Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my appearance on the late show debate comes as a result of my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) on October 22 regarding limited dividend housing, which is a program extremely vital to my district.

Further to the fact that I have been able to get some answers from the minister and his officials at the supplementary estimates meeting, which I have just left tonight, I want to try and make an impression on the parliamentary secretary as to the vital necessity of considering the part of Canada which I represent in my endeavours to bring to his attention and the attention of the House the potential development of western Newfoundland which with providing infrastructural support would make it a contributing factor towards Canada's benefit rather than to continually have to make requests for financial support towards that part of the Atlantic region.

Having regard for limited dividend housing, the main city in my district, the city of Cornerbrook, with the complete support of funding from the province is providing a regional college to look after some 500 students who will come from all parts of the west coast, and require low cost housing, but also will require accommodation for some 50 to 100 professors and their families. This, naturally, will require housing development, along with many other public services for additional citizens and children.

It is obvious then that the federal government must treat as a priority the need to provide this housing, in co-operation with the provincial government and private entrepreneurs.

This focuses attention on the flexibility of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to rise to the task, along with the government of Canada, to provide the funds and to induce contractors to enter this field and fill the need in Newfoundland and the Atlantic region generally. I point out the need to support progress, even though existing limited dividend housing in areas which already exist leave much to be desired. In referring to low cost rental housing it is obvious that the greatest need in Canada is in the field of low rental public housing for those on fixed incomes and for those having to resort to welfare.

Unfortunately, public housing has gone beyond the comprehension of the ability of provincial governments to cope with the cost. May I again use my own province as an example. Under the Newfoundland and Labrador Housing Corporation public housing is gone beyond their financial capability to cope when recent tenders have indicated that the lowest tenders offered were in the area of $45,000 per row house unit. This puts a complete block into the capability of the province and it emphasizes the need for alternative sources of housing.

It has become recognized, Mr. Speaker, if I may deal with this area of concern, that the most economical type of home which can be provided is the mobile type of home, or the prefabricated home and it is my opinion that this is the area that should be explored to try to answer the short term problem of housing.

Newfoundland has not taken advantage of co-operative housing to the extent that would help to alleviate the housing crisis, and this emphasizes the lack of communication to citizens of our country. This holds true of many parts of our country. This also emphasizes the capability of local CMHC offices to be able to serve the public who look for assistance.

Once again may I point out to the parliamentary secretary, who is to answer for the minister, as I have pointed out to officials of the department, that I commend the work done by the CMHC staff in the office in my district; but let me point out that there is an overburden of applications with which they are faced. I ask the minister to consider increasing the staff in order that more Canadians can be served in a humane and considerate manner.

I can tell him that if all agencies of government were as co-operative as the staff of the CMHC office in Corner Brook, which serves an area far beyond the call of duty, I would not be bothering the minister as much as I have done. I can only request that he make use of the advice of members opposite who have no axe to grind and who only want to serve their constituents to the best of their ability. If we all do our duty then we, as a parliament, will be performing our duty in serving the needs of our population.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the federal government is as concerned as the hon. member about increasing the supply of rental housing for low income people. I would like to take this opportunity to remind hon. members that in the past six years a larger number of units were produced than in the previous 22 years.

There has been a decline in rental starts in general and I should perhaps explain that this is attributable to a number of factors, with inflation playing the largest part, because higher interest rates, wage rates, construction costs and rent controls in some provinces have made developers wary of starting new projects. Furthermore, an increasing number of owners have been converting rental accommodation to condominiums.

[Translation]

In order to encourage the construction of new housing for average-income families, the minister announced that $50 million would be made available to builders in 10 cities across Canada for the construction of modest housing on which loans would bear interest as low as 8 per cent, provided rents are kept at levels specifically and previously agreed upon.

[English]

In other words, there is $50 million exactly for what, the hon. member is asking.

Applications for some 2,200 housing units are now being processed, under this program, with the view to approving roughly $50 million's worth of projects distributed here and there across the country, from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland. The province of Ontario is in the process of supporting this initiative completely.

Other programs are available for the construction of low-income housing, and the CMHC continues to lend its full support and encourage the provinces through loans and financial assistance to public housing. It also encourages non-profitable groups who supply rental accommodation, as well as non-profitable co-operatives by enabling them to have access to starting out funds, to loans for the full extent of the value of the loans, as well as to financial assistance representing 10 per cent of the value of the housing units.

[English]

I wish to assure the hon. member that the bulk of the CMHC programs concentrate on improving the position of people in receipt of low or fixed incomes. As to non-profit groups, not only do we subsidize their rental projects to the extent of 100 per cent but we also make grants available for the formation of such groups.

IMMIGRATION—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN NUMBER OF CHILEAN REFUGEES ADMITTED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Madam Speaker, as I rise to plead for more Canadian compassion for the many political victims and prisoners in Chile, I wish to put my remarks in the larger context of the violation of human rights sweeping the world.

Only today Amnesty International, a world-wide organization of individuals working to end political terrorism and torture, met with members of Parliament from all parties. We learned of their efforts to end torture—inflicted by governments—in the more than 30 countries where Amnesty International has affirmed the use of torture as a political instrument.

There is a new characteristic in this torture. It is used not only to obtain information but to control dissident elements in dictatorial and repressive regimes.

The World Conference of Religion for Peace, which convened recently in Belgium, has provided the same information as Amnesty International. There have been massacres and tortures in Northern Ireland, the Philippines, the Middle East and Cyprus, as well as Viet Nam and Cambodia. The escalation of violence and the continuing violation of human rights in the world led the World Conference of Religion for Peace to urge governments to construct policies "that will hold inviolate the spirit of man, and guarantee his physical and cultural wellbeing." For peace is incompatible with the violation of basic human rights.

This brings us to Chile, a country with a long democratic tradition suppressed by a four-man military junta whose continued authority lies in force. Chileans by the thousands have tried to escape from their country since the coup in September, 1973 which was followed by waves of persecution—not because they are criminals but because they oppose the draconian authoritarianism of the junta. The repression, imprisonments and tortures have become so bad that the United Nations has passed a special resolution calling on Chile to respect fundamental freedom.

On October 9, 1974, a group of 24 distinguished Canadians, representing a cross-section of leadership in the churches, labour and education, came to Parliament Hill and presented a brief to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras). This brief claimed that Canadian policy toward Chile has been inadequate to the human emergency, and that Canadian concern for the ideals of the United Nations and for social justice has not been borne out by Canadian government actions.

Specifically, the brief said that Canada had been virtually silent regarding the extinction of democratic institutions in Chile, the systematic reign of terror, the mockery of justice and brutality which has characterized the rule of the junta.

With regard to economic relations the brief charged that Canada had collaborated with multilateral organizations dominated by the United States to extend economic assistance to the junta. Canadian government institutions and Canadian business have co-operated to promote Canadian investment in Chile.

With regard to immigration, the brief charged that Canada has acted reluctantly and slowly in the refugee situation created by the coup. Only 955 Chileans were admitted to Canada in the first six months of 1974, fewer people than were admitted from Ecuador. The 955 compares with 184 for the first six months of 1973, but barely scratches the surface of this new problem. Expressed humanitarian concern by the Canadian government has been contradicted by lengthy processes and excessive security interrogations, the brief claims.

The lengthy brief and 14 recommendations, chief of which was that the government broaden its Chilean refugee program to allow 10,000 persons to enter Canada under the immigration refugee category. This special category would include people in prisons and concentration camps, those who are harassed by authorities, and those who have reached temporary shelter in third countries such as Panama, Peru and Argentina.

On October 22 I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration what response he would make to these recommendations. To this date there has been no response. But the Canadian Council of Churches, as one of the participants in the brief, has received a response from the office of the external affairs minister. It is this response that concerns me greatly and is the reason I have taken the floor tonight. For the external affairs department says the situation in Chile is normalizing and, moreover, that our support of the UN resolution demonstrates our concern for human rights in Chile.

But the situation in Chile is not normalizing, Mr. Speaker; it is getting worse. Secret trials in the Chilean navy are taking place, with the death penalty being sought. The Italian and Columbian embassies are being besieged with new refugees. Mexico has just broken relations with Chile. Not content with the 2,500 Chileans who have died violent deaths since the coup, the junta is tightening its grip. The World Council of Churches has just cabled its Canadian office to step up its support of interchurch work in Chile and Argentina, now coping with waves of arrests of ordinary workers and farmers. The World Council now estimates that there are 100,000 Chilean refugees in Argentina, 15,000 of whom are registered, which is a 50 per cent increase in the past few months.

All of this should be of great concern to the Canadian government which could provide more help than just support of a UN resolution. If we are not going to reappraise our economic relations with Chile so that we get out of the invidious position of supporting repression, could we not at least open our doors a bit wider? The Chilean government has offered to release political prisoners who have a country to go to. Surely our response can be a bit better than the assurance of the immigration minister that Canada's special immigration office in Santiago will remain open. The brief presented to the government goes much deeper into the problem and requires a better response than the minister's bland assurance that applications from refugees will be processed.

I have met some of the Chileans who have fled to Canada. They are professional, and middle class and labour people whose only crime was that they wanted to be free. Certainly, strict security measures must be enforced—and they are. In one group of 12,165 Chilean applicants, only 45 were rejected for security reasons, but very few of the others were admitted to Canada.

We should rid our minds of the idea that the Chilean refugees are communists or Marxists. Just because the slain Salvadore Allende headed a Marxist regime, it does not make all Chileans ideological communists. As the Rev. John Zimmerman, executive secretary of the Lutheran Council of Canada, noted when he came to Parliament Hill with the delegation, these people would, if they lived in Canada, be ordinary members of labour groups. They are certainly no more dangerous to Canadian life than the Hungarians, Czechs and Ugandans that Canada took in during their time of ordeal.

Canada has a well-deserved reputation for compassion. We have an economically and socially strong society to back up that reputation. Today another group of oppressed people, the Chileans, look to us for help.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member on behalf of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), who could not be here tonight. First of all may I say that Canada's effort was among the most active of any of the countries which established processing facilities in Chile to admit refugees for permanent resettlement, as is evidenced by the large number of persons authorized to come to Canada. Our effort in this case has been based on humanitarian considerations.

With particular reference to the brief referred to by the hon. member, presented a short while ago by the Canadian Council of Churches and other organizations to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, their recommendations are being reviewed and a reply will be sent to them shortly.

However, I should like to put on the record the fact that, following the coup in Chile last September, the Department of Manpower and Immigration immediately established a full processing capacity in Santiago. Because of this special effort it was possible to process applications in an expeditious manner and to meet deadlines as they arose. Although normal immigration, medical and background checks are, of course, continued even in movements of this kind, the norms of assessment were relaxed as they have been in other such similar situations. In addition, special concessions were made by allowing some people to come forward before their examinations were completed rather than risk the possible consequences of further delay.

Departmental officers worked in close co-operation with representatives of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, as well as other interested groups in making known the Canadian government's willingness to accept refugees, and our officials visited persons in camps in various countries to conduct interviews. During January, 1974, an armed forced aircraft on a training flight was diverted to Santiago when commercial services proved inadequate to move people quickly enough to safety, and 170 persons arrived on the flight.

To date, Mr. Speaker, applications have been received from about 4,000 Chileans who come within the United Nations definition of "refugee". Of these, more than 1,500 have been authorized to enter Canada, and more than 850 have already arrived as immigrants. About 750 have withdrawn their applications, and slightly more than 550 have been refused because of adverse background or character reports, or because they could not meet even the relaxed selection criteria used to assess the likelihood that they could successfully settle in Canada—for example, total illiteracy. About 1,150 are still in process.

The full range of services normally extended to refugees, such as transportation assistance, language training, employment counselling and placement, and, in emergency situations, financial aid, is available to these people.

One question that has been asked from time to time is that, if over 2,700 persons from Chile have been authorized to enter Canada since September, 1973, why have only 1,250 done so? There is of course more than one answer to this question, but such things as acceptance by another preferred country or a change of heart would probably account for most of these cases.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WOOLLIAMS—TIME ALLOCATION FOR STUDY OF ESTIMATES IN COMMITTEE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of all parliamentarians. I served written notice of it on Mr. Speaker this morning.

Before I go into my question of privilege, I think that as the first speaker in the House today I would like to congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Jerome on the arrival of the new nine-pound baby girl who will be the new Speaker in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Probably a loudspeaker before then.

Mr. Woolliams: My question of privilege arises from the procedure now being followed in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. In a few moments I will submit that we have been denied our rights to carry out our proper function as members of the opposition which is to prod the government into action when that is necessary, to criticize the government constructively, and to offer positive suggestions.

The rules as set out assign a ten minute period to each member to question a particular minister in reference to the estimates of his department. Last night members were questioning the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) on the estimates of his department. Each member has an equal time of only ten minutes. Before the rules were changed removing the estimates from the House, the committee of the whole used to consider estimates. Then, they were transferred under the new rules to the standing committee. When the committee of the whole used to consider estimates, if we did not get the answers, we told the minister in no uncertain terms that unless we got answers to our questions, the estimates would not be approved.

Under the new rules, members are allotted two hours to consider the estimates of each department. If each member is allotted 10 minutes, it means also that the official spokesmen of the opposition parties are allowed 10 minutes each and the time can be taken up by the majority made up of government members so that the opposition members are never able to prod the government into action or to seek information. Therefore, the whole committee system becomes a farce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: When we considered estimates in committee of the whole House, spokesmen for the official opposition had equal time with government members and were thus able to prod the government into action or to question ministers. Speaking of the functions of the official opposition and other opposition members, a former prime minister and former leader of the opposition, the late Lester B. Pearson once quoted another parliamentarian who said:

> If parliament is to be preserved as a living institution, His Majesty's loyal opposition must fearlessly perform its functions. When it properly discharges them the preservation of our freedom is assured. The reading of history proves that freedom always dies when criticism ends. It upholds and maintains the rights of minorities against majorities. It must be vigilant against oppression and unjust invasions by the cabinet of the rights of the people. It should supervise all expenditures and prevent over-expenditure by exposing to the light of public opinion wasteful expenditures or worse. It finds fault; it suggests amendments; it asks questions and elicits information; it arouses, educates and molds public opinion by voice and vote. It must scrutinize every action by the government and in doing so prevents the short-cuts through democratic procedure that governments like to make.

In the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said there would be reform. If this is the reform, the result is that parliament cannot control government expenditure.

What is the main function of parliament, Mr. Speaker? Is it to control expenditures? If we lose control of the purse strings any government can ride slipshod over parliament and the people of Canada. This system is a sham. I do not know who made the rule that each member of parliament has ten minutes to speak but that is how it works in practice. One member from the opposition gets his ten minutes, then it is the turn of a majority of members from the government who have a love-in with the government—naturally they have a love-in—and it is in their interest to maintain the government.

How can we prod the government into action? How can we elicit information if we are only given ten minutes to study and consider millions of dollars worth of estimates, $1,750 million worth. Mr. Speaker, the committee system is a farce under this government.

Mr. Speaker, I consider this matter affects the right of members of parliament to do their duty and accept responsibility for Canadians. Last night I was denied the right, as were other members of the opposition, to elicit information from the Secretary of State. We asked one question and he was very courteous and made a beautiful speech but gave us no information. It was a sham and a waste of time.

If Your Honour finds that I have made a prima facie case for the rights of members of parliament, I am prepared to make a motion to refer what happened last night to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have a motion prepared.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, from the remarks of the hon. member, I think it is quite clear that what he is complaining about is the rules which the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates have adopted to control their own procedure.

Mr. Woolliams: Huh!

Mr. Reid: It is my understanding that those rules were adopted in the previous parliament. They were adopted at a time when the government did not have a majority on that committee and they were adopted by all members of that committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: They are not binding on this parliament.

Mr. Reid: The second point that should be made is that the use of the time available to a party in the House of Commons or its committee is a decision to be taken by that political party. If the political party of my hon. friend does not see fit to give him the opportunity to speak at a given time and prefers to put forward other people, that is the privilege of that party. The decision rests not with the House of Commons but with his own colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what the rules are, I submit to Your Honour and the House that it was never the intention to have the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee consider, within the narrow time frame prescribed by the rules, estimates to the extent of $1,750 million. I submit it was never intended, when the new rules were brought in, that the time which parliament had for considering the important business of supply should be so narrowed down. I submit what we are talking about is the management of House business. The other important standing committees of the House are not working at present and the government House leader could have broken down these estimates and referred them to the various standing committees of the House. This would have given all members a better opportunity to discharge their important responsibilities in examining estimates of the House and to conduct in a sensible way the business of supply.

● (1120)

We are not saying that the rules have been infringed; we are saying the rules have been abused. The business of the House has been mismanaged, as shown by the fact that the miscellaneous estimates committee was given the responsibility of considering, within a narrow time frame, estimates to the extent of $1,750 million. That sort of thing was never intended when the rules were changed.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I join with my hon. friends opposite in expressing dissatisfaction with the present rules of the House. I hope they will join with us in making them more suitable, both for the government and for the opposition. I quite agree that one of the main functions of parliament is that of approving supply. That is how the opposition can examine the government and demand answers and I, myself, am dissatisfied with present procedures. I hope that the suggested amendment, and many others of equal importance, will receive the careful consideration of the committee.

Mr. McKinley: And I hope we are given better answers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If there are no further comments, the Chair must decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. I might say that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise this important question. I feel that the work of the committees is important, especially when it concerns examination of estimates, which is the fundamental business of parliament. I understand the concern of the hon. member for Calgary North and of others who have contributed to this short procedural debate. On the other hand, I must make up my mind and base my decision on the rules of the House. That is what makes my task difficult. The hon. member said that if I should find that he has a prima facie case, that there is a legitimate question of privilege, he will be prepared to move a motion. I do not think I can allow him to do so at this time.

I must refer the hon. member to our Standing Orders, in accordance with which the Chair must rule. The hon. member may have a grievance in connection with the operations of the committee, but that does not prevent the Chair from abiding by the Standing Orders which govern the operations of the House. Standing Order 65(11) reads:

> The chairman of a standing or special committee shall maintain order in the committees; deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the committee; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the House, on receiving a report thereof.

May I also refer the hon. member to citation 324 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, found at page 251. It reads:

> (1) Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the Table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.
> (2) When the evidence is before the House it may be debated at length, but members will not be permitted to discuss the conduct or language of members of the committee, except so far as it appears on the record.

That is to say, the hon. member may have a valid grievance, but the Standing Order prevents my considering his grievance at this time. I call it a grievance, and not even a question of privilege in connection with which the Chair must find a prima facie case in order to allow the hon. member to move his motion.

I refer the hon. member to previous rulings. One was made on Wednesday of this past week, when the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) raised a similar, alleged question of privilege concerning the operations of the committee. I would also refer the hon. member to another case. On December 4, 1973, when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raised a question of privilege with regard to the operations of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, alleging that the chairman of that committee prevented him from raising points of order in the committee. The decision of the Speaker in both cases was very clear, that it is a well established practice that committee proceedings cannot be brought into the consideration of the House of Commons, except by way of a report from a committee.

At the same time, I am sure hon. members appreciate the intervention today and last Wednesday by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) when he more or less indicated the goodwill of the government to improve the proceedings and rules followed in committee operations. Having said that, I must with regret reject the question of privilege of the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, there is a small point arising out of the comments of the parliamentary secretary to the House leader. At no time did I approve the 10 minute rule and at no time did I approve moving all the estimates out of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: I want that on the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now entering into debate. This is not the time to do that.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE LATE RIGHT HON. SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL

TRIBUTE ON ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTHDAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter which most nearly touches the heart and spirit of this House, a matter which we share with parliamentary institutions everywhere in the free world. Tomorrow, November 30, is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill.

There are times in the life of every institution, as in the life of every man, when the spirit flags and almost fails. Then, that institution is fortunate if there comes a man, who can by the indomitable vigor of his own heart and spirit breathe new life into that institution and give it a new hope.

At such a time in the life of these Houses of Parliament came Sir Winston Churchill to speak in this chamber on December 30, 1941 to the members of this House and of the Senate. He was introduced by the then Prime Minister, the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who told this House and all Canada that "in the gravest crisis in the history of the world Canada was honoured by the presence in her halls of Parliament of the man who, by his clear vision, undaunted courage, inspired utterance, and heroic spirit has given such incomparable leadership to the hosts of freedom." Then, this chamber heard that retort to the contemptuous threat that "in three weeks, England will have her neck wrung like a chicken", that retort which from the walls of this chamber echoed round the world, "Some chicken; some neck".

It was a battle cry from a House of Commons man, delivered in this House of Commons, which gave new heart, new spirit and new hope to the institutions of parliamentary democracy throughout the free world and to the forces of freedom fighting in the dark of the underground behind the Iron Curtain. In these days of a less heroic and less dramatic crisis, let us take heart from the remembrance of that occasion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That this House pays tribute to the memory of a House of Commons man, the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill, on the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth and requests Mr. Speaker to convey the text of this resolution to his widow, the Lady Clementine Churchill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. This motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

● (1130)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This motion should have been made on motions, so the House will revert to the presentation of reports from standing and special committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section (2) of Standing Order 21, this notice of motion is transferred to, and ordered for, consideration under Government Orders at the next sitting of the House.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUGGESTED CESSATION OF CONFRONTATION OF PROVINCES ON OIL REVENUES AND INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAM TO DEAL WITH RECESSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that information released by Statistics Canada today shows that for the third quarter in a row there has been no economic growth, thus indicating that this country is indeed officially, as in fact, in a recession, information that was obviously in the possession of the Prime Minister last Wednesday when he made his great statement that "Canadians have contributed to the impressive performance of the national economy and I should like to draw particular attention to the singularly effective contribution of my colleague the Minister of Finance"—a statement which, in light of the facts of today, is in singularly questionable taste—will the Prime Minister at this time cease this senseless confrontation with the provinces, which is obviously a diversion, and try to come to the bargaining table; and would he instruct the Minister of Finance to put before the country some program of anti-recession?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have no confrontation, and are seeking no confrontation, with the provinces. We may have a confrontation with the opposition because of its lack of ability to take any position. We hope that if there is such a confrontation with the opposition it will force the Conservative party in particular to line up with Canada or to line up against it.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, as usual, has evaded the main question which was asked. Is he able or does he want to answer the question I asked? Is the Prime Minister going to stop this confrontation, and in particular is he going to instruct the Minister of Finance to bring in a suitable program of anti-recession which this country so badly needs?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member wants to continue the budget debate. Certainly, there is puzzlement in my mind as to why he wants to ask the Minister of Finance to change a budgetary policy which we think is good for the country and will continue to be good for the country. I repeat I am puzzled why the hon. member wants to reopen the budget debate at this time. He had ample opportunity to make his points during the six days of that debate.

As far as growth is concerned, the hon. member should realize that on a year over year basis the real growth in the GNP has been 3.2 per cent.

ALLEGATION GROWTH OF IMPORTS EXCEEDS EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ACHIEVE BALANCE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the decline in the GNP for the last quarter is due largely to deterioration in our trade balance, with the growth of imports exceeding that of exports, may I ask the minister whose responsibility this is, what steps he has taken to improve this balance?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Canada is running a favourable merchandise trade surplus. I expect that by the end of the year it will be higher than it is at the present time.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

STATISTICS CANADA

SUGGESTION INSTRUCTIONS ISSUED TO WITHHOLD ISSUANCE OF REPORT ON GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister who is responsible and reports to the House for Statistics Canada whether he issued any instructions to Statistics Canada to withhold release of information on the GNP which was due to be released on Wednesday in order that the Prime Minister might be able to make the speech that he made in the House last Wednesday. Was there interference with the release of this information?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That is an outrageous suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the minister says that is an outrageous suggestion. I should like to quote from a Canadian Press despatch to the effect that Statistics Canada had originally reported that the third quarter GNP figures were due for release on Wednesday but that they were withheld because the Prime Minister was due to speak on that day. I ask the minister whether he can assure this House that there was in fact no interference with the release of this information by Statistics Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. On the point of order, the hon. member will admit that the point he is raising has nothing to do with the workings and functioning of this House. The Chair can only go by the rules and make decisions on the functioning of the House.

ENERGY

URANIUM—ALLEGATION ONE AND A HALF MILLION POUNDS OF CONCENTRATE UNACCOUNTED FOR

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. According to the report of the Auditor General, it appears that 1½ million pounds of uranium concentrate has been unaccounted for. In view of the stringent export safeguards on uranium, may I ask the Prime Minister how it is possible for the Atomic Energy Control Board to have handled this matter in such a slipshod and haphazard manner?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by department officials that certain sales contracts of uranium concentrates to which Uranium Canada was party were sent to a United States plant for conversion to uranium hexafloride before going on to the ultimate purchaser. The board of directors of Uranium Canada decided to make an on the spot inspection of these inventories. The inspection was carried out on September 23 and 24 of this year by representatives of Uranium Canada, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and at the invitation of the Uranium Canada, officials from the Auditor General's department. These representatives carried out their inspection and were satisfied with the results of that inspection.

URANIUM—SHIPMENTS TO SPAIN—ASSURANCE OF PROPER SAFEGUARDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I will direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the interest that I know he has in this matter and the widespread concern of the Canadian people regarding the precarious international situation and the danger of exporting uranium that could be used for warlike purposes, and since this shipment to which the Auditor General refers was only part of the shipment of 5.6 million pounds of uranium which was stockpiled and committed to Spain, may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether we are shipping uranium to Spain?

If that is so, does the Canadian government have any agreement with Spain to ensure that this uranium will not be used for other than peaceful purposes, and particularly to ensure that none of the by-products such as plutonium will be trans-shipped to another country, especially in the Middle East where there is such a dangerous situation today?

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of this question and bring it to the attention of the minister so that he may respond to the hon. member.

POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF ENRICHED URANIUM PLANT IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister will give us some assurance that these safeguards are being used effectively. We have been told about the safeguards but so far we have not seen the new regulations. Let me ask the Prime Minister something he might be willing to answer. Have any representatives of his government, the government of the province of Quebec and a French company been carrying on discussions with regard to the establishment in Canada of a uranium enrichment plant and if so, at what stage are these discussions at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in saying that the government is very concerned with the problems in respect of exporting fissionable materials. We do apply our safeguards with utmost care. I am sure that applies in the case of exports to Spain but, as the parliamentary secretary has said, I will check further into the matter to see if there is any particular aspect of it which should be made known to the House.

In so far as the more particular question about enriched uranium in Quebec is concerned, I replied the other day in this House that the subject had been raised between the French authorities and myself at the time of our visit, and it had been followed up by a visit to France by the Canadian part of the team that was going to look into the whole problem of energy as it interests France and Canada. I also talked to the premier of Quebec. I am repeating what I said the other day, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps the hon. member did not hear this. In so far as we are concerned, we are not negotiating any such agreement with France. The only stage we have reached is one of explaining our policies which are, as I have just explained, with regard to safeguards and other matters.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEASURES TO ACHIEVE NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Has he received any indications that some agitators, like the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, who preaches separatism in the province of Alberta, will finally understand the importance of national unity and the future of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to my mind, I believe that, fundamentally, the leader of the Social Credit will find that I agree fully with him on the basic question, but as for the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, I gave up any hope in his future a long time ago.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Following his speech the day before yesterday, has the Prime Minister spoken to the Alberta premier, and if so, is there any hope for better understanding than that we have witnessed in the last few days?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken to the Alberta premier. It may be that he has become acquainted with certain elements of my speech. But I must add that he wrote to me earlier in the week. I intend to answer his letter, naturally, and in that reply I shall repeat some of the arguments I put to the House.

HOUSING

REDUCTION IN HOUSING STARTS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the report by Statistics Canada for the third quarter shows a gross national product growth of zero, and that the weakness stemmed from the housing component which was down 4.9 per cent in current dollars and 10.6 per cent in real terms, with housing starts down 15 per cent, and with a decline in housing starts in the third quarter of 22.9 per cent—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would put this question to the minister of state responsible for housing along the lines of one I put to the minister last night, and I might say that I am not dealing with AHOP, I am dealing with that large segment which provides loans for the financing of most homes in Canada. Has the government any plans to solve the housing crisis in light of these figures which are applicable not only to the major cities but throughout Canada? Perhaps I should also mention that there is a vacancy rate in Canada of only 2 per cent in rental accommodation, combined with the fact that housing starts are down, and a prediction by the Conference Board of Canada that housing starts may be as low as 175,000. What real plans has the government got?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly we have a number of plans, not excluding AHOP, which will alleviate the housing problem so that it does not become a crisis in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: It is already a crisis.

Mr. Danson: These plans include one of the most successful programs in the history of this government in housing, AHOP. More specifically, we are addressing ourselves to the most serious aspect of the housing shortage in this country which is rental accommodation for the coming year, with the limited dividend rental housing and the expanded limited dividend rental housing which I referred to in my address in the House on the budget on Monday, which I would commend to the hon. member for reading.

I might say that this shows real progress in the housing field generally, as well as in other fields, including rural and native housing, rehabilitation of houses, senior citizen housing, non-profit housing, co-operative housing and a long list of programs which I am sure I could not cover in a short time during question period but which I would be delighted to review with the hon. member if he has two or three hours he would like to spend for that purpose.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

SUGGESTION PRIVATE LENDING INSTITUTIONS MAKE MORTGAGE MONEY AVAILABLE AT LOW INTEREST RATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister in that I have really found out now what his program is; it is a program of words but no action.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should now like to—

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: Hold on, my good friend, and you will get the question. I should like to know whether the minister would consider getting together with the Minister of Finance and the two of them suggesting that the lending institutions in this country put a large portion, or some portion at least, of their lending capital into housing at a reasonable rate of interest, perhaps 8 per cent instead of the 11¼ per cent we have heard about in relation to AHOP, so builders can increase the supply of houses for the 70 per cent of Canadians who cannot afford to purchase homes at the present time?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that great number of words relates to over a billion dollars worth of Canadian housing. If the hon. member had been listening to my answers in the committee last night and my speech last Monday, he would know that the effective interest rates under AHOP are down to 8 per cent and well below that in the case of special needs; down to 6 per cent and even 4 per cent in some cases, depending on the family size and the location. In addition to that, I hope to be introducing to the House my new housing programs, alluded to on Monday, within the next two weeks.

Mr. Woolliams: Those are the peanut programs.

Mr. Danson: These will deal with the interest rates in so far as the private sector is concerned, directing a large amount of mortgage money from the private sector at a minimum cost to the taxpayer.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

MRS. JANE DOBELL—SUGGESTED CONFLICT BY REASON OF EMPLOYMENT IN PUBLIC SERVICE AND MEMBER OF OTTAWA SCHOOL BOARD

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that Mrs. Jane Dobell is running for re-election to the Ottawa school board, which is heavily subsidized by the federal government, and as Mrs. Dobell has now been appointed by the Secretary of State as director general of the language training program, does the Prime Minister not consider this to involve a conflict of interest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I had no knowledge of these facts, Mr. Speaker, but I will look into them. I must say, however, at first glance, that I cannot see the conflict of interest that the hon. member seems to see.

Mr. McKenzie: Since the federal government gives considerable funds to the Ottawa School Board for language training and as Mrs. Dobell will be director of the language training program, this would be a conflict. She is running for the School Board—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is arguing his case, not asking a question.

Mr. Trudeau: If I understand the question correctly, there might be something there to be decided by the people who have the right to cast a vote or by the people in the School Board. However, I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that we should cease to make these grants for French language training.

An hon. Member: That's nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: Why would we have the conflict?

Mr. Baldwin: There are so few areas where you do not have conflicts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: The hon. member is not wearing a tie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. members are drawing my attention to the fact that the hon. member is not properly dressed according to the customs of the House. Unless he adheres to that custom, I cannot recognize him. I would therefore ask him to retire temporarily and return wearing a tie, otherwise I will not be able to recognize him.

Mr. La Salle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have understood the Chair, but I would like to point out that I am wearing a much wider tie than any other member in the House.

Some hon. Members: Go and dress up!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask the Chair to alter the customs of the House. We usually ask male members to wear a tie. It is practically part of our institution. I think it would be easy for the hon. member to get a tie at his office and come back. I will then be prepared to recognize him immediately.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair does not intend to discuss the matter nor to recognize the member as long as he does not comply with my decision. I therefore recognize the hon. member—

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

SUGGESTION BY AUDITOR GENERAL CORPORATION IMPROPERLY RETAINING PUBLIC FUNDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Supply and Services, but in his absence I will direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. Considering that the Auditor General has maintained in three successive reports that the Canadian Commercial Corporation has been improperly retaining public funds, does the minister plan to give any direction at all to officials to remedy this serious flaw in public administration?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am still reading the report. As soon as I am aware of its content, I shall see what I can do to comply with the terms the Auditor General is demanding about management within the government, and I shall see what recommendations, if any, I may have to make.

[English]

Mr. Crouse: In view of the fact that nothing has been done about this improper procedure for three years, would the minister tell the House whether it is the policy of the government to ignore the recommendations of the Auditor General, and does the minister believe that the Canadian Commercial Corporation should retain funds which should have been properly credited to the Consolidated Revenue Fund?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we intend to comply as much as possible with the Auditor General's recommendations. I do not know about this case, I am studying it, and I shall report to the committee under the chairmanship of the hon. member as soon as I can come to a decision.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—REASON FOR RESTRICTIVE TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR JUDGE ESTEY'S INQUIRY INTO PRICES AND PROFITS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the terms of reference for Judge Estey in the steel profits inquiry limited him in question No. 1 to examine only price increases after May 15, 1974, and therefore the judge did not examine 12 price increases from January to May, can the minister explain why the terms of reference were so restrictive?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): On the contrary, I think that the terms of reference are broad. There were three particular questions to which Judge Estey addressed himself, and he set out his reasons in some considerable depth.

Mr. Symes: The minister seems to be confusing specific price increases with general profit increases. In view of the fact that even though Judge Estey could not examine the problem of price leadership and comparative profit margins on individual products, he has concluded that the steel companies are at such a high level of profit taking that further price increases not related to cost would be profiteering, will the minister now initiate a full and ongoing inquiry into steel pricing?

Mr. Gillespie: Quite clearly, the report of Judge Estey dealt with a very wide review of the pricing practices of the industry over a very long period of time and thus has covered the situation. I would recommend it as reading matter to members who are interested in pursuing this question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED DISCONTINUANCE OF AID PROGRAMS TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES WHOSE OIL RESERVES HAVE INCREASED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence may I direct it to the President of the Privy Council who is the acting minister. In view of the fact that the oil exporting nations of Nigeria, Indonesia and Algeria are receiving more than $84 million under Canadian foreign aid programs and have been experiencing large increases in revenues for oil exports for more than a year now, will the minister explain to the House why the fact was recognized only recently and why an investigation had not begun several months earlier?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, when the present oil situation developed and prices went up, and when supplies of oil were found in some of the underdeveloped countries of the world, this question was examined very carefully in the CIDA administration, and the decisions that were made were made with the full knowledge of the facts and for reasons that I am quite sure my colleague or the president of CIDA would be happy to explain at a suitable time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In view of the fact that this particular review to which the minister refers in his answer is under way, will he inform the House whether or not aid has been temporarily suspended pending the investigation's outcome and, if not, why not?

Mr. Sharp: I would not attempt to answer that question in detail, but I would like to make this general comment, that there were certain programs under way that were very useful in the development of those countries which, while they have new revenues and oil which they did not have before, are still by our standards or by standards prevailing in the world very much underdeveloped. I am quite sure that Canadians would wish to continue these programs that are already under way. Moreover, one of the purposes of the programs that are under way is to bring these countries to a position of being no longer dependent upon aid. Then, we will have fulfilled our purpose.

AGRICULTURE

PURPOSE OF COMMITMENT OF FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS, EMERGENCY FOOD RELIEF OR DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture relating to the world food conference where the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated the reallocation of $50 million for development assistance and subsequently, in reply to a question in the House on emergency food relief indicated that it was $50 million available for emergency food relief, could the Minister of Agriculture tell the House whether there are two amounts of $50 million, one for emergency food relief and the other for development assistance, or is it one single $50 million sum for reallocation to CIDA?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member put that question to the minister in charge of the fund, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question to the same minister. In light of the minister's statement in, I believe, Belleville earlier this week to the effect that we are helping people in developing countries learn how to feed themselves and that is the reason behind the additional $50 million grant Canada is giving, may I ask if the $50 million the minister referred to in Belleville is the same $50 million to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs alluded in Rome? If so, is it the minister's position that the entire $50 million should go to assist developing countries in their food production or is it his position that part of it should go to emergency food relief?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to notes I used for a speech at Belleville. If he was not there to hear it in total I am sure I can give him the tape and he can listen to it.

An hon. Member: We get enough of that.

Mr. Whelan: He knows what the $50 million fund is. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs could be more specific, but this is being redirected to helping people feed themselves. I am sure the hon. member is also aware that we have been doing this to a greater extent on a bilateral basis than many other nations of the world and we will continue to do it. The government is searching for more funds to provide relief in a better fashion than we have in the past.

POSSIBLE AUDIT OF STATEMENT OF HOLDINGS OF CABINET MINISTERS—ASSURANCE OF NO CONFLICT THROUGH MEMBERS OF FAMILY

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the subject of conflict of interest and the guidelines currently in force. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether an audit has been conducted on the statements made by cabinet ministers with respect to their holdings, to ensure that their statements are accurate and complete?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what type of audit the hon. member has in mind. Certainly, it would be fair to say that the whole basis of the conflict of interest guidelines that we have proposed, not only for ministers but for members of parliament and civil servants, is based on the honour system rather than on the audit system. I certainly think this is the proper procedure and I repeat what I said earlier: If the House of Commons wants to take a different approach to this and depart from the honour system toward an investigative system, obviously as members of parliament and ministers we will have to adopt that system. This is not the government's inclination but if it is the Tory inclination, I hope they will say so and act in consequence.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Although under the conflict of interest guidelines there is no explicit provision for the need to deal with the potential conflict of spouses and other members of a family, has the Prime Minister privately assured himself that no member of cabinet has an interim conflict of interest through a member of his family?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the position we take on spouses and members of the family is the one that I enunciated in this House and outside the House on several occasions.

An hon. Member: No position.

Mr. Trudeau: It is a position that the evolving standards in Canada are such that we could expect that a spouse will have a right to an independent career and activities.

An hon. Member: Nonsense!

Mr. Trudeau: This position is not universally shared and certainly it is not the position of the Tory Party. Probably that is why they elected so few women members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: We have quality, not quantity.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board regarding a very critical situation. I know the matter of the grain inspectors' strike has been brought up before but the only action we see is the wringing of hands by officials of the minister's department. If the strike is not soon settled there will be no wheat in eastern Canada to make flour of grain for feeding livestock. Can the minister give the House an up to date report on this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Tom O'Connor was appointed yesterday to act as mediator in this conflict. He conferred with the parties all day yesterday; he is meeting with them again today, and I hope he will make progress. This is the only report I can make to the House at this time. I am quite concerned too about this situation, but we must recognize that the workers involved have the right to strike, a right which was given to them by the Parliament of Canada.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, we do not argue with the right of these people to strike, but we would like to impress upon the minister the seriousness of the situation and request that he ask his negotiator to proceed in all haste and earnestness.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Even supplementaries have to be questions and not statements. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

UNITED STATES IMPORT QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—MEETINGS WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID PRODUCERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister provide the House with further information regarding the meeting on Wednesday between Canadian and United States officials regarding the beef situation? Can the minister say whether he is prepared to meet with the United States Secretary of Agriculture Earl Butz and, if so, what specific proposals will he take to that meeting?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, our officials did meet with the United States officials to discuss our quota programs and the programs they have. Until the discussions are finalized there is not much more I can say. Discussions are continuing.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the outcome of this situation may take some time to emerge, can the minister tell the House what specific proposals he had in mind to help beef and particularly hog producers who find themselves in a very difficult situation?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, we are trying to work out programs to make sure that this industry does not suffer unduly but such plans have not been finalized. We do not foresee any great difficulty for the pork industry in Canada, however. I might say that we have found a home through foreign aid for some of the beef and we are still exploring other foreign aid programs and sale programs in other countries for beef.

EGGS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH ANTICIPATED SURPLUS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. In view of the 90 million egg surplus anticipated by the Canadian egg marketing agency for the coming year, may I ask the minister if he is taking steps to ensure that some of that surplus production goes into foreign aid and not into inadequate storage to be allowed to rot again?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think anyone who has anything to do with food production does not like to see it rot and will do their darndest to make sure that does not happen. I can say this about egg production, however, I am optimistic. According to inquiries not only for foreign aid but for foreign trade we will be in a better position than we have been for many months.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED SMUGGLING OF NARCOTICS INTO HAMILTON BY PLANE—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and arises out of published reports that a DC-3 aircraft piloted by a veteran Vietnam pilot accustomed to dodging radar has been making clandestine pre-dawn flights into Hamilton civil airport as part of a sophisticated narcotics smuggling racket. Is the minister in a position to advise the House whether the RCMP is aware of this situation and what action, if any, is planned?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have had no report on that particular situation. I will get some information and report to the House.

HOUSING

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO INCREASE AVAILABILITY—SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the fact it now appears that the government's efforts to improve the housing situation in Canada are doomed to failure because of persistently high mortgage interest rates and accelerating property costs, and because recent surveys have indicated that as many as 70 per cent of Canadian families cannot afford to purchase homes despite the fact that 23 per cent of these families have incomes of $15,000 or more, will the minister inform the House of the measures he intends to take to rectify this situation and to ensure that all Canadians are properly housed?

● (1210)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not acknowledge that our efforts are doomed to failure. I enumerated certain measures in committee last night, when the hon. member was present, and I mentioned some of them to the hon. member for Calgary North. There are a number of programs in this area, including the continuation of the Assisted Home Ownership Program, and the Limited Dividend Rental Program. The extension of these programs will bring more private sector money into mortgages and investments. Then, one must remember the budgetary measures, which include the writing off of capital cost allowances against other income, to allow more investment by those in the private sector in multiple rental dwellings, the savings features in the budget, which will enable people to buy more homes, the senior citizens housing program, which has high priority, rural and native housing, co-operative housing programs, which are moving along reasonably well, non-profit housing and land assembly programs, sewage programs, servicing programs—

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Darling: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider the implementation of a special program which will either lower or subsidize interest rates for builders in the conventional mortgage market, in an effort to spur housing construction and accelerate supply to a level which will induce lower mortgage interest rates for Canadians in general.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, a good many programs are directed to that end and concentrate on low income groups and high cost areas. I think the hon. member might be interested—because one cannot do everything at once—in a little piece of paper I carry in my wallet. It has figures on it which all of us should bear in mind when we think of housing. It says that 800,000 households in Canada spend more than 25 per cent of their gross income on shelter—that disturbs me—almost 440,000 households spend 35 per cent of their income on shelter and 107,000 tenant families had incomes under $3,000 and paid over 50 per cent of their income for housing. That bothers me, and these are the people I want to look after first.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF HONG KONG VETERANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As the government House leader, when answering my question yesterday, described as bad news the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was studying a proposal made by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs for an increase in the pensions of Hong Kong veterans, can the minister say if this means that he has rejected the proposal made unanimously by that committee, or whether it is still under favourable consideration.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under consideration. I have been looking at this question. It all takes time. My department is considering this matter, and if something is decided at a later date I will be glad to inform the House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BANGLADESH—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE FOOD REACHES THOSE IN NEED

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence, may I address it to the acting minister. In view of reports that a big proportion of Canadian wheat sent to feed the starving people of Bangladesh is being smuggled for high profits across the border to India or stolen by black marketeers, will the minister describe the precautions which are being taken to ensure that Canadian food aid reaches those in Bangladesh who most need it.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice. I know that my colleague in the administration is doing everything possible to see that the wheat is delivered to those most in need. I am sure that the hon. member will agree, however, that one must always work through the authorities in other countries. That is the kind of courtesy for which we would ask and it is one that we accord to those whom we are trying to help.

Mr. Patterson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Apparently the Red Cross insists on accompanying all shipments of aid to their destination, to ensure proper delivery. Will the government consider taking similar precautions in order that Canadian aid made available through government sources shall reach those for whom it is destined.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the answer must be that this can only be done with the agreement of the country concerned.

TRANSPORT

COMPENSATION TO RAILWAYS FOR LOSSES SUFFERED AS RESULT OF FREIGHT RATE FREEZE—SUGGESTED SIMILAR ACTION FOR TRUCKERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the railway freight rate freeze and the fact that the current estimates provide for a payment of $118 million to the railway companies to make up for losses they suffered as a result of the freeze, in addition to the $41 million provided for in the previous supplementary estimates. Is the Minister of Transport considering the provision of similar benefits to the trucking industry, as that industry, too, has been affected by the railway freight freeze, and faced by escalating costs of operation.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received no complaints from the trucking industry. The agreement alluded to was made by the railways, through letters sent to me. I do not know if the truckers have increased their rates, but I do not see why I should offer anything to the truckers who have not asked for anything.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister's answer was amusing, because it shows either that he does not know what is going on within his department or that he has suffered from a lapse of memory. If he checks he will find that as far back as February, 1973 and December, 1973 ongoing discussions were taking place on the subject. Is the minister not going to treat the trucking industry in the same way he is treating the railway industry?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, one reason for lifting the rate freeze was that such action would place the trucking industry in a position to compete with the railways.

Mr. Mazankowski: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister not respond to the request made by trucking companies to him, personally, and to members of his department?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON METHODS OF PREVENTING VIOLATIONS OF ICNAF AGREEMENT ON QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the question period must be nearly over. My question is for the Minister of State responsible for fisheries. About ten days ago he said that if I would wait a couple of days he would inform me of the results of the ICNAF conference, and particularly of the decision on quotas. Will he now say if any decision has been reached on methods to prevent violations of the ICNAF agreement? I have in mind what happened last year, when the Soviet fishing fleet overfished herring off the Grand Banks.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's efforts to be recognized were recognized on my side, too. I had hoped to convey my information to him earlier. The quotas—I think he is interested particularly in the herring quotas pertaining to the Georges Bank—were discussed recently at ICNAF meetings in Miami. It was agreed that the quotas in 1975 should remain unchanged from those agreed to in 1974. However, for other stocks, some extension of prohibited areas and the extension of the time when fishing may not take place were agreed to. Consultations with fishermen of the area who fish off southwest Nova Scotia convinced us that we will avoid some discarding of haddock, as we had to do under the regulations, and to diminish this waste of food, which we do not want to tolerate in any way.

As to the other point, the regulations will come up for consideration at the next meeting in Bergen, Norway, and also at the Edinburgh meeting in June. We are not satisfied that all regulations are properly observed and we will be making more representations in this area.

Mr. Marshall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On the basis of the agreement reached by all nations, will the minister say what action the Canadian government will take, in addition to boarding foreign vessels, inspecting their catch and determining by what extent they have exceeded quotas, in cases when foreign vessels have taken more than their quota and have over-fished.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, under present ICNAF regulations, any country which violates the regulations can be called to task at the ICNAF meeting itself. At the moment there is no other recourse. We hope, eventually, that management zones off our own coast, under the Law of the Sea will give us much more clout.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PROPOSAL TO PUT MORE OFFICERS IN THE FIELD OFFICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. At the Western Economic Opportunities Conference some 18 months ago, the minister unveiled what was known as the 70/30 plan by which 70 per cent of the officers of his staff would be located in the field and 30 per cent in Ottawa, the reverse of the present proportion. What steps have been taken to effect that policy and how far has it progressed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to advise the hon. member and the House that the policy has, in fact been almost totally implemented, We have turned it around from 70 per cent in Ottawa to close to 70 per cent in the field. I do not have the precise percentage at the moment. At this time I want to pay tribute to the members of the public service in my department for their co-operative approach to this effort. All regional and provincial officers are co-operating. I am getting good reports back from the field that they are being effective.

PROVISION OF FUNDS FOR SOCIAL HOUSING ASSOCIATION OF CAPE BRETON—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. May I ask the honourable and congenial gentleman to advise the House what progress is being made by the Social Housing Association of Cape Breton and CMHC with regard to provision of ongoing administrative and developmental funds.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the immediate up-to-date information on that. I will get it and report to the hon. member.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Muir: Is the minister aware that the frustration tolerance level of the association is rapidly approaching the exploding point and if a positive decision cannot be reached by December 10, the association will have no other alternative that to go out of existence?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize the degree of the temperature in the area. As the hon. member knows, we have just allocated $2 million for rental accommodation in Sydney which will help the situation. That, of course, is just the first measure. Others will come. However, I will look into the situation. I appreciate the hon. member bringing this to my attention.

IMPORT PERMITS FOR BEEF FROM UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGATIONS OF TRADING IN PERMITS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Because of rumours circulating in western Canada, will the minister immediately investigate whether there are trade-offs of import permits for beef from the United States taking place between importers?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is the first I have heard of any such suggestion. I will be pleased to look into it and inform the hon. member.

REGIONAL PAY DIFFERENTIALS—SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you for trying to look after all members in the House today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the continuing and growing concern relating to regional pay rates that work in conflict with the government's objectives of eliminating regional economic disparity wherever it exists in the nation, coupled with the fact there should be equal pay for equal work, will the minister consider referring the subject matter to either an appropriate standing committee of the House or a special committee to determine if a more equitable policy can be established?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that hon. members have many opportunities to discuss this problem, when I must appear before various committees of the House. Moreover, at this time, a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate is looking into the Finkelman report. I suggest that interventions could be made to this committee.

[English]

Mr. Coates: In view of the especially devastating effect regional pay rates have on building up rather than eliminating regional economic disparity in the Atlantic provinces, will the minister again consider whether this could be submitted to a special committee of members of parliament so that they might determine whether we can secure greater equity for people who live in that part of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure we should refer that matter to a special committee. I just said that there are several forums where it can be discussed. Moreover, it is a problem whose solution the government is negotiating with the unions representing the various groups of federal public servants. Certainly, public servants themselves are facing problems, for as it happens the cost of living is much higher in some area of Canada than in others, and the national rates have disastrous effects on some employees. You will recall the situation when the Vancouver airport firefighters insisted on getting parity with the City of Vancouver's firefighters. That could not be given to them because the union wanted to maintain a national rate.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT IN HIGHER PRICED AREAS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PUT PURCHASERS OF HOMES IN ONTARIO IN MORE EQUITABLE POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Average incomes in Ontario are only slightly higher than the national average, about 5 per cent. Home prices in certain areas are substantially higher than the national average, up to 30 per cent higher, certainly in many parts of Ontario. Is the minister considering giving additional assistance to would-be home buyers in high home cost areas by, for example, increasing the $500 grant for home buyers subjected to above average house costs? To be equitable, if $500 is fair with respect to a house purchase in Montreal where homes average $35,000 in price, should not the grant be $800 in Toronto where homes average $55,000?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to achieve equity. I think the other side of the coin is that we want to give encouragement to those people who live in other parts of the country where home prices are not as high. This might be an additional incentive to them. The hon. member will realize the reduction of the sales tax on building materials to 5 per cent is an extra bonus, if you wish to call it that, or decrease in penalty for living in a high cost area because these people receive greater benefit from that.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact the average price of houses has risen dramatically, for example 61 per cent in the last two years in Ontario, a figure well above the national average compared, for example, with 26 per cent in Quebec, does the minister have any new measures that he intends to institute in order to ensure that people living in Ontario, where they now need one third more income than if they lived in Quebec, will be put in a similar position with regard to home purchases?

Mr. Danson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the effect of the expanded program under assisted home ownership and also limited dividend. It takes into consideration assistance at the much higher price level in the Toronto region of $44,915. I am also working with the provincial ministry on co-operative programs which give special impetus in that area of high cost.

HEALTH

ACUPUNCTURE—POSSIBLE CONSIDERATION OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE FOR INCLUSION IN MEDICARE

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is related to the growing interest in acupuncture. Has the minister received representation from the provinces, either from professional or other organizations, regarding the present role of acupuncture? In order to avoid asking a supplementary question, perhaps the minister might also indicate if this matter is considered to be a high priority in terms of future federal-provincial conferences. Will he give some indication whether it will be a top priority in future federal-provincial conferences on health.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the question of acupuncture has been raised by myself and my colleagues at previous federal-provincial conferences. Indeed, the government has taken the lead in attempting to clarify the position of acupuncture as a potentially useful health service in the Canadian context. We have sponsored missions to China and likewise visits by Chinese acupuncturists to Canada. Acupuncture, like any other personal health service, comes under provincial, rather than federal law.

At the last federal-provincial meeting of ministers of health, we issued a statement in this regard setting out quite clearly that, in our opinion, acupuncture should only be provided on the advice of a qualified physician and, for the time being, it should not be considered as a shared medical act under the Medical Care Act. Thirdly, while there was some evidence that acupuncture could be useful for the relief of pain, our opinion at the present time is that it should not be used for other purposes.

MONTREAL OLYMPICS, 1976—REASON FOR DELAY IN TRANSFERRING FUNDS FROM SALE OF COINS TO OLYMPICS CORPORATION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General, who I hope is in Toronto trying to salvage the mail destroyed by fire and water, I will direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board who is also partially responsible for the Olympics bill. According to the first report of the finance minister for the Olympics coin program, no payment had been made to the Olympics corporation, even though funds were available. In the second report we find that only during the month of October, 1974 was agreement reached between the federal government and the Olympics Corporation on the transfer of these funds.

Would the minister advise the House what problems exist between the government and the corporation to cause such a lengthy delay; and because these Olympics funds were raised as the result of a federal program, as outlined in the Olympics 1976 act, would the minister advise this House what safeguards have been designed for the proper management of these funds, as there are no public tenders—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put a question, not make a speech.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a detailed answer to the first part of the question because the arrangements have been made directly between the Minister of Finance and COJO authorities. However, I shall report to the hon. member when I get a precise answer. As regards the second part of the question, it has been clearly established that the federal government would not participate in the deficit of the Olympic Games and that the management of those games is under the responsibility of the City of Montreal, of COJO and of the government of Quebec. As we did not want to assume responsibility for the deficit, we cannot dictate administrative procedures.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have gone very much beyond the time allotted to the question period. I think we should now go to orders of the day.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 28, consideration of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; and motion No. 1 (Mr. Dick).

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we managed to deal with the procedural question, and since motion No. 1 now appears on page 6 of the order paper under government order No. 14 we can now deal with the substance of the amendment. By amending clause 4(1) of the bill the definitions clause is in no way changed from its original conception. The Federal Business Development Bank is really an expansion of the Industrial Development Bank, not simply a retreaded version. The IDB can now lend up to $950 million. The proposed Federal Business Development Bank will be able to lend up to $2.2 billion, so hon. members can see the new bank as proposed will be almost twice as large.

This amendment proposes to restrict the new bank in a very minor way, though nevertheless it is a restriction. The new bank would be restricted to lending money or giving guarantees only to Canadian citizens, landed immigrants of a certain category—and the definition I have used for landed immigrants is taken from clause 9(2)(c) in the "directors" section of the bill—and the third category is British subjects who have been resident here since June 25, 1967, which is the cut-off date of the special status of British subjects pursuant to other legislation. In other words, the intention of the amendment is to restrict the lending of money by the bank to people who are Canadian citizens or will obviously become Canadian citizens.

Some people may consider this, as it is in fact, an amendment endorsing the principle of Canadian economic nationalism, which I suggest is something that we in this country must face up to. It is not an amendment penalizing foreign firms, but one that will try to bring under Canadian ownership the future economic expansion of this country. At the same time, we are trying to reserve the funds of this one bank for the advancement of Canadian ownership. Chartered banks can lend money to foreigners, and other bodies such as DREE, the ODC in the province of Ontario, PAIT under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and other government programs can be used by foreigners or foreign-owned firms as well as by Canadians. However, in the case of small business, which employs over 50 per cent of the Canadian work force and pays 50 per cent of the taxes in this country, we are reserving for their encouragement—which is the very aim of the Federal Business Development Bank as it was of the Industrial Development Bank—a pool of funds.

As I have said, I am not trying to penalize or prejudice foreign ownership. We know that Canada needs more investment. I am much happier when people from outside the country want to establish industry here and bring in their own funds. That is foreign investment in its most meaningful form. But in the case under discussion we want investment on the part of Canadians, instead of lending foreigners money to help buy us out. The Federal Business Development Bank will be owned by the Government of Canada; it is a public service that is paid for by taxes raised in this country, so surely a bank that is set up by the people of Canada should look to the development of Canada by Canadians. I think this would be a wise use of our funds and this is what the amendment is proposing.

I should like to point out one fact of which we should all be aware. In the spring of 1974, Gallup conducted a poll asking the following question: "Would you favour or oppose legislation which would significantly restrict and control further foreign investment in Canada?" That question goes much further than what is suggested in this amendment, but in reply to the question the national consensus was that 69 per cent of Canadians were in favour of such legislation whereas only 18 per cent were opposed.

Every region of Canada favoured such restrictive legislation. In the Atlantic region, 69 per cent favoured such restrictive legislation and 20 per cent were opposed to it. In Quebec, 59 per cent were in favour of restrictive legislation and 21 per cent were against. In Ontario, 72 per cent were in favour of such restrictive legislation and 17 per cent were against. On the prairies, 71 per cent were in favour, as opposed to 19 per cent against. In British Columbia—this was the highest figure—it was 77 per cent in favour of such restrictive legislation, with 16 per cent opposed. It is obvious that the Canadian people are saying something not only as a result of this poll but because of many other things: they want more Canadian ownership.

This amendment is designed to promote and encourage more Canadian ownership by reserving this large pool of funds for Canadian small businesses to expand. It has been suggested that the amendment is not really that important. I do not hesitate in saying that I am not going as far in this amendment as the poll would indicate people want restrictive legislation to go, but this is only one small measure or funding mechanism that we have in this country.

It was suggested in committee that only 1 per cent or 2 per cent of present IDB funds go to enterprises which are foreign owned. This is the evidence from the mouth of the general manager, Mr. Clark, who said he thought it was less than 1 per cent. However, he indicated that there had been a study which indicated it was, at most, 2 per cent; but when I asked for more information about this study it became evident that the figure was really a guesstimate rather than firm evidence. The information was that they reviewed the applications for a period of three or four months during the year 1972, or at least that is what he thought. Surely that is not a very valid statistic.

He believes it was the year 1972 and that is all that is indicated in the minutes. He thought it was for a period of three or four months but perhaps the applications reviewed were for the four-month period following, rather than during, that period. We do not know for sure. This is just not a very believable statistic. If that estimate is reasonably accurate, I hope the government will endorse this amendment because, obviously, we are not going to make great waves in the capital market.

According to the evidence given before the committee, the bank does not even keep statistics as to whether loans are made to enterprises that are foreign owned. The only review the bank has had is the one in respect of the four-month period. I think we must ask ourselves why such a small percentage is involved. We had evidence by the general manager of the Industrial Development Bank to the effect that there is an internal bank directive to managers, instructing them not to lend funds to foreigners for the purpose of buying out or taking over Canadian-owned enterprises. That being the case, why do we not make this the law?

Mr. Gillespie: We did, and it is called the Foreign Investment Review Act.

Mr. Dick: We will get to that in a few moments. What concerns me is that the bank has a directive which can be changed tomorrow making it possible for the bank to make 25 per cent, 35 per cent or 40 per cent of its loans to foreign-owned enterprises. Even the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell)—now back in the House after the election this year—inquired quite forcefully whether the general manager would put out a second directive to ensure that the bank would not lend to foreign-owned enterprises, allowing them to expand into unrelated fields. While this is not in the minutes, because the general manager of the bank did not make any verbal commitment, I remember that he smiled and nodded his head in an affirmative way, indicating that he understood the question and was sympathetic to it. Perhaps he will introduce such a directive. Even if he does, it means that the bank is making law by directive rather than this House making it the law of the land.

When this matter was referred to in the committee, the minister said that such provision would be restrictive and would perhaps hurt some small or depressed areas where a foreign enterprise might like to establish with the assistance of an IDB loan or an FBDB loan. I suggest that we are being restrictive if we go along with the general manager and his directive, at least to the extent of 1 per cent or 2 per cent. The chances are, with business being as flexible as it is, these enterprises could borrow money through DREE, PAIT or GAAP, or perhaps the Ontario Development Corporation, the British Columbia Development Corporation or even through some other mechanism. If the enterprise was a good one, I am sure it could find Canadian entrepreneurs who would be willing to participate in a joint venture in order to meet the 51 per cent ownership requirement of this amendment. It is restrictive, but I do not think it will lessen Canadian development in any meaningful way.

The minister said that for a number of technical reasons he thought the amendment was not good. I asked him to tell us what the technical reasons were and the only one he gave was that he thought the amendment would not include co-operatives. To overcome that objection I redrafted the amendment to include co-operatives. I appreciate the fact that the minister pointed out that objection, but if he had more he should have indicated them to the committee at the time we were examining the question. If he was not frank and open at that time, I suggest it is a little late to come up with more objections now. I tried to draft the amendment to incorporate his view. The minister indicated that the Foreign Investment Review Act would really do the same thing as this amendment. He said that act was now the law of the land and provided an adequate mechanism.

I am thankful it is the law of the land, but it represents a very small step in the direction of Canadian economic ownership, nationalism or whatever you want to call it. In any event, I think we should have more than one scheme or method to assist us in achieving this goal. Surely that would not be wrong. The fact of reserving this one pool of capital for Canadians and landed immigrants is, I think, a positive act. Rather than saying that we are restricting foreigners, I am adopting a positive point of view. Also, the experience so far with the Foreign Investment Review Act is not that foreigners have been restricted in any outlandish way—in fact, they have been encouraged—but rather than use a Canadian-owned bank to buy us out, I would much rather bring them into Canada.

The Foreign Investment Review Act is geared mainly in that direction. It does not give protection to the Canadian-owned bank which is owned by the taxpayers, with funds coming from the taxpayers of this country, as the minister says, by way of contributions for which we ask each year. I think we in this country should be trying, not to buy back ownership that we have already given away, but to buy the future. Let us look forward. My amendment is directed toward encouraging Canadians to own new ventures and expand them in the next 10, 20 or 30 years. If we, as Canadians, have control of the expansion of new ventures in this country 30 years from now we will own our economy, rather than finding ourselves in the present situation where the oil and gas industry is 95 per cent foreign-owned, where the resource industry is over 80 per cent foreign-owned and the manufacturing industry is over 60 per cent foreign-owned.

I do not hesitate to say that this amendment contains some Canadian economic nationalism, and I am proud of that. I would like to see that principle enshrined in more of our laws in the future. I think a great many members of this party and other members of the House believe in that principle; but rather than just paying lip service to it, let us do something about it. When it comes to election time, all political parties say that it is a great thing to do; let us wave the flag more; let us have Canadian economic nationalism and Canadian ownership—but nothing is done.

The Foreign Investment Review Act was a step in the right direction. I believe that this is a complementary step dealing with a federally-owned bank. It is a step toward Canadian economic nationalism. I believe it is progressive, and it is a privilege to have been allowed to move this motion. I sincerely hope that the government will support this amendment rather than staying bound to the old, Liberal continental view of C. D. Howe and his successors.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the hon. member who proposed this amendment. As he mentioned, we discussed essentially this amendment in the committee and at that time I put on the record, in considerable detail, my opposition to it and the reasons for it. I will not repeat all those reasons now, but let me just make a few general remarks.

First, I would like to make it quite clear that we on this side of the House are very interested in assisting small, Canadian-controlled industries to grow and we are interested in assisting the Canadian aspect of the small,

Canadian-controlled corporation to flourish. For that reason this government introduced some years ago—not many years ago, but a few years ago—a special taxation measure which provided significant advantage for the small, Canadian-controlled corporation. It consists of exactly one-half the corporate tax rate that a small, foreign-controlled company in Canada would have to pay. I suggest that that is of significant advantage to the Canadian-controlled firm and, further, that it is the kind of measure most likely to assist in the growth of Canadian, as distinct from foreign-controlled, small business in Canada. However, that is not the only measure: the record of the committee's proceedings contain an indication of other measures that we have taken to assist small business in Canada.

One can sympathise with the objective of the hon. member, but it is important to point out that he has gone about it the wrong way. He talks about two kinds of situation; first, the situation where the funds of the bank would be used to facilitate the takeover of a Canadian firm by a foreign interest. He mentioned in his remarks that the Foreign Investment Review Act has been put in place by the government. Indeed it has, and for that very reason there is no longer need for the kind of measure which established the former Industrial Development Bank as a matter of policy. Parliament decided it was important that a significant benefit to Canada should be assured in the case of a takeover. Parliament never decided that there should be no takeover or no foreign investment. Indeed, I think it has been made quite clear by the hon. member himself that Canada continues to welcome foreign investment—but on our terms; that is, when it is of significant benefit to Canada.

There is very good reason for this. Canada is a large country with many differing economic interests in different regions. It would seem to me that the hon. member would deny the opportunity to some regions of the country which may be underdeveloped in relation to other parts of benefiting from foreign investment, if we were to adopt the principle that the hon. member wants to put into the Federal Business Development Bank Act.

The second situation with which he dealt concerned assistance to a foreign-controlled firm already operating in Canada. Here, again, it would seem to me that his amendment would deny to a perfectly legitimate Canadian business enterprise—that is to say, chartered in Canada, paying Canadian taxes, employing Canadians and purchasing Canadian materials; and all who worked for it, as well as the community which depended upon it—the advantages of the Federal Business Development Bank which will be set up to assist small businesses in Canada. This advantage would be denied a firm which got into difficulties and could not raise funds from the regular banking system on reasonable terms and conditions.

I think that this amendment is far too blunt. The hon. member's objectives may be perfectly legitimate, and I can identify with a number of them, but the way he would go about it would be entirely counterproductive. For that reason I recommend the rejection of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I intend to speak to motion No. 1, and hope the House will support it because I believe it deals with an important question of principle. The Industrial Development Bank functioned effectively as a direct subsidiary of the Bank of Canada. I note that in the 12-month period ending November 27, 1974, the assets of the Industrial Development Bank rose to $952.7 million, the increase being $247.4 million, in the 12 month reviewed in the Bank of Canada weekly statistics publication.

I mention this because when we consider motion No. 1 we must also bear in mind that the Industrial Development Bank plays a much more important role in the financing of small businesses in this country than it used to. I think this is good. We must remember that the Federal Business Development Bank, which is really a reconstituted Industrial Development Bank, will come under the direction of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The majority of the directors of the new bank will come from the private sector. If we contemplate increasing the money supply of the new bank from $1 billion to $2.2 billion, we should also consider the manner in which the newly constituted bank will expand its operations.

In committee Mr. Clark, the general manager of IDB, made it clear that he anticipated the new bank would increase its lending by about $250 million per annum. That is the extent to which small businesses in Canada will be helped. I mention that for this reason: most of us acknowledge that foreign ownership in this country has grown more than it should. I believe that the foreign investment review legislation was good so far as it went. It was a first, hesitant step. For example, it did not cover small businesses with assets of less than $.25 million or sales of less than $3 million. We must make sure that money made available to the proposed Federal Business Development Bank will not be diverted to support foreign-owned businesses in this country, as such businesses will be unrestricted in their efforts to take over small businesses with assets under $.25 million and sales under $3 million per annum. That is to say, small businesses will be subject to takeover without any limitation or screening on the part of the government.

The Federal Business Development Bank will be empowered to lend foreign-owned companies money with which to buy up Canadian businesses. If such foreign-owned companies are already doing business in this country, they may apply to the new bank for funds with which to expand in Canada. Sometimes we choose to ignore the extent of foreign investment in this country. For example, the international economic report of the President of the United States, transmitted to Congress in February, 1974, shows that in 1972 American firms owned $44.1 billion of assets in this country. This represents by far the largest investment that United States firms have made in any country outside their own.

What is the impact on Canada of this type of investment? First, it is difficult to identify it, but we know that dividends going to residents outside Canada have increased sharply. We know that retained earnings of corporations controlled in this country by foreigners are soaring. The firm of Loewen, Ondaatje, McCutcheon & Company Limited in an interesting review of this matter explained the situation in this way: they speak of dividend trends in Canada and the United States and then say:

> What is more difficult to explain is the exceptionally strong growth performance of Canadian dividends paid to foreigners since 1969. One possible explanation might be that profits of foreign subsidiaries based in Canada have been growing substantially faster than profits of primarily Canadian-owned businesses, thereby permitting a faster growth in dividends paid to non-residents.

Imagine, here is a highly regarded investment research house saying something which politicians ought to say, namely, that foreign-owned businesses in Canada are prospering more than Canadian-owned businesses. They point out that in the period 1956 to 1969 there was an average real growth in dividends paid to Canadians of 4.87 per cent. Yet dividends paid to Canadians in the period 1969 to 1973—years when the Trudeau government was in power—tell, in real terms, by 2.07 per cent. And consider what happened to foreign dividends: dividends paid to non-residents in the period 1956 to 1969 went up at an average rate of 2.51 per cent per year.

Mr. Drury: In real terms?

Mr. Stevens: In real terms. I am pleased that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) is listening. In the five-year period 1969-1973, dividends paid to non-residents went up, in real terms, at an average rate of 4.61 per cent. On the other hand, in the last five years dividends paid to Canadians went down at the rate of 2.07 per cent, in real terms. Madam Speaker, I mention these facts because in considering motion No. 1 we must do so in the context of what is happening in Canada today.

One of the reasons we are barely balancing our trade figures at the present time is that we have an increasing outgo of dividends, interest payments, royalties and other charges to foreigners who hold interests in this country. With that background, surely motion No. 1 is worthy of consideration. It simply says that when dealing with an institution which will be subsidized by the people of Canada and is designed to help small business in this country—namely, the Federal Business Development Bank—let us make sure that the funds within the bank are not diverted in order to help foreign interests still further.

I do not believe in artificial barriers to keep out foreign investment. On the other hand, I am a strong proponent of giving incentives, and every break possible, to Canadian businesses to help them compete against foreign-controlled interests. The least the government could have done was to indicate in the bill that preferential treatment should be given to concerns owned, certainly majority-wise, by Canadians. Why is there no suggestion in the bill that Canadian concerns should get an interest advantage or special funds at substantially lower rates than would ordinarily be charged to non-Canadian concerns?

I listened very closely to the remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie). I believe it was not consistent for him to say that he felt the idea, in principle, had merit and then criticize it in substance and in form. Surely the minister would be the first to agree that he could have proposed an amendment to his legislation to cover this point. Knowing that this corporation will go into a new phase of life and will put out over $1 billion in the next four years, he should have written into the legislation a provision to make sure that the ten private interest directors who will be running this corporation will have the guidance of the legislation and this parliament in ensuring preferential treatment for Canadian interests. That is certainly the intent of motion No. 1 and that is why I support it.

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this time?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Will the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) allow a question?

Mr. Stevens: How could I refuse?

Mr. Blais: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) cited a figure of $44 billion in United States assets. Does he have any figures to indicate what percentage of that amount represents ownership by United States companies or concerns which come within the scope of this legislation?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the relevance?

Mr. Stevens: Unfortunately, the United States publication does not break down the figures as precisely as that. However, the point I was making is that the Americans seem to know more about the amount of their investment in Canada than the Government of Canada. If the hon. member is interested in such figures, it is high time he approached the responsible ministers and others and asked them to produce the figures so we know how much small, medium and large business in this country is owned by foreign interests.

Mr. Joyal: Madam Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Can he tell us whether he was attending the committee meeting when the president of the bank stated specifically how many American undertakings had applied for loans from the Industrial Development Bank?

[English]

Mr. Stevens: I missed the first part of the hon. member's question. If I understood it correctly, the general manager of the bank indicated that a relatively small number of foreign concerns have applied to the bank. I am glad this question was raised, because this is my fear. Up to the present time, the Industrial Development Bank, under the Bank of Canada, has been run as an efficient and very responsible organization. It is true they have loaned less than 3 per cent of their total funds to foreign concerns. However, I am apprehensive, now that this bank is coming under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, that we will not find in the bank the responsible management and direction we have had in the past.

I believe I have cause to be concerned, because we must bear in mind that the Export Development Corporation is now, and has been, directly answerable to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. That corporation has given financing to the extent of $1.5 billion to 51 concerns in Canada, and the majority of these concerns are foreign-controlled. If we look at the list, we see that the seven largest benefactors of export development financing—I emphasize that this is under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—have taken $100 million in benefits each from the corporation. The majority of the 51 companies that have benefited under the $1.5 billion that has been laid out by the corporation are foreign-controlled.

Surely we should be concerned. Here is a bank intended to help small businesses. It comes under the same management which produced the type of result that has been so beneficial to interests controlled by the United States. I would point out that the largest foreign-owned benefactor under export development is none other than M.L. Worthington, which responded to a decree from its head office in the United States that was extremely embarrassing to certain members on the government side of the House.

As we have stated before, we believe in the Industrial Development Bank type of approach. We hope the Federal Business Development Bank will carry on in the same fashion as the Industrial Development Bank. However, we were very startled in committee to find that it is now generally accepted by the government that no longer is this bank to be a lender of last resort. In short, it is a very active, state-run, state-owned bank that is invading the private sector. This is another piece of evidence which illustrates that those on the government benches are becoming more and more state-oriented, leading us into a state type of country, perhaps without the proper comprehension of many members of this House.

This was pointed out by certain private interests who appeared as witnesses before the committee. They, in effect, said they could not compete with the subsidized Industrial Development Bank. They were being undercut in their rates. They stated that if the bank was not run in a way more conducive to ensuring that private sector lenders would not be run out of business, they in fact would be run out of business. I mention this because I believe it would be unfortunate to have a state-owned banking system in this country. I am fearful this may be the opening entry of this lusty government into the ownership of our banking institutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Cullen).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now for the lusty reply.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): This will be a very quiet and subdued speech, because that is the way I usually am. Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) take the usual Tory stance and come down firm on both sides of the issue. In one breath he said there is $44 billion of United States investment or ownership in this country; in another breath he said he is in favour of a little more open trade between the two countries. One begins to wonder just where his party stands.

The minister of revenue for the province of Ontario has indicated that he does not oppose investment of foreign capital in his province. The NDP Premier of Manitoba has indicated that that province is quite prepared to accept funds in the interest of developing the province. One gets the impression, from listening to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, that all foreign investment is bad, at least when you listen to the beginning of his argument. Then when you get down the road a bit you are not so sure he thinks it is so bad after all. So he seems to come down on both sides of the issue, which makes it very easy when you have to talk to two different types of audience.

Since I opposed the hon. member's amendment in committee and I intend to oppose it here, I should reiterate my reasons for so doing. On the surface, the amendment seems to warrant commendation. Unhappily, the hon. member has not looked down the road to the impact that it would have. I suggest that it would have an impact in two areas, one of which he had the tendency to slough off, namely, its impact on large corporations in small communities. The second area is the impact it may have on the development of feeder companies or corporations that depend upon a large corporation for their markets.

I can think of a situation where a large corporation might make application through the normal channels to the banks and be unable to secure a loan, so they go to the Industrial Development Bank—or to this particular bank, once it is established—on the understanding that funds will be made available for expansion purposes. This will enable them to create more jobs for Canadians in Canada and buy more supplies from Canadian corporations and small businesses, which I think the hon. member is particularly endeavouring to assist. However, I think that in the way he has worded his motion it would have the opposite effect. The hon. member says that the fact that a large, foreign corporation may not be able to get a loan will not be too significant in some areas.

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would indicate what words he would like to have changed. He said that the wording did not seem to be quite right to him. Perhaps he would suggest how the wording could be improved.

Mr. Cullen: The wording could be improved by leaving it out altogether.

Mr. Dick: The hon. member just does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Cullen: I know exactly what I am talking about. The hon. member is indicating that foreign-controlled corporations should not have access to the Industrial Development Bank.

Mr. Dick: That is not what the amendment says at all. It refers to foreign ownership. There is a difference between ownership and control; at least, if you know anything about the subject.

Mr. Cullen: Whether it is foreign ownership or control, the hon. member is completely shutting the door to small Canadian corporations who may depend upon large corporations to find a market for their goods, or to find jobs for Canadians as a result of expansion from increased capitalization in the form of a loan. I am personally aware of a large corporation in a small community that pays anywhere from one-third to one-half of the municipal tax load through both real estate and business tax. This has a significant impact on that community. Recently the corporation made application for a loan and I am happy to say it was able to secure one. As a result, this corporation not only consolidated the jobs it had already created but expanded its operations and thus created more jobs. If, as the hon. member suggests, we remove this flexibility from the bill, that consolidation would not have taken place, that expansion would not have taken place and extra jobs would not have been created.

I think the hon. member's idea is a commendable one, but the witnesses who appeared before the committee indicated quite clearly that the number of corporations that are not Canadian or run by Canadians and are taking advantage of these funds is insignificant, something under 1 per cent according to the checks they had made. It was so insignificant that one of the people working for the IDB for many years did not see any substantial amount of these funds going to foreign corporations or, as my friend would say, these foreign-owned corporations. I think that in removing this flexibility because there may be down-the-road benefits, the hon. member is doing a disservice to the people whom I think he is honestly trying to help but whom his motion does not, in fact, help. For these reasons I shall vote against the amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, whose prime object is to replace the Industrial Development Bank, has given rise to the debate in progress.

Some hon. members fear that the new bank will serve, as did in some cases the Industrial Development Bank, to finance foreign companies.

Now, the Federal Business Development Bank should of necessity be accessible first of all to our small industries. Recently, a citizen of my riding asked the Industrial Development Bank for credit amounting to about $275,000. The minister answered that the bank does not loan more than $200,000.

Now, if the bank has limited powers, industries requiring $200,000, $400,000 or half a million dollars, which are not exorbitant amounts, will go to the Federal Business Development Bank which will be able to help them by taking the precautions required to avoid, as mentioned yesterday, conflicts of interest.

Some hon. members or people close to the minister could borrow. The purpose of the bill before the House is to help Canadian industry.

Madam Speaker, yesterday I believe, the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Clermont), speaking to the amendment, said that the money came from the deposits of the public at large. That is not entirely true, some of it is also made up of public funds.

That bank will be empowered to extend credit through the Bank of Canada because the latter will still remain the central bank, the master bank. Madam Speaker, will that bank have the same powers as chartered banks, except that chartered banks operate for their private organization, for their directors, their shareholders, or will it operate for the whole people of this country? That is rather important because we all know: Not everybody!

Recently, I talked to 1,000 chartered accountants in Toronto, and most of them did not know that a federal government bond purchased by the Bank of Canada allowed Canadian chartered banks to multiply the government bond by 16. In other words, $16 million worth of credit can be created for a $1 million issue—$16 million worth of credit in figures out of the ink bottle, out of the pockets of nobody. The banks have that power. Will the Federal Business Development Bank have a similar power to mint the possibilities—not the impossibilities—but the real possibilities that exist in the country?

Madam Speaker, the Federal Business Development Bank could be tremendously useful not only for maintaining any prosperity but for the economic stability of this country if the government, the board or the directors of the bank want to assume their responsibilities to develop Canada to its maximum, and not develop foreign companies. What is important is to help our own companies, our own small industries. There are thousands asking for government assistance, and they cannot get anything.

Madam Speaker, I think that might be what the government is considering in introducing Bill C-14 to help small industry. It will not be harmful to big industry in any way; that is not the purpose of the bill. It is to develop to the maximum what we can develop at home, and as I have been repeating for several years, as long as that financial institution, whether you call it the Federal Business Development Bank or the Bank of Canada, is not put at the service of the whole of the Canadian people, no matter who the directors of these agencies are, I am convinced that no government board will be able to protect Canadian contractors or industrialists against those who are bent on abusing legislation such as Bill C-14.

Madam Speaker, I hope wholeheartedly that this new bank will serve not only one sector of the public, but the public as a whole. If it does, there will be fewer conflicts in Canada than there are at present. No longer will we see people leaving Ottawa to go and preach separatism in Alberta, or people from Alberta going to Quebec to preach separatism, always with the same accusation: "It is because of Ottawa that such and such project cannot be developed in Quebec; it is because of Ottawa that such and such area in western Canada or the Maritimes cannot be protected".

It is possible to satisfy everybody. But this will require all Canadians, whether of French, English, Ukrainian, Japanese or Chinese ancestry, to strive for the common good, and not for the good of this one particular group at the expense of another. Only then we will understand better the meaning of national unity and the true destiny of the Canadian people.

● (1440)

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have been here for somewhat over two years, during which I have always found it instructive to be in the House when the leader of the Créditiste party is speaking. I was amazed that he was today able to speak at considerable length—covering the whole waterfront, including everything from Alberta and Quebec separatism to Social Credit monetary theory—without once dealing with question at issue, namely, the motion proposed by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). Let me add my unequivocal support to motion No. 1 standing in that hon. member's name.

We are not trying, by this motion, to resolve once and for all the question of economic nationalism, any more than we were trying to resolve once and for all, by the motion of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), problems in respect of the openness of the government or conflict of interest. What we are concerned with here is setting a precedent and encouraging the government to take at least one, albeit hesitant, tentative and faltering, step in the direction of economic nationalism. I am surprised to observe the sort of resistance with which this effort is being met by hon. members on the government side.

It is interesting to note that the minister and members on the government side waxed eloquent about the problems of the Canadian small businessman as opposed to foreign control of our economy. When I think of this, I am reminded of the fact that this minister, at the same time as he talked about strong measures to deal with problems in respect of foreign domination of our economy, resisted a measure which would stop this federally-controlled bank lending moneys to foreign-controlled companies—which would increase foreign penetration into our economy.

I was reminded, as well, of the statement of the late Adlai Stevenson when talking about one of his political opponents. He said he was the sort of man who would cut down a redwood tree and mount the stump to make a speech on conversation. I suggest that is the attitude of this government. Its members wax eloquent about the issue of small business, and at the same time wax eloquent about the issue of foreign domination and Canadian control of our economy, yet they do everything possible to undermine the national interest. The ultimate principle involved here is whether Canadians are willing to have their tax money used to finance greater foreign takeover of our economy and increased foreign intrusion into our domestic affairs. This is something we should resist.

The parliamentary secretary in his remarks a short time ago spoke on both sides of this issue. He suggested at one time that it was very good for the small businessmen of this country and the economies of many communities that the government be allowed to lend money to foreigners. Then a minute later he said the figure is so insignificant that it hardly warrants consideration. If the figure is insignificant, the government should not have any hesitation in taking this very faltering step in the direction of economic nationalism.

When we look at the money involved, we find that the Federal Business Development Bank will have $2.2 billion to lend, as is now the case with the Industrial Development Bank, and if only 1 per cent of that amount is loaned to foreigners it will amount to $22 million. That is, $22 million would be loaned by our federal government to encourage the takeover of our economy by foreigners. The actual figure is more likely to be 2 per cent, or $44 million; that would amount to $2 for every man, woman and child in Canada being used by this government to encourage foreign takeover.

As the hon. member for York-Simcoe pointed out, the Foreign Investment Review Board, the screening agency the government has set up, has a mesh that is too wide to trap small United States business from slipping through. It really does nothing to protect the interests of Canadians in this area. It should be very clear, when we are dealing with limited amounts of money—and they will be limited—that there will not be enough to go around so that all Canadians who want to take advantage of the program will be able to do so, and any money that we lend to foreigners will be money denied to Canadians.

What this will amount to is the use of Canadian taxpayers' money, some of which has been paid by Canadian small businessmen, for the foreign takeover of Canadian interests. When the minister spoke, he brought out the old chestnut used every time the question of economic nationalism comes up or any step which would do anything to encourage Canadian economic nationalism. He said this would discourage the economies of depressed areas, and what we have to do is encourage foreign-controlled corporations and small, foreign businesses to come here.

My party is not arguing—I want to stress this for the benefit of members on the other side—that what we should be doing is encouraging people living in an underdeveloped part of the country to keep their economy in a depressed state. We are saying that the economy of this country should be built by Canadians and that Canadians should receive the benefit of Canadian taxpayers' money. Also, when it comes to providing any incentives through this particular bank, they should be provided to Canadians because they are too scarce to be given to foreigners.

I believe, although I am not sure of this, that the parliamentary secretary mentioned that the Ontario government was not being terribly insistent in respect of the concept of foreign capital being brought into Canada. Fair ball—but this is not the issue here. It is not a question of foreign capital coming in; it is a matter of the use of Canadian capital by foreigners. It is worth looking at the record when the question of action by the Ontario government is considered. The Ontario government has gone considerably further than the federal government in respect of the issue of economic nationalism. More than a year ago, the Ontario government stopped giving loans under its development corporation to foreign-controlled companies. This the federal government has been unwilling to do. So the main thrust of the policies of the Ontario government has been toward economic nationalism, whereas the federal government has been extremely lax on the subject and, indeed, has been throwing up barriers to prevent our trying to gain some control over our own economy.

I think it would be interesting to bring to the attention of members of the House who might not have seen it, the report on the front page of today's "Report on business" in the Globe and Mail under the heading "Small business capital held critically short". This article quotes the president of Western Industrial Garments Limited as saying:

> The federal budget measures will not really be effective until the detail work is completed. They will probably help us keep up with inflation and no more. But small business has not advanced significantly in ten years. It needs a stronger financial base to compete against multinational and other large corporations and that means an infusion of capital for inventories and expansion.

This is the sort of money which could be made available to Canadian small businessmen if we restricted the lending policies of the Federal Business Development Bank. This is money which the government has denied them the use of. It is interesting, also, to consider a report submitted by Mr. Jim Conrad, entitled "Canadian income and foreign ownership". It is a report prepared for the Committee for an Independent Canada. I think one paragraph is very instructive in respect of this discussion; it reads as follows:

> The foreign-owned corporations in the non-financial sectors are the largest and fastest growing in Canada, and therefore benefit most from tax incentives given by the Canadian government (reduction of the corporate tax rate to 40 per cent, various deductible items—e.g. depletion—DREE grants, forgiveable loans which are taken from Canadian taxpayers and given to foreign corporations). In addition, foreign corporations are able to borrow from the bank, and raise debentures in the money market, generally much more easily than Canadian firms, due to the fact that foreign firms have the security of the foreign corporate head office. Therefore, we would expect to see the foreign equity ownership in Canada to be growing rapidly, and paying increasing returns to its foreign owners.

What the Committee for an Independent Canada is trying to point out is that, far from solving the question of Canadian economic nationalism or the problem of trying to gain some control over the Canadian economy, the problem is getting worse in this country. We need from this government more than pious proclamations. Canadian businessmen need more than simply the assurance that the minister is on their side, while at the same time the actions of this government serve to destroy the best interest of Canadian small businessmen. They need the government to show that it is acting in good faith, that it puts the priorities of Canadian small businessmen first and that it is willing, in cases such as are presented by the motion of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew Carleton, to stand and be counted in accordance with the principles in which it says it believes.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, I want to indicate briefly to the House that my party wishes to associate itself with the amendment moved by the hon. member. I hope that later we will have the opportunity of a standing vote on this issue so that members of the Liberal Party can indicate their position on the question of independence of the Canadian economy. The minister, when replying to the amendment, said he agreed in principle with its thrust. If he agrees in principle, I ask the minister—if he does not agree with the wording of the amendment—to indicate to us that he will draft an amendment along the same lines, getting at the same principle, and will bring such amendment before the House. I am not satisfied with a few pious words in which he sloughs off the opposition by saying, "You are a nice little boy. You have moved an amendment. I agree with it in principle, but I do not like the way you dot a couple of i's or cross a couple of t's." If he is serious, why does he not come before this House with an amendment of his own?

The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) said that very few transactions now take place because we have the Foreign Investment Review Act, and the Federal Business Development Bank would not lend a great deal of money to foreign firms. I cannot accept his explanation. There are a few loopholes in the Foreign Investment Review Act. One is that there is no legislation to cover the foreign firms already in this country which expand in the same field of endeavour or into a different area. I can see a firm coming to this country, expanding into an area not being screened under the Foreign Investment Review Act, applying for funds under the Industrial Development Bank and receiving them.

It seems to me this is grossly unfair and is the type of thing that should be covered by this legislation. Another question in respect of the Foreign Investment Review Act is that there is a threshold range: if a corporation or company has assets under $250,000, it is automatically not screenable by the Foreign Investment Review Board. Some of the small business operations which are foreign-owned might well come under that threshold when they start out in the business community. For such reasons, I believe the amendment before the House should carry. We are establishing the Federal Business Development Bank to assist small business in this country. Why should we use public funds to assist foreign business endeavours? That is beyond me.

I do not understand why this government cannot accept this amendment or one that agrees with it in principle but may be worded differently, so this House may express what I am sure are the true feelings of the Canadian people. Foreign ownership in this country is a matter most Canadians are concerned about. If we leave a small loophole in this bill—whether or not it will be really significant, in terms of dollars, is irrelevant—it will be symbolic. I think we should close any such symbolic loophole. If we do, it will be one of the steps we can take toward asserting control and maintaining sovereignty over our own economy—something that is long overdue. So I urge members of this House to show clearly by their vote where they stand on this, one of the important issues that we face.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The question is on the motion in the name of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

● (1500)

Some hon. Members: Yea.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Dick) negatived on division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Pursuant to a special order made yesterday, further consideration of the report stage of Bill C-14 stands deferred until next Wednesday.

INDIAN OIL AND GAS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING LEASES, LICENCES AND ROYALTIES

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-15 respecting oil and gas in Indian lands, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Buchanan moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to make a few comments on Bill C-15 as amended, which is before the House today. I want to say at the outset that I have two very outstanding reserves in my area, of which I am sure the minister is well aware. They are both very progressive reserves. I am referring to Walpole Island. I may say that I live right across from St. Anne's, which is part of Walpole Island which, in my estimation, is one of the most progressive reserves in Canada.

The four amendments made to Bill C-15 serve mainly to render this piece of legislation more precise in ensuring that the rights of Indians on producing lands are well safeguarded.

Subclause 1 of clause 5 was amended by stipulating that royalties obtained in respect of oil and gas on Indian lands and paid to Her Majesty in right of Canada, are held in trust for the Indian bands concerned. We understand that for the most part royalties are paid directly into the band funds. Yet there may be instances, from time to time, of hold-ups in payment, or it is conceivable that the government might, at some later date, insist that all royalty payments be paid to the Crown. Therefore it is necessary that the legislation include a reassurance for the Indian bands that should the funds, to which by law they are entitled, not be paid directly to them, they will be held in trust for their benefit.

The second amendment to the bill in subclause 2 of clause 5 provides that:

The minister may, with the approval of the band concerned, enter into a special agreement with any person for a reduction, increase, or a variation in the basis of calculation of royalties payable under subsection (1).

The addition of the words "increase, or a variation in the basis of calculation of royalties payable under subsection (1)" emphasized the fact that the minister must have the approval of the band affected in all matters concerning the establishment of royalty structures. We feel it is essential that the Indian bands be consulted on every aspect of royalty rates, not just on the reduction of the same. Indeed, in the broader context, we think this context is fine, and we feel it is vital that Indian bands be consulted on all decision-making matters that affect them.

The addition of subclause 2 to clause 6 constitutes the third amendment to the bill. This addition again serves to ensure that the producing bands concerned be consulted, not only regarding establishment of the royalty structure and changes therein but for the purpose of the administration of this law.

The final amendment is the renumbering of clause 7 of the original bill as clause 8 of the amended version, and the inclusion of a new clause 7 which reads as follows:

Notwithstanding anything herein contained, nothing in this Act shall be deemed to abrogate the rights of Indian people or preclude them from negotiating for oil and gas benefits in those areas in which land claims have not been settled.

The purpose of this clause is to ensure that the Indian or native people may negotiate for oil and gas claims in those areas of land that have not yet been settled. This serves to allay the fear of the native people that this legislation might prejudice treaty and aboriginal rights.

We are extremely pleased that our amendments have been accepted, and once again may I congratulate the minister and the committee for the excellent work that has been done, and for the committee's co-operation and understanding of these particular aspects. This bill as it now reads is quite acceptable to us, and we also believe that it serves to guarantee further the rights and claims of our producing Indian bands.

There is one area of grave concern that we still have with respect to this legislation. A change was introduced in the royalty rate structure for petroleum in Alberta in January of last year, and again in April of this year. The changes raised the royalty rate structure of the province generally above those of reserve land. The Indian Act prohibited the producing bands from raising their royalties along with the provinces. It is our hope that with this new piece of legislation they may do so, but our concern lies with the past, and is focussed on the amount that the bands would have received had the provincial royalty structures applied to their lands from January, 1973, to date.

It is true that the royalty rates for oil produced on Indian lands changed as of April 1, 1974, and it was stated by Mr. Ed Moore, supervisor of Indian minerals, Calgary, that these are now somewhat higher than those of the province. But we must still concern ourselves with the rates from January, 1973, to April, 1974—a period of some 16 months. The moneys lost in that period should be repaid to the Indian bands.

Two specific references were made to this fact in the committee meeting, and I would like to refer to those, if I may. I would like to quote from page 18 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development held on October 29, as follows:

MR. LESAUX: However, there is provision in the bill to enable a regulation to be effected and that regulation, I trust, will reflect part of the catch-up to which you refer, Miss MacDonald.

MISS MACDONALD (KINGSTON AND THE ISLANDS): Is it the intent of the bill to make the regulations that the bill says will be within the discretion of the Governor in Council retroactive to January 1, 1973?

MR. BUCHANAN: No, it is not; though it is my understanding that there was some sort of a lump sum payment involved, a sort of catch-up provision that was included in these regulations.

My understanding is that it is effective April 1, but that there is a catch-up provision. I think there was a lump sum payment as well.

MISS MACDONALD (KINGSTON AND THE ISLANDS): Will that catch-up provision apply only between the regulations promulgated on January 28, 1974 and those of April 1, 1974, or will they be retroactive to the change in the provincial royalty structures?

MR. LESAUX: I am sorry, Miss MacDonald, I cannot give you a definite time-frame. All I can say is that this has been discussed with the major oil company concerned, has been acknowledged as being a commitment of that company, and that the sum involved is a matter of negotiation between the band and the company, with our acting as intermediary or being of assistance to the band.

MISS MACDONALD (KINGSTON AND THE ISLANDS): Can the minister or the department provide us with figures which show the number of wells on these reserves and the barrel production since the time that the royalty structures were changed in the province of Alberta?

MR. LESAUX: Mr. Chairman, I would like first to apprise the bands of your request; then I believe it would be quite in order to table such information.

I wish to point out at this time that the figures to which the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred, and which Mr. Lesaux stated could be tabled, have not in fact been forthcoming. It is true that the dollar figures for royalties on production of oil and gas on 20 Indian reserves were tabled, but not the barrel production figures per reserve. I know that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) has been concerned about this matter and has made numerous inquiries about these figures. I would suggest to the minister that it is most important that the figures be tabled at an early date.

Returning to the question of loss of funds experienced by the Indian bands I should like to quote again from the minutes of the committee meeting of October 29. The first question was asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

MR. NEIL: Mr. Chairman, maybe this is a matter of policy and perhaps I should be asking the minister—of course he was not around at the time—but I am wondering when Alberta, for example, changed its regulations and increased its royalties, why the federal government, if they felt their regulations were defective, why did not the federal government then immediately bring in a bill of this nature? It seems to me that the Indian people, as a result of the failure of the government to move, have lost probably millions of dollars.

MR. LESAUX: I would prefer you to pose your first question to the minister.

MR. NEIL: I appreciate that.

MR. LESAUX: On your second question, I can assure you that there will not be a loss, as you describe it, of millions of dollars, that there will be catch-up provision, which I suggest has already been discussed with the major producers.

MR. NEIL: You say catch-up provision. Will this be based on the rates that existed in Alberta?

MR. LESAUX: Yes, sir.

MR. NEIL: And your catch-up provision will be a case of getting moneys from the oil companies to make up the difference between the 1966 rates and the prevailing rates in Alberta when they change their regulations?

MR. LESAUX: Well, the 1966 rates, I . . .

MR. NEIL: This is the rate you have been working on.

MR. LESAUX: Yes, but if you are suggesting, Mr. Neil, that we go back to 1966 with a catch-up . . .

MR. NEIL: No, no. I am only suggesting that you go back to the date when Alberta upped its royalties.

The two references to the loss of money and a future catch-up provision indicate in a rather nebulous fashion that the Indians will receive the funds which they were unable to obtain from the time when the provincial royalty structure changed.

We fully expect the government to ensure that this commitment is honoured with regard to the royalties on petroleum. I say petroleum only, because I have some indication that the producing bands have already been conpensated for the loss of natural gas royalties. However, I do request further clarification on this point, and should the compensation not have been made to this point in time, the government should make certain that the loss of money in this area will be made up in the future.

This money is extremely important to the Indian bands—I cannot over-emphasize this fact—for the general improvement of living conditions on their reserves. I might point out that a conclusion has been drawn that, because the oil companies were able to take oil from the reserves without paying the maximum royalty, they substantially increased production on Indian lands. I would like to quote again from the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development of November 5. At that time the hon. member for Wetaskiwin asked the following question:

MR. SCHELLENBERGER: This will be my last question. Because the oil companies have good legal advice and they realize the inadequacy of the legislation under the Indian Act—and I suppose this question again should go to the minister, but I wonder if you have any comments—have the oil companies increased production on Indian lands because they were able to take that oil without paying the maximum royalty, and by increasing production on these Indian lands have depleted their resources substantially in the last year?

MR. SEYMOUR: Yes, I believe that has happened because, even though we do not have the exact figures on it, the royalty has not increased substantially and yet the royalty amount, according to the minister will be increased substantially. I can only conclude that production has caused the increase.

The Minister himself in his speech on October 21 said that the Pigeon Lake Indian Reserve had oil estimated in 1969 to be good for 30 years' production at the then prevailing rate, but now, only five years later, it is thought that these reserves will decline drastically in the next three years due to increased production. The Indian people must be compensated for situations such as this—when the reserve is depleted there will be no more royalty income. They must benefit from their resources today in order to prepare for the future.

This leads me to the question of the export tax. I find it necessary to bring this up again because I wish to ascertain what has happened to the money that has been collected since October of last year as export tax on oil produced on Indian lands. Can the minister indicate when a statement will be made concerning these funds? Where is the money presently? What is being done with it? How much money is owing to the producing bands? When will it be returned to them? Will they receive interest thereon?

These are fundamental questions that have been raised on numerous occasions in this House, particularly by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. We are anxious to discover the true facts surrounding these funds. The Indian people could well use the money for building homes, buying machinery and farm equipment, and for generally raising their standard of living. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin recently gave an example of the Samson band who want to increase the size of their furniture factory and tried to borrow from the Indian Economic Development Fund. They found it impossible to do this. These people want to do something constructive, something that will improve conditions and employment for their own people, but their efforts are hampered by financial pressures, I may say financial pressures that exist unnecessarily. They had sufficient money right here in Ottawa but they cannot benefit from it at the present time. Surely this and similar situations could be quickly remedied by giving the Indian people the money that is rightfully theirs. Hopefully in his reply the minister can give us some assurance that immediate action will be taken to restore the money owing to these Indian bands.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I notice that the minister is standing to be recognized and wishes to speak. I must draw to the attention of the House that as the minister moved the motion, although he has not said a word, it is considered that he has made a speech. And because on third reading of a bill the right of reply does not apply, because third reading is not by precedent considered as a substantive motion, as is a motion to move second reading, the only way that the minister would be able to speak at this time would be with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is Friday afternoon and I think we would be glad to hear from the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the minister be heard, by consent, at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to thank my colleagues in the House for their Friday afternoon generosity. First of all I am happy to be in a position, as was the preceding speaker, to tell the House that in my opinion also the Standing Committee has improved the bill. The amendments are of a nature which I welcome and endorse.

Mr. Buchanan: Before speaking on the amendments I should like to refer to the export tax, to which the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) referred, and which is also of concern to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). Like the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, I am anxious to pursue the matter of the export tax, and to do my utmost to ensure that 50 per cent of the export tax collected in the period when it was shared equally by the federal government and the provinces is returned to producing bands. This matter is being pursued with provincial governments. The Department of Finance is the department which will negotiate for these funds with the provinces.

May I now speak to the amendment. There are three changes proposed. The first makes it clear that royalties are paid to the Crown to hold on behalf of the bands concerned. There was never any other intention, and this amendment puts into more specific language that which would have taken place in any event.

The second amendment puts into the bill the commitment to consult the Indian bands most directly affected. I am committed to consultation, as is the government. There is a great and growing reliance on consultation as a necessary adjunct to the management processes, to ensure that those affected are directly involved. I will be pleased to see our commitment enshrined in law, for it will make certain that the future will follow the course this government has pioneered.

The remaining amendment ensures that the bill cannot interfere in any way with settling claims in areas where there are no treaties or the Indian title has not been superseded by law. It is a safeguard, probably not required, but better to have than to wish for, if circumstances should change from those which I now anticipate.

With passage of this bill the way will be clear for the Indian people whose reserves are producing oil and gas to reap increased benefits. This is a vitally important factor that cannot be overlooked by the House. The Indian people stand to gain substantially from the resource which lies beneath reserve lands. It is a resource peculiarly and specially related to the modern economy.

We are often told of the damage that our society has done in the past, is doing in the present, and is likely to continue to do in the future. These warnings are often overstated. But obviously there is an element of truth to them. Nevertheless here, today, we have an opportunity to see that some of the advantages of the modern economy flow to the Indian people. When the treaties were signed on the prairies, few thought of oil and gas in the treaty areas, and no one foresaw the impact of technology on this natural resource. This bill ensures that the bands benefit fully from society's use of this non-renewable source of energy.

This bill, as members know, provides for higher royalties which reflect the new situation in oil and gas. It provides for the bands to be consulted about changes in the royalties and regulations which may become necessary as the oil and gas situation changes, and it has changed rapidly in the last few years. The bill ensures that the Indian people will get their full and rightful share of returns from this unique and valuable resource.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ENVIRONMENTAL CONTAMINANTS ACT

MEASURES TO PROTECT HUMAN HEALTH AND ENVIRONMENT FROM CONTAMINANTS

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp (for the Minister of the Environment) that Bill C-25, to protect human health and the environment from substances that contaminate the environment, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am trying to determine who has spoken in this debate. The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) introduced the bill at this stage; therefore there is nothing to prevent the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) from addressing the House at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we are delighted to hear the minister speak, so long as it is understood that she is not closing the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It should also be noted that the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) insisted on the minister making a speech. It is too bad that he is not here to listen to her.

● (1530)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-25, to protect human health and environment from substances that contaminate the environment. Hon. members will recall that when this bill was presented for second reading, I was in Victoria to attend a meeting of the council of environment and resources ministers and that I was unable to be present in the House. I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary for having replaced me and having so ably introduced the bill under consideration.

I would simply like to remind the House that this bill represents a very important step in the history of the challenges that we must meet as concerns the degradation of the environment, and even more important, as concerns the new development concepts that we must establish in modern society.

Mr. Speaker, with this bill, we enter the second generation of the environment policy, where we take preventive rather than corrective action. Because this was a new field, we had to start by repairing the damages that had been done to the environment and by eliminating the circumstances and situations caused by our activities on this planet. We also had to take emergency action to correct some of the damages caused to the environment, as well as to protect endangered species, of which we had just began to take notice, and also to make our environment healthier, since it is very important that man can go on living in an environment which can bring him all the satisfactions to which he is entitled.

Before bringing forth the bill, of course, we endeavoured to examine all instruments that are at our disposal to meet those new problems. We studied all existing laws to make sure that there would be no duplication in that field because we do have some instruments that fortunately allowed us to act. These are the Fisheries Act, the Clean Air Act, the Canada Water Act as well as some acts relating to the Department of National Health and Welfare which we have been able to invoke in some circumstances.

But today, we want to go further and fill the gaps in federal or provincial legislation because some circumstances arise in which, if we had to face really difficult problems, we would not have any legislative instrument enabling us to act in an effective way. I need only recall the recent controversy about the effects of chlorinated water on human health.

Some scientists in the Mississippi area have started pointing out that there might be a certain link between the cancer rate in the Mississippi area and the fact that Mississippi waters are among the most polluted in the world even though Mississippi water is treated with chloride.

Mr. Speaker, every time something like that happens we should not go into a panic and immediately prohibit the use of these disinfectants to treat sewage water. Of course, we will have to face problems that are known to us and which are probably much more serious. In fact, if we have managed to get rid of typhoid fever because we now know how to disinfect our water we must still see to it as the years go by that we do not get into a situation where chlorinated water could be a probable cause of cancer.

Therefore, if this situation proves to be alarming, if our research, which is very rigourous, leads us to discover that chlorinated water is dangerous, we would have to find an instrument to control the level of concentration of this substance used to disinfect water. We would perhaps at least need instruments which would give us further knowledge of the chemical components of certain of these products. So, Mr. Speaker, with modern developments there are always new problems arising and governments which want to be modern need more and more refined instruments which will allow them to face these situations.

In brief, therefore, we would like to beef up certain federal and provincial laws and as far as possible we would also like to increase the efficiency of our present legislation.

The aim of Bill C-25 is to protect our health and environment against chemical substances which are judged to be dangerous or toxic. This bill will allow us to control concentration levels as it is obvious that certain substances are dangerous only if they are absorbed in sizeable quantities. That, for instance, is what goes on in the Mississippi region, where the concentration of those substances are constantly assessed for their toxicity and asepsis. They are not toxic at certain levels but, absorbed in high enough quantities, they assuredly are. We should then control their level; it would not always be necessary to prohibit the use of those chemicals.

Mr. Speaker, this new bill must be passed because discoveries are made through research which is being done here and in other countries. We keep up to date with research being done throughout the world. The nature of some substances must be taken into account. We are beginning to discover that some of them do not disperse in the atmosphere, that some do not disintegrate. It is felt therefore that their accumulation might be harmful because, through that accumulation they could infiltrate the environment and become clear sources of contamination.

This new bill, Mr. Speaker, would therefore empower the government to require from all manufacturers, users and distributors, data on the composition of those chemicals, and even require those manufacturers and users to perform tests to check the effects of the absorption of those substances, either in the environment or by individuals, in the atmosphere or even in the ground. Those data would be absolutely essential if we are to exercise the necessary controls.

We also want to measure the extent to which those substances are being used by the public, in the atmosphere and in manufacturing processes generally. For instance, we know paint contains toxic substances.

Some substances are suspected of being toxic, those in aerosols, for instance. I am seeking therefore the authority to study those substances and their chemical, biological and toxicological characteristics. In some cases, manufacturers may be compelled by legislation to provide the government with the information it needs, information which may very well be treated as confidential. If we are better informed about the rejection patterns of these substances, Mr. Speaker, we will eventually introduce the necessary legislation. We must obtain answers to the questions we ask ourselves about the new chemicals appearing daily on the market. Phenols and freons are big questions marks. Freons are chemicals which are used as propellants in aerosol and which are suspected—I repeat, suspected only—of affecting the ozone level in the atmosphere.

That is particularly crucial in the Arctic regions because, as we know, the level of ozone there is a lot lower than at other latitudes, and consequently we must study the effects of supersonic flights over those regions because aircraft release substances that can be injurious to the ozone over our latitudes. Supersonic flights, of course, must be supervised but it might also be advisable to control the use of aerosols.

Mr. Speaker, getting all those details which are indispensable for the promulgation of regulations, controls, measures and the circulation of information, such are the objectives we have in mind in introducing Bill C-25.

I do not say, Mr. Speaker, that we do not already have a lot of information about all those matters. No, quite the contrary, as I said, the Department of Environment and the Department of National Health and Welfare and other government agencies continuously make studies based on the information they can obtain from other countries also concerned by those questions. We already have a lot of information in that respect.

And I must say that although Bill C-25 will empower us to ask manufacturers for additional information or data on the products they make, already before the legislation is even passed, before it is even put into effect I must give credit to the manufacturers who already provided information to the department on the nature of new substances they intended to introduce on the market. They are already co-operating because they realize that prevention is indeed better than cure.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is to strengthen that co-operation from manufacturers that I seek authority under Bill C-25 to officially ask for the information I need.

The legislation already in existence dealt with the direct contamination of air or water, contamination coming from industrial sewers and plant chimneys. But the new legislation will provide us with means of control over about a hundred products that can be contaminating, even indirectly.

And that is why I needed a new instrument enabling us, for instance, to oblige manufacturers to run tests and notify us of the results. Mr. Speaker, that would facilitate the evaluation of those products and lighten the responsibility of making appropriate recommendations to manufacturers, users, distributors and, if need be, on the methods that could be used to destroy certain chemical substances considered as harmful to the environment.

The law, Mr. Speaker, already contains self-defense mechanisms against vexatious behaviour. I do not intend of course to use this legislation to launch undue inquiries, but only those that would prove essential to public interest. The law also has means of redress for those who would feel they were wronged by certain rules, orders in council or provisions of this legislation. It also provides for consultation mechanisms and, I would like to emphasize this point, the law would give the Minister of the Environment only residuary powers in cases where other federal or provincial legislation would make provision for problems of the kind we are now facing. The law also provides for penalties, which are unavoidable. In order to be effective, a legislation must provide for penalties and they are, I believe, sufficiently harsh to discourage those who would intend to violate such laws and regulations.

In short, Mr. Speaker, this well balanced legislation will enable us to make up for the failings of some of our existing laws and would undoubtedly meet with the people's desire to live in a healthy environment, allaying their concern over environment, what with all the theories we hear about this planet's limited capacity to absorb pollution.

This piece of legislation is also a proof of the modern ideas of this government, that will not let economic development and environment concerns develop on parallel lines. There is no conflict, Mr. Speaker, between those two important things, however, they must not develop on parallel lines, but they should meet so that we may find new development concepts. The legislation is therefore meant to prevent damages to the environment so that we could avoid devoting all our energies to repair damages. It would also enable us to tie up a loop, because there can be no gap, Mr. Speaker, in the feed chain or life cycle. Each defective link jeopardizes the entire chain or cycle. And as the Minister of the Environment, it is my duty to be on the alert for such defaults or deficiencies which could occur in the chain or life cycle and to suggest to the government the necessary action to restore that life chain or cycle. For there can be no gap in that chain or cycle and there is surely some interaction between what goes on land and underwater.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to introduce that bill to the House, because I have the impression that it meets the deep yearnings of the people as well as those of the hon. members opposite who no doubt want to join me in cleaning the environment, and say with me to the people that this government is conscientious and is conscious of the dangers of modern development and that a wise and progressive government does not want to refrain from dealing with those problems as it becomes more and more urgent to solve them.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, there has been a suggestion among the House leaders in regard to facilitating the business. While my hon. friend from Lambton-Kent will be our next speaker on this bill, and while hopefully he will speak for a few minutes on the bill before four o'clock, there are two other bills that the government House leader is anxious to forward and get through second reading and into committee. I think that could be done now, as long as my hon. friend will be entitled to the floor when we are through and we revert to this particular bill.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I believe it will be my private member's bill that will be debated this afternoon, so we need not see the clock until five or ten minutes past the hour to facilitate this suggestion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, why don't we move time ahead instead of pushing it back? I suggest that the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) rise now and move adjournment of this debate, that we then take the two bills that the government House leader has in mind, and then start the bill of my hon. friend from Nova Scotia, even at five minutes to four.

● (1550)

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, having listened to the observations from all sides of the House I would be prepared to move the adjournment of the debate at this time, maintaining the floor when the House next considers this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Mr. Holmes, seconded by Mr. Baldwin, moves that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Holmes the debate was adjourned.

STATUTE REVISION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF STATUTES AND REGULATIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

ACT TO REVISE REFERENCES TO COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

MEASURE TO AMEND STATUTES IN VIEW OF ABOLITION OF COURT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill S-16, to revise references to the Court of Queen's Bench of the province of Quebec, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT PUBLICATION OF PUBLIC OPINION POLL RESULTS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North) moved that Bill C-213, to amend the Canada Elections Act (publication of the result of opinion polls), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have debated the subject matter of this bill in this House, but I hope it will be the last.

In view of the fact that this parliament should last for approximately four years, short of some calamity we cannot anticipate at the moment, hon. members of this House should be in a better position to put their own houses in order, in so far as future election campaigns are concerned, by developing in one manner or another a more realistic approach to electioneering, and attempting in every way possible to assist the public in making reasoned judgments as to which political party and candidate should be supported in a constituency.

This bill has the support of the leader of my party. That hon. member, like myself and many other Canadians, has indicated a growing concern about the use of polls during election campaigns. I have no objection to their use by political organizations, individuals, groups or companies. It is my belief that such use has become a part of our way of life, and we accept the fact that polls are a vital and useful source of information in certain instances.

What has concerned me from the beginning, and concerns me today, is the fact that we have no rules or regulations associated with the use of polls and the results being placed before the public as authenticated information on which the public can draw conclusions. I am fearful that the use of such information by the media can be developed in such a way that people are misled or duped into reaching conclusions, and that this can be an obstacle in the way of obtaining information on which the public can rely in coming to a conclusion or a decision during an election campaign.

The results have been used in the past, in certain instances, in a way that has come close to stampeding voters during election campaigns to come to wrong conclusions. I am afraid that this may happen if the present system is allowed to continue. If this bill is referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections I believe we may be able to devise rules and regulations in respect of information presented to the public during election campaigns, so that the public will appreciate that there is a backup to the information provided as the result of an authentic poll.

Let me give an example of what can happen. On one evening toward the end of the last election campaign, I think in the last week or 10 days, I was listening to an evening newcast by the CBC. Certain views were given, based on a poll conducted by the CBC. Certain statements were made about certain things which might happen on the basis of information obtained by the corporation. That was well and good. During a later newscast that evening by the same corporation, based on the results of the same poll, a totally different statement was made as to what might happen.

As something more than a disinterested political observer, I reached the conclusion that the CBC did not know what it was talking about, or that the poll was so difficult and complicated to read even its own officers could not make a firm decision about the prediction. This is the sort of thing that has happened over and over again.

Some people might ask what difference it makes because people do not pay attention to polls in any event. I believe that people do pay attention to polls.

I think the Labour Party in Britain in 1970 discovered, to its unfortunate shock, that the poll on which it relied showed a result that was nothing like what the electorate produced in the way of votes. In effect what the poll did in respect of that political election campaign, because it indicated that the Labour Party in Britain would win by a very substantial margin, was to draw voters away from that party to the Conservative Party.

What concerns me, whether it should happen in favour of or against my party, is that people start making decisions, not on the gut issues that are being discussed but on figures presented as being authentic to show that this or something else will happen. People do make decisions in that way. Therefore I say the very least we as members of parliament can do, if we are to allow polls to continue in this country and be used by the media during an election campaign, is place the public and ourselves in a position of knowing that when the results of polls appear, the polls have been governed by some guidelines which we can accept.

We must be sure that there is no manipulation by the media in an effort to direct the electorate in any given direction. I do not say that the electorate necessarily would follow the direction in which the media might tend to lead it, but I do say that up until now it has been very difficult for me to believe there is any credibility at all in the results of any of the polls that have been produced and used during an election campaign because, almost without exception, when the information is brought forward there is a doubt factor which can run as high as 25 per cent.

In the particular poll to which I referred involving the CBC, the doubt factor ran as high as 33 per cent. When one realizes, when election day comes around, that 5 per cent of the electorate, should it swing one way or the other, can either elect or defeat a government, one realizes it is difficult to have much faith in polls which have such a doubt factor involved in them. Yet the media does not mind this very substantial doubt factor because, if the results are not the same as were indicated, they can then say that the doubt factor substantially went one way or the other, which altered the result the media had predicted.

I do not know about the radio and television stations, but many of the newspapers in this nation become very upset by any suggestion that they should be prevented from using polls. They say this would be curtailment of freedom of speech. I say in answer to that that any time the press does not provide accurate information to the public, based on sound facts, that information should not appear in the newspapers. I say there is no curtailment of freedom involved if the newspapers are prevented from using information which, in the first instance, is not authentic. All too often newspapers have neither the staff, the time nor the capability to produce accurate information in respect of what they endeavour to place before the public about an event that is taking place.

More often than ever before in the history of election predictions, polls have been shown to be inaccurate. At the same time while this is the case I believe a great many people in this nation still rely on them in an endeavour to make up their minds on how they will vote. Whether we like it or not, my experience in respect of the various election campaigns in which I have been involved is that many voters make their determination on whether or not they think they are voting for the candidate who will be a member of the party which forms the government.

All too often the polls give an inaccurate assessment of what in actual fact happens on election day. Unless some guidelines are produced, I feel polls should be abolished so far as their use publicly in the media is concerned.

At the same time, so that members of parliament cannot be charged with limiting freedom of the press in any way, I would accept as an alternative guidelines established by Parliament that would tell the media that if they are to produce the results of polls during an election campaign, and place these results before the public as accurate and authentic information on which the public should be able to rely, then the media will have to follow a set of rules and regulations to the effect that it must be shown how many people were encompassed by a poll, that the poll was national in its investigative function, or provincial if the poll being placed before the public purports to give a reading on the trends in a given province.

In addition the regulations should provide that every area in the nation must be involved. Far too often, especially in respect of Gallup polls produced in this country, there is no mention of the attitudes of the people who live in the four eastern provinces.

Many polling organizations seem to think that Canada begins at the New Brunswick-Quebec border and extends to the west. As one coming from Atlantic Canada I feel that our people should have a voice, and have a point of view which should be expressed. I also feel it is important to know what the people in all parts of Canada think, especially if something is being presented which is supposed to contain authentic information about how Canadians feel.

There are many other considerations, but I believe there should be a substantial contact with the people in the nation, that all parts of the nation must be involved, and that there should be a minimal doubt factor. All these things should be spelled out when the poll information is being presented to the public as authentic information concerning the type of trend that is developing during an election campaign.

If these things were done I would feel better about it when listening to the poll information, and so would the public. There would be an elimination of the danger that the media in one form or another could manipulate the public by using poll information that was not accurate, to tell people things that were going to happen when in fact they did not have the information to indicate that such events were occurring. I think that the people who are putting out that kind of information have to accept responsibility for it, and must face the fact that after the event occurs the information they presented should have been at least in close proximity to the result forecast. I believe it would be in the best interests of everyone if this were to happen.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few remarks on this bill. As for all other bills put before the House during the hour set aside for consideration of private members' business, I fear the clock will again put an end to the debate. But I must nevertheless congratulate the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) for having proposed this bill.

As far as the polls are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I understand we are grappling with a difficult and serious problem because it allows journalists not to play their informative part, but to mislead the population by publishing the results of these polls. I say "mislead", because I have 13 years of experience in politics, and every year or at every election, my constituents have been seriously misled. The vote proved the public opinion polls wrong. Even in the last election, they predicted my defeat by 3500 votes to my Liberal opponent. Yet, I made it with a majority of more than 4,000 votes, which makes a difference of almost 8,000 votes with the polls' predictions.

I feel that such action should not be allowed during a period as sensitive as election time. Some take an election campaign as a joke; to them, it is like a horse race. But when one is serious about politics, when one is a member of a political especially a third party, when the odds are one to one hundred, it is then that we realize the bad influence of opinion polls.

[Mr. Coates.]

I see that the government members are having fun and are laughing, but with millions of dollars, it is easy to laugh and to buy every possible opinion poll. I think the public is misled because many people rely on polls. Even if some believe that people pay no attention to these polls, I suggest it is not so. A large number of people rely on these polls which often influence their votes. Those people expect the results to be in accordance with the poll and they are all disappointed after the election to find that the opposite happened. I say this not only for the successful candidates but also for their opponents, in order to prevent terrible disappointments, to keep a candidate from believing that according to the poll, he should win, whereas the next day he is astounded by the results. I would even say that it is unhealthy for some defeated candidates, Mr. Speaker.

I think that everything would go well if the government wanted to act properly, if big parties wanted to be honest. I am referring to the big parties because it is still felt today that everything can be bought, and since the big parties have the money, since they can pay reporters, radio broadcasters and pollsters, they control the polls. Now, there are two kinds of polls. Some are pretty good in their areas, although they cannot give the picture of the whole country. On the other hand, other public opinion polls, and they are in great majority, are "cooked" by supporters who want to influence and attract the 15 or 20 p. 100 of the voters who might be influenced by these polls.

Mr. Speaker, I think that prohibiting all publication during the whole electoral period would guarantee protection to the public, especially when there are controversies with the media. During the last election, I have had a striking proof of that. I knew that those polls were false and I did not even pay attention to them. I did not even give one dollar to the media and, unlike in previous years, I did not resort to radio or television programs for support. I published nothing in the big newspapers, precisely because I had lost all confidence in them.

To my astonishment, I was elected with a majority of almost 2,000 more votes than in previous elections. But those people had been misled during the whole election campaign. They were brainwashed by 12 or 15 ministers, going about in cars, helicopters, planes, for three weeks in my riding, spreading propaganda. To my mind, that is dishonest influence. The people who are supposed to be free, are not allowed to do something serious, wise on their own. They are not even given time to think things over.

That is why I am happy to see this bill introduced; this evening, I hope, it will be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections where we can face each other, the government members and those of the opposition, and say what we think as well as what is going on. After the elections, the electoral comedy and the money game are over. I feel much more honest and dignified work could be done in committee to protect the freedom of the Canadian citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to abuse the time of the House dealing with this matter, but after such a dirt-throwing campaign, there is much to say. However, with this bill, I wish to demonstrate to the Canadian people that there are things money cannot buy, that Canada is still a democratic state, that it is still up to the citizen to decide, that no decision can be imposed upon him and, more often than not, that his decision cannot be bought.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that this bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C-213, because it raises a quite important issue. It goes much beyond the public opinion polls made during the election campaign. Indeed, it deals with the entire question of information during the election campaign.

As a matter of fact, since the appearance of the communication media through broadcasting, our election techniques have been entirely altered. This view, Mr. Speaker, applies as much to hon. members opposite as to members on this side.

As a result of the advent of television and radio and the increasingly broader role played by the media in the information of citizens, the broadcasting of views and information is quite important in the choice made by the electors on voting day.

In the past, the only opportunities for the elector to get acquainted with the government measures and decisions were the public meetings.

You remember, Mr. Speaker, that it was the custom after Sunday services or still at grandiose ceremonies to summon the local people and convey to them comments and judgments that were mutually exchanged on what was done during past terms.

Today, the elector is shut up in his home. Quite often, he does not have the time to get interested in electoral debates. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think we are mistaken about the interest most citizens take in the electoral campaign.

All hon. members will agree that the period of keenest interest exists in the last few days of the electoral campaign, in the last two weeks in particular, and that everything before that serves as nothing more than a warm-up for the electoral machinery. Therefore, that is the time when interest is developing and it is also when the modern information techniques are applied.

Surveys as we now know them changed in a quite unpredictable way. Indeed, over the years, we had grown accustomed to giving first place to the written media. Anyone going through dailies and weeklies of that period can find out that every party bought space in them, and more generally emphasized communications in the written media. But radio and television caught up, and now the broadcast word is just as likely to influence voters as the written word.

I was rather surprised to read Bill C-213 in its present form and hear my hon. friend suggest among other things that he would not oppose the regulation of surveys. Personally I would not oppose it either if all the facts were known. But I had a quick look through papers published on the question, I looked at studies completed here in United States and England, and I realized very soon we have but limited knowledge in the field. As a matter of fact, nobody doubts surveys have an impact, but the question of measuring such an impact, of estimating its effect on the voter is still unanswered. I would direct my colleagues to an article which appeared in pages 25 and 26 of October 1974 issue of the Economist, that is a few months after the July election.

Reference to a couple of studies done by university professors can be found here. The first one is by Professor Harris. It is considered the most authoritative, first because it involves a representative sample of voters and second because questions asked dealt directly with the impact of the survey on the voter's choice. And here, is Professor Harris' conclusion. Professor Harris found no evidence that polls affected total turn-out of voters or switches between one party or another.

Mr. Speaker, citizens are undoubtedly interested in knowing results of surveys. However, the credibility of surveys may be the determining factor. As a matter of fact, during the last election campaign, for instance, the Liberal and Conservative parties both published the results of an opinion survey. Obviously, each of them believed to be ahead of the other and both believed they had made important gains. I do not think that such a survey was a determining factor on the voter's choice as, finally, these conclusions were contradictory.

Another survey was made by a radio station in Montreal, based on a very limited sample of voters and three weeks before the vote. Even there, I do not think this survey had a determining influence on the voter's choice. On the other hand, it has also been said that the sponsors of these surveys could control public opinion. However, a survey was made 15 days before the elections outcome in the Province of Quebec by the IQOP, l'Institut québécois d'opinion publique, which is directed by people who are neither Liberals nor Progressives Conservatives but who belong to a provincial party. That survey was made in a way that I consider scientific. It was made by an agency famous in this field and that specializes in surveys. Second, this agency made the survey according to a proven method. Consequently, it had more credibility because two factors were involved in the evaluation of the results. Third, the sample chosen was representative that is to say that voters were chosen according to their location in urban centers and rural areas were also well represented so that the sample reflected the province's sociological pattern if I may say so. Last, the period at which the survey was made was also taken into account.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a survey made under those conditions, those four factors being taken into account, can allow the voter to reach convincing and useful conclusions. Moreover, if a poll is conducted by a host on an open-line program at lunch time, in the afternoon, when people are busy doing anything but getting serious information and debating political matters, if results are broadcast by a station, by a host who knows nothing about sociology, a host who simply answers calls from radio listeners, if those polls are conducted by people who may already have their own opinion and may tend to influence the results of the survey, such polls, in my opinion, have no credibility whatsoever and finally prove that Professor Harris was absolutely right in concluding that such polls have a marginal effect on the voters' choice.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that at election time, we hear a lot of true and false statements. I share the opinion of my colleague for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) who said that all kins of information are often heard during election campaigns. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the information or comments we hear are far more harmful than the few results that may be published following polls.

For example, a candidate during the last election campaign stated that the government favoured Quebec because $1 bills showed Parliament Hill as seen from Hull instead of Ottawa. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think candidates who go about telling such lies have a far worse influence on public opinion than any radio station, country paper or minor newspaper which decide to conduct their own polls.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we have to face the fact that, under present circumstances, many voters do not follow as closely as might be expected the political events. Not every voter waits for the results of polls before deciding for which candidate or party they will vote.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, to come back to one of the studies on the matter, the one by professor George Gaskell from the London School of Economics, an institution that my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada know quite well, Professor Gaskell mentioned that even within the studies that are now being made, the results of a poll are quite different if its findings show that there is a very wide difference between the leading party and the runner up, whether the two parties are following one another very closely or the voters are completely indifferent or undecided concerning the issue of the election.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the studies on this question, I would really feel unprepared to accept the bill as proposed. If it were suggested that we legislate on polls or allow a definite period of time in which these polls were to be conducted and if, on the other hand, agencies like Statistics Canada were asked to conduct these polls, in that case, I think we could make regulations which would allow public opinion to take shape under reasonable conditions. However, in the present context, I do not think it would be wise to prohibit all polls by saying afterwords: "We will regulate them".

I believe it would be much more useful in the interests of our electoral traditions and especially of the protection that we, as members of Parliament, must ensure our fellow citizens, if we were to introduce immediate regulations, some legislation that we could discuss and assess as against the results of the investigations which could be carried out on the value of polls.

I am not one of those who would be the first to restrict public opinion or favour measures restricting freedom of speech. However, I realize, as do all my colleagues, that there are all kinds of exaggerations and that these methods are used to serve all kinds of purposes. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the best way of arriving at an acceptable situation is to ignore polls. In fact, all commercial agencies use polls when they want to market a product and all political parties, whatever their colour, make good internal use of polls.

Of course, when it comes to electoral strategy, it is very easy to say that the results are in our favour and that such or such candidate is ahead. However, I am of the opinion that, before getting rid of this technique which, at present, gives appreciable results, we had better try and put forward a legislation which would allow us to make surveys in acceptable conditions, rather than simply proposing to abolish them. When organizations conducted polls or surveys to determine the unemployment rate in this country, before the establishment of Statistics Canada, we did not think very high of the results, but now that a duly authorized organization such as Statistics Canada makes known the results of its monthly surveys conducted according to specific standards and criteria, these surveys are given the credibility they deserve and are useful in the developpment of economic policies.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is the same with polls. We should manage to propose—and this is something I suggest to my hon. colleague who sponsored bill C-213—regulations on polls, to authorize some professional agencies rather than simply abolish polls and ignore that this technique is useful and may be of use to the electorate. As for me, I do not think that the proposed results could be achieved simply by abolishing polls under the pretence of the exaggerations or dishonest actions which may happen in public opinion and under the pretence of the manipulation of public opinion; Mr. Speaker, one must admit that the number of voters who may be affected by the results of a poll varies with the elections.

There are elections in which the opinion of a majority of voters is already set in favour of a party. There are election situations in which the public opinion is quite divided between the policies and the mandates proposed by different parties. Finally, there are elections in which the outcome seems so remote that the majority of voters take no interest in them. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we have enough information nor sufficient evidence at this moment to accept, as my colleague suggests, to purely and simply do away with the taking of polls during election periods, and once the writs are issued.

I rather think, Mr. Speaker, that all parties who really want to improve our election habits should further their studies in that respect on an individual basis in an effort to determine the extent to which polls affect public opinion and propose regulations rather than merely ignore the polls. I would like to relate that question to the financing of political parties. The financing of political parties has been under attack for several years, particularly the obscurantism of election funds involving all sorts of tinkering with the financing of political parties and election costs. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it would have been simplistic for the House of Commons to decide overnight to do away with all contributions to political parties simply because there was a risk of tinkering on the part of candidates of a party or the government. Parliament looked into that matter during the 29th Parliament and passed a very complex legislation. I think all political parties that are now prepared to apply it realize that. I think progress was made in that direction, and I would think that we should follow that example if we want to improve our political habits about public information. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I would purely and simply ask that this bill be withdrawn since in its present form it does not contain enough material to be referred to committee.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that almost every one of us has either spoken of polls in the way one of our party leaders expressed himself about them during the last election, or thought about them in that way. He said, "When the polls are in my favour, they are wonderful; when they are against me, I pay no attention to them."

I readily understand the concern of the hon. member who introduced this bill, a concern expressed in his hope that our elections might be run in such a way that our electors would really have free choice. I support that ideal to the hilt, but it seems to me that other things interfere with that free choice far more than the publication of polls.

The previous parliament enacted legislation respecting election expenses. I do not think it went far enough. I think money spent on high powered advertising frustrates the opportunity of people to think freely at election time. If we want to improve our elections by allowing citizens of our country freer opportunity to express their thinking, we should go further in equalizing amounts of money available to the various parties and, as well, take any steps we can to rid ourselves of misleading advertising, which is prominent in election campaigns just as it is prominent in the commercial world generally.

We can do something else to improve our elections. I know that what I feel is felt by members in all quarters of the House, and I regret very much that we have not moved in this direction. I am speaking, of course, of shortened election campaigns. They ought to be several weeks shorter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Election campaigns lasting seven, eight or nine weeks are rough for all those who participate in them and they weary the souls and minds of our people, until they hardly know what to think. Near the end of that long period they are easily stampeded one way or the other. I think we would improve people's freedom of choice at election times if our election campaigns were shorter.

● (1640)

As for this specific bill, I would certainly have no objection if the subject matter of it were referred to the appropriate committee so that this matter could be discussed further. However, I see some very real difficulties in it.

During an election campaign, I pursue one of my favourite ways of campaigning by going to shop gates. If I stand at a shop gate early in the morning and ask enough of the workers going in how they are going to vote so it becomes clear to me that I have 75 per cent or maybe 90 per cent of the workers at that particular plant—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My friend need not laugh. There are plants in Winnipeg where that is the case. However, if I send out a news sheet, poster or handbill, or in any other manner say that the workers at the CPR Weston shops, Dominion Bridge or Manitoba Bridge plants in Winnipeg North Centre are voting 75 or 80 or 90 per cent for me, according to this bill I would be committing an illegal act.

There are real difficulties when you try to control the dissemination of information or the collecting of information and publishing it in one way or another. Maybe I have taken the extreme case, but certainly any reading of these words makes it clear that the bill does not just confine itself to the established commercial poll-taking organizations. It applies to any person who purports to take some kind of poll and publishes the results of that poll in any manner whatsoever. I think the bill is good as a vehicle for getting the subject discussed. If the subject matter could be referred to a committee for such discussion, that would be useful.

I cast my eye across the way and I see that my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is here. He usually is on a Friday afternoon. He is part of this exclusive club that is here on Friday afternoons.

Mr. Francis: Thank you, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has a bill on the order paper which deals with a broader subject, of which this is a part. I refer to the hon. member's Bill C-333 having to do with subliminal advertising. I am concerned not only with subliminal advertising, but with the subliminal effects of a great deal of open advertising.

Most of us have ideas and ideals about what life should be like, the kind of persons we should be and how we should live. However, if I get the opportunity to sit in front of television, I come away with the impression that in order to be a full fledged member of society in this twentieth century, and it is getting pretty close to the twenty-first, you have to make sure your breath is pure. If you are female, you need to have the sweetest mouth in town. I find you have to make sure you have no body odours that are offensive and the impression given is that you have. These advertising people tell you what to do about all that. I find that you must drink beer and enjoy it.

Mr. Cullen: How many drink it who don't?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I don't drink it. I don't enjoy it. Indeed, I share the feeling of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) that it is offensive that this kind of advertising is put over television.

The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) is concerned about freedom of people to express themselves at election time. I say that the freedom of people in this country to decide the kind of persons they want to be is terribly thwarted. It is terribly frustrated by the kind of advertising for profit that goes on in the media of this country.

I could go on with a long list, but I do not want to speak too long on this. The ultimate is that you really are not a full fledged member of twentieth century society and are unable to get into the twenty-first century unless you have the right kind of tissue in your bathroom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what the advertising people are doing to us. The hon. member who brought forward this bill has drawn our attention to the fact that they are also trying to influence us in terms of our voting patterns. They are all doing it for commercial reasons. They are all doing it for a profit. I submit that society has to sort this all out somehow.

I belong to a party that believes there is a lot we can do by legislation, but I do not see how we can legislate the press or the media. We might suggest that they be here when we are discussing them. I am glad to see two reporters in the gallery at the present time. When I got up there was only one. A second came in. This is a red letter day for me.

I do not want to take any more time because others want to speak. The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North has done a service by raising this issue today. That is not an indirect way of saying I will support his bill, because I am afraid I cannot. I think it would create more problems than it would solve. In any event, as I said earlier, I still want to be free to try to make an assessment of how things are going in my constituency at election time, and to say how I think things are going. How you can draw the line between one person doing that and another, I do not know.

I end with an emphasis on the point I have been trying to make. A concern that is really hitting us in our society today is the extent to which freedom of thought and freedom of decision as to the kind of people we want to be is terribly thwarted by commercial interests. I am glad there is some legislation on the books regarding misleading advertising. I think we have to go a lot further. I hope that one day we will have media, print and electronic, educational forces, religious forces and all the rest, the aim of which will not be some particular axe to be ground and not some particular profit to be made, but the real enrichment of human life.

Mr. Muir: I wonder if the hon. member will permit a question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Gladly.

Mr. Muir: Thank you very much. I always listen with great interest to the distinguished and hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He talked at great length about misleading advertising. During the last election campaign thousands of yellow sheets were passed around my constituency by the NDP candidate which said in so many words "Moneys have been allocated for two constituency offices and two secretaries for Bob Muir. Bob Muir has not opened these offices and has not employed these two secretaries. Where has the money gone? Your guess is as good as mine".

I am sure that all members here, especially the distinguished member from Winnipeg North Centre, know how moneys are allocated for constituency offices. Members do not receive any moneys. It is all a deal between treasury and so on. Does the hon. member consider that misleading advertising in view of the fact he has mentioned misleading advertising so much?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the facts are as the hon. member has stated them, that is of course misleading. I deplore misleading advertising or misleading propaganda of any kind, particularly in this area. I say this as one who has spent no government money at all on a constituency office.

Mr. Muir: Thank you.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I lost in that exchange one and a half of my three and a half minutes. I can, therefore, abbreviate more than ever before. I want to agree with the hon. member who just spoke about the iniquity of beer advertising. I think it is most unwholesome. I commend him rather to a much more sedate and thoughtful document, the Senate Report on the Commonwealth Caribbean, which refers to the high quality West Indian rum.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Macquarrie: That is the kind of thing he should be reading instead of spending his time on beer ads which are just as much trash.

● (1650)

I want to say that when I first heard my colleague from Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) mention this subject, I was very cool to it. But as election has followed election, I look with more favour upon his suggestion, because I think there is in fact, in this age where the medium is the message, some great danger in the manipulative tendencies getting just a bit out of hand. I agree with that great man Charles Lynch, who, while he is often wrong certainly can write, when he pointed out not long ago that the question about Gallup polls is whether or not they distort the democratic process by depicting the voting pattern in advance. This is a very important matter which I believe should be carefully studied.

The hon. member will probably be successful because a lot of us who have been here for quite a while have found that we tend to harp upon a given subject. I have been talking about permanent voting lists ever since I have been here, and some day we could get them. Perhaps we will then have what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) desires, a shorter election campaign period, and that is all to the good. Some day, I hope, we will have electronic voting in this chamber and a set period of waiting for the vote. I remember that in one parliament I and my colleagues spent slightly over a month on the voting process, and this means something less than an efficient operation of the parliamentary system.

I commend my colleague for his bill and I believe it should be studied by the committee. To expedite that process I will resume my seat.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks I want to touch on an area which I have not heard mentioned this afternoon. Being a naive backbencher perhaps I have not caught on to something, and in many ways I am very thankful that the galleries are not too full. I gather that the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) is experiencing grave concern as to the effect these various polls may have upon the average voter. Indeed I gathered from his remarks that he is of the opinion that the voter is being led down the well-known garden path.

On this point I have to disagree. Few, if any, public opinion polls in the past three or four elections have, in my opinion, been correct. I say that the average voter, in the west at least, pays little or no attention to such polls. Voters meet the candidates and speak with them, and then make up their minds. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) must know from all his years in politics that it is the people who make up their minds, not the polls.

I cannot accept the view of the hon. member from across the way who went on about the big money parties controlling such polls. Has he no faith or trust in his fellow citizens? Does he believe that most voters are so naive that they will believe anything they hear on the radio, see on television or read in the newspapers? I would not dare accuse the electors, in my riding at least, of such foolishness.

If we choose to enforce such a bill as Bill C-213 we are, in effect, telling the people of Canada that they are not to be trusted; that in the opinion of the supporters of this bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to seek the will of the House concerning private members' hour which, as hon. members know, started at 3.54 p.m. Is it the desire of the House that private members' hour be precisely one hour, or that we should allow the hon. member to continue until five o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at 3.54 p.m. we called it four o'clock so I think we should go to five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearsall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, we are, in effect, telling the people of Canada that they are not to be trusted. I gather that the supporters of this bill are of the opinion that the average Canadian does not have the intelligence to understand what he or she sees, hears or may read during an election campaign, and I find this carrying things a little too far. As I said earlier, thank heavens there are not too many of our electors sitting in the galleries today, for I am afraid they would have some very harsh things to say about their representatives down below in this chamber.

I believe that the great majority of Canadians are intelligent enough to review all the issues during a an election. They make their choice regardless of what the polls try to tell them. There is a poll conducted on the west coast which is known as the hamburger poll, and which has been going on for quite a few years. Perhaps other members have it in their areas as well. Some of the results of this poll have been really ridiculous, but it was amazing how it was only the news media that built it up to any extent. When the final results came in the man with all the hamburgers in his favour lost the election, and his supporters ended up with bad stomachs.

All through this bill the average Canadian is being told that he is not to be trusted when he walks into a polling station, or looks at television, or reads a newspaper during an election campaign, and I honestly feel that this is an insult to the average Canadian, indeed to all Canadians. They make their choice regardless of what the polls try to tell them. I believe all my fellow Canadians conduct themselves during an election in a manner that we would expect of them.

When I hear it said today that the Canadian people can be contaminated by such polls, I cannot help but wonder what is the thinking of the hon. member and how is he going to answer the people in his riding when he puts forward such a bill as this.

Mr. Crouse: He has been through eight elections so I think he can answer to them for a little while longer. Don't let that concern you.

Mr. Pearsall: Well, I told the House I was a naive backbencher. Therefore I cannot concern myself with this bill and I believe it should be withdrawn.

I should like to make one other point that I missed and which the hon. member raised. He attempted to convey to us that the kind of poll he was mentioning in his bill could have an influence—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. please. Once again I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the hour allotted for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock. this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ELLIS—INVESTIGATION OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising from the point of order raised Wednesday last by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) as recorded at page 1710 of Hansard. I regret that this is my first day in the House since the statement was made. The minister stated:

> ... it was alleged that he had in his possession a classified document belonging to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. This could have constituted an offence under the Official Secrets Act.

I feel I have two points which must be made. First, who was my accuser and how was the accusation made? Why was I not told about the accusation? Surely, any citizen, and perhaps particularly members of this House, is entitled to know when and if they are under investigation, for what purpose and who the instigators are. Surely, an investigation of this sort is not made on the basis of an anonymous phone call. I am confident it was not started by the RCMP themselves but, rather, on the direction of someone within the cabinet.

Second, with regard to the Official Secrets Act, what classified documents relating to the Unemployment Insurance Commission could possibly be construed as "prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state"? Surely, the collection of funds from employers and employees across Canada, adding contributions from government and distributing the same to the unemployed, could in no way be construed as a security matter. It might well be, as has been shown, evidence of monumentally inept bungling on the part of the UIC administration; but surely all Canadians, particularly members, have a right to know what is happening to their money. The disclosure of such a document might be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the government, but that is far removed from an offence under the Official Secrets Act.

Is the Solicitor General, the second highest ranking legal officer in the government, in fact confessing that he is perverting the Draconian provisions of the Official Secrets Act to the uses of the government rather than the state? In light of the serious statements made by the minister, I feel I have a bona fide question of privilege. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith):

> That the subject matter of this question of privilege be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised some important questions. I was not the minister responsible at the time, but I would be pleased to look into the questions he raises. I might say that I said it could have constituted an offence because the police did not know what the nature of the document was at that time. I think, if I remember correctly, the hon. member himself said in a television broadcast that he had a document. Who had asked for the investigation, I am not sure; but I will check into that. I also went on to say in my statement last week that once the RCMP had checked with the hon. member they found there was no ground for any charge and dropped the case immediately. But the hon. member raised some important questions at the beginning of his remarks and I will check into this matter and give the information to him and to the House as well.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no other contributions on the question of privilege of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), may I say that the hon. member did give the Chair notice and, as a result, gave us an opportunity to examine the merits of the case. I do not want to dwell on the matter at great length. It is a somewhat unique situation in view of the fact that the matter first arose in the House on Tuesday, November 26, the day before the minister's remarks, when the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard) was putting questions to the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) about RCMP investigations.

In the course of this exchange, the Solicitor General made replies which indicated that members of the House, or others, would not be investigated unless they were suspected of some breach of security or alleged criminal activity. At that point, the hon. member who has just raised the question of privilege rose in his place on a point of order and said, basically—I will paraphrase his words which are, of course, reported in Hansard—that, having been subject to an investigation without being suspected of any criminal activity, he challenged the answer of the Solicitor General. In due course, the Solicitor General made further remarks which indicated that in light of the hon. member's remarks, he would check further and report to the House.

In view of the fact that it was the hon. member himself who raised the question and put it in issue, namely, that he was at one time the subject of an investigation as a result of some connection with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and it was not the Solicitor General who first raised it, and in view of the fact that the Solicitor General then undertook to report to the House—and did report to the House—the following day indicating that, as the hon. member had indicated, the reason for his investigation had to do with the possession of a document connected with the Unemployment Insurance Commission, with the result of the inquiry being that there was no criminal activity or breach of security connected with the possession of the document, the investigation was dropped.

Under the circumstances, I think it is appropriate for the House to address itself, with concern, as to whether or not the investigation should have taken place in the first place. In that respect, I am sure all members of the House are grateful for the undertaking of the Solicitor General to look into the matter and to report further. Indeed, as the Solicitor General said to the House, he was not the incumbent of this office at that time, and I am sure his undertaking will be pursued to the comfort of members of the House.

But the question before us at this moment is not that one particularly but, rather, whether the remarks of the Solicitor General to this House constitute a question of privilege. In view of the fact that it was the hon. member himself who first intervened in the proceedings the previous day to put these facts on record, I am unable to find that any action by the Solicitor General constitutes a breach of the privileges of the hon. member, therefore, of any other member of the House. Therefore, I have to find that there is no prima facie question of privilege at the moment.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul) moved that the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented to the House on Thursday, November 21, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I think this particular report raises some procedural points and I wonder if Your Honour would like to hear argument on them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has examined the report in question and is, indeed, deeply concerned about its orderliness. Briefly, the facts are that a private member's bill concerning the recapitalization of the British Columbia Telephone Company was presented in the House in proper order and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. That committee tabled its second report which made recommendations to the House concerning the deposit that was paid to the House of Commons on account of the fees payable upon the recapitalization of the company; that is to say, payable upon passage of the bill. The committee recommended that these funds be held in abeyance because of a possible change in the procedures of the House in respect of payment of these fees.

Upon study of that report, the Chair was in considerable doubt as to whether or not that was within the authority of the committee which had before it a bill for study. The following report of the committee recommended passage of the bill without amendment. In fact, the bill was passed on Thursday last in private members' hour with one amendment which went forward with the unanimous consent of the House.

That report having been tabled, it is now moved that the House give concurrence to the report and to the recommendation that the deposit of some $200,000 be held in abeyance until such time—I should not go further than that because until when is not absolutely clear. In any case, that report is before the House at the present time. The question is whether the committee has authority to go beyond the provisions of the bill and to make recommendations on matters which appear to be outside the scope of the bill entirely.

The Chair has some concern and is prepared to hear argument now, or to give hon. members an opportunity to prepare presentations upon the point of procedure and to hear argument at this time tomorrow. I am in the hands of the House in this regard. Perhaps we should defer the matter for 24 hours and hear argument tomorrow. One hon. member has given the Chair some precedents to examine, and it might be worth while if we were to hold the matter in abeyance until motions tomorrow, to call the motion at that time and to see hon. members who might wish to contribute to the question of procedure at that time. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

COMMUNITY EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY

TABLING OF JOINT COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED BY BRITISH COLUMBIA AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, under Standing Order 41(2), copies in both official languages of the joint communiqué on Community Employment Strategy agreed to by the federal government and the province of British Columbia in Vancouver last Friday, November 29, this being the first we have signed with any provincial government.

PENITENTIARIES

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF CORRECTIONAL INVESTIGATOR

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when we established the position of correctional investigator one year ago, I promised to table the annual report of the correctional investigator even though there was no statutory requirement to do so. I should like, now, to table in this House the first annual report of the correctional investigator.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is an open government.

Mr. Stanfield: Open as a sieve.

Mr. Wagner: An open penitentiary.

BEEF—LARGE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN PRICE PAID BY CONSUMER AND RECEIVED BY PRODUCER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. This matter concerns the unprecedented spread between the low price paid to the beef producer and the high price paid by the consumer. No inquiry to date, including that of the Food Prices Review Board, has been able to explain this spread, although it is of vital importance to the underpaid producer and the hard pressed consumer in these days of escalating food prices.

Mr. Speaker, I have documentary evidence that leads me to believe that this low producer return and high consumer price problem has been caused by malfunction of the government-administered grading system. I plead with members to support my motion asking that the government inquire into this matter of such great concern to all hon. members and to the public. I shall be glad to appear before any inquiry with my documentary evidence.

● (1420)

With consent, Mr. Speaker, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the government immediately inquire into this serious matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have considerable reservation whether this matter, although important, contains any ingredient of immediacy or pressing urgency. In this case, because the full details of the hon. member's presentation may leave some question as to whether the necessary degree of immediacy or urgency is present, I will inquire of the House whether there is unanimous consent. The hon. member's motion, presented pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House if it is to be debated. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous agreement, the motion cannot be put at this time.

Attendance of Members

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED MEMBERS UNDER STANDING ORDERS—PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO WINNIPEG

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, rather than relying on Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 5, which reads:

Every member is bound to attend the service of the House, unless leave of absence has been given him by the House.

Sir, it has been announced that at the invitation of Mayor Juba of the city of Winnipeg, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is to attend a centennial dinner in my city this Thursday, December 5. Because I am one of the Winnipeg members, and because all of us feel that he should be there, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the Prime Minister be granted leave of absence from the House of Commons on Thursday, December 5, 1974, under the provisions of Standing Order 5, for the purpose of attending a centennial dinner being held in the city of Winnipeg, provided that at that dinner he announce the early commencement of work on the new air base facility promised to Winnipeg during the recent election campaign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Notwithstanding the clear provisions of the rule which may or may not affect the right of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), without the leave of the House, to attend this or any other ceremony or function which may be considered as part of his duties, the fact is that the provisions of that rule do not contemplate any motion as substantive as the one now being presented to the House without fulfilling the requirements of notice that pertain to every other substantive motion. I know that no one in this chamber is more aware of this provision than the hon. member who has just got his point across without conforming to the rules.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If my motion is not put and granted, does that mean the Prime Minister does not have the right to be absent on Thursday?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member does not move, in the same motion, that I be given permission to absent myself to go to Washington. Surely, important though Winnipeg is, the relations between Canada and the United States are also very important.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if there is unanimous consent, I shall be glad to add Washington to Winnipeg in the text of my motion.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, does the hon. member also want to ask the House to approve the unanimous instructions that he would want me to carry out in Washington?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I could try.

FEED GRAINS—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE SHORTAGE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce an extremely urgent motion.

In view of the grain inspectors' strike, the impending end of the shipping season and the eventual scarcity of flour and feed grain in eastern Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the government take immediately the necessary steps to cope with those conditions.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such a consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent; the motion cannot therefore be put.

MEASURE TO REMOVE REQUIREMENT FOR ACT OF U.S. CONGRESS BEFORE COMMENCING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-367, to amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, this bill will amend the Fort-Falls Bridge Authority Act to bring it into conformity with an enabling act passed by the United States Congress. There were some discrepancies between the two acts. This act will bring ours into line with theirs and allow a new bridge to be built at Fort Francis international falls.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Heavyweight dress uniforms of the current style of uniform have never been issued to Armed Forces personnel. However, heavyweight material can be purchased from Department of National Defence clothing stores by individuals who wish to have a uniform tailored privately. Thermal underwear and sweaters are issued to all male personnel and in addition those working outdoors are provided with heavyweight protective outer clothing.

Female personnel are issued with heavyweight jackets and skirts.

2. What was the average rate of interest on all new loans in this same period?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. (a) Highest, 13.5%; (b) Lowest, 9.5%.

2. Average, 11.29%. The above figures apply to the bank's fiscal year ended September 30, 1974.

CENTRAL CANADIAN DISTILLERS LTD.—WEYBURN, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 285—Mr. McKinnon:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): I am informed by the Foreign Investment Review Agency and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows: (a) Control of Central Canadian Distillers Ltd. of Weyburn, Saskatchewan was acquired by L.J. McGuiness and Co. Ltd. of Toronto late in 1973 and reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail on February 16, 1974. L.J. McGuiness and Co. Ltd. was acquired in 1970 by Standards Brands Limited of Montreal which in turn is controlled by U.S. interests; (b) The company has been the recipient of a grant from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion: (i) the grant totalled $603,911 and was provided under the authority of the Regional Development Incentives Act; (ii) no steps are being taken to recover the grant since the sale of the shares of Central Canadian Distillers Corporation Ltd. occurred after the expiry of the legally authorized control period. INCOME TAX ACT—DEDUCTION FOR EXPENSES INCURRED IN THE PURCHASE OF NEW HOME

Question No. 369—Mr. Dick:

Is the government considering a change in the regulations under the Income Tax Act to allow a person to claim a deduction under the title of moving expenses, being legal expenses for purchasing of a new home?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): A number of requests have been received from the public urging an amendment to the Income Tax Act to give a deduction for expenses incurred in the purchase of a new home. These requests are receiving careful study. However, as such an amendment would be a budgetary matter, it would be improper to indicate whether or not such an amendment will in fact be proposed.

COMPANIES HELD BY CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION AND CROWN CORPORATIONS

Question No. 379—Mr. Rynard:

1. What are the names of the companies owned by the Canada Development Corporation and what is the percentage of control for each company?

2. What is the amount of holdings of Connlab held by the Canada Development Corporation and what was the net profits of this Company for the years 1970, 1971, 1972 and 1973?

3. How much stock of the Gulf Oil Company is held by the Canadian Development Corporation?

Order Paper Questions

4. What was the cash value of all companies held by Crown corporations (a) on date of purchase (b) as of October 1, 1974?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. As of December 31, 1973: Polysar Limited, 100 per cent; Texasguld Inc., 30.4 per cent; Connlab Holdings Limited, 100 per cent; Venturetek International Limited, 35 per cent; Ventures West Capital Ltd., 49 per cent; Innocan Investments Ltd., 40 per cent; Gas Arctic—Northwest Project Study Group, 3.7 per cent.

2. The CDC formed Connlab Holdings Limited in June 1973 with initial resources of $35 million. At December 31, 1973, the last fiscal year-end, Connlab's assets amounted to $69.5 million. Connlab registered a profit of $41,000 in 1973.

3. None.

4. (a) Not available. Some companies held by Crown corporations were established by them and thus on the date of incorporation had no cash value (e.g. Air Canada's subsidiary Airtransit Canada Ltd., a number of subsidiaries of CN such as Canac Consultants Limited). Other companies held by Crown corporations were acquired as the result of their business failure where the government had guaranteed all or part of their debts (e.g. Canadian National Railways holds in trust the government's investment in the Canadian government railways, such as the Inter Colonial). It is not feasible at this time to make an appraisal of the value of an asset acquired, in some instances, (b) Not available. Since a cash value is the amount a willing purchaser would pay a willing seller, it can only be obtained by either calling for tenders if the company is to be sold or by having an appraisal estimate made by a qualified appraiser.

CIRCULATION AND CULTURAL INFLUENCE OF "READER'S DIGEST"

Question No. 393—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the government aware that the annual circulation of Sélection du Reader's Digest is up to three million?

2. Does the government have any concern about the cultural influence of the magazine and has it met with representatives of the Government of the Province of Quebec to discuss this matter?

3. Are there other magazines of such circulation in the Province of Quebec?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. According to a statement of the Audit Bureau of Circulation which appeared in the November 1974 issue of Canadian Advertising Rates & Data, the average monthly circulation of Sélection du Reader's Digest for the second half of 1973 was 268,772 copies. This would indicate that its annual circulation is up to 3 million.

2. (a) Yes, the government is concerned about the cultural influence of this magazine. (b) No, it has not met with representatives of the government of the province of Quebec to discuss this matter.

3. Yes there are other magazines of such circulation in the province of Québec: namely Châtelaine (French language edition) at 248,612, and Famille d'aujourd'hui at 220,350. These figures were taken from the same source as cited in reply to Part 1.

[Mr. Rynard.]

OLYMPIC COINS

Question No. 407—Mr. Lachance:

Do any banks, acting under orders from the Bank of Canada, refuse to honour the Olympic Coins having a legal tender below $20 and, if so, does the government intend to correct this situation which could create anxiety among the numismatists of the world and among Canadian taxpayers in general?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The Bank of Canada has not issued any orders to banks to refuse to accept Olympic coins.

UIC—TRAVEL EXPENSES FOR REGIONAL DIRECTORS

Question No. 435—Mr. Ellis:

What were the travel expenses for the Regional Director (Director General) (a) Quebec (b) Ontario of the Unemployment Insurance Commission for 1972 and 1973?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1972: Ontario, $5,775; Quebec, $1,983; 1973: Ontario, $4,966; Quebec, $2,106.

INCOME TAX DEDUCTION COVERING WAGES PAID TO A FARMER'S SPOUSE

Question No. 512—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

Is the government giving consideration to allowing a farmer to deduct, for income tax purposes, wages or salaries paid to the farmer's spouse for work done in connection with the farming operation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The government in the past had considered permitting an unincorporated farmer as well as a small commercial businessman to deduct wages paid to his spouse for demonstrably useful labour, and to allow the wife to report this income. While such a deduction is fair in principle, it was determined that the establishment of the validity of the claim would give rise to administrative difficulties. An unwarranted splitting of income would be unfair and would give rise to tax avoidance. It is to be noted that a farm which is incorporated can pay a salary to any employee including the wife of the owner. It should be realized of course that an individual farmer with low income has lower tax rates than corporations and is entitled to special averaging provisions.

UIC—USE OF COMPUTERS TO PROVIDE STATISTICS ON NUMBER OF BENEFICIARIES

Question No. 546—Mr. Herbert:

Is it the intention of the government to revise the conputer systems used by the Department of Manpower and Immigration to provide up-to-date information on (a) the precise number of persons drawing unemployment benefits (b) the number included in this total who are drawing (i) sickness benefits (ii) maternity benefits (c) the number of persons whose eligibility period for benefits has expired?

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In so far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned: Statistics Canada is the official source of statistics on the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Negotiations between Statistics Canada and the Unemployment Insurance Commission are currently under way to specify the precise computer systems requirements for the publication of statistics on the actual number of beneficiaries of the various types of benefits under the program and termination of claims. These data can be expected to appear in Statistics Canada's publications in 1975.

INCOME TAX—CONSIDERATION OF DEDUCTION OF TAX FOR SMALL FARMER

Question No. 577—Mr. Herbert:

Will the Minister of Finance consider financial assistance to the small farmer by premitting a limited direct deduction from federal taxes of paid municipal and school taxes?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Farmers like businessmen may deduct municipal and school taxes paid from their income to the extent that these are a business and not a personal expense. Therefore, no consideration is being given to provide a direct deduction from federal taxes.

CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 579—Mr. Herbert:

1. Are chartered banks prevented by the Bank Act from acting in a fiduciary capacity?

2. Has the Minister of Finance received any indication that banks exercise control in such a capacity over pension funds and the funds of other investors?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. It would be deemed beyond the powers of a bank under the Bank Act to act in a fiduciary capacity.

2. No.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT—AMOUNT OF LOANS

Question No. 611—Mr. Herbert:

1. What was the maximum rate of interest that was determined on October 1, 1974 under the small Businesses Loans Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. The maximum rate of interest was 10 per cent.

2. In July $1,897,537 and August $1,756,760 was lent under the Small Businesses Loans Act. (Figures are as reported by lenders up to October 18, 1974).

MIDWESTERN ONTARIO—BRUCE PUBLIC TRANSPORT STUDY

2. What was the purpose of identifying respondents in the survey by electoral district?

3. On what date was a copy of the report first transmitted by CTC to the Minister of Transport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The total cost to the Canadian Transport Commission of the survey of individuals in midwestern Ontario was $29,300. It was made up of the following elements: Fieldwork, $19,600; Data processing, $4,750; Administration, co-ordination, questionnaire designs, etc. $4,950.

2. Respondents in the survey were identified by Census Enumeration Areas (the smallest rural statistical geographic unit for which census information is available, thereby providing the best basis on which to locate respondents and conduct analyses). The coding numbers for enumeration areas are duplicated within electoral districts; therefore the electoral districts must be known to identify the enumeration area and hence the respondent.

3. A copy of the third part of the study was first transmitted to the Minister of Transport on April 24, 1974.

FREIGHT RATE FREEZE

Question No. 675—Mr. Horner:

In the freight rate freeze that was announced at the Western Economic Conference (a) what was the total amount paid to the transportation companies because of the freeze (b) how much did each company receive (c) were these companies subsidized under the same formula as the Freight Rate Reduction Act and, if not, what formula was used?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): (a) The total amount paid to the transportation companies because of the freeze is $40,689,251.45 in accounts of year 1973. (b) The following companies received the following amounts: Canadian National, $27,000,000.00; Canadian Pacific, $13,000,000.00; Ontario Northland Transportation Co., $51,526.00; Northern Alberta Railways Co., $634,536.00; Napierreville Junction Railways, $3,189.45; Total, $40,689,-251.45. MONCTON, N.B.—RAIL RELOCATION

Question No. 678—Mr. Jones:

1. Has the Canadian Transport Commission received an application from the City of Moncton for rail-line relocation and, if so, what steps have been taken to act on the application?

2. What financial assistance is available to the City of Moncton for rail-line relocation?

Order Paper Questions

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. An application to give notice that the city of Moncton was desirous of taking advantage of the proposed legislation previously announced was submitted in the form of a resolution by the city of Moncton in 1972. No supplementary application amplifying the resolution or further application has been received by the CTC.

2. Financial assistance is available under the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act for: (a) Preparation of the transportation plan and the urban development plan. The act provides for a grant of 50 per cent of the cost from the Ministry of Transport for the transportation plan and 50 per cent of the cost from the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs for the urban development plan. (b) Railway relocation. The grant shall not exceed 50 per cent of the net cost of railway relocation and this grant is authorized by the Minister of Transport. In addition to this grant the act provides for assistance from the railway grade crossing fund for grade separations which may be required.

Question No. 730—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is a public servant from a distant city, who enters and wins a competition for a position in the National Capital Region, transferred at public expense?

2. Is a public servant in the National Capital Region ineligible to enter a similar competition in a distant city by reason of transfer costs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): 1. Yes, paragraph 1.04 of the Treasury Board Relocation Directive, December 1973 states: "When an employee is transferred or his place of duty is changed to another location and, in the opinion of the deputy head, payment of part or all of an employee's relocation expenses is warranted, the deputy head may authorize a relocation under the terms of this directive." Paragraph 1.05 states in part: "Once a relocation has been authorized; (a) the employee shall be reimbursed his reasonable and justifiable relocation expenses.—" Paragraph 1.07 states: "Where a relocation results from a transfer between departments, the cost shall normally be borne by the receiving department. MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPROVAL OF GRANTS BY TREASURY BOARD

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the President of the Treasury Board or his predecessor, the Minister of Public Works. Has the procedure adopted by the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the approval of LIP grants, which includes among other things provision that no grant will be approved without the approval of the so-called regional minister, received approval of Treasury Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, of course the administrative procedures are always approved by the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The implication of the words—I am sure it was inadvertently given—of the Leader of the Opposition, that this is a matter of procedure, is in fact incorrect. As I have indicated in this House and publicly, and will continue to indicate, we have sought a wide-ranging consultation about the appropriateness of particular projects as to whether they should or should not be approved. We included a reference to ministers in different parts of the country as well as to members in different parts of the country. While ministers are all members of the particular party which forms the government, hon. members are members of all parties on all sides of the House. That consultation, I think, was totally legitimate in the sense we wanted to be sure that the projects, to the best of our ability, were in fact meeting the needs of the community to which they were assigned, as well as providing employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I based the question relating to procedure on a memorandum prepared for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration by his deputy minister. I quote from page 2: "No project is approved without the concurrence of a regional minister." I ask the President of the Treasury Board when it was reported by the Auditor General that LIP grants to the extent of many thousands of dollars had resulted in benefiting private property and whether Treasury Board inaugurated inquiry into procedures being followed with regard to the authorization of LIP grants.

● (1430)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I asked the officials of my department to prepare a statement on the Auditor General's comments. They should give an account of every case he raised, and if need be we will remedy the situation.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that the Auditor General made a complaint to the government over a year ago and received certain undertakings from the government with regard to this matter, can the President of the Treasury Board assure me that investigations were made by Treasury Board to ascertain how in fact these moneys have been used for the benefit of private properties and to ensure that no further such authorizations will take place?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I cannot report to the Leader of the Opposition on this particular point. I shall look into the matter and report to him later. The problem has not been drawn to my attention in these terms.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION INTO OPERATION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In light of documents revealing that the process of consultation on LIP applications with members of the House generally was superseded by a special process of clearance by key ministers and Liberal members, would the Prime Minister tell us whether the government will set up a full investigation and public inquiry into the operations of the LIP program; and also would he tell the House whether, in view of serious misinformation given on this subject by the Minister of Manpower, he has requested that minister's resignation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not admit the premise of the question, and therefore I reject the conclusions.

Mr. Cossitt: A supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the winter of 1972-73, as stated by Mr. Des Roches, Deputy Minister of Manpower and Immigration, in a memorandum of January 25, 1973, did certain regional ministers have the power of final approval over LIP applications? Was a special information group set up in the hon. gentleman's office to act as a clearing-house to hear representations from regional ministers and Liberal members? Finally, was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources the minister designated to approve Ontario projects?

Mr. Andras: No minister was given authority to veto or to approve LIP projects in 1972-73, 1973-74 or, as far as I am concerned, in 1974-75 except the minister responsible, who happens to have been me in the last two years. The consultation process which I described a few minutes ago is the fact of the matter, and I see nothing wrong with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Every member of the House should have the right to stand on a point of order at this point and object to continued inaccurate and misleading information being given in this chamber by the minister of manpower when documents from his own department prove he is not telling us the facts. I think it is a disgrace that the minister should tell us that what these documents say and what his officials say is not the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows well that the ground covered by his point of order has been covered several times. Complaints about the quality of answers received do not constitute points of order. Complaints about inaccuracies, if those inaccuracies are alleged to have been deliberate, should be accompanied by a specific charge, the consequences of which we all know.

ENERGY

OIL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE CONTINUED EXPLORATION TO MEET FUTURE NEEDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding announcements by some of the subsidiaries of United States' oil companies operating in Canada that they intend to reduce their expenditures on exploration for oil. The minister has characterized these statements as blackmail, and quite properly so in my opinion. What steps does the government intend to take to ensure that oil exploration in Canada shall continue at a rate sufficient to meet the needs of the country in 1982 and 1983 when, according to the National Energy Board, we shall face a critical situation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The budgetary measures announced by the Minister of Finance are an indication of the room to move made available to the oil industry, in a financial sense, so that it can carry on its exploration. It seems to me that the timing and manner of the announcement on the part of the various companies was unwise.

ATHABASCA, ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN TAR SANDS PROJECT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. Having regard to statements by Imperial Oil and Gulf Oil that they are re-examining their financial commitment with respect to the construction of the Syncrude plant in the Athabasca oil sands, does the minister intend to ensure the construction of this and other oil sands' projects through public participation or in conjunction with the provinces and any of the oil companies which are willing to participate? Does he intend to take any action to ensure that in 1982 or 1983 the forecast of the National Energy Board that oil will be forthcoming from the oil sands will in fact be realized?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We have no policy specifically directed at federal investment in the oil sands. The provincial government of Alberta, which has full responsibility in this area, has been at no little pains to state that federal participation is not welcome.

OIL PIPELINE SARNIA-MONTREAL—RESULT OF DISCUSSIONS WITH COMPANY REGARDING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Last week the minister said discussions with Interprovincial Pipe Line regarding construction of a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal had reached a stalemate and he was making certain recommendations to his cabinet colleagues. Has any decision been arrived at and, if not, can he tell us how soon an announcement will be made regarding this project? When is it contemplated that construction will begin?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): A decision has not yet been made. I would hope that within a week one will have been reached.

SASKATCHEWAN COURT RULING ON OIL ROYALTIES—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO APPEAL

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the same subject and is addressed to the Minister of Justice. It arises from the negative decision handed down by the Queen's Bench Court Bench in Saskatchewan on the claim of a plaintiff that high royalties imposed by a province interfered with the rights of the federal government in connection with interprovincial trade. Does the minister plan to appeal this decision or to help the plaintiff in this case—an oil company—to appeal to a higher court?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): It is anticipated that an appeal will go forward, and because of the importance of the constitutional issue involved, we would expect to intervene.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Has the minister, or have any of his officials, made any contact with the oil company up to this point?

Mr. Lang: There may well have been discussions. I would have to check into these details and report to the hon. member.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REGIONAL MINISTERS' IMPACT ON PROJECTS PUT FORWARD BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the LIP matter and ask the minister of manpower whether those members of parliament who set up advisory groups and tried to work with his department to get programs approved were told, as a matter of courtesy, that their representations would be subject to review, appraisal or veto—whatever word the minister likes to use—by a regional minister, whatever that term may mean?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): In the early 1972-73 programs there were no constituency advisory groups. There was an arrangement for consultation within communities which people selected, for the most part, by members of my department. This was good, as far as it went. But I established advisory groups in 1973 and have carried the system on, and members who decided to go along with it were given an opportunity to recommend appointments. So the position has changed considerably in the last two or three years.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting answer to a question I did not ask. Were members of parliament informed of the review by regional ministers, or were they not?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the reviews by ministers in various locations in this country were not on a formal basis in that they did not have the power of veto, so it is not relevant.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTERS TRANSFERRED ASSETS TO SPOUSES WHEN GUIDELINES ISSUED

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he assure this House that, during the time he gave his ministers to put their affairs in order in relation to the conflict of interest guidelines—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Just be quiet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: They are obviously very sensitive, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that no minister transferred to his or her spouse assets which, if held by the minister in question, would put him or her in conflict of interest under the rules of the guidelines?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not investigated that possibility.

HOLDINGS OF MINISTERS' SPOUSES—KNOWLEDGE OF PRIME MINISTER AFTER MAKING PERSONAL INQUIRIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back to a question which the Prime Minister neglected to answer the other day. I ask him now whether he has made any personal inquiries into the holdings of spouses of ministers, or into the contents of frozen trusts of ministers, so that he personally as head of the government may now be aware of any conflicts that may exist?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): In the case of frozen trusts, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. In the case of the spouses of ministers, the answer is no except in so far as ministers in some cases did consult me about certain private businesses which their wives were involved in, or holdings which they were involved in, and told me about them.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in the case of that kind of consultation, or any consultation that resulted from th Prime Minister's invitation to his ministers in July, 1973, to meet with him to discuss any possibility of conflict, was there any condition or situation brought to his attention which might have involved a conflict of interest? Was there any such situation brought to his attention either through consultations or from information received from any other source and, if so, will the Prime Minister advise the House, first, if the conflict which might have existed has been resolved and, second, who were the ministers concerned?

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the question in so far as I do not know if it relates to holdings by spouses or by ministers. Perhaps the hon. member would rephrase his question.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am interested in any kind of conflict of interest, whether it is a conflict in respect of a direct interest held by a minister or a conflict in respect of an interest that might affect the minister because it is held by a spouse or any other person close to the minister. Has any evidence of a conflict been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and, if so, what action has been taken as a result of that evidence; and, in each case, who was the minister concerned?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in so far as potential conflicts are concerned, of course the whole purpose of the guidelines was to do away with such potential conflicts. I can say that I know of no actual conflict of interest. Of course, there were potential conflicts of interest under the general practices which have been followed for time out of mind by ministers and members of parliament, in so far as it was not prohibited under our rules or customs for ministers or members generally holding shares or public stocks. It is precisely because of potential conflicts of interest that I promulgated the guidelines and demanded of ministers that they depart themselves from the administration of such stocks or other forms of property.

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE REVIEW RATHER THAN AWAITING COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF GREEN PAPER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. In view of the necessity of having an immediate review of possible conflict of interest situations involving certain cabinet ministers, and the need for strengthening the guidelines laid down for cabinet ministers on July 18 and December 18 by the Prime Minister, will he indicate why he has chosen, in government business Item No. 7, to have the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs first consider the green paper on "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest", and then only after the committee has concluded its deliberations and submitted its report may it consider and make recommendations on the subject matter of ministers and conflict of interest?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated the argument for this procedure before, but I will repeat it briefly. We are all members of parliament whether we are cabinet ministers or backbenchers. I think it is important, if we are to proceed in an orderly way, that we first of all decide, as members of parliament, what should be the rules in relation to conflict of interest. Upon that foundation we can improve the guidelines for ministers and public servants. I really believe that if we were to begin otherwise we would be asking members of parliament to look at the question of conflict of interest of ministers, or in relation to ministers, before they had searched their own consciences.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's reply and the fact that members of parliament are not privy to knowledge other than public knowledge, while cabinet ministers have continuing, ongoing knowledge of matters not in the public domain and are taking actions daily of public interest, and in view of the fact that guidelines in respect of cabinet ministers currently do not cover the activities of their spouses, nor is there even full disclosure required, will the minister indicate whether he is at least willing to change the order of reference to the committee so that the guidelines in respect of cabinet ministers could be considered first and without delay?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I would say to the hon. member, through you, that at the present time there are no rules applying to private members of parliament such as apply to cabinet ministers. These rules now govern our conduct, whereas private members of the House of Commons are free of almost any restriction whatsoever. That is the reason my predecessor in office put forward the guidelines, which I hope will commend themselves to hon. members and others. I would just repeat what the Prime Minister has said: what have we to hide?

An hon. Member: What are you covering up?

Mr. Trudeau: What are you trying to hide?

MILLABLE WHEAT SHORTAGE—ESTIMATE OF GRAIN FALLING INTO THIS CLASS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports that millable wheat may have to be rationed among our customers, I should like to ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether he has received from the Wheat Board an estimate of how much wheat falls into the millable class; and in view of large amounts of grade 3 and 3 utility can the minister say whether any of this wheat will be able to be put into the milling trade both in Canada and overseas?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of rationing but, rather, of arrangements the Wheat Board may have to make in its selling program. In view of the amounts and qualities of wheat available—fairly large quantities of No. 1CW and 2CW, the usual milling grades—the Wheat Board has been analysing the lower grades to determine milling qualities and has recently found that because of markets and the lower prices, these may represent a desirable commodity.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Canadian commitment of one million tons of food, can the minister say how much of this is expected to be wheat and what grade or category this would likely fall into?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we would anticipate that the approximately one million tons would, in fact, be wheat in the ordinary course. The grade would depend upon the desires and tastes of the receiving countries and the arrangements which may be made between them and CIDA. I should say to the hon. member that in addition to the wheat which has already been committed for aid and for sale there is an additional quantity still available in respect of which further commitments can be made.

LEVELLING-OFF OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE GROWTH

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have now gone through two quarters with zero growth rate in our GNP, the major component for this being slowdown in the export of manufactured goods—which indicates a failure of the government's program for two-year, fast write-offs to stimulate the economy—I ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to introduce any new programs or proposals to stimulate the economy, and particularly manufacturing in this country?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is right when he refers to the second and third quarter of this year as being two flat quarters after, I should draw to his attention, a period of very strong growth. We are now in a period of slower growth caused primarily by a fall-off in housing and exports, reflecting a stagnant international situation particularly in the economies of our three largest customers, the United States, Japan and the United Kingdom—in that order. It was because of that threat of a recession reflected by those factors that the stimulus was added to the 1975-76 fiscal year in the budget presented in this House two weeks ago.

STEPS TO DIVERT FUNDS TO JOB-INTENSIVE INVESTMENT TO CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there is now an increase in unemployment, and one of the problems is that a great deal of investment is going into capital and machinery, I ask the minister whether he is considering any new measures to direct business capital into job-intensive, rather than capital-intensive investment for the sake of creating jobs and stimulating the economy.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the period to which the hon. member refers, regarding which he is disturbed about the two-year write-off, manufacturing employment increased substantially for the first time in several years. The total number of new jobs created by Canadians for Canadians in 1973 was 420,000 and in 1974 it was 380,000—over three-quarters of a million; in fact, over 800,000. As a result of these write-offs and the stimulus provided, new jobs for the three-year period ending in the next fiscal year should be well over one million. If the hon. gentleman would compare the growth of the economy in October in this country—about 4.6 per cent—he would see that the negative growth is about minus 3 per cent of the United States and perhaps he could then put his comments in perspective.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a final supplementary.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the statistics the minister has enumerated before, such as on budget night, but the concern I have now is the slowdown in the last quarter. There is a slowdown in business capital expansion by corporations. I ask the minister whether we can expect any new programs that would encourage the corporations of this country to spend more money on labour-intensive industries than on capital-intensive industries.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, because of the risk of slowdown in the economy which is reflected in the current figures, the stimulus was added on budget night for the 1975-76 year. I did point out to the House on budget night that because of the current thrust in the economy for 1974-75 it is expected that business capital investment will be intensified. Later calculations which we have, thanks to the survey taken by my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as late as July, and recent indications, show that business capital investment is holding up.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER SOCIAL SECURITY NUMBER WILL APPEAR ON FAMILY ALLOWANCE CHEQUES IN 1975—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN BENEFITS

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to put a question to his parliamentary secretary.

Will there be any changes in the family allowances cheques from January 1975, that is, will the social insurance numbers of parents or husband and wife appear on these cheques?

[English]

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be a change according to the cost of living index, so far as the family allowance is concerned, if the existing legislation is followed. So far as the second part of the question is concerned, I shall take notice of it.

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE SUPPLY TO EASTERN CONSUMERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the implications of the grain inspectors' strike and the availability to eastern consumers of western grain. Would the minister agree that this is a very serious situation, and would he tell us what steps he is taking in view of the closing of the Seaway, which complicates the problem, to settle the dispute in a fair and equitable manner so that eastern consumers will not be unduly affected?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be aware that the President of the Treasury Board is responsible for the negotiations in respect to this particular dispute. I am sure that he will be pleased to answer the question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary may I put the same question to the President of the Treasury Board? While the minister is on his feet, would he mind outlining to the House what measures he intends to take, or has taken, in respect of this matter?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I told the House last Friday that a mediator had been appointed on Thursday. He has met both parties and the negotiations are still going on. We hope that he will soon be able to bring the union and the government to an agreement. But there is not much we can do at this moment, since these workers have the right to go on strike under a legislation of the Parliament of Canada. Depending upon the report Mr. O'Connor will make to us within a few days, we shall see what other steps could be taken.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO FACILITATE GRAIN MOVEMENT THIS WINTER

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister outline to the House what means he has taken, or what contingency plans he has, to facilitate the movement of grain this winter—particularly in view of the imminent closing of the Seaway—in order that eastern consumers will not find themselves in an undersupply situation? What specific plans does he have?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in the public interest to reveal the plans we have at this stage.

MINISTER'S ESTIMATE OF RATE OF ECONOMIC GROWTH IN VIEW OF LEVELLING-OFF OF GNP

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that there has been no growth in the last two quarters, is the minister revising his estimate of the rate of economic growth of the country, or is he sticking with the 4 per cent or 4½ per cent figure?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am still sticking with the estimate I gave of real growth for the year 1974, of between 4 per cent and 4½ per cent. I should say to the hon. member that if the real growth were to be zero in the fourth quarter and no revisions take place in other quarters, the year over year growth for 1974 would still turn out to be 3.9 per cent.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INVESTIGATION BY POLICE FORCES OF ALLEGATIONS MADE IN ONTARIO LEGISLATURE—POSITION OF FEDERAL MEMBERS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance claims his is an open government, in relation to the various allegations made prior to July 8 and just recently respecting the hon. member for Hamilton East, my question to the Solicitor General is, can he tell us, of his knowledge, how many investigations either by the RCMP or other law enforcement agencies have taken place in respect of those allegations?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned last week following the charges made by Mr. Schulman, the Minister of Labour and the deputy minister requested an investigation. The RCMP were asked to investigate those charges. They did that. They went to see Mr. Schulman last week, and Mr. Kerr, and also visited the offices of the Toronto metropolitan police. Just as I came into the House I received an interim report from them: the investigation is still under way. That is the stage of the investigation so far.

Mr. Lawrence: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Could the Solicitor General inform the House if there have been investigations other than within the last 12 months in respect of the allegations made relating to the hon. member for Hamilton East?

Mr. Allmand: There was no investigation of allegations made against the hon. member for Hamilton East. The investigation that is being made is at the request of the Minister of Labour following the charges made by Mr. Schulman. So far as we know, the RCMP has no other investigation under way on this matter. It arose simply from allegations made by Mr. Schulman last week.

Mr. Lawrence: Nor have there been any.

Mr. Allmand: Not by the RCMP. I cannot answer for the OPP or the Toronto metropolitan police.

MANPOWER

OFY AND LIP PROGRAMS—INQUIRY WHEN GOVERNMENT WILL ANNOUNCE NEW POLICY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since unemployment in 1975 promises to be severe, especially for young people under 25, and that high school and university students are already quite concerned about the very serious difficulties with which they will very likely be faced when they seek employment next summer, can the minister advise the House whether the Opportunities for Youth Program, in its present formula, will be extended to 1975, or whether, in view of the well founded criticisms which have been levelled at the Opportunities for Youth and Local Initiatives Programs, we can expect his department to adopt a new procedure in this area and, if so, when will the minister be in a position to make public the new program decided upon?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question having to do with a student summer employment program is under active consideration now. Announcement of the decision concerning our programs or the content thereof will be made shortly. I might also add, for the edification of the hon. member, the further report that the evaluation process with regard to the Opportunities for Youth Program and the Local Initiatives Program has indicated these have brought great benefits to the people concerned and to this country.

POST OFFICE

GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION INTO CAUSES OF FIRES WHERE ARSON SUSPECTED

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. I join in the praise given by the minister to both the Toronto police and fire departments for the efficient manner in which they brought last week's disastrous post office fire under control in that city. I ask the minister whether, because of the fact that initial investigations have determined the cause of the second fire at Bay and Front Streets to be of a deliberate nature and that arson has not been ruled out in the major fire, he could advise the House if there is any federal inquiry into this matter and, if not, is the minister now prepared to initiate such special federal inquiry?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we are waiting for the report of the fire marshal in the city of Toronto to ascertain precisely the reason for the major fire.

Mr. Jelinek: I should like to ask the minister the following supplementary question. Because of the fact that the fires involved federal employees and took place in federal buildings, destroying or damaging thousands of pieces of mail which fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government, is the minister suggesting that no federal body or agency is involved in determining the cause of the fire?

Mr. Mackasey: No, Mr. Speaker, but at the same time we do not want to leave the impression that we have no confidence in the ability of the fire marshal of the province of Ontario.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

LOSS TO TRUCK DEALERS RESULTING FROM BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON REIMBURSEMENT OF TAX

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): My question is supplementary to the one put on Friday by the hon. member for Edmonton West to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that truck dealers across Canada will lose approximately $20 million, amounting to $19,000 per dealer, due to tax policy changes announced in the budget if there is not a total refund of the tax already collected on trucks that are not sold, and the fact that dealers in Red Deer, like many dealers across Canada, will lose up to $25,000 each, will the minister guarantee to this House that all dealers will be reimbursed for tax paid?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have received many representations from members on all sides of the House about this particular item, and I intend to ask the government to provide relief from federal sales tax for tax paid inventories of trucks and other transportation equipment affected by the sales tax exemptions proposed in the November 18 budget speech. The relief, which would be provided by way of an order in council, would apply to inventories of new transportation equipment on which tax has been paid and which were being held for resale. This is a particular exemption because of the specialized nature of the equipment and because a good deal of equipment is custom built.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ROME FOOD CONFERENCE—EXTENT OF CANADA'S FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the Rome Food Conference and Canada's reallocation of $50 million in CIDA funds as a commitment at that conference for assisting developing countries to raise their agricultural production limits. Subsequently, I thought the Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear in the House that the purpose of this allocation of $50 million was to assist the developing countries. However, on November 14 the minister replied to a question of the Leader of the Opposition and said that the $50 million had been set aside to purchase about 250,000 tons of grain for emergency food relief. My question therefore is: are there two $50 million commitments and, if not, is part or all of the one $50 million commitment being diverted from development assistance to emergency food assistance?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the commitment made at the Rome conference was to reallocate $50 million for the current year for purposes attached to the food conference itself. The package of programs is being put together at present and I hope to be able to advise shortly on the specific purposes for which that money is being diverted.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

Mr. Jarvis: With relation, then, to the minister's response on November 14 to the Leader of the Opposition regarding the $50 million that could be used to buy almost 250,000 tons of additional grain, is that a separate allocation entirely from that committed at Rome by the Canadian delegation?

Mr. MacEachen: I would have to check that exchange with the Leader of the Opposition, but I think in referring to that particular sum I was relating it to what could be done at present and the amount of grain it could purchase if it were totally directed to grain. Probably it was with reference to the same sum of money.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEMONSTRATIONS ON PARLIAMENT HILL ON SEPTEMBER 30, 1974—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED POLICE BRUTALITY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is addressed to the Solicitor General. I understand that the Solicitor General last week received a brief from the Civil Liberties Association in the national capital region, supported by 16 other Civil Liberties Associations throughout the country and by the National Indian Brotherhood, the Native Council of Canada and the Innuit Tapirisat of Canada, concerning the incidents of violence which took place on Parliament Hill on Monday, September 30, 1974, and urging an independent inquiry. My question is whether in view of the detailed nature of the evidence presented and the request of these responsible organizations an independent inquiry will be held to determine whether, in fact, there was unnecessary violence on that occasion and, if so, who was responsible for it.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I met with the head of the Civil Liberties Association for Ottawa last Thursday, I believe, and he had certain people with him supporting his brief. He gave me this brief, which was rather thick, containing many affidavits and documents. Following the meeting I referred it to officials for study. The study is not yet completed. In the brief he raised many questions and I told him that I would answer his questions as soon as possible.

Mr. Brewin: Will the minister be good enough to advise the House, when he makes up his mind, what response he will give to this request?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FEED GRAINS—INQUIRY WHETHER STOCKS SUFFICIENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture being absent, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Justice who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

In view of the contradictory news which has appeared in newspapers concerning the supply of feed grains in eastern Canada, can the minister advise the House whether the current stocks of feed grains in eastern terminals are sufficient to meet the needs of farm producers during the 1974-75 winter?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, not enough grain is in position in eastern locations for domestic or export movement for the winter. Ordinarily, the volume of grain would be moving into these positions throughout the lakes and the Seaway; but that, of course, is not possible at present because of the grain inspectors' strike which is going on.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary.

Can the minister promise this House that provisions will be taken in order to see to it that eastern Canadian farmers can be assured that sufficient supplies will reach them in time so as to avoid speculation which is already starting to take place in that region?

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think that my best course at this point, while assuring the hon. member that we all attempt to look at all possibilities and avenues, is to join in the answer given a short while ago by my colleague, the Minister of Transport, to a similar question.

FEED GRAINS—ADEQUACY OF MOVEMENT WHEN GRAIN HANDLERS' STRIKE SETTLED

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put my question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Owing to the difficulties encountered by the egg and poultry industry because of the grain inspectors' strike, would the government be willing to restore the grants program in operation last year when there was a railway strike, grants intended for feed-grain producers who are compelled to supply themselves from suppliers in other provinces, for instance?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we have not taken any definite decision on the plan to evade the difficulty. I take due note of the hon. member's suggestion but I am in no position to give him a reply right now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Is the minister aware of the danger that this situation might easily degenerate to the point where Canadians might watch on television the nauseating spectacle of chickens dying by the hundreds, and maybe also dying cattle, for lack of feed?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this danger, but I am bound by the laws voted by Parliament, which gave to those employees the right to go on strike.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ROLE IN PROMOTING INDUSTRY IN SLOW GROWTH AREAS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and concerns the role of the Canada Development Corporation in these depressed times. Is the minister taking steps to use the expertise and resources of the Canada Development Corporation to promote industries in the slow growth regions of the country—which in these days is practically all of the country—and, particularly, is he considering using this corporation to promote a coal and steel industry in eastern Canada? Does the minister consider this to be practical?

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. I should like to ask about an investigation to be conducted by the RCMP into a matter which caused widespread concern in the Hamilton area and elsewhere over the weekend. I am referring of course, to the matter raised on Friday in connection with drug smuggling into Hamilton international airport. At that time the minister promised to give us a report. NATURAL RESOURCES

EXPORT OF FRESH WATER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the renewed urgency of adopting a firm policy regarding the international use of Canada's fresh water supplies arising from the United Nations presentation to the World Food Conference which indicated that world demand for fresh water will increase by 240 per cent over the next five years, and in view of Canada's abundance of fresh water and the increasing world demand, is the government currently preparing a policy regarding the international use or the export of fresh water from Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Of course, the inventories of water supplies and their importance to Canada are part of a fund of knowledge being accumulated by the government; I would not want to say we know every detail of it—but there is no policy to export water from Canada.

Mr. Wenman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recent statements issued by the United Nations regarding the demand for fresh water, does the Prime Minister still hold the position that Canada would consider the sale of her fresh water "for good, hard cash"?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would not object to that. If we could bottle up some water and sell it at a high price, it would be a nice thing, if we could replace what we were selling by good, fresh rain.

An hon. Member: Put some Scotch in it.

[Mr. O'Sullivan.]

FISHERIES

REDUCTION OF CATCH IN MARITIMES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PREVENT INDISCRIMINATE FOREIGN FISHING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and concerns the fishing industry in Canada. According to statistics, codfish landings up to the end of August this year in the maritimes are down 24 per cent compared with the same period in 1973; redfish are down 57 per cent, sole and flounder are down 15 per cent, herring catches 16 per cent, and comparable reductions are evident for halibut, mackerel, hake and other species. In view of the problems caused by indiscriminate fishing on our Canadian offshore banks, will the minister consider holding a special conference now in Ottawa with Russia, Norway, Britain, Spain, Portugal, France , Germany, Poland and the United States to see if some positive action can be taken before our fishing industry is completely destroyed?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, while not debating the statistics given by the hon. member, I would remind him that these pessimistic figures are due in part to ice conditions and a strike in Newfoundland. That being said, I recognize that the catch is lower than we would want. I would also remind the hon. member that ICNAF, with all its imperfections, is still the best avenue open to us. If ICNAF did not exist, we would not even be talking about an Atlantic offshore fishery. I am quite willing to look at the hon. member's suggestion, however, and if it is useful we will do something about it.

Will that surtax apply on automobiles that were ordered before the budget but not delivered? The minister answered the question in reference to trucks, and I wonder if he could answer now regarding automobiles?

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SENATE MEMBERS ANNOUNCING GOVERNMENT POSITION ON GRANTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister regarding various statements made on LIP grants. After the considerable work that has been done, particularly by members of parliament in Edmonton, to help check through the various LIP projects with their consultative committee, why must we put up with an appointed member from the other place, who does not know Edmonton and who, may I add, in the Prime Minister's words "doesn't know his razzmataz from a hole in the ground," being allowed to make an announcement on behalf of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the question is hypothetical, but if there is a concrete case the hon. member might let me know.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, one supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: One supplementary; the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman from the other place is from Palliser, the foothills or some place in southern Alberta, who does not know Edmonton and is not aware of what is going on in the area. Can the Prime Minister tell the House why he cannot appoint a senator from Edmonton and let him make the announcement, or otherwise appoint the senator to the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would agree with the procedure providing it were initiated by a senator from Edmonton I would take notice of the question.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened with great interest to some of the questions posed by hon. members, beginning with the hon. member for Leeds regarding LIP grants. This affects the responsibility of a good many ministers. I want to say that in my capacity as a minister in eastern Ontario not once have I intervened politically in a grant in any riding in eastern Ontario, nor to favour any Liberal riding.

An hon. Member: Would the rest of the cabinet stand up?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The only time I intervened with the minister responsible was October 31, 1973, to ensure that the ridings in eastern Ontario, no matter what their political coloration, received a fair proportion of grants in relation to the entire province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We have relied on the advice of the member of parliament—whoever he or she might be—from eastern Ontario or, where a consultative committee was constituted, on that advice. I might say that in 1973-74—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, the hon. minister may be making a valuable contribution to the subject but I must point out that the question period is over. The hon. minister has not been asked a direct question. If I permit the minister to make the statement which he proposes to make, I will have to open the other side of the matter and allow supplementary questions and further examination. I really feel that we have gone beyond the end of the question period and I do not think the matter should go any further.

• (1520)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I conclude what I was saying on the point of order because the hon. member represents a riding for which I have some general responsibility, although not as much as I should like. The three ridings, Leeds, Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton and Grenville-Carleton, all received a good deal more money in LIP grants in 1973-74 than did the riding of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance. I did not realize that he felt the shoe fits him as obviously as he has shown here this afternoon. Nobody made accusations directly against the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The accusation involves all ministers.

Mr. Stanfield: It involves all ministers in so far as it involves the system which the Minister of Finance presumably approved.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): But I was denying that that system existed.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not mean to question the good faith of the Minister of Finance when he says that, but his statement is directly contrary to a memo written to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and signed by the minister's own deputy minister. I can only assume that although the Minister of Finance is presumably acting in good faith, he does not know what is going on in the government. Perhaps, since this is the hour for true confession, the other ministers concerned could get up and tell us all they know.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: There are a lot of guilty consciences on the government side.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I interrupted the minister to indicate that although an intervention by him may be valuable in contributing to the general knowledge of members on this subject, what we are doing does not seem to fit into the procedures of the House in any regular way. Having balanced that observation against the observation made by the Leader of the Opposition, I still cannot be persuaded that further discussion of the subject is in order at this time. We have an important matter to debate as an order of the day. If we open up this subject, presumably we will have to carry on and hear every minister.

LIP Grants

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as the first question on this matter was directed to me, may I tell the Leader of the Opposition that when Treasury Board was established in 1867, it was a committee of cabinet formed for the purpose of allowing regional ministers to be consulted about the business of the government. It was established in order to make sure that all the ministers from the various regions were consulted. So I see nothing wrong in our still following the advice of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different point of order—

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister rises on the previous point of order.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I see that all ministers present are volunteering to stand up one after another. I suggest that we turn to the other side and hear them say that no political considerations at all were involved when they approved LIP grants in their various constituencies.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. A few minutes ago the Minister of Finance either disowned, or did not disown, depending how you interpret what he said, the fact that he is the regional minister and responsible for LIP grants in eastern Ontario. I wish to draw to the attention of the House a document from the Minister of Manpower's office flatly stating that ten Liberal members of parliament—and he is one of them—must have their LIP grants which are mentioned therein, adopted. It is signed by the minister's executive assistant. Therefore the Minister of Finance did not need to be the regional minister. He had it all arranged ahead of time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Please produce that document.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, a highly respected report which comes to the attention of this House from time to time, the Auditor General's report, draws attention to the approval of three LIP projects and the validity of those approvals is questioned. One of those involved recommendations from the former minister of the environment and another from my colleague who was formerly the minister responsible for multi-culturalism. The interesting point I want to make is that the third case called in question in this report involved the riding of the hon. member for Hastings. I heard the presentation of the hon. member for Hastings. He persuaded me that the case had merit and I approved the project.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must reiterate that we are dealing with a matter which I considered from the beginning to be not a point of order, and nothing that has happened since I made that observation has in any way made regular our proceedings. I must insist that we put an end to what is going on. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rises on another point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a different matter. I realize, sir, that you frequently rule, and correctly so, that the quality of an answer given by a minister is not the subject of a point of order. But I suggest that a statement made today by the President of the Privy Council, no doubt inadvertently, has a bearing on all private members of this House. I do not think that his statement should be allowed to stand on today's record without the other side of the matter being put on it as well.

The President of the Privy Council said that no guidelines or restrictions apply to private members of the House of Commons so far as conflicts of interest are concerned. In the few minutes since the minister made that statement I have checked through the books I happen to have on my desk. I find that Standing Order 11 and Standing Order 76 impose limitations on all members of parliament. I find, also, that citation 66 and citation 108 in Beauchesne's fourth edition impose limitations in this area of conflict of interest. You will notice that I am not taking the time to read them; I am just drawing attention to them.

I have also discovered that there are guidelines or limitations which affect members of parliament in the British North America Act, the Senate and House of Commons Act, the House of Commons Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Official Secrets Act, the Post Office Act, the Canada Elections Act, and even in the Income Tax Act. I submit that the statement that there are no guidelines and no restrictions on members ought to qualified by the facts I have just presented to the House.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if I created the wrong impression I did not intend to do so. I said that there are no restrictions, with exceptions. Those were the words I used. The Prime Minister, who is sitting beside me, reminded me that I had said this. The exhaustive guidelines which we propose go much further and apply a much stricter rule to the conduct of private members than any they are now expected to follow.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND ESTABLISH ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council) moved that Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide for a new and equitable method of redistributing seats in the House of Commons among the provinces of Canada. It deals with a matter that touches the very fabric of our democracy, that is of deep concern to every Canadian. A just system of the representation of the people is the very life-blood of our democratic process.

In this spirit, it has been recognized since confederation that the development of a method of redistributing seats among the provinces in the House of Commons rises above partisan politics. It was for this reason that the matter of developing a new method in keeping with evolving population trends and our fundamental democratic principles was entrusted, in the last parliament, to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of this House.

Hon. members will recall that the redistribution of seats based on the 1971 census, and calculated according to the present Section 51 of the British North America Act, produced results deemed to be undesirable by all parties. Parliament therefore decided, by way of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Suspension Act, to suspend the process of determining constituency boundaries until January, 1975.

My esteemed predecessor, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), presented various possible redistribution methods to the committee for its consideration, and members of the committee also advanced certain proposals. Despite considerable study the committee was unable to make a definite recommendation, since its deliberations were interrupted by the dissolution of parliament. However, as I mentioned in this House on October 11, I have reason to believe that it is the general feeling of hon. members that the committee was sufficiently close to completing its task that a bill can be introduced without further prior consideration by the committee.

The method contained in this bill, the amalgam method, was recommended by my predecessor in his statement to the committee, and was examined very closely. No fundamental changes have been introduced, but an omission has been corrected, as I will describe in due course.

Methods of redistributing seats in the House of Commons have historically reflected the particular federal make-up of Canada and the fundamental principles inherent in our democracy. The general principle of representation by population appeared in both the Quebec and London resolutions which preceded confederation and in the British North America Act in its original form. At the same time, however, the effects of the strict application of "rep by pop" were attenuated by a provision to the effect that no province should lose a member unless its population relative to that of Canada as a whole had decreased by 5 per cent or more.

Exceptions to the strict principle of representation by population have continued since that time. All provinces admitted to confederation since 1867 have, upon admission, received more members than would have been justified on a strict basis of representation by population. Since 1915, Section 51A of the British North America Act has provided, and I quote:

... a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing such provinces.

In 1952 it was provided that the representation of no province should be reduced by 15 per cent in any one redistribution below that to which it would have been entitled in the previous redistribution were it not for the application of this rule, and that no province should have fewer members than a province with a smaller population.

These provisions have respected the federal structure of Canada by ensuring that no province should be deprived of an effective voice in the House of Commons. As Sir Wilfrid Laurier said in 1915:

It is the very essence of our constitution that we should endeavour to have all provinces fairly represented, and the views of all provinces accepted in this parliament insofar as we can attain that end.

This is from the House of Commons Debates for that year, at page 329.

The redistribution method embodied in this bill reflects this concern. Thus, the method provides as a general rule that no province shall suffer a decrease in representation in this House. Principles of equity also require general rules to the effect that no province shall have fewer seats than a province with a smaller population or a number of seats which would give it an average constituency population greater than that of Quebec, excepting a difference in the latter case which results from the fourth general rule that all fractions appearing in numbers representing seat totals should be dropped. The rule making the average constituency population of Quebec the maximum possible was inadvertently omitted in earlier descriptions of the method, but is obviously necessary to ensure that no province receives fewer members in relation to population than the largest provinces.

The method provides that Quebec should receive a fixed number of seats after each decennial census and divides the other provinces into three categories to which specific rules are applied. Provinces with populations over 2,500,000 will receive the number of seats determined by dividing the average constituency population of Quebec into their respective populations.

If the population of a province is less than 1,500,000, but has increased since the previous decennial census, its representation will be determined by dividing its population by the average constituency population at the previous redistribution of the provinces with a population of less than 1,500,000 according to the previous decennial census.

If the population of a province is 1,500,000 to 2,500,000 and has increased since the previous decennial census, it will be allocated a number of seats determined by increasing its total number of seats by one seat for every two that it would have received were it to have the same average constituency population of the province with the largest average constituency population of provinces with a population of under 1,500,000.

If a province has a population that has decreased since the previous decennial census and is below 2,500,000 its representation will be unchanged.

Representation by population remains a treasured goal and constitutes an integral aspect of this method of redistribution. The largest provinces will have numbers of members calculated on a representation by population basis relative to the province of Quebec. Within the group of the smallest provinces, representation by population will prevail except to the extent that the floor provisions may apply. Continued population growth in the small provinces would reduce their reliance on these floor provisions and lead to a greater degree of representation by population.

The aims of maintaining effective representation for all provinces and of progressing toward representation by population together determine the relationships between the respective total numbers of members to be accorded to each province. There is a second equally important aspect to which much consideration has been given, and that is the number of members in the House of Commons.

[Mr. Sharp.]

The amalgam method was devised as a means of ensuring that the population size of constituencies in Canada would not grow to a point where a member's ability to represent his constituents would be impaired, nor the access of constituents to their member unduly restricted.

● (1540)

Whatever the energy and dedication of a member, there is a limit to the number of constituents he can properly represent. At the same time, a member's effectiveness in representing his constituents in the House of Commons can be diluted if the size of the House is allowed to grow unchecked. This bill represents an attempt to strike a reasonable balance, and to ensure that all of the people of Canada will continue to be well represented by their members, both inside and outside the House of Commons.

If and when this bill becomes law, the number of members representing provinces will increase from the present level of 262—here I would remind hon. members that two electoral seats among our 264 are represented by members from the territories—to 277 at the next redistribution based on the 1971 census. Thereafter, the results depend upon the population at each succeeding decennial census.

By providing for the addition of four seats to the representation of the Province of Quebec at the time of each redistribution, certain assumptions are implied as to population growth both for Canada and for the Province of Quebec. Should these assumptions prove to be wide of the mark, parliament may choose at some later date to add fewer or more seats to Quebec, which is the pivot of the whole system, as it was until the law was last amended. All we can do at the present time is to establish a system which appears now to be reasonable.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the consent of the House to place in Hansard an illustrative table showing the distribution of seats by provinces as envisaged by the bill before us, following the next redistribution as compared with the present system of distribution, and the redistribution if there were to be no changes. The table also includes a forecast of the redistribution following the 1981 census on the basis of certain assumptions as to the population of the provinces in 1981. The assumption which is used in the table is that the population of the provinces in 1981 will be 23,967,800, in accordance with the projection which came from Statistics Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that the hon. minister be allowed to table the said document?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is this the table which was attached to the minister's press release of October 12? If so, we have all seen it and we shall be glad to have it included.

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. member it is the same table. The calculations were redone, and turned out the same.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Will the table be incorporated in the text of the hon. gentleman's speech?

Mr. Sharp: It was my intention to recommend that it should be printed at this point in my speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: At this point, I should like to remind hon. members that the bill deals with the question of redistributing seats in the House among provinces, and that it does not encroach in any manner on the task of the independent electoral boundaries commissions in readjusting the boundaries of constituencies within provinces. The two processes are quite distinct. Nevertheless, it will be appreciated that the allowance of small increases in the size of the House, and the protection of the existing representation for each province as a minimum guarantee, will ensure that attention may be paid by the commissions to maintaining the historical, social and geographic patterns of constituencies.

The bill does not contain provisions respecting the representation of the territories. In recognition of the very special factors affecting the adequacy of their representation, the government intends to introduce at an early date, after this bill has become law, a separate bill to increase to two the number of members to be elected from the Northwest Territories. The government does not intend to recommend changes in the representation of the Yukon territory, which has a much smaller land area and approximately one half the population of the Northwest Territories.

Hon. members will recall that the electoral boundaries commissions will complete the determination of constituency boundaries throughout Canada based on the results of the present method of redistribution, if parliament does not act to adopt a new method by December 31. May I suggest, therefore, that since there is general agreement that the existing method of redistributing seats is not satisfactory to any of the parties in the House, the bill before us should be referred promptly to committee so that it can be examined in detail.

On the basis of informal discussions and consultations, and of the work of the committee in the last parliament, the "amalgam method" does seem to be the most acceptable of the various alternatives which have been put forward, but the new committee and this House should be satisfied that such is the case. The first step is for the committee to look at the alternatives and make a report. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this is a matter which rises above partisan politics.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in considering the bill before us we are, once again, contemplating a measure which would alter the basic electoral map of Canada.

Historically, this has been done at frequent intervals—almost every ten years. Reading the debates which have taken place on this subject it is interesting to note that those taking part in them believed they were making maps which would last forever and a day. I think we should remind ourselves, when studying this bill, that the map we eventually propose will almost certainly be changed after the 1981 census, and that it will certainly be changed after the 1991 census. All human beings are fallible, no matter how well we may think we are doing.

Members of the previous parliament spent a good deal of time discussing the changes they thought should be introduced, and the manner in which various provinces might be affected. I think it can be said that legislation such as this is relatively nonpolitical. After all, each member has a personal view as to the nature of the constituency he or she represents, and the way it fits into the general plan.

The issue we are considering today reflects a feeling among many members of parliament that their constituencies contain more people than they adequately are able to represent and, conversely, a feeling among rural members that with the change in the population mix they are responsible for looking after vast areas of sparsely settled country.

There is, too, the difficulty of ensuring adequate provincial representation in this chamber. Canada contains two provinces which are relatively huge in terms of population—Ontario and Quebec. These two provinces exert a great influence on the affairs of our nation. We tend to think they extend a long way to the north. In fact, though, the population is strung out in a narrow band along the United States border.

Two of the other provinces are considered to be intermediate in size—Alberta and British Columbia. The remaining provinces are of relatively small size, though even here a wide variation in population exists, ranging from Prince Edward Island with a population of somewhat over 100,000 to Manitoba with a population of more than a million. So there is a wide mix in our population setup. If all provinces were of equal size in the national sphere perhaps a really close representation by population formula could be carried out, Mr. Speaker.

I think it can be said for many westerners that they hardly regard themselves on an equal footing with the two central provinces in Canada. This is largely a matter of geography. They regard themselves sometimes as onlookers on the national scene. Similarly, and perhaps even more so, this feeling would hold true for the Maritime provinces. Of course the provinces of both Ontario and Quebec have large sparsely settled areas with different problems than those of the industrial areas, and those areas within those two provinces have their own grievances.

The study of this problem has been very interesting, and in many ways I think we should look, in the over-all matter—or perhaps some parliament in the future should—at what the Senate could be doing, as is the case in some parts of the world such as the United States, with an elected House, and in Australia with the equivalent of a Senate, both of which provide representation for regional interests. It might be that in the long run we should arrive at some means of reforming the Senate and making it another elected body in order to provide a better formula for redistribution.

In attempting to arrive at some sort of solution various formulae have been produced, and they all add up to the numbers game: how many seats should each province have? Some of this might be done away with if we had amalgamation of the Maritimes, say, or of the western provinces. Such a solution, perhaps helping in respect of redistribution, would have untoward effects, so such a solution would seem inconsistent at this time.

There seems to be a general feeling that the provinces should not lose seats, particularly in view of the fact that Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia would have their representation at their constitutional level, while other provinces such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan could well fall to a lower number of seats yet still have a larger population than the Maritime provinces. To obtain a change of this nature would require a drastic review of the British North America Act, with provincial acquiescence to changes in the constitution.

For this present redistribution it seems that most members would favour the proposed new general rules. These are in effect that no province should suffer a decrease in Commons representation. I am sure this would find general support among members. Secondly, no province shall have fewer seats than a province with a smaller population. This, and I think it goes without saying, would be quite an undesirable event. Thirdly, no province shall have an average constituency population greater than that of Quebec. It is interesting that, in this regard, we are returning to some extent to the 1867 act under which Quebec was the principle that governed representation of the provinces from 1967 to 1947. Perhaps there is historic irony in respect of this situation in our debate on the resource bill, in that we are returning to the principle espoused and passed on by the fathers of confederation.

I think it is less certain that members will want to see an automatic increase of four seats for Quebec after the 1981 census and, of course, a corresponding increase for the larger provinces. Based on present population growth this would mean increasing the size of the House substantially with each decennial census. I think it is here that many members would part company with the government and would like to see the House of Commons of 1983, or at whatever may be the proper time, pass judgment as to whether it wished to continue enlarging the House in this manner.

There are many reasons why there should be a maximum, so that the members of the House at any time will be able to pass judgment easily on whether the House should continue to be enlarged. I do not think it can be fairly said that there is great reluctance or reservation by members on all sides of the House to express themselves in respect of whether it would be a good thing to discontinue enlarging the House of Commons. At the present time it seems that enlargement of the House would create no actual physical problems, and the actual structure of the House need not be altered to accommodate the increase in the membership proposed by this bill.

Indeed, during the question period many members might like to have even fewer in the House than at the present time, and many would point to the Senate of the United States which has only 100 members to represents its 200 odd million people; not that I would equate the Senate of the United States with the House of Commons, but it does indicate a substantially fewer number of representatives.

The United Kingdom parliament has 600 members, but the United Kingdom has no equivalent number of provincial members to carry on much of the function that is carried on by our provincial members here. I would also hasten to add that, contrary to what some in Ottawa might think, Canada could not function without provincial governments representing the regions of our country.

I also believe that there is in this bill the suggestion that Quebec will remain as the pivot for the computation of the number of seats for the larger provinces. This is a return to the principle of parliamentary representation from 1867 to 1946. In the treatment of categories of intermediate provinces and small provinces the Quebec pivot has been greatly altered, and does not function nearly as well as it did in 1946.

The small provinces would be determined by dividing their population at the most recent decennial census by the average constituency population of all the small provinces at the time of previous redistribution. In no way will this tie the representation of the small provinces, populationwise, to the larger provinces.

Should this amalgam method go unchecked there could arise a situation whereby a small province or provinces could experience phenomenal growth. For instance, the discovery of oil or gas on the east coast could easily bring half a million more people to Newfoundland or Nova Scotia than are anticipated in one census decade. Similarly, for some reason, Saskatchewan or Manitoba could achieve phenomenal growth. For instance, I believe it can be fairly said that we are headed for a great shakeup in the world economic system, and consequently in our own country. Indications are, for instance, that probably Alberta will grow faster in the next decade than any other province.

Similarly, an intermediate province will be based on the formula that will be determined by increasing its total number of seats by one seat for every two it would have received if it were of the same average constituency population as the small provinces with the largest average constituency population.

The application of the definition of an intermediate province being at any upper limit of 2.5 million would create considerable problems for British Columbia which, in the next census, is forecast will be in the large category. British Columbia then would be classified as a large province, yet compared to Ontario and Quebec, although classified as a large province, would be similar to the rabbit being classified as equal to a horse.

I suggest that this low level should be raised to some degree in order to give British Columbia greater status in that it is the province with its problems furthest away from Ottawa. I think we should look at this again and explore the possibilities of defining the upper limits of what the definition is in respect of an intermediate and a small province. One suggestion is that it should be at least two thirds the size of the largest province, or some similar figure.

I expect that this bill likely will be an interim bill that will be changed when the next census is considered. There is perhaps some value in having on the books a formula such as contained in the amalgam method to provide a basis for representation in the various provinces. I am sure that in 1981 and 1982 the parliament of Canada of that day almost certainly will want to alter the electoral boundaries and distribution of seats. I am disappointed that the government has not seen fit to introduce such a clause in this bill to make it mandatory for the parliament of 1981 or 1982 to consider actively what we are doing now.

The amalgam method of redistribution fundamentally alters the formula under which representation has been effected in the past. We cannot foresee what population trends and concentrations of population will occur in certain geographic areas. Our projections are always based on statistics. It has been aptly said there are good statistics, bad statistics, and plain lies.

There is considerable truth in the suggestion that we are always ready to criticize those who went before, but we often forget that it is difficult to predict the future. I am sure there is nothing more fallacious than basing projections on population statistics in relation to what went on previously. The drop in the Canadian birth rate alone will result in a very large difference in the population map in a decade from now. One does not even have to be a statistician to realize this simple fact.

In the committee I certainly hope changes will be made in respect of this legislation to allow for the parliament of 1982 to have a look at this. I hope we will not have a situation similar to what we have at the present time whereby the map was drawn, parliament was largely unaware of what had happened, and when the map became available everyone was quite upset. Because of that situation it was necessary to go through the ritual of suspending the Electoral Boundaries Act and the commissions. This involved expense and delay in the setting up of new boundaries so that elections would be more fair.

I also think we should take a look at the definition of a province. We might consider the situation in respect of small, intermediate and large provinces, as well as the problem of British Columbia possibly being equated in the next census with a large province when perhaps it may have less than 30 per cent of the population of Ontario.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on balance we find Bill C-36 acceptable and we hope it will not take long for the House to refer it to the standing committee.

As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) indicated, the subject of redistribution is one that has engaged the interest of the country and of members of parliament very intensely throughout the history of Canada. One might not think that, judging by the number of members in the chamber this afternoon, but perhaps there are reasons why some hon. members are not here.

I have had the privilege of being here through what will now be three phases of this operation. When I first came here redistribution was still based on 65 seats for Quebec, which we all learned in school. I was here when we switched to the method adopted in 1946, a method which at that time we thought was an improvement. Now we have reached the point where we are trying a new way altogether. I agree with the President of the Privy Council that this is a subject we must approach with as little partisan bias as we possibly can, and with as little provincial or regional bias as possible.

Yet at the same time it is a fact that in a country the size of Canada, with provinces varying in population all the way from the millions in Ontario to a few tens of thousands in the province of Prince Edward Island, it becomes very difficult to devise a formula that is equitable on all counts.

I have the feeling that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in the last parliament in its wrestling with this issue did come up with a pretty fair arrangement, which I think may stand the test of time even a little more than the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) feels is the case. I agree with him that in the 1980's there may be a disposition to make another change, but I would be prepared to predict that the change to be made in the 1980's will not be a change in the nature of the formula but rather a change in the total number of seats.

Without wanting to spend more than a few minutes on history I should like to point out that from 1867 until 1946 we had redistribution of seats based on the fact that 65 seats were assigned to the province of Quebec and all the other provinces were supposed to have a number in proportion thereto. As the President of the Privy Council pointed out, there was one slight qualification to that right at the beginning, namely, that no province was to lose any seats at a redistribution unless its population dropped by 5 per cent or more.

Then it was not very long, in that first era of our redistribution history, until the reduction in the number of seats in the Atlantic provinces made it necessary to do something to protect Prince Edward Island in particular. Hence a floor was built into the constitution in 1915 which provided that no province was to have fewer members in the House of Commons than it had members in the other place. So, even in that period between 1867 and 1946, when we had what we thought was a system of representation by population, it was varied because of the requirements of the situation.

In 1946 we switched from a basis of 65 seats for Quebec and the other provinces in proportion thereto to a system based on a fixed total number of seats for the House of Commons. Then we decided we would divide that total number of seats among the provinces in proportion to their respective populations, but the very minute we wrote that system we made some qualifications in it.

We carried forward, for example, the Senate floor which was already there. We provided for seats for the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories despite their lesser populations, and it was not long after that until we got the "Gardiner rule" written into the constitution, which provided that no province should lose at any redistribution seats greater than 15 per cent of the number of seats it had before. It was a very complicated rule. But the point I am making is that again, in the 1946 to the present era, we decided that representation by population had to be qualified because of the make-up of this country.

Now we are changing, we are going back to a basic number for the province of Quebec, and we are deciding that it is to be 75 for this decade, with the provision that in each succeeding decade that number will increase by four, in other words to 79 in the 1980's, to 83 in the 1990's, to 87 in the twenty-first century, and so on, on the basis of that province having a fixed number. We are deciding that the rest of the provinces are to have their seats in proportion thereto.

However, we are still faced with the fact that when you apply strict representation by population, small provinces like Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick would suffer greatly if some floor were not provided, and we are carrying forward in effect the floor we have had. We are dropping the reference to the Senate—that of course pleases me and I would vote for the bill on that count—but we are carrying forward the actual floors of four for P.E.I., and ten for New Brunswick.

We have also come to the realization that if there are floors for some very small provinces, it is right to expect floors for provinces that are a little larger but are still small. We from the prairie provinces, particularly from Manitoba and Saskatchewan, have accepted the fact that P.E.I. and New Brunswick were entitled to their floors, but we wondered why we were not also entitled to some such provision. So, as I see it, what we are doing in this new bill is something akin to what is done by many organizations.

I do not hold it up necessarily as the only example, but I looked this morning at the constitution of the NDP—you can be sure of course that whatever we do is logical—and I find that there is a provision in our constitution regarding delegates to our national convention, which states that there is one delegate for the first 50 members, another delegate for the next 50, and so on up to 200 members, but once the membership in a constituency is over 200, the number of delegates becomes one per 100. What is true for the NDP, I suggest, is probably true for other parties, union organizations and all kinds of bodies, namely, that you provide a little larger representation for the first numbers but, as the numbers increase, you moderate it slightly.

So what we are doing in this bill, it seems to me, is very straightforward and clear. We accept the fact that in Canada we have three groups of provinces: we have large ones, we have middle-sized ones, and we have small ones, just like the Three Bears. The large ones at the moment are Ontario and Quebec; the middle-sized ones are Alberta and British Columbia; the smaller ones, the working ones, the ones from which come the real ideas, are the other two prairie provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the four Atlantic provinces, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

What we decided is that in the case of the two large provinces the relationship between them shall be exactly proportional to their numbers. We give Quebec 75, and Ontario's number shall be exactly proportional to Quebec in terms of its population. Then we are deciding that the middle-sized provinces shall get a slightly better deal, and after that we have decided that the smaller provinces shall have a break that is slightly better still.

When you read the convoluted language of the bill you may wonder what it says, but that is what it says. The formula provides for Quebec and Ontario to have numbers that are directly proportional to their population. In the case of the smaller provinces, we decided that the quotient that applied in the preceding redistribution is to apply in the new one, and if that results in those provinces holding their own number of seats or getting more, that is what they will get. In the case of the middle-sized provinces we decided that they would get half of whatever that formula would give to them, so that they fare a little better than Ontario and Quebec but not quite as well as the six smaller provinces.

I say "fare better, or fare not quite as well" in terms of their absolute numbers, but I suggest that in terms of fairness of representation, the scheme works out fairly well. I am reasonably hopeful, with the one qualification that the hon. member for Dauphin made, and I am inclined to go along with it, that this scheme may stand up better than the one we produced in 1946, and still better than the one that was produced in 1867.

I can imagine that in the 1980's or the 1990's there may be some concern about this House becoming too large, but dealing with that should wait until we see what the population is in those years, and what facilities there are to enable members to deal with the problems of their constituents. I believe the whole question of communication between Ottawa and this far flung country, and the whole question of what we do about election campaigns, how long they are, and so on, are involved in this question of the number of constituents a member would have. So I say that subject to the question of enlarging the House by too many in the 1980's, in the 1990's or in the twenty-first century—some of us would like to stay around to see how it all works out—I think that the formula has a good deal to commend it.

Although it was not my intention to broach this next subject at this time, since it is in my head now I might as well come out with it while we are talking about increased numbers. Some members immediately raise the question as to where we will put them all. So far as the next parliament is concerned after this bill goes through, 280 members will present no problems at all. As you, Mr. Speaker, are aware, we now have 279 desks in the House. We have 138 on the government side and 138 on this side, and also we have three brand new ones in the far corner for Mr. Deputy Speaker and his assistants. So we need only one more desk in the House to accommodate the 280.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): So long as we don't get another Camillien Houde.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I could share half of my seat with him, and between the two of us we could manage with two full seats, Mr. Speaker.

That picture of using every seat in this chamber of course has to be qualified by the question of how the election results break down and whether it is desirable to have the place fairly evenly balanced. Perhaps another minority parliament would be good for that first House of 280.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mind you, when you go on to 310, another problem is created, but let us worry about that when the time comes.

I have said that the language of this bill is terribly complicated, convoluted and contorted, and the minister's smile suggests that he found it that way too. I still think it should be possible to find someone else to draft these bills rather than lawyers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Such as Gene Whelan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We need someone to put this in language that any person can understand. There seems to be general agreement in some quarters that we should get rid of the lawyers, but there seem to be a few members around with a conflict of interest of that point.

● (1620)

Even so, Mr. Speaker, on examining the language of the bill quite closely I realize that not only is it a bill that sets out the basic principle, namely, that there shall be these three groups and that the large ones get a straight representation, the middle ones get a little better, and that the smaller ones fare a bit better, but then there are such things as the provision that no province shall lose any seats at any redistribution, and no province shall have fewer members than some other province that has a lesser population. When I really go through that convoluted language I realize what it does. It provides that there shall be no instance of a province losing seats at any redistribution. That is why Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will stay where they are even though the reference to their Senate floors has been taken out.

There are some other interesting things. There is a provision in the bill that takes care of the situation, if that day comes, when there are no more small provinces in Canada. Somebody gasped at that, and I gasped too when I saw it. The day when Prince Edward Island has 1,500,000 people is surely far off, but nevertheless I suppose theoretically those who drafted the bill thought the possibility should be considered.

There is also a provision for what happens if a province finds itself protected by two floors. There is the provision that says a province shall not lose any seats at redistribution, and there is another provision that says a province shall not have fewer seats than some other province with lesser population. There may be an instance where a province finds itself protected by both of those floors. In that case the language of the bill makes it clear that the province gets the greater rather than the lesser number of seats.

There is also the provision that no fraction is to count. If one should divide the quotient into a province's population and if it ends up with 14½ seats, that province gets only 14 seats.

The bill has wiped out any reference to the Senate floor. That does not do away with the fact that Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will continue to have four and ten seats respectively. I welcome that change because it means that I can simplify my bill C-205 which calls for the abolition of the Senate. That bill has not yet got past this House, but one lives in hope. In that bill I have had to consider what would happen to the floor that protects Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick if we did abolish the Senate. I have had to put some of this convoluted language in my bill to provide that they would retain the floor they had when there was a Senate. I can change that now because those provinces are protected by a different floor, the floor that says no province is ever to lose any seats, so the reference to the Senate is gone.

There is no reference in the bill to the "Gardiner rule" or 15 per cent rule. I remember the terrific battle we had over that. It was very obvious that Mr. Gardiner brought the rule in just to save Saskatchewan. He was a minister from Saskatchewan and I suppose was doing his duty by his province, as ministers still feel they have to do in various ways. After a redistribution or two it turned out, however, that it did not save Saskatchewan, but it did save Nova Scotia. It seemed to me a far-fetched rule. I think it is better to have the basic rule that no province loses any seat and the rule that no province is to have fewer seats than any other province with a lesser population. In that sense the new bill is good.

One of the other things I like about this bill if I understand it, and I think I do, is that it has softened the disproportion that existed, let us say, between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The former two provinces had floors of four and ten. Manitoba and Saskatchewan had their senatorial floor set at six, but had the protection that they could never have fewer members than a province having lesser population. Thus it was possible for Manitoba and Saskatchewan to go down to ten, the same as New Brunswick.

This new formula calls for all six of the small provinces to be linked together. The number of seats to be assigned to each of the small provinces is determined by dividing the number of seats that the six provinces had after the last redistribution into the total population of those six provinces under the new census figures. So, the populations of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are brought into the total population of the six small provinces. That is why Manitoba and Saskatchewan will go up to 14 instead of the 13 we have now, while Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will remain the same. In other words, the population of those six smaller provinces is taken together, except that the four and ten floor was already there for Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. It does not put us on a directly proportional basis but it lessens the feeling of disproportion between those two provinces and the two prairie provinces to which I have referred.

I think an arrangement has been worked out that should see us through a few decades, and I think it will be looked upon as an improvement over what we had.

I said earlier that there were one or two other things that might have been included in this bill. One that has been referred to by the President of the Privy Council is the matter of the Northwest Territories. We long ago accepted the proposition that the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should have representation in this House despite the smaller population in those parts of Canada. In the case of the Northwest Territories my friend from that area has told us, as he has told the House, of the terrific job it is to try to represent 36,000 people scattered over almost 1½ million square miles. I asked him the other day if he would not feel lonely if he had to cover only 750,000 square miles. He said that he would, but in the interests of the people he thought it was a good idea.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) has before the House a private member's bill, C-299. I hope the President of the Privy Council will examine it and, perhaps it might be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections along with any bill that the government introduces. This has been a major concern of the member for Northwest Territories since he came here. He is anxious for a system that would be more fair to the people in the north. I join him in welcoming the announcement made today. When this goes before the committee I hope Bill C-299 will be referred along with the bill the government plans to place before us.

I am glad that the President of the Privy Council emphasized the fact—I thought the hon. member for Dauphin was confusing the two things a little—that this bill deals only with the number of members to be assigned to each province. The hon. member said that after the map came out last time there was a good deal of concern, part of it was concern over the way the boundaries were drawn and part of it was the sudden realization that it was really true that provinces like Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia that were going to suffer a decline in the number of their seats. It was a combination of the two things that brought on the concern that led to the delaying bill we passed some months ago.

In this bill we are not dealing with the question of how the lines are drawn inside the provinces. We are not touching a principle that I feel is by now sacred. It took a long time to get it, but it is there. That is the provision that the lines shall not be drawn by members who have a conflict of interest, shall not be done by a committee, and particularly shall not be drawn by a government, but shall be drawn by independent commissions. I recognize all the arguments that members will want to make before those commissions, but the fundamental fact that these lines inside the provinces are drawn independently of the operation of parliament is something I am glad we won, and I am glad it is still there.

I know that in this bill part of the complicated language is there to make it clear that the work done under the old formula is now null and void, that the commissioners are going to start all over again except, of course, that it is declared that they have had referred to them the reports on population and so on.

● (1630)

All told, Mr. Speaker, I think a good job has been done; but I am not handing a bouquet to the minister or to the government because, as he himself said, this bill represents the thinking of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the minority parliament. I think it is good to see some of the things which were initiated in that minority parliament being carried forward in this one, and we are ready to give Bill C-36 its second reading and send it to the Standing Committee.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) for having introduced Bill C-36 which is entitled:

An Act to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Bill C-36, Mr. Speaker—I think it is necessary to recall—has some historic significance. Indeed, a bill to establish electoral boundaries commissions has already been introduced in the House. Such a commission acted under the legislation then enforced on the basis of the 1971 decennial census and with the former procedure used in Canada to establish the electoral boundaries throughout the provinces. As a result, the Quebec representation had two fewer members, Newfoundland, one member less, while Ontario had three members more, one member less in Manitoba and Saskatchewan but three members more in British Columbia.

This formula of course satisfied only a few individuals. Thus a group of members in each province agreed to file a notice of objection to the House against the old distribution procedure.

On June 7, 1973, I had the privilege, together with the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), to join another group of government members to categorically and firmly oppose a bill which had then been introduced. We were dissatisfied for a number of reasons. One of them was the fact that Quebec would lose two seats. The other was that it was based only on the population criterion, with a percentage of more or less 25 per cent, which meant that the electoral boundaries commission was only playing a mathematical game, putting a puzzle of sort together, joining constituencies together while applying the rule of more or less 25 per cent.

We had indicated at that time that we objected to this method for a number of reasons. One of them was the fact that Quebec had a smaller representation mainly for the following reasons: First, because the electoral boundaries commission was not taking and would not take into account geographic and economic considerations, nor the communication problems within constituencies and between various constituencies.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we were objecting because electoral boundaries were established according to the act, according to the method used to determine the number of constituencies. We had the same problem over and over again.

The House, composed of Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, New Democrats and Social Creditists, will agree by the time limit of December 31, 1974 on a procedure for the distribution of constituencies among provinces to make this Parliament representative.

Referring to Part II of Bill C-36 now under study one can wonder what the outcome of that bill will be. We shall be faced with exactly the same situation as in the past, meaning that the task will be assumed by commissionners. These are frequently judges, helped in that matter by commissionners sitting at the top of their ivory towers. They try to apply a method based or stupid mathematical criteria, in order to establish electoral boundaries without taking any particular cultural, historical, economical or social factor into consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I made tremendous efforts when that bill was introduced. I went to the court in Trois-Rivières and met with the commissioner. I prepared a report of over 65 pages in order to prove, as evidenced by figures—figures that were not drawn from my imagination, but from Manpower centres, from Statistics Canada and other organizations—to prove, as I said, that it was important not to accept the electoral boundaries of the Lotbinière constituency as proposed. I was heartily and very politely welcomed, but to no avail at all.

Private members are most concerned with electoral boundaries. Generally speaking, our party is satisfied with Bill C-36. We are glad that the government accepted to propose, to use the so-called "amalgam" formula which seems by far the best of all proposed formulas. We had a choice of several alternatives. In fact, five distribution methods were suggested, which fell into two groups, two of those methods advocating a considerable increase in the number of members, namely the amplified method and the so-called mitigated parity method.

We also had the choice between three other methods for a moderate increase in the number of seats: the compensation method, the Quebec plus 4 formula and, finally, the amalgam formula. My colleagues and myself carefully studied all these proposals. For this, we referred to the statements of the former President of the Privy Council and the documentation available, as well as to the committee on procedure, which has studied these matters.

We concluded that this government proposal is valid, justified and necessary. We are in favour of its implementation. But, Mr. Speaker, since there must always be a but, Part II says that Bill C-36 will be implemented immediately, which means that our famous boundary commissions, from their ivory towers, as I said earlier, will amuse themselves by drawing lines anywhere and try to balance the figures. With all due respect, I strictly condemn the working method of these people, Mr. Speaker. They bring about the kind of situation where the constituency of Drummond, for instance, will be integrated with half the constituencies of Richmond and Shefford. Shefford will end up in the constituency of Saint-Jean d'Iberville. Lotbinière keeps what it already has and extends to Thetford Mines. The rural constituency of Frontenac disappears and the redistribution goes on haphazardly.

As for us, we want to ensure an equitable and serious representation for Canadians. We are willing to accept suggestions. What is important is the final result; when we look at the maps as a whole, we wonder if those constituencies and members of parliament will be representatives, if they will find it easy to work in their constituency and to represent it ably. We find then that the legislator's will has not been complied with in practical matters, and we still end up with something that does not make any sense, with ridings which are too large, which do not respect the natural boundaries of the territory, or which are ill-divided.

Consequently, my remarks will deal with that matter. I would like to get something before I vote on this bill at any stage, and I want to be understood at this stage. Even though I support this bill, as I have said earlier with my colleagues, I want to say to this government, not behind its back but to its face, that I will do my utmost to stop the bill, to kill it if necessary, unless the minister gives us a sound and formal guaranty that the method which will be used by the commissioners in accordance with Part II of Bill C-36 will be more modern and more developed.

The President of the Privy Council said in his opening speech to introduce this bill that he hoped the commissioners would want to set up some sort of a model riding taking into consideration cultural, socio-economic and historical factors. Those are pious wishes. I have good faith in the President of the Privy Council but I do not trust the civil servants who will be responsible for implementing that legislation, and I feel the point I am raising here is extremely important.

Mr. Speaker, we are democratically elected in the riding. I see here the former leader of the NDP (Mr. Douglas) who was the premier of a province and who realizes as I do the importance of representation. When one is elected in a riding, and civil servants who were never elected in their damn life think of a way of implementing legislation passed by Parliament, draw maps no matter how, having fun at night while taking a beer, and make proposals that do not make any sense, one asks himself questions.

I am somewhat radical in my judgment but, Mr. Speaker, that is the situation. But when a member standing up for the interest of his fellow citizens slaves to present a brief begging the commissioners to hear reason so boundaries will respect cultural and local entities, he is very politely received, but his brief goes directly to the wastepaper basket. That is what happens, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the President of the Privy Council will realize that. That is why the Quebec Social Crediters vigorously opposed the last redistribution proposal. Several Liberal members had also opposed it, and rightly so, because the issue that we now raise is beyond political partisanship.

Mr. Speaker, because of the redistribution approach, Parliament had to pass Bill C-208 on July 3, 1973. Why? Because a prop approach had been adopted to establish electoral boundaries.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is extremely important, because in the end, what does Bill C-36 do? It conforms to the amalgam formula that allows small provinces to obtain a fair deal. Bill C-36 is excellent because it recognizes the existence of a province whose population is called average from a statistical point of view. For instance: Alberta and British Columbia.

It respects these entities with an acceptable mathematical formula. In this matter, of course, we regret that out of 13 additional seats coming from the implementation of this bill, there will be only one for the province of Quebec, in the first operation. In fact we will be eligible to get four other hon. members in the next decennial revision.

Mr. Speaker, we regret it, but we will not be among those people who block a bill only for this one reason. As I said earlier, we are not interested in the process now because we find it acceptable, but rather in what will happen afterwards in practice.

This is why we do not intend to turn the House upside down and create problems for everyone, but we will stand fast in order to have a formal assurance from the President of the Privy Council that hon. members will be consulted before the publication of the maps in question. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, that would again develop into a war, because we shall have voted for Bill C-36 and everybody will be happy because we shall have worked conscientiously without partisanship. However, when we finally face facts, we shall be in a fix that will have been imposed by public servants who do not even need to be elected to get their pay and three meals a day.

Mr. Speaker, I shall give a typical example to prove that that is extremely important. I hope that before agreeing to the bill all hon. members will require from the President of the Privy Council, as we do, a formal commitment that we shall be consulted, not only once the maps have been printed but before so that we shall be heard beforehand if we are not after—here is an example.

In the case of the Lotbinière riding which I have the honour to represent, what was done to follow the famous rule of more or less 25 per cent, that one does not have to be a genius to apply? The municipality of Warwick was to be taken out of the riding of Lotbinière. Warwick is exactly five miles away from Victoriaville which has a population of at least 30,000. Warwick is a heavily industrialized and extremely important city and most of its dealings, whether agricultural or commercial, financial, cultural or educational are with Victoriaville. However, the commissioner decided that Warwick would be part of the Drummond riding, which is sheer idiocy. There is the first surgical operation.

As he still was not completely satisfied, the same commissioner decided to get rid of the riding of Frontenac which is represented here by one of our illustrious colleagues from the Eastern Townships. This resulted in the disappearance of a riding rich in historical memories and prosperous from the mining industry, and agricultural riding with towns as important as Thetford Mines and Plessisville. Our superbrained commissioners just made this riding disappear completely no matter whether they were elected by Liberals or Progressive Conservatives. I cannot condone the disappearance of a riding like that of Frontenac strictly for mathematical reasons and taking into account the "more or less 25 per cent". I quite agree that Montreal should have better representation—I am tickled pink about the idea—but that does not solve the problem of the Frontenac electors. What exactly did this genius of a commissioner do? This genius, to ensure the disappearance of the riding of Frontenac, took his knife, sliced the riding right down the middle and said: the part on the right hand side will go with the riding of Richmond, the one of the left, with Lotbinière.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, the riding of Lotbinière would have become as big as the present province of Newfoundland, with, in each of the four corners, four different mentalities. How can one conscientiously really represent that riding? There are two alternatives, Mr. Speaker. It is not that I do not want to represent those people, Mr. Speaker, but they have the right to have their representative, and we must respect their entity.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I feel this bill is important. I see that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mackasey) is present in the House. He is an MP who is very interested in the province of Quebec, since he has travelled all over it. He has visited my riding several times. Furthermore, my vote increases everytime he comes to my riding. It is extraordinary, Mr. Speaker. I am saying it for laughs, but I know he will agree with me.

We of the Social Credit Party of Canada, intend to vote for the bill, but have no guarantee whatsoever that in effect historical and cultural entities would be respected.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without resorting to political blackmail or the like, I intend to use every parliamentary method at my disposal to convince the President of the Privy Council, with the help I hope of members from both sides, that members be consulted before maps are published. In this way, commissioners could be made aware of any suggested changes or comments regarding cultural, economical and social aspects before completing their work, which will be an expensive process anyway.

When this is done, Mr. Speaker, I feel the commissioners' retribution will be well earned and people will be happy. What is the purpose in voting this bill if it does nothing more than ensure fair representation of provinces?

In other words, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-36 ensures fair and just representation of provinces in Parliament, by determining the number of seats according to a precise mathematical formula. But I would go one step further, by amending Part II of the bill so that the same principle of fair representation be applied not only at the province level, but also at the constituency level.

I believe we would be doing tremendously positive work if in Bill C-36 we incorporated true participation, fair distribution of seats within provinces, but also a guarantee that we have real constituencies, that is meaningful ones.

Mr. Speaker, I know the constituency of Drummond because it is next to my riding. It is right at the door of the Lotbinière constituency. The same thing goes for Richelieu, Frontenac, and Lévis.

If Bill C-36 is passed, and unless on the other hand we make sure that the commissioners will listen to what the elected representative of the people have to say we will again end up with atrophied ridings as Lévis, and Drummond, amalgamated with Shefford and Frontenac. Mr. Speaker, I talk about my own area because I want to represent its people well. I know my neighbour members, and they are doing a good job. If we can get together, forget our political parties in considering this bill to ask the government to give us a formal assurance, I think that then we will achieve something extraordinary for our fellow citizens.

Let us go back to our respective ridings and say we voted in favour of Bill C-36. Mr. Speaker, let us cry out loud that we stood up for the rights of Quebec and that Quebec will not lose two members but, on the contrary, will win one. Let us say we were all honest and extraordinary in this House, and when they see the map of their riding in the papers they will say, the hon. member for Lotbinière betrayed us, and so did the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard). They will then say to the hon. members for Drummond, Frontenac, Lévis, Lotbinière, or Trois-Rivières, we do not want to be out of your ridings. That is when the trouble begins. What can we do in those cases, Mr. Speaker? Absolutely nothing, or close to it, if the present methods are maintained, except to get together and introduce a notice of opposition in this House, as we did on July 7, 1973.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the hon. members for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard), Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel), Gaspé (Mr. Cyr), Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), Berthier (Mr. Yanakis), Lapointe (Mr. Marceau), Matane (Mr. De Bané), Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) and Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre) signed a paper free of any political partisanship to stop the work of the commission because it did not make sense. They said that they objected for the following reasons:

(1) The Commission made no allowance for geographic and economic considerations, and ignored or neglected problems of communication within and between the proposed districts;

We object—the signers—for a second reason:

(2) Except for Montreal, physical, social and economic cohesion is ignored in the proposed districts,...

We should note the fact that our arguments were then devoid of any partisanship.

... thus destroying communities of interest and making adequate representation practically impossible;

That, Mr. Speaker, is what we should be aiming at now. It is advisable to do it now. Let us not wait to vote Bill C-36 because the sword of Damocles will be hanging over us on December 31.

Our weak point, and an unpleasant one too, in the House is that we act at the last minute. Every year, it is the same old story. Before Christmas we are in a hurry, we are blackmailed into working; if you want to to go on vacation, pass this, if you do not want to, don't. Finally, everybody thinks of his family and does act, to find himself after the recess with bills which he regrets having endorsed. We have a chance, for Parliament is supreme and it can decide what it will do with that act. I agree that that bill should be passed for December 31, but on the strict condition that I may change any proposition that will not respect the cultural, social and economic identity of Lotbinière, Drummond, Frontenac or Lévis.

Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious to emphasize that I am fed up with having electoral boundaries imposed on me by pen pushers lording it in their ivory tower, who know nothing at all, not even where Victoriaville, Sainte-Croix, Princeville or Warwick is situated. They say: Drummonville is where people wanted to have an international airport, and they burst out laughing, but they simply do not know where it is.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time for members of parliament to come down to earth, to support one another on a non-partisan line and to ask officials to act according to our own identity. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am today the same man as I was on July 7 when some Liberals asked me to sign this; that is why I intend to fight down to the end so that the President of the Privy Council, who does not listen to us, gives us this formal assurance, otherwise I can tell him that his bill shall not pass.

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, there are times in parliament when a member speaks for his constituency, times when he speaks for his province and times when he speaks for the country. It seems to me that, in discussing a bill dealing with redistribution, at this stage one must speak for one's province, since the thrust of the legislation before us has to do with provincial representation. I take to heart the admonition that we are not dealing now with divisions inside a province but with divisions inside the country as a whole, designed to ensure that each province would be represented by a certain number of members in this chamber.

The province from which I come is not a creation of the government of Canada. It had an existence of its own, and government and institutions of its own, prior to its entering into confederation. In preparation for this debate I turned again to Margaret Ormsby's "History of British Columbia" to which it always gives me pleasure to refer—not only is the author a native of British Columbia but she is a native of Vernon in my own constituency. In her words, "Without British Columbia there could be no Canada on the Pacific and the thought of this filled (its inhabitants) with inordinate self-satisfaction." I should like to say to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) that this state of self-satisfaction is probably not so great now as to lead the people of that province, or their representatives, to accept a redistribution bill which leaves us too far short, in comparison with our situation in terms of population.

Miss Ormsby went on to say, referring to the leader of the delegation which came to Ottawa to discuss the subject of confederation, a delegation to which a very generous proposal had been made by the Conservative government of the time, led by Sir John Macdonald:

In the capital, he found among the Liberal members of the House of Commons unqualified opposition to the generous offer which had been made to British Columbia.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED EXEMPTION FOR COSTS OF TOOLS PURCHASED BY MECHANICS

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing a measure to amend the Income Tax Act to provide that, for the purpose of computing the income from his employment, a mechanic may, in addition to any other deduction to which he may be entitled, deduct the cost of tools or other supplies required in the performance of the duties under his contract of employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to preface my remarks by pointing out to the House that this suggested amendment to the Income Tax Act is, in principle, neither novel in its approach nor radical in its extent.

Reducing the inequities of personal income tax measures was one of the fundamental aims of the Carter tax reform movement, and those familiar with that particular era in tax reform history will recognize many of the arguments I offer today.

[Mr. Johnston.]

A simple reiteration of the pros and cons of allowing deductions to certain classes of employees would seem like a futile exercise, but I strongly believe that the nature of the inequity I have singled out, coupled with the changing environment that this class of individual works in, warrants our sympathetic attention.

A brief review of the basic principles of personal income calculation for better taxation purposes might be helpful in order to judge better whether this proposed amendment conforms to those principles, and also whether the status quo contravenes these principles.

There are three basic rules of deductibility that are applied to income calculation. The first rule holds that expenditures reasonably related to the gaining or producing of income should be deductible. This permits the deduction of any expenditures made with a reasonable expectation of profit, or made as an incident of earning income. The second rule holds that expenditures should only be deductible to the extent to which they are reasonable in the circumstances. Lastly, to enforce the first two rules, expenditures of a personal nature are explicitly denied deductibility.

There are, then, two aspects of the general rule of deductibility. On the positive side, all expenditures reasonably related to the gaining or producing of income should be deductible; and on the negative side, any expenditure not so related should not be deductible.

The Carter Commission in its report pressed for reflection of both these aspects in legislation, but in retrospect it is clear that in some cases they were not so reflected. I can appreciate the difficulties involved in trying to apply basic principles across the board to a populace with as varied occupations and incomes as Canadians have, because not all taxpayers incur the same expenses, a fact which raises inequities if simplistic formulas for deductions are used. Not all expenses are directly related to gaining income, which leads to the abuse of tax privileges.

I am convinced, however, that the class of employees I have singled out is, by virtue of exclusion from the right to make itemized deductions, subjected to a significantly greater personal tax burden, a situation which cries out for reform. The capital expenditures necessary to supply the tools of their trade have to be absorbed by such taxpayers without benefit of tax deductions or exemptions, except for the 3 per cent, with a $150 maximum, for employment expenses.

I have ascertained that for some tradesmen in the automotive field an investment of $3,000 or more for tools is not uncommon, and ongoing expenditures of $900 or $1,000 per year can easily be made to replaced tool inventory. The dilemma of the policy maker trying to alleviate this problem is apparent.

If a high standard deduction is used to eliminate a large part of the differential advantage bestowed on those who are entitled to itemized income earning expenditures, the end result is a mere narrowing of the tax base rather than a constructive reform of the tax system. A preferable solution might be to go to the source of the difficulty rather than rely on a method such as the standard deduction which tends to crystallize inconsistencies into the tax system.

The Carter report reviewed these inequities and suggested:

> That there be a more liberal approach than currently existed to employee expense deductions . . .

The report suggested further:

> That the employee should be entitled to substantiate a larger deduction if he could do so.

The final effect of its recommendations on the nature of reforms in tax law is now history. The formula for all employees was an employment expense allowance of 3 per cent of income up to a maximum of $150, for a total cost of $235 million to revenue.

The government rationale for having dismissed the recommendation is that millions of taxpayers are involved and that a very wide range of expenses could be related to earning their employment income. It is contended that these taxpayers do not keep detailed records and that the government has found no practical way to permit employees to deduct actual costs as do those carrying on a profession or other business. I am sure it is hardly necessary to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that administrative convenience has never been an acceptable reason for neglecting to amend a poor law.

What represents even poorer judgment was the statement that:

> The government believes these expenses, that is employment expenses reasonably related to the earning of income, are not generally as high as implied by the commission. It would be costly, and inequitable to others to permit substantially more to be deducted by means of a formula than was normal in typical cases.

This is hardly a credible argument when both the United States and the United Kingdom have instituted measures to compensate for this very same inequity. The United States gives a sufficiently large standard deduction to cover most claims, and the United Kingdom has agreements with industry for flat rates. Both result in giving tax relief in some cases where it is not necessary or justified, but it is felt that they mete out a rough justice.

Bearing no more credibility was the argument advanced by government that the administrative difficulties would be enormous. It said:

> It would be impossible to check expense claims to prevent abuse and evasion.

That was the suggestion according to government apologists. It was further contended that:

> The appointment of additional staff plus the loss of revenue that would accrue from such allowances might even lead to higher taxes.

The fact that self-employed professionals are allowed deductions for materials and equipment consumed in income-earning activity clearly establishes the fact that it is not administratively impossible to audit such expenditures for tax purposes. Such poorly substantiated explanations have led many people to believe that this group was simply not blessed with enough political clout when reform measures were being debated. Reviewing briefly tax appeal board hearings lends some credence to this suspicion.

It is often admitted that expenses voluntarily incurred by an employee were incurred for the purpose of producing income, but there is no provision contained in the act by which a deduction from income can be allowed.

The following submissions to the public hearings in 1970, leading to the white paper on tax reform, show that the problem was at least exposed.

On tax reform the government of Ontario said:

> The white paper proposes to remedy the unfair treatment of ordinary wage and salary earners by establishing a 3 per cent employment expense allowance with a $150 ceiling.
> This ceiling should be increased to $300 with an option provided for the deduction of certain employment expenses on an itemized basis.
> This could ensure approximately equal treatment for employment and self-employment or business income.

The Canadian Bar Association said:

> The proposal to allow employment expenses of 3 per cent of employment income up to $150 per year without documentation would be unfair to non-employees and also to those employees who spend considerable amounts in earning their income.
> Allowance for all reasonable and substantiated expenses should be provided.

The Canadian Labour Congress said:

> The government acceptance of the principle that employees' expenses should be deductible for tax purposes as has long been the case for business and professional expenses is welcomed.
> However, the proposed formula falls short of what is required by many categories of workers whose outlay is much greater for such items as special clothing and replacement of tools.
> The Royal Commission on Taxation was much more realistic in recommending a $500 maximum deduction for this purpose.

Some briefs pointed out that the maximum of $150 a year is too much for some employees and far too little for others. The proper solution would be for all employees to be entitled to submit detailed and authenticated expense claims, with the alternative option to claim a flat allowance, based on a percentage of gross earnings with a ceiling.

There is no valid reason that those who have higher expenses should not be permitted to itemize and claim them, if properly substantiated, and justice would be done. Most briefs have advocated that this choice be given. It may be noted that in the United States employees may itemize and claim deduction of all ordinary and necessary expenses in the same way as the self-employed.

I therefore urge, because the principle is one of equity, that this be favourably considered and that employees be given the option to itemize, substantiate and claim deduction of all expenses, laid out or incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income. I can accept the excuse that this particular point was lost in the turmoil of a tax review as extensive as that undergone in 1972. However, the dust has settled and I am struck by the obvious inequity that has resulted from ignoring the special case represented by mechanics and tradesmen who must incur substantial personal expenditures of tax paid dollars to carry out their work and who are not compensated in any way for this burden.

A persistent refusal to amend the law is nothing but a tacit admission that employees must bear a higher burden of taxation than other groups of taxpayers. I introduced this motion by saying that the working environment for the individuals in question here has been undergoing changes relevant to this argument. Outside of double-digit inflation rates, which the government is not prepared to admit is a real problem, and apart from a recession in the United States economy that will affect the automobile industry in Canada, there are other factors. Let me present the possible effects of Canada's movement toward conversion to the metric system.

Without discussing the other ramifications of such an overhaul in industry, consider the cost to be borne by groups such as mechanics and tradesmen who will be affected by such a change in their working environment. It is estimated that the cost of the new metric tools will range from $250 for the sub-trades to as much as $3,000 for tool and diemakers in certain specialized shops.

For the older workers in particular, it would be most unfair for the government to insist that this cost be met out of their own pockets. The labour organization sector believes that if the labour standards codes of the federal and provincial governments are not revised to shift the cost to the employer, then the Income Tax Act should be amended to permit working people to write off the expense as income deductions.

May I summarize by pointing out that the problem is quite simply that the unfair discrimination between employee and the self-employed arises primarily because the self-employed can, in computing their business or professional income, deduct all reasonable expenses incurred for the purpose of producing such income.

Employees, on the other hand, in computing their income from employment can only claim a few specified deductions as set forth in the Income Tax Act, and no other deductions whatsoever. Skilled manual workers are particularly affected by this stringent limitation on deductions.

A basic and fundamental feature of an income tax system such as ours is that it must not only be fair in its burden as between various groups of taxpayers, but it must be seen to be fair. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the act fails this test in its discriminatory effect on the group of taxpayers whose cause I plead today.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in favour of the resolution before us that would call for an amendment to the Income Tax Act to permit salaried employees to claim deductions for the tools and supplies for which they must spend money out of their own pockets in order to perform their jobs. Under the present Income Tax regulations they are not allowed to claim such a deduction. This is a problem that has existed in Canada for very many years.

When I first came to this House I came from an income tax practice in which I was very well aware of the discrimination which existed. A businessman or self-employed person was allowed to deduct all the expenses actually incurred to the extent they were reasonable and incurred in the course of earning income. In the case of a salaried employee, many of whom are required to turn up for work with their tools in their hands, no such deduction is permitted.

I would like to refer to an income tax case which illustrates the kind of inequity that existed. I refer to the McKay case which came before the Tax Appeal Board in 1958. The working man in that case was a bass violin player, who played for the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and who also did freelance work playing for private gatherings.

The practical effect of the Income Tax Act in respect of that individual was that when he took his instrument with him in a taxi when he went to play at a private gathering, he was allowed to deduct the cost of the taxi because he was then self-employed. When he went out to play for the Toronto Symphony Orchestra although the taxi expenses were exactly the same he was not allowed to deduct those expenses because he was considered to be a salaried employee even though he received no reimbursement from his employer for taxi expenses. This inequity, which favours the self-employed person at the expense of the employed person, was not removed by the income tax reform which so excited this nation and occupied the time of this House in 1970 and 1971.

There was a remarkable breakthrough at that time in that the white paper on tax reform proposed that such expenses of a salaried employee—a carpenter, a plumber, an automobile mechanic, a diemaker or a toolmaker—should be deductible, but only to the extent of $150 or 3 per cent of income, whichever was the lesser. This is a very serious discrimination against the salaried employee because it tells him that even though his expenses may be higher, and even though they may be necessary in order to retain his job or perform his job, they are still not deductible.

I was a member of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when the white paper on tax reform was before it. We received a number of briefs, heard a number of witnesses and were sent many hundred of letters from working people on salaries, pointing out this inequity and asking that salaried people be allowed, like the businessman or the self-employed person, to deduct all expenses to the extent that they were necessary and reasonably laid out in the course and for the purpose of earning a living.

If I may, I should like to read to this House the view that was taken by our committee in its report. We looked at the limit proposed by the Minister of Finance, and this is what we had to say:

> It has long been recognized by taxpayers, and by the courts—both here and in Britain—that discrimination exists in the tax system against employees in the matter of deductible expenses. The self-same expenses are often deductible where a person is self-employed and not deductible where he is an employee; the height of absurdity is reached when one person acts in both capacities and receives different tax treatment for the same expenses.
> Recognition by the government of this discrimination, through the White Paper proposal to allow employees a certain measure of relief, has been generally welcomed.
> Its form, however is open to criticism. Some briefs have pointed out that the maximum of $150 a year is too much for some employees and too little for others. Those who do not in fact incur many, or any, expenses would benefit unduly; those who incur more than $150 would be unjustly penalized.
> The ideal solution would be for all employees to submit detailed and authenticated claims, but the problems of administration and compliance that this would involve, and for very little result, seem to rule this out and to make some flat allowance, based on a percentage of gross earnings and with a ceiling—as proposed in the White Paper—the only practicable way to deal with the majority of employees.

There seems to be no valid reason, however, why those who have higher expenses should not be permitted to itemize and claim them, if properly substantiated. Since it seems likely that relatively few employees would avail themselves of this, the administrative burden would probably not be unduly heavy—probably not nearly as heavy as that involved in handling the claim of the self-employed—and justice would be done. Most briefs have advocated that this choice be given.

It may be noted that in the United States employees may itemize and claim deduction of all "ordinary and necessary" expenses in the same way as the self-employed. Employees are still not quite as generously treated as the self-employed, however. The self-employed may deduct all "ordinary and necessary" expenses from gross income in arriving at "adjusted gross income", and take the standard deduction as well, while employees may deduct from gross income only expenses in four specified categories—reimbursed expenses, travel expenses away from home, transportation expenses and expenses of outside salesmen—and must then make either the standard deduction or their itemized expenses. However, United States tax law does recognize the basic principle that an employee has a right to deduct ordinary and necessary expenses incurred in carrying on his work.

We note that the revenues cost of the White Paper proposals to allow the employees' general deduction, moving expenses and others amounts to $235 million;

If I may interject, this was $235 million of extra deductions that had not been permitted to salaried employees before the white paper. The committee proceedings continue:

... we therefore hesitate to suggest that employees' deductions should be broadened.

Here is the part I want to recall for the House.

We recommend, however, because the principle is one of equity, that this be considered as soon as revenue needs permit, and employees given the option to itemize, substantiate and claim deduction of all expenses "laid out or incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income", in the same way as the self-employed now do ...

When we said that, we meant it. We were not simply trying to make up a face saving excuse to use with working people.

In concluding I would like to draw the attention of the House to an interesting comparison. In 1970, when we put out our report, the gross national product of Canada was $85 billion. In 1974 it is estimated that the gross national product of Canada will be $140 billion, nearly twice as much as it was in 1970. I submit that revenues do now permit this inequity, that has existed since long before tax reform and that has continued through tax reform, to be removed and for the salaried employees to be given exactly the same breaks as the self-employed now enjoy.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will only take four or five minutes to express my support for the motion moved by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour). This has been almost an annual motion, or an annual private member's bill, or both, for many years in the House of Commons. I can recall other years when there was hardly any disagreement, particularly from private members, on all sides of the House on this issue. I have yet to hear anybody rise to speak against such a motion. So I and others do not need to say much more on the matter.

I am assuming, since I am not a lawyer, that because the hon. member writes the word mechanics with a small "m" in the motion that it covers all other trades as well. That being the case, it illustrates how wide the discrimination is, as mentioned by both previous speakers.

The government has given the excuse many times of the administrative nightmare that this would involve, an excuse which I do not believe nor accept. In fact it seems to me that a very simple process would be to have an employer sign a statement of verification of the tools purchased and required by the employee in the earning of his income.

I think we can assume that 99 per cent or more of employers and employees would be honest and fair and would not try to obtain unfair advantage through the tax laws. This discrimination should have been ended long ago, and since there is agreement among members of all parties I urge that the motion be passed.

Also, I want to make a point that I have made almost annually since I came to this place, that in the case of private members' motions I see no difficulty in members on the government benches letting these motions pass when there is unanimous or near unanimous agreement from members of all parties. Private members' motions place no stricture on the government; they do not require the government to do anything. All they do is to ask the government "to give consideration to" or "consider the advisability of" something. There is nothing requiring the government to implement it. This would give the government the sense of members of the House. Surely this is part of our procedure in which members from all parties in the back three or four rows can have some input, in terms of offering advice to and making requests of the government, and it comes in a relatively non partisan manner.

I think it would be a credit to the House to let a motion such as this go through, and I am confident that the government will give serious consideration to the advisability of doing what the motion seeks. But there is nothing which says that it must do so. However, it would certainly give ministers an indication of how members in all parties feel, and it would give backbench members on the government side an effective role to play. It is an opportunity for them to provide a further input into matters which the government might consider. So I plead with members on both sides to let this motion pass now, and thus we can have supper half an hour earlier.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I say, as I begin, that it is a pleasure to participate in this debate. I gather from the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) that it is not a new subject for debate in the House, but I am happy to participate in it because of the significance and importance of what the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour) is proposing, and also because of the fact that the proposal comes from him. I have found that generally the contributions he makes to the House are worthy of further thought and consideration, and I am happy that we are able to give that initial kind of consideration to what he has to say on the matter.

I must say, as my colleague on this side of the House said earlier, that I have considerable sympathy for the basic sentiments behind the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina East. In a general sort of way and in a specific way we have all given a great deal of thought, in a period of inflationary pressures on all of us, to Canadians in the middle or lower income scale who probably feel the impact of inflation more than most Canadians, and who are the least able to defend themselves.

We see measures coming forward from time to time, such as increased family allowances and pensions in the last parliament, income tax indexing—and in the budget of a couple of weeks ago, personal tax cuts, measures to protect personal savings, special consideration for senior citizens, housing incentives and other measures that are all in the spirit of assisting individual Canadians to manage their own budgets to the best advantage possible as they go about their own personal struggle against the problems of inflation. Most of those measures I have mentioned, and I suspect the one that the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour) is proposing this afternoon, have their greatest beneficial impact upon the middle and lower income earner. We have all welcomed proposals of this kind from time to time and I think that is the spirit in which the hon. member makes this proposal.

I do not think any of us should underestimate the real contribution of that vast group of middle income earners in this country. Among them are a good many mechanics who, I suspect, pour a good many dollars into the economy every year. They are a crucial part of the economic lifeblood of the nation and so often their interests and concerns might be taken for granted. They do not seem to make too many waves and, as we know, it is often the old squeaky wheel that gets the most attention from all levels of the government.

The motion before us offers some recognition of the problems of the middle group. It specifically requests that mechanics be allowed a special deduction for the cost of tools, and so forth, that are necessary for their employment. I am sure the hon. member is aware of some of the difficulties inherent in the situation and he referred to them when introducing the motion. These difficulties should not be put aside too lightly. I am not persuaded they are reason enough for not proceeding with some consideration of the proposal, but we should be aware of them so that we can be better prepared to deal with them and accomplish what he is suggesting.

Traditionally there has been a distinction between income from business and income from employment. Expenses were deducted from the former but not the latter. Perhaps we have now moved past the point where such a distinction is reasonable or logical, and that is what my friend on this side of the House was pointing out. We are in the position now to go beyond such distinctions. Indeed, we might be making a move new to the industrialized world. I understand from the remarks of the hon. member for Regina East that the American tax law may have provisions similar to his proposal, but in most industrialized western states the law compares with our own. Of course, that is not any reason for not moving into a new field.

In theory an employer is supposed to provide the necessary tools of the trade for his employees, and his expenses are therefore deductible. If an employer does not pay those expenses, they are thought to be unnecessary. That sounds to me like a legal fiction and in some cases no doubt it is. For the majority of Canadians, however, it would seem that the fiction equals the fact. In most cases, an employee need only present himself at his place of work, and his tools and supplies are waiting—whatever they may be, from a paper clip to a shovel, a truck, a million dollar computer. The problem arises when, for one reason or another, the traditional and historical practices of the trade are that the employee must pay for his tools and equipment himself. That is where the legal fiction begins to miss the mark. No one can deny that in several instances employees—perhaps mechanics amongst them—expend a considerable amount of money each year in supplying themselves with equipment. Given such situations, should we allow the legal fiction to prevail for mechanics or make an exception?

Some time ago the government offered a basic measure of relief. A taxpayer who is employed may each year deduct 3 per cent of wages, to a maximum of $150, for work expenses. There is also a technical provision for an employee to deduct the cost of certain materials consumed in the course of his duties. Other than these provisions, up to now there has not been any special deduction for the extraordinary expenses of some employees. The reasons for this are pragmatic and practical and are essentially because of the difficulty in administration.

First of all, I suppose there is the problem of defining exactly the employee's occupation. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) mentioned that the word "mechanic" was not capitalized in the motion and could, therefore, be presumed to include a host of other occupations that would not in the ordinary sense be regarded as mechanics. I am not sure that is correct. If an exemption or deduction were provided for mechanics, the word should be defined very carefully. I do not suppose a tax lawyer would have any difficulty in concluding that an automobile mechanic would qualify, but there might be some question about an instrument maker or a millwright. Perhaps we might want to expand that definition beyond the technical and narrow word "mechanic". There might be a host of borderline cases that could bring themselves within the definition. Essentially it is a problem for the courts eventually. But I have some reservations about the use of the word "mechanic" per se and would like to see the amendment cast more broadly.

Mr. Benjamin: Mechanics' lien applies to all of those.

Mr. Goodale: Perhaps it does, but I am not sure that this would. I should like to see a proper definition so that all employees who are required to bring their own tools to the trade would be included.

The problems that have traditionally afflicted this kind of proposal are administrative and not insurmountable. I have hinted at one or two of my minor concerns about this proposal, Mr. Speaker, but in summary there are three questions that come to mind. First, should we make a special deduction for mechanics per se? Second, should we broaden the definition to include employees who maybe, depending on the interpretation of the word from time to time, excluded from the definition? Should the definition be as broad as we can make it? Finally, instead of working around a definition should we try to approach it by making the basic exemption more generous? In his opening remarks the hon. member for Regina East seemed to indicate that might not be the ideal approach. I do not want to paraphrase him unfairly but I think he said it could "crystalize inequities in the law". He was referring to their being embodied in the law, without being removed, although their impact might be moderated. We must consider these ideas when we consider the kind of proposal now before us. Most members of the House feel sympathy for the sentiments expressed by the hon. member in bringing his proposal forward.

As we consider the deduction for tools which a mechanic or other employee may need for his work, I hope we shall also consider the more general issue of a broader range of tax deductions which would affect lower and middle income earners and provide for them some further protection in their personal battle against inflation. We can deal with the particular matter before us now and recognize, at the same time, that a much broader cross-section of Canadians is fighting the same battle and that inflation for all is a problem. We should consider possible tax deductions as relief for them as well.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the proposal of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour). I remember many similar types of proposals coming before the House in times past. Let me put forward this argument to members on the government side: Over and over again, after parliament had expressed its will, its will had been thwarted by the actions of civil servants or other officials who are responsible for carrying out the instructions of parliament. For example, members on all sides of this House have said for many years that charging federal excise and sales tax on articles bought by a municipality is not fair. After years of pressure the government of that day, the Diefenbaker government, passed legislation exempting articles bought by municipalities from excise tax and sales tax. Yet, although this House passed that legislation, it was never fully implemented because of a quirk in the regulations. It took another amendment of the law, brought forward under the 1973 budget provisions, to correct this anomaly. These regulations were enforced not by ministers, not by parliamentarians, but by civil servants. I am now referring to the ways and means motion connected with the 1973 budget which finally removed excise tax on trucks bought by municipalities.

The second situation to which I refer is still continuing. About a year ago parliament passed a law saying that family allowances could be raised to $20 per child. However, regulations made by civil servants and not by this chamber stopped family allowances being paid in cases of children whose parents had both died. The minister has recognized this anomaly and said he will correct it. I first raised this matter in March, and here we are in December and it still has not been corrected. This situation is absolutely immoral. A child with one parent is eligible for family allowance; but if both parents die, that child is not eligible for family allowance. I hope this situation will be corrected. Parliament must speak loudly and clearly, to let those who draft such regulations know that we are following what is being done. If the will of parliament is ignored, as it has been often, we should speak up loudly.

The proposal to allow mechanics and other similar employees to deduct the cost of their tools from income has been made many times. It was before the House when the government considered the so-called tax reform. When the committee considering that bill met, it heard speaker after speaker recommend that such employees be not discriminated against. Everyone knows that if a man works in an automobile producing plant, the company provides the tools; if a man works in a plant producing electrical components, his working tools are supplied by the company. If a tool wears out or is broken, the company writes off its cost against income. But if a man happens to be a tradesman—the common expression is, a mechanic—and he works for an employer owning a small business, he must buy his own tools simply because the employer knows that if the employee buys his own tools he will take better care of them and not lose them. If we impose on that employee the burden of buying his tools and do not allow him to deduct their cost from his income, we are discriminating. Our Income Tax Act discriminates in this way against a very large and necessary group in our type of civilization.

I suggest that we allow this proposal to pass, if only to jolt those senior civil servants, those mandarins, who are responsible in this area and to let them know that this House does not think that this discrimination against the man who works with tools should continue. I have a personal reason for speaking on this matter. I represent a rural area. The backbone of our small communities consists of mechanics who service industries in our areas. Too often they see others idling, enjoying the so-called benefits of unemployment insurance. The idlers come into their shops and say, "Why don't you get smart and go on unemployment insurance?" These mechanics, because they are badly needed, are never unemployed and therefore never take advantage of unemployment insurance benefits. In addition they must carry the burden of the cost of their tools. The fellow across the street who works in a law office does not pay for the materials with which he works; but the working man who works in the garage or machine shop must at present bear the full cost of his tools.

I hope that this grievance of this backbone of our work force can be eliminated, and that the minister will do so before the next budget. I hope, in the interests of humanity and fairness, that the House will not talk this proposal out. I hope it is implemented and that the minister will correct this injustice.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to take part in this debate—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Old reliable!

Mr. Blais: —and, contrary to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may think, I do not intend to speak on this bill until 6 o'clock.

Indeed, I wanted to indicate my support for the bill introduced by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour), because I feel this is a motion which must be adopted of necessity. In fact, I have already made recommendations and representations to the minister on the subject matter of this motion.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members who have already spoken about this bill are, for the most part, people who live in developing centers. When we consider that these include the hon. member for Regina East, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) we realize that this is indeed a motion of particular interest to the people of developing areas.

When I made those representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), Mr. Speaker, I was led by four considerations. The first was that the matter involved was a discrimination against workers in the north. Evidently in urban centres, the issue is that most of those workers are paid by industrialists, large companies which can deduct expenditures for tools.

Unfortunately, in the north we find skilled workers who go from a company to another because there is a shortage of work and they must travel with their tools. Of course, things are more difficult, because they are unable, through the companies which hire them, to deduct part of the cost of their tools. This stands to reason. I only have to give as example the forestry worker who has to use a power saw. Naturally he is not allowed to deduct his expenses to save a few dollars which the company which hires him could effectively do it.

The second thing that worried me was this, and no mention was made of it. When I made representations to the minister, I included transportation expenses in the list of deductions. Of course, these expenses are also included in deductions the member for Regina East appears to be attempting to justify. I also believe worker's transportation should be deductible.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, a number of small towns in my constituency have not enough jobs for the workers, so those have to look elswhere for work. Evidently they have to travel to find work in larger centres. I am thinking of a town like Sturgeon Falls, located in my riding, where lack of work forces people to go either to Sudbury or North Bay to find jobs. These workers are mechanics. They cannot deduct travel expenses. They have to live in Sudbury during the week and cannot deduct those expenses either. Clearly, these people finally tell their families: Since I may not deduct expenses, I am going to locate in the city. And by that they mean North Bay, Sudbury, Noranda or even Toronto or Winnipeg.

So they leave their hometown to locate in some larger centre, which reinforces a tendency to concentrate in cities. And so we have a depopulation of centres traditionally recognized as needed for the continuation of the Canadian way of life. This has not been taken into account. Within the context of the overall motion before us, I believe such considerations should be brought to the minister's attention.

[Mr. Blais.]

[English]

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) indicated that this House should express its views, evidently in this particular context. I have been in the chamber since the beginning of this discussion, and there is no doubt that members of all parties who have expressed their views agree that this resolution merits very serious study.

The question of discrimination was pointed out. I am a practising lawyer. I am allowed to deduct my practice expenses, including law books, from my income. A doctor is entitled to depreciate his equipment, as is a dentist. However, a common mechanic—and I agree with other members that a mechanic should be included in the classification we are considering—is not able to do that because he is an employee. He cannot deduct his expenses such as tools, travel expenses and room and board. I think the government should give immediate consideration to those particular measures.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it always amazes me that with two or three minutes left in an hour's debate, the members who favour the motion having spoken for 57 minutes, someone who might have something to say is cut down to only two or three minutes and there is shame involved for taking that particular stand.

We have before us today a motion that has been advanced very seriously by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Balfour). He was very fair in pointing out there is nothing novel about this motion. I believe the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), who is not here at the moment—and I do not make anything of that—has introduced this motion, or something similar to it, in the past. Private members' hour is an avenue that is used from time to time to express something that should be given consideration by the government. The hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) read from the minutes of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which, I believe, sat between 1968 and 1972. He indicated that the view being presented by the hon. member was one that had won acceptance of that particular committee, but the committee was honest enough to point out that there were administrative pitfalls.

There would be a form of discrimination if this were allowed to mechanics who are employees. I am not nitpicking about mechanics, including the other trades referred to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale). However, there would be a discrimination against other employees.

I was surprised when the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) said that as a lawyer he could write off the cost of his law books. I am sure he has a very large practice. Now that he is a member of parliament, he may have to hire a lawyer who would be an employee. That employee would not be allowed to deduct the expense of the books he brings into the particular business.

That is the distinction that is made here. Maybe the distinction is out of line. Maybe there should not be that kind of distinction. But how far do we open the gates? Do we say that no longer in the income tax law are we going to distinguish between the individual who is employed and the individual who is the employer, and there is no difference between the forms of income that are earned? The entrepreneur sticks out his neck, gets a business going, spends money on equipment and material, creates jobs and hires people. The people for whom he has created those jobs, in the final analysis, would derive the same benefit as the entrepreneur. This motion loses sight of that.

Recognizing there is some merit in this argument, the government went part of the way with the 3 per cent or $150 deduction. Speaking personally, I do not think it is enough. I believe it should be higher. If the opposition had not spoken so long, I would have been able to expand on that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I deeply regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the hour appointed for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1974

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND ESTABLISH ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp that Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was referring to our own provincial historian and to some of her comments on the negotiations which brought us into confederation. There is one more interesting reference I wanted to add from her history. She refers to all six of the members of parliament heading down to Ottawa for their first federal parliament. That is all there were at that time. The population was not very large, because Miss Ormsby, my historian, says:

> We learned that provincial representatives had endeavoured to enlarge their representation by over-estimating the population of their province.

Things have changed a great deal in that regard since entry into confederation. Yet there are other things which have not changed. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) made an eloquent plea for a non-partisan approach to the bill. Yet this, of course, had everything to do with politics and one is suspicious of the terms the far western provinces are getting under the proposals for redistribution. He described them at the beginning of his address as new and equitable. New, certainly, but equitable, never. Here I differ from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and his simplistic explanation of the bill. There are not three groups involved, there are five, because the bill in its totality covers the territories.

Mr. Sharp: It does not cover the territories.

Mr. Johnston: It covers the very small provinces, the small provinces, establishes a category of medium provinces, and goes on to categorize a group of large provinces. All these things must be taken into consideration as one looks at the bill and the table showing representation in the House of Commons, because the public in the west will consider them all when looking at the share allotted to the West, and will ask questions about it which are difficult to explain, particularly in our province of British Columbia where the growth is very rapid.

I should like to read from an article by Nick Hills, writing in the Vancouver Province of Wednesday, October 23, in which he speaks of the rapid growth of our population and the concern it brings to the province. He says:

> The tide of migration into B.C. from other lands and other regions of this country has become so strong that the province has virtually lost control of its future growth.
> Between 1970 and 1974, the province's population shot up by 12.5 per cent, more than double the national increase of 5.4 per cent. But between 70 and 80 per cent of this increase was beyond control of British Columbians.
> Regional planners for the Greater Vancouver district now estimate that more than three-quarters of this area's population rise is being caused by migration. They have broken it down this way: 40 per cent immigration, 40 per cent migration, and only 20 per cent births.
> Planners now think it is close to 80 per cent and could go even higher unless some very tight controls are clamped on the movement of immigrants both outside and inside this country.
> The immigration problem for B.C. is two-fold. Not only has this province become the second most popular landing place in the country, it also seems to have become the most popular second option for immigrants who originally planned to settle permanently in Ontario or Quebec. On top of this, more and more Canadians are moving here from other provinces.
> The apparent decision by Ottawa to stabilize the annual national immigrant total at 200,000 dismays government officials at all levels in B.C., because, in their opinion, it simply perpetuates a situation that is already intolerable.

● (2010)

Those are some words in regard to population growth in my province, which is beyond the control of the government and the people of British Columbia because that lies in jurisdictions that are elsewhere; yet there is one area where something could be done about it, and that is in the area of representation in this chamber.

We hear a great deal about western separatism, and one of the reasons is that there is that feeling there is because their voices are not heard sufficiently in this chamber. That feeling arises partially because the people know they do not have as many voices in this chamber as they would have a right to if redistribution in this country was carried out on an equitable basis. This is the cause of great concern for the people of my province.

The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is delighted that the bill has no reference to the Senate or to senators. I suggests there should be such reference, because again one of the scandals of representation in this country is that the province of British Columbia has only six senators, the same number it had when it entered confederation. No increase in number has been made. While the number of senators serves for some provinces as a floor below which the number cannot go in terms of representation in this parliament, the Senate certainly has a very useful purpose.

I have the suspicion that certain provinces may regret it if this bill eliminates a reference to the Senate. I would suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should use some of his great talent, erudition, experience and wisdom to suggests ways and means of altering that organization rather than to so cheerfully eliminate it, because in respect of the representation of the west we certainly do not want to lose six senators, and we would willingly have a considerable number more.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We would be better off if we lost the whole works.

Mr. Johnston: I cannot agree with the hon. member in that comment as I still feel the Senate can serve some useful purpose. I feel we should discuss that purpose so we can continue to count them among representatives, particularly when we in British Columbia and the western provinces are shamefully shortchanged in representation.

There are simple remedies for some of the problems that exist in the other place, and one of the quickest and simplest would be to allow the provinces to name at least half their senators. I think this would have a marvellous effect and impact on that other place.

One thing we should remember when talking about population growth is that there is always a lag in redistribution, and we can see it developing again. The census is held in years that end with the figure one, that is 1961, 1971 and so on, but redistribution is seldom accomplished until the middle of what is the decennial census. So a province that is growing rapidly goes through one or two elections before the change finally comes; then there is another census and another lag.

On the other hand, the lag, of course, benefits the province that is losing population or that is growing slowly. For the province that is growing fastest of all the loss is important. Again this is something that needs to be considered when looking at the figures for the province of British Columbia, and they are not particularly generous.

There are a great many areas in which this bill can be opposed, and the party I represent is opposing the bill, not simply for the sake of British Columbia, but for a whole variety of other factors, some of which have already been mentioned. One is the extremely rapid growth in the membership of this institution as laid out in the bill, which may rise to over 300 very swiftly. Certainly I expect that many of us will still be around, if the proposal goes ahead, to see the day when the parliament of Canada will number over 300 members, and perhaps more than that.

I should like to concentrate in my remarks on areas that affect the province I represent. One must consider the geographical factors in a province like British Columbia, which is the most mountainous of them all and which has vast areas that are scarcely mapped as yet. Because of the difficulty of communications links between other parts and the mountain valleys in which the residents live, they have built up their own distinctive character. If you link too many of them into a single constituency you end up with a constituency which is very difficult to serve, no matter who represents it.

I have the feeling that there is opposition to this bill from both sides of the House and from all parties that have representatives here from the province of British Columbia. I would find it strange if the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson), or the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall), could find much to support in this bill. I realize that not all those members are in the House this evening, but I am sure they must be concerned about this bill as they all have very large constituencies with all the problems I have mentioned in terms of transportation and communication.

The city of Kamloops is one of those areas that is growing extremely rapidly, and by the time we get around to the next election, if not around to the time redistribution is ready, it will in itself deserve one member without that vast hinterland that now surrounds it. The constituency of Skeena, which is larger than many of the provinces of this land, is another one whose growth will probably take off in spectacular fashion, and the representative from there will know what I talk about when I speak of the lag which comes from redistribution.

If one looks strictly at the mathematical table presented to us, one might be inclined to have some sympathy with the large provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and one might credit them with some restraint in the formula which sets their average constituency population figure higher if one did not know that the province which has the largest figure of all is British Columbia, especially when it moves into what is known as the large province category according to the table in the bill before us.

I think we should move with extreme caution in this regard as we must remember that the significant column of figures in the table is the one which shows redistribution under present rules. It shows that under the present rules the number of members from British Columbia would increase from 23 to 26. When the committee on privileges and elections was studying this during the last parliament, I was not a member of parliament—almost, but not quite. I regret that even more keenly now because I would certainly have liked to be here when the initial discussions on the amalgam formula were taking place.

If we look at the redistribution under the proposed recommendation we find the number for B.C. is 27. If we go back to the committee we see that the figure was 26. Somehow one seat seems to have been added in the interim. I suspect it has been added to forestall the criticisms of some of the members from British Columbia on that side of the House who have taken the time to see just what is in store for them.

I am sure when this bill is presented and argued in the province which I represent the people of that province will be told that they are being given four new members. But we should remember that the present rules were to give them three new members. The amalgam formula as now interpreted adds only one. It should not be forgotten that the three new members would have been from a house of 264, whereas the one extra is from a house of 280. So we have gone backwards instead of forwards. One can read over and over again statistics about our population increase and realize that we are gaining faster than any province in this country; but when it comes to representation in this House we are losing out, and we lose out under the amalgam theory as well because we are counted as an intermediate province in this redistribution, proposed to follow the 1971 census. The 29 members we could have expected as a small province have been cut in half by the formula. As I have said, one seems to have been added along the way out of a total house of 280. I do not object to the rider—it is not in the bill—which I realize will give an additional seat to the Northwest Territories.

I listened, as I am sure did other hon. members, to the eloquent address by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth). He described that vast constituency of his. Having a vast constituency of my own, I know how many times more vast his problems are in relation to mine. However, the additional seat adds to the total whether or not it is contained in the bill. I realize the bill really does not deal with the territories; they will be dealt with separately. By 1981, which date will be upon us soon, according to the formula laid down here we are supposed to become a large province. Let us have no sense of false pride in British Columbia, great and beautiful as it is.

There is nothing to be gained by playing games with the big people here, because the advantage in seats comes from adopting a low posture. We have many problems in terms of local geography and distance from this place. All members from British Columbia know what it means to spend days on a plane and at airports. They know what it means to have to wait to take off, not knowing whether or not a flight will arrive on schedule. Then there is the jet lag. I am sure the performance of our members of parliament is as brilliant as that of any group, and yet coming and going we are faced with the problem of jet lag. There are problems of representation which are distinct to a province on the Pacific coast, and I suppose also the province of Newfoundland, although it does not have the same rapidly increasing population.

By 1981 we are expected to be a large province, even though the percentage figure of the province would not give British Columbia one third of the population of the province of Ontario. I would hope at the committee stage in respect of this bill there will be an amendment whereby the population figure that is used in respect of a change from a medium to a large province would be at least four and one-half million, so that this change would not come until the intermediate province became at least half the size of the largest province, be it Ontario or Quebec, at the time when the changeover is made.

The other provinces grow, but we grow more quickly. I think that is an important factor to remember. When we look at the figures published in respect of the 1981 redistribution we note that, if it were worked out on the basis of a small province, we would qualify for 38 seats. If we were to be an intermediate province, we would qualify for 34 seats. Then if we look at the table that is set out before us we find that we are offered 32 seats. If we look back at the original discussion we find that we were offered 30 seats. There has been a slight increase in respect of the proposals placed before us this evening; however, the figure is two instead of four or eight. Considering all the problems of representation I do not feel that is an adequate number.

It should be remembered that the large provinces are on either side of this national capital of ours. They have the great advantage of being right here in the middle. The problems we face as members from the far corners of this country are very different from the problems faced by members in the two large provinces surrounding the area which comprises the national capital.

So for all these reasons I feel we must oppose the bill. If we do the arithmetic for 1981 under the new rule, we find that Quebec rises to plus 11, Ontario to plus 16, and British Columbia to plus 4. It would seem to me that the bill has been designed with the thought in mind that somehow it would be dangerous if the most rapidly growing province ever in any way caught up with representation in this House. Therefore I personally oppose the bill for this reason. I suspect it will be the reason some speakers from the rapidly growing province of Alberta will oppose the bill. There are a great many reasons, including the suggestion that parliament should not grow to an unwieldy figure in a very short of time, which provide this party with sufficient evidence to oppose the bill presented to us this evening.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, early in 1973 the electoral boundaries commissions for the various provinces reported to the House with their recommendations for the new distribution in accordance with the legislation which existed at that time. As a result of the 1971 census it was now time to redistribute the seats in the House of Commons. However the electoral boundaries commissions did less than a satisfactory job in the way they divided up the various provinces.

Certainly in the province of Alberta, with which I am most familiar, the redistribution job can only be termed lousy. For example, they have constituencies such as Lethbridge, which is mostly rural, with a population of 97,000 and constituencies such as Calgary North, totally urban, with a population of 77,000. Clearly it does not make sense from the point of view of fair play or in terms of making it easier for members to communicate with their constituents, or vice versa. In fact it only makes sense if you realize that the city constituencies are more likely to swing with national trends, and if you are a party in power not represented too well in a particular province it is in your interest to have more urban than rural seats.

There were things wrong with the redistribution reports of the electoral boundaries commissions for other provinces as well. The fact that these reports were made gave members an opportunity to raise long standing grievances about the method of allocating seats between provinces. In particular, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfoundland were all to lose a seat. This is not the first time that Saskatchewan and Manitoba have lost seats. However, this loss represented a very substantial loss in terms of the numbers they had; it was one out of 13. Clearly these provinces were represented much more poorly, not in terms of the quality of their members because that is not the case—in fact, it is just the opposite—but in comparison with the Senate floor protected provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. The electoral boundaries commission for Nova Scotia in particular did away with the constituency of the then president of the privy council, so he was very receptive to the suggestion made by members on this side as well as his own members that the redistribution formula be set aside.

Mr. Benjamin: This is a non-partisan debate.

Mr. Andre: Yes, certainly. He was receptive to the proposal that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be asked to review the whole question of redistribution.

On July 5, 1973 Bill C-208 was brought in to set aside the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, and the matter was referred to committee. The bill passed committee on July 12 and was given third reading in the House on July 13. I mention those dates because in just two short weeks the whole matter of setting aside redistribution was handled by the House. Seven months later the matter of seeking a new redistribution method was brought to the committee, that is, on February 29, 1974. At that time the then president of the privy council presented some alternatives to the committee, and this took up the total time of the committee on that day. Two months later, on April 9, the committee had a meeting to discuss this redistribution method recommended by the president of the privy council, and that was the only discussion that that method was given. Essentially there has been no opportunity for members of the House to indicate their reaction to the government's recommendation, no opportunity for public debate, no opportunity for the media and for observers of parliamentary processes to react to that method or discuss it.

For that reason it seems to me highly inappropriate for the government at this time to bring in a bill calling for the implementation of a method which has had no analysis or discussion and to ask for the approval of the House. It would be irresponsible for us to grant the government's request. It is especially galling, and I wonder about the priorities of the government.

A week or two ago I received a letter concerning the Abbott Commission, a commission established to look at the question of facilities and space for parliament. It is a commission with representation from both sides of the House, the Senate and outside people. It has staff and an office, it will travel to hear witnesses, and in fact will undertake an extensive study of facilities for parliament. Surely the question of redistribution, of how many members we will have in the House and what the regional representation will be, as well as how well protected will be the small provinces, is at least as important as how many offices and committee rooms we will have.

[Mr. Andre.]

Mr. Andre: Surely the responsible thing to do, since we are now no longer in a minority position and have probably four years until the next election, and therefore ample time, to give the consideration, study and analysis which this matter deserves. It is far too important to be dealt with in what can only be described as a haphazard and offhand way. It would be irresponsible to zip this redistribution method through the House to the committee where the government can use its majority to jam it down our throats. I have been on enough committees to recognize that is a very real possibility.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) indicated in his speech that that is not the case. Well, his predecessor in that office told us that the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections would have ample opportunity to discuss this question, but how much opportunity did we have? We had one meeting—two if you count the one at which the government presented its point of view. We had only one and a half or two hours. I do not consider that ample time for discussion.

It has been suggested by the President of the Privy Council and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this bill may be as good as we can get. That is not true. Anyone with a modicum of imagination can come up with half a dozen alternatives that are superior.

Some hon. Members: Let us hear them.

Mr. Andre: In order to get these alternatives into a form in which they can be discussed, we will have to be provided with an opportunity, and it has not been provided.

An hon. Member: We had a parliamentary committee on the matter in the last parliament.

Mr. Andre: Do you know how often it met? It met for two meetings on this subject.

There is much that is wrong with the amalgam method, and I will get to it in some detail. First, I would like to quote from an editorial in the Calgary Herald of Saturday, November 30, which states in part:

> The bigger House of Commons plan for Canada will not accommodate Alberta's growing sense of urgency about the need to get fair treatment in Parliament . . .
> Albertans can be forgiven for not cheering. The bill will not do anything to alleviate a strong feeling that the structure of the House of Commons works against regional aspirations and interests. And, in fact, the bill will have the effect of reducing prospects of redressing the grievances of the West.
> Statistics tell the story. Of the 15 new seats planned for the Commons, Alberta stands to gain one; Ontario stands to gain seven. This is fair from a population distribution point of view, but won't reduce fears that the population strongholds of the country will continue using their numerical strength to raid Western resources. Without redistribution, Ontario alone has 88 MPs to represent the users of oil and gas, while Alberta has 19 MPs to represent this province's position as a major energy producer.

> By 1983, after a second stage expansion, the four western provinces stand to gain 16 additional seats, while Ontario and Quebec stand to gain 27 additional seats. Boosting the size of the commons beyond the 300 mark will do nothing to improve the decision-making process, and wont't help solve the lack of protection for minority interests.

It is difficult to question the principle of representation by population, yet rep. by pop. fails to support another cornerstone of confederation—the protection of regional interests and the allocation of resources to provinces. Certainly the cause of confederation is not served by a federal government which, under the guise of national interest, rides roughshod over the rights of provinces. This serves to foster the development of dual loyalties, and in some cases, sells the cause of the separatists.

The editorial continues in that tone, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to read it all but the penultimate paragraph is worth noting. It reads:

Canada has gone through great turmoil in recent years debating the concept of making confederation flexible enough to accommodate two nations. With this issue, still unresolved to anybody's satisfaction, Canada is moving rapidly to the day when the federal system may have to become flexible enough to accommodate ten "nations".

Someone in the New Democratic Party made a remark about the newspaper being the dinosaur, or something along those lines. To indicate that this feeling is shared by other Westerners and is a non-partisan issue, I should like to quote from a publication issued by the Edmonton Journal entitled "What Does the West Want?" which contains an article by Izzy Asper, the former Liberal leader in Manitoba. He begins by saying:

Manitoba and the other western provinces have lived under a system of economic colonialism to eastern Canada for over 100 years and this cannot be allowed to continue.

Mr. Asper goes on to describe some of the economic disparities and then continues:

While the reorientation of federal policies is much needed in the shorter run, the complete renegotiation of confederation is the ultimate long term solution to the problem of the economic costs that the present federal system imposes on western Canadians.

Western Canadians want a truly federal union where regions are properly identified and guaranteed a certain basic sovereignty and political and economic equality, both in relation to each other and in their representations within the central government, and where distinct cultures are treated with the dignity and given the equality and rights which they deserve.

A truly federal parliament must have a radically reformed Senate—a Senate assigned significant areas of responsibility. It should have authority over matters of national importance and should provide a just and democratic representation for the underpopulated regions of Canada. Thus, a reformed elected Senate must give each province the same number of seats. This is the only method to alleviate the problems of regional disparity that currently exist.

Later in the same article Mr. Asper writes:

Western Canada's weakness within the country results directly from the fact that Canada's parliamentary system is not truly a federal institution. Reform of the parliamentary structure designed to provide less populated areas with just representation in a reformed confederation must be considered as a major priority for all western provinces wishing to become partners within a strong federal union.

That is the view of the Liberal who is more than a casual observer; in fact, he is leader of a provincial party. I think his advice makes good sense.

Not only does the amalgam method of redistribution presented in this bill not address itself to that problem, but the committee of the House of Commons which was supposed to discuss this issue did not have an opportunity to raise points like this. It is improper to ask this House to approve in principle a method which essentially has not been discussed by a committee of the House, has not been publicly debated, has not been thoroughly analysed, and which does not address itself to any of the fundamental problems.

The first thing wrong with the amalgam method is that it calls for an unlimited increase in the number of members in the House of Commons. This is folly, to say the least. It will cost the Canadian public a lot more money to maintain this institution and, more important, will reduce the effectiveness of members of parliament. An individual member of parliament would have less influence in a 300 member House or a 350 or 400 member House than in a 264 member House or even a 200 member House. If we are going to change the size of the membership of the House, we should probably decrease it.

On several occasions the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) has indicated a desire to examine methods of making the House more efficient and we agree that we must find better ways to handle the country's business. We feel it equally, if not more, important, however, to find ways of making the House more effective. This redistribution method is not going to achieve either of these objectives; what it will do is increase the authority of the executive branch of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: What it will do is increase the authority of the already overgrown Prime Minister's office and the already overgrown Privy Council office.

In his remarks the President of the Privy Council indicated that the government wanted to increase the number of members so that each member would have fewer constituents, making for easier communication. I think the duties of a member of parliament fall into two classes, Mr. Speaker; he is a legislator performing his duties in the House of Commons, and he is an ombudsman or, as one of my colleagues said, a second rate social worker. A member's responsibility toward his constituents is very important, but rather than increase the number of members it would be better to improve the staff and facilities available to present members. It is inconsistent with our responsibility as legislators to suggest that we would be better if there were more of us. In fact, we would be less effective. The constituency office system introduced last year was a step in the right direction, and as populations grow we should expand that type of service.

There is another problem with this amalgam method which was referred to in the article by Izzy Asper from which I quoted.

● (2050)

The bill does not address itself to preserving the federal system of government in Canada. Recently newspaper articles and television and radio programs have all made clear that, increasingly, the federal-provincial conference has become the forum in which we want to discuss important national problems. We do not discuss them so much in the House of Commons, partly because of the diminished authority of the various regions of Canada. It has become increasingly clear to the people of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and other provinces that it is better to let provincial representatives deal with their problems than refer them to members of parliament.

I do not think that it is desirable to foster the idea in Canada that people in regions remote from the capital may obtain redress of grievance only through their provincial representatives. I believe in a strong federal state. Unless we make parliament a truly federal parliament and reform the Senate it is increasingly likely that Canada will be balkanized and become a country composed of semi-independent states. I do not look forward to that condition but I should be irresponsible in not considering that possibility, especially as we are considering redistribution.

Third, I shall vote against this bill because I contend its provisions amount to gerrymandering. Under the amalgam method proposed to the committee by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), the average number of voters in constituencies in provinces whose population is under 1,500,000 is to be smaller than the average number in the constituencies of the other provinces of Canada. I do not disagree with that concept. The President of the Privy Council also suggested that the average size of constituency populations in Ontario and Quebec is to be greater than the average size of constituency populations in the rest of Canada. I think that is a reasonable philosophy. He said also that there is to be a third category of province which will include Alberta and British Columbia initially, and later Alberta, and the constituency populations in those provinces are to be of an intermediate size. What he suggested sounded good; it sounded like a suggestion which we could buy.

Then he produced his formula, or the arithmetic behind his philosophy. By coincidence, I am sure, Alberta and British Columbia, the two intermediate provinces, ended up with having the largest average constituency populations in the country. I am sure this happened by coincidence when one remembers that these two provinces in the period 1972-74 had only four Liberal members representing them in this House. When one considers the much greater number of Progressive Conservative and NDP members those provinces sent to Ottawa, it becomes most difficult, even for the most generous-minded, to escape the conclusion that the minister's proposal involves gerrymandering.

In the next following election, British Columbia returned more Liberals to Ottawa. Those members examined this redistribution proposal and said things in the province had changed. The government said, "We will need to take that into consideration." It then considered the formula under which British Columbia was to be an intermediate province, and it said to the members from British Columbia, "You may now have the privilege of representing what we consider a large province." Incredibly—and this was only possible because the Liberal members from British Columbia had been newly elected—those members accepted the government's proposal. They are getting hosed, but they accept what the government is doing.

If the government is insisting, as it says it is, on approaching this question in a non-partisan way and saying that the smaller provinces shall have smaller than average sized constituencies and the larger provinces larger than average sized constituencies, and that certain provinces shall be considered as intermediate sized provinces, then, for goodness sake, why did it not bring forward a proposal which will do just that, instead of trying to "con" us into accepting a proposal which is nothing short of gerrymandering?

Mr. Woolliams: And political manoeuvring.

Mr. Andre: For example, Alberta has 20 per cent of the population of Ontario and British Columbia has, perhaps, 25 per cent. If the government had said that constituency sizes in the intermediate provinces shall be as large as the average size of constituencies in both, large and small provinces taken together, the result would be this. Alberta would be represented by 22 seats, and British Columbia by 29. So even while claiming to be non-partisan, even while saying it will take into account regional interests in Canada, the government cannot resist putting the boots to Alberta and British Columbia. I do not think that the President of the Privy Council can ask this House to approve that kind of proposal. Certainly for those reasons I cannot vote for this bill.

Mr. Benjamin: What is your reason, then?

Mr. Andre: I could explain it to the hon. member in one syllable words three times, and he still would not understand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question. Did I understand him to say that his calculation results in Alberta's having a constituency population larger than that of Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. Andre: That is right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the hon. member not aware that the bill specifically says that this shall not happen, and that the calculations work out to about 80,000 per constituency for Alberta and 83,000 for Quebec?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will not argue procedure with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), or theology, but I will argue points of arithmetic. On the basis of the redistribution method that was proposed to the committee, I indicated—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: Just a moment—

An hon. Member: Stick to the facts. You are suggesting something new.

Mr. Andre: No, Mr. Speaker. The amendment I am speaking about says this: If an intermediate province is hosed, it is given the privilege of being considered as a large province. That is what the minister's suggestion entails. On that basis the average constituency population in Alberta is to be 81,400; in Ontario it is to be 81,000 and in Quebec 80,400. So Alberta constituencies are to be larger than those in Quebec.

● (2100)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, looking at the table and looking at the bill, it states that no province, not one of the other nine, shall have a constituency average greater than that of Quebec. In making any calculation you have to take that into account. Looking at the table given today by the government House leader, I find that Alberta has a population of 1,628,000. It has 20 seats, which works out at about 80,000 per constituency. Quebec, with a population of 6,028,000 has 75 seats. That works out to about 83,000 per constituency. The hon. member had better go back to school.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the 1971 census shows Alberta with a population of 1,627,900. You divide that by 20. That is not too difficult; just drop the zero and divide by two. You get 81,400 which is 1,000 more per constituency than the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member's arithmetic is wrong, Mr. Speaker, completely wrong.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) a tutorial on arithmetic later. At the moment he is inaccurate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: He is also inaccurate about the amendment. All the amendment says is that if the formula which is used for the intermediate or small provinces happens to give an average constituency population larger than Quebec, it may be treated like a large province. On that basis, British Columbia gets an extra seat, Alberta does not. We still end up with the largest constituency population in the country, as does British Columbia.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not so.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to table some arithmetic if it would help the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre understand. The fact of the matter is that all of this arithmetic which has been cited is galling to anyone with a sense of fair play or with half a brain. We were told the government was coming out with a method that would give us some favoured treatment because we only had 20 per cent of the population of the large central provinces. We were told that this method of redistribution would give us a little better treatment. However, if you look at the formula that has been proposed, that is not the case at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The Liberals have been less than honest and less than forthright in their presentation of this bill. They provided no opportunity for members of this House to discuss this bill. They provided no opportunity for public discussion of the redistribution method. In fact, they are simply using the very legitimate arguments and concerns of members from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfoundland to improve the position of the Liberal party within the country.

Mr. Goyer: Saskatchewan? Thanks.

Mr. Sharp: Thank you very much.

Mr. Andre: If this is damaging to the country and damaging to federalism, they apparently do not care.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: You have them all worked up.

Mr. Andre: If you have a comment, make it loud enough so I can hear it or keep it down. There are a number of reasons why this bill should be opposed. First, contrary to government promises, there has been insufficient examination of the method. Second, it calls for unlimited growth of the House of Commons, which I am sure the people of Canada do not want. It will be detrimental to the efficency and effectiveness of this House. It will serve only to increase the authority of the executive branch of the government and to diminish the authority of the legislative branch.

This amalgam method is a movement away from the protection of the small provinces. Under the existing method, the small provinces have 22 per cent of the seats and would retain roughly that proportion. If the proposed method is accepted, the proportion of seats would drop to 18 per cent within the next 25 years. Therefore, this method in fact moves away from protecting the small provinces. It is not consistent with protecting a strong federal union.

Fourth, it is gerrymandering. The government has developed a method which ends up with Alberta and British Columbia having the largest constituency population. It is part of the never ending stream of moves which goes a long way toward explaining western alienation and a whole lot of problems associated with it. This method does not address itself to the fundamental problems of a federal system within Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: What would you do?

Mr. Andre: If you will give us an opportunity, we will tell you. We have a multitude of proposals. We have been discussing the bill in principle and this bill must be opposed by anybody who has any principles.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, discussions regarding redistribution always start out with ideological and philosophical statements.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Is the hon. member rising on a question or is he rising to make a speech?

Mr. Wenman: To make a speech.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding he was rising on a question. There has not been a speaker from this side since the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) made his presentation earlier today. I think there should be representation from this side as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): May I say to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) that the Chair looked to his right. No member stood in his place. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) stood and was recognized. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West has the floor for the purpose of making a speech.

Mr. Wenman: Mr. Speaker, thank you for that very correct and fair ruling. As I was saying, discussions usually start on a rather ideological and philosophical base.

When talking about redistribution, people talk about the interest of Canada. They talk about objectivity and fair play. It usually does not take too long to get down the power block plays and individual self-interest. It seems we did not even get started to discuss the philosophy, and matters of high intent. Instead, a bill was presented on the basis of pragmatic parochialism and self-interest. Speaking on the bill in the current Canadian parliament is, indeed, frustrating, knowing that as I stand to speak on the things that are wrong with this bill, these same factors, assure the passage of the measure and continued disproportionate representation to Western Canada, and in particular to British Columbia.

As the member for Fraser Valley West, I can stand in my place in the House of Commons and speak about inequitable freight rates, the flooding of the Fraser River, or the attack by the federal government on provincial resource rights. But once again, of what significance will it be when you are speaking about these critical problems to a government that recognizes that it can get elected—and the last election validates this—without the western vote? We bemoan the fact that a government can be produced almost solely from central Canada. We are concerned that this is a serious blow to national unity, and yet by simply recognizing this fact we are, in effect recognizing the regional character of Canada, and, more important we are making an indirect argument for equitable regional representation.

Western Canadians would accept economic equalization much more readily if Eastern Canadians would accept equalization of representation for Western Canadians. Most of those who have spoken in the debate to this point have recognized that the West has not had its fair share of representation of terms of numbers in the House of Commons, both now and under the current proposals. One simply has to take note that it takes 3.7 B.C. votes to equal one Prince Edward Island vote in terms of straight proportional representation. But this is only one side of the question. Certainly nobody wants to deny Prince Edward Island or any other small province their share of representation simply because they are not growing. The idea of redistribution is not to reward growth but to do all we can to ensure equitable treatment for the various parts of this vast and diversified country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wenman: In other words, what we want to do is to consider the overall good of the country, rather than solely preoccupying ourselves with mathematical equality. Equalization of representation relative to regionalization is as valid a concept as representation by population. If we were to divide Canada into its natural five or six regions this would provide each region of Canada with between 46 and 53 members per region. While I realize the pragmatic improbability of British Columbia and the Yukon region receiving approximately 46 to 53 seats, and a need to compromise representation by population, the compromise between regional representation and representation by population, as it appears in this bill, is totally against the interest of British Columbia.

[Mr. Wenman.]

Western Canada has quietly accepted economic equalization, Well, perhaps not so quietly of late.

Mr. Benjamin: What do you mean by economic equalization?

Mr. Wenman: I mean the situation whereby Western Canada supports the confederation of Canada economically, particularly British Columbia and Alberta, as "have" provinces. We do not object to this too strongly. However, in the light of legislation before the House, as well as historic Western discrimination and over-compromise on the part of Western Canada, it is time for Eastern Canada to recognize Western Canadian and, particularly, British Columbia demands for equalization of representation as well as economic equalization.

From my point of view, a similar sized, or even smaller sized, House of Commons with more effective individual M.P.'s would be the best concept to ensure efficient and effective democratic processes. Before we start legislating grand schemes to increase the size of the House—and is there really a limit once that starts—perhaps we should concentrate on making what we have here, and what we do here, more effective.

It is typical Liberal aphorism that quality comes with quantity; that to deal with a problem you first think in terms of quantity. Do we really want or need more representation? Does more representation mean better representation? Personally, I doubt it. The opportunities to speak and participate as an M.P. are already considerably limited through the appropriation of the limited time available for the day.

We often lament the fact the legislature is on the decline in the twentieth century while the executive is becoming increasingly more dominant. We see this most clearly in terms of power and responsibility when comparing political executives and senior civil servants with M.P.'s who are not in the cabinet.

But this disparity is manifested in another way also, perhaps an even more important way, since it penetrates to the very root of what democratic government is all about. This is the area of information and expertise. An unfortunate development in the legislature's decline has been the increasing disparity in expertise and knowledge between those who are part of the executive and those who are not. This is critically important because it tends to undermine the day to day accountability of ministers to the members of parliament, a development that threatens to render ineffective not only the opposition but parliament as well. Such steady attenuation of accountability cannot be tolerated in a democracy, and the bill before us continues to atone the consolidated power of the executive to grow.

As any non-executive member of the Canadian parliament knows, information and expertise is the single most important thing a member needs to be effective. Accountability in government is all but impossible without it. But, at the same time, as most members are only too aware, the technical facilities and resources available to the ordinary M.P. are dismally inadequate. They are so inadequate that one sometimes wonders how a member is able to deal with a question or policy in any but the most superficial way.

The bill before us is an example. For example, there is argument between members about arithmetic. There is argument about the meaning of the clauses. These differences arise partly because opposition members on the back benches do not have access to adequate resources of expertise and information.

Very definitely one of the things we need is to keep the House as small as possible, or in fact smaller than it is. I would have the political courage to stand up and suggest that we divide the riding in my area, making the riding smaller, and I will fight for one of those seats. At least let us consider the suggestion.

I will vote against this bill as I do not believe it is in the interest of Canada to expand the size of the House of Commons. It is my opinion also that this bill has been conceived in faulty and weak philosophical premise, not in the interests of Canada. It is also an attempt at regionalism that British Columbia is named as a middle-sized province, and is little more than an effort to thwart the obvious rights of British Columbia in respect of equitable representation.

Representation by population concepts once again are discriminatory against British Columbia, in particular, relative to the smaller provinces. It is not in the interests of Canada to expand the size of this House, and I have grave concerns and reservations that we have started in the wrong way. We should be forgetting municipal and provincial boundaries and looking instead toward the regions of Canada. If we were to assure equitable regional representation in a smaller House, the House of Commons of Canada would be more efficient and effective in accomplishing the democratic processes necessary to carrying this country forward.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there has been comment to the effect that there has not been much time to debate this particular subject. Let me remind hon. members that when the subject of redistribution became a factor in the public eye it was debated quite hotly as to whether the mechanisms then existing were appropriate to the provision of the kind of representation in Canada we wanted. This reached culmination when the government brought in, with by-partisan support, the bill to disband the operations of the Electoral Boundaries Redistribution Act. This was done because members from all sides of the House felt the existing system was not competent.

When that bill went through the House there was discussion about the kind of redistribution system people would like to see. There was discussion in the committee about that and then the government came back with five proposals which were laid before the House, briefly debated and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In that committee a proposal was put forward by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), known as the Ritchie proposal. This amounted to an increase of three seats for Ontario and three for B.C. This was in addition to the five proposals which the government put forward.

The committee very quickly came to the realization that the two proposals which had the most merit from its point of view was the Ritchie proposal and the amalgam method. The committee did not complete its work, although I believe it was on the verge of making a decision between these two proposals when the election intervened. After the election there were consultations between the leaders of the parties and it was decided that, because the committee had almost come to a decision between these two, it was not necessary to refer the matter back to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, that instead the government should bring down the bill based on the amalgam method.

An hon. Member: It is not true.

Mr. Reid: I want to repeat that this was negotiated with the various parties, that it was clearly understood that this is what should happen, and that it was being done on the basis of the very widespread public debate which had preceded that decision. It may well be that many members feel they have not had much of an opportunity to participate in the debate before. I can only say that there has been plenty of opportunity, and that is the only comment one can make about it.

An hon. Member: When and where?

Mr. Reid: I have discussed already, in answer to the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), the procedures we went through, the opportunity there was for public participation, and the opportunities there were for people to present other alternatives to the committee. In point of fact, when we were at the committee stage there was only one proposal put forward, other than what the government proposed, and that was the Ritchie proposal.

An hon. Member: We only had two meetings.

Mr. Reid: The Ritchie proposal had sufficient merit that members of the committee were prepared to consider it and the amalgam method. Had other members come forward with other suggestions and other mechanisms, I am sure there would have been a longer debate in the committee. But they did not.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member says "nonsense". I am describing what happened. Whether hon. members agree with what happened is not for me to say. What I am describing is the process that took place, the decision that was taken as a result of the debate that went on in the House between the parties, all of which led to the decision to proceed with this bill. As I say, all the parties were fully informed. Whether your caucus was informed is something I cannot say. I can say that we had a full discussion about it, and I am sure the same thing happened in other parties.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) to the Abbott Commission. It was established because of the report brought down in this House in 1970, I believe, called the Beaupre Report. The Beaupre Report was to the effect that the duties of members of parliament were expanding and therefore something had to be done about facilities. The government took over the Confederation Building to provide additional space and staff, but it then became apparent that when the government began to expropriate the rest of Wellington Street this would not be satisfactory and it would be advisable to bring the public as well as the House of Commons into the procedure.

That is what the Abbott Commission was all about. It was designed to try to provide additional ways in which members of parliament could be more effective, and it looked into the staffing and facilities available to members. The Abbott Commission had nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. Andre: But the subject of the Abbott Commission reference was at least as important as the subject of this bill.

Mr. Reid: The subject matter of this bill is a method of redistributing parliamentary seats as between provinces and regions in Canada. Let me say at the outset that there is no one satisfactory method of satisfying everybody. This is a blunt fact of Canadian geography, and it is a blunt fact of distribution of parliamentary seats.

Mr. Woolliams: Would you permit a question?

Mr. Reid: Certainly.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says that the Abbott Commission had nothing to do with the increase in the size of this House. Does that mean that when the Abbott Commission came up with the suggestion that we need more staff and more office space—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a question?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

An hon. Member: It just takes him a little longer than others.

Mr. Woolliams: I think it is a very important question, and it is a question, with great respect. If the Abbott Commission came up with a recommendation for more staff and facilities for members, would that not cost the taxpayers a lot more money, particularly when you consider an increase in the size of the House?

Mr. Reid: Of course, the answer to that is that if we increase the staff for members of parliament, that is going to increase the cost to the taxpayers as well. The point of the amalgam method is that nobody pretends, least of all the government, that it will satisfy all regions, all areas, all provinces and all constituencies. Obviously it is not possible to do that.

We have many problems. We have a number of provinces that have historical floors in respect of representation, and we have a law which prohibits the reduction of that representation. We cannot transfer enough seats from one province to another. Because we have these floors across the country it means that if we continue with the existing method, the disruptions that would take place in representation as between provinces and regions would get completely out of whack. All you have to do is look at the existing system as it dealt with redistribution. It was so bad that members of parliament unanimously passed a bill bringing an end to the operations of the electoral boundaries commission because it was obviously not satisfactory.

The amalgam method attempts to deal with the reality of historical floors. It attempts to deal with the realities of very large provinces, and it tries to deal with the fact that some provinces are not small and not large but somewhere in between and are growing. Because we have the floors and peculiar forces of population growth and geography in Canada, we had to come up with a formula that would treat everyone reasonably equitably, but nobody exactly as fairly as one would hope in terms of population on the basis of representation by population.

We freely admit that this is not a method based on representation by population, but it goes some distance in that direction. It accepts the principle that floors do exist, and it accepts the principle of our history.

Mr. Andre: And the principle that Alberta votes PC.

Mr. Reid: We have to look at the amalgam method as it deals with all of Canada, not how it deals with my province or my riding. Does it provide for the reasonable distribution of seats across Canada? Does it provide for a reasonable distribution of seats based on constituency size? Does it still provide reasonable representation in the House of Commons for all Canadians?

• (2130)

It is on those judgments that one must consider the decision of the parliamentary committee when it looked at the proposals. It had before it the proposal of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). Of the six proposals it had, the committee came down on the side of two, that of the hon. member for Dauphin and the amalgam method. It is not clear which way the vote would have gone in the committee, but from the point of view of the government whatever proposal was voted on by the committee would have been accepted. The election intervened, and after negotiations and consultations with members on the other side and their leaders, the government came to the conclusion that the amalgam method was acceptable. There is no attempt by the government to impose upon the House of Commons a system which is repugnant. This is a system which has come to the fore because it is simply the best of the proposals we had before us at the time.

We have not heard since the last election any proposals that were largely different from those the committee had discussed and those the government had worked out for the benefit of the House of Commons. As I say, the only one was that provided by the hon. member for Dauphin. He deserves kudos for having done the work and for having put in the effort to come up with an alternative system.

It is now 9.30 Mr. Speaker. I want to remind hon. members that the House of Commons is very short of time. It has been suggested that it will take a considerable length of time before the petroleum bill goes through, and it will also take considerable time before the income tax amendments dealing with the resource industries go through the House of Commons. Both these bills continue to have priority and should be passed by December 31. Certainly that applies to the petroleum bill. I would remind hon. members that if we do not pass this bill by December 31 we will be in a position where the old electoral boundaries commissions will be re-established. We will operate on the basis of the previous allocation of seats as between provinces.

It would seem to me it would be impossible for the government and this House to bring down legislation to suspend the operations of those commissions again, simply because we allowed ourselves 18 months to come up with alternative proposals. Surely if there is no agreement on this proposal or on any other proposal it would strike me that the government would have no option but to permit the operation of the existing system. So I want to impress upon the members this problem we have in respect to time.

I commend the bill to hon. members not as the most perfect solution to the problem but as the most satisfactory one we have been able to find. When I say "we," I do not mean the government; I mean the members of this House of Commons taken in total. I want to emphasize that this is not a proposal the government has brought down, as in the case of the petroleum bill. It is a proposal that was widely discussed and debated in the House, and there have been opportunities for members to make their contributions.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Reid: If members have not had an opportunity to make their contributions I suggest it is because they have not been paying attention.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Would the hon. member who has just resumed his seat explain, with the urgency attached to this and other matters, why the government delayed so long convening this House after the election? That is blackmail.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the general question because I am not a member of the government, but I can say in respect of the bringing down of this bill that the bill was brought down after consultation with the party leaders. The government was given certain assurances as to the time it would take in the House. The government was told there was no pressing urgency in bringing it down and making it the first order of business, but that there ought to be no problems.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to say that I do not want the impression to be left in the minds of any members in this House or anyone else interested in this debate that the concern for reasonable representation in parliament of Canadians rests solely on the government side of the House. If that was the impression the parliamentary secretary was trying to leave with the House, then quite frankly I do not like it. It is certainly not in the spirit with which I intended to enter this debate.

Second, I do not like to be lectured by a parliamentary secretary, particularly this parliamentary secretary, with regard to understanding the importance of this piece of legislation. I do understand its importance. It is important not just to his constituents but to the constituents represented by all members of this House. The spirit with which we have entered this debate and continue with this debate is to find a basis, if we can, for proper representation of all Canadians, including Canadians in Kenora-Rainy River and in every part of this country.

I do not accept the suggestion that there was an understanding or agreement that there would not be discussion or debate in respect of this matter. The government House leader is here. Although I could be wrong in that regard, that was not my understanding. My understanding was that this matter would receive reasonable discussion. Perhaps all parties to the discussion in this regard are not here. Perhaps the best advocate the House has heard today with regard to having a full and complete committee discussion of this bill is the parliamentary secretary himself. He perhaps gave the best reason for the debate we ought to have on this bill, bearing in mind the time limit. I understand that if this bill is dealt with within a reasonable period of time there would be time to give it full and adequate consideration in the committee.

I wish to clear up another misapprehension the parliamentary secretary had. I refer to his reference to the Abbott Commission and the reference by the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) to that commission. The hon. member was not speaking along the lines the parliamentary secretary seemed to think. What he was saying was that the government, with our approval, had seen fit to appoint a commission of learned, experienced people both inside and outside the House headed by a great Canadian to examine at great length the physical facilities of the House of Commons, yet at the same time there seemed to be great haste in respect of the redistribution. The hon. member was saying that the matter was somewhat out of proportion, because surely the matter of redistribution is just as important as the question of further facilities for this House.

I realize there are others in this House who have paid greater attention than I have to the discussion in the early stages concerning the methods proposed by the government House leader. But my understanding is that with respect to the amalgam method there were only two committee meetings during which the matter was dealt with, and that is really of significant importance. I want to say to the government House leader—because this affects member from provinces that differ in terms of their needs and their wants—that we regard this bill as important. It is for that reason that I spoke to the government House leader earlier this afternoon, and I was pleased to have the discussion and the understanding that I did with him.

Dealing with the bill itself, the first thing that I want to say about it is that as a member of parliament, albeit not the most experienced, and having seen this parliament operate at least since 1972, I am not completely sure that the best interests, not only of Canadians but of members of parliament generally in the operation of the system, will be served by a method by which for the first time there will be no end to the number of members who may be in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Frankly I think that it is a question principle that the House, in a country of 23 million people, should now embark on a procedure which goes on and on, at least in principle, until it is stopped by legislation of this House. It is really a bad principle. There is more to the representation of people in parliament than merely numbers; there is an aspect of quality to representation. Quality will vary with the member, but the mere insertion of a numerical factor does not guarantee that the House will be a better place. The open end addition of members, however, will guarantee that parliament will become even more unwieldy than it is; that parliament, as a matter of sheer mathematics, will become more expensive than it is; and that it can become less responsive than it is today. These are guarantees as a result of the principle set forth in the bill.

As I said, there are more things to being a member of parliament, and as a member of parliament I would like to see improved, not just the number of my colleagues, but the work that all of us can do on all sides of the House. The first thing that I think is the hallmark of good representative government is that the representation not merely reflect the population but reflect the awareness of the fact that there is opportunity to gain knowledge of the operation of government by all members of the House. Not just for the sake of the member himself, but because our system of government has as its foundation the fact that there is always in the House, at least in principle but sometimes in fact, an alternate government. There is the principle that there ought to be men and women on all sides of the House who, subject to the doctrine of cabinet solidarity and secrecy, have equal knowledge. I do not think that our system today, which breathes and lives on orders in council, on press releases and on ministerial statements when the government decides to make them, leads to good representative government. I would like to see efforts made to adopt the principle of knowledge rather than the numerical principle, as I first mentioned.

Second, I believe that there should be power among members of parliament—all of them, not just in the opposition—to examine the way in which the executive branch, that branch of government which for better or worse is becoming more powerful in our community, conducts itself. I think that if any lesson has been brought home to me since I have come to this place, it is that the right of the private member, the backbencher, whether he sits to the right of Mr. Speaker or to his left, is being diminished. It has been diminished, I suppose, because that cannot help but happen in a very complex society. But it has been diminished as well because institutions within this institution have allowed this to happen, in fact have copped out. That has happened on both sides of the House. The real cause is to ensure that there is this ability in the backbencher of the House to examine and probe, no matter where he sits.

I think that we should have a committee structure that really functions—and that is perhaps more important than the number of members or the people they represent—one that will allow real investigation by private members, by the representatives of the people in the House, of the power of government and how it uses it. We should have a committee structure which is not partisan but which will follow in an evolutionary and continuing way the examination of the estimates and of the operations, expenditures and functions of each department of government, not just to embarrass or to delay but to improve. We do not have that here in the House and we are a long way from it. That is how I would like to see this parliament improved.

I think that the principle of the bill is based solely on the numbers aspect of representation, and in that sense the bill is narrow and is wrong. I am not one who would dare say, whether I believed it or not, that representation by population is not important. Of course it is important. But we should not let that catchword, that cliché, blind us to the importance of the functioning of the House, a House of a reasonable size, where there can be some informality in debate, in order to improve the representative quality that the public of Canada expects from us.

I do not think that the public is prepared at this time to endorse a blank cheque to cover the cost of the operation of parliament. If we pass this bill, that is exactly what they will have to do. Within this bill there are sufficient principles which would increase the number of members without limit. We do not approve of this and we have indicated that we intend to oppose this bill. We cannot accept the suggestion that this is the only way in which representation can be approached. We feel that it is not sufficient, in dealing with the problems of the people of Canada and their representation in the House, to say that we must now adopt for the first time a principle that has no end to it in terms of numbers.

We believe that there should be a form of protection for certain provinces which face a diminution in population, but we think there must be a balance between the two approaches. Having said that we cannot accept the open end principle and that we must accept the fact of Canadian life that there are certain provinces the representation of which is diminishing perhaps unfairly, we must in those circumstances vote against this bill. We will be voting against it on the grounds and in the hope that in the time remaining to us there will be sufficient discussion of the bill not only by members of parliament but by other interested bodies and learned writers in the country. It is important that the principles and ancillary aspects of this bill be recognized before the bill, or something like it if there is an amendment in committee, be put before the House for final disposition.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate hoping that I did not detect a suggestion of blackmail in the remarks of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). In a democratic country members of parliament are elected to speak for the people, and in this debate today I detected frustration. As a citizen I have known frustration for many years, and I know that many people feel that same frustration when they have a government over which they have no control.

We cannot support this bill, Mr. Speaker, primarily because it is an open ended bill. It is like a farmer going down the road with a truck which has lost the end gate and the grain is spreading all over the place. That is what is happening here. The government must make better use of the facilities already at their disposal rather than increase the membership of the House. Increasing the membership is just like spreading a lot of icing over a cake that has fallen to try and fill the holes.

The frustration I speak of is felt by a great many Canadians when they are trying to deal with the bureaucracy of government. The government tries to give the impression that it is caring for the people, but really every time a piece of legislation such as this is introduced it creates a heavier burden on them. The increase in membership of this House of Commons suggested in the bill could cost the taxpayers something in the neighbourhood of $1 million. I believe each member of parliament costs about $60,000 or $70,000 per year, so the increased cost of a larger membership is obvious. It does not mean better government, however. Just today in this House we heard member after member of the Privy Council say that he was responsible for a certain area or region of this country. That is not what democracy is about, Mr. Speaker. That tendency leads to a dictatorship and nothing short of it.

Since I have been a member of this House I have noticed that the government does not make use of the provincial governments. In fact, it tends to erode their authority. This also deprives the individual of the most advantageous government at the municipal level. I could list several programs that the present government has initiated, such as OFY, LIP and DREE, which could well be handled at the municipal level with the guidance of the provincial government. The present policy of the federal government is wrong and the people know it; that is why they become so frustrated with the administration at all levels.

Much time of members of parliament is taken up in dealing with the shortcomings of such programs as unemployment insurance, old age security and family allowances. These programs could be administered at the provincial level and perhaps some even at the municipal level. When the municipalities of the country hold their annual meeting, one of their major complaints is the lack of co-operation they receive from senior government; the provincial governments cannot give that co-operation until they have the authority from the federal government. I urge the government to give more authority to provincial and municipal governments for the administration of these programs. Certainly I believe that we must have a strong federal government, but that does not mean to say it should meddle in the business of provincial governments.

The bill before us proposes to increase membership of the House of Commons by 15 seats, and I imagine we could tolerate that over a period of time. But the bill also suggests 307 seats by 1981. We should consider the cost of this to the taxpayers. If they do not receive benefit from this extra cost their frustration will increase.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—EXPORT OF WATER TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF FORMER MINISTER'S POSITION ON EXPORT OF WATER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that we still do not have a consistent and clear statement of policy from this government on the very important question of the export of water. Back in early October when I delivered my maiden speech to this House, there was the clear implication from the hoots and snickers from back benches that all of my concern about the government's non-policy on the export of water was simply a figment of my imagination. When I brought up the contradictions of former Liberal ministers on this question, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) jibed that my assertion that the government had no policy regarding water export was simply not true.

● (2200)

Thinking this response odd, especially in light of the research that I have done on this subject, I asked the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) on October 18 whether she is in favour of the export of Canadian water to the U.S. As the minister responsible, she then enunciated government policy, which was a flat no, she was not in favour of the export of Canadian water. Contradicting herself two weeks later in response to another question, in which I again asked what the government's policy regarding water export was, she said, "We have no policy."

Seeing the gross confusion among senior cabinet officials, I thought perhaps I should try to get clarification once and for all. So today I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether or not he was in favour of the export of Canadian fresh water supplies for good hard cash, and he contradicted all of his ministers by answering "Yes".

I ask, is the answer yes, no, or maybe? I thought that when cabinet ministers spoke, they spoke after they had discussed positions in caucus and arrived at a unified decision. Apparently this is not so. I thought that the Prime Minister, as head of the government, would have the final say on what is happening. No wonder when I first raised the issue the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and their back bench noisemakers seemed nervous. Needless to say, I find this quite disturbing. It is time for clarification and leadership on this matter.

Setting aside the red herring issues whereby local arrangements between communities on two sides of the border share a singly developed local supply and the export of bottled water and other such products which incorporate water, such as wines and whiskies, Canada's waters should not now or ever be for sale.

It has frequently been claimed by those who see water export as a great economic opportunity that Canada has so much water and uses so little. Why not determine the obvious surplus, they say, and sell it for good hard cash? This suggestion was directed to the Prime Minister earlier today, and he concurred in it. That is amazing. I wonder how members of the cabinet can accept that position.

Newspaper accounts often credit this country with 25 per cent, some say even 40 per cent, of the world's fresh water resources. Such estimates are not merely misleading, they are inaccurate. Most of the world's water not found in the oceans or locked up in polar ice and glaciers is stored underground. Canada's over-all groundwater situation is not known with any degree of reliability, but what we do know is not especially promising. Too many of our northern lands are bared of soil, impregnated with permafrost and underlain with impermeable crystalline rock or saline formations to make probable much groundwater potential or to create great expectations, other than on a local scale. Where Canada does excel is in its lake area, which is perhaps greater than that of any other country in the world. Lakes are invaluable for regulating the flow of rivers to the sea, but ours are, for the most part, the legacy of an ice age which ended several thousands of years ago. Lakes are not renewable except at a cost to the rivers which fill and drain them.

The only real measure of a country's water supply, therefore, is its renewable streamflow. On an average annual basis, Canada's rivers discharge not 40 per cent, not 25 per cent, but slightly less than 9 per cent of the world's renewable water supply, roughly 3.5 million cubic feet per second. Set against a Canadian population which is less than 1 per cent of the world's population, this is a generous endowment indeed; set against a territorial area which is about 7 per cent of the world's land mass, however, it is not so disproportionate. Also, this national data must be tempered with the knowledge that it disguises wide variations of water availability in time and place. Much of the Canadian west is not well-watered. Indeed, almost two thirds of our runoff is carried northward into the Arctic ocean.

On the demand side, there are similar misconceptions. A conventional determination of future water demand in Canada, the rest to be considered surplus, might add up projections of present uses for domestic, industrial, irrigational, electrical and recreational purposes in terms of discrete quantities. In the wider scheme of things, Canada's water must emerge as more than a commodity to be harvested, processed and transported like a bushel of wheat or a barrel of oil. It is an integral element of our environment. It is, therefore, basic to our national identity, to our understanding of what this country is all about.

It is crystal clear that water export has no place in that future. Our priorities and our opportunities in water management are here within our national and provincial boundaries. We will face enough challenge when dealing with the ramifications of major water projects for Canadians, without exaggerating these for the convenience of others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Wenman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If you take into account the two or three minutes to make the changeover to adjourn parliament, I believe I have another minute left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. No point of order can be raised at this stage of the proceedings. The hon. member knows the Chair tries to be fair and just at all times.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, on October 18 the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) made reference not to one concern, but three. Let me speak to each of these concerns in turn.

With regard to water export, the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) clearly stated in response to the hon. member that she is not in favour of water export and that no discussions have been held with the United States to that effect. Nor has the United States government ever proposed that we consider exporting our water.

However, let us be very clear what is meant by the term "water export". The artificial diversion out of this country of waters which are entirely Canadian would, of course, be water export. This in fact, has never occurred. For emphasis, Canada's water is simply not for sale. When the hon. member speaks of Skagit, Garrison and so on, he must realize that these are boundary and transboundary waters which are the joint responsibility of the government and transboundary waters which are the joint responsibility of the governments of the United States of America and Canada. In their natural state, they cross or form the boundary between our two countries and do not solely lie within the jurisdiction of either country. Thus, the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 provides the instrument which governs the actions which can be taken by either country. Through the Department of External Affairs, discussions have been initiated and will continue to be initiated with the United States concerning these and other boundary and transboundary water issues to ensure that Canadian rights are always protected.

The third concern the hon. member expressed interest in was the federal role in water management on both the international and federal-provincial fronts. Examples of actions taken on the international front include the legislated protection of our Arctic waters in 1970, followed by our continued efforts for global agreement at the Law of the Sea Conference on regulations controlling offshore and oceanic pollution. After probably the most intensive investigation ever undertaken into major lake pollution, Canada and the United States entered into the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement in 1972 to restore the Lakes' quality by funding treatment plants and research applications within the next few years.

The Canada Water Act provides for water programs on the federal-provincial front. We have now completed comprehensive development plans jointly with the provinces for the Qu'Appelle, Okanagan and Saint John basins. Newer activities include the 1973 agreement with Ontario to jointly undertake a $0.7 million Great Lakes shore damage survey, the 1974 agreement with Alberta and Saskatchewan to cost-share a $2 million submerged weir to restore water levels in the Peace-Athabasca delta, and a subsequent agreement with Saskatchewan and Manotoba to cost share a $1.1 million comprehensive investigation of the Souris basin.

Mr. Wenman: Is there time for a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that the adjournment debate does not provide for points of order or questions.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:11 p.m.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the order: Presenting Reports from Standing and Special committees:

November 29, 1974 MR. J. CAMPBELL (LASALLE-ÉMARD-CÔTE SAINT-PAUL) chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications:

That the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, presented to the House on Thursday, November 21, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday, in reference to this subject matter, it was indicated that the Chair was in considerable doubt as to the propriety of the report from the procedural point of view. I invited hon. members who wanted to do so to contribute to that subject today. It would be my intention to hear hon. members who wish to make a contribution and probably to reserve whatever judgment I propose to deliver until some time later this week.

Mr. John Campbell (LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday apparently there was procedural difficulty regarding this recommendation brought before the House. We have been able to gather some material that I believe will be helpful to the Chair in reaching a decision. During the consideration of private members' business last Thursday there was an indication that the Chair might be asked to rule at the appropriate time on whether or not the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications could be received. Before such decision is taken I would seek from the Chair permission to make some comments.

It was argued last Thursday that it was beyond the capability of a standing committee to make a report of this nature to the House since its order of reference was only to consider Bill S-11. The authority cited was Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 304, where it is stated:

(1) A committee may only consider those matters which have been committed to it by the House.

(2) A committee is bound by, and not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference.

Beauchesne himself cited his own authority, which was the Fourth Edition of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, page 469. It appears that the House may have strayed from the original principle in recent years to the point where it may be useful to quote the original authority in extenso: I believe most hon. members are aware that the two paragraphs I have mentioned go beyond Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure. There are two sentences in this citation which should be considered very closely. The first is:

Consequently, if a bill be referred to a select committee it will not be competent for that committee to go beyond the subject matter of its provisions.

It would appear clear that committees are not restricted to the provisions of a bill but can also consider the subject matter of the provisions of a bill, public or private. Accordingly, committees should indeed be competent to submit to the House recommendations dealing with the subject matter of the provisions of a bill. Should the judgment of the committee be challenged, then it should be through a decision of the House and not a decision of the Chair. The second sentence or part thereof which warrants attention is the following:

No such restrictions apply to committees on private bills . . .

There may be some who would argue that this citation finds no application, but the fact is that there appears to be no precedent where the House or Mr. Speaker have refused committees the right to submit to the House reports of the nature of the report now brought before it. Dealing in particular with recommendations submitted by committees in relation to private bills, Bourinot at pages 603-604 reads as follows:

In case the bill is withdrawn or otherwise fails to become law, the fee of $200 is refunded, generally and properly on the recommendation of the committee on the bill. Sometimes the committee will recommend that it be refunded on other grounds:

Because a bill has been rendered necessary by the action of the general legislature. Because the necessity for its passage arose from no fault of the promoter, but from circumstances beyond his control. Because the committee have materially diminished the powers asked for. Because it is not liable to the fee and charges levied on private bills. Because it is a mere amendment to the general act respecting banks and banking. Because a project is of a great public benefit to a locality, because the promoters of the bill have agreed to accept the provisions of a general act passed that session: because it has to a great extent been superseded by the provisions of a public bill. Because a bill has been consolidated with another, on which fees are paid, or because it is a mere amendment to a previous act.

The only vehicle available to committees, on a bill for presentation to the House, of such recommendations is a report. The House has consistently received from committees dealing with private bills, reports containing recommendations without challenge. The fact is that if the Chair refuses to seize the House of the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications it would probably be establishing a new rule for which it would be difficult to find a precedent. Should the Chair allow itself to be placed in a position where it would be substituting its judgment for that of a committee on grounds other than procedural grounds? The question is of some importance because there does exist an analogous precedent in recent years, at least as far as procedure is concerned.

It is true that the mode of relieving a company of charges levied under standing orders is different, but that is a matter of judgment to be decided by the House and not a matter of procedure to be decided by the Chair. On May 30, 1967, the House referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, Bill C-104, an act respecting the Bell Telephone Company. On October 20, 1967, the committee submitted to the House the following report:

Your committee has before it Bill C-104, an act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Your committee unanimously recommends that the capital stock charges in the amount of $150,400 collected and paid to the Receiver General of Canada, and deposited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund in the course of the past session (1966-67), by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, be applied to the capital stock charges levied at this session.

The said report was concurred in on October 24, 1967. The Chair then had no objection whatsoever to the moving of a motion for concurrence in the said report. It is therefore difficult to understand why any objection should be raised to a motion for concurrence in a similar report at this time. The Chair is now being asked to rule out of order what the House declared in order only a few years back. Should the Chair decide that committees cannot submit recommendations in any form to the House in connection with their consideration of bills, then there will undoubtedly arise problems of a practical nature. May I quote, as one example, the report submitted by the Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines on March 24, 1960, which was concurred in by the House on the same day:

Your committee reported this day Bill S-16, an act to incorporate Matador Pipe Line Company, Ltd., as its fourth report.

Clause 3 of the bill provides for capital stock of one hundred thousand common shares without nominal or par value.

Your committee recommends that, for taxing purposes under Standing Order 94, each common share shall be deemed to be worth one dollar.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. Howe, seconded by Mr. Baldwin, the said report was concurred in.

If committees are not permitted to report recommendations to the House, then in such cases there can be no application of the provisions of Standing Order 91 inasmuch as there would be left no vehicle whereby the committee could ask the House to agree to an evaluation of shares. The same would be true of Standing Order 105.

[Mr. Campbell.]

May I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the House that the committee, in ordering the presentation of its second report to the House acted in good faith and within the four corners of parliamentary tradition. If Your Honour decides to take under advisement the objections raised, then may I suggest that the following points be considered. First, there is little basis for the contention that committees charged with the consideration of a bill cannot submit recommendations to the House. Second, dealing with private bills specifically, there would appear to be no precedent where a committee report was ruled out of order on the grounds that the bill was the order of reference and recommendations could not be received. Third, the report submitted to the House by the committee is procedurally consistent with each and every report of the same nature submitted by this or any other committee in the past. It has not been brought to the attention of the Chair that any such report was ever ruled out or order, and the Chair might not wish to impose upon committees conditions which the House itself did not impose either through its Standing Orders or its decisions.

Fourth, a decision to deny committees considering bills, public or private, the right to submit from time to time reports containing recommendations would necessarily entail far reaching consequences in several areas: For instance, where a committee submits that a bill be divided, that a witness has refused to appear, that the order of reference should be expanded, that the bill should more properly be considered by another committee, that the committee be allowed to travel, etc.

In conclusion, the committee which honoured me by electing me its chairman has taken a unanimous decision which it hopes will be submittted to the judgment of the House. Decisions of the Chair are not subject to appeal, and should the decision of the Chair be that the report of the committee is out of order there would be no opportunity left for the members of the committee to justify, in parliament, their position. The committee felt that it was acting within its capability, competence and responsibility and hopes that its decision will be concurred in by the House.

I would respectfully request that the motion be put, but if there are misgivings it would be my suggestion that all the matters raised today in this respect be referred for immediate consideration either to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization or to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset indicate my support for the position which the committee has taken in this report, namely, that the company concerned should not have to pay the very extravagant fee which is apparently required in this case. However, there is a procedural point of some importance here. It concerns the powers of parliamentary committees to make representations to the House of Commons. Your Honour will recall that your predecessor, Mr. Speaker Lamoureux, on June 18, 1973 delivered a ruling on the nature and the ability of a committee to make a report on the estimate. Taking that as the beginning, I submit that the restriction on a committee to make reports on bills referred to it is equally restrictive and obligatory, and that the committee may report only on a bill and amendments thereon. I do not think it necessary to quote the report of the standing committee or the reference. I think these are easily found.

● (1420)

However, I want to deal with House of Commons Standing Order 65(8) which reads as follows:

Standing committees shall be severally empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters as may be referred to them by the House, and, to report from time to time, and, except when the House otherwise orders, to send for persons, papers and records . . .

The point is that the matter of the fee in Bill S-11, according to the reference on Thursday, November 7, was not referred to the committee and is not encompassed in the reference that was made to that committee. What was referred to the committee was Bill S-11 which the committee must report with or without amendment to the House of Commons. Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 304(1) at page 244 reads:

A committee can only consider those matters which have been committed to it by the House.

Citation 304(2) clearly states, and I quote:

A committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference. In the case of a Select Committee upon a Bill, the Bill committed to it is itself the order of reference to the Committee, who must report it with or without amendment to the House.

May's eighteenth edition at page 620 makes the following point:

A select committee, like a Committee of the whole House, possesses no authority except that which it derives by delegation from the House by which it is appointed. When a select committee is appointed to consider or inquire into a matter, the scope of its deliberations or inquiries is defined by the order by which the committee is appointed (termed the order of reference), and the deliberations or inquiries of the committee must be confined within the limits of the order of reference. But when a bill is committed, or referred, to a select committee, the bill is itself the order of reference, and the inquiries and deliberations of the committee must be confined to the bill and amendments relevant to the subject-matter thereof.

What the House might wish to do concerning the fee paid by British Columbia Telephone Company is a totally separate issue from Bill S-11. In view of the fact that Bill C-29 will apparently standardize the fees paid by companies seeking to enlarge their capitalization, the House may wish to consider bringing its Standing Order fee provisions into line with the new legislation or it may wish to order the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications or the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders to consider the question of the fee to be paid, or not paid, by British Columbia Telephone Company. Beauchesne, citation 304(3) at page 244 reads:

When it has been thought desirable to do so, the House has enlarged the order of reference by means of an instruction or in the case of a Select Committee upon a Bill by the committal to it of another Bill. Mandatory instructions have also been given to Select Committees restricting the limits of their powers or prescribing the course of their proceedings, or directing the committee to make a special report upon certain matters.

(4) Sometimes a committee may have to obtain leave from the House to make a special report when its order of reference is limited in scope.

Means exist, therefore, under the rules of the House to allow the committee to consider, and make recommendations on, the fee to be paid in connection with Bill S-11. However, such means do not now exist under the committee's present order of reference with application to Bill S-11 and any recommendation other than reporting the bill with or without amendments is out of order.

The important thing here is the nature of the reference and the fact that in commenting on the fee payable the committee exceeded its order of reference. The normal procedure of the House of Commons is that a committee has the power to amend a bill, by which means it expresses its opinion on the bill. Such a report, including an amendment, is, in effect, a report to the House of Commons that a substantive change is necessary. But the authorities do not contemplate at any point the possibility of a committee making extraneous reports or commentaries on legislation referred to it in the form of a bill.

I think Your Honour must find, taking into consideration the arguments I have advanced, and the direction your predecessor has provided, that this report is out of order.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the problem inherent in the procedural point raised regarding this report is referable to section 16 of the Financial Administration Act. While I am in considerable sympathy with the remarks made by the learned chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communication, I should like to call the attention of the House to an interesting reference by a former Auditor General, Mr. Watson Sellar, in an audit office guide which he wrote for the instruction of Treasury Board officers in 1958. On page 24 of this publication, he mentioned a situation which arose in 1929 when motions to remit funds for private bills withdrawn were, for the first time, rejected by the Speaker whose explanation was:

It is essentially contrary to section 35 of the Consolidated Revenue Act (now section 16 of the Financial Administration Act) which stipulates that any fees received by the officers of the House shall be deposited at the bank, when they become the property of the Receiver General of Canada. To remit such fees would require an estimate from the Minister of Finance.

This was reported in Hansard of June 14, 1929, at page 3762. The Speaker's ruling was not, of course, binding on the Senate, so a degree of inconsistency existed in practice until the act was amended.

It seems obvious that the moment the funds were paid by the B.C. Telephone Company they became the property of the Receiver General of Canada and should have been, and likely were, deposited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund by the Chief Clerk of Committees.

It would therefore seem there would be little point at this time in sending a reference to the committee instructing it to deal with the question of the funds, should such action be contemplated, if only because the funds are not there any more; the only way to have them retrieved, if, in fact, it is proper to do so, would be pursuant to section 16 of the Financial Administration Act which is entirely within the discretion of the Minister of Finance. So, regardless of what may happen with regard to Bill C-29, the Canada Business Corporations Act, discretion remains with the Minister of Finance to take whatever action he deems to be equitable in the circumstances.

This question is causing considerable concern because of the size of the fee and the relevance it might have to telephone rates in British Columbia. While I am all for seeing the powers of committees preserved and, if possible, extended, I have grave doubts as to the relevance of this recommendation. We are dealing here with a delicate matter related to the responsibilities placed upon some of the officers of the House in connection with fees of this type.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise, really, just for the purpose of asking whether the provision set out in Standing Order 99—

Mr. Grafftey: You just couldn't keep out of it, could you, Stanley?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —have been carried out with respect to this bill. Standing Order 99 reads as follows:

> No motion for the suspension or modification of any provision of the standing orders applying to private bills or to petitions for private bills shall be entertained by the House until reference has been made to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders . . .

And so on. It seems to me if that reference were made, then, of course, the committee could report thereon. If that reference were not made, it would seem to me that the committee does not have the right to report thereon but that a request would have to be made for that reference.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I will keep my comments to myself since the chairman of the transport committee is aware of my views. I have no comment to make now.

However, I wish to point out on behalf of my fellow Social Crediters that an unfortunate situation has now occurred. Today is an opposition day allotted to our group for the consideration of subsidies. It is our only opposition day before the holidays and since the beginning of this Parliament, and already 20 or 25 minutes have gone by, the question period has not yet started and the orders of the day are not yet completed.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with the point of order, I wish to convey our regrets and ask the Privy Council to try to plan better its agenda, so that when it asks the co-operation of members for the passage of government measures we may be in a position to co-operate. On the other hand, it should also co-operate with us when it comes to allotted opposition days.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thank hon. members for their valuable contributions to the question, and as I have indicated will be delivering my ruling and the reasons therefor probably tomorrow.

[Mr. MacKay.]

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED INQUIRY OF ALLEGED POLITICAL INTERFERENCE WITH LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM— REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask permission of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity with regard to the Local Initiatives Program and to copies of additional government documents which I would be prepared to table today. I ask permission to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

> In view of copies of further government documents now available today, including ones signed by D. C. Trehearne, R. J. Gairns, Robert K. Andras and others, showing evidence of political interference and manipulation with the Local Initiatives Program as illustrated by project numbered X1074 in the constituency of Capilano in the province of British Columbia, the House requests a full and independent inquiry by a royal commission to determine the extent of political scandal in the handling of the Local Initiatives Program.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Because of the reference in the terms of the motion to documents which have become available this day, there would be some element of immediacy to it which did not exist hitherto. However, the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it requires unanimous consent before it can be debated. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to ask whether I have the permission of the House to table these documents. Surely, the government is not afraid. If it has nothing to hide and there is no scandal, why will the government not agree to my tabling the documents?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows there is no provision in the rules for a private member to table or file documents in any way. However, the hon. member, having the documents in his possession, presumably can make them public in a number of other ways.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR MEMBERSHIP OF INDEPENDENT MEMBERS ON COMMITTEES

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-368, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act (independent members of the House of Commons).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, the Speaker of the House of Commons can always be relied upon to uphold the rights of minorities in this House. To this I might add that Your Honour, as Speaker, and your staff have been of tremendous assistance to myself as an independent member. Truly, you have been like a godfather, very co-operative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh! Explain.

Mr. Jones: However, membership on committees is subject to the vagaries of the party whips, and the purpose of this bill is to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act to provide that independent members or those not associated with any recognized party shall be entitled to membership on at least two standing committees.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill? I hope that is not construed as an offer that the House cannot refuse!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

In answer to a question asked a few days ago, the minister indicated that grain inspectors had the right to strike and he expressed the hope that an agreement would be reached by normal means. Is the minister now in a position to announce that indeed such an agreement has been reached?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—ADEQUACY OF SUPPLIES IN EASTERN CANADA THIS WINTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, but perhaps the Prime Minister can give me the information. In view of the strike and the absence of any report of a concrete nature from the President of the Treasury Board, and in view of reports abroad that this means a shortage of grain in the east for milling and other purposes, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether his government has had an examination of inventories conducted and that he can assure the House there will be sufficient grain in eastern Canada this winter to meet the needs both for human and animal consumption?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course this matter deeply concerns the government, and the minister in particular. We discussed it this morning, he and I, and we will continue to do so during the course of the day. As far as the exact inventory to which the Leader of the Opposition referred, it is obvious that that depends on the assumptions considered, namely whether the strike will last any length of time or not.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister has stated to the House that no inventory has been taken, but his answer depends on certain hypotheses. In view of the fact that the government has substantially created this problem itself, does not the Prime Minister feel under any obligation to give the House and the people of the country some assurance that there will be no shortage this winter? Finally, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has been able to create a mess like this without even trying?

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—USE OF OCEANGOING VESSELS ON GREAT LAKES TO TRANSPORT GRAIN TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the President of the Treasury Board and it arises out of the fact that as of midnight last night there were approximately 80 oceangoing vessels above the port of St. Lambert and 63 above Port Waller, all of which must be out of the Seaway system by two weeks from today.

In view of this fact that there are currently numerous ocean vessels in the Seaway system capable of transporting grain to eastern terminals before the closure of the system, can the minister assure the House that these vessels will in fact be utilized to alleviate the supply situation in eastern Canada, and that they will not be allowed to leave the system empty of grain cargo?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, all these vessels are not scheduled to carry grain and, according to the events, we will see what use we can make of them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Perth-Wilmot on a final supplementary.

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR TRANSPORTING GRAIN TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I will address my supplementary to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It is estimated that a ship is capable of carrying up to one million bushels of grain per run, while a boxcar can transport only 2,500 to 3,000 bushels. In view of the fact it now appears that if government action is not taken immediately to end the grain inspectors' strike, the seaway will in fact close and domestic grain supplies will be dependent upon rail transport, will the minister reveal the contingency plans which the Minister of Transport indicated he would be preparing to ensure that there are grain supplies in Eastern Canada for the upcoming winter, especially since this is a matter directly related to the public interest?

● (1440)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Transport very carefully avoided going into detail about the nature of the plans and for the rather good reason that while negotiations and discussions are going on it is inadvisable to examine in the House the alternatives based on a number of hypotheses. Naturally, at the same time we examined what can be done in different circumstances and when the time is right we will make the plans known.

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—PROTECTION OF CONSUMER AGAINST PRICE INCREASES FOLLOWING SETTLEMENT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that a continuation of the grain inspectors' strike until the closure of the St. Lawrence Seaway will create a supply situation which will promote inevitably an increase in the price of domestic milling grain in eastern Canada, will the minister inform the House of the contingency plans he has created to ensure that consumers in this part of the country will not bear the burden of unnecessary price increases in essential consumer items, caused in part at least by government inaction in formulating an acceptable settlement of this strike?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Well, Mr. Speaker, not only is the conclusion a simple barb not designed to get at any part of the whole question, it is clearly in those terms hypothetical. We are hopeful that a great volume of grain will still move down the seaway.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEAL WITH FURTHER LAY-OFFS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that General Motors Corporation of Canada announced there would be 2,095 employees laid off by that company in the coming weeks, bringing the total number of lay-offs in the automotive industry somewhere in excess of 9,000, I should like to ask the minister if he has been in touch recently with the corporations in Canada to find out what their plans are for the coming weeks and whether he would tell us what plans his government has to deal with the anticipated increase in lay-offs.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yes I have. The position I announced in the House the other day described the condition as then existing as cautiously optimistic, and this has been confirmed by the heads of the major automobile manufacturers in Canada. I have been advised also in respect of the General Motors lay-off to which the hon. member referred that even after it is completed there will be 30,850 employees whereas in January this year employment was at a level of 31,500 reflecting on a year over year basis only a very modest change in that corporation.

AUTOMOBILES—DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN PRICES IN CANADA AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): There is a marvellous optimism which prevails, Mr. Speaker. I have a second supplementary. Since the price of automobiles is obviously related to the number of cars sold, and since the minister has frequently told the House that the difference between the Canadian and United States price is in the neighbourhood of 7 per cent, could he inform the House if that 7 per cent figure pertains to 1975 models?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe that figure is within the ballpark. The reason I have a slight reservation is that there is a different percentage for each of the three major companies. If we take the three major companies I think that would be of the right order. The point I have made in the past is that there has been a diminishing percentage over the last few years.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a final supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that a random check of the three major motor companies in Canada, Chrysler, Ford and General Motors, recently taken in respect of the prices at which they were selling cars in Canada compared to the United States indicated that the price difference today for a medium-sized car is in the neighbourhood of 17 per cent and the price differential for a small sized car in respect of all three companies, which I think is rather curious, is in the neighbourhood of 11 per cent, would the Prime Minister take steps to have either the minister's staff changed or the minister himself so that we can get some accurate information.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that the difference comes from the fact that the hon. member is using retail figures, as I understand it, whereas the figures on which we rely are wholesale figures. Perhaps the hon. member, if he does not change his staff, will send me figures.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ELIGIBILITY OF LAID-OFF AUTO WORKERS FOR BENEFITS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Of these 9,875 Canadian workers who are facing various periods of unemployment in respect of General Motors, Ford and Chrysler Canada, 2,965 or almost 3,000 have been informed that their termination of employment is for an indefinite period. As there seems to be some question of interpretation by the Unemployment Insurance Commission officials concerning whether indefinite termination actually qualifies these people for unemployment insurance, I wonder if the minister is in a position to clarify the situation of confirm that these benefits are payable to these workers.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my first impression is that they would not be denied benefits, but I should like, with respect, to have the opportunity to examine the hon. member's question and give him an answer at the earliest possible date.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON PLEASURE BOATS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

In the recent budget speech, he has announced a 10 per cent surtax on pleasure craft with 20 or more horsepower engine. This measure seriously affects that industry which, on the one hand, has been subsidized to create jobs and which, on the other, sees the price of its craft increased to a prohibitive level, even though they consume very little gas. Has the Minister of Finance received representations from craft manufacturing companies all across the country and, if so, how well has he received their representations that he merely abolish that tax?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. I think we will consider the representations from those companies. We still may discuss this question in the House, in committee of the whole, when we will consider the bill.

IMPRESSION CREATED BY PRIME MINISTER DURING MEETING WITH PRESIDENT FORD

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Before I ask it I am sure I speak for all members of the House when I say we wish him well on his very important visit to Washington tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: In view of the very short space of time that is allotted to the very important discussions that will take place between the new United States President and the Prime Minister, does he feel confident that he will be able to create the good impression which is so vital at the present time which was so startlingly absent during the President's last visit to Ottawa?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member will realize why it is not possible to spend more time with the President if he recalls the motion made by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party. I am pressed to go on to Winnipeg as soon as possible, but I will do my best in the short time I will have with the President.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In the short time he has during his conversation, if the Prime Minister begins to get the feeling that criticism will be unavoidable will he do his very best to have himself compared to a more lofty portion of his anatomy than was the case the last time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member is interested in literary matters and I would refer him to the Dictionary of American Slang where he will see that I came out of this as a very good friend.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I think the Prime Minister was referring to the fact that he had said earlier, and said again today, that I do not know the difference between a hole in the ground and razzmataz. It is a very serious charge against a member of parliament and therefore I looked up the definition of both terms in both French and English dictionaries. The best definition by far of "hole in the ground" is given in the French dictionary as follows: "hole in the ground or water hole—un trou d'eau". The word razzmataz —very important in this case—is not listed in the French dictionary, but in the English dictionary the definition reads: "razzmataz, what Nixon described Trudeau as".

● (1450)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: It is obvious to all hon. members that there is no difference between the two expressions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Let us see him match that.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in view of this enlightening information I would now amend my earlier statement to say that the hon. member does not see the difference between a hole in the ground and a hole in his head.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: New writers are needed.

FISHERIES

INVESTIGATION OF ICNAF QUOTA VIOLATIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Fisheries). At a press conference in Newfoundland last week the minister announced that the RCN destroyer Annapolis had left the previous day to do patrol work off the northeast coast of Newfoundland and Labrador and would do on-board inspection of foreign ships fishing in that area. Can the minister tell the House how many ships have been boarded, if it was found that some of the foreign ships are violating the quota system worked out by ICNAF and, if so, what actions have been taken by this government?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, at one point during that conference I thought the hon. member had resigned from the House and joined the press corps. I was very pleased to see him in attendance.

However, in response to this very serious question I must say that I have not had a report on the results of these boardings as yet. I will look into this matter and inform the hon. member.

INFLATION—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO COMBAT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): My question is based on the fact that the federal government's annual expenditures have more than doubled over six years from $12 billion to over $26 billion. In view of the statement by the chairman of th Economic Council of Canada that domestic inflation is largely caused by federal government expenditure duplication and waste, I should like to ask the minister when the federal government will take a leadership role in battling inflation and when the Minister of Finance will present to the House of Commons the government's precise program to wrestle inflation to the ground.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was here on budget night and he heard me elaborate on that quite fully. The chairman of the Economic Council also referred to structural changes in the cost of energy, the cost of food and other contributing factors to inflation in this country and elsewhere.

Mr. Grafftey: In view of the fact that the minister himself stated that the government in the budget was more preoccupied with the problem of recession, is it not his intention at a future time to present a precise program to the House to battle inflation as opposed to the recessionary considerations with which he was involved in the budget this year?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is not exactly what I said on budget night. I said that there were twin problems, the problem of inflation and the problem of the threat of recession, and in order to fight them, I recommended for the 1975-76 year a stimulus in the amount of a cash deficit of $3 billion, largely achieved by tax cuts both at the corporate sales tax and the personal tax levels which would give that stimulus in a non-inflationary way. In other words, I hoped to achieve a stimulus to protect us against the threat of recession but in as non-inflationary a fashion as I could.

GRAIN INSPECTORS STRIKE—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO HAVE GRAIN MOVED

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to other questions but it relates to the non-movement of grain. It arises from representations made only this morning to me by feeders in my area. I will put my question to the Prime Minister; perhaps he can do something about it before he leaves for Washington.

As a result of the continuing grain inspectors strike, orders for grain and stock and poultry feed placed by feeders in our section of Ontario through the Prescott elevator are now going unfilled or partly filled or interrupted. Because of the adverse effect of this situation, will the Prime Minister please press for an early resumption of the movement of grain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a repetition of the representation made earlier this afternoon. The House is aware that meetings were going on this morning and that we hope for a very quick settlement of this strike. We will certainly have to inform the House of whatever new developments there may be during the day by tomorrow.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT FORD—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO HALT GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. When he visits Washington, will he make the strongest possible representation to President Ford to call a halt to all construction of the Garrison Diversion unit project in North Dakota because of the serious pollution and massive flooding problem it will generate in Manitoba?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will certainly take note of the representation. It is something in which the federal government is very interested of course. As the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings reminded us, the meeting will not be a very long one and I cannot guarantee that I will be raising every subject which is of interest to Canada and to hon. members.

Mr. McKenzie: Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs might have more time in Washington. In view of the serious shortage of water in the United States, will the Prime Minister or the minister impress upon President Ford that it would be only logical to divert water from the Garrison project for use within their own country?

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT FORD—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF SUBJECTS TO BE DISCUSSED AND REPORT TO HOUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question in reference to his visit with President Ford tomorrow. I wonder if at this time he is able to tell us the priorities that he will be outlining and discussing with the president in the short time he has. I am thinking of the security of supply of energy and the automobile pact. Has there been a priority set for this interview which is so important at this time for the economic life of both nations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell us what those priorities are. If he is not able to tell us now, will he be making a full report when he returns from Washington?

Mr. Trudeau: Oh no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: I will ask this then: is this meeting with the president so confidential that the Prime Minister cannot tell the Canadian people and the House what the priorities are or report on the discussion when he returns to Canada? Is it a confidential meeting?

Mr. Trudeau: It is a private meeting so far as our side is concerned, but the policies which will be discussed are of interest to Canadians and to the House of Commons and I will be prepared to answer questions or make a statement.

Mr. Woolliams: You said you would not.

Mr. Trudeau: You mentioned Washington, not Ottawa.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH PRESIDENT FORD—REQUEST THAT JOINT APPEAL BE MADE TO RUSSIAN AUTHORITIES FOR MORE HUMANE TREATMENT OF VALENTYN MOROZ

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the recent open appeal made by the wife of Valentyn Moroz to all good and compassionate people, which included the Prime Minister and President Ford, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of such a letter, and further, whether he will use the occasion of his visit tomorrow to ask President Ford to join him in taking joint action to appeal to the Soviet authorities for a more humane treatment of Mr. Moroz, and in particular to urge the Soviet authorities to remove Mr. Moroz immediately to hospital because of his deteriorating condition.

● (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the letter to which the hon. member refers. As to whether the question will be raised, I can only give the same type of answer I gave to an earlier question: there are many matters to be raised and I cannot guarantee that they will all be raised.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that December 10 has been designated as International Human Rights Day does the Prime Minister not feel it appropriate to renew his efforts on behalf of Mr. Moroz? Does he not consider the evidence of Mrs. Moroz as substantive proof that the health of Mr. Moroz is deteriorating and death is near unless medical treatment can be provided to him immediately?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my information is that medical treatment is being provided and that Mr. Moroz is in hospital. This information was conveyed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs by the Soviet ambassador when our minister spoke about this matter to the ambassador a week or two ago.

Mr. Mazankowski: One further supplementary for clarification, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister indicate whether Mr. Moroz is in a hospital in prison or in a hospital outside the prison?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we know it is a hospital but we do not know if it is in or out of prison. I suppose that as in Canada they have hospitals in prisons and outside.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

SUGGESTED LOOPHOLE IN LEGISLATIVE PROVISIONS CONCERNING TAKEOVERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware of the announcement by Bevis Corporation Limited, a British controlled company, that it has discovered a loophole in the Foreign Investments Review Act permitting it to avoid approval of takeovers and if he is, does he propose to take any steps to block this loophole?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have seen a reference in the Globe and Mail. The transfer of voting rights by non-Canadians without the corresponding transfer of equity ownership is not by itself sufficient to change ultimate control of the corporation. This is patently so where those voting rights will revert to non-Canadians some time in the future.

PROPOSED FUNDING OF EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM FOR NATIVES ON USE OF ALCOHOL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I address this question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the recommendations resulting from a series of workshops held in the western Arctic a few months ago sponsored jointly by the Northwest Territories government and the Indian Brotherhood of the Northwest Territories on the subject of alcohol problems in the north, does the minister intend to initiate any programs in the near future to increase the funding available for alcohol education in the Northwest Territories and to set up community rehabilitation centres staffed by northerners?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows my department is providing some funds at the present time, particularly with respect to the problem of alcoholism among natives. I am currently reviewing our program in this respect but I am not in a position to make an announcement at the present time. We are examining the matter, however.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. Has the minister undertaken any studies recently on the effectiveness of alcohol education and rehabilitation programs in the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I know of no specific survey or review in the sense of a scientific review of the programs currently being operated in the north. One thing is sure, however, we are not satisfied with what is taking place at the present time and should like to improve on it.

BEEF—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NUMBER OF GRADES AND GRADING PRACTICES OF PROCESSING PLANTS

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister inform the House how many grades there are in the beef grading system in Canada and whether processing plants are allowed to pay for cattle using their own grading standards?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows how many grading systems there are in Canada. To give a detailed explanation of how the grading systems work would take up too much of the question period, but I could send him a breakdown of the information. We have one of the most advanced grading systems in the world, I can tell him that.

An hon. Member: How many?

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary. Would the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I confess I have some reservations about whether the answer to the hon. member's first question could not have been more properly sought through other means. Perhaps the hon. member can clarify that through a supplementary.

Mr. Hurlburt: Fine, Mr. Speaker; I will forget my supplementary.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED REPLACEMENT OF PARKING GARAGE WITH OPEN PARKING LOT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister aware of plans to close permanently the parking garage at Vancouver International Airport and to replace the parking space lost with an open parking lot in spite of an offer from the parking operators to replace the lost space with a new double deck garage? Will the minister investigate the situation in order to avoid the necessity of a shuttle bus service and other inconveniences that would be suffered by travellers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this project that they may have but I am going to investigate.

An hon. Member: What are you aware of?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there are about 2,000 airports in Canada, so I do not know everything that is going on at each one. I will get the information and give it to the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Prime Minister but I see he has gone.

PROPOSED MEETING OF MINISTER WITH TREATY SEVEN CHIEFS AND URBAN TREATY ALLIANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I should like to begin by welcoming him back to a friendly audience after meeting with the Liberals in Alberta.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): My question concerns a group the minister did not meet there, the Treaty Seven Indians, whose grievances concerning the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development led them to occupy departmental offices. I should like to know from the minister whether he would now give an undertaking to meet both the chiefs of Treaty Seven and representatives of the Urban Treaty Alliance to discuss their grievances and to meet them in Alberta rather than Ottawa?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to correct the mistaken impression left by the hon. member. I found the Liberals of Alberta very warm and cordial.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): All three of them?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, I had sent a telegram to the chiefs of Treaty Seven indicating that I would be happy to meet with them and suggested it would be preferable that we meet in Ottawa.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF GRANTING OLD AGE PENSION TO SPOUSE OF RECIPIENT OF PENSION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As he is absent I will put it to his parliamentary secretary.

Could he tell the House when he will be able to announce that a husband or a wife will receive a pension similar to that of his or her spouse?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin—

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I repeat my question because I notice that the minister has returned.

Could the minister tell the House when the government will be in a position to grant the old age pension to the pensioner's spouse?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this question has already been replied to. It will be done in October 1975.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DATE WHEN REDISTRIBUTION LEGISLATION WILL AGAIN BE DEBATED

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. In view of the filibuster on the redistribution bill last night, can the minister indicate when that bill will be brought forward again?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): As soon as I have some indication that progress is desired on the other side, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

EFFECT OF GRAIN INSPECTOR'S STRIKE ON CANADA'S REPUTATION AS GRAIN SUPPLIER—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. The most recent stoppage of grain movements caused by the unfortunate circumstances of the grain handlers' strike in Vancouver, has cast shadows of doubt on Canada's international reputation as a grain supplier and also has given rise to uncertainties concerning future foreign commitments. Does the minister not consider that a second stoppage within two months will further damage Canada's reputation, especially in view of the widely publicized world food crisis. If so, what does the government intend to do about it?

● (1510)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are always concerned about the problem of delivering grain on time. At present, negotiations are continuing in an effort to deal with the dispute in progress. In a number of areas within the grain handling system, either in the private area or in the area under government management, employees have the right to strike as part of the process. Where bargaining fails and where, as in this case, employees do not want to accept the recommendations even of the majority report, that right is available to them under the law. That brings certain consequences for the grain industry and, in certain cases, for other individuals. Nobody can put forward easy alternatives for dealing with labour difficulties when the collective bargaining process does not achieve agreement.

BEEF CATTLE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO AID PRODUCERS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. When, if ever, will the minister make a statement, in accordance with the request of the prairie ministers of agriculture, about the problems cattlemen are facing? Will he make it before cattlemen unload their cattle even at today's depressed prices or does he intend to sit this one out like an old maid at a ball?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's question, although I think I know what he said. I am certainly aware of the different provincial programs which are in effect. We had a meeting with the prairie ministers of agriculture a week ago yesterday and discussed with them what we ought to be doing. We met with the NFU and talked with the CFA about what we ought to be doing, and I hope we will come up with a good program for the producers concerned.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What plans has the minister to save the land which was seeded to grass at an expense of some $40 million two or three years ago at the instigation of the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and what plans has he to prevent that land from being used again for the growing of crops.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED RELIEF FOR THOSE WHO HAVE PAID TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. As the minister, fortunately, has now seen fit to provide relief from federal sales tax for taxpaid inventories of trucks and other transportation equipment, will he inform the House whether he intends to take the same action and provide relief for those who have paid sales tax on building materials.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I refer the hon. member to the special circumstances mentioned in my reply yesterday to the hon. member for Red Deer and elaborated in the press release that was issued following my answer in the House.

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED INCENTIVES TO IMMIGRANTS TO GO TO ALBERTA IN VIEW OF LABOUR SHORTAGE—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. As it is the department's policy to provide incentives for Francophone people to immigrate to Quebec, an area of high unemployment, is there not some special incentive applicable to the province of Alberta, where the unemployment rate at present is less than 2 per cent and where a serious labour shortage exists at present.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there are no special incentives for people to immigrate to Quebec, at least so far as the federal government is involved. As I explained to the House, we are working in co-operation with officials and departments of the government of Quebec to establish offices abroad. As for the recruitment of required workers to Alberta, I have discussed this thoroughly with Dr. Hohol, my counterpart in the government of Alberta and with people in industry in that province provided they are prepared to first try to recruit Canadians from Alberta and the western regions and nationally to Alberta and failing success, we will help them recruit from abroad. If they satisfy those certain conditions, including, where practical, willingness to train Canadians first, without success, we will certainly consider getting workers from abroad.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO PRACTICE OF PRICE LEADERSHIP

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that Judge Estey in his inquiry on steel profits was not permitted to examine the implications of the oligopolistic practice of price leadership by the Big Three, and since Judge Estey concludes, "This is a matter . . . of such complexity and importance to the industry and commerce of Canada generally as to require its own separate study . . . ", will the minister now establish such an inquiry into price leadership?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated previously, Judge Estey's report is comprehensive. It speaks for itself and stands on its own.

STEEL—REASON FOR ACCEPTANCE BY JUDGE ESTEY OF LIFO SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question about price leadership. May I ask another pertinent question. Can the minister explain why Judge Estey accepts the steel companies' inflation accounting system of LIFO, last in first out, in computing costs, whereas the Department of National Revenue and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants have ruled that LIFO is not a proper accounting method?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think that the report speaks for itself and stands on its own. I think Judge Estey clearly examined various accounting principles. He sought the best advice available and he put forward his views in the report.

FEED GRAIN—REQUEST IF SUPPLIES ARE ADEQUATE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice being absent, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the reply the minister made yesterday that there is not enough feed grain in eastern Canada, due to the grain inspectors' strike, can he assure the House that domestic needs will be given priority, and that steps will be taken to prevent current grain stocks in eastern terminals from being exported, as long as the present situation has not been remedied?

Mr. Speaker: I must regretfully advise the hon. member that this is the third time this question has been asked today during the oral question period, and in exactly the same terms.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have only one question today. It relates to—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, could we have silence in this House? My colleagues on your right are charitable people, but they sometimes take the liberty of disturbing hon. members who ask serious questions, as I am doing now, and I do not like this. I respect other hon. members, so they should respect me in return.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Then, my point of order is as follows: since the question I asked the minister deals with the fact that indeed there are problems—I do not blame anyone for that, but there are problems—with the feed grains which are now stored in the east, and since it is impossible to ship them in sufficient quantities, I ask the minister whether he can assure the House that these feed grains will meet domestic needs before being exported to outside markets.

Mr. Speaker: I regret, but I still insist that this question is identical to the one asked by another hon. member at the beginning of the oral question period.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): What was the answer?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Earlier in the question period the hon. member for St. John's West directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries. The minister undertook to answer as soon as possible. I have received an indication that the minister is now prepared to answer that question, and his answer will probably bring the question period to a close.

FISHERIES

INVESTIGATION OF ICNAF QUOTA VIOLATIONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, in answering the question of the hon. member for St. John's West, may I inform the House that five boardings of Russian fishing vessels have taken place by fisheries officers travelling on the Annapolis acting as a designated ship in the last two or three days. No violations were found and the ship is now moving off Cape Freels, where there is a heavy concentration of fishing vessels, to continue inspection and boardings.

● (1520)

ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF ICNAF QUOTAS BY BRITISH FISHING VESSELS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State (Fisheries) on that particular point. According to the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries, ICNAF, fishermen operating on Brown's and Georges Banks have a zero quota on an endangered species, haddock. However, the crew of the American coastguard cutter Vigorous recently boarded six British stern trawlers, namely the Marbella, the Seafridge-Skua, the Farnella, the Coriolanus, the Northbella and the Southbella, and found all of them having catches vastly in excess of the amount permitted. In fact, one had 130 tons of haddock out of a total of 135 tons. Has the minister or any official of his department made representations to the British government to see if they intend to continue violating ICNAF regulations?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to look into this matter and hopefully have an answer for tomorrow's question period. I do not question the hon. member's word, but if the allegations are correct, this is a matter which we would find intolerable.

SUGGESTED PAYMENT BY DEPARTMENT FOR USE OF NAVAL VESSELS AS PATROL SHIPS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I will make my question to the Minister of State (Fisheries) in the form of a supplication or request. In this most worthwhile and useful exercise of utilizing vessels of the Canadian armed forces, will the minister's department undertake to pay the underpaid and under-funded Canadian armed forces, particularly maritime command, for the fuel they use so we can get on with some training from time to time?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, that is a most valid suggestion. I hope the hon. member will support me when I go to treasury board for supplementary estimates.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise on a point of order or question of privilege, but I do so because there is some immediacy and urgency involved. If I did not raise this matter, it could result in a meat shortage in retail outlets in the Toronto and Hamilton areas. Because of a back-up in the deliveries of meat products from packing plants and food terminals in the Toronto and Hamilton areas that is being caused as a result of federally employed meat inspectors walking off their jobs yesterday, and as of an hour and a half ago were still not back to work, I wish to bring this to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister assure the House he will take immediate steps to terminate this illegal walk-out before it becomes an illegal strike? Canadians are getting fed up with the fact that illegal strikes are being taken for granted by this government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member when he says that meat inspectors do not have the right to strike and that immediate action should be taken to make them understand the situation and penalize them if necessary. Some civil servants have the right to strike, but as regards those designated employees who must stay on the job to protect public security, I believe it is most important that they obey a law voted by Parliament.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT'S NEGLECTED TO PAY OLD AGE PENSION TO PERSONS AGED 60 AND THEIR SPOUSE

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi) moved:

That this House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I am moving in the name of my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada stems from the numerous letters and communications we receive from our constituents, claiming that pensionable age be possible at 60, with an appropriate pension, and that the spouse of a person eligible for old age pension be equally eligible for that pension, as I have been requesting in this House since 1966.

I can hardly believe, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House are the only members receiving such requests from the voters we represent, and I am certain that other members receive the same. Yet, the government is in no hurry to answer the requests of these people. The leader of the liberal party of Canada did promise during the last election campaign that the wife whose husband has reached 65 would be entitled to the old age pension. But we are still far from allowing early retirement at a reasonable age in our modern times when the production of goods and services is increasingly easy.

As soon as the leader of the liberal party resumed his office of Prime Minister, he made a step backwards and we heard in the speech from the Throne that the wife or the spouse will have to wait until October of 1975 at least to see that promise carried out. And yet while he was in Trois-Rivières, the leader of the liberal party promised that the 60 to 65 year-old wife would receive a pension as soon as the liberal party was reelected. At that time, there is no doubt that many women of that age believed that promise and decided to vote for the Liberals. I would not be surprised that many of them kissed him for that promise. However, they will have to wait for a year and a half after the federal election to see that promise fulfilled. That is the reason why we are blaming the government for not having taken at the beginning of this session the necessary action for the enacting of such legislation and for this government to acknowledge the services those people rendered their country.

With the developments in all types of industries, it seems to me that 42 years of assiduous work are enough to have done one's duty towards society.

The figures of Statistics Canada show that in 1972 the life expectancy was 69.3 years for men and 76.3 years for women. Under the present Old Age Security Act, this means that a woman has a life expectancy of only 11 years when she reaches retirement age. As for men, they have a life expectancy of only four years when they reach retirement age.

After working hard for more than forty years, men and women should be able to do what they like in complete financial security.

Lowering the eligibility age to 60 for those who wish it would not mean that these people would have to remain inactive. They will be able to render many other services to their country and to their community without being forced to do so. They would be happier.

It is not the first time that we request this in the House. We have done so several times before, and I realize that we are getting more and more support, especially from this side of the House, and that a few government members agree with me but do not dare say so. They say that because of party policy, of government solidarity, the part does not want this change. We shall probably hear the same old objections: "It would cost too much money." Of course, if we think only in terms of dollars or of the taxation capacity, we may be reluctant to accept this proposal but we should see the facts as they really are.

If people aged 60 to 65 agreed to retire at 60, would this weaken the national production rate in Canada? Do we not have a whole army of young people with a college or university education who are waiting only for an employment offer to put their talents to use, to earn their living honourably and to give their services to their country to develop it and serve it? Did we not penalize farmers because they were producing too much?

There has been of late much publicity about the food destroyed. No way could be found sell them, let alone eat them. Industry is slowing down almost everywhere, if not at a standstill, so it is unthinkable not to allow people, men and women, to retire at age 60.

Only yesterday a 65-year-old man told me that because of ill health he had to cease working at 60. Great numbers of people are also worn out or ill well before the present retirement age.

I put this motion forward because I believe the Canadian government can lower retirement age to 60 without upsetting anything.

I am also seeking that old age security pension be paid to the pensioner's spouse as soon as the former reaches retirement age. This is also very important and should be considered now by the government.

Madam Speaker, I have been regularly putting forward a motion of this kind since 1966, the first member I believe to do so. Opposition members supported me, Liberal members spoke against it. But older people, and even the young I meet, all favour such an amendment to the Old Age Security Act. It is at their request that I have caused this motion to appear under my name on the order paper.

When only one of the spouses receives the old age security pension, the income of the couple becomes insufficient and the wife must, most of the times, resort to welfare. In Quebec, I assure you, Madam Speaker, that it is often disheartening for these people to appeal to officials for their living.

An hon. Member: It is a disgrace!

Mr. Laprise: Those officials, on the orders of the provincial government dole out the allowances in driblets. We know that the federal government has geared old age security pensions to the cost of living. Now, I remember the case of a couple in my constituency; the husband is eligible for old age security pension. Recently, I have received a letter whose main point I would like to have entered into the record. It has been sent to me by a citizen of Taschereau, in my riding, and she acquaints me of the situation.

In October, she writes, my husband received $192.80 as an old age security allowance, plus $43.72 from the Quebec Pension Plan; I, his wife, have received $20 from the welfare, which makes a total amount of $256.52 for the month.

This month, that is in November, she says, in spite of their saying that my husband is going to receive much more, here are the facts: old age security pension, $199.10; QPP, $43.72; welfare, $13; that is to say 70c. less, because of the increase in the old age security allowance.

Then, on the whole, this couple has 70c. less than they received before the increase. Here is indeed a strange increase in income for the aged.

So for the months of October, November and December, this couple received a little less than before. To the government of Quebec, inflation is not a problem, but it is nevertheless true that this couple and many others in the same situation are hit very hard, even harder than those with higher incomes.

The National Council of Welfare, in its report on the situation of the low income consumer on the Canadian market, published in April 1974, explained how families with low incomes have to spend more for food, for example, than families with incomes superior to the average.

We are given the example of a family whose annual income is $3,000 or less and 27.9 per cent of this must be spent on food while a family whose income is $15,000 or more only spends 13.4 per cent. The same goes for housing, clothing and all of life's necessities.

Statistics Canada tell us that the price index went from 100 in 1961 to 188.4 in June 1974 for food; 165.5 for housing; 152.0 for clothing; 169.3 for personal care and hygiene; 151.2 for public transport and 156.9 for recreation, training and reading. That goes to show that the galloping inflation we have known especially from 1968 to 1973 has become dizzying in 1973 and 1974 and we are now being told it will be a knockout in 1975 and it is a cause of concern and hardship for the families and old people in the low income bracket.

That is why the government must come to an agreement with the provincial governments so that this law can be modified to reflect the motion I have moved.

There is also another point on which I want to bring the attention of the government and my colleagues in this House, even though the motion does not deal with it, and it is the guaranteed minimum income supplement that goes with the old age security pension. The pension should be paid in full without any means test because otherwise, as is the case now, those who have a job—however temporary—are being penalized. Those who have a few savings or who paid into a retirement annuity in a private business are being penalized. Since 1966, a legislation forces them to do without part of their salary which is paid into a federal or provincial pension plan, and when they reach the age of retirement, they lose part of the guaranteed income supplement. That is an injustice for those who worked, who paid taxes, who managed to make good use of their savings. Those who did not work half the time, who "invested" their money in taverns, are entitled to everything. A system like that does not make sense.

Let us do away with the tests, let us all recognize that Canadians are entitled to their pensions as soon as they reach 60, and that both husband and wife are entitled to it. That is what we are asking for on behalf of Canadians, and to refuse it to them is not to believe in the wealth of this country, nor in the capacity of our young people to produce goods and services in large quantity as we have already done.

Madam Speaker, I ask the government and government members to consider that motion and respond to it in an objective and above all affirmative way. As I said at the outset, this is not the first time we make that request. I know we must hit the nail several times to get it in but the government must understand that the head of the nail is now at ground level and it is time to get it over with. I am sure my colleagues will put forward other arguments in support of that motion, and I hope that before this day is over the government will show flexibility, and that it will introduce before Christmas the necessary bill to meet the wishes of the Canadian people.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, the motion before us is a very appealing one and I congratulate its mover. Indeed, I congratulate the members of his group generally. I have noted that time after time they have brought forward measures which they consider in the interests of that very important part of the national constituency, the aged and the needy. I think it behooves us as serious legislators—I have said this many times in my public career—to take the attitude at all times that the government must exhibit the greatest care toward those who most need care.

I am not an advocate of the fiscal theories of the Social Credit group, and even if I understood them I do not think I would be, but I nevertheless commend them for being interested in and articulating on behalf of the poor and the elderly people of this country. It is we in this House who must speak for these constituents. We must vote for measures to help them and use the state to help ameliorate the ravages of raging inflation. As I say, I commend the mover of this motion. I have very much sympathy for the thrust of the motion. I think the day will come—and it will not be too far removed from today—when we will be looking at the age of 60 as we now look at the age of 65, and as we once looked at the age of 70, as the time when we put into operation what we now call, and what may some day be changed, our old age security system. I am not terribly old, though I may look it, but I well remember occasions when people have said, "You can't lower the retirement age from 70 to 65 because you will ruin the whole country. You have no idea how much it will cost".

Yet we have survived this de-escalation. The country still exists. It is not as healthy as it would be if we were well governed. But society has not been blown asunder. However, we must never forget that there is far too much poverty in this land. Just because we hear this said day in and day out is no reason for resting content. We are told that one in four Canadians lives on or below the poverty line—and I can assure hon. members it is not gracious living. I know that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) was very callous and cool the other day when I referred to the message of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to the old age pensioners, namely, that they save money by eating stale bread, peanut butter and skim milk powder. The Minister of Justice commented that bread one day old was not stale. "Don't be too fussy with our old people". I presume was his thought.

Mr. Lalonde: Some bread is old when you buy it.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am not going to say that I should have better than the elderly people of this country. If the minister is inviting me to say that, then he does not know me at all. I think the old people of this country should have a more gracious living and be removed from the anxieties that face them.

This is a very serious measure. However, we must be leery of simplistic solutions. We must also not overlook many other areas of need in our society. We must have compassion and concern for our older citizens but we must also always think of those who, for reasons other than age, may not be able to cope with or combat the difficulties of life. My colleague from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), who I hope will be speaking today, has given great leadership and study to the whole question of the place of the disabled in our society, and this must touch us all.

Then there are those who are unemployable for reasons other than age. For example, we have to think of the blind. I have always been appalled at the suggestion of a means test for one who is deprived of the precious gift of sight. Only recently, I must confess, did I learn how far we are behind, not just in this area of governmental concern but in many areas. We have not done nearly enough for our people who are deprived of hearing—another group deserving of great compassion. Then there are those who are recipients under private pension plans and who have seen their pensions shrinking in value in these inflationary times.

The problem of these people cannot easily be dealt with by changing the legislation for which the minister has responsibility; it is more difficult than that. But because it is more difficult and because it affects people in the private sector does not mean that the problem is not acute and sometimes overwhelming. I am told by people who themselves are in this situation that, while we have made some statutory improvements in the field of war veterans' allowance and other related areas, the single veteran is still finding it very hard to live in today's inflationary society. So I suggest there are many areas deserving of consideration.

We must also avoid any unwillingness to face the grimness of the reality. I was appalled when I read a report of the Senate committee on agriculture a few days ago. A very reputable and intelligent person, with good research facilities behind the organization that she represented—the Consumers' Association of Canada—was asked about the use of pet foods for human consumption. She was asked by a very distinguished and compassionate lady senator from my province whether this practice was extensive, and Mrs. Brenchin replied, as reported at page 8 of the report for Thursday, November 14 last:

> Yes, there are numerous well documented cases now, especially concerning the beef chunks, horsemeat and other unmixed canned foods, being used for human consumption. We feel very strongly about this.

And, God help us, so should we all feel very strongly about that situation. Certainly there is a challenge here. I shall always remember the old gentleman in the senior citizens' home who was asked how he coped: he said he bought three pounds of barbecued chicken wings because it was the cheapest food he could find, and he described how many meals he had out of that. Here we have a poor old chap who has worked for many years ending up with chicken wings and loneliness in a senior citizens' home.

Another question that we cannot discuss fully in 20 minutes, or indeed in twice 20 minutes, is what we intend doing about this important balance between state compassion and individual initiative. People today say that the work ethic is passé, that we have encouraged ourselves and our children, in a labour-saving society, to worship the most up to date labour saving devices and then pretend to be surprised when the younger generation is not keen to work.

I think we are less than serious and less than profound if we are not concerned about those things which could diminish individual effort in a group society. It is easy to say that the work ethic is dead and these old Presbyterians and Calvinists are really not "with it". However, I look at some of the countries of the world which compete with us and trim the socks off us in most economic things, such as Japan and West Germany, and I find that the work ethic is not dead. So I am troubled when we have a situation where a man earns more through state aid than he earns through wages.

In saying this I do not attack the state mechanism. I am worried about the economic institution not paying a man enough for the application of his energy, his time, his strength, his intellect or, to use a terribly old-fashioned word, the sweat of his brow. But while we must be compassionate, while we must be sensitive, and while we must be serious and try to be wise, one thing that has always troubled me in respect of these fields in which we are sensitive is that it is very easy to embrace every concept of change. In respect of those about whom we feel sensitive, perhaps we forget, if the time ever comes to translate that feeling into reality, that we might find things rather difficult.

There is one part of this motion which troubles me. It has no personal application, because I am not arranging a second marriage. If the spouse of an old age pensioner is to be regarded also as a recipient, and the age of that person is not considered, I think we could be accused of being a little reckless. If in ten years time, when I would be 65, I were able to convince a 19-year old girl to run the risk of living with me, she would become an old age security recipient for goodness knows how long. She might earn her living if she were living with me. However, I think we must be realistic. My colleague wonders whether I am bragging or complaining, and I will not tell him which it is.

When my party was appealing for public support we said honestly and squarely what we would do. We gave the age of 55. I think the government's announced age—and I wish it would bring in the legislation—of 60 is less realistic than ours. Since the government took the idea from us, I think it should take over the age that we proposed and we would support it. But I cannot honestly go so far as saying that age is immaterial. I know that the motto amor vincit omnia really still prevails, but I do not think we could seriously legislate that age does not matter.

There are two other aspects of this matter with which I should like to deal before I sit down. I know the minister is aware of this as we on this side of the House are aware of it. When we look into the area of considering the spouse who is not of qualified age we immediately have many thoughtful Canadians who ask—and they are right—is it not more likely that the widowed person will be in far greater need than the one who still has a spouse? So when you take that first step—and it is a good one and I am with the members of the Social Credit Party although I think the age figure is too low—then you are open to even greater sensitivity about the people who have been widowed.

One woman wrote to me and said, "I am 63 and my husband is 69. When the government puts the bill through, if I lose my husband in a year's time, what happens? Am I taken off the rolls just when I need help more?" That is another thing we must look at. What do we do about the spouse under 65 who qualifies through marriage—marriage is a partnership and a lot of other things—and what happens when someone is widowed and is still too young to qualify for OAS? I find, as I am sure the minister and the mover of this motion find, that this general question opens many avenues down which we must move with great care.

I do not wish to take all the time available to me, but I reiterate my commendation of the mover of this motion. I express to him my general sympathy for it. However, I have tried to underline with a little realism some of the economic responsibilities this expression of compassion would entail. But I congratulate him for drawing our attention to just the kind of problem that serious legislators should never lose sight of.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) in commending the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) and his party on the subject they have placed before the House of Commons on this allotted day. Any motion dealing with pensioners and calling for an improvement in the position of pensioners has my immediate support, even though I might want to change some of the details in a motion such as the one placed before us. The hon. member for Abitibi was quite correct—I can certainly confirm it—that one of the ways to win improvements for old age pensioners is to keep at the issue day in and day out, week in and week out, year in and year out and decade in and decade out. The encouraging thing is that by keeping at it we do make considerable progress.

I agree with the previous speaker that there are other issues that are of concern in the social security field. The hon. member mentioned several groups, such as the disabled and the blind. He mentioned persons on private pensions, and I would add those on government annuities, and so on. One must also think of those who are in that grey area where they are employed and therefore cannot qualify for social assistance but are not earning enough to have a decent standard of living. We sometimes refer to them as the working poor. It certainly is a fact that the area of social security is an important one in which, even with all that we have done, there is a great deal yet to do. Yet it seems to me it is no excuse for not doing something about old age pensions at age 60 to say that there are other things that should be done which the government is not doing anyway.

Therefore, I welcome this motion with its particular emphasis. I confess that in my view there is a bit of confusion in the motion and a bit of confusion in the mind of the hon. member for Abitibi as to whether what is being pressed is a program for pensions at 60 or a program under which the spouse will receive the pension no matter what the age of the spouse, provided the other spouse qualifies for the pension. In my view, the best way to deal with the matter of providing an income for the younger spouse of a pensioner is to lower the pension age.

As the hon. member for Hillsborough pointed out, if and when the government brings in its bill on pensions for spouses between the ages of 60 and 65, provided the other spouse is over 65, we will immediately be deluged with letters from widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors in that same age bracket who will ask, "If it is possible to provide old age pensions to some people who are between 60 and 65, why not to the rest of us?" I urge that the way some of us have been proposing for a long time is really the way to cope with this problem. In fact, I have it on the order paper in my private member's motion No. 39 which calls for the eligible age under both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to be lowered to 60, with the proviso that between 60 and 65 pensions under those two pieces of legislation should be paid only to those who are out of the labour market. That would include, in most cases, spouses who are younger than the person who is already on the pension and all wives between 60 and 65 who are not in the labour market. It seems to me that this is a better way to do it, because at the same time you are making it possible for widows, spinsters, widowers and bachelors in that age bracket to get the pension if, as I say, they are out of the labour market.

That is why I welcome the motion this afternoon. Its terms are broad enough to allow us to talk about any aspect of social security or pension policy. Indeed, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) can tell us about his orange paper and about the discussions he is having with the provinces. The field is as wide as you can possibly imagine. But no matter how wide the field is, there are times when one should concentrate on a particular point or two. In my view, what is now urgent in the pension field is that we concentrate on two things: one is to get the voluntary pension age down to 60, and the other is to get the basic amount paid under the Old Age Security Act up to $200 a month without a means test of any kind.

With regard to the lowering of the pension age to 60, as I have already said, my view is that the time has not yet come to make it universal at 60 the way it is now at 65, but I insist that the time has come when the pension should be available at 60 to those who are off the labour market. That would include persons like wives, for example, who have not been in the labour market. It would also include those who are working but are prepared to retire.

Mr. Lalonde: All wives?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All wives who are out of the labour market and all husbands out of the labour market, too. I was not indulging in any discrimination when I referred to wives rather than spouses in that context. I was talking about wives who are not in the labour market, and in my view they would be covered by the kind of definition that I suggest. I have no idea how many persons would drop out of the labour market in that age bracket, but I expect it would be several hundred thousand and that this would have an immediate effect on the unemployment situation by opening up a great many jobs for younger persons.

But I am concerned not only for the spouses, the persons who are at home and who are out of the labour market, but about a large number of individuals, working men and women. However, I refer more to working men, for a reason I shall give in a moment, who find the rat race of modern industrial activity a little hard to take over an extended period of time. We had a discussion a few days ago on a bill having to do with the fighting of elections and I had occasion to refer to my favourite method of campaigning at election time, which is to turn up early at shop gates and plant gates in the whole area of greater Winnipeg and to meet a great many working men and women as they are going into those plants.

In the last election, as in the previous ones, the question that was put to me most often, especially by the men who were going into the CPR shops, the CNR shops, Dominion Bridge, Manitoba Bridge, packing plants and so on, was, "When are you going to get the pension age down to 60?" Some of the men who put that question to me appeared, in the grey light of the early morning, older than I am—and around here I am supposed to look old. Some of these men who are asking me for the pensionable age to be lowered to 60 appeared to me to be 63 or 65 already, and in instance after instance I had these men say to me, "I am 57" or "I am 58." The fact is that the rat race of that kind of life is just too hard and I think that they have the right, having gone to work at the age of 25 or even younger or later than that, by the time they are 60, if they want to leave that kind of activity and enjoy the benefits of our social legislation, including in particular old age security and the Canada Pension Plan, to do so.

I know all the arguments that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has. If he has any new ones, I will be delighted to hear them. But he talks about other needs that must be met and the things that he is working on under the aegis of his orange paper, which is a good paper that I like very much. He may even throw at me the question, "What about millionaires between the age of 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market?" There are so few of them that they do not worry me very much. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) could take care of them. I doubt that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will throw that argument at me today after what the Minister of Finance did in his budget. He did not show greater concern for pensioners who are at the lower end of the scale. He showed greater concern for the wealthy. He provided an improvement for the 30 per cent or 40 per cent of pensioners at the top, but he provided nothing for the 55 per cent, 60 per cent or 65 per cent of pensioners at the bottom of the pension income scale.

I say to the minister that it is time for him to get off this kick that there is something wrong with my head-on program for pensions at 60. He should become more aware of the experience in this modern industrial society and realize that this is one of the campaigns that he should be on as well. The campaign to get the pension age down to 60, not on a means test basis or welfare basis but on a voluntary basis. Let those who want to keep on working—some of us may want to go on for a long time—do so, but let those who feel they have had all they can take, or those who are in need, have the opportunity, without any means test, meeting only the test of being out of the labour market, to get their full Canada Pension Plan and their full old age security pension at the age of 60.

Because this motion today gives those of us who feel this way the opportunity to press this point, I am very grateful to my friends in the Social Credit Party for having made it the subject of this allotted opposition day. One of the arguments that we get is that it cannot be done, that it would upset our economy, it would cost a great many dollars and, where is the money coming from? Well, I have not been here through the whole history of pensions, but I was reading and following what was going on back in the middle 1920s and I have been here for most of the changes that have taken place. I simply have to say that that has been the argument every time. When J. S. Woodsworth stood in this House and called for a pension of $20 a month payable at age 70, he was told by the minister of finance of that day that the country could not afford it. When it got over to the other place, they used the argument that it would bankrupt the country to pay $20 pensions to our old people. They said it would not be good for older people to have this kind of hand-out from the state.

Mr. Speaker, we got the pension started in the middle twenties. In January, 1927, It became effective at $20 a month at age 70, with a severe means test. When I came here in the early forties it was still that pension. I can remember that when I was arguing that it should be raised from $20 to $30 and the age brought down to 65, with the means test removed, I was told by the older men of that day that I had some good ideas but it could not be done. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have succeeded in getting the pension raised from $20 a month to almost $120 as a basic pension, without a test of any kind, and we have had the age reduced to 65. That is one of the most recent instances of something being done that they said could not be done. The day finally came when Mr. Pearson and his government realized they could reduce the age a year at a time from 70 to 65.

More recently we were told that we could not escalate the old age pension by more than 2 per cent per year. During the days of the minority government, however, we got that 2 per cent ceiling removed and pensions now escalate according to the statistical increase in the cost of living. I shall have something to say—time does not permit me to go into it now—about the way it is always calculated behind the time when it is needed, and so on. The point I am making is that all the things we are now doing in terms of pensions are things we were told earlier could not be done. Let us not have any more of the suggestion that pensions cannot be lowered to age 60. Let us put it down to 64 now, 63 next year, and so on. Other improvements have been won, and this improvement can also be won. In my view, it is a matter of great urgency.

In a moment I shall indicate one of the reasons I am glad my friends put this subject down today. I would rather we had debated my motion, which I think is more comprehensive, but the luck of the draw was against me. I drew position No. 39 with my private member's motion, so the chances of its being reached are not good. I am therefore glad to have this debate today because we are a few months ahead of the day when the Minister of National Health and Welfare will bring in his bill on pensions for spouses where those spouses are between 60 and 65 and where the other spouse is a pensioner. It has the proviso, however, that the younger person is to get a pension only on the basis of an income test. I hope the minister will give me credit for the struggle to say "income test". As far as I am concerned, it is still a "means" test, but I know he is sensitive about the word.

The reason I am glad to have this debate today is that it gives us a chance to plead with the minister to go further with that bill. During the election campaign, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the program of pensions for spouses he said it would create problems. He referred to spinsters, widows and other persons and said it had to be a tentative program. I say to him that the government will have a great deal of trouble over a program as limited as the one that is proposed, and they should think about it now. The bill that has been promised for pensions only for spouses between 60 and 65, on an income test, should be transformed into a program that meets the needs of today. That is, Mr. Speaker, a program of pensions at 60 for those not in the labour market. This should apply both to old age security and the Canada Pension Plan, and the time for this is now.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, today I speak on behalf of the government against the motion proposed by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) who has advocated that the old age security pension be given to any person who has reached the age of 60, as well as to the spouse even if the spouse has not reached pensionable age. The question is not really as simple as the Crédit Social would like it to appear and it must be looked at from an altoghether different aspect than just lowering the age to 60 in order to obtain the old age security. We must ask the question, "How well can all the other needs and the needs of people who are not old be given the attention they deserve?" This question becomes important if we allow spending to increase income maintenance for the elderly only.

I should like to remind hon. members that the elderly are being well taken care of by the government. I will leave it to other speakers on behalf of the government to speak of the benefits available to the elderly. However, I would point out that government programs are already available for any person who becomes sick and is not able to work prior to age 65. Such persons would draw benefits under the Canada Pension Plan already in existence, benefits under the assistance available to veterans, or from the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Speaker, this motion is asking the government to set a new age for retirement. Such a measure would entail a great deal of expenditure by the government, expenditure which is needed in other areas.

The question arises: Are we certain that this area requires new action right now by the government? Is it really our most pressing social problem? Because if implemented, it probably would absorb for some time to come a lot of the additional tax resources available to the government. The cost of such a proposal has been estimated at almost $1⅔ billion of net additional expenditure. Again, Mr. Speaker, one must look at the needs of all the Canadian people and at the government's responsibility to fulfil those needs. It is proper for the government to think in terms of those who are retired, and they have put forth some fine plans to appeal to that age group, such as New Horizons, the Canada Pension Plan and its recent amendments which come into effect January 1, 1975, as well as senior citizens' housing and homes for persons unable to take care of themselves. As well, there is the increase every three months in the OAS and the GIS.

But there are in our society many other people with needs which are attended to by the government of Canada. They must also be looked at in the perspective of benefits provided by the government in terms of the elderly. What are these needs? There are problems other than social security, such as pollution abatement, energy resource development, transportation and problems in our north, to mention a few, which are applicable across Canada. There are social problems apart from income security. They are mainly health care, housing, native development and day-care. These are just some of the areas to which the government must direct its attention and try to meet the needs that exist.

Also, there are the investment programs designed to give Canadians income security from their own employment. Such programs consist of economic development, manpower training and regional expansion programs of all varieties. These programs cry for greater attention, and should have the attention of the government in order that their greater development may come about because they benefit so many Canadians. Apart from considering where government money should be spent, we must remember that many people who are not old rely on the government for income support. These people include the disabled, the physically or mentally handicapped, mothers on their own caring for children, veterans, and foster parents caring for unwanted children. All these people must be encompassed in a program which considers their needs. The question is, how do their needs stand in relation to the need to retire people at age 60, because many people 60 years old can and do earn an income?

Finally, there are also those whose unemployment insurance benefits are inadequate to meet their needs, and there are people in Canada who must be given a supplement of some type in order that they may maintain a minimum standard of earnings. The government has directed itself to the problem of these people and of others as evidenced in the review made in the orange paper, the Working Paper on Social Security tabled in the House in 1973 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

There are a number of questions which should be asked about the desirability of implementing this proposed program as opposed to making improvements to other government programs, for it is impossible to move in all fields simultaneously without bankrupting the Canadian public. Again, one must balance the question of providing earlier pensions against providing more adequately for the needs of non-senior citizens who are unable to support themselves, such as the physically handicapped, the mentally retarded, and one-spouse families. To demonstrate the existing disparity between the income support available to senior citizens and that available to people who are unable to work, it should be noted that in all but one instance—that of the single person rate in Newfoundland—OAS and GIS guarantee levels for single persons and married couples above the rates paid by the provinces for single persons and couples on welfare. Taking the situation in July of this year, OAS and GIS provided $2,306 a year for a single person and $4,400 for a married couple. At the same time, Ontario, New Brunswick and British Columbia, to give just three examples, each had a maximum assistance rate which was below $2,000 a year for a single person. Some figures applying to a married couple are as follows: in British Columbia, $3,240; in Nova Scotia, $3,072.

What about the priority of rehabilitation programs whose aims are helping people who might otherwise rely on welfare to regain or retain their ability to support themselves and their families? These include activities aimed at the vocational rehabilitation of the disabled as well as many programs mounted by the Department of Manpower to assist people with employment difficulties. These programs involve training, mobility, job placement and job creation. They also include many measures aimed at stimulating economic expansion in less developed regions, including native communities. In general, then, the question is this: Given the tremendous amount of new spending which this measure proposed by the Social Credit Party would require, how will the other needs, particularly the individual needs of people not between 60 and 64 years of age, be met?

I remind hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that the federal and provincial ministers of welfare decided in April, 1973, to launch a comprehensive review of the entire Canadian social security system. The objective of the review was to analyse the system as a whole, not just piece by piece on an ad hoc basis, in order to implement on an integrated basis major reforms urgently needed in all areas. The review was subsequently endorsed by the Canadian first minister's conference. Through this review, the needs of Canadians of all ages will be examined as a whole. The review will investigate the condition of single as well as married people—that is, of both men and women—workers, people who do not work, and people who could work but cannot secure a job, bread-winners and dependants, people who manage on their own and people who need institutional care. It will investigate the condition of people across Canada in cities, towns and rural areas.

Introducing ad hoc measures to help only one area of need on the basis of consideration of one group of our population only, and moving unilaterally on behalf of only one level of government would certainly run counter to the spirit of the review, of federal-provincial co-operation and of integrated action based on commonly perceived priorities. To stress again the central point, all such assessments will take place within a total analytical spectrum and future action will be aimed at ensuring maximum over-all efficiency, effectiveness and co-ordination of total government social security expenditure. It is felt that this method is superior to simply piling more patches on top of existing patches in a social security quilt that is already too short in some places and too threadbare in others.

We ought to look at costs. How much will such programs cost the Canadian people? Without going into too many details, I wish to consider economic costs, social costs and costs to the financial community in general. The economic costs must be considered and I stress the need for an in-depth analysis of this area. When considering economic costs, factors such as the loss of trained manpower must be considered, early retirement provisions may induce certain highly skilled and trained members of our work force to retire from active employment at an age below which less skilled workers might consider retiring.

We must consider, also, the ability of people to pay for early retirement. On the one hand, early retirement will reduce the working life of such people but will increase the cost of pensions, and on the other hand, such early retirement will reduce the ability of the economy to produce the level of real income that is needed to support a program of early retirement. We must also consider under economic costs the drop in income. Even generous pensions will provide less than can be realized by wages. In some cases the pension will not meet a person's needs and that person, after retiring, will be forced to seek social assistance.

We must also consider the social cost to the Canadian people. We must consider the problem of health. Studies show that the status of employment is a determining factor in the health of the elderly who are employed, however, this is not the only consideration to be borne in mind. Retirement from employment may have adverse effects on one's health, even if one's physical condition had remained constant prior to retirement. Also, will earlier retirement result in increased institutional care costs for senior citizens, as well as increased housing costs for senior citizens who cannot find suitable accommodation in the private market, at a price they can afford once their income has been reduced?

Finally, one must consider the social consequences of early retirement or the negative public image of an elderly person. Will persons who retire early be willing to face the prevalent, negative image attached to elderly persons or to those who retire before retirement age?

As well, we must bear in mind the increased costs to be borne by the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan in cases of early retirement. Will early retirement bring about labour-management difficulties, or will such retirement in special areas bring about specific labour shortages? I stress these points as they must be considered. It is the Canadian public who will be asked to support such programs. Increased taxes may be necessary if we are to support people who retire at an earlier age.

In conclusion, I remind hon. members opposite that the aims of their motion are not feasible at this time due to the greater needs of the Canadian people which must be attended to by the Government of Canada in ensuring that all Canadians will benefit. To state without further ado that the age of retirement should be lowered to 60, when many feel that they should not retire even at 65, is to put forward a most uncompromising proposition to the people of Canada. The overriding principle is that we must do what we can for the Canadian people, but we must resist at this time, what is proposed in view of new legislation affecting the Canada Pension Plan and measures proposed in the budget.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by my colleagues of the Social Credit Party, and I would like to congratulate them for having introduced such a motion in this House. I would also like to urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) to consider very carefully that need of those 60 years of age and over.

I would like to confess at once, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to take up the time allotted to me to indulge in negative criticism—quite the opposite. I would not want to be one of those who would simply say that the minister did not make any efforts. On the contrary, I know that the minister did make efforts to deal with the difficulties facing those people, proposed solutions and is now discussing with the provinces this guaranteed annual income which I think is an excellent thing.

The government is now considering with the provinces three plans of guaranteed minimum income. This is somewhat of an urgent necessity if we want to make our social security system more simple, more consistent and more effective, and especially if we want to put up a better fight against poverty.

The studies under way on income security and eventually a guaranteed minimum income are a central point in the debates and the needs of today. The present social programs and the old age security pension are currently under consideration for people of 65 years of age.

Following the many arguments that were put to me, and I think the same arguments were raised in other ridings, I personally conducted a survey in my riding. Out of 6,000 answers, 98 per cent were in favour of old age security at 60, but with the choice left to the individual so that he might either take a deserved retirement or continue to work when in very good health.

I would like to seize this opportunity to seek the minister's support so that the matter will receive particular attention and I invite him to consider the possibility.

I shall certainly be told that the government has already increased the old age security and welfare allowances. True, it has done so; we know perfectly well that it had to do it considering the cost of living. I have no intention whatsoever of repeating that the government has not considered the social security problem, but I believe there is urgency and personally I agree 100 per cent with the Social Credit motion before us today.

As for the comments I get in my riding, I have every reason to believe other members in other ridings are told the same things. How far should the government go in financing such a program? We might discuss the matter later on.

I think we should consider seriously the possibility of allowing people over 60 to take a well deserved rest. I believe that if we fail to consider that question today, when we are perfectly aware of the present situation, we may be facing old age security at 55 within 10 or 15 years. In my opinion, we would make a colossal mistake if we refused to give that matter every necessary consideration. I believe that is nearly seven years, since I represent my riding, I have never hesitated once nor have I missed once the opportunity to recommend that measure, and I think I was right.

We undoubtedly keep hearing of the expense and the possible cost of such a step. However, no one has ever been able to figure out the cost of maintaining 400,000 or 500,000 unemployed people. I believe manpower mobility would provide young men and women with job opportunities when they graduate from universities and often find with disgust that there are no jobs available for them. This would be a positive step for those young people, if we consider that 25 per cent of them are under 25 and claim unemployment insurance benefits.

There are apparently 786,000 people between the ages of 60 and 65. It might be possible to grant old age pensions as of 1975 for a period of five years to 64 year old people. According again to 1971 figures, there were at the time 145,000 people of 64 years of age.

I believe the implementation of such a measure, along with the implementation of the guaranteed annual income as mentioned by the Minister, might be extremely worthwhile. However, this is apparently not for the near future. Nevertheless the government is still thinking of that step which I think is very worthwhile, but if we consider the situation of people 65 years old especially in the light of technical changes in our industry, we know perfectly well that the same machine in any industry is running a lot faster than it was 15, 20 or even 30 years. ago. Therefore, these people who never had to rush during their working hours are quite unable to keep up with this modern technology, and if we really want to humanize the industrial sector, we feel the need to apply this measure, and many of those would certainly be willing to retire at 60.

We must also consider the case of the wife who is not 65 yet. We could at least go even further than the proposal put forward by the government and take into consideration the fact that the wife under 65 who cannot receive a pension puts the couple in a very difficult position, something which is not provided for at the present time.

I would like to urge the minister to reconsider his position as concerns the granting of old age security at 60.

I said that in 1968 we had 175,000 unemployed, and I sincerely believe that we could have eliminated the problems caused by this unemployment rate. Apparently to fight inflation, the unemployment rate was increased starting in 1968, but we find ourselves, and I say this without malice, with 400,000 to 500,000 unemployed and we still have inflation to boot. If we look at the figures for 1971, we see that there were 800,000 people between 60 and 65. Had we granted old age security at 60 over five years, I believe that we would have solved the unemployment problem which worsened from year to year, while allowing those who wanted to do so to take a well-deserved rest.

In my constituency, for instance, there are approximately 3,000 people aged 60 to 65; there are not necessarily 3,000 unemployed. I believe that if we had lowered the retirement age to 64 in 1968, to 63 in 1969, and so on, we would have gone a long way towards solving the unemployment problem, which is extremely expensive.

Once again, I would urge the government or the minister responsible to consider this. We must admit that a government must be very serious and do some serious thinking before implementing a program which would apparently cost more than $1 billion. I believe we should also take into account the advantages of such legislation and the savings that it could bring about by reducing unemployment.

I wonder if, up to a point, it would involve anything more than the reallocation of certain funds, which would give a holiday to those who deserve it and benefit the young people who are still looking for jobs.

Those are the few comments I wanted to make on this motion, Mr. Speaker. But I was also thinking of the morale of the worker, for instance. We are well aware that several workers deplore the fact that social measures apply to some individuals who, without, work, often give the impression to the workers that they are more intelligent than they are.

As far as the worker is concerned, the tax levied on his wages is used once again to enable other people to remain unemployed.

I think that if such a measure were enforced, the worker would be willing and pleased to contribute to such a legislation, because at 60 years of age, he would take it seriously. Today his contributions would allow his parents to take a rest thanks to an adequate pension. I think that he would be pleased to do so. As a result, the worker would have a much greater motivation than he has today because of increased benefits which would be very costly to the government.

[Mr. La Salle.]

We are considering a specific motion which should ensure that such a measure would be to the advantage of the community. Consequently, I will not hesitate in due time, if we have to vote, to support such a motion, because it would give those people a chance to have a well deserved rest, and would also he highly beneficial both to our younger and older citizens and to all those who are looking for jobs. Given the context of a society undergoing tremendous changes, we owe it to ourselves to reconsider the legislation before us.

It is not enough, I think, to consider the possibility of having people retire at the age of 60. It is also our duty to consider the overall social aspect of the measure and the social context in which these people are living.

I think it is advisable and urgent, before undertaking any further studies, to have the basis of the old age security programs changed so that the qualifying age for pension be set between 60 and 65 in harmony with all the social programs which the Minister is now considering, and this in co-operation with the provinces. I think it would be appropriate to have this matter considered in relation with people who have reached age 60.

I also suggest that if we want to do something beneficial and humanitarian for those people, we should also consider whatever relates to this category of people such as transportation, for example. We know that this group of people often ask for certain privileges or certain benefits in connection with transportation, housing or lodging, medical prescriptions, home care and a whole list of services.

I would even go so far as to say that when the government implemented the New Horizons Program they deserved to be congratulated. They showed extraordinary initiative but it still seems that for these people the government is still short of funds. I think it is our responsibility to co-operate in promoting and organizing their leisure time and an interesting life from age 60 though the limit is now set at 65, but could be 60.

I think that a social policy for this category of people should take all those aspects into account and deal with them with all due attention. Adequate allowances are very important for them. It is important to consider the wife who unfortunately is not eligible because of her age. Whether we want it or not, we must absolutely do it. Secondly, all these factors which are part of the life of any individual at that age must be provided for in a general program which will definitely give these people a further lease on life, the benefits they are entitled to and the possibility of doing something by way of recreation.

So with these comments, Mr. Speaker, I am once again very objectively asking the minister to consider these possibilities and pass these measures as soon as possible. We know that in the primary industries there are workers aged 60 who are terribly eager to retire. And I think that such comments are received from all ridings and they are heard very often. I think that introducing this motion in the House was a good thing. As a member of this House I think it is fair to recommend this to the attention of the minister and I would be very happy to support the government if they presented us tomorrow with a similar proposal to fulfill the needs of thousands of individuals. I would be very happy to see that the government has at last understood that it is important to implement such a legislation.

Miss Monique Bégin (Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, it is with great compassion that I have given thought to the motion put forward today by the Social Crediters in order to reduce, to lower to 60 the pensionable age. Besides, I must admit that my compassion for senior citizens, not for the Social Crediters, suffers badly from the hidden electoralism which I have had to hear pouring forth for a while from opposition speakers.

For anyone engaged in an election campaign, especially in Quebec, may I suggest that a lot of that kind of propositions made by the candidates of the Social Credit Party might amount to gross electoralism. This is evidenced, for example, by this cute little green book whose printing, by the way, must have cost a fortune for a so-called needy and needy inclined party, and which has been distributed in my constituency and is entitled "Le Parti Crédit Social propose". We find on page 9, and this is the startling example I use as an evidence, or at least as a rather obvious indication that the proposition, the motion now before us might not be inspired as they would like us to believe by such pure, candid and responsible motives.

Today, in a rather vague motion, we find a proposal to lower the eligibility age from 65 as it is now to 60. In a few minutes I will speak purposely on its cost, as I belong to a government party which is responsible for the costs involved in that.

During the election campaign, hardly four or five months ago, much more than that was promised, it was not difficult as they were not in power. They were far from Parliament and questions could not be put to them either. So here is what they promised: for any older citizen, not 65 but 60 or more, a supplement to the pension—now paid to people over 65—of $1,500 a year. And for any spouse under 60, the pension plus a supplement of $1,000 a year. We must remember that, if we put that in dollars and cents as we have to in the end, the taxpayers, the Canadian people as a whole are paying for the programs created afterwards by the federal government.

Here is what it means in figures: there are now about two million Canadians who receive either the basic monthly pension of $117 or also the guaranteed income supplement. To those two million people would be added—just like that, as if it were a drop in the bucket—all those between 60 and 65, another 1,150,000 persons, pardon me, more precisely 830,000 persons, plus the spouses under 60, that is each spouse of a person qualified for a pension, which means 320,000 persons. Therefore the two million recipients would grow to—

Mr. Lalonde: Two billion.

Miss Bégin: —recipients, I am not talking about benefits.

Mr. Lefebvre: They do not care.

Miss Bégin: The two million recipients would grow to 3,150,000 and, to top it off, just like that, a small $1,500 a year. Easier said than done when one is not on the government side and cannot possibly hope to be. I challenge the Social Credit leader, whom I can see seated at his desk and who has been applauding me for a while, I do not know for what reason, I challenge him to tell me at once how much that program would cost the federal government, namely the taxpayers. Does he have the slightest idea about it? I just took a piece of paper and a pencil—

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I seek the privilege of answering my hon. colleague. Since Women's Year is coming, I would not dare take up a challenge by a woman.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. The hon. member may request the right to reply, but he will do so at the right time, which is when he is recognized to make a contribution. This is a motion by the Créditiste party and there will be ample opportunity in the debate for members of that party to take the floor.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, my calculations amount to four billion dollars. Here, Mr. Minister, are the billions—four billion dollars, that is two thirds of the whole budget of the province of Quebec.

That is very easy. I noticed, for that matter, that the previous speaker, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), goes hard at it when he says this, very piously, and he is not the only member of the opposition who talked very piously this afternoon—everybody here is particularly religious on that subject today, whereas I contend that it is a public lie to deceive the people into thinking that we can afford this immediately—he says he would with great pleasure vote with the Créditistes on this resolution if it were put, while knowing very well—for he has been in this House long enough—that this resolution does not call for a vote, since it expires automatically under Standing Order 58(11). I find it a little easy for one to advocate something one knows very well one will never be able to put into practice. That amounts to telling the people, who do not have the same reference documents as we do, things that they are not in a position to check for themselves.

Going rapidly over the present situation, we know that old age pension was granted in 1952. At that time there was no guaranteed income supplement, and the pension only consisted in a monthly $40. A more flexible system was implemented in 1967 to alleviate the situation of people who were really in need. The concept of a guaranteed income according to needs was introduced, and both amounts have of course gone up steadily. It may not be as high as we might hope, for we can never ask for too much on behalf of old people. And that very feeling of guilt that we all share in respect of retired people is currently being taken advantage of with all that fuss about the alleged emergency to lower immediatly the retirement age for everyone, and to multiply the amounts to be paid under that program.

I think people's emotions are being manipulated—at least they were considerably manipulated during the electoral campaign—for in our days when the bulk of population concentrates in towns where families do not have sufficient accommodation to keep their old parents, and when provincial governments, in many instances, have unfortunately not provided for the creation of a sufficient number of homes for the aged where required, it is unfortunately too easy to suggest that we have not done enough, and that the government is deliberately disregarding older people.

Let me add that I for one believe that pension age should not be lowered to 60, and that the time is not right. I think it should be received at 55, and this should have been done 30 years ago. I see the problem in a different light. Let me explain: 55-year-old people—and I am concerned with real problems, not with easy and reverent phrases—55-year-old people can easily and could, 20 or 30 years ago, be overly tired, for they generally worked in physically exhausting and often unacceptable social conditions.

Canadians have today the highest life expectancy in the world, namely 76 for women and between 72 and 74 for men. I no longer have the precise figures, but women do not die easily! Although I do not have the detailed statistics, I want to say that the higher our life expectancy, the more a lower pensionable age would be sought, without the least thought of facing the music and considering the problem, the possible consequences of employment interruption that would be forced upon a whole segment of the population.

I must say at this point that for every letter I received during the election campaign asking me to lower the pensionable age to 60, I got one asking me to retain the right to work for people in the same age group. Then the universality principle so dear to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who asserted it no later than a few days or a few weeks ago is then open to question and challenged.

I do not feel that this matter can be so easily solved. As I said, I am interested in real concrete problems and not so much in ideologies easy to convey, because quite emotional, but which are deceiving the man in the street.

We would have to dismiss suddenly and arbitrarily all labour force between 60 and 65 years of age if we wish to maintain universality. This could directly make some people ill due to the disruption of their way of living, because in the Canadian community, the social institutions are not organized to meet the new needs of the group between 60 and 65 years of age who would be more and more active as a result of the increased longevity of the Canadian people.

It is a problem which the Creditists have not yet solved. I repeat that I would have like to see that measure applied 30 years ago, but if it was not, I think that we can sincerely say that the economic possibilities of the federal budget, perhaps also the lack of general sensibility did not allow it, but there was probably no bad faith involved.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will point out three extremely urgent problems which should be solved when referring to the needs of senior citizens.

The hon. parliamentary secretary mentioned several of those among which I would like to deal with one in particular. She mentions here social priorities in general, and not only those of people over 60 years old. Among Canadian social priorities, I would like to deal with that of single parent families in need. I will add to this three concrete problems which, in my opinion, are especially related to the last part of the second half of life. First, the employment problem for all those who lose their job after 50. I am obviously talking about the problem in large cities, which is the one I know best. The unwritten but very real discrimination of employers against any unemployed individual who has to write down on his forms that he is 51, 52, 53 years old and even more, even if he is in perfect health, should be erased from our traditions as quickly as possible.

Second, there is the urgent social problem of older single people, very often women, who had to bring up their brothers and sisters or help their aged parents and who, because of the structure of our society, did not have any special professional or technical training and who, at 50 or 60, do not receive any assistance from other members of the family and find themselves alone after having lost the parents to whom they devoted their life.

Thirdly, I wish to mention the couples who will be covered by the government proposal which we hope will be implemented in January 1975, couples in which one of the spouses is not yet of retirement age, that is couples who must suddenly start living on the pension of a single person after living on a salary and who obviously cannot manage it.

Mr. Speaker, I would have many other things to say about this problem which is very important to Canadians. It is obvious that everyone would like the retirement age lowered, and indeed, not even to 60. Some people who are 30 years old would also like it to be lowered. A great many people would like to see the retirement age lowered as soon as possible. All members of this House certainly want everything possible to be done for senior citizens. This is a basis of common understanding about which there is a consensus.

However, Mr. Speaker, I shall never accept that they tell stories to lead our people to believe that a budget which represents over two third of that of the entire province of Quebec can be found like this, without even saying from where it would come.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to support the motion moved today in this House by my very good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), a motion which reads as follows:

> This House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

I want more particularly to thank and congratulate my colleague for having moved such a motion in the House on a number of occasions. I feel that it will mark an era, because it repeats what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was saying during the last election campaign. It aims at bringing the case of senior citizens before the House, so that they may be allowed to retire at age 60 on an optional basis. I do not agree with the previous speaker that this motion provides for universal retirement at age 60. The purpose of our motion is to lower to 60 the retirement age, but on a voluntary basis, that is for those who want it, in addition to enable the spouse of a retired person to automatically receive the old age security pension.

I consider that this is a major problem which is not easy to deal with but which requires a great deal of tact if one is to discuss it objectively. However, this problem is quite real and is becoming increasingly serious due to the ever rising cost of living. Faced with this situation, the government must take prompt action, and I feel the only position that the hon. members can take is to pursue a common goal without animosity or political partisanship, that is to find solutions as quickly as possible.

I intend, Madam Speaker, during the few minutes at my disposal, to look at what has been done up to now in various places, in order to put this debate in its true perspective. Afterwards, since this motion contains three aspects, I intend to talk first of all about the lowering of the retirement age to 60, then about the automatic eligibility to pension of the spouse and finally I will deal with the voluntary retirement for those who are between 60 and 65 years of age.

If we consider the historical background of this motion, and if we look at what is being done elsewhere, we first realize that opinions on the retirement age vary considerably according to economic requirements and special situations that occur during the life of a nation.

In times of unemployment, as is now the case in Canada, the public opinion requires that retiring age be lowered so that more older people may leave the labour market and give way to younger workers. On the other hand, it must be pointed out that the difficulty which older workers are facing to find a job also contributes to the need for lowering the retirement age. That is what happend in Denmark in 1932, when labour unions asked that retirement age be reduced from 65 to 60. The same reactions have led the British trade unions to advocate a lower retirement age and a higher limit for compulsory school attendance so as to make jobs available for young people and find them more work. It can then be said that it is the needs which guide the decisions of the countries in that connection.

One notices also that this problem is not a new one and that long before us other countries recognized the need to lower the pension age and passed legislation to that effect, an Act was even passed in New Zealand in 1898, to grant a pension to men and women of 60 or over. An amendment passed in 1911 in that same country lowered the pension age to 60 for men and to 55 for women, whenever the claimants had two or more dependent children of 15 or under.

Another amendment passed in 1913 granted superannuation pensions to all persons of 60 or over.

The act passed in Australia in 1908 granted superannuation pensions to men and women of 65 or over. That minimum age was lowered to 60 in 1910 and as far as I know, Australia did not go bankrupt as a result. The same amendment also provided that permanently handicapped men could retire at 60.

In Canada for instance, we had to wait until 1927 for a $20 monthly pension in the case of people of 70 or over.

All that, madam Speaker, goes to show that the problem exists in all countries, at least in the industrialized ones, and that as far as Canada is concerned, it took perhaps a little more time to get worse on account of the favourable economic context of the twenties. But I believe that state of the economy which was considered favourable in 1920 has changed now and that time has come for us to consider lowering the pension age to 60, a year at a time if necessary.

I come now to the main point of this motion, namely the lowering, progressive or not, from 65 to 60, of the age of eligibility to the old age security pension. There exist, with regard to that age level, special and often trying problems that could be solved or at least reduced with the lowering of the pension age.

Madam Speaker, there are people between 60 and 65 who do not earn enough and who have to depend on parents or on welfare and must beg for this or that in order to provide for their essential needs.

There are also the sick people who in spite of their poor health do their utmost to go to work until they reach the pension age, namely the age of 65. I represent a riding where several big factories or industries, mines or papermills are located. I often receive comments from those workers, the great majority of which would like to have the alternative to retire at 60. Mrs. Speaker, I want that point to be understood clearly! They write that they would like to have that alternative.

Furthermore, in asbestos mills such as those in Asbestos and Thetford and in papermills such as those in Brompton and Windsor in my riding, additional problems have appeared those last few years, namely the outbreak of diseases called industrial diseases.

There is also the fact that faced with economic difficulties, industries and factories demand an ever increasing output from their employees, whatever be their age; this affects the elder in a particular way and often contributes directly to shorten their lives.

Moreover, the pension at 60 would enable several younger healthy people in the bloom of youth to replace the elder willing to retire.

Furthermore, such a measure would remove the difficulties for those between 60 and 65 who are laid off for lack of capacity and do not manage to get back on the labour market.

Madam Speaker, when the Western industrial giants like Chrysler Canada Ltd., Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited and the like lay off thousands of workers such as is presently the case due to the economic crisis, the same happens with smaller enterprises. That means more and more massive lay-offs and those less able to find a new job are still the oldest workers. Hence the urgent need for adequate solutions like the one we are proposing. There are several points in favour of lowering the age of retirement, but I referred to the most important ones.

Now I should like to talk a little about the second principle in the motion before us, namely to give automatically the pension to the wife of a pensioner.

In the present circumstances, it seems to me more and more necessary that the wife of a pensioner also receive a pension simultaneously. My constituents strongly advocated this approach and the problems submitted to us are often very distressing. For example, we have the case of the husband who retires at 65, but who is the only one to get a pension because his wife is younger than he is; often, the wife will work if she can still do so; she will work hard sometimes. She will clean floors or do similar tasks, or she will ask her member of the legislative assembly to write to the welfare people to get her a pittance from the provincial government.

I think that in 1974, the situation has lasted long enough and that we should give a pension to the wife as soon as the husband gets his.

Turning to another aspect, Madam Speaker, we propose that those between 60 and 65 not be forced into retirement but rather that they may do so if they consider it suitable.

Major objections were in fact raised, and often rightly so, about the fact that compulsory retirement would sometimes create serious problems. That is not the case for the sick, the handicapped, the non-retrainable, or those for whom it is impossible to go back to work. On the other hand, such a compulsory measure could be prejudicial to those who have obligations up until the age of retirement or even are in good health and want to continue working until 65.

The best answer to all those problems is what we are now proposing, that the pension at age 60 be optional and up to the individual. Several difficulties would thus be avoided, and the freedom of the individual would be upheld.

Madam Speaker, I am under the impression that the government should now be in a position to accept our motion, at least follow it up very soon with very specific measures since several members on the government side including the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), as well as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stressed the soundness of such measures as well as their principles in that respect.

To illustrate that the attitude of this government is in line with our motion, I would simply like to refer to statements made during the last election campaign in the month of July 1974. There was talk about the subject-matter of our motion today in the context of the "integrated system of social security" as laid before the people of Canada by the Liberal party in power during the last general election. For example, in the newspaper Le Droit of June 21, 1974, quoting from an article by Fay Larivière:

> Sherbrooke—The Prime Minister restated Thursday his intention of providing Canada with a revised and integrated social security system in cooperation with the provinces in line with the guidelines set out in the working paper of April 1973 tabled in the Commons by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Marc Lalonde.
> The first measure implemented will be to extend the benefits, subject to a means test, to the wife of an old age security pensioner if she is between 60 and 65.

However small, it would be at least be a first step, a gesture indicating an intention to improve the situation in this area. All the more as since then, the cost of living has kept increasing. The situation has become even more difficult for people of 60.

Recently, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) announced some tax cuts for lower income groups, thus showing his willingness to deal with the difficulties caused by our economic situation. It was all very well, but I feel it is time for us to do something about pensionable age.

Madam Speaker, every political party saw fit to raise the matter during the election campaign. The time has now come for the members to act. For all these reasons, I believe that now more than ever it is time to do something positive or at least to give the Canadian people an inkling about it.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—GOVERNMENT'S NEGLECT TO PAY OLD AGE PENSION TO PERSONS AGED 60 AND THEIR SPOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Laprise:

> That this House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, I have listened religiously to the previous speakers during this debate on the motion of the Social Credit Party. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin), and I think it would be rather expensive to implement such a program.

But before I expound my philosophy on this subject, I would point out to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) that, in my opinion, the Progressive Conservative Party has a short memory. I must explain because the hon.

member for Joliette stated at great length during the election campaign what he has just said.

But I have here an official document on the elections of the last few years. I notice that under the Progressive Conservative government from 1957 to 1963 the pension plan was only increased by $10 in seven years, that is less than $1.50 a year. We can then appreciate the record of the Progressive Conservative party as regards the old age security pension.

As soon as the liberals were elected in 1963, the increase was by $10, and a comparison between both records will show that under the liberals, the pension was increased from $75 in 1963 to an amount of $117.02, in October 1974, with an escalation clause, which added to the guaranteed income supplement comes to $199.10 for single people and $189.91 for a married couple.

Mr. Lalonde: This amount will be raised to $204 in January.

Mr. Roy (Laval): And the Minister just tells me that this amount will be increased to $204 in January.

Madam Speaker, such was the performance of the Progressive Conservative Party when it was in power regarding that policy, compared with the Liberal government's performance. I would raise the following question: it now seems much easier for the Conservatives to take a stand on social measures than on the oil problem. There is no unanimity in that area, because the problem seems complicated, but on social measures, they are asking for more and more and once again, we see nothing wrong with that.

Madam Speaker, when I was asked to speak today I sought inspiration in a document I have here and entitled "Je ne demande que de servir". We find in it the words of a man of extraordinary energy and courage. Here are the words of His Excellency Governor General Georges Vanier, and I quote:

> Old age does not come from the number of years lived. I firmly believe we get old only when we relinquish our ideal. Indeed, the symptoms of old age are fear and discouragement, while youth is characterized by an attitude of health and confidence, especially toward young ones.

Nowadays, attraction is toward material things. We have a tendency to stress standard of living rather than the aim of life.

In passing judgment on a social policy, it is not enough to blame the government for not bringing pensionable age down to 60. We all strive for social betterment; but improvements in this area, or in the field of economic development, are not brought about by random attempts or by momentaneous pressures. They have to be planned, with the cooperation of all the people and every social agency, both at the preparation and implementation stage. According to Statistics Canada, the 65-year old and above will number 2.5 million in 1985, a 47 per cent increase over the last census. Extrapolation indicates for the year 2000 an extra 700,000, 88 per cent more than in the 1971 census. All this points to a well planned program. Social improvement is an essential factor in economic development, to the extent it helps improve human resources.

Old Age Pensions

Madam Speaker, I would like to deal in the next few minutes with another aspect of today's debate.

I do not pretend to be an expert on old age. I would like nonetheless to give my humble views, even if they are not shared by members opposite. The latter I would refer to as "today's spendthrifts". They propose the most simplistic, the most materialistic of solutions, namely reducing pensionable age to 60 without any other consideration.

Of course, I cannot take the time to elaborate on all the social measures proposed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), or to explain the general aims of the social programs that are being reviewed with the provinces, from the guaranteed income to the community employment policy, keeping in mind those who have special needs.

Having said this, I shall now restrict myself to the 1972 program which shows the importance given by the government to the plight of the older citizen in our society. This program called "New Horizons" clearly shows the willingness of this same government to explore new avenues and implement novel formulas when they appear likely to meet adequately the needs of those who have reached the third age.

What is the thrust of this program?

First of all, this program gives older people the opportunity to contribute to their own welfare as well as that of the community. Secondly, the program is designed to help the government to set up effective means of communication and liaison with the pensioners and the aged, in order to make them aware of their needs and to provide for the passage of the required measures. And thirdly, the program seeks to bring about a general awareness through which an attempt will be made to grasp the meaning of the word "aging" in the context of our modern life.

The hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) stated a while ago that the 60-year old would like to retire as soon as possible. I think that it is less and less true on the contrary. Still again, I agree with the member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin). If we consider that there is less physical effort than 25 years ago, that the number of working days has decreased as well as the number of working hours, I think that the statement of the hon. member for Joliette to the effect that the people would like to retire at 60 years of age is not true. He is playing politics at the expense of those people.

I would like, Madam Speaker, to refer to my father as an example. When he learned that he was pensioned at 65 years of age, he could not accept it. Unfortunately he died a few months later, because he could not get used to the idea that he was retired. He felt that he still had some possibilities and a potential to work for the community. He did not want to be discarded.

The New Horizons Program was designed as an innovation program. This was a deliberate effort in order to try to establish the most flexible program possible whereby the government would be in a position to offer to groups of retired people the financial assistance necessary to implement projects of their choice and thus give free rein to their talent, their abilities, their ingeniousness and the full richness of their experience.

Society has often tended to adopt a paternalistic attitude with the programs intended for the aged. Society was inclined to dictate rather than suggest, to act without bothering to consult beforehand the very people on behalf of whom it was acting. That is what we have tried to avoid with the New Horizons Program which is essentially based on self-determination. In the light of our brief experience, we are already in a position to recognize all the resources of invention, energy and collective goodwill shown by the aged. As they are able to identify their own needs, develop projects which interest them and plan them in conjunction with their needs and as they have been faced with many obstacles and have learned to foresee them, they know now how to assess the kind of support they will have to ask for; briefly, senior and retired citizens are now in a position to call upon all their possibilities and their experience which otherwise could not be fully exploited. But there is more: there is the spirit of enthusiasm they generate the incredible vitality which emanates from their projects; both have repercussions on the whole of society and contribute, in a way, to erase the obsolete concepts about senior citizens and to replace them by an image more akin to reality.

Madam Speaker, I have here the list of the projects that were accepted since the beginning of this federal program. The number of projects by province is extraordinary and we can see how the projects submitted fill almost unbelievable needs. They are part of a most remarkable spirit of innovation and enthusiasm. To date, since the beginning of this program, 2,960 projects have been approved for a total of $21,393,143.

How many retired people benefit from or participate in the implementation of these projects? There are 635,128 retired people who are concerned with various New Horizons projects.

Since I cannot table the paper, if I may, Madam Speaker, I will indicate the number of projects by province, simply to demonstrate how that program was overwhelmingly popular throughout Canada.

In Newfoundland, 47 projects were approved, amounting to $294,173. In Prince Edward Island, 35 projects were approved, totalling $132,692. In Nova Scotia, 66 projects were approved for an amount of $732,905. In New Brunswick, 111 projects were approved for an amount of $661,-254. In Quebec, 752 projects were approved, totalling $4,072,592. In Ontario, 976 projects were approved and the minister is telling me that they amounted to $5,469,653. The minister certainly is aware of the amounts of money granted by his department and he would like to see the figures quoted accurately by all members.

In Manitoba, 201 projects were approved to an amount of $932,800; in Saskatchewan, 232 projects totalling $931,-342; in Alberta, 189 projects for $1,124,975; in British Columbia, 345 projects for $1,920,231. For the Northwest Territories, four projects were approved for a total of $24,921 and two projects in the Yukon, amounting to $9,037. As I mentioned earlier, the total amount is $21,393,143.

Madam Speaker, I believe that the sampling carried out throughout Canada for these projects proves how much our senior citizens and our pensioners want to continue working for the development of Canada.

In conclusion, I congratulate the hon. Minister and I thank him on behalf of all those people who, from October 1975, will receive a pension, as a temporary measure, which will provide assistance for a couple when one spouse retires at 65 and two people must live on a single pension. This agreement was discussed at length in the Liberal caucus and I was very glad when the minister confirmed it. It is not realistic to think that we shall solve all our social security problems by paying millions of dollars to all people between 60 and 65 who may not need it. It would be better to implement a program which guarantees the income with no age restriction for those who are unemployed, handicapped or do not have a sufficient salary.

Madam Speaker, I would like to close with this sentence of Félix Leclerc: The best way to make a man die is to stop him from working. I therefore prefer to keep in mind the positive aspect of our program rather than say that we shall provide money regardless of need.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity which enables me to take part in this afternoon's debate. Having listened to members' contributions, I detect a reasonable degree of unanimity in our approach to the problem we are considering.

The previous speaker, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy), spoke of the bad old days and seemed to identify them exclusively with one party. I do not think he deliberately meant to leave the wrong impression this afternoon. If he casts his mind back to 1956, I think he will remember the attitude shown by the then Liberal government to old age pensioners. That attitude resulted in a popular slogan being adopted in the election of 1957. All hon. members will recall what happened in the 1957 election. We saw the day of deliverance when, at long last, there was a change of government. Because of the parsimonious attitude of the outgoing Liberal government and of the then minister of finance to the funding of pensions for senior citizens of Canada, members of that government became known across the country as "the six buck boys."

This afternoon we shall not talk about the bad old days, as it is clear that in the last 15 years or so, beginning with the change of government in 1957, we have seen a new, more positive and constructive approach to the problem of meeting the social needs of the people of Canada.

As I already indicated, I do not think there is much disagreement on the broad fundamentals in achieving the objective that we all want to attain, that is, an adequate level of income, not only for our elderly but for all groups who find themselves in a position where they are not able to earn sufficient income for a reasonable standard of living. Along with the elderly that could include those who have disabilities such as the blind, the severely disabled, and those who are handicapped mentally or in any other respect.

I congratulate the Social Credit group for having made this debate possible. While I might not agree specifically with their solution to the problem, I am sure the debate that has been precipitated as a result of their motion is going to add a lot of grist to the mill which is now grinding as a result of the presentation of the orange paper by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

I shall deal with some aspects of the orange paper, but before I do I should put on the record the fact that the members of the official opposition have been in the vanguard of exploring new ways and means of dealing with the problem of income maintenance for those who are in a needy position. For example, as far back as 1972 the Conservative party came forward with specific recommendations. I shall deal with them briefly.

First, we recommended the establishment of a national income floor for individuals and families who have no earned income because of physical disability or other valid reasons. A second major point was to ensure that an individual or family capable of earning an income below the poverty line is entitled to retain a specific amount of this earned income without any reduction in the amount of public income supplement received. This has been described as the incentives income policy. The third point was to ensure that beyond this first specified amount an individual or family would be entitled to earn an additional amount of money which would be more than that by which the public income supplement would be reduced. That, I repeat, is the policy statement that emanated from members of the official opposition as far back as 1972.

As I read the orange paper recommendations put forward by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I can only conclude that he must have been looking over the shoulders of the policy formulators of the official opposition. I congratulate him on his wisdom in this regard.

Mr. Macquarrie: I gave him a copy.

Mr. Dinsdale: The principles that have been laid down in the current discussion that is going on with regard to social security parallel very closely those outlined by members of the Conservative party, and I shall quote them.

> In the first place, the social security plan shall ensure to persons unable to work, the elderly, the blind, and the disabled, an annual guaranteed income that is fair and compassionate.

I will read the second principle that has been laid down by the minister in his initial statement on the orange paper, because it is germane to our discussion today:

> The second principle, the social security system, applicable to persons able to work include work incentives and emphasize the need for reinstatement of social welfare recipients into the labour force.

Those two principles, I submit, are an almost direct paraphrase of the principles laid down in the Conservative party manifesto. Again I congratulate the minister. Of course he at one time had very close identification with members of the official opposition. I am sure that sort of association has had a strong determining tendency on the attitudes of the minister, even though he has fallen amongst bad companions in recent years.

Obviously there has to be action along the lines proposed by the motion because the government itself has now introduced a plan whereby its employees can retire at age 60. In parallel plans several provinces, including my own province of Manitoba, have now made similar retirement without loss of pension benefits available to their numerous employees at age 60.

We are all aware that more and more of the labour force are involved in government operations. One of the issues that emerged in the recent election campaign in my constituency—and we do not have a great number of civil servants at either the provincial or the federal level in the city of Brandon—was the question of when would the government bring its old age security program and Canada Pension Plan into line with its age 60 retirement plan? This is an indication that if we are going to rationalize our social security program we have to deal with inequities sooner or later. In light of the hodge-podge which is now an essential part of our social security system, I would say the sooner the better.

In his peregrinations during the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made this one of the major points in his promises, of which there were many. He wants to have the following integrated into the government's social security program for pensioners: the extension of the OAS/GIS on an income tested basis to spouses aged 60 to 64 of the present recipients of the OAS/GIS.

This was to be merely an interim step until such time as the comprehensive review that has been precipitated by the presentation of the orange paper has been completed. The official opposition presented a similar proposition, namely, that there be some consideration for the spouses of husbands or wives, as the case may be, who had reached the age of 65.

In the remaining few moments of the time allotted to me I wish to go into the broader concept of the need for providing income stability to groups other than the elderly. The elderly are in a special category by reason of age. However, there are those who are prematurely handicapped, as I have already indicated, by reason of blindness, physical disability, and handicaps of various other kinds. The strange and even tragic anomaly is that there is no special income allowance for people with handicaps of this kind. Since 1924 the blind people have been asking for a blindness allowance that would be paid regardless of the financial circumstances of the individual or the family concerned. They make this request on the simple basis that blindness is a severe handicap for which there is need for general community support.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) went back to 1927 in his presentation this afternoon. He referred to the great struggle for an adequate income security plan for the elderly. The blind of Canada and their associations have been campaigning for the same consideration for this group of disabled persons since 1924. The physically handicapped are in the same category. Perhaps I can deal with the two together to show how inadequate or even ridiculous the situation can be when governments, either federal or provincial, fail to consider the special needs of the handicapped.

In the case of the blind, if two blind persons marry and there is a certain amount of income the wife loses her disability allowance. It is not a generous sum in any case—about $75 a month. Recently I received a letter from two severely handicapped persons, both disabled by cerebral palsy, who married. Before their marriage the wife had been in receipt of a disability allowance of some $75. I have met these two individuals in person. The husband is less severely handicapped than the wife; she is in a wheelchair and is not really able to take care of herself at all.

The enterprising husband in this happy matrimonial situation has employment as a counsellor at the Chedoke Institute in Hamilton and now, because he has a certain income and because he has married a fellow sufferer from cerebral palsy his spouse immediately loses her social benefits. This is an urgent situation which must be dealt with, and I trust it will be attended to by the government when it brings down its more comprehensive recommendations arising from the current review of the orange paper.

Unfortunately, in recent years government involvement in these areas has been going backward rather than forward. After the war, led by the Department of Veterans Affairs, there was a great upsurge in interest in the needs of the disabled. More recently, even though our horizons have extended and we understand better the needs of the disabled with regard to education, vocational training, transportation, accommodation and so forth, there seems to have been fewer effective attempts to provide solutions.

In some parts of Canada, it is true, a beginning has been made, but we have yet to follow the example of some countries where, for instance, one finds a whole range of programs which make it possible for the severely disabled to lead a more or less normal existence notwithstanding their handicaps. Up to the present Canada's approach has left much to be desired.

I know the minister agrees with me because the orange paper suggests he is disillusioned about what has been going on in the past; emphasis has been placed upon trying to put new wine into old bottles, if I may use that figure of speech—trying to express old policies in new forms and to carry on with the outdated welfare state concept where the outlook of the government is paternalistic.

The new approach is aimed at making it possible for the handicapped to meet their own needs with the help of volunteer groups. This is borne out by the fact that the administrator of research, planning and evolution for the Department of National Health and Welfare, Mr. John Osborne, back in 1973 during a discussion in Watrous, Saskatchewan, concerning the orange paper, asked the voluntary groups working in the area of assistance to the disabled—there are 26 such groups across Canada—to let the government know where it is on the track and where it may have been derailed. I believe the minister will agree that the Canadian approach to these matters has often been off the track—that it has consistently veered off course in recent years.

The parliamentary secretary mentioned cost as being one of the deterrents to moving quickly in this field. She added that there were other demands on public funds. That is true. One of the exorbitant demands on the welfare dollar has come through the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In meeting unemployment insurance demands, overpayments of $2 billion have been made in recent years. There is no need, in a resource rich country like ours, to be faced with these huge demands on the treasury for unemployment. The great mistake is that we have tried to use the Unemployment Insurance Commission as a back door approach to the problems I have briefly outlined this afternoon.

Some of the present ad hoc programs which are geared to nothing specific have also constituted a major drain on the national treasury. I would strongly urge the minister to deal with the specific matters we have been discussing this afternoon. It will not bankrupt Canada. The way the government is spending, with an increase in the budget to $26 billion, it is evident that fiscal policy in Canada must have great flexibility. I urge the government to consider priorities and not expedience.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I expect all members of the House will readily agree that people who have worked and contributed to their community for some decades should be able to retire, (a) at an age when they are flexible enough to adapt to and enjoy their new lifestyle, and (b) with enough money to provide a decent standard of living. It will be very much harder to find agreement (a) on what is an appropriate retirement age, and (b) how much of a person's financial security in retirement should reasonably be provided by the state, how much by former employers and how much by the individual's own savings.

The motion before the House refers to state pensions being made available at age 60. The age of eligibility set for state pensions has a way of influencing the complusory retirement age. In fact it tends to become the compulsory retirement age. This certainly happened when the pension age was reduced from 70 to 65. The compulsory retirement of an unwilling employee, who is unprepared for retirement either economically or psychologically, can be a painful and unhappy business.

People who are now 60 generally entered the labour force during the depression years and often found it difficult to survive, far less think of saving for their old age, for the first 15 years of their employment. For some there was also war service, followed by resettlement problems afterwards, which further delayed the process of acquiring equity in a pension plan, even where a pension plan was available; and it must be remembered that 40 per cent of the work force is not covered by private group pension arrangements.

While the prevailing rates of old age security and guaranteed income supplement are higher than most provincial social assistance rates for single people and couples, they represent quite a drop in salary for the average Canadian worker. In the riding I represent, where many people do hard manual work, I find considerable interest on the part of middle aged people in relocating to work which is less physically demanding, but very high resistance to the idea of final retirement.

This seems to be a fairly general trend. There is an early retirement option in the public service which provides quite generous superannuation benefits, yet less than 15 per cent of those eligible take up this option. In the blue collar area, the pioneering early retirement plan of the United Auto Workers is very well known, yet the latest take-up figures are less than 20 per cent of those eligible in Canadian plants, and only about 3 per cent of those eligible in the Detroit area, which includes some Canadian workers.

More people seem to be fighting decisions which would retire them early. There was a recent court case concerning the Canadian public service, and there are a number of cases, including many against private companies in the United States, where early retirement is more common. Even very good supplementary private pension rates for early retirees—around $625 a month after 30 years service with the UAW; 60 per cent or more of average earnings in the last five years under superannuation—do not attract large numbers of potential pensioners. So one has perhaps to look past the purely financial reasons at the drop in status which must be adjusted to by the retiring worker.

Desirable or not, our society is strongly work oriented. Individual evaluation, by oneself or by others, often flows from a person's job. In older age brackets this equation of work with social value is particularly strong. Early retirement, especially when involuntary, can drastically harm a retiree's self-image, pride and self-esteem.

Looking at it from another angle, will persons who retire early be willing to face the prevalent attitudes toward elder persons at a much earlier age? We are so concerned with meeting the needs of the aged today that we have given little thought to the future effects of policies on future generations of the aged. As we produce a healthier, better educated and more financially secure older generation, the trend toward earlier retirement may prove to be quite inappropriate.

The success of a retirement depends quite a bit on the amount of preparation for it, such as the development of outside interests and hobbies which can replace the work focus. It is a fallacy to think that just relaxing is something that will satisfy people who have been active all their lives. To be successful these hobbies and interests cannot simply be minor items but must be able to develop into full absorptions.

Pre-retirement training, even at age 65, is a very undeveloped field at the present time. Are we ready to meet the requirements of a whole new retired population? Leisure skills are becoming more and more expensive to acquire and practice. People who are not affluent probably have the least involvement in the hobbies and interests they need to enjoy themselves in the suddenly increased free time they will have.

There is also the whole question of social inter-action. The work place provides a daily set of human contacts, friendships and so on. Retirement removes this meeting place and can bring great loneliness. Low income earners are least likely to have a set of contacts of which they can make use when retired. Both their physical and social mobility is likely to be limited, and to grow more so as the period of retirement lengthens.

Loss of income, loss of status, loss of friends and the sense of "just hanging around" can be very destructive in respect of a person's self-esteem. Removing something that has been the focus of life for 40 years and replacing it with a void can be harmful. And dropping into retirement status people who are five years younger, more vigorous and more energetic may accentuate this sense of ennui, alienation and uselessness.

A lower pensionable age may be considerably less than a boon to older workers. It may indeed prove harmful to a number of them. People aged 60 who are not employed or are not employable because of illness or disability or, in the case of widows, because of lack of marketable skills, certainly need to have access to financial assistance. However, I do not think that should necessarily be through an early old age pension. Measures now in place include disability and survivors' benefits from the Canada and Quebec pension plans, workmen's compensation and provincial social assistance. I hope that the current social service review will result in a simplified income supplementation which is easier and less expensive to administer, and which is easier for people receiving it to understand and apply for, Mr. Speaker.

An aspect of aging which receives insufficient attention at present is that people are not only living longer, they are staying healthy, active and productive longer. Some people who take advantage of early retirement schemes use their pension to train for and undertake a second career. I do not think state pensions should be used for this purpose but I should like to see a greater interest on the part of industry in encouraging retraining of older workers. I also hope we may find a way to use some of the community employment programs to help older people retrain and relocate.

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in congratulating the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), of the Social Credit party, for introducing this motion in the House today. May I also say I have no difficulty in supporting in principle or spirit any measure to assist our senior citizens with respect to their importance to our community and to our society.

I am one individual in this House who has had perhaps a unique experience with senior citizens. During my years of practice, particularly in my specialty, I have been fortunate to have been in daily contact with senior citizens in my community and in the surrounding area. I can assure you, Sir, I have developed and retain the deepest respect and admiration for this important segment of society.

Members of this House, and indeed all citizens who have not worked with senior citizens or who have not experienced a close personal contact with them, in my view have missed and are missing a rich and rewarding experience. Their philosophy of living is life itself. Their sense of independence, their humour, their faith, and above all their devotion and loyalty to traditions and friends, could well be emulated by many in our present society. I have been privileged to share these experiences with many senior citizens, and have witnessed the important role they have played and continue to play in our society.

During the debate this afternoon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Campbell) referred to the necessity of having a comprehensive social program over and above an adequate income support program. In effect the parliamentary secretary indicated the necessity of understanding the total needs of our senior citizens. I support that thesis. I also wish to underscore the necessity of looking at the whole person, the total person, the complete individual.

Perhaps I could best exemplify this by giving one of several examples I have had over the years. I recall that about seven years ago I had occasion to look after an elderly patient who had a heart problem. She had been removed from her own home to live with her family at a distant place. I can assure you that her surroundings were excellent and that the concern and care by her family were unexcelled. Yet despite this the patient continued to deteriorate.

In looking at the total patient I thought it was important to note that what had been overlooked was her sense of independence. The cure, of course, was to return her to her own home where she could live by herself in an environment with familiar people, family and friends she had known over the years. Now, at a young age in her late 80's, she continues to enjoy her surroundings. I think all of us at that time learned a great lesson about independence and the importance of looking at the total patient, the total senior citizen.

During the 1st of March, 1973, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) spoke on old age security. He stated:

> . . . when coupled with the cumulative benefit increases that have been provided, it will be readily seen, Mr. Speaker, that this government has effectively banished poverty for persons over 65 years of age in the course of the last two years.

● (2020)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If the hon. member would check in Hansard, he would find that I never made such a statement. That was quoted by the former member for Ottawa West, I believe, at which point I raised a question of privilege, following which there was a correction, and an apology for misquoting me. So I suggest that the hon. member find the proper reference.

Mr. Holmes: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see the minister has returned and is listening. I shall certainly take heed of his comments and recheck the record.

I should like to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the minister that my correspondence would not suggest that no senior citizens in our society feel that they have been complimented by the proposals presented by the government. Let me give you one illustration in a letter which I received this past week, part of which reads as follows:

> I was wondering if Mr. Turner's budget is final and all the election promises to wives of pensioners have gone down the drain.
> Gordon isn't able to do much, and I am trying to keep on selling Watkins to try to get enough to keep going. You know my health, nerves, diabetes, arthritis. It is far from easy to get out in the cold and try to sell to get the necessities that Gordon's pension will not stretch over. It is impossible to keep a home, pay insurances and buy food on one pension for two people. Where are all the promises that we would get my pension in January. I have no choice but try to carry on in the cold until Gordon can (hopefully) help me again.
> I just wondered if you could try to stress this fact to a few people like our Prime Minister and Mr. Turner.

I respectfully submit that letter to the minister. As the letter suggests—and this was indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this afternoon—the recent budget of November 8 offers very little hope and no help to the majority of our senior citizens, and in particular to that great number who are on low and fixed incomes.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) by his own admission, when he presented the budget, gave a very pessimistic economic report for 1975 indicating that inflation would continue. Indeed, it has been estimated that it will continue in double figures during the year 1975. It seems to me that if the government were truly concerned about this important segment of our population, then surely the obvious answer would have been to introduce measures that are anti-inflationary. I recognize that the minister's explanation will be to index old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, but at the same time we must recognize that the problem for this group of citizens is compounded since the basic expenses for old age pensioners for food and housing in particular tend to rise at a much higher rate than the average consumer price index.

I am also concerned when I review the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, and more recently the supplementary estimates, which reveal substantial increases in operating costs. And when I recall the deficit in the unemployment insurance fund of approximately $1 billion I cannot help but question the government's lack of response to social needs in establishing priorities, in particular with respect to our senior citizens.

This afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the motion before us was broad enough to include any aspect of the social security program. I simply want to make reference to two points, and perhaps the minister will comment on them later if he enters the debate. A major problem which frequently works to the disadvantage of our senior citizens is the complexity, the frequent duplication and the fragmentary approach of the social security system. I would like to take one case in point, and that is the guaranteed income supplement.

There are thousands of pensioners who are short of money because of the present system and the inability of the government to introduce alternative proposals which would guarantee the rights of these needy pensioners. This problem is compounded, certainly in my province, by the fact that to qualify for additional money or benefits, such as the 1974 elderly pensioners' tax assistance program for homeowners in Ontario, or for the recent Gains program and for drug assistance the pensioner must be on the guaranteed income supplement.

What are some of the questions that they ask? I think I can summarize these from all the correspondence I have. The questions are: Who should apply? What is yearly income? What are qualifying incomes? What yearly income qualifies a single pensioner? What yearly income qualifies a married couple where both are pensioners? What yearly income qualifies a married couple where only one is a pensioner? I suggest seriously to you, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of senior citizens do not have the information available or the answers to the questions, and I think that they are penalized because of it.

I find it inexcusable that many pensioners who are eligible for the guaranteed income supplement have not applied because of the complexity of the system. Surely the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare in particular, could find and provide alternative proposals to correct the situation and to help these needy pensioners. Perhaps the minister will comment on this problem before the termination of this debate.

The second point I want to make is with reference to the letter that I quoted earlier in which reference was made to the hardships experienced by senior citizens when both husband and wife must try to survive on a single pension. As has been pointed out by others during this debate, surely this matter deserves thoughtful consideration by the government.

As I indicated at the outset, I was impressed with the parliamentary secretary's observation that it is necessary to look at the total social program affecting our senior citizens. During her speech this afternoon she made reference to medical care. It is important for our elderly citizens, as part of a comprehensive program, to look after these individuals. While I support the principles that were enunciated by the parliamentary secretary, I cannot let the government's record go unchallenged, and indeed that record does not reveal the existence of a program dealing with the specific health problems of the aged.

Let me take a moment or two to try to place the problem in its proper perspective. This group of citizens aged 65 and over represents approximately 8 per cent of our total population, or about 1.7 million Canadians. Projections of populations indicate that by the mid 1980's this group will represent approximately 9 per cent of the total population, or about 2.3 million people.

During 1969, 39.9 million days were used by Canadians in hospital treatment in all age groups, and of this total, 13.3 million days of hospital care were used by the 65 and over age group alone. In effect, 33 per cent of hospital days were used by only 8 per cent of the population. Significantly, in this older age group accidents and muscolo-skeletal disorders are vastly more important in women, while men suffer predominantly from cancer, respiratory and genito-urinary tract disorders.

The average length of stay in hospital for all ages is 12.6 days for men and 11.4 for women. By the age of 75 and over, the length of stay increased to 27.2 for men and 35.2 for women. Clearly, these chronic and disabling diseases are of major significance. Once again it must be stated that our priorities for research, prevention, treatment and rehabilitation are obvious to all those who look at the statistics. However, these disturbing facts do not represent the total picture of disability and despair that is frequently suffered by our senior citizens. Far too often our aging population is isolated, alone and needlessly rejected in the every day life of modern society. Too often capable expertise is retired only to be forgotten or otherwise ignored. I believe this attitude must, and can be changed.

All of us in this House recognize the importance of young energetic workers, but it is essential that senior citizens continue to be productive to society and to themselves. There is no doubt that the mental health of our senior citizens can be enhanced through continuing productive participation. There are many sectors of our everyday economy which continue to require the parttime assistance, consultation and advice which are available from senior citizens.

I would suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, perhaps in conjunction with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), should look carefully at the possibility of developing an inventory of senior citizens across Canada who would be readily available to provide their services when required.

We must also realize that the aging process is frequently related to many simple discomforts of life that can be resolved with prompt intervention and a little expense. For example, nutritional disorders can be linked to buying power or to the lack of properly fitting dentures. The lack of glasses and hearing aids is a major disadvantage. I believe that these problems can be resolved easily through co-ordinated action by the provincial and federal governments, and I hope that the minister will initiate discussions with the provinces to accomplish this.

Again, chronic disorders contribute a great deal to the personal discomfort of far too many aging Canadians. Our preoccupation has been with the provision of treatment facilities, often at the sacrifice or lack of provision of rehabilitation facilities, particularly as they affect these older aged groups. I would encourage the minister to concentrate on this problem and take it up with his provincial counterparts as a priority item in future federal-provincial conferences.

Many additional hardships are experienced by our senior citizens, Mr. Speaker, such as drug costs, high cost of housing, and the inaccessibility of New Horizons programs particularly in rural communities. I would simply conclude by restating that any social program for senior citizens must include adequate income support and a complete understanding of and sympathetic response to the entire individual.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, without ado, I want to say I am extremely pleased to make my most sincere contribution on that important question of old age security and the Canada Pension Plan.

To repeat what has been said earlier by some of my colleagues, this government did promise to the Canadian people that effective October 1975, allowances would be paid to spouses of old age security beneficiaries aged between 60 and 65 and provision would be made to also remove some of the requirements concerning Canadians who have lived outside of Canada for a limited period of time.

The motion reads as follows:

This House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the old age pension.

For many years, the Créditistes have been advocating that pensions provided under the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan should be paid to any individual having reached age 60 and increased to $200 a month for single persons as well as married men and to $150 a month for the spouse whatever may be her age.

Mr. Speaker, as time passes, we realize that the cost of living steadily continues to increase, that people on low income such as older people and others, that the retired do not have adequate incomes to live decently, and sometimes they must even do without the basic necessities and even the indispensable. Furthermore, since there are a lot of married women who have not yet reached the age of 60 and have no source of income they often find themselves in awkward situations.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that each time I meet these people I take the trouble of listening to them since they express to me their problems, their concerns and their needs, and ask me to try and do something for them.

I consider, Mr. Speaker, that the method set up by the government and which consists in increasing pensions according to the cost of living index with adjustments every three months, is not an adequate solution to stop inflation since that will not cure the economic discomforts from which everyone is suffering. All other sectors will eventually face increases, the cost of living will continue to rise, the economy will suffer more and more, and consequently there will be poverty within abundance.

Everyone knows that our governments promoted poverty, unemployment and inflation through legislative methods. So it is through opposite legislative methods that our governments will restore the national economic balance for all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the national economic imbalance of inflation, unemployment and poverty affecting our classes of society is not accidental but indeed the result of the legislative action taken by both our Progressive Conservative and Liberal governments. Mr. Speaker, only Parliament has the right to vote legislation on the distribution of incomes and taxes among individuals, families, and corporations.

It is not the millionaire, multimillionaire, national or multinational companies or even our neighbours who have the right to vote in this Canadian Parliament but we alone, the members elected by the Canadian people. That means that we alone have the power to maintain and reestablish the national economic balance between the elements constituting our country. It is not enough to checkmate inflation, unemployment and poverty, we must above all correct this distressing situation and see to the definitive reestablishment of the national economic balance between individuals and families. In any event, the final goal of the economy can be simply reduced to the satisfaction of the population's needs. We must therefore work out new remedies and stimulants for our economy so as to achieve the happiness of all Canadians.

The smallest bit of our national economy must be provided with its fair share so that our quest for economic balance can be reflected in the whole of the national economy.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that it is important to consider the present facts of our national economy as they stand because each year the difficulties of inflation, unemployment and poverty are considerably amplified despite increasing productivity and notwithstanding the clearer and clearer disorder of more and more senseless distribution.

In this very alarming situation, Mr. Speaker, we must try to identify abuses and make them disappear if we really want to solve the problems and reestablish the stability of our economy.

We of the Social Credit Party of Canada do not have a monopoly on folly. For years we have been suggesting very sensible solutions to the numerous problems of the whole world. Many members are patting their own backs and saying: "Another Social Credit illusion". But, Mr. Speaker, if we really take time out for a flashback, it is easy to see what seemed ridiculous yesterday is true today. Indeed, this government is timidly adopting measures advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada such as increasing pensions at all levels and promising to establish a guaranteed annual income plan.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully convinced that governments will be compelled before long to apply the measures we advocate if they are really bent on taking steps to save Canada and the world from the disaster which hangs over mankind.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is the very high taxes and the exorbitant interest rates which are exploiting the greater part of the Canadian people and contributing to the rise in the cost of living. These exorbitant taxes and interest rates cripple the economy and create inflation, which really smother the Canadian economy and nullify the purchasing power of consumers.

We are aware that personal and corporate income taxes are under the strict jurisdiction of the elected members of Parliament whose responsibility is to meet the needs of the population as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, inflation, unemployment and poverty are the three main signs of the economic imbalance which is still hurting all economic and social levels of the Canadian people.

As I said earlier, the only way to get rid of poverty, unemployment and inflation is through restoring economic balance at the national level between individuals and families. The government of Canada alone has the power to restore quickly and thereafter maintain the kind of national balance that would eliminate inflation for the benefit of all Canadian citizens.

All this, Mr. Speaker, amply demonstrates that the time has come for a more thorough study, not only of the social security system as it applies to underprivileged citizens such as the elderly and others, but also as concerns families living on a single person's salary. I further urge the government not to stop at this, but to undertake a study of all systems of revenues, of expenses, of hidden or secret reserves to which are entitled million- or billion-dollar companies, either national or multinational.

We suggested on various occasions that the old age security pension should be raised to $200 per month, both for single or married individuals, and to $150 in the case of the spouse of whatever age, as I indicated in my opening remarks. Mr. Speaker, like every other member, I receive on various occasions numerous requests from persons between 60 and 65. Most of the time, those people are unable to or unfit for work. I therefore urge the government once more to lower to 60 the pensionable age.

In view of the great number of people who are 60 or over, of widows and orphans without work, I most sincerely feel it is inhuman, shocking and abnormal that they be forced to live in reduced circumstances before reaching the current pensionable age of 65.

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask the government to lower the pensionable age to 60. I urge them to very seriously consider this move, I am confident it will meet with the approval of all Canadians.

Mr. George Baker (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly to this motion, particularly the aspect concerning housing for senior citizens, after which I shall make a few general remarks about the motion itself.

Four sections of the National Housing Act apply to senior citizen housing. Under section 15 of the act the federal government, between the time section 15 was promulgated and September, 1974, has been instrumental in the production of 12,148 units, these being mostly bachelor and one-bedroom type units, and accommodation for 1,653 hostel beds. Under subsection (1) of section 15 the government was instrumental in producing 18,475 units, and accommodation for 30,179 hostel beds. These units were built as a result of 100 per cent loans being granted on a unilateral basis. The federal government granted these to the sponsors of the schemes, which might be any non-profit organization, municipal or provincial, or any sponsor, private or voluntary. These loans were granted under subsection (1) of section 15, as I said.

Under section 40 of the act, provincial and federal governments for over 40 years have been responsible for assembling land for family housing and senior citizen housing. Some 7,366 senior citizen units have been built under that section, together with accommodation for 146 hostel beds. The province puts up 50 per cent of the necessary capital under this section of the act.

Under section 43 of the housing act federal and provincial governments are entitled to enter into agreements under which the federal government may lend money to provincial housing corporations. Ninety per cent of such money is in the form of loans granted by the government for capital costs connected with dwellings for senior citizens and low rental housing. Under this section 38,304 units of senior citizen housing have been produced and accommodation for 430 hostel beds.

If we total all benefits accruing under the National Housing Act, we shall see that 76,293 units have been built, involving accommodation for 32,408 beds, for a total investment of just under $1 billion—for $972 million, to be exact.

Under sections 40 and 43 of the act the annual subsidy, approved on a 50-50 basis to the provinces, amounts to $25 million per year. That is the figure applying as of 1974.

Certain sections of the act and certain agreements which may be entered into under those sections are matters I do not entirely support. For instance, under sections 40 and 43 only 28 units have been built in Newfoundland, whereas in Ontario the number of units built is 32,800, in Nova Scotia, 2,772, and in Prince Edward Island, 206. Who is to blame for this situation in Newfoundland if not the provincial government which is supposed, under the housing act, to enter into agreements with the federal government?

The foregoing figures show, Sir, that for a total federal investment of slightly less than $1 billion, the federal government has provided many units of senior citizen housing. Clearly, the federal government has not been negligent in providing housing for senior citizens.

I wish to make reference to the motion. It reads:

> That this House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

The government will undoubtedly act on some form of guaranteed annual income. It will undoubtedly act on an income stabilization program for fishermen and farmers, and on providing a supplementary allowance for spouses between the ages of 60 and 65 where the income of the old age recipient is inadequate.

In bringing forward this motion I recognize the hon. member's concern for the poor. I understand his concern for those people between the ages of 60 and 65 who cannot find jobs. When we look at the actual distribution of money to people within provinces, we see the great inequity between someone living in the province of Newfoundland and someone living in the province of Alberta. We see that the Newfoundland provincial government, which has to supply 50 per cent of the total cost of welfare, certainly cannot meet the same standards as those in Alberta.

I can understand the hon. member's concern for people who, in certain instances, are almost unemployable. However, we have to consider that his motion reads:

> ... as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

If someone 20 years of age married someone 60 years of age, as I interpret the motion, he or she would receive the old age pension. This would take away the work incentive. About the only incentive this motion would give would be to marry someone 60 years of age if you are out of work.

In speaking against this motion, may I say I look forward to the day when there will be some form of guaranteed income, some form of income stabilization for fishermen and farmers, the vital primary producers of this country, as well as a supplement for spouses between the ages of 60 and 65 where the family income is not adequate to meet the demands of the seventies.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I enter the debate on this Créditiste motion which reads:

> That this House regrets that the Government neglected to make all those who reached the age of 60, as well as their spouses although such spouses may not have reached pensionable age, eligible for the Old Age Pension.

I compliment the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) on bringing forward this important subject for debate today. The section in this motion which bothers me the most concerns allowing spouses to receive the pensions, even though they may not be 60. In some cases this is justified, but what happens in the case of a man who is considerably older than his wife, say for example, 20 or 30 years her senior? At the age of 60 he naturally qualifies for the old age pension under the proposed motion, and so does his wife.

How could this parliament justify a woman in her thirties or early forties receiving a pension, simply because her husband turned 60? This holds true if a woman is older than her spouse. The motion is too broad. In order to make it fair, we have an obligation to set up age guidelines in the case of the spouses becoming eligible for the pension when their partners turn 60.

The lowering of the age of eligibility for the old age security to 60 is a step in the right direction. It has to be done sooner or later. The increase in pressures in today's society has created a lot of premature ill-health for Canadians in the 50 to 60 age group, the very group that we are discussing. Many in this age group can no longer work, while others in the same age group cannot find work because of their age.

Whatever the situation, the present high rate of unemployment makes it virtually impossible for one spouse to find employment to compensate for whatever the other spouse would receive in old age benefits once that spouse has turned 60. For those who cannot go out and work because of illness or who cannot find employment because of their age, this adds to their hardship if their only source of income is one spouse's old age benefits.

This proposed motion would assist Canadians in those unfortunate circumstances, but nevertheless I still feel that we must place age guidelines on the spouses who are not 60, but who would automatically become eligible once their partners turned 60.

Here we have a segment of our population who, by virtue of the fact that they are classified as old age pensioners, are receiving just barely enough on which to live. We turn the coin around and see virtually millions and millions of dollars being thrown away, for example in Unemployment Insurance Commission payments and LIP grants, by which we encourage Canadians not to work. How can we justify this sort of treatment to our old age pensioners? They have been the backbone of our Canadian society for years, and now that they have reached their old age, the government of the day, in gratitude, provides them with just enough to exist on, until they are no longer a burden to the government.

[Mr. Baker (Gander-Twillingate).]

Those who are new on the Canadian scene are being pampered and babied with hand-outs left and right, while those Canadians who contributed a lot of sweat, toil and tears for their country are shoved out of sight in disgrace, and are left with just enough to survive.

Ironically, Mr. Speaker, the government does not seem to realize that it is laying down a poor foundation for the very people it is babying, and creating future problems for future governments through not having enough foresight in presenting enlightened legislation which would provide adequate assitance for Canada's old age pensioners, now and in the future.

Several years ago the government had a slogan "the Just Society", and a just society it certainly created, a society more of injustice than of justice. The old age benefits fall in the area of injustices. But another area of the unjust society covers armed forces personnel living on pensions.

The government recently announced that there would be increases for those who came under the magic 85 plan in order that forces pensioners might combat inflation. Those who did not come under the magic 85 plan but who are receiving a pension were not eligible for the cost of living increases. The present set-up governing the magic 85 plan stipulates that a member of the armed forces or of the R.C.M.P. must, for example, have 30 years of service and be 55 years of age before being eligible for the special benefits under the 85 plan.

The constant reduction in the strength of the armed forces means that a lot of men in their late forties or early fifties will be pensioned off, and in many cases these men will not have enough years of service to qualify under the magic 85 plan. This certainly puts a lot of hardship on those who find obtaining employment difficult and still have a family to raise.

It seems to me that too many discriminatory policies are practised by the government. The government penalizes people because they are old or because they are in the armed forces. The policy of magic 85 is an example of discrimination. With the present cutback in the strength of the armed forces a lot of men in their late forties and early fifties will be forced out into a labour scene which cannot supply employment for them. Their pensions will be insufficient to support them and their families, and with the way the cost of living is continually rising I cannot see how they are going to make ends meet.

The government must reduce this magic 85 requirement and provide adequate increases to all armed forces personnel across the board. There is no excuse for a requirement that a man must have X number of years of service and be X number of years of age in order to qualify. This requirement does not exist in the civil service pension plans, so why should it exist for armed forces personnel? It is archaic, something out of the dark ages, and the sooner it is abolished the better for all concerned.

The most outrageous form of discrimination I have come across concerns a Mr. Builder, one of my constituents. The present Old Age Security Act does not recognize a Canadian veteran's overseas service whether or not he has resided in Canada full time after discharge. This overseas veteran was informed by the regional director of old age security services in Victoria, "For our purposes we cannot consider you as physically present in Canada when we have confirmed that you were overseas with the Canadian Armed Forces from June 8, 1940, to March, 1946, and in addition left Canada again in November, 1946. The Old Age Security Act does not permit us to consider the overseas service as physically present in Canada for old age security."

If this is not discrimination then I must have a different interpretation of the word than the one on which the government relies. How can the government discriminate against the proud veterans who served overseas? Why should there be a difference in ruling as between one like myself, for example, who never went overseas, and one who did? If, after the war, I had gone out of the country in similar circumstances, then presumably when I came back in similar circumstances, I would qualify. Surely this is discrimination against veterans who served overseas.

Many veterans, like my constituent, did not choose to be sent overseas. If this veteran had been stationed in Canada, as I was, there would be no trouble, but he went where his country sent him, and because of this the government is penalizing him. This line of reasoning is unjust and discriminatory. There is no way in which it can be justified. Here is a case where a man's courageous war service in defence of his country is being used against him. It seems to be the policy of the government that those who have contributed nothing to the country are rewarded, while those who have contributed much to the defence and development of this great nation are penalized.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on the motion introduced by the Social Credit Party of Canada. The motion is aimed at reducing the pensionable age to 60 and also making the spouse eligible for a pension.

I must say that it is rather easy for an opposition party, especially one which is quite sure that it will never be called upon to form the government to introduce that kind of motion. Indeed, I would say that for the Social Credit Party of Canada it is a quite reasonable motion in comparison with some other motions introduced and discussed in the House. I recall more particularly a motion introduced last year on the annual guaranteed income which had given me the opportunity to assess the cost of the scheme then suggested by the Social Credit Party of Canada. I had made an assessment that amounted to about $26 or $27 billion and I had not yet taken into account all the factors of the guaranteed income scheme proposed by the Social Credit. I remember that some members from that party had questioned my figures, and I discussed them with a member of that party who, unfortunately or fortunately, is no longer sitting in this House, and to whom I had asked at that time what was according to his own figures, the total amount of the guaranteed income scheme proposed by the Social Credit. He told me I was mistaken in quoting $26 billion, that from the Creditistes calculation, their project would cost only $21 billion and therefore, I was greatly mistaken.

Indeed, I believe that there rests the beautiful freedom of a member of the Opposition and, in particular, of a small party in the Opposition; that enables one to make such promises. And as the hon. member for Saint-Michel (Miss Bégin) said this afternoon, it enables one to fool the electorate on a number of issues.

I must point out that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in the course of today's debate, has once again made a strong presentation of his point of view and, consistent with his own tradition, has not taken into account the cost of such a project. I am not at all surprised for he is concerned primarily with increasing the benefits.

But I have been surprised to find how conservative the hon. member's attitude has turned out to be today. He has indeed put forward a universal amount of $200, but if my memory is correct, his own party had proposed, not so long ago, $250 a month and this universally. I do not understand why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is now willing to accept this cheap program. And I would even say that this is a very conservative figure for the hon. member, since he himself proposed a universal pension of $200, when as early as next January the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement will mean $204.27 to everyone who will pass the income test. If I understand correctly the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, he would even be willing to take $4.27 off the benefits which would be payable in January.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, surely, the minister would like the laughter in which he is indulging to go on the record as well? He knows that I proposed that the basic pension, which next month will be $120 a month, is the pension which should be raised to $200.

Mr. Lalonde: I am glad to have it on record finally that the hon. member is not talking any more about universality in connection with this question of old age pensions. It now comes out that he wants to have a supplement as well, yet all our disagreement in the past has been on the basis that he does not want any tests—he wants everything universal. However, if he accepts the idea of something additional there will have to be tests. I am glad to have it finally on record that the hon. member still favours some kind of income supplement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, would the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, if the hon. member is willing to add it to my half hour I will be glad to entertain a question; I would rather take it at the end of my speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My question is very simple. Since the minister has only 30 minutes, why is he wasting it?

Mr. Lalonde: I cannot imagine that I am wasting my time trying to elicit new information from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He has been in this House a long time and everything he says to me is very significant and important.

[Translation]

Many hon. members have taken part in today's debate which, I think, was a very good one and several have emphasized the importance of dealing with this problem as a whole. Speakers on the government side have pointed out this element and I noticed also that many hon. members from the official opposition insisted on mentioning a certain number of priorities. I note in particular the contributions made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and also the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes).

I would also like to thank all the Liberal members who in this debate have endeavoured most successfully to bring to our attention programs implemented over the years by the Liberal government.

With regard to the motion of the Social Credit Party of Canada, I would have appreciated it if its spokesmen had gone to more pains in order to further clarify their thoughts.

They talk, for instance, of optional retirement, Madam Speaker. I would like them to specify what they mean by this and how they are going to define this optional retirement. Do they include those self-employed, the farmer, the fisherman, the small businessman, the shopkeeper. How are we going to determine whether everyone has retired or not? Do my colleagues include all the wives who stay at home? Will they be considered as having voluntarily retired or not? And if they are not included, I would like the hon. members to put it on record instead of talking in quite general terms which seem very generous but are rather vague.

As to the situation that developed with respect to retirement, it is obvious that there was a tendency in the last decades to reduce the age of retirement. Even now we have pension plans in the private sector providing for retirement before the age of 65. On the other hand, one realizes that there are more people wondering about that approach. I refer particularly to the debate now taking palce in the United Stated concerning compulsory retirement at the age of 65.

More and more people in the United States are now raising the problems posed by compulsory retirement. A strong debate now going on tends to suggest that it might be preferable to reintroduce a system of optional retirement in view of the extended lifespan and productive capacity of a great many people over 65.

That debate is far from being settled, it will be with us for a good while but, to my mind, this indicates that the situation is not irreversible, as some would like us to think.

Madam Speaker, I would like to take the few minutes remaining to me to talk about the resolution from two points of view. First, the cost aspect and, second, the priority aspect. As to the cost aspect, it will not take much time. If the proposal under consideration were simply to extend to people between the ages of 60 and 65 the benefits now available to those over 65, that would represent an amount ranging anywhere from $1.2 to $1.6 or $1.7 billions. That is new and additional money.

This is a considerable amount, although not unthinkable. I want to stress that it still represents half of all we spend at present on old age pensions and guaranteed supplements for those over 65. In fact, that amount represents roughly double the current contribution of the federal government to social assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Therefore, this amount is not to be ignored and if it is provided for this purpose, it will no longer be available for other purposes. That leads me directly to the second matter I wanted to raise, that of priorities. There is no doubt that if the state were a limitless reservoir of funds, we would immediately make people at age 60 eligible for pension, and probably people at age 40, but the state is not an inexhaustible source of funds and priorities must be determined. The responsibility, the privilege, indeed the burden of government includes defining such priorities, and that applies not only to the federal government but to provincial governments as well.

So we have to make choices and make them taking into account all the requirements that now exist, all essential or useful programs in the field of social security. As an example, I will indicate some of those priorities, Madam Speaker. There is, first of all, the need to protect the income of old age pensioners facing the rise in costs. We have already escalated old age pensions with quarterly increments and I am pleased to note that as early as January 1975, these pensions will be raised again.

The basic pension to which will be added the guaranteed income supplement will be brought from $199.10 to $204.27 and, for a couple, to $389.70. The basic pension itself will be increased to $120.06 in January. With the pensions paid under the Canada Pension Plan, the maximum benefit under this plan will be raised from $109.60 to $121 per month. So a person who is now retired will receive a maximum of $241.06 under the Canada Pension Plan, including the basic pension. Those are the amounts that will become available to elderly people as of January 1975.

Things are happening in that area, and one of the priorities is to guarantee the income of those who are already retired, who are already 65, in the face of rising prices. Another priority, Madam Speaker, is more services for older people about which many hon. members talked tonight. Some of them referred to the "New Horizons" program, others to housing programs, and still others to medical care programs. Those are so many services that, of course, we must improve for our senior citizens, essential services, and there again, the government has done a great deal in the past in that area. There is still much to do and we are committed to keep on improving these services.

Another priority which does not only concern senior citizens primarily but also citizens other than those who are retired is a better income security program intended for all those who are now unable to provide for their needs. This includes a great number of physically and mentally handicapped people as well as all one parent families, especially when they are the mother's responsibility.

A fourth priority which we must take into account is the need to supplement the income of the small wage earners, those who work for a minimum wage and who have a large family, or those who have a job at minimum wage level or casual work. We must implement a program which will encourage those people to stay in the labour force and enable them to provide for their own needs and those of their families.

A fifth priority we must face is that of strengthening the essential social services such as day nurseries and programs designed to help children in general as well as programs to help juvenile delinquents and people liable to imprisonment under Canadian laws.

Another priority which was mentioned earlier by one of my colleagues is the need to provide all our citizens with moderately priced housing and there again, the opposition frequently asks the government to implement additional measures in that area.

And finally, there is the whole extremely important area of improved manpower services such as manpower training, so that welfare recipients and unemployed may re-enter the labour market more easily. The problem is trying to reconcile all these priorities; I have not listed them all, but this is a series of priorities, of constant demands made upon the government. To reconcile these priorities is not only the federal government's problem; it is also of very great concern to the provinces which also have extensive responsibilities in this area.

May I remind my hon. colleagues that a very serious dispute almost arose between the provinces and the federal government when soon after my appointment we increased old age security pensions from $85 to $100 per month. I am surprised that my colleagues of the Social Credit Party of Canada who all come from Quebec have forgotten that period when the Quebec government in particular, and those of other provinces very firmly opposed unilateral action by the federal government in this field. They argued at the time that we were changing provincial priorities.

In order to achieve these goals, it is therefore essential that we maintain close co-operation with the provinces. This we endeavoured to do, Madam Speaker, as early as April 1973, and the process is now under way to review with the provinces the social security program.

This undertaking, to which we set a two-year time limit, is now nearing completion. For this reason, the federal government could not even envisage a new program or project, of the nature of that involved in the motion before us, without very seriously harming the review and being accused of bad faith by the provinces that co-operated with us in this review. May I repeat that in so doing, we would be implementing a specific provision certainly limited in nature, directed to a limited group. More importantly, it would do very little to counter poverty in this country. May I indicate once more that the intention here is to extend a universal program to a still limited group of citizens, namely the 60- to 65-year old.

What would that achieve in the fight against poverty in this country, the aim of any new undertaking in the field of social security? It would achieve very little, for the simple reason it would transfer funds to a great number of people who have no current need for it, because they have good jobs and they want to go on working in order to maintain their revenues.

Revenue distribution in the country according to five income groups indicates that over the last 20 years, in spite of all the social measures that were passed by governments over the last 20 years, there has been practically no change in the proportion of the income spread between the five groups in our society.

As a matter of fact, the only changes that came about affect the 40 per cent following the first 20 per cent at the top. This is the only group in which a favourable change took place. All those at the bottom level kept the same proportion they had previously and that, in spite of all the measures that were taken in the social field. It has been shown that without the present social measures, the situation of the poorest among us, namely those at the bottom level, would be twice as bad as it is now. Social measures thus help to improve their lot but in spite of that, the fact remains that income distribution in our society has practically remained the same over the last 20 years.

Now should we want a more equitable distribution of income, are we going to obtain it by extending to a limited group of citizens universal programs such as the one proposed in this motion? I do no think so. If we really want to tackle seriously this poverty problem in our society, we will have to take all available additional funds and allocate them, not in a universal way, but in a selective fashion, concentrating our attention on people who really need help. On this point, I agree with my hon. colleague from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who spoke first on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party and said we should use our funds to help those who need them the most.

And that is the general trend of the current review of social security and the fundamental priority that the government and myself have adopted.

So, what do we want to do? We want to achieve that not by considering a limited group of citizens, a single sector of the community, but by guaranteeing an income to those unable to work and earn their bread, whatever their age. We want to provide adequate help to the handicapped of 30 or 35, the chronically unemployed of 55, 56 or 57, who is unable to find work just as the chronically unemployed of 61 or 62.

And furthermore, as I was saying earlier, we want to apply available resources to supplement the income of the one who works but does not earn enough to maintain his family.

These are priorities which are not restricted to one age group, which are not restricted to a limited section of the population, to whom would be distributed universally or nearly universally funds which would benefit many people who do not need it.

These are the priorities of this government, Madam Speaker. While we have this major objective, I must once again remind hon. members that we have not ignored senior citizens.

Improvements which have been made to pensions these last few years, and especially during the last two years, are more important than any improvement made at any time before, and the government is rightly proud of this.

As was said earlier, we started by increasing the basic pension to $100 a month, then we geared it to the cost of living to account for inflation. These benefits were adjusted quarterly. Moreover, we made a series of very important improvements to the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan.

There was a considerable increase in the level of incomes which are subject to Canada Pension Plan contributions. We eliminated the income test for all people aged 65 to 70 under the Canada Pension Plan so that whatever their income, these people will still continue to receive a pension under the Canada Pension Plan. Moreover, as I said earlier, we fully adjusted the benefits under the Canada Pension Plan.

Madam Speaker, I hope we shall conclude our review of social security measures in the spring of 1975. At that time, I hope the provinces and the federal government will have come to an agreement about guidelines for reforming social security in Canada. As for guidelines for the future, I hope they will set priorities which will have been agreed to by the provincial and federal governments.

Again, to date, I believe we did not put aside the problems of the aged and the government does not intend to do so in the future.

Finally, we will fully discuss that question, and it is a question that I will certainly consider with my provincial counterparts. My colleagues in this House should also think about it. It is the matter I mentioned in the beginning, the possibility of optional retirement, selective retirement even at 65. I think that the debate will continue in the years ahead of us, and we will need the knowledge not only of my provincial counterparts but also of all members in this House.

Madam Speaker, once again I want to thank all members who have participated in that debate, particularly government members, for their contribution to the discussion which certainly interests all Canadian citizens. But I thought it was important to point out also to my Social Credit colleagues that we must take into account priorities when we discuss those matters and that we cannot propose such a project without referring to the whole set of other priorities which this country is now facing.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There must have been a breakdown in communications. There have been discussions with the occupants of the chair, perhaps with all of them except yourself. It was our understanding that since we have had only one speaker so far today, the speaker to follow the minister would be the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes).

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I regret this. I thought the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich was rising to ask a question. I will recognize next the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Is the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich rising to ask a question?

[Mr. Lalonde.]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): No, Madam Speaker, but may I have the assurance of a place following the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) was to follow the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. Perhaps if there is enough time the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich could be recognized afterwards.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Late show for the hon. member!

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, thank you. I am glad that I am able to follow the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) because he has brought out all the old red herrings, such as that this measure would be too costly to implement, that the program to have voluntary retirement at the age of 60 would be too expensive, and so on. I hope in the course of my speech to use some of the figures that the minister used to disprove that it will be as costly as he claims. I think that the government can finance this measure.

The motion before us regrets that the government has not lowered the age of retirement to 60 so that those people can be eligible for old age security pensions. I would have used a stronger word than regret, nevertheless the NDP supports the idea of retirement at the age of 60, but we support it on a voluntary basis. We would also like to see the basic pension raised to $200 a month. I think the two are very complementary.

We have come a long way since 1926 when the House passed a measure giving the senior citizens of this country the magnificent sum of $20 at the age of 70. Hon. members reading their history will recall that this measure came into being mainly at the instigation and pressure of J. S. Woodsworth, the founder of the CCF. But it is also interesting to note that the Senate rejected that first pension plan passed in the House. Listening to the minister this evening, and to many other Liberal backbenchers, I found that they sounded very much like some of those Senators back in 1926 who said that the country could not afford an old age security pension plan. I would like to quote briefly two Senators who took part in that debate. First, Senator Donnelly, when the bill went to the upper house, said:

> I feel that there is in this country many people who think they have the assurance that when they reach the age of 70, the government will provide for them, and who therefore will not make very much effort to provide for their old age. I think that in this way the Bill places a premium on extravagance and imposes a tax on thrift.

Another member, Senator Beaubien, said:

> This, in my opinion, is an iniquitous measure. First of all, it is unhealthy in its basic moral principle... If this bill passes, the obligation of the children to look after their father and mother and grandfather and grandmother goes by the board... Is it judicious for us to impose upon our country such socialistic legislation as this—because it is nothing else—when there is no call for it?

That Senator said there was no call for pensions back in those days when workers were making 25 cents an hour.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He had one for life, he was a Senator.

Mr. Symes: Finally by 1929 reason and humanity prevailed, and the first pension became law. Many years later, in 1972-73, when we had another minority parliament, we got a further increase in the basic pension mainly through the untiring efforts of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, ever since coming to the House in 1942—that was one year before I was born—has been fighting for pensions for the senior citizens of this country.

In that last minority parliament, because of NDP pressure we got the basic pension up to $100 a month with a cost of living adjustment making it $117. It is now brought up to $199 with the supplement. But the situation today is not all that good because, when we look at inflation, we realize that since it is at a rate of 11 per cent pensioners still find themselves suffering hardship. Since 1961 the consumer price index has risen by 60 per cent, meaning that what $100 could buy in 1961 it now takes $160 to buy. I wonder what the minister and the government can say to the pensioner of today who, despite the increase in pensions, is falling behind because of the rapidly rising cost of living.

What does the government say about the pensioner who has eye cataracts and has to pay $107 or $110 for eye glasses? What does the government say about the pensioner who has to pay from $100 to $300 for dentures? What does the government say to pensioners who need hearing aids, which cost around $400, when we know that the cost of the components is only about $25? What does the government say to the pensioner who has seen his fuel bills increase by 31 per cent in a year? The minister says they are doing all right under the new pension increases.

What about the pensioner who has to pay outrageous prices for drugs, or the pensioner who is paying $150 or $170 a month rent or, if he owns his own home, is paying exorbitant property taxes? How do they cope? I wish the minister would follow a pensioner around the supermarket some time and see what food he buys. It is the cheapest meat, the stale food, and indeed we have heard of pensioners who have had to eat pet food. That is a disgrace in a country as wealthy as Canada, yet the minister says there is no money to increase pensions.

The fact is that 60 per cent of pensioners have an income low enough that they qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. The fact is that most of them go without proper food, clothing and accommodation. A 1972 report by economists Ross and Crawley found that about 50 per cent of Canada's aged live in poverty. I say that demonstrated a need to get the basic pension up to $200 a month.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, as far as I know the motion before the House is not to increase pensions but to lower the age to 60 for the same pension. I submit that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Symes: Madam Speaker, I am arguing that the two go hand in hand. I should like to turn now to the actual business of retirement at age 60, and the minister's argument as to its cost. I think it is necessary first of all because many of our workers deserve it after having worked for 40 or 45 years. The life expectancy for a male in this country is 69 years, and for a female it is 76 years. That leaves the average male worker just four years to enjoy his retirement.

Lowering the retirement age to 60 would not only allow many workers to enjoy their retirement but would also allow many young people to enter the labour market, and thus help solve our unemployment problem. Many private businesses are retiring people at age 60.

The minister says that Canada has a great pension plan, but 12 other countries including France, Italy and Japan have already lowered the retirement age to 60. The minister objects to this proposed reduction. I think the ghosts of the senators are writing his speeches. For example, he is saying it is too costly, but he was saying that in 1972 when it was proposed to increase the basic pension from $82 to $100. The minority parliament changed that.

Can the government afford to reduce the pension age to 60? I think it can, for a number of reasons. The old age security income for 1972-73 was broken down as follows: personal income tax, $1,190 million, corporation tax $226 million, sales tax, $770 million. This is all applied toward pension payments. What then would it cost to reduce the pension age to 60?

The 1971 census shows 777,015 people between age 60 and 64. If we were to make retirement at age 60 voluntary I doubt whether 100 per cent of those people would elect to accept that. Studies have shown that the figure is more likely to be 30 per cent. The minister is therefore distorting things when he says it would cost between $1.2 billion and $1.6 billion. That is only if everybody retired at age 60, but if only 30 per cent did, the cost would be somewhere between $400 million and $500 million per year.

The government says it cannot afford to bring the pensionable age down to 60. I would point out to the minister that corporations are contributing $226 million to OAS. If they paid their fair share of taxes the government could easily afford it. But the minister does not want to collect extra taxes from the corporations. As of 1974 corporations have been legally able to defer paying $5.9 billion in taxes to the federal government. If the government charged 10 per cent interest on deferred taxes, which to date are interest free, it would have $500 million to contribute to bringing the pension age down to 60. So, it is quite feasible to reduce the retirement age to 60. The revenue is there, but the government is unwilling to bring in the necessary reform of the pension laws.

Canada owes her senior citizens a better deal. They built the country and we have benefited from their labour and taxes. They should be able to retire early enough to enjoy their retirement years and have an adequate income to live in dignity and security. I am sure the Liberal majority government, like the Senators in 1926, is going to deny the wishes of Canadians that the pension age be brought down to 60 and that an adequate income be provided for retirement years.

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Symes: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member referred to a life expectancy of four years when a man reaches 65. Is he aware that although a life expectancy of 69 for males and 76 for females has been stated, once you reach 65, for the male the life expectancy is 14 years, and for the female 17 years? Is he aware of this?

Mr. Symes: Madam Speaker, I got my figures from Statistics Canada. Perhaps the minister and I should compare our government sources.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Madam Speaker, I realize there is not much time left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I realize also that some government members do not like to hear about old age security, because they cheer when time is short.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): At any event, I listened very carefully to the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and I noted that he made some excellent comments. On the other hand, I was rather surprised to hear him mention the priorities that must come first, but it is quite normal. However, he seems to forget easily or he did not understand the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not so long ago. I have here a speech which he delivered in Granby on June 25, 1974, and in which he said, and I quote:

> What was announced and what we are legislating is a coordination of the two systems so that if we are elected there will be a guaranteed annual income for all those who cannot work, whatever their age, be it 65, 60, 50, or even 20.

That was during the election period.

Of course, they were in a much better mood than after the elections.

The newspaper Le Soleil reported this on June 21, 1974:

> Yesterday, Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau followed in the footsteps of Conservative Leader Robert Stanfield and announced that the old age security pension would be granted to the 60 year old spouse.

But that is what we are asking for. The text of the motion moved by my colleague for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) clearly summarizes the opinion often voiced by a great number of Canadians especially during the periods of unemployment we have known during the last years. Among the comments coming from the various speakers who took part in the discussion, it is easy to see that many understand the soundness of this motion and considering the present economic circumstances, the government should propose legislation in agreement with the request submitted.

In a brief submitted for the advancement of senior citizens in January 1965, that is almost 10 years ago, we find some interesting excerpts. After having asked for a lower eligibility age, it outlined what had happened during different periods in Canada and in many other countries of the world to legislation concerning senior citizens. I believe it would be fitting to quote certain extracts of this brief presented to the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the new pension plan. Once again, I am emphasizing that this brief was tabled in January 1965. Here is an extract, and I quote:

> Early retirement will be compulsory in the near future thanks to automation.

Well, I can see two of them gnashing their teeth on the other side. I guess that those two are professionnal gnashers.

An hon. Member: I guess they are paid for that.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I shall continue with my quotation:

● (2150)

> The government already recognizes age requirements by providing pension benefits to people of 65 and over, which emphasizes the difficulties older people have to face when looking for a job.
> The people of the world look more and more to their governments for universal measures providing for an adequate and secure retirement. Canada is no exception and must not be.
> In the United States, women of 60 and men of 65 may receive up to $200, a month; mind you, that was in 1965. In England, the age is 60 and 65; in Switzerland, 62; in New Zealand, 60; in Denmark, 62 and 67; in Soviet Union, 55 and 65. Some countries use a means test. Even in China where a few years ago old people starved to death in the streets, pensions are now paid at 50 and 55. We should be ashamed. In this vital question of age, Canada cannot lag behind that vast and overpopulated country.

It is high time a bill were passed in Canada to lower to 60 the pensionable age.

For various reasons, economic security is one of the primary needs of the aged.

It is almost ten o'clock and I would have many things to say, many details to give, many allusions to make and facts to tell about the minister's visit to the riding of Kamouraska and to a home for the aged where he must have noted that most of the time the aged never get their increase. Federal-provincial relations should be greatly improved so that the increased granted to senior citizens are not retained by provincial governments under the pretense that maintenance costs increase with the cost of living.

A real pension plan should be designed to enable older people to use their maturity at this important stage of their life, which would allow them to put into practice a philosophy of life impossible to attain at an earlier age.

While their declining physical strength or the disappearance of friends may have closed some doors to them, their maturity opens others. The disappointments of life has often increased their wisdom so that they can avoid trouble. Whatever privileges the retired must give up he still has the right to usefulness and the right to dignity.

The Economic Council of Canada states that over 700,000 Canadians among elder people live below the poverty line. Keep on laughing you two sneerers from Sherbrooke! How does the Economic Council of Canada define poverty? That is not happening elsewhere, it is happening in Canada.

At page 104 of the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada released in September 1968, one reads, and I quote:

> To feel poverty is, among other things, to feel oneself an unwilling outsider—a virtual nonparticipant in the society in which one lives.

The problem of poverty in developed industrial societies is increasingly viewed not as a sheer lack of essentials to sustain life, but as an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living.

Those are valid reasons that should prompt the government to pass legislation aimed at guaranteeing a minimum level of income and security for people of 60.

We should not wait for all sorts of manifestations to happen to pass legislation providing older people with a suitable pension at the age of 60.

Legislation should also be geared toward creating a climate of security for older people so they can have some compensation for the years of hardships and economic distress that too many poor, particularly in our stupid system of today, had to suffer in a country as rich as ours. Society is not fulfilling all its obligations if all it does is look after the material well-being of the retired, without considering their emotional and psychological needs. It is a mistake to think that we can somehow send older people to the pasture by providing them with food, clothing and shelter.

Canada must try to make full use of the huge tank of ideas, skills and competence represented by its million and a half inhabitants over the age of 60.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but—

Mr. Fortin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order for two reasons. First, the opposition day allotted to the Social Credit Party of Canada under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons for the business of supply was much shortened this afternoon by the many points of order which were raised. Second, my colleague, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), was interrupted several times by members opposite. I feel therefore that it would be only proper that the House allow him a few minutes more to complete his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hon. member is certainly aware that the hon. member for Kamouraska may complete his remarks only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Make it quick!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I am very grateful to my colleagues for these few additional minutes and I want to assure them right away that I shall not try their patience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Perhaps hon. members opposite have thought that I was about to offer my congratulations to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) concerning the New Horizons Program. This program allowed many of our senior citizens groups to show that they could make themselves useful through practical work and by organizing healthy recreational activities adapted to their age. I do not hesitate to congratulate the promoters of this program when I see its advantageous results. I hope that the necessary credits will be provided so as to maintain what I would call a program for the flowering of humanity.

There is something we should not forget when we talk of our senior citizens: life does have its disadvantages and the longer it lasts, the shorter it grows. It would only be normal that the period of hesitation should not be unduly prolonged before a bill is submitted so that 60-year-old Canadians can enjoy an adequate revenue and be assured of a pension at the requested age of 60.

We could make amendments to the present law. We have only to stop believing that it is not possible and we shall succeed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being after ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—CANADA-CUBA ROUTE—POSSIBLE COMPLETION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, on October 16 I raised with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) the question of completing negotiations for regular passenger service between Cuba and Canada. I was a little surprised at the minister's reply which seemed to indicate a lack of progress in this important matter. I had thought that after so long a period of discussion our two countries were closer to formal agreement.

As many in this House know, I have long been an advocate of closer trade and contact with the Caribbean area and in that area Cuba is an important, indeed very important, element. In 1971 it was my pleasure, along with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), to visit Cuba. I think we were the first group of Canadian parliamentarians to make an official visit to that island. There is a great potential for growth in that beautiful island, and their economic efforts merit great commendation. For those who denigrate the Castro regime, I suggest they recall or research the kind of Cuban society, the kind of Cuban government which preceded the present system of political organization.

One of the strong moves on the international scene by the government led by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with Cuba. In 1962, when Washington inspired a hemispheric embargo of Cuba, the Canadian government decided to retain diplomatic and commercial ties with Havana. We kept the doors open, but for a long time I think we have not moved sufficiently through those open doors.

Of late, things have improved. There has been a welcome increase in trade between Cuba and Canada. Our foreign trade with Cuba, $58.8 million in 1971, was practically the same in 1972 but rose to $81.9 million for 1973 with excellent prospects for 1974. Looking at the import side we see that the balance is decidedly in Canada's favour.

One thing which impressed me when I was in Cuba was the large number of trade delegations seeking to make stronger commercial contacts with the republic. I saw many European businessmen there and many Japanese but few, too few, Canadians. The Cubans, with a pragmatism which characterizes their system, have a division of their Trade and Commerce designated as "Trade with Capitalist Countries".

The opportunities for increasing trade with Cuba are encouraging and I welcome signs of leadership from both the south and the north. A few months ago the Cubans bought a shipload of first class hogs from Prince Edward Island; we have also done much in contributing to the Cuban development of pure-bred cattle of exceptional quality. An enterprising young businessman from Charlottetown has sold several orders of equipment which has done much to improve the efficiency of Cuban fish processing plants.

The Atlantic provinces' chambers of commerce plan a visit to Cuba. This is a welcome and worthwhile move. In the development of closer ties between businessmen and people generally, the provision of comfortable, convenient, regular passenger air service is very much of the essence. I should like to see a direct Halifax-Havana service or a direct Charlottetown-Havana service, but would settle for Montreal or Toronto. There is need for an upgrading of priorities in connection with this matter.

The economic realities today dictate and underline the urgency of diversifying our trade patterns. New markets are essential. We must develop them. Trade and commerce on the Atlantic seaboard by sea and air should be encouraged. I renew my appeal for increased celerity and concern with regard to this important area of transportation improvement. If the parliamentary secretary, my fellow islander, can announce tonight that arrangements are moving very fast, if he can give a date for the inaugural flight and arrange for both of us to be on it, my cup of joy will be full indeed.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): As the President of Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), the House leader, pointed out at the time, Madam Speaker, the government is not at present engaged in any "air negotiations" with Cuba. However, recent development in Canada-Cuba relations may well lead to such negotiations in the foreseeable future.

It has been recognized for some time that there is need to provide direct air connections between the two countries. There have been serious delays in communication, and in the handling of mail and freight to Cuba through the Mexican postal administration. It was proposed at one time that Cubana Airlines might operate charter flights to Montreal for the carriage of freight and mail only, at more or less regular intervals provided such traffic were shared by a Canadian carrier, but Cubana did not actively pursue this type of operation.

Canada's trade with Cuba has expanded considerably since 1970-71, as the hon. member has pointed out. While the volume of air passenger traffic between the two countries has not been particularly large, tourist traffic from Canada appears to be increasing. Air Canada has been associated with inclusive tour charters to Havana, but until recently had shown little interest in starting a regular service.

During 1973, 5,000 or more Canadians arrived in Cuba, on charter flights using Air Canada equipment. Cuban autorities, of course, along with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), would like to see that figure expanded. I think the hon. member will be interested to know that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) will be recommending shortly to his cabinet colleagues that we enter into negotiations to work out a bilateral air agreement with Cuba.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE JAMES BAY SETTLEMENT NOT USED AS GUIDE IN SETTLING LAND CLAIMS OF OTHER NATIVE GROUPS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Madam Speaker, I wish to refer to a question I put to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) on November 18. The question related to a statement the minister had made on regarding the James Bay settlement as a precedent. I am happy to see the minister here tonight, since this is an important question and one in which many people across Canada are extremely interested.

I shall not take up much time, since the question itself is very basic—as a matter of fact it could be answered by a brief yes or no, although I hope the minister will be disposed to give the House a more elaborate reply.

I should like to ask the minister whether he can state that the government of Canada is prepared to negotiate native claims in the Northwest Territories in good faith, and without any preconceived limits or constraints arising from the James Bay settlement or other settlements? The reason I ask this question is that I am of the opinion that many people are afraid that that settlement will be used as a model, or formula. We agree that the settlement is good inasmuch as it was negotiated; and secondly the government of Canada admitted that the native peoples of this country do have aboriginal claims in certain areas. Basically that is the question I should like the minister to elaborate on at this time.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, since the agreement in principle on a land settlement between the province of Quebec and the James Bay Cree Indians and Inuit of northern Quebec was announced, concern has been expressed by other native groups who are preparing their land claims that the Quebec agreement would form a rigid basis for all future land settlements. Recent comments in the press may have contributed to this concern.

It is my view as the minister most directly involved with native claims that the James Bay settlement is an immensely important historical event, not only for the native peoples of James Bay but for all native peoples of Canada, simply because the settlement resulted from a process of negotiations. This is the process established by the government's major policy statement of August 8, 1973, and I believe the settlement indicates clearly the success of this policy. As a process, the settlement will obviously have a bearing on native claims negotiated elsewhere in Canada.

However, again I wish to emphasize that each individual claim will be considered on its merits, and that the importance of regional differences as they appear in each claim will be recognized. It is not a rigid formula. For these reasons, a different pattern of settlement from that of James Bay will likely emerge after separate negotiations with the various native groups involved in each area. We are prepared to negotiate in good faith on this basis, realizing that there will be differing conditions and aspirations, as well as different requirements in each region of the country.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING INDEPENDENT ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION BOARD

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Madam Speaker, at the end of October an airplane owned by PanArctic Oils Limited of Calgary crashed through the sea ice in the far north. Thirty-two people died, and two survived the accident. I was interested in it, as I am sure many Canadians were, because of the very extensive loss of life, yet in these days what at one time would have held the attention of the world for a long period becomes the current day's interest, and seems to disappear without further mention in a very short space of time.

As I say, there were a couple of survivors from the accident and the airplane almost made it to its destination. Under those circumstances especially I think questions are raised as to whether every precaution was taken in terms of safety, and in terms of checks and inspections of the plane itself.

Subsequent to the crash I received a letter from a constituent in which several questions were raised as to the sort of safety inspection done on privately owned planes as well as that required for commercial flights. Any plane carrying as large a number of passengers and crew as this, bears with it on every trip people whose services would be of considerable value to a large section of the population who depend upon them.

I asked a question about bringing forward in the House the proposed independent accident investigation board that was promised in the Speech from the Throne. At that time I had two supplementary questions which were more specific that I wished to direct to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). At this time I should like to direct them to the parliamentary secretary.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. McIsaac) give an indication concerning what investigative procedures are now underway in regard to this accident? Also can he say, when the promised independent accident investigation board is set up, whether this particular accident will be referred to it? I realize this would be somewhat retroactive. However, considering the very large loss of life I think this is the sort of accident which should be thoroughly investigated by as impartial as possible an investigative body. The families and friends of those killed and injured, as well as a great many other people involved in this sort of flight in the far north, will be very interested in the reply from the minister.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, in reply to the hon. member may I say I shall have to answer the latter part of this question at a later time as I do not have the facts with me tonight to deal with it.

In respect of the question as first presented, in the Speech from the Throne, as the hon. member mentioned correctly, the government did state its intention that an independent transportation accident investigation body would be established by parliament. This proposal is based on a report made to the ministry of transport by General H. A. MacLean, who studied present Canadian federal organizations for the investigation of transportation accidents and the promotion of transportation safety.

The proposals for the new transportation accident investigation body would include the investigation of aircraft accidents, railway accidents and marine accidents. This would involve not only a new act of parliament to set up such a body; it would also involve amendments to the Aeronautics Act, the Railway Act, the Canada Shipping Act and other legislation dealing with these matters.

At the present time the proposals for the new independent transportation accident investigation body are being studied by senior officials of the ministry of transport. It is anticipated that recommendations in respect of specific legislation will be going forward through Cabinet, to the Department of Justice, to prepare all necessary legislation in consultation with officers of the ministry of transport in the very near future.

I am confident the hon. member will agree that in the meantime we must make sure that the means now at our disposal, which have served us well in the past to investigate accidents such as the one to which he referred, will continue to be as responsive as possible to the needs of the Canadian public. With regard to when the hon. member can expect to see the new legislation, may I say I am not able to tell him specifically the date but certainly it will be sometime during the current session after the Christmas recess.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

STRIKE OF GRAIN INSPECTORS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members may like to know that we have reached a settlement with the primary products inspectors and everyone will be back at work today or, at the latest, tomorrow morning at eight o'clock.

● (1410)

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before we leave motions, could the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Chrétien) tell us more about the second part of his statement and indicate what the terms of settlement are? I ask this now so that we need not take the time of the House during the question period.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the final details. I know that the two parties reached an agreement but I do not know all the monthly payment details, and so on. I understand that the contract will be for 15 months and the increase will be 18 per cent over that 15-month period, plus other changes.

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION

PROPOSAL TO APPOINT A MEDIATOR TO SETTLE STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that a number of employees of the Northern Canada Power Commission have gone out on strike following the failure of the commission and the Public Service Alliance of Canada to come to an agreement on a new wage settlement, and in view of the fact that this situation presents a matter of some danger to public health and safety, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Minister of Labour to immediately appoint a mediator in this situation and to dispatch him to the scene so that an agreement can be arrived at as soon as possible which will satisfy all parties concerned and restore full power services to the northern communities affected.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion which, being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion, accordingly, cannot be put at this time.

RETAILING OF POSTCARDS AND OTHER COMMERCIAL ITEMS IN POST OFFICES

Question No. 154—Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain):

1. What methods has the government devised to assess the effectiveness of retailing postcards and other commercial items in post offices?

2. What is the conclusion of such assessments?

3. In the last fiscal year, what were (a) the costs (b) the proceeds of retailing postcards and other commercial items in post offices?

4. In the last fiscal year, was the practice of retailing commercial goods in post offices more successful in certain types of post offices and, if so, in what types was it most successful and in what types least?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. While the Canada Post Office has experimented with the sale in the past year or two of what may be termed commercial items, the sale of such products has since been discontinued. The sale of illustrated prestamped postcards is an extension of the practice of selling stamped stationary which the Canada Post Office has been engaged in for over 100 years. The first illustrated prestamped postcards were issued in 1930. In selected postal outlets we are continuing the sale of postal related products and reporting systems are being refined to assist in the financial assessment of this limited product line.

2. See 1 above.

3. (a) and (b) Of the variety of postcards that have been sold by the Canada Post Office since 1871, the most recent, issued in July, 1972, bears full-colour provincial scenes which are enlargements of the postage impression on the address side of the card. Costs to date have been approximately $355,000 with proceeds from the sale of these cards estimated to be $700,000. As stated in 1, above, we are no longer involved with the sale of what may be described as commercial items.

4. The experimental sale of commercial items was generally restricted to post offices in which a philatelic counter was located. Sale of such items were not normally conducted across regular post office counters. Therefore, as only one type of post office facility was utilized there is no basis for comparison.

NUMBER OF INDIAN STUDENTS IN ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOLS

1. How many Indian children attend elementary schools and how many attend secondary schools and, of these, how many are attending schools which are (a) purely Indian (b) integrated?

2. How does the percentage of Indian students attending (a) elementary schools (b) secondary schools compare with the percentage of the whole population attending elementary schools and secondary schools?

3. How many Indian students are attending universities or any other advanced educational institutions in each province?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

	Elementary (1973-74)	Secondary (1973-74)
*(a)	24,536	862
(b)	27,347	9,354

	(15.7 per cent)	(32.6 per cent)

2. How many Indian students attending university in 1972-73 withdrew before the end of the academic year?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. During 1972-73, 480 Indian university students completed their first year.

GRANTS GIVEN BY FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT PROGRAM TO OKANAGAN BOUNDARY CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 294—Mr. Whittaker:

What was the total amount of money given out in the Fitness and Amateur Sport Program to date (a) what was the total given out in the Program in the constituency of Okanagan Boundary and what percentage is this of the total distribution (b) what projects in the Okanagan Boundary, by name and amount were given in grants (c) how many were given grants in previous years and what amounts were given to them at that time (d) how many permanent jobs were created (e) what was the total amount of applications received from the constituency of Okanagan Boundary?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): $62,712,861. (a) With the exception of the grants-in-aid to student athletes, funds are distributed directly to national sport and recreation associations and to the Atlantic provinces and the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It is quite probable that individual athletes from the constituency of Okanagan Boundary have been supported in various competitions but this would be impossible to detail. Since 1971-72, Okanagan Boundary has received $17,500 in Grants-in-aid to student athletes. This represents .5 per cent of the total (distribution) since the inception of the granting program. (b) and (c) 1971-72: R. Advent, $1,500; 1972-73: George Athans, $2,000; B. Aynsley, $1,200; 1973-74: George Athans, $2,000; B. Ashley, $1,200; Greg Athans, $1,800; M. Bullock, $1,800; P. Hrdlitschka, $600; T. Irwin, $1,800; 1974-75: Greg Athans, $1,800; P. Hrdlitschka, $1,800. (d) The Fitness and Amateur Sport Program is not designed to create permanent jobs. Rather, it assists Canadian athletes to pursue both educational and competitive sport interests. (e) Information on unsuccessful applicants is not retained.

TEAM CANADA—USSR

Question No. 382—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the public statement made by Mr. Gerry Cheevers, a member of Team Canada 1974, to the effect that he and other members of the Team found electronic snooping devices in their Moscow hotel rooms, is the Department of External Affairs aware of such incidents and, if so, how many such incidences occurred during Team Canada's stay in Moscow?

2. Has the government made any protest to the Government of the USSR on this unwarranted invasion of privacy towards Canadian citizens and, if so (a) on what date was this protest made (b) by whom (c) to whom (d) what answer has been received and, if none, on what date is an answer expected?

3. If the government has made no representations to the Government of the USSR on this matter and if the government has just become aware of the situation, will a full investigation be made immediately and appropriate action taken as a result?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Department of External Affairs is aware that on October 9, 1974, allegations were made in the press that the rooms of Team Canada players in Moscow were bugged. The department has, however, not received any complaints about such activities and has no information at its disposal to suggest whether or not there is any substance to these allegations.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

PERCENTAGE PENALTY CHARGED ON WHARFAGE

Question No. 455—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What is the percentage penalty charged on wharfage accounts by the National Harbours Board that have not been paid per month?

2. On what date was this rate established?

3. What is the cumulative annual rate on such overdue accounts?

4. Does the government feel that it is within and compliant to government policy to charge interest at these rates?

5. Does this rate have the approval of the Cabinet and particularly the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

6. Is it the intention to adopt this rate of interest for other departments of the government that have accounts payable?

7. On what date did the National Harbours Board determine that the vessel owners and operators should collect these accounts, as opposed to the Board collecting their own?

8. Is any litigation underway with respect to these rates and, if so, what is the nature of the government's defence of these rates?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The applicable by-law provides for a penalty of 10 per cent on wharfage charges not paid within 60 days of the due date for each subsequent 30-day period. The concession to permit payment after delivery of the goods at the wharf is a convenience to the vessel owners, and the penalty is to prevent abuse of the privilege.

2. The rate of 10 per cent became effective on November 1, 1968.

3. If the penalty were applied in 12 consecutive months it would represent 120 per cent of the unpaid wharfage.

4. The wharfage by-law makes no reference to interest.

5. The wharfage by-law was approved by the Governor in Council prior to the establishment of the position of Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

6. There is no knowledge of rates of interest that other departments of the government pay, if any, on their accounts payable or of any intention to change such practice.

7. The wharfage by-law providing that wharfage charges shall be collected by the owner of the vessel has been in effect since May 9, 1966.

8. Yes. The action is a claim by the board for the penalty charges pursuant to Section 14(1)(i) of the National Harbours Board Act and by-law B-3 issued thereunder.

MONCTON AIRPORT

Question No. 680—Mr. Jones:

1. How many times in each of the years 1963 to 1973 inclusive was the Moncton Airport used to handle international flights?

2. Are there adequate services at the Airport available to service international flights and, if not, what additional services are required?

4. On what date is the Moncton Airport likely to receive international status?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. Records are not available for 1963. 1964—16; 1965—9; 1966—10; 1967—13; 1968—6; 1969—17; 1970—4; 1971—22; 1972—24; 1973—29. These flights were primarily general aviation and private aircraft with a small number of passengers per flight. The following additional charter flights, mainly diversions from international airports such as Halifax, are recorded for the last three years only as 1971—12; 1972—22; 1973—12, and proportional numbers of diversions may also be attributed to preceding years.

2. No. Major expansion of ground handling, terminal and inspection services would be required.

3 and 4. A number of requests were received from the city of Moncton but investigation disclosed no necessity to conduct formal studies leading to designation of Moncton Airport as International; hence, no date for such classification has been established.

AIR CANADA—MOTHER TONGUE OF SENIOR EXECUTIVE CATEGORY

Question No. 699—Mr. Jelinek:

1. What is the mother tongue of all officials in the senior executive category (equivalent to the SX category in the Public Service) in Air Canada?

2. How many of the officials in the senior executive category make over $25,000 per year?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. Air Canada is interested only in the principal language of its employees, and does not keep records of their mother tongues. On this basis, English is the principal language of 34 of the 40 executive management of the airline and French is the principal of the other six.

2. Information concerning salaries paid Air Canada executives has traditionally been treated as proprietary. To reveal this information while other Canadian airlines do not have to do so could be prejudicial to Air Canada's position in a highly competitive manpower market. Release of information covering terms of employment could also be damaging to the morale of the organization.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS SECURITIES TRUST EMPLOYEES

Question No. 821—Mr. Stevens:

1. As of March 31 in each year 1968, 1970, 1972 and 1974 (a) how many were employed by Canadian National Railways Securities Trust (b) what would have been their aggregate salaries if all were employed for a full year (c) how many had salary levels of (i) $20,000 or more (ii) $35,000 or more (iii) $50,000 or more?

2. What was the salary or the salary range for each of the five highest paid employees of the Corporation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: There are no employees assigned as such to Canadian National Railways Securities Trust. The work is done by employees of Canadian National Railways.

2. What was the salary or the salary range for each of the five highest paid employees of the Corporation?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport):

The management of Air Canada advises as follows:

1. (a) (b)	1968	1970	1972	1974
Number of Employees	16,582	17,568	17,443	20,969

Annual Payroll Monthly x 12	134,792,388	174,412,992	209,491,860	273,880,740

1. (c) and 2. Information concerning salaries paid Air Canada executives or groups of executives has traditionally been treated as proprietory. To reveal this information while other Canadian airlines do not have to do so could be prejudicial to Air Canada's position in a highly competitive manpower market. Release of information covering terms of employment could also be damaging to the morale of the organization.

PROPOSED REVISIONS TO INDIAN ACT

Question No. 841—Mr. Schellenberger:

1. What is the present status of the proposed revisions to the Indian Act?

Order Paper Questions

2. How much money has been allocated for this study?

3. To whom has this money been given?

4. When is the proposed completion date and will the proposal be tabled in the House of Commons or in the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The National Indian Brotherhood presented, at the end of October, proposed revisions of the Indian Act which had been developed under the sponsorship of the Indian Association of Alberta.

2. The Department has allocated $225,000 for the study.

3. The National Indian Brotherhood.

4. The proposals submitted by the National Indian Brotherhood constitute, at this time, only a basis for discussion with the representatives of the Indian people. No decision has yet been taken whether the proposals will be tabled.

FURTHER ASSISTANCE TO AIRPORTS IN SMALL MUNICIPALITIES

Question No. 848—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Does the Throne Speech reference to "further assistance to airports in small municipalities" as among "new initiatives that the government is prepared to undertake immediately" betoken an upgrading in the priorities for improvements of the Charlottetown Airport?

2. Does the recent announcement that Air Canada will provide service to Charlottetown in April, 1975 accelerate the pace of progress on said Airport improvement?

3. What improvements and additions are now decided upon for the Charlottetown Airport and what dates will each eventuate?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Throne Speech reference to "further assistance to airports in small municipalities" is generally relative to airports which are not owned and operated by the Ministry of Transport and is therefore not applicable to Charlottetown Airport.

2. The extent of Air Canada requirements when they commence services to Charlottetown Airport in April 1975 is not yet known and is the subject of current discussions between Air Canada and Ministry of Transport officials. It is not anticipated, however, that immediate needs will be crucial and it is considered that future needs for incorporation into the airport master plan are of much more significance.

3. The development of a master plan for Charlottetown Airport is in the final stages, with completion expected by early January 1975. The evolving plan and related discussions with provincial officials and the air carriers are largely keyed to the necessity for an up-graded passenger terminal and related facilities. The exact extent of these requirements will not be known until the plan is completed but there are current indications that a 3-4 year construction programme will be necessary. Implementation of the final plan will depend upon national priorities and the availability of funds. However, discussions with EPA and Air Canada are now underway to arrange a means of accommodating the increase in traffic expected. As well, a contract was awarded on November 7 to Schurman Construction for the erection of a temporary control tower to be used until new permanent facilities are constructed as a result of the master plan findings.

(1) The geographic distribution of Head Office contracts is not necessarily the final shipping point nor the location where the work is actually performed but is often the location of the contractor's administrative offices. Field Operations Branch data relates to the location of the Field Office which awards the contract.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the very serious allegations made by a member of the Ontario legislature and the position taken by the Ontario solicitor general, is it the intention of the government to set up an independent inquiry into the operations of the SIU in order to fully and independently investigate the charges of violence and intimidation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of Labour said some days ago, the RCMP has been asked to make certain inquiries into allegations that have been made. There is also a responsibility upon the province of Ontario in connection with infringement of the Criminal Code. My colleague, the Minister of Justice, is in touch with the province of Ontario to discuss the respective responsibilities.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. In light of the very serious charge that has been made which is to the effect that the SIU bragged that "we have a senior cabinet minister in our pocket"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —am I to take it for granted that the government will want to have an independent inquiry with regard to that in order to clear the reputation of the members of the government?

Mr. Sharp: Is the Leader of the Opposition associating himself with these statements? Is he taking the responsibility for these allegations?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am taking notice of the fact that the charge has been made.

Mr. Sharp: By whom?

Mr. Stanfield: It has been made in the Ontario legislature and the statement has been attributed. As far as I am concerned, I thought the government would seize an opportunity to clear its name.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I simply wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether his government proposes to take any action with regard to clearing the slur that has been cast upon the members of the government.

Mr. Sharp: As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, the RCMP have been invited to investigate and are investigating any allegations that affect the reputation of federal officials or federal ministers. That is what they are now doing. The Minister of Justice is talking with the province of Ontario about the question involving the Criminal Code for which they have the responsibility of prosecution. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to make a charge that could be investigated here, let him make it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—DATE WHEN MINISTER OF LABOUR LEARNED OF TAPPED TELEPHONE CONVERSATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

An hon. Member: Two will get you three.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Because the Minister of Labour seems either unwilling or unable to make a voluntary statement in respect of these unfortunate allegations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —can he tell us today the date on which he first learned that an alleged telephone conversation between himself and the president of the SIU was tapped by the Metro Toronto police?

● (1420)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member says I refused to make a statement. That is utterly unfounded. I was the first—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Many members on both sides of the House were in this chamber a week ago last Thursday when I was the first to stand up and say that, after learning of these charges which had been made by this member of the Ontario Legislature I had asked the RCMP to investigate.

An hon. Member: Answer the question!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I made several statements which any hon. member was free to note by reading the papers at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. With all respect to the minister, a suggestion was made as part of the question and the hon. gentleman has now refuted the preamble to the question, more, I think, as an answer to the question than as a question of privilege. I do not like to see this done by way of points of order or questions of privilege. I wonder if the minister would wish to address himself to the part of the question which remains as to knowledge about the tapping of the telephone.

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hees: Let him answer.

Mr. Lawrence: I think the minister was rising on a point of order and directing himself to what he thinks were unwarranted allegations of mine in the first part of the question. In my view, the minister has not answered the question and I understand he now desires to answer it, in which case I might have a supplementary to ask.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the second part of the question, as the President of the Privy Council has indicated, I asked for an investigation by the RCMP. We have had, the Solicitor General has had an interim report from the RCMP.

An hon. Member: Answer the question!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I am answering it but I want to be accurate in what I say. This interim report contained among its revelations the wire tap conversation between myself and Roman Gralewicz. I think I became aware of that some time last Monday afternoon.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF LABOUR OF INVESTIGATION WHEN CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTION RETURNED

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): My final supplementary concerns the money apparently returned to the President of the SIU. Will the minister confirm he had no knowledge of any police investigation into matters relating to the SIU, and specifically to his own election campaign funds, at the time he returned those moneys?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): At the time I returned the moneys to the SIU, I was aware generally that they were the subject matter of controversy. I made a value judgment as perhaps any hon. member of this House would. I am sure we all receive donations from corporations and perhaps from unions. I made a judgment that because there was controversy surrounding it, although I was not aware of the nature of the controversy, I thought it might be misunderstood if I kept this particular contribution and it was for this reason I returned it, not because I thought it was improper for any member of the House—

An hon. Member: But you are the Minister of Labour!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Well, any minister of labour in the country might be suspect, then, having received moneys from a union to finance a campaign. If every member of the House is to be subjected to innuendo because of campaign contributions received at election time, perhaps we should all go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—DATE WHEN ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE BEGAN INVESTIGATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the attorney general of Ontario is reported to have said that he sent to the federal Minister of Labour ten sworn affidavits regarding SIU violence, could the Solicitor General inform the House at what precise time the investigation into this situation was begun by the RCMP?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of these affidavits having been sent to the Minister of Labour. The first and only time since I have been Solicitor General that I was requested to investigate the SIU was last week, following the allegations of Mr. Shulman. Following those allegations, the Minister of Labour asked me to approach the RCMP about having a full investigation into those allegations, and they have been investigating ever since.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: If hon. members on the other side have questions I will answer them, but I guess the best they can do is laugh. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the only time I was asked to have the RCMP investigate the SIU was last week, and they have been investigating ever since. I have received an interim report and the investigation is continuing. I have no knowledge of the ten affidavits.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST THE SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—DISPOSITION OF TEN AFFIDAVITS SENT MINISTER OF LABOUR CONCERNING VIOLENCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. If what the Solicitor General says is true—and I have no reason to doubt it—and he did begin the investigation last week, would the Minister of Labour explain to the House why he has not yet sent to the Solicitor General these ten sworn testimonials which were sent to him by the attorney general of the province of Ontario concerning violence by this union?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can answer that. To my knowledge, the only reason they have not been sent is that I have not received them, and I am not aware that anybody else has received them. The RCMP investigation is carrying on and perhaps this will bring them forward. In the meantime, as the President of the Privy Council indicated, the Minister of Justice has been in touch with his counterpart in the province, and presumably through that contact we might obtain possession of these particular affidavits. They have not come at this time. I would welcome their coming, but at this time they have not come to my attention. I hope that the hon. member will accept this. I wish they would come. I should like to see them from the point of view of determining whether I should advise my colleague that some sort of further investigation other than the one already being carried on is warranted.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a final supplementary.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the precedent set by the appointment of Justice Norris as an industrial inquiry commissioner in 1962 to investigate waterfront violence and the role of the SIU specifically, and in view of the serious evidence, of which we are all now aware, of current violence on the waterfront, will the minister appoint another industrial inquiry commission immediately?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree that there was instituted, within a very short time after these allegations were made, an RCMP investigation. I believe it is important that we get the results of this RCMP investigation and then make a judgment as to whether any type of further investigation of the nature suggested by the hon. member is warranted. I am just waiting for further revelations to come from the RCMP investigation, and I will keep this House, including the hon. member, fully informed.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ACCEPTANCE OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS FROM UNION WHICH IS UNDER JURISDICTION OF MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the opinion of the government that it is satisfactory practice for a member of the government to accept campaign funds from a union, the operations of which come under his jurisdiction as minister?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Labour has said, we are going to have an investigation into all sorts of campaign contributions. Whether there is some reason that we should accept some and not others, let us make it general and not point the finger at any particular minister.

● (1430)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, of course the acting Prime Minister did not answer the question, so I will repeat it. Does the government consider it is proper practice for a minister to accept campaign contributions from a union, the operations of which come under his jurisdiction as the minister? This has happened and I am asking for the opinion of the government.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think this same question might be put to my hon. friend. When he was the Minister of Transport did he receive contributions from corporations?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to answer that question. When I was a minister of the government I did not accept campaign contributions from corporations or unions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, when I was the Minister of Transport I divested myself of any investments I had in transportation companies, and when I became the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I divested myself of all investments and put every cent I had into government bonds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Has the minister any other questions he would like answered?

An hon. Member: Why don't you answer the question he asked.

Mr. Hees: I did answer the question.

An hon. Member: No you didn't.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been accused of not answering the question. I did answer the question. I was asked whether I had received contributions from corporations or unions when I was a minister of the Crown. My answer was: No, I did not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—POSSIBLE INTERROGATION OR SIGNING OF STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF LABOUR DURING POLICE INVESTIGATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, during the investigation which has been taking place by the RCMP has the Minister of Labour been interrogated or interviewed by members of the RCMP, and has he sighed any statement in reference to matters that would concern him in the investigation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the SIU investigation by the RCMP, I have no way of knowing, nor should I know, the degree to which the RCMP, have investigated allegations against myself. I have no control over the RCMP, nor should I have such control. I have looked at the interim report.

An hon. Member: Is that a public report?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I indicated earlier that I had seen the interim report which indicated certain material, the nature of which I have already revealed, in terms of the tape and so on, but nothing with reference to myself. I might add that the only charge which has been made in respect of myself is the charge by the member of the Ontario legislature which indicated that officials had been bribed. He did not name them. Then last night he said he did not mean bribery, he meant that certain officials were "cozy", so that is a little different situation in that particular context.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, let me quite clearly indicate that I do not believe there should be so much sanctimony shown here with regard to campaign contributions. There are ministers and there are members on both sides of this House who have received campaign contributions from corporations.

An hon. Member: We are not Ministers of Labour.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It is no more improper for me to receive contributions from unions than it is for hon. members to receive contributions from companies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister is a little upset and did not understand my question which was a very simple one. During the investigation by the RCMP, which the Solicitor General dealt with today, the interim report of which the minister had read, was the minister of Labour interviewed by the RCMP, himself personally, in reference to this matter, and did he sign a statement prior to the investigation, or subsequent to it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both questions is no. In answer to the first question let me say that I would welcome an interrogation by them at any time they wish to conduct one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ACCESS OF CITIZENS TO THEIR FILES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Solicitor General.

Is he considering the possibility of introducing a bill similar to that adopted in the United States two weeks ago to allow Canadian citizens to verify and, if necessary, correct their files with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, once I have examined the legislation introduced in the United States, I shall be able to reply to the hon. member.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REASON FOR FAILURE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL TO DISCLOSE CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTION FROM UNION BEFORE ORDERING INVESTIGATION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and possibly a supplementary for the Solicitor General, and my first question is directed to him in his capacity as the minister responsible for overseeing the investigation by the RCMP into Dr. Shulman's allegations. Why did he not disclose his connection with the SIU and the fact that he was not a disinterested party at the time he initiated this inquiry instead of waiting until after these facts were disclosed in a Toronto newspaper, and until after he had made a number of public statements—on the matter?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): To begin with, Mr. Speaker, I think I should point out to the House that I do not conduct investigations. They are carried out by the RCMP. The RCMP carries out hundreds and perhaps thousands of investigations each week without ever approaching me. Sometimes people ask me to request the RCMP to conduct an investigation. When that happens they conduct them completely independent of myself. I repeat, I do not conduct these investigations; I am not in charge of them and I do not have a veto in respect of such investigations.

As far as the nature of this matter is concerned, I think I was the first to reveal the fact that I received a donation from the SIU.

An hon. Member: No, it was in the Toronto Sun yesterday.

Mr. Allmand: I revealed it, I think the day before. I forget exactly when I revealed it. Of course, if I had been asked in the House I would have revealed it here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: As far as I am concerned, whenever I was asked to reveal information I did so. I never made any attempt to hide it at any time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INTERIM REPORT OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would refer the minister to section 5 of the RCMP Act which says that the Commissioner acts under the direction of the minister. Now that the Minister of Labour has indicated that the interim report of the RCMP had been shown to him in respect of the nature of this charge, is the minister prepared to table that report in the House so that hon. members may be able to consider it and satisfy themselves as to the nature of it?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. I have shown the transcript of the tape to certain members of the government, and I discussed it with the Prime Minister as it was my responsibility to do so. This is not a report that should be tabled in the House. I showed certain aspects of the report to the Minister of Labour to determine whether he was in fact involved in such conversations, and he admitted that he was. In some way or other this tape has been given to this member of the Ontario legislature and others. How this happened I do not know. It was a tape made by the Toronto Metropolitan Police, but as far as I am concerned it is not something that should be tabled in the House.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST GOVERNMENT SUBSIDIZE PART-TIME FISH PLANT WORKERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a very urgent question which involves both the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In view of the fact there is not enough fish being landed to ensure employment on other than a part-time basis for fish handlers and packers in Nova Scotia, will the minister undertake to assure these fish plant workers that the government will make up the difference between their present earnings and the minimum amount available to the unemployed workers before the whole industry closes down and all fish handlers find it necessary to seek full unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, two of my officials are in the maritimes today discussing this very problem of the adequate throughput to support operations of plants. I shall, of course, be answering the hon. member's question when I get that information.

ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF ICNAF QUOTAS BY BRITISH FISHING VESSELS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): While I am on my feet I would like to answer a question asked by the hon. member yesterday. I believe the boardings of the United Kingdom fishing vessels by the United States coastguard referred to by the hon. member occurred in September of this year. U.S. coastguard vessels found six U.K. vessels fishing in apparent violation of ICNAF haddock regulations in the Georges Bank area. These apparent violations were reported to United Kingdom authorities through regular channels. This matter was also raised by the United States at the recent ICNAF meeting in Miami. The delegate from the United Kingdom at the meeting was extremely concerned that these violations had apparently occurred. The United Kingdom delegate emphasized the importance which they attached to their fishermen being informed of and abiding by all ICNAF regulations. He stated that as soon as sufficient evidence had been obtained, the United Kingdom authorities would proceed with the prosecution of those who had violated the law.

FINANCE

PROCEDURE FOR REMISSION OF SALES TAX ON HEAVY TRUCKS AND EFFECTIVE DATE OF SPECIAL TAX ON HEAVY CARS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In light of the fact that the budget bills will not follow through this week or next week, would the minister indicate to the House what procedures will be followed for the remission of the sales tax on heavy duty trucks, and also answer the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Huron-Middlesex with regard to the effective date of purchase in the case of the special tax for heavy cars.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, I will be seeking an order in council from the Privy Council under the Financial Administration Act to remit the sales tax on tax paid inventory for heavy duty trucks and other heavy transportation equipment, in accordance with the answer I gave in the House and the press release I issued subsequent to my answer to the hon. gentleman's colleague.

In answer to the second part of the question, the sales tax of course is imposed effective on budget night. It depends very much on the date of the contract of sale of individual items as to whether the tax is imposed or not, and, as I said to the hon. gentleman, when we get to committee of the whole I will be glad to get into more detail on that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In view of the fact that discussion may be deferred for some weeks, perhaps the minister would consider making it abundantly clear so that the trade and individuals concerned would know where they stand.

[M. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. gentleman may well have a point and I will look into it.

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF TAX ON PLEASURE BOATS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): My question deals with the matter of the 10 per cent additional sales tax on pleasure boats and on motors in excess of 20 horse power, and it is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the many complaints from boatbuilders and marina operators that this new tax will do untold damage to the tourist and boatbuilding industries, would the minister assure the House that he will reconsider his proposal to impose this tax?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I cannot give that assurance, but obviously it will be a topic of conversation before committee of the whole.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EXPORT OF FISSIONABLE MATERIAL

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of recent statements by cabinet ministers that government policy on safeguards regarding the export of nuclear fuel and technology is in the final stages of preparation, will the minister assure the House that every consideration is being given to limiting the export of fissionable materials to only those countries which have signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister said the other day in answer to a similar question, the matter is under consideration in the cabinet and has been now for a couple of weeks. This is one of the conditions that might be attached, but no final decision has been made. The matter is a very complex one. I only wish it could be settled as simply as that.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): In view of the fact that an agreement to supply France with enriched uranium from the James Bay area is under discussion, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister said in reply to a question of mine last week that he had conveyed the position of his government on the export of such fissionable material to the premier of Quebec and to the premier of France, will the Acting Prime Minister now convey to the House the government's position with regard to the export of enriched uranium?

Mr. Sharp: The whole question of the export of fissionable material, of nuclear reactors and so on, is under consideration now. As soon as we have reached a decision, we will make it public. The position on the export of fissionable material is long standing. When I was minister of trade I had the responsibility of denying the export of fissionable material to France at that time.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I have a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister say why it seems proper for the government to communicate its intention to the government of Quebec or the government of France and not to the people of Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: I am sure that if we had not given a satisfactory explanation to the government of Quebec, which apparently now intends to consider a contract with France, we would have been derelict in our duty.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I should like to address further questions to the Solicitor General, but before doing so I should like to let him know that I also was proud to receive contributions for my campaign from trade unions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: I didn't know you were a minister.

Mr. Sharp: There is a definite conflict of interest here.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sure that members of the House accept the word of the Minister of Labour.

I would ask the Solicitor General whether he could tell the House what the terms of reference were for the RCMP when he requested them, at the request of the Minister of Labour, to make an inquiry. Did the terms of reference include an inquiry into political contributions or an inquiry into violence in SIU or any other matters?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): When I approached the commissioner of the RCMP I asked him to investigate allegations made by Mr. Shulman with respect to the SIU and impropriety by certain federal officials. At the same time, the deputy minister of labour had also made a request through one of his officials, and the commissioner of RCMP then decided he wanted the request in writing. So the deputy minister of labour made the request in writing to the commissioner. There were, therefore, two requests to the commissioner. I do not have details of that latter request before me now. I was told later by the commissioner of RCMP that so far as violations under the Criminal Code were concerned, that was within the jurisdiction of the government of Ontario, but that the RCMP could investigate corruption or bribery with respect to federal officials. That is what they are investigating now.

Mr. Benjamin: I take it then from the minister's answer that the terms of reference of the RCMP are only in respect of allegations regarding possible corruption or bribery attempts and not violence of the SIU. If the minister feels that that is something the Ontario government should look into, may I ask him, in view of the fact that an RCMP inquiry of this nature is internal in the sense that it is under the government and an internal matter, whether he does not feel able to make public any interim or final report. I am trying to be helpful, Mr. Speaker. In order to make it easier for the minister, his colleagues and everybody else in the chamber, would he agree to some kind of public inquiry in which findings of the RCMP investigation and other information would be brought out?

Mr. Allmand: We certainly have not decided against such a suggestion, but since we presently have a police investigation going on under the RCMP I think we should wait for some kind of report from the RCMP.

Mr. Brewin: Who judges the report?

Mr. Allmand: As with all police investigations, if the RCMP have any evidence collected, they will lay charges and prosecute. If they do not have enough evidence to prosecute then there may be grounds for having a public inquiry, but there is a police investigation under way now. Following the police investigation there may have to be a public inquiry.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REASON FOR SHOWING INTERIM REPORT TO MINISTER OF LABOUR—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Could the minister tell the House whether it is normal practice to show an interim report on an RCMP investigation to persons mentioned in that report and if not, why was an exception made in the case of the Minister of Labour?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I do not know if it is normal practice, Mr. Speaker. This is the first time I have been confronted with this sort of thing. I was asked to discuss it with the relevant ministers and the Prime Minister and I did just that.

An hon. Member: By whom?

An hon. Member: Who asked?

Mr. Allmand: I was asked—I reported to the Prime Minister with the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, since this extraordinary action has been taken in this case—

An hon. Member: Who says so?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —this extraordinary action of showing to a person mentioned in an interim report, simply because he happens to occupy the privileged position of minister of this cabinet—since that extraordinary action has been taken by the government in this matter, and I direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister—why does the government continue to refuse to have an independent inquiry into this matter so that we will know and the public of Canada will know that the results are going to be made available to all interested parties, which is to say this parliament, and not just the people who happen to be mentioned or involved in the investigation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important in the conduct of government that before inquiries of this kind are launched there should be a basis of fact and not just simply charges and innuendo put out by somebody who is not a member of this legislature. That is what we are doing. We are now asking the police to investigate the facts. If they find there are sufficient grounds for a prosecution, it will be launched. If there is not and the police believe an investigation is necessary we will follow that advice. Even if the police report were of such a character that we felt it desirable to have a public inquiry we would do so. I am sure all members of the House would believe it is better to have a foundation of fact than it is to have a foundation of gossip.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asked the Minister of Labour if he would make provision for an industrial inquiry commission to go into the question of waterfront violence, the minister's reply was that this should wait until the current investigation by the RCMP had been completed. My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that since that answer was given it has been made clear that the RCMP investigation is only into the allegations regarding certain individuals and not into the question of waterfront violence. I wonder, therefore, if the Minister of Labour should not now be given a chance to answer the question about an inquiry into the broader subject, that of waterfront violence.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that I first asked for the investigation by the RCMP with respect to allegations made against officials. It was a very wide sweeping statement first made by the author and I felt this was the only way it could be clarified one way or another, to have this type of investigation and that included politicians, ministers and all officials in the broader context. My colleague, the Solicitor General has indicated that. He also indicated that the RCMP came back during the course of last week and indicated that they felt with respect to the charges of violence that it was a matter for enforcement of the Criminal Code and fell within the jurisdiction of the province.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): You may feel it is nonsense and you have a right to that opinion. Let me state what I know to be a fact today. The responsibility for enforcement of the Criminal Code falls within the provinces. As the President of the Privy Council has indicated, the Minister of Justice has contacted his provincial counterpart to see if this type of material, allegations of wrongdoing, violence, and so on could be forthcoming and with this as a base we could form a judgment as to whether some type of inquiry is warranted. That is going on right now.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate in terms of what I think an implication was about interim reports of the RCMP being revealed to me, that I will have to come to a judgment as I suppose every member of government will have to at some stage, as to whether a full type of inquiry in addition to what is going on in terms of the police investigation, is warranted. Naturally, if I have to assume that responsibility I see the reports.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): My only answer to this is that I have no control over the reports. They are RCMP reports. The RCMP, when it has the material, can decide to lay charges at any time without any suggestion from the government of any kind. Knowing the integrity of the RCMP I trust they will continue to take that posture.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised what was obviously a supplementary question on the basis of a point of order. The minister has made his contribution to the same point of order with what was obviously an answer to the supplementary question. There is the right of course for hon. members to pursue vigorously a topic of this kind. There is no question about that, and balanced against that are the rights of other members who have other questions. I only ask if hon. members want to pursue the matter that they do so by way of questions if indeed questions they have, and not under the guise of points of order.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INTERIM REPORT OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have one question arising out of what the minister said. I listened to him very carefully but there was a little noise. I thought he quoted from the police report that he had seen. I use as my precedent the occasion when a former solicitor general quoted from certain letters dealing with the case in which Carmen Perrault was mixed up, the Geoffroy case. I raised that with the former Speaker. The Speaker of that day ordered the former solicitor general to file the documents. Now that the minister has quoted from the report, and I think he did that, I think the investigation by the RCMP which has been shown these people should now be laid before the House of Commons by an order of the Speaker.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. I did not quote from the document and I think that any examination of the record will show that. I do not believe it is proper—

An hon. Member: That's right. It certainly is not.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —to quote from the report. I think that is a matter for the RCMP in their normal investigation methods—

An hon. Member: Normal?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): —because I have a responsibility to determine—

An hon. Member: Whether you should be investigated.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is the most dreadful reasoning I have ever heard.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, no, I have a responsibility to determine whether an inquiry should be held.

An hon. Member: Where is your sense of values?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North raised what is a legitimate point of order. He suggested that because a report was quoted from it must be tabled. If indeed a minister of the Crown has quoted from a report or document which is in possession of the ministry, there is clear precedence that it must be tabled. My recollection of the remarks of both the Solicitor General and the Minister of Labour, however, is that they made reference to the existence of the report but did not quote directly from it. Therefore, as I understand the precedent, they will not be required to table the report under the circumstances.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the immediate opportunity, since members are insisting on being very precise in regard to certain matters, to point out that earlier in the discussion in the question period the President of the Privy Council indicated that there had been contact between my officials or that I had asked for contact by my officials with those in the counterpart department in the provincial government. The Minister of Labour inadvertently referred to direct contact between myself and the Attorney General. I want to make clear to the House that that in fact has not taken place.

It is rather extraordinary that no one, so far as I know, in the provincial administration of justice, which is the only administration with jurisdiction over such matters as criminal violence, sought in any way the assistance of those in the federal jurisdiction in these matters. That should have been, I would think, the ordinary way of going about this if those concerned want assistance instead of seeking a public answer on this matter.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice raised a point of order, in the course of which he asserted that the matter in question was one within provincial jurisdiction. I ask, is it not abundantly clear that violence on the waterfront falls directly within federal jurisdiction, as the Norris commission inquiry clearly indicates.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it should be clear to members of the House that, although the federal parliament enacts the criminal law, it has been the long standing tradition that matters which arise under the Criminal Code fall within the administration of justice, the enforcement of which has been delegated, under the Criminal Code, to provincial attorneys general. Let me make the point that provincial attorneys general have been very jealous about their function in the administration of justice which has been delegated to them.

In any matter involving violence, fraud or an offence coming under the Criminal Code, the ordinary initial investigation and pursuit of the matter comes within the competence and jurisdiction of the provincial attorney general. Of course, if that provincial attorney general finds it impossible to complete the investigation or if he finds that he cannot get the co-operation of other provincial attorneys general, then we stand more than ready to help. I only suggest that in such circumstances it would be well if the provincial attorney general would communicate such request to us, instead of responding publicly to invitations held out by an NDP member in the provincial legislature or making statements in the press.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. When the Minister of Justice attempts to slough this matter off on the province, as he has just now done—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —and when he attempts to indicate that the provincial attorney general has not sought his help, and those were his words, or the assistance of the federal government in this matter, Sir, may I, through you, suggest to him that this matter falls exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Obviously, that is why provincial attorneys general would not seek federal assistance. They believed that these matters, which encompass far more than the territorial jurisdiction of one province, fall solely and exclusively under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I think everybody here is getting self-righteous, and I want to be self-righteous and suggest to the Minister of Justice that it is a pity he does not follow his own sensibilities about the administration of justice when he lectures the ministers of justice of the provinces about abortion law.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will endeavour to hear all hon. members who want to contribute on the point of order, although I have grave reservations as to whether it is a valid point of order. I have heard several hon. members and several more want to contribute. If I hear some, it is only fair that I should hear all who want to make a contribution. I remind hon. members that our proceedings were interrupted by the point of order. We were in the process of coming to the hon. member for Rocky Mountain for a final supplementary. I think, in the interests of the question period and the orderly conduct of the House generally, that we should return to that point as quickly as possible. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton on a point of order.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some divergence of opinion between the two ministers concerned. I wonder if the ministers could resolve it. The Solicitor General indicated that the administration of justice falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that therefore matters of violence, which are dealt with under sections 244, 245 and 246 of the Criminal Code should be dealt with by provincial attorneys general; on the other hand, it is suggested that offences falling under sections 108, 109 and 110 of the Criminal Code, to do with fraud, bribery of officials, breaches of trust by public officials and influencing or negotiating appointments, meaning influence peddling and bribery—and he used the word bribery—should be investigated through his department. Why are both categories of offence not dealt with by the same agency, either by the province or by his department.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to make sure I have heard from all hon. members who wish to contribute. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I raise what will be, I hope, a final point of order. It has to do with the contact which has or has not taken place between the federal government and the government of Ontario. The Minister of Justice just told the House that he received no requests from the government of Ontario for an investigation of this matter. Is he saying that that request did not come from the government of Ontario? Did he not receive that request from the Minister of Labour? I was informed that on November 19 the Minister of Labour obtained a specific request from the attorney general of the province of Ontario to have this matter investigated. Did the Minister of Labour not request the Minister of Justice to look into this?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, he did not. The investigation which followed that contact was in relation, I think, to matters which were followed up through the police. I should say in reply to the further question asked that prosecutions involving employees within the federal field, and criminal cases closely touching the federal government, fall within the jurisdiction of provincial attorneys general. That is our policy. Because such cases closely touch the government itself, we naturally take steps on our own initiative to investigate complaints. If they come to anything, or if it appears that anything is substantially wrong, the case goes into the hands of the provincial authority in ordinary circumstances.

As well, in cases not involving federal governmental people but involving people coming under the broad jurisdiction of parliament, the Criminal Code clearly calls for investigation and pursuit, under existing conditions, to fall within the ambit of provincial attorneys general. Provincial attorneys general have been extremely jealous about any interference or alteration of that course. At the same time, perhaps this House might consider whether some further matters ought to be administered by the attorney general, federal, rather than by the attorney general, provincial. As matters now stand, when a matter involves violence or an offence which would lead to a criminal charge against a non-governmental person, that matter falls squarely within the jurisdiction of the provincial attorney general.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. Does the Minister of Justice not agree that widespread and general allegations of beatings, violence and intimidation concerning a national union, have national ramifications which affect a national industry and that this should justify federal intervention in the form of an inquiry?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the minister answers that question, as by his rising he shows he intends to do, I think the Chair should make it clear that, as an hon. member raised by way of point of order a question which he felt ought to have been put, but which was not—and that was not a point of order—so in this case, the House is considering a point of order which began when the minister made to the House an answer to a question which he had hoped, I suppose, would be asked during the question period but which was not asked; that, too, was not a point of order. We have now clearly arrived at the point at which we ought to have arrived in the first place. We should simply continue the question period and hear questions of members and answers from ministers. I do not know why the guise of a point of order was ever used in either instance. I have some difficulty in understanding that. I again ask hon. members to apply themselves to questions during the question period. The hon. member for Peace River asked the minister a question, which the minister was about to answer.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think if the matter falls within provincial jurisdiction, then, naturally, we would draw it to the attention of provincial authorities. What the hon. member has referred to, however, as widespread allegations—and the point in question concerns what are allegations, have come to our attention through the press. The person who apparently has some information in his possession is drawing it out day by day before the Ontario legislature and not even placing it fully before the provincial authorities. As far as we are concerned, we read about it in the press as he day by day reveals more of his supposed rabbit which turns out not to be a rabbit at all.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—PERSON WHO DIRECTED SOLICITOR GENERAL TO SHOW INTERIM REPORT TO MINISTER OF LABOUR

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Solicitor General who earlier in the question period indicated he had been directed to take this extraordinary step to make the interim report of the RCMP available to his colleague, a minister who was involved in that report. Can the Solicitor General advise who gave him that direction? Was it the Minister of Labour and will the Minister of Labour be part of the group which assesses the RCMP reports and makes the decision as to whether there should be a public investigation into activities which include activities of the Minister of Labour?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I said I was directed.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Allmand: I said I made it available. I made it available to the Prime Minister. If I recall correctly, I initiated the move to see the Prime Minister and Minister of Labour about it. The hon. member keeps speaking about this case as if the Minister of Labour were an accused. The Minister of Labour is the one who asked me to initiate the investigation with the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: He asked for the investigation. The Deputy Minister of Labour asked for an investigation. I decided to show the interim report, which was not a police report but an interim report in the form of a letter, to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should have preferred advising the Chair of my intention of raising the question of privilege, as requested by the Standing Orders, but before doing so I wanted to check in Hansard for yesterday the oral question I put concerning the exportation of cereals stored in eastern elevators.

A copy of Hansard was given to me by an employee of the Commons just before I came into the House, that is around five minutes past two, I was unable to check it earlier and to advise the Chair of my intention of rising on a question of privilege. I therefore beg the Chair to understand my situation.

My question of privilege stems from the fact that the Chair felt that the question I put to the Minister of Justice yesterday, concerning feed grains and exports of cereals from eastern ports, would not be such as to harm the domestic market in eastern Canada, and that steps will be taken to prevent such exports being made to the detriment of the farmers in that area of Canada.

I looked very quickly in Hansard to find out whether the government had answered such a question asked by Quebec or Maritime members. I did not find any such question or answer. Since that situation occurred last year, I merely wanted to be assured by the minister that this would not happen again.

In addition, as a member from eastern Canada and more particularly from Quebec, I feel it is my duty to obtain that assurance from the minister responsible for feed grains in order to protect the interests of farm producers and consumers. Even if the strike of the grain inspectors has ended, can the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board assure us that the domestic needs of eastern Canada will have priority and that the grain now stocked in eastern elevators will not be exported to the prejudice of our domestic needs?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The short and most direct answer I can give now is that, despite whatever merits the hon. member's presentation today may have, there scarcely can be any other way I could regard them except as a request in some way to reconsider a decision that I made during the question period yesterday. I gained the impression yesterday that the question he was asking at the end of the question period was basically the same question that had been asked by the Leader of the Opposition and by other members of that party supplementary to the question of the leader at the beginning of the question period. If by any shade of opinion the hon. member is concerned about that, I certainly cannot consider any reconsideration of that position. However, there is nothing to prevent the hon. member from posing that question at a subsequent question period.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It requires an answer from the Solicitor General. Because of the long question of privilege preceding mine, the minister left the chamber. I would like to be recognized for the purpose of asking it tomorrow. My question of privilege is not only on behalf of myself because of an investigation that I underwent, but on behalf of any other member of the House who may well have been investigated. Why was an interim report not tendered to me or any other members who may have been mentioned?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: On the question of privilege, the other day the hon. member raised some questions. I said I would get the answers for him. I have the answers here. I do not know if I would be allowed to read them in the House. It appears that the hon. member for Hastings was not investigated as a possible accused, but was approached as a witness in a case. He was interviewed by the RCMP as a witness and not as an accused.

An hon. Member: What about the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Allmand: As I stated earlier, the Minister of Labour had requested an investigation. I was reporting to him and the Prime Minister. There were no allegations of any wrong-doing made against the Minister of Labour. If the investigation had been into the Minister of Labour, he would not have got the report.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hastings has raised a question of privilege to which the Solicitor General has made a very valuable contribution. In light of the difference between the two cases, I must hold that the hon. member for Hastings does not have a prima facie question of privilege.

● (1520)

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege that concerns the business of the House.

My colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), was referring to pages 1883, 1884 and 1885 of Hansard for yesterday, and to his question, as reported on page 1890, dealing with feed grain, stating that the supply of feed grain for the eastern market must be given priority over exportation.

Your Honour ruled then, and I do not object to your decision, that this question had already been asked.

Yesterday was an opposition day, when most of the speeches were made in French, so that we have received the official report—and this occurs very rarely—after 2 o'clock, so that my colleague could not give notice he was going to rise on a question of privilege, as prescribed by the Standing Orders.

He raises the question of privilege at a time when the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr.

Lang) is discussing with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and is not sitting at his place. The Chair states that my colleague will ask his question some other day and my colleague remains unsatisfied while this is a matter of high priority and urgency.

Immediately after that, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis), on a question of privilege similar to that of my colleague from Bellechasse, asks a question. Before the Chair has a chance to interrupt, the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) intervenes and answers the question.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I ask you to allow my colleague from Bellechasse to put his question not tomorrow but today, since we have asked only one question because there were so many points of order and abuses in the House today during the question period.

● (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I listened with interest to the questions of privilege raised by both hon. members and before making a decision in either case I was not only ready, but anxious, that anyone who wished to make any kind of intervention on the question should do so. The position is the same at the present time. If the minister wishes to make an intervention, he may do so.

Mr. Lang: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity. I am glad to say that the Canadian Wheat Board will make every effort to ensure that the supplies which are required are available. There will be some difficult transportation problems this winter, and it will be important for everyone involved in the business of obtaining feed grains to do what they ought to do to get those grains and not rely on the help of the Wheat Board. However, when the chips are down and it is a matter of supplies, the position of the domestic market is, of course, held secure first.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Friday, November 29, consideration of Bill C-14, to incorporate the Federal Business Development Bank, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; and motions Nos. 3, 2 (as amended), and 4.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand there is agreement that the House should proceed now to the taking of the deferred divisions with respect to several of the motions to amend Bill C-14. Call in the members.

● (1540)

And the Members having been called in.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Although there was some indication at the beginning of the discussion during the report stage on this matter about the grouping of the motions, I understand it was indicated during the course of that discussion that it would be preferable and more orderly to proceed first with the vote on motion No. 3, and, depending on the outcome of that vote, we would then determine what might be done with motion No. 2. Therefore, the question is on Motion No. 3 in the name of Mr. Stevens.

The House divided on Motion No. 3 (Mr. Stevens) which was negatived on the following division:

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1974

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS AND ESTABLISH ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS

The House resumed, from Monday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp that Bill C-36, to provide for representation in the House of Commons, to establish electoral boundaries commissions and to remove the temporary suspension of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, when I adjourned the debate on this redistribution bill on Monday I was speaking about the frustration of the ordinary Canadian who finds difficulty in exercising a certain amount of control over a government that is continually growing. I am closing the debate today although I know that several of my colleagues would liked to have participated in it. I mention the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) who feel as I do. They recognize, as I do, that anything that is big does not necessarily mean that it is better. Just because we have a big government does not mean we have good government. A big House of Commons does not mean it will be a good House of Commons.

When the day comes that the government gives members of this House the opportunity fully to exercise their abilities, we will be able to give greater service to Canada than is being given at the present time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

On Monday, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) brought to the attention of the House the fact that Senator Hastings from Alberta, a Liberal, had made an announcement regarding LIP grants to the city of Edmonton. Surely such announcements should either be made by the minister in the House or even by the member representing the area. I feel this is almost bordering on a question of privilege when a spokesman for the Liberal organization makes such announcements. I am not so much concerned about who makes the actual announcement provided it is a member of the cabinet, preferably the minister in charge of the department, and it is made in the House of Commons.

I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that some members opposite seem to consider that we are conducting a filibuster on this bill. We are not. I mentioned that some of my colleagues would like to speak but they are willing to forgo their opportunity so that the bill may come to a vote and go to committee. After the bill had only 3½ hours of debate the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. Pearsall) yesterday put the following question to the President of the Privy Council, as reported at page 1889 of Hansard:

MR. JACK PEARSALL (COAST CHILCOTIN): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. In view of the filibuster on the redistribution bill last night, can the minister indicate when that bill will be brought forward again?

HON. MITCHELL SHARP (PRESIDENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL): As soon as I have some indication that progress in desired on the other side, Mr. Speaker.

It is unfortunate that the hon. member spoke in such a manner when members on this side of the House from British Columbia are so very concerned about what is happening with this bill. As I said, bigger does not mean better, and an increase in the number of members in the House of Commons will in no way ensure better government. The ordinary Canadian is becoming frustrated daily as he feels he is losing control.

In Great Britain where the population is 55,514,600, parliament has 635 members. That means each member represents 87,000 constituents. In the United States with a population of 212 million there are 435 Congressmen and 100 Senators, which means that each person elected represents 396,000 people. With 22 million people in Canada, taking the members of the House of Commons and the Senate combined, each member represents 60,000 people. Canadians are the most over-governed people in the world. If the government really wanted to give good service to the average Canadian it would make better use of the Senate which is assigned a disproportionate membership from certain regions.

Commissioners will be appointed under the provisions of this bill to oversee the redistribution of electoral boundaries. This rules out any possibility of a member of the House of Commons or other individual having influence over such boundaries. This is one of the areas that created great concern in the last redistribution.

The commissioners completely failed to consider the needs of the people. I know that Saskatchewan and Manitoba need protection, just as the eastern provinces and the maritime provinces do, and I think the people of Canada recognize this, as do members of this House. We in this party all subscribe to the idea that commissioners, when they draw boundaries, should consider the needs of constituents. The other day the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) introduced a private member's bill, which was passed, which called on commissioners to give reasons for their decisions. That was a step in the right direction.

One of the greatest shortcomings of this bill is that it does not lay down guidelines which commissioners must follow. That is a serious omission. I think the government is wrong in thinking it is God's gift to Canadians because I, for one, as well as many others, do not hold that view. The government should remember that we, on my side of the House, also speak for Canadians, that we are interested in this matter and that our advice is worthy of consideration.

When electoral boundaries are drawn consideration should be given to the travelling habits of people, to their social habits, and to what is convenient for them. Canadians should not be treated like cattle, and provinces should not be carved up like a turkey for Thanksgiving. When electoral boundaries are drawn and, for instance, a river is involved, should the commissioners not consider on which side of the river constituents would like to be included, whether there is a convenient way of crossing the river, whether bridges are available, and so on? At present these matters are not considered. Guidelines on such matters should have been incorporated in the bill. Perhaps the committee will consider this matter and propose amendments which will improve the bill.

Some say that we should adopt wholly the principle of representation by population, but in a country as vast as Canada that may not be possible. The requirements of various areas must be considered. I hope the government will listen to the recommendations of members on my side. We, too, speak for Canadians. We wanted to speak on this bill, to make the government conscious that we are dealing with human beings. After all, we are here to represent our people. I wish the government would give us all a better opportunity to serve our people better. After all, Mr. Speaker, this House exists for that purpose.

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members wish to allow the hon. member who has the floor an opportunity to participate in the debate.

Mr. Watson: Mr. Speaker, I rise to express some serious reservations about this bill. I would prefer to see the bill not go through this afternoon. Actually, I would prefer to see it not passed at all. Members of this House who represent rural areas—I am not in that group—should not be happy with this bill, because it is one that they should not buy. The end result of this legislation, I am convinced, will be that there will be a larger number of seats in the Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver areas, and the rest of the country will take up the balance. If members on the other side of the House feel that somehow this bill will improve representation in rural areas, they are deluding themselves. It will not happen that way.

There are, in addition, some more fundamental reasons for my opposition. The bill is based on the premise that we in Canada are heading in the direction of an ever increasing population. It is my firmly held belief that Canada should aim at zero population growth.

I also argue that, under the new formula, no advantage will accrue to Quebec. Compare the proposal under the amalgam formula with the system which would exist if this legislation were dropped. What will you find, Mr. Speaker? I suggest that Quebec will bear almost exactly the same relationship to Ontario and the rest of the country under the proposed system as under the existing system.

My argument may or may not persuade members to vote either in favour or against the bill. Nevertheless I sincerely believe that we shall make a mistake if we increase the number of seats in the House, as more seats will make the House more unwieldy and we shall encounter more problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Watson: Certainly I think we shall encounter more problems in our ability to handle our own affairs. I do not believe that we need to have 353 members in this House in the year 2000. I urge the House not to vote on this bill this afternoon, because the public of Canada needs to hear more about it.

On Monday, when few members were present, there was general agreement to process the bill through the House. That did not happen, and I am happy. I suggest that we need more time to let the public zero in on this question. Once the public starts zeroing in on it, I suggest members of parliament on all sides will begin reacting in the same way as the public.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks at this stage of Bill C-36 which concerns electoral boundaries that are about to be changed. As for me, after studying the bill, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the province of Quebec is in process of becoming the least represented province in the House of Commons.

According to the amalgam process, we have lost some ridings in the last few readjustments and are now about to be given one more riding and so, once more, 75 MPs for the province of Quebec. However, if we look at the present trend toward the exodus from parishes or rural areas to the cities, one can readily foresee that this new riding will be absorbed by the city of Montreal which even then will not have enough representation. The rural areas of the province of Quebec will inevitably lose other ridings to the cities of Montreal and Quebec. To my mind, the same phenomenon exists in Ontario especially and will soon be witnessed in British Columbia.

Before many decades we will have a country that will be represented, run and governed by Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. And that would be to the detriment of rural or semi-rural areas, and I do not think it would be to the advantage of all Canadians.

Under that method even if after 1981 the province of Quebec has four more ridings, when the legislation is passed, that will mean that no matter what the trend in the population of the province of Quebec may be, whether it goes up, remains the same, or decreases, there will always be those four more ridings. Should there be a rapid increase in population, that would still mean that the province of Quebec would be less and less represented, all proportions being kept.

I would also like to bring to the attention of hon. members a very important point. Under the method we had with the last census or the last redistribution, we realized that the map was drawn up by the commissioners before members were consulted. We were kindly offered to voice our opinions after, but I do not know if it is for reasons of economy but our recommendations were ignored, the maps were not reprinted, the electoral boundaries were not reviewed according to recommendations made by hon. members. There were some absolutely ridiculous situations.

I have one now in the riding of Abitibi. To represent two municipalities—Desmaraisville and Miquelon—I must virtually cross the adjacent riding, the riding of Villeneuve. Similarly, when the electors of those ridings want to meet their member of Parliament, they must cross another riding.

After this carving into the electoral map, recommendations were made in this House. I made some representations to the commissioner. At that time, I asked that municipalities with an equivalent population near the constituency of Villeneuve be given back to that of Abitibi and that the municipalities of Desmaraisville and Miquelon be given back to Villeneuve. This would have been more logical, but I received no answer. I was not even told whether it was reasonable or not. These recommendations were not considered, and I know that other members made recommendations at that time and met with the same answer.

I humbly submit that this bill should be amended. If it is to be passed, I would like hon. members to be consulted before the constituencies are chopped up, before any change is made in the boundaries. I believe that the members who represent constituencies, be they rural or urban, know their region, their population, the geography of their constituency, and are in a better position to advise the commissioners through their representations.

Mr. Speaker, these considerations should be studied in depth. When the bill is studied in committee, they should be taken into account, and I believe that this would be to the advantage, not only of myself, but of others who will represent my constituency in the years to come, I do not know when, but I hope not for a long time, but in any case, others will benefit from this later. It still remains that Bill C-36 which will soon be passed will apply for a long time. We must therefore take all the time we need to study it carefully so as not to make any mistakes and be stuck with provisions that we would not like later on.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe we should take all the time we need to study the bill, to learn the opinion of all members from across Canada, so that the bill may truly meet the needs of all areas, and not only the needs of political parties but those of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Laprise.]

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the minister rising on a point of order? I see the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is standing. He may wish to address the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I already spoke on second reading of this bill: therefore, under the rules, I cannot speak again. That is why I rise on a point of order to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), who was going to rise, whether he intends to answer the points I made in my speech on Monday and the recommendations I put forward along the same line as several other members on both sides of the House, to the effect that we can indeed expect some changes in the mandate of the commissioners who will draw up the maps. Under this condition, Mr. Speaker, we would be ready to support the bill and expedite its passage. Otherwise, it will be extremely difficult to obtain the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of the House.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform hon. members that if the minister addresses the House at this time, he will close the debate.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to keep the House for more than a few minutes. I wish first to thank hon. members who have contributed to the debate.

When the government presented this bill it was not on the basis that it would satisfy all members of the House, but that it seemed to represent the best consensus that could be reached. We based this view upon the discussions that took place in the standing committee in the last parliament and upon the informal discussions that took place between the parties. It is quite clear that it does not satisfy all hon. members. It does not satisfy some members of the Conservative party nor does it satisfy all members of the Liberal caucus.

I want to make it quite clear that the government is not putting this forward as a partisan measure. It is putting it forward as representing the best consensus that appears to be available that best represents the interests of all members of the House. I say that quite clearly because it would be most undesirable for it to appear to the public that the government is moving ahead with a measure that was designed to be of particular advantage to the party on this side of the House. That is not so. It was not designed for that purpose. If we had something like that in mind, this might have been quite a different bill. As I say, it is one that is based upon discussions that have taken place among members of all parties.

The second point I wish to make is partly in reply to my friend, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson). I think it is obvious there is a better chance of there being greater representation from rural areas with a larger number of seats in parliament than if we continue with the present system which, hon. members may recall, was found to be wanting. It was almost universally condemned by all parties and by many members. It was for this reason the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act was suspended.

We are hoping that on the basis of the new distribution of seats, or whatever proposals may be forthcoming as a result of discussion in the committee, there will at least be a better opportunity for the representation of the Canadian people. If the committee were to come forward with some proposals for the adjustment of this bill which it considered more acceptable, the government, for its part, would not necessarily oppose them.

We are looking for something which is broadly acceptable to the greatest number of members and to the country as a whole. I hope, therefore, that we can get this bill into committee where there will be opportunity for the kind of discussion to which the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) referred, giving the public time to understand all the implications of what is being proposed. Debate on second reading is rather inadequate for these purposes since it does not afford sufficient flexibility. I urge hon. members to allow the bill to go to the committee for these reasons. If there are improvements which can be made, the government is not inflexible.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea; those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Yea!

Some hon. Members: Nay!

An hon. Member: I think we've won.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Sharp) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 14, consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. I invite hon. members who are leaving the House to do so hastily so that we can proceed in committee.

[Translation]

When the committee adjourned on November 14, 1974, it was considering clause 2. The committee held a general debate allowing members to hold a general discussion on clause 2.

● (1710)

[English]

The hon. member for Hastings had the floor. I wonder if he had completed his remarks? The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, since this bill was last before committee of the whole a great deal of water has passed under the bridge. To say the least the bill is now completely redundant and is an anachronism. First of all I have to comment on the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not present. When we are debating a ways and means motion that has $3 billion or so riding on it, I think he should be here.

The price of oil this winter is no longer of great urgency since the premier of Alberta has indicated his intention to keep the price at $6.50 per barrel, so we are debating this in a vacuum. I have several questions, however, which I will put to the parliamentary secretary, although they can only be answered by the minister speaking for the government as a whole.

Since this bill was before the committee on November 13 a report has been issued by the National Energy Board asking the people of Canada, and parliament, to move as swiftly as possible in order to bring the oil and gas industry back to an economic state of health. In plain English, that is warning the people of Canada that if they do not move expeditiously there will not be oil enough to meet their needs very shortly.

In other words, by the bumbling and fumbling of the various governments in Canada, and I am referring specifically to the federal governments, future supplies of oil and gas in Canada have been endangered. This means that consumers in Ontario and the eastern provinces will have to bear the load of higher prices and shortage of supply because the present government, by a series of actions has made a declaration of war not on the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan alone, but on every province.

The National Energy Board is the only board in Canada that is independent of the government and that can give us some form of truth. Despite the fact that it has been in existence since 1959 this is the first report it has published, and I recommend it to members on the government side. If they have any voice in caucus they should tell the government what the report says. The year 1977 is not far away, nor is the year 1982. If I lived in any part of this country as far away from oil and gas wells as Ontario, Quebec and the eastern provinces are, I would take a good look at this report.

The first question I have to ask the parliamentary secretary is this: in view of the fact that the National Energy Board is pleading for us to make a rapid decision, will the government not now recognize that Bill C-32, which is supposed to ratify and legitimize a position taken by 11 heads of government on March 27, is completely redundant?

A second report that has come out since this bill was debated on November 13 is that of the Economic Council of Canada, another board independent of the mandarins in the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. That report devotes a whole chapter to energy in graph and table form. It tells the people of Canada that the only way they can assure themselves of not moving into an importing position and becoming dependent on world supplies is to get the price up to $8 per barrel. With this report in their hands every member of the government party should be at the door of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister showing that they take it seriously.

In view of these two important reports by independent groups advising the people of Canada to take heed, the government should take them very seriously indeed.

The budget of November 18 repeated the mistake of the May 8 budget in making provincial taxes and royalties non-deductible. That shows that Bill C-32 is not just a bill to ratify what 11 heads of government agreed to on March 27 but is a continuation of a planned attack on the constitution of this country, by attacking every province on its basic rights of ownership—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boulanger: You don't believe that!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): If any member from the province of Quebec does not know the history of that province—why they came into the federal system, why they sought so hard to have certain responsibilities remain within their field—he should read the debates leading up to enactment of the British North America Act in 1867. All during the years that followed, the province of Quebec has led the battle in trying to protect the rights of its people against the encroachment of a strong federal power. Now for the first time in the history of this parliament we have a group of members from the province of Quebec—

An hon. Member: Who are running!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): —all interested in one thing only, keeping a united voice in order to keep a Prime Minister in power who is destroying the basic economic health of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Just reserve that genuflection for the proper place, my friend.

I have in my hand a front page story from the Montreal Gazette quoting the Premier of Quebec on the question of energy. He says that the federal government has simply the role of a customs officer. The premier says that he is in a position of power. He was referring to resources belonging to the people of Quebec. Yet we see members of this House representing ridings in Quebec selling their province down the drain by their support of the budget. The effects of the budget are plain. No province can impose a tax on land which—

● (1720)

The Chairman: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member for Sherbrooke rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Chairman, I should like to put a question to the hon. member.

The Chairman: It cannot be done without the consent—

[English]

The hon. member is seeking permission to ask a question.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, may I thank the hon. member for seeking permission, although I wish he had given me an opportunity to complete my remarks without interruption.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Chairman, I simply want to know whether the hon. member would entertain my question?

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) has answered that he does not wish to be interrupted, which means that he is not prepared to accept the question. Since he has the floor, he is entitled to continue.

[English]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, the truth is hurting hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Say what you think, but you don't think about what you say.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member has no knowledge of the history of this country. He does not know what the great members of parliament from Quebec have done over the years in this House. He is selling the people of Quebec down the river, just so that he can remain a faithful soldier of the Prime Minister. The government has expounded its philosophy in this bill. It intends, unilaterally, to interfere with taxes any provincial government may impose on land, forests, mining and oil. It is trying to pretend that this bill is an attack on the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan only; it is not. It is an attack on people in every province. That is why the premier of Quebec knows he must fight. That is why every member from Ontario and from Quebec who supports this bill knows that he stands on the wrong side of this question.

During the past year the province of Ontario passed a law for taxing excess profits taken by speculators in land. The federal government said that the amount of such tax paid will not be considered as a deductible expense for purposes of income tax. Under section 109 of the British North America Act land, resources and royalties are the property of the people of the province concerned. The government has said that the tax on land—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member; however, he has used up the time allotted to him. He may continue only if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Although there is no consent for the hon. to continue, no other member is standing up seeking the floor.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the hon. member. Although he did not spend much time talking about clause 2 of the bill, his intervention was most interesting. He suggests that this bill is not valid because one party to the agreement of March 27 no longer supports what was agreed to then. One of the most important features of the bill is that it gives the government power to pay compensation to the five eastern provinces of this country, and this guarantee will lapse on December 31. I do not think hon. members opposite who represent ridings east of the Ottawa Valley, ridings which are beneficiaries of this clause in the bill, want to see a filibuster. I suggest that they want the bill to pass as soon as possible, because its provisions are as necessary now as they ever have been.

The hon. member talked a great deal about resources being seized by the federal government. That was just claptrap. No one questions the rights of provinces to own their resources. Of course they own them. Yet, if one examines the British North America Act, one will find that the federal government has authority to tax by any means it chooses. We are not talking here about the ownership of any resource; we are talking about the taxation of corporations. I do not think that point has been made effectively.

When the hon. member spoke on the National Energy Board report, I thought he said that it is an encouraging report as it indicates positively that there are supplies of oil in this country. I suggest that we should move on to other clauses of the bill, rather than talk about non-relevant matters.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

An hon. Member: Why not the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who is in the Chair? How dare you do that to a lady!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Madam Chairman, I was asking a series of questions which can be answered only by the minister. As this bill, in conjunction with the budget, presents serious constitutional implications, and as I asked in what manner has the government changed its attitude since we last discussed the bill, I suggest that my question should be answered by the minister speaking for the whole government and not by the parliamentary secretary.

I pointed out that the National Energy Board and the Economic Council of Canada in their reports both asked the government to quit quarrelling with the provinces and return to the business of restoring the health of oil and gas companies in order that we may foster development. The dangers of which I warned the government, dangers which flow from a confrontation between provincial premiers and the federal government, have been realized. I told the committee what the premier of Quebec thinks. I have before me a whole file of clippings showing what other premiers think, but I will not read them to the committee.

In our discussion of clause 2 we are dealing with the general purposes and general thrust of this bill. I have raised questions concerning the National Energy Board report, the Economic Council of Canada report, the budget, the position of Premier Lougheed, who is the main partner in the agreement of March 27 as he is providing 85 per cent of the oil, and other questions concerning the reactions of the governments of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Quebec, Newfoundland and other governments.

In view of the current position I would think that it would make good sense if the government after a full cabinet meeting, could look at the new factors which have arisen and withdraw the bill until there can be consultations with the premiers of all provinces. If we are to keep our federal system strong, the federal government must show positive leadership. Our system can be kept strong only by consultation and agreement, not by confrontation.

Mr. Blais: That is what the bill says.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The bill says, Mr. Chairman, that in the absence of agreement the federal government will use its power to impose conditions unilaterally. Further, the bill says that the government is to have permanent powers in setting the price of oil and of petrochemical products in this country.

● (1730)

This is a direct infringement on the provincial power of price setting. I say again that I am asking, in these opening remarks on this bill, that the government come down and state that its ministers as a government have considered this in council, and their position is this.

We are not dealing with itty-bitty little matters. We are dealing with the constitution of Canada. Bill C-32 was brought into this House to legitimize an agreement made orally between 11 heads of government. All parties agreed to legitimize that agreement by putting through this legislation. However, it is no longer in the ball park. It is an anachronistic type of legislation.

I wish to bring forward some points of which I think we should take note. When the vote came up in the House on Supplementary Estimates A, I spoke to the head of the Treasury Board. I pointed out that the vote which made it legitimate for the government of Canada to pay subsidies to those people east of the Ottawa line only carried until the end of December, 1974. As a matter of procedure in this House it should be proper, I told the President of the Treasury Board either to change the wording of the vote, which was inaccurate, or raise the amount to the full fiscal year to the end of March. He promised to consider that.

The change was not made. This indicates that the government is deliberately trying to cut off the money to subsidize the people in eastern Canada at the end of this year. When the government had a chance, during debate on the supplementary estimates several weeks ago to make that vote effective until the end of March, 1975, at the request of the spokesman for the official opposition on oil and gas matters, it did not do it. Instead it has now come in with a bill that is redundant and out of date. There is no agreement to ratify. The Cabinet wants to waste the time of this House without a responsible minister here to speak for the whole government. I simply point out that if the government is going to play games with the people of Canada on a subject like this, and deliberately cuts off its power to give money as a subsidy, to people east of the Ottawa Valley which all parties have agreed to, the fault will lie on the shoulders of this administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan voluntarily agreed last March to subsidize every consumer of oil products in this country to the extent of $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year. They did that as Canadians. They were praised in this House by all parties for their statesmanship.

Who destroyed this good will? Who broke the agreement? Who brought in Bill C-18 in the last session hours after the agreement was made, that destroyed the agreement? This government did. The budget of May 6 was a complete declaration of war. It was repeated again all during the election campaign. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said this was a negotiating point, that they would reconsider it. However, when the budget came down on November 18, they again declared war. They pretended they were backing up by $115 million a year on a $3 billion industry.

I want to put something forward for the government's consideration because eventually this has to be dealt with by the government as a whole, not just by the parliamentary secretary or someone else. Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is prepared to propose ways in this House that will prevent the government from taking off the subsidy for people east of the Ottawa Valley line, that will keep one price across Canada which is lower than the world price, that will allow for the cushioning effect of staging to the new price levels, and will also be fair to the producer provinces and give them a quid pro quo. Above all, we are prepared to bring forward proposals that will guarantee, if the government wants to carry this legislation forward, that there will be consultation before there is any unilateral force applied to a province when dealing with the property of the people of that province.

We, as a loyal opposition, are willing to try and end this confrontation deliberately sought by a government that is only conscious of political gimmicks to achieve its end. We will be putting forward these proposals. However, they can only be made in the presence of a minister who can go to cabinet and make these proposals to it. I have made some of these proposals to the minister in private and some in public.

The proposals we want to put forward will have to be dealt with seriously by the whole cabinet because this bill is a clear indication that it is a power device by this government to continue its gambling policy that it can smash the constitution by unilateral action while playing politics with the question of prices for the oil that heats our homes and runs our automobiles. This is a very serious thing the government is doing.

I suggest to the government supporters and to the parliamentary secretary in particular, that they carry this message back loud and clear because the people of Canada are not going to stand idly by Mr. Speaker. Not only will the provinces and their premiers be in rebellion, but if you do not honour the property rights of the people of a province, the people of that province can destroy a government. No provincial government wants to be destroyed by not fighting on this issue, which is the whole bedrock of our constitutional base.

We in this party are the founders and fathers of the federal system. We held out the proposal to the people that a strong federal system will only work if you undertake it by agreement and consultation. If agreement does not follow consultation, then we are not a mature nation and do not deserve to continue.

This principle of consultation which we have followed over the years has worked. I was in the Diefenbaker administration. Over 50 agreements were made with the provinces in which then the federal government took the initiative, on matters which were purely in the provincial resource area. In every case we sat down as equals with the relevant provincial government and said, "This is your resource. In the national interest we would like to achieve certain objectives for the good of all Canadian people. Here is our proposal." Every one of those agreements were signed willingly by the provinces. This not only involved matters of resources.

We even moved into the field of education. Every province signed, because they were agreements reached after consultation. We went across the field. Believing in a strong federal central government, we knew it could only be strong if we worked in harmony with the provinces which had responsibilities under their part of the constitution. That is a record which bears repeating.

If the people of Canada know what the issue is, they will opt for a type of federal system that does not have this concept of confrontation that was brought in by the Pearson administration in 1963, and continued by the present administration. They will opt for the principle of consultation, and then agreement. This is a vital issue affecting the way in which we run our government.

● (1740)

I conclude by repeating what I said in my opening sentence. This is not just a constitutional debate. It is a debate on a product which provides 50 per cent of the energy of Canada. This energy not only runs our factories, our trucks and our automobiles; it keeps us warm in winter. The actions of the government are driving the oil and gas companies out of this country, and hastening the day when we will have to go out and beg the world for supplies of oil to run our factories and keep us warm. If that doesn't get through to hon. members opposite, I am darned sure the premiers of the provinces, particularly the premiers of Ontario and Quebec, will be teaching them a lesson very shortly as to where the real power lies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: Madam Chairman, the government has decided to bring forward this bill at this time, and I consider it very inadvisable to do so today. It is indicative of the federal government's continuing policy of confrontation with the provinces. There is to be a very important meeting on Monday of the federal-provincial ministers of finance, which will look at the budget implications, and especially the implications attached to non-deductibility of provincial resources.

This bill cannot be considered by itself. It must be looked at in conjunction with the federal budget and the measures which relate to energy. Therefore, it seems to me very ill-advised on the part of the government to expect the House to deal with this bill, to try to ram it through, before those discussions with the provincial finance and energy ministers take place. We do not even have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with us today. We have before us an energy mess. It is a mess not only from the point of view of supply and from the point of view of price, but also from the point of view of federal-provincial relations. I somehow get the impression from the government side—from the backbenchers and from the Minister of Energy—that Bill C-32 is going to be one of the great solutions of the energy problem in this country. But this bill is not going to do very much.

There isn't the oil in Canada in the first place to provide Canadian industry with fuel, and consumers with fuel as well. And I think the bill must also be looked at in the context of the recent National Energy Board report which, if you go through it carefully, finally recognizes what we in this party have been saying for many years, that we are in a critical supply situation and the future does not look promising. Now the board talks about becoming net importers by 1982. But if you look at the board's charts, all they are looking at is western Canadian production and western Canadian demand. If you add eastern Canadian demand we are going into a shortfall position as early as 1977.

The National Energy Board report also assumes that we will be able to feed the eastern market with oil simply by importing it from the Middle East and Venezuela. But other reports show that by the beginning of the 1980s there will be a critical world oil supply situation. For the board and the government to assume that as we run short of western Canadian oil—and I would remind the House that sufficient quantities of Arctic and offshore oil are not yet discovered and the tar sands cannot produce sufficient quantities of oil by the early 1980s—we will be in a situation where we will be able to import one million to two million barrels per day in the early 1980s, is taking an overly optimistic view. The world supply situation will be becoming tight at that time and there is no guarantee that eastern Canadian demand will be fulfilled. So the bill has to be looked at in that context because it deals with payment of compensation to eastern Canada, and also with the giving of power to the federal government ultimately to decide the price of oil if no agreement is reached with the provinces.

So, it seems to me then that the timing of the bill, the bringing of the bill before the House at this stage before relations with the provinces are sorted out as to royalties, is most unfortunate. Looking at the business of the non-deductibility of royalties that the Minister of Finance brought forward in his budget, surely it cannot be classified by an impartial observer as a fair measure.

The argument of the federal government, as I understand it, is that ever since the price of Canadian oil went up from about $3 to $6.50 a barrel and the provinces correspondingly increased their provincial royalties, the federal government has lost very important sources of revenue and that the provinces are moving by the royalty route into an area of taxation which the federal government considers to be its own prerogative. Well, that in itself is very debatable. The resource, of course, belongs to the provinces since historically the provinces have had the right to impose royalties. But the minister comes up with the curious argument—well, the royalties of the provinces today aren't royalties in the classical sense of royalties. In other words, he is saying that despite the fact that the price of a barrel of oil goes up, the royalty must always remain fixed, and can't be imposed on a percentage basis. I wonder if the Minister of Finance would accept the same kind of argument as applied to corporate income tax, saying it must be fixed and cannot rise as corporate profits rise. I think that it is a very unfair interpretation.

The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy are taking the position that the federal government has moved somewhat, that it has reduced certain taxes, that it has allowed the exploration write-off to rise from 50 per cent to 100 per cent, and that it has allowed deductions for development and so on. Therefore they are saying now to the provinces that the ball is in their court. They are saying, "We in the federal government have moved back a bit from taxation, so now we want you to move back on the royalty issue." Well, I do not think the federal government has moved back much on corporate income tax.

The minister talks about a 10 per cent surtax on corporations, but he exempts the resource industries. If he wants more money he can impose a surtax on the resource industry. He cannot give them a 100 per cent write-off for exploration. I think the Minister of Finance has bought the argument of the oil industry that they desperately need all these concessions for exploration, citing as evidence the fact that drilling rigs are moving out of Alberta.

I submit that the drilling rigs are moving out of Alberta because the oil companies have concluded that there is no oil to find in Alberta. They are more interested in the Arctic or in other countries, so it seems to me the concessions which the minister has given in his budget are not entirely necessary. He has room to manoeuvre to increase federal income. I really question the motives of the government in bringing the bill in today this early before the question of royalties has been settled with the provinces.

I should like to put two questions to the parliamentary secretary because I think they are pertinent to this bill and to the recent report of the Energy Board. First of all I have a very brief question, and when I have the answer I will follow it up with a second question.

How long does the government intend to pay compensation to eastern Canada for its imported oil?

Mr. Foster: Madam Chairman, that is a very hypothetical question, because we do not know what compensation program will be necessary to compensate for world prices of oil. We do not know what the world price of oil will be. The minister has said on many occasions that the Canadian price would move up to a level that would bring on frontier and non-conventional oil supplies, but I do not think anyone could guess how long it is going to be necessary to provide compensation to the eastern provinces.

One of the complaints of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, when he spoke on second reading, was that the bill did not have a terminal date on it; he said this was new and that it was different. It is not new and it is not different. There was no terminal date to Bill C-18 that was introduced last spring, and, of course, there is no terminal date to this bill.

Mr. Symes: That is very interesting. The government wants us to pass this bill when we are not given any timetable showing how long the compensation provisions of the bill are to last.

My second question is this: How does the federal government expect to fund this compensation to eastern Canada in view of the fact that the funds to date have been coming from revenues derived from the export tax? The National Energy Board is now saying we must reduce our oil exports to the United States, which will mean that we will be reducing the amount of revenue gained from this tax. As this revenue declines, how does the government intend to compensate eastern Canada? If the export tax fund goes into a deficit position through reduction of exports to the United States in accordance with the National Energy Board recommendation, how does the government intend to fund this compensation?

Is this the reason that the parliamentary secretary is reluctant to give us any indication of how long this compensation will continue? Is he saying that in the near future the government is going to start cutting back on compensating eastern Canada, or will withdraw that compensation entirely? This is why I want to know whether, as exports of oil are cut back and the revenue therefrom depleted, compensation will be paid out of general tax revenues. Will compensation come from, say, an excess profits tax on the oil companies, or will the government cease compensating consumers in eastern Canada?

Of course, once the price of oil in eastern Canada goes up to the world level, it will mean that the price of oil all across Canada will reach the same level, thus doubling the price of a barrel of oil in Canada. This will doubtless mean another huge increase in inflation, and Canadians may be paying $1 or $1.20 for a gallon of gasoline.

I should like to know what position the government is taking. Obviously the minister is showing his confidence in the parliamentary secretary being able to answer these kinds of questions, so I ask him where will we get the money to compensate eastern Canada as our revenues from the export tax decline, and for how long will this compensation be paid?

Mr. Foster: Madam Chairman, the bill provides that funds for compensation will be appropriated by parliament. Surely the question as to where funds will be found should more appropriately be addressed to the Minister of Finance rather than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. This bill sets out a regime till the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. Symes: On a point of order, Madam Chairman, the non-answers of the parliamentary secretary confirm my original view that we are wasting time trying to discuss this bill in the House today. We cannot get any definitive answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Madam Chairman, even if the province of Quebec has no oil resources, I am pleased to take part in the debate of Bill C-32 which deals with an extremely important matter for the future of our country. If present conditions hold, the productive capacity of oil fields in Canada will start to decline in a few years from now or in not more than four or five years.

Even if the country goes all out to transform in real supplies its immense energy potential, it will not for some twenty years recover the freedom it now enjoys in choosing among various types of energy. Any curtailment of exploration and development would throw the country in the situation of energy shortage now experienced by various countries. The degree of government taxation is an important factor in determining the development of petroleum resources, in promoting or discouraging the exploitation of future discoveries.

According to various inquiries, it is estimated that it will take about $50 billion in the next ten years to enable our country to regain its present independence. Our problem right now is to find new sources of energy. Since charity begins at home, it is imperative to think first about Canada's needs. As it deals with a non-renewable resource, it is urgent that the government take steps to ensure that research for the protection of existing reserves be maintained and encouraged.

Mr. Andre: Madam Chairman, I see it is very near the hour of adjournment, but may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the minister will be here tomorrow? No offence intended; he has answered questions in the fashion we have become accustomed to, but could he answer that question?

Mr. Foster: Yes, Madam Chairman. It is our intention to go on with this bill tomorrow and the minister will be here. It was only because of such great co-operation from the other side that we were able to get in this very enlightening half hour this afternoon on the bill. I am sure we will go on to make a great deal of progress tomorrow, and I thank the members of the committee for this co-operation.

Mr. Andre: Then may I call it six o'clock.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, I must rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST)—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE ALLEGING CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTION SOLICITED FROM SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The Globe and Mail this morning carried a headline which reads "Munro phoned SIU for money: police". The story under the headline says that I solicited a campaign contribution from the Seafarers' International Union. It goes on to say that some source suggested I initiated the call. This is totally false, Mr. Speaker. The facts are that Mr. Gralewicz telephoned my campaign office at a time when I was not available. I returned his call subsequently and it was during this conversation that he offered campaign support to me. I did not at any time solicit support from the SIU. As the House knows, my campaign organization received a contribution from the SIU but it was returned several weeks later.

● (1410)

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of privilege. I apologize to the Chair for not giving notice that I wanted to speak on the question of privilege. Allegations in the same context were made about me when I was Minister of Labour in 1972 to the effect that I received affidavits and documents from persons in the Seafarers' International Union concerning alleged violence and did nothing about it. I did something about it at that time and the Department of Labour heard nothing more from those people after that point. I will be glad to describe what I did at that time. It resolved the matter, at least at that time.

It is also said that I appointed Mr. McLaughlin, president of that union, to the ILO or to the United Nations. I did not do so. It is also said by Mr. Shulman and in the press that certain affidavits were supplied to me. I am informed by the Department of Labour that the specific one mentioned in the press was not received by me. There are many allegations going about in this situation. I want to clarify my own position in it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Are there any more confessions?

MR. MACKAY—CANCELLATION OF MEETING OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERING ESTIMATES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have just been informed that the scheduled proceedings of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates called to consider the supplementary estimates in connection with transport have been cancelled. I believe this is true with respect to the consideration of several other supplementary estimates, and since this concerns a matter so fundamental to the work of parliament, the examination of supplementary estimates, I should like to move—and I hope other members will support me:

That the way the scheduling has been carried out, the abrupt cancellations, and so on, be referred to the Committee on Procedure and Organization for further study.

The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) raised this matter earlier. In my opinion the way in which this has been done is most unsatisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised, without notice, a question of privilege, supported by only a very brief development of his argument. I have not noticed any other members who seem prepared to make any contribution. The hon. member has referred to the sudden cancellation of a standing committee meeting. Unless possessed of much greater detail it would be impossible for the Chair to hold that a valid question of privilege arises in respect to the proceedings of committees, certainly in respect to the scheduling of meetings or to the cancellation of a scheduled meeting. The Chair does not know the reason the meeting was cancelled and, in the circumstances, it would be most difficult to find there was a prima facie case of privilege.

This is not to say that the subject, one which has been raised on other occasions by hon. members in the last few days, is in any way less important. The question has been referred to not only by the hon. member but by two other hon. members in the last two days in the light of the fact that under the rules the time allowed for the examination of these estimates has been so greatly reduced. I hope all members on both sides of the House feel that this is an important restriction on the opportunity afforded them to carry out the important task of detailed examination of these estimates.

In this context, I repeat that it was comforting to all members, I am sure, to have the assurance of the President of the Privy Council that this whole subject of the examination of the estimates is to be considered at an early date by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

AIR CANADA

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF LABOUR DIFFICULTIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise to propose a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, involving our national airline. Members of the Canadian Airlines Employees Association have just walked off their jobs in Winnipeg in protest over labour-management relationships at Air Canada. As this is the second occasion since the 81-day strike last year, the effects of which are still being felt, and since I am reliably informed that serious internal problems exist at upper management levels in Air Canada as well as difficulties with our airline's current capital budget, not yet approved by cabinet, I move:

● (1420)

That the Minister of Transport immediately refer these matters to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for appropriate consideration and action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—DATE WHEN MINISTER OF LABOUR BECAME AWARE OF ALLEGATIONS OF VIOLENCE DURING TERM OF HIS PREDECESSOR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. I should like to ask him when he first became aware of the letter from the seamen's reform committee to his predecessor, who spoke on a question of privilege this afternoon, allegedly accompanied by massive affidavits alleging violence and requesting an investigation before any more violence occurred, and of the reply by an executive assistant to his predecessor following a meeting with some officers of the department to the effect that the Department of Labour had no authority to investigate the internal affairs of the union. When did the Minister of Labour first become aware of these matters?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say the precise time because that would be impossible in terms of memory. I do recall some time ago talking to some of my senior officials and asking them when notice came to me of allegations against the SIU. I asked whether any such allegations or complaints had been made to the department, and my officials informed me that, subsequent to my being a minister, such complaints were made—I believe they indicated two or three—and they went on to say they had taken the appropriate action at the time with respect to them.

I have since checked as late as yesterday what action was taken at that time, having been advised that appropriate action had been taken, and I was told that the matter was, firstly, referred to the so-called watchdog committee of the Canadian Labour Congress, and secondly, that they had recommended that the matter be turned over to the police. They felt that that was appropriate advice and conduct on their part at the time these complaints came to their attention. The former minister may wish to amplify, but I believe that is the situation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would try to refresh his memory as to whether he received this intimation before the election campaign or after. As a supplementary question I should like to ask the Solicitor General this. In view of the information just given by the Minister of Labour that the Department of Labour turned this information over to the police, presumably through the Department of the Solicitor General, how—

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if I may, I did not say that when these complaints were made some time ago when I was not Minister of Labour that they were turned over to the police. I said that the officials advised me that they recommended to the people that they turn the matter over to the police themselves.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—POLICY OF GOVERNMENT WHEN COMPLAINTS OF UNION VIOLENCE RECEIVED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I thank the minister for his correction because I did misunderstand him. Therefore I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether it is the policy of the government, when one of its ministers receives a complaint alleging violence in connection with a union that has previously been investigated for violence and the minister is asked to take action before further violence occurs, simply to state to the complainants that the department in question has no authority to conduct an investigation into the internal affairs of the union and to send the complainant off to the police?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer I must give is that under the circumstances prevailing at that time the Minister of Labour acted very well, indeed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is it therefore the view of the Acting Prime Minister, and the policy of the government, that when a complaint like this in connection with a union over which the federal government has general jurisdiction is received, the government should not conduct any further investigations itself but simply wash its hands of the whole affair?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think it greatly depends upon the circumstances. The Leader of the Opposition has asked a question about general policy. I should think that in each particular case it would be necessary to make a judgment, and I think that the Minister of Labour and his department exercised good judgment in the circumstances. I have heard nothing to the contrary.

Mr. Baldwin: We challenge that judgment. We think it was very bad.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN TO ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE IN RESPECT OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer of the Minister of Labour, I should like to put a question to the Solicitor General regarding the investigation and the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday that "the RCMP have been invited to investigate and are investigating allegations that affect the reputation of federal officials or ministers". In precise and concise terms will the Solicitor General tell us what instructions were given to the RCMP in respect of the investigation and what were they to investigate; violence on the waterfront, the SIU, the reputation of government ministers or senior officials—just what were the instructions and who gave them to the RCMP?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I did not give any instructions. Following an approach by the Minister of Labour I asked the RCMP to investigate the allegations made by Mr. Shulman of the Ontario legislature. They came back to me later and said that these investigations covered some matters that were not under their jurisdiction, but they would investigate fully all allegations relating to misconduct on the part of federal officials or elected members of parliament and ministers. That is what they are investigating. They said the aspects relating to violence between individuals were matters for the Ontario Attorney General and the police of the province.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR NAMES OF MINISTERS INVESTIGATED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Will he now tell the House in plain, concise and precise terms the names of the ministers of the government who were subject to any investigation by the RCMP?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there were no ministers named. I asked the RCMP to check into the allegations by Mr. Shulman. His allegations have been very vague. I think one of the members on this side said yesterday that he revealed part of the allegations day by day, like taking a rabbit out of a hat, and then there was no rabbit. His allegations were very vague. He recently mentioned my name and the name of the Minister of Labour. I tried to deal with that and said there was nothing there, but there has been no allegation made by Mr. Shulman directly involving members of the cabinet or officials of the government.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might follow that up with just one further question? In view of the minister's answer, and having seen the report of the RCMP which was discussed yesterday in the House, what ministers were investigated in reference to the allegation of this Mr. Shulman and the waterfront coverup?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour requested that the RCMP investigate the allegations of Mr. Shulman and the deputy minister did the same thing in writing to the Commissioner of the RCMP. As a result of that request the RCMP visited Mr. Shulman to get from him whatever evidence he may have. While he told them his story he did not give them any documents, transcripts, tapes or anything whatsoever. The RCMP then went to the provincial authorities of Ontario and the Toronto Metropolitan Police and obtained certain material. They gave me the interim report and are still continuing their investigation.

● (1430)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. It is based on the clear precedent of 1962 when, in the light of continuing trouble on the waterfront, an industrial inquiry commission was established under section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which provision now is section 159 of the Canada Labour Code. In order that this whole matter of corruption on the waterfront, charges of violence and all the other charges might be thoroughly investigated on a broad basis, is the Minister of Labour now prepared under section 159 of the Canada Labour Code to establish an industrial inquiry commission?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated on several occasions in this House, I would be prepared to consider such an inquiry at a later stage but at the moment the matter is under investigation by the RCMP. It seems reasonable to me that the government should have the revelations of that investigation and the details thereof before deciding whether or not an inquiry is warranted, and that is what we are waiting for.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—SUGGESTION SOLICITOR GENERAL SECURE COPIES OF TAPE OF TELEPHONE CONVERSATION FROM TORONTO POLICE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, not accepting the argument that now is not the time to appoint an industrial inquiry commission, if what is being pursued is an investigation by the police, may I ask the Solicitor General if he will ascertain whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have secured or will secure copies of the tapes made of telephone conversations which apparently have been obtained by the Toronto Police.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP at last report had a transcript of one taped conversation which was given to them by the Toronto police. So far as I know, that was the only one the Toronto police felt was of relevance in respect the RCMP inquiry. I might point out that the Toronto Police themselves and perhaps the Ontario Provincial Police were investigating the question relating to violence between certain members of the SIU. One would have to check with them to find out the evidence they have.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a final supplementary.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that what some of us are asking for is a broad inquiry into the whole matter, will the Solicitor General make sure that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police get transcripts or copies of all tapes obtained by the Toronto police or the Ontario Provincial Police in respect of SIU matters.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Minister of Justice has contacted the Ontario authorities to get that evidence, and when he gets it we will see if such a public inquiry is necessary. Let me say that if there is substantial basis for a public inquiry I presume the government will have one, but thus far no evidence has been given which would substantiate such an inquiry.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour, if I understood him correctly, just said he was deferring any decision on a request for a public inquiry until the police inquiry into the violence had been terminated, whereas the Solicitor General yesterday and again today indicated to the House quite clearly he thought that the police inquiry was not into violence on the waterfront but simply into charges relating to federal officials or ministers or things right around here. I have to say I think we are being led down the garden path.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order to clarify this matter, the RCMP are investigating questions relating to possible corruption in respect of federal officials or members of parliament and the Ontario Provincial Police and the Toronto Metropolitan Police are investigating those matters relating to violence in respect of individuals on the waterfront.

[Mr. Munro (Hamilton East).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse.

MONTMAGNY—CONSULTATIONS WITH QUEBEC REGARDING CLOSING OF DISTRICT JAILS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Solicitor General?

Since the jail of Montmagny will soon be closed, may I ask the minister if the federal government gives a financial contribution for maintaining and building district jails, and if yes, can he tell the House whether he had consultations on this with the authorities of the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we have signed an agreement with the province of Quebec and other provinces for the exchange of facilities. We have had discussions with the province of Quebec about using some of their facilities where they are no longer needed or where there is a small prison population. I would have to get information on that particular institution and report to the hon. member.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR NUMBER OF COMPLAINTS AGAINST UNION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would obtain from the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General and from their department particulars as to the number of incidents in which complaints of violence, intimidation or improper conduct have been made in respect of the Seafarers' International Union in recent years so that despite the sensitivity of the government in respect of conducting any judicial inquiry this House may form some opinion as to the need for such an inquiry.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I do not quite understand what kind of incidents the hon. member was inquiring about. Is he talking about violence on the waterfront or allegations made by Mr. Shulman?

Mr. Baldwin: On that point of order, I am inquiring about incidents on the waterfront which have been matters of national notoriety over the past few years. Would he inquire of the ministers involved, who may not have been ministers at the time, about the number of incidents of complaint that were made directly or indirectly involving these matters of improper conduct, violence and intimidation.

Mr. Sharp: I will undertake to do that. I should say that the Minister of Justice is trying to obtain up-to-date information in the hands of the provincial authorities on this question which would be available to the federal government. That would be considered a more reasonable way to go about the process rather than resurrect incidents from the past which may no longer be relevant.

JURISDICTION TO INVESTIGATE INCIDENTS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Yesterday the Solicitor General indicated it was not within the jurisdiction of the RCMP to investigate matters of violence. On that ground I wonder whether the minister could explain why his department and the RCMP have changed their approach when in fact in 1972 the RCMP did all the research and initiated the prosecution of Geza Matrai who assaulted Mr. Kosygin in the city of Ottawa. If that is a matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question seems clear and direct enough for the Solicitor General to reply.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it seems that that was a case involving a guest of this country and there were external affairs implications and so on. The RCMP had jurisdiction. I want to make clear to the House that I did not suggest that the RCMP didn't have jurisdiction over the violence aspect of this case. They decided that they did not have jurisdiction and I did not press the matter with them. With regard to the previous question, not once since I have been Solicitor General has anyone approached me in respect of any allegations against the SIU. Mr. Shulman knew where my office was and never once made any attempt to see me.

● (1440)

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I readily accept the minister's response that in the case of the attack on Mr. Kosygin there was certain national importance. Is it the view of the minister that this matter of violence on the waterfront by a union controlled under the legislation of this federal government is not a matter of national importance?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am not the principal law-officer of the Crown, I have been advised where it is a case of violence between individuals, questions of assault and so on, this is a matter for the provincial attorneys general and they are very jealous of their jurisdiction.

An hon. Member: When it is dangerous you leave it to the provinces.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE DETERMINATION OF NECESSITY FOR INQUIRY COMMISSION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the evidence that is going to be gathered by the police forces involved in the investigation both of violence and possible corruption, is going to be reviewed simply by one or two of the ministers. It seems to me that since the ministers may be directly involved that this matter of investigating these reports should be done more openly. I wonder whether consideration would be given, in the interest of doing this in the open, to having a parliamentary committee assess that evidence to determine whether a further inquiry commission is required rather than just letting the minister do that himself?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member failed to direct his question to any minister.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The question was directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that would be a useful suggestion at the present time. I think we ought to have more facts and less gossip.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—EVIDENCE RECEIVED BY RCMP INVOLVING CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Solicitor General arises from the exchange between him and the hon. member for Calgary North who asked for the names of ministers being investigated. The minister's response was that Dr. Shulman supplied no information on specific ministers. In light of the statement by Dr. Shulman as recorded in the Ontario Hansard as follows:

> Roman Gralewicz, president of the SIU in September of 1974 when interviewed by police officers from two forces, boasted to them that they could do nothing to the SIU because he had a senior cabinet minister "in his pocket". He then named the minister. It was not Mr. Munro. It was not Mr. Allmand. In the course of the same statement, Gralewicz also spoke of the union's close connection with other members of the cabinet. The RCMP have a copy . . .

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question for the Solicitor General?

Mr. Beatty: Yes, I have, Mr. Speaker. In light of this assertion by Dr. Shulman and the further assertion he makes that "The RCMP have a copy of Gralewicz's statement," can the minister state categorically that the RCMP have not received any such police report dealing with bragging by Gralewicz that he had a senior unnamed cabinet minister in his pocket?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the RCMP are also aware of this statement and they will visit and inquire from all persons named in the report and obtain what information they have. I am saying the RCMP are carrying out this investigation. They will approach the people mentioned as they feel it necessary to do so; they are independent in this investigation; they will pursue whatever course they think necessary. In response to the last question, Mr. Speaker, if the RCMP or the Ontario police forces see that wrongdoing has taken place they will lay charges and prosecute.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he is changing his previous assertion that no allegations were made specifically about any cabinet minister and if in fact allegations were made and the RCMP has evidence as to the particular ministers involved, will the Solicitor General disclose the names of the ministers under investigation?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, when the RCMP went to Dr. Shulman he did not provide them with any documents or affidavits. He told them his story. In the Ontario legislature he did refer to me and he told several lies extremely—what I call very serious falsehoods and he also referred to the Minister of Labour. Now, I am sure that the RCMP will pursue some of the information that was raised by Mr. Shulman in the Ontario legislature and rightly so.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ALL DOCUMENTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to my previous question. In the interests of ensuring that this whole matter is investigated in the open, would the Acting Prime Minister consider tabling all of the documents related to this matter—documents, tapes, transcripts, letters, communications of any kind?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I would not adopt that suggestion and I am sure the hon. gentleman would be just as concerned as I would be about the correctness of tabling documents in this House which might involve the civil rights of many individuals. I am sure he would feel that a question like that has many implications that would be very, very important to members of this House and all Canadian citizens. I do not think my colleague, the Minister of Labour, would have any objection to those tapes being tabled but I believe there are many people in this country who would take very serious exception to that procedure.

Mr. Baldwin: Never have I seen so much virtue.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

POSSIBLE CONFLICT FOR MINISTER OF LABOUR ARISING FROM INVOLVEMENT WITH SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—ADVICE OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the Prime Minister's statement of December 18, 1973 that "A minister has an obligation to seek the advice of the Prime Minister on any matter concerning a conflict of interest in which he may be in doubt", would the minister indicate if he sought the advice of the Prime Minister, on what date did he seek the advice and what was the advice of the Prime Minister concerning the possibility of a conflict of interest involving the minister and the SIU situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated several times, I did not consider campaign contributions coming to members of parliament or ministers in the process of a campaign as in any way putting that member of parliament, or that cabinet minister, in a position of conflict.

An hon. Member: Why did you send it back?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): It was, therefore, unnecessary to consult the Prime Minister.

POSSIBLE CONFLICT FOR SOLICITOR GENERAL ARISING FROM INVOLVEMENT WITH SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—ADVICE OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary, I should like to put substantially the same question to the Solicitor General. Did he consult and ask for the Prime Minister's advice concerning any possible conflict of interest involving himself and the SIU situation?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not. I got a contribution from them during the election campaign. Of course, at that time hon. members opposite thought they were going to form the government. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the SIU gave donations to members of all parties in this House. My campaign cost $13,000, the SIU gave me $500. I did not consider that a conflict of interest.

Mr. Baldwin: That is why you took it. You did not think you would be in the government.

THE MINISTRY

POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF DUTIES OF SOLICITOR GENERAL AND MINISTER OF LABOUR AS RESULT OF INVOLVEMENT WITH SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the statements made in answer to my earlier questions both by the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General, and in view of the allegations and innuendos surrounding the present Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General of Canada with respect to the SIU, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate if consideration has been given to rearranging or transferring from those two ministers their duties with respect to the SIU and related matters under the provisions of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act and if so, to what ministers is it proposed to transfer their duties at least in the interim until an inquiry may begin?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the people of Canada decided it was better to have ministers on this side of the House than from his party.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Solicitor General on a question of privilege.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I want to reject very strongly the insinuation that because I received an election contribution from the SIU I was tardy or negligent in my responsibility. The only time someone asked me to investigate the SIU was last week and it was from a distance, in Ontario. The very next day, through the Minister of Labour, we carried out that investigation. There was no tardiness and no neglect whatsoever.

● (1450)

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, in response to the remarks made—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This is a question of privilege. Have they not heard of that over there?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It has been the habit of the House to hear both sides of an alleged question of privilege. The Solicitor General was listened to a moment ago; I think the Leader of the Opposition ought to be listened to now.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, they may have won the government but they do not occupy the chair of the House. I say, in response to the question of privilege which the Solicitor General raised, that it is clear the Solicitor General or Minister of Labour were involved in a conflict of interest—

An hon. Member: Make a charge!

Mr. Stanfield: —in accepting contributions when there was reason to believe that a matter might come up in their departments in connection with the contributions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Earlier this afternoon I asked the Minister of Labour when he first learned of the matter which his predecessor claimed to have dealt with satisfactorily. I did not obtain a definite answer from the minister. I say to the Solicitor General and to the Acting Prime Minister that if I were Prime Minister of this country, I would have grave doubts—and I do not cast aspersions on any individual minister—whether the minister who had received a contribution from the union in question ought to be in charge of the investigation.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. You know, by his statements, the Leader of the Official Opposition has impugned, by implication, the integrity of a minister of the Crown, when he knows full well that members of governments and members of provincial legislatures—he was a provincial premier—receive contributions from companies, unions and individuals during election time.

An hon. Member: Why did you send your contribution back?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): These contributions have never been regarded as involving the substance of a conflict of interest. Persisting in this way with innuendo and implications to question the integrity of a minister of the Crown is cowardice. When, I ask the Leader of the Opposition, will he have the courage to make a charge? If he has the courage to make a charge, let him make a charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): And let him take the consequences if he cannot substantiate that charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are discussing the question of privilege raised by the Solicitor General. I see the minister rising. I am not disposed to hear from the same hon. member twice on the same question of privilege. I understand that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands wishes to contribute.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on this question of privilege. It seems to me important for parliament and the whole parliamentary process that the government not only be deemed by itself to be right but that it appear to the public to be right. Previous answers indicate that the RCMP are carrying on an investigation. We have confidence in them to do their duty. The point at issue, however, is this: When the report of the RCMP becomes available to the government, the very people whose integrity has been called in question will be deciding what disposition will be made of that report.

Mr. Fairweather: Right on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I submit, through you, Sir, to the government that this matter can be cleared up if the government were to assure the House that when the report of the RCMP has been completed and all the facts have been gathered, the report will either be made public or placed before a committee of this House so that the public can be assured that evidence adduced by the RCMP will be the basis for an unprejudiced decision as to whether further action and investigation is required.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House is considering the question of privilege raised by the Solicitor General concerning, as I understand it, some insinuations against him in respect of the carrying out of his duties. Certain questions raised by hon. members may involve insinuations. However, all the questions, and I have listened carefully, have, in my opinion, been orderly questions concerning the inquiry into an important subject. In situations like this there are always insinuations of some sort connected with questions. It seems to me that the questions asked have been to the point, as have been the answers. The situation is being clarified as the questions and answers come forward. It seems to me that this is good parliamentary exercise, but I cannot recognize in it the ingredients of a question of privilege respecting the rights, conduct or the ability of a member to function as a member of the House of Commons. When the Solicitor General rose on his question of privilege, there were about 12 minutes remaining in the question period, and I was about to recognize the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further question of privilege. When the Leader of the Opposition responded to my remarks, he said something which I feel raises another question of privilege and which I should answer. He said he felt that I, as Solicitor General, was involved in a conflict of interest in the carrying out of my duties as I was in charge of the investigation being carried on by the RCMP. That is completely false, as anyone familiar with the RCMP act and the traditions of parliament will know. The RCMP carry on these investigations themselves. If they see fit to lay charges and prosecute, they can do so without consulting me in any way. They direct their own investigations. I do not direct their investigations.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I simply assert, in response to what the Solicitor General said, that in a situation like this the Solicitor General, in my judgment, ought not to be in charge of this investigation and reporting to the government in that regard.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF TERMS OF REFERENCE AND FINDINGS OF INQUIRY

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. As the Solicitor General is ultimately in charge of the inquiry, both from the point of view of the terms of reference of the inquiry and of his acting upon the findings of the RCMP, will the minister inform the House if he will make public the terms of reference of this inquiry and the findings?

Mr. Fairweather: And the result.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that assertion, may I say that I am not in charge of the disposition of the findings. The police, if they find evidence on which to lay charges, will see what charges are to be laid. They do not need my permission to lay charges, and it would be wrong if they did, because that might involve a conflict of interest. The hon. member, in the second part of his question, asked if I would make the report, which the RCMP would give me, available to the House. The RCMP do not usually report to me on investigations. They conduct an investigation and, if there is evidence on which to lay charges, they lay charges; if there is no evidence, they will not do so. When I ask them for a report, they usually give it to me, but it is against all tradition to table police reports in the House of Commons.

• (1500)

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister. In view of the fact the RCMP gave the minister an interim report on the investigation and in view of the fact federal cabinet ministers are involved, I should think the minister would want a report from the RCMP on this. Again may I ask the minister whether he will make the conclusions of that report public so that any suspicion of this House and the country can be allayed that proper investigation is not being carried out?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will give serious consideration to making the conclusions of the report available to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Deo gratias! Mr. Speaker, I do not remember what I wanted to ask.

As for the question of privilege raised a while ago, I note that there are some doubts in various quarters. If there is nothing to hide, Mr. Speaker, an inquiry should be launched in all honesty to satisfy public opinion and to prove to the Canadian people that Parliament can work quickly to pass legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to my colleagues on both sides of the House who are hurling charges at one another that I feel that innocents are not more numerous on one side than on the other. There are just as many on both. They are both financed by the same sources. If those members came more often in Quebec, they would be aware that we are used to inquiry commissions. We even have a premier who is—

An hon. Member: Mind what you will say!

Mr. Fortin: Oh yes! That has become the main industry in Quebec, Mr. Speaker.

The premier of Quebec who is now in France has spent $500 million of the money collected from taxpayers to buy his welcome there. Nobody says anything. At the House of Commons, Tories and Whigs have the same source of funding, throw accusations at one another, refuse to make investigations while I wait to ask my question.

FINANCE

EXCISE TAX ON HEAVY VEHICLES IN WAREHOUSE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. After all, Mr. Speaker, he is the one who administers the governments financed by campaign funds, so he will understand what I mean.

The Minister of Finance recently tabled a budget that could have very serious consequences for some citizens. Not long ago, I asked him a question about boat manufacturers. I should like to put the same question to him today, with regard to vehicles of more than 16,000 pounds, that are stored in yards and to which the sales tax removal cannot be applied.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, since he already told me that after Christmas holidays we can discuss bills on that matter and move amendments, whether he could give us the report of the studies made by his department and likely to explain the implications of the taxes proposed in the last budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think we will be discussing that bill tomorrow, with the consent of the leaders of the House, and that would be quite an appropriate question for the committee of the whole.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Could the Minister of Finance provide us with figures as regards the forecast of his department about the implications of those taxes?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think such a question would be appropriate tomorrow, or when we get to the study of that specific clause of the bill before the House. I will then be ready to answer the hon. member's question.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—POSITION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA WITH REGARD TO EGG MARKETING BOARD—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It is not with regard to his activities with the SIU.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Anderson: Yesterday it was announced that the British Columbia Egg Marketing Board was giving notice of its intention to quit CEMA as of 1976. Will the minister advise the House whether any dialogue has been carried out with the minister of agriculture for the province of B.C. to determine whether that province was in agreement with the stand taken by the egg marketing board.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture for British Columbia was here a week ago Monday. At that time I talked with him about this matter. I gained the impression he was determined to see national egg marketing continued in Canada and that the B.C. egg producers and their board should stay in the marketing plan. Since that time I have not seen anything other than a report in the press. I do not know whether to put very much confidence in that report. According to the report in the press, he seemed to be of the same opinion on Monday of this week. However, we will check with him directly as soon as possible. Unless he has changed his mind, he appeared to be very strongly in favour of national marketing.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—PERSON DIRECTING SOLICITOR GENERAL TO DISCUSS RCMP INTERIM REPORT WITH CERTAIN MINISTERS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It involves the interim report of the RCMP about which we have heard. Yesterday the Solicitor General said, and I believe I am quoting him correctly, that he was asked to discuss the report with the relevant ministers and the Prime Minister and he in fact discussed it with the Prime Minister as it was his responsibility to do so. Will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House who asked the Solicitor General to take that rather extraordinary course of action, on what authority and what responsibility he had to discuss that interim report with the Prime Minister?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that yesterday the Solicitor General corrected his language. He inadvertently used these words. He did not intend to and he corrected the record.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I might give the Solicitor General a chance to correct it again. My supplementary question is also to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday the Solicitor General, if he was quoted correctly, called the member of the Ontario legislature a muckraker who has no respect for the truth. In light of the obvious bias in this matter which was demonstrated by those words, is it not rather obvious that the Solicitor General is not competent to undertake this investigation? In view of this, will the government now undertake to set up an independent and public inquiry?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member, he surely is repeating a question that was put on at least two previous occasions, once specifically by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR NAMES OF MINISTERS INVOLVED IN RCMP INVESTIGATION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. In light of the revelations made by Dr. Shulman in the Ontario legislature, can the Solicitor General inform the House whether he has asked the officials of the RCMP if they have taken part in interrogations and determined that a senior cabinet minister is in the bag? Also, has he asked the RCMP officials to supply him with the name of that senior cabinet minister and can the Solicitor General tell us that name?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I tried to explain before that I asked the RCMP to investigate all allegations made by Mr. Shulman in the House or out of the House, wherever he made them. It is up to them. They are trained policemen. They know how to conduct investigations. I do not tell them who to contact or not contact when making their inquiries. If I did that, I would be interfering in a political way with a police investigation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the minister has already admitted that he has received information from the RCMP involving certain cabinet ministers. Are there any other names than those that have been mentioned? Are there others such as the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance who are involved in the allegations?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I received a transcript of a tape which the RCMP received from the Toronto Metropolitan Police. This is the tape—

An hon. Member: Why did you receive it?

Mr. Allmand: The RCMP got it and they gave it to me.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): But you are not involved in the investigation.

Mr. Allmand: I am not involved in the investigation. They gave me a report.

● (1510)

Mr. Speaker, this transcript of the tape was leaked by the Toronto Police to a member of the Ontario Legislature who in turn leaked it to the press. I think this is a shocking thing. I would like to remind the House that earlier this year we spent a great deal of time debating the privacy bill and there was much concern shown here about protecting individuals who were the subject of wire taps by the police. As a matter of fact, at that time opposition members wanted to strengthen the measure to protect individuals who were the subject of wire tapping. In this case, the government responded to some of the leaked information—misinformation—which was put abroad, but in principle we are against the release of transcripts of wire taps which are made by the police in their investigations—these should be released, in my opinion, only under the conditions of the privacy bill. I hope the opposition will take the same view, because that was the position they took during the debate.

Mr. Symes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister said earlier that he did not get involved in the investigation. But a moment ago he said he had received a transcript of the tape from the Toronto Metropolitan Police.

An hon. Member: No. He said he had received it from the RCMP.

Mr. Symes: From the RCMP. Did the minister ask for this tape or is it customary for the RCMP to report constantly to the minister on this investigation?

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. The House had asked me for a report. I promised to report to the House. I asked the RCMP for an interim report, and with the interim report they gave me a copy of that transcript.

[Mr. Allmand.]

PERSON GIVING GUIDANCE TO FORCE DURING INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGATIONS AGAINST CABINET MINISTERS INVOLVED WITH SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): My question is also to the Solicitor General and has to do with his rather peculiar interpretation of section five of the RCMP Act. It says clearly that the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police acts under the direction of the minister. Under that direction he has control and management of the force itself. Since the matter under investigation by the RCMP in this instance is one which concerns not only the law but also the propriety of conduct of ministers, will the Solicitor General advise the House to whom the RCMP must look for guidance on this question other than the chief law enforcement officer under whose direction the RCMP must act by statute?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I would suggest to the hon. member that he get a legal interpretation of that section because there is a long tradition in Canada that the Solicitor General, or, before him, the Minister of Justice, the minister responsible for the RCMP, does not interfere in criminal investigations. He does not direct the force to investigate when it does not feel it should investigate, nor does it try to deter the force from investigating when it feels it should investigate. They investigate freely and openly and then they lay charges when they have the evidence. They do not clear with the Solicitor General—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Since, according to statements made frequently in the House in the last few days, this is not simply a criminal investigation but is also an investigation into the conduct of ministers and touches the propriety of their conduct—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Of course it is.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —to whom does the RCMP in these unusual circumstances look for advice and direction other than to the minister?

Mr. Allmand: These investigations do relate to certain provisions of the criminal law. There are sections of the Criminal Code which relate to the bribery and corruption of public officials. But those matters, if they relate to federal public officials, are usually investigated by the RCMP. I must repeat that the RCMP, when undertaking investigations, does not seek my advice and direction. They were asked to investigate allegations made by Mr. Shulman and they carry out that investigation independently and freely.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day!

Mr. Dick: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A matter on which Hansard perhaps has something incorrect. You indicated that the Solicitor General has cleared up an error. I am wondering whether Hansard has it incorrect.

Although the hon. member for Hamilton East indicated that he had read the interim report, the Solicitor General indicated in the first instance that he had only shown him that portion which dealt with the wire tapping but later the Solicitor General said he had shown him the report; the answers in Hansard yesterday indicate that the Minister of Labour had read the entire report. Was the Solicitor General, or was Hansard, incorrect in copying down the Solicitor General in saying he had only shown him that aspect dealing with the taped telephone conversation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member has asked what would have been a very interesting question had it been posed during the question period. However, it does not constitute a point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Might I ask the House leader, having in mind the tremendous speed with which the House has been processing legislation, what designs he has on the time of the House between now and the date on which the government decides to recess?

Mr. Sharp: Today we shall be continuing discussion in committee of the whole on the Petroleum Administration Act and tomorrow the Minister of Finance will take two of his budget bills, perhaps the Excise Tax Act and the customs bill. If we can dispose of them, we shall revert on Monday to consideration of the Petroleum Administration Act. Tuesday is an allotted day and I hope there can be some discussion of the very popular question of conflict of interest. I trust that at the end of the day we can make the reference I have put down of the subject of conflict of interest as it affects members of parliament including cabinet ministers, and public servants to the appropriate committee.

Basically, there remains on our agenda until the time of adjournment for the Christmas recess, the Petroleum Administration Act and, of course, completion of the consideration of certain bills which are now in the standing committees or at various stages. I hope we can complete some of these bills, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A week ago today, the hon. gentleman indicated in reply to the third or fourth question on the matter, that we would soon see the bill in the name of the Minister of Transport calling on the railway companies to disclose certain freight rate information. Will we get that bill in 1974?

Mr. Sharp: I should not reveal what went on in cabinet today, but there was authorization to proceed with this bill so I expect that within a few days it will be before the House.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, December 4, 1974, consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

● (1520)

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening it was still considering clause 2 of the bill and the hon. member for Calgary Centre had the floor.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon we were in committee of the whole on Bill C-32 and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, speaking on behalf of this party, outlined the position of our party on this bill. Though it should not need repeating, it evidently does in view of the reaction we have had. Let me make it clear that this party still maintains the position it took in November of last year, namely, that there should be one uniform price for crude oil across Canada. We still take the position that that price should be less than the world price; but we also insist, on legal grounds, ethical grounds and on grounds of maintaining a viable and healthy Canadian unity, that this price and any future increase, as well as the question of revenue sharing, must be resolved by consultation and fair dealing on the part of the federal government and the provincial governments affected. We cannot and we will not accept the kind of confrontation, bad faith and what has been called treachery—and I agree with that word—that have been exhibited by the government.

Bill C-18, this bill's predecessor in the last parliament, was introduced after the March 27 first ministers' agreement which was heralded by the Prime Minister and all members of the House as an example of Canadian federalism at its best; an occasion when the premiers, the Prime Minister and the interested parties had sat down and worked out an agreement that was recognized across the country as fair and just. On that basis, our party was prepared to pass the enabling legislation, Bill C-18, very quickly.

However, the government chose to throw in a twist: in spite of that agreement and the good will that had overcome some of the bad will that had existed over the previous year, the government chose to throw in a veto clause. In committee this veto clause was described by Mr. Leitch, the attorney general of Alberta, as recorded at page 7 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works for May 7, 1974, as follows:

Far from embodying a term of the first ministers' agreement it stands as a direct negation of the principles upon which that agreement was based. It permits the executive council to terminate an existing agreement between a producer province and the federal government or to decline to negotiate a renewal agreement and to impose by unilateral action maximum prices on a natural resource owned by a province.

This party agrees wholeheartedly. If that clause and the equivalent clause in the section of the bill dealing with natural gas were removed, we could promise very rapid passage of this legislation; we would pass it as quickly as the government would like and we could all get on with the other important legislation facing the country. It is especially galling to have the government introduce legislation like this when in its own document "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase 1" which was tabled in July of 1973, there is advice which the government indicated to the House would be acted upon. This document was the preliminary to the government's energy policy and was considered so important that it was transported from the printers by Brink's trucks. At page 58 of that document the following appears:

That there can be no effective set of national energy policies developed without the participation of the provincial governments is readily apparent.

It then goes on to state:

Obviously, policies developed in isolation in Ottawa hold scant hope for success.

So we have in the government's own publication excellent advice, advice which this party stands wholeheartedly behind. Thus, I question why the government is incapable of following it. At page 60 I find the following:

The federal government has already assured provincial governments that it intends to obtain their views about the impact upon the provinces of possible federal energy policies before any final decisions with respect to them are reached by the Government of Canada.

What a farce! No such consultation was undertaken. Then the document goes on to underline consultation even more:

It is envisaged, however, that the participation of provincial governments in the formulation of national energy policies would involve more than was implied in that assurance.

So the government was going to do more than simply consult; it was going to work out things jointly with the provinces. If that were the case, then how does it rationalize the veto clauses in Bill C-32 which were also included in the previous bill, C-18? This is not the only example of bad faith, Mr. Chairman. Let us consider the question of price. How was the price arrived at in the first place? We all know that the September 4, 1973, price freeze was a unilateral decision, with no consultation. It occurred after a long cabinet meeting over Labour Day weekend. The federal government was forced to introduce the export tax to make this price freeze work, and they were embarrassed about it. There are several quotes in Hansard that I could read to the committee to indicate that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had said, "Don't worry: 100 per cent of this export tax is going back to the producing provinces; it belongs to them".

Then as the export tax grew, the government became a little less generous, but said it would guarantee that the producing provinces would not lose a cent of income. Then it went to 50 per cent that the government would return to the provinces. We then had the budget in which not only did the government take 100 per cent but a good chunk of provincial royalties as well. We want to make it abundantly clear that this party is not arguing the question of royalties. We are not defending the royalties issue: That is for the provinces to decide because it is within their jurisdiction. If they are in fact too high, then indeed the government should engage in consultation with the provinces regarding fair sharing of revenue derived by the oil companies.

Instead of this, what has the government done? A week ago last Wednesday the Prime Minister, in attempting to rationalize or explain away to the House the charges of bad faith and treachery in his dealings with the provinces which had been levelled at the government, indicated that "the provinces had fair warning as to our views on revenue sharing". He then went on to say that in January of this year the federal government had tabled a document illustrating the kind of revenue sharing it would like to see. I went and dug out the file on this, Mr. Chairman, and yes, indeed, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did table a document concerning pricing. I have it here. In his statement the minister said that the attached tables presented alternative ways of describing a distribution of revenue flows on crude oil production and he made the point that annual flows do not include the yield from existing fiscal regimes operating below $4. The table of figures had been presented to the conference as representing the federal government's views on the fair sharing of revenues from oil.

These are the figures on the basis of which the Prime Minister said the government had warned the provinces about revenue sharing. At that time the federal government indicated it would be fair for the provinces to receive 30.75 per cent of the oil revenue including export tax. These are the figures tabled by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at that conference and referred to by the Prime Minister in his speech last Wednesday when he tried to explain to the House how above board and fair the government had been in its dealings in respect of revenue sharing.

What is Alberta's share? The royalties in existence as of April 1, 1974, give the Alberta government 23 per cent of that revenue as opposed to the 31 per cent the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated would be fair and just. In other words, the province of Alberta is collecting 8 per cent less than the minister indicated was fair. Those are the figures the Prime Minister gave us. This gives us an idea of what this government considers fair sharing. How can this government justify its budget of May 6 and how can the Prime Minister justify the statement he made during the budget debate? He said he told the provinces about revenue sharing but the provinces became greedy. According to the government's own figures, Alberta has not been greedy enough. I suggest this whole thing is strictly a smokescreen. What is involved here is not revenue sharing; it is power-grabbing and control. That is all that is involved. Let us not talk about bad faith and treachery. Having tabled this energy policy after bringing it in by Brink's truck, I do not know why the government did not bother to read it. It states on page 9:

No national policy can be contemplated without the fullest of intergovernmental consultations and consensus.

What consensus has there been in respect of the budget? What consensus has there been in this government's dealings with the provinces? I suggest there is no consensus because that is not what the government is after. This government is after control. What will happen if it gets control? Let us look at that matter. We have a constitution which outlines who owns natural resources, but apparently that does not matter much to this government because, notwithstanding the constitution, it intends to exercise control. Let us consider the situation to see whether there are non-legal considerations to justify the federal government taking control of natural resources.

To begin with, the government does have control over federal land north of the sixtieth parallel. This government argues that it has control over offshore resources as well. Certainly it has control over some aspects offshore. In April, 1970, the federal government withdrew land use regulations pertaining to lands under federal jurisdiction. That is over four years ago, and there have been no regulations and no royalty structure pertaining to lands under federal jurisdiction since then. These are the lands from which we will have to produce the oil and gas Canadians will need within a decade.

How competent is this government in administering that land under its jurisdiction? There has been no regulation and no royalty structure in respect of those lands for over four years. What in the blazes is holding this government back? How does it expect industry to operate when it does not explain the rules? How does the government expect anyone to invest millions and even billions of dollars when there are no regulations and the administration is as shoddy as it is?

What has been happening in terms of the industry in the last two years? In 1973 things looked bright and promising. There was great expectation in the industry in terms of exploration. Then we had the initiatives of this government. What have we today? According to a news report of the Canadian Petroleum Association there will be a drop-off to the extent of $900 million in exploration and development conpared with what was predicted at the first of the year. The Prime Minister indicated in January of this year that we would require at least $3 billion capital investment in exploration and development to remain self-sufficient. So far we are down to about one-third of that and evidently this government does not care.

The Minister of Finance says the next move is up to the provinces. Somebody ought to explain to him that these companies are not carrying out exploration on provincially administered land. Imperial Oil indicated it was cutting back $100 million in its exploration budget. Imperial Oil has not explored in Alberta for a number of years: its entire exploration work is being conducted on federally administered land. I suggest its decision was taken as a result of the last budget and this bill; it was not taken as a result of any action by Alberta. Shell Oil and most other petroleum companies have not explored in Alberta for years. The supply of oil and gas other than conventional in Canada will have to come from federally administered land and that is where the cutback in exploration budgets is occurring.

The Minister of Finance is inconsistent when he states that the next move is up to the provincial governments. He is totally ignoring what is happening and I think it is time he and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made it their business to find out who in this country is responsible for making sure we have enough oil and gas to remain self-sufficient. Evidently the government does not care. What is more important to the government is who is going to get the biggest chunk of the pie. We can freeze in the dark so far as this government is concerned.

Where does this government expect the 170,000 barrels a day for the Polysar plant in Sarnia will come from, when we have cutbacks in exploration and development such as have taken place? Are we to import this oil from the Arabs? If we do, it will be the highest priced plastic in the world, and where would we sell such a product? So much is happening by way of reduction in the activities of this industry that any Canadian who has the slightest concern for the future of this country has to be deeply troubled and frustrated. Any Canadian with a modicum of intelligence must appreciate that solutions will not result from continued confrontation because the battle will simply be accelerated.

The federal government wants this bill passed so it will have a club with which to beat the provinces. The next thing will be that the provinces will take legislative initiative, then the federal government will do something else, followed by additional action on the part of the provinces. What will happen to the people of Canada? Apparently that is immaterial and the only thing that is important is power and control. That is absurd. It is about time we had a minister who is concerned about the energy supply in this country and it is about time we had a minister who is concerned about the potential of Canada.

Instead of people being concerned about their jobs in the energy industry, they should be looking forward to a tremendous future. What an opportunity we have in this country, because it is still the only country in the industrialized western world that is self-sufficient and has the potential to remain self-sufficient, yet this is the only country experiencing a decrease in exploration and development activity. What an incredible situation that is. How can this government blithely sit back and say that the next move is up to the provinces? When is the government going to accept its responsibility?

The worst thing we could do to this country is pass this bill with the veto clause. This will guarantee continued confrontation. The passage of this bill will just whet the government's appetite for power and control. It will then have control over oil and gas and the next thing will be coal, then electricity and then everything else. Then we will have the same people in control who have not been able to produce land use regulations for the north for four years. What an absurd situation, to say nothing of the fact that this clause is constitutionally illegal.

Mr. Chairman, any Canadian who is concerned about the loss of opportunity we are experiencing must be frustrated, bitter and disappointed. We as a party and, I think, most thinking Canadians request in the strongest terms, plead with and beg the federal government to stop these confrontation tactics, to stop grabbing for power and to sit down and negotiate openly, declaring everything rather than hiding things in innuendoes and subtleties. We urge the government to put an end to this confrontation so that Canada can look forward to a future of which we are capable and, I believe, deserving.

Mr. Milne: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in energy, and have been for quite some time. I have followed with interest this bill and other energy measures before the House since being elected. I had not intended to enter this debate but having listened for some time to the discussion I feel I should rise and speak to some of the points about which I feel very strongly.

I understand that hon. members from the producing provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan speak as they do concerning this bill in an effort to get the best situation they can for their provinces. One would expect them to do this and I respect them for doing so, although I do not agree with most of the points of view they have put forward. I am absolutely astounded, however, at the role played regarding this bill by hon. members opposite who come from eastern Canada. I cannot understand how the Conservative Party has solicited their support in filibustering this bill. The Conservatives have openly admitted they will filibuster it. Their spokesman on energy matters, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, conceded as much in a story written by Victor Mackie in the Ottawa Journal last Monday. When asked if his party intended to filibuster the bill, the hon. member is quoted as replying: "Yes, I suppose, although politicians don't like that word".

I ask the Conservative members from Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes if they really understand this bill and if they truly appreciate the implications if it should not go through. I should like to know how they would react to this bill being withdrawn and therefore letting the price of oil in eastern Canada go up to $11.70 from $6.50, and the price of natural gas perhaps doubling. I ask what effect would that have on industry and agriculture in their ridings, and what reaction they would receive from their constituents. It was not very long ago that the hon. member for Norfolk, on the opposition side of the House, asked a question about a letter from Union Gas saying there was some question concerning security of supply of natural gas for a hospital in Simcoe, Ontario, and raising a question about the price of natural gas to the hospital.

I ask why they would raise such a question and still filibuster this bill, because this is the government's answer to the energy question in eastern Canada. I cannot understand why the Tory members from Ontario have not spoken on this bill, or why in their caucus they have not opposed the filibuster undertaken by the western members. I am sure they must have heard rumblings in their ridings concerning security of supply of gas and what the future price might be, as well as the impact created if the price of Canadian petroleum went to $11.70. Despite these concerns in their ridings, it is obvious that the Tory members will knuckle under to the filibuster tactics of the Alberta members and argue against a bill which would ensure for their constituents and all Canadians, a reasonable and fair price for oil and natural gas in the future.

The basis of this bill is to place the federal government in the position where it can consider the interests of producers and consumers. We are not opposed to raising the price of petroleum, if necessary. We are not opposed to bringing the price of natural gas closer to its value. But we are saying that someone must mediate this argument and that it should be the federal government. If hon. members opposite intend to filibuster this bill, I suggest that before doing so they look at the Toronto Star for November 2 and read what Pan-Alberta Gas is doing in regard to gas, the reserves it is tying up, and some of the marketing policies it would like to have. In fact, it is quoted in the Globe and Mail of November 5, by the same organization, that even in the really energy deficient United States, one could not afford to buy natural gas at the price at which they want to market it.

Again I ask eastern members of the party opposite how they can rationalize their position with their constituents if the bill should not pass? I think the most astounded I have been, as a member of this House, was before the budget when I heard some of the members from Alberta putting their case, and at the same time I saw the Leader of the Opposition calmly sitting there going over his Christmas card list. This was at a time when members of his own party were seriously threatening the industrial base of the maritimes. I cannot understand how that was leadership. He seemed to have no interest in his own part of Canada and sat there working on his Christmas cards while this subject was being debated.

I want to speak a little about what this means, for example, to Ontario. If this bill should not pass, the first thing that would disappear in Ontario is the greenhouse industry. It is a very large and viable industry which grows cucumbers, tomatoes, flowers, and so on. Energy represents 50 per cent of the costs of the industry. It is a marginal business now, which competes with imports from the United States. Are these members saying we should import this food and have food costs go up even further, or do they really care about the greenhouse industry, particularly any member who might have greenhouses in his riding?.

The productivity of agriculture has increased greatly. Agriculture in this country is one of the most productive in the world. One reason for this is the major shift to corn from legumes and hay crops in eastern Canada. Energy, in terms of natural gas and propane, is essential for drying corn. This year the moisture content of western corn was as high as 50 per cent. How will these members answer their constituents when they bring forward questions concerning the high cost of propane and the fact that they cannot be sure they will have natural gas to dry corn? What about the cost of fertilizer? It has already gone up dramatically. Do these members want this cost to almost double again?

I will tell the committee what has happened in Ontario. A number of farmers have already cut back on the amount of fertilizer they use and there has been a pretty dramatic decrease in the yield of corn this year on farms where this has been done. Surely the strategy of this government which must be supported by members on the other side is to increase our food supply. If we are to have increased food production, we must have energy because energy is an essential input for agriculture.

There is hardly a town in western Ontario today which does not have a sign welcoming industry to the town and saying there is abundant, reasonably priced energy available.

Let us suppose the Canadian price of crude went to $11.70 in western Ontario, and natural gas perhaps doubled or tripled in price. Some of these industries then might be non-competitive in the export market. I can hear members on the opposite side asking the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what he intends to do about this situation. I do not think that is fair. I think that if members really care about these industries in their ridings, they will say that this bill should pass.

I think, also, that surely members from the Maritimes must have a difficult time in respect of their conscience when they think about this bill. Certainly, if the price goes up to $11.70 for crude it will affect the industrial base of the Maritimes and their employment picture. If this bill is withheld, it will place in jeopardy the jobs of many people in the Maritimes. I believe that members of parliament were elected to do more than filibuster a bill that is in the best interests of all the people of Canada. I am sure that the citizens of the Atlantic provinces who sent Conservatives here expect more from them than that. The hon. member for St. John's East, the Conservative consumer affairs critic, makes a sincere plea on behalf of consumers daily in this House. We can imagine what he would have to say if the price of gasoline and heating oil jumped dramatically. He would be asking for a parliamentary inquiry. But why does he not stand up now and say that this bill is good legislation for Canadian consumers?

I say, again that the government is not opposed forever more to a freeze on the price of western crude. They are committed to do as good a job as possible, in consultation with the producing provinces, to gradually increase the price of natural gas; but this must be done by mediation between the consuming and producing areas. In case of a deadlock in the situation, a mediator is necessary. I would warn members from eastern Canada on the opposite side not to get sucked into the argument that they must feel sorry for the multinational petroleum companies. These companies have made millions and millions of dollars from the resources of Canada. The Minister of Finance has given them as good a—

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Milne: —tax position as any industry in Canada. If you want to side with the argument to put them in a better tax position than any other industry in Canada, at the expense of your constituents, that is your prerogative. But that is what is at stake in this bill. In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask hon. members opposite to think twice about filibustering this bill. Members from Ontario and eastern Canada have most to lose. On July 8, the voters were concerned about energy in eastern Canada and were perhaps concerned about the representation they were getting, so some seats changed. Voters are not very impressed with a party that filibusters a bill, and they have very long memories.

It is interesting to note that the Premier of Ontario and the minister of energy for that province are more concerned about the interests of the people in eastern Canada than the Conservative members elected to the House of Commons. I should think the Premier of Ontario has enough problems and concerns of his own without carrying the argument for eastern Canada on this issue as well. Only two out of 25 Conservative members from Ontario have spoken on this bill. The others have continually yielded the floor to members from the west. Also, the two who spoke did not take a position on the bill. Surely, in fairness to their constituents they should be putting their concerns on record.

The federal government intends to consult the provincial governments on the future price of natural gas to assure a return to producers and not to sock it to the consumers with a tremendous impact. Hon. members opposite should be very concerned about how industries and agriculture in their ridings could absorb a sudden rise in energy prices. The official opposition is on record as saying they will filibuster this bill. I think I can say, on behalf of the government, that we feel this bill is important to the majority of Canadians and we are prepared to tough it out as long as the opposition wants to sit here, because this bill must be passed: we think it is that important, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just resumed his seat made reference to filibustering this bill. This is a very important piece of legislation and I, for one, am not going to be deterred from discussing it because someone threatens that if it is not passed quickly the price of oil and gas will be doubled. In the first place, there is an agreement that the provinces should hold the price to $6.50 until the end of June, so that part of the price structure is already fixed. My concern is that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has said repeatedly that the price is going to escalate to the international price. That is what the hon. member ought to be worrying about, rather than this bill. When the bill is passed it will simply put into effect the price structure that has been in place for some time and will continue because of the agreement reached with the provinces.

In the budget debate I suggested that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would be wise to withhold this bill from the House and committee of the whole until after the meetings of the ministers of finance on December 9 and 10. I still believe that. Until there have been discussions between the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurers to see if a way can be found out of the present impasse, it will be very difficult to get agreement on the bill.

I stated the position of this party when the bill was presented to the House. The New Democratic Party supported the bill because it believes in a two-price system and in an export tax. This party believes the revenue from an export tax should be used to compensate for imported oil so that there is a uniform price across the country. Any money left in the fund ought to go into a capital fund for either the province or the federal government to search for new oil supplies. There is no doubt, however, that since this legislation was introduced we have entered a new ball game.

On November 13 and 14 we were prepared to give the federal government the powers which it asked for in clauses 36 and 52 to set the price of oil and gas in the event a negotiated price cannot be reached with the producing provinces, but the fact that the government has now introduced legislation to take with the other hand in addition to what they are taking in this legislation creates an entirely different situation. As I said in the budget debate, we have to rethink our position. I believe there is a mistaken idea that the federal government's only revenue from the resource industry is in corporation taxes. If that were true, the federal government surely should not be reducing corporation taxes for oil companies as they have in the budget, nor should they be increasing exploration write-offs from 50 per cent to 100 per cent.

They should not increase exploration write-offs from 50 per cent to 100 per cent. Nobody has asked them to reduce the amount of revenue they will get from taxing oil and gas companies. One must keep in mind the fact that the federal government, through the export tax, gets $5.20 on every barrel of oil exported. That should be taken into consideration because that money is additional to what the federal government receives from corporate taxes imposed on the oil and gas producing companies.

While the provinces, the federal government and the oil industry are arguing about how to cut up the pie, we had better make certain there will be a pie to cut up. The uncertainties of the present, which will probably continue until the finance ministers meet and the first ministers meet with the Prime Minister and come to some solution, may have serious repercussions. I hope the minister will tell us—and the sooner the better—something which will help to allay the concerns of many of us. I hope he will make a statement on government policy.

A great many oil drilling rigs are leaving Canada, particularly rigs which drill for oil at great depths. This morning's newspapers say that Atlantic Richfield Company, which held 30 per cent equity in the Syncrude plant in the Athabasca oil sands, has told its partners that it will pull out of that project. This news follows the announcement by Shell Explorer of Houston, Texas, that it is dropping its 50 per cent interest in the proposed Shell plant which would operate in the Athabasca tar sands. Perhaps these companies are bluffing. Perhaps, as the minister says, they are trying to blackmail the government.

I do not shed tears for the oil companies when they say they are not making a profit. In the last two years their profits broke all previous records. But I think the country wants to know, as does this committee, what the government intends to do to ensure that when our conventional oil supplies are no longer adequate for meeting our needs, additional alternative sources of supply will be on hand. The report of the National Energy Board on availability of supply states that we will not be self-sufficient in oil by 1982. The board pins its hopes almost exclusively on additional oil supplies being available from the Athabasca tar sands. The lead time for production of Arctic and offshore oil is between ten and 15 years. The critical period will come in the early 1980s. The National Energy Board feels that our difficulties can be met because it anticipates that three plants will be in operation in 1982 in the Athabasca oil sands and four plants will be in operation by 1983.

If these plants are not in operation, and if considerable drilling is not carried out in Alberta and Saskatchewan in areas which can still be developed, we shall face a most critical situation by 1982 or 1983. I am sure the government must have some plan in mind; the minister must have in his briefcase some policy that he intends to trot out in order to meet this situation. If there is no policy, we shall be in great trouble. For too long we have closed our eyes to the fact that conventional supplies of oil in this country are declining. We cannot afford to behave like Mr. Micawber and hope something will turn up. Does the federal government, either by itself or in conjunction with the provinces, intend to make sure plants will be built in the Athabasca oil sands? Will the government, working through Petro-Can, pour money either on its own or in conjunction with the provinces into the development of areas of Alberta and Saskatchewan from which some drilling rigs have been withdrawn?

It is not enough to say that the oil companies are blackmailing us. We must decide if we are to call their bluff and if the government intends to act in order to ensure that the oil in this country, oil which belongs to the Canadian people, is developed. If the oil companies are not prepared to develop it, the people of Canada, through their federal and provincial governments, ought to develop it. That is what we ought to do. I wish the minister would tell us exactly what the government has in mind. I do not want to be told again that the matter is under consideration, that the government is still thinking about it and will keep thinking about it and some time in the distant future will come to a decision. The graphs accompanying the National Energy Board's report on availability of supply show how close we are to the danger line.

As the oil from the Athabasca oil sands will be our only assured supply, the only supply on which we can count, the construction of the oil sands plants must begin on schedule. Even so, we are placing a great deal of faith in these plants being completed on schedule as their completion will depend upon the availability of materials and manpower. We must do our best to bring these plants on stream when conventional oil supplies diminish to the point at which we are no longer self-sufficient. I hope the minister will give us assurances on these points and tell us what policy the government intends to pursue if the withdrawal from this country of oil drilling rigs continues. If Shell Explorer, Atlantic Richfield and other companies which have announced their intention of withdrawing from the Athabasca oil sands do as they say, who will fill the gap? Who will step in to make sure that the Canadian people are supplied with oil? It is useless arguing about the price of oil and how we are going to divide tax revenue derived from it if there is no oil. We had better make sure that we possess oil, the price of which we can sell and tax.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, in response to the hon. gentleman's question, I suggest that an analysis of the fiscal régime proposed by the government in the budget will show that there is adequate financial room for the existing industry to engage in exploration and further development of oil properties, whether involving the oil sands or conventional sources, in this country as they are needed. He pointed out that there is a tendency on the part of the companies—indeed, probably a concerted plan on the part of companies having little connection with Canada, by withdrawal and spectacular announcement to attempt to change the fiscal provisions of the budget.

I deduced from the hon. member's argument his feeling that it is appropriate that the oil industry should bear the kind of share of the national cost which is suggested by the Minister of Finance in his budget. At times the hon. member, in his usual skilful way, seemed to argue both sides of the question. He suggested, I think, that a substantial share of the cost should be borne by the industry in favour of the national government, and I think it is perfectly proper to suggest that a share should be borne by the industry in favour of the provincial government. However, we believe that the return to the companies is adequate in order to continue the exploration and development they have under way. The hon. member made specific reference to ARCO and the reported announcement that ARCO will not be going ahead as a partner in the Syncrude project. I understand the other partners will be meeting with Atlantic Richfield for the purpose of defining their intentions from the standpoint of what we will do about it, I would be very interested in pursuing with the partners and, indeed, the government of Alberta the question of federal involvement in that particular project in the oil sands.

Over a period of time it has been made clear to us by the government of Alberta that participation by the federal government, whether by way of research, assistance in surveying or equity investment, would not be welcome in the oil sands. On the other hand, we stand ready to participate in this way. We will entertain any suggestions that the partners or provincial government might have with regard to the nature of this participation. I would say that for areas that are of significance to us, for example in the development of frontier resources whether offshore or in the north, there has been, and is, an indication of a substantial exploration program for this coming winter. That exploration program will be carrying forward the relatively successful results that have been realized heretofore toward better defining that resource.

We should really be talking about this bill and how oil should be priced in Canada. In terms of pricing, this bill is just as important and, indeed, even more important now, not just for the producing companies but for all Canadians, in terms of making certain that while the producers can over a period of time get a fair and adequate return on their resource, consumers should be entitled, not as the Alberta minister of federal and intergovernmental affairs said, that world prices should be shoved to the Canadian consumers right now but to adjust to them.

At this point we do not know the position of the government of Alberta but we can again make clear the position of this government. We do not think we should go into world prices right away. Canadians should be cushioned against this kind of increase. This legislative measure we have put forward is just as relevant now as it was last May, and just as relevant as it was before the budget. It is important and relevant now to provide a balanced regime in Canada to make certain that the supreme reality of the change in international oil prices is cushioned for Canadians to the best extent we can.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, may I just say to the minister I am glad to hear him say that the federal government is not ruling out the possibility of any involvement either with the partners in the various Athabasca oil sands projects or with the governments of the producing provinces. When the legislation to set up a national petroleum corporation is before the House we will have an opportunity to get more information from the minister and some statement of policy.

The minister talked about my remarks indicating that I am probably on both sides of the question. I want to make it perfectly clear that as far as the budget is concerned, I am not on both sides. I am prepared to support the government having the right to set the price of oil and gas and to collect the export tax which gives them the larger share of revenue from a barrel of oil. They receive about 54 per cent of the revenue. At the same time, I say they have no right, in an underhand and round about way, to turn around and take the unprecedented action of saying to the provinces, "Whatever you are getting out of your oil, whatever you collect by way of royalties, will not be deductible for income tax purposes."

We are not only doing this with oil. We are doing it with reference to gas and minerals. It is only a next step to do it with reference to renewable resources, lumber, stumpage dues and other royalties. In my opinion, this will reduce the provincial governments of this country to little better than glorified municipalities. That is why I object, not to the government having the power to collect an export tax but to the federal government, in an under-handed way, destroying the fiscal capacity of the provinces to run their own affairs and manage their own resources.

May I say one other thing to the minister. He believes the Canadian people should be cushioned against the world price. I certainly agree. If one goes back to the record, I introduced a motion as far back as January 25, 1973, arguing for exactly the same thing. I am not convinced at this moment that we ought to set, as a goal, ultimately raising the price to the international price. We can produce enough energy in this country so that Canadians can get it at a price that gives to those who produce it a fair return on their investment and pays the province a reasonable royalty and still keeps the price below the world price.

We give to our industry a very advantageous competitive position. My hon. friend who spoke before I did was interested in the industries of Ontario. He ought to be interested in keeping the price of energy at the lowest possible level.

I see no reason at the moment, and I do not know whether the minister is talking about 18 months or three years, why we should be planning ultimately to move toward a world price which in the main would take money out of the pockets of the consumers to either pay larger profits to the oil industry or larger taxes to the provincial and federal governments. We would be better to have cheaper fuel as long as we can, while at the same time paying to those who produce the commodities a reasonable return on their investment, and making adequate compensation to the provincial governments for the part of their public domain which is being diminished, in the hope that they will use all or most of the revenue to search for further supplies of energy materials.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I might just indicate to the hon. member that the touchstone which the government uses in terms of long-range pricing of oil has been the ultimate cost necessary to bring on additional supplies for Canadians. However, it might be formulated, there is not very much difference of opinion between the hon. member and myself. The critical question will be, at the insistence of some of the producing provinces, how quickly we move to the higher price. The fundamental question, and it may be difficult, is what is the appropriate price for oil sands or frontier oil to bring on these additional levels of exploration and development? Of course, there will be attempts—this is the way of the world in some sections of the petroleum industry and I think it is the position of Imperial Oil—to say you have to go to world prices as quickly as possible. That seems to be the position of the Alberta government.

It is said we are engaged in confrontation. Because we do not happen to accept that particular opinion, we are told we are tearing confederation apart. As I said in the throne speech debate and again in introducing this bill, the formulation for pricing in Canada is to have a price level high enough to bring in incremental supplies for Canadians without abandoning our prices, as going to world prices would involve prices that might be set from time to time by OPEC.

There are those who ask, why shouldn't we be at world prices, when we have been before? May I remind the House that we were not on world prices before. For a period of ten to fifteen years the price paid by Canadian consumers was $1, $1.50 or $1.70 above the world price. We have not been on world prices before. If it was appropriate at that time, as it was as a national policy, to ensure a higher return for those producers, it seems equally in the national interest that we should have the same balance in the other direction now that the circumstances have changed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am glad of this opportunity to take part in the debate at this stage of our proceedings. I believe no prophets and no members of the House should be more concerned about the passage of the bill before us than those from Ontario. I say this because we have a government which, through its incompetence and lack of understanding of the energy situation, is placing our fine province in the position of being literally dependent on supplies of foreign fuel in future years. This is a matter about which the 55 Ontario members of the Liberal caucus should be reminding themselves. How will they explain to their constituents the incapacity of their government in this field, a failure which according to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will possibly result in Canada being a net importer of crude in the early eighties? How will they go back to the electors who placed confidence in them and tell them that a country which has been self-sufficient in oil, and which could continue to be self-sufficient if the reserves under federal jurisdiction were properly developed, is now likely to be without ready access to crude oil supplies? I would point out that for Ontario, especially—a land-locked province—this is an intolerable position.

I suggest there are three important questions which member for Ontario should be asking themselves. The first concerns security of supply. The price of oil is one thing, but surely the paramount question is security of supply to Ontario, bearing in mind that of all current domestic production used in Canada approximately one-half is used in Ontario. We should never lose sight of this fact when considering a bill such as the one before us, which presumably reflects the over-all approach of the government to energy policy. We are the most vulnerable province in the nation, and the government is taking steps which will make sure that energy will not be available in a few years.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Do you want one price?

Mr. Stevens: The second question is, why is the construction of a pipeline still under consideration? Why are we not told the date by which it will become operational? So far, the pipeline has been discussed in terms of its going from Toronto to Montreal. I say it is more important, if hon. members opposite continue to support the incompetent Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that they should be asking the minister when he intends to build a pipeline from Montreal to Toronto to ensure that if we are to be dependent on foreign countries, at least we should have the advantage of a transportation system sufficient to get imports into Toronto.

The third question concerns conservation of supplies. There is probably no federal government which has done less, in practical terms, to conserve energy than the present government. In this connection I would mention that while Americans are striving to lessen their dependence on foreign oil and to work toward self-sufficiency, Canada is in the unbelievable position of drifting from self-sufficiency to dependency on foreign oil. In the United States, President Ford plans to lead his nation to self-sufficiency in oil production by 1980. Here in Canada, the Prime Minister appears to be willing to allow the nation to become dependent on foreign oil by 1982.

The United States is aiming at independence by way of better conservation measures and the development of yet untapped reserves. From being a net importer of oil, they plan to become a net exporter of oil. A few days ago, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources outlined a very different picture so far as Canada is concerned. He released the report of the National Energy Board which showed, in dismal terms, that Canada has only enough oil for perhaps 7.3 years, after which we would be dependent upon imports from foreign countries. Within eight months, Ottawa has changed its position very dramatically. Members who sat on the Standing Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works will recall that when he appeared before the committee, the minister stated, "We can see a ten-year supply, a ten-year period during which supply will be adequate to meet Canadian demands."

A year earlier the minister said, "For another decade or longer we could continue to meet export commitments and to meet the growth of the Canadian market." In the energy department's policy for Canada, published in 1973, a 15-year reserve of oil was referred to constantly. These figures did not include the oil sands reserves or northern reserves. In the space of less than a year, what has happened to Canada's oil reserves? I suggest the reason the government has shifted to painting a relatively pessimistic picture—and if it is pessimistic for the nation as a whole, it is particularly pessimistic for Ontario—is that previous estimates of reserves of oil took it for granted that exploration would continue to produce new oil finds roughly equal to our annual consumption. In the past year, however, as a result of government indecision and its quarrels both with the industry and producer provinces, the drilling rigs have pulled out. Little new oil has been found, and the authorities are becoming alarmed. Hence the gloomier picture.

As we consider Bill C-32, let us not attempt to shift the responsibility. This responsibility lies with the government whose failures and lack of foresight have placed us in the position of possible dependency upon foreign oil. Dealing specifically with the bill, I note that in clause 36 the government seeks to infringe further upon the control exercised by the provinces. We are being asked to endorse a price-fixing mechanism which is designed to function with or without provincial agreement. Even though the oil producing provinces withdraw from any pricing agreement they may make with the federal government, the federal government is empowered, under clause 36, to establish the price of oil unilaterally. This is a direct encroachment on provincial rights. Similarly, part III of the bill would allow the federal government to regulate the price of natural gas in a producing province and for export, with or without the agreement of that province—another infringement of the right of a province to control its natural resources.

It is very easy for a member from Ontario, particularly if he is a supporter of the government, to be shortsighted. I understand previous speakers have even referred to this bill as some type of consumer bill. What utter balderdash! If you like, Mr. Chairman, it is a consumer bill in the sense that consumers are going to be cut off from their rightful resources in this country due to bungling and lack of co-operation by this government in its relationship with the provinces.

Mr. Foster: One of the Bay Street boys.

Mr. Stevens: The establishment of price controls must be taken in a spirit of co-operation. Such a move requires broad provincial and federal government consultation. The input of industry in this country and consumer-producer participation should also be an integral part of the formation of such policy. Sole federal control is not the answer, though it is clear evidence of the status quo approach of the federal government. I suggest that the oil and energy resources of this country should not be used by the federal government as a battleground to wrest further control or power from the provincial governments. It knows the proper mechanism to use. If the government feels there is some imbalance between federal and provincial authorities, then let it consult the provinces and work out an agreement with them and, if necessary, amend the British North America Act. But let not the consumers of this country, particularly those in Ontario, be victimized by the inept policies of the government.

I say this because without provincial control over price-fixing mechanisms, the producing provinces will be unable adequately to ensure a fair return to the provinces and oil companies which are developing petroleum resources. Without adequate return there will be a marked decrease in exploration activities and a consequent decrease in supply to the consuming provinces. Our main concern is adequate supply for the consumer in Ontario and in the other consuming provinces. The federal government, in its attempts to establish a federal price-fixing mechanism, has created an unhealthy political atmosphere in which the consumer is the ultimate loser. The situation now is that we will be forced to rely increasingly on petroleum imports which, in the proven unstable international political atmosphere of today, can fluctuate and in the end leave the consumer with a shortage of fuel for the winter.

As I have said, Ontario is a land-locked province that is forced to rely on the transportation of petroleum products via pipeline. By failing to ensure construction of the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline through the constantly changing attitude of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Prime Minister, the government has failed to ensure security of supply to the Ontario consumer. This pipeline should be built and it should be a reversible pipeline.

I suggest that rather than engage in a dispute with the provinces over the establishment of a price-fixing mechanism, the federal government should be trying to work with the producing provinces to develop policies to conserve petroleum resources through discouraging needless waste, providing incentives for continued exploration, and researching and developing alternate and renewable energy sources. In this connection, the Ontario background papers to the federal-provincial conference of first ministers on energy, held in Ottawa on January 22 and 23 last, made the following statement in relation to the supply problem the province faces this year:

> In Ontario, the supply question is dominated by the province's reliance on eastern refineries. While Ontario received all of its crude oil from western Canada, refinery capacity has not been expanded in about four years.
> Thus, eastern . . .

That is, mainly Montreal—

> . . . refineries provide Ontario with 14 per cent of its motor gasoline, 25 per cent of its light fuel oil and 38 per cent of its heavy fuel oil. The basic supply outlook for Ontario is not known with any degree of certainty. The technical advisory committee of the National Energy Board states that the over-all supply and demand situation for oil products in Ontario this winter will be "in precarious balance".

"This winter" is last winter. The papers go on to say that the price of petroleum products in Ontario will depend on the price of western oil, presumably to be determined by federal-provincial negotiation. Surely the government should be telling this committee why those negotiations have so broken down that we are now confronted with Bill C-32, which in its present form is obviously completely unacceptable to the producing provinces and, I suggest, to the consuming provinces, certainly to the province of Ontario.

Speaking of the province of Ontario, I presume that the 55 Liberal members in the government caucus who come from that province must be asking themselves why it is that, despite the fact that their membership in the caucus has risen from 36 in the last parliament to 55 in this parliament, their representation in the cabinet has gone down. Surely those Ontario members must go home at night scratching their heads and wondering why in the twenty-ninth parliament there were 11 cabinet ministers from Ontario, the next highest province being Quebec with nine, whereas in the thirtieth parliament the same Prime Minister has chosen only ten cabinet ministers from Ontario and 11 from Quebec.

Mr. Turner (London East): You would never make it anyway.

Mr. Stevens: Well, it is your caucus. I have touched briefly on the allied question of conversation. I hope Ontario members of the government caucus are asking themselves why the government has not worked out more effective measures to help conserve energy in this country. In the United States, for example, speed limits have been reduced. Not only has this reduction in the speed limit saved a considerable amount of energy, but it has had the collateral advantage of saving many human lives through fewer fatalities on the roads. I checked the situation today and found that, based on 100 million vehicle miles, the number of fatalities in the United States has dropped 20 per cent to 25 per cent since speed reductions were made mandatory in that union. Yet this government has repeatedly stated that it does not intend to take any such measures but hopes, through a $1 million advertising budget, that it can talk people into doing something about conservation.

Conservation is conservatism. We believe in conservation, and we certainly believe that if there is any serious energy shortage we should not only be looking for new reserves in this country but conserving the energy that is available to us. It is only recently that Canada has developed a national set of statistics which relate to our inventory of energy supplies. Until very recently the Canadian government had to depend upon statistics provided for it by the oil companies, statistics which hardly provided a basis for a sound national policy but only benefited individual firms or industries.

We still find it difficult to discover the facts about our inventory of energy resources. Planners both in corporations and in government have had extreme difficulty in producing valid projections. In spite of our lack of knowledge about our inventory of energy resources, there is no doubt that long before the so-called energy crisis in 1973 experts in the oil industry, government and universities were telling us that our energy resources were being depleted at perhaps too fast a rate. They told us we should seek alternative sources of energy and in some way end our extravagant use of depleting resources; yet this government has chosen to do virtually nothing.

Even today, when the world's economic system may collapse because of the tremendous balance of payments problems caused by the western world's inability to pay for high-cost energy, at a time when the poor nations of the world are starving and have little prospect of being able to improve their position because of the high cost of energy, and in spite of the example set by our neighbours to the south—which I have touched upon—we in Canada are doing nothing to conserve our essential reserves and we are doing very little to develop new sources of power and find other ways to provide energy for our industrial and social life.

At a time when all the developed nations of the world are placing increased importance on the over-all concept of rail transportation and the development of new forms of technology in urban and intercity transportation, we in Canada are still back in the 1950s. We have virtually no research taking place on problems connected with urban transportation systems. We have no leadership from this government to help provincial governments set up urban transportation programs which would end our dependence on the automobile, that extravagant user of gasoline, and get our citizens in the large cities to their places of work efficiently. At a time when most other countries are expanding and improving their railways, we are ripping up our tracks and cutting down the number of rail services, forcing Canadians to use automobiles and buses.

Perhaps it is unfair to blame the situation solely on the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Certainly his colleague, the Minister of Transport, has to take some credit: he has set a new record, perhaps, in incompetence and inability to master that portfolio. One hears that a new cabinet shuffle is coming up.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the Committee that the hon. member be allowed to continue?

An hon. Member: He is not saying anything, so let him go ahead.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I will not go beyond my time except to say I should like an opportunity to speak again on this important bill. Many of my colleagues intend to speak on the bill, and we believe that many members from Ontario sitting on the government side should also get to their feet and speak on behalf of the consumers of Ontario, informing them that our energy problems are due substantially to the incompetence of the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I must say that not the least useful aspect of the speech of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe was getting something out of the hon. member for York-Simcoe who just came out with a ringing appeal for higher prices for the consumers of Ontario. We will make certain that his view, that Ontario people should pay higher prices for gas and oil, is well known to his constituents and to other citizens of the province. This is a critical question and it is one on which the hon. member has just hooked himself. As I said to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the question is whether Canadians should be paying adequate prices to bring about additional resources in Canada, but not world prices, or whether we should go to world prices. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has just hooked himself with the highest price and "sock it to the consumer."

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It is obvious to those in the chamber that the minister has absolutely no justification for making a statement like that. The record will show that at no time did I suggest higher oil prices. The minister did not deal with the important point, that is, why we are experiencing a shortfall in Ontario if there is a shortfall.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member specifically adopted the United States program of higher oil prices for Americans.

Mr. Stanfield: So have you.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, I have not.

Mr. Stanfield: You are a demagogue.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, whenever a member from Alberta stands in this chamber to speak on energy, there seems to be the automatic assumption on the other side that he is going to present a narrow focus. I hope the minister will listen for the next few minutes as I attempt to put the bill before us in the wider context which it deserves. I declare with pride, as I stand here as an Albertan, that I am a Canadian first. In presenting an argument in respect of provincial rights to the minister, I think I do more to contribute to national unity than does this type of bill which steamrollers over legitimate provincial interests.

By way of introduction to my remarks, let me say that last Saturday a number of Liberal cabinet ministers went to Edmonton to attend a fund-raising dinner. That was their right. But I think it was not their right to make statements such as the one made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that Alberta members of parliament come down here as demagogues. I reject that statement. What a suggestion, that we cannot stand here as Alberta members of parliament presenting arguments in the best interest of our country! I would ask the minister to give us his view, at the conclusion of my remarks, on whether my remarks about this bill can be taken as demonstrating a demagogic position.

If we do not lie down and allow this Liberal government to steamroller over us, and if we resist with some strength a bill which we believe will do irreparable harm to our country, we are accused of filibustering. It is not my belief that the people of Canada represented here by members of this party, people who have asked us to speak for them here, expect us to lie down. That is why you will hear during this debate not only from members from Alberta but members from Quebec, Nova Scotia and the other provinces. What is at stake here is the legitimate regional and provincial development of our country. I laugh when I hear speeches about Alberta and its strong energy position and the suggestion that it is adopting a separatism position, going its own way. Nothing could be further from the truth. Far from trying to get out of Canada, members from Alberta for years have spent their time here fighting to get into Canada. We have been trying to assert ourselves as real partners. This is what the Western Economic Opportunities Conference was all about. That was the conference which promised us our so-called place in the sun, in legitimate recognition of the fact that we have been victimized by central Canada. That is the conference which is long overdue in accomplishing what it set out to do.

Since this is the first time I have spoken on this bill, I intend to address some questions to the minister. Before doing so, however, I should like to deal with what this bill will accomplish in general, in an effort to show that as an Albertan I am concerned about the total effect of the bill from the constitutional and energy supply aspects. Why is the total issue involving the constitution and supply important to all Canadians and not just to Albertans or westerners? This debate clearly centres on issues of broad national significance. We are discussing whether or not the federal government is constitutionally intruding into an area of provincial jurisdiction. We are discussing the extent to which a province has the right to manage its resources as it sees fit. That is the basic issue.

In this analysis, the vehicles for discussion are crude oil and natural gas, but the issue clearly extends throughout the entire spectrum of non-renewable resources. We are discussing a provincial revenue which may, to a greater or lesser extent, be subject to equalization, which is certainly an issue of more than passing interest to the other provinces of this country. And we are concerned about the condition of an industry whose future success bears directly on the future economic well-being of this nation. Certainly this is not an unimpressive list of national concerns. But even more fundamental is the fact that in this debate we should be concerned about the extent to which the Government of Canada is inclined to penetrate the domain of private and public interests in its effort to achieve what it perceives as social justice. I believe it is fair to say that the traditional purpose of the law has been to assure the legitimate expectations of individuals living in a free yet ordered society. Only if organizations and individuals are free to order their lives and their affairs with reasonable expectations that today's rules will apply in the future, when their present actions may be judged, can there exist tranquility in the person and peace in his society.

When normal expectations are frustrated, society grows fearful and distrustful and is more prone to lapse into disorder. To what extent can what we might term the natural laws of economics and of human conduct be controlled and even repealed by parliament? To what extent can we comprehensively and logically prepare for tomorrow's oil supply difficulties, in light of today's frenetic political climate? It is difficult to perceive how we will control our destiny if we cannot even discipline ourselves to control today's domestic developments. Is it not reasonable to expect the same standards of conduct in legislatures that citizens expect of one another?

I come now to another question in respect of which I will insert some general comments later on. I ask myself: how is this total issue related to changing world conditions with regard to energy and to the squeeze that developing nations are feeling today with regard to their inability to pay high prices for commodities they need in order to grow food? Well, as commodity prices have escalated and as inflationary trends have worsened in general, we have witnessed a growing tendency on the part of many nations, both developed and developing, to take whatever they can get—a spirit of protecting one's own position whatever the cost to others. There is certainly not much evidence of a philanthropic feeling abroad in the world today. It would appear to me that much of our current debate in regard to non-renewable resources in Canada reflects this politically hostile environment on the international scene.

There is a reluctance on the part of the industrialized nations to provide assistance on a scale commensurate with the needs of the third world; there is a reluctance on the part of the OPEC nations to share their newly-found largesse with less fortunate members of our global society; and there is a reluctance on the part of many developing nations to undertake those social reforms which would be beneficial to improving their own lot. In a time when the need for international co-operation has never been as great, and in a time when the problems of population growth, of food supply, of poverty and of resource development have never been so paramount, there is a conspicuous lack of concern, a lack of willingness to assist.

On the other hand, it is also fair to say that any nation undergoing considerable economic and other problems will be hard pressed to help others. The United States, for example, which will have paid out approximately $25 billion during the course of 1974 to import oil, obviously will be less psychologically disposed toward assisting less fortunate countries. In Canada, to the extent that we can avoid or at least ameliorate our coming problems, whether in the field of oil and gas supply or elsewhere, by means of intelligent, comprehensive and long-term planning, to that extent will we be better placed to extend assistance to the developing countries.

In other words, what I am saying is that our own house must be in order if we are effectively to work beyond our own national sphere and assume our international responsibilities. It is difficult to move promised grain supplies to lands with starving peoples if that grain cannot move across the country or cannot move through the St. Lawrence Seaway because of strikes. It is difficult to talk about entering an international energy agreement when we cannot settle an energy dispute internally. In short, until such time as we repair some of the damage that has been done in this country to the faith of the individual and of private enterprise in the astuteness and leadership of our legislative bodies, it will be most difficult to put together the wherewithal to help those members of our global society who are in mounting need of such assistance and who are progressively less well disposed to wait for that assistance.

[Mr. Roche.]

I come now to another question: how can these responsibilities at the federal and provincial levels be reconciled, and how can we bring these governments together? At least in the case of oil, this debate will in some ways become academic within ten years. At that time oil exports will presumably have been phased out and the domestic price of oil in Canada will be nearer, or at, the world price. We may not like that prognosis, but it seems to represent what our current appreciation of the supply situation is telling us. At the moment, and assuming that the federal and provincial governments could amicably come together, there is considerable flexibility in the manner in which this issue could be handled. If, on the other hand, this issue should proceed to the courts, one side will to all intents and purposes win and the other side will lose. There would certainly be less flexibility in dealing with such problems if that were to occur, and whatever flexibility there might be would largely depend upon whether or not the winning side chose to be magnanimous in its victory.

This current flexibility of negotiation I regard as an asset. I do not believe that a court decision in favour of one side or the other would result in light and understanding; rather, it might institutionalize a bitterness which we at least at the moment have the opportunity of overcoming. In view of reconciling federal and provincial interests and responsibilities, I suggest that both levels of government have fair claim to some of these formerly completely unanticipated revenues. They have the responsibility of not making excessive claims in the process; they have the responsibility of ensuring that private enterprise is not emasculated in the process; and they have the responsibility of avoiding the temptation to legislate everything that they can lay their hands on. I would reiterate my earlier point, that citizens in a democratic society should be allowed to function with the minimum of laws necessary for good governance.

I see it is five o'clock, and I would be willing, Mr. Chairman, to suspend my remaining comments until after supper. I would ask the minister to return following the supper hour because the questions which I shall put in detail will require answers by him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I did not hear the hon. gentleman. Will he repeat what he said?

Mr. Baldwin: He was saying he hoped you would have a good supper and come back and reply nicely to him.

● (1700)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have a meeting with the provincial ministers this evening, but I will put it off in order to be present and hear the hon. gentleman.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the House may proceed to the consideration of private members' business. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Proposed increase in pensions of Hong Kong Veterans—government position; the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk—Multiculturalism—Alleged Change in government policy—Request for assurance to minority groups; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Immigration—Possibility of obtaining counsel for persons facing summary deportation—Review of cases by minister.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills. There being no item on the order paper under the heading of private bills and notices of motions, the House will proceed to public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

PROVISION TO CHANGE NAME OF CORPORATION TO HABITAT CANADA

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West) moved that Bill C-215, respecting the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to again speak in this House on my bill proposing that the name "Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation" be changed to "Habitat Canada". I introduced this bill in the twenty-ninth parliament but, unfortunately, because of the length of that parliament and the many bills put forward by private members, I was not able to bring it forward for debate.

In presenting this motion to change the name of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, my intention is to give this institution a designation which will more accurately reflect what it is, what it is doing and what it is becoming. If I am successful, I hope that this bill will effectively focus this institution in the minds of Canadians. Indeed, I believe this is happening now. The present name in almost every respect is inappropriate. It is called Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at a time when it is making a vigorous effort to decentralize, to distribute authority, initiative and decision-making across the country to ensure that this important national institution will respond in a more sensitive way to unique local needs and objectives.

The present title emphasizes the word "mortgage". While the granting and insuring of mortgages is an important aspect of CMHC's daily business, mortgages are just an instrument which the corporation uses in fulfilling its broad social responsibility to improve the living conditions of Canadians. This part of its title, perhaps more than anything else, helps to preserve the notion of a purely financial institution whose main function is to make prudent and profitable investments of public capital. In the minds of most Canadians it is a sort of government bank for mortgages.

The next significant word in its present title is "housing", and certainly the creation of reasonable housing that is accessible to all Canadians continues to be a prime function of this agency, by whatever name it is called. But housing alone and housing in its narrow context does not begin to define the role and objectives of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. As the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) has often said in this House, it is not enough to be concerned simply with housing without regard to the whole environment in which houses are built. That is a view I have heard from all sides of the House. People live not just in houses but in communities. Houses are just one element in the fabric of community which depends for its life on a whole range of physical and social amenities which must be knitted together in a planned and coherent way if we are to serve the human needs of this country.

The growing concern of the government and the corporation for these aspects of community life is reflected in the latest amendments to the National Housing Act, particularly the neighbourhood improvement program, the new communities program, the increased commitments for the public assembly of land—we heard a great deal about that in the last parliament—and in the legislation which we will be asked to consider later this session with regard to sewage treatment assistance. So CMHC is a housing corporation but not just a housing corporation, not always central and not only dealing in mortgages. It is for these reasons, to rid the corporation of a designation that is restrictive and misleading and to give it a new title that dramatizes its broader, more ambitious goals, that my bill proposes that it be known henceforth as Habitat Canada.

This title, it seems to me, connotes, in both the official languages without translation the real work of the corporation which is concerned not just with mortgages and houses but with the places where people live—roads, sewers, parks, schools, churches and shops, as well as houses, and the way all of these elements relate to each other. I am not suggesting, Madam Speaker, that by changing its name we will change the character of the institution. The fact is that the institution has changed and is changing as the needs of Canadians have changed. I think it is only fair that the people who staff and run this institution should no longer be burdened with a cumbersome name that has outlived its relevance. Habitat Canada has a meaning that suggests the breadth of its duties and obligations to the people of Canada. I believe it will become even more meaningful day by day as the activities of Habitat Canada continue to change and improve the cities, towns and villages where Canadians live.

In preparation for making this address today I looked up the history of the word "habitat". In the English language it is as old as the language itself. It comes from the Greek word "habère", meaning to hold; to occupy or possess; to have. Even a small child, when developing and learning, has the word "habitat" in his vocabulary—"That is my habitat, the place where I live". That is common to our language. In the same way, its roots are equally deep in the other official language, the French language.

One of the most serious difficulties in our society today as a government and as members of parliament is to make people understand what is available to help them. I suggest that this is a phrase that says, in both official languages without need for translation and in words long based in both languages, Habitat Canada; just what it means. There is some precedent for simplifying the names of federal institutions. TCA was changed to Air Canada, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to Radio Canada. That has surely been helpful to Canadians to know and to identify these institutions of the federal government. I will not continue, Madam Speaker, because I hope for sympathetic support for this bill. There is some indication from the government to that effect. I hope my friends on the other side of the House will agree that this is a simple move to help Canadians understand better what is being done for them in the field of housing.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I was interested to hear the fatherly presentation of my hon. friend opposite where he stressed the role he sees for yet another government organization. By now we should be used to such time-fillers as the bill of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming). After all, he is a member of the government which in the last session had us debating a bill about what kind of football Canadians should be allowed to watch, at a time when Canadians were so frightened by the effect of inflation on their savings that they were going on a huge spending spree, fueling the fires of inflation even more. In that same week, the government-owned CBC was broadcasting American football games in Toronto. This government again illustrates that it is insensitive to the wants of Canadians. If Canadians did not want to watch World Football League football it would fade away without any help from the government and Canadians would have had one more element of their freedom left intact.

The changing of this corporation's name to Habitat Canada will cost the Canadian taxpayer a great deal of money but will not make it one bit easier to obtain a mortgage. But then the government, after interfering in the bargaining process, held off recalling parliament to stop the grain handlers' strike in Vancouver for six weeks, completely ignoring the cost entailed in keeping ships in port. It also ignored Canada's failure to meet overseas grain commitments and the wishes of producers and consumers who are now dangerously short of grain.

But let us look at this bill. The hon. member for York West says that it will provide a shorter name and one that is the same in both official languages. The corporation has been known as CMHC—you will notice that there are just four letters—for decades. It will take another decade for people to learn that good old Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is the same as Habitat Canada. And for many Canadians the word "habitat" will recall mixed feelings and memories of the housing white elephant built for Expo 67 in Montreal. The hon. member says that it would be the same in both official languages. That may be true, but it would not mean the same thing in both languages. Or would it?

Harrap's French and English dictionary is supplied to members of this House. If we look at the French word "abita" we find that it means "habitat" in English. The Concise Oxford Dictionary, which is also supplied to members, defines "habitat" as the natural home of plants or animals, or as a habitation. It goes on to say that habitation means a place of abode or branch of the Primrose League. The same book says that the Primrose League is a Conservative association formed in memory of Benjamin Disraeli, the Earl of Beaconsfield. Perhaps "Habitat Canada" would be interpreted as the Canadian old Conservatives, a sort of Conservative Senate. Who knows what it would mean!

We have seen much evidence of this government's gimmickry in changing names. For instance, to name a few, we have Sports Canada, Recreation Canada, Taxation Canada, Agriculture Canada and Information Canada, affectionately known as InfoCan. None of these agencies works any better under its new name. In fact, some do not work as well. The Post Office, for example, is known as Postes Canada, but that is backwards for Canada Post, which used to be known as Royal Mail.

These problems, of course, are not related to the two languages. For instance, in the English language version there is a program known as PEP, the Program to Enhance Productivity. That does not apply to the people in the House or to agriculturalists; that is an industrial program. The aims of the program are: to encourage industrial growth and production by supporting studies to determine the feasibility of projects designed to enhance substantially the productivity or efficiency of companies. Well, so much for PEP! And if that description does not boggle the mind, let me refer you to GOMI, which is short for the Grains and Oil Seeds Marketing Incentives Program. And the list seems endless.

Some huge group evidently sits around all day dreaming up these names. I am sure we can all feel sorry for the fellow who dreamed up the slogan Air Canada. Sorry? Yes, because the name was grabbed up by the airline when he had intended it for the CBC. The poor old CBC had to settle for Radio Canada, which is not too bad except when the announcer says, "This is Radio Canada," you can see him on television and the television network uses the same name. One name which did not cost millions to change over was COJO. The only problem is that it only translates into the French words "Le comité d'organisation des jeux olympiques." In English that would be the Organizing Committee of the Olympic Games, or OCOG. But I suppose that's no worse than PEP or GOMI.

Maybe we should look more deeply into the reasons for this proposed, costly changeover. Maybe it is a plot to expand operations and for the government to get meaningfully involved in housing. The Liberal-Socialists on my left would certainly agree with that. To date, certainly, we have all known of this corporation's mortgage business. Many thousands of Canadians have been able to take advantage of the government's mortgage scheme, although many more thousands could not afford to do so. But I am not sure that many Canadians are aware of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation's housing operations which, like many other government enterprises, are not models of operating efficiency. Those who really need the government's help find that government housing is unacceptable or unavailable because they cannot afford to take advantage of the government's offers.

Perhaps Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is planning to branch out. Vote 10 of the main estimates relating to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for the calendar year 1974, provides for expenditures on housing research; for the amounts of loans forgiven; for contributions made in respect of loans to facilitate home ownership; for losses resulting from the operation of public housing projects; for losses resulting from the sale of mortgages, and so on. The last item of the vote reads "for the cost of acquiring Granville Island and for the loss incurred in the redevelopment, administration and operation of the island." There is no breakdown of the total of $143.2 million listed under Vote 10. Granville Island, as I say, is mentioned in the last item in the vote.

Granville Island is in Vancouver; thus, CMHC has acquired the 42-acre Granville Island, which has nothing whatever to do with mortgages or housing. This man-made island in the city's False Creek was turned over to CMHC by the Department of Transport's National Harbours Board, which had been leasing it out as an industrial estate for years. It seems that the land, where the leases have expired, has been converted to parks and some $20,000 worth of trees have been planted on it. Most other leases run to 1983, but several have 20 years or more to run; so CMHC will have a lame duck industrial estate on its hands until nearly the end of the century. The government's mortgage and housing corporation had to manage its industrial estate and care for its expensive parks, so it hired a project manager at a salary of $25,000 plus support staff.

It will not surprise members of this House to know that the project manager happens to be the former president of the British Columbia Liberal Association. He was selected, said the former minister of state for urban affairs, because of his business qualifications. Nothing was said of the failure of two private companies with which this man was closely associated, I believe as president. Both of them suffered from fatal financial problems when this man was running the Liberal campaign in the 1972 federal election. Most governments, by interfering in the free market, create problems. The report by the National Council of Welfare on the low-income consumer in the Canadian marketplace, called "Prices and the Poor" has this to say about housing and food. May I begin quoting from page 17:

> What are the poor getting in return for this large outlay of money? The answer is all too apparent: They are getting the worst housing in Canada.

The report goes on to say:

> ... it should be noted that the possibility of a low-income family buying a home has become practically nil in the major urban centres of Canada.

According to the report, the poor are excluded from housing. I continue quoting:

> ... the supply of low-cost housing is grossly insufficient to meet demand. And the root of the supply problem is the extremely high cost of land in virtually every Canadian city ...
> One traditional response to the low-cost housing problem has been public housing. Public housing has usually taken the form of large complexes set either in the most undesirable urban locations or in the most inaccessible outlying locations. Many low-income families forced out of inner-city accommodation enter public housing. But a great many more are unable to enter public housing because the supply falls so far short of demand ...
> The great public housing complexes which only a few years ago seemed to be the solution to the low-cost housing problem are now recognized to be a thoroughly inadequate response.

The report continues:

> Unless it is applied only in the short term and tied to a program for generating a major expansion in the supply of low-income housing, rent control in Canada would ultimately result in an even more reduced supply of low-cost housing... If the housing problem in Canada is to be solved, the solution can only come through the development of a comprehensive national housing policy. At present there is no such comprehensive policy, only a collection of ad hoc, often unrelated or even contradictory, specific programs that have been developed over the years.

● (1720)

I think that is sufficient criticism of the past operations of CMHC. I do not think the members of this House should believe that a new name is going to change the operations.

Mr. Woolliams: Not until we get a new government.

Mr. Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): CMHC has done its share for higher housing costs through some of these actions. It has had extremely stringent requirements on some of its mortgage loans, for example sewers instead of sceptic tanks on all houses which will qualify for loans. CMHC has been the victim of the present government's inflation policies. In the recent budget debate I pointed out the drastic effect of higher interest rates on housing costs. Of course, not even the government is willing to lend its money at a rate much lower than the rate of inflation plus a reasonable rate of return. Finally, I repeat to members opposite that their time, the time of this House and the taxpayers' money could be better directed than in dealing with a bill such as the one before us, and I call for its rejection by this House.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): The explanatory note of Bill C-215 reads:

> The purpose of this Bill is to change the name of "Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation" (and in French the words "Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement") to "Habitat Canada".
> This would have the advantage of providing a shorter name for the corporation and one that is the same in both official languages.

I have never, in my nine years here, experienced such a waste of debating time and money as set forth in this proposed bill. We have a serious inflation problem. We are discussing problems with regard to the high cost of living. We have a serious housing problem and a petroleum problem. Yet the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) brings forth Bill C-215 to change "Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation" to "Habitat Canada". I would ask the hon. member for York West, through you, Madam Speaker, how many constituents in his riding have asked that CMHC change its name to Habitat Canada. How many people have asked him about the serious housing crisis in his area? How many people have asked him about high interest rates, shortage of supply, high rents and the high cost of housing? I would venture to say that not five people in his constituency have asked the hon. member to change the name Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to Habitat Canada. I would say that hundreds of people have asked him questions with regard to the serious shortage of housing, the high cost of housing and rents and high interest rates. They have asked him this time and again, and this is his answer with regard to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Fleming: Do you want an answer?

Mr. Gilbert: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, as both the previous speakers well know, although I am a government supporter I am not the government. In private members' hour I hardly have the ability to move a motion that is going to involve finance, affect inflation or anything else. Hon. members work through their caucus; I work through mine. In private members' hour we try to do something that is useful. That is why I suggested this. I was in communications for 12 years. I have a deep belief that if Canadians understand what they are dealing with, they are ready to approach government and receive the help of government.

Mr. Gilbert: Today we have the hon. member for York West speaking about a change in name. On December 3, two days ago, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) spoke to the Toronto Home Builders' Association. He said:

> Almost 800,000 Canadian households spend more than 25 per cent of their gross income on shelter. Even more disturbing is the knowledge that 107,000 tenant families with incomes under $3,000 spend over 50 per cent of their incomes for shelter. These are hardly comforting statistics, nor is the fact that there are some 500,000 housing units in Canada requiring rehabilitation or replacement . . .
> The present shortage of suitable accommodation at affordable prices in Toronto and other cities across Canada is not acceptable. It is not acceptable to the people who need housing in communities where the shortages exist. It is not acceptable to the federal, provincial or municipal governments and surely it is not acceptable to builders either . . .
> I am particularly concerned about the shortage of apartments and other types of accommodation for rent. For this kind of housing, starts declined nearly 60 per cent in the first 10 months of the year. Rents, on the whole, have not increased at nearly the rate of other costs, but the continuing vacancy rates of less than two per cent in major centres could produce pressures on rents that are unacceptable.

Here we have a minister setting forth the housing crisis, and the hon. member for York West wanting to bring about a mere change in name which would have no effect on the housing crisis being experienced in Canada. The previous speaker set forth the definition of "habitat". I also looked up the definition. It is rather interesting. The Concise Oxford Dictionary states: "habitat; natural home of plant or animal." Are we going to change the name of CMHC to this?

Mr. Fleming: Read on.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

Mr. Gilbert: It says "habitation". Now if we look to the definition of housing, it reads: "house; building for human habitation." We now have Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I would prefer that we have Canadian Housing and Mortgage Corporation. That would set forth the number one item across Canada—housing. It would then set forth mortgages. We would then have Canadian, or Canada Housing and Mortgage Corporation. That would make sense. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation commenced on January 1, 1945. It is companion to the National Housing Act. In a great many ways it administers the National Housing Act with regard to housing, mortgage loans, research and many other items.

CMHC has had its name for almost 30 years. In Ontario we have the Ontario Housing Corporation. more commonly called by ordinary folk, OHC. OHC blends in nicely with CMHC. Across the country there are many housing corporations and commissions which go by the short name. Habitat Canada would not fit in with the theme of housing across Canada. If it is the natural place for plants and animals; it has no place in housing. When we talk about housing, we talk about different types; for example, there is single-family housing, row type housing, condominium type housing, co-operative housing, senior citizens' housing and public housing. This is what CMHC is all about. Can you imagine calling it single-family habitat, row type habitat, condominium habitat, co-operative habitat, senior citizens' habitat, and public habitat?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): "Cohabitat."

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member says, maybe we should call it "cohabitat", common law habitat. We associate Habitat with Expo 67. I thought that was an interesting design in housing. It acquired a name with regard to a special type of housing. But it did not catch on. That is the main thing.

● (1730)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A high rent district.

Mr. Gilbert: The hon. member has pointed out that, in Montreal, Habitat is associated with high rents. That is not a significant achievement. One should bear in mind the expense of changing the name CMHC to Habitat Canada, as well as the confusion it would create across the country. People have learned that the intials CMHC stand for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Why should they have to change to Habitat Canada?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Imagine the difficulty of discharging a mortgage.

Mr. Gilbert: If the government wants to bring about a change in name I think it is the responsibility of the government to bring forward the legislation, not that of a private member.

Mr. Kaplan: That is not what you say about your own bills.

Mr. Gilbert: Ah, if parliament were to enact my bills we would see a garden of Eden, we would experience the millenium within a very short time. As I was saying, the responsibility falls upon the government, not upon a private member. If the hon. member for York West and the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) had set forth in legislation a change in philosophy on the part of the government they would receive complete support from our party, because we believe that housing is a social right in Canada and that all people are entitled to good housing at a reasonable cost. At one time, I thought this was the philosophy of the Liberal government. But it is not. Apparently, the hon. member is more concerned about making a change in name and the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is more concerned about producing more bang for a buck than he is for housing.

About a week ago the minister made a speech before, I think it was called, a property forum. He said, "What we have to give you is more bang for the buck." He claimed the budget contained a number of items designed to achieve that purpose. But at whose expense? It is at the expense of people in the small and middle income brackets across the country. In other words, housing is to be treated as a commodity available at the highest possible price and the highest possible interest rates. This is the philosophy of the government. It has no concern for high interest rates, the shortage in housing starts or land banking. It is all slanted toward the builders, the speculators and the developers.

I am sure, Madam Speaker, you have heard the Minister of State for Urban Affairs talk about the registered home ownership plan under which young people can deduct $1,000 from taxable income yearly for ten years for the purpose of buying a home. What a tremendous achievement! What it really means is that if they buy a home and give $10,000 as a down payment they are left with a mortgage of $40,000 upon which, at the end of 25 years, they will have paid $123,828.

These are the things people are concerned about, Madam. They are not concerned about changing a name. They are concerned about changing a philosophy. I am sure, Madam Speaker, you also heard about the $500 grant for those who purchase homes for the first time. When I challenged the same minister to show me homes in Toronto which cost less than $44,000, the best he could do was direct me to some condominium homes.

He is asking young people to raise a family on the 12th floor of a condominium home. He is asking them to acquire a mortgage of $40,000 at 12 per cent, on which they will eventually pay $123,828. He says, "If you accept this responsibility I will give you $500, which will leave a net balance of $123,328." Isn't this a proud achievement? Is it any wonder that members of my party and people across the country become deeply displeased with the Liberal government and with this attempt which is being made not to grapple with the real problems of housing but to bring about a change in name? What's in a name? That which men call a rose will smell as sweet by any other name, said Shakespeare.

In the last 30 years, CMHC has acquired a meaning. What has Habitat Canada done? What will it do? Nothing. Will it strike at the housing crisis? Will it lower interest rates so that ordinary folk can buy a home? Will it increase land banking operations?

Mr. Kaplan: This is your third time around.

Mr. Gilbert: Will it improve the quality of homes? Never. All it will do will be to create confusion and impose unnecessary expense. On the other hand it might expose the lack of policy and principles of the government with regard to housing.

I should like to touch lightly on what the Minister of State for Urban Affairs said with regard to interest rates: He said:

> We want to make it possible for even more people to be helped, but considering the whole range of the government's operations there are limits to how much taxpayers' money can be committed in this way. I intend to encourage private investment more heavily, which is essential if we are to continue to grow.

● (1740)

> In order to unleash the major sources of private mortgage funds, we intend to bridge the gap in interest rates between the minimum rate at which private lenders can economically lend and the maximum rate at which lower and middle income Canadians can afford to borrow.

The assisted home ownership program provided interest rates at roughly 8 per cent, and the minister wants to increase the funding of AHOP. He does not want to spend more government money; rather he wants to attract private investors. He is prepared to say to these private investors, and more particularly to the financial institutions, "If you direct some money to AHOP at 8 per cent, we will pay you the difference between 8 per cent and the going rate of 12 per cent. In other words, we will subsidize you".

This is a private enterprise principle that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is now going to attempt to apply. Rather than attempting to decrease interest rates, he is attempting to maintain them and to subsidize private investors. I think that is shameful, and I certainly oppose this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Before recognizing the parliamentary secretary, the Chair would like to remind hon. members that the purpose of Bill C-215 is to change the name of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Therefore the Chair would greatly appreciate it if hon. members would stay within the scope of the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think that your correction is quite proper, owing to the remarks of the members for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) and Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Clarke) who both have shown complete lack of sincerity as well as stupidity and bad faith. The member for Broadview has even criticized his colleague for taking steps suggesting that only the government can do so. I think that it is rather paradoxical for a member of parliament—

[English]

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, on a point of order, is the parliamentary secretary rising on a point of order, or is he going to talk about the bill that he is complaining other people are not talking about?

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, I am not at all surprised by the hon. member's protests. I realize how right I was when I said that the previous speakers did not want to deal with the subject of this debate.

I want to repeat to the hon. member who is trying to interrupt me that it is my turn to speak, and that I do so frankly, openly, like those who have preceded me.

First of all, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) for his initiative in presenting this motion. I agree totally with him when he says that the present name of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does not describe appropriately the role this Crown corporation is playing and will play in the life of Canadians. "Habitat Canada", in both official languages, indicates more specifically to what extent the corporation is concerned with the living conditions of the people in all parts of the country, in villages and small cities, in urban areas and surrounding regions.

While advocating the adoption of the new name, I should not however want to give the impression that the corporation will be less concerned with basic housing questions, and mortgages which are fundamental if all Canadians are to be given a chance to buy proper housing within their means. There is no doubt that the top priority of the government and the corporation in coming months will be to increase considerably housing construction especially in the lower-price bracket, and to make sure that these are accessible to those in greatest need of them. We trust we will be able to find a solution to housing problems which confront us now and which are essentially—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I have asked hon. members to try, as much as possible, to stick to the subject of Bill C-215, that is change of name.

[English]

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, with regard to the private bill of the hon. member for York West I want to say on behalf of the government that we totally approve of its intent. I remind hon. members that if you can identify this federal agency in Engligh by the four letters "CMHC", in French that is not possible. I have never heard anyone identify "la société" with the combination of letters "SCHL"; in French you have to say "la Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement". In English you can identify Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation by the capital letters "CMHC"; in French you must give the total title.

The initiative taken by the hon. member for York West represents, in my opinion, more fully the new role of CMHC, which no more looks upon itself only as a banker, as it did 20 years ago. For 20 years CMHC has been an instrument in the federal government's social policy.

Mr. McKinnon: You are getting out of order again.

Mr. De Bané: You shut up and listen to me—O.K.?

[Translation]

Therefore, I think, Madam Speaker, that the hon. member's project fully reflects the role played by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which has been very beneficial in Canadian history, especially since the last war.

[Mr. De Bané.]

[English]

For all these reasons the government welcomes the initiative taken by the hon. member for York West, and on behalf of my minister I commend the bill to hon. members for their support.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I should like to say, first of all, that I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) on one point. Habitat Canada sounds to me like a new environmental group.

The parliamentary secretary talked about the desirability of having names equally understood in both languages. As a philosophy in terms of naming new institutions this is admirable, and I am wholeheartedly in favour of such an approach. But what are we going to see now—a whole string of private members' bills wanting to change the names of all Crown corporations, such as the CNR, the Polymer Corporation, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Northern Transportation Limited, and so on and so forth?

I think I can speak for the majority of my party when I say that we recognize that some of our predecessors in this institution did not pay as much attention to being able to identify government operations, departments or Crown corporations in both languages as they should, and thus did not choose quite as wisely as they might have. But surely this is little reason to go altering all these names, or at least to alter this name.

I associate habitat with some form of architecture. As the dictionary indicates, it is a word that means nothing. I very often get the feeling that members on the government side think that a change in name is almost as good as a policy. I am not going to get off on to the subject of housing—though Lord knows there is ample room to talk about that subject for several days, not to mention just the few minutes available to me—other than to say that the hon. member is paying attention to historical precedents in this House. I have heard a rumour or story circulating, that I have not had a chance to check out personally, about a current member of government whose claim to fame is a private member's bill that accomplished something along these lines.

The housing problems which exist in Canada are enormously severe. In the last three months the cost of a serviced lot in Calgary went up 12 per cent. What is being done in that regard? I do not know how many employees there are in CMHC, but I suggest the worst thing we could do right now is send them scurrying around the country changing all the literature and hanging new signs on their buildings. Surely what they should be doing is concentrating on housing problems. If we need a new name, Housing Canada would make a lot more sense than Habitat Canada.

I recognize the difficulties in respect of the nature of the two languages to which the parliamentary secretary has alluded, but this does not seem to have hurt IBM, CIL, the CPR or a lot of other companies. At this stage of the game I think it would be reasonable on our part to save the government a lot of money by refusing to order employees of CMHC to run around changing the letters on their stationery and on their buildings when they should be addressing themselves to the serious housing problems in Canada. I could carry on but, in view of the fact that others of my colleagues would like to contribute, I will leave it at that.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, on rising to speak on Bill C-215 presented by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) I cannot help but emphasize the cost involved. At a time of rampant inflation, and excessive and uncontrolled government spending, we should be bringing in bills with ideas to cut down on government expenditure. As the previous hon. member has stated, the cost of the proposal in this bill would be fantastic. Clause 1 of the bill states in part:

> Wherever, in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, or in any other statute of Canada or in any regulation, order, deed, contract, lease or other instrument, the words "Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation" appear . . . there shall be substituted therefor the words "Habitat Canada".

Just imagine the fantastic cost involved in carrying out this suggestion at every CMHC office across Canada. I have just received some translation cost figures in respect of one airport tower at the new Mirabel airport. The cost involved there in a similar change is $1.6 million. Costs are astronomical in respect of name changes. Just imagine the cost of changing all the fancy gold lettering on all the office doors across the country.

It would seem to me that, as a result of this proposed change, considerable confusion would develop. Canadians are used to seeing CMHC on the letterhead of this corporation and on its office buildings. If the name were changed to Habitat Canada they would perhaps think that CMHC had moved or that they were in the wrong building. I am sure there would be a tremendous amount of confusion.

The abbreviation of this corporation's full name is not difficult, and it is one that Canadians have been accustomed to for years. There has been no problem with such abbreviations as CMHC, CPR, CNR and others.

I would be happier had the hon. member brought forward a bill with some ideas to correct the many housing problems in this country. When one reads the recent statistics released in respect of housing he will see where the real problem lies. This is the sort of thing to which the hon. member should be directing his attention.

Let me state my reasons for suggesting that hon. members should be concerned about housing in Canada. House building activity continued to decline in October. The seasonally adjusted annual rate of housing starts for all areas dropped to 173,700 units during the month as compared to 192,500 units in September and 206,600 units for the third quarter of this year. One can see the seriousness of our housing problem with housing starts dropping at that rate.

Another interesting sidelight is the number of new homes which cannot be sold. Many Canadians are trying to find homes but cannot manage to obtain CMHC mortgages. Interest rates are way out of line, yet there are thousands of housing units sitting empty. This is where the real problem lies. I do not believe there should be a priority at this time in respect of changing the name of any government department, agency or corporation. We should be finding ways and means of cutting down on government expenses. More concentration should be placed on providing housing at reasonalbe cost with lower mortgage interest rates.

There is a great deal of confusion today in the housing industry. One prominent industry spokesman stated recently:

> I wonder if the government's intent was to cajole house buyers to defer their purchases or to line up today at real estate offices.

There is little doubt that a supply increase is needed, particularly as it affects the lumber and construction industry. The finance minister's proposals as they relate to housing do little but reflect the naivety and uncertainty of the government's economic policies. On the one hand with the $500 grant, the opening of high ratio mortgage loans and the reduction of the sales tax on building materials, the minister appears to be attempting to increase demand. On the other hand with the registered homeownership savings plan, it would appear that his aim is to defer demand.

It is too bad we cannot go back to the days of the Conservative government when anyone could buy a three bedroom bungalow with a down payment of $350 to $1,200. In those days bus drivers, truck drivers, clerks and others could afford to buy homes. This is where the real problem lies, not in respect of the changing of the name of government departments.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): The hour provided for the consideration of private member's business has now expired.

Perhaps the House would agree that we resume consideration of Bill C-32 in committee before calling it six o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mrs. Morin in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-32. When the committee rose at five o'clock clause 2 of the bill was under consideration. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister returning. I know he has other meetings tonight. I shall put to him a couple of questions. I do not intend to recapitulate the part of my speech I gave before the supper recess, but I shall sum up what I believe Canadians want as they look at the federal government and its desire for petroleum legislation that will make this country grow. What we want is the existence of laws which do not change at a whim. We want laws that may be relied upon at all times.

We want to be able to have expectations that, within reasonable tolerances, are predictable with regard to exploration and development. These are conditions which are far from being met in Canada today. Perhaps I might sum up the feelings of the people in Alberta. The minister knows I began by trying to give the wider perspective from a Canadian point of view, before the Albertan point of view, that there are merits and demerits in respect of this legislation.

I wish now to consider the Alberta viewpoint which I think is in harmony with the views I expressed before supper. I shall quote a couple of paragraphs from the Edmonton Journal to give the minister some of the feeling that has been caught in these paragraphs about the situation existing in Alberta today. I quote:

> Given the irony of the situation one can readily accept the outrage of Alberta's premier. Logic, obviously, plays no great role in the formulation of federal energy policies, which appear suspiciously like hastily constructed frameworks designed to cope only with short term political expediencies.
> The new federal budget includes provisions that will remove provincial royalties paid by oil companies as deductible business expenses. Last summer Mr. Lougheed warned the federal government against taking such a step on grounds the action would 'damage the confidence and strength of the petroleum industry in Canada.'

However, the federal government does seem bent on a course designed to force the oil industry out of the exploration business all together. That is a source of concern in Alberta today. Now I come to a very specific reason in a speech made by the Hon. Don Getty, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs for the Province of Alberta, a man who has taken part in negotiations with the federal government, a man who is very modest not only in his views but in his expression of them.

After I read a small section of the speech made by Mr. Getty on Tuesday night in Edmonton, I will ask the minister to respond to the charges that are made in it concerning the ways in which the federal government has deliberately injured the development of the oil industry in Alberta by its conduct and by its failure to consult. We do not need to go over once more all the conferences, accords, meetings and technicalities. Let us look at it the way Mr. Getty looked at in a very sharp focus.

Mr. Getty makes a number of points. He says that the federal government has, over the past 18 months, taken what you could call seven steps. The first step was as follows:

[The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin).]

> The Federal Liberal Government is so oriented to protection of the Central Canadian power base and so dependent upon it it couldn't stand to have something as important as oil and gas not under their control.

I remind the minister that I am quoting Mr. Getty, who is saying that the philosophy of the federal government is such that it fails to consult, and is dominant in the discussions it does hold. The second step mentioned by Mr. Getty was that:

> Alberta was told, regardless of what your oil is worth in the world markets, you can't sell it to Central Canadians at world prices. You will still buy from Central Canada at world prices or more but by God you will sell them your oil in the name of Canada, at a lot less. Why? Well it's for the good of poor old suffering Central Canada.

● (2010)

The third step in Mr. Getty's analysis was that Alberta was told it could not even sell oil to people other than Canadians at world prices, even though those other people were willing to pay that price. We cannot do that in Alberta, according to this philosophy, because the money, the $1.5 billion, is needed for central Canada.

Then there is the fourth step. There may be an oil supply emergency, so the federal government is setting up a federal petroleum administration act to give it authority to set prices for oil. It also tells Albertans where the oil must go, and when. This is needed to protect central Canada, or at least that is what we are told in Alberta. Mr. Getty calls this a piece of outright larceny, proposed in the same name of an emergency.

Next comes the fifth step. In Alberta we might get a petrochemical industry, but only after one is established in Ontario with a federal Crown corporation and guarantees that it will get Alberta's oil at subsidized prices to compete with the petrochemical industry Alberta is trying to develop. That is because central Canada needs the jobs.

Step No. 6 is that the federal government is envious about the provinces' natural resources starting to be really valuable. It wants a greater share of the results of this production. So it uses the federal budget not only to gouge more money from the sale of provincial resources, but in a manner that controls or stops the provinces from deciding how much they should get for selling their assets. Alberta is told, "If you don't play along, we'll kill your industry if you don't allow Ottawa a greater share."

Step No. 7 is that there is no longer an oil supply emergency. We realize that following last winter. There is no oil supply emergency at the moment. But not only will the government proceed with a federal petroleum administration act that controls the price and allocation of oil, but it decides to expand it, so now it can control the price of natural gas too, and also determine to whom it can be sold. There is to be no more letting Alberta use those resources to bargain for fairer treatment in confederation. Central Canada says, "We don't expect you to like it, but we're doing it anyway for Canada's sake."

That is the spirit in which the federal government has approached the problem of petroleum legislation. I put these questions to the minister, asking him to respond publicly to Mr. Getty. We can say that the view in Alberta is in harmony with the national interest—with provincial resources systematically being dragged into the federal grasp, with the constitution being literally changed before our eyes. Albertans are seeing their future heritage and hope being taken from their control. A federal government stomping on Alberta will feed on its own power, and other provinces will also feel its tentacles. That is what this struggle is about; that is what the fight is going to be about, and that is why I feel, along with Mr. Getty, that Alberta must stand and fight for its heritage and its future, and the future of our children.

Premier Lougheed's call is not just to Albertans or even just to western Canadians, it is to thinking Canadians everywhere. But whether they rally to Alberta's side or not, unless there is a change in federal actions and policies the result is a resistance that Alberta intends to maintain. It is a resistance that the province of Alberta can carry on in another way. It is a resistance that members of parliament from Alberta feel committed to, for the good of all Canada. I submit it is a resistance by members of parliament on this side of the House from all provinces, who are concerned that the future development of this country and the future national unity of this country depend upon a square deal for the development of regional resources. I submit that Mr. Getty has made very serious public charges against the federal government, and I think the minister ought to respond.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): At the outset of his remarks, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman said that perhaps when his colleagues address themselves to these questions they talk with a violence that causes them to have a narrow viewpoint, and he said that he would not emulate them. I would have to say that he has followed through. Indeed, in the two years that we have mutually sat in the House at the same time this has been characteristic of his approach, and perhaps uncharacteristic of his colleagues.

I think the hon. member's was a thoughtful approach, but I wonder if he cannot see in the speech made by Mr. Getty some of the basic contradictions he put to himself. In particular, the hon. member started off by saying that he felt Alberta had been victimized by central Canada, just as Mr. Getty did in his speech, through uncharacteristically, I would agree, and dripping with venom he expressed such a terrible antipathy to central Canada. Both gentlemen used the expression "victimized by central Canada," in regard to Alberta.

I remarked earlier today that there had been programs operating in both directions, both in favour of Alberta and in favour of the consuming provinces. Indeed, programs have been operating for the Atlantic provinces and right across Canada to deal with their different circumstances. But "victimized by central Canada"—is that correct?

To deal with Mr. Getty's second point, when he says that, "You can't sell oil to Canadians at world prices", I would point out that there has not been a tradition of selling oil to Canadians at world prices. For ten or 15 years oil was sold to central Canada at about $1.25 or $1.50 above world prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That is not true.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is true. It certainly is true. I pay no attention to the hon. member for Calgary Centre, but address myself to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona because he has taken an intelligent approach. The Alberta industry developed on the basis of a series of federal policies, not central Canada policies, but federal policies which substantially assisted the development of that industry and from which at that particular time the producers of Alberta benefited.

That was due to the fact that Ontario in particular, instead of taking the offshore oil which could have been landed more cheaply into the Toronto and Sarnia refineries, developed industry on the basis of western Canada oil. There was no question of victimizing anybody. It was a good policy, and it assisted the development of the Alberta industry.

I have difficulty when I address myself to a member like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona in finding how he can speak with antipathy about a part of the country which I happen to represent, and in which I know he was educated. The hon. member for Crowfoot is an Albertan and he has a particular viewpoint, but may I suggest that bringing out this particular attitude—

Mr. Horner: Why bring me into it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —is not going to assist us at all. When the hon. member talks about a particular part of the country being victimized, and Premier Lougheed talks in such vicious terms as he did in September, 1973, about central and eastern Canada, then I would suggest to the hon. member that he might reflect and think about the attitude behind that point of view.

Let me deal with the questions one by one. On the question of world prices I have pointed out that Alberta has not been getting world prices in the past but has been getting better than world prices. Indeed, in relation to natural gas which was a system put into effect through federal policies, gas which would have had to be flared at the wellhead was marketed to the advantage of both those who were consuming it and those who were producing it. Federal policies were in force to achieve this. It was not victimization. It is very much the reason why there are skyscrapers today in Calgary and Edmonton—because there were national policies which gave advantages to that particular industry.

Mr. Yewchuk: The victimization is not by central Canada, it is you.

● (2020)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is not what the hon. member said and it is not what Mr. Getty said. If the hon. member for Athabasca means his remark in a personal way, that is all right; I do not care.

Mr. Andre: The minister sounds like Portugal rationalizing the colonies.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Getty taking exception to the petroleum administration bill. It is not clear in his speech whether he takes exception to the fact that there is a single oil price in Canada, and that we are using part of the economic rent from the export charge to cushion the price of oil in eastern Canada.

Mr. Horner: What are you doing to bring about more supply in central Canada? That is the question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We are dealing with what Mr. Getty appears to be professing and what hon. members are holding up in the House. Members representing the Atlantic provinces, parts of eastern Canada, as well as other parts of Canada, would be very much prejudiced if the price of our oil were forced up to world price levels. I think they should consider again whether they agree to step number four, Mr. Getty's proposal that the federal petroleum administration bill should not go through.

Item number five raises the question of a petrochemical industry being established in Ontario. I hope the hon. member for Lambton-Kent does not have the notion that the Petrosar project should not go to southwestern Ontario because—

Mr. Andre: But where are you going to get the oil? That is the point.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The notion that the federal government wants to build such a plant in Ontario first is not true. The petrochemical projects have not gone ahead in Alberta as a result of a provincial decision. The planning decision as to where to put the Dow-Dome project has been outstanding for several years. Negotiations are in process with CIL, Dow-Dome and others, but the decision on where the petrochemical industry will locate, and what it will do, is a decision for the Alberta government. It does not rest with this government. This is a matter for provincial decision, and it is unfair to suggest otherwise.

If the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona considers this bill from the standpoint of its entailing antipathy to central Canada—and I see the hon. member for Lambton-Kent is sitting in front of him—does it not strike him that his argument is a contradiction in terms? We are talking about policies which exist at present and will exist in future in order to assist all parts of Canada. Does the hon. gentleman really wish to found his policy on that kind of antipathy to the part of the country which I and others in this chamber represent? I suggest the hon. member is far too intelligent to support a policy stemming from that position and I am sure that if he considers that, he will appreciate the contradiction inherent in his argument.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, we have just witnessed a typical performance by a Liberal minister who uses divisiveness as his main weapon. He began by attempting to divide me from my Alberta colleagues, by suggesting that I am possessed of a much superior view, which he would be willing to discuss with me. Let me tell the minister that everything I have learned about oil and gas I have learned from my Alberta colleagues.

Mr. Faulkner: That is the problem.

Mr. Roche: If the minister knew as much about oil and gas as members from Alberta do, the government would be in much better shape.

[Mr. Symes.]

The minister also used the weapon of divisiveness characteristically to divide and conquer. He tried to make it look as if in some way I am opposed to central Canada because I referred to Mr. Getty's position. Let me say that Mr. Getty can speak for himself; he is perfectly capable of it. I used the words I did, in the context of the Liberal government's domination of this country from a position of central Canadian strength. That is the issue. We, in the west and the maritimes, must keep on resisting this government, so that we can develop. That development will not take place under the centralist philosophy and domination of a government run by Liberals in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roche: I urge the minister to refute the charges made by Mr. Getty and myself. He has tried to make it appear as if we are opposed to the interests of central Canada. I am not opposed to the interests of central Canada, but I am opposed to our entire country being dominated by a philosophy which protects central Canada at the expense of the development of jobs and resources in western Canada as well as in the maritimes. That is the issue.

I went to the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, as did many of my colleagues, and I could quote chapter and verse what happened, but I will not take up the time of the committee. Oh, yes, the Liberals went in with a list of proposals which looked as if they were committed to the well-being of western Canada. Yet 18 months later we know what happened. The result of the conference is zero, less than zero if you consider the lifting of the rail freight freeze.

In his response the minister did not deal with the central problem, which is how we are to ensure supplies for central Canada through strengthening our resource base in the west. We want to develop those resources for the good of all Canada. That development and exploration will not take place unless our people have confidence in the government, unless the government is credible, and unless it is prepared to negotiate. My chief witness is Mr. Getty, a man of great repute in this country. He has given up on private negotiations and made a public attack. That is what the minister must respond to now.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, as this debate is to continue on Monday, tomorrow is to be devoted to the consideration of a ways and means motion connected with the budget, and as the minister wishes to propose several technical amendments which must be explained, could the minister not present those amendments now, so that members can study them over the week-end? That way we could express ourselves more cogently. Is the minister willing to accept this suggestion?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, over a week ago I provided hon. members with amendments; there are to be a number of additional amendments. I will be glad to go into them on a clause by clause basis.

Mr. Horner: The minister is filibustering his own bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Not at all. I want to help.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, if I may speak on the point of order, I find it amazing to note that although the minister presented to the committee some 32 pages of amendments, he now says there are to be more amendments. Quite probably he will present even more on Monday.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I am trying to do what is obviously in our best interests. We have become involved in a strong political argument, and that is good, but we have work to do. We should be aware of the contents of the amendments. I suggest, after the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie has spoken—I understand he is next—that the minister might stand up and explain some of the amendments he will propose. That will help us in discussing the very serious points at issue here.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair will not raise objections to the hon. member's suggestion. We are discussing clause 2. With the unanimous consent of the committee the minister can be allowed to refer to other clauses and to amendments. Is that the unanimous wish of the committee?

● (2030)

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a correction, Mr. Chairman. All I want to do is use the same precedent I used earlier. The minister can take some of these amendments and explain them, but he cannot move them during this discussion on clause 2. If he wants to explain some of these amendments which are of a technical nature, we can still stay on this clause. He can then table them so we have them on the record and can study them over the weekend.

The Deputy Chairman: I appreciate the point the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain is making, because we did that in the case of certain amendments that he brought to the attention of the committee. That, of course, was done with agreement. The only point the Chair is making is that this can only be done if the committee so agrees.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. I find that highly irregular from the point of view that the minister would be the only one speaking to the amendments today. This is why I say we need the opportunity to have an exchange. I think it would be better to follow the normal practice.

The Deputy Chairman: Consent has not been given.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, I have a series of questions for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. He might take note of them as I go along, and answer when I have finished.

As I mentioned last night, we cannot look at this bill in isolation. We must look at it in the context of the National Energy Board report and the problem of supply and demand. I wish to sound out the minister on his views of partially meeting our supply problem by means of a method of conservation. The minister talked about the federal government introducing an energy conservation program. I would like him to elaborate on that, and answer some of the questions I will be putting to him.

In its most recent report the National Energy Board predicts an annual demand growth rate for oil at 3.2 per cent over the next 20 years. I find that rather low considering the historical growth rate in the demand for oil. Perhaps the minister can elaborate on how they arrived at that figure.

It is predicted there will be a shortage by 1982 and we will have to become a net importer. This not only means a problem of supply. Studies indicate that the world supply situation will be very tight in the early 1980's. The cost of foreign oil will probably be higher. In light of our tight supply situation in the next few years, it seems advisable for the government to begin now to institute a strong oil conservation program.

The energy demand growth rate for all forms of energy during the fifties was 4 per cent per year. In the sixties it was up to 5.5 per cent per year. The trend is to increased demand, rather than a levelling off as predicted by the National Energy Board over the next 20 years.

Have the minister and the government developed a conservation program embodying some of the following points? If we are to reduce consumption of fuel in Canada because of our tight supply situation, there should be a revision of the building codes to demand more insulation in our homes and office buildings. Has the minister discussed revising the national building code with his colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or any other institutions involved, with a view to upgrading insulation standards for buildings across Canada in order to conserve fuel?

Second, has the government considered more mass transit systems in Canada, with a view to getting people away from using automobiles for their transportation to work and getting them to use train and bus systems? I know the budget imposed a tax on high energy consuming cars. However, most of those cars are not used by the average Canadian. They are a minority. Therefore, it will not affect automobile fuel consumption very much.

The Minister of Transport is very anxious to go ahead with his short take-off and landing program, STOL, emphasizing airplanes over rapid trains and buses. We know that in terms of passenger miles planes require 10 times as much fuel as buses, and six times as much fuel as trains. In light of the energy supply situation, has the minister urged the Minister of Transport to press ahead with mass ground transportation plans rather than STOL aircraft and similar programs?

Third, has the federal government taken any initiatives in urging provincial governments to reduce highway speed limits to 50 miles an hour? I believe only British Columbia has done this. I point out to the minister that by driving a car at 50 miles an hour rather than 70 miles an hour, there is a saving of 15 to 25 per cent in gas consumption.

Fourth, has the minister considered and will he urge the Canadian public to turn down their thermostats in homes and office buildings? By the way, do government offices still have their thermostats set at 68 degrees as was the case last winter, or have they gone back to more normal temperatures?

Does the government intend to ask Canadians to turn down their thermostats in order to conserve fuel? I believe the average thermostat is set at 72 degrees. If it were turned down four degrees to 68, each year we would save the equivalent of 900 million gallons of fuel oil, about 10 per cent of the energy used for heating.

Fifth, is the government considering higher prices as a means of enhancing conservation of energy? I hope not. I do not look upon fuel as a luxury. I do not believe that if we raise the price, people will immediately cut back consumption. I draw to the minister's attention that farmers are the largest fuel consumers in this country. They cannot cut back on fuel consumption. They must still drive their tractors and combines. If the farmers' fuel prices increase, food prices will rise dramatically.

One study indicates that if we doubled the price of gasoline, initially the demand would go down 20 per cent, but would be back to normal in six months. If we doubled the price of home heating oil, initially the demand will go down 10 per cent, but in six months it will be back to normal. Is the government considering higher prices as a conservation method? I do not think it would work.

Also, has the government carried out any studies to ascertain the effect of last year's price increases on general fuel consumption? The minister has talked about introducing a conservation program. Has he considered the five points I mentioned? When may we expect a conservation program to be announced?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member has asked me about the report of the Energy Board. I do not have a copy with me this evening to refresh my memory as to the bases upon which the board arrived at its predictions of demand figures. The question might be pursued with the officials of the board. We have under consideration a program of conservation, both in terms of the government's own use of energy and in terms of persuading the community as a whole to be more economical. In due course we shall be making this available. The questions the hon. member has posed are the obvious questions one would consider when devising such a program. I shall be in a position later to go into detail as to what measures have been adopted, and why; I am not in a position to go into these details this evening.

Mr. Symes: Can the minister tell us when this program will be announced?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I doubt that it will be announced before Christmas. It is more likely to be announced in the New Year.

Mr. Symes: We shall await the program with interest. Now I have another question to ask on a different topic, that is, the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline. Would the minister advise the committee as to the current stage of the negotiations with Interprovincial Pipeline? Who will build the line, and who will own it? If the private company will not build it, will the government do so, and under what terms? Also, will the pipeline be reversible in the light of possible supply problems in the years ahead?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The intention would be to put in the capacity to make the line reversible, although the machinery would not necessarily be put in place in the early years. Negotiations are under way at the moment with regard to the construction of the pipeline. I do not anticipate that an announcement will be made this week, but I do expect that perhaps next week I will be able to make a more definite statement.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is of fundamental importance in the context of this discussion that we recognize that the critical energy problem confronting Canadians today is not the one-price policy. That is common ground between us. It is not the mechanics of payment of the price shelter or the levying of the export tax. Those were accepted in principle months ago, and the enabling legislation could be passed by this House in an afternoon.

The critical problem, the one which the government stubbornly refuses to acknowledge and come to grips with, is that of security of supply of petroleum and natural gas for Canadians, not for the year ahead but rather for the last half of this decade and the first half of the next.

I ask the minister, point blank: can he assure us that Canada's marketable oil and gas reserves will bridge the gap before new and expensive frontier resources can be brought to market? The answer to this question will determine our ability to fuel our industry, heat our homes, power our transport and co-operate internationally before presently available supplies run out.

I suggest to the minister that there is a distinct and present danger that our domestic petroleum supply situation could become desperate before 1980. Evidence continues to mount that future productive capacity in the presently accessible producing areas is falling short and, furthermore, that our hopes and expectations with respect to tar sands production might be met with disappointment. This morning we learned that one of the participants in the Syncrude project has withdrawn, and that the remaining partners feel obliged to re-examine their position.

The evidence with respect to the availability of adequate natural gas supplies from the existing producing areas is even more clear and it is expected that these will fall far short of national requirements before the end of the decade.

Specific policy decisions and new initiatives at the national level are clearly called for, and the host of present policy uncertainties relating to the oil and gas industry must be resolved so that the monumental task of assuring adequate energy supplies for the future can procéed. The resolution of these problems and the formulation of the policies required call for the highest degree of co-operative action and consensus between both the provincial and federal levels of government and between both levels of government and the industry itself.

The situation cries out for the re-establishment of an atmosphere of trust and confidence, an atmosphere now sadly lacking as evidenced by the hard-line belligerent statements originating from government leaders in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and from right here in Ottawa. I suggest the time has passed when recriminatory statements, regardless of their source—and I do not suggest that the minister is solely responsible in that regard—serve any useful purpose. Such statements make no contribution to resolving our problems.

I further suggest that the legislation we are considering here, encompassing as it does a massive assault on what have hitherto been considered exclusive provincial prerogatives, will inevitably lead, if allowed to pass in its present form, to further bitterness, confrontation, and to the disastrous supply crisis referred to earlier.

Surely it is not beyond the ingenuity of the minister, his colleagues in cabinet and his officials, to develop by the process of negotiation a consensus with the provinces, a consensus that will lead to a restoration of that atmosphere of confidence and entrepreneurial spirit which, during the years following the Leduc discovery, resulted in creating in Canada the potential capacity to become self-sufficient for decades to come in oil and gas supply.

I listened yesterday with amazement as hon. members from the Province of Quebec derided the comments made by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain concerning the attitude of provinces other than Saskatchewan and Alberta with respect to the constitutional confrontation that the federal government seems hell-bent on creating. I say I listened with amazement, Mr. Chairman, because on November 12 last I listened to a speech delivered by Mr. Guy Saint-Pierre, the Minister of Industry and Commerce in the Liberal government of the Province of Quebec, and I would like to quote for the benefit of those hon. members opposite some of the things that Mr. Saint-Pierre had to say on this very question we are discussing today. He said, and I quote:

> In 1974—at these crossroads at which the Canadian state finds itself—Quebec supports the claims of Alberta. After all, we consider it as a fundamental principle of confederation that a province has the exclusive and ultimate right to dispose of its natural resources as it sees fit and to take the necessary steps to organize its industrial development unhindered by external pressure. If we do not live up to such a principle, it does not appear to us in Quebec that confederation can be maintained for very long.

He went on:

> Having said that, it will not shock you to hear that the centralizing tendencies of Ottawa in the area of the distribution of these resources and the revenue sharing which flows from it, do not appeal to the Quebec government. In fact, we abhor them.
>
> Having watched closely the attitudes and policies of the Ottawa government, we have concluded in Quebec that for some reason or other the federal government wants to circumscribe provincial initiatives insofar as the distribution of energy resources and the use of the revenues derived therefrom are concerned.

Later in his speech, Mr. Saint-Pierre went on to say:

> We sometimes have also wondered in private whether the federal government has not accepted the objective of limiting provincial involvement in resource development in order to give to itself the time to establish a strategy of partial nationalization of the resources.
> We said it privately, as I pointed out. But I wonder if our doubts have not been confirmed. Quebec wanted to become a shareholder in Panarctic Oil. The federal government has decided that we have not the right to do that on the grounds that there could emerge a serious conflict of interest.

Having said all this and after having consulted widely and wisely, the Quebec government accepts the position of the governments of Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. Saint-Pierre went on to say:

> Federalism must be more flexible. Mr. Trudeau endorsed the need for this flexibility at the opening of the energy conference in 1973. However, recently he seems to have acted as if he had come to reject this principle which demands interprovincial consultation and federal-provincial agreements freely entered into.

● (2050)

I say to hon. members opposite that Mr. Saint-Pierre's excellent speech deserves careful study if we truly want to understand the attitudes and aspirations not only of the people in the producing provinces in western Canada, but of the people in all of Canada.

I suggest to the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, that he is in real danger of making a serious and tragic miscalculation concerning the mood of the people of Canada in respect to their historical provincial prerogatives and attitudes to confederation. I suggest that the minister reconsider his present determination to usurp to the federal power the unilateral price fixing mechanism embodied in the legislation before us.

I have listened carefully to what hon. members opposite have had to say about this legislation and about energy policy generally, and there have been many interesting views and opinions put forth. But instead of opinions I invite members opposite, and the minister, to reflect on a few facts. Nine hundred million dollars have been carved out of oil exploration budgets for 1975. In a report published today, Statistics Canada predicts that a reduction in exploration expenditures of $800 million will result in the loss of 54,800 jobs for one year, and a sales decline of $973 millions in other industries through spin off effects.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his colleagues in government must shoulder their share of the responsibility for these results, results which, I suggest, it is not exaggeration to describe as catastrophic. We have finally arrived at a point where the industry's calculations regarding future supplies and proven reserves of oil and gas approximately match those of the government's own National Energy Board. Instead of responding in a positive fashion with policies of encouragement and incentive, designed to ensure that the industry will be able to provide for the future, the government has created a situation so intolerable that industry is taking flight.

I feel genuine concern—and I hope my remarks reflect that concern—for the Canadian consumer who will be most affected by a prolonged federal-provincial conflict over the resource industry. Negotiation, conciliation, consultation and co-operation between the two levels of government has always been a policy of my party and, indeed, of the minister's own party. Damage to the intricate workings of the delicate balance of our confederation that has taken decades to achieve would be tragic and possibly irreparable if the government continues on its present course. It is not just the interest of the producing provinces that is at stake; rather, clauses 36 and 52 of this bill endanger the rights of any province that prizes its provincial prerogatives.

That he retreat—and I do not use that word in a derogatory sense because it would be an honourable withdrawal having regard to the important constitution issues at stake—from his present posture of "my way or no way," reopen the doors of negotiation with the provincial governments concerned and seek a solution by consensus and consultation rather than confrontation, is a policy that I urge most sincerely upon the minister.

The bill before us in its present form should be withdrawn. Our party stands ready to co-operate in the fullest sense to provide the minister with whatever legislative authority he requires to maintain the petroleum price and shelter system he has developed, and to levy the export tax necessary to implement it.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Douglas (Bruce): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie, in speaking about STOL aircraft, would not like to mislead the House. I think he mentioned that STOL aircraft required six to eight times as much fuel as trains or buses. I should like to put a couple of things straight on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Bruce is not rising on a point of order but entering into the debate. He will be recognized in due course if he wishes to participate in the discussion.

Mr. Firth: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think there are very few members of the committee who know what it is like to have to pay $2.25 a gallon for fuel to run their motorized toboggans. Likewise, very few members of the committee know what it is like to have to pay $1 a gallon for fuel in the Arctic, especially when you have to use 25 to 30 gallons a day at times when the temperature reaches 50 below. A lot of fuel is flown in to many parts because it is a necessity of life, especially in the high Arctic. Neither do I think there are many members here who know what it is like to have to pump their own fuel and have gasoline burn their hands while pumping gas into an aircraft that is going on a very important mission, and pay $2.25 a gallon for 80-87 or 110-30. I do not think those terms register with many members here, but they are common in my constituency.

The average price of fuel in the high Arctic is in the area of $1 a gallon and up, and that is a very sad situation. I am happy to see that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is in the chamber tonight because I am sure he is aware of a certain program in operation in Old Crow in the Yukon. This is a program that makes use of alternative fuel supply, since it is impossible to fly fuel into Old Crow to run the nursing station and school at all times of the year.

This program, which has worked very well, utilizes wood as fuel to run the school, and this in itself creates an industry in a little village like Old Crow. The people there go out and fell trees, and use their own labour and resources in providing fuel to run the school. This is a very good program that I think should be considered for some of the smaller villages in the Arctic, especially along the tree line.

I think this point should also receive serious consideration. We have airlines like Pacific Western that charge a higher rate per passenger mile and a higher charge for freight in and out of the Arctic compared with elsewhere. Their aircraft refuel at the wellhead at Norman Wells. The company uses 737's and other kinds of sophisticated aircraft, but charges a much higher rate than Air Canada or other common carriers in the Northwest Territories compared with other rates across Canada.

Why do we allow companies like Imperial Oil to rip off the public by refueling Pacific Western Air Lines' aircraft and charging a higher rate than is charged similar equipment elsewhere in Canada? This does not make sense to me, and I do not think it would make sense to anybody else. North of Norman Wells bulk barges are used on the river to transport fuel further north. Sometimes we pay higher rates north of Norman Wells than south of Norman Wells, even though it is the same company doing the transporting. I suggest these questions should receive serious consideration.

Aside from that, I should also like to make this point. How many people, in this House or in the southern part of Canada generally, know what it is like to have to pay from $2.25 to $3 per gallon for fuel for their motorized vehicles which they require to make their living? These people in the north have to pay that amount and there is no tax rebate, whereas farmers in the southern part of Canada do get a tax rebate on the cost of the fuel they use to produce food.

The Innuit or the Indian has to pay upwards of $2.25 per gallon to run his motorized equipment in order to go out and fish, or hunt cariboo to feed his family, and he gets no rebate whatsoever. He is not even considered to be a farmer, yet he is working his land by fishing and hunting for cariboo or moose just as the farmer down here works his land, yet the farmer here receives a tax rebate and does not have to pay as much for low-grade fuel.

This is something hon. members of this House should consider. There are only about 40,000 people in the whole Northwest Territories. They are not all hunters and trappers, but these people must pay these high prices for fuel to harvest their crops in that area, and I think they should be considered for some kind of tax rebate.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to take part in a debate on a bill which has, I think, a great importance. To start my remarks, I would like to read its title once more:

An Act to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade

I imagine that the minister responsible should aim at ensuring the necessary supply of those products at the best possible price for all Canadians. It is not the basic objectives of the government that concern us but the means it intends to use to reach them. As many other members, I believe there are acceptable means that, in the name of federalism of which we talk so often, could give much sounder results than the means proposed in this bill. It is also clear in this bill, Mr. Chairman, that there is no agreement with the provinces. If there is no agreement between the provinces, the federal government will have the right to decide that its authority to set prices for oil and petrochemical products will become permanent. And if we extrapolate a little and take into account the objectives of the National Energy Board, I think that this bill does not apply only to two provinces but to the ten provinces that make up Canada.

We feel also this centralization spirit which is unfortunately unacceptable if we respect the right of the provinces. I do not say that the government has no responsibility concerning the oil supply in Canada or a better service for Canadians.

The government has responsibilities, but it must assume them in consultation with the provinces. Mr. Chairman, we have heard the comments of several ministers and members of the opposition. The whole campaign promoting extraordinary powers is conducted in the name of national unity and interest. Whether we are to realize national interest or unity, I could not care less. I think we should rather realize national harmony. We are aware of the marked differences that characterize each of our provinces. We have a typical example of this with Alberta and Saskatchewan. There have been hundreds of examples in Quebec for 104 years. Every time a major problem rises, it is in the name of national unity or interest. That is not true, Mr. Chairman, we are wasting our time. To my mind, the time has come to recognize that our major national problems are caused by the different needs of each part of Canada. We have tangible proof that it is national harmony we will have to seek by recognizing the differences between the provinces, and attempting to harmonize them in such a way as to better serve the voters in each region.

We have the proof that it is unthinkable to introduce a bill of national scope which corresponds to the needs of each province. So, it is also impossible to achieve national unity if that objective is to be reached. And it is also impossible to reach that objective, to the extent where the provinces will not feel at home within a federal regime. And once again, with regard to this bill, and many other acts to be introduced which we have already seen, the provinces will not feel at home. The fiasco is already recognized, when the provinces cannot feel at ease within Confederation. The federal government therefore has a responsibility—that of motivating the provinces towards an acceptable consensus, that of co-ordinating the actions of some of the provinces through a form of management acceptable to them, for the greater good of our country; but not by giving the federal government powers which, in the final analysis, belong to the provinces and are recognized as such.

Some provinces already have reacted to the legislation before us. And I think sufficient comments have been expressed in newspapers. Dealing with the province of Quebec particularly, they have already mentioned the position of the minister, Mr. Saint-Pierre, who bluntly urges the provinces to unite against those extraordinary powers.

I think this is clear enough and I believe Mr. Saint-Pierre implicitly expects to get the support of the members from the province of Quebec in this House.

Of course, the premier of Quebec has not yet made any statement, but he will do so as usual when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) gives him the opportunity to express his views on that matter. But Mr. Saint-Pierre has a very definite opinion, and his remarks are fairly justified indeed.

Moreover, Mr. Saint-Pierre made a very clear point when asking every province to unite and prevent the federal government from assuming such extraordinary powers.

Quebec, has some hon. members pointed out, has a historical background has a defender of rights. It has always somehow complained, and often with just reason, about the federal government encroaching on some powers. And we could recall the days of the hon. Maurice Duplessis and his successor Mr. Lesage who put up some rather extraordinary fights in the matter of taxes. We also heard Mr. Johnson's representations. We are concerned by Mr. Bourassa's silence. Private members from Quebec might hopefully rouse him and invite him to voice his opinion has other premiers outside Quebec already have in that matter. Today, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing with oil, but next will come mines and electricity. And I am worried about the Quebec premier's silence. That is why I am raising that point. I hope to challenge him into answering at least his minister of industry's invitation and joining other provincial premiers to force the government in Ottawa to act as coordinators and not has centralizers.

I therefore dare hope the hon. members in this House whom the people of Quebec have greatly trusted will also depart from their silence and support the invitation by Mr. Saint-Pierre.

It is not the first time indeed that Quebec ministers invite Quebec members to give a yes answer. Mr. Choquette did so not long ago, Mr. L'Allier very often, and so did Quebec Immigration Minister Bienvenue. It has been done for quite some time.

It is my definite impression, Mr. Chairman, from what I hear, that ministers representing the Quebec government find absolutely no support here, although we have 60 Quebecers. If separatists only will defend the province's sacred rights and oppose the centralizing of such powers, I wonder if Quebec members from the other side could say today they are meeting Quebec's needs.

Let us give examples. By their silence on this bill and on others, as well as by their failure to act on Quebec ministers' requests, they show they have non inkling that they are being taken. So did Mr. Bourassa feel in Paris. I wonder if he was being short-changed, because it appears the deep sea water port will not be forthcoming for Gros-Cacouna, judging from the silence kept by our members and Quebec's premier. There is a direct link there with the energy issue. Not a word is being said on the matter. I would however, Mr. Chairman, recognize the efforts made by the member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata (Mr. Gendron), who made representations; but nothing was heard of other members on the subject.

The member for Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata did not get the support needed. And the ministers responsible for the project are unfortunately too silent too. The proof that this government is getting powers that will be not only embarrassing, but harmful to the provinces, can be found in the statement made two days ago in Paris by the Quebec premier, when he dealt with enriched uranium.

And, right away, the minister responsible in Ottawa immediately said: In any case, they cannot pass that agreement with France until I give my approval. We know that the premier of Quebec had the courage, while very far away from Quebec, to accuse the federal government of playing the role of a customs officer with respect to that project. I hope he will repeat that in Quebec, for example. I also hope that our members when they sit here will urge him to do so.

So, the stakes, the objective, is respect for the provinces. I think the government must set the prices and distribution with them in the interest of every citizen. And that is possible. Through many additional meetings with the provinces we will be able to make the distribution to the extent that some provinces will be able to do so. The redistribution of our wealth with the other provinces, to the extent that it is acceptable, must be done. It is not because the federal government would have all the powers that it would be the only one capable of making that redistribution. Why, if we were able to have an agreement a year and a half ago on that oil issue with the co-operation and the participation of the provinces, would it be impossible in the future to have prior negotiations within the spirit of the constitution. Indeed, the powers of the provinces must be respected. I am happy to see, Mr. Chairman, that this time the province of Quebec is not necessarily directly involved. But, indirectly, in a general way and in the long term, all provinces will be embarrassed if this bill should ever be passed. Indeed, there are signs and statements from our ministers in Quebec that are disturbing. I read recently a speech by the Quebec Minister of Communications who was concerned—

An hon. Member: Another separatist.

Mr. La Salle: Another separatist. Because one is not a Liberal in Quebec, Mr. Chairman, it seems one is necessarily a separatist. That opinion is not worth much.

The Minister of Telecommunications, who has a lot of problems with his counterpart in Ottawa, recently showed his discouragement about federalism and its future in a speech before the Chamber of Commerce. I believe this is a warning that our members from Quebec in Ottawa should seriously consider when they hear people like Mr. St-Pierre, Mr. L'Allier, Mr. Choquette and so many others. And the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is aware of this from his recent discussions with Mr. Choquette. He always receives negative answers and Mr. L'Allier goes on by saying that he is concerned and sad that this support is not sufficient.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we must force the government to respect the rights of the provinces. For my part, I refuse to support such a bill which puts the provinces in a straightjacket. And it is not the first time that this government is tempted to do so. I therefore say right away to the provinces: Wake up and unite or else you will soon be considered unimportant entities by the federal government. Those are, Madam Chairman, the few comments that I wanted to make about this bill which is vitally important for the future of our country. I believe that all those who respect the rights of the provinces wish that this national harmony be realized fundamentally in each of us.

It is not with coercive measures like the one under consideration that we will reach this goal. I recognize the good intentions of the minister, but I do not accept the means he suggests. I regret that I do not have more support from my colleagues from Quebec since this bill is essentially against the federalism principle. People will regret the silence of these members and I invite all of them to prove to the government that there is a way to help Canadian citizens. But we must take other means than those suggested.

● (2120)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. Béchard: Madam Chairman, I am not answering the invitation of the hon. member for Joliette, but I would just like to know if he would answer a couple of questions.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member for Joliette accept a question?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Madam Chairman.

Mr. Béchard: Madam Chairman, the hon. member for Joliette said earlier in his remarks that he did not care about Canadian unity. I should like to ask him how the bill before us tonight deny any right over the provinces' natural resources, as he said so well in his speech? I put the question to the hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Madam Chairman, I am pleased to answer the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine. First of all I said I could not care less for national unity, because it is an aim that has not been reached. I am talking about national harmony. Admittedly the provinces are different.

An hon. Member: It is quite different.

Mr. La Salle: Yes, it is quite different. On one hand, we refer here to national unity, but there has been too much sermonizing about it, Madam Chairman. Then I am asked where the bill provides clearly that in case of disagreement among the provinces, the federal government will go to great lengths not to butt in. I say that we have no right to make any decision about those measures for the provinces.

Thus the provinces are deprived of rights acquired according to the spirit of the bill now under consideration which explicitly states that if there is disagreement, the government will decide. The government should not decide, but call together the provinces and co-operate with them. The provinces have control over their natural resources. It does not rest with the federal government to abolish their rights.

Mr. Béchard: Madam Chairman, the member did not answer my question. Would he answer another question. Can he say whether his speech or those he has delivered in the House during the past few weeks are drawn from his daily reading of the separatist newspaper Le Jour?

Mr. La Salle: Madam Chairman, I am pleased to say to the member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine that I read during the day, because I do not read at night. I also read other dailies to be informed, but I do not read only the Liberal newspaper published each month. I would ask the member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine to read clause 36: Where no agreement is entered into pursuant to section 22 with the government of a producer-province . . ."

Clause 36 answers adequately the question he asked me a while ago.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member allow me another question?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allowed to the member for Joliette has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Reynolds: Madam Chairman, the comments by the hon. member opposite directed to my friend from Joliette point out that the hon. member for Joliette does read every paper, separatist or anything else. At least he knows what is happening in Canada today. He has a better idea than the hon. member opposite or the latter would not have asked the first question. Quite possibly, since we are not getting much reaction from the other side, he may have been asleep during the debate.

First of all let me point out that in light of the fact that on Monday there is to be a very important meeting of federal-provincial ministers of finance to consider budget implications, particularly implications surrounding the deductibility of provincial royalties for tax purposes, the timing of the presentation of this bill is most inept. To even consider this bill by itself, apart from the federal budget, is virtually impossible as they are completely interdependent. Also, since this bill was before the committee on November 13, the National Energy Board has indicated the very unhealthy state of our oil and gas industry, and has pointed out that in a relatively short time our country will not be able to meet its own oil needs.

The confusion and confrontation between the provinces and the federal government have placed unnecessary strains on exploration and development of yet unfound oil sources. Last night, for example, the CBC carried a report indicating that exploration plans of roughly $2.1 billion have been reduced by some $900 million. Can anyone in this House deny the implications of a loss of $900 million to the future of Canadian oil exploration? Quite obviously no company or corporation wishes to become involved in what can best be described as a declaration of war between the provinces and the federal government. We find that the budget on November 18 has reiterated the stand of the May 6 budget in making provincial tax and royalties non-deductible.

Bill C-32 is not simply ratification of the March 27 agreement between the provinces and the federal government, but an attack on provincial rights of ownership. The government has made its stand through this bill crystal clear. That stand is that the federal government is determined to intervene in the provincial governments' rights to land, forest, mining and oil. Let us not be so naive as to think that only one, two or three provinces are involved. The entire country is involved, each province is involved and every Canadian is involved.

It is clear, also, that it is not only the petroleum industry that is involved, but the same format holds for the mining industry. In my own province of British Columbia this continuing confrontation and the lack of serious negotiations have seriously upset the entire natural resource exploration and development industry.

This royalty situation is indeed a most critical one, and resource industries throughout my province are finding themselves forced into a system of double taxation, economic chaos and certain closure.

An hon. Member: Let the Liberals in. Get rid of Barrett.

Mr. Reynolds: I could not agree with the hon. member that at this time we should get rid of the premier of my province. Although I disagree with his philosophy, he has a tough job when dealing with this federal government.

The very fact that the provinces and the federal government are increasing taxation of the resource industry has very simple and straightforward consequences. When thousands upon thousands of jobs are involved, and millions of dollars invested in exploration, how long will it be before these companies simply cease to produce, or until the provincial governments are forced to adjust or cancel their royalties which, of course, form one of their most important tax bases?

It is quite obvious to most people in western Canada that if we do not get these royalty payments we will not be able to build up a secondary industry base like that which is so strong in eastern Canada. If the federal government insists on going along with this measure, where is western Canada going to be ten years from now when its natural resource is depleted?

We have heard much rhetoric about the voluntary agreements reached with the federal government and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan regarding subsidization of oil products to the benefit of all Canadians in the amount of roughly two and a half or three billion dollars a year.

All parties praised the efforts of those involved in considering their fellow Canadians. But what happened to that faith in bargaining? Again, very simply, the Liberal government destroyed the agreement, broke faith with those provinces and, through its proposed budget of May 6 and its new budget of November 18, declared an invasion into traditional provincial rights.

There was never an attempt by the Liberal government to sit down as an equal with the provincial governments and negotiate responsibility and fair terms and conditions.

If the members of this House do not feel that the unilateral action of the federal government in the petroleum area is not a power play aimed directly at our constitution, then they are sadly mistaken. If they do not feel that this is only one more giant step in an attempt again to increase centralized control of this country, then they are greatly mistaken. If they do not feel that this attitude of confrontation rather than negotiation will seriously jeopardize the true meaning of federalism, then they are seriously mistaken.

Based on this bill and government's intention to have even greater control of our petroleum industry, the Canadian consumer can soon expect the same result that has been occasioned in other areas where government has taken control.

We have seen the disastrous effects of government sponsored marketing boards and, in spite of government's attempts otherwise, we are looking at the highest prices for eggs in our history.

The federal government got into the food industry and appointed Beryl Plumptre to the Food Prices Review Board. What a waste that was.

If the people in this country are prepared to pay a dollar to a dollar and a half for a gallon of gasoline, or if they are prepared to anticipate major shortages during our energy crisis, then by all means let us continue with the confrontation, let us continue to detract exploration capital from Canada, and let us continue to press for even greater federal control of our economy.

If, however, we are to have a truly viable resource industry, which will provide not only for our own immediate needs as well as our long term needs, but assist in supplying some of the needs of our American neighbours, then stability and encouragement must be returned to this industry. The very future of our own industrial expansion is at stake.

I should like to read into the record an extract from a press release I issued during the last election campaign. It concerns something about which I felt very strongly, as I think did a lot of people in western Canada. The results of the election in that part of the country endorse this. In the second paragraph of this release, dated May 13, I said:

> One of two things is painfully apparent in Finance Minister Turner's proposed taxation changes for the resource industry.
> 1. His preparation was based on absolutely no investigation into this area (which one can assume is doubtful) or
> 2. He is deliberately encroaching into an area which is primarily a private taxation reserve of the province.
> If one disregards the first point, then one must assume that a select group of senior civil servants have taken it upon themselves to invade an area of provincial domain and have convinced their minister that such action would be beneficial to increasing the ever-growing federal power base and pressuring those provinces into reducing their royalties if their resource industries are to remain even slightly economically sound and they are to provide substantial employment opportunities.
>
> Under the new budget proposals, by not allowing the deduction of provincial royalties before computing federal tax, confusion in the resource field to companies both large and small will result, and the resource industries will find themselves forced into a system of double taxation, economic chaos and eventual closure.

● (2130)

Consider, for example, Company X, which should net $18 million in 1974, pay a basic royalty of 2.5 per cent on their gross, amounting to $1.025 million and pay a subsequent super royalty of $6.805 million and 50 per cent federal and provincial tax of $9 million profit. Total taxes and royalties then would amount to $16.83 million, leaving a profit of $1.17 million on an original investment of $63 million. The effective rate of return would be 1.85 per cent.

Consider Company Y, which should net $38 million in 1974. Their basic royalty on 2.5 per cent of the gross would be $2.3 million, the super royalty would amount to $21.025 million, and federal and provincial tax on profit would be $19 million. The total tax and royalty would be $42.35 million, or $4.35 million more than they net. Therefore, on an original investment of $138 million they would be operating at a $4.35 million loss.

I point out that companies X and Y actually exist and operate in Canada.

Now consider the oil industry in Saskatchewan. Oil is sold for $3.08 a barrel by the company concerned. There is an additional $3.42 royalty to the province concerned, to bring the total to the agreed price of $6.50 per barrel. The cost to the company to produce this barrel is roughly $2.50, representing a profit of 58 cents per barrel. Add to this the royalty of $3.42, which under the new budget will not be deductible, and you arrive at a figure of $4. At a 50 per cent tax rate the federal government will collect $2 for every barrel produced from a company which is only making 58 cents per barrel. The net loss to the company, therefore, will be $1.42 per barrel. Surely this must pose some very serious questions to the provincial premiers and to the people of this country.

With thousands upon thousands of jobs involved and millions upon millions of dollars being invested in our exploration provinces, how long will it be, under the proposed budget, before these companies simply cease to produce, or until the provincial governments are forced to adjust or cancel the royalties which are one of their main tax bases?

Let me close by saying that members of this House representing provinces of western Canada think of Canada as a unified country. They always have Madam Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reynolds: For years western Canada has paid more than its share in making sure that the provinces of central and eastern Canada can get oil. Year after year we have helped in this way. We did not object last year when the government introduced a bill to ensure that all Canada could get oil at a preferred price. But we do object to the fact that the people in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba must pay more for automobiles and manufactured goods than the people of central or eastern Canada. And, by introducing this bill, the government is saying it will not allow the western provinces to make the money which is necessary to make the west strong and to allow it to establish secondary industry. Such industry is necessary if we are to survive, if we are to remain a strong force in Canada in years to come.

Mr. Nystrom: Let me begin by saying that, as a western Canadian, I want to see this country stay united. Maintaining national unity is important, as we all agree. If it were not for certain portions of the budget I suggest that much of Bill C-32 would not be controversial.

An hon. Member: Who are you kidding?

Mr. Nystrom: I suggest that we shall find in Bill C-32 many principles which all parties can accept, as two or three Conservative members suggested earlier this afternoon. I think we all support the idea of a single, domestic price for oil across Canada, transportation and handling costs being considered apart from the price. I think all members of the House accept the idea of the subsidy to cushion the price of oil in our five eastern provinces. I also think many hon. members believe that the export tax was justified, as it helped the country during the past winter. We do not quarrel with these ideas.

I think what concerns hon. members is that the federal government through this bill is proposing unilaterally, without consulting the western provinces, to go behind the agreement of March 27 and 28 last. The government began this process in the budget of May 6 last, in which it said that royalties paid to provincial governments for oil and gas could not be deducted from income. That was done without consulting the provincial governments concerned, even though an agreement had been entered into last March.

It goes without saying that we were able to surmount the difficulties of last January, February and March because of the consensus which had been arrived at, which was possible because of the compromise arrived at by the western premiers and the Prime Minister. Great credit is due to Premiers Lougheed and Blakeney for agreeing, on their part, to hold down the price of oil to $6.50 per barrel. Yet under this bill the federal government, without consultation, has decided to force its way into the provincial field and take a greater share of provincial revenues. It has done this by telling the provinces that royalties paid on oil and gas will no longer be deductible from income.

Then, the Minister of Justice said that if provincial governments try to out-manoeuvre the government by nationalizing industries in the provinces or turning them into Crown corporations, the federal government will consider taxing such Crown corporations. Such threats, following a voluntary agreement, make it very difficult for hon. members to grant speedy passage to this bill.

As the Ministers of Finance are to meet on Tuesday—I think the Mines Ministers met today in Ottawa—and as it is not reasonable to expect speedy passage of this bill, would it not be sensible to let them discuss this measure before we finally deal with this bill? If they do this, perhaps some questions that are of concern to hon. members can be clarified, and perhaps this bill could pass. Certainly as things now stand many questions remain to be answered.

The ways and means motions to be considered in connection with the budget have raised many questions in the minds of provincial ministers. How can one consider Bill C-32 without considering what is in the budget, and without referring to negotiations and statements made by the federal government about what is to happen to oil in this country and to oil coming in from outside?

I suggest that the federal government must be given the right, after consultation, to set the domestic price of oil. Ultimately the federal government will be given that right. I wonder whether the government is prepared to consult the provinces on this question. I am referring not only to Saskatchewan and Alberta, but also to Ontario, Quebec and other provinces. Is it ready to negotiate with them and arrive at a position on the basis of consensus and compromise? These are things which I, as a western Canadian representing a constituency in Saskatchewan, am very concerned about at this stage when we must contend with many difficulties in the field of oil.

There are problems regarding the movement of drilling rigs out of this country. We face problems in terms of long-term supplies of oil. So long as the federal government chooses to act unilaterally it will be difficult for the industry, whether owned publicly or privately, to develop satisfactorily. My party, of course, supports public control and ownership of oil and gas; nevertheless, whether the industry is owned privately or publicly, it will not develop satisfactorily unless the federal government can sit down with the provinces and hammer out some kind of agreement. This must be done to let the industry know where it stands, and to let us all know where we stand.

When I look at statements that have been made at the budget and so on, I wonder what the government has up its sleeve. I have here a press clipping from the November 13 issue of the Regina Leader-Post. It quotes the federal minister as saying he had a deal with the oil and gas companies. The article was headlined "Promise broken", and it reported that "Some oil companies broke a promise to the federal government by not pressing the provinces for a reduction in royalties," the Energy Minister was quoted in Ottawa as saying on Thursday. "The oil companies said in meetings before the budget was brought down that if Ottawa reduced its tax burden, they would turn their attention to the provinces. The minister said he regretted that they have not followed through with their promise."

Until I read that article I did not know that a nice cozy little deal had been made between the federal government and the oil companies. If Ottawa were to back down a little—the Minister of Finance says it has—the companies would turn their attention to the provinces. Why was this type of arrangement cooked up?

I have often heard Eric Kierans, a former member of this House, say that multinational oil companies liked to work with this government. They could control this government, but they found the provinces were getting tough and difficult to deal with. I now see a Canadian Press story quoting the minister who said he had cooked up a deal with the oil companies prior to the budget. I wish he would cook up a deal of some sort with the provinces. He should bring the provinces into his confidence and negotiate with them. If those types of things were done, the bill before us today and other energy legislation we are going to deal with in this House could be dealt with in a positive and expeditious manner.

All of us are concerned about unity. We are concerned about the supply of gas and oil. We know we are running into some long-term difficulties. We must sit down with the provinces, lay our cards on the table and be open and frank with each other. If that is done we can look forward to a very positive future for our country in terms of energy in the long term.

These are some of the concerns that I have. They are some of the concerns of my province and, indeed, of all Canadians. I conclude by warning the minister that if we continue in this fashion of unilaterally doing and saying things, all the provinces will be up in arms. The government will have a difficult time in keeping the country together, having it as a meaningful federation where wealth and opportunities can be distributed to help all regions. If the federal government does this sort of thing with only certain industries, it will have the premiers down on its neck. They will naturally be concerned because there will not be balanced growth and balanced development. Unless the government changes direction, we are in for some real trouble in the years to come.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Chairman, I take pleasure in rising to speak on this topic. We are not simply discussing the matter of oil but the right of future Canadians to design their own destiny. Last week I listened to a half hour speech by the Prime Minister which he recycled twice. He discussed what he said was the policy of how best to serve the Canadian people. Over and over in that speech one word kept ringing out. That word was "control". It was not so much the concern of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about what is best for the Canadian people but rather about whom will control the resources of the provinces in the future. Control is the operative word on the government side of the House at this time. This is the concern of the central government.

I believe in a strong central government. If we are going to have an orderly dispatch of business in Canada, we must have a strong central government. What I fear is a pervasive strong central government, a government that is not only strong but moves into areas that up to this time have been the concern of the provinces.

When the government takes it upon itself to move into the area of taxing energy in this country, it is moving into an area rightfully belonging to the provinces. We have to fear this kind of pervasive strong central government which moves into areas not hitherto considered within its purview.

There may be two possible reasons why the government feels justified in doing this at this time. First, it thinks it has the right to do it. If the government feels it has the right to move into the energy resource field at this time, it has already decided it has jurisdiction over offshore resources.

The west coast and the east coast have another resource. That is the fishing industry. Here is a resource which the federal government has already indicated it has the right to control. Does the minister in the future intend to exercise control in that particular industry which is one of our vital natural resources on our east and west coasts? Is the minister prepared to project himself into the future and foresee a time when he wants to control that particular industry? The minister is not listening. He does not want to answer that question, so I will move on.

This pervasiveness of the government is characterized by that very homey, heartwarming, almost heartrending phrase which the Prime Minister and the minister talked about, "benefits for all Canadians." That always sounds so appealing. It has a paternalism about it, a care and a concern. I would like the minister to describe how this works in with co-operative federalism.

Paternalism always carries with it an aura of social concern. It has the ring, but not the heart of social concern. The heart of social concern allows people the dignity to choose for themselves. That is precisely what the government is cutting off with this measure.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

How can we talk about social concern for all the prople of Canada when we take away from them the right to decide the destiny of their natural resources? If the government is really concerned about benefits for all Canadians, it will let the government of each province decide what is right for its people.

Let the government of each province distribute the benefits of the natural resource of that province. After all, it is closest to the needs of its people. Provincial governments know the needs of senior citizens and the deprivations of their people. Let them distribute the benefits of their natural resources. The provincial governments are a little closer to the scene. They know a little bit more about the needs of their provinces. In this way the benefits of these natural resources would be distributed to all Canadians.

The problem is that the benefits will not go to all Canadians if this government is handling them. Chances are they will go to ever-expanding Canada Council grants, LIP programs and bureaucracies. That is where the benefits will go. If the benefits actually went to those who need them most, we could see some sense in what the government is proposing at this time. Far be it from me to want to take away this kind of resource from the benefit of all Canadians. If we had that kind of assurance, we would be loathe to thwart the government in that area.

This kind of paternalistic control is wrong because the government is incompetent to handle the situation, if the report of the National Energy Board is to be believed. We recognize that the government is not ready to handle our natural resources. We recognize that the government is not handling with competence the resources which are already available to us. How can we entrust to it the resources of the future? The government is at fault in even bringing this bill forward. This legislation asks us to disregard the needs of our people by moving into an area which is far better left to the provinces.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In my efforts to understand the import of this particular bill, I spent a fair amount of time going through it carefully and I have broken it down into its various components. The bill is divided into five parts. The first three clauses are preceded by paragraphs. They are designated first, as Short Title; then Interpretation, as is normal, after which we come to clause 3. I think it would be useful if I were to read clause 3 into the record:

> This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of any province.

Hon. members will see that it is short, but to the point. I was struck by the words of this particular clause. In fact I could not believe that parliament would ever be asked to consider such a provision in this context. Disallowance has gone out of style, but we have now invented something else which is called an override. Clause 3 appears in this bill to override any regulation which a province might bring into force in this area.

It so happens there are four other sections of this nature on the statute books of this country. Incidentally, all were passed under Liberal governments. All these sections do not read in exactly the same way, but the import is always the same—overriding rather than disallowing. One of them deals with international river improvements. I think that is acceptable. An international river is a river which flows along a border or which crosses a border and if something is done in Canada to affect such a river, something which affects people on the other side of the border, Canada is responsible under international law. A clause of this kind makes some sense in those circumstances.

Another such clause is to be found in the Fisheries Act as amended in 1970. I refer hon. members to the Statutes of Canada chapter 17. It has to do with deleterious substances and marine plant harvesting, presumably beyond the limits of provincial jurisdiction. Fair enough.

The third example is interesting. It is very topical. It has to do with nuclear liability. We have been hearing lately about a particular premier who has undertaken to negotiate contracts in the international field for the sale of uranium products or for the enrichment of uranium products in Canada for sale abroad. In this particular act there is a section which reads very much like section 3: "Subject to subsection (2) the Crown in right of Canada or the province is bound by this act." I think this particular premier will receive a rude shock when he returns to Canada from his tour abroad to find that section 33 of the Nuclear Liability Act, Chapter 29 of the Revised Statutes, may make it a little difficult for him to export enriched uranium.

The fourth of these sections on the statute books I find difficult to understand—I have still to examine its full implications. But it appears as part of the Explosives Act, chapter 15. It has the same kind of implication.

So there are four sections of this kind already on the statute books. A fifth is before us this evening and we are asked to do something about it. If I am not mistaken my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain will be proposing an amendment in an effort to make this a little more palatable in federal terms because this overriding feature is one which I do not find acceptable, and I am sure the provinces from east to west would agree with me.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—PROPOSED INCREASE IN PENSIONS OF HONG KONG VETERANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, on Friday, November 29, as recorded at page 1798 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) a question regarding the recommendation concerning Hong Kong survivors made recently by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I believe it was my third time of asking when we might see the recommended legislation. The minister indicated in his response that the matter was under consideration both by him and by his department. He said that a matter like this takes time, but that if something is decided he would be glad to inform the House.

I am sure that all members of the House who are interested in veterans affairs will agree with me that one of the particularly decent and humane results of the Woods committee study, the report that followed it, and the legislation that came out of that report, was the fact that significant improvements were made in the pensions of Hong Kong veterans. My particular interest in this matter stems from the fact that there were many from my city of Winnipeg in the Winnipeg Grenadiers who were in Hong Kong, and spent years as prisoners as a result of that expedition. Any of us who know these veterans, these survivors of Hong Kong, are aware of the tremendously difficult experience through which they went.

As a result of the Woods committee recommendations legislation was passed which provided that any Hong Kong veteran or any Canadian who was a prisoner of the Japanese in that part of the world is to be regarded as being disabled at least to the extent of 50 per cent. This has the advantage of providing a little better pension for some than would otherwise be the case. It also has the very real advantage of providing that the widow of any Hong Kong veteran is guaranteed a full widow's pension as a matter of right. As I say, Madam Speaker, we regard this amendment to the Pension Act which dealt with Hong Kong veterans as one of the very decent and humane results that came out of the Woods report.

Even so, it is a fact that there are quite a few of these Hong Kong survivors for whom the going is still very tough. I am thinking in particular of those who are on pensions at rates between 50 per cent and 100 per cent. If I may use round figures, there are about 1,165 survivors of the Hong Kong experience. A hundred and seventy-five of these are on pensions of 100 per cent, and approximately 530 are on pensions of 50 per cent; as I say, no Hong Kong veterans are below 50 per cent. But in between these two groups there are roughly 460 whose pensions vary from 55 per cent to 95 per cent.

Many of these Hong Kong veteran survivors are finding it extremely difficult to hold jobs and stay in the labour market. It was on that background that the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, at its meeting of Tuesday, October 22, 1974, adopted a first report to the House of Commons, which was presented that afternoon, and which reads as follows:

> The Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has the honour to present its first report.
> While considering its Order of Reference dated Thursday, October 3, 1974 relating to the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975 under Veterans Affairs, your Committee agreed to report the following to the House:
>
> Your Committee recommends that the government consider the advisability of introducing legislation to provide for full pensions to all Hong Kong veterans forced out of the labour market.

A copy of the relevant Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence (Issue No. 2) is tabled.

The whole case is right there in that report, Madam Speaker. We welcome the fact that there is a 50 per cent floor, but we feel that for those Hong Kong survivors who are out of the labour market, whether because they cannot find employment or because their health does not make it possible for them to work, this suggestion is one this House would like to see implemented. We are really talking about only 460 survivors of that Hong Kong expedition.

I know that no one in this House is more sympathetic toward those survivors or feels more deeply about them than the honourable and gallant Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). If he is having trouble with his Cabinet colleagues some of us are ready to back him up. We do hope he will soon be able to bring in the legislation that the standing committee recommended. I would remind him that he was there when that recommendation was made and he seemed to be in complete sympathy with it. I hope he has good news tonight.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): As indicated by my colleague opposite, there was legislation passed to assist the Hong Kong veterans and other Canadians who were prisoners of the Japanese. Anyone who was a prisoner received 50 per cent pension. This was very beneficial at the time of passage and continues to be so. The widows of Hong Kong veterans continue to receive the pension.

If I recall the motion by the committee on veterans affairs, and I have not got it before me, it was that all those who were prisoners of the Japanese during the war and not employable or not able to obtain employment should have their pensions increased to 100 per cent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is correct.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I would submit, as I have done previously, a day or two ago, that this whole matter requires a considerable amount of work and detail. The pension commission of my department, in conjunction with others, is presently studying this matter and I hope to be able to come forward with a report on it before too long.

MULTICULTURALISM—ALLEGED CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE TO MINORITY GROUPS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I want to make a few comments about the subject of multiculturalism. I think it is fair to say that since at least the turn of the century minority groups in this country have contributed greatly to the progress and development of the country. It is also fair to say that there has been a great deal of progress made in terms of these minority groups being accepted socially, economically and otherwise by Canada's majority groups.

● (2210)

When the multiculturalism policy was announced a couple of years ago it appeared at the time that the government of the day was taking cognizance of the fact that Canada's minority groups had a real and genuine desire to maintain their own particular individual identities, the reason being that any individual or individual group if they were to compete successfully in society and make the maximum contribution to that society must feel confident and proud of their own identity.

We can look back even to debates in this chamber at the turn of the century and find examples where blatant outright prejudice was expressed against minority groups coming into the country at that time. As I said before, I think the situation within this country certainly has improved as these groups have been more identified as part of the Canadian entity, and as they have proven themselves to be as productive, as useful, as intelligent and so on as anyone else in Canadian society.

The policy of the past two years stirred a genuine hope and feeling among Canada's minority groups that finally their status had been elevated from third class to second class citizens, and that it will be elevated in due course even to that of first class citizens.

It is interesting to note that following the 1972 election, when the Liberals came back with a narrow margin and were groping for support in the hope that they might get back with a majority, they were very interested in multiculturalism and appointed a full-time minister, although he was not given any authority. He was sort of like the fellow who operates the gas pump at the gas station while the real manager is inside, in this case the Secretary of State.

At that time we had a full-time minister who was dedicated to the concept of multiculturalism and thought it was a good thing for the country. He probably tried to do a sincere job. He thought he could promote the concept and make it more acceptable to society at large. I think it is fair to say that, having appointed this man, the government of the day did improve its position with regard to its relationship in political terms with minority groups, in that some of these people decided to support the government in the 1974 election for that reason.

It is difficult for me to understand why, when a majority government was returned, suddenly these people were no longer important. It seemed that suddenly they were not needed any more because a majority government was returned. We were back in the old arrogant days of the twenty-eight parliament.

I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question in the House, and he said he did not think the situation was upsetting anybody or that it meant a downgrading. The Prime Minister suggested that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is so intelligent and competent that in 5 per cent of his time he could do more for multiculturalism than the hon. member for Parkdale was able to do on a full-time basis. I find that argument difficult to buy.

I have received responses to a question I asked of ten major ethnic groups in the country. I asked what they thought about the appointment of a part-time rather than full-time minister, and whether they thought this would increase the status of multiculturalism. One group said that it was confusing, that they felt labour was far removed from multiculturalism and they wondered what would happen. Another group was disappointed and did not think the government was taking multiculturalism seriously. Another group said they were confused and angered. They were involved in certain programs but now doubted whether multiculturalism was going to continue.

Still another group indicated that they wanted a full time minister with a full time department. The fourth group said they felt they had been deceived because promises had been made and broken. Another group was afraid that grants would be slowed down. There was one group that had no position. Another felt that multiculturalism was being phased out, whilst yet another felt it was being denigrated.

I think this is pretty good evidence of what the groups feel about this matter of firing the former minister and tagging the job on to another minister who has a full time department, and who is also responsible for women. I am not sure what he does in that role, but that is his responsibility.

We have a situation where one-third of Canadians feel they are being suppressed, their status threatened, and that they are being downgraded from nearly equal to another category of subjugated Canadians who are not supposed to be proud of their identity.

If one looks at the report tabled by the Consultative Council on Multiculturalism it will be found that it expresses in a straightforward manner what the minority groups of the country expect from their government. On other occasions I asked the minister whether he would consider implementing any part of that report, but he simply said he was studying it and was waiting for yet another report. This type of answer does nothing to allay the fears of Canada's minority groups that they and their languages are being suppressed, and that the government is not taking action to retain their culture.

I see the parliamentary secretary is sitting on the edge of his seat so I will conclude and listen to what he can tell us about these serious problems.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I concur with the observations of the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) about the sometimes sad record of minorities in Canada in the past, and about the importance of assuring that their future is brighter. Of course we must observe that the discrimination to which they have been subjected has not usually been discrimination in law—certainly not laws made by this parliament, but rather discrimination in fact. Naturally the law has to take cognizance of this and do its best to try to raise to the status of first class citizens all who belong to minority groups.

I wish I could say that I agree with rest of the statements of the hon. member for Athabasca. I find it unfortunate that he has thought it necessary to indulge in political posturing tonight. He knows better than to say that people in minority groups are no longer important to the government merely because there has been a change in ministers. That is nonsense. In fact, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is not only one of the senior ministers in the cabinet but is one who is assisted by a parliamentary secretary. However, he is no longer responsible for the status of women as that responsibility has been transferred to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde).

Under the aegis of the present minister the Canadian Advisory Council on Multiculturalism has been extremely active. In the last several months regional meetings have been held across the country, and the annual meeting will be held in Ottawa on December 13 and 14.

Contrary to evading the questions of the hon. member with respect to the first report of that council, the minister has pointed out that the report has to be confirmed by this forthcoming meeting, after which it will be presented to the government. In addition, the Ethnic Studies Advisory Committee has also been extremely active under the minister's direction.

I would conclude, Madam Speaker, with a short quote from a speech the minister gave in Winnipeg to the Canadian Ukrainian Committee Congress on October 12.

● (2220)

. . . concern has been shown over the most recent Cabinet restructuring. Let conjecture stop right here. Multiculturalism is a permanent government policy. The programme requires further attention and development. I am committed and determined to giving it both.

The federal government considers multiculturalism an integral part of Canadian society and therefore a cornerstone of real and lasting Canadian unity based on mutual respect and understanding. Our government naturally believes that multiculturalism can operate fully within the context of bilingualism and both are part and parcel of the reality of Canada.

Government policy in this area rests not on the convictions of the minister who happens to be responsible at the moment; it rests on the firm policy and conviction of the government itself. This has been amply demonstrated in the last several years and is being demonstrated at present.

IMMIGRATION—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING COUNSEL FOR PERSONS FACING SUMMARY DEPORTATION—REVIEW OF CASES BY MINISTER

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, on October 21 of this year, as a result of a case in which I had a particular interest, it having been referred to me by a former chief of police in the constituency I represent, I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) if he was prepared to take the initiative and permit individuals faced with deportation procedures time to obtain and properly instruct counsel.

The minister indicated in his reply that the whole matter of immigration procedures, policy and legislation has been under investigation since 1952, and that the government was going to do something about it. He also indicated that if I would give him specific instances of people who were treated unjustly by special inquiry officers he would ensure a thorough examination of these practices.

I am taking the minister at his word and using this opportunity to elaborate upon the case of which I spoke earlier, involving a man named Richard Eddy, an American citizen from Miami, Florida. I emphasize, in fairness, that since the date I asked the question, the minister has written to me. His letter, dated October 17, reads in part:

With regard to the future, Mr. Eddy is prohibited from visiting or working in Canada until such time as it is possible to seek relief from the prohibition against him. If, in the interim, there is good reason to admit him to Canada for short periods of time, I can authorize a minister's permit to facilitate this. My decision, of course, would be based on the circumstances prevailing at the specific time he would wish to come forward.

That is fair enough. Unfortunately it is a little late to do anything, as I first got in touch with the minister in a letter sent by hand on July 22, when the matter was pertinent.

I have received today, by coincidence, a letter from Mr. Eddy in which he gives me an up-to-date assessment of what has happened to him as a result of the delay in having this matter, which occurred on July 17, of this year, dealt with before now. His letter is lengthy. I shall quote briefly from the last part and indicate that I am willing to send it to the minister or to his parliamentary secretary, so that the entire document may be available to them. His letter says in part:

. . . My next statement should probably be better left unsaid, but I now, in my depressed state of mind, find that fairness is as difficult to obtain in Canada as it is here. Most people go to Canada to escape some of the hypocracies here, only to find myself chastised so intolerantly by that immigration executioner. I find myself again a victim to political misuse.

Perhaps the man is exaggerating, but the point involved here, Madam Speaker, is that despite my efforts to intercede for this man he has suffered irreparable damage because of the procedural delays involved. Had he had even a few days to instruct counsel adequately and prepare his defence, I am sure the minister could have made time available in which the man could post a bond or make such arrangements as would permit him to fulfil his contractual obligations.

It is probably too late to help this man now. To demonstrate what type of evidence was used against Mr. Eddy, that evidence forming the basis for his expulsion from this country, may I quote from the sworn statement of an American attorney who has been involved in the case. The circumstances set out by the attorney form the basis for Mr. Eddy's alleged unsuitability for remaining in Canada, even though he had come here for many years and posted a bond each time.

The sworn deposition I am about to refer to comes from Richard G. Taylor, of Miami, Florida, who writes as follows:

Pursuant to our conversation of this day, I am happy to give you a recapitulation in writing. Richard Eddy had occasion approximately 3 years ago to help provide entertainment in a raffle for a Chamber of Commerce men's meeting in Hollywood, Florida. This is a small municipality north of the city of Miami, Florida. Towards the latter part of the evening the Hollywood municipal police department, acting upon an alleged call of a person on the wanted list and being present, surrounded the place. The call turned out to be quite without merit. The police were a bit chagrined and thereafter and incidental to their unsubstantiated call, they arrested Richard Eddy and either one or two other girls for selling chances on prizes, originally, allegedly conducting a lottery and thereafter changed those charges to the principals of the Chamber of Commerce, and, due to the fact that the girls or girl had worn negligées they modified the charges to lewd and lascivious or pornographic of that type and nature.

Actually, the whole matter was totally out of proportion to reality and without any real merit. I disposed of the matters for Mr. Eddy on a nolo contendere basis paying some nominal fine which was much less trouble and easier and accomplished a disposition for everyone involved.

I am utterly amazed that your country should have heard of the matter inasmuch as this did not in any way involve a state or federal offense. Again, I repeat that the matter was truthfully an unwarranted resultant disposition in a small municipality in southeast Florida.

He goes on to say he knows Mr. Eddy and can vouch for him. I see I am just about out of time, Madam Speaker. I have never met this man. It is the principle that is involved that concerns me.

To make the matter even more ironic, Mr. Eddy had an assistant who was with him at all relevant times when he was in Canada, who underwent the same experience and was treated in the same way, and yet this assistant was not disturbed and was allowed to remain in Canada. I think this says something for the thoroughness and consistency of the procedures used by the particular immigration officers in question.

I have other names and incidents involving people who have been treated in a high-handed way by immigration officers, and I trust the minister will be as good as his word and investigate seriously the attitude and the actions of those people in his department who exercise what amounts to a judicial function, and that he will provide people who are affected some of the traditional judicial safeguards.

I am satisfied on the basis of what I know about this case, and I have gone into it in considerable detail, that at no time was Mr. Eddy given adequate time to instruct counsel properly. The consequences have been very serious. I am sure this is the case with many other people as well, which is why I raise the matter at this time.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to answer this question on behalf of my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Rompkey), who is absent on official business.

I was not aware that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) was going to concentrate on a particular case. Therefore I am not able to respond with any details of the particular case. However, I wish to place on record the kind of deportation proceedings and procedures at the point where an immigration officer considers that, for one reason or another, a person should not be allowed to come into, or remain in, Canada. At this point he prepares a report, as required by the Immigration Act, in which he outlines the statutory prohibitions relevant to the case in question.

The person is informed of the contents of the report, given an appointment to appear at an inquiry, and told that he may be represented by counsel should he so desire. Counsel may be a lawyer, clergyman, or in fact any person whom the applicant feels may be of use. The special inquiry officer who conducts the inquiry is an immigration officer whose responsibility it is to inquire into and bring out all relevant facts in the case before him.

Before the fact finding portion of the inquiry begins, if the applicant does not have counsel with him, he is again informed that it is his right to have counsel should he desire. If he is not represented and does not wish to be, the inquiry proceeds with only the applicant, the special inquiry officer and stenographer present, but if, as sometimes happens, during the proceedings the applicant has second thoughts and wishes counsel, the special inquiry officer will adjourn the inquiry to allow such arrangements to be made. If required, a competent interpreter is provided by the department and is of course present throughout the inquiry.

Before the special inquiry officer arrives at his conclusions, the applicant and/or his counsel are given every opportunity to question, probe, expand upon, and deny, every allegation, statement, document, etc. presented to the inquiry. In arriving at his decision, which is based on all the facts that have been presented at the inquiry, the special inquiry officer is bound by the parameters of the Immigration Act. In other words, only legal considerations, as opposed to humanitarian or compassionate ones, can be considered. If the decision is to admit the person, he is admitted immediately. If the decision is to deport, then deportation is carried out as quickly as possible, taking into account of course human considerations. Naturally, if the applicant has the right of appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board no action is taken until that right has been exercised.

I would like to add that from time to time allegations and complaints are received from persons who feel that they were unfairly or unjustly dealt with by a special inquiry officer. When such information is received a complete investigation is carried out, and invaluable in such an investigation is the complete and "certified correct" transcript of the proceedings. This allows the department to examine in detail everything that transpired.

● (2230)

In addition, I must repeat that if information comes to light during an inquiry which makes a person prohibited under the act, then the special inquiry officer has no alternative but to order deportation.

In conclusion, I would like to reassure hon. members that our special inquiry officers are experienced officers, knowledgeable in the law, who have a tremendous task to perform in the interests of this country and, although not infallible, generally speaking they do a very fine job.

PROPOSED TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE AND STUDIES RELATING TO ENVIRONMENTAL DAMAGE BY SYNCRUDE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to seek leave of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of a letter made public this morning in Alberta from the federal Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) to the Alberta government in which she states there is the likelihood of major environmental damage as a result of the Syncrude Tar Sands project, I move seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That the Minister of the Environment table in this House all relevant correspondence and environmental studies on the impact of the Syncrude project on the environment.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF LABOUR OF COMPLAINTS AGAINST UNION WHEN CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTION RETURNED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising from his statement that he had returned the contribution made by the SIU toward his campaign because, and I think I am quoting him, he was aware generally that the union was the subject of controversy. I should like to ask him whether by that phrase "the subject of controversy" he had in mind the charges of violence and intimidation—the complaints made to his predecessor in 1972 to which reference was made in the House yesterday, and other charges?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, it was not because of any reference to that matter. It was as the result of being involved in mediation efforts on the Great Lakes during the summer, although the SIU was not itself connected with that particular dispute. I became aware that there were internal disputes within the union—I had been aware of it for some time. There were law suits going on, contested elections and so on. I was aware that there was internal union strife of one kind and another in connection with the leadership.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister said yesterday that his officials had made him aware of complaints submitted to his predecessor in 1972 accompanied by affidavits. Is he now saying that he was definitely not aware of these complaints about intimidation and violence at the time he returned the contribution?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): No, I am not saying that. I am saying it was some time during the summer when I became aware that prior to my being minister there had been a complaint or complaints with respect to the SIU. I have checked this out since the hon. gentleman's question yesterday and apparently it was one complaint backed up by several affidavits. Someone alleged he had been beaten. That is the matter to which I referred when I said the officials had recommended that, first, the complaint be taken to the police, and, second, to the watchdog committee of the CLC. There was one complaint, action had been taken some time ago, nothing further came of it and I thought the action taken by the officials in my department was appropriate. So that matter was not prominent in my mind at the time. I cannot tell the Leader of the Opposition the precise moment at which this information was conveyed to me but it was some time during the summer or the fall.

Mr. Stanfield: I gather the minister is saying that his officials had informed him of this prior to the decision being taken to return the cheque.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Might I clarify the matter? I thought this had happened a long time ago; appropriate action had been taken, so it did not appear to me there was anything improper about the SIU. The reason I came to the decision I did was that I felt the union was involved in controversy and if someone wished to do so he might say, at a later stage, that I was compromised by reason of the acceptance of a contribution, even though such a charge would not be valid. So I returned it. Obviously, from that point of view I might as well not have done so because people are still trying to attribute improper motives to me.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—POSSIBLE WARNING TO PRIME MINISTER, CABINET MINISTERS NOT ACCEPT CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS FROM UNION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, granted that the minister felt that the action taken regarding the complaint in 1972 was appropriate at the time, but did it not occur to the minister that his department might have to deal with this matter of alleged violence and intimidation in the SIU, and that consequently this would involve a potential conflict of interest, with the possibility of the government having to deal with it? In view of the minister's knowledge of this complaint and, presumably, his awareness that the government might have to deal with it eventually, did the minister inform the Prime Minister of his decision and his position, with a view to warning other cabinet colleagues that it might be important for the government to have to deal with this whole question at arm's length, so that they would be warned against accepting contributions from the SIU in the event that the matter did develop further?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the Leader of the Official Opposition yesterday, no, I did not take it up with the Prime Minister. The position I have always taken is that I have assumed, and I think correctly, that members of parliament on both sides of the House at election time do receive contributions, and that this does not constitute a conflict of interest. The contributions come from various sources. I am sure that the Leader of the Official Opposition's own party receives contributions from corporations and goodness knows who else during the course of an election which may involve positions on policy that are going to be taken later. I have yet to hear any member of the House suggest to the Leader of the Official Opposition or to the Conservative party that the positions they take on policy matters once the election is over are in any way affected by the contributions they have received. We give them sufficient credit, which they are not apparently prepared to give me, for basic integrity in this regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, without the minister thinking that I am attacking his integrity, I should like to ask him whether he considers it appropriate for a Minister of Labour to accept a contribution from a union about which complaints have been made in the department, as the minister knows, concerning violence and intimidation. Does the minister feel it is wrong for me to question him as to whether he did not feel that there was a potential conflict of interest there, and as to whether, in view of that, he did not take the matter to the Prime Minister so as to warn other colleagues who might find themselves in an embarrassing position?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, at that time there were no outstanding complaints against this particular union. There had been one in a previous administration which had been dealt with, I think in a proper fashion. I am not going to be one of those who condemns a union, a corporation or an individual or in any way impugns them on the basis of no evidence. If during the course of an election I am going to accept contributions from companies and unions, I will do so in the same way as everybody else does so, namely on the assumption that they are valid and legal corporations or individuals. If it turns out differently later on, then I will take the appropriate action against them, just as anybody else would, and just, I trust, as the Leader of the Official Opposition would.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—EVIDENCE NEEDED TO ESTABLISH NECESSITY FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of five charges having been laid to date by the police against SIU members for offences ranging from the dangerous use of firearms to assault occasioning bodily harm, all charges having arisen from waterfront violence, and in view of further allegations of violence and intimidation within the union, will the Acting Prime Minister indicate what further evidence he feels is necessary before an independent inquiry can be commissioned to look into these matters, bearing in mind that we are dealing with a federally chartered union that has a similar record of violence as set out more fully in the Norris Commission Report of some 10 years ago?

● (1120)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the evidence we have received so far does not seem to us to justify an inquiry of this kind.

An hon. Member: Let us see it.

Mr. Sharp: This is one of the reasons my colleague, the Minister of Justice, has been in touch with the authorities in Ontario who would have the evidence of violence and the kind of information to which the hon. member has alluded. So far we have not received evidence of the kind that would justify us launching such an inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before permitting the hon. member to ask a final supplementary question on the subject, and I might say that I do not want to interfere with his right to pose questions, I should indicate that the question has been taken in this sense: Has the government or the Acting Prime Minister sufficient evidence now to warrant an inquiry? That would be a proper question, and it was that kind of question to which the answer was given. However, a question which went on to ask what further evidence or what specific evidence would be required in the future to constitute that kind of an inquiry would be hypothetical to begin with, if not the subject of some other disability. However, I will permit the hon. member a supplementary.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

KNOWLEDGE OF FORCE OF INVESTIGATION BY ONTARIO PROVINCIAL POLICE INTO ACTIVITIES OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I will direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Come on in Warren.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, with the presence of the Solicitor General now perhaps I can direct my question to him. In view of the minister's statement that he knew of "no suggestion of wrongdoing by SIU officials in recent years", and in view of the fact that SIU activities have been under investigation by the Ontario Provincial Police since April, will the minister indicate whether he was in fact aware that the OPP was investigating SIU activities since April and, in particular, will he indicate why the RCMP chose not to gain any knowledge concerning the OPP investigation until last Wednesday?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had no knowledge of an OPP or any other investigation until the request was made to me by the Minister of Labour to investigate the allegations of Mr. Shulman. In respect of the question of why the RCMP chose not to investigate, again I think that is a serious accusation. The RCMP investigate if they see evidence of something wrong taking place, or if somebody requests that they investigate. There is no evidence that the RCMP chose to ignore certain wrongdoing, and not to investigate.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the issues surrounding the SIU in respect of its activities on the waterfront and its involvement in the controversies that have been discussed this week are not being resolved by ex parte statements by Cabinet ministers, and in view of the right of the public and of this parliament to an independent examination of the whole matter, will the Acting Prime Minister get in touch with the Prime Minister and recommend the early establishment of a public inquiry under either the Canada Labour Code or the Inquiries Act?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of what has been discussed in this House of Commons I see no reason to make such a recommendation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that nothing has been made known to us as a result of the government's own investigations, do we not have the right to a public inquiry?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, a public inquiry is a very serious matter—

An hon. Member: That's right.

Mr. Sharp: —and could not be undertaken on the basis of wiretaps or the statements of a member of the Ontario Legislature. If there are charges to be made there are plenty of people on the other side of the House who can lay those charges and can investigate before they pass on gossip and the kind of half truths that have been—

An hon. Member: There is something you are trying to hide, Mitch.

Mr. Sharp: —put forward here without anyone taking any responsibility whatever. All that has happened in this House in the last two days has been the repetition of what Mr. Morton Shulman said.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a final supplementary.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the acting Prime Minister not realize that he has just confirmed my statement that all we are getting from Cabinet ministers are ex parte statements?

Mr. Sharp: It certainly confirms that we are not getting any information from the other side of the House upon which we could take action. All that is happening here is repetition of Morton Shulman's statements, most of which have been proved to be false.

MIRABEL—TREATMENT OF EXPROPRIATED PARTIES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

In view of the fact that since 9 p.m. last night, over 500 persons have been occupying the offices of the CAIM at Sainte-Scholastique to protest against the policy of the federal government, can the minister tell us whether he intends to visit those people with a view to finding a solution to the problem?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in the case of Mirabel, we are in the process of rounding up a conciliation committee. I, in no way, want to resort to acts of intimidation against the government.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—MATTERS BEING INVESTIGATED BY RCMP AND ACTION TO BE TAKEN FOLLOWING REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Would the Solicitor General advise the House whether the investigation by the RCMP is an investigation into strict matters of illegality or whether there is also consideration being given in their inquiry to questions of propriety or conduct of ministers.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Well, Mr. Speaker, their investigation is into the impropriety of ministers as it would relate to charges of a criminal nature relating to corruption, bribery or anything of that nature. They would not be investigating something that would not be illegal. In their investigation I presume there will be charges, counter-charges and statements by different witnesses, and then they will have to decide whether there is enough evidence to lay charges under the Criminal Code or any other statute.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Just so that we might understand this completely, then it is the situation that any judgment as to a question of propriety by a minister is at this stage, according to the minister's testimony, to be left exclusively to the determination of the RCMP. Is that the understanding?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the RCMP may check their evidence with the Crown prosecutor or other prosecutor who would lay charges in the case, although they could also lay charges directly if it were very clear that charges should be laid, but this judgment would be with them and the prosecutors and not with me.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): They will deal simply with matters which might lead to criminal charges and it is only on a question which might lead to criminal charges that they would make the recommendation. This is my question. Is it only on matters relating to criminal charges that they would make a recommendation to the minister or that they would cause action to be taken in the courts? If that is so, what provision is there in the extremely limited investigation under way now for evidence to be brought forward that would allow this parliament and the country to come to conclusions as to whether or not there had been acts of impropriety on the part of ministers which did not involve a strict violation of the law?

● (1130)

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is true that the police are investigating matters that would give rise to charges before the courts. If no charges are made before the courts, then it will be up to parliament to proceed in another way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Show us the testimony.

[Mr. Drury.]

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST BY PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES FOR FEDERAL INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Given the fact that the government are appearing to fob this off on the provincial authorities and forces of law, and having in mind that it now appears on record, at least the public statements I have heard made over the radio, that the provincial attorney general and other provincial authorities suggest that there should be a federal inquiry, will the government not accept that as being an adequate reason for holding this judicial inquiry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion about the two types of inquiries and I think it is important that they should be distinguished. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain has been talking about possible improprieties of officials or ministers. I gather that the House leader of the Progressive Conservative party is talking about an inquiry into the allegations of violence on the waterfront. In that particular case—because that is what I understand to be his question—we are awaiting information from the Ontario government about the facts—what is the evidence of violence—and if there is sufficient evidence I think there would be a case for an inquiry. But we are awaiting the facts. We do not have them and we have seen nothing as yet that would justify such a serious investigation as is proposed either under the Inquiries Act or under other legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: On the basis of that statement, given the fact that the provincial law enforcement officers will have knowledge of these allegations, will the government accept the request of the provincial authorities, in the face of the knowledge they have, as being an adequate reason for instituting a public inquiry?

Mr. Sharp: My colleague, the Minister of Justice, has put just such inquiries to the Ontario government. As yet they have not provided the evidence.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST THE SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—LACK OF INDEPENDENCE OF SOLICITOR GENERAL AS JUSTIFICATION FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): My supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister. Putting aside for the moment the evidence which he has or does not have which may prompt an independent inquiry, may I suggest that in view of the fact that the Solicitor General yesterday or the day before has characterized a particular member of the Ontario legislature as one who has no respect for the truth, a liar or muckraker, whatever his words were, and in view of the fact that the RCMP expressly by statute are responsible for this inquiry, is it not the government's position that the lack of independence of the Solicitor General, who is directly responsible for the RCMP, is sufficient in itself to warrant an inquiry that is independent of the Solicitor General?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member just now accused me of not being independent and he has made other insinuations against me. I ask him, as did the Minister of Labour yesterday, if he has charges against me, to lay them before the House and we will go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is all bluster.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No guts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Perth-Wilmot has a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Jarvis: I rise on the question of privilege raised by the Solicitor General. I made absolutely no insinuations yesterday or today. I simply said, in a question to the Acting Prime Minister, that the Solicitor General had called Mr. Shulman a muckraker, someone who has no respect for the truth. I also prefaced my question yesterday by saying if the Solicitor General had been quoted accurately. My whole purpose in putting my question was not to make insinuations about the Solicitor General but to simply say he cannot remain independent when the RCMP by statute is directly responsible to the minister and the minister, rightly or wrongly, is the subject matter of part of this interim report. How can any reasonable person expect the Solicitor General to be independent in judging a report the very nature of which is to be independent? For the Solicitor General's own sake, would it not be far better that this investigation be conducted independently of him?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this question was addressed to me, although it got a little mixed up in the process. I have confidence in the Solicitor General, in his independence, and I do not think the fact that he has characterized certain statements made by Mr. Shulman as being lies does in any way interfere with his independence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Spurious argument.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The worst one you put up yet.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In light of the fact that the Solicitor General and the Minister of Labour asked for an investigation, and in light of the fact that the Prime Minister said they will weigh the evidence, they will decide, in light of the fact that they are the interested parties, there is a conflict of interest if they are to weigh their own evidence and act as judge and jury. I hope the minister will answer me. Does the Acting Prime Minister not see in that situation an inherent danger in not appointing an independent judicial body under the Inquiries Act, as was suggested this morning, so as to clear the air for the government, if nothing more?

Mr. Sharp: It seems to me that we are still getting confused about the inquiries that are being proposed. Two types of inquiries have been proposed: one by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, another by the House leader of the Conservative party. So far as the investigation of the charges by Mr. Shulman are concerned, involving the possibility of impropriety on the part of ministers or public servants, that has been turned over to one of the most independent bodies in this country, which is the RCMP.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree with the Acting Prime Minister that the RCMP are respectable and independent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: But we have continually heard from the Acting Prime Minister, the Solicitor General, the Minister of Labour and any other minister who is involved in making decisions that there is no evidence now. They are weighing their own evidence resulting from their own investigation. Does the Acting Prime Minister not see some inherent danger in allowing them to weigh their own evidence and coming to a decision as would a judge and jury investigating themselves. Would he not relieve them of this responsibility and clear the situation? Surely, he can see that it is time to have an independent inquiry, as suggested by several responsible members this morning.

Mr. Sharp: The answer is in the negative. If there are any charges of impropriety against a minister, it is the House that should decide. I suggest to members opposite, if they have evidence of this kind, surely they should not depend on a member of the NDP in the Ontario legislature to prove the basis of their charges. Let them make them, and this House can have a full and complete inquiry to satisfy everyone.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REASON FOR SHOWING MINISTER OF LABOUR INTERIM REPORT FROM RCMP—STATEMENTS IN TORONTO "SUN"

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Wednesday in the House he said that if the investigation had been into the Minister of Labour he would not have received the report. In light of the fact that RCMP sources were reported in yesterday's Toronto Sun to have said that the Minister of Labour was actively under investigation and in light of the fact that the Sun reported that Gordon McCaffrey, executive assistant to the Minister of Labour, confirmed that fact, can the minister explain why the Minister of Labour was allowed to see the report when he had said earlier that had the Minister of Labour been investigated he would not have seen the report?

● (1140)

Mr. Allmand: As soon as—

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I answer the question about the Toronto Sun article. I would not pretend for a moment that I would personally accept anything necessarily as authentic merely because it appears in the Toronto Sun, but I would say this: It should be clear to this House that I asked, when these allegations were made by Mr. Shulman, for the Solicitor General to have the RCMP investigate those allegations. Mr. Shulman made allegations against various officials. I am not aboslutely certain at this time whether he mentioned labour officials or not. As I felt that that is what he might be implying, I wanted the names of the officials cleared, irrespective of whether they were public servants or politicians; and the Solicitor General did that. If that is to imply that I am under investigation, O.K. I want that clearly understood. But, if the hon. member is suggesting something else, I should like him to have the courage to stand up in the House and say so.

Mr. Speaker: We had arrived at the point at which the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo had put a question to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, on a further question of privilege—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I was asked a question about an article in the Sun. As soon as that article was brought to my attention—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is another question of privilege before the House, on which the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo wishes to make a contribution.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour was questioning the accuracy of the Sun's article as to whether he was under investigation. Since the report referred to quoted the minister's executive assistant, Gordon McCaffrey, as saying that the minister was under investigation, and as my only source of information on this is that which is available to him as well, perhaps the executive assistant took the Toronto Sun down the garden path on this.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Solicitor General can resume his answer.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as soon as the article in the Toronto Sun was brought to my attention yesterday, I called the deputy commissioner of the RCMP who is in charge of criminal investigation and asked him which RCMP officials had said that the Minister of Labour was under investigation and, if this had happened, to give me information on that. The deputy commissioner telephoned the office in Toronto and checked with every source there. He was told that a reporter from the Toronto Sun had spoken with one officer of the RCMP, but the RCMP officer had never told him any such thing. He was surprised and did not know the Sun had ever printed such an article as a result of their conversation.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question, to get this clear once and for all. Will the Solicitor General state categorically that at no time has the Minister of Labour been investigated about this matter by the RCMP.

Mr. Allmand: No, Mr. Speaker. The RCMP were asked to investigate allegations made by Mr. Shulman. While investigating those allegations by Mr. Shulman, they were given a tape on which there is a conversation between the Minister of Labour and the union official offering a contribution toward election expenses. That is about it. If that is construed as an investigation into the Minister of Labour, that is a real distortion of the meaning of investigation.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED ENVIRONMENTAL DAMAGE BY SYNCRUDE PROJECT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the conclusion of the Minister of the Environment in a letter dated October 11, 1974 and released today, in Edmonton, that the Syncrude tar sands project as now planned will very likely cause major environmental damage, what action does the government plan to ensure that the development plans of Syncrude will conform to environmental standards.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will refer that question to the minister, who will reply when she returns.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST OF LEADER OF ONTARIO LIBERAL PARTY FOR ROYAL COMMISSION INVESTIGATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the Acting Prime Minister seems to ignore all the requests of uninformed Tories on my side of the House, perhaps he might consider what the Leader of the Opposition in the Ontario provincial legislature, the leader of the provincial Liberal party, said yesterday. He said "The allegations are extremely serious, and in my opinion these can only be cleared up by a royal commission. In my opinion this should be at the federal level." Will the Acting Prime Minister take this representation into consideration and ask for an inquiry?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so that the record remains clear, let me say that the kind of inquiry which Mr. Nixon was supporting was an inquiry into violence on the waterfront. We have not said that we will not have such an inquiry. What we have said is that we will not have an inquiry except on the basis of facts which will justify such a serious action. That remains our position. We have not yet received the evidence.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONTRIBUTIONS TO ELECTION EXPENSES OF MINISTERS FROM COMPANIES WHOSE OPERATIONS ARE WITHIN THEIR RESPONSIBILITIES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Having sat here for two or three days and listened to what has been going on, it has become abundantly clear to me that the political morality of this government is about as deep as a dishpan full of dirty water. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Labour in this House and the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare broadcast by the CBC today, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the government has any policy with respect to cabinet ministers receiving political donations during campaigns? I mean, for example, situations in which the Minister of National Health and Welfare would receive a donation from pharmaceutical companies, or the Minister of Supply and Services would receive contributions from suppliers under contract to the federal government.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the morality required of cabinet ministers is any greater than the morality required of members of this House as a whole. I think we all share the same responsibilities. We must act with integrity and refuse to be bought and never be under the influence of money or anything else. I attribute no such motives to my hon. friend. I hope he does not attribute them to any of the rest of us.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the minister's perception of political morality and his view on political science, which is that the duties and responsibilities of a minister of the Crown are the same as those of an ordinary member of the House of Commons. Would the minister answer my question? Does the cabinet have any policy on the receipt of political contributions by ministers of the Crown who have taken oaths of office to administer departments of the Crown during an election campaign.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the same standards apply to all members of parliament, as well as to candidates for this House as apply to us. After all, the hon. gentleman seemed to assume, in the last election campaign, that we would continue to be the government.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point is simple, I hope not too simple for the narrow confines of the gray matter of the Acting Prime Minister. Under the constitution of this country, as the Acting Prime Minister knows, the government continues and ministers of the Crown continue in their offices even when the House of Commons is dissolved, until a new government is sworn in. If the Acting Prime Minister does not know that elementary fact of political science, it is no wonder that we see this most improvident government, which has been established since the last election campaign.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify something right away, as a result of information I have received. I believe that the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo referred to certain remarks which appeared in the Toronto Sun, which referred to Gordon McCaffrey. I should like to clear this up immediately. Mr. McCaffrey is not my executive assistant. He is my special assistant. To be precise about what he said to the Sun, he copied down his statement. This is a direct quote: "I said to the Sun, the minister asked for an investigation into the allegations by Morton Shulman, but the minister is not in a position to tell the RCMP whom they should investigate."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—ASSURANCE DECISION ON HOLDING INDEPENDENT INQUIRY NOT BIASED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister and relates to the subject matter raised by the hon. member for Calgary North. As there is some question of impropriety involved in the investigation which the RCMP is carrying out, and as it appears that the only people who will decide whether there is evidence of impropriety to warrant a public inquiry will be the ministers themselves, will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House what steps he intends to take to convince Canadians, or at least make it appear, that an impartial decision, without bias, will be made on the basis of evidence presented by the RCMP on whether or not an inquiry should be held.

● (1150)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With all due respect, several times that very same question or one slightly different has been put. It seems it has been answered every time it has been put. There is a rule which states that the same question cannot be put more than once in the same question period.

ALLEGED ANNOUNCEMENT ALBERTA WILL REDUCE REVENUES FROM OIL—CONSULTATION WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I hope it will be an interlude in these particular deliberations. It arises out of an announcement made yesterday by the premier of Alberta in which he indicated that within two weeks measures will be announced whereby the provincial take from oil revenues will be reduced. Prior to making that announcement, did the premier of Alberta consult with the federal government?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, not with me.

Mr. Blais: A supplementary question. In view of that particular announcement, will the federal government now consider that the moment is right for the federal government to take initiatives to try to pour some oil over the troubled waters between the federal government and that province?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly use the occasion of the meeting on Monday and Tuesday among provincial treasurers, provincial ministers of finance and myself to explore that. Perhaps the occasion will arise in private conversations with the Alberta minister.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—POSSIBLE CONDITIONS ATTACHED TO OFFER OF CAMPAIGN FUNDS BY UNION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. During the course of his conversation with Mr. Gralewicz, were any conditions attached to the offer for campaign funds?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Korchinski: Will the minister indicate the nature of his reply at that time? Can he comment on his reply at that time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am trying to elicit certain facts. My question is within the ambit of questions that are allowed. I am trying to elicit information from the minister which I believe is fundamental to the argument that has been presented here in the past few days. I simply wish to ask the minister the nature of his comment after the contribution offer was made by Mr. Gralewicz.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may want to reply. The hon. member asked if there were any conditions attached to the offer. The minister said no. The minister earlier indicated he had accepted the offer. The question was put, what was the nature of the minister's reply, can he comment on that? Asking a minister to comment on a situation like this is a very general type of question which does not seem to be suited to the question period.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, can I change my question and ask the minister to indicate what the reply was without making any comment.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I accepted the offer, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—ACTION OF SOLICITOR GENERAL IN ASCERTAINING FROM RCMP WHO SAID MINISTER OF LABOUR UNDER INVESTIGATION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. It arises out of the comment in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo. On several occasions the Solicitor General has insisted that the RCMP will be conducting an independent investigation. In reply to the hon. member's question, the Solicitor General stated that when he learned of the report in the Toronto Sun in connection with comments made by the special assistant to the Minister of Labour, he telephoned the RCMP to find out the name of the officer who had made those statements. Clearly, that is not an independent investigation. Will the Solicitor General now turn this investigation over to another minister?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it was not the statement of the special assistant that caught my attention. It was a statement in the Toronto Sun that a senior officer of the RCMP—

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): But you interfered.

Mr. Allmand: I did not interfere. Listen to the answer for a change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: There was a statement in the Toronto Sun to the effect that a senior officer of the RCMP said that the Minister of Labour was under investigation. I found that a matter on which I should advise myself in case questions were asked in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: I did not direct the investigation. There is quite a difference between directing an investigation and asking the RCMP what they are doing for the purpose of giving answers in this House. If you do not know the difference, you are not very intelligent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: In answer to the inquiry, the deputy commissioner in charge of criminal operations said he was surprised. He knew of no senior officer who said that the Minister of Labour was under investigation. He telephoned Toronto. He found that in Toronto there was an officer who had been interviewed by the Toronto Sun. The officer said he had told the interviewer no such thing as was printed in the Toronto Sun. I in no way interfered with the investigation. The RCMP are free to carry it out. However, from time to time I ask them questions in order to give answers in this House.

Mr. Andre: In his reply to the House, the Solicitor General indicated he had telephoned the deputy commissioner of the RCMP and asked for the name of the officer. Are officers of the RCMP to conclude that should interviews they might have with persons concerned with this investigation become public, they would be subject to personal attention and investigation by the Solicitor General?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I said I asked for the name of the officer in Toronto.

An hon. Member: Yes, you did.

Mr. Allmand: We will look at the blues and see what I said. If I did say that under fire, I was wrong. However, I do not think I said it. What I said was I approached the deputy commissioner of criminal operations and asked whether such a statement had been made. He said he did not know but that he would check with Toronto. He said an officer there did speak to the press. I did not ask the name. By the way, even though I did not ask, he told me the name but I forget it now.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF FREEZE ON FREIGHT RATES AND BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I will switch topics and direct my question to the very knowledgeable Minister of Transport. In view of the fact the freeze on freight rates and the moratorium on rail line abandonment will cease at the end of this year, is consideration being given to continuing that freeze and not going ahead with abandoning rail lines on the prairies?

● (1200)

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): First, I must confess I am insulted to be one of the very few members, if not the only member, in the House who did not receive contributions from the labour unions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I made an announcement on the freeze. It was an announcement following a cabinet meeting. This, I think, is going to end at the end of December. I do not think this will have the impact which is suggested. As far as branch lines are concerned, we thought we could reach a decision this week but it will take another week before we can make a statement.

Mr. Nystrom: I might say the minister probably did not receive any contributions from unions because he deserted them years ago.

In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman has often criticized the railroads in this country for controlling too much of the economy, why is he not extending the freeze on freight rates when the freeze should clearly be extended having regard to the lack of a transportation policy?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know whether the hon. member was here when this question was asked last week. The freeze covers only 22 per cent of the income of the railways. It does not cover, say, the transportation of coal or grain or a great many other products carried at agreed rates. It covers only certain categories of merchandise which do not affect the west at all. The impact on the cost of living will not be great. As I have said before, we intend to continue the review we began with western ministers hoping we can arrive at a better policy in the future. If ever we introduce some kind of freeze it will be more comprehensive and will have a better impact on the economy.

TRADE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EXPORT OF ENRICHED URANIUM—SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF COST OF RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS IN NEXT TEN YEARS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: In view of the fact that the export of uranium comes within federal responsibility and in view of the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on September 5 of this year that the government's first priority must be to ensure a long term reserve of nuclear fuel for our domestic needs, can the minister tell us what is the position of the federal government in the on-going discussions for the establishment of an enriched uranium project in the James Bay area for export purposes, a project which would utilize 18,000 tons of uranium oxide annually although Canada's production is presently only 5,000 tons and is estimated by the minister to reach only 16,000 tons by 1980?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The government has taken no decision to issue export permits for enriched uranium.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): May I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister? Given that capital expenditures of at least $100 billion over the next ten years would be necessary to build all the major resource development projects under active consideration by private and government bodies at the present time, will the Acting Prime Minister undertake to make public the report of the task force on capital requirements recently completed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources so that the total economic impact of these massive expenditures proposed could be given adequate public scrutiny?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I find myself in general agreement with the hon. lady; it is desirable that the public should know the implications of the enormous developments which will have to take place. I am a little uncertain as to whether that particular report should be revealed; it may contain information of another character which it would not be in the public interest to disclose. However, I will certainly recommend to my colleagues that the kind of information for which she has asked should be made available publicly.

AIR CANADA

REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVAL OF CAPITAL BUDGET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the House why it is that the capital budget of Air Canada for the current year has not so far been approved by cabinet, and when does he expect it will be?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I hope it will be approved soon. It is a very pertinent question, no doubt about that. It is because we asked for some information from Air Canada that we did not receive. Now, I think we have convinced the chairman and directors of Air Canada that they will have to supply this information so that we may know where Air Canada is going in the next five years.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-40, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for a number of significant amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. The proposed changes would implement important dimensions of the government's policies to deal with the two major problems confronting most western economies—inflation and slower growth.

The bill before us provides for sales tax reductions amounting to an estimated $940 million in a full year. These reductions will provide an important stimulus to the housing and general construction industries as well as to the transportation sector of the economy. The effects of these measures, combined with other policies proposed in the budget, will directly benefit consumers through their impact in moderating prices and encouraging the creation of new jobs. In addition, the bill provides for important new taxes on high energy consuming vehicles as well as for moderate increases in the levies on liquor, wine and tobacco products. I will have more to say about these measures during the committee stage. At this time I would like to restrict my comments to the general substance of the bill.

The amendments related to adult clothing and footwear proposed in the measure before us will formalize sales tax reductions for these goods provided under the Financial Administration Act on July 16, 1974. These are important measures affecting over $5 billion in annual retail sales of clothing and footwear. They will save consumers over $300 million in taxes over a full year. In the May 6 budget it was emphasized that adult clothing and footwear accounted for a significant proportion of the budgets of most families and that the proposed action would significantly reduce the prices of these products.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been monitoring prices in this area since action was taken to remove the tax on July 16, 1974. The final report of the price-monitoring exercise will be tabled early in the New Year. However, preliminary indications suggest that the reductions are being passed on and have had a significant impact on moderating price increases in this important sector of the economy.

[Translation]

Dealing with the provisions of this bill concerning housing, the tax exemption on building materials and municipal water distribution systems as well as the reduction to 5 per cent of the federal sales tax on a wide variety of equipment and materials used in housing construction should act as an important incentive to housing construction and the building industry as a whole.

In that respect, some questions have been raised concerning the particular impact of government housing policies on housing costs. The government has put forward in the budget speech a number of policies directly relating to the housing industry. Such provisions include the $500 grant to those who purchase middle priced houses, the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan, the new provisions concerning capital cost allowances, the proposal to disallow charging carrying costs on land awaiting development against other income as well as the sales tax reductions that amount to over half a million dollars as provided in the present bill.

Although the financial incidence of those measures on housing costs cannot possibly be figured out, I am assured that those reductions will stimulate new investments and create forces on the competition market which will benefit home purchasers through a significant moderation of prices for housing. The building materials sales tax reduction for one should account for about $650 in savings on the cost of houses currently priced at about $40,000.

My colleague the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) will review the incidence of those measures on housing construction and report to the House in due course.

[English]

Turning to the proposals to remove federal sales tax from a comprehensive list of transportation equipment, the budget speech pointed out that cost pressures in the transportation industry were significantly undermining the vitality of that industry and that these cost pressures were being translated into price increases affecting virtually every other sector of the economy. The transportation measures proposed in this bill will affect approximately $1 billion in annual sales and will result in a reduction of an estimated $100 million in federal revenues over a full year. I am confident that the reductions will be reflected in increased investment in this industry as well as in a moderation of transportation costs.

Members will be aware of my intention, announced a few days ago on December 2, 1974, to request the government to provide relief for tax paid inventories of trucks and related transportation equipment. This action was necessary because of a combination of critical factors affecting the trucking industry and related transportation industries. Dealers were unable to sell tax-paid inventories because the sales tax already paid on larger trucks and other equipment often amounted to several thousands of dollars per unit. In addition, customers were refusing to accept shipment of many highly specialized custom built items which had been ordered but not delivered as of budget day. Many customers were prepared to wait for tax-free goods to become available or to transfer orders to dealers who already had tax-free inventories on hand.

It must be emphasized that the proposed action constitutes a marked departure from traditional practice. However, the combination and intensity of adverse circumstances affecting the transportation industry made immediate action necessary in order to avoid extreme hardship and a serious disruption of production and employment. Indeed, certain businesses risked the very health of themselves and the industry.

The bill also contains important amendments related to the air transportation tax. The bill proposes that the governor in council be given authority to impose a ceiling on the 5 per cent ad valorem tax. It is proposed that this ceiling will initially be set at $5. This will benefit all persons who travel long distances by air. In particular, this ceiling will assist persons living in the north and in other remote parts of Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), or I will have more to say about these changes during the committee stage of the bill.

The bill also contains measures to deter wasteful energy consumption by imposing special excise taxes on high energy consuming vehicles. These measures, first referred to in the May 6 budget, have been modified to increase the effectiveness of the tax by providing for significant rate increases. For cars weighing more than 4,500 pounds and station wagons weighing over 5,100 pounds, the rate will be $20 for the first 100 pounds over the limit, $25 on the next 100 pounds and $30 for each subsequent 100 pounds. For motorcycles with big engines, the rate will be 5 per cent. The rate for privately owned aircraft, boat motors larger than 20 horsepower, and boats designed to be propelled by these motors, will be 10 per cent. These new taxes will increase federal revenues by an estimated $30 million in a full year.

As mentioned earlier, the bill also contains proposals to increase moderately federal levies on liquor, wine and tobacco products. These measures were first proposed in the May 6 budget and at the time the budget was defeated I stated that it was the government's intention to reintroduce these measures if the government were returned. These amendments will generate an additional $130 million in federal revenues in a full year.

The bill also contains important new sales tax exemptions for a number of articles purchased by handicapped persons. In addition, the provisions in the Excise Tax Act which permit certified institutions to purchase all goods exempt from federal sales tax have been broadened to include purchases made by day-care centres, physiotherapy units and other institutions.

In conclusion, the budget emphasized that through the taxation system and in other ways the government was encouraging the private sector to maintain a healthy level of activity for the present, and to build new capacity to increase the supply of goods and services for the future. And all this by reducing the cost factors, of which sales tax is an important component. The measures proposed in this bill, in particular those related to the housing industry and the transportation industry, constitute important steps in this direction.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons I am very pleased that we are able to get to this bill today, contrary to the government's stated intention in the middle of the week to postpone the budget bills to some time in January or February. I think that the determination of certain points in the bill following this debate—and I hope that today we can see the completion of our study and passage of the bill—will settle a lot of unresolved questions for business in this country. There are a number of points that I should like to put to the minister generally on second reading; more specific questions will be put by my colleagues and, I suspect, by members on all sides of the House to the minister and his advisers on matters of detail that have still to be resolved.

Excise

There is one matter that has consistently disappointed me in connection with excise taxes and the Excise Act. The minister's predecessor, the now departed Mr. Benson, and also the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), who was formerly minister of national revenue and subsequently minister of consumer and corporate affairs, indicated that a study in depth would be made of all excise taxes. We had a study in depth of income tax by the Carter commission, which had a great number of things to say about sales taxes as well as the confusing situation arising out of federal and provincial jurisdictions and how the taxpayer was affected by such taxes. But ever since then there has been a deathly silence on the subject.

However, the problem of the impact of sales taxes, whether at the federal level or at the provincial level, still exists. To the person of low income they are certainly a heavy burden. Although taxes levied on an ad valorem basis strike at taxpayers evenly as to amount, as to impact this is not the case. In the province of Ontario a rebate is given income tax payers so that those of lower income are given some form of compensation for the impact of sales taxes both at the retail and federal level. This is part of the Ontario tax credits plan. This is one of the reasons that there is this form of compensation.

We have studied in the past tax credits for persons on lower income scales, rather than the elimination of taxable trusts, so as to compensate them for the impact of sales taxes. True enough, with the removal now of sales tax on clothing and footwear one can say that the impact of sales taxes on, say, senior citizens whose income is limited to pensions will be much lighter since they will not have to pay sales tax on those items, at least at the federal level.

I always felt this was one of the inequitable features of an excise tax. We are seeing these removed more and more. Excise taxes in this country have reached the level of 12 per cent and that is very high. There is a great difference between non-taxable items and taxable items in particular categories. I suppose the reduction to a 5 per cent tax on building materials will remove some of the difficulties that arose from the arbitrary nature of the classification of building materials because some were caught and others were not. With the 12 per cent on the one hand, and no tax on the other, it makes quite a difference. I would like the minister to tell us whether it is now the view of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue that they should continue the study into the effect of sales tax and the general reforms that are required. Up to this moment we have not seen any reform of sales taxes but we have seen the removal of some.

We are now coming into a new era of transportation tax which in itself will cause a lot of grief to a lot of people who heretofore have had nothing to do with the collection and remission of sales tax. The travel agencies and airlines that sell tickets are going to step into a buzz-saw of which they have had no prior knowledge. There will be some extreme difficulties in this area and I shall refer in some detail to air transportation taxation and the general principle, as will some of my colleagues. Let me emphasize at the outset that the main burden of my point is that we should have a study without delay on the impact of sales taxes. If one accepts the principle of justice in a progressive income tax system which is purportedly established on the basis of ability to pay, then in so far as excise taxes are concerned there is a total denial of justice because they are certainly not based on ability to pay.

One now has to pay excise tax generally, outside of footwear and clothing. Excise tax is certainly payable on the purchase of a chair, and whether that chair is bought by an old age pensioner or a person with an income of $40,000 or $50,000 a year matters little. Certainly, one must recognize that excise tax is not predicated upon ability to pay. Some will argue that people with more money will buy the more expensive goods, but that is not the point. I would like to see some form of social justice within the whole framework of excise tax because in this way we would require fewer relieving features and there would be fewer complications for persons on lower incomes. The minister did indicate that it might cost some $300 million to drop the sales tax on clothing and footwear.

Having looked at the latest information from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the 1973 Canada Year Book and the 1973-74 Analysis of National Financing from the Canadian Tax Foundation, I must confess that the only reliable information is in respect of the fiscal year 1970-71. I am afraid that is a little out of date for the purposes of the remarks I should like to make at this time. The budgetary statistics tabled during the budget speech by the minister lump together sales taxes and other taxes and it is impossible to sort out precise excise taxes or sales taxes as we know them. I would like the minister to indicate what the annual yield is and what it was for 1971-72, 1972-73 and 1973-74, although I can understand that we cannot get anything for this particular year and that in respect of 1973-74 there is a complication because of the export tax on oil.

My objective is to determine what the progressive yield has been from excise or sales taxes on goods and commodities as we have known those taxes over the years. We want to see the effect of inflation upon this type of tax. I know that this will require some intensive effort, but it is something we would like to know about in respect of the general theory of federal sales tax. If the minister cannot provide that information today, perhaps he can do so at a later time as we would certainly like to have it.

I am sure the country welcomed the minister's announcement of a reduction in the tax on building materials to 5 per cent with a headshake and a smile, not necessarily all of joy. I wonder why this reduction was limited to 6 per cent rather than applied to the entire amount. I do not think that was necessarily related to cost but, as I have said, at the moment I do not know what the sales tax on building materials has yielded. It may have been in the nature of $500 million or $600 million. With the inflated prices we have known in the past couple of years, the yield might have been that high. I know it has been fairly substantial. On the other hand, when we consider the swollen coffers that have resulted from inflation, there is no question that a total abatement of this tax could have been made. There would have been much greater benefit, if this reduction was designed as an anti-inflationary item, an anti-recessionary item or an item to encourage the construction of homes in the hope that there would be a reduction in price—perhaps to a limited degree—if the sales tax had been removed entirely, rather than reducing it to 5 per cent.

One of the greatest costs of the building materials merchant is the cost of administration involved in collecting the sales tax. If business generally could be relieved of the cost of tax collecting, whether it be the small country town lumber yard or the large discount operation on the outskirts of major cities in Canada, it would be of great benefit because this additional cost represents a large portion of the profit margin of the dealer in building materials. Of course, we must not forget that he will not take it out of his profits; it will go right to the consumer.

● (1230)

The consumer is always at the end of the line. The consumer pays every charge whether it be an increase in taxes, an increase in returns for government, an increase in unemployment insurance contributions or an increase in minimum wages. No matter what it is, John Citizen, the consumer at the end of the line, pays. I am amazed, at times, at some of the naivety that comes out of the mouths of certain people, or out of the pens of others, demanding that this or that be done or that this or that cost be saddled on to business, to the cost of commodities. It may be somewhat indefinite, but one thing that is not indefinite is the cost: it goes right on the back of the Canadian citizen generally, as a consumer.

Over the years this whole process has been one of the greatest exercises in self-delusion, in dissipation, unproductive labour and unproductive expenditure. This is part and parcel of the overgoverning that Canadians suffer not only at the federal level but at the provincial level because of the way some of the provinces behave. I cannot differentiate between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Like Edmonton.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are some parts there that I could criticize. I do not believe the government of my home province is necessarily a paragon of virtue in its administration. I must say it inherited an awful structure, and everything cannot be changed overnight. In any event, I would say that on general principle my remarks should be remembered. That is the reason I would like to have seen the total removal of the sales tax on building materials. Certainly it has been shown to be a regressive step ever since it was introduced or extended primarily in 1963. It was then at a level where about one-third of the building materials bore sales tax liability, but the real impact came in 1963.

Now I come to the air transportation tax. This was the subject of a budget some three or four years ago. I remember at that time I moved an amendment which would have changed the impact of the tax and would not have disturbed ways and means. I will always remain unrepentant, unforgiving and unchanged in my opinion concerning the correctness of my motion. A citation from Erskine May was quoted against me in the ruling, but one must never take as absolute gospel what is written in any book. In this particular case, a little research into the references in Erskine May showed that the editors of that book had erred and exactly the opposite had been the situation regarding two decisions taken by chairmen of committees in the British House of Commons during the time of World War I. This was the authority on which Mr. Speaker of the day based his decision that my motion was out of order. May I say, however, that I am satisfied it was in order.

At this time I do not intend to move for a change because, in effect, the minister has now come to the formula for which I was asking at that time although I must say the impost is slightly higher. Presumably he has been influenced by inflation and has almost doubled the impost I had in mind at the time of the previous presentation. There were two difficult points involved, but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has since cleared one up. I refer to the implication that the tax would apply to tickets sold at Canadian travel agencies for travel exclusively outside Canada. That point has been cleared up.

One point, however, has not been cleared up, and I would invite the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Transport to look at it under the regulatory powers. This tax is all-encompassing. It covers all carriage by air for reward. Under the previous proposal, air transportation below a minimum weight—in other words, what you would call the puddle-jumpers in the north, the two or four-seater aircraft in an area where people are completely dependent upon air transportation—was to be exempt. People in the frontier communities of the north who were most hard hit were being hit every time they wanted to move. It was proposed to exempt them from the effect of the air transportation tax.

Unless I am very wrong, the interpretation of the proposal at this time catches everybody: it would catch the person flying from Yellowknife to Fort Simpson, from Simpson to Norman Wells or anywhere down the Mackenzie, or anyone going to Frobisher or any of the northern communities. The reference is to all air carriers or commercial air services.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What about Ottawa to Carp?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My hon. friend asks, what about a little flight from Ottawa to Carp?

There would be a tax on that type of transport whether it involved a two-seater Cessna or an eight-seater plane that could use the Carp airport, unless exempted.

An hon. Member: Are you sure there is an airport there?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I should like the minister to tell us what justification he will offer to these people for the heavy impact on this tax. Then I will ask him whether it will apply in the case of aircraft operated by mining and oil companies, as well as others, for the transportation of their employees in the case of a subsidiary company organized for transportation purposes and where the actual charge for the transportation is fixed on the basis of the amortization of the unpaid balance and depreciation schedules in respect of the aircraft.

● (1240)

This is a very simple and regularly used procedure. But will there be a tax payable? There is no ticket issue, but the air carrier is authorized by the Canadian Transport Commission to operate as an air carrier or as a commercial air service. I suggest that the privately-owned subsidiary company of which I have spoken has been licensed and authorized as an air carrier and will therefore be caught by this transportation tax.

I notice, also, that the collection will be made at the retail level and there must be monthly remittances to the Crown as in the case of all other taxes. These will add substantially to the costs of operating travel agencies and others handling the tickets. Who will pay the tax collector? The consumer, of course. On the one hand the government is giving encouragement to transportation, and on the other it is giving it a kick in the teeth. We could use all sorts of metaphors. We remove the sales tax from commercial aircraft, but we also impose a tax to satisfy some of the demands of the Department of Transport.

This tax is to be used even at airports not operated by the Department of Transport, and here is the switch in the thinking of that department, because when this tax was proposed initially it was to alleviate the losses and costs of operating MOT-operated airports. I say "nonsense," Mr. Speaker. This tax will apply in many instances when an MOT airport is not used but, rather, municipal airports which get nothing from MOT. All that is happening is that the Minister of Transport, through the Minister of Finance, is asking residents flying in Canada to pay a tax because he is going to splice some air space on the way through.

The government must come clean in this regard in that the tax, as I say, was proposed in order to alleviate the costs of operating MOT airports, and no more. I have letters that say it will now be used to defray most departmental expenses with regard to air. Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance does not write letters to his colleagues but I have letters from the Minister of Transport indicating the purposes and how this tax will be used. In so far as the frontiers are concerned, that is where the impact of the tax is even more unjustifiable. I do not mind paying a user tax for Toronto international, Montreal international and, to a lesser degree, here in Ottawa, because this is more of a cattle station than are the others, as well as some other airports across the country. But when I see the facilities that the people in the frontier areas have to put up with, and know this is their only means of communication, I think the tax could be an absolute injustice.

I hope to hear the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) say what he thinks about this tax. I do not think it will be printable, even though he is a mild sort of man, because for people in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and many frontier areas of Canada this tax should be known as "sock it to them" because it imposes a substantial increase in the cost of their essential transportation. I hope the minister can see his way clear to exempt the frontier areas from this tax.

One area in which I had hoped to see the minister move was a change in the definition of "small manufacturer" so as to raise the value of goods manufactured to be in excess of $3,000. Unless my memory serves me incorrectly, the $3,000 limitation still exists for the exemption certificate of the small manufacturer. Of course, today he cannot turn around in a shop and produce less than $3,000 worth of goods. I do not see that there is any encouragement here. I do not see why the minister did not increase that sum to $5,000 or $6,000 is he really wants to assist small business to develop.

I was very pleased to see the minister act promptly on a good precedent with regard to the removal of the sales tax on heavy trucks and transportation equipment that is in inventory, but when he says "in inventory", is he also including "in transit"—vehicles discharged by the manufacturer and in transit on November 18? I do not know how much that would represent, but in many instances it might be something to consider. I say that because I am looking in particular at the distributor or dealer who is independent of the manufacturer. We know that some manufacturers of heavy trucks and transportation equipment have their own agencies with the employees of the parent company. I can cite some, if need be. There has been no passing of title and, in fact, no sales tax paid on inventory because there has not been a disposition of the vehicle, and the time limit within which the tax is paid after completion of production of the item has not elapsed.

However, on the other hand, with the majority of manufacturers' title in the commodity having passed to a financing company or maybe a related company, either a transport company or a dealer, the sales tax is levied on the unit in question as at the time of transfer of title. Naturally, this created some difficulties as between the type of dealership and I was very pleased to see the minister make this change. However, I hope that in his answer to us he will indicate the procedure that will be followed. Are the applications for rebate to be made through the manufacturer, as they were in 1961 in the case of the automobile rebate on inventories of the special excise tax that was then remitted? This may be the safest procedure to avoid the necessity of dealing with umpteen thousand dealers.

I have mentioned those matters which I felt I should draw to the attention of the House. We will consider other items in detail; my colleagues wish to make their contributions on particular points. I hope that we can consider the clauses of the bill this afternoon and, hopefully, pass the bill by four o'clock.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the minister, under Bill C-40, is to increase the tax on hard liquor and wine but not increase the tax on beer, the champagne of the working class. That is one of the progressive features of the bill and I am glad the minister has recognized a basic fact in our society. The bill will introduce a whole series of changes and create new taxes. There are to be amendments to the Excise Tax Act and to the Excise Act. In addition to increasing the tax on hard liquor, the government is to increase the tax on cigarettes, cigars, and certain items used for transportation.

The point made initially by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was a good one, namely, that we should consider looking at the impact of taxes on our society and determine the effect of various taxes. Our income tax system is now among the most progressive in the world. It takes into account the needs of invididuals. We should do the same sort of thing with other taxes. For example, we have not yet looked closely at the effects of the excise tax and sales tax, the latter being imposed at the federal and provincial levels, or at the effects of the property tax which is imposed at the municipal level. It is our duty, as parliamentarians, to consider the effects of such taxes, many of which are regressive.

The sales tax, applied uniformly to every person in society, bears much more harshly on those at the low end of the income scale than it does on those higher up the income scale. I support wholeheartedly the call by the hon. member for Edmonton West for a serious study on the impact of sales taxes and excise taxes in this country. This ought to be done during the present session of parliament.

My party can support most of the measures proposed under this bill, although we question two or three items which can be dealt with in committee of the whole. I shall raise one or two questions now to which the minister perhaps will respond if he participates in the debate this afternoon. I refer particularly to the removal of sales tax from clothing and footwear and the removal of excise tax from other commodities which affect consumers. Too often in the past when such taxes have been removed, the consumer has not been given the benefit; the middleman has pocketed the extra money. If we remove the sales tax in order to help people fight inflation, it is incumbent on us to set up a monetary agency which will make sure that sales tax reductions are passed on to the consumer and not pocketed by the middlemen—advertisers, wholesalers, retailers or others in the chain.

We should also monitor closely building material sales to make sure that the tax reduction is passed on to the consumer. My party has always been in favour of refunding the money collected as a tax on building materials to those who are going to build homes, particularly those in the lower and middle income brackets. We are afraid that once the sales tax on building materials is reduced to 5 per cent, hundreds of millions of dollars which should be passed on to consumers will be siphoned off by people in the building industry—contractors, painters, real estate people, and so on, right down the line. This would not happen if the money collected were rebated to those building a home. Why did the minister not consider this, because I suggest that what we propose will be much easier to administer?

Reducing the sales tax to 5 per cent right across the board could be regressive. For example, the person building a home worth $30,000 or $35,000 will not benefit to nearly the same extent as the person building a home worth, say, $100,000. On the surface, both will benefit to the same extent by the reduction to 5 per cent.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You cannot have a sales tax which is regressive and make it progressive when you lower the rate.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, that is why we suggest the tax credit approach. Perhaps it would be better to pay a lump sum to every home builder as a tax credit. Such credit might be worth, say, $500 to everybody. At least that approach would be equitable. The greatest benefit would not go to those who build the most expensive houses; it would go to those who build average houses or houses which do not cost too much. I raise these matters as they concern me. Perhaps the minister will respond later in the debate.

The extra tax to be imposed on vehicles with powerful engines is a step in the right direction as such engines consume large quantities of energy. I am happy to see exemptions made in favour of farm tractors. My only concern is the limit on the size of boat engines. I think 20 horsepower is the limit on boat engines, above which extra tax must be paid. I suggest that a 20-horsepower boat engine is not very large; I do not think an engine so small consumes very much energy.

May I call it one o'clock and continue later?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, before the lunch hour I was saying that one section of the bill before us implements a tax on high energy consuming engines and motors. I had made the point that it applies to boats with an engine of 20-horsepower. There is another point I want to mention at this time. Unfortunately, the minister is not here although his parliamentary secretary is in the chamber. I refer to clause 21, page 10. Section 10 refers to motorcycle engines to which the tax will apply. It provides that motorcycles with an engine displacement of greater than 250 cubic centimeters will be subject to a tax of 5 per cent. A motorcycle with a 250 c.c. engine is one of small or intermediate size. The tax should not apply to an engine of this size: it is not high energy consuming. If we are to try to save energy, which is the purpose of this tax measure, we should apply the tax to engines of much greater size.

In today's society, people who live in the suburbs travel to and from the city to work in a car that weighs several tons. More people are using motorbikes or motorcycles of one sort or another. If you put a tax on a motorcycle with an engine as small as 250 cubic centimeters, you defeat the whole purpose and philosophy of putting a tax on high energy consuming engines. This tax should be lifted from 250 c.c. engines and applied to those in the range of 600 or 750 cubic centimeters. I hope that when the minister returns to the chamber he will consider the possibility of an amendment with regard to motorcycles.

I wish to stress another point. Motorcycles are often not used for pleasure. People use them to go to and from work, to the corner grocery store, and so on. They are not used as much for pleasure as are boats. I have argued that the limit is too low for boats and my argument is even stronger with regard to motorcycles. After all, we are not dealing with a huge engine that consumes a lot of energy.

There are two further points in this bill with which I wish to deal. The first is the point touched on by the hon. member for Edmonton West, namely, the airport tax which applies to all airplanes. This is unfair. In the Northwest Territories, the Yukon or northern Saskatchewan there are no roads: it is not like in the south where people can travel by car, truck, bus or rail. They must use aircraft. Fuel costs in the north are already excessive because it is necessary to fly in the fuel. An additional tax on aircraft will discriminate against the people of the north. The minister should consider amending this provision when we get to clause by clause study of the bill. There is one other point I wish the minister to take note of with regard to aircraft. Section 12 of clause 21 provides:

> Aircraft but not including gliders or aircraft purchased or imported for use exclusively in the provision of such class or classes of air services as the governor in council may by regulation prescribe . . .

They would be subject to excise tax. Of course, it is left open under the regulations that are prescribed by the governor in council; in other words, the minister. If a person purchases an aircraft of more than a certain size, should it be other than a standard commercial or passenger aircraft the aircraft may be subject to extra tax. Again, there are people in northern Canada who use aircraft for personal reasons in the same way as we use cars, and if the section imposed an extra tax on these people I think it would be discriminatory.

● (1410)

I also ask whether the new tax would apply to motorized toboggans used in the north for hunting and trapping? Most of the measures here are measures which I believe all hon. members will support. I should like the minister to undertake a study of the impact of sales taxes to determine whether they are regressive, as I think they are. I think the object should be to distribute our wealth in order to create a more egalitarian society: we have the wealth to do it, and I think it would be a moral crime if we did not.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, I would like to make some comments about this bill, the purpose of which is to implement the changes in sales tax proposed in the November 18 budget. The bill proposes that the sales tax on construction materials be reduced to 5 per cent. This reduction is not just for materials used for residential construction but for all construction. Yet the budget statement indicated that the primary aim of the proposal is to stimulate residential construction and to help moderate the price of housing. One could ask, therefore, why the approach could not have been to focus the impact of this cut more on residential construction, particularly for moderately priced housing.

One approach that could have been used would have involved an extension of the provisions the present tax law uses to grant relief from sales tax if the goods are to be used for certain purposes; in other words, an extension of the end-use provisions of the present law. This might well have been complex administratively. But there is another approach that could have been used if the principal objective was to reduce or eliminate that part of the cost element in the price of housing created by the sales tax. It would have involved sizably increasing the new grants that are to be given to first-time purchasers of new, moderately priced homes. This would have put the benefit of the tax reduction directly into the hands of consumers. These grants could have been increased from $500 to some greater amount, with the program being further modified by making purchasers eligible for it even if the new home they were purchasing was not their first home and by widening the price ranges of eligible housing.

After all, when this $500 grant program was first announced during the election, it was put forward as being for the purpose of compensating the home buyer for the approximate amount of sales tax on the price of his home. The use of this latter approach would also have meant that the reduction of sales tax would not be available for luxury homes, apartments and office buildings, as will now be the case. In addition, it would have meant that there would be no question, as there now is, as to whether the reduction will ever actually benefit the consumer.

Of course, if you look at the proposal to cut the sales tax to 5 per cent as a means of generally encouraging the total construction sector of the economy and providing a basis for holding prices down throughout this sector, there is a strong argument for this kind of across the board reduction. But this still leaves the valid and very important question of whether the benefit of this reduction will in fact be passed on to the consumer either through lower prices or, at the very least, through the absorption of increased costs, or whether it will not, instead, be pocketed by others in the form of higher profits.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) said he has asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) to monitor the sales tax cut to see that it is actually passed on to consumers. I think we need some further reassurance as to the capacity of that minister's department—which is, after all, a very small one—and that of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to carry out this task. We also need information as to exactly how it will be carried out. Will the monitoring cover the whole of the construction industry, or only residential construction? Whatever expertise Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has is likely to be concentrated in the residential area. But the monitoring should cover the entire construction area of the economy to which the new sales tax reduction is applicable.

The monitoring of sales tax and tariff cuts to attempt to determine the actual effect they have is a new kind of federal government activity. It was carried out for the first time by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on the effects of the tariff and sales tax cuts announced in the budget of February, 1973. The same department is carrying on another monitoring exercise at the present time on the effects of the elimination of sales tax on clothing and footwear, first announced in the May 6 budget. But as I have said, these programs are a new kind of federal government activity. Obviously, they are still of a somewhat experimental nature. As a result, consumers could well be given unrealistic expectations as to what this monitoring means and what it can actually do for them.

For example, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) announced that with regard to the current monitoring program on the effects of the elimination of sales tax on clothing and shoes, the names of any firms which have not passed on the benefit of the cuts to consumers would be disclosed to the public. However, what he failed to make clear at the time was that the department was going to monitor only some 120 firms which had already been informed they would be surveyed for this purpose. This means that the only "culprits" whose names the department would be in a position to reveal would be those found, if any, among this limited sample of 120 companies. A look at a sample of this size, if it is representative in terms of geography, various levels of trade and size of firms can, when checked against general statistics data, provide useful information of a kind the government never had before as to the actual effects of sales tax cuts on prices. But it could hardly be a way of helping keep the thousands of firms who are not in the sample, and who are therefore not being monitored, in line for the purpose of ensuring that they pass on the benefit of the sales tax reductions to consumers.

I think therefore, that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs should state as soon as possible exactly what is going to be done in a realistic way to monitor the cuts in sales tax on building including the names of firms to be checked for monitoring purposes materials, and what kind of information this monitoring will actually provide. The Minister of Finance should also be prepared to state what the government will do if it finds the benefits of these and other sales tax cuts are not in fact passed on to the consumer.

The Minister of Finance has also confirmed the removal of sales tax on construction equipment and on vehicles used for mass transportation. He has not yet announced who will monitor the effect of these cuts, but they involve sizeable amounts of government revenue and they should also be covered by a monitoring program. It appears that the government intends to rely mainly on competitive pressures to make certain that the benefits of all the new sales tax reductions are in fact passed on to the consumers. Therefore, it is essential that we have the legislative means of ensuring that these competitive pressures are working fully and effectively in the Canadian economy. This underscores the necessity of putting into law as quickly as possible both stages of a reformed and updated competition policy.

Also, the reduction of sales tax on building materials should remind us that when the legislation covering reform of the personal and corporate income tax became law two years ago, it was stated that the next stage of tax reform would deal with federal sales and excise taxes. Nothing has been heard about the status of that review since then, and I suggest it is time we had a report on what is happening with it. The fact is, however, that a major change was made, on what is essentially an ad hoc basis, in our sales tax system in the current budget. This is a strong argument for the completion of this review and the publication by the government of proposals for public discussion of the reform of our entire federal sales tax system at an early date.

It was announced on budget night that the reduction of sales tax on building materials would be in force immediately the following day, November 19. However, it should be realized that the effect of this reduction of sales tax cannot be immediate with respect to all building materials across the board. This would, of course, lessen the degree of short-run impact the tax cut could have on the economy. The federal sales tax is imposed at the manufacturer's level. At the time the federal tax was announced, dealers already had on hand varying amounts of inventory, depending on the kind of material, on which tax had already been paid.

As is customary, neither the budget statement nor this bill make any provision for remission of sales tax which had already been paid. I am told that, depending on the kind of material, it could be up to four months before all this tax paid inventory could be disposed of through sale in the marketplace. For example, such tax paid inventories would be minimal or non-existent for products like concrete blocks or liquid cement for which there is a close relationship between manufacturing and ongoing demand and which go directly from manufacturer to user.

However, these inventories could be quite large for other materials like lumber and builders' hardware. I am told that most lumber yards turn over their inventories only four times a year. Therefore, it could be up to three months before the effect of the sales tax reduction could show up fully in lumber prices except, of course, in the rather unlikely event that the dealer could afford to cut his prices on materials on which tax had already been paid. The Minister of Finance announced on December 2 that there will be a remission of sales tax on tax-paid inventories of trucks and other transportation equipment affected by the sales tax exemptions proposed in the November 18 budget. However, he has indicated he will not do the same thing for building materials.

It could be argued, however, that the same considerations that led to his decision on transportation equipment could well apply to building materials. A prospective purchaser of building materials might defer his purchases for some months until he can buy goods free of tax. Or, he might switch his business from a dealer with a large tax-paid inventory to another one with little or no inventory, who could therefore offer him immediate delivery of stock which he had just purchased and on which sales tax had not been imposed. If builders deferred purchase of materials until they could buy them on a tax-free basis, it could slow down the effect desired by the budget of encouraging a greater supply of housing at lower cost in the near future. It could also slow down the achievement of the more general objective apparently hoped for from the reduction of sales tax—the stimulating of the entire construction sector of the economy. I would therefore suggest that further consideration be given by the Minister of Finance to this matter, now that a precedent has been established with his recent decision on transportation equipment.

In conclusion, while there are those who might consider my comments to be of a critically questioning nature, they are put forward in a constructive spirit in the context of my general support of the budget. Therefore, I believe that on balance this bill should have the support of this House and I look forward to its early approval by parliament.

Excise

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to make a few comments.

When the budget bills are being considered, tax reductions are noted. I think that we must applaud such procedure, because we know that taxes are a heavy burden for the consumer, since at any level of tax collection, the burden always falls on the consumer. I have always felt that a government must only use a tax system to finance its expenditures and its administration. I think that a tax system should exist to cut financial surpluses, because it is possible and even probable at a given time, at some economic level, that too much money can give rise to a misuse of power.

● (1430)

This may create difficult situations where even the government may have administrative difficulties, when enterprises, companies or corporations become financially stronger than the government.

In this regard, a tax system must be set up to prevent the accumulation of riches in the ahnds of a happy few, but this is very far from the present principle where nearly the only purpose of the present tax system is to find financing sources for government activities,both at the federal and provincial levels.

When this is no longer enought, there exists a second means, that is to borrow from those who have savings they may lend.

Madam Speaker, I think we must rejoice whenever the government decides to lighten the burden of taxpayers through tax reductionS since when we reduce taxes, we do in some way something which helps increase the consumer's purchasing power.

So far, we have observed labour disputes between workers and employers, between public servants and government, fought in order to get salary increases based on the price index and the cost of living increase. Each time the workers have got a salary increase, a tax revenue increase has followed, and each time the wages have got higher, expecially in industry, there have been as a consequence price increases and, consequently, tax revenue increases. For years I have told this House, as the Quebec Minister of Finance has also just stated, that it is no longer necessary to increase taxes, since inflation does the job. There is no use raising taxes for the purpose of refilling the governement's treasury, inflation does the job.

In my opinion, the tax on building materials should have been completely removed. A cut of about 50 per cent is clearly not enough if it is really intended to encourage the building industry and the housing starts we knew in the last few years but which have dropped catastrophically in the last few months slowing down activity in other sectors of the Canadian industries, for instance in the lumber industry. I appreciated very much the speech the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) has just made. He is now leaving the House. He wondered to what extent the tax cut could serve the consumer, the man who wants to build a house or buy a new one, the citizen who has repairs or maintenance to do.

[Mr. Gray.]

How can we be sure the tax reduction will reach him? To some extent, we can bank on competition, but there was competition 15, 20 years ago; I wonder if it still exists today.

Commerce, principally for building materials, is now mainly in the hands of a few companies which can easily, maybe not directly and officially but indirectly, reach agreement to support prices, Now, as the hon. member for Windsor West pointed out earlier, when they are asked about the impact of that sales tax cut on building materials, they talk about inventory. And can the ordinary consumer check the veracity of such an affirmation? It is impossible for him to know whether the inventory is depleted or not.

Therefore, I think that in conceiving such measures, we should take action to ensure that this tax cut relieves precisely those we want to relieve, namely the consumers. A few years ago, we have had the suppressions of the sales tax on medical drugs, the effect of which we did not see at the consumer's level. We were told that it was the increase in costs which was responsible for the maintenance of high prices. But what are the true facts? The consumer is not in a position to know. It is not known exactly how far inquiry commissions or civil servants of certain departments who control that sort of things can go in such situations.

I suggest that we should make or have made sure that the benefits of the sales tax removal would in fact be passed on to consumer. If that tax had been removed, I think it would have been a lot easier to check whether the reduced cost of building materials has actually been passed on to the consumer and has therefore given a new impetus to the building industry.

I suggest this is very important because housing starts have decreased by about 50 per cent and possibility more. Not only lumber, cement, concerte, elecritical wiring or plumbing equipment are involved, but also all secondary materials used in home building. Everyone of those industries is affected when house building is stagnating. Indeed, there is a chain reaction that must be watched.

When we shall consider this bill clause by clause in a few minutes perhaps, we can then study it more in depth. The minister will be in a position to give us more details, more information on every clause. We shall then know what the minister and the government have in mind, and the ultimate purpose of his budget policy.

[English]

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Madam Speaker, I ani pleased to have the opportunity of saying a few words about a specific clause in this bill and of indicating that, while I am in agreement with many of the items in the budget which benefit the consuming public of this country, there is one item that concerns me particularly as a tobacco farmer and as a member representing a great number of tobacco farmers in Ontario. It is obvious that I itend to talk about the increased tax on cigarettes. I do not do this in a frivolous way, but with the hope, that when I am finished hon. members will realize I am deadly serious in my attempt to impress upon the minister the impact an increase in the tax on cigarettes has on the tobacco farmer, the primary producer, in Ontario.

The tax set out in the budget represents an increase of two cents per package of 20 cigarettes. Before I go any further, I should indicate that we appreciate the fact that budgets over the past number of years have not contained an increase in the tax on tobacco products. The minister has been kind enough to avoid such an increase in the recent past but I note that he has yielded to the temptation this time. I am not sure whether he is a smoker, but I am not speaking for the smokers; I am speaking for those individuals who produce tobacco.

The increase in taxes on alcohol and tobacco is a means of obtaining additional revenue. I hope the minister was not influenced by his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), to use this increase as a subtle way of cutting down on the consumption of tobacco. Unlike his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has more common sense and allows the public to decide, as individuals, whether they want to smoke. As I say, the real purpose of an increase in tax is to increase revenue, and tobacco and alcohol are fair game when considering fields for taxation.

I wonder whether the minister and his officials have considered that some time, somewhere the law of diminishing returns will begin to take effect. Once the tax forces up the price to the consumer to a certain point, the sale of the product will be reduced and thereby the amount of revenue produced likely will diminish. A number of years ago the Ontario Flue Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board made a serious representation to the Department of Finance on that topic. At that time they pointed out the critical point at which the revenue to the government would begin to decline.

Speaking in this vein, I wonder whether the departmental officials had any prior consultation with the tobacco growers of Canada to obtain their views, because they could present this aspect of the situation much more forcibly and logically than I could in these few remarks. I hope the minister will take note of what I have said and will appreciate the great value the production of tobacco has to the economy of the area from which I come and also to many parts of Ontario and Canada generally.

The tobacco industry is really the backbone of agriculture in my area: it pours a tremendous amount of revenue into the economy. I want the minister to be very much aware of this when he unduly increases the tax on a product which means, not just comfort and luxury to the smoker but bread and butter to the man producing the original product. If the minister should not listen to what I am saying and should continue with his intention to increase the tax, I would respectfully suggest that he make available for export promotion a certain portion of this tax. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been very helpful to the tobacco growers in assisting them in the marketing of their product in countries such as China, Japan, Europe, and so on. I respectfully suggest that he seriously consider making available for export promotion certain funds raised by the increase in the tax he is now levying on tobacco. That is all I have to say, Madam Speaker. I hope the minister will take due note of the fact that tobacco is not just a luxury item but is really a very important industry in certain parts of this country.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Madam Speaker, I rise to enter the debate today on the Excise Tax Act because I should like to discuss a few things which I believe are of importance. Although the first item on which I should like to touch may be not too important to all of Canada, it certainly is important to British Columbia and to my riding in particular. It has to do with the use of the word "municipality". I see it is again used in this legislation in new subsection (3) of clause 18 where there is reference to sewerage and water distribution systems. This subsection provides:

> Where any water distribution, sewerage or drainage system is transferred by a person to a municipality within two years after the completion thereof, pursuant to a bylaw of or agreement with that municipality under which that person is required to install such system and transfer it without charge to that municipality—

I am concerned about this because in British Columbia there are regional districts and fire districts which are constituted under the Water Act. I have had some experience in this regard since coming to Ottawa. The fact is that the excise tax is being charged in respect of these organizations because of the interpretation of what is a municipality. Although these are quasi-municipal bodies, they are not given the same treatment as a municipality under the Excise Tax Act, even though in their own right they are taxing authorities and can do on their own behalf exactly what a municipality can do. When I first came here I obtained some correspondence from my good friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), in respect of the taxing method being used. One letter states:

> Various kinds of districts under the Water Act of British Columbia have been created for a variety of special purposes. Some have extensive powers while others have only a single purpose as street lighting or fire protection but since they are not classified as municipalities by the creating authority we have not regarded them, in general, as municipalities within the ordinary meaning of the term.

Then in a letter from the minister of national revenue in 1973 we find this statement:

> As you suggest in your letter, the Excise Tax Act is considered as contemplating fully organized municipalities and it is in this spirit that we have been administering the statute. However, in keeping with the spirit of your representations and others which have been made recently on this subject we are currently reviewing our position in this respect. Our study will encompass the form of incorporation and the functions of the various local authorities in British Columbia. The object of our study is to determine whether a recommendation should be made to the governor in council to classify some or all of them as municipalities for the purposes of the Excise Tax Act.

This came about because of the fire districts in my area which are in the regional district but are not municipalities. They were classified as unorganized territory. In order that the people in these regions could set up a fire protection district, these areas were classified by the province of British Columbia and incorporated under the Water Act. At one time they purchased their equipment and were not bothered too much. Then suddenly someone in the department discovered what was going on and started to harass the seller of the equipment in respect of the tax and, of course, the seller could not do anything other than pass the tax on to these districts.

We started looking into this problem in 1973 because these organizations were being taxed. On October 1, 1974, the Winfield fire protection district in my area was taxed an amount of $3,654.05 for a piece of fire protection equipment. I am very concerned about this situation because these districts cannot qualify as municipalities since no one on the government side seems to want to change the wording in the act in respect of municipality, which states "any water distribution, sewerage or drainage system".

● (1450)

Exactly the same thing will happen in these areas where we have regional districts which are not classified as municipalities as has happened with the fire protection districts. These regional districts are set up to perform this kind of function. If we have municipalities which do not cover all the people in total, then I would respectfully ask the minister to amend the interpretation to include all these types of people in Canada. I do not wish to accuse the minister or the government of not doing this because only a very small area of Canada is involved; nevertheless, I think this provision must be changed to avoid discrimination.

Over the years I have been intrigued by the excise tax. I first became interested in it when I was in the appliance business in Vancouver shortly after the war and we found the excise tax being put on one year and taken off the next on some of the appliances we sold. I could never really understand the philosophy behind the imposition of this tax. In my opinion, only the income tax is fair. I should like to know the reason for putting the excise tax this year on boats of over 20 horsepower. In my riding in the Okanagan Valley we have a flourishing industry in boats. Our greatest satisfaction is in the pleasure people take from these boats. There are some lovely lakes in the area which lend themselves to the use of boats built locally and used both by local people and tourists who visit the Okanagan Valley.

Now the excise tax is imposed on boats of over 20 horsepower. What is the thinking behind this measure? Does the minister believe that this is what he has to do to fight the energy crisis? The people who are manufacturing and selling the boats, and we have many of them in British Columbia, have already been hit by the full impact of the energy crisis. The number of boats over 20 horsepower that are sold and used in the area, and on which the excise tax is imposed, amounts to 80 per cent. The percentage is not nearly as high with regard to Cadillacs. The gas consumption in the motor boat industry in Canada is well below 1 per cent. I do not think that the excise tax will have very much bearing on gas consumption but, as I have said, the motor boat industry has already been hit by the energy crisis. For instance, resin, which is used in making fibreglass boats, has increased in cost in one year from 20 cents a pound to 56 cents a pound. The upholstery which is used in other boats, which I believe is mainly plastic, has gone up 27 per cent.

A popular model of a boat manufactured in my area which in 1973 sold for $5,847, in 1974 sells for $7,268. Now, with the increase in tax, it will go up to $7,915 because the tax increase is $647. I really wonder whether that will stop people buying boats. I certainly do not believe that people will stop buying Cadillacs because of the price increase. The percentage of sales of Cadillacs is not very great anyway, and I do not think the increase in cost will be a deterrent because people who can afford that price can afford the increase also.

There has been a tremendous increase in the price of boats in Canada and in North America because of the cost of the input in boatmaking. We could also speak about the competition between imports and Canadian production: it is a very interesting subject. I do not think too many boat manufacturers are worried about competition except for the fact that boats manufactured in the United States are cheaper because of the lower price of materials. Manufacturers there have ways of exporting boats to Canada and avoiding in some way part of the duty that is charged, so that the percentage of the increase as a result of the excise tax on imported boats is lower than for Canadian boats.

Most hon. members here know that I always put in a plug for industry in Canada and I do not like to see anything done, small as it may be, to inhibit the development of industry in this country. However, here is another instance where it is not being helped. I would not be suprised if somebody in the boat manufacturing business in the Okanagan Valley said to me: "It would be much better for me to move my plant across the boarder to Omak, which is only about ten miles away, so that I could manufacture my boats there using American labour and American materials." We would be witnessing the disappearance from Canada of another industry that could sell its products for less. In the whole area of the Okanagan Valley there are beautiful lakes and a great many people have their pleasure boats there. Certainly, the tourist industry depends on boats and it would be to the detriment of that industry to impose this tax.

Another subject in which I am interested is the wine industry in the grape-growing area of the Okanagan. We have had our problems there with the farming industry. We have a tremendous fruit industry, but we cannot get cars to transport our fruit for export to the United States or even to bring it to eastern Canada. Perhaps the consumer does not see this, but I certainly see a great number of American apples being sold in eastern Canada today. I know, Madam Speaker, that you would not notice the difference in the price of American apples and Okanagan apples, but I certainly do. This is one of our problems. One of the things we have been told by officials of the federal Department of Agriculture and officials of the provincial department is to diversify the industry so as to avoid surpluses. One way to do this is to grow grapes. We have the right climate for grape growing—semi-arid, semi-desert.

● (1500)

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) wants the wine industry to pay additional excise tax and I do not know why. I cannot understand this move, as the wine industry in Canada is not economically healthy, not making large profits, and not reaping the rewards of inflation which many other industries are reaping. It is in a depressed state. That is the best way to describe it.

We should consider the Australian experience of a few years ago. Australia imposed an excise tax on Australian wine. That move only helped to depress the Australian wine industry. Finally the Australian government had to rescind the tax in view of large losses the Australian wine industry had suffered.

Look at it another way. The government is to tax more heavily the wine industry, but it will not impose similar taxes on beer or cider, substances which have competed for the consumers' attention over the years. It is well understood that demand for wine is elastic and responds to price changes. How consumers will respond to the price of wine is not known. As I say, wine competes with beer and cider for the consumers' attention in the market place. Considering the economic condition of the Canadian wine industry, I think that the new tax will make it much harder for the industry to expand and use all the grapes grown in Canada.

The Canadian wine industry is under pressure from imported wine. Last year wine imports increased by 9 per cent, and domestic wine sales were down by 1.5 per cent. Is this the time to impose a 60 per cent tax hike on our wine industry? Officials of the department think the extra tax will bring about $5 million more into the coffers of the federal government. A drop in sales of domestic and imported wines might mean that the government will gain much less than $5 million from its new tax.

We must also consider some intriguing side effects. Because of the tax importing agencies will be under pressure to bring in lower priced wines. Some low-priced wines may be dumped in Canada. We know that the grape crop in the United States has never been larger; probably it stands at an all-time high. We know American grape growers are looking for markets for their product. As American grapes are cheap they may be dumped in Canada, in one form or another. Further, I know from experience how difficult it is to prove dumping. Nevertheless, as some Canadian wines become more expensive by virtue of the tax, imported, low-priced wines may fill up the vacuum. Therefore the new tax will not help the Canadian wine industry, or Canada.

For that reason I hope the minister will consider again the imposition of this tax. At the same time will he reconsider the tax on boat engines, as it will not do what some in his department think it will? I hope, in any event, that the minister will reconsider the additional tax on Canadian wines.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the difficulty the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) faces as he attempts to readjust our taxation system. His is indeed a difficult job, but he must make sure that, in adjusting our tax system, he does not upset the delicate balance of the market place. I am particularly concerned in case, by readjusting our tax system, he unwittingly destroys the competitive advantage enjoyed by a particular Canadian industry. By hurting the competitive position of a Canadian industry, he may disadvantage other segments of our economy which depend on that industry, and thus hurt them.

I was pleased to note that the minister talked about objectives and about the fact that he is trying to bring about competitive balance within industry. He also talked in terms of encouraging investment in Canada, particularly Canadian investment in Canada. Those are worthy objectives. Any actions which may bring adverse effects or which may hinder the attainment of such objectives should be examined carefully.

I do not intend to repeat the arguments of my colleague from Okanagan. However, as a British Columbia member who is interested in the growth of the wine industry in British Columbia, I am concerned in case the competitive position of that industry may be disrupted. The industry may be damaged severely.

The Canadian wine industry now employs just over 1,000 people, and Canadian grape growers supply 2,000 permanent jobs and six weeks' seasonal employment for many more. Twenty-eight Canadian wineries and about 1,150 grape growers have a current capital investment of approximately $130 million. The wine industry uses about $36 million worth of supplies obtained mainly from Canadian grape growers, and from glass and paper board manufacturers.

Canadian wineries purchase over 75 per cent of the Canadian grape crop. This is the second largest fruit crop in Canada, and its concentration in the Niagara Peninsula in Ontario and in the Okanagan Valley in British Columbia makes it extremely important to the general economy of these areas. The current forecast for Canadian grape purchases by the wineries in 1974 is about 60,000 tons, with a potential value of approximately $14 million.

The proposed excise tax increases will seriously impair development of the Canadian wine industry, an agriculturally based industry which is still in its formative stages, although it has experienced some healthy growth in recent years and anticipates expansion in international markets. Certainly this Canadian industry is growing and anticipates moving into the international market. In some cases Canadian companies anticipate taking over American companies, rather than the reverse. Certainly they should be encouraged. Instead, they are facing a serious slowdown in sales, showing an increase of less than 1 per cent in the 12 months ending March 31, 1974. While corporate profits generally show substantial increases, Canadian wineries are showing profits below last year. The industry in encountering pressure from low-price imported wine and sky rocketing costs for Canadian wineries.

I ask the minister to reassess the competitive position he is disrupting in the Canadian industry relative to imported wines, and also the position of the wine industry relative to other alcoholic beverages such as beer. One of the responsibilities of a member of parliament is to make the minister and his department aware of some of the effects he might be having on small businessmen or small industrialists.

One change in the bill that is of concern to me and will affect the industry in my constituency relates to the situation of built-in fireplaces. There are three types of built-in fire-places. One is constructed from a base of brick. There are also the metal fireplaces and free standing fireplaces.

The free standing fireplace is being put in an unfortunate competitive position. I understand that 90 per cent of them are manufactured in Canada. This is a relatively new business. In fact this market is being taken away from United States manufacturers. On the other hand the American manufacturers produce a type of built-in fireplace that will compete with this free standing fireplace and gain a tax advantage. They in turn produce some 90 per cent of the input into Canada.

It is rather incongruous that the Minister of Finance would promote a taxation benefit for an American industry and a taxation disincentive for a Canadian industry, particularly since this is a new industry which is just getting on its feet.

This Canadian industry is doing extremely well. Its growth has been quite satisfactory, particularly with regard to British Columbia. This is also an Ontario based industry. On that basis I ask the minister to reassess this and hopefully take out of the legislation the words "built-in". If fireplaces were just included generally, this would be satisfactory.

Another minor factor encouraging the free standing fireplace is the matter of conservation. A free standing fireplace gives off a considerable amount of heat. As we are talking in terms of energy conservation, we should not have the heat going up the chimney. We should instead ensure that it is distributed throughout the room.

Injuring the free standing fireplace industry by destroying its competitive position and increasing the competitive position of the United States companies is totally against all the concepts upon which the minister built his budget. He built it upon the premise of hopefully improving employment in Canada. This will do the opposite. He built his budget on the objective of encouraging Canadian investment in Canada. This clause regarding built-in fireplaces goes against the objective. It is upsetting the competitive position of this Canadian industry. I am sure that is not the minister's intent.

I hope the minister will remove the words "built-in" from the bill. I will look for that in the amendment. That is in schedule V, Part 1, paragraph 2. I would appreciate it if the minister would take these factors into consideration. If necessary I will discuss the matter further on third reading.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, as I do not wish to take too much time of the House I will only make a few comments. I know that other members want to speak and that there is a disposition to pass this bill by four o'clock.

When you look at this bill in an overall way, you see there is good news and bad news in it. The bad news is if you fly or are a passenger in an airplane, drive a big car, buy a boat with the motor over 20 horsepower, smoke cigarettes or cigars, drink wine and brandy.

Mr. Nystrom: It is bad news for you, Bill.

Mr. Kempling: I'm glad you are here. If you are in the construction machinery business, truck equipment business, are handicapped, have children and are buying clothing for them, then there is good news for you.

I wish to endorse the comments regarding the wine industry which were made by my colleague, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman). We have a considerable wine industry in the Niagara Peninsula. I have been in contact with them and I understand they have made representations to the minister. I hope he will take the remarks of my colleagues into account, as well as the representations made by the industry which is quite concerned about where it will be heading in the future.

I know that other members intend to speak at some length regarding taxation on motors, boats and so forth. Therefore, I will skip my remarks on that. I will confine myself to the transportation equipment business. I commend the minister on his recent news release wherein he recognized the tremendous inventory that this industry has on hand. He says he is prepared to do something about it. Remitting the sales tax would represent millions of dollars to the industry which is now having great problems with cash flow. This would certainly help them. When the minister made the announcement I took the liberty of sending out approximately 150 copies to people I knew who would be interested. I know they are waiting for a further revelation on how this will be handled.

The industry about which I am particularly concerned is the Canadian truck body and equipment industry. It is vitally affected by the regulations pertaining to transport equipment. I wish to say a few words about that. This industry has had a good deal of difficulty getting any sort of recognition from the government. As a matter of fact, the reason its association was formed was because various members in the business had received different rulings from the Department of National Revenue pertaining to sales tax and excise tax.

At that time a handful of people in the business, including myself, got together and compared rulings. We found some people had rulings and other did not. Some were being taxed unjustly and others not taxed at all. Consequently we formed an association. It is now Canada-wide with representation in every province. It represents hundreds of millions of dollars in business every year and employs thousands of people. One particular problem the Canadian truck body association had was that they met with various departments of government, but I am told that the departments or the government were not aware that such an association existed. I want to repeat that they do hundreds of millions of dollars worth of business a year. They do employ a great number of people, and they are a very innovative type of industry. The proposal which mainly concerns them in the schedule is in Part XVII, items 8 and 9:

● (1520)

Parts and equipment designed for permanent installation on the tax exempt goods mentioned in sections 1 to 7 of this Part where, in the opinion of the Minister, the fair sale price by the Canadian manufacturer or the fair duty paid value of the imported article exceeds $1,000 per unit.

As I say, this is a very innovative industry. It responds to the demands of the construction industry and transport industry, as well as to the needs of municipalities. In many cases the products of several manufacturers are combined. I stress to the minister that he ought to accept the principle of aggregate pricing when dealing with $1,000 value per unit.

The bill provides, as I read it, that where the duty paid value of the manufactured article exceeds $1,000 per unit the tax is to be levied. It is very simple to take a hydraulic pump and a power take-off, or some other device, and combine them into a piece of equipment which sells for $3,000. But either of these items separately might be worth only $500. In the past the department has held that when these components are combined it constitutes production for the purposes of the act.

Take the example of a manufacturer who makes a truck. That is merely transportation until someone puts a body or a piece of equipment on the back. But when fitted with a van body, a tailgate and a hydraulic lift, the additions, as a whole, may well be worth $3,000, although the value of the parts separately is less than $1,000 each. If any one of those articles is left off the buyer is not in possession of a complete piece of machinery. When the minister is laying down the rules I hope his officials will recognize this aggregate principle, so that when someone in the business describes a piece of machinery the aggregate principle will be applied.

I see that my hon. friend from South Shore has some comments to make. I believe I have made my point, and I see that the minister's officials in the gallery have noted my remarks as well. Having said this, I shall defer to my hon. friend.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): It is not my intention to speak at any great length on Bill C-40 or seek to delay its passage. However, there are a number of items in it which are causing me concern. One in particular appears in item 11 in clause 21 where we read that a special excise tax of 10 per cent will be applied against:

> Boats, other than boats purchased or imported by Her Majesty in right of Canada for use exclusively by the Government of Canada, designed to be propelled primarily by motors exceeding twenty horsepower; and motors exceeding twenty horsepower (including drive assemblies) for boats other than boats purchased or imported by Her Majesty in right of Canada for use exclusively by the Government of Canada.

When this information became public knowledge following the budget speech, I received telegrams from several boat builders in my riding which I should like to place on record. One firm, one of the largest Canadian manufacturers of sailboats, expressed itself as follows:

> Strongly oppose the special excise tax for pleasure boats and engines proposed in the November 18 budget speech. We feel this 10 per cent tax will strike a blow detrimental to the small boat industry which is already struggling in the grip of inflationary costs. We implore you to reconsider this proposed tax immediately.
> Paceship Yachts,
>
> Mahone Bay, Nova Scotia

Another telegram which I received reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Crouse, Your attention is directed to the forthcoming bill re 10 per cent excise tax on large outboards and boats. This is a drastic blow to a business and industry which is already staggering under inflation. Your co-operation please.
>
> Corbett's Gun and Tackle,
>
> Liverpool, N.S.

And from yet another boat builder:

> Very unhappy with 10 per cent excise tax on outboard motors and boats introduced by federal budget. Anything you can do to eliminate or reduce this tax will be very much appreciated.
> Sealand Industries Ltd.
> Gerald B. Stevens.

These are the people who have sent telegrams to me, but I have received other indications through personal contacts and by telephone from many others, citizens and boat builders in my riding, about this matter.

In his budget speech the minister stated that this special excise tax was proposed with respect to high energy consuming vehicles, effective immediately, and presumably he is following this course in order to conserve our dwindling supplies of oil. Nevertheless, I view this measure with considerable alarm.

The boat building industry in Canada, and especially in Nova Scotia, is already troubled by marketing problems. I would point out that boats and yachts, generally speaking, are luxury items and that when the economy turns down into a recession, as it has at the present time in Canada as well as in the United States, a yacht is one of the first things a person deletes from his budget.

Mr. Hargrave: I never had one in my budget!

Mr. Crouse: I suppose the second thing to be deleted is a light private aircraft. But in this instance I am dealing with boats for special use, boat builders, and the tax the minister proposes to place upon this industry. I would ask the minister to bear in mind that when the yacht-building business declines, a whole group of ancillary industries are forced to close their doors.

I recognize that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has a vast range of knowledge in probably many fields, but I venture, nevertheless, to offer him this information: the hulls of most yachts or pleasure craft are built in one place, the galvanized fittings are made somewhere else, the blocks and rope fittings in yet another place, and the dacron sails are made elsewhere.

Bilge pumps, small anchor winches, riding and running lights, galley equipment, toilet equipment and fittings are either manufactured locally or brought in from some other part of Canada. so when the boat building industry is closed down it is not unlike closing down the auto industry, since the ramifications of such an action are felt, though on a smaller scale, throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Another question which comes to my mind concerns the simplicity of the wording of this provision. Does the word "boats" refer not only to pleasure boats but also to fishing boats? If it does, it opens up a whole new field of inquiry and concern. I am not going to get into that aspect this afternoon in view of the limited time we have available, other than to say that if it does apply to fishing boats it is something that will really add the finishing touches to an industry that is already facing high winds, heavy seas and cloudy weather. I hope that the minister in his reply will clearly indicate that this does not apply to fishing boats.

● (1530)

For the life of me I cannot understand the reasoning behind the minister's action, for this particular industry contributes a great deal toward our balance of payments since the major part of our yacht and pleasure craft manufacturing industry exports its production to the United States. As long as the U.S. dollar was trading on a basis higher than the Canadian dollar, the Canadian shipbuilders could survive economically. But now the U.S. dollar trades on a basis lower than the Canadian dollar, and this is compounding the problems of our boat builders.

The average pleasure craft requires a motor, even if it is a sailing yacht, for motor power is required to bring it into port in the event that it is becalmed. I cannot help but wonder why the minister, if he needs money so badly, did not simply put the excise tax on the motor alone rather than on the entire boat. If he persists—and I say this with due respect to the minister—in this foolhardy proposal, he will simply be killing the goose which has been laying the golden eggs which the minister and his government dearly love to tax so highly.

This tax points out more clearly than any words of mine that in bureaucratic Ottawa the right hand simply does not know what the left hand is doing. Here we have a department of Regional Economic Expansion making grants to assist industry, on the one hand, in regionally depressed areas, while the Minister of Finance on the other hand is establishing policies which basically lead to the destruction of local industries on a massive scale, leading in turn to still further unemployment, a problem which is seriously plaguing the present government and the country.

This 10 per cent tax deals our boat building industry a crippling blow which it may well not survive. I implore the minister to reconsider this matter, to cut down on his need for money by cutting down on his massive public building program for Ottawa and Hull for at least a few years, in the hope that this will take off the pressure for additional funds, pressure which, I submit, is killing the boat building industry in Nova Scotia as well as other private industries in this country.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am making this point of order now because I want to give the minister an opportunity to consider it. My point of order relates to item 11 in clause 21(2), relating to boats. My point of order is that this item offends against Standing Order 60(11).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has already spoken, and what he is now saying could have been said in his speech. The House is considering the second reading of a bill, and I do not see how it can consider a clause in the bill until and unless the House goes into committee of the whole. I see the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) shaking his head, and if he has a different opinion I would invite his comments.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my comments are very brief. First of all, I do not know that there has ever been any rule which provides that having spoken during the second stage of a bill an hon. member cannot rise subsequently on a point of order. That is item one. Secondly, I submit that although the hon. member is referring to a particular item which could be discussed in the committee stage, I put it to you that his point of order goes to the very resolution on which the bill is founded.

The minister is asking this House to give approval in principle to a bill which, on the basis of the argument that will be advanced by my colleague, is defective under our standing orders. I can give Your Honour chapter and verse of previous examples. My colleague will explain, and I do not want to steal his thunder. I suggest that Your Honour hear him out, and then I think you will see that on the basis of his proposal it is at second reading stage that this matter should be raised. It could be raised on no other occasion that on second reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am, of course, ready to listen to the hon. member's argument. The principal point that I was making, without my listening to the point of order—though I might be mistaken about this—was that I was afraid he was going to involve himself in another speech, using the excuse of a point of order to complete some comments that he did not make when he had the floor. I still question what the hon. member is attempting to do at this time. Nothing would have prevented him from at least enlightening the Chair during the course of his speech. Then, in view of the time element, we would not have had to go into a procedural debate which might take up all the available time. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary.

Mr. Whittaker: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, my point of order is that item 11 in clause 21(2) relating to boats offends against Standing Order 60(11). This Standing Order provides:

> The adoption of any Ways and Means motion shall be an order to bring in a bill or bills based on the provisions of any such motion.

The ways and means motion upon which this bill purports to be based was adopted on December 2, 1974. With respect to item 11, the ways and means motion reads as follows:

> Boats, other than naval vessels, designed to be propelled primarily by motors exceeding twenty horsepower: and motors exceeding twenty horsepower (including drive assemblies) for boats—ten per cent.

This is to be found at page 219 of the English version of the budget motions. The French version is at page 232. I point out that the exception in the French version reads "autres que les navires de guerre". The English version in the bill, at page 11, refers to:

> Boats, other than boats purchased or imported by Her Majesty in right of Canada for use exclusively by the Government of Canada . . .

I would point out that the meaning of "boat" to which the tax applies is affected as the exception widens or narrows. In the ways and means motion, the exception is "naval vessels". Note the distinction in the use of the word "boats" and, again, "vessels". Then, also, "vessels" is qualified only by the adjective "naval". It can be argued that "naval" is used to assure that "vessel" is understood in the sense of a ship, rather than any other meaning that the word "vessel" can have.

In this use the distinction maintained by many yachtsmen is upheld, namely, that there is a distinction between a "boat" and a "vessel". Generally this distinction relates to size. In this interpretation the tax would not apply to vessels whether owned by a private citizen or corporation or by the Crown. On the other hand, the tax would apply to boats, other than the class of naval vessels, even though owned by the Crown.

In support of this interpretation, the draftsmen of the item in the bill have dropped the use of "naval" and "vessel" and have used "boat". Here they have qualified "boat" by substituting "purchased or imported by Her Majesty in right of Canada for use exclusively by the government of Canada". The words "purchased or imported by" are completely new. There is no such qualification in the ways and means motion. The idea of ownership is completely new. The motion does not refer to ownership at all. The bill brings in ownership and use. The boat must be purchased or imported by Her Majesty for the exclusive use of the Canadian government. Not only do the technical words differ between the motion and the bill, the concepts have changed.

● (1540)

I would also point out the obvious difference in the French version between the use of the words "navires de guerre" in the motion and the word "navire" in the bill. The English and French versions differ even in the motion. One uses "boat, other than naval vessels", the other "bateaux, autres que les navires de guerre". In the Bill, the word "boat" is used in the general and in the particular, but in the French version the general word is "bateaux", while the exception is "navires".

In the end result, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that item 11 in the bill does not comply with the requirements of Standing Order 60(11), and must be struck out as not based upon the relevant item in the budget motion.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member and the overworked research staff of the opposition on putting together that particular argument. The hon. member has made his case on second reading when his colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), said he should make it. Unless Your Honour wants to rule at this stage, perhaps we could argue the point when we get to the specific clause. In any event I should like to have the opportunity of examining the argument of the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. At this time the Chair has to decide whether there is a point of order, and not with regard to the goodwill of the minister. What the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) has said confirms the first impression the Chair had. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is aware that the motion before the House at this time is that the bill be read the second time and referred to the committee. I do not see how he could expect the Chair to rule on a motion to delete a clause of the bill at this stage of second reading without having that specific clause before the House. At this time the whole bill is before the House.

I see that the hon. member for Edmonton-West (Mr. Lambert) seems to be attempting to rise. He had the opportunity to stand up and make his case earlier. At this time the House is considering the whole bill, and I do not feel it can be amended at this stage of second reading. I cannot accept the argument of the hon. member that I should make a decision on a motion to delete item 11 at this time when that clause is not really before the House, but will be before the Committee of the Whole at a later stage. For these reasons I cannot accept the point of order raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The Speaker has made his ruling.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Speaker has made his ruling, and I say that is unfortunate because the same point of order arose at the time Bill C-259 was introduced.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would remind the hon. member that he had the opportunity to intervene during the procedural debate but did not do so.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, I beg your pardon!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should have the right to make a further comment on the acceptability of the ruling after it has been made. For that reason I suggest that we proceed with the debate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we should take one thing at a time. My colleague was raising a point of order. Your Honour intervened and, in effect, suggested that he should not be doing that. I suggested to Your Honour, without disclosing what the hon. member was going to say, that it was right that he should do so at this time. Your Honour did not give me the opportunity to speak on the merits of what he was saying. I could not speak on the merits of what he was going to say because he had not said it.

It was for that reason I indicated my desire to rise in order to draw Your Honour's attention to a very valid and compelling precedent, namely, the decision of Mr. Speaker Lamoureux on precisely the same point in respect of Bill C-259. The bill introduced did not conform with the ways and means motion, and steps had to be taken to correct it. That is all we are concerned with now—correcting the discrepancy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to address myself to the subject matter of the item referred to in the point of order. I want to examine the item and its content, namely a provision for a 10 per cent tax on boat motors over 20 horsepower. I notice that the minister is here and that a half a dozen officials from his department are in the gallery.

I, too, have received representations from marine dealers, and I should like to lay some of their arguments before the House with the hope that the minister will listen carefully, as I think they make a great deal of sense.

The point is that the 10 per cent tax on boat motors of over 20 horsepower will have a detrimental effect not only on the marine business but also on tourist operators and commercial fishermen in northern Ontario. When I look at the tax I must ask myself why the minister brought it in. I can only conclude that this was an attempt to reduce energy consumption, and that the tax was viewed as a luxury tax in that these boats are used primarily for recreation. On an examination of this matter I would dispute that the tax will have the desired effect.

I suppose the first idea of the tax was to reduce energy consumption by taxing the large motors, thereby discouraging the purchase of motors over 20 horsepower. I submit that this is discriminatory. We find a similar tax being applied to high energy consuming automobiles. I would point out to the minister and his officials that these boat motors are used only during summer months, on an average for about 100 hours per year, whereas the high energy consuming automobile is used the year around. I conclude, therefore, that the tax regime is unfair when it compares boat motors with large automobiles.

In addition the owners of boats have to contend with higher fuel costs, and that has an effect on energy consumption. I find this tax, which applies to outboard motors of over 20 horsepower, is discriminatory if it is being used to prevent the high consumption of energy. I do not have a Canadian study on the matter, but I did examine the records of the United States Department of Commerce which indicate that the combined energy consumption of outboard motors, snowmobiles, lawnmowers and so on is less than one-half of 1 per cent of total energy consumption in the United States.

Let me also point out to the minister and his officials that 1975 outboard motor models have been vastly improved in respect of energy consumption. I am told that 1975 Mercury models have been improved to the extent of 25 per cent to 40 per cent in fuel economy. The new 1975 models will not burn as much fuel as the older models.

Also I have learned that a 1975 70 horsepower outboard engine uses less gas per mile than a 40 horsepower outboard engine. If the motive is to reduce energy consumption I do not think this tax on the new 1975 motors is a fair one from the point of view that the motors have been improved in their design and require less fuel. If the minister is looking at this tax, not from the standpoint of fuel consumption but from the point of view of this being a luxury item, then I think he is out of date. At one time outboard motors of 20 horsepower could be considered a luxury, but today the trend is toward larger and heavier boats which require motors much more powerful than 20 horsepower.

I would also point out that there is a need in today's society for recreation, and that more and more people today try to get away from the pressures of modern day work by getting out with their families. Boating is a very important recreational industry in this country. It is enjoyed by thousands of Canadians and their families. One cannot water ski behind a 20 horsepower engine. A larger engine is required.

This tax will have an effect on family recreation. I would also point out to the minister that marine dealers cannot survive on the sales of motors of 20 horsepower and below. A 20 horsepower engine sells for about $700. It is interesting to note that in respect of 60 per cent to 75 per cent of marine dealer sales, the revenue from engine sales is in the 40 horsepower to 80 horsepower range and not in the range primarily below 20 horsepower.

The other very discriminatory thing about this 10 per cent tax is that it means that the marine dealers will have to find 10 per cent extra working capital, because they purchase their motors in December for sales during the spring and summer. I spoke to one dealer who told me that, as soon as this proposed tax was announced, he immediately called his supplier and cancelled his order for outboard motors for this winter because he did not have that extra 10 per cent that he claimed would be needed if this measure should pass. Marine dealers also tell me that because of the general inflation in today's economy, and the marginal aspect of their business, a number of operators will be forced to close down, or at least to lay off a number of employees.

In my riding of Sault Ste. Marie there are approximately 100 people employed as marine dealers. We can only guess how many workers in this country are employed in the building of boat engines, pleasure boats and other craft. Also, of course, the ramifications of the decline in the boat and outboard motor industry will be felt by tourist operators and all subsidiary industries which supply them. Therefore I think this tax will have a much more far-reaching effect than the minister and his officials first realized.

It is also interesting to note that in the budget of May 6 this tax was only 3 per cent, while in the November budget it is 10 per cent. I think some explanation is required in respect of this increase. Because of the hardship to marine, fishing and tourist operators, and indirectly the hardship to those employed in the building of boat motors and the building of boats themselves, I urge the minister to amend this bill so that the 10 per cent excise tax would apply only to marine engines of 85 horsepower or over.

If this is to be viewed as a luxury tax then obviously those who can afford to buy motors of 85 or more horsepower can afford to meet the 10 per cent tax. I very seriously urge that the minister reconsider the implications of the 10 per cent tax on motors above 20 horsepower. I find this to be discriminatory against many of our small boat operators. Many companies will be forced either to lay-off employees or even shut down. I think it is time the government learned to protect some of our small businessmen more than the large corporations to which the government gives so many tax concessions.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have but three minutes left. I think I can make a a five minute speech if you would be willing not to see the clock for two minutes. I hope to be awarded for my brevity by the minister when he ultimately makes his response.

The entry to my first comment is through clause 19, where there are some minor adjustments in sales tax to help handicapped people. I congratulate the minister for the step he is taking to help the handicapped by the removal of certain taxes, but the removal of the sales tax simply is not enough to help the handicapped.

The minister will ask why I do not bring this subject up during a debate on national health and welfare in a social context. The reason I am entering a plea for the handicapped during a debate on the finances of this country is that since the budget came down we have received from the Economic Council of Canada, in its annual review, the theme that there is a need for economic and social indicators. I shall quote just one sentence to indicate what the Economic Council was saying:

> . . . there is a need for a broader framework within which it should be possible to say something concrete, from the viewpoint of overall well-being, about the ultimate ends of the socio-economic activity of the nation, the means to achieve these ends, and the degree to which they are being achieved.

I am really amazed because, although I am a long way from being a candidate for appointment to the Economic Council of Canada, I go back to a speech I made a year ago in which I entered the idea of having a social council of Canada which would emphasize social indicators that would help us in an integrated economic and social plan. In other words, it is not enough any longer in our very complex society for us to have economic indicators as the chief criterion for our success in society.

I want to impress upon the minister how much I look to him for leadership in backing up what the Economic Council of Canada is saying about the implementation of social indicators and the integration of them with economic indicators, so that together there can be a better over-all policy aimed at the well being of the human being and the individual.

Now, on the subject of the handicapped I only point out to the minister that despite the programs and various things done for the handicapped, there is not in this country adequate educational, vocational and employment guidance for handicapped people. I know what I am talking about on this subject, because there are in my riding several handicapped groups which are overly dependent for funding on LIP and other politically inspired government programs.

I could make available to the minister correspondence and documents which indicate the difficult time the handicapped people in our country have because they are not plugged into the economic system and have too low a priority. The priorities of the government are geared exclusively to the economic well being—I reinforce what I am saying now by reference to the Economic Council of Canada—and there must be an integration that will improve the quality of life, into which the handicapped will then have a right of access rather than be treated in a paternalistic and patronizing way. I do not blame the minister. I only say I encourage him to get behind the Economic Council of Canada and lend support to the implementation of its ideas, and perhaps more specifically get behind the idea of a social council of Canada which would help implement this.

● (1600)

I ask for an extra minute so I may make my second point. I will do it under sixty seconds because the minister is well tuned into the argument which I am advancing, that is my very extreme objection to the implementation of an air transportation tax. I tell the minister that this is discriminatory in regard to western Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I had hoped that the hon. member would ask for the consent of the House if he wishes to go beyond four o'clock. I allowed him one minute, but I feel that an extra period of two or three minutes needs the consent of the House.

Excise

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I say that I think the House would grant an extra minute to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche), or give him an alternative. As other members would like to speak on clause 1 because there is an amendment to the definition section, if second reading is granted could we have an understanding on the part of the House that the general debate on clause 1 would be carried on in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. Roche: I am willing to wind up in one minute, if the House would agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Roche: The minister is familiar with the argument; he does not need to hear it in detail. It was mentioned at the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, and he knows it that the spirit of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in Calgary was to treat transportation in this country as being for regional development. If we cannot get the National Transportation Act amended immediately so that the principle of it being for regional development is a priority, at least we can avoid taking steps that are discriminatory against western Canadians through a tax that would hurt many businessmen and families in western Canada for whom air travel is a necessity. I think this is an unfair tax which certainly violates the spirit of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference, and I want to put that seriously before the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree that we not go into Committee of the Whole now but proceed to private members' business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It now being four o'clock, the House will proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you will find that there is general agreement that we discuss today private member's notice of motion No. 14 standing in the name of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we stand all motions appearing ahead of motion No. 14, and proceed with motion No. 14?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE RESPECTING ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should direct the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to study and report back to the House its recommendations in respect to appropriate measures for the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect, and for such other ancillary measures in the same matter as the Committee may consider desirable.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of all members to make a slight change in my motion, that is, to change the words "Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs" to "Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs", so that the matter would go to a different committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I hope all hon. members will agree with me that the government should direct the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to study and report back to the House its recommendations in respect of appropriate measures for the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect, and for such other ancillary measures in the same matter as the committee may consider desirable.

I feel that this is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which requires our immediate consideration and attention. This is not a partisan matter. This is an issue where political affiliation is not of concern. It is a matter which is of the utmost importance and which I feel has the support of many of the members of this House. My plea to this House is: do not let this matter die at the end of this hour. This problem has been with us for too long. I urge hon. members to do their utmost to ensure that this resolution, or one similar to it, is passed as soon as possible.

It has been many years since Jean Jacques Rousseau stated, "Let us speak less of the duties of children and more of their rights". It is indeed time that we act, and those who will benefit most from our action are Canada's greatest asset—Canada's children.

The term "battered child" is one which is often used to describe abused or neglected children. Dr. Henry Kempe of the University of Colorado offered this definition of a battered child, "any child who received non-accidental physical injury or injuries as a result of acts or omissions on the part of his parents or guardians".

There are no accurate national statistics on the incidence of child abuse or neglect. Very little is known about the rate or frequency, but child abuse does exist, and this is a fact. David Bakan, a professor at York University, in his book "Slaughter of the Innocents," which was published in Canada for the CBC learning systems by the Hunter Rose Co., at page 4 of that book, which is in the Parliamentary Library, says:

In numerous known and publicly recorded instances children have been victimized by those responsible for their care . . . How prevalent can such occurrences be? Clearly data are hard to come by because only in the most extreme cases do such things come to public notice. Yet available information strongly suggests that the frequency is far greater than one may naively or hopefully imagine.

In fact a committee of the United States Senate was told at a hearing in 1973 that 60,000 children in that country every year were reported abused, some to the point of permanent injury and even death.

In the province of Ontario, for instance, the chief coroner's office records show that from late 1962 to September of this year 116 children died as a result of abuse or neglect. However, after 1966 when provincial legislation was passed making reporting acts of child abuse mandatory, the number of child fatalities in Ontario due to abuse or neglect decreased by about 50 per cent.

It should be noted that only five provinces have laws making reporting cases of child abuse mandatory. It is estimated that the incidence of child abuse in North America is roughly 250 to 300 per million persons per year. If this is the case then the 600 incidents reported last year in Ontario represent only one quarter of the total number of occurrences in this province. Estimates of actual cases of child abuse in Canada per year range from 1,000 to 10,000.

The grim reality of child abuse and the shocking revelations of research in this area must spur us, as law makers, into action. In the past Canadian law makers have largely overlooked this problem. Horrifying examples of abused children, often resulting in death, come to our attention through the news media. However, there are many cases of lesser degree, where children have been beaten or neglected, that go unnoticed. Child abuse is not only characterized by extreme physical beatings but may also include sexual abuse, deprivation of normal and sufficient care and nutrition, and neglect on the part of the parents.

Child abuse is not a new problem. It did not start just a few years ago when a group of physicians found the courage to make public knowledge of it. The bible records many instances of child abuse. For example, the story of Moses, in which Pharaoh ordered that all male Jewish children be cast into the river, may be found in the Book of Exodus, Chapter 1, verse 22. Instead of putting him to death, his mother put Moses in a basket, from which he was recovered by a princess.

The writings of Charles Dickens contain ample examples of child abuse, such as the beating scene in David Copperfield. In England, not until 60 years after an act making cruelty to animals an offence was passed, was an act passed making cruelty to children an offence. This law was passed in 1889.

It is time to re-examine our past efforts to prevent, identify and treat child abuse. It is time to figure out where we have gone wrong and once and for all put an end to the tragic accounts that temporarily jolt us from our newspapers or television sets before we file them away somewhere in the corner of our minds so that we do not have to think about them. The courts have assumed the position that parents are entitled to punish children within the bounds of moderation, but punishment must be for the child's welfare, without maliciously inflicting traumatic injuries. When punishment becomes unreasonable and traumatic injuries result, the state must intervene and exert its police power on behalf of the children.

I believe that we, Madam Speaker, as law makers must now act. There is no question as to the existence of the problem, nor of the need to find a solution. A problem of such major significance as the battered child requires the organized efforts and co-operation of all concerned persons and agencies for its ultimate solution. The abused child has no advocate. He is handicapped by his physical and mental immaturity. As Professor Bakan stated:

> Child abuse thrives in the shadows of privacy and secrecy. It lives by inattention . . . A reasonable solution to the problem can come about only if there is a large scale acceptance that the welfare of children is of concern to the whole of the society and that the welfare and very survival of the total society critically depends upon the welfare of its children.

The question before us is: are we prepared to use our power as law makers to do our utmost and ensure that appropriate measures are taken, to the best of our ability, to prevent, identify and treat abused children, and to see that such instances do not recur? I say that the answer must be yes. This is one matter which we must recognize. Children have basic rights, the most important of which is the right to be a child. When children are deprived of this normal developmental growth, as are most abused children, unusual and strange things happen to their ability to make decisions, to use others, to trust and to become dependent on someone else. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1945 includes the following in Article 5:

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment.

Section 2 of Article 25 states:

> Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance. All children, whether born in or out of wedlock, shall enjoy the same social protection.

Both these articles, Madam Speaker, which Canada endorsed, apply as much to children as anyone else. Very little is known about the battered child and his world. This, coupled with the fact that child abuse does exist is, I feel, one reason for a committee of this House to study the matter. This proposed study most look into the medical, legal and sociological aspects of child abuse. The logical solution would be to eliminate the problem. However, this appears to be impossible. Since this is the case, we must concentrate on the early case finding as a means of prevention.

The most desirable goal for treatment, of course, is that the child who has been selected for abuse will have it made safe for him to live in his own home. The beginning of the cure, and at times the only cure for the situation, may be removing the attacked child from his dangerous environment.

The great majority of child abuse cases are first seen either in a physician's office or in an emergency room. The manner in which this emergency care of the suspected case of child abuse is handled will set the stage, either for a smooth flowing therapeutic relationship for the child and his family, or for an ineffectual treatment program which often leads to repeated abuse or even death. It is a serious national responsibility to guarantee every protection to our children. We must ensure that cases of abuse are identified and reported, and that proper care is provided for children.

Because these tragedies most frequently occur within the family, it is imperative that cases of abuse be detected as early as possible, so that adequate treatment is afforded to both the abused child and the abusing parent in order to re-unite the family, so that a loving atmosphere can once again be established.

Law, as well as medicine, is concerned with child abuse. The law can never serve the true ends of justice until lawyers and judges alike view the battered child as more than a legal problem. Each must commit himself to the ultimate welfare of the child and parent. An adequate child abuse law, in addition to the usual statement of purpose, definitions and procedural provisions, should include: first, specific reporting provisions, including a mandatory requirement that physicians and medical and hospital personnel, schools and public agencies report suspected cases of abuse. After abrogating the physician-patient confidentiality privilege, the law should encourage reports from individuals, and should grant immunity from civil damage actions to all who make reports in good faith, even reports which prove unfounded.

The law should include, second, well defined responsibility on the part of the police or public welfare agency to require prompt and thorough investigation of all such reports within clearcut channels of referral for the protection of the child; third, the broad jurisdiction of the court to protect any child within its boundaries, regardless of the residence of the parents; fourth, the right of a hospital or protective family to provide emergency care and shelter for a limited time; fifth, the authority for a court to make unilateral orders for temporary removal of a child from a parent, pending the filing of and a hearing on a petition or a complaint of neglect and abuse, where reasonable grounds are shown to justify such action. The law must also provide, sixth, that child abuse may be established by a preponderance of evidence, rather than beyond a reasonable doubt where an infant or child too young to testify on his own behalf sustains unexplained injuries. We should also review our laws forbidding persons from inflicting injuries on children, and urge provincial governments to consider reciprocal and related legislation.

The purpose of the reporting laws mentioned earlier are for the treatment of present injuries and to protect the child from further abuse. It is essential that there be one centralized depository where all cases of child abuse can be reported, to ensure a complete history and aid in the prevention of further abuse. Our laws should be a reflection of our attitudes to children. No simple solutions exist, but there are directions in which we can move. Studies have shown that the battering of children occurs throughout the population, and is not restricted to race, religion, education or socio-economic groups. I believe that we must act immediately to take steps to attempt to solve this problem.

I am not saying that it is feasible or even desirable to separate all abused children from their parents; but I am saying that, as legislators, we must expand our efforts in this field and take appropriate measures for the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect.

This is not a partisan issue. I do not believe that any hon. members who sit in this House are in favour of child abuse in any form. However, we must now show this. We must now show that we are concerned about Canada's children. We must show that we are concerned about their rights, and that the abuse of innocent children will not be tolerated in our country.

Our children are this country's richest resource for the future. We must not allow some of them to be deprived emotionally or physically of their heritage, when it is possible for us to change the situation. We cannot right the wrongs of the past, nor can we right every wrong of the present. But what we can do and what we have a responsibility to do is to act on a situation that has become more prevalent than any of us wish to admit.

Our main business is not to see what lies dimly at a distance, but to do what clearly lies ahead. Of all human resources, the most precious is the desire to improve. I suggest to this House that this is one area which we can improve upon and which we must improve upon. I am not offering a solution to the problem of child abuse. Indeed, there may not be a complete solution, but what I am asking is that we recognize the problem, and that we make an attempt to do something about it by directing the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to study and report back to the House its recommendations in respect of appropriate measures for the prevention, identification and treatment of child abuse and neglect, and for such other measures in the same matter as the committee may consider desirable.

The problem exists, and I believe that it has been clearly defined in this House. It has been said that to define a problem is to begin to solve it. I hope this is the case. We have the opportunity to make an attempt to find a solution to this problem. I think we must, but it must be remembered that opportunities carry with them obligations, and this is only too true in this case. Our obligation at the present is to ensure that this resolution, or one similar to it, be passed by this House, and passed as soon as possible.

This is not a matter which should be neglected, and it is not a matter in which political affiliation is of concern. I hope all members of the House will do everything possible to co-operate and ensure that this measure takes effect, and that a committee will indeed look into this matter and report back to this House. Elton Trueblood once wrote, and I quote:

> A man has made at least a start on discovering the meaning of human life when he plants shade trees under which he knows full well he will never sit.

I hope, Madam Speaker, that this is indeed one shade tree that all members of this House can sit under and can take pride in. It can be done, Madam Speaker, but only with the help and co-operation of all hon. members of this chamber.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I shall be just a very few minutes. I commend the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) on introducing this resolution. I also wish to commend him on the thoughtful and excellent speech he has made in support of it.

[Mr. Howie.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with him that this motion ought to pass this afternoon. I am delighted to learn there is a good chance that it will. My contribution toward getting it through will be to make these remarks very brief.

As hon. members realize, there is a fairly wide public awareness of the fact that there is more child neglect and child abuse in Canada than there ought to be in a civilized country. I am sure all of us are embarrassed and ashamed that it takes place in our land. I have the notion that people generally are aware of it and do not like it, but hope that somebody will do something about it. That somebody, of course, is always somebody else.

The hon. member said we are the legislators of this land and it does not fall to us to pass the buck. The least we can do is arrange for a thorough study of this matter in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. I am pleased to give our party's support to this motion.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I want to begin by congratulating the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) on presenting this motion. This is a subject which has interested me for some time, and one which we have had under study in the ministry of the Solicitor General for several months.

Our three man team studying this matter has developed more than 300 contacts in Canada and the United States. They have travelled in Ontario and British Columbia, and have consulted with local authorities such as Dr. H. B. Cotnam, chief coroner of Ontario, and Dr. S. Segal of the British Columbia Family and Children's Law Commission. In addition they have attended conferences on the subject in Washington, Boston and Victoria, B.C. A policy paper is being developed within our ministry at the present time, and should be ready soon to be presented to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs should this motion pass. I might say that I am in favour of having this motion pass. I hope that near the end of the hour we will do just that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Generally our feeling is that while cases of child abuse may be prosecuted through either the criminal court via the Criminal Code sections on assault, neglect or sexual exploitation, or through the family courts under the provincial child welfare statutes, the Criminal Code is the less appropriate one. The experience in the United States indicates that state or provincial specific legislation on the subject, defining abuse and creating methods of reporting and handling cases, as well as safeguards for professionals involved, is one good approach.

The federal input in this matter might be to help the provinces with research and demonstration projects, to develop communications among interested groups and agencies, to promote research on the subject and, in our case, by providing expertise where we are best able, such as in the areas of policing, records management, information dissemination and so on.

It is obvious that most of the initiative must come from the provinces as well as the federal ministries more directly involved, such as Health and Welfare. Unfortunately, little coordinated effort is visible at the present time and it might just be our role to take a lead in focussing attention and effort on child abuse, and then gradually to phase ourselves out if the option of decriminalization is followed.

We might spend some time looking at the definition of child abuse. What exactly is meant by that term? The definitions of child abuse are legion. The problem is not helped by varying degrees of distinction made between physical abuse, sexual abuse and neglect. In medicine, child abuse is generally known by the term "maltreatment syndrome" or "silverman's syndrome", which is more all-inclusive than the definitions usually employed.

In a statement made before the United States Senate subcommittee hearings on senate bill 1191 in 1973, the bill known as the child abuse prevention act, Mr. Henry Kempe, a leading expert in the field, included all children receiving less than reasonable care and protection.

There are three components of child abuse—physical maltreatment, sexual exploitation, and failure to provide the necessities of life. Because the first two are generally manifested more luridly, there is a tendency for the other type of abuse to be less visible. Physicians frequently speak of a failure to thrive syndrome. Infants who suffer from it are malnourished and otherwise underdeveloped, not because of a failure to provide sufficient nourishment, but because the emotional climate of the environment interfered with development in ways which do not yet seem to be precisely understood.

The most complete definition which I have seen to date is that embodied in the child abuse prevention act, which I have referred to, and which decreed that the term "child abuse and neglect" means:

> ... the physical or mental injury, sexual abuse, negligent treatment, or maltreatment of child under the age of 18 by a person who is responsible for the child's welfare under circumstances which indicate that the child's health or welfare is harmed or threatened thereby.

What is the extent of the problem? It is impossible to get even a general idea as to the number and distribution of cases of physical abuse, sexual abuse or neglect. Reporting systems, which operate in only five provinces, have so many loopholes and are so inefficiently managed as to preclude obtaining valid statistics. In fact the only reputable statistics now available in Ontario are those of the chief coroner, Dr. H. B. Cotnam, which at least identify all those unfortunate children who died at their parents' hands.

Estimates of the number of incidents of child abuse in the United States vary widely, and some writers speculate that they may number in excess of 100,000 annually. In the preface to the second edition of their classic compendium on the subject, Kempe and Helfer note that:

> Adequate demographic data which provide up-to-date evidence of the true incidence of significant child abuse in the United States are not available. Comparing current reporting of child abuse under state laws, we find that many communities are running a rate of 375 reports of suspected abuse per million per year. No one has tried to compare the reported rate of suspected child abuse to the actual incidence.

● (1630)

The development and refinement of mandatory reporting laws in every U.S. state has brought the reporting rate closer to the actual rate at a frightening speed. The report of the New York State Assembly Select Committee on Child Abuse of April, 1972, noted that there were some 400 reported cases of suspected child abuse in that state alone in 1966. By 1971 the annual total had climbed to 3,200. It was also noted that at least 1,000 American children died annually from causes attributed to child abuse and neglect.

In Canada, the only major work is by Mary Van Stolk, and she speculated that incidence rates and patterns in this country were likely similar to those in the United States, although she did take a slightly more conservative rate of 225 cases per million population.

The Nova Scotia study on child abuse tended to support Greenland's tentative position as it discovered only 59 cases in a year when Van Stolk predicted a possible 172.

Now there are many questions which can be asked and, as has been suggested, I think we should define more clearly who are the abusers, who are the abused; develop a pattern, and look into the results. We should examine the symptoms of child abuse. We should also find out what happens when a child has been abused, what happens when he goes to the hospital, and what happens when the matter is reported to the police, and so on.

I would like to end my remarks by suggesting some of the things which might be done. I stress that some of the examples which have come to my attention are quite horrifying. In general, suspected incidences of child abuse are treated by the hesitant, ineffective method described in the speech of the hon. member and mentioned by myself. In a very few serious cases where criminal acts are involved the penalty imposed in such proven cases does little for the child and little for the parent.

It is my feeling that a major effort will have to be made by all levels of government, acting with professionals in the fields of social work, medicine, education, and the criminal justice system, to develop new approaches in dealing with child abuse.

I suggest the following list of priority items be looked into: (a) the problem of child abuse must be placed squarely in the public eye as a first step in a massive public education program; (b) the entire question of the legal position of the child and, in particular, his right to protective services must be made the subject of a major study—this is currently being done in the United States; (c) the potential roles and functions of all professions, agencies and levels of government in eradicating child abuse must be analyzed and evaluated; (d) every effort must be made to increase communication and diffusion of knowledge among interested persons, particularly professionals, and assistance must be given to voluntary groups, such as Parents Anonymous; (e) a comprehensive review of federal and provincial legislation governing the provision of protective services to children and rehabilitative services to parents, with a view to providing new legislation which will perform both functions effectively; (f) particular attention must be paid to the role of police forces—this is one glaring omission in the American literature which is available at this time, and I suspect it has its roots in the particular position into which the police forces in that country have been forced, as well as the traditional antipathy between law enforcement and social work; (g) the final main task will be to put all the pieces together.

This will be a truly massive undertaking, but one which must be tackled in co-ordination by all the agencies concerned.

What role can the Department of the Solicitor General play in this matter? First we should realize that our interest is from the viewpoint of law enforcement. Child abuse is a criminal offence and we are very much concerned because of the extensive commitment of the RCMP. Second, it seems apparent that the incarceration of child abusers is not the answer. The approach has to be one of diversion, one in which we are taking an active interest and in which we probably have as much expertise as any other agency in Canada. Third, it seems that a nationally co-ordinated mandatory reporting system will be required. The RCMP seems to be one of the very few agencies in Canada with the expertise to provide such a service.

What can we do to assist in the development of appropriate approaches to child abuse? We should recognize, first of all, that the main source of funding and expertise will have to come from other departments, and probably from other levels of government. I think the role of my own department would be limited to that of providing expertise on such subjects as the police, record-keeping and the dissemination of information, as well as in facilitating communication and consultation between the agencies, levels of government and individuals concerned with the problem.

Finally, by playing a leadership role, and encouraging study and discussion of the problem, particularly in the federal government, and by the formation of inter-governmental, multi-disciplinary task forces, we will be able to develop new approaches to the problem.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that I support the hon. member's motion and I would like to see it passed by the House before the end of the hour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) for having introduced such a motion and congratulate him for the the way he stood up for it, because I realize that this motion will be passed and I agree.

I am more particularly pleased because I listened carefully a while ago to the speech of the Solicitor General and I am happy to see that he also agrees. He has in a way laid down the line of conduct on which the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs may base its proceedings.

We have found that unfortunately, even if we live in a highly civilized country, there are still people who batter children in one way or another. I think that ways must be found to protect those children.

As the father of an average family of ten children, I think I can understand the motion of the hon. member, and this is why, together with my colleagues, I must use every possible means to prevent situations similar to that we were made aware of not a very long time ago when a child was confined in a closet. Neighbours called the police because of the nauseating smell which was emanating from the dwelling.

Such situations should not occur in civilized countries such as ours, and I feel that this is a good motion which should be adopted. The committee set up to examine these cases and others of child abuse or negligence may recommend the necessary proposals for the corrective means to prevent similar incidents from occurring again in the future.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me an opportunity to take part in the debate and my first words will be to assure my colleague who took the initiative of presenting the motion of my whole support.

I should like to make a few comments supplementary to the statement of the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand). As we know, Madam Speaker, the public is now and then made aware of cases of child abuse, either because cases are brought to court or still because some professional groups take the initiative of organizing symposiums on the matter. The last one we have been able to attend was the one held by the Criminology Institute of the University of Montreal and the Association of Women Graduates of the University of Montreal, on October 21 last. At that symposium, a brief was presented redefining the overall context of the problem we are discussing today. Previous speakers, mentioned the difficulty of determining the incidence of child abuse in our country each year.

Now, Claire Dutrisac, an editor for La Presse, wrote this in the issue of October 24, 1974, and I quote:

> In Quebec alone there are 1,800 abused children each year, children who are ill treated, beaten, underfed, dehydrated. In Montreal alone, there are 750 such children.

This demonstrates, Madam Speaker, how widespread this problem is. Another editor for a newspaper, the Montreal-Matin, said the following in the October 26, 1974 issue, and I quote:

> Every day, children aged from 2 months to 10 years are mutilated by parents who lie when a physician confronts them with their brutality and who evoke their privileges as parents in order to escape a justice which is inoperative in the case of these children.

Madam Speaker, the time has come for the government in co-operation with all hon. members to review all legislation in that field. I not not agree fully with the commissioners of the Canadian Conference on the Standardization of Legislation who broached the subject in August 1969 and concluded, having terminated their work, that one of the solutions lies in furthering the education of the public. Not that I maintain, Madam Speaker, that we should not do so, among other things, but I trust it will not be the sole means resorted to.

The government of the province of Quebec tabled a tentative Bill of Rights, which now carries the number 50 of the Quebec Legislative Assembly; clause 36 provides that:

Every child has a right to the protection and security that his family or the persons who replace it must ensure him.

Clause 44 of the same draft stipulates:

Illegal attack on a right or freedom recognized by this Charter entitles the victim to seek an end to the attack and reparation for resulting prejudice, moral or material.

Madam Speaker, the last work I have had a chance to consult is a volume published by the Canadian Mental Health Association. The book is entitled "In the Defence of Children's Rights". I quote from that volume because two of its articles, especially, are signed by persons who are well known in the field of social welfare. One of the co-signers, Mr. Claude Castonguay, formerly Social Affairs Minister in the Quebec government, writes on page 6, quote:

● (1640)

It is unthinkable that a battered child would remain at the mercy of those who mistreat him because the legislation does not provide enough security for those who might protect him.

All those points may appear interesting to citizens. The problem is their interest remains passive or transient.

And this is precisely where I wish to draw my colleague's attention. When the case of an abused child is brought to the courts—and I will come back to the last case examined by the courts of the province of Quebec, namely a judgment rendered November 12, 1974—tabloids seize that opportunity to publish scoops, report evidence and the judge's sentence, and a few weeks later the whole matter falls dead, until a new sensational case stirs up the emotions of the organizations concerned.

I believe the time has come for a complete revision of our philosophy on the child's fundamental rights, I quote another article from the same book by the Canadian Association for the Mentally retarded:

Dr. Eugene Brody, a professor in the Department of Psychiatry of the University of Maryland refers to the child's seven (7) fundamental rights as established by a United States Commission or joint Conference on the Mental Health of Children.

However, Madam Speaker, when one tries to find out at what time in history the rights of parents or their power over children were expressed, one has to go as far back as the history of roman law, of which I take the liberty of quoting a famous phrase:

Patria potestas in pietate debet non in atrocitate.

. . . in other words . . .

. . . (the power of parents must be exerciced with love and not cruelty)

I should like to point out to you, Madam Speaker, that that phrase did find its place in our legislation. Indeed, Criminal Code's Section 43 is essentially based upon this maxim. As you know, Section 43 reads as follows:

Every school teacher, parent or person standing in the place of a parent is justified in using force by way of correction toward a pupil or child, as the case may be, who is under his care, if the force does not exceed what is reasonable under the circumstances.

However, the legislator realized quickly that certain people in charge of children committed abuses repeatedly. This is why, Criminal Code's Section 200 stipulates that these offenses are punished.

However, Madam Chairman, we can easily see that Section 200 in its present form is inefficient. In fact, this article says:

Every one who unlawfully abandons or exposes a child who is under the age of ten years, so that its life is or is likely to be endangered or its health is or is likely to be permanently injured, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

However, Madam Chairman, we cannot ignore Section 204 which reads as follows:

Every one who by criminal negligence causes bodily harm to another person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

Yet, we have the ambiguous situation where a person who commits a criminal offense on a child is liable to a lesser penalty than one who commits the same criminal offense on an adult or a nubile person.

Madam Chairman, I think this is one of the facts that the committee should be instructed to investigate as it should study the necessity to revise the proposed bill on human rights which has already been mentioned during previous constitutional conferences, a bill that would contain specific provisions regulating the seven fundamental rights of the child mentioned by Professor Brody in his recent publication.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that since 1971, since such a motion was presented in the House for the first time, the Canadian provinces made progress in a way which allows us to hope that action in this area can be concerted between the federal and the provincial governments.

I take as an example bill 65 which was passed by the Quebec National Assembly in 1973, and which contains a section, Section 4, making it mandatory for anyone who is aware of an act of child's abuse to report the case to a Quebec court. Therefore, whether a parent, professor, baby sitter or teacher, any person aware of negligence toward a child must report the fact to a court of justice.

Let me refer also to the New Brunswick Child Welfare Act, under whose section 24 any person must report negligence toward a child. The same goes for section 49 of chapter 37 of Newfoundland statutes, whereby every person must report within seven days, any offence in this respect to the authority responsible for youth. The same applies in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

Madam Speaker, I believe this issue, in addition to being of concern to provinces, should also be brought to federal attention. I will conclude my remarks with the main features of a brief submitted by the Society of Criminology of the University of Montreal and the Association of Women Graduates in October last. The brief is interesting, Madam Speaker, to the extent it emphasizes prevention rather than repression. While it is easy to pity abused children, and especially when one considers instances of injuries to them and their lack of defence, I believe it is more important to act before violations are committed, and instruct future parents of their eventual role, so that they will not commit what we wish to prevent.

This brief by the Association of Women Graduates tells readers that the best way of preventing abuse is future parent education. It is said on page 9 of the brief that courses in parental responsibility should be given in schools. It is also stated that assistance should be given to parents, for instance, by public nurseries and family workers, to help them discharge their responsibilities.

Madam Speaker, we know that most delinquent parents are parents who either have broken bounds or whose home is very unsteady following the desertion or even the imprisonment of one of the spouses, or still parents in situations where one of the spouses indulges in the use of drugs or alcohol or fails in his or her task of properly running the household.

Madam Speaker, if the government can provide additional means to allow those parents to fulfill their roles by encouraging the setting up of a day care center system, by urging the provinces to do everything within their jurisdiction in this area, by promoting the establishment of family assistance services, we will make it possible for parents, who in other circumstances could leave their children on their own, to look after them.

I would also like, Madam Speaker, to mention an initiative that seems to me to be most innovative, that is the formation of mutual assistance groups for high risk parents. I think we know about the formation of groups to help anonymous alcoholics. They operate on about the same principles, that is people helping parents faced with those situations before they become delinquents. Those groups offer parents the necessary consultation and support services to prevent negligences from happening.

And I would like to bring to the attention of this House the existence of that society because I think it is an initiative that has not yet spread throughout the country and which deserves that kind of spreading that the Canadian Conference on the Standardization of Legislation mentioned in its report of 1969. That society, Madam Speaker, is called the "Société québécoise de protection de l'enfance et de la jeunesse." It is composed of parents whose purposes are to bring together and organize the services of people wanting to work on a voluntary basis to help and protect children and youth in the province of Quebec.

Its object is to provide means and services to children or families requesting them, while defending by all possible means the rights of children, of the young and of the family. Those parents are organized on a voluntary basis, there is a reception committee to take phone calls and reply to letters. A mobile team of men and women visit parents at home to advise them and help in the guidance of problem children or wayward or unamanageable children in a normal family and those teams provide homes whenever children have difficulties.

As you are aware, Madam Speaker, this is a relatively new public responsibility and I believe the work that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs will be able to do will lend an effective hand to this provincial service that was established in recent years.

It is a pleasure for me to support the motion of my colleague and to urge the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Allmand) to pursue his efforts to adjust our laws to the modern context.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion of the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul (Mr. Campbell) for concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications came into question some time ago, and, a time having been set aside for discussion thereof, the Chair has now had an opportunity to consider all the worthwhile contributions which have been made as to its procedural acceptability.

Hon. members will want to understand clearly that the difficulty arises from the fact that the committee had before it Bill S-11, a private bill dealing with the recapitalization of the British Columbia Telephone Company. Standing Order 91 requires the payment of fees prior to any consideration of such a bill by a standing committee. The fee varies according to the capital structure of the company and in this case involves some $200,000. In compliance with the Standing Order 91 the said sum was paid to the Clerk of the House while the bill was under consideration at second reading, and in further compliance with the Standing Order the Clerk of the House transferred the funds to the Receiver General upon the passage of the motion for second reading in order that the committee stage could proceed. The committee thereupon considered the bill and reported to the House in its third report the passage of the bill without amendment. On November 28, with one amendment upon unanimous consent, the bill was given third reading by the House.

Because there is a measure before the House to change the procedures applicable to this kind of recapitalization—Bill C-29, an act respecting Canadian business corporations—which would alter or eliminate such fees, the committee considered the question of the refund of the fees to the applicant corporation and in its second report, the subject matter of the motion under discussion, unanimously recommended that the fees be held in abeyance. The question, of course, is whether it is within the competence of a standing committee to make such a recommendation when its order of reference is a bill.

The governing citation is citation 304, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. There is, in the view of the Chair, no room for doubt or question about this citation and it has been reinforced on numerous occasions both in respect to bills and the study of estimates. A committee may only consider those matters which have been committed to it by the House and is bound by, and does not have liberty to depart from, the order of reference. It is equally clear that the recommendation contained in the report under discussion deals with the application of a Standing Order of the House and is totally outside the terms of the bill, and therefore, unless the arguments put forward by the distinguished chairman, the hon. member for LaSalle-Émard-Côte Saint-Paul, can persuade me otherwise, I would have to hold the report out of order.

● (1410)

I have carefully reread both citations referred to by the hon. member, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 304, and Bourinot's Fourth edition, at page 469, with particular attention to the two sentences emphasized by the hon. member, the first being:

Consequently, if a bill be referred to a select committee it will not be competent for that committee to go beyond the subject matter of its provision.

This first sentence seems to me directly to contradict the hon. member's argument and to support the principle outlined in Beauchesne's citation 304. The second sentence, "No such restrictions apply to committees on private bills . . .", refers not to the authority of the committee but to limitations by way of direction which may be contained in an order of reference, and therefore not applicable to the present circumstances.

The hon. member's reference to Bourinot at page 603 relates to a number of cases prior to the turn of the century, in which the committee to which the bill was referred, recommended the refund of the fee. Quite a number of examples were cited and I have taken the time to examine each one individually. The following conditions existed in every case which do not apply to the present circumstances. First, the Standing Order in respect to fees had been fully complied with. Second, the committee had completed consideration of the bill. Some special facts had come to light during committee stage, so that the bill was withdrawn or materially altered, or, in the alternative, the committee became aware of special circumstances in relation to the introduction of the bill; for example, the fact that the bill was not to the advantage of the proponent, but rather that it had been required by the operation of law. Then, and only then, did the committee recommend the refund on the basis of an existing circumstance or condition.

None of these relates to the present bill, and to hold that, by analogy, a committee could, prior to the passage of a bill, recommend the suspension of the Standing Orders as opposed to compliance with them on the basis of possible passage in the future of other legislation would, in my opinion, in the existing circumstances be a totally unwarranted distortion of these precedents. I should also add that these distinctions are consistent with present day requirements of Standing Order 99, that the refund motion cannot be moved until committee stage of the bill has been finalized.

The hon. member's reference to Bill C-104 in 1967 in respect of the Bell Telephone Company is clearly distinguishable, because in that case the standing committee had before it a bill which it could not consider by reason of Standing Order 91 unless the appropriate fees had been paid. The applicant had paid the fees in the previous session when the bill was introduced but not finalized, and the committee simply sought the direction of the House that the payment in the previous session would apply in respect to the bill before it. Having obtained such direction the committee then proceeded to consider the bill, a situation totally distinct from the one before us now.

In respect to the hon. member's reference to the Matador Pipe Line Bill C-16 in 1960, again the committee's recommendation was necessary for the calculation of the fees which were required to be paid as a condition precedent to consideration of the bill. It must also be noted that in that case the motion for concurrence was put in the House by unanimous consent, which, of course, eliminates any consideration of it as a precedent.

The hon. member makes two further suggestions. Firstly, he suggests there is no precedent for setting aside committee reports where this sort of difficulty exists. With due respect, I would refer the hon. member to citation 323 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition as well as a ruling of the previous Speaker, Speaker Lamoureux, as reported December 20, 1973 and March 24, 1970.

Secondly, the hon. member suggested that to rule against the acceptability of this report will deprive hon. members of their rightful opportunity to express themselves in committee deliberations, both in respect to legislation in general and on this particular suggestion of refund of fees in particular; but, with respect, I must disagree with both contentions. Hon. members can, of course, influence the terms of reference to the committees, and in any case have ample opportunity to express themselves on matters of legislation through the introduction of amendments.

In respect of this particular case, far from depriving hon. members of an opportunity to bring about a refund of the fees, it seems clear now that the bill has been passed that the proper procedures are envisaged in Section 16 of the Financial Administration Act and outlined in Standing Order 99. Whether the House would give its approval pending or upon passage of Bill C-29, there can be no doubt that the procedures exist for the necessary motion either now or at that time.

Accordingly, I must hold that the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, contained in its second report, is totally beyond the terms and provisions of Bill S-11 and, therefore, beyond the scope of its order of reference, and the motion for concurrence cannot be put.

[Mr. Speaker.]

IMMIGRATION

SUGGESTED EXCLUSION FROM CANADA OF ALEXANDER GRESKO—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that Alexander Gresko was deported from Great Britain as a high level Russian espionage agent in 1971, and currently serves as Russian liaison officer for the forthcoming Olympic games, and in view of the fact that the 1976 Olympics are being staged in this country, creating intensive security precautions, notwithstanding our own national security and that this incident has already gone so far as to offer this Soviet spy access to the Prime Minister's office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this government for the sake of national security be instructed to seriously consider declaring Alexander Gresko persona non grata and refusing him any further entry to this country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SPECIAL ORDER RELATING TO ALLOTTED DAY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose first of announcing a change in the business for today and, secondly, to propose a special order relating to the business tomorrow.

Today the first business will be the resumption of consideration in committee of the whole of Bill C-32, the petroleum administration bill. At 8 p.m., because of the necessary absence from the House of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), on government business we will call Bill S-12, an act to amend the Immigration Act.

Tomorrow, as the House knows, is an allotted day. Following discussions among House leaders it has been agreed that the day should be devoted, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested, to the consideration of the question of conflict of interest, following more or less the lines of the motion which is now on the order paper. However, I propose a small change in that proposed reference to meet the views of hon. members of the House, in that the reference should be to the Committee on Privileges and Elections rather than to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Accordingly, I propose the following special order:

That the Green Paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest" tabled on November 27, 1974, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; and

That, after the committee has concluded its deliberations and submitted its report on the aforementioned matter, it be authorized to consider and make recommendations upon the subject-matter of ministers and conflict of interest and public servants and conflict of interest.

That any question or questions necessary to dispose of the said motion and any amendments thereto be put at 9.45 p.m., December 10, 1974;

That, immediately following the disposal of the said motion, the House proceed to the consideration and disposal of any motion or motions and bill or bills based thereon with regard to the business of Supply in the same manner as if December 10, 1974 had been an ordinary allotted day pursuant to Standing Order 58;

That for the period ending March 26, 1975 there be eight allotted days pursuant to Standing Order 58;

And that the Order of the Day "Government Business, number 7" appearing on page 10 of the Order Paper today be discharged.

● (1420)

That is the special order. I can perhaps explain the final paragraph by saying that the reference which appears as No. 7 does refer to a reference to another standing committee and that is why it must be discharged.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and the order is acceptable to us. I think I should supplement the rather grudging expression of gratitude to the opposition that the minister has made by saying that in order to facilitate the business of the House Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition has lent tomorrow to the government and has deferred one of the opposition days until the next semester. I thought the House should understand that in our anxiety to see the proper business of this country proceed we have agreed to this course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion as read out by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) does represent the points on which we agreed. We are, therefore, prepared to support the motion. I wonder if there is a slight oversight in the next to last paragraph in that it adds an eighth day to the next period but does not take one away from the current period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would presume it is not possible to take any more days away from the current period because it ends tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, the arguments of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp), and the essence of the motion, are precisely what the four parties have agreed upon. Consequently, we respect the agreement.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House will understand that for several reasons such a motion can be made at this time only with unanimous consent of the HOuse. I would ask therefore, does the House agree to the terms and conditions of this motion and is it to be so ordered.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Order Paper Questions

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

[Text]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 15, 148, 187, 305, 345, 359, 405, 406, 409, 443, 444, 548, 608, 624, 659, 664, 679, 685, 718, 726, 774, 795, 796 and 849.

Mr. Speaker, if question No. 8 and starred question No. 197 could be made orders for return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR SUPPORT OF RELATIVES OUTSIDE OF CANADA

Question No. 15—Mr. Reynolds:

Is it possible for Canadian residents to send money out of Canada to support relatives and deduct this money from income before calculating their tax payable and, if so (a) how much can they send (b) what is the maximum amount deductible (c) what proof is there that the money actually leaves Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Yes. (a) There is no limit on the amount that a taxpayer may send out of the country to support a person but there is a limit on the amount he may claim as a personal exemption in respect of that person. (b) The deduction is limited to the amount actually expended in support or if the dependant is under 16 years of age, $300 less one-half his net income, if any, in excess of $1,100, or, if the dependant is 16 years of age or over, $550 less his net income in excess of $1,150. (c) The act does not specify what proof of payment is required. However, the act does provide the general authority that a taxpayer wishing to claim a deduction from his income must be prepared to substantiate his claim with receipts or vouchers. The department has administrative rules that require a taxpayer claiming an exemption in respect of a non-resident dependant, to complete and attach to his income tax return, form T1E-N.R. This form stipulates that the taxpayer must submit as proof of support cancelled cheques, bank funds transfer receipts, bills, receipts or other documentary evidence of cash remittance or value of parcels sent directly to the dependant and not an intermediary third party.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of National Revenue): Departmental personnel records indicate that in 1973: (a) 901; (b) 33; (c) One.

Order Paper Questions

REVENUE FOR FUTURE INCOME TAXES AS REPORTED BY CORPORATIONS IN CANADA

Question No. 187—Mr. Orlikow:

What reserves for future income taxes have corporations set aside since 1968 as reported to the Department of National Revenue or Statistics Canada and shown up to 1968 in their reports on Corporation Financial Statistics?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The reserve for future income taxes as reported by corporations in Canada (excluding insurance carriers, co-operatives, crown corporations and tax exempt corporations) and as defined in "Corporation Financial Statistics" for years 1968 to 1971, the latest year available, were as follows:

	Reserve for future income taxes	Increase
	$000,000
1968	2,700
1969	3,214	434
1970	3,658	444
1971	4,172	524

NUMBER OF COMPANIES IN OKANAGAN BOUNDARY CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 305—Mr. Whittaker:

1. What is the estimated number of companies or industries in the constituency of Okanagan Boundary?

2. What is the approximate division of this investment capital?

3. (a) In what areas is the foreign investment (b) what are the estimated amounts of these investments?

4. How do these figures compare (a) with those 1968 to 1974 inclusive (b) to that of surrounding areas in British Columbia?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. The estimate of manufacturing establishments in the constituency of Okanagan Boundary in 1971 (the latest year for which data are available) is 170, as compared to 3,302 for the province of British Columbia.

2, 3 and 4. Statistics Canada cannot provide answers to these questions as immense quantities of time would be required to provide this information which is not readily available. Moreover, prior to 1971, British Columbia district boundaries, which are used as coding boundaries for statistical records, do not match well with the electoral district of Okanagan Boundary and therefore it would be difficult to make an estimate of manufacturing establishments prior to 1971 within the electoral district.

4. Were any complaints against the proposed phase-out of the consumer milk subsidy directed to the Minister of Agriculture by the Nova Scotia Minister of Agriculture and Marketing at the federal-provincial conference of Agriculture Ministers held in Winnipeg, Manitoba?

Has the Government of the Province of Quebec requested and obtained financial participation by the government in the construction of the Authier-Nord-Joutel road in Abitibi and, if so, in what amount?

CMHC—RESEARCH MONEY TO BUILDING EXPERIMENTAL SOLAR HOUSES

Question No. 409—Mr. Johnston:

Return tabled.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had on the order paper for some length of time, approximately two months, certain questions in respect of the appointment of Mr. Michael Pitfield, certain questions in respect of Mr. Ivan Head, certain questions in respect of the Prime Minister's personal and political travels at public expense and also questions in respect of the operation in general of the Prime Minister's office. I feel that after a period of two months I am justified in rising on a point of order to ask why this information is delayed and whether the parliamentary secretary will give some assurance that it will be forthcoming shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before commencing the oral question period may I say that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) has given the Chair notice of his intention to make a correction in Hansard relating to an answer the minister made on Friday last in which the minister I think made reference to one member and intended to refer to another.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Prime Minister who was unavoidably absent from the House in the last few days. Is he now prepared to recommend an independent inquiry regarding charges of intimidation and violence with respect to the SIU, and also with regard to the handling of these matters by the federal government? Is he prepared to recommend such an inquiry in view of the specific allegations, and accusations that have now been made and indeed telecast to the nation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I am not aware of the specific allegations and accusations that the Leader of the Opposition talks about which have been broadcast to the nation. I have consulted with the House leader, who was Acting Prime Minister during my absence, and I stand completely by the statements he made on the matter of an investigation on Wednesday or Thursday of last week.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the obvious truth in what was said, I think last week, by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands regarding the importance of the government not only being honest but appearing to be honest and the importance of the government being so regarded in the country, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what action his government intends to take to deal with these charges, with the charge, for example, that was repeated and asserted on the national network last evening that a member of the government was in the pocket of the SIU.

Mr. Trudeau: I must confess that I was not listening to the national network last night. I do not know who made the charge; I do not know whether that person is worthy of testifying before the House. I do not know if the Leader of the Opposition himself supports that charge.

Mr. Stanfield: It is not a question of whether or not I support the charge.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. Stanfield: I am very concerned about the situation.

An hon. Member: Make the charge.

Mr. Stanfield: A very serious charge has been made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What charge?

Mr. Stanfield: A charge has been made casting a very heavy cloud over the government. There is absolutely no use in members opposite asking me to make a charge. I do not intend to make a charge. That is not my responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Stanfield: But it is my responsibility to press the government to clear up these matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—ACTION OF MINISTER OF LABOUR WITH REGARD TO STATEMENTS ON TELEVISION PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. I want to say to him quite frankly that I thought the program went too far. Is it the minister's intention to proceed against the network for defamation of character.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I can only advise the Leader of the Opposition that I have developed and am developing a transcript of the program. I have not decided as of now what action I might take.

● (1430)

I might advise the Leader of the Official Opposition when he quotes a particular charge repeated in the newspaper this morning about the minister in the SIU's pocket—with reference to the importance of that, I think it was last Wednesday night in the Ontario legislature that Dr. Shulman said I was not the minister in the SIU's pocket, so I do not know which unreliable source the Leader of the Opposition is relying upon.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. I just want to assure the hon. Minister of Labour that I am basing my question on what I saw and heard on the national network last night.

An hon. Member: Hearsay!

Mr. Stanfield: I am very anxious to know what measures the government is going to take to clear up the matter or failing action of the government, what action the minister himself is going to take?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that in my own terms I have noticed such a great deal of innuendo, implication and total irrelevancies being played up to such a high degree that I just do not know what action to take. I just hope the type of conduct that seems so prevalent in some quarters will not be repeated in this House.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

PROPRIETY OF DONATION BY SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION TO CAMPAIGN OF MINISTER OF LABOUR—FAILURE TO CONSULT PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister indicate if it meets standards acceptable to him for a member of his cabinet to accept campaign funds from the Seafarers' International Union, the operations of which come under his jurisdiction bearing in mind that the SIU, a subject of controversy for 25 years has in the past year been the subject of renewed controversy including criminal charges having been laid, litigation having been instituted alleging irregular union election activities and many other such allegations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what allegation the hon. member supports. If he wants to make some allegation let him do it.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's answer I should like to direct a further question to him. In view of the statement of the Minister of Labour last Wednesday that he returned the campaign funds donated to him by the SIU because he thought and I quote: "It might be misunderstood if I kept this particualr contribution" and in view of the Prime Minister's statement last December 18 that "A minister has an obligation to seek advice of the Prime Minister on any matter concerning a conflict of interest in which he may be in doubt", and in view of the statement of the Minister of Labour last Wednesday that he had not sought such advice from the Prime Minister, would the Prime Minister indicate if he has asked for an explanation from the Minister of Labour as to why the minister felt there was sufficient doubt that he should return the contribution to the SIU but did not feel in sufficient doubt to consult the Prime Minister on whether there was in the Prime Minister's mind a possible conflict of interest?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in this party campaign funds are received by various members of parliament and ministers. Some of them choose not to receive and accept funds, others do. I am surely not going to call to account every member of my party who refuses to accept funds from some particular group.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In his reply to the Leader of the Official Opposition the Prime Minister asked for specific charges. In my question I should like to refer the Prime Minister to seven specific assault charges which have been laid against members of the SIU and ask if he learned of these specific charges and in particular, in light of a quote that is attributed to the Solicitor General of the province of Ontario that "sufficient evidence of assault and violence and intimidation" exists to justify a full public inquiry into SIU activity, I would ask if he does not feel that a public inquiry is required into this situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely the hon. member is talking of different types of charges than the Leader of the Opposition was in his question to me earlier in the House. He is talking about charges of violence. My understanding is that the Ontario police and the metropolitan police of Toronto are making investigations into that to find if there is enough evidence to file an information and lay charges. I have had no report on that.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is only partly correct.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: If hon. members would just listen to the question. The question which I put last Wednesday and subsequent questions put by other members of my party on Thursday and Friday referred specifically to the charges of union violence which led Dr. Shulman originally to make his charge. It was to investigate that matter in particular, but by no means exclusively, that we were suggesting a public inquiry was necessary. The Prime Minister has indicated today that he understands that the provincial police and other law enforcement agencies of the province of Ontario are investigating these questions. The conclusion reached by the Solicitor General of the province is that the evidence they have warrants a public inquiry. In view of that judgment what is the Prime Minister's position?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is the same as that expressed by the House leader and the Acting Prime Minister some days ago, that the responsible police of the province and metropolitan area of Toronto are making inquiries into these specific charges: This is my understanding. We have not had a report from them, though I understand the Deputy Minister of Justice is writing to the Ontario government asking if there are any facts or material that should be known to us. I have had no request yet from the Ontario government to make any inquiry. I am trusting them and their police services to find the facts on this. I hope if they do find some that reveal a possibility of criminal action they will lay an information and do what their duty is to take this matter to the criminal courts. It is only if they report failure, that they are unable to do anything and feel very strongly that the only way to get at the facts would be by a public inquiry held by the federal government rather than them, that I would consider this matter.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary. It is my understanding that such a formal request is now being prepared by the government of Ontario. I want to get it perfectly clear from the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that the SIU is a federally chartered union with headquarters in Montreal, and operating in more than one province, if he gets such a serious and formal request from the government of Ontario will he make a decision to have a public inquiry?

An hon. Member: He does not choose to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will know, as other hon. members do, that to ask any minister a question on what he will do if something happens in future is hypothetical and outside the scope of the question period.

An hon. Member: What he will do is duck.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, one further supplementary. Given the importance of this and simply to get clarification from the Prime Minister, would he inform the House what in his view are the conditions necessary to induce this government to take some public action on this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that could take 100 pages. There are all kinds of conditions—if the province of Ontario were unable to discharge its duties, if the attorney general of Ontario were unable to find facts, if the police were incompetent in finding facts. There are all kinds of reasons which might cause us to want to make a public inquiry. Surely, the hon. member cannot ask me to enumerate all the reasons in advance of something that might happen and what we would do if something happens.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID TO QUEBEC POLICE FORCES—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Last night, on the national news bulletin of the CBC, I heard, like all those who were listening, that the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada is a hypocrite, a liar, that he is hiding behind the Solicitor General of Canada with regard to the claims of the province of Quebec on the use of the Quebec provincial police, for which the province is asking a federal contribution of some $450 million. Since last night, or even before, has the Prime Minister been in touch with the Quebec Minister of Justice and could he tell us what progress has been made in those talks?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall first of all have to check to see if the allegations repeated by the Social Credit leader were in fact made over the CBC network. I know nothing of what was said but I shall look into the matter; I do hope the language used by the hon. member was not in fact used by a minister of the Crown.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RETIREMENT OF FOUR DEPUTY MINISTERS—USE OF MERIT PRINCIPLE IN APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSORS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the appointment and dismissal of deputy ministers comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Prime Minister, will the Prime Minister advise the House what he knows of the circumstances which caused four deputy ministers, two of whom are the most senior and important in the whole of the civil service, to decide simultaneously that the atmosphere in which they are working is such that they prefer early retirement.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the allegation as repeated by the hon. member is false.

Mr. Hees: Seeing the Prime Minister refuses to answer that straightforward question—

Mr. Trudeau: I said it is false.

Mr. Hees: Will the Prime Minister advise the House if the merit principle will prevail in the appointment of successors to these four deputy ministers who are resigning or will proximity to the Prime Minister be the overriding factor as the Prime Minister continues to supplant very able men by his own palace guard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member is again misinformed. By order in council we appoint meritorious people. However, we do not follow the merit principle that applies to the Civil Service Act and not order in council appointments.

Mr. Hees: Will the Prime Minister then advise the House if the appointment of Mr. Michael Pitfield was simply on his own whim rather than following the merit principle.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it was made because of his very great merit. I would not say as much about the merit of the person who was elected by the Prince Edward-Hastings electorate.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REASON FOR DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO EMPLOYEES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It concerns the strike against the British Columbia Railway. Can the minister advise the House why the Unemployment Insurance Commission has refused to pay benefits to 2,000 workers who do not belong to the shopcraft unions that are on strike and who are not on strike themselves, but who are prepared to work and who are in fact laid off by the railway company?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will inform myself of the details and report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise why an incident that took place before the present legal strike commenced on November 21 is being used as an excuse by the minister's officials in British Columbia to deny these 2,000 non-striking workers their benefits?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I presume the same answer will apply.

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt about the nature of the hon. member's question. Possibly the information ought to be sought in some other way. This is a strong request to the minister to give in this chamber a legal interpretation of the right of applicants for benefits under unemployment insurance legislation. I feel very clearly the minister ought not be required to do that in this chamber in answer to a question.

Mr. Fraser: In view of the gravity of the situation, Mr. Speaker, can I ask the minister to tell us now if he is going to take immediate and personal steps to intervene in this situation so that these men can get their benefits and get them quickly. The economy of the whole area covered by the B.C. Railway is now in great jeopardy.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I note the hon. member's concern. As I indicated earlier, I will fully acquaint myself with this situation. I will not commit myself to intervene unless that is clearly the proper mode for me to adopt. However, I will inform myself and advise the hon. member of the facts and the consequences.

UNITED STATES IMPORT QUOTAS ON HOGS—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the virtual cessation of exports as a result of hog quotas with very low prices in certain categories of heavy hogs, is there any possibility of pork quotas being lifted between Canada and the United States in the immediate future?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that discussions are still going on at this time.

USE OF NAVAL VESSELS IN SURVEILLANCE OF EAST COAST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fisheries). Is the minister's department making funds available to the Department of National Defence so they can continue to use Canadian destroyers on coastal surveillance, particularly at this critical time of over-fishing?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the hon. member that other vessels of National Defence will be designated for fisheries patrol duties as a piggyback operation to normal duties. I also wish to point out that at least three vessels of the Fisheries and Marine Service have undertaken over 250 boardings in the past year. Therefore, there has been continuing patrolling over the past months.

Mr. McGrath: Will the minister report on the press conference in Halifax today regarding the course of the Canadian destroyer Annapolis as to whether that ship will again be used in the immediate future for this type of surveillance?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will have to await information on this press conference. I know that the crew of the vessel was very enthusiastic about the work they undertook. The forces have expressed willingness to again carry out this operation and I very much hope they will do so.

USE OF NAVAL VESSELS FOR SURVEILLANCE ON WEST COAST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State in charge of Fisheries.

Can he tell us if he intends to introduce a similar system on the west coast of Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I think that would be a very good idea. We would have to see, however, if the rules contained in the international agreements that govern that deep-sea area allow us to designate military ships as we do within the North Atlantic Council. If that is possible, I do not see why we could not do it.

NATURAL RESOURCES

THETFORD MINES—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL FINANCIAL AID FOR RECONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Following the fire which last night devastated the King Beaver asbestos mining facilities in Thetford Mines, in the province of Quebec, could the minister advise the House whether his department intends to financially help reconstruct this industry which was employing 1,000 workers who are unemployed today?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have already had conversations with the hon. member for Frontenac concerning the Thetford Mines disaster. I have asked my officials to conduct an investigation with the provincial government and the company to ascertain the circumstances of this fire. There exists at present a shortage of asbestos on world markets. This is a disaster for Canadian producers and it is of national interest to rebuild this very important plant immediately. The federal government is therefore willing to help as much as possible to rebuild these facilities.

HAITIANS—ALLEGED INVITATION TO SEND CANADIAN SURVEILLANCE COMMISSION TO HAITI

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since some ten days ago, Mr. Lavigne of Montreal returned from Haiti and confirmed that the president of that country had invited the Canadian government to send a supervisory commission if the Haitians were deported to their country, is the minister in a position to tell us whether he has received such an invitation from the Haitian president and if so, what is the decision taken by the minister in that connection?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is the minister willing to make a statement soon, so that we may know what has happened about the final decision of the Canadian government concerning the Haitians who are about to be deported.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have made many statements on this subject. The situation has not changed.

ALLEGED UNAUTHORIZED PAYMENTS TO PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE FIELD MEN—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Agriculture. I ask it with the knowledge of the quick action of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in responding to a request for an inquiry in the province of Quebec. Would the minister take personal note of the disturbing events in the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the west? I am referring specifically to unauthorized payments for field men during the election period, information about which the hon. member for Red Deer has in his possession. In view of these disturbing developments, would the minister consider asking Mr. Howard Riddell, who was for 14 years the head of PFAA and who is now working for the Department of Municipal Affairs in Saskatchewan and who has the confidence of the farmers, and who is well known for his honesty and integrity, to come back and check out this very smelly situation?

● (1450)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I do not know what the situation is, but I will certainly check on it and ascertain what the facts are.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I believe the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Williams, is retiring very shortly. Perhaps the minister might consider, when he is checking the situation out, that this might be a very good job for him to look after, because he, too, I think, has the confidence of the farmers out there.

ENERGY

OIL—UNITED STATES POSITION ON REDUCTION OF EXPORTS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Last week, in the right hon. gentleman's discussion with President Ford during which there was general agreement there would be no trade war between the United States and Canada, was the Prime Minister able to get a specific assurance from President Ford that there would be no response on the part of the United States government to Canada's decision to reduce the rate of export of oil to that country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Certainly, the President did not indicate there would be any strong reaction, nor did he indicate to the contrary. He was interested in the explanations, the motivation, which led us to a certain position. He seemed prepared to consider them after they had been explained to him, and that was the essential purpose of my visit, not to get any strong undertaking at that particular time but to make sure he understood Canada's good reasons for doing certain things.

SYNCRUDE PROJECT—POSSIBLE FEDERAL PURCHASE OF ATLANTIC RICHFIELD INTEREST

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the federal government initiated any negotiations regarding the purchase of the Atlantic Richfield interest in Syncrude? Specifically, are negotiations being conducted, or have negotiations been conducted, between the federal government and Atlantic Richfield, between the federal government and the Alberta government, or between the federal government and other participants in the consortium?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I met on Friday afternoon with the Alberta ministers of the environment and of mines and minerals. At that meeting we discussed the ARCO decision with regard to the Syncrude project. I expressed the interest of the federal government in supporting the government of Alberta in financial terms in order to make sure that the Syncrude project kept going. I indicated, of course, that federal participation would be subject to the approval of the Alberta government.

At a later time I met with one of the other partners in the Syncrude project to obtain confirmation of the decision made by ARCO and to obtain information as to the situation in which the project now finds itself. I have asked my officials to keep in close contact with Syncrude officials so that we can be better informed of the facts concerning that project and be in a better position to determine what assistance the federal government could possibly render if, indeed, this were found acceptable by the government of Alberta.

Mr. Symes: My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that if a decision is made to provide federal funds or other assistance to the Syncrude project to ensure that tar sands oil is available to us in the early 1980s, the federal government will take equity in the project proportional to the financial assistance made available?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I take the question as a representation and I will consider it.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Can the minister tell us whether a decision has been taken about the construction of the oil pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Cabinet took a decision on this and we are having negotiations with Interprovincial Pipeline Limited.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Since it has been announced that there will be no oil left in the west when the oil pipeline is ready for operation and given the cost of such a pipeline, does the minister think such capital investment is justified?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we think that in the near future, as well as in the distant future, such a pipeline will be to the benefit of Canada, particularly as regards the security of the Montreal market.

ATHABASCA OIL SANDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE CONTINUED DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to that asked by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. It is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the withdrawal of Atlantic Richfield is the second major set-back suffered in connection with this project—Atlantic Richfield is the second major company to withdraw from this project to develop the Athabasca tar sands—and since the reason for the withdrawals in both cases is vacillation in government policy and economic instability as far as the petroleum industry is concerned, can the minister tell us what steps, if any, he is planning to take in order to bring about a feeling of confidence in this area as it relates to government policy to ensure that development does not stop?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Neither the decision of Shell Explorer nor the decision of ARCO was taken for the reasons stated by the hon. member. The decision of ARCO was taken in the light of the cash position in which the company finds itself because of its involvement in the Alyeska Pipeline project resulting in the cancellation of a number of other projects including one involving oil shale in the United States. It was obviously decided to give higher priority to Alyeska. The Shell Explorer decision was reached specifically because of the decision not to permit the export of Canadian oil unless surplus to Canadian requirements. I think that is a sound policy; it is one which we on this side of the House, at least, support.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT OF STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES CONCERNING ALBERTA MINISTERS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Speaking in Regina only last week, the right hon. gentleman said:

> If we are to remain strong as a country, federal-provincial differences will have to be hammered out on the basis of a fundamental belief in the other fellow's honesty.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he considers the statements made in this House on Thursday night by the Minister of Energy that Premier Lougheed is acting in a vicious way and that the remarks of the interprovincial affairs minister, Mr. Don Getty, were dripping with venom, are in harmony with his plea for goodwill on both sides?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Frankly, what I had in mind was the kind of allegation made by the other side, particularly the allegation that we had acted in bad faith in connection with this matter. I find that very poor—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—POSSIBLE REQUEST OF PRIME MINISTER TO SEE RCMP INTERIM REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and it refers back to the subject of the SIU. Did the right hon. gentleman ask to see the interim report of the RCMP investigation concerning the Minister of Labour and, if so, what action has he taken as a result of that report?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As is customary, the Solicitor General reported to me on investigations which are going on, particularly when there are allegations which involve ministers of my cabinet. He made me aware of this preliminary or interim report.

Oral Questions

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—RESPONSIBILITY FOR INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED IMPROPRIETY OF MINISTERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Is the Prime Minister leaving to the RCMP the responsibility to conduct an inquiry into the question of the propriety of conduct of ministers of the Crown in matters relating to the SIU? If not, who is responsible for any inquiry that might be undertaken into the question of the propriety of the actions of ministers of the Crown in this matter?

● (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not up to the police to determine questions of inquiry, or even, for that matter, I believe to determine ultimate prosecution. It is up to the police to discover the facts. They are looking into the facts on the basis of some allegations which were made. I believe that this is the type of inquiry which, at the request of the Department of Labour, the Solicitor General has set up, and the police are looking into these facts. It was on the basis of this type of inquiry by the police that a preliminary report was made to me by the Solicitor General.

SUGGESTED INDEPENDENT INQUIRY TO PROTECT INTEGRITY OF FORCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that section 5 of the RCMP Act gives control and management of the force to the commissioner, who, however, is, if I may quote the wording, "under the direction of the minister"—that is, the Solicitor General—and in light of the fact that the Solicitor General has an obvious personal involvement in the SIU matter and in fact is one of those singled out in the interim report, I ask the Prime Minister whether, if for no other reason, he does not consider the protection of the integrity of the RCMP sufficiently important as to order an independent inquiry, so that the RCMP is not put in the untenable position of investigating the Solicitor General, under whose direction it operates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is a long standing practice in the RCMP if they are investigating ministers—and I believe this practice must have existed in the days when the Conservatives formed the government—that the commissioner or his representative makes me aware of any such representations against ministers. If it is found—and certainly this is hypothetical—that there is in some way involvement of ministers, then it is reported to me, as I am sure would have been the case in the time of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The Solicitor General is rising on a question of privilege. I listened carefully to the question of the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot to see whether or not there might be some awkwardness to the situation in which the RCMP finds itself, but I failed to hear any allegation that would in any way give rise to a question of privilege on the part of the Solicitor General. However, I am prepared to listen to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, since last week I checked the section in the RCMP act referred to, and which has been referred to several times by the opposition, and I found that the section was written at a time when the Minister of Justice was responsible for the RCMP, and he was also the attorney general in charge of prosecutions. As the hon. member might know, in 1966 a new department of the Solicitor General was set up whereby he answers for the RCMP in the House of Commons and the Minister of Justice, who is still the Attorney General of Canada, is in charge of prosecutions. So that the section referred to by the hon. member, and which, as I say, has been referred to by others, really no longer applies today in the way it did when the act was written.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the Prime Minister; I will make no comment on the question of privilege that has been raised. In light of the Solicitor General's statements, both in this House and elsewhere, describing the character and integrity of Mr. Shulman, and whether such statements are accurate or otherwise, I ask the Prime Minister, in regard to an investigation of the SIU, whether it is not government policy that such investigation must clearly be void of any suggestion whatever of partiality or bias or lack of independence. Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister whether he does not consider an independent inquiry the only means of assuring this appearance of impartiality and lack of bias?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we are back to the earlier confusion between the two types of inquiry; at least I must confess I am confused. I am not sure whether the question refers to an inquiry into the violence perpetrated, or allegedly perpetrated, by the SIU, or an inquiry into the alleged misconduct of a minister on this side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am sure the hon. member does not need any help in asking his question, but if he would clarify that point I might be able to come out of my state of confusion and give him an answer.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, may I put a final supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that it is becoming obviously more and more difficult to sever these problems, I simply ask the Prime Minister, since in the interim report there is mention by the RCMP of the minister under whose direction the force operates—the legislation uses the clearest possible terms in that regard—and in order to protect the integrity of the RCMP and to give the hallmark necessary to every investigation of lack of bias and impartiality, whether it is not government policy, at the precise moment when the matter arises, to order an independent inquiry into such a serious matter as allegations involving the SIU, whether it be the violence allegations or the contributions allegations?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, surely the violence allegation has nothing to do with the Solicitor General; there is no reason to suppose that he is involved in that matter. If they do have to do with questions of integrity, then I explained in my first answer what was the policy of the government and the practice of the RCMP when they are investigating a minister—

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Tell us about Edgar Benson and CMHC.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I see the opposition is really not trying to get to the bottom of this.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION CONCERNING VETERANS HOUSING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister say when he will be introducing legislation respecting veterans housing to take the place of the Veterans' Land Act, as promised by the government during the debate on November 5 and 6?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before, there has been some study by the government of this question, and in particular by my department and the Department of Urban Affairs, which has progressed quite well and we shall be reporting to the House at an early date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which relates to the fact that the right to make applications under the Veterans' Land Act will expire on March 31, 1975. Will the new legislation be ready by that date?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I feel that whatever is going to be done will be made known before then. I am not endeavouring to leave the impression that it will be in the form of legislation.

HERMANN REPORT—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the fact that the Hermann report was delivered to the government in October 1973 and tabled some 14 months later, would the minister advise the House whether he has now considered the preparation of the motion to refer the report to the veterans affairs committee, and has he discussed the matter with the leader of the government in this House so that this matter can be attended to at the earliest?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, regarding the hon. member's reference to when the report was made available, I should like to say that when it was first made available to the government it had to be re-edited by the individual who wrote it, as well as translated and printed. This is why I bring to the attention of the House—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was mostly figures that had to be translated.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I want to give some reasons, sir, if you would be prepared to listen for a moment, why the report took considerable time, and I can convey further information to you at a later date. With regard to referring the report to the veterans affairs committee, I have discussed the matter with the House leader. I have also received correspondence from veterans organizations across Canada, which has also been received by the veterans affairs critic on the Conservative side as well as the House leaders of the other parties. Veterans affairs associations have requested us not to advance too rapidly with this report in the committee to give them sufficient time to make a study of the matter before they appear before the committee. We have agreed to do this, with the agreement of other House leaders.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—SUGGESTED DISCONTINUANCE OF PRACTICE OF GIVING MINISTERS ADVANCE INFORMATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce what sort of raw information he can give us on the unemployment figures due to come out tomorrow?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I cannot enlighten the hon. gentleman at all as I have not been enlightened myself.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give the House the assurance that this very, to use conservative language, questionable practice of giving certain ministers advance information about the consumer price index figures and other things, before presentation to the public and to the House, has been stopped? Can he assure us that this questionable or perhaps even nefarious practice has ceased?

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FOR ALLEGED DENIAL TO MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT OF TAPES OF PROGRAM RELATING TO SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State perhaps I might direct my question to the Acting Secretary of State. Last week the CBC radio carried a national broadcast on its program "As it Happens" relating to the SIU controversy, including interviews with the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General. This morning a request from a member of parliament for the transcript of those broadcasts was denied by the director of parliamentary services for the CBC, but the director promised to provide the tapes of the broadcast. Later the CBC phoned back to say that the tapes would not be forthcoming. Since the request for the tapes was originally granted, and since requests in the past for CBC tapes have always been met without reservation, can the Acting Secretary of State enlighten the House as to the sudden reversal? Was there a sudden change in CBC policy, or is it just in this specific case that the government has given orders to the CBC that it should not turn over the tapes?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, that is a question of some complexity, judging at least by its wording.

I must recognize that I have not been aware of any fact since, unfortunately, I came back only yesterday night from a trip abroad. However, I would be very glad to transmit the question of the hon. member to the minister who, in turn, can ask the CBC. But I can immediately assure him that it has never been a practice of the government to give any instruction whatsoever to the corporation or to keep secret or reveal anything and that, furthermore, had the government done so, the corporation would not have complied with such instructions.

[English]

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact the tapes were originally promised and then denied, can the minister advise if the reason these tapes are not available is that they have been called for by the RCMP?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I do not know that, Mr. Speaker. I do know that following the allegations in the statement Mr. Shulman made on that broadcast I requested transcripts of what was said, and they were given to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: I will be glad to give anybody in this House a copy of the transcripts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: If the hon. member or anybody else wants a copy I will be glad to give him one. I issued no instructions to them. I merely asked for a transcript and they gave it to me. I do not know whether the RCMP approached them.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact the Solicitor General has just advised that he received transcripts of the tapes, will the right hon. gentleman instruct the CBC immediately this afternoon to treat all members of parliament with the same courtesy, and to turn the transcripts over to any member of parliament who requests those tapes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know on what authority I could instruct the CBC to do that. I will certainly take note of the suggestion by the Tory party that I should be giving instructions to the CBC.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Following the Prime Minister's answer to my question earlier, I tried to catch Your Honour's attention for a supplementary question. I did so because the Prime Minister somewhere in his answer said that he did not consider the remarks by the energy minister in respect of Premier Lougheed and Mr. Getty to be conducive to goodwill. I want to point out to this House that this name calling is on the front pages of newspapers all across Canada, particularly in the west, and is hurting the climate for negotiation in respect of the energy question, with the result that people in Canada are suffering. In view of the fact that we perhaps all say things in the House that we later regret, I would ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he would like to apologize for referring to Premier Lougheed as "vicious", and Mr. Getty as "dripping with venom"?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, on this same point of order, I must tell the hon. member that if he wants to know the nature of my thoughts, the person I had in mind who had used expressions of bad faith was the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member's leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker. I just want to assure the Prime Minister that I will be coming back with the same charge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He will find it difficult for his backbenchers to object to this kind of language, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Thursday, December 5, consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Penner in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege as I was not able to obtain an answer to the question I directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As we are resuming the discussion this afternoon of Bill C-32, I challenge the minister to apologize to Premier Lougheed and Mr. Getty for the remarks he made, so that our discussion can be conducted in a climate of good will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, when I called it ten o'clock last Thursday evening I was examining the implications of part III of this bill, which uses language that I find extraordinary. I think it would be permissible briefly to review some of the arguments I had put forward.

This is only the fifth instance of language of this sort being used in any federal legislation. With respect to the four other instances, the first was the Fisheries Act, which we can understand because it has to do with pollution, pollution control and a resource which goes beyond the control of the provinces; the second was the Nuclear Liability Act, which has to do with matters in which the federal government is involved as a result of international arrangements—here again, the binding nature of that legislation is understandable—and the third instance was in relation to international river improvement. This related to the fact that a person might improve or do damage to a river that could result in damage across the border. The responsible authority would be the federal government; therefore the federal legislation was considered to be overriding. The fourth instance concerned explosives—and it would be pleasant if we did not have so many explosive sounds in this chamber.

● (1520)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I think the point just made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich is a good one. There is a considerable amount of noise in the chamber, which makes it very difficult for the member who has the floor to make his points. I hope that hon. members who wish to carry on conversations will do so behind the curtains, so that the business of the House may continue.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): As I was saying, the fourth special instance deals with explosives and safeguards. I was not too clear why this should have crept into the bill we are considering, although I think perhaps we can accept it as being a matter of interprovincial trade: it refers to the imposition of standards in the carriage of explosive material which could do damage to the population. This matter should come under general regulation and is therefore federal. The fifth instance in the bill is to be found in clause 3. I think it is worth reading this clause into Hansard. It provides:

> This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of any province.

I ask the minister to please tell us why it is felt necessary to use this type of wording. I think this Draconian measure is sort of an overriding provision in this bill. When I look at the bill I find it is divided into five parts. The first part deals with the imposition of an export tax. I cannot believe that this particular clause is necessary in order to impose and to collect an export tax. This, clearly, is within the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Part IV has to do with compensation for imports over the price set. Again, I think this is in the general interest of Canada and there is no objection to it. This leaves parts II, III and V. I should like to come back to parts II and III, but for a moment I will deal with part V because to my way of thinking it has introduced some rather startling concepts in clauses 89 and 90. I think that when clause 3, which must apply to all that follows in this particular part of the bill, is examined very closely we will see the danger we are running into if we allow the bill to pass in its present form. It is our intention to propose amendments to clause 3.

In part V of the bill it will be seen that the minister may require any person to make to him a written return showing in detail information with respect to the affairs of the person named in regard to petroleum development and sales arrangements, if the minister feels this is necessary. I find paragraph (b) of subclause (1) of clause 89 very distressing. Several months ago we had a debate about invasion of privacy and the use of wiretaps. I challenge anyone to find anything more dangerous or more threatening to the privacy of the individual than paragraph (b) of clause 89, subclause (1) which reads:

> ... authorize any person designated to carry out investigations under this act by the minister to enter any premises in which that person has reason to believe that there may be evidence of a contravention of this act ...

I cannot help reading this particular clause with clause 3 in mind. Property and civil rights normally are matters of provincial concern. Here we have an overriding clause, in a law which this parliament is expected to approve, that will invade this area of provincial jurisdiction and will threaten the privacy of the individual. To my mind, clause 3 is an extremely dangerous clause to leave in any legislation unless there is good reason. I have just received a copy of a letter which was sent to the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources by the Minister of Mineral Resources of the province of Saskatchewan. I assume it was written after they met here last week. On page 3 of this letter some of the misgivings of Saskatchewan in respect of clause 3 are expressed. I should like to quote one particular sentence relating to these misgivings:

> If clause 3 is enacted and is found to be constitutionally sound ...

Which, of course, is very hypothetical.

> ... it may effectively restrain the provinces. But in the light of events in recent months, we must ask what restraint will there be on the federal government in dealing with matters that are the legitimate concern of the provinces.

Last week we heard that nine of the mines ministers of this country are resisting strenuously this particular bill and the present trends of the government. One province alone has acquiesced. This is the expression of opinion of one of the producing provinces. No doubt there are others which we will hear about in the course of time.

I should like to return to clause 3 and parts II and III, which are the price-setting arrangements for which I suspect clause 3 was expressly designed in order to allow the federal government to regulate prices and do something it has not done before in peacetime. I shall return to this matter in the course of this debate, but I hope that before that the minister will have had an opportunity to reflect on the use of this particular clause in the bill and will express his views on possible changes.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I shall adhere closely to my notes because of my limited time, but I would ask the indulgence of the House if I should stray a little beyond my allotted time. Because I propose to make some suggestions to the committee, perhaps members of the committee might give me special consideration.

The bill, of course, stands by itself so far as discussion in the committee is concerned, but it cannot be dissociated from other measures the federal government has passed or will introduce, namely, the energy allocation bill and the proposals to amend the Income Tax Act which, of course, will be discussed at a later date. You have to take them together, as a package, when looking at this issue. They all go to the question of the natural resources which belong to the provinces.

● (1530)

There has been a lot of glib talk about the constitution. I think it is necessary to go back to basics, to review our position, to strip away the overlay of academic and legal jargon which has been superimposed on the original foundation of the act. There are several sections of the constitution which this committee cannot ignore in examining the whole issue. Section 125 says, "no land or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation." Section 109 gives to the provinces all lands, mines, minerals and royalties within the several provinces of Canada, and so on. I will not go into the whole section because I think members of the committee are familiar with it. Finally, among others there is section 92(5) which reads:

> . . . management and sales of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon . . .

The section provides that these shall be matters in respect of which legislatures may exclusively make laws. I suggest that, taken together, we can come to no other reasonable judgment than that these constitute a grant of ownership pure and simple, free from the rights of federal taxation so far as provincial ownership is concerned. This is not just a matter of being given jurisdiction over a subject matter, being given jurisdiction in respect of roads, education or public works within a province: this is an outright grant of title, without restriction.

This is borne out by the terms of the bill in 1930 by which the federal government of that date returned to the western provinces jurisdiction over the natural resources of which they had been deprived since 1905. In the debate which took place in the House at that time, it is very interesting to note what was said. I wish I had more time to go into it. Perhaps I will later on, although I hope not. There is a very interesting comment made by Mr. Stewart, at that time minister of the interior, who when dealing with the question of what was meant by royalties said:

> [Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]
> Mining leases and oil leases are in the same category; they are subject to fluctuations in royalties.

He was responding to a question from R. B. Bennett. The rest of the debate shows, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that royalties and the right to change them were included in the outright transfer to the provincial governments and constituted a rental. The provinces rented out the natural resources of which they were the owners and got royalties in return. This was accepted in the debate and was the subject of the legislation at that time. Furthermore, the language used in the confederation debates which took place from 1864 to 1867 shows that at that time natural resources provided one of the methods by which provinces were able to finance their undertakings. For that reason, unlike the division of the subject matters, it was an outright transfer and ownership fell squarely to the provinces.

Then there were some legal decisions. I will not go into all of them now, although I may later. There is an interesting judgment of 160 pages in the court of Saskatchewan. I may have occasion to read it into the record at some time. It might be of use to the government. I hope I will not have to, but it is possible. There is the case of Attorney General of Ontario v. Mercer, where it was held that these provincial powers were the attribution of royal territorial rights. I wish the Prime Minister were here; that great, confirmed royalist who from time to time competes with the right hon. member for Prince Albert for being the greatest royalist. That judgment refers to—> . . . the attribution of royal territorial rights for purposes of revenue and government to the provinces in which they are situate or arise.

There was another Ontario case which touches on this issue. The province of Ontario, in granting rights to a company within a timber berth, attached a condition by which the timber which was felled could not be exported out of the country to be sawn into lumber. That condition was attacked on the ground that it constituted an interference with the regulation of trade and commerce which of course is a federal matter. This case, tried by a trial judge, subsequently went to the Ontario court of appeal which rejected outright the argument that the condition attached by the province constituted an interference with the federal right to regulate trade and commerce. So it does appear, on the basis of existing jurisprudence, that certain rights are given to provinces to attach conditions to those natural resources of which they are the outright owners. Then there is the recent decision of Mr. Justice Hughes in the Saskatchewan case just decided, which upheld provincial laws relating to taxation and royalties with regard to minerals and petroleum products. As I say, that may be the subject of prolonged discussion later on.

So while admitting the wide power of general taxation given to the federal government, I suggest as strongly as I can that that power cannot, and must not, be used for the purpose of depriving a province of its property or as a blunt instrument designed to set aside the proper constitutional rights of the provinces. Such would be the result of the federal proposals now before the House, and in effect they have been so claimed by the Minister of Finance who makes it clear that the federal government feels the provinces are getting too much revenue from the rental they are charging for their petroleum resources. He has introduced amendments through the ways and means motion which will shortly be before the House in the form of legislation. They are being inserted by the federal government for the plain purpose of compelling the producing provinces to decrease the amount of the rental they are charging for their own property. I say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the members of the committee, surely this constitutes an obvious interference with the enjoyment of property by the provinces.

In the same vein, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources contends that the federal government must have the unchallengeable and unquestionable right to reach into a province, fix prices in the province and determine the disposition of these provincially-owned resources whenever the federal government sees fit to do so. Surely these two federal assertions demonstrate the true purpose of the present government to interfere with the rights of ownership given by sections 109, 92 (5) and 125 and for all practical purposes will be aside by the unilateral decree of the Trudeau administration.

I ask members from the province of Quebec, particularly those on the government side who have applauded so loudly the action of the government, what would be their view if the federal power of taxation were to be utilized for a different purpose and the federal government were to say that they would impose an additional excise tax of 100 per cent on all construction material going to schools or universities which do not give predominance to the teaching of English, or were to amend the Income Tax Act so as to grant a deduction of some amount in respect of those students who attend only English-speaking universities? This would be a use of the taxing power for a purpose which I would not like. I say to hon. members from Quebec sitting on the government side: you would object to it; you would say it is unconstitutional; you would say it is wrong—and I would agree with you.

Let us come to the present impasse. In dealing with it, I shall deal particularly with the province of Alberta because the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, in a thoughtful and knowledgeable speech derived not only from his experience in the House but from his knowledge as a former premier of the province, has dealt most effectively with the case of Saskatchewan.

According to the correspondence filed by the Prime Minister on November 28, on March 4 this year Premier Lougheed told him privately, in advance of publication, of the intention of the Alberta government to impose royalties at a given rate. This has not been contradicted by the Prime Minister. We must then assume that on March 12 when the Prime Minister sent a letter to the Premier of Alberta, and on March 27 when the federal-provincial agreement was being made here in Ottawa, and on March 28 when the Prime Minister made a statement in the House, he was in full possession of this particular information which he had been given by the Premier of Alberta.

It is true that the Prime Minister has told the House that he said to the Premier of Alberta that he was unhappy with royalties of this kind, and also said the same in his letter of March 12. He does not claim, however, that he made it clear that the federal government intended to meet this attitude on the part of the provinces by bringing in a budget, as was done in May of this year and repeated on November 18, which would disallow the provincial royalties; nor did he say he was going to bring in Bill C-32, which in April of this year was Bill C-18.

Mr. Chairman, I say that when the first ministers met at the residence of the Prime Minister on March 27, he owed it to the premiers, to Premier Lougheed, Premier Blakeney and the others, to display the same frankness as was displayed by Premier Lougheed. He should have said outright that the Minister of Finance, in his budget shortly to be announced, was going to disallow provincial revenues represented by the royalties outlined on March 4 by the premier.

Let us not delude ourselves. There can be no doubt at all that on March 27 the nature of the budget and the extent of the amendments to the Income Tax Act must have been within the knowledge of the Prime Minister. This is a document several inches thick, translated from French into English and English into French, with a bill following it. It was not prepared overnight. The effect of the budget, its intentions and its terms must have been within the knowledge of the Prime Minister on March 27 when he had the meeting in his residence on Sussex Drive, and on March 28 when he made the statement in this House.

Mr. Chairman, he also owed it to the producing provinces to tell them that, even though by their meeting on March 27 they had agreed to a Canadian price mechanism for petroleum products, there was at that time in existence Bill C-18 which gave vast, unilateral authority to the federal government to fix prices without regard to the provinces in spite of any agreement which had been or would be reached in future as to price structure. There is no question that such authority was in effect in that bill, and presently exists in Bill C-32.

I suggest these admissions show more than lack of candor, more than just sharp practice: they constitute a complete lack of understanding of the federal-provincial relationship. They fall dismally short of that degree of utmost good faith that has to be present if arrangements of this kind are to be of any value. They come within the description that I gave in my speech on November 28 as another example of "the suppression of the truth and suggestion of the false" which is one of the guiding mottos of this government.

I have restrained myself and have been remarkably mild in the things I have said, Mr. Chairman, but I must say that as a result of this we have come to a dangerous situation in Canada on the question of energy and the development of new sources thereof. We face economic problems of a grievous nature—not only with regard to energy but in a great many areas, when we see what is happening all over the world—which will require the utmost degree of federal-provincial co-operation. I do not think anyone on the government side will deny that. The question of federal-provincial co-operation is going to be paramount in the difficult months, and maybe even years, which lie ahead.

There is overwhelming evidence of a shortage of energy not just over the short term but likely over the long term. It is now quite clear that there is confusion and uncertainty and that the program of searching for and development of new supplies has ground to a halt. There is confrontation and political warfare at the intergovernmental level, and grave danger—I say this advisedly—to the basis of confederation. Consequently, I say to members of the committee—I believe I reflect the thinking of most Canadians when I say this—it is imperative that the 11 governments quickly move together to repair the damage done. There must be a careful and thoughtfully put together proposal which will touch all bases on this question of energy, with the first priority being securing new sources of supply with recognition of the constitutional rights of the provinces as well as the need of Canadians for an agreement founded on fairness, equity and constitutional propriety.

I need hardly point out that this cannot be done against the background of the federal proposals now before the House and to be brought before the House. If the government attempts to bull these through at this time on the basis on which they have been put together, it can only lead to further deterioration of the situation. Our leader has indicated our position. Others in the House, with some exceptions, seem to take the same general attitude.

Does the Prime Minister want to be in the position of not calling a first ministers' conference until he has secured, by Bill C-32 and the budget proposals, the whip to bring the provinces into line even if it is a mutilation of the spirit of national unity? Does he want to go to the first ministers' meeting and fling on the table as his strong point, his ace in the hole, a constitution altered by closure in this parliament?

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has maintained that he must have this legislation in order to have the power to impose the export tax and to provide the subsidies for the consuming provinces. There are other reasons as well, but I mention those two in particular. I say this is not necessarily so. I agree that if there had been agreement, this would be the way to do it; but I would suggest the record indicates that for some considerable period of time these two objectives have been achieved without the benefit of Bill C-32. The Oil Export Tax Act, which was passed some time ago and which retroactively levied taxes from October 1, 1973—it only received royal assent in January, 1974, and ended in April, 1974—is a precedent against the government's argument that Bill C-32 must be passed by the new year.

It will be noted that Supplementary Estimates (A) for 1973-74, which voted compensation from January 1, 1974, to March 31, 1974, did not receive royal assent until March 28, 1974. Thus, compensation was paid three months in arrears. I am not saying that this is the best way to move, but I am saying it has been done and it offers some answer to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. There are other alternatives, however, which I should like to propose now in the hope that the government might consider them. It would be quite simple for this House to consider a supplementary estimate for enough money at this time to add to the present estimate of $330 million which I believe was passed in a previous supplementary estimate and is expected to run out some time in January. A further supplementary estimate would carry through adequate funds for the federal government to continue paying subsidies required by the consuming provinces until March 31, 1975, the end of the fiscal year. Should there be agreement in the House, I do not think such supplementary estimate would take too long to pass.

With regard to the collection of the export tax, there is ample legal authority under the provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act. I do not say that I like that act: I fought against it because there are some things about it which I did not like; but parliament passed it and the amendments. I have not time to go into the details, but I have checked it quite closely. I checked the regulations respecting the export control list. By amendment, petroleum products are now covered by the export control list. I suggest to the minister it would be possible to attach a condition to the export of petroleum products by which the tax could be paid.

However, if this does not appeal to the government, I am quite sure it would not be too difficult for there to be a ways and means motion to cover the collection of the export tax for the period I have mentioned. There is also the National Energy Board Act. There are several methods by which it would be possible for this parliament to ensure that the funds are in fact collected and made available for the purpose for which agreement was achieved on March 27 at the federal-provincial conference. There is little time left. I suggest to the Prime Minister and his colleagues who have been so involved in this matter that they forget confrontation politics. I will be frank and say it has not all been on the government side. Some of the provinces have been engaged in this. However, there are some very powerful forces afoot. There is a feeling on the part of a great many people in the western provinces, as was the case for many years with the Atlantic provinces, that they are the low people on the totem pole. That feeling is very pervasive today. I would like to see matters develop through the instrumentality of this House which would bring this to a stop.

I do not suggest that the government withdraw Bill C-32, but that it give consideration to putting it over until some time in the new year. This would give an opportunity for the 11 heads of government to meet. The finance ministers are meeting today. It may well be they are laying the foundation for a time and agenda for the first ministers' meeting. For that reason, I suggest this should be done. Confrontation should be put aside. The federal government should act with the provinces in a reasonable attempt to refill the reservoirs of good will and co-operation which have been sadly depleted in the past few months. With the aid of this House and the provinces, we should get on with the type of program to deal with the very pressing and dangerous problem which faces this country, and do it by going with, and not against, the grain of the constitution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, we have had a suggestion by the hon. member for Peace River, which I gather is the same suggestion that he made privately to my colleague, concerning the Petroleum Administration Act. The hon. member also spoke at some length about the budget, which I do not propose to do since we are now dealing with the Petroleum Administration Act. It might be useful, in the first place, to make some response to the various points the hon. member made in his argument so far as they relate to this particular bill and to put again the government's position with regard to this statute.

The hon. member made a suggestion which I am prepared to consider actively with my colleagues to see to what extent it provides a basis for arriving at a settlement which will not, as has been threatened, tie up the time of the House for weeks, and perhaps even a month or more. The hon. member addressed some remarks to the constitution. In speaking about taxing, I was not sure whether he was dealing with the income tax regime or the export tax regime. To the extent he was speaking about the income tax regime, I will not press the argument which in due course my colleague will undoubtedly want to refer to again. However, with regard to the export tax, not only is there a basis in the constitution for the export tax under the trade and—

Mr. Baldwin: I am not contesting that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I can only say I am not attempting to raise any income tax by the bill we are discussing. If that is not contested, that is fine. The hon. member referred to this regime as reaching into a province and dealing with a resource. That is obviously not a clear case under the constitution. Quite clearly, the management for the good or ill of a resource within a province lies with that provincial government. That is why, for example, although we think from a national standpoint it is of very great concern as to the kind of proposals put forward with regard to the development of the oil sands, this government has accepted the view of the government of Alberta that it is exclusively for that government to decide whether to set out on such development, and the federal government has not been encouraged to have any participation whatsoever.

I have within the past 72 hours made a suggestion which I hope will be helpful to Alberta in relation to the ARCO withdrawal from Syncrude. However, this government recognizes it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction, just as we have taken the position that except in so far as native rights might be affected by the James Bay development or except in so far as the James Bay Corporation or Hydro-Quebec may be applying in due course for an export permit to export any surplus power from that province, basically development of the James Bay area falls within provincial jurisdiction.

The real question is whether one is talking about interprovincial trade in a particular commodity or international trade, that is, export of a commodity. Does the federal government not have a right, and in some circumstances a responsibility, to moderate the national market according to the national objectives? The examples I gave when introducing this bill are still relevant. To answer the hon. member opposite, I would have to say that while he was not a member of the cabinet, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings were; they were members of the regime which introduced the National Energy Board Act and a national oil policy. They provided a system whereby the price of and trade in a commodity within Canada would be restricted and controlled in such a way as to create a favourable climate for one part of the country, namely, the Alberta producers, so they could sell their oil over the years at between $1 and $1.25 more in the markets of Ontario than would have been the case had those markets imported from abroad. That regime came under attack after the Diefenbaker government went out of office. In the successive Cal-Oil cases the supreme court held that these provisions were directly within this trade and commerce power.

I argue, on the basis of regulating interprovincial and international trade, there can be no question about the right of the federal government to take this particular action. I would agree with the hon. member when he said there may be no question about the right, but is it desirable to do that? I want to deal with that point in substance after I have dealt with a number of his other arguments. There is obviously a matter for concern about supply of oil in Canada. We have had an analysis of the situation by the National Energy Board. It indicated that unless certain measures are taken with regard to restricting exports from this country, by the year 1982 existing Canadian production will not be adequate to meet the markets that are now projected to be supplied from Canadian production with the increase in demand including the addition of the Montreal pipeline. This, obviously, has to be a matter of concern for all Canadians at both the provincial and federal levels.

I think it is fair to contest the question as to whether the budget or any particular statute has been the basis for a slowdown in oil exploration, particularly in Alberta. The best witness I could call with regard to whether it has been the budget, and that there has not been a climate of reduced exploration, at least in federal territories, would be Premier Lougheed. The December 6 edition of the Globe and Mail reports a speech made by Premier Lougheed to his constituency association. The article is by Thomas Kennedy. I quote:

> According to the premier, at the same time as the industry was urging Alberta to reach an accord with the federal government, ostensibly for the sake of domestic harmony, companies went ahead with spending on exploration and other commitments on federally held lands, even though "you didn't know what the rules are going to be".

● (1600)

> "Give us stability, give us certainty," Mr. Lougheed said the industry demanded of his government. "Yet you do not know what is going to happen on Sable Island."

It seems to me this is clear evidence—the premier seems to think it is—that there has been a substantial amount of exploration in federal lands and offshore. I would suggest the reason for the departure of the 40 rigs the hon. member mentioned has been given by the premier himself. He said:

> Regardless of the conditions here, the U.S. project Independence has diverted investments and rigs from this region.

That is the background of the situation. The argument that Canadian policy has in any sense been the basis for diverting drilling activity, and so on, from Alberta is, I maintain, a difficult one to sustain.

Mr. Baldwin: I am not saying it is the only reason. I am contending it is a factor.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member for Peace River always tries to be fair, and I appreciate that. To deal with some of his procedural suggestions, he says the objectives have been met in the past by a ways and means resolution. But a ways and means resolution providing, as it does, by constitutional practice authority to collect the tax in advance of action by parliament, has to be followed in due course by a tax bill. From this standpoint, the tax is now being paid by the companies as a result of a ways and means resolution and will, presumably, continue to be paid until that resolution expires either by the enactment of a bill or the ending of the session. There is, therefore, a legal basis for it.

Then the hon. member suggests a supplementary estimate so that adequate funds can be provided up to the end of the fiscal year. That is a procedure I would have to take into account along with my colleagues. I would have to raise some question with regard to the vehicle he suggests, the Import and Export Permits Act. To make what is, perhaps, a judgment from the saddle on the matter, my recollection is that the act does not apply to crude oil, which is dealt with specifically by the National Energy Board Act.

Mr. Baldwin: It does. When I first looked up the act, I had some doubt myself, but there has been an amendment to the regulations by which the definition of high energy fuels has been expanded to include petroleum products.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Well, Mr. Chairman, I guess that before expounding any more legal opinions I had better look up the law. At least we see the hon. gentleman's viewpoint. There is at least the prospect that we shall not find ourselves in a situation early in the New Year, in the depth of winter, where we find oil prices will have to rise in eastern Canada because of the failure of parliament to enact this bill.

I think it is worth while going back again to basic principles when looking at this legislation. The hon. gentleman has, in a manner of speaking, summed up the debate from his party's point of view. May I just do the same for a few minutes from the point of view of the government? As the House knows, the government wishes to continue to be in the position to cushion the impact of high oil prices in eastern Canada. It was on this basis that we proposed the measure which is now before the committee. The view of the government with regard to oil prices is that they should move in due course to a level high enough to attract the incremental investment necessary for the production of oil in Canada, but that they should not necessarily move to world levels.

Of course, it is not easy to say what incentive is required at any particular time to bring on this additional production. At the moment, however, we are not inclined to believe that the price should rise to world levels in order to achieve this result in Canada. While, therefore, we think the ultimate level may be below the world price we recognize that, if it must go higher in time, the adjustment to a higher price should come by a series of stages which cushion as far as possible the consumers of petroleum and petroleum products against the economic impact—not consumers in eastern Canada alone but in the whole of Canada, including Alberta itself—because of our decision to adopt a single price.

Mr. Benjamin: There is no argument about that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Somebody says there's no argument about that. On the contrary, there seems to be a great deal of argument about it. There is a suggestion from Alberta that the price should be $10 a barrel. I would point out that an additional $2 a barrel is equivalent to one percentage point on the consumer price index, and hon. members know that at a time of grave concern about inflation, nationally and internationally, we would be well advised to cushion the effect of such increases in Canada to whatever extent is possible. This is a fundamental position taken by the government. We do not feel consumers should be obliged to bear the full impact of any cost increases in one shot.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Certainly.

Mr. Stanfield: With regard to the one price system and the forecast that Canada will enter into a deficit position perhaps as early as 1975, is the minister in possession of any forecast showing to what extent exports will exceed imports in 1975-76? And can he tell us what this will mean in terms of cost to the federal treasury when it comes to preserving the one price system across Canada?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. Current levels of imports are around 750,000 or 800,000 barrels a day. The level of exports as of January 1 will be at about 800,000 barrels a day. But taking into consideration the higher quality of Canadian oil, even on the basis of this net balance there would be a surplus in the account in Canada's favour.

If exports of Canadian oil to the United States declined to 650,000, as I have proposed—and I may say I have discussed this proposal with both the producing provinces, and while there has been no final conclusion, the matter is now under consideration by them—there would then be a deficit of 150,000 barrels a day and there would, therefore, be a deficit in the taxation account, a lessening of the ability to find the compensation payments from the oil export tax receipts. Also worthy of note in this connection is that some time between now and July 1 we expect to meet with the provincial governments to determine what the price level should be. The exact exposure of the consolidated revenue fund at that time will depend upon the gap between the domestic price and the international price. For this reason I cannot be precise, but in principle there would be a deficit of some kind if we went down in mid-year. If we did not go down in mid-year, the problem would present itself at year-end, assuming the National Energy Board recommendations are being followed.

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder whether the minister could give us a forecast of the deficit position in the year 1976. I think he is assuming that imports will remain constant at 800,000 barrels a day. Does he have a forecast for 1976 of imports per day, on average, for the year and of exports per day, on average, for the year? I ask him this because it sounds as though this will be an expensive burden for the federal treasury to bear. Does the minister have the basis upon which we can calculate how much it will mean for each dollar below the world price as the government tries to maintain a one price system across the country?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the answer to that question would depend on the price level at that time and the extent to which demand had been restrained. If it is difficult enough to know what price level will be agreed in 1975, it is obviously even more difficult to do so with respect to 1976.

● (1610)

It could well be that there will be an exposure of the public treasury and that we will have to face at that time collecting from general revenue a sum sufficient to cushion those consumers in that part of Canada dependent upon imported oil. However, that is a step that will be taken at the time the situation arises. But I repeat that what I have said about the impact on consumers remains a matter of major importance. We should try to ease, as far as possible, the degree to which higher prices do have an impact upon Canadians.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one more question and then I promise you and the minister I will not bother you again? Is the minister prepared to give any assurance that the one price system below the world price will be maintained through 1976, or is he saying that this is something that will depend upon a lot of conditions that he cannot forecast? In presenting this bill to the committee now, is he prepared to give the committee a firm assurance that a one price system will be maintained across Canada which is significantly below world price? After all, this is a major aspect of the bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, this is, of course, the government's objective. One of the interesting questions, of course, is what will be the world price at that time. Will Secretary Simon be correct in anticipating that the world price will drop off by several dollars, or will the OPEC nations, despite their indications of late, put the price up again further? Perhaps I might be excused from speculating about the world price in 1976 and what the regime will be at that time. The general approach of this government, which should commend itself to all corners of the House and to all Canadians, is that we should do our best within our financial means to keep the price down to the point where incremental supplies can be brought on from within Canada, without necessarily going wherever the leaders of the OPEC nations take us in terms of price.

Before the hon. gentleman's questions I had made some reference to what were the government's objectives in terms of oil. At the present time the price is dependent upon the will of the premier and government of Alberta. The position that the government takes—and this is enshrined in the bill—is that while every effort should be taken to arrive at an agreement with the provincial governments as to what the appropriate price level should be for this commodity, whether sold for export of sold into interprovincial trade, it should be the ultimate responsibility of the Government of Canada to determine a price level that is in the interests of all Canadians. In particular, it should not be left to the will of the premier of a single province, who after all is elected only by his local electorate and is responsible only to them; it is this parliament that must take the ultimate responsibility, and by this bill we seek to do exactly that.

Mr. Baldwin: Within the constitution.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Within the constitution. We have been talking about oil, Mr. Chairman, and I should now like to make a few remarks about natural gas which I think may have some relevance to what is behind the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River. If he did not say so in so many words, I think he suggested that we should let this bill and the budget stand for a couple of months, have a federal-provincial first ministers' meeting and see if we can work things out. I think that was his proposal.

I would have to say that it is certainly a proposal worth considering, but the one difficulty we have regarding natural gas is that the legal regime now created in the province of Alberta means that unless action is taken during 1975 there will be an automatic escalation in the price of natural gas to consumers, an escalation which may be as high as 90 per cent of the price now being paid. In the last two years the prices of natural gas, which of course is sold under long-term contract, have increased from 16 cents a thousand cubic feet to 22 cents a thousand cubic feet. Today, the average price at which TransCanada PipeLines buys natural gas, as of November 1, 1974, is about 45 cents. That is the average price; a number of contracts are still at the 22 cents level, and the price ranges all the way from 22 cents to about 60 cents.

What is proposed under the Alberta arbitration act and by the producers in the province, with the support of the provincial government, is that the price of natural gas at the wellhead on November 1, 1975, should go to 85 cents a thousand cubic feet, which is about a 90 per cent increase over the present day average price. This price of 85 cents for all contracts will, as I think it can be seen, have a substantial impact on consumers in all parts of Canada.

May I again deal with the point made by the hon. member for Dauphin. His constituents and other Manitobans, per capita or per household, are greater users of natural gas than my constituents in Toronto and other parts of Ontario. Close to a 100 per cent increase in natural gas prices to the household is as much against his interests and the interests of the people of Manitoba as it is against the interests of those in Ontario and Quebec. So often this debate is put on the basis of the west versus central Canada; but the critical thing that he has to bear in mind is that when Premier Lougheed talks about the east in speaking of natural gas, he means everybody east of the Alberta border, including Saskatchewan and Manitoba, which provinces will themselves have to bear the impact of higher prices for natural gas unless action is taken of the kind proposed by this bill to moderate the price.

As I have said, I have given the committee the basis for oil pricing that the government has been following, and I should like to restate our approach to natural gas pricing. This is a premium fuel, a fuel which should be used, for example, in certain commercial applications but particularly for residential applications because of its premium qualities. It should not be used as far as possible for industrial applications where, comparably speaking, either coal or oil could be used in competition with it. We recognize that the price of natural gas in Canada has to go up. But the proposal we have made to the provinces is that the increase, as with oil, should be escalated in small enough steps over a period of five years so that the full impact of the price increase does not fall upon the consumer right away.

I think I would be justified in saying that under the current law there is no way, except by an amendment of the kind proposed in this bill, in which one can prevent the arbitration process provided for by Alberta law from escalating the price at the wellhead and therefore passing on the higher prices to Canadian consumers generally. It is on the basis of avoiding this situation that we have proposed to the provinces that the price be escalated in stages, and we are suggesting that the only effective way to protect that staging is by this kind of amendment in the bill.

I appreciate the courtesy of the committee in giving me an opportunity to restate the reasons behind the government's thinking in regard to this particular measure. I also appreciate the courtesy of the committee in enabling me to adjourn the debate at five o'clock so I can have meetings with the Premier of Iran. The hon. member has made some interesting proposals which I shall have to discuss with my colleague, of course, but I am sure we will have an opportunity before long to return again to this fascinating subject.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, may I make one or two comments? The minister has spoken about central Canada versus western Canada. I do not like that kind of confrontation, which I think we can do without. However, I remember well as a young man in the west, when living in the northern part of western Canada, that prices went up because of tariffs, and also because of horizontal freight rates. I participated in some of the submissions made to the board of railway commissioners, as it was then, and the arguments that were put forward on behalf of those people representing what has been referred to as central Canada were to the effect, "Well, if you ignorant people want to live that far out in western Canada, you must suffer the consequences." I think that is wrong and I would hate to see it become part of this argument now—and I refer to what has been said over and over again.

● (1620)

I know there are difficulties; the minister does not need to tell me that. I followed this matter for years until I became involved. But I suggest they are not difficulties which are insurmountable. When I was young like the minister, the sap of energy and controversy ran through my veins, but as one grows older he grows a little more mellow. There is an old motto which the minister may know, being a lawyer, that a case settled is a case won. In any event, I cannot believe there are difficulties of the kind envisaged in this particular matter of energy supplies that cannot be solved by people of good will getting together on a fair, firm and equitable basis, respecting the constitution under which this country is governed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Baldwin: Let me tell the minister a story which illustrates my point. Not far from the town of Peace River, though not in my constituency now but in the constituency of the hon. member for Athabasca, so there is no conflict of interest, the Shell people were involved for a number of years in an in situ tar sands development project. It was estimated that there were anywhere from 15 billion to 50 billion barrels of oil involved. Shell worked for some five to seven years with the government of Alberta and the Alberta Research Council on this project. This involved some $40 million to $50 million at the outset, with more money available over a period of time. It was a pilot plant that was deemed fairly likely to be successful and would have brought a large, additional source into the stream of energy supplies of this country.

This is the kind of thing the people of this country demand the 11 governments take into account in their approach. I do not suggest that the fault lies exclusively with the federal government—and you can tell by my voice that I underline the word "exclusively". At the same time, none of these are problems that cannot be worked out by people sitting down together in good faith. For this reason, I suggest we buy time by the course I have proposed. I think the people of Canada will expect and demand that governments sit down and work this thing out, as I believe they will.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might say that in respect of the specific reference to in situ tar sands development, I am in total agreement. It is for that reason we have laid some emphasis on the importance of research investment in which this government is prepared to engage, as well as in respect of oil sands development technology in order to reach, not just that portion of the deposit that can be obtained by what are essentially mining means but in trying to find a process through which we can obtain the nearly 500 billion barrels that lie much deeper.

The hon. member made some remarks about the manner in which the debate has been conducted. I note that the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona is back in the House. I would have responded to his question today except that we reached the end of the question period. I would have to say there has been an intemperate quality to the debate on both sides. Perhaps participants on both sides may have said things they wished they had not said in the heat of the debate. I would have to suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that putting the debate within the context of what has been done, against central Canada, is not the way to bring about a solution to the differences. There is really a national concern here.

As I said in my remarks about natural gas, in response to the hon. member for Dauphin, this has a much wider impact than he expressed in this regard. I would acknowledge that the discussions, if they can be discussions, or even a debate in disagreement could probably be conducted in a more temperate vein than has perhaps been the case in the past.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question for the purpose of clarification. When the minister was talking about increasing prices for oil and natural gas over a period of time, I thought I heard him refer to a five-year period in respect of escalating prices for oil and natural gas. Is that correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No. It would involve phasing the price of natural gas to the price of oil in Canada as it may be determined at the time. The value of gas would be a commodity value based on the price of oil. We have proposed a five-year period in respect of the escalation in the price of gas. In fact the price of oil may be higher or lower, but the period we have proposed is five years in an attempt to restrain the impact as the price goes up.

Mr. Symes: Has the five-year period been agreed to by the resource producing provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We have put the proposal forward to both the producing and consuming sides, but up to the moment it has not been agreed to by anyone.

Mr. Mitges: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have an opportunity to take part in this debate on Bill C-32 respecting the administration of interprovincial, export and import trade in petroleum and petroleum products. After reviewing and studying the debates on this bill up to now, and after assessing the pros and cons of what has already been stated by various speakers on both sides of the House, I find it would be most difficult on my part to contribute to this debate and focus attention on any pertinent information that has not already been brought out by previous contributors to the debate. Therefore, I should like to direct the content of my remarks to perhaps a slightly different angle or approach.

As a member from Ontario, I feel we in Ontario have been caught in the middle of a continual harangue and bitter confrontation that has been going on at an ever increasing pace between the fuel producing provinces of Canada and the federal government. Ontario is a province which, by virtue of its vast industrial and commercial make-up, plus its large and extensive population, requires a great deal of energy to keep its furnaces alight and to guarantee the continuation of the many hundreds of thousands of jobs necessary to keep our economy bright. Yet, with all this, we are the most vulnerable of all provinces in so far as energy is concerned and we are obliged to recognize that our role is less than that of an innocent bystander at a boxing match.

I would humbly suggest that the people of Canada have "had it", they are fed up with this fruitless dialogue they have had to digest, and now demand a quick end to this charade so they will know soon where all Canadians stand and what to expect in the future, in order that we can begin to prepare ourselves as soon as possible for all the eventualities that might present themselves. The time is now ripe for both sides to bury the hatchet and start once again from scratch. The time is ripe for a new spirit of negotiation and consultation with some plain give and take by both sides. This is of tantamount importance if we are ever to solve this unfortunate but important problem.

Bargaining in a spirit of good will, honesty and good faith, rather than bargaining for political advantage, as I have observed, would indeed go a long way toward resolving the difficulties. Let us make sure we do not find ourselves, as many school boards and teachers in our province have unfortunately found themselves, involved in the constant bickering and confrontation which has been evidenced lately with both sides of the Ontario school educational system superimposing their own philosophies at the expense of each other, completely forgetting the innocent bystander, in this case the student, who is the ultimate loser as a result of the never ending dispute.

Likewise, Mr. Chairman, in this energy debacle involving the producing provinces and the federal government, the eventual losers will be the innocent bystanders, in this case the Canadian people, unless something is done, and done soon. I think it is mandatory that we end this confrontation and replace it by honest bargaining, in good faith, by all parties, that would be beneficial to all sides concerned and, above all, of lasting benefit to the people of Canada. This would be a most welcome factor in furthering the cause of national unity, a cause which needs the most careful cultivation and nurturing to ensure the moulding of all regions of Canada into a truly national entity in which we can all take pride and of which we can all be proud.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, the government has been actively trying to promote the myth that the bill which we have before us, and the budget bills relating to federal taxation of royalties, are issues which concern only the producing provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the federal government. Many members from western Canada have already spoken in this debate. But I speak on behalf of a constituency in Ontario because this bill poses a threat, not just to the prairie provinces but to all the provinces which must be wondering what resource area the federal government will try to take over next, and to all Canadian consumers whose supplies of oil and natural gas depend so heavily on successful federal-provincial co-operation in this area.

Behind this bill there is a fundamental lack of coherent energy policy in this country. In the formation of energy policy, where intelligent initiative and long-range planning are called for, we have seen nothing but reflex reaction. This bill is just one more example of legislation by reaction. It does nothing to provide an integrated, over-all energy policy to co-ordinate the development and delivery of our natural resources in the most efficient and rational way. Instead, by proposing unilateral action to set oil prices, an action which invades provincial jurisdiction, it introduces division and friction to an area where cohesion and co-operation are desperately needed.

Until we have a coherent national energy policy, each piece of the government's legislation can only be disruptive, like pieces of a jigsaw puzzle forced into a frame by someone, without any idea of the over-all picture behind the puzzle. The government unfortunately needs to be reminded of the obvious. In particular, it needs to be reminded that any energy policy is justified only if it makes the best possible contribution to the quality of life in Canada. The only exception to this might be whatever contribution we make to the poorer nations of the world. All other policies must contribute to the strength, unity and self-reliance of our nation. They must create communities that are varied, healthy, secure and stimulating.

They must create jobs and investment opportunities for Canadians that are challenging and in every sense rewarding.

All of this is so obvious that it is almost embarrassing to say it, yet the government is so caught up with the problems and pressures of the moment that it regularly responds with policies that do not meet these criteria. The policies of the government are rather unimaginative products of the conventional wisdom of the fifties and sixties, perhaps reasonable in their time but demonstrably unsuited to the seventies.

We badly need a plan, an integrated plan, of which all government policy is a part; a plan moved by a vision of Canadian society 50 years hence which is self-sustaining, utilizing all our resources efficiently and with a view to their long-term supply. But because the government has no concept of such a sustainable society, it has no plan for reaching it. Because it has neither direction nor plan, it moves from one crisis to another, all the time allowing our valuable, non-renewable resources to be consumed at rates that are not necessary, not reasonable and certainly not sustainable.

When I look at this bill there are four aspects of the government's failure to come to grips with Canada's energy problems which come instantly to mind. First, we find that the government has failed time and time again to get accurate figures on the demand for and supply of Canada's oil and natural gas. No more eloquent testimony to the government's ineptitude in forecasting ability can be found than in the white paper on energy issued last year by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On page 104 the white paper states categorically:

> In summary, the analysis suggests that Canada has more than enough energy resources available to cover her own use at least until the year 2050 and that there is a chance that there may be substantial amounts of oil and gas surplus to domestic demand.

This analysis was done just last year, yet last month we were informed by the National Energy Board that proven oil reserves cannot be expected to fulfil our own domestic requirements past 1982, even if all exports of oil to the United States are stopped. If those exports continue, the National Energy Board reports our oil self-sufficiency will end even earlier, in 1978.

The government has had to impose immediate cutbacks on our exports of oil, another reflex reaction. This government, which has already proven to be so inept in this field, now moves by means of this bill to increase substantially the regulatory powers of the federal government over oil and natural gas. Of a total of 95 clauses, 30 give complete discretionary powers to either the government, the governor in council, boards, or the minister. Moreover, the number of clauses granting the governor in council power to act by regulation and order in council has more than doubled from the government's previous bill, C-18. How could anyone vote for a bill giving so many powers of regulation over oil and gas supplies to a government whose record of forecasting in this area is so dismally bad?

Second, this bill substantiates the government's complete failure to work out solutions to our energy problems in co-operation with the provinces. Members on this side of the House have emphatically supported the idea of a single domestic price for oil across Canada, transportation and handling costs being considered apart. I think all members of the House accept the idea of the subsidy to cushion the price of oil in our five eastern provinces and agreed with the export tax for that reason.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

If the government were to put these proposals to us in this committee pure and simple, I am sure they would be passed today. But what we object to, and what many Canadians across this land object to, is the unilateral nature of the federal government's proposals with regard to price. We in Ontario, living in a land-locked province with no substantial gas or oil reserves of our own and very little prospect of ever discovering any, are particularly concerned that the federal-provincial arrangements on energy should work smoothly and effectively.

At the moment it is largely due to the good will of Alberta and Saskatchewan that the price of oil to the eastern provinces has been equalized. If the retail price of oil in Ontario should go up in the new year, the federal government will be to blame. Our party pressed the cabinet to include in the supplementary estimates adequate funds to continue the federal subsidy on oil through to the end of March, 1975. But the government refused and has provided in those estimates for the subsidy to continue only until the end of this year.

Instead of uniting the country in the fact of an energy crisis, the policies of the federal government have begun to divide it. It is one thing to pour oil down the drain, as some of the government's inaccurate projections have more or less done in the past, but it is another thing altogether to pour the good will and good faith of the province down the drain with the same reckless abandon. The federal government may get away with its policy of imposing a tax on royalties on the provinces, but the ill-feeling and mistrust that would be generated among the different governments of this country will filter down and leave a legacy of ill-will and mistrust between the people of the east and of the west.

The third failure of the government with direct pertinence to this bill is its failure to produce anything more than rhetoric in the way of long-range energy policy. The cabinet apparently wants the power to control this area, but lacks the will to plan constructively for future resource development. The classic case here is that of uranium. Here is a resource on which Canada will have to depend more and more as our supplies of oil and gas run out. Here is a resource over which since the Second World War the federal government has had virtually exclusive jurisdiction. At present, for instance, all uranium produced in Canada must be marketed through Eldorado Nuclear, a Crown corporation, and any exports of uranium must receive authorization from the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

It is undoubtedly from this perspective that the Prime Minister was involved last month in talks with the President of France over the building of an enriched uranium plant in the James Bay area. The government seems to be moving quickly to support the construction of such a plant. Already they are involved in an exploration agreement with France and Quebec with a view to a plant in this area; and Premier Bourassa spoke several times last week, after communication with the federal government, as if federal approval was a very minor detail.

This is a project of vital importance to the future of Canada's energy supplies, one over which the federal government already has legitimate jurisdiction, yet all the government's statements have been either deliberately ambiguous or completely shrouded in secrecy. The only facts about this hydroelectric project and the enriched uranium plant to be made public have come from the president of Quebec Hydro, who has indicated that such a plant, if built, would cost over $3 billion, would use at least 2,500 megawatts of electricity a year and 18,000 tons or uranium oxide annually. We would be using one vast energy resource to create another form of energy—and all for export. If such a plant to enrich uranium were built with no thought given to our domestic needs, to the supply of the Candu reactors in operation or planned throughout the country, we would use up all of Canada's known uranium reserves within 22 years after the plant had begun operation. To date the government has taken no firm stand on this project. It has made no move to meet its responsibilities as the custodian of the country's uranium resources. Yet in this bill it is setting itself up as the national custodian of our oil and natural gas resources. One can only ask: what can justify this move?

The fourth area in which the government's record must be examined to see if there can be any justification for this bill is in the field of energy conservation. The government announced last week that it is to spend a million dollars on promoting energy conservation. Is this going to amount to anything more than a glossy, public relations campaign designed to put the pressure on individual families to conserve energy, in the absence of any positive action on the part of the government itself to conserve energy? For instance, the government is pushing ahead with the construction and utilization of airport facilities such as Mirabel and Pickering and larger jets, concentrating on a mode of transportation which uses far more energy per passenger mile than alternative methods. Investing massive amounts of our money in facilities designed to support greatly increased use of aircraft which use 2½ times the amount of energy of other modes of travel does not make sense. It is a classic example of dull thinking, imagining the future to be an extrapolation of the past, assuming that our metro areas will grow and grow when all the evidence is that such growth cannot be sustained.

How much more sense it would make to spend that money to achieve similar objectives, that is, the ability of Canadians to travel, with much less energy. How much more valuable it would be to improve the country's railways, stop the policy of branch line abandonment, improve the right-of-way of the Turbo, and participate with the governments of Ontario and Alberta—and, I hope, other provinces—in their admirable and pioneering efforts to develop various forms of urban transit.

There are other areas in which the government has failed to act, areas in which the government has responsibility to conserve energy, particularly with regard to petroleum products, where so far it has failed to provide direction or leadership. In his last budget speech, the Minister of Finance stated that the tax on heavy cars is designed to conserve energy. I wonder how much energy he thinks it will conserve. How many potential buyers of a Cadillac de Ville will be turned toward a lighter vehicle by a tax saving of $250, or how many buyers of Oldsmobile 98s will be discouraged by a tax of $135? This tax is a smokescreen calculated to make the government appear to be interested in petroleum conservation without, in fact, changing anything at all. Since all the largest cars are foreign cars designed and manufactured outside Canada, it is impossible to comprehend why the government is not willing to do something meaningful in this area.

Transportation is not the only place where the government has failed to provide incentives to conserve our energy resources. The CMHC code for residential construction has not ensured nearly adequate insulation. Canada has been passing through a period of great activity in the building of houses, apartments and offices. Because the government has been totally inert in encouraging conservation, many thousands of buildings contain much less insulation than they should. Year by year, every year for decades, they will require enormous extra amounts of oil, of gas and of electricity to keep them warm—due entirely to the government's failure to ensure otherwise.

The government has failed us, too, in its blind acceptance of U.S. emission standards for automobiles. A government that lets artificial islands be built in the Beaufort Sea without environmental impact studies has decided, in the name of the environment, to apply standards designed for Los Angeles and New York to automobiles in Moose Jaw and Fredericton. What is most remarkable of all about the government's total failure in the conservation field is that for the most part these measures save money. Ian Efford, of the Science Council, has shown how much would be saved by a relatively minor reduction in the rate of increase of electrical consumption in British Columbia. If the consumption increased 3 per cent per year instead of 4.5 per cent per year, the reduction in new facilities required by the year 2000 would amount to $2.8 billion, twice that province's annual budget. The savings possible if growth could actually be stopped would be triple that amount. Such enormous savings could be left in the pockets of taxpayers to improve their lot, or spent on improving services like housing, or both.

Not building Pickering saves money. Putting a significant tax on large cars increases revenues. Conservation measures also save petroleum for petrochemical feedstocks. So much of our present society depends on products made from petroleum and natural gas—solvents, plastic film, moulded plastics, cable insulation and, most important, the fertilizers and pesticides on which our agriculture is based. It is likely that this very long list will grow longer and that future Canadians will wish very much that their predecessors had not depleted the supplies so rapidly and irresponsibly by sending them up in smoke.

● (1650)

Ten years ago, few people in the world sensed the implication of what we were doing. Two or three years ago, the imminent and acute shortage of petroleum was being predicted very accurately. But the government chose to ignore the warnings. Now, everyone sees the danger—the oil companies, the consuming provinces, the producing provinces, even the National Energy Board. Inaction now is inexcusable.

The government is not going to solve much in the long run by bills such as this. This is a band-aid bill designed to cope with a situation that should never have arisen. I can forgive the government their past mistakes, for they were in good and abundant company, but now the message of conservation, the need to create a sustainable and stable society, is writ so large that anyone can see. The government's failure to take tough decisions now to protect our future will rightly appear to future Canadians to be incredibly callous.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left before five o'clock I should like to make a few remarks, some of which are prompted by the contribution to the debate in this committee last Thursday by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe from the Liberal side. I respect the hon. member's integrity and ability and his contribution to this House, but for some reason he went off the rails in his contribution to the debate. In Hansard for December 5 the hon. member is reported as saying, at page 1972:

> I cannot understand why the Tory members from Ontario have not spoken on this bill . . .

I regret the hon. member's absence today because there have been and, I am sure, will continue to be many members from Ontario who will speak on the bill. Indeed, it is likely that all members from Ontario will speak, because the bill is of vital concern to that province. The hon. member also said on December 5:

> I ask the Conservative members from Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes if they really understand this bill and if they truly appreciate the implications if it should not go through.

I assure the hon. gentlemen that not only do members from those provinces understand it, but they are alarmed by the implications of the bill. It seems to be his position, in a simplified sense, that if you are for this bill you are for cheap energy, and if you are not for the bill you are for expensive energy. What the hon. member failed to direct himself to is the more important problem of there being any supply of energy. If he proposes to speak for the good people of his riding and the people of Ontario, I hope he will direct his energies principally and forcibly to that single issue so important to all Canadians no matter where they live in this country, namely, what are we going to do in face of reports now available from the National Energy Board and the Economic Council of Canada? This is the first independent information available to all members of the House and to all Canadians indicating where we, as a consuming nation, are headed.

If the hon. member insists on concerning himself solely with the matter of price, I would suggest to him as forcibly as I can that he is ignoring the bush because he is swallowed up in the trees. With respect to price, the hon. member should know, as the minister certainly does, that there is ample legislation available for the government to assure the price with which he is so concerned. We went through that exercise. Today the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands made very clear just what was available to the government to solve this great preoccupation that the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe has with price.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands).]

But the matter becomes more serious than that, Mr. Chairman. For some reason the hon. member related this legislation to the productivity of agriculture. If I understood him correctly, he suggested that the potential productivity of Canadian agriculture is dependent upon this piece of legislation. He would indicate to the House that lack of increase in that productivity is directly related to the price of energy. I suggest that any increase in agricultural productivity is not related to the price of energy, but to an agricultural policy, or lack of one, such as exists in this country.

If the hon. member would like to increase the productivity of his farming constituents, I would suggest that he look to the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance for salvation. We have been told over and over again by the Minister of Agriculture, in this House and elsewhere, that this country is capable of producing 50 per cent more than it does, and never once have I heard the minister or anyone speaking on his behalf or on behalf of the government suggest that we will not be able to reach this capacity because of the energy situation or the price of energy.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might call it five o'clock? I want to get into the broader aspects of this legislation, and I see about 30 seconds before the hour.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that we call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

It being five o'clock, I shall rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External affairs—Role of Israel in deciding attendance of representatives of Palestinian Liberation Organization at Geneva conference—Position of Canada; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Social security—Reciprocal agreements on pensions with foreign countries—Possible agreement with United Kingdom and United States; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Unemployment insurance—Reason for denial of benefits to employees of British Columbia Railway—Government position.

today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe there is general agreement to take first motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF POWERS, PREROGATIVES AND PRIVILEGES OF OFFICE OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a committee should be selected to consider the powers, prerogatives and privileges attaching to the office of Prime Minister and to report what safeguards are desirable or necessary to secure the constitutional principles of the sovereignty of parliament and the supremacy of the law.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the House that the language of this resolution was drawn from a resolution introduced to the British House of Commons on precisely this topic several years ago. I can say, in a certain hopeful sense, that the resolution was accepted at that time in that House. I hope it will receive similar treatment here today.

● (1700)

In the past ten years there have been a great many deliberate changes in our political institutions. New departments of government have been introduced and a range of new procedures developed from impact studies to local initiative of government spending designed to bring governments and citizens into closer harmony. Last year parliament passed the Election Expenses Act which will end the secrecy of political party financing and encourage all parties to become more active and more broadly based. The rules of parliament have been dramatically changed, and the Speech from the Throne suggested that more radical changes will be proposed. Those changes have been made deliberately, usually after extensive study and public debate.

In that period the office of Prime Minister has also changed dramatically, and it is one of the curiosities of our system that so little serious attention has been paid to the extent or significance of the power of that office. In the United States, books and theories and countless columns are written about the power of the presidency. In Canada, with rare exceptions, we focus for a moment on a sudden growth in staff or an expenditure on suede sofas, and then largely leave the question alone. However, it is too important a question to leave alone and the purpose of this resolution is to allow an examination of the role that should be played by the office of Prime Minister in a modern, federal parliamentary state.

I underline and emphasize the fact that what is sought in this resolution is an opportunity for a committee of this parliament to examine the role of the office of Prime Minister. The resolution makes no assumptions about that role except the assumption that the powers of the Prime Minister, like the powers of parliament, should be discussed and decided in public and in the context of the requirements and the traditions of the whole country.

Let me say a word about those traditions. In my view there is no tradition in Canada of a weak Prime Minister. We are told, in parliamentary theory, that the Prime Minister is merely the "first among equals" in parliament, with the assumption that Her Majesty can quite easily choose another of us equals to be first. That is the theory. In fact, the Prime Minister has always been a strong figure in Canada, with his parliamentary leadership buttressed by his party leadership and with official responsibilities and an official reputation far beyond those of his peers and at least equal to those of Her Majesty.

Therefore, the tradition is not the theoretical tradition of being merely the first among equals, answerable to the Queen but, rather, the practical tradition of exercising leadership in a federal state with a parliamentary system which requires the governors to be responsible to the governed through this parliament. Nobody is suggesting that we go back to a weakness that never was. However, throughout our history there has been another tradition to balance the necessary strength of the office of Prime Minister; that is, that the powers of the Prime Minister should not be developed or exercised in isolation but must be set in a federal parliamentary context and be subject to detailed and regular parliamentary scrutiny. There is no such scrutiny today.

The Prime Minister comes to the question period on most days, but the questions are usually about his judgment, seldom about his powers; and anyway there is no requirement that he answer. After the so-called Pearson precedent of 1968 there is a real question whether parliament can defeat a Prime Minister by vote in this House, except on matters of obvious confidence, like a budget. If our capacity to defeat a Prime Minister is so limited, so is our capacity limited to control him by the threat of defeat. As the chief minister, he is less bound by Treasury Board than any of his colleagues, and appointments to or by his office can be made without recourse to the Public Service Commission. His estimates are brought before the miscellaneous estimates committee. However, they are not dealt with there by him, but by a parliamentary secretary to another minister.

The Prime Minister reports to no standing committee and there is no statute to define his responsibilities. Ironically, parliament probably has less real control over the Prime Minister than we have over the president of Air Canada or the president of CNR, because a Crown corporation is established by statute while the Prime Minister's office is not, and its officials must appear regularly before standing committees while the Prime Minister's officials do not. No matter how loosely you define "responsible" government, parliament should have some direct control over the actions of its Prime Minister beyond his mere appearance for questions in the House. If that has been important in the past, I suggest it will be even more critical in the future, for reasons I will enumerate.

First, whatever the theory, the fact is that our system of government in Canada is a system of cabinet government, not parliamentary government. Occasionally, initiatives by private members are adopted by the government and from time to time members can amend a bill in committee or the whole House. However, the bulk of the power of initiative lies with the cabinet. It is the same in Britain, and one distinguished participant in and observer of the British system, the late Richard Crossman, suggested that in the system of the Mother of Parliaments, the process of a concentration of power has gone even further. Writing a decade ago in the introduction to Bagehot's "The English Constitution", Crossman said:

> In Bagehot's day, collective cabinet responsibility meant the responsibility of a group of equal colleagues for decisions taken collectively, after full, free and secret discussion in which all could participate. It now means collective obedience by the whole administration, from the foreign secretary and the chancellor downwards, to the will of the man at the apex of power.

We have no expert testimony on this trend in Canada, but it is safe to assume—and certainly it is the public assumption—that the Prime Minister controls his cabinet and that it is the Prime Minister, not the cabinet, and certainly not parliament, who regularly makes the final and the important decisions.

Second, the power of the Prime Minister grows as government grows. We have increasingly an interventionist state which controls or strongly influences more and more of the processes of our society. The merits of that development can be argued another time. The simple point I want to make is that as the government becomes more powerful in the nation, so does the leader of the government become more powerful. The present Prime Minister, by virtue of his office, has much more power in Canada than did Louis St. Laurent, John Diefenbaker, Lester Pearson or any of his predecessors. The state might have got out of the bedrooms of the nation, but it has more than made up for that everywhere else, and the one office that has grown most in power is the office, in Mr. Crossman's words, "at the apex of power".

Third, the same active agenda which has increased the role of government has decreased the power of parliament to control government. Parliament once had a virtually unlimited power to scrutinize and delay. While parties might disagree about the nature of specific reforms, all of us recognize that the old, easy rules would not have let the business get done. But we have paid a price for that reform, and the price has been that at the same time as the powers of the executive have increased, the powers of parliament have decreased; so we have less control on bigger government.

The fourth factor in the growing power of the Prime Minister is television. Today, every head of government has become a star personality whose advisers cultivate the talent to manipulate opinion and whose office has the permanent opportunity to command attention. Professor Denis Smith, in his article "President and Parliament" argues, and I quote:

> Canadian Prime Ministers have always made their primary appeal for support not in the House of Commons, but outside, to the electorate.

That is much easier now, with mass media. All of us here, if we are realists, know that the most effective place for a Prime Minister to get his message across is on television, not in this House. That is a fact of life which adds immensely to the power of the Prime Minister and diminishes, again, the capacity of this parliament to control an official whose whole authority is presumed in theory to arise from this chamber.

Fifth, the present Prime Minister has, in effect, established for the first time a new "Department of the Prime Minister" in the privy council office and the office of the Prime Minister. His purpose was to provide a means by which he, as head of government, could keep track of and co-ordinate the various initiatives of a mammoth government. I understand that purpose and, speaking personally, approve of it as the only means to ensure that there is, in fact, some over-all control of the direction of government by the elected politicians whom the Prime Minister commands. However, this new department was created in the absence of authority from, or discussion in, parliament. It operates beyond our scrutiny and, having the ear of the Prime Minister, it has the capacity virtually to change any direction or challenge any initiative that arises either in parliament or in the public service.

● (1710)

Without dwelling on them too long, I would suggest that certain other forces which traditionally have restrained a Prime Minister have been weakening recently. For example, we accept the notion, without much evidence, that Canadian political parties control their leaders and, in particular, prevent them from the excesses we associate with Watergate. But when did that last happen? Did the Liberal Party in Newfoundland ever restrain Joey Smallwood? Did the Union Nationale restrain Maurice Duplessis? Parties do not behave in that way because they know that in attacking their leader they attack themselves. This is particularly true now that campaigns are so heavily influenced by national media and voting is more often for the personality of the leader than it is for the local candidate or a specific issue.

Again, we have assumed that a Prime Minister can be controlled by the public which, at each election, has the chance to "throw the rascals out." However, public control of the Prime Minister depends upon a competitive electoral system. In Canada, the electoral system is, unfortunately, not competitive in Quebec, which means, as it did in 1972, that a Prime Minister can be rejected by most of the country and still survive.

Finally, there is the argument that the professional public service can provide a counterbalance to a powerful Prime Minister. That capacity also is being weakened, first by the deliberate establishment of a "Department of the Prime Minister", precisely to confront such a capability in the public service and, second, by the increasingly frequent appointment to public service positions of individuals who have personal or partisan loyalties to the Prime Minister.

Hon. members can disagree about the extent or significance of any of the factors I have discussed today, but I think we must surely all agree that two main trends are occuring. The first is a trend toward the concentration of formal and informal power in the office and person of the Prime Minister. Second is the weakening of any effective means to control that power. In a modern state, it may well be impossible or even undesirable to reverse the first trend. But surely we cannot let that power grow unscrutinized and uncontrolled.

I think it is safe to say that if we saw a corporation, a union or any other private agency accumulating the power that is developing now around the office of the Prime Minister, we would want to develop some assurances that the public interest was being served. It is particularly important that we apply that same standard of scrutiny and control to an office whose original authority was as a creature of this House.

The resolution before us suggests simply that this is a matter which we cannot ignore. It does not propose a particular remedy or imply that anything improper has been done. It simply asserts that the tradition of parliamentary control requires at least a formal consideration of the powers which now attach, and the restraints which should apply, to the most powerful office in our political system. There is a danger, of course, that this discussion will be seen as simply one more step in a struggle for power between members on one side of the House and those on the other, or between the executive and the legislature. However, that is not the case, as I hope my arguments have shown. There is another dimension to the problem; it is the very real harm that can be done to a country like Canada by any concentration of power.

Our federal parliamentary system was not developed by accident or by simple, blind importation from elsewhere. We are a diverse country and we need institutions which both reflect and accommodate that diversity. The best institution for that purpose has been parliament, because it draws its membership from truly every corner of the country and has traditionally encouraged its members to express the views of their locale. But parliament was never designed to be simply a talking shop; the assumption was that the Prime Minister and the cabinet, who came from parliament, would heed the views of the various locales. If they didn't, in theory, parliament would bring them down.

But parliament, the forum of diversity, has lost this control over the executive, and the Prime Minister is increasingly able to construct a government which reflects his own views better than it reflects the diversity of the country. If that double trend continues—the weakening of the forum of diversity and the empowering of a particular group—those regions and attitudes which lack power will naturally tire of the system. That is the special Canadian danger of this kind of concentration of power, and it must be on our minds as we consider the powers and prerogatives of the office of the modern Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its attention and hope that this resolution will commend itself to the support of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) for bringing this subject to our attention and also on the excellent speech he has just made in favour of his proposition. I agree with him it is important for us to examine the institutions of government from time to time, to analyse changes which concern us and question the direction government seems to be taking, especially if it is one about which we do not feel comfortable.

The hon. member would not expect me to agree with him in all regards, but I do share his concern about the way in which various government institutions are developing in an attempt to cope with the questions which confront them—questions to which there are no easy answers. The point I am making is that government develops in response to stimuli from outside. It is no accident that within the last 15 or 20 years the power, as well as the expenditure, of government has expanded to a remarkable degree. The government has acquired a whole series of new powers, not because of any particular attempt on its part to do so but largely in response to developments within Canadian society which have forced it to act, to legislate, to transfer authority in order to carry out detailed programs approved by parliament.

It is true that today, as when this country came into being in 1867, the Prime Minister is the first of equals. It is true now, as it was then, that the Prime Minister is called to his office by the Governor General. And it is true now, as it was then, that the Prime Minister calls upon colleagues of his in the House of Commons to sit with him and form a government which is responsible to the House of Commons. All this still applies. Nothing has changed. The Prime Minister is subject to parliament. The way in which parliament organizes itself is a significant factor in the success which it can expect in controlling the executive, of which the Prime Minister is the head—not the whole, not the heart and not the soul.

I think it is important to realize that the powers of the Prime Minister today are really no different from what they were 100 years ago; it is the scope of government that has widened. The powers of the government have increased, and with that increase and greater scope so also have the powers of the Prime Minister increased in keeping with the expansion of government in general. I think it is important to realize that the powers of the Prime Minister are totally dependent upon the powers that this parliament gives to the government.

Having said that, I think it is important to look at the development of the Prime Minister's office as it stands today. As hon. members know, it was the Liberal government in the days of Louis St. Laurent that brought in the concept of the executive assistant. It was the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that brought in the concept of the special assistant—in other words, staff designed to serve the minister as minister.

What we have in the Prime Minister's office is the same kind of staff, except that the constituency of the Prime Minister is not a region in a province, in some cases in one of the smaller provinces, but the whole of Canada. For it is the whole of Canada which the government and the Prime Minister seek to govern, and to govern in tune with what they feel is going on. For example, half of the staff of the Prime Minister's office today works in the correspondence section. The Prime Minister received an unparallelled number of letters. I cannot recall the exact number, but I remember that one year when I appeared before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates it turned out that the number one subject about which the Prime Minister had received letters on that particular day was on the question of robins in New Brunswick and the campaign to save them, and the letters numbered some 11,000. All of these letters have to be answered, and so do inquiries; thus, a good 50 per cent of the bodies in the Prime Minister's office are engaged in correspondence.

The Privy Council office is an office of long standing. Even 25 years ago the Privy Council office comprised no more than a handful of officials who acted as a secretariat to the cabinet so as to ensure that decisions taken in cabinet were truly communicated to the departments concerned, and enforced. Under the changes that have taken place in the government, basically those same functions are being carried on. Because the Prime Minister is chairman of the cabinet, it is he who has the ultimate responsibility for ensuring that the collective decisions taken in cabinet are communicated to the departments and enforced by those departments. You will understand, of course, Mr. Speaker, that many departments put their own interpretation on what should be done, and because many of them have grown in response to the legislative demands we have made upon them, often they are not in harmony with the decisions taken by cabinet and they resist them. Those who are ministers and those who have criticized ministries know this to be the fact.

As for the responsibilities of the Prime Minister, he attends the question period daily. In point of fact, I think that if hon. members will check the record they will find that the present Prime Minister probably has one of the best records over the last 20 years for appearing in the House of Commons to answer the criticisms of his government made by members of the opposition, whose right and duty it is to put these criticisms to him. I think it is quite clear that the Prime Minister is not isolated; he is in the House in the question period and answers questions daily. These questions apply not only to his own operation but to the operations of the government as a whole.

There is no way that the Prime Minister can escape the barrage of questioning that comes from hon. members opposite. He is here in the House, he responds to those questions, and he is accountable on the floor of the House of Commons for any criticisms made by members of the opposition. That, I think, is absolutely clear. In point of fact, if one looks at the volume of questions it would be crystal clear in all our minds that it is the Prime Minister who responds to most of the questions. There is no question that he is the target of the opposition and number one spokesman for his government.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain raised a very interesting point about the nature of our politics. He complained that this parliament is not necessarily the vehicle for holding the Prime Minister in check or for defeating the Prime Minister. I tend to agree with that interpretation. I myself regret that most of the important politicking in this country is not carried on in this chamber but, instead, takes place outside the chamber. I think there are two reasons for this. First of all, we tend to use this chamber not as a political forum. I think we waste our time doing too much with other things rather than concentrating on political issues. We also waste our time with antiquated procedures. We do not have the time to debate the issues that the Canadian public wants debated in public. I think that because the House of Commons has not taken action to deal with this reality, it has lost, and is losing, a great deal of respect on the part of Canadians.

About two years ago a Gallup poll that was published showed that the respect the people had for members of parliament and for parliament as an institution was declining. I feel that we are not making it our responsibility to check the government and to forcibly bring it to account. I think parliament can do a great deal more to bring its procedures into tune with the times. It can appropriate powers unto itself and become a much more effective forum.

This would mean that many members of this House would have to give up a lot of things which they regard as important and vital to the way in which they as individuals carry on their business. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be an extraordinarily painful experience for many members of parliament if the House were to change its procedures, but I hope that program of parliamentary reform upon which the House leader has embarked will be the vehicle for making parliament more germane, more important, more the centre of political activity in Canada.

I do not agree with the former leader of the Social Credit party, Bob Thompson, who once complained to the Speaker that a terrible thing was happening in the House of Commons—it was becoming a political body and political debate was being introduced. I think that is the spice of this institution. It is important that we consider the way we behave and do business in this House, with a view to dealing expeditiously with those matters about which there is a great deal of agreement. We must put the important issues before the Canadian people, debate them and then find a mechanism for bringing them to a conclusion after meaningful debate, instead of the one-sided monologues that we have in this House at the present time. Because for debate to be meaningful there must be contributions from both sides. Under our existing rules and practices in the House, this does not take place; consequently, in many respects we are responsible for lulling the Canadian people to sleep instead of taking advantage of their natural instinct for things political in Canada.

I should also like to make the point that when the Prime Minister and ministers of the government find themselves going outside the House, over the head of parliament, as the hon. member for Rocky Mountain expressed it, there are two good reasons. First of all, it is helpful and healthful for both the Prime Minister and his ministers to get out of the House of Commons, out of the stultifying atmosphere that is Ottawa, to where the "real" people are, so they can become continually reinforced in their awareness that Canada is a land of diversity. If the Prime Minister, ministers and backbenchers were to stay in Ottawa all the time, there would be a tendency for them to get sucked into the kind of mentality that pervades this place. This is why members of parliament are able to come back here from their constituencies in all regions of Canada and contribute an input into the civil service during the question period, in committee hearings and by making speeches on various subjects in the House of Commons. This could bring back the administration of the country to the House of Commons. My main point is that prime ministers and ministers go outside, into the country, for this healthful reason, and because it is an important form of communication with the electorate. Governments, prime ministers, ministers and backbenchers from all sides like to be re-elected. Any prime minister, minister or backbencher who finds himself losing contact with his constituency is not going to last very long around here. So it is healthful to go back and speak to your people and have them speak to you.

● (1730)

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other ministers have large constituencies. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has a large constituency for which he speaks. He speaks for the old age pensioners and is recognized as one of their spokesmen, so it is a national constituency for which he speaks. The Prime Minister also has a national constituency, so it is very important for him to travel nationally, making a point of being seen and being available.

The fact that it is interpreted that he is going over the head of this House is an indication that this House is not in tune with what is going on, because if the House of Commons were in tune with what is going on, that charge naturally would not be made.

It is my hope that when we have the opportunity to deal with the placing of television cameras in the House of Commons, and making available the televised record of this House to those who wish to see it, this will mark a change in the approach we as politicians have taken toward the use of television in Canada. I think the existing scrum that takes place after the question period is a disgrace. It would be far better if cameras recorded what goes on in the House of Commons and transmitted it to the people in their homes, so that they could see what takes place in this place as well as anybody else.

An hon. Member: You better be careful because they will see the Cabinet.

Mr. Reid: Cabinet ministers often say to me that they never get on television. I think most Cabinet ministers would look with a great deal of anticipation to the opportunity of becoming television stars.

An hon. Member: I would rather watch Lassie.

Mr. Reid: It may well be that the Cabinet ministers and their families would be the only ones who watched, but at least the opportunity would be given Canadians to see the performance not only of Cabinet ministers but also of members opposite. That is also an important consideration.

The hon. member made reference to the fact that one of the ways in which the government could be kept in check is if we had what he called a competitive electoral system. I tend to disagree with the interpretation he places upon the situation, in that he said we did not have a balanced system. He referred to the province of Quebec and to the fact that his party has difficulty in getting seats there. My party has difficulty getting seats in the west. If you take a look at the total of all seats you will find that the two tend to balance off, except that I think we do much better in the west than the hon. member's party does in Quebec.

Surely the reasons for the situation are historical and have to do with the position that political parties have taken on the great issues of our time. They have to do with the way in which these parties are seen as the defenders of their interests. It may very well be that, in a country like Canada with such diversities, it is impossible for any political party to be popular simultaneously in all parts of the country. My feeling would be that if indeed a party could ever be simultaneously popular in all parts of the country either there would be something the matter with the political party or something wrong with the Canadian population. I do not believe it is possible, or that it would be particularly healthful.

I would reiterate the point I made in reply to the hon. member a few minutes ago. I think parties get their strength from the decisions they have taken while in government and in opposition. This is the result of the decisions taken by parties on public issues of the day. We have to take responsibility for the stands and decisions we take, and I think that is the only fair way to go about it.

I do not think the hon. member should say the political system is unbalanced. His party came far too close to winning in 1972, and if the party opposite had fought us as hard as it fought itself during the last federal election its hon. members might well have won and be sitting in these seats. That party did not win. Consequently justice prevailed, and truth is in the ascendant.

I want to deal with the constitutional relationship raised by the hon. member, and the concept of parliamentary democracy versus Cabinet government. It is quite true that we have a system of Cabinet government. It is also true that we have a system of parliamentary legislature. There is a distinction between the two. The job of the government is to govern. It is not our job as legislators to govern but to legislate.

If you were to take a look at the amount of legislation passed through the House of Commons over the last 15 or 20 years you would find quite clearly that the productivity of the Canadian parliament has been declining. This decline in the ability of parliament to cope with changing social situations and the necessity to legislate old legislation into conformity with new situations is one of the reasons why the Canadian parliament has not been highly regarded by the Canadian people in recent years.

The point I want to make is that there is no disharmony between the concepts of Cabinet government and parliamentary democracy. The Cabinet is drawn from the legislature and it is accountable every single day of the week in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister and the ministers are in their seats and questions are asked. In addition there is an unparalleled opportunity, I think unique in our parliamentary system, whereby parliamentary committees have the opportunity to question officials about the administration of legislation.

No longer must we be satisfied with the bland explanations we used to get in the good old days when estimates were dealt with by the House in committee of supply, when ministers would sit there with two officials in front of them providing information. That information did not flow to members of parliament, and members of parliament had very little input in the administration of programs. We now have the opportunity, under the existing system, to influence not only the policy but also the administration of the policy. It seems to me this is a significant thing we have acquired, obtained or won, depending on your position.

What seems clear is that the government feels it is not receiving sufficient scrutiny in the House of Commons. I think the government feels that the calibre of the opposition in examining policies and programs is not as good as it should be. I think the government feels the need for that kind of hardnosed opposition, because it is that kind of opposition which keeps the government and civil servants on their toes. This is a vital part of the way in which the government comports itself inside and outside the House of Commons.

When the opposition is digging in on various government policies it is not surprising to see changes made in their administration, and hon. members opposite, as well as backbenchers on this side, have a significant input into the way in which governing is carried on here in Canada. This seems to me to be the role of the politician. It is not part of his political role, but is part of his role as a legislator.

If we are to talk in terms of bringing the Cabinet to heel and being subject to closer examination, it seems that members opposite have to ask themselves if the opportunities now available to them are being fully exploited. If you look at those opportunities in an objective way I am sure you will find that, in fact, the existing opportunities have gone by the wayside and are not being exploited. Parliament is the master of its own fate. It has the power to effect change, and the power if required to institute different procedures in order to redress an unbalance.

● (1740)

I think one would find that backbenchers on this side of the House and the government itself would be prepared to co-operate in bringing such an undesirable thing to a happy end because we feel that the basis of the democratic system in Canada is a Parliament which is respected and looked up to, Mr. Speaker. We feel this is not now the case. We feel the prestige of the government, of the Prime Minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely interesting subject that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) has introduced. I suspect that many of us agree that it is unfortunate that there is only an hour for this debate. Of course that could be corrected if the motion of the hon. member passed and the matter were dealt with by a committee.

I believe one might also say there is more common ground between the hon. member for Rocky Mountain and the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid) than one might have anticipated. Both, and I agree with them, feel that we should avoid having a one-man dictatorship, an all-powerful prime minister as the one and only person running this country. I agree with the view expressed by both preceding members that perhaps the best way to make sure that we do not have a master as a prime minister of this country is to strengthen parliament itself. I regard this motion as useful in that it encourages us to think of ways in which this institution might be strengthened.

I have a number of ideas, but I shall not have an opportunity to get them all across because one must not speak for too long in this hour. First, however, I want to say there are ways in which parliament is a stronger institution today more than it was in the so-called good old days. I was here in the days of Mackenzie King. Let me tell members on all sides of this House that the word of Mackenzie King was law with respect to every last detail in the operation of this House. He did not have to ask for unanimous consent in respect of things cabinet ministers ask for such consent today. He just said that was it, and that was it!

I remember an occasion in the 1940's when I had my first experience as a member of a committee on procedure. The committee had produced what I thought was a pretty good report. It was presented, debated for a day, and then it stood for some time on the order paper. In my naiveté as a young member, I wondered what was wrong. Brazenly one day I went over to Mr. King—I knew he was the boss; he was the one to see—and asked him if he could not do something about having this report brought back for further debate. His answer to me was no, that the report proposed that the House adjourn at 10.30 at night and that we could not possibly do that. He said that we had been sitting until eleven o'clock for years, and that the report was no good. Mackenzie King did not like the suggestion that the House adjourn at 10.30, and so the report was denied.

I remember later when I dared challenge him on something he had said which was out of order. I just about got put out of the place. Here was I, a young man in my thirties, criticizing the Prime Minister! Mind you, that was a day when children were more respectful of their parents, and a day when teachers and principals ran the schools. Society has changed. Today backbenchers have a voice, and cabinet ministers and prime ministers do not rule the roost in terms of superficial details, if I may call them that.

One other factor in those days was that we did not have the sound amplification system, and many members of the House of Commons in the fourth or fifth rows did not speak during a whole session because their voices were timid and they could not be heard. Some of us who could shout and be heard thought that the introduction of the sound system was unfair because it gave an opportunity to the timid souls to be heard. Times have changed, and participation by members in all parts of the House is much more the case now than it was in the forties.

There was a similar situation in respect of the French-speaking members in those days because it was an English-speaking House, with the translation of the French appearing at the end of Hansard. Many times a translation did not appear at the end of Hansard because the French-speaking members saw no point in speaking because they were not understood. A change came about in that regard.

When I first came here, at the beginning of a session a first meeting would be called, in one room, of the 20 or 25 committees for the purpose of electing the chairmen of these various committees. I remember that one day at that mass meeting I asked if there was a quorum present of the particular committee of which I was a member and for which a chairman was being named. I was told by the government whip of that day that it always had been done in this manner and that the chairmen were elected in this way. I was put in my place.

Most of the committees did not hold meetings. I would say there were a good dozen committees that would go through a whole parliament without meeting, or meeting perhaps only once, such as the Committee on Printing to agree not to print certain documents, and the Committee on the Restaurant to approve raising the price of meals in the dining room from 50 cents to 75 cents, or something like that.

There is now far more participation by individual members of all parties than was the case when I first came here. I say this with some regret because in those days we, as members of a small party, were the prima donnas and we produced the action. Now there are prima donnas in all parties; there is the electronic system and everybody gets in. There is, as I said, more participation by private members, and this is good.

I think there is a good deal of merit to what the last speaker said about the question of respect for parliament today. I also agree. I think one reason is that we do not make the best use of our time. We spend the same amount of time on unimportant as on important issues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope we will adopt a system—I may put it in as precise terms as I see it—whereby we decide every session that there are three categories of bills, routine and quite unimportant things, things that have a reasonable measure of importance, and then the crucial ones.

In respect of the routine housekeeping measures let us not spend any time on them at all, but ship them to the committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As for the medium group I suggest we should have an agreement that there would be a certain number of hours for debate on any one of those bills.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My next suggestion should receive applause from this side of the House. I say that the opposition should have the right in every parliament to say that there are five or six bills which we regard as crucial, and that these must be before the House without a time limit. The result is that we would spend most of the available days on five or six crucial bills, but let the routine and medium class bills be dealt with in a routine way. I think then we would have sharper debate and would increase the respect held by this country for parliament.

I feel the same way about estimates, the study of which is another major function around here. I think the way we spread ourselves over the whole gambit of billions of dollars, and do not do a very good job on any, is wrong. I would rather see us handle half a dozen departments a year so that we would do the whole job in the course of a four-year parliament. I would also like to see us bring back to the floor—I realize what the member said about the value of doing things in committee—three or four departments a year at the choice of the opposition—and I think an element of surprise would have a salutary effect—so that when we study the estimates we would do a really thorough job.

I have lots of other ideas, but that is enough time for me to take today. I agree completely with my friend, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, that we do not want a master prime minister; we want parliament to be supreme. I agree with the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the way to do that is to look at our procedures and try to strengthen them. I believe we can do so, and I hope we can get at this very soon.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in the debate today, but having listened to the motion put by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark), to the comments of my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Reid), and those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I felt compelled to make some comments and, like the hon. member who spoke before me, I shall not take too long.

It is always very difficult for a new member, especially a young member, to follow someone such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has so much under his belt, so to speak, in parliamentary experience. I think that most of my observations will be on a purely academic level since I was a student only a few years ago.

The basic argument that we have before us in the motion of the hon. member for Rocky Mountain is that we should achieve some balance between historical growth, the evolution of society, the government and the role of the executive, and the accountability of the parliamentary system.

Let us consider first how our system developed. We must remember that the role of prime minister started originally back in the Middle Ages when kings used to rule England and they chose two or three advisers. After a while, as various kings decided to attack other countries to expand their domain, they found they needed more advisers. They had to build up their own administrative system. Later in the Middle Ages we saw a growth in the court around the king. Then the king started to choose one principal adviser. Gradually, that person gained preeminence. At the same time the administrative or support staff of the king gained in influence, while the power of the kind started to decline.

Office of Prime Minister

In the civil war in the 1600's in England the real power of the king started to wane. Of course, in 1649 King Charles I had his head cut off, and what better example of accountability can there be? As you remember, the long parliament made the decision on Charles's fate and gained more and more power. We saw after the years of Cromwell the restoration of the monarchy with King Charles II and then King James, but royal power was never the same again. Parliament gained control over money bills and generally took a greater part in the affairs of the nation.

I suppose we saw an increase in the power of the executive in the time of King George III. For those of you who are perhaps a little rusty in British history let me say that King George III was the one king who, unfortunately, had certain physical problems that everyone thought were a mental illness. Some days he functioned, some days he did not. Of course, it would never do to run a country that way. There must be a functioning executive every day of the week, I should think. Then the cabinet started to assume powers. Lord North was the fellow who took on this mantle. He became a powerful first lord of the admiralty or first lord of the treasury.

Gradually we saw the evolution of the office of prime minister with Sir Robert Walpole. In 1910 the change was completed by the parliamentary act of 1910 or 1911 when Sir Herbert Asquith went to the king. During the constitutional crisis the king had threatened to create more peers if the House of Lords continued to impede the legislative process. Parliament gained power all the time.

Finally we come to today, in the last fifty years, we have had two world wars, an economic depression, a rapid growth in technology, and a rise in the standard of living across the world. The demands that people in Canada, and people in the western world generally, have made upon their leaders have also greatly increased. As a result, the power of government has grown. It is only natural that the powers of the executive, the cabinet, the Prime Minister, have grown too.

We should take a look at our system today in the light of what is happening on the American political scene. We saw the chief executive officer under siege in the last couple of years. It was so tough to get at him that it tore the country apart. My colleague, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, has shown that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) under our system is accessible not only to members on the government side but to members of the opposition as well. He is in the House just about every day of the week. Questions that are posed to him are ones that he does not take lightly.

A comment was made by my friend, the hon. member for Rocky Mountain. He decried the fact that today the Prime Minister and ministers appeal to the news media, the press, and that this is the way in which they get attention, not through the House. However, that is one of the facts of the cybernetic revolution, if you would like to call it that. I think what has happened to society is beneficial, because in an age of rapid growth of technology it is the media that are forcing questions. We have seen this only last week. The Prime Minister was not here of course, but we saw how the rapid change of events could be seized upon by the media, and questions from the opposition reflected what was going on outside.

[Mr. Collenette.]

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I see the clock. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT—MAKING IT AN OFFENCE FOR DEPORTED PERSON TO RETURN TO CANADA WITHOUT CONSENT OF MINISTER

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill S-12 from the Senate to amend the Immigration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to set this bill before the House this evening for at least second reading, and perhaps in view of some conversations that have taken place, we might even proceed beyond that by the adjournment hour, if the disposition and will are there, to do so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could not have agreement right now for the motion to read: "referred to a committee of the whole House". I think there would be agreement to proceed in that way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, we would agree to that arrangement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, may I express my appreciation to the House for that accommodation. It prompts me, along with an aside from across the floor, to keep my remarks as brief and non-controversial as possible. Even as short a bill as this, however, requires some explanation and elaboration. I am sure we will be able to examine it responsibly before we dispose of it this evening.

It is a very short bill and I frankly admit the proposed amendment is a measure which should have been taken long before this. I find myself slightly embarrassed by the fact that a year or so ago,—subject always to the will of parliament and after consultation with people concerned with the subject matter of the bill—I made certain commitments that I would do my best to present it persuasively to the House for passage as soon as possible.

What it boils down to is that section 35 of the present Immigration Act, which deals with deportees who may not return to Canada, reads as follows:

> Unless an appeal against such order is allowed, a person against whom a deportation order has been made and who is deported or leaves Canada shall not thereafter be admitted to Canada or allowed to remain in Canada without the consent of the minister.

As I am not a lawyer, when I first saw that I thought we were reasonably well protected, but I have since found that is not the case. Hon. members will be able to tell from the bill that we propose to amend that section to read as follows:

> 35.1 Every person against whom a deportation order is made who
> (a) is deported or leaves Canada, and
> (b) returns to Canada without the consent of the Minister, > is, unless an appeal against the deportation order is allowed, guilty of an offence and is liable
> (c) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for two years, or
> (d) on summary conviction, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

The original wording of the act constitutes a serious loophole in our deportation law, and our legislation is acquiring increasing significance as time goes by. The loophole is the lack of a significant deterrent to previous deportees who return to Canada without the consent of the minister.

● (2010)

The reason it is a loophole is that Section 35(1) of the current act places the burden of proof on the examining officer of the deaprtment rather than on the person who has been a deportee and who is attempting to come back into Canada. The burden of proof is there. It reads "shall not thereafter be admitted to allow to remain." That, of course, is the action or otherwise of the admitting officer, and not of the deportee. It is a silly situation. We have had some ludicrous results from it. I will not bore or titillate the imagination of the House by detailing them all.

I have seen some evidence, however, about one chap who came across the border 12 times, another 17 times. We were not able to deter them. All we could do was send them back from whence they came. The very fact they repeated this action so frequently indicates there is no deterrent there. Such a person does not mind being deported once more. It is apparently more profitable for him, whatever way he would describe profitability, to take his chance on being deported again, because that is the only punishment he would incur.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is a commuter.

Mr. Andras: That is right. I am told that we had a ridiculous situation where the deportee was escorted to the border and put across it by our escorts responsible for getting him there, who then made the mistake of stopping thereafter for a cup of coffee, with the result that the deportee was once more back in Canada before them!

I do not say this totally facetiously because this is a serious enough matter. In addition to the weakness in the wording of the act as it now exists, and which I hope to get the consent of this House to change, it having been dealt with in the other place, there is the horrendous problem we face in terms of the number of border crossings annually. It makes this an empty deterrent for people who want to come here. Between 35 million and 40 million foreign visitors annually cross the border into Canada. Approximately 30 million Canadians leave Canada and return. With that arithmetic members can visualize something in the neighbourhood of 70 million border crossings into Canada annually.

Each one of those crossing has by implication the necessity for someone to make a judgment as to admissibility into this country. In actual practice, that would be impossible. I do not think anyone in this House would subscribe to the idea that we set up a bureaucracy to be able to examine each person who enters Canada in terms of those kinds of numbers. If those who are inclined to criticize the government for the growth of the civil service would recommend that we do such a thing, they would be on very tenuous ground indeed. Apart from the numbers we would need to man our borders to examine each and every person who comes in, the implication of what I could only call a police state would be frightening to the most hawkish among us.

Yet the wording of the act is such that if an officer does not ask a question of the person entering Canada who could be a deportee, it would be very difficult for us to prosecute and get a conviction of that deportee under the law as it now exists. The deportee does not have to volunteer the information that he has previously been deported from this country. If he does not lie or get in by falsehood, we cannot pin upon him an accusation of coming by stealth which is necessary to charge him under certain sections of the Criminal Code. There really is no penalty, and therefore no deterrent in the case of a person trying to get into this country.

We do not claim there are great numbers of people who abuse this situation. When I mention such large numbers of crossings as 70 million per year, I do not want to convey the impression that a large percentage of individuals who have been deported from this country are in fact coming back across the border. However, the fact is that this is a situation in which the numbers who abuse the system are not really the important aspect. It is the type of people who do this that bothers us most.

I do not think I am exaggerating when I indicate to hon. members that very often the kinds of persons such as those about whom I gave illustrations, who cross back quite regularly, were involved in criminal activities. They come to Canada for very unacceptable reasons and are, in the main, themselves very unacceptable people. They are the very kind of people we are determined not to allow freedom to, so that they may move about this country and prey upon people who are legitimately here.

The effect of the proposed amendment will be to make it an offence to return without the minister's consent, thereby creating a deterrent and doing this in a clear and understandable manner which anyone can follow, and without any question of our ability to prosecute, and to punish in the case of prosecutions that are successful.

As hon. members will note, there is an option as to the form of prosecution. The offence may be dealt with by either summary conviction or on indictment. There is also a range of punishment in response to the seriousness of the crime, which would be judged by the court, in the provision providing this option. It would of course be up to the Crown prosecutor to determine whether to proceed by way of indictment or summary conviction.

As is the practice with all these kinds of wordings which appear very often throughout our legislation, the Crown prosecutor would take the circumstances of the case into consideration in deciding to proceed by either indictment or summary conviction. Regardless of the method chosen to proceed, it would then be at the discretion of the judge to decide the severity of the sentence up to the maximum of two years and/or the fine which would be imposed.

As is standard practice, the judge would consider the circumstances in imposing sentence upon conviction being established. I might point out that the judge does not have to impose the maximum provided by this amendment. He might impose the minimum, which could be one day in jail or an absolute discharge. The range of deterrent is there. Our courts have proved their experience in applying judgments and sentences wisely in relation to the circumstances.

It is not our intention to see this treatment rendered indiscriminately to each and every violator of this section of the act. Again, circumstances could determine it. For example, it is not intended to institute prosecution of a person who comes forward to a port of entry, even though he or she may have been a deportee, if only to seek advice. Nor will this apply to someone who might come to the border and be turned down at the port of entry. It is to permit prosecution of those persons who succeed in entering Canada without the required consent.

I should also like to advise hon. members that it is our intention, and I am sure it will be the practice of any of my successors in this portfolio, to exercise compassion in certain circumstances. A deportee might be coming forward for a very urgent matter, an understandable matter such as an illness or a death in the family in Canada, or even a more happy occasion such as a wedding or a celebration, without having had time to present his or her case for return, that is, to receive the consent of the minister, in advance, which, of course, would be the proper way to do it, need not lie about his or her previous deportation because it would be our intention to issue minister's permits and such authority could be delegated, as is often the case, to regional officials across this country.

So, again, provision for people who deliberately want to beat the system is there and the deterrent is there, but in cases where there are genuinely compassionate grounds existing we will not hold those people up; we will be letting them in, temporarily, of course, on a minister's consent, provision for which is made in the bill.

[Mr. Andras.]

As hon. members will also note, we have been careful to protect the appeal system. It is my understanding, from legal advice I have been given, that the upholding of an appeal, or quashing or staying of a deportation order, would not leave the person involved with a stigma, thereby attracting the punishment of the law as we are amending it here in terms of the deportation order. So where a deportation order has been made but an appeal upheld, or where it has been quashed by the Immigration Appeal Board in the exercise of its special jurisdiction on humanitarian or unusual hardship grounds, a person would not be considered a deportee for the purposes of the act.

I am grateful for the co-operation indicated in the opening minutes of this debate. I am very keen to hear the views of the hon. members about this situation during the time which remains to us, and I look forward to the continuation of the debate with gratitude to all hon. members for their apparent willingness to give this bill speedy passage.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of observations I should like to put on record in connection with Bill S-12 and the so-called loophole it is designed to close. The Immigration Act is being amended at a time when many of us are awaiting the government's green paper on immigration policy. No doubt this will contain some interesting information regarding immigration problems and the annual growth in Canada's population.

The bill is unique in my experience, at least, in that it has been introduced and passed in the Senate, so the minister's comments when he appeared before the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, are now before us. The relevant section of the act presently reads as follows:

> Unless an appeal against such order is allowed a person against whom a deporation order has been made and who is deported or leaves Canada shall not thereafter be admitted to Canada or allowed to remain in Canada without the consent of the minister.

The argument against the present law is based on the fact that a person who has been deported is able to return to Canada immediately without any penalty being imposed on him. The only penalty which could be inflicted on such a person would be to deport him again, and this procedure could be carried on indefinitely, if one cared to do so. Bill S-12 makes it an offence for such a person to return to Canada without the consent of the minister. If a person who had not received such permission returns to Canada after having been deported, one of two things could happen—he could be found guilty on summary conviction and suffer the penalties spelled out in the bill before us, that is to say, a $500 fine or six months' imprisonment or a combination of both, or dealt with as having committed an indictable offence for which the maximum penalty is two years.

The minister explained that his authority in this area would be exercised with a certain compassion—that he would be guided by humanitarian considerations. He mentioned, for example, illness or death in a family, or some urgent family matter, and stated that in such circumstances leniency would be shown. This aspect was considered in the other place when the bill was under consideration there, and I am glad the minister has referred to it in some detail today.

It could be argued that the subject of deportation and the penalties for which deportees returning to Canada are liable are already covered by the Criminal Code and the Immigration Act. Section 46 and 48 of the Immigration Act address themselves to these circumstances, as does section 115 of the Criminal Code, for that matter. The person concerned is prohibited from returning to Canada, but a duty is placed specifically on an immigration officer to ascertain whether or not that person has ever been deported. The onus, in other words, lies not with the person entering Canada but with the immigration officer, and if the person entering Canada does not of his own free will inform the officer that he has previously been deported he is not liable under the law. This is the loophole my party would like to see closed.

We could argue that section 46 of the Immigration Act should have applied during this period of time. I was rather shocked to find, on reading the report of the proceedings in the Senate, that the government has not attempted to convict any people under these acts since the legal advice received by the minister was that these sections were not specific enough to be able to get a conviction. Thus Bill S-12, in essence, creates a new offence whereby if a person re-enters Canada without the express permission of the minister he will be liable to an offence under the laws of Canada as spelt out in this bill.

The so-called green paper that is going to lead us into this great national debate of ours opens up all kinds of questions regarding immigration as well as the deportation of those who come to Canada illegally. We are very concerned that the government and its officials be given the power to regulate immigration, and specifically those immigrants who disobey the laws of Canada. However, I was completely surprised to hear the minister say he really did not have the power to prosecute those who, having once been deported, return to Canada, and that the only thing he could really do was to give them another one way ticket out of the country at our expense.

Under section 5 of the Immigration Act, which deals with the so-called prohibited classes, it is my understanding that the minister does have the power to declare that a person is within that prohibited class. Then there are further sections in the act dealing with the prosecution of those people who, having once been deported, return to Canada. Just as an aside, one of the subsections of section 5 of the Immigration Act relates to people suffering from epilepsy who now cannot enter Canada. I have written to the minister about this particular matter because I feel it is a discriminatory aspect of the act that should be removed as soon as possible. Therefore I thank the minister for assuring me and the House that this part of the act will be removed at a very early date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: Under section 5 of the act, as well as in Bill S-12, there is no power of enforcement. However, the minister and the government will have the support of this party in getting on with the job of keeping undesirables out of the country.

To a great extent immigration is, in my opinion, in a mess. I know the minister has attempted through various means to exercise some control within the immigration department over the numbers and types of people who come to Canada. I should like to quote from the Senate debate on immigration and the control thereof. The government leader in the Senate, Senator Ray Perrault, spoke specifically about what he thought of the immigration situation today. As reported at page 166 of the Senate debates for October 23, 1974, he said:

> Honourable senators, with respect to the need for this amendment to the Immigration Act, I would say that I come from an area which has been afflicted most adversely by those who contravene deportation orders. It has become a serious problem in the Vancouver area, and especially in the whole of southern British Columbia. Montreal and Toronto have also been affected. The criminal elements have been making a mockery of Canadian immigration laws. They have been deported from this country, and there are many cases on the record—the information can be made available to the committee—in which within 24 hours those criminal elements have returned to Canada, engaging in crime and completely flouting any regulations which exist.
> Whatever is done, in my view it is imperative that the two chambers of Parliament deal expeditiously with this particular measure. Law enforcement agencies are thoroughly alarmed about what has been going on. To have the present section stand without any penalty whatsoever, and allow a system to continue whereby time after time, when the minister orders people to be deported, they return across the border within a few hours, is not good enough. There are even cases on record in which they have returned within two hours of deportation, to go through the whole cycle again. Whatever we do, it is obvious that we must act.

So I think the views of the government leader in the Senate on immigration are pretty clear. He feels that there has not been the control that Canadians have been demanding regarding the movement of immigrants and of those who come to this country without the immigration rights people have sought in other places.

I should also like to quote what Senator Laird said when this bill was before the other place. He sponsored the bill, and as reported at page 232 of the Senate Debates for November 5 last had this to say on the subject of immigration today:

> I am told—and here again I presume all honourable senators have had occasion to read about these cases—that in some of the larger cities like Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, there have been many instances of very undesirable characters being deported, coming back into the country and engaging in criminal activities here, then simply being deported again and going through the cycle just about as many times as they feel like it. We want to stop this.

That certainly has my support. Obviously what is needed is a very strong tightening of present immigration regulations as they apply to those who refuse to obey the law. When the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on Thursday, November 7, 1974, he cited an example of the type of situation that the immigration department has had to deal with under the present law. As reported at page 1:6 he said this:

> The first example involves a chap who is a pimp. He was deported first on February 10, 1966, and then deported again on the following dates: November 14, 1966; November 28, 1966; February 29, 1968; March 18, 1968; March 21, 1968 . . .

That is three days later, Mr. Speaker.

> . . . April 9, 1968; October 22, 1968; and November 27, 1968. For all I know, he may be back in Canada again.

That is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. The arguments expressed in the Senate as to whether or not the present immigration laws and the Criminal Code are sufficient in order to gain a conviction of these people—I am not a lawyer so I will not go into this question—convince me as a member of this House that Canadians are demanding a better system.

Since I have been in this place Canadians from right across the country have asked me time and time again why it is we cannot keep undesirable elements out of this country. This is not to imply that these people are against immigrants or that, as I stated in my reply to the minister's statement of October 22 this year, they are opposed to immigration. They want immigrants to come to Canada, take jobs and make a meaningful contribution to our way of life. There are job vacancies in many parts of the country that could be filled by immigrants. The point we are making, and which we have made before in this House, is that all too often our immigration laws have not been strongly enough applied against those immigrants who are undesirable.

In this respect I contacted a corporal of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to ascertain his views on the kind of enforcement powers they require in order to deport those whom they thought were undesirable or were members of the criminal element of our society. I should like to quote a section of his letter, which is dated November 18, 1974:

Since my initial take-over, there have been eight persons who were ordered deported from Canada for various reasons, who had been deported before from Canada and, of course, there are many others who have not been surfaced through investigation. The majority of these persons are travelling criminals who are involved in organized crime, kiting or prostitution. One such person that I dealt with had been deported twice from British Columbia and she advised me that there is no deterrent and she got a free trip home anyway, at the expense of Canadian taxpayers if caught.

This is the type of situation with which our law enforcement officers have had to deal. Part of the problem would be eliminated by the tightening up of our immigration laws. Much of this difficulty is due to the fact that in past years we have not had control over immigration. For example, there are many people in this country who came as visitors, were allowed to apply for landed immigrant status from within Canada, but have never done so.

This party supported the minister's readjustment program last year under which people who had come to Canada as visitors could apply for landed immigrant status within a specified time. I believe we still have a lot of people here who came in during that time, but who have not come forward and regularized their status as landed immigrants. These people who are here without right should be forced to leave. I say that because there are many people who would like to come here as immigrants but are prevented from doing so because of the action taken by the government to deal with people who are here without legalized status. This is a situation which has caused us a great deal of trouble. We are now reaping the whirlwind of those lax immigration laws.

Another aspect of Bill S-12 that is of interest to me is that part in respect of student visas. For many years now

Canada has accepted students from other countries who wish to study here. Many of them obtain skills and knowledge and return to the countries from which they have come, to the benefit of their countries. We have no quarrel with this, but we do quarrel with the situation that allows students to come to this country to obtain an education, and who have no intention of returning. If they want to stay in this country they should go through the regular steps and apply for immigrant status like everybody else.

It seems to me that our law enforcement officers virtually have had to play musical chairs in dealing with these people we have been trying to deport. It is time the government showed leadership in immigration, and tried to bring in people who have the ability and the desire to make a contribution to Canada. I would impress upon the minister that it is high time the government vigorously enforced our present immigration laws.

The point was raised during the Senate debate on Bill S-12 that the Department of Manpower and Immigration cannot provide specific statistics on the number of deportations that have taken place in the last few years. The explanation is given that there was a new system and the statistics were just not available. Before this bill is passed I would appreciate it if the minister made these figures available for the last several years. If they are not available to the minister now, perhaps he could provide them at some convenient time.

In closing I should like to say that we support Bill S-12 and its spirit, because we want to have laws that are fair and enforceable. On that basis we endorse this measure.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, there are two reasons why we have Bill S-12 before us tonight. The first is related to the fact that law officers of the Crown have stated there is a loophole not covered by the act which must be closed in order to maintain control in respect of persons deported. The second reason is that police forces have brought this matter to the attention of the authorities across the country. About a year ago the metropolitan Toronto police brought it to the attention of the minister.

Many individuals who are arrested and subject to deportation have been found, on investigation, to have been deported once, twice or more times before. The same situation prevails not only in Toronto but in Montreal and Vancouver. We in the NDP welcome the bill because of this loophole. The provisions in Section 115 of the Criminal Code and Sections 46 and 48 of the Immigration Act do not cover persons who have been deported from Canada and return without the consent of the minister. This situation is causing a great deal of consternation.

Let me give some of the background to our immigration situation in Canada. Back in 1966 we made changes to the regulations as a result of which we had many immigrants coming to Canada as visitors, and permitted to apply from within Canada for landed immigrant status. Many people in Canada welcomed this change and, as a result, we had a great inflow of new regularized immigrants. But also as a result of that change we had visitors, some of whom when they applied for landed immigrant status were refused on the basis that they could not meet the criteria. Many of them appealed, and were finally given deportation orders.

We had a tremendous backlog, and many of those ordered deported did not return to their country of origin. This left an enormous immigration mess.

To my personal knowledge we have had four immigration ministers in the last nine years, and this has added to our difficulties. I give credit to the present minister who has been seized with the problem and has attempted to solve it. Last year we had the readjustment program which brought forward many immigrants who had not obeyed the law. Many of them returned to their country of origin and applied for landed immigrant status. Many others during the readjustment program were allowed to remain in Canada, provided they could meet the criteria.

Bill S-12 is a move in the right direction. During the last three or four years we have had an average of 7,000 persons against whom deportation orders have been made. During the first nine months of 1974 there were 218 persons deported from Canada for the second, third, fourth and, in two instances, the ninth and 17th times. Surely it is time to make a change.

In fairness to the minister, he undertook to make this change as a result of pressure from the Toronto and other police forces. An election interfered with that, and he has now brought it forward. I agree with the officers of the Crown that sections 46 and 48 do not present an opportunity to allow people who have been deported from Canada to be convicted of an offence, and there was no deterrent under section 35. The other sections did not provide an opportunity to stop these people returning to Canada.

In the words of the minister, when we have 40 million odd visitors annually crossing the borders of Canada and also 30 million odd Canadians crossing the border, we can appreciate the difficulty immigration officers have at the border when handling these people. I am rather proud when I travel from Canada to the United States that there is a minimum amount of inquiry with regard to where I am going, when I intend to return, and so on. I appreciate that feeling. I am sure it is appreciated by many others. I just heard a little quip from one of my colleagues who mentioned that this perhaps is because I do not wear long hair. I do not accept the premise that just because a person has long hair he would be stopped at the border.

The officers at the border have a very difficult time. In order to secure a conviction under section 46 of the Immigration Act the officer at the border would have to ask a person whether he has ever been deported. Can you imagine the average Canadian travelling to the United States and being questioned, when returning to Canada, about whether or not he had ever been deported? This is the difficulty the immigration officers have, and this is the reason that out of 7,000 persons who were deported in 1974, in the first eight months only 128 cases were reported of persons who had been deported for the second, third, fourth time and so on.

There is a problem in respect of people who deliberately and intentionally violate the law. This is the reason why the police forces of the major cities across the country have raised this problem seriously with the minister. It is also the reason why the minister has responded by closing the loophole. Therefore we are rather happy this amendment is coming forward tonight. We are also happy with the statement of the minister that not only may an indictment be laid but that also there may be a summary conviction charge laid. This points up the difference with regard to the seriousness of the offence.

When people make a mistake unintentionally I would think they would be charged under the summary conviction procedure. If a person has intentionally committed an offence in returning to Canada without the consent of the minister then I think a serious attitude should be developed toward him.

I was happy to hear the minister say that if there should be a question with regard to a person who has been deported wishing to visit because of marriage, sickness or death reasons relating to his family, the department will co-operate in every way either by issuing a permit or giving consent relating to the period in which such person would be in Canada. I think this is the attitude that should be taken.

We all await the green paper on immigration because of the problems we have had concerning immigrants over the last nine or ten years. At one time the regulations were quite strict, and deportations were not as numerous as recently. However, once the change was made in 1956 which permitted visitors to come to Canada and apply for landed immigrant status within Canada, problems arose in great numbers. This is the reason why we must look again at the Immigration Act, the last major change of which was made about 30 years ago. It does not apply to present conditions.

In closing may I say that we in the New Democratic Party support the amendment. We note with interest that Bill S-12 was initiated in the Senate. That is a rather interesting departure because the Senate has not played a very useful role with regard to legislation. In the past the Senate has been considered to be a body that would take a second sober look at legislation. This time it took the initiative, probably on the suggestion of the government, with regard to Bill S-12 and did a job. I happened to read the minutes of the Senate proceedings, and it seemed to me that a pretty fair job was done. It may not warrant some of the criticism that has been levelled at it.

The Senate has been tagged as the delapidated annex of the Liberal Party. It may be that that is the definition of that body, but I think that the Senate is attempting to recover some of the prestige it had, if it ever had any. There are certain bills which therefore may originate in the Senate for the purpose of expediting legislation in the House of Commons and, if so, then as one member I would welcome the initiation of legislation in the Senate.

I notice my parliamentary leader is shaking his head.

Mr. Broadbent: I am leaving.

Mr. Gilbert: He is leaving. I agree with him in substance that the Senate has no place in Canadian parliamentary history, but if we must have the Senate we must make it function. This is one way in which we can make it function. Therefore we welcome the work of the Senate on this particular bill.

Immigration

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will say only a few words, and touch on only three points, because it was agreed at the beginning of the sitting to refer this bill to committee as quickly as possible.

First of all, Bill S-12, as passed by the Senate on November 12, was certainly well examined by hon. senators. As it happens, there is not much talk about the work of the Senate because we have so much to do here in this House. For once, the Senate introduced a bill drawing the attention of the House. I think we must congratulate them tonight for their work on this immigration bill.

Furthermore, the minister did a very good job in enlightening the House. I followed his speech carefully, and he explained very well the shortcomings of the present legislation as well as the effects Bill S-12 will have.

Mr. Speaker, after listening to the minister I think that the introduction of Bill S-12 is timely. I was surprised, although I am not an expert on immigration matters, to hear the minister tonight that some immigrants re-entered Canada 9, 10, 12 or 15 times after being deported. The other members also stated those facts, and that is why I do not want to repeat what they already said. I simply want to express my satisfaction and say at the same time the impression we had when we saw that mass of people who were re-entering Canada after being sentenced.

We always wondered how our legislation could allow those people to go about so freely but I never imagined that an individual could re-enter Canada 15 times after being deported as many times. It must be noted that most of those people are troublemakers.

In past years, there was trouble in the province of Quebec and elsewhere. When we consider the names of the leaders who aroused the people, we see that most of the time the names of the deported resurface because we do not have any legislation to keep them out of Canada.

I am happy Bill S-12 makes guilty of an offence and I quote:

> Every person against whom a deportation order is made who
> (b) returns to Canada without the consent of the Minister . . .

I feel that amendment will give authority to the minister through the sanctions imposed. The law will not be respected without corresponding punishment. The minister said earlier that the judge will always have discretionary power in imposing the penalty according to each case. All I ask, Mr. Speaker, is that the judges use their common sense as most usually do. I ask that they show compassion while remaining firm, that our Canadian laws be respected and all sorts of revolutionaries kept from rallying our young and the not quite so young and stirring up trouble in Canada.

I want this bill to be deferred to the permanent committee as soon as possible, that it might be passed before the Christmas recess.

● (2100)

[English]

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, Bill S-12 as presented to the House corrects an obvious difficulty for the department in that a deported person could come right back to the country merely to await a new deportation hearing. As has been said and read, the bill adds a penalty to section 35.1 of the Immigration Act that should discourage the commuter or the "bumper jumper". I hope the penalties outlined there are wise and do in fact discredit this abuse of the Canadian law.

I cannot forget the fact that just a few years ago the Immigration Appeal Board had a total of over 28,000 appeals between January 1, 1973, and August 31, 1974. Close to 23,000 of these had been dealt with by October 16, 1974, and 5,000 odd remained on the books. Of the total, 2,500 had formal hearings, 2,500 were awaiting documents, and 18,400 of the appellants had been given landed immigrant status.

It would appear that since the right of appeal against deportation was restricted on August 15, 1973, the board had been able to progress with a rather heavy work load. In October, 1966, the then minister of immigration, presently the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand), decided that things were in a bit of mess in the department and ordered a white paper. This white paper was intended to stimulate public assistance for the department with an input to the drafting of an updated Immigration Act. A statement of principles and policies pertaining to immigration was made, but where has been the result?

The one thing that has happened is that we had the Immigration Appeal Board Act in 1967, and tonight we are discussing Bill S-12. In the meantime, since 1966 and the white paper, we have been a haven for numerous American pimps, procurers and prostitutes, and we have enabled them to continue to be domiciled here even after conviction under our Criminal Code. Our present inadequate laws, combined with certain flaws and weaknesses in some provincial laws, particularly private companies acts, constitute an open invitation to U.S. con men, swindlers, fraud artists, and both penny anti and big time crooks to enter Canada easily for the purpose of looting the Canadian till.

Bumper jumpers have been the order of the day, and we are trying to prevent them with the introduction of Bill S-12. I certainly hope that this abuse at our crossing points will be ended with this bill. Crime, and the infiltration of Canadian business for the laundering of illegal money have been made possible by a loose application of the Immigration Act, and if we were sincere back in 1966 about the updating of that act, why have we not been with it?

One other situation that applies to immigration that is unfair to the private property owner in our municipalities, and that I believe deserves some consideration on the part of federal and provincial authorities, is the cost of education of those immigrants who land in our cities and attend schools within our cities and who become a burden on the local property owners.

One other thing to which I should like to draw the minister's attention is the screening and interviewing procedure for non Canadians entering Canada at our international airports. It is really a farce. Preliminary interviews are now conducted by untrained customs officers and undergraduate students taking summer employment. Immigration officers only conduct an interview in depth if the preliminary interview discloses some reason for it. Ottawa has decreed that in the jet age of giant passenger loads the interviews must take no longer than 35 seconds. During most of the hours of darkness there are no immigration officers on duty at Canada's international airports.

Our generosity toward draft dodgers and deserters from the United States has meant that we have acquired large numbers of activist yippies who have been in the forefront of every insurrection and riot that has taken place, and who are dedicated to continued confrontations. Not too many years ago at the border crossing at Blaine, between Washington and British Columbia, 30 miles south of Vancouver, a group of these people damaged storefronts and cars and publicly burned the United States flag. All the yippies who led the demonstration were Americans domiciled in Canada. The laconic comment by the Blaine police chief after the incident was, "If you want 'em, you keep 'em up there".

Canada has become a haven for the type of person who is not a good citizen in his homeland, never mind in this country. I recently came across a booklet which is circulated in Canada and is aimed at offering protection to these people, and which gives help on how to beat the Immigration Act so that they can stay here despite their difficulties. I will not bore hon. members with reading too much of this booklet, but I think it should be examined by the department when any restructuring of the act is considered. I will just quote a sentence from page 21:

> The wording "admit to having committed" deserves comment. If you have committed, you do not have to admit to it, and this does not involve falsification.

The manual details the nitty gritty of how to beat the Immigration Act. It is issued by a group of lawyers representing these people in Canada.

I should like now to refer to sections 5(1) and 5(m) of the Immigration Act. On many occasions over the last two years people from the department have informed me that this section of the act is not enforced. I wondered why this is so. Have our lifestyle and philosophy in Canada changed to the point that this section no longer applies? Section 5 reads:

> No person, other than a person referred to in subsection 7(2), shall be admitted to Canada if he is a member of any of the following classes of persons:

Subsection 5(1) reads:

> (1) persons who are or have been, at any time before, on or after the 1st day of June, 1953, members of or associated with any organization group or body of any kind concerning which there are reasonable grounds for believing that it promotes or advocates or at the time of such membership or association promoted or advocated subversion by force or other means of democratic government, institutions or processes, as they are understood in Canada,

And subsection 5(m) reads:

> (m) persons who have engaged in or advocated or concerning whom there are reasonable grounds for believing they are likely to engage in or advocate subversion by force or other means of democratic government, institutions or processes, as they are understood in Canada;

I grew up in an era when people who belonged to Technocracy Incorporated were not allowed to go into the United States, and vice-versa. Thank goodness we have progressed from that stage. But today we are in the situation that organizations are allowed in Canada and then they print material which advocates the forceful overthrow of our form of government by gun or by any other act of terror that they can devise. This is known to the police and to the department, yet the section of the act I have just read is not enforced for our protection. I should like to know why.

It is important that we have policies that will allow the proper assimilation of peoples coming into this country. In the last seven years we have brought in more non-whites than our total native population.

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Huntington: There is nothing much wrong with it, except that it is happening too fast and is imposing a great social burden on the country. Our record of improving conditions for our native people has not been too good.

For 2,000 years man has been facing racial problems. The problems and pressures that we are facing today in Canada do not exist in China, however. China does not allow whites to immigrate, nor does Japan, nor does India.

An hon. Member: Racist!

Mr. Huntington: I am not a racist. Anyone who knows me knows well that I am not. I have never had any trouble pertaining to race, creed or religion in my life, and I would not belong to an organization that exercised discrimination. But I am a concerned Canadian who represents a community worried about the lack of enforcement of immigration laws.

An hon. Member: What is your riding?

Mr. Huntington: My riding is Capilano. The government has had many opportunities to solve the problems of our native people, but new ghettos are being created all the time. Chinese people and Indian people who cannot be absorbed properly into the country, and who cannot find jobs suitable to them, are being admitted under the act. So are people who advocate the forceful overthrow of the country. It is claimed that these people are being allowed in to do the menial labour of Canada.

Surely as intelligent people we can get together and solve this problem, but planning is needed. The ghetto problem should not be aggravated by setting East Indians down in places like Quesnel, and then finding there is a confrontation with the white residents because of lack of proper planning.

These people are coming in so rapidly that they are not fitting properly into the fabric of Canadian society. They are locating in ghettos, dozens to a house. Does this give them respect for the Canadian system and our government? It does not. It just creates cells for further reactionary groups to work against the fundamental principles for which this House is supposed to stand. Do not label me a racist. I am just saying that we have a problem and the government should recognize it as a problem. If you need help my colleagues will be pleased to render it.

If there is one thing we need in our immigration policy it is a planned assimilation of other races, of Asians and East Indians. We must take steps to achieve this if we want to avoid cells of discontent and the establishment of more ghettos. There is too much pressure in this regard in the city of Vancouver. Perhaps it is time for another cabinet leak. Man has been trying to solve the question of integration of races for some 2,000 years If the cabinet has the solution to the problem, maybe it should leak it so we can understand a little more about it.

An hon. Member: Tolerance.

Mr. Huntington: Yes, tolerance and compassion. Those qualities are not developed by the immigration of masses of people who are foreign to our ideologies and our way of life. They come in planeloads, 350 at a time, and there just is no way to assimilate them.

Mr. Sharp: How would you do it?

Mr. Huntington: It is high time to ask ourselves if immigration from Asian countries in great numbers is helping solve the world's population problems. Each year the populations of India and China increase by a number in excess of the population of all Canada. India's population increases annually by 13 million.

● (2120)

An hon. Member: Do you want to shoot them?

Mr. Huntington: No. You want to feed them and have them breed more, but what can we do with an immigration policy to solve that problem? This is a world situation which cannot be solved by destroying the Canadian social fabric with an over-anxious immigration policy. There is nothing racist in my remarks. I just think this has to be said.

The matter of crime that is being allowed by the Immigration Act and the enforcement of it has been mentioned. Some day when the act is again being discussed there will be a massive presentation, as has already been indicated by the leader of the Senate. By all means we should pass Bill S-12, but let's get on with the 1966 white paper, the 1974 green paper and the restructuring of our Immigration Act so that it protects and adds to the quality of Canadian life.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, in giving my support to this bill I do so with some concern and apprehension. I hope Your Honour will allow me to put my remarks concerning this apprehension in a shade wider context than the narrow focus of the bill. I assure Your Honour I will not make a general speech on immigration.

I cannot reflect my concern about the manner in which the government is now handling immigration if I do not make a few comments just slightly around this bill. I am concerned because of the headlines I see in the newspapers. For example, in the November 25 edition of the New York Times there is a headline, "A Racial Trend In Immigration Is Troubling Canadians". The November 26 edition of the Ottawa Journal carried the headline, "Racial Conflict, We Are Not So Free Of It—Discrimination Tearing at the Canadian Fabric".

[Mr. Huntington.]

The other night I heard a comment on CBC "Viewpoint." I forget the name of the commentator. However, his words have lingered in my mind because I considered them so racist in provoking Canadians to hostility toward immigration.

I commend the government on bringing forward this bill to straighten out the criminal abuse by immigrants, whether those who entered illegally or those who entered legally and then committed criminal acts.

I send the minister many cases concerning immigration. Very often I do not know whether the people who are making the request have legitimate grounds. I want to thank the minister. I think he is doing a very fine job. It reflects a combination of compassion and concern in the dispatch with which the cases are handled. I have been greatly pleased to see several people able to come into this country because the officials of the minister's department care.

Having thrown that bouquet which is very legitimate, I must also throw a little brickbat. The reason for the problems in immigration, the headlines I have quoted, the program and the comments on it, and the concern of many Canadians about immigration, is they do not know whether they are coming or going with regard to immigration. The policies of the government have been loose and changeable. There are many regulations and minor bills that have been brought forward.

I refer to the statement on motions about a month ago concerning the tightening of regulations to make it much more difficult to get into this country. I refer to the debate we had a year ago in which my colleague, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), referred to illegal immigrants and straightening out that matter. I refer to the bill now before us. All of these are negative acts. They are reacting to loopholes. They react to what the government perceives as a feeling in the country that immigration is too loose. That is why the government comes along with these band aids.

We know the green paper is in preparation. I have known that since coming to parliament two years ago. What I am suggesting is that the bill now before us, as well as the other pieces of legislation and regulations that have come in, are actually doing a disservice to the cause of immigration and the understanding of the Canadian people. We do not have a full understanding of where we are going with regard to immigration.

I have a question for the minister. I hope he will respond to it when he closes the debate. Why is there the long delay on the green paper? It was referred to here this evening. It is an absolute disgrace that the green paper, which is to outline the beginnings of what will be a new policy, has been delayed. It is that delay, along with these minor pieces of legislation, that is unsettling the Canadian people.

I am going to make a strong pitch for immigration. For those who advocate the overthrow of our country, for those who are here illegally and those who are committing criminal acts, let the government move in much more strongly. Let it have better control over the dissident elements in our population. However, do not do this in such a way that it creates the impression that immigration is bad. Immigration is good. The future of our country will depend on increased immigration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: The population of our country is slightly over 22 million. Our net immigration is 60,000, and our fertility rate is 1.9 per cent. Taking those together, by the year 2000 the population of this country will be 30 million. That is a very small increase relative to world standards and the population situation.

When we look at immigration we must consider that there will only be a small increase over the next 25 years. Here I speak of those sections of the country that are not Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. I speak of large sections of the west which are now short of labour. They will be involved in mammoth projects, on which the future of our country will depend for productive capacity because of the role Canada can play in a changing world. By having an immigration policy that is restrictive, we do ourselves a disservice. If the green paper were escalated and there were positive results coming from it, we would be able to move on to a positive track with regard to immigration. It would be something the Canadian people would understand and accept at a moderate pace.

The need, as I see it, is for a positive approach to immigration, something which the Canadian people could understand and accept, in which case we would not be hearing so much about dissident elements which are being brought here and getting so many headlines because of circumstances which have nothing to do with immigration.

The minister would be well advised, in my opinion, to pay attention to the speech made by one of his hon. friends, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), on November 26. He did not subscribe to the theory that immigration is inimical to the employment of Canadians. I thought he made a good speech. It came down to asking for an enlargement of immigration in a positive way, so as to help our country.

I have before me the results of a Gallup poll taken recently by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion. This is the question which was asked: If immigrants are brought in, do you think only those who have definite jobs to go to should be allowed to come to Canada, or do you think they should be allowed to come here and hunt up their own jobs? In answer to this question, 61 per cent of Canadians polled said that only those with jobs to go to should be allowed in, whereas, when the same question was asked in 1947 only 49 per cent gave a similar answer. So, there is a large increase in the number of Canadians who are taking a restrictive view with regard to immigration.

The type of bill before us, and the failure to take strong action against dissident elements, help to produce the kind of statistics I have cited, figures which encourage a lot of people to say that 61 per cent of Canadians are against immigration, when such is not the case at all. I ask for a firm immigration policy geared not primarily to economic needs, bearing in mind that skill and the availability of jobs are the prime ingredients of immigration today. I say this policy discriminates against the non-white and the non-rich parts of the world. It does so in two ways: the general population of these areas is excluded from Canada by the present piecemeal immigration policies of the government, and further, under present arrangements only the most highly educated and skilled members of the population of those countries is welcome. Thus, we skim off the people most essential to the modernization of their own countries.

I recently heard the Secretary General of the United Nations speak on this very point, saying that the western countries—he did not mention Canada particularly—were responsible for a "brain drain" of the developing countries.

I am not saying we could solve the world population problem, or the problems of the developing nations by allowing increased immigration. What I am suggesting is that having an open society would enable Canada to become a bigger base, and thus be in a better position to assume our responsibilities to produce food, energy, shelter and clothing for a world whose population will double by the end of the century, and treble by the year 2050. I am suggesting we need a national immigration policy; we need to move forward more quickly than we are doing and help Canadians understand how important immigration is to the future of our country.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I find this bill both confusing and amusing. The bill is a simple thing. It says that people who have been deported cannot re-enter the country without fear of being put in jail or fined. I presume it depends on how rich they are whether they are fined or put into jail.

This is just an indication that the Department of Immigration is in very bad shape. This is not the type of legislation used in other countries. What we are saying, is that we have no means of stopping people coming back to this country, but if they do come back and are caught here they will be subject to this law, which says that if they do not have the money to pay a fine they will be entitled to room and board here for a period of a year and a day. Well, Mr. Speaker, it may cost us between $3,500 and $10,000 to keep an immigrant here as our guest for a year. Surely the government can come up with a better system than this.

Few people swim to Canada, so they must come by some other method, unless they enter from the United States. They probably come here by air. All such people are scrutinized, and if the Department of Immigration is aware of who is coming before a plane lands, it will probably be able to carry out a fairly extensive check.

If a person travels from Canada to the United States, and is on the black list of the United States government, it is very doubtful whether he will be able to pass through customs. I am not sure how they work this but I know that they ask you your name at the border and where you come from. It is likely that in certain circumstances they will ask you to step inside for a few moments. Then they run a check through a computer, and if you are on the "do not ship" list you are shipped back where you came from—they ship you, anyway.

It seems to me we should be using a system which would prevent the entry of deportees rather than supplying them with free board and lodging. Moreover, many of those who have been engaged in undesirable activities, or who lack the qualifications for normal entry are the kind who would not mind experiencing our hospitality for a year. It seems to me we are being asked to approve a foolish way of tackling the situation caused by the re-entry of people who have been deported.

It seems to me that the Department of Immigration, which is very interested in knowing whether a person has brought in an extra carton of cigarettes—

An hon. Member: Those are the customs people.

Mr. Peters: Well, the people who land here go through the same process. It seems to me that our officials should be aware of the identity of those who have been deported and that they should not let them re-enter. Why should we allow them to enter, and then try to catch them and deport them again after keeping them here for a year? I know that my colleagues believe that if you break the law you should be punished, but it seems to me the public will be paying a lot of money to punish these immigrants, particularly if they are poor.

If Howard Hughes happened to come here I suppose the department could collect $500 as he left. If Howard Hughes wants to come to this country, probably he would not be deported, and doubtless never has been deported. He has been here a number of times, and when he is ready to leave he does go. No one is ever sure whether he is in this country or not.

I happened to be in another country about a year ago, at a time when members of its government were taking strong measures to find out whether Howard Hughes was in a certain hotel in that country. If he had been they would have deported him, but they were not able to establish whether he was in the country. By the time they were, I guess he had left anyway.

What I am saying is that the rich will pay $500 and enjoy our facilities for a certain period of time, whereas the poor will be subject to one year's accommodation at our expense. This situation reminds me very much of our penal system. We have a very good judiciary and some excellent lawyers, particularly prosecuting lawyers. I do not know about the defence lawyers, but the prosecuting ones are good. People are put in jail and we feed them, clothe them, and probably train them as well. We then let them out but they come back again, and we do this over and over again. It seems to be the only system we can devise.

We have never been smart enough to do something about these people who are incarcerated for a period of time. Putting people in jail costs a lot of money, but as the years go by it seems more and more people end up in jail. Canada now has the dubious reputation of having more people per capita incarcerated than any other civilized country in the world. This bill will add yet another category.

I suggest the minister should seriously consider doing something to prevent people who are deported from Canada ever returning again. I understand from one of my colleagues that on the border they have a system whereby they know all about a person who is driving through in a matter of seconds, simply by nothing his licence plates. I suggest we should do the same with people who are deported. If the manifest shows that these people are undesirable, we should not let them across the border. Then we would not have the problem of deporting them.

Perhaps the immigration minister should do what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) does. He does not let unwanted oranges or animals come into this country. Not long ago I entered the United States from another foreign country and the customs officer asked me if I had any pets, vegetables or other agricultural products with me. I said no, I did not, but that I was only stopping off in that country on my way through to Canada. I told him that Canadian law was much stricter than theirs in regard to prohibiting plants or animals from entering the country.

We do have a reputation around the world for stopping contraband in the form of plants or pets entering Canada, though we do not seem to have any system for preventing unwanted people from entering the country. I suppose there are some pets you might want to bring in that would meet the requirements of the minister of immigration, but the other kinds that are classified are not allowed in at all.

This bill is going to cost the Canadian public a lot of money over the years, and it is going to mean that the poor people who come to this country, many from ethnic groups who are not very well off when they arrive, are going to end up in jail at the expense of the Canadian public. In my opinion these people are not really guilty of an offence; they are only guilty of wanting to come to Canada when we do not want them.

Mr. Andras: This bill does not deal with that.

Mr. Peters: No. But the point is that we do not want them here. They would like to come here, and this bill is for our protection, not necessarily theirs.

There are many reasons for deporting these people, and most of them are deported because they did not come through the proper channels. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) is probably well aware of the fact that there are agencies in many parts of the world that send people to this country as wetbacks, much like the old Mexican border trick where immigrants think they are coming here legitimately and pay their money to come, but when they arrive find they have broken the law unintentionally. Their only real offence was that they wanted to come here in the first place. These are the people I suggest we will be putting in jail because they have broken our law, and in my opinion they cannot be blamed for wanting to come and make their homes in this country.

I suggest that we should strengthen our immigration regulations at the border. Most people arrive in this country by air and could easily be checked. I am sure it would not be difficult for the immigration minister to have his officials obtain the manifests from the countries of origin. They would be able to check with Interpol the aliases, passports and other travel paraphernalia of these immigrants. Most people arrive thinking they will be allowed to stay, not realizing they are acting illegally. Usually they do not use the sort of dodge others use to get into this country.

Therefore I suggest to the minister that he will be neglecting his duty if all he is depending upon to prevent people who have been deported from returning to Canada is the penalty clause in this bill. Both of my colleagues in attendance this evening are lawyers and believe that anyone who breaks the law must pay the penalty, whether morally that penalty is justified. However, it seems to me the immigration officials could exercise good judgment on behalf of the Canadian public in preventing deported persons from returning, in which case there would be little or no need for this law.

I am afraid that once this law is passed, as is common with other similar laws, all we will accomplish is a conviction of persons under the law which will result in many of these people becoming guests of the Canadian public in our institutions for a period of up to a year, and I am not sure that is the wish of the Canadian public in asking the government to limit immigration to this country.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a few reservations about this bill. Although on the surface it looks like a housekeeping bill designed simply to plug a loophole, I think it is to some extent a bill that is based on a false assumption.

I think the false assumption is that everybody who has been deported is a criminal and therefore should never be allowed to return to this country. Everybody who has been deported from this country is not a criminal. There are many cases of individuals who have been deported for reasons which cannot be classified as criminal activity. Let me give you an example.

I was associated with a case of an individual who was deported only yesterday. He happened to be a student travelling in this country, and required some money. He took a job for a month or so without a ministerial permit, and was deported for doing so. Under this legislation, unless I am wrong, this man will be prohibited from ever coming to this country again for the rest of his life, whether he wants to come as a tourist, a visitor, or what have you. He is on the minister's black list and will not be allowed to come back in without running the risk of facing a fine or a prison sentence.

Unfortunately I did not hear the minister's explanation when he led off the debate. Perhaps he would explain how he will get around this particular problem. It seems to me that because of the fact that a lot of people are deported for reasons that may be considered to be criminal, this will tend to tar everybody with the same brush. The minister did indicate that a certain amount of humanitarianism and good judgment will be required in the administration of this measure, but I do not know that ministers of immigration in the future will be as humane as this particular minister claims to be.

The provision that leaves everything up to the minister's discretion, or requiring that everyone must get a permit from him puts a rather difficult obstacle in the way of people who want to come here simply for the purpose of visiting. A better method must be available, and we should attempt to differentiate in respect of reasons for deportation in terms of this bill when it becomes law.

I can think of cases where people, who have been deported for a reason such as the one I gave in respect of the student, may be required to come to Canada to visit friends or relatives here, and may not have the time to go through the dragged out procedure of obtaining a ministerial permit. This bill may create very serious difficulties for people in that category.

I am not sure that without some clear delineation as to the kind of guidelines the minister will follow in issuing permits I am prepared to give him the absolute power for which he is asking in this bill. It would also be useful to consider some other aspects of the Immigration Act about which I am concerned, and one is the point system.

Many people may make application for immigrant status who, for one reason or another, do not obtain enough points and are rejected. While this point system is useful as a guideline, I think it does not consider the needs of certain regions in Canada. This is an area where possibly greater discretion in terms of regional need is required.

It is fair to say that in the prairie provinces, certainly in northern Alberta with which I am very familiar, there is a tremendous shortage of workmen, skilled and unskilled. One of the greatest shortages at the moment is in respect of unskilled workmen. One can go to almost any service station or farm and find that the operators or farmers are unable to find men to help them carry on with their work. Many Canadians do not want these jobs, and this is an area where we should re-assess our immigration laws to make sure that these areas are treated differently than others, such as the metropolitan centres of the country where unemployment is more of a problem.

The situation varies not only from city to city and province to province, but from region to region within provinces. If we are really concerned about meeting all the needs of this country in terms of the availability of workmen we should be looking for some changes.

I would agree that we should be increasing the number of vocational schools in order to upgrade the skills of individuals who are chronically unemployed or presently considered unemployable. The fact is that programs of this kind have not been very useful to date, and I do not see anything on the horizon that promises anything different. Even though we may think that some day we will have sufficient vocational training facilities, we must find some method of motivating people to go to these institutions, particularly those chronically unemployed or unemployable but who are in good health, and who lack skills. It is possible that some day we might find a formula under which we can prepare these people for the labour market, but at the moment there are many areas in the country that require workmen but are absolutely unable to get them.

When we look back over the history of immigration in Canada we find that our laws have been much more lax than they are today. In the 1930's, the 1920's and earlier, when we wanted settlers to open up agricultural lands in the west, there were virtually no restrictions in respect of educational ability or skill. The only restrictions were those in respect of health. It has been proven to my satisfaction that it is not the amount of education an individual may have, or his particular trade or professional qualifications that guarantees a good or productive citizen rather than one who becomes a burden to our society. We have experience that shows that the important thing is the initiative of the individual, and that initiative is by no means restricted to those people who happen to have a trade or a professional skill of some kind.

If we are going to be serious about this problem from the point of view of humanitarianism and discernment, while at the same time meeting the needs of the Canadian labour market, we should be considering changes based on regional concerns.

I would conclude by simply asking the minister to clarify his position on the main purpose of this bill, telling us what his ground rules will be in respect of people who wish to return after having been deported for some reason other than criminal or undesirable activity. If there are no such guidelines issued in advance so that we know what to expect, perhaps the minister should consider an amendment to clarify his intention in this regard.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, before this debate began there was an agreement that the bill would be referred to the Committee of the Whole. There was unanimous agreement, and I concluded there was a disposition to complete at least second reading tonight. I wonder if there would be agreement that you not see the clock for a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (2200)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the minister. Is there agreement not to see the clock for at least the completion of the second reading stage of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I will agree to terminate my remarks at this point and continue them in Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

On clause 1.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, perhaps it is better that we are now in Committee of the Whole for the completion of my remarks because, as I understand it, at this time we are in a position to expect answers and explanations from the minister which are necessary in order to expedite speedy passage of this bill, if that is the desire of the House. I should like to ask the minister whether he would clarify what guidelines he proposes to follow in terms of allowing ministerial permits to be issued to people who had been deported for reasons which were not of the type which could be construed as relating to criminal activity, but were simply as a result of the bending of some of our laws with regard to employment. What guidelines does the minister intend to use in such a case, and how difficult would it be for an individual who had been deported for that reason to obtain a permit? How long would he have to wait? I would like to have a little more detail about the plans.

[Mr. Yewchuk.]

Mr. Andras: I did attempt to make some explanation on this point in my opening remarks on second reading. The real purpose of this is to bring to bear the pressure of a deterrent on those people whose motives in coming back may be quite reprehensible. In 1973, if I recall correctly, there were only about 128 such cases, so it is not the volume about which we are concerned. A total of 128 out of 70 million border crossings is a needle in the haystack in terms of border crossings. It is the intention to issue minister's permits where people who may be deportees give sufficient advance notice that they wish to come back for a specific understandable purpose such as I mentioned—illness, a funeral or even the happy case I described otherwise.

I would not want the hon. member to think that a person who had been deported because of prosecution under the law would be welcomed for a long stay. There is a discretion concerning the length of time for which a permit would be issued. We would not unduly withhold the minister's consent unless the person involved had a criminal record.

Mr. Yewchuk: Would the minister care to inform us what the ratio is between those deported for criminal activity and those deported simply for some minor offence, such as taking employment while here on a tourist visa?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, the bulk of the deportations now, which include turning around at the border which could be voluntary departure as well as the acts of rejection, would be made up of people coming here who are considered to be non bona fide visitors coming for a purpose other than to visit. As to the criminal content of deportations, I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member the number off the top of my head, but the bulk of them would be people who are breaking our laws in terms of overstaying, or coming here without acceptable evidence that they are visitors.

Mr. Yewchuk: If that is the case, then it seems to me that this bill is shooting at a fly with a shotgun because what we are doing is excluding a large number of people for the rest of their lives for very minor offences, offences which are not dangerous to the security of the nation or to the people of the nation. If they want to come here as tourists or visitors, it seems to me that this is a rather severe measure.

Mr. Andras: I think the hon. member should be aware that it is unacceptable now under the present law for people to come back to Canada, having once been deported, without the minister's consent. Of course there is no punishment for that, but if we apprehend or identify them, we can deport them forthwith. What we are providing here is a deterrent for those people determined to come back illegally. In my comments earlier I indicated that there is discretion in the application or prosecution of this deterrent.

We do not intend to charge people who come to the border and inquire, or who are turned away at the border.

That is the time for them to declare the purpose for which they want to come back to the country, and there will be a delegation of authority to issue the minister's consent at border points where the purpose of the visitor is identified as being innocent. But we do not want to be left in the position in which we are now, where people who have been deported come back illegally because they only face another deportation.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, this is my final question. I want to know two more things. The minister has not told me what length of time he anticipates it would take to issue a ministerial permit. Let us say it is for an occasion which has a specific date but, because of the mail service in our country, this individual who is in some other country did not receive notification until two or three days before the event. How long would it take him to get the ministerial permit? Second, could the minister clarify what he anticipates would be the number of these permits issued to people who have been deported for non criminal reasons? Does he anticipate that most would be able to get a permit to come back to visit, or very few?

Mr. Andras: I thought I answered the first question by saying we would delegate authority to the border point upon a phone call from the region. So in terms of a situation such as the sudden illness of a relative in Canada, where there was no advance warning to the person who was coming back who had been deported, that person could come to the border, explain the circumstances, and within an hour might receive the authority. I am quite prepared to delegate it. In fact, ministers permits are delegated now on certain prescribed occasions.

As to the second part of the question, I honestly could not give the hon. member the number.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am asking for the ratio, not the number.

Mr. Andras: I cannot give the hon. member an indication of the number of people to whom the minister's consent to come back is given or would be given under the circumstances of the proposed amendment. Such consent is going to be for the purposes I have already described. For coming back to Canada to take up Canadian citizenship or landed immigrant status, that is a different matter altogether.

● (2210)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: As far as the operation of this particular clause is concerned, may I ask the minister whether prosecution will be instituted through his department or through the offices of the attorneys general of the provinces?

Mr. Andras: We would notify our own officers at the border or our inland officers. I have authority to make arrest under this but the practice is to refer it to local police forces. In fact, many of the applications for arrest would be enforced by police officers. As my hon. friend from Broadview indicated, and this was also brought to my attention by the police forces in some of the major cities, too often they have no way of deterring hardened criminals from coming back to Canada. Those people just laugh at the idea of being shipped across the border once more.

The application for charges would be laid by our officers, or officers of the metropolitan forces, and the decision to prosecute by summary conviction or indictment would be made by the Crown attorney.

Mr. Peters: In view of the number of people coming in—I think the minister mentioned 170 out of 70,000 as the number that came to his attention as being subject to this type of legislation—may I ask how many were from the United States and how many arrived by air from other countries?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, those that came to my attention by and large are from the United States, people who cross the border to Vancouver, for instance. I believe the hon. member for Capilano could support that. Or they come across to Toronto, to Windsor and so on, but the vast number of people or criminals who have crossed the border came by way of Detroit and Windsor. I subscribe to the proposition that we should improve the prevention system but it is a problem when you have 40 million people a year coming here. Of course the number is not the real problem either, it is the type of people. The Americans have something like nine million or ten million illegal immigrants now, so their problems are far worse than ours even though their computers may be a little better.

Mr. Peters: It seems to me, with my small experience of border points, that those who were not allowed into the United States—including a couple of former members of parliament—found out that they were unable ever to cross the border. It seemed that the officials could recognize them every time. I am not really concerned with the criminals, unless the minister agrees with some of our legal colleagues that anybody who has committed an offence is a criminal.

I know there have cases of deportation where the people did not want to do something within our law at times, but they were not bank robbers or out to cheat anybody—except the country, I suppose. Unless the word criminal is used to mean such cases, the people I am concerned with are those who have relatives here and who were deported because they did not meet our requirements. It seems to me that to put them in jail rather than develop a system to make screening simpler is not the answer.

We need something that will allow our officers to be less cautious rather than more so. I am sure these people are well known after they have been deported three or four times, and would be easily recognized if they attempted to cross the border again.

Most of the immigrants in my riding, and I suppose the same is true of the minister's riding, have come by air from Europe and the Caribbean, and are not what I consider to be criminals. Where there are passports and other facilities, we should not have this difficulty. I know some cases that should not have happened. I hope this bill will not be the only thing which will try and prevent people from re-entering this country who came in under those circumstances. I say this because some may have parents here, and some may be parents of those who live here.

These people make the attempt as often as they can, particularly the Chinese.

Why is there not attached to this bill the protection which the minister provides for compassionate reasons? This should be indicated in the bill. If this minister changes to another portfolio, we will be assured that this will still be the direction of the department. In my experience the immigration department has too often been hinged to the whims of whoever happens to be the minister, rather than to the act. I would like to see some indication that this regulation would apply at border points on compassionate grounds.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, regulations will flow from this. I do not think we should open up the legislation to describe the exceptions other than the fact there is an option to prosecute by way of summary conviction or indictment. There is an option in the sentence the judge imposes when a conviction has been returned, which ranges from an absolute discharge up to a maximum of two years imprisonment. The courts of this country have indicated their competence to make those kinds of distinctions based on the circumstances of the offences.

In terms of regulations, it is my intention to indicate in regulations the extension of delegation of the authority to issue ministerial consent for coming back into Canada. It would not then be an offence under the act, because ministerial consent would be delegated, as is now the case in the field under certain circumstances. I think that would be the way we would approach it.

I must with respect disagree with the hon. member on putting compassion into the court again. Once a person who has been deported knowingly slips back into the country, under this amendment he could be punished for that offence by either summary conviction or indictment, with the range of penalties I indicated. It is not before the appeal board. The deportation has already been handled. It is after the deportation has been heard by the appeal board, which at that stage has chosen not to extend its compassionate jurisdiction and upholds the deportation order thereby requiring the department to execute the order. That has all passed. This person is coming here in defiance of that deportation order. I presume the Crown attorney and the judge judging the circumstances, if it were a hardened criminal—and I am inclined to agree with the distinction the hon. member makes—are in a position to decide how to proceed with regard to prosecution and the sentence to be imposed, taking those facts into consideration.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, there are two things I would like to see the minister indicate in this bill. Maybe I used the wrong word in saying compassionate. That is what we used to say in the air force. We asked for compassionate leave to attend a funeral, wedding or something of that nature. That is the type of compassion I was talking about, not with regard to sentencing. I would not ask the court for compassion in that sense.

It seems to me we should clearly indicate to all immigration officers the names and descriptions of persons who have been deported, and make every effort to prevent their entry. For example the banks pin up lists containing the numbers of counterfeit bills, and do not accept bills bearing these numbers. We should make it clear that we do not accept deportees because they have, in a sense, committed a crime. We should use whatever machinery available to us as a means of stopping them coming in here. I agree there are two categories—those who come in for illicit reasons and those who come in—I do not know what the word is—those for whom this country has an attraction even when they do not come here for an illegal purpose.

Mr. Andras: I can only say to the hon. member that I agree with him there is a need to improve constantly our techniques at the border points to make sure that people do not enter this country illegally, whether they are deportees or first-time triers. Of course, that exercise is under way though I do not intend to take up the time of the committee describing what I consider to be the improvements which have been made over the past year or so. However, I do not want to leave the impression that this is a simple matter.

I would remind the committee that there will be a great deal of opportunity to talk about immigration policy and programs when we are considering the new legislation in terms of the green paper to be published, although I tell the committee frankly that this is an amendment which we believe to be absolutely necessary now, because taking a realistic view I think it will be a year before we shall be able to study the Immigration Act in detail. It is always going to be difficult to prevent all illegal border crossings when there are some 70 million crossings a year, and when the border is as wide as ours. Then again, there is a lack of desire on the part of Canadians to see a heavy policy system with a huge bureaucracy.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister has told us that the bill is directed, more or less, at a criminal element—I think he mentioned 128 people. In that case why was the bill not drafted so as to aim squarely at the criminal element involved?

Mr. Andras: I do not want to give the impression that it is not designed to apply to all those who have been ordered deported and to all cases where a deportation order has been executed. Anybody coming back to Canada having previously been deported will be subject to the deterrents inherent in the bill. But it will be left to the Crown to determine whether to proceed by way of indictment or not. I cannot subscribe to the idea that we consider lightly the return, without the consent of the government, of any person who has been dealt with by a deportation procedure which is also the law of the land. I have indicated that we are not aiming at relatively innocent people; we shall deal less harshly with them or the courts will. I am sure.

I indicated in my opening remarks that the very fact that the bill provides for the minister's consent, and continues to do so, is indicative of some discretionary powers that I hope hon. members would wish to remain in the hands of the minister. I cannot see them exercised for any reason other than a justifiable purpose, such as the compassionate ground that I tried to describe in my illustrations earlier.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the minister can achieve the same result, so far as people who are not members of the criminal element are concerned, by requiring a visitor's visa or something of that nature. Is that not so?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is suggesting that all visitors to Canada must have a visitor's visa obtained abroad, then he is opening up a whole new range of policy, program and techniques to which I was alluding when I replied to my hon. friend from Timiskaming. I personally would not at this stage be favourably disposed to exercise that option, but I will not rule it out in terms of a more profound examination of the subject that we will be having shortly when the green paper is forthcoming. I would rather hope that I could convince my hon. friend at that time that, while a visitor's visa sounds like an easy method of control, the trade-offs will be quite difficult to accept. I do not see this as a substitute, certainly not for now anyway; but we can examine it in more detail when we take a look at the green paper and at the government's position on the new immigration act in total.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister said there were 128 situations where the bill could apply. I assume there is some deficiency in the Criminal Code, or at least in the present Immigration Act, which has led the minister to bring forward this amendment. I am curious to know the advice the minister received regarding the existing provisions and why he feels that there is a deficiency in the existing law. If that was the advice he received, how many of these particular instances to which he refers, in approximate figures if he has not the exact figures, were not successfully prosecuted in the eyes of the government?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, I did try to deal with that in my opening remarks. I noted that the immigration critic of the hon. member's party agreed that the current law is inadequate to permit successful prosecution under the act, which was the advice the legal officers of the Crown gave me and gave my predecessors for a considerable number of years. I also noted that the hon. member for Broadview agreed that the wording of the present act does leave a loophole, which mainly lies in the fact that under the present act the onus is upon the officer. The wording is "shall not be admitted".

Provided the returning deportee does not state an untruth, does not lie, about the condition of his or her re-entry, then I am told that no prosecution would really stand up. Of course our difficulty is that there are 70 million crossings a year. If we could take the time to set up a system whereby everyone who crossed the border was asked, "Are you a returning deportee, or have you been deported from this country?" and if the answer was no when in fact the contrary was the case, then we could prosecute. However, as I have said, there were 128 instances last year out of a total of 70 million crossings. That is the number, so far as we know. I am not going to boast to the hon. member that I can be absolutely sure that that is the total number, but that is the number we identified. However, there is a lot of room for error within that figure of 70 million. There is a lot of movement within that 70 million and a lot of room for error. We know this, and in almost every case these were people the like of whom we would all prefer not to have back in Canada.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ROLE OF ISRAEL IN DECIDING ATTENDANCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PALESTINIAN LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT GENEVA CONFERENCE—POSITION OF CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the minister's reply to my question of November 26 in effect underscored and restated his UN declaration regarding the role of Israel in determining the makeup of the Palestinian delegation at the Geneva conference. At New York the minister stated that Israel was an essential party in deciding the question. An earlier version of the text used the word "principal", but apparently this was not considered sufficiently strong and the word "essential" was inserted.

For a long time the minister and his predecessors have said that Canada recognized the right of the Palestinians to be represented at Geneva. The minister referred to this again in his UN speech, although in somewhat muted tones. It is now clear to the world that the Palestinian question, the fate of the Palestinian people, is at the heart of the continuing Middle East crisis. It is also clear that the Palestinians must be heard. They must be given an opportunity to present their case. This they received at the United Nations, and a considerable body of world opinion believes they should be at Geneva. No sensitive, compassionate person can be deaf or blind to the fate of one and a half million people living out a hopeless, sorrowful existence in squalid refugee camps.

In light of Canada's expressed belief that the Palestinians should be at Geneva, I asked the minister how he envisaged their representation coming about. All the Arab states including the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan have agreed on designating the PLO as the Palestinian spokesman. The Palestinians under military occupation of Israel, or in the far-flung, dreary refugee camps of the Middle East, have no representative institutions. How then does Canada see them represented. By Jordan? Jordan has itself agreed that the PLO should go to Geneva. Do we envisage them being represented by Israel? It would be strange if the Minister were exalting the right of conquest at a U.N. meeting, and I cannot believe that the minister meant that.

In the light of statements by Israeli leaders that they would never talk to the PLO, what is the effect of the minister's declaration that Israel is an essential determinant of how the Palestinians should be represented at Geneva?

If Israel is given the authority to make the decision on this matter it is clear that the Palestinians will not be represented. Without recognition of the Palestinian cause I fear there will no peace in the Middle East. It is not in Israel's interest that the tension be heightened and the bitter animosity prolonged. It may well be that the minister's statement, more pro-Israeli in some respects than that of the United States, will not in the long run be so helpful.

The situation in the Middle East is complex enough to deter anyone from proffering simplistic solutions. I believe, however, some realities must be faced. By agreeing to sit down with Israel at Geneva the neighbouring Arab states have shown a realism they have for a long time avoided. By going into conference they are, ipso facto, recognizing Israel. Despite all the agonies of the 1940's, the lack of consultation with the Palestinians, the terrorism, the violence, I think the Arabs must now face reality and recognize Israel as a fact of life.

The Israelis must, on their part, recognize that they do not have the right to borders of their own choosing. More fundamental, they must recognize that the Palestinians are a people. The United Nations which set up an Israel also created a new Palestine. Canada, as a United Nations member, has some responsibility, and I was surprised that we voted against observer status for a people to whose future the United Nations made such a fateful contribution in 1948. Not being a state, how else can these people be heard at the international forum which made such traumatic decisions on their fate 26 years ago? It must not be forgotten that the Palestinians were unheard in 1948. Are we to go on forever acting as if they did not exist, did not in fact exist when Israel was created?

I close with my renewed plea for a more open-handed view, a recognition that while UN resolution 242 calls for a situation helpful to Israel, it also deals with territories and rights of other people. Until we have a new measure of compassion, realism, fairness and moderation, this troubled region will threaten the people of its own area and of the whole world.

The Middle East situation is one of immense sensitivity and explosive possibilities. It is an area concerning which we must all seek eternally and energetically for helpful contributions. In the emotion-laden atmosphere surrounding this fearful question there are occasional contributions and utterances which are not helpful. While I have never had anything but kindly feelings for Israel, where I was so well received a few years ago, I think its president's threats of atomic warfare were regrettable. Unfortunate, too, is a tendency to denigrate and sneer at the nations comprising the majority which voted for observer status at the United Nations.

Not for a moment would I accuse the minister or his parliamentary secretary of dealing in such diabolic dialectics, but I do deplore those who sneeringly toss off the majority as merely a union of Africans, Arabs and Asiatics. Such racist elitism is the very antithesis of what the UN should stand for, and should be abhorrent to all liberal internationalists.

I fervently hope that reason, not racism, will prevail, and that, in the words of the Psalm of David, mercy and truth shall meet together. To this end I hope Canada will commit itself.

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset I have no difficulty in sharing the sentiments of the hon. member, my friend from a neighbouring province, on the first part of his speech in which he expressed his sentiments regarding the Palestinians. I can tell the House and the hon. member that those sentiments are shared by many members in this House, and on this side of the House. I do not see any difficulty in reconciling the proposal of the government on this particular issue with the sentiments of the hon. member, which are that there should be understanding and compassion toward the Palestinians.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) indicated in his reply to the hon. member on November 26—to use his terms—that it is self-evident that unless there is concurrence on the part of Israel with regard to with whom it will negotiate or with whom it expects to negotiate there is little prospect for a negotiated Middle East settlement. We must understand that the question at issue is the negotiation of a peaceful settlement. I know of no peaceful settlement which can be achieved without negotiation.

The question of which group, body or organization or combination thereof will speak for the Palestinians is one which must be decided by the parties directly involved. It seems both obvious and reasonable to expect, and in my view is essential, that all parties which must be involved in a negotiated settlement of the conflict must recognize each other as parties to the negotiations. Any other option could not reasonably give hope of a peaceful settlement which, by its own definition, must be a negotiated settlement.

SECURITY—RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS ON PENSIONS WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES—POSSIBLE AGREEMENT WITH UNITED KINGDOM AND UNITED STATES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 21, as reported in Hansard at page 552, I put the following question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

In view of the fact that several years have gone by since the government launched an effort to secure reciprocal agreements on pensions with a number of countries and in view of the fact that thus far only one such reciprocal agreement has been put into effect, can the minister say whether the government is now prepared to activate this program in the hope that the reciprocal agreements might be reached fairly soon?

Sir, when parliament, back in 1965, passed the Canada Pension Plan, we included in that legislation provision for reciprocal agreements with countries having social security legislation more or less like ours. A couple of years after that, with the kind of fanfare for which Liberals are famous, a commencement was made on the achieving of a number of these reciprocal agreements, but so far only one has been achieved, namely, an agreement with the Federal Republic of Germany, which I think was signed in 1971.

I believe that discussions have been held with certain other countries such as the United Kingdom, the United States, possibly France and I believe Italy, but as yet no agreements have been reported with any of these countries. The reason that we are interested in reciprocal agreements is that there are persons from these other countries now living in Canada who are denied either pensions in the first instance, or increases in pensions paid by the countries from which they came because of the lack of a reciprocal agreement.

I hope, therefore, that this excellent program which, as I say, grew out of the Canada Pension Plan and was started in the late sixties, might get moving again.

I did not take time to read the minister's answer to me on October 21, and I hope he will not read it to me again tonight either. The gist of it is that we are always ready to agree, provided the other side will agree. We are prepared to give our pensions to Canadians in other countries, but we will not do it without an appropriate quid pro quo from the other side.

I hope that tonight the minister will not simply try to win the argument by having the last word and repeating what he said on October 21, but that he will agree with me that it is important to many persons now living in Canada that these reciprocal agreements be achieved. I hope he will indicate that somewhere a fire will be set under somebody so that the program will be advanced and a number of reciprocal agreements achieved at an early date.

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as he indicated, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) brought up this matter on October 21 last, and he is bringing it up again. In fact, he would like the government to activate the negotiation of reciprocal agreements with other countries in the field of social security and more specifically in that of pensions.

That was basically the essence of his intervention on October 21 when he suggested more specifically that there was a meeting of minds in this respect between the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada.

I should like to point out that the technical discussions in which the civil servants have taken part in recent months, namely with their United Kingdom counterparts, have brought to light some of the difficulties parliament, and I repeat, parliament will have to overcome if Canada is to pursue a policy designed to protect the vested interests of people who immigrate to Canada or who emigrate from Canada.

As I indicated in my preliminary answer on October 21 last, the basic question to those bilateral agreements is always that of knowing how much the other countries are willing to give up in exchange for the outstandings privileges available in Canada in social security.

[English]

"To activate the program," as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have it, involves a number of problems for this parliament, on the legal and constitutional planes among others. I know of no country, for example, which would be interested in an agreement on old age pensions without including the Canadian Old Age Security program. At the present time there is no provision in the legislation for OAS to be included in international agreements. In addition, certain countries are not interested in an international social security agreement involving old age pensions alone. They would wish to have included programs covering other contingencies which, in the Canadian context, involve programs of differing jurisdictions, some of which have no provision for international agreements.

The one agreement to which the hon. member referred in his question last week is our convention on social security with the Federal Republic of Germany, to which the hon. member again referred to tonight. This is not a standard agreement. I should perhaps explain that pension benefits to which entitlement has been earned under the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany are not normally payable to aliens outside that country unless it has a convention with their country of nationality. The underlying purpose of our convention with the Federal Republic of Germany, therefore, is to provide for the payment in Canada, to Canadian citizens and other persons, of pension benefits to which entitlement has been earned under German law.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, every time the government feel that it is of benefit to immigrants and Canada to seek out new reciprocal and bilateral agreements on social security, I shall be pleased to indicate to hon. members what measures will have to be taken to implement such a policy.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—REASON FOR DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO EMPLOYEES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) for being here this evening. I know that he, along with other members of this House, recognizes that the difficulties along the British Columbia Railway with respect to unemployment insurance payments are serious, especially at this time and in the context of the economic difficulties afflicting that part of my province.

The chronology of this dispute is important, Mr. Speaker. On November 4 an illegal strike was commenced by five of the unions which had been negotiating with the British Columbia Railway. That strike was recognized as illegal; an injunction was obtained and the strike was ended.

There were incidents at the time of the illegal strike and, if my information is correct, they amounted to the fact that in certain places along the British Columbia Railway north of Williams Lake certain members of other unions at first hesitated to cross the illegal picket lines. Things moved on, and there was a dispute with respect to certification which involved only the five unions which were on strike. I am informed that they comprise only about 500 people, leaving another nearly 2,000 people who worked for or are connected with the work of the railway.

On November 21 the legal strike commenced. I am informed that up until that time the non-striking union members had indicated their determination to go to work, and in fact the railway was operating at about 50 per cent capacity. When the legal strike commenced the British Columbia Railway Company laid off all its employees. As a consequence we have a situation where a strike, now brought legally by about 500 people, has put another nearly 2,000 people in a very difficult position.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission says that only 400 people have applied for benefits. But I say through you to the minister, Mr. Speaker, that the number of people now out of work, not on strike but laid off, is probably closer to 2,000.

● (2250)

I am asking the minister tonight what steps will be taken to exercise that discretion which I believe lies within the Unemployment Insurance Commission to read Section 44 in such a way, without contravening the legal position set out in Section 44 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, that will enable these people to draw their unemployment insurance benefits.

Many of these people, probably the majority of them, have never drawn unemployment insurance benefits. They belong to a very stable work class. As a consequence they are not the kind of people who have been taking advantage of the unemployment insurance system.

I repeat that I am pleased to see the minister here tonight. My question is: what steps is the government prepared to take immediately to exercise an interpretation of Section 44 that will enable these people to collect their unemployment insurance, keeping in mind that the apparent reason for denying these benefits is that there was some refusal to cross illegal picket lines in a strike which was illegal, and which took place before the legal strike that is now in existence?

As far as I am aware there is no indication that these men, apart from the striking workers, have in any way refused to go to work or to be available to the company. The fact is that the company has laid them off.

At this time in British Columbia, along the length of that entire railroad, there is very grave difficulty and serious economic loss. That is what I wish to bring to the minister's attention tonight. I would ask him to intervene personally. I ask the government to make every effort to exercise the discretion which I think is available under Section 44, and make an interpretation of that section which will give to these men at least limited benefits at this very grave and discomforting time in the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the hon. member for the clarity of his presentation, and tell him that in the short time since first he raised the matter I have not had a full opportunity to explore it.

I am told that the Unemployment Insurance Commission, in accordance with the Unemployment Insurance Act and established jurisprudence, disentitled effective November 4, 1974, members of the United Transportation Workers, Canadian Union of Transportation Employees Local 1, the Brotherhood of Railway and Airlines clerks, and some other unions because they were held to be members of a grade and class of workers who were participating in a labour dispute by honouring the picket line established by the shopcraft unions. This was imposed under authority of Section 44(2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Although this picketing and honouring by the other unions occurred in the northern section of the British Columbia Railway system, around Prince George, the entire British Columbia Railway system is considered as a single "premises" under the Unemployment Insurance Act and established jurisprudence.

Subsequent to the picketing by the shopcraft unions and refusal to cross by the other unions, there was a partial resumption of work effective November 13, 1974. This was, however, not considered to be "substantial" within the umpire's interpretation of what he contends to be "a termination of the stoppage of work" and sufficient to terminate the disentitlement previously imposed effective November 4, 1974. It is, therefore, considered to be one labour dispute and the stoppage of work has not yet terminated.

I should point out to the hon. member that the unions have filed an appeal against this decision to the board of referees. This is an impartial body set up to hear such cases and render a decision in accordance with the circumstances. The appeal is to be heard on December 23, 1974.

Notwithstanding this information I am conveying to the hon. member, I am intrigued by his presentation. I would like to take a further look personally although I cannot promise to intervene because I am not quite sure it would be proper for me to do so at this time. However, I will look more deeply into the matter and, privately or otherwise, convey to the hon. member further findings that may come to light as a result of that analysis.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:56 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MUNRO (HAMILTON EAST)—REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS IN ONTARIO LEGISLATURE RELATING TO INVESTIGATION OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege resulting from an exchange yesterday in the Ontario legislature which only recently came to my attention. This exchange has serious implications for the proceedings in this House during the last few days and perhaps for later today. The exchange is as follows and began with a question by Stephen Lewis:

May I ask the Solicitor General, in your reported request to the federal government for a royal commission inquiry into the activities of the SIU, would it be possible for you to indicate to the legislature specifically on what grounds you are making the request, the documentation which you are including in your submission, indeed, could you table the submission on which you based the request.

HON. GEORGE KERR: Mr. Speaker, there is some, shall we say, exaggeration to the story that was reported in this morning's Sun.

We are not demanding a probe. There is no application to the federal government for a probe. What I said to the reporter actually was said last Tuesday evening and has been said over and over again in this House in respect to questions of the honourable members. The only new information really that I gave that reporter was the fact that we had correspondence from the Ministry of Justice received on Friday from the federal Minister of Justice requesting our reasons for a federal investigation or a federal inquiry and why we felt that the police forces under the Criminal Code cannot, in fact, conduct any necessary inquiry or investigation. I had indicated to that reporter that we would be replying to the Ministry of Justice this week. Really, as far as new information is concerned, I believe that the honourable member for High Park has indicated in his remarks in this House and the information that the police have, and all of which is available to the federal officials, is really the information in total.

● (1410)

STEPHEN LEWIS: May I ask the Solicitor General, since you have now indicated publicly yourself that the inquiry makes good sense, could you, in fact, table the document, the letter . . . whatever it is that you sent to the federal Minister of Justice or Mr. Allmand so that we can see the formal basis on which you seek it.

HON. GEORGE KERR: Well Mr. Speaker, that will be a letter to the Minister of Justice. I believe the letter actually will be going from my Deputy Minister to his Deputy Minister and whether or not it should be tabled, I suppose, should to some extent depend on his opinion in that regard. But, I have no objection to tabling that letter . . .

At this point I am not going to move a motion, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to draw to the attention of the committee and of this House the content of this exchange I have just read, which suggests that members of the House have been basing some of their interventions in this House on misinformation, and apparently, and I believe, this process of misinformation was calculated.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is a total abuse of the rules. There is no question of privilege.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say to the minister through you that at no time have I based any interventions I have taken on this matter on any assumption that the Ontario government had asked for an investigation by the federal government. My understanding is that it is the view of the appropriate minister of the Ontario government that there ought to be an investigation, and that the subject matter is properly the subject matter for investigation by the federal government. I think the exchange in the Ontario legislature read by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) this afternoon confirms that. I just want to make it perfectly clear that I, at least, have not been operating under any misapprehension in that regard.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister gave me notice of his question of privilege and he has spoken to it. I do not think it is proper to have any more than one presentation on any one subject by one member no matter who he may be. If there are others who want to make a contribution to the point I will be glad to hear them now.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to ask the question I am hearing asked all around me. What is the question of privilege on which the minister has risen?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege as far as I am concerned arises from the fact that there has been constant reference in the House—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If there are no other members who wish to contribute I must say that I had the same question in my mind. The hon. minister has made his intervention, of which he gave the Chair notice. As is the custom, it is necessary to hear hon. members fully in the presentation of what they may believe to be a question of privilege, and generally to hear members opposite on somewhat of an equal time sharing basis in order that both viewpoints are represented.

I must say that on two counts I have no difficulty in coming to the decision that there does not, from any understanding I have of the rules of the House, appear to be a prima facie case of privilege. In any event, the minister did not follow his proposed question of privilege with a motion which would require the Chair to make a ruling, so I propose that we could move on with the business of the House.

Seafarers' International Union

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is an abuse of the privileges of the House.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the Order: Presenting Reports from Standing and Special committees:

November 7, 1974—Mr. McCleave (Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments):

That the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Thursday, November 7, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I seek the consent of the House to withdraw the first motion standing in my name, and in explanation I would say that I understand the House leaders will decide on the two hour period, perhaps later this week, or at least sometime soon, regarding the debate on the other motion standing in my name.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has two motions on the order paper standing in his name and seeks leave of the House to withdraw the first of those two. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF HIRING HALL PRACTICES OF SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, involving a matter of national interest and recent concern to this House. In view of the great emphasis placed on the activities of the SIU and the response of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), and in view of the statutory prohibitions in the Canada Shipping Act against hiring hall practices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Minister of Labour direct his officials to make public records and correspondence relating to complaints received from seamen, and further that the Minister cause an investigation in regard to Kenneth McGuire who is a dispatcher at the SIU hall in Montreal, contrary to Article XIII of the SIU Constitution in that he does not have the required sea time and other qualifications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

MANPOWER

SUGGESTED POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS IN APPROVING LOCAL INITIATIVES PROJECTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 which is both urgent and pressing. In view of documented revelations in today's press that the allocation of federal funds, under the Local Initiatives Program in 1972-73, was made by political rather than economic considerations in that Liberal ridings received nearly twice as much as opposition ridings, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House request that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration appear before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, to explain and reveal the reasons for the allocation of funds for each constituency in 1972-73 under LIP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some reservations about the subject matter of this motion in respect of its conformity with Standing Order 43; first, because the subject has been raised previously on several occasions in the House and there have been questions and answers with regard to it. I cannot agree that an allusion to a newspaper article puts an element of immediacy or urgency upon something which has been before the House on several occasions in the past.

In addition, I can perhaps place before the House or more stringent requirement in that on this day or on days of this sort hon. members might want to bear in mind that it is somewhat surprising to me to see on an opposition day or on an allotted day—although this is a special day when all parties in the House have agreed upon the subject matter of debate which is of some importance in this House, that being conflict of interest—a motion presented under the provisions of Standing Order 43 which would frustrate this arrangement and perhaps switch the debate to something else. Perhaps I am putting an undue construction on that, but it may be something that hon. members might like to think about in the future.

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF POSITION OF EXPROPRIATED PARTIES TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter whose importance requires immediate action on the part of the Canadian government.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That a special committee of the House be set up to study carefully the problem of the people who were expropriated at Sainte-Scholastique, whose payments have not been finalized, which situation has stirred their wrath and exasperation, and that said committee be required to report to this House by the end of 1974.

Mr. Speaker: Once again, while recognizing that the matter is important and of continued interest to this House, I feel that it totally lacks the element of urgency which is absolutely required by the provisions of Standing Order 43.

PETITION REQUESTING CANADIAN SUPPORT FOR THE STATE OF ISRAEL

Mr. John Roberts (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to introduce a petition to the House of Commons. It is a petition presented by the Beth Tzedec Congregation of Toronto. It is on a single slip of paper over 370 feet long, the length of a football field. It contains thousands of signatures. The petitioners indicate their solidarity for the state of Israel and request that the House of Commons support Israel by a resolution in the House and prevail upon Her Majesty's government to support the state of Israel at the United Nations.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—MATTERS ON WHICH GOVERNMENT IS SEEKING CONSENSUS OF VARIOUS GROUPS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and it is with regard to the program of trying to achieve a consensus among the principal elements of our economy to which he referred in the Speech from the Throne, and apparently again discussed yesterday at the meeting of the ministers of finance and provincial treasurers. Can the Prime Minister tell us briefly about what the government is trying to seek a consensus. Is it trying to seek a consensus on guidelines with respect to wages, salaries or profits?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Beyond what the Minister of Finance and myself have said on this on other occasions, I would just inform the House that the Minister of Finance has been talking about this at the meetings taking place yesterday and today, that he will be reporting to cabinet on Thursday, and that I expect that the series of consultations which are going forward would be made known to the House in a fairly short time.

Mr. Stanfield: That would be fine if it were Alice in Wonderland, but we are here in parliament. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can indicate what it is on which the Minister of Finance is trying to seek a consensus. Is that an improper question to direct to the head of the government who has been talking around this subject for several months now? Can the Prime Minister indicate to us very briefly whether the consensus being sought is a consensus on guidelines?

Mr. Trudeau: The consensus being sought is one on achieving ways of slowing down the rate of inflation and, I hope, bringing it down to a level which will cause the government less concern. That is the general subject of the consultations. The object of meetings of the various groups differs according to the groups that are meeting. Various ministers will be meeting various groups and discussing different aspects of inflation with them.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one final supplementary question. Is the Minister of Finance then seeking a consensus on economic theory, on what is the correct attack on inflation in Canada in the year 1974-75? Is it the approach about which the consensus is being sought and, if so, when may we expect a response, some time in this decade or the next?

Mr. Trudeau: Hopefully in this decade.

Mr. Stanfield: I doubt it.

RATES OF INFLATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT ON WHICH BUDGET PROPOSALS BASED

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the reports that are coming out of the Finance Minister's conference that the Minister of Finance based his budget on the assumption of a 9 per cent inflation and 6½ per cent rate of unemployment, can the Prime Minister assure the House that these are in fact the projections or assumptions on which the November 18 budget was based?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I could not say for sure, but I am sure the Minister of Finance will be glad to answer that.

Mr. Gillies: In view of those reports, would it be a fair statement that the government is prepared to accept as successful an inflation rate of something like 10 per cent during 1975?

Mr. Trudeau: We constantly indicated that inflation at these rates is inflation that gives the government great concern, and that is the reason we brought in so many policies to combat it. We hope that these policies—

UNEMPLOYMENT—REASON FOR FAILURE TO TAKE INTO ACCOUNT UNEMPLOYED NATIVE PEOPLE IN PREPARING MONTHLY FIGURES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I should like to put my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the National Indian Brotherhood estimates the level of unemployment amongst native people living on reserves in Canada varies between 50 per cent and 80 per cent at the present time, can the Prime Minister inform the House why these unemployment levels are not taken into consideration in the preparation of the monthly figures indicating unemployment levels in the country as a whole?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be glad to refer that question to the appropriate minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question. When the Prime Minister refers that question to the appropriate minister would he find out or get a commitment or issue a directive to the minister, rather, indicating the desirability of having statistics available on a regular basis which indicate the level of unemployment on the reserves with our native people. This is obviously a very important way for this House to determine the policies and programs and to what degree they need to be improved to provide employment for these people?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will gladly refer that question to the minister as well.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST OF QUEBEC TO BE REIMBURSED FOR NOT USING FORCE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, I asked him a question arising from the remarks the Quebec Minister of Justice had made the night before on the CBC network, accusing him of hiding behind the Solicitor General and behaving like an hypocrite in connection with the money asked by the province of Quebec in compensation with the non utilization by the Quebec government of the RCMP. The Prime Minister replied yesterday that he would check the remarks made by the Quebec Minister of Justice. Can the Prime Minister now advise the House whether he has checked and communicated with the Quebec Minister of Justice and, in the affirmative, what sort of understanding or misunderstanding they have reached?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, in part, Mr. Speaker. I have read some excerpts of the statement made by Mr. Choquette, but I have not seen the complete statement yet. I have been told that he added this morning to what he had already said. I was not aware of this before I came into the House. I simply cannot reply as long as I have not read the complete statement. On the other hand, I am not the type to hide behind any of my ministers; if Premier Bourassa wants to contact me about this, I think he could do it directly, without passing through Mr. Choquette.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Just when the Prime Minister was sitting down after having answered my last question, which was really intended for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that minister came into the House. I wonder if I could be permitted to direct the question to him now that he is here.

Mr. Trudeau: He will get notice of it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

FISHERIES

LOSSES OF LOBSTER FISHERMEN AS RESULT OF STORM—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the staggering lobster trap losses suffered by lobster fishermen from Sable Islands, Shelburne County, to Cole Harbour, Halifax County, Nova Scotia, as a result of a severe storm on the night of December 2 which delivered a crippling blow to the inshore lobster fishing industry, has the minister taken steps to classify this area as a disaster area or what action does the government contemplate taking to assist these fishermen in surmounting their disastrous losses?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for indicating to me yesterday that he intended to raise this question. My colleague from Yarmouth also raised it. I regret to inform the House that some 92,000 traps have been lost and in some areas it has been a complete disaster, with as much as a 75 per cent loss. In other areas the loss varies from 25 per cent to 40 per cent. When we get a full assessment I hope we can do something about it.

THE ARTS

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO CHARLOTTETOWN CENTRE OF THE PERFORMING ARTS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I sent him notice yesterday. I am sure his parliamentary secretary will be able to reply. May I ask if the minister has received an urgent request for an emergency grant for structural and maintenance aid for the Confederation Centre of the Performing Arts in Charlottetown. Also, can he advise what measures of assistance are contemplated for this artistically valuable cultural centre erected by the national and provincial governments to commemorate the Charlottetown conference of 1864, the deliberations of which brought this country into being.

● (1430)

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the hon. member's question as notice and refer it to the minister.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT IN SEEKING CONSENSUS OF VARIOUS GROUPS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As the Minister of Finance said yesterday, "I want the labour movement and business to tell me what they can do and then we will see if we can work out a consensus," is it not the intention of the government to present immediately to these groups at least a preliminary policy of its own as to what level of restraint should be expected from each, or does the Prime Minister merely wish to play the role of host?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO MINISTER HAS TRANSFERRED ASSETS TO SPOUSE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister's guidelines for conflicts of interest relating to ministers of the Crown do not include spouses and since the right hon. gentleman, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, said that he had discovered potential conflicts of interest during the period he had given ministers to put their affairs in order, can he assure the House that under present guidelines no minister of the Crown has transferred assets to a spouse in order to avoid conflict of interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wanted to hear the full import of the question before intervening. The hon. member well knows that the subject of conflict of interest guidelines, and the green paper have been referred to the standing committee. Also, specific guidelines respecting conflict of interest involving ministers and senior civil servants are to be the subject matter of debate today and I feel that these questions should be dealt with then rather than at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish the minions on the backbenches would remain silent. It was precisely because there is to be that debate this afternoon and this evening that I asked my question, since the Prime Minister's answer would have a bearing on my remarks either this afternoon or this evening. The Prime Minister may not necessarily be present in the House during the debate, nor will he necessarily reply to speeches made later today. That is why I asked this specific question. I am sure he would like to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Be that as it may, I feel that whoever participates in this important debate on behalf of the government will be able to address himself, as the lead-off speaker, to the very important question asked by the hon. member. I think that will be the appropriate time to do it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the answer to the hon. member's question would put the debate in its proper perspective.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member for Labelle wants to shout and yell all the time. I do not think he was sent to this House to do that. I am trying to make a sensible, responsible suggestion. The answer to the hon. member's question would put this afternoon's debate on the rails.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I listen religiously to the questions of hon. members of the opposition, but I think that if the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi had referred himself to today's order paper, he could have waited to put his question during the debate now about to take place.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

PENITENTIARIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ESCAPE OF TWO INMATES—SUGGESTED MANNING OF TOWERS TWENTY-FOUR HOURS A DAY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and has to do with the escape from the British Columbia penitentiary last week of two dangerous criminals. Can the Solicitor General advise the House if the four towers in the British Columbia penitentiary will be manned 24 hours a day, as they were last year when there was such a rash of escapes, so that the people of British Columbia may be protected against escaping convicts?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the only time the towers are not manned is—

An hon. Member: For coffee break.

Mr. Allmand: —from midnight until eight o'clock in the morning.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to say that the only time the towers are not manned in the B.C. pen is after midnight, when inmates are locked in their cells. In this particular escape inmates had put dummies in their cells, and had hidden—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The dummies are on the government side.

Mr. Hees: Is that why you are so slim today?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to give the House full information on this question. Before lock-up these inmates had put dummies in their beds and had hidden outside. After the lock-up, with the guards absent from the towers, they escaped.

Mr. Hees: The dummies stayed in and the prisoners walked out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to know if the opposition is really serious about hearing an answer to the question. Last year we tried, for a while, to keep guards in the towers at all times, even when inmates were locked in their cells. It was found to be an expensive operation and it was recommended to me as being unnecessary. As a result of that escape—

Mr. Hees: How many got out?

Mr. Allmand: I must say that few escaped after midnight and before the men got up in the morning, but there were these escapes. I am looking at this question again; it involves the question of cost-benefit ratio. Is it worth keeping guards in all towers between midnight and six or seven o'clock in the morning? We will look into that once more.

Mr. Reynolds: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As prisoners are still escaping between midnight and eight o'clock in the morning, would the minister consider putting dummies in the towers so that prisoners will think they are being watched?

Mr. Allmand: Are you available for the job?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

REDUCTION OF TARIFF ON BICYCLES—EFFECT ON INDUSTRY AT RIVERS, MANITOBA

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance—

An hon. Member: He is in the tower.

Mr. Dinsdale: —perhaps I can direct my question to the Prime Minister. As the recent reduction form 25 per cent to 15 per cent in the customs duty on imported bicycles is threatening the industry at the former Rivers defence base, that being a successful project supported by the Department of Indian Affairs, what action is the government taking to resolve this conflict of interests?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance who has been consulting with me on this matter because DREE is involved in the project, may I advise the hon. member that the matter is now under consideration. No decision has been made about duty. I should point out that some changes in sales tax regulations will be of benefit to the company and may offset to some degree the effects of the decline in the rate of duty.

● (1440)

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister been made aware of this problem and has he moved to protect the interests of the native people who are employed on this project?

[Mr. Hees.]

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the problem and I have been discussing the situation with my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DETERMINE IF PRICE INCREASES RELATED TO COSTS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the conclusion reached by Judge Estey in the steel price inquiry that "any future price increases should be linked directly to cost increases, otherwise the profit margins which customarily obtain in the industry will be exceeded", and in view of the announcement by the steel companies this week of further price increases ranging from seven to twelve per cent in the case of certain products, has the government conducted an investigation to determine whether these increases are directly related to costs, and, if not, why not?

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I take notice of this question. I will be pleased to get the necessary information.

[English]

Mr. Symes: I did not get an answer to that question from either the minister or the Prime Minister, but I think the Prime Minister can answer this supplementary: will the right hon. gentleman ensure that these price increases, if justified, will apply only to new production and not to the existing inventory, so as to prevent, in effect the double ticketing of steel products?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure this is the kind of question I would have referred to the parliamentary secretary had I been given notice of it. His minister is presently meeting with the Prime Minister of Iran. This is not the kind of question to which I have the answer in my head, and I think the House should realize that. If I had answered the question I would have answered it in exactly the same way as the parliamentary secretary did.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATURAL RESOURCES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON DEVELOPMENT AND EXPORT OF URANIUM

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Following the federal-provincial conference on mining policy, Quebec Finance Minister Massé has maintained that the federal government should withdraw from the uranium mining industry. Did the minister communicate with the provincial minister about this?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did discuss the matter with the minister and I have also looked into his communication.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Contrary to the agreements signed by the provinces, does the minister consider that the role of the federal government is to act simply as a customs officer when it comes to the export of uranium?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Speaker. I have informed the provincial ministers that the federal government does not intend to relinquish its jurisdiction over uranium.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

GRAIN

PROPOSED CONTINUOUS OPERATION OF DRYING FACILITIES AT TERMINALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who reports for the Wheat Board. Since it is a known fact, or an estimated fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Korchinski: Since it has been estimated that 26 per cent of all the grain in western Canada is either tough or damp, are the drying facilities at the terminals, particularly those at Thunder Bay, working round the clock on a seven-day-a-week basis?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): With the slowdown in the movement of grain out of Thunder Bay there may have been some difficulty recently about unloading at maximum capacity, but I can assure the hon. member that the Wheat Board is very conscious of this problem and is urging farmers to do a lot of the drying themselves. The board is also making sure that the various drying facilities both inland and at the ports are being used to capacity.

Mr. Korchinski: Since it is a known fact that it is more economic to dry the grain at the terminals than to do so in private drying facilities, will the minister ask the Wheat Board and those concerned to endeavour to operate these facilities on a seven-day-a-week round the clock basis?

Mr. Lang: As I have indicated, even if the facilities are being operated in that fashion, a significant amount of drying on the farm will still be required. The fact of the matter at present is that it is more economic to dry the grain in that way—recent changes in price spreads have widened the differential in price between damp and dry grain, so it is more profitable for the farmer to dry it.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ENVIRONMENTAL CENTRE, VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Would the hon. lady please advise us whether plans for the new environmental centre in Vancouver promised by the former minister of the environment during the July election campaign are continuing and, if so, whether they are available?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): The hon. member is no doubt aware that some restraint has to be exercised in capital expenditure—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mrs. Sauvé: This particular expenditure is presently under review and will be looked at in the context of general government expenditures.

HOUSING

ELIGIBILITY OF PURCHASERS RECEIVING PROVINCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR FIVE HUNDRED DOLLAR GRANT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would the minister inform the House whether or not recipients of housing assistance under provincial housing programs through which the cost of homes has been reduced, in some cases, to the $18,000-$25,000 level, will be eligible for the $500 tax-free cash grant?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Without understanding the question fully, I would suggest that if it is a first-time purchase and if it complies with the other criteria, these people will be eligible.

Mr. Darling: If, as the minister indicates, these people will be eligible for the grant, will the hon. gentleman tell us whether or not he considers this to be appropriate, bearing in mind the fact that they have already received housing assistance?

Mr. Danson: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are a large number of people who receive housing assistance in one form or another because so many programs have been initiated by the federal government with a view to helping those who need housing. But they will, nevertheless, be eligible for further benefits, except in certain circumstances where people have received more than 100 per cent financing.

ENERGY

OIL—PROPOSED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF REASON DRILLING RIGS LEAVING ALBERTA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that drilling rigs in Alberta are now leaving in droves and Canadian geologists and technical know-how people are leaving for the United States, all caused by the devastating policies of the federal government and the uncertainty, is the minister now prepared, as he does not seem to accept the real facts, to give a direction, with the co-operation of the members of the House, to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, or to the standing committee that looks after this matter, to go to Calgary, Edmonton and other places in Alberta and in Saskatchewan to get the facts immediately, so as to reverse these policies and secure a supply of petroleum for Canada in the future?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I might suggest to the hon. gentleman that he start off by reading the speech of Premier Lougheed last week, when he pointed out that while there may indeed have been rigs leaving Alberta, they were going in some cases to federal territories. Perhaps he might like to look into the policies of the provincial government first.

[Mr. Danson.]

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps the minister is prepared to send some people from his department to the ports of entry of Canada and the United States, where they would see drilling rigs leaving Alberta for the United States. Just as an aside, the last one out last week put the lights out in Calgary.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am inclined to take the judgment made by the premier of Alberta regarding the reasons for the drop in drilling in that province, and, of course, he does not ascribe it in any sense to the reasons stated by the hon. gentleman.

DISALLOWANCE OF ROYALTIES AS DEDUCTION FROM INCOME TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ROYALTIES IMPOSED BY FEDERAL LEGISLATION IN YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Welcome back.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am always overjoyed at the welcome back given to me, but hon. members do not seem to realize that I and the hon. member for Northwest Territories come from a jurisdiction under the absolute control of the federal authority and we have to run around after dozens and dozens of boards and commissions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: My question to the minister of energy is this. With respect to the policy of the government on disallowance of royalties as a deduction from income tax, does the government intend to apply that same policy to the royalties imposed by federal legislation in the federal jurisdictions of the Yukon and Northwest Territories?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman might like to pose that question to my colleague, but my answer is that I believe that is also the policy.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED AFFRONT TO BRITAIN BY PRIME MINISTER ENTERTAINING MR. GRESKO, AN ALLEGED SOVIET SPY—PROPOSED REFUSAL OF ENTRY TO MR. GRESKO

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and deals with the Soviet espionage agent Alexander Gresko. Can the Prime Minister offer any explanation why he would have his picture taken in his office with Mr. Gresko, a well known senior Russian spy already ejected from Great Britain for high level espionage activities, and does not the Prime Minister consider it a political affront to Britain if he entertains a person who is declared by that government persona non grata?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not consider that an affront, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Assuming that it is the policy of the Department of External Affairs to grant neither diplomatic nor courtesy visas to known Soviet spies or other spies, which in fact they have done in the past, and assuming that it is the policy of that office to regard information from the RCMP on matters relating to national security seriously, would the Prime Minister assure the House, therefore, for the sake of national security, notwithstanding the security for the Olympic games—Mr. Gresko is Soviet attaché to the games in Montreal—that appropriate steps will be taken to declare Alexander Gresko persona non grata in Canada and to refuse him any further entry to this country? If not, I should like some explanation why not?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Department of External Affairs and the RCMP are aware, and were aware, of the identity of Mr. Gresko. Any steps that they take will be made known to the House.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE ACCORD WITH ALBERTA CONCERNING ENVIRONMENTAL JURISDICTION OVER TAR SANDS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the desire frequently expressed by representatives of the government of Alberta to develop the Alberta tar sands as soon as possible, and in view of the statement of the Minister of the Environment of that province on November 4 in the Alberta house in which he said that "the accord"—he meant the accord between themselves and the federal government—"if and when we reach one, will recognize that the province will be in the forefront in dealing with the companies", and that "we are very close to reaching an accord", would the minister advise this House if negotiations are still taking place, and has an accord been reached with the government of the province of Alberta concerning environmental jurisdiction over the tar sands?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): No, Mr. Speaker. The question of agreements on responsibilities in environmental matters is now under study. A draft of the agreement which could be signed between the different provinces and the federal government is now before the Alberta Minister of Environment and Resources. He sent me back some corrections, some amendments he would like to make to this agreement and we are discussing this.

ALLEGED DESTRUCTION OF BIRDS IN TAR SANDS—POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES BEING LAID

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that there have been rumours that 1,000 to 2,000 birds have been destroyed in the tar sands—and there is certainly confirmation of some bird kill—is the minister now ready to advise the House whether her department has determined if charges should be laid with respect to the death of any of those birds in the tar sands, or whether an investigation has been completed?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, about the report on bird killings in the tar sands, I must say there is no basis to it. There has been no such thing as the destruction of thousands of birds in ponds used for settling some residue from tar sands development plants.

[English]

Mr. Leggatt: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the House that she will rely on information received from her own department and from the government of Alberta, rather than information provided by the companies, which has largely been the case to date?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: I think the information to which the hon. member alluded come from the press and those I gave him come from my own services.

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

How does he propose to implement the recommendation of Heritage Canada, made public on December 9, that the federal government should recognize the mother house of the Grey Nuns of Montreal as a national historic site, buy it, endeavour to renovate it and use this architectural complex for public purposes?

[English]

HEALTH

NEED FOR INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MEDICAL STUDENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that a high proportion of foreign students are presently enrolled in Canadian medical schools and that at the time Medicare was introduced by the government a commitment was given that federal funding would be used to expand medical school facilities, would the minister now give us an explanation regarding what policies are presently underway to increase the number of seats in Canadian medical schools for medical students?

● (1500)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer could be long but I will try to make it as short as possible. Over $500 million has been spent on improving medical education facilities in this country after the introduction of Medicare, and at the present time the rate of production in our medical faculties in Canada is substantially higher than it was five or 10 years ago. As far as the presence of foreign students in our medical faculties is concerned, we must bear in mind that we have a great number of Canadian students and graduates of medicine studying abroad in other countries, so we should be very careful before we jump to any conclusion as to what should be done with regard to foreign students in Canada.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REASON FOR ALLOWING CONTINUANCE OF HIRING HALL SYSTEM BY SEAFARERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION IN VIEW OF LEGISLATION PROHIBITING PRACTICE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour but I do not see him in his seat, so perhaps I can—

An hon. Member: Here he is.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, the Norris inquiry dealt at length with the dangers and problems associated with hiring hall practices and so on. Charges have been raised time and time again with regard to "do not ship" lists and other problems directly related to the hiring hall and the Seafarers' International Union. I would ask whether the minister can advise why the hiring hall system of engaging seamen is continually used by the Seafarers' International Union and the Canadian Lake Carriers Association when there is a specific legislative provision outlawing the hiring system set forth in Section 154(1) of the shipping act? It is very short so I should like to read it. I am sure the minister is aware of it. It states—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister is aware of the law.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the question of the hiring hall as it is being practised has not been the subject of a complaint by the major parties involved, for instance on the Great Lakes. I will say right now in the House in answer to the hon. member that if anybody wishes to launch a complaint against the present practice, or back up any allegations with any facts at all we will look into the matter. In the meantime, I have been advised that this is not the case at the present time.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer I would like to put another very brief question to him. Is he in fact satisfied that any complaints which have arisen relative to this matter are being adequately looked after by the so-called "watchdog committee" that has been set up through the Canadian Labour Congress? I should like also to go back briefly and ask the minister again, since he is familiar with this specific statutory prohibition against the hiring hall system, why it is that this particular statute of Canada is not being enforced?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept for a moment the hon. member's legal interpretation in respect of that particular section. I think if anything is required in terms of an amendment to the code, it would be in relation to complaints in respect of people being abused as a result of the system so they can be dealt with quickly. I do not agree with the present legal interpretation, and I would reiterate to the hon. member that if any complaints should come forward they should immediately be referred to the Canada Labour Relations Board for investigation.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question or a point of order.

Mr. Forrestall: Or a question of privilege, one or the other.

Mr. Speaker: No matter how you describe it, there seems to be a contest between the two seat mates to see who will ask the next question. If they can agree I will be glad to have one of them ask the next supplementary question.

Mr. MacKay: Go ahead.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the Minister of Labour is attempting to advise the House that the SIU is above the law in respect of infractions under the act under which it operates and which is within the jurisdiction of this particular legislative body, and that these should not be construed as infractions unless somebody complains?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Of course not, Mr. Speaker. All I am indicating—

Mr. Forrestall: That's what you said, John. Don't be so hyper.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): All I am indicating is that during the time the so-called "hiring hall" practice has been underway there have been no complaints in respect of it. I want to say as well that during negotiations on the Great Lakes this was not a principal issue of dispute between the employers and the employees. If the hon. member wishes to launch a complaint in respect of abuses of the so-called "hiring hall" system, there are mechanisms now in place to thoroughly investigate and come to a conclusion.

Mr. Forrestall: John, you are so sensitive about a completely straight-forward matter that you cannot see your nose.

HEALTH

REASON FOR INCREASE IN PRICE OF INSULIN—INCREASE IN PRICE OF PANCREATIC GLANDS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the price of insulin has increased by over 20 per cent in the last two months, and the fact that this price was held steady for years when Connaught Laboratories was under the aegis of the University of Toronto, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare explain why insulin production, which is essential for the survival of thousands of Canadians, was put on a profit making basis when Connaught Laboratories became part of the Canada Development Corporations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question has a very familiar ring to it. If I am not mistaken, another member of the hon. member's party put that question in exactly those words to the minister.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My question was prompted by a direct letter of inquiry from one of my constituents with information I was not aware had been presented before.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the minister answered the question at the time.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, I do not think it was. I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask a question on this matter. I should like to draw his attention to the fact that animal pancreatic glands, from which insulin is made, have gone up in price very substantially from approximately 35 cents a pound to 75 cents a pound. It is inevitable that some of this increase would show up in the price of insulin. I am just as concerned as the hon. member about the increase in the price. There has been a meeting between the interested parties concerned, the Connaught Laboratories, the Canadian Diabetic Association and several federal departments, at which the whole question of price and supply was discussed. Indeed, a close look is being taken at this situation. I might add that every indication is that the price of insulin has not gone up by as much as the price of the glands has gone up, and it is unlikely that it will do so.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there has been such a pronounced increase in the price of the pancreatic glands which are used, as the minister has said, in the manufacture of insulin, and in view of the fact that this price is not reflected in current revenue, according to the cattle industry, what explanation does the minister have for the increase in the price of these particular organs?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not have a complete answer in respect of this particular situation, except that the price of animal products has gone up substantially over the last few years.

INSULIN—POSSIBLE HOARDING OF PANCREATIC GLANDS BY PRODUCERS TO DRIVE UP PRICE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he has carried out studies or investigations within his department to determine if producers are in fact withholding animal pancreas from the market in order to drive the price up? This is the evidence we have.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the evidence that my department has collected from the meetings and discussions that have taken place between the parties concerned, including the Canadian Diabetic Association and Connaught Laboratories, has not provided us with any indication at all of hoarding. There appears to be no foundation to this allegation. What has happened is that there has been a higher demand for glands, not only for insulin production but for other purposes. The packing industry has been made aware of the priority that should be given to providing glands for the production of insulin. The conclusion is that there is no reason to expect any particular shortage of insulin in the foreseeable future.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief point of order for the sake of clarification. I do not want there to be any confusion in respect of Hansard tomorrow. The minister was referring to the Canada Labour Code in the course of an answer to me and I was referring to the Canada Shipping Act. I just want to have on the record that while he was speaking about complaints and so on pursuant to the Canada Labour Code I was referring to section 154 (1) of the Canada Shipping Act when I was asking the question.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF GREEN PAPER "MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND CONFLICT OF INTEREST"

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest" tabled on November 27, 1974, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections; and

That, after the committee has concluded its deliberations and submitted its report on the aforementioned matter, it be authorized to consider and make recommendations upon the subject-matter of ministers and conflict of interest and public servants and conflict of interest.

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There has been some discussion about time limits on this debate. This is a government motion on an opposition day, so it has some characteristics of both. I think there is general understanding that the normal rules should apply. However, I am advised by my seatmate that he will not abuse his privilege in respect of unlimited time, like the seatmate of the government House leader did not long ago. After the first four speakers, two speakers for the official opposition, and after the government House leader, who will be speaking later by agreement—

Mr. Sharp: I will speak first.

Mr. Baldwin: I beg your pardon. After the government House leader, the first two speakers for the official opposition, and speakers for the NDP and the Créditistes have spoken, there will be a ten-minute limit on speeches. I think this will be useful and will give members more opportunity to discuss this important issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to make sure that this agreement implies that our first speaker will have enough time to deliver his speech and that the next two will have ten minutes. Is that what the hon. member for Peace River means?

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Not unlimited time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that was not quite our understanding, if I may speak as one who was involved in the discussion. We understood that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who would be the first two speakers, would try to hold themselves to half an hour each, and that thereafter the first speaker for this party and the first speaker for the Social Credit party would get half an hour and everybody else would get ten minutes. This is the proposition to which we agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope I do not go beyond half an hour, but I do not agree to be limited to half an hour. I will try to stick to it as much as I can.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Sharp: We are agreeable to that understanding. I shall try to keep my remarks to within 30 minutes, but I hope I will not be stopped if I should take another two or three minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The extension of anything resembling unlimited time, or 30 minutes as I understand it, to all three speakers from the opposition parties is a departure in itself from the rules. My understanding of the rules is that the mover of a motion on an allotted day, and the first speaker immediately in reply thereto, are not under any constraints as to time; thereafter, everyone suffers the 30-minute time limit. However, if it is understood that there is a relaxed view toward the first four speakers, but that deadlines are such that they ought to try to keep themselves within 30 minutes if at all possible, perhaps we can proceed on that basis. Thereafter, all speakers would have ten minutes. Is that agreed?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the ten-minute limitation. I would be agreeable to cutting it in half from 30 minutes to 15 minutes, but not to ten minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I think this is an important point. You just said that the spokesmen for the government and for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition will each be able to speak for 30 minutes, but you did not say how much time will be allocated to the leaders of the New Democratic Party and of the Social Credit Party of Canada. This is why I would like to insist that the leader of the Social Credit Party (Mr. Caouette) be given as much time as the government's and the Official Opposition's spokesmen, otherwise we would withdraw our support.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It is evident that the Chair can be guided here only by some accord from members, which does not seem to exist or, alternatively, apply the rule which exists, which is the way we will have to proceed.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, during the last parliament my predecessor in office, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), tabled a green paper entitled "Members of Parliament and Conflict of Interest" and placed on the order paper a motion to refer this paper to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As hon. members are aware, I tabled the same paper again in this House and put down a similar motion for its reference to the same standing committee.

As a result of discussion among the party representatives—here I should like particularly to acknowledge the co-operation of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield)—the final allotted day for this part of the session is being devoted to a debate on the reference which, however, has been amended to refer the green paper and the other questions to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The motion asks the committee to study and report to this House on the green paper which deals with members of parliament and conflict of interest, and then to turn its attention to two related members—ministers and conflict of interest and public servants and conflict of interest.

All three matters are of major importance, and the government has taken the lead in all of them. We initiated the reference to the standing committee because we want the proposals we have made, whether relating to members of parliament, ministers or public servants, to be examined carefully and thoroughly and we are hopeful that out of this study will emerge a sound basis on which to base both the law and the practice. We shall take steps, I might add, to bring the same matter before the other place because the position of senators is involved just as is the position of members of parliament.

On several occasions, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other ministers have emphasized that we have put forward our proposals in this difficult field, whether relating to members of parliament, ministers or public servants, not as fixed and final but as constructive steps forward. They are subject to review and can probably be improved. We are prepared to look at them again in light of the conclusions of the standing committee and of parliament as a whole because eventually the committee's report will be returned to us.

I should remind hon. members, as we enter this debate, that already parliament has taken major action in a related field by recent amendments to the Canada Elections Act and by passage of the Election Expenses Act. We have gone a long way by these reforms to put the financing of election campaigns and the financing of political parties on a basis that minimizes any possible conflict of interest and that in fact encourages individuals, corporations and trade unions to participate in the political process by making contributions to their candidates or to the political parties they wish to support.

I mention this in light of recent discussion in this House. I draw attention particularly to the point that the reform legislation does not in any way discourage contributions to political campaigns. By a system of tax credits, such contributions are, on the contrary, encouraged, and this is as it should be. No stigma should attach to the support of a political party or candidate by anyone in this country so long as the contribution is open and above-board.

The principle underlying our election expenses legislation is that the source of major financing of parties and candidates should be disclosed, not prevented. It is for all candidates for office and for all parties to decide what to accept and what not to accept within the law, and it does not seem to me that the responsibility differs as between candidates or parties. Presumably, most if not all of those who stand for office, at least of the principal parties, do so with the hope of being on the government side or even of being a member of the cabinet. Presumably, all parties are striving to become the party in office at some time, and even when that is not so I do not imagine that any candidate who stands for parliament without hope or ambition to become a minister will be more willing to accept a particular contribution for that reason.

As I have said, we have taken a giant step forward in the reform of the election laws. The task before us now is to make similar progress in establishing standards for the conduct of members of parliament who are safely elected. I turn, then, to the green paper and first of all I draw attention to a part of the green paper that is related directly to the question of elections. Let me refer to one specific proposal in the green paper. It is proposed that a candidate for membership in the House of Commons should be required, when nominated, to list with the Chief Electoral Officer the details of all financial interests and offices he holds which would be prohibited if he were a member. He would also be required to list all holdings and companies in which he holds more than 5 per cent of the issued shares, if they are public companies. Upon election, a new member would be required to divest himself of prohibited interests and offices as soon as possible or, in any event, within a year.

Certain fundamental, ethical and democratic principles underlie the specific proposals advanced in the green paper. First and foremost, our democratic system is based on the requirement that members of parliament and senators perform, and be seen to perform, their duties in a manner reflecting the highest possible degree of concern for the public interest. Similarly, it is basic that all members of the public should be assured of equal access to and impartial treatment by government officials at all times, and that the key advocacy rule of members of parliament and senators be governed by that principle. In accepting membership in either chamber, a member of parliament or a senator simultaneously accepts a code of conduct which is commensurate with his public responsibilities.

However, we must be careful not to develop rules respecting conflict of interest which turn the House of Commons and the Senate into the private preserves of only a few whose personal circumstances are such as to allow them to meet overly stringent standards. The very representativeness of these chambers might be adversely affected were we to decide to require their members to divest themselves of all financial assets or other private interests. It was these considerations which led the government to place before the House, in the green paper, various forms of rules including an independence of parliament act, orders of both chambers and retention of certain principles in the Criminal Code, and to suggest different means of dealing with conflicts, including strict avoidance in the clearest cases of impropriety and disclosure of interests where there is only a potential conflict. The specific proposals contained in the green paper concern those conflicts of interest that result from a member or senator having a personal pecuniary interest in a given matter that is sufficient to influence the exercise of his public duties or responsibilities.

My predecessor in office outlined the contents of this document in his statement to the House on July 17, 1973, which I commend to members of the present House. I would, therefore, only remind them of the basic concerns described in the green paper. The text addresses itself to four major areas of conflict of interest, namely bribery and prohibited fees, incompatible offices, government contracts, and financial interests. The offence of bribery would remain in the Criminal Code, and a supplementary provision prohibiting the receipt of fees by members of both houses for the advocacy of personal, private or professional matters among members of parliament, senators or public servants, or before any government board or tribunal, is recommended. A Standing Order and rule for the House and Senate, respectively, are proposed to prohibit such fees.

Second, it is proposed that members and senators should be prohibited from holding nearly all federal or provincial offices, since to permit them to do so would constitute a conflict of interest, violate the supremacy of parliament or violate the concept of the division of power between federal and provincial jurisdiction.

Third, it is suggested that members of parliament and senators not be permitted, directly or indirectly, to participate in or derive benefits from government contracts. Reasonable and necessary exceptions are provided, but public disclosure would be required of members choosing to take advantage of the suggested exemptions.

In the fourth area, financial interests, disclosure is also required. To deal with possible conflicts in this area we are proposing resolutions from both houses to require members to disclose any special pecuniary interest which they may have in the subject matter of a debate or of a communication with ministers, other members or public servants. It is also recommended that a further resolution be adopted to require members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to exercise care in the management of their private investments so as not to benefit or appear to benefit from the use of confidential information. Sanctions are provided for violations. The respective chambers would, of course, police their own orders, while the Attorney General of Canada would be charged with the enforcement of the independence of parliament act.

Hon. members will recall that my predecessor in office emphasized the importance of the proposed role of a special committee that is advocated in the green paper. Let me quote from his statement appearing on page 5688 of Hansard for July 17, 1973:

> What I consider to be central to the success of the others is the recommendation that a standing committee of each House be designated and charged with a permanent reference to investigate all questions of conflict of interest, to provide members on request with advisory opinions and to advise the House on a regular basis of any changes which are needed in the rules governing conflict of interest. There will be a continuing need for observation and reform.
> These committees would also be empowered to grant dispensation of relief to any member from the application of certain provisions of the proposed act if it is thought that a particular provision would create undue personal hardship for the individual member or not be in the public interest.

This green paper is advanced as a possible framework for discussion of this most complex and difficult matter. It is, we believe, of the utmost importance that recommendations first be formulated which would govern the conduct of all members of both chambers. As the Prime Minister mentioned in his statement of July 18, 1973, to this House, the rules and laws applicable to members of parliament and senators will be the foundations upon which the special guidelines applicable to ministers of the Crown will rest. It is, therefore, all the more crucial that standards be developed for members of parliament as a starting point for the guidelines applicable to ministers and to public servants.

The government believes that the recommendations contained in the green paper represent a code of conduct which, if followed, would result in a standard of behaviour in which all Canadians could place their complete confidence. The proposals, however, do not attempt to canvass in detail or specific terms all possible unethical activities of members of parliament and of senators. In this, as in many areas of human conduct, rules may become less effective as they become specific.

In the final analysis, the spirit and the principles which underlie the rules we may adopt will be of paramount importance. We must not forget the fact that no rules, however wise and however just, will ensure the highest standards of conduct. The strength of our system of government will depend, as it always has, on the continued and wholehearted effort of each and every one of us to meet his responsibility to conduct himself in an honourable way.

Before concluding these remarks, Mr. Speaker, let me refer to the standards that are being applied to cabinet ministers and to public servants. The Prime Minister dealt with these matters in two statements to the House in the last parliament—on July 18, 1973, relating to ministers, and on December 18, 1973, relating to public servants and order in council appointees.

May I make a few general comments on the question of ministers and conflict of interest. As a Privy Councillor since April, 1963, I can testify that the guidelines now applying to cabinet ministers represent a considerable advance over anything required heretofore—

Mr. Stanfield: From your point of view.

Mr. Sharp: From the point of view of a cabinet minister who has served in other administrations. This is not so much in spirit, because we were always conscious of the particular responsibilities that were placed upon us, but in terms of specific action such as the creation of trusts. I say this because I heard one hon. member opposite say something to the effect that there has been no change. I can testify, as a cabinet minister—and can probably speak for all my colleagues who have been in cabinet as long as I have—that there has been a great improvement in the specificity of the guidelines as they apply to cabinet ministers.

What has been lacking, however, has been a foundation upon which to build these ministerial guidelines. I think it is fair to say that the cabinet has moved well ahead of parliament. We do not know yet what kind of standards the two Houses of Parliament wish to apply to their members, as members. The Prime Minister dealt with this point in his statement on July 18, 1973, when he said:

> ... ministers will be governed by whatever decisions parliament arrives at with regard to members of the House and senators. It is our belief that, by combining the requirements of law and of parliamentary resolution with the guidelines, a clear standard will be in place against which the conduct of members of the government can be measured ... Much of what I have outlined with regard to the conduct of ministers has been the policy of the present government and that of my predecessor for several years . . . The rules . . . will be put in the form of precise guidelines just as soon as parliament has had an opportunity to consider the green paper with regard to members of parliament and senators and the legislation that might be made applicable to them. It is quite possible that the general views of parliament on matters of principle and the specific provisions that are judged necessary or desirable for parliamentarians should influence the final formulation of the guidelines.

For example, there has been some questioning in the House about the guidelines as they relate to the spouses of cabinet ministers. Quite a number of questions have come from the other side. There was one today. The conflict of interest guidelines applying to the prime minister and to ministers of the Crown apply to them in all of their financial dealings. They are expected to include any transactions with or transfers to their spouses. The prime minister and cabinet ministers are also expected not to divulge any confidential information to their spouses which they might use or appear to use to their personal financial benefit. Ministers are held accountable for any breach of these guidelines or of their spirit, as was mentioned in the statement of July 18, 1973, in which the first step of the government's policy regarding conflict of interest of ministers was announced.

This being the case, and having regard to the fact that a minister and his spouse are two separate human beings, it would be unjust to impose upon the spouses of ministers restrictions which would prevent them from assuming an independent role in the community if they saw fit to do so. Moreover, it is the firm belief of the government that no conflict of interest guidelines, however stringent, can be devised which would not put the onus squarely on the individuals to whom they are applicable.

The government would welcome the views of the standing committee and of parliament on this issue. The government will wish to know how the spouses of ordinary members of parliament are to be regarded where they may have financial interests of their own. Are these interests to be revealed if their spouses are involved in advocacy which would require them to disclose an interest? I put this question just to illustrate that members of parliament will have to face up to exactly the same problems, and I hope they will solve them in the same liberal spirit that we have.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, they do not.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You don't really believe that.

Mr. Sharp: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphasize once again the desire of the government to facilitate the work of the standing committee. I hope it can be said of this parliament that it established for its own membership standards of conduct second to none.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is worth putting on the record at the outset that this debate is taking place today because the official opposition made an opposition day available for that purpose and has shamed the government into making a move. A short time ago I asked the government House leader whether the government was prepared to screw up its courage and put this matter of conflict of interest before the House and permit debate on the referral resolution on an opposition day. That day is now upon us, and not a moment too soon if one considers everything, aside from its courage, which the government has managed to screw up in the meantime. I regret—

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) a question?

An hon. Member: He hasn't started yet.

Mr. Allmand: The Leader of the Opposition has kindly agreed to answer the question. He has talked about tardiness in bringing forward these conflict of interest rules. I wonder if he could tell the House whether he ever introduced such conflict of interest rules in Nova Scotia when he was premier.

Mr. Wagner: Go back to the SIU, Warren.

Mr. Stanfield: As far as members of the legislature were concerned, I think the same kind of rules existed as exist here in the House of Commons. Really, the green paper does not propose any specific change of the existing situation. As far as members of the government were concerned, there were no published guidelines but there were clear understandings. I do not think there was ever an instance of a member of the government which I led being accused of involvement in a conflict of interest situation.

● (1540)

Mr. Allmand: You did not like that question?

Mr. Stanfield: It was a very good question, asking about something that happened ten years ago! The Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) should bring himself up to date and realize that he has been put in an awkward position. I regret this, because I think he is an honest man and should never have been put into this awkward position. I regret to note that while the House is debating this question, five committees are sitting, preventing members opposite and on my side attending this House. They could not hear what the government House leader said and they will not listen to any pearls of wisdom which I and others may or may not drop in the course of this debate.

[Translation]

Later in the course of my remarks, I intend to submit to you a number of principles enunciated by the right hon. Lester B. Pearson some ten years ago. This will give you a fairly good idea of the inertia the government has demonstrated in this area. Information brought to our attention since the beginning of this session has demonstrated the extreme urgency of concrete measures. This urgency is all the more real since the government must now clear without delay some doubts which have been raised concerning the behaviour of some high government officials.

[English]

That urgency was missing as the minister presented the government's position. Today all we heard from the government House leader was a rehash of rhetoric to do with proposed guidelines. These, in the opinion of my colleagues, in my opinion and in the opinion of all whose opinions are known to me, are sadly inadequate. We also believe that the government is not proceeding in the right way to implement guidelines. Certainly, the manner in which it is proceeding today is not adequate. It should aim first at setting adequate guidelines for those at the top. Heaven knows, that is where the urgency is.

Let us get this straight: when we talk about conflict of interest, we have in mind the public interest, not political interest and not institutional interest. We are thinking of the public interest as it applies to someone entrusted with safeguarding that interest. This is a much broader concept than national security, for example. It is a wide-ranging concern and goes to the very root of public confidence in our system, in our institutions, in our political process and in those who are in high positions of trust. It is within that meaning of conflict of interest that we make our case. We believe any narrower meaning is inappropriate.

In accepting this broad definition, one must recognize that there is no way of eliminating all possible conflicts of interest which may and do exist. For example, how can you eliminate the possible conflict of interest involving a minister and a friend, or a member of the House and a friend? I recognize that it is not possible to eliminate all possible conflicts of interest, but I contend that the definition of what is the public interest must be as broad as I have made it, if problems are to be faced and situations met in a way which will increase public confidence. I believe Canadians will be much more ready to accept that kind of judgment-call approach if they perceive that the call and the judgment are weighed against guidelines and rules and regulations which have more substance than those proposed so far in relation to cabinet ministers. These, surely, are not adequate to increase public confidence. I will come back to that in a moment.

[Translation]

In defining the policies, rules and procedures which will become law, we shall keep in mind that we are dealing with two groups of people whose influence differs according to the group involved. The first group, of course, is made up of the people sitting in Parliament. This group includes members of Parliament, cabinet ministers and parliamentary secretaries, as well as the Speaker of the House and his deputies.

[English]

The other non-elected group includes career public servants, those appointed to positions in the service. Although senators are appointed, I include them for this purpose as parliamentarians. The influence exerted by those in the appointed groups is tougher to define precisely; there is not that clear and unmistakable distinction which there is between ordinary members of parliament and cabinet ministers. However, there is within the public service group a clear distinction between those who have been appointed to deputy minister status, or the equivalent level, and those who are at a support level well below the level of deputy minister. Likewise, in ministers' offices there are senior staff, people who are appointed and are different and distinct from House of Commons support staff who are available to ministers and other members through the administration headed by Mr. Speaker.

In assessing levels of influence in the public service, there is a middle ground occupied by all those whose rank ranges from assistant deputy minister down to director which is analogous to the middle ground occupied in the elected group by parliamentary secretaries. I know, sir, that you have recognized this middle ground in this House in our proceedings, so I suggest to the government that achieving such definitions should not be beyond its ingenuity.

Across the broad spectrum there are two groups, members of parliament and those who are non-elected. Within both groups there are those who serve in special positions by appointment, and within both groups there are levels of seniority and influence. In my remarks today I do not intend to cover the waterfront—and there is no slur intended in using that expression. I will deal with the area of cabinet ministers. Before doing so, I wish to comment on the position of members of parliament who are not cabinet ministers and whose situation the green paper purports to cover.

The green paper deals with members of parliament; and I include senators, of course. As the government House leader pointed out, the green paper deals with corrupt practices, prohibited fees, incompatible offices, and government contracts. These are traditional areas in which there have been rules concerning conflict of interest and prohibited practices. The green paper perhaps goes a little further in some directions, but it does not break new ground in the area referred to.

There is also a provision in the green paper relating to members holding shares in companies which do business with the government. No member may be permitted to participate in the management or direction of a company which has a contract with the government, or an agreement. Members must list annually companies in which they are directors, officers or managers. Members, according to the proposed guidelines, may own up to 5 per cent of the shares of a company which has a government contract. However, a member's holdings may amount to less than 5 per cent in a public company which has a government contract. Unless one is involved in the management or direction of a company, how would one know, if one owns less than 5 per cent of it, that the company has a government contract?

I noted that the government House leader, when he was speaking about the Canada Elections Act, pointed out that the new legislation requires a candidate to disclose his interest—I think over 5 per cent of the shares in any public company—whether or not that company holds government contracts. But there is no provision in the green paper that any member of parliament who acquires a 5 per cent interest in a public company after becoming a member would have to disclose the fact. There is clearly no co-ordination between the disclosure provisions in the Canada Elections Act and the green paper.

As far as investments in companies are concerned, the specific provisions in the green paper are confined to instances where those companies have contracts or agreements with the government. There is nothing in the green paper relating to financial interest in a company which does not have a government contract, except the provision which has been understood for years, in a way, that a member is supposed to disclose his financial interest before engaging in debate or making representations to a minister, for example. It does not go any further. For example, proposal 15 on page 34, which covers the situation, simply states:

> In any debate of the House or its committees or transactions or communications which a member may have with other members or senators or with ministers or servants of the Crown, he shall disclose any relevant pecuniary interest or benefit he may have when that interest or benefit is not shared in common with all other persons or particular groups in society.

That is all one finds in the green paper with regard to the financial interest of members of parliament, other than interest in a company which has a contract or agreement with the government. The committee will have to consider very earnestly whether the green paper will be satisfactory to the Canadian people in this respect.

The green paper basically follows what I understand to be the British approach rather than the United States practice of requiring disclosure. But how does a member of parliament live up to the provision that, before engaging in debate, he should declare his financial interest, if any? Does he stand up in a debate on the budget, for example, which may have something to do with corporate taxation and reel off a list of the shares he owns? Does he say, "I have three shares in Bell Canada, two shares in the Royal Bank of Canada," and so on down the line? Is this really a practical way of proceeding?

It would be very inelegant, to say the least, as far as debate is concerned. Some of my wealthier friends opposite might take half an hour to list their holdings before they could even begin to talk about the subject before them. As I say, I do not think it is a practical way in which to proceed and I doubt whether the government could have been very serious in putting it forward. The committee will have to be a little more serious about this subject than the government.

Personally, I have had to face this question since I came here as a member of parliament and Leader of the Opposition. The potentialities for conflict of interest are much more rife here than they are in a provincial legislature. For example, with respect to the question put to me by the Solicitor General, I found I confronted a potential conflict of interest on many questions before the House as long as I had any shares in a corporation of which I had knowledge. This was because so many questions come before the House affecting the value of investments. This is obvious in the case of companies which are regulated by the government or by an agency of the government. It applies also, of course, to any company which is subject to the tax laws of parliament with respect to which changes are proposed from time to time.

I am not suggesting that the stand appropriate to the Leader of the Opposition must apply to other members of the opposition. My responsibilities are, presumably, somewhat different from those of a member of the opposition who is not the Leader of the Opposition. But I, personally, came to the conclusion that there were only two options appropriate for me as Leader of the Opposition—either full disclosure of all investments held by me, my wife and my minor children, or a blind trust with respect to my holdings, my wife's holdings and anything owned by a minor child.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I decided in favour of a blind trust for a number of reasons, the most important of which was this: if my wife has some property, why must her privacy be invaded to the extent of her having to disclose what those holdings might be? And why should a young person be, perhaps, embarrassed to some extent by the public disclosure of information which really has nothing to do with any conflict of interest? So I opted in favour of a blind trust; and I must say to all hon. members that there are disadvantages involved in a blind trust. I get a report twice a year of the net value of the investments held for me by the trustee. In conditions such as we have experienced this year, I must say I am glad I have no knowledge of what the trustee is holding, because some of the things I held at the time of the transfer are, to put it mildly, less valuable today than they were when they were transferred. I am expecting a letter—I hope it does not come this December 31—in which the trustee will say something like this, "Mr. Stanfield, we have some good news for you and some bad news. We will give you the bad news first. The assets we hold for you are now worthless. The good news is that we can assure you that this happened without any conflict of interest being involved."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I do not suggest—and I repeat this—that my hon. friends should necessarily be subject to the standard appropriate for myself as Leader of the Opposition and, certainly, appropriate to members of the government. But we must recognize that potential conflicts of interest go beyond holding investments in companies which have contracts or agreements with the government. That is surely an old-fashioned approach to the question as to what constitutes a conflict of interest. The committee members must ask themselves how practical and effective an answer to this problem is proposal No. 15 in this green paper. The committee will have to strike a balance when it considers the question of conflict of interest for members of the House who do not hold office in the government or the responsibility that I assume I have. The committee will not wish to discourage unduly Canadians from seeking entry into parliament by causing candidates to pay too high a price for membership in this House.

● (1600)

How far the committee ought to travel toward the position taken by the New York Times, as quoted on page 5 of the green paper, is a question the committee will have to consider pretty carefully and, I suggest, with some caution. In an editorial on August 26, 1970, the New York Times had this to say:

> What is needed is an acceptance of the fact that election to the House or Senate . . .

This is in the United States.

> . . . like appointment to the cabinet, means often accepting a full-time job and a total commitment to public service. That means no directorships, no law practice, no outside business interests, and all investments put in trust until the individual returns to private life. Disclosure is not enough, divorce is the only answer. Until the line is clearly, irrevocably drawn, members of the House and Senate . . .

Again, this is in the United States.

. . . will not be where they ought to be—above suspicion of using public office for private enrichment.

That is a very high test indeed to which to subject all members of parliament, and members of the committee will have to consider very carefully how far along that road they wish to recommend that the ordinary member of parliament has to travel. That goal, however, is appropriate for a member of the government, and I also suggest it is appropriate for the Leader of the Opposition.

Whether or not the methods suggested in that editorial necessarily achieve that goal is not the question. Members of the committee and other members of parliament will wish to discuss carefully and conscientiously how we establish the necessary public confidence regarding conflicts of interest or, more properly, the elimination of conflicts of interest, without unduly discouraging Canadians from seeking membership in this House. There will be substantial differences of opinion in the country and in this House on the question of how far down the road to the New York Times' position members of parliament ought to be obliged or be required to travel. Therefore, there will be substantial and, I suspect, protracted debate in committee, and ultimately again in the House, on this particular question.

The simplest area to tidy up—an area that can be tidied up quickly—and an area that most urgently requires tidying up is the position of those at the top regarding conflict of interest, that is, cabinet ministers. It is absurd that this committee, according to this reference, is required to consider and report on the position of members of parliament before considering and making recommendations on the position of cabinet ministers.

In preparing the reference in this way, the government is simply indulging in games. It is putting the resolution before the House in such manner as is designed to bury the question of conflict of interest for members of the government for many months until what I suspect will be quite a long discussion of the conflict of interest of ordinary members has been terminated and reported upon. Ministers must, because of their responsibility, avoid conflicts of interest, and be seen to avoid conflicts of interest. This is urgent.

In the rules or guidelines that have been given us by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to date there is not enough recognition of the fact that the higher the position, the higher the standard that must be demanded. On the contrary, as far as ministers are concerned, the government has demonstrated in recent weeks quite an opposite approach. We heard the government House leader, for example, the other day and again today, on the question of campaign donations, suggesting that a minister of the Crown should be under no different guidelines regarding contributions and, presumably, gifts than an ordinary member of parliament. The government has shown that it considers itself, as far as the cabinet is concerned, to be a kind of nobility, above reproach and therefore beyond criticism, by its own decree.

What would have happened to someone, say, at the assistant deputy minister level in the Department of National Health and Welfare who might have taken a privately-owned jet on a visit to a foreign country on what he claimed to be official business? What would have been the assessment of a senior public servant who did that, or something like it? For someone in the self-decreed, high quarter of the cabinet it is not a serious matter. Is that not rather a pitiable double standard? Is it not rather incredible that these people in the government continue to say, or at least continue to say that they think this kind of thing really does not involve a really serious conflict of interest?

I do not think that is acceptable. Members who sit with me on this side of the House do not think it is acceptable, and I believe a lot of members on the other side of the House do not think it is acceptable. Indeed, there are not many people around who would think it is acceptable. Yet this Prime Minister and his cabinet stubbornly insist it is not serious, and they are really suggesting that they will continue to do pretty well what they please. That, sir, is really what this debate today is all about.

Surely, standards of conduct must be set for the ministry before we can expect any renewal of public confidence in the system and before anybody can expect the application of standards to anybody else outside the ministry. When I talk of the ministry in this way, I mean it in broad terms, in terms of the high office group as a whole. In that group are the ministers themselves, who should set an example of excellence in their own conduct.

Ground rules for this entire high level group should be dealt with as a matter of first priority in tackling the whole area of conflict of interest. You just cannot take the attitude which the Prime Minister seems to take of, "Oh, well, as far as members of the cabinet are concerned, they are all okay or I would have not let them in the cabinet in the first place. So we will leave off worrying about them until everybody else is taken care of". Ministers and others in this ministry level group of appointees should receive first consideration when approaching a clean-up of conflict of interest problems. I hope that we can persuade this government of this today.

I hope we can yet persuade the government that what it proposes by way of a so-called frozen trust which is permissible for the Prime Minister and members of the government is not of any consequence unless accompanied by disclosure. I fail to understand how a frozen trust as such, of which the minister concerned or the Prime Minister knows the content, constitutes any protection against conflict of interest. I say there has to be either disclosure or a completely blind trust. As I said earlier when speaking of myself, I have come to the conclusion that there is no alternative because almost weekly cases of conflict of interest would arise for me in this House when discussing matters if I had knowledge of anything I owned, that my wife owned or my minor children owned. The frozen trust is a lot of nonsense. I hope we can achieve some recognition that the spouses and minor children of cabinet ministers must be included in the guidelines which cover broad holdings.

● (1610)

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) brags that the government's guidelines are the best in the world. I do not think he has looked very far outside Ottawa when he says that. The Ontario government, for example, uses a family basis for holdings of cabinet ministers; a family consists of a minister's spouse and his minor children.

The Prime Minister has made some suggestion about the sanctity of the individual—the government House leader did so again this afternoon—and the desirability of enabling a spouse to pursue an independent career. I have to say quite bluntly that this is dignifying the loophole. I want to see as little interference as possible with the life, opportunity and anything else of the spouse of a minister; but I say very emphatically that total exemption or ruling out of any consideration of what may be held by a spouse or minor children really makes conflict of interest, when applied to the property of a minister, a farce.

The government House leader said today, for example, that transfers from a minister to a spouse would have to be disclosed; they would come within the conflict of interest rules and guidelines. But supposing there is a transfer of something that is completely innocuous—say cash? What is to prevent a conflict of interest situation arising subsequently, depending upon the manner in which the spouse invests that money and the knowledge of the minister as to how it is invested? By all means let the committee try to leave as much freedom for the spouse as possible, in terms of a career, but let us not make a complete farce of the conflict of interest rules being applied to ministers by eliminating the spouse and minor children completely from any consideration.

Then there is the question of gifts to ministers. There appear to be no guidelines at all with regard to gifts. What about forgivable loans and loans in general to ministers? These should be covered in a very strict way that is spelled out publicly. There can be just as much a conflict of interest involved in a loan situation as in connection wih ownership and, again, this situation should be covered in relation to the spouses and minor children of ministers.

I understand that the last time I spoke in this House about a particular gift—that was some weeks ago—the Prime Minister took it as a below the belt, personal attack. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here today, but through you, sir, I assure him sincerely—as I attempted to do when I commented on it—that I was not attributing motives or suggesting anything remotely sinister in that particular case. I am not dealing in innuendo or smear when I say as strongly as I can that I believe this to be, in principle, an inappropriate practice, and I am obliged, because of the position I hold in this House, to draw this to the Prime Minister's attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Recent events in the House, that we might refer to as the SIU matter, have created further instances of emotional distress and ill-feeling which can only serve to cloud the issue. The issue should be clear. It should also be clear, and it is vital that it be clear to the public, that the government is prepared to respond to the issue in a way which is not open to misunderstanding, suggestion, doubt and suspicion.

There is another group which I wish to touch on very briefly. I refer to senior staff people in ministers' offices. This group becomes of greater and greater concern as the government makes more and more senior staff appointments and deputy minister appointments under what seems to be a concept of interchangeability. Obviously, the principle should be that the same standards which apply to cabinet ministers should apply to ministerial senior staff appointees and to deputy ministers and other high level appointees.

This principle was clearly and emphatically discussed in a letter dated November 30, 1964, by the then prime minister, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson. I am not going into the background of that letter, but apparently some senior staff in the ministry had been up to strange things, or were alleged to have been, and the government was in a large vat of hot water as a result. Mr. Pearson wrote to his cabinet colleagues, in part:

> There are several things that should be stressed. The central one is that a minister's staff must be subject to exactly the same high code of conduct that is recognized for ministers themselves.
> It is by no means sufficient for a person in the office of a minister—or in any other position of responsibility in the public service—to act within the law. That goes without saying. Much more is required. There is an obligation not simply to observe the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny.

There is an interesting similarity of language, parts of it verbatim, in what the present Prime Minister said on December 18, 1973, when he made his statement to the House on guidelines for public servants and order in council appointees. As recorded in Hansard at page 8837, the Prime Minister said:

> Central to our policy is the principle that it is not sufficient for a public servant merely to act within the law. We believe that there is an obligation to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest scrutiny.

So we see the phrase "there is an obligation to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest scrutiny" used word for word by two different prime ministers almost ten years apart. The significant difference is that one prime minister in 1964 said that this worthy principle should apply equally to ministers, their staff and others in positions of responsibility within the public service, whereas the present Prime Minister in 1973 talked about this strict principle only in relation to the public servant and not to a member of the government. It is a not very subtle change in emphasis over the years between the approaches of the two right hon. gentlemen to conflict of interest.

In the wake of the present government's approach to senior appointments a corollary problem has become evident. Some long service, senior public servants are apparently displeased with the approach and are simply leaving the service because there does not seem to be room at the very top for other than the government's political friends. These very capable public service people are going into the private sector, as we call it. I presume that in many cases they will go into jobs in the same fields that they dealt with in the government service.

What guidelines are given to them on leaving the public service? Is there a system, or a set of rules, or is each person who leaves the public service from these high levels left largely to the dictates of his conscience to interpret the demands of the oath widely or narrowly? Surely it is a second element of unfairness to these people who have given years of service to have a situation so loose that they can feel placed under a cloud if they decide to take a particular job when they leave the service. The government owes it to them to publish guidelines to cover this situation.

There is still, also, no clarity in relation to top-level businessmen who move in and out of the public service on exchange programs and senior public servants performing a reciprocal exercise. There is no excuse for this whole area to be left loose any longer. The government is not doing anyone a favour by diddling along on the assumption of some never-defined honour system. The government would not insult anyone by establishing and publishing guidelines for conduct at the most senior levels as its first priority. As it is, no one is protected; anyone could be suspect in a given situation. The onus is on the government to change that situation.

We do not live and work in times when the public feels really confident about any so-called honour system which is supposed to be operating in politics and in high levels of government. Why encourage further erosion of that confidence, when the appearance of proper guidelines could start to turn things around and help to restore some confidence? Public confidence is a precious commodity, almost as precious as democracy itself, because without it the democratic system just cannot work. To encourage it requires firm action and proper priorities. Therefore, in keeping with that belief I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner):

That paragraph 2 of the motion be deleted and the following substituted:

"That the committee be authorized to report on the aforementioned green paper after first considering and making recommendations on the subject matter of ministers and conflict of interest and public servants and conflict of interest".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Stanfield: Certainly.

Mr. Drury: I listened with great interest to the thoughtful, and what I might call unemotional approach of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), but I was a little confused—I think the confusion is fairly prevalent in the public mind—by his frequent use of the term "conflict of interest" which covers a wide range of things. Parliament itself is a conflict of interest, and the way to get rid of that is to abolish the institution. I think I should point out that we live with conflicts of interest. The hon. member did, however, use what appeared to me to be a rather more significant approach than "conflict of interest," which was the avoidance of the use of public office for private enrichment. Would he agree that basically what he meant by conflict of interest was the offence of using public office for private enrichment?

Mr. Stanfield: No, Mr. Speaker. I think the definition given by the minister involves a very substantial part of the concept of conflict of interest, but I would not agree that it covers the whole concept of conflict of interest. I would just like to add that, even taking the definition the minister has given, the rules laid down by the Prime Minister are just as deficient as they would be if a somewhat broader concept of conflict of interest were involved.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the minister introduce his motion in the House this afternoon I was reminded of the old chestnut about shutting the barn door after the horse has gone. The more the minister spoke, and the more one looks at the government's proposals, the more obvious it is that the correct use of that analogy, with reference to the minister's speech, would be that he only gets the barn door partly shut, perhaps half shut or a third shut, after the horse has gone.

Unfortunately, the minister seems to be under the illusion that he has produced the whole product. The proposals brought forward finally by the government to deal with the very serious subject of conflict of interest are completely inadequate. First, the emphasis by the government is entirely wrong. In this we agree entirely with the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) with respect to the amendment he has just moved, and we will support it. Instead of beginning where the problem is most serious, with the cabinet, the government starts out with a green paper on proposals for members of parliament in general who have little or no power, as everyone knows. That in fact is referred to in the green paper itself. The real power in this government, as is the case with all modern governments, is with the cabinet and senior civil servants.

So there is a diversionary tactic on the part of the government, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, in getting us to focus on supposed or real conflicts of interest with respect to ordinary members. Instead of presenting the House with proposals or regulations which have teeth, the government has given us—I say this with care—mere cosmetics, a situation which in my view makes matters worse because it leaves the impression that a bad situation is being remedied, when in fact it is not.

Before discussing the three areas—members of parliament, cabinet ministers and senior public servants—in a detailed way, and what the reaction of the New Democratic Party is to each set of proposals for these different areas of responsibility, I want to indicate why it is a serious question that is before us, namely, conflict of interest. I think it is no accident that this problem has become more apparent in recent years not only in Canada but abroad in Great Britain, the United States and other countries. It has not always been seen as a major problem. First of all, there is the growth in government as a customer of business. Many government departments are major spenders in the economy: in fact, governments collectively represent the major spenders in the economy today.

The Department of National Defence, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—you name them—at the federal level have a major input into the private economy. Second, there is the pervasiveness of regulatory, financially-supportive provisions related to promotional programs for the private sector. We have tariff and taxation laws and regulations, and major discretionary powers with the Minister of National Revenue effecting decisions as to whether to collect or not to collect taxes from certain corporations or individuals. The government makes DREE grants and provides a series of financial incentives to industry. But the precise implementation of these laws is left in the hands of the minister.

● (1630)

Third, there is increasing mobility between the private sector and government where we have ministers leaving their positions in the cabinet to go to very important and powerful positions in the private sector, frequently with firms operating in the sector of the economy for which, as ministers, they had direct legislative and administrative responsibilities. I submit that these three points are relatively recent in their growth and significance, which makes it much more apparent that we need tough regulations pertaining to conflict of interest.

I want to get back to three areas of concern, first of all the green paper to which the motion moved by the minister refers. What do we get, in the green paper, proposals for ordinary members of parliament? In the main, it proposes a codification of existing laws and practices with respect to corrupt practices and prohibited fees, incompatible offices, participation in government contracts and financial interests. I repeat, it is essentially a codification of practices that have been around for many years. There is no great innovation in the green paper. The minister was patting himself a little too much on the back when he rose in the House today and presented this document as a significant innovation. All it does is to bring together practices that have been going on for many years in the House of Commons and in the Senate.

There are a few innovations. What are they? I want to mention them before going on to raise objections about them. The first one concerns prohibited fees. By way of additions to the Standing Orders and rules, members of parliament would be prohibited from receiving a fee or reward for intervening, on behalf of constituents or members of the public, before government boards or tribunals, public servants or fellow members of parliament. Second, incompatible offices: by a new legislative provision, the holding of nearly all federal and provincial offices would be incompatible with membership in the House of Commons or the Senate even if there is no salary attached to these offices. Third, participation in government contracts: the proposed legislation would, in general, prohibit a member of parliament from participating in or deriving any benefit, directly or indirectly, from government contracts. These are the innovations which I suggest are not very significant.

What can be said in a negative way but with positive implications about the proposals even for members of parliament and even if we agree that we are beginning at the wrong end of the power structure by beginning with members of parliament? First of all, the annual disclosure of directorships and financial holdings should be comprehensive and routine for all members of parliament. It should not be restricted to the general area of government contracts, as is the proposal in the green paper. In other words, all members of parliament should have to declare their financial holdings. I think that should become a matter of routine. It is not without some direct benefit at times when we vote on legislation concerning corporate taxation, for example; or, indeed, if we vote for a variety of legislation outside the tax field that can give particular benefits to members of parliament. I think the public has a right to know the holdings of all MPs quite independent of holdings in companies that may have contracts with the federal government.

Second, the prohibition against participation in government contracts should be tightened up. It is much too loose. The 5 per cent threshold in particular is a serious loophole, in our view. Five per cent of the shares would often represent a significant holding, sometimes a controlling interest, in a public corporation. I think, for example that if someone held 5 per cent of the shares of Bell Telephone it would probably give them controlling interest. So the 5 per cent threshold is a meaningless threshold; it is much too high; it is open to too much abuse and requires tightening up.

Third, the committee charged with supervision of the rules, that is, the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, should have the authority to investigate conflicts of interest involving cabinet ministers. This authority is expressly denied in the green paper, where it is said that the committee will not have the right to investigate alleged or potential conflicts of interest of cabinet ministers. I think that by giving a committee of the House on which backbench members from all parties are members, authority to look into alleged cases of conflict of interest we would be doing a great service to those who are concerned, including ministers of the Crown, on the question of conflict of interest.

The recent dispute, for example, concerning the SIU could have been referred to this committee with the request that it consider the matter with dispatch and report back to the House. It seems to me that a committee representing all parties in the House is the appropriate body, initially at least, to look into charges of conflict of interest involving ministers of the Crown. These are three specific proposals that seem to us in this party to make sense, and we hope that when the committee gets the green paper it will consider them with great seriousness.

Now I would like to say something about guidelines for cabinet ministers. The guidelines which we have are the product of two statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), one on July 18, 1973, and the other on December 18 of the same year. To go back to my earlier point, these must be looked at with even greater care than the regulations or guidelines pertaining to members of parliament. I repeat the point: the power, in our form of government, really resides with the cabinet and that means the potential for abuse resides, in terms of substance, with the cabinet. So the guidelines and regulations dealing with conflict of interest have to be much more stringent for cabinet ministers than for members of parliament, and anyone who suggests the contrary simply does not know what he is talking about. The green paper itself, I remind the minister, refers to this point in the following words:

> It must be acknowledged that the opportunity for an individual member of parliament, other than a minister, to alter substantially the course and content of public policies, is limited.

What are the guidelines that the Prime Minister has set down vis-à-vis the holdings of cabinet ministers? There are three choices. They can put their holdings in a blind trust, a frozen trust, or—this is the third variable that was added in December of last year—in terms of real property they can have it registered and therefore made known to the public. What is wrong with this? I said at the outset that the proposals really lack substance; they are totally defective. Why? First, there is too much discretion left in the hands of ministers and the Prime Minister himself. We need tough regulations pertaining to the cabinet, and not so many discretionary decisions left with ministers of the Crown or the Prime Minister.

The statement I have referred to is full of references to the discretionary authority of the minister. Surely, in part that is what the need for conflict of interest regulations is all about, namely, to get away from the discretionary realm in this subject. Tough regulations would protect the minister's good name as much as they would protect the public. We need more legislative control, with less authority left to ministers.

Second, Mr. Speaker, we need more complete public disclosure requirements. For example, the public should be told of the directorships that a minister resigns when he becomes a minister of the Crown. It is important to know what his previous connections were in order to know what his orientation or biases are likely to be. The public has a right to know what goes into both the blind trust and the frozen trust, for the reasons that the Leader of the Opposition indicated in the House today and for the reasons that members of my party and social scientists independent of any party have been enunciating. It is not enough simply for these trusts to be set up. The green paper does not deal with this issue at all, but is simply a cosmetic measure that leaves the impression something is being done when it is not.

Third, the exclusion of spouses and dependent children totally negates the intended result. It seems to me to be a basically misleading notion of equality of the sexes to exempt spouses from disclosure provisions applied to their husbands or wives who are cabinet members. Unless you assume, as is apparently the view of the Department of National Revenue on another matter, that the husband and wife will be divorced and the relationship is a temporal, non-significant one, such a position is contrary to human reality. The family unit should be regarded as just that in regulations dealing with conflict of interest, but the government has totally ignored that basic human and economic fact by exempting spouses from guideline regulations.

Fourth, Mr. Speaker, there are no guidelines for persons leaving the cabinet. If a minister decides to return to private life, normally he goes back to an occupation similar to the work he was doing in government. When the former minister of industry, trade and commerce, the Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin, left the cabinet he went to a firm where his responsibilities would be similar to those he was exercising as a minister of the Crown. Indeed, he carried with him studies and knowledge that were directly applicable to his new line of work. I want to stress that I do not imply any criticism of Mr. Pepin in that circumstance. His is one of a number of cases that could be cited.

Our party does not have an easy answer to this problem, but I hope the committee will spend some time on it and perhaps come up with a regulation that would govern ministers and senior civil servants going into the private sector. We know that a deputy minister is leaving the Department of the Environment and going into a line of work very similar to what he was doing for the government. That kind of move at the top level, where there is potential gain for the firm he is going to work for, derived from his experience in government, is unquestionably an area of potential conflict of interest and should be considered. Whether appropriate regulations can be laid down in a free society is another question. This matter was looked at by a federal government commission headed by Professor Williams and completed in 1969, and it should be considered when the green paper is before the committee.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to the matter of guidelines for the public service. These were laid down by an order in council issued on December 18, 1973. There are more defects in those provisions than in these pertaining to cabinet ministers and members of parliament. I would just enumerate them. First, there is no provision covering spouses and dependent children. Second, there is no requirement for public disclosure. Third, too much discretion is vested in the public servant. The onus is on him to disclose to the minister those matters which he believes are in actual or potential conflict.

Fourth, there is no distinction between senior public servants in policy-making positions and those in lower categories. Fifth, there is no provision in respect of ministerial staff. We have talked about civil servants, members of parliament and the cabinet, but what about ministerial staff? They have access to important information which puts them as much in danger of potential conflict of interest as the other groups to which I have referred. Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is no reference in those guidelines to the process of moving back and forth between government and the private sector.

The guidelines in the order in council issued last December are even worse than the proposals and guidelines pertaining to the cabinet and members of this House. The steps the government has taken so far on the question of conflict of interest are totally inadequate. The only good result of government action to date is that for the first time in the history of the Canadian parliament, to my knowledge, a committee of the House will be looking into the issue. It is the hope of the New Democratic Party that members of that committee will come forth with proposals of greater substance than those presented by the government.

● (1650)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment put forward by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is quite sensible. It purports to delete paragraph (2) of the motion and substituting the following therefor:

> That the committee be authorized to report on the aforementioned Green Paper after first considering and making recommendations on the subject matter of Ministers and conflict of interest and Public Servants and conflict of interest.

We have been hearing for a week about conflicts of interest involving members of Parliament, ministers and senior civil servants. I was in the Federal Republic of Germany last week, and I heard about them even there. They were talking about conflicts of interest, and saying that people from the SIU had supplied the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) with $500, that Progressive Conservative members and even New Democratic members had also received some moneys, and fortunately, Mr. Speaker, none of them could say that the Social Credit Party of Canada had also received moneys because none of them made any contribution. We were too small and they turn to big parties. I am talking about the SIU.

Let us have a look at what is going on in the province of Quebec. People from the QFL supplied some federal ministers, provincial ministers and federal members of Parliament from Montreal with certain amounts of money. They supplied them not only with moneys but also with bullies to win the elections and they are the very people from the QFL in Montreal who yell their heads off that they are going to break up the system. And yet they help financially sustain the system. I find this a terrible situation. And to think that my good friends from the New Democratic Party are very much against those conflicts when they get a percentage of contributions from all international unions which collect them from their members within Canada. Even my good friends from the Social Credit in Montreal are members of a union out of fear and are obliged to pay a certain percentage of their contributions to the New Democratic Party. They do not brag about it in this House. But that is true. Facts will be facts. Mr. Speaker, there are certainly some conflicts involved. There are not only conflicts of interest in respect of individuals, but there are conflicts of interest for groups. When I think about the QFL in Montreal, I always see the face of fat Laberge. He is the guy who wants to break the system. He did break it in James Bay. We see this in the Cliche investigation commission. This gives us obvious proof that bosses, the government and the union leaders unite to crush the worker. If the worker objects, he is told his legs will be broken by a goon squad led by Dédé Desjardins or someone else. Mr. Speaker, this situation has existed for many years. In the early 1960s, Mr. Hal Banks was put in prison. He was released on a bail of $25,000. When the time came for him to report back, he escaped to the United States. We were told: We do not have any right to extradite him. I am convinced that Liberal ministers had a part in allowing Banks to escape to the United States so that he would not be caught afterwards.

The ministers then told us: It is impossible to find him. A Toronto reporter went to New York and sat on the deck of a boat in the harbour with Hal Banks. He spent the afternoon with him smoking a cigar and drinking scotch or whiskey. Mr. Speaker, Hal Banks is still over there and has never been brought back to Canada.

For many years, incidents of this kind have been numerous. This is why I ask myself what will the green paper change? Standing Order 11 of our rules states that No Member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest, and the vote of any member so interested will be disallowed.

In my opinion, not many members would vote if we made a careful scrutiny of the interests of all members of Parliament because every one of them tries to find some benefits outside the House.

I am a businessman and I do not have the right to sell a car to the government. But if I wanted to do so, what would stop me for instance from saying to another Chrysler dealer: You should submit a tender to the government, and if you get it, you can pay me back for the favour I did you.

Mr. Speaker, this example concerns the automotive industry, but the same thing now happens for building companies. That is fairly current practice in many fields. Union leaders do so freely, but not their members. The latter know absolutely nothing about the practice, but their top leaders, those who carry a lot of weight, some governments organizers and political party organizers do so. I am happy to know—though the newspapers forgot to mention it—that our party had nothing to do with contributions from the SIU or any other seafarers' union, the QFL or the CNTU. We are not mixed up with them. The journalists forgot to mention that. The three main parties are mentioned. The NDP have four more members than we have, but they are more important than we are. That only exists in the heads of the journalists.

Speaking of them, they know something about conflicts of interest. I have seen an hon. member make the most insignificant speech ever in this House. I would never have mentioned it in a newspaper. But, on leaving the House, if someone slips a $20 bill in some reporter's pocket and asks him to publish it, the next day we see the member's picture on the front page and speech is published. That is conflict of interest again. But the reporters do not brag about that.

I know we are often forgotten. There is no time to talk about us. The same goes for the CBC. People spend their time giving tips right and left to get coverage. As for me, they will "uncover" me before I act that way. But this is something I have seen first hand.

Mr. Speaker, what will the green paper prevent?

● (1700)

The leader of the NDP recommended earlier that ministers who had left their ministerial or government office be followed or not be authorized to continue to work in the same line. Mr. Speaker, that is a hoax. I think this is discussing to say absolutely nothing. If a minister who is a company director is forced to resign arrangements are made so that he may still remain a director.

Even if three dozen green papers were introduced what would it change? The same thing would happen again. The human being will always remain a human being. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was quite clear earlier on that. We will not stop the human being from being human because he is a minister, a party leader or the hon. member for Timiskaming. Honesty is a matter of education. To be elected to this House a man must first be honest with his voters and, if he is, he will not join with other organizations to crush his constituents and take advantage of the situation.

Mr. Speaker, before being appointed a minister, a man, whether it be Jean-Luc Pépin or a deputy minister, who receives a salary of $35,000, $40,000 or $45,000 a year and gets an offer of $75,000 a year in the same line of work from a private business, are we going to blame him for accepting the position giving him $30,000 or $40,000 more a year? That seems normal to me. Let us not be that stupid and say: once you have been a minister, go and hide in the forest, and run away so no one will see you.

It seems to me that on that point one should use common sense in the same way as before being appointed a minister. However, let us set up standards, laws or regulations so that a minister will not be the prey of profiteers or large companies and become their stooge or puppet.

A minister of the Crown must be secure from any suspicion, as must be his officials and any other public servant. In today's Le Devoir, I think, there has been such a public servant unmasked in Quebec. It is very common in Quebec, we see that every day. Has Labour Minister Cournoyer been duped by a member of his staff, a man by the name of Morin? He is surely not a relative of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Morin), but he is perhaps a relative of a member of the Parti Québécois, though. Apparently, according to calculation we made earlier, that man gets $55,000 a year, including his $23,000 salary. And he would get that for duping the minister, and without his paying any income tax! Mr. Speaker, those are conflicts of interest which should absolutely not be tolerated. We fully agree on that, we must take steps to prevent it.

As I was saying a moment ago, our financial system does nothing else but promote conflicts of interest. When anyone sponsors a bill in the Senate, does he not receive the visit of two or three company directors who come asking for his help for the passage of their bill. The Liberals receive such visitors all day long, and so do the Progressive Conservatives, the NDP and also the Social Crediters. If it is not Simpsons-Sears Limited, for an insurance company, it is Eaton's for another company. All companies act in this manner. Shall we refuse to help someone who is asking us for help? No, but let us not allow them to play tricks on us though. We are here to represent the people, and not the private interests of a group, a finance company or any other organization or union. I believe the most serious error made in Canada was to make the Rand formula compulsory. Very often workers are forced to pay dues to unions of which they are not members. We are told 30 per cent of the Canadian population is unionized. While 70 per cent are non-unionized, if half of the unionized 30 per cent are forced not only to join in and pay real dues, but on top of that contribute to NDP election funds, that is the end of it. And that group speaks on behalf of the unionized 30 per cent of the Canadian people.

I believe if we are to have adequate unions, if we are to prevent union representatives from running after us or trying to finance us under the table, we should tell them: Look after your own members, do your own recruiting and collecting, that is your job. They might then have less time to think of new strikes, overstrikes, support strikes, counterstrikes and every other kind of strike. They would have work to do, getting their own members, convincing them to join the union instead of forcing them to, as they would and actually do. We would then have healthy unions, respected membership, and member pride in their union.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

As I have already said, Mr. Speaker, the little ones, the uninfluential ones get very little attention. This is also true in this House. We have here newspapermen, CBC people. You have to give a tip to have reaction, to get results or to go on the air, and especially with the three political parties. But as one might expect, this is the group that would change the system.

This morning, in my office, I had my television set on for an hour. What was there to see? The René Lévesque story? All the time Parizeau, René Lévesque, the whole collection of separatists with a couple of journalists. There appeared Gérald Godin, formerly of Quebec-Presse, a defunct lowly paper in Quebec City that used to preach revolution, inviting everyone to revolt and have bloodshed. That was Radio-Canada's broadcast this morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, there are means of stopping this, but none still of stopping human beings from being human. We in Canada let those people say whatever they like. One of them was in France recently and he realized that there is less freedom in France than in Canada and the province of Quebec, really.

Let newspapermen go and write in France what they publish here in the province of Quebec and they will be behind bars before long. It was forbidden to write anything against de Gaulle when he was President of France. Even caricatures of him were strictly forbidden.

Here in Quebec, Ontario and the rest of the country, anyone is free to caricature us. We laugh because we know from whom the cartoons come from.

Mr. Speaker, the green paper will not prevent ministers from being ministers, members of parliament from being members of parliament and human beings from being human beings. To have regulations is a good thing; some will nonetheless evade them.

One day, when the Minister of Transport personally wrote to every large company in Canada asking them to replenish the election fund of the Liberal party, he was caught. What was that? He was begging the large companies to come and help them. We must recognize it, it was a kind of conflict of interest, not for him personally but for the party.

The Progressive Conservatives have done the same thing. We also write to people to get financial assistance. The NDP does not have to write so much, because it acts in collusion—not collision—with union leaders so they get money no matter what.

As for the green paper, we agree that we are going to consider it, but we are going to vote for the amendment put forward by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that the parliamentary committee should be authorized to report on the green paper to learn its meaning and to make proper recommendations enabling us to do the necessary cleaning and prevent abuses noted in the past. This is why, Mr. Speaker, we support the motion introduced by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

● (1710)

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would blame myself for not making any comments—although they will be off the cuff—on the absolutely foolish remarks I just heard in this House. Even in this House, what are we not forced to hear when this Parliament is supposed to set the pace and to direct the nation in the way of progress. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), in his interpretation and application of conflict of interest with regard to ministers or members of parliament, expresses a concept absolutely obsolete and even reactionary of society and women in society, a concept by which two persons, because they are married together, are tied up as if they were not two separate entities with their own freedom.

This concept, Mr. Speaker, does not take into account the new dimension of the role of today's women and their desire to enjoy all the rights of a citizen. I think we could reasonably acknowledge the right of women to follow their career until their complete fulfilment. If we acknowledge this right of a woman, we should do the same for her spouse. So, Mr. Speaker, one person should not be held responsible for the other. Two married persons have their own identity and they must have the opportunity to pursue their own activities.

Do the hon. Leader of the Opposition and even the Leader of the New Democratic Party think that women are not full-fledged citizens and that they cannot have an activity as such? If a woman happens to be appointed minister of the Crown, do they think that her husband should be penalized and inhibited in his own career? This is the conclusion one comes to on the basis of the interpretation given by the hon. members to the concept of conflict of interest. According to the proposed legislation, the minister will have to declare his holdings. I entirely agree that a minister should not have interests which might lead to conflict in his high office but it does not mean that we should impose the same obligation to his spouse.

Is not a woman, if married, free to carry out any sort of business transactions, even without her husband knowing it? Why should a minister of the Crown not assume her responsibilities in such a way as not to involve her husband in her activities?

For instance, should a woman whose husband is a member of parliament be excluded from the public service either at the provincial or federal level of government?

Times have changed, Mr. Speaker, and women must be allowed to take up careers. I fully agree, Mr. Speaker, that it is not possible to regulate everything, and this green paper certainly tries to establish rules for those who assume public office.

But it is not possible, as the Leader of the Opposition will have it, to assimilate a wife to her husband or even to her under age children. And this is why, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised by the remarks I hear in this House. The Leader of the Opposition keeps referring us to the Napoleonic Code which has been amended so many times already. I am also surprised to see the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) agree that members of her party assimilate the conflict of interests to the choice of a person to take up a career. If I were she, I should be ashamed to sit in the House with people and with a leader so mesmerized by the concepts of Caesar's wife, a base cliché, Mr. Speaker, that led to the enslavement of women we heard about. One cannot codify everything, Mr. Speaker, I agree. But ministers of the Crown take an oath, first to keep secret the facts they become acquainted with in their duties and, second, to make their decisions in the best interest of the Canadian people.

Unless the contrary has been proven, Mr. Speaker, benefit of the doubt must be given the minister having public responsibilities. It is impossible to claim that somebody has betrayed his or her oath unless supporting proof is simultaneously offered and no one can imply that that somebody is not faithful to his or her oath.

However, I completely agree that since one cannot codify everything and considering the really privileged relation existing between a man and a woman and within a family, persons in such circumstances acquire a very high sense of ethics and that must be left to everybody's conscience. As a matter of fact, it is one of this society's problems to insist or codifying everything without relying at the same time on values that make people act in such or such a way. That is a basic truth, a guiding principle in life that normally derives from the whole field of human activity. The most perfect system cannot work if trust does not exist. There must at least be some faith in people's honesty. This has always been our society's moral foundation. I agree that we should codify wherever it is possible but conscience exists and it rouses me to indignation to see that hon. members opposite have not thought about it in this discussion which is precisely related to the basic values in life.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that if I say I am indignant at the very materialistic way those people approach the matter of conflicts of interest without giving due consideration to conscience, it is not sufficient and it will not appreciably change the situation. But at least, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will know exactly what stuff I am made of.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, and I know that hon. members on this side do as I do—try to develop the very high sense of ethics that will enable me, as the only woman sitting in this Cabinet, to be a pioneer in the way which will be opened to women by the fight I am engaged in.

[English]

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé). What she obviously fails to grasp, and what members on the other side of the House fail to grasp, is that this debate deals with principles which touch upon the very foundations of order in our society. It raises, first, the question of the principles of good conduct and moral responsibility on the part of elected representatives. In the reference we have before us there is recognition that such principles do in fact exist. The problem lies in the fact that the government is unwilling to take the strong, affirmative action that is needed to ensure that these principles are honoured at every level, particularly with regard to the executive.

● (1720)

The second fundamental question which this debate raises is that of public confidence and trust in government. A study carried out in Canada in 1968 discovered that more than one-third of Canadians were skeptical about the integrity of public officials and a substantial number considered public officials to be dishonest. There is evidence from studies carried out in other democratic countries of progressive erosion of trust in the integrity of government officials over the past decade. These data, while fragmentary, suggest that we have reason to be vitally concerned about the strength of public support for our political institutions. I suggest we are dealing here with a matter which touches on the very survival of democratic government as we have traditionally understood it.

Democratic government rests on trust, but that trust should not be accorded simply on faith. Those who seek concealment will inevitably be assumed to have something to conceal. Public confidence will only be accorded if there is public scrutiny. Private activities which have a public implication cannot be reserved from public scrutiny. Our sincerity as members of parliament will be judged by our willingness to apply to ourselves stringent standards and rules.

I am pleased that the government has seen fit to introduce conflict of interest guidelines regarding private members, but I am gravely concerned about the nonchalant way in which similar conflict of interest legislation regarding cabinet ministers is dealt with. Although the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) presented his guidelines on cabinet disclosure in July, 1973, it was not until December of that year that he promised a registry where the public could see these disclosures. Further delay of almost a year ensued because, in the words of the Prime Minister, "the registry was not ready because there was no staff for it nor offices allocated". Surely this is not sufficient excuse for such a lengthy delay, unless of course it gave the Prime Minister time to formulate his particular interpretation of conflict of interest legislation as it would apply to spouses and dependent children of cabinet ministers.

I would like to take issue personally with the way in which the Prime Minister dealt with this particular aspect of the guidelines. And the government House leader did nothing today to clarify the government's position on this matter. I may say, neither did the protestations of the Minister of the Environment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): They all failed to grasp the magnitude of the public concern which exists about political morality. The Prime Minister has demonstrated many times in the past just how adept and singularly clever he is at wrapping himself in robes of virtue whenever he feels vulnerable on an issue. For instance, he portrayed his heavy-handed imposition of the War Measures Act as protection for millions of Canadians, when in reality it involved denial of their civil liberties.

The country is certainly aware of the Prime Minister's tendency to adopt a deliberately simplistic and evasive approach to some of the most perplexing and agonizing problems confronting members of parliament and the Canadian electorate. Such an approach can do nothing but undermine faith in our democratic institutions. Nothing is more desperately apparent, in the wake of Watergate, of alleged corruption and innuendo, than the need to restore public confidence in the political process. Strict regulations regarding conflict of interest are a necessity so that those who are responsible for decision-making do not appear to have any conflict between their private interests and their public duties.

How does the Prime Minister treat legitimate questions raised about the effectiveness of measures as they apply not only to cabinet ministers but to their spouses and dependent children? These are questions which are inherent in the public perception of the integrity of cabinet ministers. As one might expect from past practice, the Prime Minister treats such questions by deliberately avoiding them and distorting the issue. He grasps at any sort of camouflage, and on this occasion he reasserts his virtue by wrapping his indignation about the appropriateness of such questions in the mantle of women's rights. I should like to tell this Johnny-come-lately to the field of women's rights that in doing so he belittles the movement to which millions of Canadians, men and women, have dedicated themselves for many years. However, his newly acquired mantle of concern for women's rights is pierced through by male chauvinism. How do I arrive at this conclusion? I do so by noting the Prime Minister's replies in the House of Commons. Let me remind hon. members of his answer on November 29, when he said:

> It is a position that the evolving standards in Canada are such that we could expect that a spouse will have a right to an independent career and activities. This position is not universally shared and certainly it is not the position of the Tory Party. Probably that is why they elected so few women members.

An hon. Member: That's right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's reference to women members betrays his own outdated preconceptions with regard to the role of women in Canadian society. The Prime Minister's statement automatically assumes that spouses are women, that cabinet ministers are normally male, and that their wives need special exemptions from conflict of interest legislation. What the Prime Minister fails to understand about the women's movement is that it is equality for which we have been striving for years, not special status.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): What is the reason for the Prime Minister's reference to women members? I wonder how members of parliament who happen to be women on the Liberal side of the House feel when their leader implies that they have been elected because they are women. Is it beyond the comprehension of the Prime Minister to recognize that these women could have been elected on their merits and their ability to do the job demanded of them as members of parliament? Can he not admit that they are here because they have demonstrated, in the minds of the electorate, an ability and competence to be members of parliament? The Prime Minister's remarks showed complete lack of comprehension of what equality for women and the whole women's movement really means.

Why this sudden interest in women's rights by the leader of the government? Why this sudden interest by the government leader who, during his almost seven years in office as Prime Minister, has yet to enact a single, major piece of legislation regarding women's rights and who as Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: It is on the order paper.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Why this sudden interest by the Prime Minister, who has never made a major speech on the subject in this House and seldom outside? Why this sudden interest by the Prime Minister who has promised a human rights commission, the major recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, in throne speech after throne speech, yet has not seen fit to introduce it in the House of Commons? But he salutes Canada's contribution to International Women's Year with a $500,000 untendered advertising award to a firm which comes up with the slogan "Why not?" Why not a woman, indeed!

● (1730)

The chauvinistic campaign which is shortly to be launched to tell the world about Canada's contribution to international women's year could have been written by the Prime Minister himself. Why, even his expletives are chauvinistic! Why this sudden interest in women's rights? It is because the Prime Minister must have a diversionary tactic to draw attention away from this loophole in his conflict of interest guidelines for cabinet ministers. Mr. Speaker, it does not matter how serious the matter or how sensitive the issue, the weapon of obfuscation can always be pulled from the Prime Minister's arsenal. So it is with this vitally important issue.

But if the Prime Minister thinks his belated discovery of the women's movement, and his misguided efforts to ride like Sir Lancelot to do battle on their behalf when faced with questions about the conflict of interest of spouses of cabinet ministers, will impress those who are making serious efforts toward equality in this country, let me disabuse him of any such thoughts. He will find that such use of a serious movement is an insult to millions of Canadians.

Sir Winston Churchill said:

> It is a principle of public life that ministers must so order their affairs that no conflict arises, or appears to arise, between their private interests and their public duties.

Obviously the financial interests of spouses are closely linked to minister's private interests.

I find two glaring faults in the government's handling of conflict of interest regulations, regulations which are so fundamental to the credibility of our entire political system: First, quite simply the government accords no priority to legislation respecting cabinet ministers. Second, in what it has proposed there is no provision for conflict of interest as it relates to spouses. Mr. Speaker, this issue includes the virtue of both Caesar's wife and Calpurnia's husband.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I must admit I am somewhat surprised. I thought we were involved in a discussion on conflict of interest, and instead it seems we are involved in a debate on women's rights.

An hon. Member: The Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) started that.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Your leader introduced it.

Mr. Herbert: I listened very carefully, and I felt that the hon. member for Ahuntsic (Mrs. Sauvé) made some interesting points which I had intended making myself in connection with the rights of my wife and her intentions in life.

Since we are discussing women's rights perhaps I might set the record straight. This government has amended the divorce law, the abortion law, the Labour Code relating to women, the Unemployment Insurance Act as it relates to women, and has legalized the sale of contraceptive materials. It was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when Minister of Justice, who introduced the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I think at this particular stage we should get off the subject of women's lib and get back to what we really should be discussing which is conflict of interest.

Although I have been here only two short years many things are not a surprise to me. However, one major surprise to me is the absolute hypocrisy we have heard in this House. The subject of conflict of interest which we are discussing today certainly is not a new subject. Surely it is a subject which every member must have considered when he came to this House.

First, we might ask what got us off the rails and why we are debating this subject today? A bit of scandal which was reported in today's Ottawa Journal sets this out in very clear terms. The article is entitled "This miasma of scandal". We are debating this issue today because of alleged violence by members of the Seafarers' International Union and because of campaign contributions to some cabinet ministers. That really, in essence, is why we are discussing this question today. That in itself is hypocritical.

I shall quote part of the article from the Ottawa Journal which I consider very appropriate. It states:

> What . . .
> —Opposition members—
> . . . should not do is make charges of impropriety without evidence and suggest that the acceptance of union support . . . was in any way wrong in itself.
> Most Canadians . . . know elections must be paid for and they know the system depends upon all sectors supporting the policital process.

This is where we start today's debate. In fact we started today's debate not on conflict of interest but on campaign contributions. I wish now to read something that is more apropos to today's discussion. I refer to a paragraph on the first page of the green paper which has been tabled, and which is the subject for discussion today. It states:

> A conflict of interest denotes a situation in which a Member of Parliament has a personal or a private pecuniary interest sufficient to influence, or appear to influence, the exercise of his public duties and responsibilities.

We might consider first of all the point in reference to a member of parliament. It has been suggested in the amendment that there is a refusal to consider conflict of interest which might apply to ministers of the Crown. I suggest that first we must look at ourselves, every single one of us, and stop talking as if the situation is serious if it is big, and not too serious if it is small. I suggest there is enough conflict of interest in respect to members in this House. It is darned nigh time that we started discussing the activities of members of this House before we start worrying about ministers of the Crown. This is dealt with in the document where it states:

Although some may still consider membership in the House of Commons a purely part-time activity, the demands being placed on Members would suggest otherwise.

I suggest that at this particular point in time everyone should accept the fact that this is not a part-time job.

An hon. Member: It is a full-time job.

Mr. Herbert: It is a full-time job. I want to go quite a bit further than the green paper. In fact I challenge the opposition to say that the green paper does not go far enough in the sense that if we are studying this we must go all the way and set the record straight in respect of everything. This is why I take issue with the statement that appears on page 4 of the green paper. It says:

● (1740)

To sever all contacts and to liquidate all holdings is a luxury which could be afforded only by those well established or by those who do not depend on such sources for security.

It has been argued with justification that extended restrictions on outside employment may therefore discourage many prospective candidates. I consider that to be garbage. If restrictions are placed on members' outside interests, it will be necessary to ensure that the level of remuneration here is sufficient to comply with these restrictions. To some extent the independence of members of parliament depends on actions of parliament itself. I feel very strongly on this point because I think that today we are influenced in the House by special segments of the population, and I believe that that is because we, in all parties, have great difficulty in finding the kind of candidates who will represent the interests of our parties in the manner in which we would like.

It strikes me as incredible that in a constituency such as my own, which some may say may be considered a fairly safe seat so far as my party is concerned, we find a total of 14 persons out of 120,000 who are prepared to put themselves up for election for the various parties. I think that this is a state of affairs which we have to face when we are studying this green paper. It arises because of the taint which presently attaches to political life. Part of that taint attaches because of the number of members who really have a conflict of interest in the other things they do quite aside from their jobs as members of parliament.

I suggest we should go all the way right now and say that members of parliament should not only divest themselves of their financial interests but should divest themselves entirely of any other income, any other job, and look upon their job as member of parliament as a one hundred per cent full-time job. On that I challenge members of the opposition, who perhaps as lawyers or accountants are working for companies that in turn are doing business with the Crown. In their case there is just as much conflict of interest as in the case of ministers who have holdings.

Also I suggest that when we talk about financial holdings as if that posed some real conflict of interest, I wonder how many of us really believe that because we have a few shares in Imperial Oil, for example, we will be able to change the course of action taken by the government toward the oil industry. I feel that the whole attitude at present that has been attached to ministers of the Crown who have holdings which are supposed to influence their decisions is begging the real issue.

Either we accept on trust the word of every member of the House, or we establish a set of rules that governs everybody, not just ministers but every member of the House, and governs them to the point where there will be no conflict of interest because it will not be permitted to exist. Those rules must apply right down the line—severance of connections with companies, severance of connections with other jobs, severance of connection with any association that results in a member receiving moneys from any source whatsoever.

An hon. Member: What about farmers?

Mr. Herbert: Exactly that, we have farmers in this House who have large holdings, and do not tell me that there is no conflict of interest when they argue for their own point of view in committee. I am suggesting that if we are to be really honest with ourselves, we must go into committee and study this green paper which states:

A Member of Parliament is a trustee of public confidence and must perform and appear to perform his duties in a manner reflecting the highest degree of concern for the public interest.

That means that if we are going to set up rules, those rules must be complete and absolute. I challenge members of the opposition to accept that principle and not to point their finger at cabinet ministers, but to point a finger at every member of the House who theoretically, at some time in his life, will be in a position where he can be accused of conflict of interest because of an interest outside the House.

An hon. Member: Why not cabinet ministers first?

Mr. Herbert: I said already that I feel there should be no differentiation over what is considered a gross conflict of interest. Why is the conflict of interest of a cabinet minister any worse than that of a private member?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You can disregard the rest of your speech.

Mr. Herbert: If we are to examine what is going on in the House, we should look at what is going on in committees, at what members on the opposite side are doing in committees. They have a duty to perform to this country in committees, but where are they? They are all over the country doing other jobs, receiving other incomes. There is a real conflict of interest, and that is what I am dead against.

Until we face up to the truth of what is real conflict of interest, we will not go anywhere. That is why I want to see this green paper strengthened and toughened, and I want to see rules brought in so that there is no further doubt. If we are not accepting a man's word any more—and I am prepared to accept everybody's word—then let us have a set of regulations that are so tight that no one will get away with it and no one will be able to be accused of conflict of interest. That is my objective, and that is why I am anxious to get on with the discussion of the green paper in committee.

Mr. Reynolds: Would the hon. member answer a short question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That can only be done with the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Herbert: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Reynolds: The hon. member quoted something out of a newspaper, and then he quoted some words. I know where the quotes were coming from, but can he tell us who was the speaker in the second quote?

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman has not read the green paper because, after my initial quotation, my other quotations were from the green paper which we are supposed to be studying tonight.

Mr. Reynolds: The hon. member said he was quoting out of a newspaper.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be participating in this debate. Although we on this side will try to keep our speeches down to about 10 minutes, I will not find that very difficult because I do not want to make too many comments about the previous speaker, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). Although one can get into a discussion on semantics about the honoured name of his constituency, I felt that part of his argument, to which I listened with great interest, fell within the confines of vaudeville because obviously there must be a difference in the conflict of interest of a cabinet minister and that of a member of parliament due to the difference in their responsibilities and duties and in the exercise of discretion between the two. If the hon. member does not appreciate that, then to have a meaningful debate on this subject will become very difficult indeed.

Having said that, let me say that I fully agree with the hon. member that this is not a simple situation of resolving whether a member is to be here full-time or part-time. During the hon. member's speech someone interjected, "How about farmers and fishermen?" We could even mention lady members of parliament involved in the women's liberation movement.

This whole matter is so involved and complicated that obviously it must be considered in committee. As to cabinet ministers, there have been some remarks made by members opposite regarding different attitudes and responsibilities of cabinet ministers and members of parliament in this chamber and in the Mother of Parliaments.

To have listened to some of the comments here and in the question period during the last two or three days defies description. I must say that I am glad that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) and the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Drury) came back to the House. If there was any revelation at all on the problem of conflict of interest it was in the latter's question to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). He asked if the definition of conflict of interest was, in effect, a participation in public office for private gain. If that is the hon. minister's concept of this debate he is revealed in his nakedness of knowledge on this subject more than the emperor who was wearing no clothes.

Obviously while profit could be a factor, it is the public perception of the office that is important. It would be just the same thing if a doctor, who was an eminent citizen in a town, owned and operated a funeral parlor. There would be a public perception on the part of the citizens as to whether the doctor was discharging his full duty under the laws of medicine—dependent on the business that might be going on in the funeral parlor! But I would repeat that it is the public perception of the office that is important.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, and because communications has been my responsibility under my leader in this party, I have a matter to bring before this House. This is the proper place to bring up the matter of the interests of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson). I sent him notice of my intention to raise the question, and I am glad to see he is in the House.

I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that anything I say in the next few minutes will not be intended to reflect in any way on my personal relationships and associations with the minister. But I feel very sincerely that having had six years and five months to divest himself, either by blind trust or frozen trust, of shares in the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company Limited, and having failed to do so, he comes within the area of conflict of interest. He is a minister of the Crown, and an agency of the Crown, the CRTC, is involved with licence applications. I might add that there are three shareholders in the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company Limited.

The minister was first appointed to cabinet on July 6, 1968, when he was made minister of defence production. He then became in turn minister of supply and services, minister of transport and communications, which was very directly connected with the whole question of assignment of radio frequencies and the technical studies that determine whether there should be a radio station, and now he is Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, which department has many interests in eastern Canada and has contractual relationships with the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company, Limited through advertising, as well as with the other media in Atlantic Canada.

I am not digging into the history of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company, Limited, Mr. Speaker, although I appreciate that at the moment some epithets are being thrown back and forth between the former premier of Newfoundland, the only living father of Confederation, Mr. Smallwood, with allegations about how the company was formed, and Mr. Pickersgill, and the minister. The CBC took a long time to get to St. John's, finally getting there in 1964.

As I have pointed out already, there are three shareholders in the company. The minister's brother has one share, Mr. Jeff Stirling has 151 shares, and the minister has 148 shares or 49.33 per cent of the total shares, so he has a natural and substantive interest in the undertaking.

In the six years and five months that the minister has been in cabinet, applications have been before the CRTC in proper form for TV licences initially, or for renewals, or for an increase in the power output for radio stations. There have been 17 applications affecting television stations, and ten affecting radio stations owned by the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company, Limited.

There has been no effort by the minister to divest himself of his interest in that company through a blind or frozen trust, and this must affect the public perception. I fully appreciate his difficulties in trying to make arrangements to take care of something that has been his lifelong work and to take care of his family. This is part of the difficulty, and it is why no questions were raised in the House for two or three years about the problem as it affects cabinet ministers from time to time.

Senator Keith Davey pinpointed New Brunswick, and said there is monopoly ownership of newspapers in that province by K. C. Irving—even though some of them are marginal operations and could not keep going unless Irving underwrote them. But I wonder if the same rules do not apply to these applications for extensions, renewals, new licences or increased power output of the radio and television station that I mentioned. In effect, there is a monopoly of radio and television by the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company, Limited. I do not impute anything of a criminal nature to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to read to the House part of a letter which Mr. Pearson wrote to his ministers on November 30, 1964, in which he said:

> . . . equally . . . a minister must not have a pecuniary interest that could even remotely conflict with the discharge of his public duty.

I think it is clear that a minister of the Crown, let alone a minister of transport and communications, who had something to do with radio and television licence applications of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company, Limited did have an involvement in the discharge of his duties with that company which had contractual relationships with the government in which he sits as a prominent and respected member. This is one of the reasons why I think we have to look at the whole question of the involvement of ministers. Obviously the higher the duty the higher the responsibility, and there should be definite guidelines.

If the government is intent on opening this matter up, an answer to my question on the order paper of November 15, asking about contractual relationships and the number of successful applications, would have helped.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) also has a question on the order paper directed to the Minister of Supply and Services inquiring about his contractual relationship and interest in Avis, Canada before it was sold to Avis in the United States.

Because of a minister's responsibilities there is a higher duty on him in the exercise of his discretion. Members must appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, before they can talk meaningfully about the conflicts that exist at times of members of this House of Commons.

Mr. Jamieson: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) for giving me notice of his intention to participate in this debate and to raise the issue of my holdings in the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company. I sincerely appreciate what he did, and I am sure his action reflects a mutual desire to reach an understanding on these matters that is satisfactory and meets the high standards of this House.

I welcome the opportunity to respond, not merely because the issue affects me personally, but because in a much wider context it gives me the opportunity to deal with a question which can, from time to time, affect other hon. members.

At the outset let me emphasize what I have said many times before. Since entering public life I have not been involved in any way, and I emphasize this, in the operations of the company concerned. Upon entering the cabinet in 1968, I immediately ceased to be a director or officer of the company. At that time also—and I think this is important—I sought means of placing my holdings in some form of trust, not because there was any legal requirement that I do so, but because I considered it the appropriate thing to do in the circumstances. Such a trust was in fact drawn up at my request and I have scrupulously honoured ever since the spirit of that document, as many people, including, I sincerely believe, some of my friends opposite, can attest.

The problem, and now I come to the central issue which, as I said, can affect other hon. members from time to time, is that in many cases where undertakings are licensed by some federal authority or agency, shareholders are specifically prohibited from assigning their rights to a third party. I emphasize that point because it is essential to this particular issue. In many instances where undertakings are licensed by some federal agency, shareholders are specifically prohibited from assigning their rights to a third party. This, as hon. members well know, is the case in broadcasting and, so far as I have been able to determine, in several other fields under federal jurisdiction such as, for example, certain activities regulated by the CTC and similar bodies. Thus a member or minister, in entering into a trust to eliminate even the appearance of one potential conflict, would find himself in violation of a federal law or regulation. That is precisely the position in which I found myself.

I hope that hon. members viewing this issue objectively—I emphasize objectively, because I believe that is what we are trying to do in this debate—will see its very wide ramifications. It is my opinion that the committee should examine this issue and recommend appropriate means whereby members of this House and others in similar circumstances—and I am referring, although they are perhaps not as relevant to this debate, to senior public servants and the like—can be relieved of this particular requirement relating to federally licensed businesses.

There is another reason why I believe it to be desirable. Persons such as myself, with holdings in licensed undertakings—and I am sure that members of the legal profession know this—are not free to sell such holdings except with the permission of the licensing authority, in this case the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. In ordinary circumstances this is a sensible regulation and I believe, if my memory serves me right, that my hon. friend from Annapolis Valley and I both voted for it in committee some years ago. So I have no quarrel here and, if the hon. member's memory is as good as I think it is, he will concede that we both agreed on that point. So the proposition that the CRTC should have the right to approve a sale is sensible. In ordinary circumstances there is no problem with it. However, for members of parliament and ministers that proposition has created real, indeed almost insuperable difficulties, as I have discovered.

In the first place a sale requires negotiations with one or more of the potential buyers. That is demonstrably true, it seems to me. I would not consider it proper for a shareholder, particularly for a minister, in those circumstances to carry on such negotiations personally. To do so would certainly offend against the spirit of what we have always believed to be a proper guide of conduct for members and ministers in this House. I should like the committee to consider this inhibition, this difficulty placed in front of each of us, whether as private members or as ministers.

● (2010)

Second, even if such negotiations were carried out successfully by the party concerned, the CRTC is under no requirement to approve a sale or to accept a particular buyer as being satisfactory. This is the law of the land. I mention it in the context of the CRTC, but my belief is that it applies to other regulatory agencies where similar circumstances prevail.

In my case, faced with this dilemma, I wrote to a trusted friend a year and a half ago asking him to accept full authority from me to negotiate the sale of my holdings, making it abundantly clear that, if he accepted, there would be no consultation with me and that I would be fully prepared to agree to whatever arrangements he could work out himself.

The gentleman in question—and I hasten to add that he is in no way related to me, nor do I have any business connections with him—was prepared to accept the assignment, for which I am extremely grateful because it is not easy to find someone ready to accept that kind of responsibility. Since that time the only information with which he has provided me is that in December, 1973, an offer to purchase my holdings was filed as required with the Canadian Television and Radio Commission. As hon. members know, it is for the commission, and for the commission alone to determine the scheduling of its deliberations and to date it has not heard the application. I suggest to hon. members that my judgment was correct in saying I would not consider it proper for me to request the commission to accommodate me, and therefore I have made no contact with them whatever.

Hon. members might well consider, during their deliberations, whether it would be appropriate to suggest to the CRTC and to other licensing authorities that special arrangements might apply in cases such as I have outlined. I believe, if I may say this in parenthesis, that a member of this House, be he a minister or otherwise, should probably have the right to request a licensing agency, whatever it might be, to give some kind of priority attention to matters of this nature.

From my point of view I have been in the hands of the CRTC for over a year with no opportunity whatever, other than one which might well be considered an improper intervention, to ask the CRTC to deal with this matter expeditiously. These are the facts of the matter. They are on record, and they are clear for everyone to see. I am most anxious to have this matter dealt with expeditiously. In the meantime, I have, of course, complied with the conflict of interest guidelines.

As a matter of fact since my holdings have been a matter of public record each year in the CRTC report, there has been full disclosure; whatever argument there may be among hon. members about full disclosure it certainly cannot apply in this case. There has been full disclosure, and the option I exercised was a perfectly natural one for me to exercise under the guidelines. I am pleased to have the opportunity to repeat what I have said many times publicly—that I have never in my years of public life sought in any way to benefit from my position. Quite the contrary, as the chairman of the CRTC can attest if any member cares to get in touch with him, my only representation to him, since entering parliament, has been in the course of efforts to get CBC service into remote parts of Newfoundland and other distant areas, and I am confident that all members will agree that this is part of my responsibility as a member of the House and that, indeed, far from reflecting some kind of personal interest it was, if anything the reverse—we are talking about small repeaters which are not significant from a profit point of view. I was trying to get the CBC to move more rapidly than it has in reaching people in remote parts of the country, and I am sure no one will accuse me of conflict of interest in that kind of situation.

I should say, too, that the chairman of the CRTC, who is known generally and widely respected by every member of the House as an independent and conscientious public servant, has already stated publicly on several occasions that I have never attempted even to discuss with him any matter being dealt with by the commission.

I respect the hon. member for Annapolis Valley for making the distinction this afternoon between matters which relate to my responsibilities as a minister and matters affecting my responsibilities as a member of parliament—those touching my constituents. I say to him that no person I am aware of can state I ever discussed any other matter with the CRTC relating to my own province except those which had to do with service to remote areas, and if there is any doubt left in his mind I suggest the chairman of the CRTC be asked to confirm what I have said. Despite this, let me say in all sincerity that I shall be glad when the necessary CRTC hearing has been held and the matter disposed of, Mr. Speaker.

At the same time—and I am asking hon. members to consider soberly what I am saying—it is a case where the cost of public service can come high. Many hon. members, some of them sitting on the opposite benches as well as on this side of the House, know what it is like to build a business from scratch—there are others who know this is precisely what happened in the case in question. It can be a cause for regret, particularly in view of the uncertainties of public life when, for whatever reasons, the necessity arises to dispose of it. In my years here I have found that we, as members, must retain a mutual respect for each other's integrity. Without this an already arduous and difficult career in the service of the country would be doubly difficult, even impossible. That is why I took the steps I have outlined. It is why I now urge the committee to examine the general questions I have raised. I am confident that if it does so an equitable solution can be found.

For my part, any or all of the documents to which I have referred, namely, the assignment of the right to dispose of my assets and the acceptance of that right, the trust agreement, which as I have emphasized was indeed an illegal document in the sense that it was not permissible according to the CRTC, evidence that it was executed in 1968, and anything else to demonstrate that the outline I have given today is a factual one, are available to any member who cares to contact me, for this issue this really illustrates not so much the quandary of a particular person but the very definite gap in the present arrangements regarding conflict of interest.

● (2020)

Anything that I can do in this regard to help resolve the matter, I shall do. I mean, resolve it not for me, because I believe I have resolved it honestly and totally so far as the CRTC is concerned—the next step is up to them—but to resolve the question for members generally who may, indeed unwittingly, be parties to a licensed organization as a result of which they are not able to deal in total freedom with their assets. I shall be more than willing to assist them in that project.

In conclusion let me say once again that I am glad I have had this opportunity to dispose of a situation which has been, to say the least, embarrassing. I say embarrassing in the sense that although I have been doing the right thing, with no question in my mind or in my conscience, I nevertheless realize that here there was potentially a question in the minds of other people. If I can help dispose of this issue and assist myself and others in getting rules which will provide a simple means of resolving this kind of conflict, and which above everything else will ensure that people are not prevented from entering public life in these kinds of circumstances, then it seems to me that it is worth while to do so. I for my part am quite prepared to co-operate in whatever technique or methods the House, in its wisdom, decides to employ.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Annapolis Valley rising to ask a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if I may. I certainly appreciate the minister's remarks tonight, and it is that mutual respect for each other's integrity which made my remarks prior to the supper hour somewhat sensitive, and I am glad I did not encroach too far.

The whole dilemma confronting us in this debate today is not that of the respect that I might hold for the minister as a minister, or as a colleague, or in the corridors as a friend; the dilemma we face is the public's perception of what we do here, either officially as members, as government leaders or—

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is hardly asking a question. I wish he would come to his question now.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to my question. For this reason I should like to ask the minister two questions. First, when the offer to purchase was made in 1973—and I can understand the minister's hesitation in trying to expedite it—why did the agent not expedite it? Secondly, so that full public disclosure is made here tonight even before we get to committee, would the minister do his utmost, with his colleagues on the treasury benches, to answer the questions that I have on the order paper?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first question, I am sure the hon. member can see the point. Once I have assigned responsibility to the agent, surely I ought not to instruct the agent what to do. I assure the hon. member there was no relationship at all between us regarding this matter.

I should also point out on the broader question that it is not unusual, as I understand it, for matters before the commission to drag on for a year or more. Indeed, I saw only yesterday that it was passing down judgments from June of last year, so I think the hon. member is aware that the time span is a long one.

With regard to the second query about the questions on the order paper, a rather broad area is involved here. I hope the questions will be answered to the extent they can be, but this afternoon my hon. friend raised a question, and since it was rather broad I hope the House will permit me to answer it at some length.

The question is rather general in the sense that it asks what constitutes a contract. For example, references were made to various departments for which I have had responsibility. To the best of my knowledge there were no such contracts. There may well have been, for instance, an advertising campaign relating to safe driving or to the breathalyzer test or something of that nature, which presumably was placed by an advertising agency, but I can assure the hon. member, again without qualification, that there was no influence on my part. Quite the contrary.

This also seems to me to raise a question to which I suggest the committee address itself, namely, a clearer definition of what actually represents a contract between the "Crown" and a member of parliament or anybody else. Does it in fact extend, for example, to Air Canada, or to the Wheat Board in its permit book system with the farmers? What is a contract in those terms? I do not profess to have the answer, but I can assure the hon. member that from my point of view it will be answered to the best of our ability.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in following the minister I want to echo the words he just used and assure him, as I am sure all other members in this House will be quick to assure him, that our deliberations in this House of Commons of Canada, if we are to serve the people of Canada who sent us here, do depend in a profound way upon what the minister said—and I took his words down—"mutual respect for each other's integrity". I think that is something that all members of the House can find themselves in agreement with tonight.

There is also the question whether the public is going to have the respect for this chamber that we may well have for each other within it. We are dealing at a greater distance with the public, and that is why, in these matters of the public interest and the conflict that may be engendered not only by members of parliament and cabinet ministers but by public officials as well, it is incredibly important that it be seen by the public that there is no conflict of interest, so that the public has respect for our integrity.

The motion I rise to speak in favour of tonight, put by my leader, is that the committee be authorized to report on the aforementioned green paper after first considering and making recommendations on the subject matter of ministers and conflict of interest, and public servants and conflict of interest.

I had occasion a few weeks ago to raise the issue as to what is the obligation of a senior public official, a deputy minister, when he leaves the service of the government and gives his services to a private employer, or to a community interest for that matter. When I first raised the question with the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé), she was unaware that her own deputy minister was in fact leaving, or rather she knew he was leaving, but not to go into private business. Her suggestion was that the oath which that particular deputy minister had taken was sufficient to preserve all the proprieties.

On a later occasion I was able to raise this question with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and on November 25 I said to the right hon. gentleman that in order to gain public confidence in the matter there should be a cooling off period from the time when a deputy minister or other high official leaves the service of the government and the time he is permitted to engage in private industry or business in the same area in which he has served the government.

● (2030)

The right hon. Prime Minister said this, and I quote from Hansard of November 25 at page 1618:

In so far as the question itself is concerned, the government did consider this alternative and it was rejected. I think if it were to apply to civil servants it would have to apply to all members of the House and we do not think that members of the House would want to apply that rule to themselves.

The Prime Minister then went on to say, and I think this is interesting because he recognized the problem:

. . . frankly I have no further solution to this difficulty and I see it as a real one. I do not think it is a practical alternative to suggest that when officials or ministers or for that matter civil servants or members of parliament, have departed from their particular employment that they be in some way restricted as to the use of their freedom. I would hope that their oath of secrecy and their innate honesty would guide them in the circumstances that the hon. member suggests.

That is all very well, but I think it is important to emphasize the words of the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) this afternoon, when he said:

These very capable public service people are going into the private sector, as we call it. I presume that in many cases they will go into jobs in the same field they dealt with in the government service. What guidelines are given to them on leaving the public service? Is there a system or a set of rules, or is each person who leaves the public service from these high levels left largely to the dictates of his conscience and to interpret the demands of the oath widely or narrowly?

I think what the Leader of the Opposition said has put the position very clearly. This matter has been the subject of discussion in the press, and at least two well-known observers on the political scene in Ottawa have reported on it. Perhaps it is proper to draw the attention of the House to an article by Maurice Western, which ended in this way:

The problem is that, without violating the oath, such former public servants can be extremely useful to private firms in dealing with the Government. They may well have been recruited for exactly that reason. It is altogether improbable that they will be asked to reveal (or would disclose) what was in such and such a minute or secret study. But they may well be asked for counsel. Would it be wise to proceed in a particular manner or to emphasize this or that in making a representation? How, in counselling a private firm in what may be a competitive enterprise, are they to shut out of their minds a whole experience?

That statement reflects the commonsense appreciation of the situation by most people in Canada.

In another article Mr. Phil Gibson touched on this problem in respect of a particular deputy minister who was being discussed. Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear at the time, and subsequently, that in raising the question of the retired Deputy Minister of the Environment I was in no way suggesting that his integrity was for one minute being questioned. Indeed, along with many of my colleagues and I am sure other members of the House, I have a tremendous regard for the public service he has given this country, especially in relation to his role in respect of Expo, and for the years he subsequently gave this country as the Deputy Minister of the Environment in his difficult task of forming a new department. That particular deputy minister has, I think quite properly, declined to comment.

Let me quote from the article by Mr. Gibson as follows:

However, he and others in similar situations might welcome a clarification of the accepted, official morality. Jack Cross, assistant clerk of the Privy Council, said he has known deposed or retiring cabinet ministers to ask for a copy of their oath. "We don't ask why they want to see it, but I suppose it gives them some indication how free they are."

There also appears to be some ambiguity over whether the oaths are legally binding once a person has left office. None of the four varieties of oaths makes specific reference to this possibility.

The public service oath, which applies to deputy ministers, states simply: "I solemnly and sincerely swear that I will faithfully and honestly fulfill the duties that devolve upon me by reason of my employment in the public service and that I will not, without due authority in that behalf, disclose or make known any matter that comes to my knowledge by reason of such employment. So help me God."

Even Cross, who has kept track of scores of oaths in 30 years at the Privy Council office, is unsure of their applicability, although he adds: "It would be ridiculous not to have it apply after leaving office."

The fact of the matter is that events have changed over the years, and the tremendous position of power that senior public servants acquire as a result of their duties, and the tremendously important knowledge they carry with them when they leave these duties give an inside track to those public servants when they go into the private sector and have to deal with the government departments, agencies, licensing authorities and fund raising authorities, and that affects the public interest.

There has been debate today as to what "public interest" means. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) asked whether it meant when you used your own public office to your own private advantage? It does mean that, but it means something else as well. It means whether your activities give you, or the people you work with, an advantage over other members of the public who are expected to come before the government, its agencies, its regulatory offices, its licensing bureaus and its financial granting offices with complete equality with any other group or citizen that is applying.

It is interesting that this issue is raised at a time when a number of deputy ministers are retiring. The Deputy Minister of the Environment is leaving, the Deputy Minister of Finance for the past four and a half years is leaving, the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is retiring, as well as others. One of my colleagues reminds me that the Deputy Minister of Agriculture is also retiring.

It seems to me that at time when a number of deputy ministers are withdrawing from public service it becomes very important that the government immediately lay down guidelines and stipulations as to what their freedom of operations is after they leave the public service, and whether there should be a period—I call it a cooling off period—so they do not take with them, to use in a situation of immediacy, the knowledge they acquired in the service of all the public. It is interesting that the right hon. Prime Minister when answering me seemed to suggest that this alternative had been disposed of or rejected by the government as not being practical.

I am indebted to a citizen who wrote me, a Mr. V. H. Coley from the province of Alberta. He had this to say:

> Ten or twelve years ago I worked for the C.N. Express in the bond department, working in the Federal Building on 107th St. We gave in bond shipments to the customs and when they were cleared delivered them. The gossip was that appraisers or men who worked in the customs long room assessing duty and sales tax, if they resigned from the service, were not allowed to work as or for customs brokers for one year, to remove the edge they had.

● (2040)

I ask hon. members to keep in mind what that citizen said. To quote him again, he said, "to remove the edge they had". Discussions were held with some officials in that particular department, and one of them said something interesting. He said that this requirement was "in order to remove the potency of the information which they have accumulated". It is interesting that indeed such regulations do exist. I shall cite for the benefit of all hon. members the regulations respecting the licensing of Custom house brokers. These regulations were promulgated in April, 1960, and so far as I know are still in effect. In the qualifications for licence section in these regulations appears the following:

> The Committee shall not recommend to the Minister the granting of a licence to an applicant unless the applicant satisfies the Committee that he . . .

Then there are a number of things he must satisfy the committee about which are enumerated, following which item (f) reads:

> (f) has not been an officer of the Customs and Excise Division of the Department within two years from the date of the application; and

> (g) is not related either by birth or by marriage to an officer of the Customs and Excise Division of the Department.

It is difficult for me to understand, and I think it will be extremely difficult for the public to understand, why the customs officer cannot go out into the private sector and use his knowledge accumulated within the public service within two years, and yet a deputy minister with all the power that that position gives him, and all the influence it gives him in relation to other members of the community, can go out immediately and place himself in a position that the Parliament of Canada will not allow to an ordinary customs official.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: It is not just sufficient to say that this would be difficult, that it might create problems and that hon. members would not want to be restricted in what they can do. The fact of the matter is that the Parliament of Canada has already recognized this situation and enacted regulations. So, I am sorry the Prime Minister is not here tonight, but I would ask that someone bring this to his attention because it is extremely important that what we decide by law will apply to people away down the line should also apply to people in the most senior and powerful positions of the government of Canada.

It is my view, and I would urge it upon the government, that long before the time comes when it will be necessary to discuss the green paper and all its ramifications, in view of the fact there are increasingly more and more cases of senior public officials retiring and entering some sort of private life, that the government should now lay down some guidelines, which can be adjusted later if necessary, in order to clear up once and for all any doubt concerning whether or not these officials will leave the public service carrying with them an advantage which gives them an inside track against the interests of other members of the public, and in this way affect the public interest of our country.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. I am delighted with the intensity of the debate. I think it certainly reflects, so far as our party is concerned, the great respect we have for and the way in which we cherish this institution. We try to develop guidelines which show that justice not only is done but appears to be done.

One of the interesting things about the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson)—and clearly he has the respect of every member in this House—is that he missed during his eloquent defence of his position the point that justice not only must be done but must appear to be done in terms of this particular piece of legislation. I have heard arguments from both sides of this House which avoid the principal issue, which is the question of full disclosure. We are still skirting around, above, under and over it, but are not really getting to the question of full disclosure because what the public wants to know is what one has to hide. The public wants full disclosure.

There is no reason why we should have to become involved in blind trusts or frozen trusts. A blind trust works both ways. It is blind in respect of the person who owns it, and it is also blind so far as the public is concerned in respect of knowing what is in it. This is what I mean that justice must appear to have been done, and the only way is by having full disclosure.

I have had an opportunity to look through about 69 pages of the green paper on conflict of interest. It so happens that I picked up a bill from the province of British Columbia which contains five pages, but which does more in respect of showing that justice is being done and appears to be done, than all the 69 pages in this green paper on conflict of interest. I might point out that that bill was passed in British Columbia in September of this year. It provides that every elected official in the province of British Columbia must disclose his assets, period, that those assets be made public and that the public have an opportunity to examine them. In that way the real question of conflict of interest is avoided, because if a cabinet minister who has control over the economy in a particular area discloses his assets, then I will respect him because I know he will make sure there is no apparent conflict of interest.

If we want to be sure that not only is justice done but that it appears to be done there is not a reason in the world why total disclosure should not be made of the assets of every member of this House.

I was very interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on July 18 when he said this:

> The government believes that no higher standards should be demanded of anyone than of ministers themselves.

That is a wonderful sentiment. I waited patiently to see it reflected somewhere, but it has not been reflected in anything. In fact the green paper sets a lower standard in respect of cabinet ministers than it does for members of the House of Commons. This is why at page 37 the committee that is to be appointed to study the question of conflict of interest is given wide powers except in this case:

> The Committee may not investigate conflicts of interest of a Cabinet Minister if the alleged improprieties result from the exercise of his duties as a Minister of the Crown.

Why should we exclude ministers of the Crown from the inquiry of the committee while we include members of this House? It seems to me one could argue that lower standards are being set for ministers in spite of the very eloquent remarks of the Prime Minister, in which he indicated that ministers should have the highest standards.

● (2050)

I think we all agree that if we are going to do a service to the public we must see that justice appears to be done, and it can only appear to be done when the public knows that those assets are on the record and are disclosed.

An hon. Member: Tell that to Mr. Barrett.

Mr. Leggatt: Let me tell the hon. member that it is Mr. Barrett who should be telling this government that, because the bill to which I am referring requires full disclosure from every elected official in British Columbia. It is that bill that this House should adopt if we want to be realistic about full disclosure.

Before concluding my remarks I want to comment on the questions raised by the Minister of the Environment (Mrs. Sauvé) this afternoon in her remarkable defence of the failure to bring spouses under the bill, using women's rights as an excuse.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Leggatt: If there is a group in this country that wants to see that justice is done and appears to be done to them and to everybody else, it is women. And they should be the first group, and I am sure they are, that would be critical of a minister that would use that argument to hide behind the failure to have proper conflict of interest guidelines. I do not need to deal too much more with that, because I think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) dealt with it very successfully. In fact, she dealt with it so successfully that the next speaker said: "Let us not deal with women's rights any more, I think we have had enough", and I am sure they had.

I think that if you analysed that kind of argument, which is an elitist argument about women and which is the wrong argument to use—remember, when you are talking about women you talk about the most unemployed, the most on welfare—you find that they have interests besides whether they are going to marry cabinet ministers, and they have other worries than whether or not they have to disclose their assets.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Sauvé: I want to ask the hon. member how he thinks a cabinet minister will remain married if the condition of her being a cabinet minister is that her husband stops having a career?

Mr. Broadbent: It does not follow.

Mr. Leggatt: Let me say in answer to the question that there is an act called the married women's property act under which every woman who comes to marriage is entitled to own the property she brings to the marriage. If it is in her name, I am not interested in it, but I am damn interested in the property she acquires since the date of her marriage. I think that should be disclosed, and not to disclose it is a way of avoiding justice appearing to be done. That is all the public wants, and all that the House really wants.

Mr. Jamieson: You are an old reactionary.

Mr. Leggatt: I am sorry that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is not in the House, but it is he who said that the real reason for this debate today was not conflict of interest but to raise the question of the SIU.

The first time that those three letters were mentioned in the House in this debate was when the hon. member for Vaudreuil decided that was the time to mention them. I am surprised he bothered with it, but it is he who brought it into the debate. I must say, as one member who was not in the House when many of these questions were asked, that I have seen a lot of smoke but not very much fire. Perhaps we have had a little too much protest. I do not know why they want to raise that question in terms of conflict of interest guidelines. In any event, I must say that if the price of influence peddling is down to $500—

Mr. Jamieson: That is just plain peddling.

Mr. Leggatt: —then I would be very surprised. In any event, I will not deal in an extensive way with that subject, which was certainly canvassed extensively last week.

I want to conclude by urging the minister and the committee when they deal with this matter to have a look at frozen trusts and blind trusts, and then to have a look at full disclosure. Within those three principles you will find that the public is more interested in the disclosure of assets so that they know that justice is being done, and so that they have access to that information. Then parliament will receive the respect which ministers and members of parliament deserve. But until we are ready to take that step we have not gone far enough in terms of conflict of interest legislation.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened a few moments ago to a very eloquent speech by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), but I want to say to him that the very fact that he felt compelled to stand in the House and make the speech which he did is one of the strongest arguments that could have been put for the support by his party of the amendment that has been put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was an eloquent speech, and I rather felt for him—I say this to him directly—because he confessed on the floor of the House—

Mr. Jamieson: Not confessed.

Mr. Broadbent: Admitted.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let me finish that phrase. He confessed on the floor of the House to feeling a sense of embarrassment in the situation in which he found himself, albeit as he argued, and we could examine that argument later, he was compelled by law into this situation. But it is that very sense of embarrassment that a minister of the Crown should feel, and which this minister has confessed he did feel, which is the strongest possible argument for the amendment we have moved.

The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that in dealing with questions of morality or justice, in the fair and equitable manner in which the minister asks us to deal with those questions, the place to start is not in the complicated and difficult area of the member of parliament, the backbencher, but in the clear area of ministers of the Crown. That is the reason that we have put this amendment. But for all his eloquence the minister did not answer the argument that was made earlier today by the Leader of the Opposition. I think the proposition put forward by the Leader of the Opposition is unassailable, namely, that the higher the position, the greater the duty to ensure not only the existence of morality in public life but the appearance of the existence of morality in public life. That is the plain unvarnished reason for the amendment which we have moved.

I want to say to the House that I have been astounded by the speech of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) and by the fact that he should say what he did and say it in the way he did, completely misinterpreting the line of debate that we have tried to bring forward today. But I was astounded more by the government House leader who, on December 6 in the House, appeared to argue that the special position of cabinet ministers, their special privileges, the important access they have to knowledge, do not place a cabinet minister in a higher position than a backbencher in the House. I cannot accept that argument, and no one else can accept that argument. That is not to say that a backbencher's duties ought not to be examined, but surely in the year 1974 we have not come to the position in this country—particularly this country—when people with these extraordinary powers and privileges do not carry with them a special duty in the exercise of their privileges. That is the point of the amendment that we put forward, Mr. Speaker.

● (2100)

Some hon. members in this House today have dealt with public servants. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) said that the guidelines that were produced on December 18, 1973, with respect to the public service were not sufficient. I think he has a point, and the committee would have to look into it. It is worth noting what the guidelines say. Section 2 reads:

> It is by no means sufficient for a person in a position of responsibility in the public service to act within the law. There is an obligation not simply to obey the law but to act in a manner so scrupulous that it will bear the closest public scrutiny.

Surely if that is the duty of the public servant who merely advises a minister, then the minister who has the ultimate power to dispense has a much higher duty. That is the point of this amendment, Mr. Speaker. That is why I think the government ought to thank the Leader of the Opposition for the thoughtful amendment he has put, and why the government, men and women, ought to stand up and support that amendment. They should not hide behind the smokescreen of women's rights or the smokescreen that was raised by the government House leader on December 6, or something that I would not dignify with the name of smokescreen, and that is the speech of the hon. member for Vaudreuil.

The responsibility lies upon all of us to take our duties in our hands, recognizing that if we are to codify what is right in the eyes of the people of this country we ought to start where the responsibility is greatest and the duty is highest, namely, with ministers of the Crown. I ask the government to support the amendment on that basis.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in considering this question of conflict of interest I think it is generally agreed that the important thing for members of the government is that they should not at any time be in a position where they can increase the value of their holdings by means of decisions they take in the particular spheres of activity which come under their direction as ministers of the Crown.

One way that has been suggested of meeting this problem is that a minister should put his or her investments into a frozen trust. This is definitely not a satisfactory solution to the problem, because although the minister cannot change his or her securities, he or she knows what those securities are, and the value of them can be affected very materially by decisions the minister may take if the operations of the company concerned come under his or her particular responsibility.

Another suggestion that has been put forward for meeting this problem is that a minister should put his securities into a blind trust where the owner is unaware of any changes made in the portfolio from time to time. Mr. Speaker, this method is equally impractical for meeting this very serious problem. Any member of this House who is a practical man or woman will realize that no agent into whose care such investments are entrusted will make any change in a portfolio without first checking with the owner through a third or fourth party. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, a blind trust becomes nothing more than a frozen trust and, as I have said, that is not a satisfactory solution. We should ask ourselves then what is a practical method of handling this very real problem which all governments face?

To begin with, for many years in the parliament of Canada it has been an unwritten rule that because of the great influence which the position of the Minister of Finance has on business affairs throughout the country, upon taking over his portfolio such minister should divest himself of all common stocks, and invest the funds that are realized through those sales in government bonds. I believe this procedure should become a formal requirement for the Minister of Finance, and also for the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, because of the great influence their decisions have on the value of common stocks generally.

I also think that it is obvious that the Minister of Transport upon taking over his portfolio should divest himself of any stocks in transport companies. I believe too that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should divest himself of any stocks in energy or mining operations upon taking office. As well, the stocks of any minister of the government which could possibly come under his own jurisdiction in the operation of the companies concerned, should be sold and the funds realized placed in some other investment. In this way when carrying out the duties within their responsibility, ministers would be free of suspicion of influencing in any way the value of stocks in companies which came under their particular department's authority.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I believe that all ministers should declare their holdings in a written statement to the President of the Privy Council, and notify him by letter of any change that is made in their holdings. This would enable the President of the Privy Council, as the watchdog of the operations of cabinet—because the Prime Minister is obviously too busy to concern himself with details of this kind—to make sure that no changes are made in any portfolio as a result of cabinet discussions regarding various areas of business activity.

An obvious example of this is, of course, the discussions on the budget, in which all members take part before it is presented to parliament. In this way the holdings of cabinet ministers would not become public knowledge, and of course there is no justifiable reason why they should become public knowledge. It would also ensure that ministers would be precluded from making an increase in the value of their holdings due to information available only to them before an economic event takes place.

Finally, I wish to speak about cabinet ministers receiving gifts from those whose operations come within their jurisdiction. It is obvious that all ministers must be careful not to allow themselves to be put in a position in which it might appear that their decisions are influenced by the gifts they have received. If a minister is so foolish as to allow himself to be put in such a position, he has demonstrated that he did not possess sufficient judgment and common sense to warrant his appointment to the cabinet in the first place. Unfortunately, several members of cabinet have demonstrated just that in the past few days.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, at the outset let me make it clear that the questions I have directed to the ministry and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during past months to do with conflict of interest guidelines for ministers, and the sentiments which prompted my participation in this debate tonight, have nothing to do with any fishing expedition relating to any individual minister.

If any person wishes to be overly dramatic and suggest that I make specific charges either inside or outside the House, let me say I have none to make. I repeat, what I have to say does not involve any fishing expedition relating to the morality of the cabinet in general or any individual minister in particular. However, let me say that the conflict of interest guidelines proposed by the Prime Minister are nothing less than an insult to our intelligence. My remarks tonight will pertain purely to those guidelines, as they relate to ministers of the Crown.

No person, be he eventually a minister of the Crown or an ordinary member of parliament, swears an oath of proverty when he decides to run for public life. As the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) suggested, assets accumulated from the practice of a profession or private business should not bar one from public life. We are wrestling with that problem in Canada, and they are wrestling with it in the administration of the United States and the United States Congress.

An hon. Member: But that is a different situation.

Mr. Grafftey: I know the situation is different, but we are still wrestling with it. Just as judges, school teachers, rabbis, priests and other ministers of religion adhere to certain standards which are not ambivalent, so should members of parliament. Although we should not swear an oath of poverty, we should swear to serve the people in the truest and best fashion. For this reason I suggest that conflict of interest rules as proposed by the Prime Minister should be up-to-date and meaningful.

I was interested to hear the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion say how hard it is to build up a private business. I felt almost sorry for him as he pleaded. However, Mr. Speaker, most businessmen do not have the help of people like Mr. Smallwood. The minister should give the former premier of Newfoundland credit for his help in building up that private business. Let us call a spade a spade, and come clean with the Canadian people.

The differences between ordinary members and ministers of the Crown have been spelled out by members who have spoken this afternoon and this evening. The Prime Minister has tacitly admitted that there is a clear-cut difference between conflicts of interest involving ministers of the Crown and ordinary members of Parliament. In typical government fashion he has set up a bureaucracy in the Privy Council office which is to deal with this question, thereby admitting tacitly that there is a difference as between private members of parliament and ministers of the Crown. That is the basis for the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

Let us begin and put first things first. Call a spade a spade. To pretend that ministers of the Crown are not privy to information which is not available to ordinary members, is folly. I suppose, under the Prime Minister's proposed conflict of interest rules, ordinary members of the House will have to parade to the Privy Council office and build up the bureaucracy which has been established to deal with ministers of the Crown. I suggest that the obvious repository of declaration of members of parliament is the Clerk of the House, under Mr. Speaker.

Having said that, let me show why the Prime Minister's proposed guidelines are a mockery and an insult to the intelligence of members and of the Canadian people in general. The green paper suggests that a minister will not be involved in a conflict of interest if he holds no more than 5 per cent of the stock of a company. Anyone who is familiar with the sorts of shares traded on the Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto stock exchanges knows that anyone who controls even 3 per cent of the shares of any major company has effective control of that company. Yet the economic wizards advising the Prime Minister suggest that a 5 per cent holding will not involve any conflict of interest. Such loose thinking in relation to proposed guidelines is not acceptable.

Some hon. members have alluded to frozen trusts and blind trusts. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) has talked about obvious loopholes concerning blind trusts. What about frozen trusts? Any minister involved in this situation may say that what is in a frozen trust is nobody's business but his own. He knows what is in the trust. While the assets are frozen, he might still be involved in a blatant conflict of interest, in view of his activities as a minister of the Crown.

It is not good enough to say a trust is frozen. A trust can be frozen, but the stock or assets can still increase in value; yet nobody except the minister involved will know about this, and this knowledge will remain unknown unless investigative research work is done. What will happen if one goes to the Privy Council office? Nothing, because nobody is allowed to know what is in a blind trust, except the minister involved. Obviously he knows what is in the trust.

• (2120)

But the real reason, Mr. Speaker, brought up time and time again by the Leader of the Opposition, the pith and substance if you will of why the guideline rules are absolutely meaningless, is because they do not include spouses. I have asked the Prime Minister time and time again if during the period he gave individual ministers to put their affairs in order he could assure the House that no minister transferred to his or her spouse assets which, if held by the minister in question, would have placed him in a position of conflict of interest.

I was ruled out of order this morning with regard to this question. I want an answer tonight. Where is the Prime Minister during this debate?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Grafftey: All the ministers do is laugh. The Canadian people are asking these questions through me. Did any minister, during the time he or she was given to put his or her affairs in order by the Prime Minister, transfer assets to his or her spouse which if held by him or her would place him or her in a position of conflict of interest? How many many times do I have to ask that question? Oh, I see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury) looking at me quizzically, but he has enough knowledge of economics to know what I am talking about, I hope. The Canadian people will not be satisfied—

Mr. Drury: I was just wondering whether the hon. gentleman, in his enthusiasm, recognized that I am a widower.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: I already made it quite clear at the beginning of my remarks that I was not on a fishing expedition. I don't know, maybe I have lost my sense of humour, but I didn't find that all that funny. Well, hon. members opposite laugh, but do they really feel the Canadian people are that stupid, to see the man who has the senior elective office in this country come and say, "Look at your great guidelines for conflict of interest of ministers." They don't even include spouses. He gives the ministers for ever and a day, while he builds up a big bureaucracy in the Privy Council offices, to put their affairs in order. The Leader of the Opposition time and time again asked why spouses and next of kin are not included in these great new guidelines. And until the government comes clean with this House and with the Canadian people we are going to persist in our questioning, because the government must not only be honest it must seem to be honest.

Why have all these blind trusts, open trusts, the big bureaucracy in the Privy Council, but not including spouses? Can the Prime Minister come and join this debate? I was ruled out of order this afternoon on the ground that the Prime Minister would be here in the House to answer in this debate. Well, where is he? And if I ask that question tomorrow, will he guarantee this House that, during the time he gave ministers to put their affairs in order, no assets were transferred to spouses to avoid individual conflict of interest? That is what I want to know. That is what this House wants to know. That is what the Canadian people want to know.

The only kind of declaration that will satisfy the Canadian people and this House is an open and complete declaration by ministers of the Crown of all their holdings, and not all the blind trusts, open trusts, frozen trusts—sending the press up to the Privy Council offices on a wild goose hunt to find nothing. What have you got to hide?

Mrs. Sauvé: Nothing.

Mr. Grafftey: You say nothing. Then tell us. If it is nothing, then let us see. Because only with this kind of open and full declaration will the Canadian people and this House be satisfied, and will the government led by the right hon. Prime Minister have played a leadership role in some small way in making this institution a little more meaningful.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): We have just listened to some real oratory and some excellent positive suggestions by the member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

I think that in taking part in a debate of this nature, in the ten minutes allotted to me I might just lay what I would call an introduction. I think that we as Canadians can be proud, looking over our history, and at the various governments—we have had two kinds to date, Liberals on the one hand and Conservatives on the other—that we have been fortunate to have experienced relatively few scandals of any significance which pertain to conflict of interest.

The first thing to remember is that no matter what rules we may lay down, the morality of the people themselves who serve in this chamber is of primary importance. I cannot forget the lessons I learned in political science from George Britnell, who was a great political scientist in the Province of Saskatchewan. He said you can legislate anything, but you can never really legislate morality. So I think that really the first few words that are necessary to set the tone for what I have to say are that we have been very fortunate in the kind of Canadians who have come here, and who are representative of Canadians everywhere in every segment of society; and our scandals as we look over history have been pretty unimportant. We have, therefore, been pretty fortunate and we can be quite proud as Canadians.

I think the most important part of this debate arises out of the amendment moved by our leader. I would hope, looking at it, that having been considered by both sides of the House, it would receive unanimous consent and endorsement. To my mind, if that happened it would be monumental because the first thing to do is to differentiate between the responsibilities of a cabinet minister and of a member of parliament.

All of us realize that to become members of parliament under our particular system of government we must first be elected. But when we are appointed cabinet ministers our responsibilities become entirely different from those of ordinary members. I want to draw a few illustrations, because you can use rhetoric but you need to get down to brass tacks when you are considering the difference between a cabinet minister and a member of parliament.

Let us take a few examples. Consider the Bank Act. Members of the cabinet are the first to know whether they are going to take the 6 per cent ceiling off interest rates. They are privy to this knowledge long before other members of parliament. A cabinet minister is armed with knowledge that no other member of parliament possesses. Anyone with any knowledge of business knows that once interest rates are free the price of bank stock is bound to increase. We saw this very thing happen when the Bank Act was changed, when the interest rate was allowed to run free and the ceiling of 6 per cent was removed. The value of the stock increased. Even on the market today, in its most depressed state since 1970, the values of bank shares are still greater on the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges than they were on the day it was announced that the Bank Act would be changed.

Another good example is in the field of transportation. The Minister of Transport and his cabinet colleagues were the first to know that a big airport was to be built and that, as a consequence, a great deal of property would be expropriated. Of course if land is to be expropriated it is subject to changes in value. This is why there have to be rules for ministers to prevent them making substantial sums of money either for themselves or their friends.

● (2130)

One hon. member talked about running a country which had a budget of $26 billion. That is a large amount; of course the government is the largest enterprise that we have in this country. But we also have people who are privy to knowledge concerning the gross national product, which is subject to changes in the field of taxation, to decisions made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and other ministers, which affect the shares of corporations. Thus people are armed with this knowledge This is why we need men and women who have sufficient integrity not to use this information for their material gain and enrichment.

The amendment now before the House is suggesting that we start at the top, where the decisions are made, when it comes to dealing with conflict of interest. I think it is a monumental suggestion, and I hope it receives 100 per cent support. Surely we can forget partisan viewpoints in this regard. It was this party that initially suggested this debate, and it was the government House leader who came forth with a motion. Our leader came forth with an amendment that is practical from the point of view of dealing seriously and responsibly with this question of conflict of interest.

The second point I want to make, which is most important in terms of the cabinet, concerns the image of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister of this country must always set an example. If he is ever careless in so far as a conflict of interest is concerned, or if he leaves a wrong impression or does something that gives a wrong impression, his image suffers.

I should like to pay a compliment to two prime ministers who served during the time I have served. I refer to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who, whatever the critics said about him, was above reproach in regard to setting an example of the kind I have mentioned; and to the prime minister before him,

Louis St. Laurent, who had the same character and integrity. Such example, of course, sets the tone of the cabinet itself.

When the vote comes tonight I hope we will have the support of hon. members for the amendment. We should differentiate between cabinet minister and backbenchers. Backbenchers do have some knowledge when bills come before them or when facts are given to the House, but cabinet ministers are decision makers and are privy to knowledge long before parliament.

I sit here day after day, and what I object to, when questions are asked, are cabinet ministers who leave the impression with the media that there is no difference between privy councillors and ordinary members of parliament. I am not fond of the term "backbencher". A lot of people who use the term "front bencher" and "backbencher" seem to think it denotes where a member sits. As I understand British political history, a frontbencher is a privy councillor. Whether he sits in the back row or in the front row, he is equally a member of parliament. However, there is a difference between a member of the cabinet and a member of parliament when it comes to questions of conflict of interest.

I hope that whatever rules are laid down there will be no straitjacket. I agree with my hon. friend that a blind trust, or that putting stock in what is called a frozen trust, is no real, solid solution. We need sound rules. In order to play baseball or football we must lay down the rules of the game, so the game can be played properly and responsibly. Any member of this House can suggest a rule or put something down in writing, but one thing I have learned as a lawyer is that if a person in his own conscience sets out to do wrong and intends to do wrong, no matter what is written in a document or in all of the statute books, that person will do wrong.

I hope that whatever rules are laid down, whether for cabinet ministers or for members of parliament, there will not be a straitjacket in any sense of that word. I come back to my opening remark, that the strength of the question whether we allow our public interests to conflict with our personal interests depends upon the integrity, calibre and character of the men and women who are elected to this place. Since I have only ten minutes and I see my time has already elapsed, I should like to hear from some of my colleagues in this connection.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to take part in the debate. This debate is all the more important as it comes a few days after the discussion of the topic which has aroused Canadian public opinion, and stirred this side of the House as well as the other. That debate also proved the vulnerability of political parties. Indeed, we learned in the course of the deliberations that as many hon. members on this side of the House as hon. members of the official opposition, received contributions from unions whose activities have brought up questions in several person's minds. I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to learn that hon. members of the opposition had also accepted gifts, all in all quite modest, from a union, thus exposing themselves, to comparable blame, which the ministers willingly pointed out. Indeed, if the majority—

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I apologize to the hon. member. I think he made a lapsus linguae when he said hon. members of the official opposition and of the other parties. I want to point out to him that it has been publicly confirmed that the Social Credit Party was not involved with the unions concerned.

Mr. Joyal: I thank the hon. member for Lotbinière; the point he raised is indeed correct.

I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that if a majority of Canadian voters had favoured members of the party of the official opposition we would probably have had the same debate, and vice versa, as in the final analysis our system showed in the past that the door was open to actions by groups that could readily be questioned.

● (2140)

And that is precisely why the 29th Parliament passed a bill thenceforth allowing all members of recognized parties to receive contributions, but also disclose the origin of such contributions.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think that today's debate is the logical follow-up to those situations we pointed out, that the prime responsibility for detecting conflicts of interest rests with the political party itself.

Indeed, when political parties have to chose candidates, quite often they must take into account a number of factors, including of course the honesty of individuals, their competence, and also their role in the professional world.

As a matter of fact, most parties that want to undergo a change are increasingly looking for candidates with extensive experience, and that experience includes the realm of business, of professions, of education as well as all sectors related to government activities.

It would be quite easy, Mr. Speaker, when considering the situation of every member, to find that at a given moment one or the other could be in conflict of interest. It is not because of person is not a shareholder of a company or a property owner that he or she is necessarily unaffected by all kinds of conflicts of interest.

When a bill is introduced in the House, an active union member or a businessman fights for the opinions, the interests of the people among whom he has gained his own experience.

And in this context, I think it is a little simplistic to limit the debate or conflict of interest solely to the financial aspect. This responsibility of political parties should be thoroughly investigated to develop a code of ethics. And I believe it is really on this area that we should concentrate.

A code of ethics, Mr. Speaker, does not have a solely repressive effect, it does not aim simply at imposing sanctions for offenses, but it also has a normative effect. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), when underlining the importance of an investigation on organized crime in a previous speech, showed that the aim of such an investigation was not necessarily repressive but normative, that it aimed at warning people about a possible danger and at contributing to the development of a valid policy taking these dangers into account. I believe that a code of ethics should be adopted, and my colleagues in the House of Commons should be interested in promoting such a code.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who believe that only ministers and senior public servants can be involved in conflicts of interest. Having had a role in a minister's office which, as the hon. member mentioned, dealt daily with cases of future expropriation, I know that ministerial staff can be as involved in conflicts of interest as the minister himself, since during the course of their work, they have access to information that they could use to their own advantage or in such a way as to help other people they know to make profits.

I also do not believe that not being a cabinet member is reason enough to be excluded from this legislation. Many of us have had previous professional responsibilities in the business world, and the companies for which we used to work may—one day or even now—have negotiations with the government and make representations to obtain contracts and responsibilities. And the fact that we no longer belong to these companies does not exclude us from conflicts of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we really want to have a serious and non-partisan approach to this matter, we must consider it in its whole, we must consider the responsibility of political parties when they look for candidates, people who necessarily have had professional experience and interests in wide ranging economic activities. And the aim of most political parties when they want to be renewed is to call upon people who have proved themselves in the business or academic world or as professionals.

But to look for angels and to believe that candidates can be found who are immune from any conflict of interest is, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, to oversimplify politics, which does not necessarily imply that political parties or individual members of the House have no responsibilities. But they can only assume those responsibilities if a code of ethics is actually adopted and if that code of ethics aims at both objectives I mentioned earlier, that is, first a normative objective that would consist in creating within groups, among people with public responsibilities, a certain set of values of honesty and of the services to be rendered primarily to the public. But I do not think we are doing Canadians a service if we try to keep this debate within the narrow limits of contributions that may have been received during an election campaign. We dealt with that problem especially during the 29th parliament when legislation was passed, but in the present situation, what we must establish within the public service, within the Parliament, is actually a set of values that would bring everyone to model his conduct after a service to the public which is not what we have witnessed in the past days.

I should like to report, Mr. Speaker, that in some countries—and I am thinking of Britain and the United States in particular—the intelligence of citizens was not insulted because not every minister and state secretary in the past had to disclose his interests. In my opinion, if we must seek a solution agreeable to all hon. members, we will really find it by giving up partisanship and by strictly keeping in mind the need to improve the relations which hon. members of Parliament ministerial staff officials and ministers themselves will have with their constituents.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question now is on the main motion. Is there a disposition to deal with the main motion by a voice vote. Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Sharp) agreed to on division.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the President of Treasury Board) moved:

That supplementary estimates (B) 1974-75, laid upon the Table, Friday, November 22, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) thereupon moved that Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975, be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) thereupon moved that Bill C-42, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1975, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Fortin: On division.

Clause 3 agreed to on division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Fortin: On division.

Clause 4 agreed to on division.

On clause 5—Power to raise loan of $2,500,000,000 for public works and general purposes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Could I ask the Minister of Finance to tell us the exact purpose of clause 5 which is in addition to the usual form of an appropriation bill? We are now being asked to approve the granting of additional authority to the Governor in Council to borrow sums of roughly $2.5 billion, as I read it. There may be a valid explanation, but I think it should be on record.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. member is very observant, as usual. The reason we need extra borrowing authority is because of the extra liquidity given to us as a result of the very successful Canada Savings Bond campaign.

The Chairman: I wish to bring it to the attention of the committee that I thought the hon. member for Edmonton West was rising on a point of order. By virtue of an order of the House which has been accepted we are to dispose of this bill without debate. Thus, I consider the question raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West to be a point of order, and I will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) in the same way.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I did not hear clause 5 was carried and I had a question for the Minister of Finance concerning the proposed interest rates on the $2.5 billion bond issue.

The Chairman: Order. The chair is in a somewhat awkward position. The House instructed the committee to deal with the bill without debate, and if at this point I recognized the hon. member for Edmonton West, I thought he rose on a point of order. I may be inclined, to be fair to the hon. member for Lotbinière, to give him the same opportunity, but I would not like him to press his question any further if the minister will answer.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, but I put the question at this point to show that we are now giving the Minister of Finance authority to borrow $2.5 billion. A completely ridiculous procedure. I believe this system of carrying the motion will be abolished when we debate amendments to the procedure.

● (2220)

The Chairman: Order. I must emphasize, for the benefit of the hon. member, that we have to act with such speed not only because of House or committee procedure, but also because there was an order by this House, approved by all members and the hon. member in particular, that tonight, at this time, we vote all necessary estimates, all amendments and the main motion.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member rise on a point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I have to apologize, Mr. Chairman, for not being very familiar with procedure, because I am specializing mainly in production, and not in estimates. I would therefore ask for what I believe is a warranted explanation.

On Clause 5: $2.5 billion which may be required for Public Works—I agree with this—and other general purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. Minister of Finance to clarify what is meant by other general purposes. Mr. Chairman, I have risen on a point of order, which is a serious matter, and I would like to keep the floor. If we have 50 chairmen in the House, it will simply not work.

The Chairman: Order, please. I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I simply wish to refer him to the decision arrived at by the House last Friday which compels the Committee, at this stage, to pass the bill clause by clause, without debate. Then, the hon. member has the privilege to vote against Clause 5 if he is dissatisfied with the gist of it. He can only show his dissatisfaction by his vote. Therefore, I must at this time avoid other debates and, unless hon. members rise on points of order or procedure, I must call Clause 5.

[English]

Clause 5 agreed to: Yeas, 180; nays, 5.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. Chrétien) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I think the government House leader was in some doubt a couple of days ago about the business for tomorrow. Perhaps he might be able to enlighten the House tonight as to what we will be doing tomorrow.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to call two bills standing in the name of the Minister of Finance, Bill C-40 and Bill C-39, in that order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being after ten o'clock, pursuant to standing order the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
