GOVERNMENT ACTION TO WARN OF DANGERS OF KRAZY GLUE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I rise to propose a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that a commercial product extensively advertised on national television under the trade name "Krazy Glue" has proven dangerous to children and adults alike, as expressed by members of the medical profession and others, and by the very nature of its name totally excludes the damage aspect and fails to properly illustrate those dangers both on the packaging as well as their advertising, and in view of the fact that with every day serious injuries are incurred by children and others, indeed making this motion an urgent one, I, therefore, propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds):

That the government take the necessary steps to ensure that all advertising including TV contain warnings as to the dangerous qualities of this product and that the trade name "Krazy Glue" be changed in order to eliminate its present appeal to children.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As important a public matter as this may be, the hon. member will be aware that approximately two weeks ago another hon. member raised the matter through several questions in the House, and the minister who was questioned at that time was no doubt aware of the circumstances. I repeat that the subject matter may be important but I could scarcely hold that in view of the reference to this subject matter on that last occasion the matter still retains the urgency required under the rules.

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—REQUEST FOR COMMISSION TO STUDY CLAIMS OF EXPROPRIATED PARTIES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of obvious urgency and importance.

In view of the presence at noon today on Parliament Hill of hundreds of expropriated people from St. Scholastique who are angry at what they call the federal government's about-face with regard to them, and who are anxious, and rightly so, to be treated fairly and equitably, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey):

That a parliamentary commission be established to hear evidence from all parties involved, to study and review all relevant documents, and finally to recommend to the government and Parliament specific measures in order to give justice to those expropriated at St. Scholastique.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion can only be debated with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED STUDY OF PROCEDURE ON ORAL QUESTION PERIOD—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of extreme urgency and very great importance for the future of Parliament. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the standing committee on procedure meet in a special sitting to examine most carefully the procedure of this House respecting the oral question period, more particularly with respect to supplementary questions which seem to be too numerous and time-consuming during a period which could be used in a more productive way by members of the different opposition parties on major issues dealing with administration, and current events and that the said committee report to this House before the adjournment for the Christmas recess.

Mr. Speaker: Although the motion is moved pursuant to Standing Order 43 and although it deals with a matter of tremendous importance, I regret to say that, in my opinion, it is not exactly a matter of urgency but rather a matter of interest to all members and a relevant matter. I do not think it is an urgent matter under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

My colleague, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) moved that motion under Standing Order 43 to further specify the terms of reference given by parliamentary leaders on both sides of this House, through the

House of Commons

Chair, to the committee on procedure which will be sitting after the Christmas holidays. Mr. Speaker, I think that matter is extremely urgent, and there is also agreement between the four parties that the oral question period should also be reviewed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

My motion was made pursuant to Standing Order 43. I have always been under the impression that such motions required the unanimous consent of the House. Maybe I did not listen carefully enough, but was the unanimous consent of the House requested or was the decision made in another way?

● (1410)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. I was endeavouring to indicate to the hon. member that while his motion contained a subject matter of extreme importance, it was in my opinion more a matter of continuing concern such as other rules and procedures of the House which may be considered, which may be improved and which may be clarified at each session of every Parliament. Suggestions as to such improvements in the procedures of the House and the oral question period, as well as supplementary questions, are matters of continuing concern and therefore in my opinion, while this is an important matter, it cannot be used as a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to seek the consent of the House to set aside the ordinary business of the day. Accordingly, I rule it is not a proper question according to Standing Order 43.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I say that I understand quite well what you said in respect of the motion of my colleague from Bellechasse, but I know that any rule or any ruling can be changed with the consent of the House, whether you like it or not. So at this moment I think you should have asked the House whether the House is ready or not ready for that motion. That is what I think.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will remind the hon. member and the House one more time that notwithstanding the fact that a motion is presented to the House pursuant to Standing Order 43, and notwithstanding the fact that that rule envisages the unanimous consent of the House before debate is possible, the wording of the rule is as follows:

> A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent . . .

Therefore, I take it as a condition of a motion presented pursuant to Standing Order 43 not only that unanimous consent of the House be sought but in addition that it not only be an important matter as this is but that it be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which in my opinion this is not.

[Mr. Fortin.]

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO MAKE DESTRUCTION OF FOOD AN OFFENCE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-361, to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of food).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code in so far as the destruction of food is concerned so as to make it an indictable offence and therefore provide a penalty in cases where food fit for human consumption is destroyed. When this is done purposely as a form of protest, it becomes an immoral act in a world where so many people are in danger of starvation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

1. Did the government fail to publish an annual report of the Defence Services Pension Fund and, if so, for what reason?

2. Is any consideration being given by the government to investing the Defence Services Pension Fund monies into mortgages benefitting the contributors of the Pension Fund?

3. Who are the contributors of the Defence Services Pension Fund?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. The annual report of the Canadian Forces Superannuation Fund was tabled by the Minister of National Defence on October 3, 1974.

2. No. Since the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account is part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, there are no separate moneys available and therefore consideration cannot be given to investing moneys in mortgages.

3. The Government and every member of the Regular Force contribute under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act.

4. No. The Government contributes 1.8 times the members' contributions and, in addition, credits the account with interest and also assumes the responsibility for actuarial deficits as well as the amount considered necessary to provide for the increase in cost of benefits due to pay increases.

Question No. 18—Mr. Horner:

SOY BEAN MEAL

How much soy bean meal was used for human consumption in (a) 1973 (b) 1974 to date?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Soy bean meal is not used for human consumption but is used in livestock and poultry feeds. Soy bean meal can be further processed into isolates and protein concentrates which are used in human nutrition. There are no statistics available for human utilization in Canada but it is estimated that approximately 0.3% of Canadian production of soy beans is used in human nutrition in Canada, or approximately 25,200 cwt.

NATO—CANADIAN FINANCIAL AND PERSONNEL CONTRIBUTION

Question No. 82—Mr. Fortin:

1. For each year 1970 to 1973 inclusive, what was the financial contribution of the government to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO)?

2. How many Canadian soldiers were placed at the disposal of NATO (a) on a permanent basis (b) on a temporary basis each year (i) 1970 (ii) 1971 (iii) 1972 (iv) 1973?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Insofar as the Department of National Defence is concerned: 1. The financial contribution to NATO infrastructure and military budgets for the period 1970 to 1973 was as follows: 1970/71, $14,384,000; 1971/72, $13,834,000; 1972/73, $14,323,000; 1973/74, $21,000,000 (estimated) See Note: 1.

2. The number of Canadian Forces personnel placed at the disposal of NATO for the years indicated is as follows:

a. Permanent basis—

Year	Number Stationed in Germany	Number Serving on Nato Staffs	Total
1970	5,792	401	6,193
1972	5,092	234	5,326
1973	5,036	233	5,269

b. Temporary basis—

Year	Maritime Forces	Land and Air Forces	Total
1970	4,546	4,679	9,225
1971	4,536	5,215	9,751

NOTE: 1. The significantly higher contribution to NATO in 1973/74 was due to approximately $3,000,000 having been outstanding for 1972/73. This was caused by a new NATO policy of programming construction costs over a shorter time frame. Thus the contribution to NATO for the two fiscal years averaged: 1972/73, Approx. $17 million; 1973/74, Approx. $18 million.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): A reply to this question would require the review of personal files of every individual employed in the Public Service of Canada. In view of the workload involved, the Government does not feel justified in undertaking such a review. Employees of the Privy Council Office have always been members of the Public Service. The remaining individuals described in the question may have been members of the Public Service on leave of absence, while attached to the Office of the Prime Minister, a Minister or Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons and thereafter returned to public service assignments. The exempt staff of the Prime Minister, Ministers, the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, Leader of the government in the Senate or Leader of the Opposition in the Senate may be appointed to the Public Service under Section 37 of the Public Service Employment Act. Parts (3) and (4) of Section 37 set out the "Rights on termination of employment" of such employees while part (5) assigns the determination of the "Order of appointments to the Public Service Commission". The statutory base for appointments to Ministers' office dates from 1918 "Civil Service Act". In 1929, the 1918 Act was amended to include appointments to the office of Leader of the Opposition plus an amendment dealing with appointment of such individuals to the Public Service on termination of exempt employment. In addition to the appointment procedure set out in Section 37 of the Public Service Employment Act, any person may apply for Public Service employment and if vacancies exist, selection proceeds via normal Public Service Commission selection processes.

MASON JARS AND LIDS

Question No. 300—Mr. Whittaker:

How many companies in Canada produce masonry jars and lids for home canning (a) do they produce both items for sales individually (b) what percentage of their production is sold outside Canada (c) what has been their total production of these items in the past five years, by year?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Two companies produce glass Mason jars in Canada. These are Consumers Glass Company Limited and Dominion Glass Company Limited. These companies buy the lids and rings from Anchor Cap and Closure Corporation of Canada Limited and/or Bernardin of Canada Limited. The glass companies ship the Mason jars complete with lids to their distributors. The lid and ring manifacturers in addition to supplying the glass companies also supply the replacement market. The Mason jar and lid manufacturers do not export these products. Production statistics are not published. However, the two Mason jar manufacturers have advised the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that their current combined production is about 8.5 million jars per year, and 1974 production was higher than in any of the four preceeding years. The companies also advise that, in the past, certain market areas, i.e. British Columbia, have been inacessible to them because of U.S. imports.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The Marine and Ferry Branch of the Ministry of Transport engaged Swan Wooster Engineering Company Limited to study the existing ferry terminal facilities at North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and to recommend a program of development that would enable the terminal to adequately handle the traffic offering until the year 2000.

2. The final report has not yet been received from the consultant, but based on the draft already submitted to the Ministry of Transport the final report will recommend the construction of a new stern loading dock, parking lot and passenger facilities in 1975/76, and the construction of various administrative buildings and additional stern loading facilities in a phased program over an eight year period.

3. The contracted cost of the study was $43,000. The study was carried out by 13 professional/technical staff members of the consulting engineering firm and its Nova Scotia associates.

PERSONS IN SPECIAL POSITIONS TO A MINISTER 1963-68 WHO HAVE MOVED TO OTHER POSITIONS

Question No. 525—Mr. Dinsdale:

What were the names of all persons who held the position of executive assistant, special assistant, private secretary, consultant and/or advisor, or any other special capacity to a Minister since the commencement of the 26th Parliament in 1963, and the end of the 27th Parliament in 1968, who have moved from that position to the Public Service or to Governor in Council appointments and, in each case (a) to what position did they move (b) at what salary?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): The government does not maintain records which would enable it to trace the subsequent careers of those who at one time served ministers in the capacities listed. In order to answer this question, it would be necessary to review the personal files of every individual employed in the Public Service of Canada. In view of the workload involved, the government does not feel justified in undertaking such a review. See also reply to Question No. 159 answered this day.

NAMES OF PEOPLE WHO HELD SPECIAL POSITIONS TO MINISTERS AND WHO HAVE MOVED TO THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 526—Mr. Dinsdale:

What were the names of all persons who held the position of executive assistant, special assistant, private secretary, consultant and/or advisor, or any other special capacity to a Minister since the commencement of the 28th Parliament in 1968, who have moved from that position to the Public Service or to Governor in Council appointments and, in each case (a) to what position did they move (b) at what salary?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): See reply to Question 525 answered this day.

*STATUES OF FORMER PRIME MINISTERS

Question No. 544—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Did the government commission statues of the Rt. Hon. Richard Bennett and the Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen for the purpose of having them placed on Parliament Hill?

2. On what dates were these statues completed?

3. Where are these now being stored?

4. For what reason have they not been placed on Parliament Hill?

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. Mr. Speaker, as regards the Right Hon. Richard Bennett, the answer is no. As regards the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the answer is yes.

2. The artist's design proposal for the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett statue submitted in the fall of 1969 was not approved. The statue of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was completed in June of 1970.

3. The statue of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen is in storage at Plouffe Park, Ottawa, the Department of Public Works storage area.

4. No decision has been reached as yet. The matter is under study and a decision should be reached before the landscaping season next spring.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Bring on the landscapers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REASON FOR COMMITTING CANADA TO SUPPLY ONE MILLION TONS OF GRAIN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and it is with regard to the proposal made in Rome by the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning aid in the form of grain. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why it was felt sufficient for the Canadian government to make a proposal to increase our grain aid to a level that is still well below that of 1970-71 and 1971-72 although the need and the general level of starvation has greatly increased? We like to look at OPEC countries and suggest that they have created great problems by increasing the price of oil, but we must recognize that there are great problems for food importing countries by virtue of the increase in the price of grain.

● (1420)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I reply to this question as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. The various countries present at the world food conference were asked to make pledges. They were asked as a collectivity to pledge ten million tons of grain annually during the next three years. The government of Canada looked at this request very carefully and came to the conclusion that a proportion that would indicate Canada's willingness to help would be 10 per cent, which is about one million tons per year. Never in the past, of course, have we supplied one million tons a year every year for three years. It may be that we will be able to supply more, but we felt that was a constructive contribution to the world food conference and one we hoped other countries would follow.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the decision to make the commitment for one million tons a year was based upon an estimate of the inventory surplus or some other consideration?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I have explained, it was based upon the request to which we were responding and as I say, if we are in a position to supply more than one million tons out of our surplus, we have not closed the door to that. We felt we should make a positive response, however. No other country in the world has made as positive a response as Canada has to meet this world problem.

Mr. Fairweather: They have not spoken yet.

[Mr. Reid.]

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH A GRAIN BANK

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the opposition): One further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, relating to the attitude of the government of Canada to the proposal that a grain bank be established by the food exporting countries. Are we to take it that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has committed Canada to this proposal? Has the government of Canada endorsed this idea and has it prepared concrete proposals on how such a grain bank could be established?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think I would prefer to wait until my colleague returns from Rome. Negotiations are continuing and I know he has instructions to do everything that Canada can do to help meet the very serious problems now facing the world. It is probably the most serious problem the world has ever faced in this field.

An hon. Member: Why don't you lend-lease Otto?

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBILITY OF CURTAILING OTHER AID PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL FOOD AID

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated in Rome that the government has allocated some $50 million out of our total aid spending to cure what he calls food problems in the world, may I ask if that involves any increase in the government's total aid budget? If it does, what existing aid programs is the government contemplating cutting to provide the additional food aid?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question was examined at great length in this House, in cabinet and in cabinet committee. An undertaking to supply about one million tons of grain annually, if it is in the form of food, represents an enormous increase in the funds put at the disposal of the countries of the world for food aid. We have been looking at the rest of the program to see whether this would involve us in having to cut back within the limits that we have established for our aid programs as a whole. We believe it will be possible to finance this increase in food aid within the three year period providing we can, with the support of parliament, increase the total amount of aid by perhaps 15 per cent each year.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBILITY OF CANADA SUPPLYING FERTILIZER AND OTHER AGRICULTURAL AIDS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): May I ask a final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the President of the Canadian International Development Agency has been quoted as saying that Canada, because of inflation and rising prices, will not be able to provide as much aid to third world countries as was provided formerly, and as fertilizer is in short supply in underdeveloped countries, will the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether Canada is considering providing additional aid, such as fertilizer and high energy agricultural input aids, besides grain?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, dealing with the first part of the question, I hope members of the House noticed that when my colleague made his statement in Rome, he said that physical amounts of food are needed, not money. That is why Canada undertook to supply one million tons of grain every year for three years, instead of so many millions of dollars. That is the most practical response we can make. We are also pledging additional money to help in supplying other products which we may not be in the position to supply physically ourselves but which may be needed.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF SUGAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT CONSUMER

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. An Ottawa man called the office of our parliamentary leader yesterday to say he had purchased a 10-pound bag of sugar in Ottawa one morning this week for $5.49 and had returned to the store one hour later to find that the price had jumped to $6.29, with no price being posted on the sugar, and as the price had gone up by 80 cents in one hour, can the minister indicate what action he is taking to protect consumers from this type of price gouging. Can he say whether he plans to take action to overcome the excessively high price of sugar in this country?

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that the price of sugar has increased so much. The government will probably announce soon its sugar policy. As for the profiteering mentioned by the hon. member, I plan to introduce a bill very soon and I hope that this time the hon. member and his party will support it.

TRADE

EXPIRATION OF INTERNATIONAL SUGAR AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RENEGOTIATE AGREEMENT OR NEGOTIATE WITH CUBA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the international sugar agreement expired in December, 1973, what action has the Canadian government taken in trying to renegotiate that international agreement? Can the minister also tell the House whether he is negotiating a bilateral agreement between Cuba and ourselves for a guaranteed supply of sugar for this country.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions aimed at getting the international sugar negotiations under way again. I cannot give the hon. member an up-to-date account of the status of those negotiations but I will be pleased to make inquiries and give that information to him and to the House.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary question. As we import almost no sugar from Cuba, can the minister say whether he is involved in negotiations with that country in order to supply people in this country with Cuban sugar which would be guaranteed as to price and supply.

Mr. Gillespie: No, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Why not?

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH DELEGATION OF EXPROPRIATED PARTIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport.

At midday, a fairly important delegation of expropriated people from St.-Scholastique asked the government to review their requests. They do not demand preferential treatment, but merely ask to be treated on an equal basis with the people from Pickering. May I ask if the government or the ministers concerned meet at noon-time with the representatives of that delegation, Mrs. Lafond and Mr. Raymond, and if they agreed on some sort of agreement to ensure fair treatment for the expropriated people from St.-Scholastique?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, expropriation matters in St.-Scholastique are obviously under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Public Works. As for the number of people from St.-Scholastique whose situation has not been cleared yet, I think there are hardly a hundred left out of the original 3,000. All other cases have been settled, either through court decisions, or by mutual agreement, and I might ask my hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works if he believes people have been treated unfairly.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The Minister of Transport says his colleague should answer my question. I would therefore like to hear the answer of the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, all I can tell the hon. member is I shall be meeting that delegation next Friday.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE RIGHTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—TEST CASE CONCERNING DEFINITION OF INLAND WATERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the minister say whether in fact there are areas off Vancouver Island, such as inland waters, that were explicitly excluded from the test case put before the Supreme Court in 1967?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check the record on so specific a question.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I understand a new test case is to be put. I would like to know whether the federal government will be supporting the position of the province of British Columbia or opposing it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I gather the test case would relate to the inland waters as defined by that judgment. I think we will need to have further information on the exact relief being sought, particularly if the court has defined an area of inland waters which would be under provincial jurisdiction. It would be in our interests to work out with the province the exact demarcation of the two.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

LOANSHARKING—REASON FOR NOT CHARGING OFFENDERS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. According to an RCMP superintendent, there is ample evidence now in police hands about loansharking activities in southern Ontario, but because loansharking as such is not an offence under the Criminal Code, no charges are being brought. However, lending money at exorbitant rates is a breach of the federal Small Loans Act and is a punishable offence. What does the government intend to do in order to help smash these organized crime operations and, in particular, what is the minister going to do to remind the enforcement agencies of the requirements of bringing a prosecution under that act?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government will introduce in the next few days a bill to amend the Act and deal precisely with those cases mentioned by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice in relation to offences under the act which are now taking place. Does the minister have any information and is any suggestion going out to the enforcement agencies about offences under existing legislation?

[Mr. Drury.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is of course our constant policy with regard to federal statutes and offences within them to examine the manner in which they are being obeyed and to investigate whether it seems appropriate to lay charges, whether the investigations indicate that is the proper method.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING CONTINGENCY PLAN FOR OIL SPILL ON WEST COAST

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. Several times in past weeks I have asked the minister whether she could table in the House a copy of the contingency plans her department has in the case of a major oil spill on the west coast. Is the minister now prepared to table such a plan?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, for some time now, hon. members opposite have been pressing me to table the plans to be carried out in the event of oil spills on the west coast.

I have tried to make them understand that I do not have any specific plan but rather contingency plans suitable for all kinds of circumstances, whether they be oil spills at sea or on land, on the east or the west coast, or spills of toxic substances on land. We have a system under which all the means at our disposal are coordinated by computer and can be adapted to any circumstance. To give an example of the efficiency of this plan—because I was pretty sure that the hon. member would ask further questions—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order; order, please.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I therefore made an inquiry about a hypothetical accident on the west coast. I got an answer and if I unrolled it, it would stretch from here to the hon. member's chair. I will use the usual means and send a messenger to hand it to him.

USE OF CANADA'S FRESH WATER SUPPLIES BY UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact no government policy has been stated in this House regarding the use of Canada's fresh water supplies by the United States, and in view of the fact that you have and are aware of—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Wenman: —a firm policy statement on the export of Canadian water prepared and in files in your office—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Wenman: —why have you not presented this to the House? When will you do so, who is stopping you from presenting this to the House?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In addition to reminding the hon. member that his question is argumentative, I might point out I have refrained from reminding hon. members of the fact that all questions and remarks in this chamber are traditionally put to the Chair and not directly to the person who is being questioned. I refrained from doing that at the beginning of the session in order to allow hon. members time to acquaint themselves with the procedures, but it might be well now to remind hon. members of that.

Mr. Wenman: Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister to answer my question.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I am terribly sorry, but I was busy giving the document to the messenger and I really did not hear the beginning of the question. I wonder if the hon. member would mind repeating it or rather shortening it.

Mr. Wenman: In view of the fact no government policy has been stated in the House regarding the use of Canada's fresh water supplies by the United States, and in view of the fact that you have and are aware of—

PICKERING—PURPOSE OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—REASON FOR ADVERTISING POSITIONS AT AIRPORT

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister whether the purpose of the Airport Inquiry Commission's hearings was to determine, in light of any new evidence, whether or not a second international airport was needed for the Toronto area. If this is the case, can the minister then explain why advertisements for positions at the new airport facility have appeared in various newspapers when the commission has not yet submitted its final report?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I missed the first part of the question. It obviously refers to the airport at Pickering. Of course, I still do not have this report. I will not have it before the end of December.

Mr. Beatty: As the minister missed part of my question, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be permitted to repeat it. May I ask the minister whether the purpose of the Airport Inquiry Commission's hearings was to determine, in light of any new evidence, whether or not a second international airport was needed for the Toronto area. If this is the case, can the minister then explain why advertisements for positions at the new airport facility have appeared in various newspapers when the commission has not yet submitted its final report?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference of the commission have been tabled in the House. It is not up to me to interpret them. I think the hon. member can do that himself.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister decided to continue the moratorium on rail branch line abandonment? If not, has any decision been made and what is it?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no decision has yet been made. It will have to be made very soon because we are committed to maintaining the branch lines until December 31. Therefore, we will have to make a decision very shortly.

● (1440)

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It has been reported that the government will consult with the grains council on which lines will be abandoned. Has the government also agreed to hold extensive talks with the provincial governments on any rail line abandonments, and has the government agreed in principle to provide financial assistance to the provinces for highway inprovements which would be required in the event that the railways were shut down?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, this decision has to be made by the Governor in Council. The Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the Wheat Board, made some formal statement on this and I think he is the one who can probably answer the hon. gentleman's question.

POSSIBLE REVIVAL OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. In view of the fact that both CN and CP are supposed to have plans to propose to the minister regarding reconciliation of rail transportation problems, I wonder whether the minister has seen those plans and read them and is able to advise the House if any recommendation was made to revive rail transportation passenger service in the province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I have not seen them yet, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTORS—CONSIDERATION OF SAFEGUARDS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the report that Canada has placed a moratorium on a dozen proposed uranium export contracts and that discussions with South Korea on the sale of a CANDU nuclear reactor have also ground to a halt pending a nuclear safeguards policy by the government, would the minister advise the House whether a similar moratorium has been placed on the proposed sale of a CANDU reactor to Argentina?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the contract has already been executed with Argentina and it is at a different stage from the contract with Korea. However, the government of Canada and the International Atomic Energy Agency are both now in the process of negotiation with the government of Argentina respecting satisfactory safeguards. The sale to Argentina will be dependent upon the conclusion of an effective safeguards arrangement between the agency and Canada and that country.

Mr. Leggatt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the government finally comes to a conclusion regarding those safeguards, will this House be given an opportunity to debate their efficiency or effectiveness, and will the minister table the regulations or decisions that have been made regarding the safeguards policy for the consideration of this House.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, a statement of policy of that kind would certainly be made in the House.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR BETTER PRICES FOR PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

At the end of the 1974 election campaign, it was reported that a group of Liberal ministers promised that, if reelected, the Liberal government would take steps, the day after July 8, to increase the price of industrial milk, and that such a price hike would be adequate to cover rising production costs.

Does the Prime Minister feel the prices now received by industrial milk producers are adequate to cover all production costs and leave a reasonable profit to encourage them to keep producing milk?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, the question calls for an opinion statement. The government, of course, feels it is doing the right thing; as regards that part of the question that may seek information from the government, I am taking note of it.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I did not criticize what has been done, I merely asked if it was possible to do more. My supplementary is this: in order to prevent industrial milk producers from finding themselves in the same critical condition now faced by beef producers, can the Prime Minister give assurance to this House that measures guaranteeing this group of producers a fair and decent return will be introduced very soon?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can expect the usual answer, that any measures would be announced the usual way in this House.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONSUMERS RECEIVE BENEFIT OF PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN GRADE A AND GRADE C BEEF

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What action does his department take in periods such as this, when the price paid to producers for C grade beef is considerably lower than that paid for A grade beef, to see that this differential is passed on to the consumers and that C grade beef is not being sold at A grade prices?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, officials of my department and members of the board chaired by Mrs. Plumptre are presently studying the issue. REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STUDY BY C. L. DUDLEY INDICATING DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES INEFFECTUAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RELOCATION OF NEW INDUSTRIES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It would appear that the conclusions of a recent study by Professor C. L. Dudley of the University of Ottawa's department of geography and regional planning indicate that the regional development incentives of the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion have been ineffectual in inducing manufacturers to establish new plants in the nation's economically depressed areas. The study goes on to say that while increased business activity may have been stimulated and new jobs created, in many cases this growth is marginal and tends to serve those industries already located within the depressed regions.

Will the minister please explain to the House why so few attempts have been made to relocate new industries, which would far better serve to stimulate the over-all growth and development of these depressed regions than by further subsidizing traditional industry groups?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the last half of the question first, obviously the main reason we have not sought to relocate industry is that hon. members on both sides of the House would be properly opposed to such a policy of moving industry from one location to another. As for the findings of the study, I have not seen them in detail, but may I say that, by and large, regarding our not being able to persuade certain kinds of industry to locate in slow growth areas I can make the same comment that I have made several times previously, namely that this is one of the problems with the program that we are seeking to try to correct.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO STIMULATE MARKETS

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In response to questions previously put to him regarding the depressed state of the lumber industry in Canada, the minister replied that his department is studying the situation and will be making recommendations. Is the minister prepared today to inform the House what action his department is planning to alleviate some of these very serious problems?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have been examining this question in some considerable depth but our study is not yet completed. I do not expect to have any announcement this week, but as soon as a decision has been taken I will announce it in the House, which is the appropriate place.

AIR TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF POSSIBLE DEFICIT OF AIR CANADA ON DEVELOPMENT OF REGIONAL AND THIRD LEVEL CARRIERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Knowing that the Minister of Transport is keeping the financial affairs of Air Canada under his keen scrutiny, I should like to ask him whether in his opinion the anticipated deficit of Air Canada will have any adverse effects on the orderly development of regional air and third level air carriers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): My answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacKay: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have been in some difficulty two or three times this afternoon with questions that are really seeking either a very general expression of opinion or a general expression of government policy. I have tried not to interfere with those questions and have let them be posed, but I have moved away from allowing a supplementary question. If this kind of question is going to be put, then I think it is fair that hon. members ought not to expect to ask a supplementary. When a question of a general nature is asked, hon. members will have to expect a general reply. In this case perhaps the hon. member would be more specific.

● (1450)

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of abusing the privileges of the House, but perhaps I did not put the question as well as I should have. I was really rising on a point of order as I did not catch the minister's reply. I did not hear what he said.

AIR CANADA

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF BASE AT WINNIPEG—DATE OF COMPLETION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the vice-president of Air Canada said in Winnipeg that Air Canada did not propose to build the base in Winnipeg until 1979. In light of the Prime Minister's statement in Winnipeg during the election campaign, I wonder whether that date meets with his approval?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the statement but I imagine it is true in so far as it represents Air Canada's intentions until the time the government asks it to accelerate the date.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister give the people of Winnipeg any indication as to when that base will be completed and operating?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I attempted to answer this a few days ago and the Minister of Transport also replied to the question previously.

IMMIGRATION

DETENTION OF TWO POLISH FAMILIES AT NIAGARA FALLS—REQUEST FOR REFUGEE STATUS AND INQUIRY AS TO USE OF FORGED DOCUMENTS

Mr. Roger Young (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerning the detention of two Polish families who attempted to cross from Canada to the United States at Niagara Falls last week, were refused entry thereto, returned to Canada and detained for first having entered this country illegally after escaping from Poland by means of forged papers or other identity cards. Will the minister and his officials take all necessary steps to determine as soon as possible whether these two families might be granted refugee status and, secondly, will he have his officials investigate the means by which, and the sources from whom such fraudulent papers may have been obtained so that those who would unscrupulously profit from such activities may be apprehended, and in order that people who would sincerely wish to immigrate to this country might not jeopardize their rights or privileges to make proper legal application?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Kaminski family has applied to remain in Canada as refugees. Their case was referred to the interdepartmental committee on Monday and will be examined in detail as to the validity of that claim. Of course, if there is a favourable decision from that committee that settles the matter. If not, they then would have access to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board. I can assure the House that their story will be very carefully examined and a decision will be based on the merits of the case.

In respect of the other family, I am in some difficulty because the head of the household of that family has disappeared and we would have to contact him before we could find out what case he may or may not wish to present.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IMPACT ON MUNICIPALITY OF POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF BASE AT MONCTON—CONSULTATION WITH MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of National Defence I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the talk of cutbacks and/or cutouts in the Department of National Defence, will the minister please inform the House whether he or his staff have had any discussions with the municipal authorities, the chamber of commerce and the labour council in the Moncton area with regard to the economic impact of possible closure or the reduction of Canadian Forces Base Moncton, resulting in layoffs and general economic effects on the community and the Moncton region generally?

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question directly. I am not aware of any discussions but I will check this out and get some information for the hon. member.

IMMIGRATION

HAITI—PROGRAM FOR ENCOURAGEMENT OF FRANCOPHONE IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the indication in the minister's short statement on immigration that he would encourage Francophone immigration, and in view of his own expression about Haitians, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he has mounted any special program to recruit immigrants form Haiti, who of course are Francophones, and, if so, can he state in a general way what that program is?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think to illustrate that, in spite of the difficulties that face Haitians who are coming to Canada on an illegal basis, I should put on record that for the first six months of the current year we have accepted 1,790 regular immigrants from Haiti; for the same period only 1,398 from France, and it is possible that the total for the year 1974 of legitimate immigrants into this country from Haiti will run to 3,500 as compared with 2,178 for 1973 and 836 for 1972. I think that is an indication of our willingness to process and deal favourably with applications that are made in a legitimate manner and in accordance with the rules, regulations and laws of this country.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I was not asking the minister about his willingness to accept immigrants from Haiti, I asked him whether he has mounted any special recruitment program consistent with his policy of recruiting Francophone immigrants generally?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, an office was opened at Port-au-Prince a year and a half ago, which I think is an indication of our long-standing desire, and it is my hope that we can find ways and means to improve recruitment of Francophone immigrants to Canada, hopefully to Quebec.

ELECTION EXPENSES

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question and perhaps one short supplementary to the secretary of the Privy Council.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. To my knowledge there is no secretary to the Privy Council present in the House.

Mr. Dick: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I intended that my question be directed to the President of the Privy Council. Thank you very kindly. I had no intention of demoting the minister.

In view of the fact it has been some ten days since it was drawn to the attention of this House that there has been a flagrant abuse of the Election Expenses Act, I believe an immoral exploitation of a loophole, such that provincial political party associations are going to reap benefits which were not intended, does the President of the Privy Council have any intention of introducing amendments to close up this loophole and stop the exploitation of the federal Election Expenses Act by the NDP or other political parties?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have been reviewing the operations of the Election Expenses Act and I think it will be necessary to bring revisions before the House. The hon. member may be aware that one member on the Liberal side, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, already has a private bill on the order paper for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for one short supplementary.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, is the introduction of this bill being delayed as a government bill because of the fact that on October 28, 1974, on Liberal party of Ontario stationery over the signature of the president Jeffrey King, individuals were being asked to donate to the provincial party in the same manner—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I do hope, however, that hon. members on the other side of the House will co-operate in dealing with measures to clear the order paper so I can deal with this matter.

TRANSPORT

ASSURANCE AS TO AVAILABILITY OF CATTLE CARS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in view of the drastic drop in cattle prices and the demand for feeder cattle in eastern Canada, can the Minister of Transport assure the House and the country that he and his department will make every effort to encourage both railways to make all possible livestock cars available in western Canada? We have the cattle and we want to move them but there is a shortage of cars right now. Will the minister's department assure the House and the country that they will make every effort to get these stock cars into western Canada to move the cattle?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will make every effort that can be made in these circumstances.

HOUSING

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON HOUSING FOR NATIVE AND RURAL FAMILIES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Could the minister tell the House if an agreement has been entered into with the government of the province of Quebec under the National Housing Act providing for the construction or the purchasing of housing facilities for rural and native families?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have signed agreements with the province of Quebec. I would have to check the precise details in relation to the question, but it covers the broad range of housing available in other provinces and this is a great step forward for the province of Quebec and for Canada.

INQUIRY AS TO REINTRODUCTION OF BILL C-134 PROVIDING LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

During the last Parliament, the Minister of State responsible for Urban Affairs introduced Bill C-134 providing for the continuation of the National Housing Act concerning loans to municipalities; does the minister intend to re-introduce that legislation in the course of this session?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker; this bill will be re-introduced.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING BY SECRETARY OF STATE IN OFFERING FLAGS TO MEMBERS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question, through you, to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the action taken under the Combines Investigation Act which resulted in General Mills Canada Limited being fined for misleading advertising of pewter beer mugs which were in fact made of aluminum, an offer described by the Justice Department's prosecutor as untrue, misleading and deceptive, will the minister now initiate an action against the Secretary of State, his seatmate, for misleading advertising contained in a letter offering Canadian flags to all Members of Parliament. This letter states that the small flag is on a "gold plated desk set mounting" when in fact it is only gold-coloured plastic.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should think that the hon. member can refuse such an offer if he so wishes.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

ALLEGATION CORPORATION FAVOURS CERTAIN REGIONS IN MAKING PURCHASES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services of which I have given him notice with regard to the Canadian Commercial Corporation. In view of the fact that of the orders placed by this company with Canadian companies six out of ten provinces received less than 5 per cent of the business of this company and eight out of ten of the provinces received less than 15 per cent of the business of this company, can the minister advise the House whether any action is being taken by the government to bring this corporation in line with announced government policy to promote government business across Canada.

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern of my hon. friend. As a matter of fact the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation should be put in the perspective of the total purchasing power of my department. Having that in mind, we acquired last year in British Columbia four per cent of our total needs in goods and services. This is not enough. This is the reason why next week I am going to Vancouver to open a new regional office in order to do more business in British Columbia and in western Canada generally.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister. I was not as concerned about British Columbia as the maritime provinces which are receiving a lot less than their share of the action. Is the government taking any action to make sure this business is spread equally across Canada and especially in the maritimes which are not as rich as the rest of Canada.

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, of course in our purchasing activities we must bear in mind the total industrial output. My department cannot create industries in different regions. This is why we must maximize our purchasing power by regions having in mind their total industrial output.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—TABLING OF STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great importance of the subject matter I wonder if Your Honour would inquire of the House whether it would give consent to revert to motions so that the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs might table a very important statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Rome so all members would be in possession of the facts which would supplement the unusually very terse and abbreviated nature of the answers by the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I have the permission of the House I would be very happy to table a copy. I have only one copy and I understand the rules require that two copies be tabled, one in French. I have only one copy in the English language but I shall undertake to have both copies laid on the table. I present one copy now in English.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, why do we not make it an appendix to Hansard.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has just been brought to my attention, as parliamentary leader of the Social Credit Party in the House, that you made the following reply to the Leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), as reported in the Hansard of November 4, and I quote:

The hon. member for Témiscamingue will note, I am sure, that there are exactly five creditist members in the House at this time. I intend to recognize a second creditist member during the question period. This, to my mind, is a fair proportion under the circumstances.

I have perused our Standing Orders, as well as Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice and Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, 4th Edition, to ascertain what the Speaker's powers are as to the counting of hon. members. The only reference I have found is the case of an hon. member inquiring whether there is quorum. Mr. Speaker, considering that you took the liberty to count the members of our party who were present in the House at the time to justify the number of questions allowed, I feel it is within my rights and privileges, as parliamentary leader, to explain why there were only five of us present in the House. Four hon. members were representing fellow citizens involved in arbitration awards of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, while the other two were attending a committee meeting. Mr. Speaker, I feel that our 11 members carry their share of the load as well as any other party and that this practice of counting hon. members should cease forthwith.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind the hon. member that it was not the Chair that raised the subject. The hon. member for Témiscamingue raised the question of whether or not one of his colleagues ought to be recognized during the question period. My reply was simply to indicate I was trying to maintain a proportion between the various parties in this House. There were at the moment five members of his party to whom he referred present in the House. I indicated I had the intention of recognizing a second member during the question period, which I did, and that two out of five for Ralliement des Créditistes in proportion to the attendance of other parties in the House was absolutely just in the circumstances bearing in mind—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —that two members of the Ralliement des Créditistes out of five members represents 40 per cent. If the Chair were to recognize 40 per cent of the New Democratic Party and 40 per cent of the Conservative Party at the same time, there would not be enough time, to say nothing of government members seeking to be recognized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I say only that my reference to the number of members of Ralliement des Créditistes present in the House was not my idea but was raised by the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Further to that question of privilege, I can understand that you could say then that there were only five of us in the House. When the Chair allowed us three questions, for instance, during the question period, we never complained; the Chair did so willingly. But the other day, being told that there were only five of us was insulting. The number of members in the House, Mr. Speaker, and I am very serious in pointing it out to you, is our business. I doubt that the Chair counts the number of hon. members present each day before deciding how many questions will be allowed the Conservatives or the New Democrats.

Last Monday, the NDP had six members in the House and we had five. To my knowledge, in 16 years, the Chair has never said to the House: There are so many members in the House; you are therefore entitled to this or that many questions. The Chair has made its little point—

● (1510)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might point out to the hon. member that I was perfectly aware on the day in question of the fact that there were exactly six members of the NDP in the House, that is the difference between the two parties at the moment, and the leader of the NDP did not ask me why they were not recognized. I have heard questions from their members. I recognized exactly two from their party and two from the Ralliement des Créditistes, which I felt was more than just in the circumstances in relation to all hon. members present.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I simply wish to let you know that twice you have called us the Ralliement des Créditistes. This is not our name at all. We are the Parti Crédit social du Canada, The Social Credit Party of Canada.

So I respectfully request that you call us by our name from now on.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my point of order relates to an answer which I have just received to a question on the order paper which will be recorded in Hansard which, I believe, certainly inadvertently misleads the House. My question had been to seek the names and positions of those people who had served in the political offices of ministers of the Crown since 1963 who are now in the public service or the agencies. The answer in the reply of the President of the Privy Council indicated:

A reply to this question would require the review of personal files of every individual in the Public Service of Canada.

I submit that that is not correct. An alternative method to proceed would have been—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I seriously question whether the hon. member has a legitimate point of order. He has received a reply. Whether or not he questions the quality of that reply is not a point of order in this Chamber.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised the point as to whether or not the statement tabled by the President of the Privy Council should be appended to today's Hansard. I took it that since there was no objection to that, it was agreed that that would be done.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

VETERANS' LAND ACT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF TERMINAL DATE OF PROGRAM

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to review the terminal date of March 31, 1975, now specified in the Veterans' Land Act, and to report thereon to the House within the time limit set out in chapter 3 of the Statutes of 1974.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, on the eve of the solemn ceremonies of November 11 I rise with pleasure and pride to participate in this debate on the Veterans' Land Act on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and so ably supported by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). But I do so with certain misgivings because of the broken commitments by this government, especially with regard to veterans and the armed forces. It was for that reason that I indicated last evening, before calling it ten o'clock, that I could not share the confidence of my friend, the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), who preceded me in the debate.

I suggest that in a manner of speaking this whole debate is a comment, and not a very favourable one, on the government's credibility and reliability. A year ago we started out with unanimity. That unanimity has been wearing away, and now we find the government backing off. In veterans affairs, as in so many other areas, the government seems determined to run roughshod over the demands of this House. It lacks respect for this House.

Only yesterday we observed an example of the roughshod manner in which the government treats this House. As a relatively new member of the House I was literally appalled at seeing the government House leader, and then another prominent member of the government, rise to question a ruling of Mr. Speaker. I had been led to believe that that was just not done. However, we observed it yesterday; we saw once again the manner in which the government is prepared to ride over the rules of the House, and is trying to run the House for its own convenience.

What do we observe today in relation to this debate? We see the unanimous consent of the House of a year ago being reneged. A year ago almost to the day, on November 9 to be exact, as we were reminded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, this House agreed unanimously to a motion under Standing Order 43 to have the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) re-examine the Veterans' Land Act with a view to extending the deadline for applications for benefits under the act. This was a unanimous agreement, let me emphasize.

What do we hear now? We hear vague hints and suggestions and what I would like to describe as weasel-word promises, and a gradual withdrawal by the government from a position it held as a minority government in a delicately balanced House. It is withdrawing from that position because it now has a majority. Could we suggest that member's of the government agreed a year ago to this study simply to build up their credibility in an election that they knew would have to come soon? Now that they are in a majority position, we hear a different song. I suggest that this is characteristic of this government led by this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

We saw it yesterday, and we heard it today also. Yesterday we heard the minister back away from his position. My comments are not directed toward the minister in person—I want to make that clear. I have great respect for him and his personal devotion to the veterans. But he is not supported by his government led by this Prime Minister. I feel that the minister has been compelled to back down by the failure of his colleagues to give him the support he needs in cabinet. I think that this is reprehensible. They have ganged up on him. Withdrawing from earlier commitments is all too characteristic of the government.

We have heard the promises made during the election campaign, promises that are now being repudiated, promises of public funds spent to the tune of about half a billion dollars which are now being repudiated. We have heard the promises of the government, and we know they are not to be relied on, Mr. Speaker. It promised us a new and better bill to help veterans. This is now being hinted at across the House, and we are being asked to accept that promise.

As an example of the broken promises offered by this government let me draw your attention to the conditions in the veterans' hospital in Victoria where many of my constituents go for treatment. This is the hospital where they used to get the treatment they deserved, but where now they are treated with something just bordering on contempt. They are a nuisance in that hospital now, whereas once they commanded respect. Under this government the veterans' hospital in Victoria was handed over to the province a month ago, with catastrophic and disastrous results. I should like to put some detail on the record which reached me on Monday of this week as the result of experiences at the hospital over the past weekend.

The staff, which had been under the jurisdiction of the Department of Veterans Affairs, was given the option of alternative employment or early retirement. Those who decided to stay on have been offered alternative employment. In fact this means that former administrators are being asked to perform tasks which, compared to their former employment, can only be considered demeaning. Instead of helping in the administration of that hospital they are now being asked to carry messages from building to building, in the hope that their self-respect will wither and they will take early retirement. This is not the sort of treatment they thought they were going to get when the hospital was handed over to the province.

There are only two doctors left in the hospital. Once there were six. My friend who spoke to me about these matters on the telephone the day before yesterday was obliged to call on a chest specialist to examine him because the chest specialist who had been at the hospital was no longer in attendance. The doctors who were in attendance were so occupied they could not offer him the treatment he required. Where, I ask you, but in a veterans' hospital, with the history of how they became veterans and the circumstances of why they went there known to the staff, is it more likely that a chest specialist should be in attendance? Is this living up to a commitment?

The laboratories have been moved, and even wheel chair cases are obliged to go from one building to another for laboratory tests. Is this living up to a commitment? Electrocardiogram equipment has been removed from the veterans' hospital and patients who require this, although they are not expected to run, have to go to the other hospital to get electrocardiogram readings. I submit this is reneging on a commitment.

The chronically ill, those known as 29ers, are no longer able to eat in the dining room in the veterans' hospital. Even those in wheelchairs have been told to go to a much smaller accommodation known as the board room.

These are simple evidences from one person, Mr. Speaker, and I know I can get others. As far as I am concerned, they are evidences of the government's attitude toward those who saw their duty in wars in which Canada was involved. I find it disgraceful. These men are being repudiated by the leaders of the government just as the government is now reneging on the commitment of earlier governments to veterans under the VLA. As it is reneging on the commitment it gave to the veterans just a year ago by its association in the unanimous consent accorded on that occasion to a motion, so now it is reneging on the whole operation and hinting at other better legislation.

Some of those opposite who have spoken in this debate, such as the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn), may be inclined to believe the promises the government makes from time to time, and particularly the promise of new and better legislation for veterans. I am not so gullible, Mr. Speaker. I have learned my lesson. I have been hearing promises since May and June of what the government is going to provide, and for many months before that. We have all seen so many of those promises repudiated.

We were warned by the "Chief Manitou" of promises himself, right at the outset of the campaign, that there were going to be promises made and we had better beware of them. He began to make a great many promises involving a lot of public money, and of course they have since been repudiated. Not too many of those promises fell on stony ground, however, and now that he has his majority position he feels quite free, indeed entitled, I suggest, to forget them.

Let us not get roped in by the vague and uncertain promises we hear from the other side of this House about new and better things for veterans. We cannot believe it until we see it. This reneging process could have attained epidemic proportions so let us watch out, let us beware.

What new legislation is being hinted at, Mr. Speaker? Let us see it. If it comes from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) as has been suggested, let him bring it on. We cannot believe it until we see it. Many of my colleagues on this side of the House and myself fall into a class of unbelievers as far as the government is concerned because we can no longer accept its promises.

The VLA we now have must not be rejected or allowed to die on the statute books until something as satisfactory has been brought forward to replace it. We all know the story of the bird in the hand, so let us not go beating about in the bush looking for the bird that just may not be there.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate because I happen to be a veteran, having served in the Royal Canadian Air Force and also the Canadian Army. I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whose motion we are debating. I appreciate the remarks and their sentiments, but on the other hand I must say that I too have been interested and concerned about veterans for many, many years. As a matter of fact, on Remembrance Day this year I shall be taking the salute as usual before at least one of the legions, of which there are five, in my riding.

At the end of world war II, Mr. Speaker, I was able to take advantage of the educational credits offered, and my brother took advantage of the Veterans' Land Act. Both of these were commendable ways in which the government showed interest in veterans, and we were helped a great deal. Just a year ago I was honoured by my legion, Branch 217, with a 25 year pin, and this certainly indicates that I have every concern and interest in veterans.

At this time in the debate, Mr. Speaker, it would appear that virtually everything has been said, and said several times. I believe we should take a look at the Veterans' Land Act, however, its provisions and history.

The Veterans' Land Act was enacted as one of three postwar rehabilitation programs and was designed to assist veterans of world war II and of the special force in Korea to settle in Canada as full time farmers, part time farmers and commercial fishermen. Assistance was also available to veterans who wished to act as their own contractors in construction of their own homes.

The act consists of three parts. Under Part I financial assistance, including both grants and loans, may be provided to veterans who held a Veterans' Land Act certificate of qualification on October 31, 1968, and who desire to settle on the land as full time farmers, part time farmers coupled with other employment, commercial fishermen, settlers on provincial or dominion lands, or Indian settlers on Indian reservations.

Part II of the act provides that any veteran who is approved for a loan under the National Housing Act may receive financial and other assistance to build his own home on any lot acceptable for a single family dwelling.

The amount that may be advanced is $18,000, or the amount of the approved NHA loan, whichever is the lesser.

Part III makes additional, fully repayable loans available to full-time farmers, part-time farmers and commercial fishermen both at the time they are established under Part I of the act and for so long as they have a subsisting contract with the director. The act requires that all veterans who wish to obtain financial assistance under the farming, small holding or commercial fishing provisions of the act must have had a valid qualification certificate by October 31, 1968. I understand that there remain some 100,000 veterans who indicated a possible interest in the Veterans' Land Act by obtaining a qualification certificate on or before that date, but who have not yet applied for financial assistance. The deadline for them to do so is March 31, 1975.

Veterans who have a subsisting contract with the director, and who wish additional financial assistance up to the limits of the act, may submit loan applications up to March 31, 1977.

The Veterans' Land Act regulations require that a small holding contain a minimum of one-half acre. However, when a parcel of land does not contain this minimum and no other land is readily available to make up one-half acre, this requirement may be reduced by 20 per cent. Commercial fishing establishments, and veterans whose disabilities are assessed by medical officers of the Canadian Pension Commission at 50 per cent or more, irrespective of whether the disability was service associated or not, may be exempted from this minimum acreage requirement.

Veterans wishing loans for full-time farming must have had at least two years' practical experience in the type of farming in which they wish to be established before a loan may be approved under the act. Farm loans may be approved under the categories of commercial family farms or small family farms.

Loans for commercial family farms are generally limited to farmers whose full-time occupation is farming. Financial assistance may be approved up to the lesser of $40,000 or 75 per cent of the security value of the land, basic herd livestock and farm equipment.

Mr. Benjamin: We all have the stuff the hon. member is reading.

Mr. Robinson: Of the total amount which may be advanced, $6,000 is available under Part I and bears interest at 3.5 per cent per annum. The remainder may be lent under Part III at the rate of interest applicable under the Farm Credit Act, which I understand is 9.25 per cent at present.

The down payment under Part I is 10 per cent of the amount requested for the purchase of land and buildings and to effect permanent improvements. As the maximum assistance on commercial family farms under Parts I and III may not exceed 75 per cent of the value of the security held, or to be held by the director, a veteran seeking a loan under Part III must have an equity of at least 25 per cent in the land and chattels offered as security for the assistance requested, or pay in cash an amount to raise his equity in the security to the required percentage.

Small family farms are units that do not produce a large enough farm net income to be classed as commercial farm units. In most cases such small farmers obtain some additional income, on top of their income from agriculture. Financial assistance of up to $18,000 or 75 per cent of the market value of the land, whichever is the lesser, may be approved. Interest rates are similar to those for commercial farmers; that is, 3.5 per cent is charged on the first $6,000, and the Farm Credit Act rate of 9.25 per cent applies to the balance, as I previously said. In addition to the down payment of 10 per cent, full-time farmers are required to repay two-thirds of the amount expended under Part I for all purposes except chattels over a period not in excess of 30 years, with interest at 3.5 per cent.

The remainder of the assistance under Part I, plus any amount used for the purchase of chattels not exceeding $1,200, is a conditional grant and need not be repaid if the veteran fulfills the terms of the contract for a period of 10 years. In the aggregate a veteran may obtain a conditional grant of up to $2,320.

A feature of farm lending peculiar to VLA is the open end mortgage concept; that is, as the principal indebtedness is reduced, additional loans may be approved provided the indebtedness at any one time does not exceed the statutory ceilings.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has not told us anything thus far which cannot be obtained if one writes to the minister. The veterans of this country are interested in what is to happen to those particular pieces of legislation. I think the hon. member is wasting the time of the House by reading this material into the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I doubt whether the hon. member has raised a valid point of order. He may have a difference of opinion, or a grievance about the way in which the hon. member is presenting his case. Nevertheless, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) has the floor and he may continue.

Mr. Robinson: Small holders and commercial fishermen may also obtain part I assistance of the same basis and terms as described for full-time farmers. In addition, up to $10,000 may be lent to them under Part III, provided the individual veteran contributes in cash or equity one dollar for each five dollars borrowed, thus making available for disbursement a maximum of $12,000 under Part III and an aggregate total under both parts of $18,000.

The conditional grant available to farmers is also available to small holders and commercial fishermen up to a maximum of $2,320, depending upon the acreage of cultivable land. However, small holders generally use the full amount of assistance available under Parts I and III for house construction or to purchase land, and for permanent improvements and their grant is, therefore, normally $1,400. The remaining indebtedness is repayable over a maximum period of 30 years, with the Part I indebtedness repayable at 3.5 per cent and the Part III indebtedness at the rate applicable to loans under the Farm Cerdit Act at 9.25 per cent.

Qualified veterans seeking establishment on federal or provincial land as farmers, commercial fishermen or small holders, may obtain a grant of up to $2,320 for the purchase of improvements, for essential building materials, for clearing and breaking, and for livestock and equipment. No down payment is required, and the $2,320 is not repayable if the veteran fulfills the terms of his settlement agreement for a 10-year period. Similar assistance is available to Indians on Indian reservations.

Since inception, 140,000 veterans have been approved for assistance under the Veterans' Land Act, more than 13 per cent of the enlistments for world war II and Korea. For the fiscal year 1973-74, over 8,000 loans were approved of which 2,500 were additional loans to veterans already settled under the act. Since inception of VLA operations, in excess of $1,200 million has been disbursed under all sections of the act. The outstanding principal investment is $545 million. Currently there are approximately 9,000 farm accounts and 51,000 small holding and commercial fishing accounts. At the end of September, 1974, the total VLA staff consisted of 480 employees, compared to 1,818 in 1947. As one can see, this represents a considerable reduction in staff, in line with the reduction in the number of claims.

Since 1942 when the act was created there have been a substantial number of amendments. The original ceiling of $4,800 was progressively increased to $40,000 for full-time farmers and to $18,000 for small farmers, commercial fishermen and small holders. The repayment period has been extended from 25 to 30 years. Aside from the increased ceilings perhaps the most significant changes have related to the purpose for which expenditures may be made.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister wants to cancel these provisions.

Mr. Robinson: Initially, expenditures were limited to the purchase of land and improvements and to the purchase of a limited amount of livestock and farm equipment. It is now possible to utilize loans for almost any worth while purpose relating to the improvement of the security in land permanent improvements, for livestock and equipment, and to pay off various farm operations or property debts.

There were no terminal dates in the act prior to 1959. In that year, by means of Bill C-50, a section was introduced into the act which established a time limit for a veteran who wished to be settled under Part I to obtain a certificate of qualification. The time set was 15 years after September 30, 1947, or 15 years after a veteran's discharge, whichever date was the later. By Bill C-80 in 1962 this date was extended to October 31, 1968, which corresponded with the final date for the use of re-establishment credits.

For the purpose of phasing out VLA lending operations in an orderly manner, Bill C-128 was approved by parliament in 1965. It established terminal dates for submitting loan applications and for the commencement of work related to construction or effecting other permanent improvements. The terminal date for new establishment loan applications was the March 31, 1974, but this deadline, pursuant to the provisions of Bill C-17 approved by parliament last spring, has been extended to March 31, 1975. A veteran with a subsisting contract may apply for an additional loan up to March 31, 1977. Construction or improvement work must commence within one year of these dates.

The foregoing is a concise history of the act and its provisions. It is now time it was terminated. If new measures are necessary, they can be brought forward, Mr. Speaker.

I agree with the minister when he said, and I quote:

> An urban housing program for veterans who have reached or are approaching retirement from post-war careers is inconsistent with an agriculturally-oriented rehabilitation program which was designed to assist veterans following their discharge from wartime active service.

I also agree with him when he said, and I quote:

> Many low or modest-income veterans have needs in respect to housing. It is realized that many do—and that their requirements or preferences are varied in nature. It is in recognition of that awareness, and of the greater relevancy of the provisions of the National Housing Act to those needs, that a study has been undertaken to examine whether special arrangements should be made to assist such veterans.

In conclusions may I say that I have every concern and interest in veterans and their affairs. I have had close contact with them for over 25 years. However, I do believe the Veterans' Land Act should be wound up without any further extension. I must therefore vote against the motion because the Veterans' Land Act has really outlived its original basic usefulness.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not often speak on matters affecting veterans, although it goes back a long way to when I first became a veteran. And 1916, in the month of March or April, is a year and a day of long ago. Through the years I belonged to the Canadian Legion, first in the Great War Veterans' Association from September, 1917, through to 1924 when the Canadian Legion had its beginnings.

When I was Prime Minister I recommended to Her Majesty the Queen that the Canadian Legion, by reason of its service, should be entitled to have the addition of the royal honour of Royal. It was pointed out to me that no other national Legion, whether in the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand or elsewhere had that right. I could only conclude that the Prime Ministers of those several countries had not asked her for her approval. As a result of the representation made, the Canadian Legion became the Royal Canadian Legion.

When I listen to these young members speak, I begin to realize that I am indeed casting my longest shadow toward the east. I have listened to a number of the speeches and read all of them. I would now endeavour to bring this House back to the question that we face.

I recall the days of world war II and the tremendous galaxy of greatness sitting on the treasury benches. All of them today have gone beyond, excepting one. I think of Colonel J. L. Ralston, Angus L. Macdonald, Chubby Power and Clarey Gillis of the CCF. There are other members I could mention in the Social Credit. The only one now living of that group who sat on the front benches of those days is the Hon. Joseph Thorson.

In 1944 it was decided that this House should consider a veterans charter. In those and in later days when debates took place on matters concerned with veterans, ministers were in the House. Today the numbers that are present consist of two ministers. That is of some interest, I am sure.

The veterans charter was something on which we all worked. I have not looked up Hansard, since, but I recall the hours and days that we spent. Many of those were veterans of the first great war, for few of the second great war had yet returned.

In the last days of that legislation the three Ministers of Defence mentioned the contribution made by Her Majesty's loyal opposition and of various amendments, and I say this in all modesty, that they were advanced by myself.

Why this haste to get rid of this legislation? What is the reason? It certainly cannot be in the heart of the gallant Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). Indeed, as he listens to the debates, he makes very clear the fact that he is doing a job he does not want to do because he invariably keeps his eyes down on the documents before him.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Come on, John. I am busy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is true. I have watched the minister with interest. I have great admiration for his tremendous service in the days of war. He has a job to do.

Why do these members of the government want to get rid of this legislation? They talk of politics. Somebody mentioned there should be no politics in connection with veterans affairs, and that is right. Those sitting opposite should be their own physicians in that regard.

Before the election the government postponed action, along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Their plea was accepted, and action was put off until after the election. There were no politics, of course, activating any member of the government in postponing this legislation; they were filled with a desire to help the veteran. I heard about it in my own constituency. People said: "Isn't it wonderful how the government listened to the arguments of the opposition and has postponed action on terminating the Veterans' Land Act?"

Now the election is over, a majority has been attained, and this motion is being talked out. It is being talked down and opposed by the very members who were giving it their utmost support during the period between 1972 and 1974. What is the haste here? As pointed out by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro), the government has promised that sooner or later, at some time, other legislation will be introduced. I say the government should postpone consideration of this motion and bring in that legislation now. I ask the government whether it has that legislation ready, or is it in cold storage? Have the bills been drawn? I wait for an answer, but the minister is silent. The answer is no.

I ask the government not to play politics with this matter. Do not endeavour to deceive the veterans of Canada into thinking that somewhere, some place, some time, the government is going to introduce something that will be even more beneficial to them than VLA. I say, produce it now and let it be seen.

Is it for economic reasons that this legislation is being ended? Again there is a deep silence from the government benches. The government is going to save money from this. Is that the purpose? The government profligately spends the people's money, yet to save a few dollars it is going to take money from the veterans, many of whom are today beginning to realize that they ought to have taken advantage of the Veterans' Land Act. Surely the government will reconsider its decision.

A few days hence we will stand on Parliament Hill and do honour to those who gave their all. A few days in advance of this day of national remembrance and dedication we have before parliament a motion asking for a review of the terminal date of the Veterans' Land Act. But the government sits silent, in expectation of something about to be achieved.

I do not want to go into a lot of detail, but I make an appeal on behalf of those who are asking that this legislation be not set aside until the government has has an opportunity of deciding whether the legislation should be repealed. We talk of justice being done to our veterans, and much has been done in this regard. But just as important as that justice be done is that justice appear to be done.

In this case all I can say is that, as one who has a badge which I treasure above all others—a 50 year active membership badge in the Royal Canadian Legion—I appeal to the government to reconsider. Think for a moment what its action means. I ask it to adjourn this debate until the new legislation is brought in. Do not ask this House to vote for something evanescent, for something promised by a government which, with the greatest respect, has not been noted up until the present time for carrying out its promises, its responsibilities and its undertakings.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to participate in this debate following the profound remarks of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I do not expect to emulate his oratorical skill, but I do want to assure hon. members that I am as sincere in what I say as he and others members on this side are regarding this motion.

It is unnecessary for me to detail the events that led up to this debate; that has been done by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), whose strategy and procedural work in bringing this debate before the House today are recognized by members on all sides of the House. Indeed, we are deeply indebted to them for this opportunity to draw the attention of the minister once again to our absolute opposition to the abandonment of the Veterans' Land Act. Through the procedural work of these members we have obtained at least a one-year delay.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that the signatures which were required to move this motion all come from members on this side of the House, and this despite the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre endeavoured to interest members of the Veterans Affairs Committee who sit on the other side of the House in affixing their names in order that the matter might receive full and frank discussion. But this has not been the case and I think it illustrates some partisanship of one kind or another.

Government members of parliament and also the minister hint at some new plan which might supersede the legislation being phased out, Mr. Speaker. But it is only a hint. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out, the minister is strangely silent when this subject is brought forward. There have been some innuendos on his part and on the part of others, but we have had nothing of a concrete nature.

The first part of the motion asks the minister to review the terminal date of the VLA and to report back to the House in 15 days. We still hope that within that 15 days he will come to his senses and heed what has been said in this debate. If he does, he will wipe out the deadline of March 31, 1975, and while he is at it he will repeal section 3 of the Veterans' Land Act which sets up the October 31, 1968, deadline for qualification.

I am going to repeat what others have said, but being repetitive seems to be the only way that we will get the government to appreciate our strong feelings in this matter. I think repetition also serves to emphasize the validity of our arguments. I think we also want to assist the minister in convincing his colleagues in cabinet and those others who sit on the government side that this is a fit and proper course for him to take.

Attention has been drawn by other hon. members to the fact that we are debating this matter on the eve of Remembrance Day. We have just passed through committee, preparatory to third reading in the House, a bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act to give generous increases to veterans. That, I suggest, is a symbolic wreath which we may lay on the cenotaphs of remembrance across this land. But just as surely as that is a symbolic tribute to those who died—and war veterans allowance is a tribute to those who are still living—it must also be a black mark on the Department of Veterans Affairs and on the government if they permit the Veterans' Land Act to go by the boards.

I plead with the minister to reconsider the suggestion to refurbish and update the VLA which has meant so much to so many people and, if he will not, I would urge him to introduce a suitable housing program. If he stood in his place now and indicated that he was about to make this announcement, I would sit down, and I am sure that all hon. members would be silent and await with interest what the minister had to say.

No one can deny the benefits of the VLA which has been in effect for approximately 30 years. We listened to a long discourse in this regard by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). Many full time farmers have been established on the land, and a great number of others have benefited.

I personally have benefited under this legislation so I can speak from experience about the great work that has been done for veterans in this area. These benefits have been provided to full-time farmers as well as to fishermen, those with small holdings and so on. I do not think I need detail that.

At this point I should pay tribute to the efficiency of members of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and particularly those who have worked under the Veterans' Land Act. I pay tribute to them all for the way in which the act has been administered. I would pay tribute as well to the past and present directors, and to those field men who were of such great assistance to the veterans over the years.

Let me follow somewhat along the line taken by the right hon. gentleman for Prince Albert in trying to analyse the thinking of a government which would contemplate doing what it intends to do in phasing out the Veterans' Land Act. Obviously the minister has been advised in this regard by the officials of his own department. I am sure their opinions are based on statistics only. The point was well made yesterday by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) that more important than statistics are individual persons whose livelihoods will be affected and whose very opportunity for advancement will be curtailed if we neglect the human factor.

The flow of letters across members' desks from people objecting to the phasing out of this act, and asking if we are in a position to do something to persuade the government to do otherwise, indicates to me the personal nature of this thing and how these people feel about it. Let us not be swayed by statistics.

One argument being used by officials to convince the minister is that administration costs are too high. Let me point out that the staff is already in place and experienced. This is a good group of men who know more about settling people on the land than perhaps any other single group in the country. Surely cost is not a factor. Mortgage money comes from a revolving fund constantly being replenished by the repayment of loans by veterans. Surely cost is not a good reason for these people to take this view.

Some suggest that there are not sufficient numbers of veterans interested in this act. For goodness sake, some 150,000 veterans established eligibility, and 100,000 will be affected if the act is cut off. Let me read what was said by the Director General of the Veterans' Land Act when he appeared just last week before the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I quote from page 2:28 of the proceedings of that committee on October 22:

> Mr. Chairman, we have had approximately 2,000 loan applications for new settlement—

Surely the need is there. The reason for phasing this out cannot be that insufficient numbers of veterans are applying. If there is in fact some element of truth in that suggestion let us consider why there is not a sufficient number of veterans coming forward. To begin with, many veterans were simply unaware of the October, 1968, deadline. They were not members of veterans' groups of any kind, the Legion, the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans, or what have you. They did not read their magazines and did not see the supplements in the newspaper. I suggest they did not realize the finality of the deadline.

Other people felt their way of life was good and sufficient for the rest of their lives, and there was no reason for them to apply. We have had many letters from individuals, all of which would suggest that conditions have changed. Let me read from one of those letters as follows:

At that time I was employed as the Manager of the Delhi Auction Exchange, owned my own home in Delhi, and if I knew of the deadline, I had no reason to register for a permit. However, as you no doubt know, I have since lost my position (I was never given any reason for the dismissal) and now I am trying something new.

The property in Lynedoch consists of a house and six acres with about 1½ acres of cleared land and in order to make the necessary repairs and purchase some small equipment I may find it necessary to place a small mortgage on the property.

If there is any way you could assist me in obtaining the necessary registration permit, I would appreciate it very much.

I think that indicates what this debate is all about. There are many others who neglected to quality because the amount of the loan was meaningless to them. There is simply not enough money available to be of any use in today's society. I have another letter which bears that out, and this is only an example of many that have come to me and I am sure to others. This letter is from a Mr. Braley of Simcoe, who states:

Most country or city lots cost way over $15,400 so what choice does a vet have to take advantage of this? Would you please ask parliament if they would please consider increasing the amount of loan at reasonable rates of interest so that I and others could be helped?

I made some inquiries of a licensed real estate appraiser in respect of the value of land and houses in my area. He indicated that an unserviced rural building lot costs from $7,000 to $8,000; serviced town building lots cost from $12,000 to $15,500, and that a house and lot in the town of Simcoe cost $39,900, that is for the very cheapest. So you can see how meaningless has become the amount available. Those are the things that officials of the department should be taking into consideration when they suggest that not enough veterans are interested.

The third reason often advanced in support of phasing out the VLA is that the act was not designed for the type of housing required today, but was designed to settle full-time farmers on the land. The argument continues that those who would quality now would be too old to enter this occupation. At this point in time that may well be true, but surely it is not beyond the comprehension of those in the department to change the plan and the conditions.

I well recall my earlier interest in the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs when I asked a former director general about lot sizes. I suggested that we could change the size that veterans must have to meet the conditions of the various towns and villages, and in reply he suggested that we could not change the rules in the middle of the ball game. The minister now does not want to change the rules, he wants to call the game in the seventh inning when there are 100,000 veterans who could still qualify. It is inconceivable to me that officials would want to kill this program rather than change it, particularly at this time when housing is desperately needed by veterans, many of whom are in the declining years of their lives.

That is the thinking of the department in spite of the statement by the minister on March 31, 1974, when we were debating this matter and he said:

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this extension will provide many veterans with the opportunity to take advantage of a program which was designed for them.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

He concluded by stating:

It should be made quite clear that we are not doing this as a favour to veterans but simply as a right which they have earned.

If that is true, and I am sure we all agree, why in the world are we trying to get rid of this thing?

In conclusion I would simply like to summarize what I have been trying to say by listing the essential changes the minister must consider if we are to retain the Veterans' Land Act and make it meaningful and useful to veterans in today's economy. This should be the minister's task in the ensuing 15 days when he makes his decision, or decides—and from what we have heard about this we are skeptical—to introduce a new housing program. The new program, if there is to be one, must be exclusively for veterans. They are a special group. They did a special service for their country and deserve special recognition.

Second, the increase in the loan ceiling in respect of house and lot must be made realistic in light of today's escalating costs.

Third, lot size should conform with lot sizes set forth in provincial and/or municipal regulations and bylaws.

Fourth, the terms of repayment should be as generous as those which now exist in the present act.

Fifth, there should be attractive interest rates, even subsidized if necessary. These are the conditions the minister should note when drafting new legislation or when setting levels which we hope he will do. All these terms are not something the motion gives gratuitously or grudgingly. They belong to the veterans as a right, as the minister has so well said, because they have been justly earned.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Madam Speaker, the government is not keeping faith with the veterans in Canada. I say that because I cannot believe that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has his heart, mind and soul in terminating the Veterans' Land Act on March 31, 1975. I consider him to be a man of compassion and concern. I just cannot believe he would not support this motion put from the opposition.

I appreciate that the minister has lost the war with his cabinet colleagues and the backbenchers in the Liberal Party. He has failed to gain any support whatsoever for the needs of the veterans in Canada. All I can say to the members of the Liberal Party who have spoken is that they have adopted a very cold, callous, calculating and hypocritical attitude toward the veterans of Canada.

Three strange things are happening in this debate. First, we are debating a motion in respect of government legislation moved and seconded by opposition members. It is a credit to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's St-Barbe (Mr. Marshall) that they have brought forward this motion at this time to underline the need to extend the legislation. It is the first time in my nine years here when I have seen two opposition members bring forward for debate a motion on government legislation. This is a credit to them.

Second, there has been a change in the position, posture and attitude of government members. There should be compassion and concern with regard to veterans, but I find a total absence of compassion and concern on the part of government members. In fact it would be like looking for water in the Sahara Desert to find this. Back in March of this year government members took a non-partisan attitude with regard to the legislation which extended the Veterans' Land Act from March 31, 1974, to March 31, 1975. I was rather proud of their attitude and their action concerning this matter.

Now, with the exception of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, I have heard no member of the Liberal Party support this motion. All I have heard from them is that opposition members are taking a partisan attitude. There was no partisanship prior to the legislation of March of this year, but now there is partisanship on behalf of the Liberal members. I recall when they were in a minority position how humble they were in respect of this legislation because they knew they could not enter the election without supporting this legislation. But after July 8 they acquired their old arrogance and their miserable attitude toward veterans. One mistake the Canadian voters made was to give a majority to the Liberal Party.

The third strange thing is that I am amazed that the Liberal members are prepared to accept on behalf of the veterans of this country a vague promise of help which is without substance, form or time. I should like to read from the statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to underline how gullible the Liberal members can be with regard to this vague promise. He said:

> I expressed the view a moment ago that an urban housing program for veterans who have reached or are approaching retirement from post-war careers is inconsistent with an agriculturally-oriented rehabilitation program which was designed to assist veterans following their discharge from wartime active service.
> This is not to say that many low or modest-income veterans do not have needs in respect to housing. On the contrary, it is realized that many do—and that their requirements or preferences are varied in nature. It is in recognition of that awareness, and of the greater relevancy of the provisions of the National Housing Act to those needs, that a study has been undertaken to examine whether special arrangements should be made to assist such veterans.
> Because discussions are still in progress, I am not in a position to comment further at this time. I am hopeful, however, that it will be possible for me to do so in the not too distant future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is not even on the drawing board.

Mr. Gilbert: Madam Speaker, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, it is not even on the drawing board. Not only that, but to expect the government, through the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson), to bring forward a program which will be acceptable and suitable to the veterans is asking too much. Why do I say that? The present Minister of State for Urban Affairs has been in that ministry for five months. What has he done to cure housing problems across this country? We have seen a drop of 25 per cent in housing starts. That will not help the veterans. We have had the highest interest rates that have ever prevailed across the country. He acts like Santa Claus trying to put young people in poverty by offering them $500 to buy a home.

A young person over the weekend asked me if I could imagine a minister attempting to persuade him by saying he would give him $500, and that therefore he could go out and buy a home ranging in price from $50,000 to $60,000 or $70,000, and then pay for it for the rest of his life. If that is not placing young people in poverty and if it is not placing a great strain on their marriages, then I do not know what else is, Mr. Speaker.

The Liberal members would accept the vague promise of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to place this matter in the hands of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. If there were anything on the drawing board we could examine it, but the minister knows there is not, and yet he says there will be a study concerning whether legislation will be brought forward to help the veteran. I am amazed at the attitude not only of the minister but of all members of the Liberal Party. The veterans of this country are fully aware of what is being done to them. They will rise up with a wrath which would be comparable to that of the great prophet Amos. They will pour forth their thunder and their scorn forever and forever. I am almost preaching.

An hon. Member: Amen!

Mr. Gilbert: What is needed to give the veterans of this country a fair deal? First, we should not even be considering an extension of time with regard to the right of every veteran to establish his entitlement to this special program. There should not have been a qualification time for a certificate set at October 31, 1968, nor should there have been a termination date of March 31, 1974, or of March 31, 1975. If the veterans of this country are to be treated fairly and equitably, there should not be any date whatsoever. They should have the privilege at any time to exercise their rights.

● (1620)

Second, there should be an increase in the limits with regard to the loans. The limitation of $18,000, which has the net effect of a loan of $15,400, is not practical today. What we should be doing is getting the figures that are required for people to purchase homes, and adjusting to the prices of houses.

We should be changing the land requirements because the requirement of a half acre back in the 1940's, 1950's and early 1960's is not appropriate today and, as the last speaker so eloquently said, today that just cannot be obtained.

The fourth point is with regard to interest rates. To charge any veteran more than a 6 per cent interest rate on any loan that he obtains, is really treating him in a very niggardly and miserable fashion. At present the rate is 7 per cent.

I want to point out to you, Madam Speaker, the type of trickery that the Department of Veterans Affairs is perpetrating. This letter came to me back on March 20, 1974. It is from a constituent of mine who says:

> In response to our recent conversations, I enclose herewith a photostatic copy of a form letter requested to be signed in connection with an application for assistance under VLA. At first glance it would seem to be presuming a change in the Act at April 1st whereas, currently, applications must be in by expiry of the Act March 31 to get consideration. Upward revision of interest rates in Part III in my view would be tantamount to killing the Act as there would be little benefit in obtaining such assistance except at rates at least reasonably below conventional mortgage rates. In addition of course, the outside limit of $18,000 ($2,600 of which is the applicant's) is unrealistic in today's real estate market. Argument that increasing the limits would re-open previous applications is hardly valid in that previous borrowers under the act would have already enjoyed the gains in real estate values.

Then he encloses the form in which they ask veterans to sign a certain statement, part of which I will read. This is what veterans have to sign:

I have been advised that the interest rates of Part III loans is 7 per cent at the present time. It is my understanding that this rate is subject to change on 1st April, 1974. I will continue with my Application for Assistance regardless of any change that might take place in Part III interest rate on my Agreement if my loan should not be processed to the approval stage before the above-mentioned date.

I am aware it is my responsibility to submit a property acceptable to the Director prior to March 31, 1974.

If the property is rejected because of area zoning, drainage, price or other reasons not associated with title difficulties, I realize an Application for another property cannot be accepted after March 31, 1974.

This is the type of procedure and attitude that the department has been perpetrating on veterans. I am totally ashamed of this attitude of the government and more especially of the Liberal members of parliament, with the exception of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. As I said at the outset, I feel sorry that a man who has made such a tremendous commitment to his country, both in service and in loyalty, should have been subjected to a war that he has lost in the cabinet, and should have been unable to persuade the cabinet that the veterans should have the highest priority with regard to some of the programs that exist.

It has been said that civilizations are evaluated according to the way in which society is treated. If that is so, our civilization, or more especially this government, will be regarded as one that has treated veterans in a very shabby and niggardly fashion.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate, especially one where I am certain of the sincerity of so many members. I include in that sincerity the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), and of course the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

I rise to say that on this weekend of weekends and this day of days it might be important that we not all speak for the record, merely to place on the record those moments and things that concern us so desperately in the one situation which confronts us.

I for one would like to say that there are people in Canada who ask: who were they? That should be asked clearly. Who were they? Why did they go? What did they do? It is important to say to those people who ask: they were young, they walked with a quick step, their hair blew in the wind, they went laughing, they went strongly, they left their fathers and mothers, their children and their friends.

It is important that people not always see them as they are now in veterans hospitals. It is important that people not always see them as so many crosses row on row. It is important to remember that they did indeed go to end war. They had decided to put an end to war. This was their decision. This was their legacy to us at a time when we required them.

They returned, and the Canadian government of that day did honour to them, did not say they were Sunday soldiers, but said that they did indeed deserve a spot in our country, in our hearts and in our minds for life, for all their lives. This was done in those days.

Having had a father who came from that war with a total disability, I remember the situation which he faced. I remember him facing the depression and the possibility of losing his pension if he went out to earn $1.50 shovelling snow. None of us are apart from this, it does not matter what political colour we are. As the war disappears, we forget. Unfortunately it came again.

An hon. Member: You soon forgot, however.

Mr. MacFarlane: The hon. member would be wise not to refer to me but to bring his mind to bear on those people who were so important to us.

It happened again. I remember when I stood in short pants by a train that was going somewhere with an older brother on it; a year later I rushed to a port to see a sister going away in the navy. Then a younger brother joined them. This is what has happened down through the generations. In the same way we lost the cream of our youth.

I was proud to call these people who served, my comrades, and I was proud that succeeding governments, which served in times when veterans were important, would see to it that they received special consideration.

The day may come when young people may not go to war to end wars. We are not ashamed to say that, and our fathers were not ashamed to say it to us. We did not go like lions and tigers to devour the enemy simply for that purpose. We went to fight for high sounding causes, we were idealists and so were some older men who went with us and fought like younger men to lead us.

Lest anyone make a mistake, it should be understood how we would handle the situation, as it were, from the outside. We would be with our comrades—indeed we are with our comrades and our minister. We have no doubt that veterans receive the kind of treatment that is important. We make decisions justly and honestly, taking into account the seriousness of the situation and our responsibilities.

It is the minister's difficult task to administer the act justly and to bring forward legislation that will benefit the veterans. This we believe he has done and will do. We have no doubts about it, Madam Speaker. At this point it is like freeing someone from an almost unwanted patronage. We believe it is time for those veterans to be recognized openly lest they be thought of as people who have not earned their way in life.

We believe that by doing something different, by removing this kind of giving which is not recognized as being truly a reward, we can make things better in the long run. When pruning a plant one must be careful not to destroy it. We are mindful of our responsibility, Madam Speaker, and will not forget it.

When the scribe writes that last word, that last line, when he puts in that last comma, that last dot, we can rest assured he will say, "They did not forget". We are certain that they, our comrades, would have been much like us, charged with responsibility.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) for having introduced the motion presently before the House, and to associate myself with their eloquent and passionate pleas to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to review the terminal date March 31, 1975, of the Veterans' Land Act.

While the injustice of the phasing out of this act has been of concern to many members in this House and while we have tried to impress that concern on an intractable government, I want to express my admiration for the work done by one member of this House in particular—the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. He has devoted time and effort to keeping this issue in the arena of public awareness. As a result of his article in newspapers across the country, branches of the Canadian Legion, veterans' organizations and members of our armed forces have stepped up their representations to individual members of parliament to reiterate how the phasing out of the act will adversely affect them.

Equally important, Madam Speaker, is the adverse effect that this breach of faith, this breaking of a commitment will have on our system of government. When government, any government, fails to honor its commitments, then the credibility of the whole system suffers. It is ironic to think that those who fought and sacrificed to safeguard and protect our democratic institutions, our system of responsible government, should now be betrayed by it.

I listened to the speeches of the mover and seconder of this motion, Madam Speaker, and I listened with anticipation to the words of the minister to see if he would respond in the same generous humane way as the two hon. members who preceded him. And while I have great respect for the minister for much of the work he is doing, his statement yesterday afternoon came as a great disappointment. His flat refusal even to review the terminal date of the act was surprising and discouraging, particularly in view of his remarks that he was considering another housing program for veterans. If such is the case will the minister not consider an extension of the act at least until such time as the new housing program for veterans is operational?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, we all know that the gestation period for any piece of legislation is uncertain, and there certainly was no indication by the minister that any new housing program for veterans would have a high priority on the government's list of legislation. In fact, we were not even told if the proposed program is yet off the drawing board.

In view of the absence of detail about a new housing and land program for veterans, surely it is not asking too much of the minister to extend the current legislation until something better, something more in line with contemporary costs and needs, can replace it. Is there to be an interregnum between the two programs? And, if so, who is to say who and how many veterans will be reinstated? Are our veterans to be left waiting in limbo while a suitable program—and one might ask, suitable to whom—is developed?

Will it be suited to the costs of housing in various parts of the country? Will it take into consideration the fact that the present $18,000 limit for a lot and a house is a ludicrous figure in this day and age? Will it acknowledge that $18,000 would hardly pay for the lot, let alone the home?

Will it recognize that the present one-half acre stipulation in the act has restrictions both for those wishing to locate on farm land in the country where such acreage is inadequate, and in a suburban area where it is too large? Will it be available to those who were eliminated from the benefits of the current act by the arbitrary imposition of the 1968 deadline governing the issuance of certificates? Will any of these things apply in the proposed new legislation?

The extension of the Veterans' Land Act would allow time to rectify these inequities or to bring in a new housing program, one that could be applied in terms of today's housing market, housing prices and housing construction. It would allow time for many people still in the service, who will retire to parts of the country other than where they are presently located, to work out suitable retirement plans. Even if they could do the improbable and meet the conditions of the present act, why should they rush to purchase a house just to beat the deadline of the March, 1975, expiry date?

At a time when the morale of our armed forces is low, and when that morale has suffered further blows in recent weeks with announcements of restraint and restriction, the situation surely should not be further aggravated by the news that the government will not retreat from its intention to phase out the Veterans' Land Act.

There are many veterans, Madam Speaker, and many active service personnel in Kingston and the Islands, the constituency I represent. Kingston has a history of 300 years of military involvement. Its citizens are serving Canada in many centres in this country and abroad, and those who remain behind are concerned—concerned about what the government proposes to do with this act, and concerned about who is to come within its terms. They want to be certain that those who should be able to avail themselves of the benefits of the act will have the opportunity to do so. But we are speaking of more than money, or terms, or rewards. We are speaking of faith, or breach of it; of trust, or lack of it; of honoring commitments, or breaking them.

On March 12, 1974, as recorded at page 434 of Hansard, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, during the debate on the Veterans' Land Act, said:

It has been made abundantly clear on many occasions that the federal government does intend to live up to the commitment it made to those who went overseas to fight in the defence of freedom... I wish to assure honourable members as well as my comrades across this country that this government intends to continue to live up to its commitments to all veterans.

I remind the House that he was referring to the provisions of the Veterans' Land Act. Yet a mere seven months after that statement the same minister, speaking on the same issue, told the House yesterday that the original purpose of the act has been amply fulfilled.

Earlier today the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) said that this legislation has outlived its usefulness. Surely we do not look at legislation from that point of view. A law does not outlive its usefulness. Law is not static. It is something which lives and breathes and continues to change in a way which reflects the social and economic needs of the day, as this piece of legislation ought to do. It is not enough for the minister to say that the original purpose of this act has been amply fulfilled, and then dismiss it from his mind. This law should be adapted to meet the needs of the day.

What puzzles me, Madam Speaker, and many others, is this: what prompted the government's change in attitude with regard to the Veterans' Land Act in the short space of seven months? Cynics will point to the recent election results, with justification, as the determining factor in changing the government's position. Let me say that the government's approach, its changed position, reminds me of litmus paper. The government was true blue when it was in a minority position, because then it felt pressure and had to react. But now it is true red; it has a majority and seems to think it can do as it pleases.

If the minister is considering proposals to assist our veterans obtain decent housing, as he indicated yesterday, it seems to me that it is even more important for him to accept the motion now before us, which asks him to review the terminal date of the Veterans' Land Act and to make a further statement within the next two weeks on what the government intends to do in this area. Then he could provide more definite information on any proposed new program. He could also give notice to all serving personnel in this country that the government will not break faith with them and that the present act will remain in force until a more equitable, contemporary housing program for veterans can be introduced.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Madam Speaker, it is with considerable trepidation that I enter this debate. I was flattered when my colleagues asked me to contribute. Many in this House had the honor to serve their country in the armed forces during the war. Others of us were of too tender an age to be eligible for service; but we enjoyed the luxury of being defended by those gallant troops without ever having to don uniforms ourselves. Indeed I was but a wartime twinkle in my father's eye.

I suppose it can be said, rightly, that only those who endured in that struggle can understand the nature and extent of the sacrifice entailed by leaving families and homes, and answering the call to combat in the service of country, particularly in a war which initially was not of our own making. They heeded the summons to defend our allies, which probably made the sacrifice even more acute. With this in mind I take part in this debate. I defer to those who actually saw service, and have always been conscious of having grown up free of fear and danger because of the tremendous sacrifice made by those who answered the call.

Although I was born immediately after the end of world war II, I grew up in war torn England and can remember, when I was five and six, my home neighbourhood being ruins, our block of flats being the only one standing. We amused ourselves in those days by playing on bomb sites. I also remember that many of my classmates did not have fathers. I remember every family conversation being laced with references to the war, and many times I heard of the sad loss of members of our family. Actually, eight members perished at one time in an air raid. I mention this only to show that my generation has been made aware of the great sacrifice that our parents and grandparents were forced to make so that we, in my generation, could stand here today.

I was somewhat puzzled by the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), who talked about members on my side of the House lacking compassion. Let me tell the hon. member that some of us on this side have vivid memories of what the war was all about, even though we did not fight in it. I trust hon. members will bear this in mind.

Why am I taking part in this debate? Consider the motion before us. It has been presented not long after our eight-day debate on the Speech from the Throne, during which the opposition had any number of opportunities to discuss any subject. Indeed the minister participated in that debate. The question raised by this motion could have been raised at that time, especially as the minister had stated he was studying this matter. Bear in mind, also, Madam Speaker, that the estimates of the department were before the committee of the whole about two weeks ago.

I submit that there is not a member opposite who believes the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) has not been giving this matter serious consideration every day and that he will not continue to do so. Is it seriously contended that the effect of this motion, if passed, will be this: that the minister will begin to review this question? What is the real reason behind this motion? Is it real concern for veterans, a genuine concern for their well-being?

Nobody doubts the sincerity of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as well as many others on both sides of the House who have spoken on this issue. No one questions the sympathetic views expressed on behalf of our veterans. But, please, do not question the sincerity of members on the government side.

I take extreme exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) who said this is a further example of how the government rides roughshod over parliament. I believe the opposition is wrong in insisting on flogging this issue to death and misleading the general public.

I do not want to become too partisan, but it is obvious from comments of members opposite that we should have some partisan approach. My reading of the situation, from a vantage point outside parliament in March of this year, was similar to that of Geoffrey Stevens in his article of March 13. We all know that Mr. Stevens is not the greatest friend of the Liberal party, or has not been in the past. Hon. members might like to read that article. The Conservative party at that time was desperately looking for any excuse to provoke an election at any cost. I quote from the article:

The Conservatives found a way to twist the VLA deadline into an insipidly worded non-confidence motion while protesting that defeating the government was the farthest thing from their minds.

The New Democrats found a way to use the non-confidence motion to bring another, and dubious, concession out of the government while protesting that politics was the farthest thing from their innocent minds. I quote:

The veterans of Canada will know, said NDP leader David Lewis . . . that the Conservative party is ready to play politics with their welfare.

That is what we have before us today, genuine sincerity on behalf of some hon. members, and an exercise to save face for the actions of last March by others, playing the veterans of our nation off for political gain. I certainly cannot condone that. Those who protest do so full well in the knowledge that this minister, who is perhaps one of the most distinguished ever to grace this portfolio—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: —and his sincerity cannot be questioned, would not dare to jeopardize the rights of veterans. Not being privy to cabinet decision making, I fully share the faith of my colleague, the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), who stated last evening he was sure the minister would introduce legislation to answer the needs of those few veterans who have not been assisted under the Veterans' Land Act. Perhaps this can be done by a mortgage financing program under the Department of Urban Affairs, or by a program for rural retirement settlement under the Department of Agriculture.

There is no question of the government reneging on the commitment made by former Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden in 1917, which the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe quoted yesterday, and which can be found at page 1069 of yesterday's Hansard.

I recently had occasion to be guest speaker at the semi-annual meeting of the Toronto and district Royal Canadian Legion at No. 10 branch which is in my constituency and, I might add, as a non-veteran. I might say at this point that that portion of my constituency, which is known as the borough of East York, was settled primarily by veterans and their families after both world wars. I can safely say that the constituency of York East probably has one of the largest concentrations of veterans in the country. By coincidence, I might state that I am very happy that the mayor of East York, His Worship Willis Blair, is here today to hear my remarks.

At that meeting I spoke on benefits in general that had been available to veterans under programs established by the Department of Veterans Affairs. A significant portion of my speech dealt with the question of the Veterans' Land Act. I would like to read from that. I quote:

The Veterans' Land Act was designed to assist veterans to pick up the threads of civilian life following discharge from active wartime service by settling on the land as full or part-time farmers, or in association with their occupation of commercial fishing. It was realized that not all veterans would be interested in or find that the provisions of the act best suited their post-war needs and plans. As a result, two other post-war rehabilitation programs were developed, university training and re-establishment credits, with benefits under all three measures being alternative to each other.

Having regard for the purpose of the legislation, the lengthy period which had already elapsed since the end of world war II, and for the fact the university training program had been completed in the mid-fifties, in 1959 parliament approved amendments which established September 30, 1962, as the terminal date for veterans to use re-establishment credit benefits or to become qualified under the Veterans' Land Act. In 1962, this deadline was extended to October 31, 1968.

For the same reasons, in 1965 parliament enacted further amendments which established terminal dates for phasing out VLA lending operations in an orderly and reasonable manner. These legislative changes specified March 31, 1974, as the final date for qualified veterans to apply for settlement under the act and March 31, 1977, as the deadline for veterans with subsisting VLA contracts to apply for additional loans. Last spring, the March 31, 1974 deadline was extended one year.

We all know the reason for that. The opposition, for their own political gain, forced the government to extend this an additional year.

As I have noted, the Veterans' Land Act was designed as a land settlement program to assist veterans following discharge from active wartime service as distinct from being an urban housing measure for use following retirement from post-war occupations or careers. In the circumstances, and bearing in mind that the other two alternative programs were concluded quite some time ago, it is difficult to believe that veterans genuinely interested in VLA assistance have not had an adequate opportunity to do so in the period of almost 30 years which has elapsed since the end of World War II.

At the luncheon break I discussed this matter and the impending probability that the VLA would be terminated in March of next year, and there were no objections from any of the members with whom I spoke. In fact an office holder of the Legion said that it was quite understandable that the government should want to phase out this program at this time, and that he knew most veterans were more than satisfied with the efforts of successive Canadian governments over the years to ameliorate their lives.

Indeed, the only time when this topic arose in the general election campaign was at all-candidates meetings via planted questions by my Tory opponent. That is how the people in York East felt about it once it was properly explained. I think the minister has done a very good job of explaining it.

What then is the nature of the problem today? The nature of the problem is that in spite of understanding the nature of veterans benefits legislation and recognizing its merits, and also recognizing the wisdom of endeavouring at one point in our history to close the books on the benefits to world war II veterans, we have arrived at a stage today where, perhaps in isolated instances, there may be hardships to veterans.

Is it not understandable that a law which was properly conceived, debated and enacted, containing a deadline which was properly advertised and under which every veteran was given a proper opportunity to qualify, may yet, despite every precaution, cause some veterans to regret today the fact they did not apply for certificates of qualification? There are others, of course, who did apply who find themselves in a position where they cannot make application by March 31, 1975, for a specific piece of property, which is what the deadline requires.

We are dealing with a small number of people and, indeed, a different kind of situation from that of the hardship which might exist under a piece of social legislation. If there is any hardship at all to the veteran, and any way to counteract it to help those veterans who served this country, by somehow reviewing the expiry date of this act or simply through straight-forward generosity under a new piece of legislation, I am sure every member on both sides of this House would want to see to it that this is done.

I entered this debate to say that if circumstances come to light which indicate that a single veteran has been aggrieved, even though that may be the result of his own actions, we have to recognize that we can never adequately repay him. If there is any way that the cabinet can be persuaded at any time to extend to that veteran some privilege, whether by new legislation or by interpretation of old legislation, this is something we must always do. Therefore I oppose the motion.

● (1700)

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I am sorry to have to follow the remarks that the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) used in opening his speech, which was an attempt to impute improper motives to the members of this House when they were considering this very important matter shortly before Remembrance Day a year ago. I think that if the hon. member reads Hansard he is going to regret having made those opening remarks regarding this very important matter. He may justify his stand if he wants to, and I may disagree with his stand if I want to; but he ought not to try to justify his stand by retreating into the worst kind of partisanship that we have seen during the course of this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He ought not to accuse any member on this side of saying to the minister that he lacks compassion. We have never said that. But what we have said is that we are worried about the company in which this compassionate minister finds himself so far as this legislation is concerned. We do not doubt for a moment that the minister, as the hon. member for York East has said, considers this matter every day and that he is concerned about it every day. What we are concerned about is that his colleagues are not equally concerned about the position of veterans every day.

I now turn to the remarks of my hon. friend, the member for Toronto Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). I use the expression "my hon. friend" with some justification since he is a man I knew for many years before I came to this House. His contribution to this debate has been to read into Hansard a brochure on veterans' legislation, all of which is well known to the beneficiaries of veterans' legislation. He might better have read into Hansard the act and regulations. He took us on an Alice in Wonderland tour of the statute. Surely he did not do this for nothing. In taking us through the act he must have meant that it was a good piece of legislation. Then having said that by implication, he announced to the House that he was going to vote against this motion, while two sentences before he had said he thought VLA was a great piece of legislation.

The minister and others in the House have implied that a study is being undertaken of other legislation. I ask the minister, as others have asked, where is this legislation? What is the timetable for the completion of this study? When is the bill going to be brought forward? If the minister says it will be introduced within a short period of time, then I would call on that compassionate man to call off his dogs and let this matter stand while the House examines that legislation. There is not one member in this House who does not have concern for the veteran. But what I am concerned about is the way this whole matter had degenerated.

I share the concern of many members of the House that these studies, if they exist at all, are only at the beginning stage. Perhaps the government does not really know what it intends to do. This piece of legislation will be off the statute books for a long time before any other legislation is made available. If this is the case—and it has not been denied—then I respectfully suggest that the deadline be removed and the statute amended so that in no way is any veteran deprived of the benefits of the legislation. More than that, I suggest the statute be amended so it is in tune with the current situation in urban communities.

I have heard the members of the House discuss the issue of partisanship. We have not approached this matter with any partishanship, and quite frankly we do not like being accused of partisanship. I remind every member of the House that when this matter last came before us as a result of the hard work of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it was brought forward under Standing Order 43 and received the unanimous consent of the House. That includes the consent of the minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen). There was no question of partisanship at that time.

What has happened to that unanimity? Where are these other members of the Liberal party? I would be cynical if I suggested the reason is majority government.

I want to say something to those members of the House who, in a few moments, are going to stand up and vote against this motion. I want them to remember the last Remembrance Day and how proud they all were to leave this House and, on that sacred day, visit Royal Canadian Legion branches and cenotaphs all across this land and proudly lay a wreath presented by the government in memory of those who served their country in war. Madam Speaker, I will lay you dollars to doughnuts that when all of the members left that solemn ceremony and went back to the Legion branch for good fellowship, they told their friends in the Legion how they had given unanimous consent to the resolution moved last year just a few days before Remembrance Day.

In a few days' time the members of this House, including the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane), the hon. member for Toronto Lakeshore and the hon. member for York East, are going to go out of this place and lay those self-same style wreaths, and I should like to see them look those survivors in the eye and tell them that they voted against this statute which was meant to benefit our veterans.

I conclude on this note. I listened with great interest to the eloquence of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain. If he reads his speech, he is going to find that he dug a little hole for himself. He is going to find he said that retired veterans were second class citizens because of this legislation, and that the government was attempting to uplift them by taking their benefits away.

In the course of his eloquence he had this to say: "The veterans of this country are in the hearts and the minds of all of us". And they are. What we ask of the government today is that the veterans be in the legislation that is approved by this House. I ask those who choose to vote against this motion, which many of us were very proud to sign in anticipation of the day of remembrance, to remember what I can only term the hypocrisy of the position that they are taking.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am going to vote against this motion, and I say so at once so no questions will have to be asked across the floor. When I hear hon. members opposite talking, I wonder whether they are talking about the same veterans I am talking about, namely, those who served in the first and second world wars. Why should we be ashamed of ourselves for the kind of assistance we have given our veterans?

Rather than listen to hon. members opposite I think it would be more appropriate to listen to what the president and two vice presidents of the Canadian Legion said on a local CBC television program entitled "Platform". They were asked how veterans were being treated, and they said they had been treated extremely well. They said they felt that the veterans of this country had been treated better than the veterans of any other country which was involved in the first or second world wars.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The government is still leaving some of them out.

Mr. Cullen: Does the hon. member want to listen or does he want to shout? I am prepared to sit down while he shouts, after which I will get on my feet and speak.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will speak after you so that we can hear what you have to say.

Mr. Cullen: I have a little bit to say and I take second place to no one, including those veterans in the House, of whom I am not one. Certainly as a member of the Veterans Affairs Committee, and as a past vice chairman and chairman of that committee, I begin to wonder when I hear members opposite suggest that we have been arrogant because we now have a majority. Surprisingly enough, from 1966 to 1972 when we had a majority and when we were considering this legislation, representatives of the Canadian Legion said this was the best veterans' legislation they had seen in 50 years. They said that then, and they are saying it now about veterans' legislation.

An hon. Member: What about the Veterans' Land Act?

Mr. Cullen: The reason the opposition parties want to keep this piece of legislation in existence is that they have not been able to come up with any new ideas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) has indicated what the veterans feel about this particular piece of legislation, and we all heard the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) talk about what happens when we all go back to our local legions. The thing I thought significant was that I found myself apologizing for the members of the opposition party, and I did so in view of what members of the Legion in my local branch were saying. They asked me why those fellows were playing politics. They were saying that this was a shameful thing to do in a minority parliament. I indicated to those veterans that members of the opposition were not playing politics, but were sincere in their belief that this piece of legislation should be extended. That is the kind of non-partisanship all hon. members of this House should bring to debates on veterans affairs.

I did not hesitate at the time to indicate that I quite frankly did not agree with extending it, as I felt the act had served its purpose. I was not ashamed to say that then, and I am not ashamed to say it now. I will not be ashamed to say it when I go back to my riding to attend a dinner on November 11.

I think this piece of legislation has been used to do a good job. We have all heard what has been done, as recited by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson). Perhaps hon. members opposite have to be reminded that surely there comes a time to look at new and different ways to help the veterans rather than the same old ways. This bill has outlived its usefulness and we have to move on to something new.

I was quite frankly surprised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he looked over at the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) and indicated that the reasons he was not going along with this motion were economic. That right hon. member should know better, and knowing better I do not think he should have made that kind of ridiculous suggestion.

There are new areas of assistance to veterans that we must consider. We must consider the ages of these veterans at the present time. One suggestion that has been made, and I think it is incumbent upon me as a member of parliament to repeat it, is that we should start giving old age pensions to veterans at age 60. Many of our citizens gave up their lives during wartime, and many others gave up five or six years of their lives away from their wives, families, their brothers and sisters, and perhaps this is one way we can show our appreciation. We can never compensate them for that sacrifice, but perhaps this is one way we can help them, by lowering the eligibility age for old age pensions to 60 for veterans. That may be a start in the right direction.

The minister has suggested that there will be some arrangement made in respect of retirement. I do not know what he has in mind, but perhaps there will be some form of compensation in the way of rentals or municipal tax payments. In any event, I think we have to look at new ways to assist the veterans. These are not young people who have just come back from a war and are endeavouring to re-establish in civilian life. We have a different kind of veteran today. Our veterans today are looking to retirement, and their needs and wants are different. Surely we have to come up with new ideas rather than continually extending old acts that have long since served their purpose.

I have no hesitation whatsoever in voting against this particular motion. Nor will I be ashamed to go back to the veterans in my riding and indicate to them, as I am doing publicly here in this House, that I am against this motion because the act has done the job it was set up to do. Let us now get on with some new legislation. For the reasons I have stated I am voting against this particular motion, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) I was somewhat astounded when the younger member for York East (Mr. Collenette), possibly not knowing what went on in this House last session, drew his own conclusions to support purely partisan arguments. He obviously does not know the contents of my file on this subject, which I might add goes back as far as two of the minister's predecessors, that is, prior to the expiry date of 1968.

Contrary to what the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) suggests, I have a whole raft of letters from veterans who will be cut off by the phasing out of the Veterans' Land Act at this time. I think it is pure politics on the part of hon. members to suggest that because we want to see this extension we are, in some way, denying the validity or the worth of the legislation in the past. This is an argument bereft of any strength and is made merely to take up time and to confuse the issue. I invite any hon. member who has a large serving garrison in his riding, as I have in Edmonton, to counter that statement.

Let me remind hon. members of the many thousands of veterans who, instead of opting for a civilian life back in 1946 and 1947, stayed in our armed forces. Many others perhaps rejoined in 1952 because of the Korean conflict. These men also have an entitlement.

There is one point I do not seem to have been able to get across to the minister, his predecessor or the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton. Regardless of what these veterans decided to do at the end of the last war, there is nothing we in this House should do to deny them the rights they earned through service to their country in time of war. Should a right be denied them because they decided to remain in the armed services?

Hon. members should keep in mind that the last 10 years of service in the armed forces must be taken into consideration in any decision by a veteran to settle in this place or in that place because of the various requirements of the act. Under the Veterans' Land Act a veteran must be present during the construction of a Veterans Land Act house. Sometimes I think the officials of the CMHC and the officials of the VLA work at cross-purposes.

I know that officials of the Department of National Defence have expressed a great deal of concern about the difficulties servicemen are having in trying to fit into VLA programs at this time. This concern was caused by the 1968 abridgement and by the refusal to grant an extension beyond 1974. Now again it is caused by this government through the person of its minister slamming the door on this type of legislation which is in fact housing legislation.

Somehow or other there is an insistence that this is some sort of agricultural settlement. Within the city limits of any major city we have had VLA settlements. They were not any agricultural settlements by any stretch of the imagination. The requirements have been reduced over a period of time. In the case of a disabled veteran, depending upon his disability, the size of a lot could be reduced even more. It is nonsense to suggest that this is agricultural legislation. The problem is housing.

I might bring the minister back to the situation after the war, because some of the other members might not be aware of it. At that time thousands of veterans coming back were seeking housing. I remember reading in the newspapers at that time the ads of people who were looking for an apartment or any type of housing in the city of Edmonton.

At that time housing was provided through the university, through the city and the province, in veterans' quarters. That was one type of housing. There was another type of housing assistance known as wartime housing, with the financial arrangement that that involved, and there was the VLA.

Somebody hit on the idea that some of the men might not like to settle in the big cities but would prefer to settle in some of the smaller towns where they could perhaps have a small holding on the side. This was an idea that was current at that time. It was popular with many men. However, the main purpose was to house veterans rather than to make small-time farmers of them. The purpose was to provide housing when there was a shortage of housing.

What have we today? We have a shortage of housing. When our servicemen come out on retirement pensions, regardless of their rank, we tell them they have rights under the VLA. We tell them there is a maximum mortgage under Parts I and II of $18,000. One does not have to go to the centre of Toronto or Ottawa to see what the price is for a three-bedroom house. All one need do is go to St. Albert outside the city of Edmonton, within a few miles of the Canadian forces base. One will find that there it is necessary to make a down payment of $20,000. It is ridiculous to think that a retiring serviceman would have that kind of money to put down on a house.

The government must accept the responsibility for inflation. If there is a point where inflation hits doubly, it is right here. I have received letters in which the men tell me that they have found homes but the cost is out of their reach. I have the letters here if anyone wishes to see them. I could read them into the record. I could also read, particularly for the benefit of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton, the comments of the President of the Canadian Corps Association on this point. For the benefit of some hon. members I believe I should place this on the record. The letter is addressed to the minister and is dated January 28, 1974. It states:

We would like to make some comments concerning your stand in support of the decision to phase out the Veterans' Land Act as of March 31, 1974. As you are well aware, all the veterans' organizations in Canada are opposed to a deadline, or any other form of limitation being applied to a veteran's eligibility for benefits under the Veterans' Land Act.

We refer specifically to the statements you made in the House of Commons on November 6, 1973 in answer to the address given by Mr. Jack Marshall, M.P. In your answer to Mr. Marshall you alleged that some veterans were attempting to take advantage of more than one of the three forms of rehabilitation which they were entitled to after honourable discharge from the Armed Forces at the end of World War II. We would like to point out here that there were many veterans who were not aware of the Veterans' Land Act or the university training program until after they had used up all their re-establishment credits. And, of course, they had to refund their re-establishment credits before they could become eligible for Veterans' Land Act benefits. So they were not trying to take advantage of two forms of rehabilitation, they were merely changing one for the other after they had learned of the existence of Veterans' Land Act.

I can say that here is one who, at that time after the war, was not aware of the Veterans' Land Act. I was a city boy. I attended university. It was only after I had been in university for some time that I became aware of this program, not that I would have availed myself of it but I heard of it only at that time. I recall this very graphically. The letter further states:

There is another point that has not been brought out recently as far as we know and that is the scarcity of housing that existed immediately following the end of World War II. This is why many veterans were unable to find suitable properties which could be financed through the Veterans Land Act at that time. Veterans and their families were forced to rent two or three rooms in someone else's house, or buy a place they did not want just to have a place to live. And then, when the housing shortage started to ease, the prices went up to the point where the monies available under the Veterans' Land Act were inadequate to meet the inflationary costs.

I wonder whether anybody remembers the inflation of 1952-53. There was an increase of 13 points in one year. At that time it was necessary to make changes in the Veterans' Land Act to increase the mortgage ceiling and the valuation of property. This is not the first time a government under Liberal leadership has seen galloping inflation and has had to react to it, but perhaps the reaction was a little more prompt in those days than it is now. The letter continues:

And this is why they were unable to take advantage of the Veterans' Land Act later on. So you can see that the veteran was caught in a giant squeeze-play, first from the one side by the housing shortage, and then from the other side by rising costs, and then the game is called in the third quarter because the timekeeper wants to go home early. The solution to this problem is to keep the Veterans' Land Act in operation and to bring it up to date with changing conditions and rising costs.

Perhaps I might interpolate here that that is precisely what the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), myself and many others in this House have tried to impress upon the ministry. That is the purpose of this motion. I realize there are others of my colleagues in this House who wish to speak, and therefore I shall end my remarks briefly after quoting further from this letter:

You stated that many qualified veterans still serving in the Armed Forces are already established under the Act and that others are in the process of doing so. You say 'many', not 'all,'. How about the remainder, and what percent of the total do they constitute? How can a man stationed in West Germany or the Middle East go about finding suitable property in Alberta or Ontario?

I will ask the minister that question. He failed to answer it. When I finish my speech he can answer. How can a man who has given notice, who is presently posted away from Canada, as many men are, make a selection of property, and how can he complete the necessary documents in order to meet the deadlines and the tables laid down in the act? The minister can give the answer. Hopefully there is one.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Sure there is.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I continue reading from the letter:

You say that you are satisfied that the vast majority of veterans who hold Veterans' Land Act qualification certificates simply took the precaution of obtaining such a certificate before the deadline of October 31, 1968. This is just like the precaution they took in 1914, and again in 1939, to ensure that no enemy soldier set foot on Canadian soil, except as a prisoner of war. However, they were not so cautious with their own personal safety a lot of the time.

Finally, in connection with the investment of $1.25 billion of public funds, there has been a great deal of money made in interest, and the value of this investment must have at least tripled by this time. With the interest rates as they are now, and the properties as security, what better way is there to invest public funds? We believe that the public would be well satisfied to know that their money is invested in this way.

I should like to underline Mr. Heesaker's remarks. This country invested millions and millions of dollars in the free education of its veterans. How did this pay in dividends? This brought uncounted hundreds and hundreds of per cent in profit to the nation. It invested millions and millions of dollars in veterans' housing, farms and so forth. This was paid back. We are not asking the minister to provide any more money in grants. This is not to be a government expenditure. This is to advance more moneys for mortgages which are to be repaid. We ask for more faith in the remainder of veterans who would be entitled to benefits under the VLA.

The letter goes on to read:

In view of the above facts, we believe that a veteran should be eligible for benefits under the Veterans' Land Act until the day he dies. He offered his life in a time of crisis and this is little enough to give him in return and at the same time you are investing public money in a very profitable venture.

On many occasions I have put my views on record on this, and all I can say is that yesterday I told the minister in connection with Bill C-4 that, although it contained many good things, I was bitterly disappointed at what it failed to contain, and doubly more disappointed at the reason why. This was done for fiscal reasons, not administrative reasons. Hell's bells, this government wastes more money in one day than it would cost for a whole year to carry out the program that we call for in Bill C-4.

I am bitterly disappointed that this minister—and he is a veteran entitled to the respect of every member of the House—has had to disclose to the House and to the veterans of Canada, who would be entitled to benefits under VLA, that this administration has closed the door. I think this is a crying shame.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Sir, although this is my first speech in the thirtieth parliament of Canada I hope I will be allowed to reserve the amenities and courtesies on the selection of our presiding officers to a later date, perhaps the budget debate. But I would not like the opportunity to go by without saying that your selection as Deputy Speaker was a personal joy to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: Now, because others wish to take part in the debate and the hour goes apace, I should like to make a plea, as short and simple as I possibly can, from a member who is a non veteran to a minister who is a veteran. I say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) that there is no way in which the people of Canada can thank him enough for what he himself personally underwent on behalf of this country. There is no amount of money that can ever compensate him for what happened to him, and there is no way in which Canadians can sufficiently express their gratitude, although we have tried in a humble way with various programs in the Department of Veterans Affairs.

However, I must say that I think he was wrong when he said at the veterans' meeting in St. John's, Newfoundland, that the time had now come to put the veterans' problems in the same category as the problems of the older members of our population. I think that was wrong, because we make exceptions almost every day in our treatment of distinctive segments of the Canadian population. For example, a few days ago there was a considerable feeling, among members of the House at least, as to whether the Indian housing problem was being properly tackled. And so the story goes, but I will not take time to list other examples. Obviously we are a House which is capable of drawing generalizations, but also capable of making exceptions to those generalities.

My sole point in rising at this time is to say that I think most Canadians have no objection to continuing every veterans' program to the last veteran who is left in Canada, expensive though that program may be, because it is a distinctive way in which we can say thank you to people who have allowed Canada to be what it is today.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. I want to answer the hon. member opposite. He asked me if I was claiming, with regard to a person who wanted to establish in Alberta and who had served in Germany—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the minister but I must point out that to allow the minister to speak at this time would be to give him the floor a third time. This can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Are hon. members ready to allow the minister to answer the question, with the knowledge that there are other members who wish to speak?

Mr. Marshall: I myself would certainly be willing, Mr. Speaking, but there are members here who have been waiting to speak for some time and they should be granted an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair cannot guarantee any time before six o'clock.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think that in the circumstances we cannot give our consent at this point. But we do not want it to be construed as refusing the minister an opportunity to answer the question put to him. However, in the circumstances we cannot give him our consent at this time because of the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I suggest that if there is a minute left before six o'clock, we could come back to the question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, having listened to this debate I realize that there is a point that some of my friends on the government side have missed. Many of them have said, and have freely acknowledged, that there are still many problems that veterans are facing who did not obtain certification in 1968 and for whom, for a number of reasons, it is impractical now, in the remaining months of existence of the Veterans' Land Act, to make application. That has been freely admitted by a number of government speakers, but they have all said that they recognize this, and of course in time and on a proper occasion they will consider doing something about it.

● (1740)

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) ended his speech with what can be termed the pious hope that his government would, of course, if there was a single injustice give it appropriate consideration at the appropriate time and, I suppose, do something appropriate. What the government is asking us to accept is the elimination of a bill that gives rights to veterans which the minister admitted they have, Mr. Speaker. It was not too long ago in this House that he said, as recorded at page 948 of Hansard:

> It should be made quite clear that we are not doing this as a favour to veterans but simply as a right which they have earned.

That right has been accepted by the government. That principle has been accepted, yet hon. members on the government side have said it will be done away with because it has outlived its usefulness. But they have not said what they are going to put in its place. I repeat that, Mr. Speaker. Not a single member on the government side in this debate has indicated what the government intends to do to secure those rights that it has admitted do exist. That is the weakness in their position. It is more than a weakness; it is a glaring defect in the logic of their utterances.

I am not going to get into the question of whose motives are sound and whose are right. I did not enter this debate to quibble over the sincerity of hon. members in the matter, and I would hope that some of those who have quibbled about it will not quibble about sincerity of motivation the next time they debate in the House. The reaction of hon. members this afternoon has been quite evident.

It has been suggested that we are in this situation today because the government was forced into legislation which gave the right to 25 members, upon petition, to have a matter reviewed. It has been said that the Veterans' Land

Act should be reviewed because it has no further purpose. I should like to remind some of my friends on the government side of the wording of the motion of November 9, 1973. My hon. friend from York East was not here then, but this motion obtained unanimous consent in this House and it was his colleagues, sitting in the House on that day, who approved it. The motion reads:

> That this House requests that the Minister of Veterans Affairs give urgent consideration to the amending of the Veterans' Land Act regulations to permit veterans to acquire small holdings, even if the main purpose of most of the older veterans now applying for loans under the Veterans' Land Act is to meet their housing requirements, it being the view of this House that entitlement to a piece of this land ought to be the right of any veteran.

That is the issue, Mr. Speaker. That is what the government agreed to last November 9. That is why this motion is before the House today, and none of what they agreed to then has come about.

It is not enough to come in front of this House and say, "We have decided, despite what we agreed to a year ago, that we are not going to amend that legislation. We are going to do nothing to secure those rights. We are not going to continue the legislation and make amendments which would put into effect the principle to which we agreed on November 9, 1973. We are going to eliminate it; take it right out of the legislation."

But that is what the government is doing, and it is doing it without offering us any commitment that something will be placed before us in substitution. I say that with all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, and I ask every one of my friends on the government side to ask themselves quietly in their own consciences if they believe that something will be brought in as a substitute, and what commitments they have that this will be done. I have the answer already, of course. The answer is that they do not have a clue whether they are going to do anything or not.

I ask one other commitment from hon. members on the government side. After they defeat this motion today, after they have wiped out this legislation which their minister admits secures the rights of veterans, will they search their consciences and go to work to make sure that very soon substitute legislation is put before the House so that the rights, which the government agreed to a year ago, will be reasserted at the earliest possible time?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think I was just about to bring up the same point because no other member seems to be standing to participate in the debate. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) under Standing Order 37(2) has right of reply, having moved a substantive motion. I wonder if we could come to an agreement to allow the hon. minister, in a short speech with allotted time, to answer the question that was asked?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that question was asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and I rose to say that we would consent. I have spoken to the minister about that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we will allow the minister to give a short answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me if I could explain how a veteran serving in Germany could select a piece of property on which he could become established, and I told him I could explain. A year and a half ago regulations were passed, approved and accepted to the effect that a soldier serving in a foreign land could select an agent to do this. That is how it is done and that is how it has been done. A number of veterans have thanked me for this.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have had a good many experiences in my years in this House but I think this is the first time that I ever had the privilege of concluding a debate that I started.

In connection with this two day debate which was provided for in a statute that was passed in March, I want to say how much I appreciate that speeches made by all members but I have to say that in particular I appreciate the speeches of those who have supported this motion.

I am still conscious of the events of the last session of parliament. Because of that I am surprised that there are those on the other side who have spoken as though we should not have brought this motion before the House of Commons. Not only was there complete unanimity on November 9, 1973, to the motion put in my name and seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), which was again read a few moments ago; there was, also, on March 28, 1974, unanimous approval for the amendment to the bill we had before us that day, which provided for this debate to take place. Indeed, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) in speaking to that amendment said, on behalf of the government, that the proposal was welcome.

In other words, last March this House, at the very time it was extending the Veterans' Land Act for another year, said that we would welcome the opportunity some time after September 30 to debate the matter again. That is what we have been doing. We have been carrying out in the past two days the will of the House, as expressed by the House of Commons last March.

Because I have the right of reply, I am allowed to speak until the last minute. But it is not necessary for me to do so. Rather, I should like to speak for just a few minutes, and in doing so to deal not with the unimportant things which have been said by members on the other side, but to deal with what those on the government side seem to regard as their strongest argument.

Liberal after Liberal has said that it is time for something better, and that they are going to oppose this motion, that they are going to oppose the continuation of the Veterans' Land Act beyond March 31, 1975, because veterans should have something better with respect to housing. That would be a good argument if there were anything to it. But, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs was very clear yesterday. All he was able to say is this: The matter is being studied.

There was no suggestion that any legislation is being drafted. We have been given no assurance by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) that his department is dealing with the matter. So, we are being asked to let the Veterans' Land Act, a piece of legislation that deals with housing for veterans, die on March 31, 1975, with no assurance that there will be anything to take its place on April 1, 1975—indeed, there is no real assurance that there will ever be anything to take its place.

How my friends opposite could have fallen for that argument is, to me, a mystery. Some of them are new members and they do not know that the government can make promises but not come through with them. Member after member on the other side has said, "We are going to vote against the motion, against the proposal to continue the Veterans' Land Act, because we are in favour of something better." But where is that "something better"?

I join with those who have expressed belief in the minister's complete sincerity and concern for veterans. I say to them, and I say to the minister, that if it is true that there is to be veterans housing legislation, that is all the more reason to let this legislation stay on the books until that time comes. That would show that the government means business. We fear that if this legislation is allowed to drop, then in the weeks and months ahead, when the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and I, as well as others, stand up and ask where is that veterans housing legislation, the answer at first will be that it is being considered, it is under study; then, after a while, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs will stand up and say, "Well, the veterans have available to them the government's general housing legislation."

I predict that this could well happen, and the idea in the mind of the Minister of Veterans Affairs might never come to pass. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that without any guarantee that we are to see such veterans housing legislation soon, or ever, it would be utterly irresponsible for this House to let the Veterans' Land Act die.

I must sit down, Sir, before you call it six o'clock. The clock is going faster than I thought. I know that the government has stated its position, and I know that Liberal after Liberal has said he will vote against the motion. But, Sir, in that 15 minutes between the putting of the motion and the vote, during that time when the bells are ringing for 15 minutes, or however long they may ring, there will be time for the government to rethink its position.

What will the position be if the government decides to let this motion pass? It will not actually extend the Veterans' Land Act. The motion calls on the minister to come back to the House within 15 sitting days and tell us of the result of another review. In effect, that is all. This motion, if passed, will simply guarantee another review, another statement by the minister within 15 sitting days. The issue will remain open. But a defeat of this motion is, in effect, a statement that the Veterans' Land Act is going to die on March 31, 1975. I do not think the House of Commons should say this at this time, just a few days before Remembrance Day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thank all those who have participated in this debate. Each has expressed his views. I hope that we will now, by our vote, show where we stand with respect to the rights of our veterans.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Debate on the motion being terminated at this time, it is my duty to put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the motion, pursuant to the special order adopted previously. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

At 6.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX "A"

SPEECH BY THE HONOURABLE ALLAN J. MACEACHEN TO THE WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE,

ROME NOVEMBER 6, 1974

Mr. President, I wish to join those who have spoken before me to congratulate you on your election to preside over our proceedings. You bring to your high office a range of learning and of experience that bear directly on the matters we have before us. The acclamation by which you were elected expressed the confidence of this conference in your capacity to help us bring our deliberations to a fruitful conclusion.

I should also like to pay tribute to the Secretary General of the Conference. He, too, is no stranger to the problems we shall be surveying. His special credentials are reflected in the quality of the preparatory work that has been done. Given the importance of the conference, there has been all too little time to set the parameters of our discussions. Nevertheless, it seems to my delegation that we have rarely entered upon a conference where the issues have been set out with greater clarity or the solutions with greater realism than in the documents the Secretary General has put before us.

This conference is engaged on a mission to seek the elimination of hunger—man's oldest scourge and the most persistent enemy. Together with the Law of the Sea Conference in Caracas and the world population conference in Bucharest, it is part of a process of reassessment of man's global relationship to the resources that sustain him that may yield us a new consciousness of the global responsibilities carried by every nation and people. We in Canada will not shirk these responsibilities, and are willing to play our part in furthering those common endeavours which bear promise of helping to produce a lasting freedom from want for all mankind—but the endeavours will remain barren if they are not truly common and truly sustained.

Hunger must today be tackled at every level—at the family, village, province, country and region as well as the global level, for no unit of society bears any graver responsibility than that of feeding its people. In our present world community we are everywhere faced with an agonizing awareness of starvation wherever it occurs; and finding means to harness production around the world to alleviate it poses a challenge to our ingenuity as well as to our compassion. We in Canada recognize that our farmers can grow more than they do at present. To that end, we have recently taken several policy initiatives that will not only ensure that producers will have more stable and satisfactory returns, but that they will have a better transport and storage system to get their products to market. We believe that these initiatives will permit Canadian agriculture more nearly to reach its potential. We must however remember that, whatever food may move internationally, most men for the foreseeable future will inevitably remain dependent on the food produced near to their neighbourhood markets.

It is for this reason that Canada emphatically supports the development of increased food production capacity by developing countries as the key to an anti-hunger strategy. Where opportunities for efficient food production exist my government stands ready to accord it a high priority in our assistance programs Canada has always been responsive to requests for assistance in this area. We are now carefully re-examining the skills and resources that may exist in Canada suitable for assisting the development of new agriculture and fisheries capacity in developing countries to determine practical ways of making them readily available. We therefore intend to have a matching response for countries who set about energetically to mobilize their internal food production resources and who give a high development priority to efficient food production.

We know from experience that expanding food production on a secure basis is not easy. It demands adaptation of land and water, technology, research, finance, modernized storage and transport facilities, marketing organizations, planning, and government services; all of which may require changes to traditional modes of life. Increased production is also facing barriers arising from supply shortages of certain inputs, notably nitrogenous fertilizers. No deus ex machina will remove these impediments overnight, and each country must come to terms with them in its own way. Where Canada can help to make these problems more manageable it will, and it will strive to see access to inputs maintained internationally on an equitable non-discriminatory basis.

The situation of the "vulnerable groups" in food-deprived areas is a reproach to us all. The spectacle of two hundred million malnourished children, and of nursing mothers suffering on a similar scale, makes a mockery of the ideals professed by every society. The malnourished children of today must somehow be enabled to become the wellsprings of tomorrow's prosperity. This conference should determine upon effective ways for directing a greater volume of food to these groups, and make them priority recipients under international food assistance programs. UNICEF and the world food program, not to mention the voluntary organizations who form so much of the vanguard in this struggle, must be given the resources to develop programs to this end which are truly effective. Canada intends to play its full part in this effort.

We cannot ignore the fact that in the immediate future there will be substantially increased demand for food imports in a number of countries that cannot pay for it. The food aid programs of many donor countries have hitherto been facilitated by the existence of "surplus stocks", which are now non-existent. Food aid is consequently falling off just when it is needed most. Yet the people fed by "surplus stocks" cannot be counted "surplus people", and their needs cannot be written off. Canada has seen its commitment to these programs as a commitment to international solidarity and to human compassion. We do not intend to abandon them now. Food aid donors, and indeed all prosperous countries, have an obligation to maintain these flows while emergency conditions persist, and should expand them if possible.

Conversely the recipients, past and future, have an obligation to take every reasonable measure to augment the availability of food locally, in order that food need not be diverted from those who are unavoidably hungry to feed those who are avoidably starving.

Canada accepts the main elements of a long-term food aid policy which have been recommended to us. I shall now set forth the specific response of the Canadian Government to these recommendations:

First, the Canadian Government accepts the concept of forward planning; it has decided to make its own commitment for the next three years.

Second, it agrees with the concept that, if the eroding effect of sudden price increases on the levels of food aid is to be avoided, the best way of pledging food aid is in physical terms, that is to say, in quantities of food rather than in amounts of money.

Third, Canada supports the setting of a minimum target for world aid flows of 10 million tons of foodgrains a year.

Fourth, in pursuance of these principles which we have accepted, Canada hereby commits itself to supplying an average of 1,000,000 tons of foodgrains annually for each of the next three years. In pledging thus more than a proportional amount towards the total target, we have had in mind that it is a minimum target and that we are facing a situation of extraordinary gravity. We would hope that other traditional and new donors will subscribe with us to the objective of surpassing the minimum target.

Fifth, Canada is prepared to increase substantially the allocation of commodities other than foodgrains for food aid purposes.

Sixth, we accept the proposition that multilateral food aid programs have operated to good and beneficial effect and that their continued effectiveness must be buttressed by adequate resources. Accordingly, we are prepared to channel approximately 20 per cent of Canada's food aid through these multilateral programs. In order to carry out this commitment Canada will make a supplementary contribution to the world food program.

This, Mr. President, is the substance of Canada's response to the situation of acute distress that is confronting us.

In the longer term there is clearly a need to define more closely the circumstances where food aid is appropriate, and avoid the disincentives it causes in indigenous production. There is merit in suggestions that grain stocks for emergency relief be set aside on some consistent international basis, and arrangements made for their rapid mobilization when needed, and we will help pursue this question.

Canada has long been a proponent of grains arrangements that would augment world food security and of other measures to this end. At last year's FAO conference Canada supported the principle of a voluntary undertaking on world food security and since then has participated actively in the consideration of alternative texts. The voluntary undertaking that is before the conference contains a framework of objectives whose attainment would be a significant world achievement. Canada endorses the undertaking, and will, once suitable country coverage and implementation arrangements have been concluded, become a party to it. We must not blind ourselves, however, to the fact that much work remains to be done, particularly among the countries chiefly concerned, to make meaningful food security a reality. In this demanding and detailed task Canada will participate fully.

World food security in its broadest sense can only be attained by the prudent management of food supplies at every level—a situation where governments, growers and traders in every country use their best judgement and foresight to assess probable needs and supplies. Canada has provided a key element in world food security in the past through its supply management and maintenance of stocks. This task is one we would be happy to share more widely. Improved information can play a big role, and we hope to see all the countries at this conference contribute extensively and accurately to the proposed early warning system. Food-importing countries have an evident self-interest in improving their storage capacity, which would augment world security. On a longer-term basis security is most likely to come from providing producers and traders with stable expectations of a financial return commensurate with the value of their product—a value which few people anywhere today would be inclined to denigrate.

Two allied international fields of concern are inextricably bound up with the food problem: international trade, and the preservation of the environment.

Canada has long supported a general liberalization of trade in food products, in order to encourage the efficient producer and thereby provide more abundant food at reasonable prices. This is one of our main objectives in the impending trade negotiations in Geneva. We recognize that certain food-importing countries face an enormous challenge in meeting their food bills in the short and medium term, and that this dilemma arises in some respects from factors beyond their control. This payments problem extends into every aspect of the economies of the countries concerned, however, and it is principally through general financial measures, including those taken within the IMF or IBRD, that Canada would expect to see this problem attacked. We are confident that the Geneva trade negotiations will follow the directives to the Tokyo ministerial meeting of the GATT in September, 1973, and secure additional benefits for the trade of developing countries, and Canada will strive to see this accomplished within a non-discriminatory trading framework.

In the longer-term perspective mankind has no choice but to arrange his feeding in harmony with a balanced use of all the earth's resources, or his civilization will go the way of those of Nineveh and Babylon—which destroyed the soils that fed them. The World Population Conference of Bucharest marked the first, albeit halting, step towards using a full range of policies to control the pressures exerted on this planet's resources. Progress in this area must be accelerated. Already we are experiencing declines in catches of certain species of ocean fish, and the sea is not the only resource whose capacity might come to be tested in the foreseeable future.

World food production has maintained a precarious adequacy through notable research accomplishments and through the application of modern technology. To gain further ground these efforts must be redoubled, but our perspective of the problem must also be widened so that entire eco-systems can be used to greatest advantage and a lasting equilibrium can be achieved.

Mr. President, I have outlined in some detail the Canadian position on the various elements of the world food strategy that the Secretary General has set before us. We recognize that this strategy, if it is to bear fruit, will require a reordering of priorities on all our part. We also recognize that it will require the mobilization of vastly greater resources for agriculture both nationally and by the international community. We believe that the time to set this world food strategy on its right course is here and now by this conference.

As an earnest of Canada's commitment to the solution of the world food problem, I am pleased to announce that the Canadian Government has decided to allocate at once the sum of $50 million of Canada's development assistance to be used in ways which will make an effective impact on the present critical situation.

The primary aim of this conference, as we see it, is to produce at every level of society an awareness of the affront to the human conscience that hunger constitutes, wherever it exists, and a determination to make its elimination a basic policy goal of all governments represented here. If that is to be the result of our conference, its conclusions cannot be allowed to implement themselves. We must try to ensure that we have the mechanisms that will enable us to monitor and review the progress that is being made, to correct the strategy when and where it needs correcting, and to see to it that existing and new resources are used to promote agricultural development in a coherent and effective manner.

It is our view, Mr. President, that in this essential process of pursuit, full advantage should be taken of the experience and the established competence of the organizations that have a contribution to make to the solution of the world food problem. This is not to say that all should remain as it is but that we should approach the matter of institutional arrangements with economy and good sense.

On October 30 the Prime Minister of Canada met in Ottawa with the premiers of the ten Canadian provinces to discuss the problem of inflation. My Prime Minister took this opportunity to raise with his colleagues from the provinces the world food problem. They told him that they were also preoccupied by it and that provincial governments were prepared to cooperate with the Government of Canada in contributions to the resolution of the world food problem. I think this vividly reflects the seriousness with which Canadian people view the problems before this conference.

Future generations have a claim on our intelligence and our compassion, as do today's, and if we do our work well they may come to look back on this conference as the starting point for the development of a global process that gave each man, in truth, his daily bread.

FOOD PRICES

SUGGESTED CONTROL OF PRICE OF BREAD AND MILK—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43. The consumer price index released today by Statistics Canada shows the largest September to October change in 24 years. Bread, milk and sugar combined to push the food component up by 1.4 per cent. On September 4, 1973, the Prime Minister introduced a program to subsidize domestic wheat to keep down the price of bread and a five-cent per quart subsidy to keep down the price of milk. In view of the dietary importance of milk and bread and in order to ensure that Canadians on lower and fixed incomes will not be deprived of these two vital elements of an adequate diet, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That in the opinion of this House the government should give immediate consideration to introduce measures to control the spiralling cost of bread and milk in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

STATISTICS CANADA

ALLEGATION ADVANCE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO MINISTERS—SUGGESTION THAT PRACTICE BE STOPPED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. It being reliably reported that the departments of government, and perhaps as well ministers, are receiving reports of Statistics Canada sometimes several days in advance of their being made public, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on this report and whether he will give the House assurance that any such practice will be discontinued immediately?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I make one general comment and then ask my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to answer more fully. My opening comment is that this is not a new policy. It is a policy which has existed since the 1950's and was followed, for example, by the administration of the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to say to the minister that his statement is false. Documents were delivered to the press and to the public on the same day as received and were not kept under cover for several days as is the practice of the present administration.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the House that that is not my information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Your information is generally wrong. We have found that out.

Mr. Gillespie: We have made full and very extensive inquiries and have been assured that this is a long-term practice and I believe for very good reasons. The general public expects ministers to be fully informed of selected indicators of the country's economic performance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you have been asleep on.

Mr. Gillespie: The government at the same time is continually reviewing the needs of departments in this connection and for that reason we have a departmental committee examining the practice at this time.

Oral Questions

ALLEGATION ADVANCE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO MINISTERS—REFLECTION ON CREDIBILITY OF ISSUING AGENCY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Acting Prime Minister as the acting spokesman for the government here today. I did not ask whether this had gone on before. We all know there used to be conflicts of interest in bygone days which are no longer tolerated. I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether in fact this is taking place and whether he will give the House assurance that it will be discontinued because its existence in modern day conditions, in view of the importance of Statistics Canada's credibility being beyond question, places that institution in a very bad and very unfortunate light. Also in view of the suggestion that the Chief Statistician has been trying to get this practice stopped I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he will in fact see this is stopped and not try to talk about what has happened in the past.

● (1410)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has said, the government has this under review. I should like to say to the House, however, that the reason I explained that it was a long standing practice was to make it clear that it did not originate with this administration or that there had been any changes that would in any way have reflected on the integrity of Statistics Canada. I think that the information should be made known to the government as soon as possible. As I understand the situation, Statistics Canada does not hold back any publication in order to give the government advance information, either now or in the past. It is simply that when certain crude information is available, it is available to the ministers who can take action on it as quickly as possible. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition would expect that the government should get vital information of this kind as quickly as possible so that it can adapt its policies as quickly as possible.

Mr. Stanfield: I am surprised that such a Liberal as the Acting Prime Minister would justify some practice because it has been done for years in the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Starting in 1963.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether this practice does not unfortunately put the Chief Statistician and Statistics Canada in a very bad light. Does not the existence of this practice tend to undermine the impartiality and the independent position of that agency, and if it is the view of the Chief Statistician that this practice should stop and that information should be made public at the same time as it is made available to the government, will the Acting Prime Minister and the government accept that view and remove Statistics Canada from the invidious position in which the government is placing it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that Statistics Canada is put in a compromising position by letting the government have certain vital information as quickly as possible. If there was any suggestion—which the chief statistician has not made—that she was under any pressure, that would be a different matter. She has never alleged that. Indeed, I think it is quite clear that she has never been subjected to any pressure to change any of the figures that have been published.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

ALLEGATION ADVANCE INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO MINISTERS—SUGGESTED QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege. In light of the very damaging revelations made by the Acting Prime Minister today—

An hon. Member: Headlines!

Mr. Baldwin: —which support the statement made by the Chief Statistician who is the deputy, under the statute, of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and in light of the fact that it has obviously been admitted that members of the cabinet who are members of this House and as such in a political sense receive advance statistical information resulting in the delay and the suppression for definite periods of time of this vital information so essential to the members of the House and to the public, if Your Honour finds there is a prima facie case of privilege I would move the following motion:

That the extent to which the government in general and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has engaged in the practice of suppressing or delaying publication of statistics of urgent public importance for one or more days after Statistics Canada has reported them to him be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Did you have any other dreams last night, Jed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to get some of those officials on the witness stand.

Mr. Baldwin: I will be glad to interpret it for Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has sought the floor on a question of privilege and has outlined what he alleges to be a prima facie question of privilege. The preamble contains an allegation that there has been disclosure today of some untoward withholding of information by the ministry which is in receipt of that information, particularly the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who I presume, without at least on the face of it further argument, would be in receipt of that information in the course of his duties. At the moment, I cannot be persuaded that that represents a prima facie question of privilege. If further information of that sort comes to light and is pressed by the hon. member for Peace River or any other member, that the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or any other minister has in fact in any way deliberately withheld or in any way used deception in the possession of that information in the carrying out of his duties, that might form the basis of a specific charge to that effect by a member with the concomitant results well known to members on both sides of the House.

I find, however, that the general allegation of a standard of conduct which is perhaps less than the perfect standard which might be observed by other members were they in the position of the minister is perhaps a criticism of the ministry but it does not in my opinion constitute a prima facie case of question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East on a supplementary.

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH LOW INCOME EARNERS' CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has to do with Statistics Canada. In view of the fact that low income earners in Canada spend a much larger proportion of their incomes on certain components of the Consumer Price Index such as food and shelter than does the average Canadian family, would the minister instruct Statistics Canada to institute a low income earners' index which would adequately reflect the effects of rises in the cost of living specifically on low income earners?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to refer that representation to the Chief Statistician.

HOUSING

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE ON LOANS TO PROVINCES FOR PUBLIC HOUSING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Housing. Since the 10.3 per cent increase in the housing index portion of the cost of living figures released today represents the highest increase for a comparable period of time in the past two decades, and since interest rates account for a major proportion of the increase, can the minister explain to the House the incredible decision made by his department last week to increase the interest rate on money going out to the provinces for public housing from 10 per cent to 10⅜ per cent? Given the need for more public housing and the need to solve the problem of interest rates, can the minister explain why the government last week increased its own interest rate to the provinces.

● (1420)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice of CMHC to lend the provinces the funds necessary and agreed upon at the rate at which we borrow from the Department of Finance, plus ⅜ of one per cent, I believe, to pay for handling. That has been the consistent practice except in specific areas involving programs with interest rate subsidies. We have done this in previous programs and will in future, and this fact will be reflected in new programs.

REASON FOR DIFFERENCE BETWEEN LENDING RATE TO PRIVATE DEVELOPERS AND TO PROVINCES FOR PUBLIC HOUSING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister knows very well that that is a matter for his decision. Why is the government lending money to the provinces, for public housing, at 10⅜ per cent, when it is lending money to private developers at 8 per cent? Why is it putting out money for public housing at an interest rate substantially higher than that made available to private developers for limited dividend housing?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a judgment which must be made. Interest rates have to reflect costs, to some extent, even when subsidized. In my judgment that is the logical way to provide money to provinces at a lower cost than the one at which they are able to raise it for themselves. They seem quite happy to accept it on that basis and we provide a subsidy in those areas where we see specific benefits.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED DIVERSION OF FUNDS FROM CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS INTO HOUSING

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Since one of the government's stated cures for inflation involves increased supply, will the government consider cutting back on its stated intention to spend some $128 million during the current fiscal year for federal government buildings in the Ottawa area and divert funds to the much needed housing sector?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there was a general understanding on the part of the provincial premiers, when they met the Prime Minister and me—

An hon. Member: Before or after coffee?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That was after coffee, Mr. Speaker—there was the general understanding that, in certain overheated areas of the country, it might be wise to postpone or orchestrate capital building in favour of residential housing. This is something I want to take under consideration. I will give the hon. member a fuller answer on budget night.

REDUCTION OR REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS—INCLUSION OF LAND COSTS IN COMPILATION OF CONSUMER PRICE INDEX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. As the consumer price index for October illustrated that housing costs were again on the increase and as the CPI does not include land costs, which have registered the most dramatic increase in all housing factors in the compilation of the housing component index, would the minister now consider either removing or reducing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and including the land factor in future calculations of the CPI, to ensure that Canadians are informed about the true increases in the housing component index.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the components of the index are a matter for Statistics Canada. The hon. gentleman's question really relates to a budgetary matter. I might say at this stage that the prime thrust in the rise in the cost of living, although it involves housing and clothing components, was primarily owing to the increase in food costs, particularly foods having a sugar based component.

Mr. Baldwin: Surely, with four days' notice the minister could have done better than that.

AGREEMENT WITH QUEBEC ON URBAN RENEWAL—INQUIRY AS TO PROJECTS PRESENTED BY MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Following the signature of an agreement with the province of Quebec concerning Bill C-133 on urban development, could the minister tell the House whether many municipalities have submitted projects in order to benefit from this legislation?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the agreements were signed fairly recently. I am not aware of the specific projects which have been submitted to the provinces on this matter but I will be glad to get the information and inform the hon. member.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House whether, under the terms of this agreement, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is provided with regular information concerning the application submitted by the municipalities?

[English]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure I will be aware of them. However, I believe this will be handled through the Quebec Housing Corporation.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

SUGGESTED NEED FOR MEASURES TO INCREASE PRODUCTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. As the minister has stated many times that the only effective way to combat inflation is to increase production, and as Statistics Canada have reported that the index of real domestic product, which is the real industrial growth of the country, has actually decreased during the last six months, showing less than zero growth during that period, will the minister advise if the country can expect programs to be introduced in the budget to increase production in this country which will be far more effective than those which he presented in his last three budgets?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the increases in capacity and production, both in the agricultural and industrial spheres, are of course an essential part of the government's program, although not the only part. I will be glad to reply in more detail to the hon. member's representation on budget night. I know he will be here.

STATUS OF MEETINGS WITH VARIOUS GROUPS ON PROPOSALS TO FIGHT INFLATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. For approximately two months now the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have been talking about a co-operative effort to fight inflation and fairly share the national pie among wages, prices and profits, something in which we are all interested. Have these get-togethers, referred to by some as social get-togethers, with groups in the economy come to an end and are substantive and formal talks, based on concrete government proposals, about to begin and, if so, when?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, they have been in progress. I hope to provide further clarification to the House on budget night. As the program develops, it will be fully apparent to the House and the people of this country.

MANPOWER

PROPOSED CONFERENCE ON INCOME DISTRIBUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. It is in the same vein, respecting wages, prices and profits and, in particular, income distribution. In view of the statement made by Mr. Lawson, president of the Canadian Manufacturing Association, that there are labour shortages on one hand and inflated unemployment benefits on the other while employers search for workers to man their plants, and his subsequent call for a national conference to discuss income distribution, composed of governments, organized labour, farmers, consumers and businessmen, will the minister act upon Mr. Lawson's request and call a conference at an early date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give the representation of the hon. member and his chum, the president of CMA, full consideration.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGAR—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO CONTROL PRICE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. With the wholesale cost of sugar rising over 400 per cent in 11 months and the industry predicting it will go to $75 in mid-November and $120 by January, when will the minister step in and stop retail prices from this skyrocketing spiral which could bring sugar to $1.50 a pound retail?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I previously answered a question relating to sugar in this House and I said that the government would soon announce its policy. I would therefore ask the hon. member to wait for this announcement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—PROPOSAL BY UNITED STATES TO ESTABLISH EXPORT PLANNING GROUP

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. At the World Food Conference in Rome today, the United States proposed a new export planning group which is seen by many in Rome to be another rich man's club in control of vital commodities. Will the Canadian delegation in Rome be instructed by the government to insist that any such new group have representative membership of rich and poor nations so that a power cartel on food will be avoided?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. member. I will take his suggestions under consideration.

Mr. Roche: Recognizing the Acting Prime Minister will want to examine the United States proposal in detail, may I ask whether he will now give his assurance that any food authority established at the Rome conference will be truly international and that Canada will insist on this?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, that will be in accordance with established government policy.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGAR—ALLEGATION LARGER AMOUNT IN STORAGE THIS YEAR THAN LAST—INCREASED MARK-UPS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The hon. gentleman informed the House that he had answered questions on this subject earlier. But the people of Canada are not asking for sugar-coated ministerial statements. They are asking for action.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister tell us whether or not an inventory has been taken of the amount of sugar in storage in Canada? Do present stocks amount to a great deal more than at this time last year? With prices rising at an outrageous rate, and sugar refineries making tremendous profits, surely we are entitled to a better answer than being told that some day, some place, we shall be advised as to what is happening.

Does he realize that the sugar refineries are before the courts today? I do not say whether they are guilty or not guilty. But if they are found guilty, the amount they have been able to mulct from the Canadian public in the last few weeks would pay several of the largest fines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are several aspects to the question raised by the right hon. member. I do not think I could examine all of them during the question period; I can however assure him that, as far as I am concerned, my department has assumed its responsibilities and has initiated proceedings against three Eastern Canada refineries. Also, we support the Plumptre board's recommendations concerning rates. Moreover, we are waiting impatiently for the hon. Minister of Agriculture's recommendations as to the possibility of increasing to a certain extent sugar production in Canada. Finally, we support the efforts of the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning international agreements.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have heard all those exculpatory statements over and over again. Is it not a fact that there are in storage today on behalf of the sugar corporations of Canada larger amounts of sugar than were held last year certainly, or for several years, and that the prices of the stocks on hand and purchased at lower rates than today are now being marked up and up day by day, whereby totally unconscionable increases are taking place?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: If what the right hon. member is saying is true, I hope he will support the steps I will take when I introduce a profiteering bill later on during this session.

TRADE

REASON CANADA NOT NEGOTIATING WITH CUBA TO PURCHASE SUGAR

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My supplementary is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and I hope I don't get any sweet talk. The consumer price index indicates that sugar prices have more than tripled over the last year and I note that Cuban sugar is being sold to us at $4.57 per cwt. while Australian and South African sugar are considerably more expensive at $6.47 and $6.02 per cwt. respectively. Would the minister explain why Canada is not negotiating with Cuba for more substantial imports of raw sugar?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The primary reason is, of course, that the sugar trade is carried on by the private sector. In this connection I think the hon. member might be interested to know that imports of sugar from Cuba have increased in recent years. In 1974 it is estimated Cuba will supply between nine and ten per cent of Canadian requirements.

Mr. Rodriguez: Can this House and the people of Canada expect that the government will step in to make sure that the public is able to buy sugar and its derivatives at reasonable prices rather than being ripped off by the sugar cartels?

Mr. Gillespie: I have already informed the hon. member that companies in business in the private sector have increased their imports from Cuba. These amounted to 47,000 tons in 1973 and I understand that imports in 1974 should be in the order of 97,000 tons.

Mr. Ellis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not at all sure that this is a valid point of order but when the hon. member for Nickel Belt was asking his question he talked about sugar being sold at $4.00 a cwt. and $6.00 a cwt. and the minister read his answer back, though everyone knows the price of sugar is over $60 per cwt., not $6.00.

An hon. Member: The minister does not know that.

PARLIAMENT HILL

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF DEMONSTRATIONS TO CERTAIN AREAS

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It arises from the increasing number of demonstrations on Parliament Hill, the anxiety these demonstrations cause and the impediments created by them. Would it be possible to restrict these demonstrations to an area of the Hill where they would not interfere with normal business and would not cause consternation—

An hon. Member: It is their parliament, too!

Mr. Flynn: —to many Canadians and visitors from abroad who have a perfect right, also, to be on the Hill.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): I will look into that question, Mr. Speaker, but it is my understanding that matters relating to Parliament Hill and its use for demonstrations or otherwise fall under Your Honour's jurisdiction.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF INTERIM REVIEW BY DEPARTMENT IN VIEW OF EXPECTED SURPLUS RATHER THAN DEFICIT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In view of the fact that the Annual Review of the Department of Finance is released in early spring and would now be many months out of date, does the minister intend to publish an interim review before November 18 so that we can put his budget proposals in proper perspective?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The hon. gentleman will recall that in the last three years we have been publishing an Annual Review at that time regardless of the particular date on which the budget is presented. I hope to bring the hon. gentleman up to date as best I can during the budget presentation itself.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I ask that question, Mr. Speaker, because in the budget of May 6 the minister was calling for a budgetary deficit of some $450 million during the fiscal year. The other day, however, he indicated that a budgetary surplus of some $598 million was now expected. I should like to know whether this spread, amounting to more than $1 million, is the result of any change in fiscal policy or whether it is a measure of the standard of government forecasting?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a matter with which I intend to deal in some detail on budget night.

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR PROHIBITION OF USE OF LOSS LEADERS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

In view of the fact that last year the NATCD began campaigning to make the government aware that this country's small businesses are disappearing because of the tremendous growth of concerns which resort to more or less fair methods to accelerate their growth, I would like to ask the hon. minister, in view of Bill C-2, whether he would be ready to favour the addition of a clause recommending that the sale of loss leaders become, through that bill, an offence under the act?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be pleased to examine clauses of that type, the more so as Bill C-2 provides that such a practice as that mentioned by the hon. member would be illegal, if the price is ridiculously low and likely to limit seriously competition. I think this is another example of the urgency to amend our competition act and I hope the hon. member will persuade his colleagues on the other side to support my action.

SUGAR—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF REDPATH, ATLANTIC AND ST. LAWRENCE REFINERIES TO ACCEPT ORDERS FOR FUTURE DELIVERIES TO SMALL PROCESSORS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs aware of the practices of the big three sugar companies operating in Canada, namely, Redpath, St. Lawrence and Atlantic, of refusing to accept orders for future delivery of sugar to small processors, which is the usual custom for supplying larger firms, and of their only supplying these small processors on a short-term pickup basis?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to be provided with all the details on the type of activity the Redpath Company is indulging in. If the hon. member wants to give them to me, I will gladly accept them and pass them on to the officials of my department for them to take necessary action.

WALKOUT OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—POSSIBILITY OF SETTLEMENT—INVESTIGATION OF METHODS TO SETTLE FUTURE DIFFICULTIES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in view of some uncertainty as to the actual status of the railway walkout, can the Minister of Labour enlighten the House on the actual situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe the matter is presently being resolved and I am awaiting another report at any time.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, as more than 1,250,000 workers will be involved in wage settlements in the coming year is the minister actively pursuing methods such as voluntary arbitration or final offer in dealing with this type of walkout?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the discussion we are now undertaking with labour, business and industry is designed for that very purpose, to see if we can through some type of tripartite arrangement find better ways of avoiding work stoppages of this kind.

In connection with the hon. member's first question, I think the House will be pleased to know that I think an agreement has now been reached, subject to confirmation, between the railway unions and management in respect of the ensuing year.

MEDICAL RESEARCH AT UNIVERSITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I should like to direct my question to his parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Southwestern Nova. In view of the fact that federal support of medical research at the University of British Columbia has been significantly decreasing, and that on October 15 the Canadian Medical Science Community presented a brief to the minister on the immediate need for increased funding, does the minister now feel convinced of the need for greater assistance to medical research at the University of British Columbia and across Canada?

HOUSING

SUGGESTION $500 GRANT TO BE RETROACTIVE TO JULY 1, 1974

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Would the hon. Minister inform this House whether he has considered the possibility of making the $500 grant provided for new house owners retroactive to July 1, 1974, rather than to November 1, 1974?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did consider that and rejected it. I did agree that it would be retroactive from the date of the announcement, when the legislation is passed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I had intended to wait until the end of the question period, but since the minister has dealt with a similar question I will raise it now. In response to one of my questions I think the minister inadvertently misinformed the House. The question concerned the new interest rate the government was charging the provinces under section 43, which has gone up to 10¾ per cent. The minister replied that the rate was still such that the provinces would want to borrow money from the government as they could get it cheaper there than elsewhere. I am informed that precisely because it is now at this rate it will undermine the public housing program as provinces can get the money cheaper elsewhere. Would the minister inform the House whether he was talking about the old rate or the new higher rate announced last week?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I have had no indication that the program is undermined or that the provinces are rejecting any money at these rates. On the contrary, they seem to be moving forward and we are co-operating with them. I do not say I am satisfied, or that anyone is satisfied with the degree of activity, but we are trying to escalate it. I will be introducing new legislation to this end. We have not had a bad record, or all that we want to see, but we want to build from there.

DIFFICULTIES WITH GO-URBAN MAGNETIC TRAIN—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the frontpage headline in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the province of Ontario's Go-Urban magnetic train is having difficulties and in view of the fact that this system was intended to be used in other places, particularly Ottawa, has the government of Canada been asked in any way to assist in this matter to overcome these difficulties?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman knows that we are working very closely with the government of Ontario in attempting to form only one corporation for the purpose to which the hon. member has referred. In addition to that, our own transportation development agency in Montreal is working on a device similar to the one which has been put under contract to Krauss-Mafei of Germany.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ESCAPE OF FIVE INMATES—LETTER REQUESTING VISIT BY JOURNALISTS TO CELL BLOCK ONE

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in view of the much publicized letter directed to the Solicitor General warning of a "blood bath killing spree" by extremely dangerous escapees from the maximum security block at Laval Penitentiary, would the minister advise the House of the intended response of his government to the threat? In view of the fact the minister almost a week ago received a promised report on the breakout, will he make a full statement on motions regarding this serious situation rather than continuing to ignore this House in favour of government by press conference?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deny the last allegation. I have answered all questions put to me on this matter in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Very often the press has better questions than I get in this House, therefore they get better answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Yesterday I received a call from a lawyer in Montreal who conveyed to me the contents of a letter he had received from two of the escaped inmates, one being Richard Blass, in which they complained of conditions in cell block one of the Laval temporary maximum penitentiary. They asked that we permit the entry of a group of journalists into the institution and that there be an improvement in the conditions. Let me say that we have always taken the position that we should try to improve and humanize our institutions and also improve the security, but we do not intend to let inmates decide for us how our penitentiaries should be administered.

● (1450)

On the other hand we have always permitted the entry of the press into the institution unless there has been some serious incident. I have consulted with the officials of the penitentiary service and we have agreed we will in this case permit entry of some journalists into the Laval maximum security institution under certain conditions. I will be getting in touch with certain journalists in this regard.

With regard to the report in question I received it on Monday this week. There were findings in the report of maladministration and negligence. There were 16 recommendations, 14 of which have to do with improvements in the institution and we are already taking action on this. There is one recommendation in respect of discipline and this is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to do so, but I find myself having to do so because of the minister's continued refusal to make a statement on motions about this very serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows very well that is not a valid point of order.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. O'Sullivan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member indicated at the beginning of his remarks that his alleged point of order had to do with the alleged failure of the minister to make a statement on motions. Unless the hon. member has another reason, that is not a valid point of order.

Mr. O'Sullivan: Mr. Speaker, my point of order refers to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition at page 134, section 159(2) of which I am sure Your Honour is aware. It reads:

> A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

My point of order is that the minister's failure to make a statement on motions makes me very aware of the fact that the minister was reading his answer and the minister must now under the rules table the entire document.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The citation to which the hon. member has referred deals only with instances in which a minister of the Crown in making an announcement or in making a comment or speech in the House refers to an existing document of some sort in the possession of the minister of the Crown which is not in the possession of the House in which case he must identify it and lay it on the table. Certainly, documents, in that sense were not intended to cover brief notes the minister may have in order to prepare himself to answer the questions put to him during the question period.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell the House how the merit system can continue to prevail under the program as announced yesterday?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I did not announce any program yesterday, Mr. Speaker. Legislation on this matter was passed by Parliament a few years ago. A resolution has been concurred in by the House in 1973, to the effect that there would henceforth be in the Public Service bilingual positions, positions where English would be essential, positions where French would be essential, and positions where both English and French would be required. It is within this policy adopted by the House that this program will be implemented.

GUIDELINES FOR MINISTERS ON ACCEPTANCE OF FREE TRANSPORTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Would he indicate if any guidelines have been set for cabinet ministers and their families as to when they may or may not accept directly or indirectly free transportation or other accommodation from those in the private sector and if so would he table the guidelines. If not, will such guidelines be set and tabled?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such guidelines. I am sure the cabinet ministers, all my colleagues, observe principles of good sense and avoid becoming in any way indebted to anyone else.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary again directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of his earlier question and in view of the fact that El Al, Israel's state airline, has two seats available on its regular flight from Israel to Montreal on Monday, would the Acting Prime Minister cause the Minister of National Health and Welfare to be informed that it would be preferable for the minister and his wife to use those seats rather than return on the Bronfman jet as he has so brashly stated he intends to do.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED UPWARD ADJUSTMENT OF LOAN CEILINGS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question, if I may, to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the incredible rise in building costs now being experienced in Canada, and the particularly severe restraints being placed upon the provision for and construction of hospitals, nursing homes and low rental housing, would the minister agree to instruct Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to upwardly adjust its loan ceilings in order to meet this particular pricing problem with very little expense to the Canadian taxpayer.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member that the loan ceilings are constantly under review in view of the fluctuating situation and variations in different parts of the country, and I think we should bear in mind that the ceilings tend to become minimums. By setting realistic ceilings we have seen programs which have been extremely successful. The minimum price for a house in certain areas has come down to meet the ceilings we have set.

Some hon. Members: Where?

Mr. Danson: So long as members ask where, I would ask them to just look at the advertisements in the Toronto Daily Star which appeared on the same day as the announcement which the hon. member for Broadview made that houses were not available at or below the ceiling in Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Last Friday I invited the minister to take me around metropolitan Toronto and show me any homes that were priced at less than $45,000. He did not take up the invitation. I checked the newspapers on the weekend and I found only one builder who was advertising homes at less than $45,000. He advertised them for $39,000 and up. I would again ask the minister to show me those homes in the Toronto area that sell for less than $45,000.

An hon. Member: Perhaps a small condominium.

Mr. Danson: I rise on the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think the hon. member has put his question of privilege to place allegations on the record which I think should not be allowed to stand, as was the case with the previous reports. I have sent the hon. member a newspaper advertisement showing condominium housing and row housing. If the hon. member is going to delude voters in his constituency into thinking that inexpensive single family dwellings on inexpensive lots in major municipalities around Toronto are still here, I think it is a delusion.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—LETTER REQUESTING VISIT BY JOURNALISTS TO CELL BLOCK ONE—METHOD OF SELECTING JOURNALISTS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: It is always nice to know that one is welcome among friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: My question is for the Solicitor General, and it is supplementary to one which was asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth. I should like to establish what is in the mind of the minister, if anything, in connection with his reply that some members of the press would be admitted to examine cell one and cell one conditions. The question that the press has been putting to him is whether they will be permitted to examine the conditions at cell one, and if there will be a selection, how will that selection process be carried out by the minister. Will all members of the press be invited to visit the cell, if they so please, or will they be selected so that only certain members will be allowed to visit?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You can't get them all into the same cell.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Obviously we cannot allow all the journalists in cell block one—it would not be big enough to hold them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Get them in there and keep them.

Mr. Allmand: But we are following a precedent made a few years ago when there were some allegations with regard to one of our institutions. In that case we invited the leading newspapers of Montreal to send anybody they wished to visit the institution. We will do the same thing in this case.

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in reference to another example of concealment of information on the part of the ministry. Yesterday, answers, or what purported to be answers, were tabled in reference to several questions. Two questions were submitted by me, Nos. 525 and 526, and another two by the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, questions 159 and 388. The reply from the government in all cases was that the government does not maintain records which would enable it to trace the subsequent careers of those who at one time served ministers in the capacities listed. In order to answer this question, the answer goes, it would be necessary to review the personal file of every individual employed in the public service of Canada. Obviously, that is false because all that is necessary is to review the files of those who have worked in the offices of ministers, and this is a task that is relatively simple. Our concern in putting these questions is simply that the government is bypassing the Public Service Commission and in its efforts is politicizing the public service of Canada.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Labour recently indicated, I believe, that there was a negotiated settlement, temporary or otherwise, regarding the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Workers. I wonder if he is aware of the fact that according to the Ottawa Journal of today's date there are still some 235 CN employees on strike.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I resent the attitude of that gang over there. I was going to assist the Minister of Labour, but the government members cannot understand that.

This is the report on the feasibility of constructing a railroad from the Far North to Alberta. I have here four copies in French and four copies in English.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: I wish at this point to refer to the settlement which the minister had indicated had been reached. At the same time I am not sure that he is aware of all the circumstances as indicated in the Ottawa Journal of today. Apparently there are some 235 CN employees still on strike. There is no staff at the Ottawa Station or Walkley yard. Ticket sellers, redcaps, baggage, freight and express handlers, have all left to hold meetings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period is concluded. The hon. member may have a further follow up question, a supplementary question, or indeed is endeavouring to assist the minister to clarify his earlier statement, although that may be fortuitous on his part. The question period has come to a conclusion and I can scarcely regard further questioning of the minister on the same subject as a point of order at this time.

After that is concluded we will return to the consideration of Bill C-32, the Petroleum Administration Act, which, after receiving second reading, will be referred to the committee of the whole.

Tomorrow we shall consider Bill C-27, the amendment to the Customs Tariff. Tuesday, November 12, and Friday, November 15 will be allotted days under Standing Order 58. I want to point out that I was using the figures for raw sugar landed in Canada and I believe the hon. member for Hastings was talking about the price for refined sugar.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the weekly announcement of the Business of the House may I ask the President of the Privy Council a question. Will he at an early date, or will the Minister of Veterans Affairs with the approval of the government House Leader, be introducing a motion which I am sure can be passed without debate, giving a term of reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs so that that committee can hear certain veteran organizations.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member we will give sympathetic and urgent consideration to his request.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION AND POWERS OF COMMISSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-13, to amend the Northern Canada Power Commission Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we are not going to oppose this motion provided we can obtain an assurance from the government House leader that we will not be impeded in calling those witnesses in committee whom we on this side of the House consider essential to the clause by clause examination of the bill. If we can have that assurance now, there will be no problem in giving the bill second reading now and sending it to committee; but we do not want to encounter, in committee, a rejection of the request to call witnesses by the government majority on the committee.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to commit hon. members. Members of the committee are all members of the House of Commons, just like my hon. friend, and would not want to receive instructions from me.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the government House leader can go so far as to say he will prevail upon his colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan), and perhaps even the chairman of the committee, to assist in the meaningful work of the committee by providing that there will be no impediment to the calling of witnesses. We are prepared to hasten the bill along by giving it second reading now, as long as we can be given that assurance.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, of course I cannot give assurances on behalf of other members of the House. I will see that sympathetic consideration is given to the request of the hon. member, but I am in no position to commit my friends on this side of the House or those on the other side.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT

AMENDMENT TO GIVE BOARD AUTHORITY TO MANAGE OTHER FUNDS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-17, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

FIRE LOSSES REPLACEMENT ACCOUNT ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION OF ACT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-18, to amend the Fire Losses Replacement Account Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I seek the same kind of assurance from the government House leader, namely, that he will speak to his colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) along the same lines as my representations on Bill C-13.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of co-operation and friendship which I extend to the hon. member on his return to the House, I give that undertaking.

Mr. Baldwin: Parliament is alive and working.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Monday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Oil and Petroleum

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, prior to calling it ten o'clock on Monday last I had expressed my concerns and those of my constituents on the issue of resource taxation and the groundwork that this legislation lays for the forthcoming budget proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). While recognizing the need for the paramount position of the federal government in national issue areas such as energy, it has become increasingly evident that the intent of the government is to supersede innately provincial responsibilities.

Moreover, to do so by confrontation can only serve to further damage the economic climate necessary for the resource industries to reinvest in this country. Without the necessary co-operation and co-ordination of policies between the provincial and federal governments, we will continue to see the decline in exploration as witnessed in western Canada by the departure of approximately 28 per cent of the heavy duty capacity oil drilling rigs. The result of this, coupled with continued uncertainties over taxation, the lack of concrete energy policies, aggravated by continual intergovernmental quarrelling, is that resource industries can hardly be expected to remain and continue to reinvest in so hostile an atmosphere. In the end, communities such as I represent in Kootenay West, whose lifeblood is based on the resource and energy related industries, will suffer.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help observing that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) could not address himself to this bill without reference to government takeover of companies now drilling for oil. The hon. member wants the federal and provincial governments to drill for oil. With his party's policies now being demonstrated by the Saskatchewan government, it will not be long before that will be precisely the case, because nobody else wants to drill for it. Now that the Saskatchewan drilling rigs have left for the Dakotas and elsewhere, where is the technical know-how, the skill and experience to do the job? That is the very thing this nation neither needs nor wants, namely, another massive bureaucrat created from the monster of nationalization.

Mr. Speaker, many members have expressed grave concern about the constitutional validity of part III of Bill C-32. Certainly I have expressed doubts and concerns, and I urge the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) to demonstrate an understanding of our concern and to recognize that what we in opposition are really saying is that this is a good act; just clean it up a little. We are saying that we support the minister's good intentions. This bill will benefit Canadians, but just as surely as attempts were made in this House on Tuesday to challenge the authority of the Speaker, so part III challenges the authority of the provinces. It is confrontation without consultation, and no good will come of it.

When the people of Canada—who are also the people of the provinces—realize they have been had, they will remember four years hence. I further state that this feeling of national frustration will increase after the Minister of Finance brings down his budget—a budget that I predict will be a further erosion of the British North America Act, a further erosion of the oil and gas industry in Alberta, a further erosion of this industry in Saskatchewan, and it will give the mining industry of British Columbia a final shove on the slippery slope of socialism whereon it has already commenced its downward slide. That, Mr. Speaker, in broad terms is the industrial condition. What about the provincial governments and federal government confrontations? I can hear the constitutional battle; this House and all provincial legislatures will ring with the sour notes of bitterness and alarm.

Finally, I would end with a question. In the past few months we have witnessed the uncertainties created in the poultry industry and in the eyes of the consumer over the subject of rotten eggs. The government has responded with a review, a study of the problem. In fairness, we must await recommendations regarding this unsavoury problem before, hopefully, solutions are implemented. For over a year we have witnessed uncertainties in the beef industry. In many cases these uncertainties have been calamities—calamities to cow-calf operations and calamities to the sensibilities of Canadians viewing the slaughter of 600 calves. The government has responded: we will get a review of the beef industry. Again, in fairness, we must await recommendations before, hopefully, solutions are effected.

But once Bill C-32 becomes law and still contains the constitutional glove in the face, part III, how will this government respond? What possible review, what possible recommendations will it make that will not leave the bitter taste of doubt and mistrust in the provinces of this nation. And as an extension to that question, and speaking to the future, I ask, what possible review and what possible recommendations will this government make if the Minister of Finance further erodes federal-provincial relations with a raw resources taxation policy that may well break the back of the mining and petroleum industries of Canada? Let us have an energy policy, Mr. Speaker, but an energy policy that the minister can sleep with, that the opposition can agree with and that governments and the people can live with.

I note from the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, November 7, that the Minister of Finance is now expressing concern regarding the fouled-up federal equalization formula. The minister said he will be presenting a proposition. It has been my experience that every time I have heard a proposition, somebody is had. In this case it will be the provinces. I note, further, that the Minister of Finance is thinking in terms of a short-term arrangement. That, too, sounds like a proposition and a further indication of the failure of this government to develop long-term planning. Again we see, according to the press, the further probability of federal-provincial confrontation. What future propositions will the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources have in store both for the provinces and for the people.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, today we are considering Bill C-32, a bill to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade. This bill is similar to the one introduced last April. Since then, conditions have changed. However, I still feel that some of the powers proposed in this bill should not be granted. I feel now as I did when I last spoke on this legislation.

Before commenting on any specific clause, may I point out that I have asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) questions concerning the export tax on oil produced from lands owned by Indian bands. I refer particularly to Alberta, although this matter applies also to other provinces. So far my questions have been ignored.

In September, 1973, the government introduced an export tax on oil. It promised to give back 50 per cent of the tax to the producing provinces. The other 50 per cent was to be held in the federal treasury, to be used for research in resource development. Subsequently, the government realized that it was levying the export tax on oil produced on Indian lands. That tax money was accumulating in the federal treasury. Although the federal government had collected the export tax from October, 1973, to April 1, 1974, the Indian people have not had the benefit of one dollar of that tax. I raised this matter in my speech of April 8 when we were considering the previous bill, and the minister said he would look into it. Eight months later the money remains in the treasury. At least, I hope it is still there. I do not know how many millions of dollars are there for the benefit of our native peoples. Perhaps the minister will clear up this matter either in the question period or in committee.

When is the government prepared to distribute this money to the Indian bands? Rightfully it is theirs. It will help them to build houses, to buy machinery, to raise their general standard of living and, as in my riding, to purchase the equipment necessary to farm their lands. This would mean they would no longer need to rent land. I submit that although the future development of the tar sands will benefit our Indian people, the bulk of the benefit will go to the rest of Canada. The tax money referred to belongs to the Indian people. They should be allowed to invest it as they see fit in order that they may improve their prospects. As the government has been tardy in turning over this money to our Indian people, it should, when it does pay it back, pay it back with interest accrued for the last eight months. One could argue that the tax collected since April 1, 1974, with respect to oil produced on Indian lands should be returned to our Indian bands. The amount, insignificant on the national scale, is most significant to the Indian people of this country.

The government, in its last budgetary proposals, wanted royalties paid by oil companies to provinces to be not deductible from income tax which those companies might owe the federal government. In essence, that proposal would have resulted in double-taxation of oil producers. Canadian oil and gas companies would pay income tax on moneys collected as royalties by provincial governments. Nowhere else in the world is a company required to pay tax on royalties it pays to a government. Ignoring the constitutional ramifications of the foregoing, which others have dealt with, let us examine how the $11.70 per barrel of oil is broken down. The federal government collects, at present, about $5.20 per barrel in export tax. The provincial government collects $2.60 per barrel as royalty. This leaves the producer with $3.90, $1 of which is consumed in lifting and overhead charges. The producer is ultimately left with $2.90 a barrel, which is the total amount of money available to him for the purchase or lease of acreage, exploration costs, paying the hundreds of small, independent companies to drill the wells, investment in new facilities and, of course, profit.

Should the producer be required to pay a tax on the provincial royalty, the breakdown would be as follows: $5.20 would still go to the federal government as an export tax, $2.60 would still be the provincial royalty. However, there would be $1.96 in income tax, $1.44 of which would go to the federal government. The provincial government would collect an extra 52 cents as its share. This would leave the producing company with $1.94, out of which $1 is taken for overhead and lifting charges. In the final analysis, if this bill is passed the producing company will receive 94 cents to cover all the costs I have mentioned, out of $11.70 for a barrel of oil. That is a mere pittance.

In order to find new oil, oil companies must go to the peripheral parts of the provinces, such as the tar sands in the Athabasca area of Alberta, and the Arctic. They say that to find new oil costs between $3.50 and $6 a barrel. Admittedly, they have old oil which they found at a much lower cost. However, when they average these costs they simply cannot make it on 94 cents a barrel. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) reintroduces this budgetary measure, the producing companies will receive much less money than at present. This is a matter of grave concern to provinces which are producing oil and natural gas.

Because of the lead time necessary, we must immediately move to construct transportation and production facilities to bring oil and gas to the markets of this country. Capital investment is needed for this development. In the event that the profit margin of the producing companies is substantially decreased, the oil companies will be forced to move out of exploration and go to countries which provide the incentives that so many are now providing. At the moment Canada, at current rates of production, has enough developed, recoverable resources of oil and gas to last between 10 and 15 years. These recoverable resources are estimated to account for only one-third of the oil actually in place. It is possible to guarantee 100 years of oil needs and 250 years of gas needs through coal gasification, and so on. The oil sands of Alberta are estimated to contain 300 billion barrels of oil easily recoverable by the mining method, and perhaps three times that amount through new technology.

Even given the fact that energy demands will increase from present levels, and consumption will double, the resource base is sufficient to ensure that Canada will not run short of energy for many decades. However, only through exploration can such a long-term supply be guaranteed. Without this exploration Canada will face oil shortages in the future, not because of lack of reserves but because of short-sighted policy. Smaller, independent companies recently have been playing an increasing role as explorers in western Canada. These companies do not have sufficient internal cash flow to undertake the required exploration; they, necessarily, rely on capital from investors. But the capital will not be forthcoming should a climate of relatively unstable legislative and regulatory conditions prevail. The indecision reflected in government policies concerning an energy policy, and frequent changes to existing legislation, tend to make investors wary of possible future changes.

Other countries, notably the United States, are providing constant incentives to stimulate domestic exploration of oil and gas and to further research development with regard to other possible sources of energy. Proposals for restrictive tax changes are being sidetracked in the U.S. and Americans hope that by 1980 the country will be self-sufficient in its energy supply. If royalties are subject to taxation, significantly more money will be paid in income taxes from the profits earned by oil companies; little will be spent on exploration from retained earnings because the return on investment will be relatively insignificant. A loss of investor confidence will result and will preclude raising funds from Canadian or outside sources.

Surely Canada should follow the example of other nations by allowing the producing companies their present production income. Only this will encourage further resource development. The producing provinces have the right to benefit from their resources. In Alberta, one-third of the population depend on the oil industry, directly or indirectly, for employment. The province could not afford to lose this industry. If royalties are declared no longer tax deductible when the budget comes down, compensation will have to be made to the companies by lowering the royalty rate.

A large portion of the moneys the province collects as royalty must be used for the development of new industry and alternative sources of employment for the time when conventional oil supplies run out. For example, the Leduc field, discovered in 1947, lies entirely within my constituency. It provides employment for many people in the area, and these people are genuinely concerned about the future when the oil supply is depleted. Many are raising families and would like their children to remain in the area. Consequently, it is imperative that the province of Alberta develop new industries in the region, industries that will provide alternate sources of employment when the oil supply exhausts itself.

However, even given the fact that the government of Alberta will, in the face of budgetary proposals, be forded to lower the royalty rate, it may perhaps be too late to assuage the damage. Because of the uncertainty already created by the May 6 budget of this year, and in view of the possible imminent budgetary measures imposing taxation on royalties, the industry may disappear before it can be saved by the provinces.

I strongly feel that there is a dangerous precedent being set in the price-fixing proposals for oil and natural gas as outlined in Bill C-32. The government is seeking to wrest resource control from the producing provinces by giving itself the right to fix prices with or without provincial agreement. For example, should a province withdraw from the agreement or should the agreement be deemed ineffective in the opinion of the governor in council, the federal government may then, unilaterally, by regulation establish the price of oil—clause 36—and natural gas—clause 52—in that province. Surely this represents an infringement on the jurisdictional rights of the provinces. It is questionable how far a federal government may go in establishing price mechanisms affecting the provinces. What the bill really says is this: I do not wish to play the game if I cannot win.

Part V of the bill, in particular clause 89, gives the government the right to appoint persons who shall have the authority to enter premises and examine and seize records of any company or province importing or exporting oil and natural gas. This provision, again, serves to reinforce my submission that the federal government is attempting to gain control of matters which should rightly rest with the provinces. Not only are the rights of the provinces infringed upon by the legislation presently before us, but total disregard of this House and the parliamentary process is evident in the contents of Bill C-32. The bill contains 95 clauses, 30 of which would confer complete discretionary power on the government, the governor in council, the minister or various boards. Specifically, there are 11 clauses granting power to the governor in council to act by regulation and by order in council. These wide regulatory powers should rest with the House rather than the government.

The government wants freedom at all times to establish an export tax on oil. As a result, the industry would be subject to a tax which varied from month to month according to government whim. The government is also seeking a free rein to grant exemptions from tax to anyone it wishes. That is in clause 12. Surely if these powers are granted, they should be subject to close scrutiny by a parliamentary committee, which in turn would present its findings to the House of Commons.

Mr. Alexander: Hear, hear!

Mr. Schellenberger: The imposition of an export tax, particularly one which fluctuates in accordance with the whim of the government, poses a threat to the nation as a whole. It is a dangerous attempt to secure all the finances possible from other countries in order to subsidize our own industry. The minister has stated that the export tax against the United States should be increased. Has he stopped to think of the ramifications of such a move, or of similar moves, upon the economy of Canada? Other nations are likely to react to taxes in a reciprocal fashion. Take, for example, the case of fishmeal from Peru or bauxite from the West Indies. Nations have examined the oil pricing of the OPEC countries and in response have set higher prices for their own rare commodities, even though the price at which they were previously selling those products to Canada was bringing in considerable profit.

Because the imposition of an export tax results in an unstable market, with consequent insecurity of employment and indeterminable profit margins, companies are already moving their expertise elsewhere. There are, in Canada, approximately 360 drilling rigs operated by 55 contracting companies. Of these, 341 rigs and 47 companies are located in western and northern Canada. The drilling contracting industry provides an essential service to the petroleum companies, and any policy designed to squeeze justifiable profits from oil companies will have a more severe impact on independent companies than on the five large international firms. This means the Canadian drilling industry will suffer severely, because it is the smaller, independent companies which carry out the bulk of the drilling operations. Only incentives for increased markets and a higher profit margin would enable these companies to attract the necessary funds to carry out their high level of activity. On Friday, November 1, the Globe and Mail carried an article which read:

> A total of 39 drilling rigs has been taken out of Canada this year to work in the United States and overseas along with about 250 key people who own or operate the units . . . Most contractors say they are leaving northern and western Canada because of the lure of substantially better financial returns elsewhere . . . The hardware is in growing demand in the United States where a rush to find new crude oil and natural gas supplies has brought into use almost that country's entire inventory of approximately 1500 land-based units. In addition, Middle East countries, particularly Iran and the Persian Gulf states, require more drilling rigs to develop their production potential. The economics of operations outside Canada are often better . . . Some contractors say they are "fed up" with uncertainties over taxation and energy policies in Canada. He (Alberta Premier Peter Lougheed) has laid the blame at Ottawa's doorstep for failing to bring about a climate conducive to resource development.

Canada must ensure that her resources are competitive on the international market. We cannot afford to hoard resources which are in plentiful supply, nor can we afford to leave them undeveloped. Mexico has recently found fresh sources of oil, there is great potential from Sweden and Norway in the reserves beneath the North Sea, and Russia and China are self-sufficient in petroleum resources. But Canada, which is probably the most wealthy resource country in the world, whether on a per capita basis or otherwise, may find herself a net importer of oil in as little as eight to ten years. As I mentioned previously, conventional oil supplies already proven will run out in approximately 13 years. If the federal government continues to socialize the industry, we may find ourselves a have-not energy nation rather than one possessing sufficient energy resources to assist underdeveloped countries. Approximately 12 OPEC nations have been discussing the possibility of rationing petroleum and petroleum products for internal consumption in an effort to assist other nations in the event of a crisis arising. If the government fails to provide incentives for the further development of our resources industries, Canada may be one of the needy nations seeking help from other, more developed countries.

I would like to speak for a few moments about the export tax provisions affecting natural gas as outlined in clauses 5 and 7. Natural gas has always been a strictly provincial commodity. Never has an export tax been charged on it. The imposition of such a tax, and the price fixing mechanisms covering gas as outlined in clause 52, are further examples of the government's trend toward socialization of our natural resource industry and the assumption of virtually complete control over it. Is this indicative of a move to gain control over all sources of energy? Will an attempt soon be made to control the pricing policies followed by the hydroelectric power industries of Ontario and Quebec and the coal industries of Ontario and the prairies?

Considerable sums of money are being taken from the provinces, yet they still have the expense of maintaining efficient health care and educational facilities as well as healthy resource industries. The province of Alberta is showing itself to be a great Canadian citizen by giving up $5.20 per barrel of oil, almost $6 million per day, or $1.3 million per year, to eastern Ontario. Do not misunderstand me: we are giving it graciously to our fellow citizens east of the Ottawa Valley. The wealth of others is of great concern to us.

Before closing I should like to mention one other matter. This party asked that a pipeline be constructed that would secure a supply of energy to eastern Canada and prevent the outflow of money to the coffers of the already overrich. This pipeline should have been built long ago. Its existence would have eliminated much of the discussion in which we are involved today and it would give us security of supply in the event of another energy crisis. In closing, I would offer a word of caution and advice to the government. Do not lose sight of the fact that past experience has proven that free enterprise and initiative are better alternatives to the development of a country than the socialization of its successful industries.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the previous speaker. Bill C-32 concerns the use of the exportation of our natural resources such as gas, oil, wood, any sector of our economy. It clearly shows that the government cannot make its own decisions, and that it has to rely on the scientific and financial advice it receives from the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canada should tell to the United States and to any other country: "We are our own men. We have natural resources and you envy us for this." They do envy us because they do not have such resources. They are equipped for processing products and we are taken advantage of by those who purchase our raw materials.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is better to tax Canadian exports to the United States than to tax Canadians. In any event, we note that the United States seem to have complete control over the development of our natural resources, and not only over oil and oil products.

When we listen to Premiers Barrett of British Columbia, Lougheed of Alberta, Blakeney of Saskatchewan and Schreyer of Manitoba, we are astounded to hear that they are threatening to separate from Canada and join the United States if we do not accept their conditions.

I am as much in favour of the Western provinces as I am of the Eastern provinces.

Some 30 or 40 years ago, when there was a drought in the West and oil had not been discovered yet, the Eastern provinces were sollicited, taxed and forced to accept certain conditions to help the Western provinces who were suffering most terrible hardships.

Mr. Speaker, we did not object to that, even though we heard some people say: "We are tired of supporting the West."

Nowadays, we hear the same type of people in the West say: "We have oil." Not so long ago, Mr. Harridence, a separatist from Alberta,—I appeared on television with him in Toronto—was saying:

[English]

"Let those eastern bastards freeze in the dark". Those were the words from your province.

An hon. Member: No, they were from Alberta.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): They speak in exactly the same way as the NDP out there.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) calls me Réal. At least, he knows my first name, as he knows also that I am right, because the situation is the same in Saskatchewan, not in the oil industry but in the potash industry. That government said: "Let us control it". Effectively it took over the industry, but prices are now three times higher in Saskatchewan.

[English]

An hon. Member: What about cars? Tell us about cars.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): The same thing applies. Why aren't you going to Europe to buy yourself a car? They are all built in the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection at all to the Premiers of those provinces standing up and saying: Well, we have resources and Eastern people must suffer because we do have those oil resources.

Mr. Speaker, I never heard anything like this in the province of Quebec, except from the mouth of separatists: Let the Westerners starve, we have too much fish, but let them die and dry up, because we are overproducing.

In 1929, 1930, 1931, 1935 and 1936, that is during the Depression, we in Eastern Canada have made every sacrifice to maintain farmers in Western Canada, and we did it without grumbling.

● (1600)

An hon. Member: We still are!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): We are still making sacrifices without grumbling. Today, we hear these people from Alberta, like Mr. Harradence, a lawyer, trying to teach us something. And a lawyer is supposed to be intelligent.

An hon. Member: He is supposed to!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): But he is not, that is clear, if he says that he was glad to let Easterners freeze in the dark.

An hon. Member: Tell that to Mr. Wagner.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Repeat that.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is not here at the moment and I want to stay in order.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand that kind of attitude. There are in Canada so much space and so many resources, enough to meet the needs of all Canadians, not only in one region, but all across Canada.

In Quebec, we have huge hydraulic resources. If we said to Ontario: "Listen, you do not have any, so we are going to let you die in the dark. We are not going to sell you any more electricity, because you are Ontario." We could say the same to the United States, because we export electricity there too.

Mr. Harradence, or others who think like him, should realize that if I had to resort once again to candles, to rags soaked in pig or beef fat for lighting I would be one of the first who would get angry and say to Quebec: "Give us electric power, give us power".

Mr. Allard: Give us "juice".

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I shall say like my colleague from Rimouski: "Give us 'juice'." That is right.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the position of those who say: "We are against the bill because it has been introduced by this government." What would the Progressive Conservative government do in its place? I followed in 1962 and 1963 with my colleagues then sitting in the House the struggle led by the Premier of British Columbia against Ottawa to obtain recognition of a treaty or trade agreement between the United States and the British Columbia government, namely the Columbia River Treaty.

The then Premier of British Columbia, W. C. Bennett, led the struggle against the then Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and pursued it under the Pearson administration in 1963 and 1965. It lasted seven years and it was recognized afterwards that the Premier of British Columbia was right. The Prime Minister of Canada, the President of the United States as well as the Premier of British Columbia then signed the treaty which is still in force.

Mr. Speaker, the natural resources belong to a province. Alexandre Taschereau, Maurice Duplessis and Jean Lesage were all for it and so is Robert Bourassa. The natural resources belong to a province, but it does not mean that the province must turn away from the others. We live in the same country, so the provinces should agree about their respective natural wealth. We need the gas of Alberta.

An hon. Member: Even in Saint-Hyacinthe.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Even perhaps the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe is now heated by gas which comes from Alberta.

Mr. Speaker, we may discover within two or five years oil deposits in the Atlantic as extensive as those in Alberta or British Columbia.

They say that there might be enough oil in the Alberta tar sands to meet our needs for the next 300 years. Who can say that, six months from now, in view of the search being carried out in the Atlantic and the Gulf St. Lawrence, there will not be, available to us, reserves easier to tap than the Alberta tar sands?

How short-sighted Messrs. Blakeney, Lougheed and Barrett are! When, five years from now, nuclear energy is used, not to kill people, but to serve them, who knows, natural gas might very well fall out of use. I do not mean to say that this will necessarily happen, but it might. The coal mines in Western Canada, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and elsewhere have been inactive for a great many years. Now, they are saying: We could use coal to make electricity. That is why they are trying to find openings on world markets for Eastern and Western coal; the day may come when we are unable to meet the demand for it.

Mr. Speaker, those are the facts of life, as far as energy is concerned: one year, you have enough, the next, you don't. This is not unique, for such is the case also in agriculture. Five years ago, they told cattle producers: "Your increasing production will be our salvation". Today they are saying: "We are in a mess now because you overproduced".

Faced with this dilemma, what are we going to do? Will the government make its position known, or will it let anarchy take over Canada? The same thing will happen in the farming and industrial areas, no matter the level of production or Bill C-32 which will impose an export charge.

I feel we should stop giving away our resources to the United States, saying: "Manufacture this material and rob us clean, selling it back to us whether at wholesale or retail prices".

Since we own the basic resources, Mr. Speaker, why not build our own plants to make manufactured goods and sell them ourselves? This would create jobs and replace the depression forthcoming clearly with prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, as I often say, iron ore is bought at Sept-Iles or Rouyn-Noranda at a rate of 2 or 3 cents per ton, and sent to the United States. It comes back afterwards in the form of cars, refrigerators, television sets, or any other manufactured product sold at prohibitive prices. The price of a car which was sold $2,000 two, three, or four years ago has nowadays climbed up to $5,100, while being made with primary products coming from the Province of Quebec or Canada.

An hon. Member: Dealers are the ones who make the profit.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Finance companies, rather. The hon. member says to me that dealers are the ones who are making the profits. Mr. Speaker, I for one am a dealer, and I will produce my balances in order to prove beyond any doubt that the Trader's Finance Company is making at least five times more money than I am in my business, by financing while I provide the services. The company is not accomplishing any concrete work and it makes profits, while we do all the job and we are the ones who lay out the money. This is where the difference lies.

Mr. Speaker, such things happen in the automotive industry, as one of my colleagues just said, and the situation is the same as far as energy production is concerned. We sell our energy to the United States, telling them: "Do something with it, then sell it back to us." This is where we get lost in assumptions of all kinds. What they do, we can do it in Canada. We have nothing to learn from them. All a responsible and sovereign government has to do is to make sure that our raw materials are put at the disposal of our secondary industries here.

Instead of giving them to the United States, let us sell them materials and manufactured products so that our dear friends, the Americans, may proclaim loudly that Canada allows them to go on living. These guys down there cannot live without the natural resources of our country. If we want to become masters in our own house, I think this bill represents a step forward. Let us say to the Americans that we are willing to sell to them but that they will have to pay us. Let us stop them from suckling Canadians. Let us tell them that they will have to pay for the work done by Canadians to serve them the Americans.

It is not because we have a grudge against them or because we hate them. No, we like them. It is because we care for them that we ask them to pay for what they take from Canada. Pay for the work done by Canadians, pay so that workers, farmers may be satisfied; pay so that Canada may be itself and so that the government may be recognized as sovereign.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I cannot take part in this debate without making a brief reference to the comments just concluded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette).

[Translation]

As it is not right to say that Mr. Lévesque speaks on behalf of the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), it is not right to say that Mr. Harradence speaks on behalf of all of us Albertans, especially if he talks as mentioned by the hon. member.

[English]

Having said that, I wish to advise hon. members of my concern about the danger that exists, in the sentiments referred to by the hon. member for Témiscamingue, in that in my native province of Alberta feelings might become extreme and serious if there is a continuing belief that it is the repeated thrust of federal policy to go against the interests of that province—just as there was the danger in the province of Quebec of civil unrest spreading when there was a feeling that federal policy was designed to go against the interests of that province. It is important that we recognize, in dealing with the legislation before us, that there is a real feeling that the major thrust of this legislation is directed against the two producing provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan. There are other aspects of the bill, of course, but there is a real sense that the constitution is being changed in an effort to diminish the authority now enjoyed by those two producing provinces. If that sort of thing continues, I think members from my province, and probably those from Saskatchewan, would agree that there is a danger that we will find ourselves in a situation where the determination to remain a creative part of the Canadian confederation will wane in that part of the country.

I do not intend to take up a great deal of time in this debate, particularly because many of the technical aspects of the bill have been discussed and many of its implications, not simply for the petroleum industry and the province of Alberta but also for the people who work in the industry and count upon the capacity of Alberta to industrialize in a secondary industry way. I share the view expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), that there is a real sense of insecurity now among my constituents with regard to living in the oil patch, as to how long they will be able to continue living in the towns where they are now, as well as how long the industry will continue to be there.

The point I wish to make with regard to this legislation is primarily with reference to the degree to which it represents an extension of federal power, an intrusion into the provincial domain. This bill, as has been noted by many others, is a change from the predecessor bill considered in the previous parliament. It is not, as was the other one, a temporary means to implement an agreement reached by heads of government. Instead, it is now a permanent means by which, to quote the minister himself at page 917 of Hansard, "the federal government will give itself increased powers". The excuse that the minister uses—he used it earlier in his remarks, as recorded at page 915 of Hansard—is that this extension of power is necessary "to provide for oil price restraint in situations where either such agreements cannot be reached or, having been reached, are terminated or are found not to be effective." The danger with that rationale is that it removes from the central government the incentive to come to agreement with the provinces on questions of this kind, and it also grants a most dangerous unilateral power to the federal government to act alone when agreements are not effective and consequently when it is in a position to use the increased power which it seeks in this legislation.

What we have here, when everything else is stripped away, is an attempt to acquire unilateral power to impose a price control system on a commodity regarding which primary jurisdiction has been vested in the provinces, under the Resources Transfer Act, since the 1930s. What is most frightening about this bill is that it does not stand alone: it follows similar action taken in the recent past and it sets a frightening precedent for the future, not only for the provinces directly attacked now, namely, Alberta and Saskatchewan, but for all provinces. The point has been made that this new, extended power would apply not only to oil and gas, and not just to Alberta and Saskatchewan, but to other resources in other provinces, at other times. What has perhaps not been emphasized enough is that this attitude of invading provincial jurisdiction is evident, not just in this bill but in other actions of the government, most notably actions concerning oil and gas but also potential actions concerning other matters over which the federal government has or might be able to concoct some kind of jurisdiction. It is important to note that this bill is part of a pattern of aggression against the petroleum producing provinces regarding the control of their resources. The point has been made several times, but I believe it needs emphasis here, that these are depleting resources and also they are the only means by which Alberta and Saskatchewan can develop the kind of secondary industry base which will ensure the maximum contribution of these provinces—provinces with great potential—to the strength and development of Canada.

I think I should mention, in passing, that another difference between this bill and the preceding legislation on this subject was considered in the last parliament is this: at that time there was general agreement about the need for some kind of quid pro quo; that if we were going to legislate an agreement by which the producing provinces surrendered potential revenue, we would have to compensate the producing provinces by recognizing their needs in transportation and in industrial development. I regret that there appears to be no mention now of such quid pro quo, no mention of compensation in other policy fields for the money that has been lost by the producing provinces under the agreement to which this legislation is giving body.

I want to come back to the pattern of aggression that has developed against the producing provinces. It began with the export tax which, whatever its justification, was imposed in a way that was absolutely unjustifiable because it was done virtually without consultation.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, a short while ago the hon. member commented on the minister's speech as reported at page 917 of Hansard, from which he quoted the following words: "the federal government will give itself increased powers". However, he neglected to indicate that that particular sentence is preceded by a number of conditions before these powers will be given to the federal government. I think I should draw this fact to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member may feel that he wants to draw something to the attention of the House. However, in fact he is not gaining our attention on a point of order but is, rather, intervening in the debate.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): I am delighted to hear from the closest thing to a prairie member of the Liberal caucus who has become their instant expert on energy questions. I am also pleased to note that he has lost no time in learning the tactics of diversion that have been employed by members of the government party on the front bench, as well as in this bill. I say this because whatever conditions appear to be attached, and however many clauses there are in this legislation, the simple fact is that the bill constitutes an attempt to intrude upon the jurisdiction which was granted to the provinces in the Resources Transfer Act of the 1930s and it is a clear attempt to increase the powers of the federal government.

I want to continue, now that we have witnessed some excitement on the other side, with a review of the pattern of aggression, of which this is only the most recent part, which began with the imposition, without consultation, of an export tax a year ago. It is a pattern which was continued with the proposition of a tax on royalties in the budget speech. I make the point here that whatever the diversionary attempts of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the thrust of this proposed tax then, as it might be now, was not a question of revenue but of jurisdiction. It is not money that is at issue here; it is the question whether the federal government or a provincial government has the right to exercise a controlling influence over a national resource within a province. As was made abundantly clear by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) in his opening remarks on this bill, the use of the taxing power to try to accomplish other goals, particularly other constitutional goals, is contrary to the constitutional practice of the country.

● (1620)

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question at this time with respect to a statement which he just made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. Will the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) permit a question?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I am delighted to indulge the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais).

Mr. Blais: My question is whether this power would cover distribution of a particular gas and the selection as to where it will be directed within the confederation.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has a great deal to learn about the constitutional questions involved here, but I thought he knew that question was settled as being within the federal domain. What is not settled, and is being threatened now, is the right of the provinces to enjoy primary authority, as enacted by this parliament in 1930, over natural resources. That is what is at issue in this second act in the pattern of aggression against the producing provinces, of which this bill is the most recent example.

I must say now that in light of unilateral imposition, without consultation, of the export tax, in light of the recognized although unstated goals of the proposed tax on royalties, we on this side of the House, and certainly members from Alberta, must entertain certain suspicions about the government's motive in renewing interest at this point in a formula for repatriation of the Canadian constitution. We have to ask whether the motive for this most recent announcement is, in fact, to repatriate the constitution or whether this might be another instrument of pressure by which the central government can attempt or threaten to limit the provinces.

It was, of course, this proposal for repatriation that was a major priority in the first major speech in this parliament by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is worth wondering why the Prime Minister thought it necessary to raise this question at this time, unless it was in the context of the continuing pattern of pressure that has been brought to bear upon producing provinces in relation to petroleum questions. I think it is clear that if the formula of the Victoria conference was now in force, in an emergency the government could threaten to use it against the producing provinces regarding their constitutional right in relation to natural resources, just as a threat was used in some of the more passionate speeches in the debate of a year ago. There was a suggestion in the press, although I do not believe there was in this House, that the federal government might be able to use its authority on matters in the national interest to intrude upon this particular responsibility, and perhaps they are going to make it part of the thrust regarding the question of repatriation.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is the third part of the "triple whammy" being used against Alberta by this government. Whether repatriation is used as another weapon, this assault upon the resource provinces must have one of two motives. The motive must be, first, political, to try to turn region against region for political purposes. I, personally, suspect that was one of the motives that inspired the predecessor of this legislation, and I have to say it worked; but had it been used by any other party it would have been severely criticized in the country. Second, the motive must be a simple ideological one, a view of federalism which is determined to build up the central power and to resist any effort by any province, even if acting within its own jurisdiction, to develop its particular strength without the outright approval or control of the central government.

There is, naturally, a different perspective on the petroleum question as between western Canada and the rest of the country. In most of Canada it is seen as a question of supply and price. In Alberta and other regions of the west it is also seen as the essential means by which we can industrialize. It is a sad fact of confederation that Ottawa paid little attention to western problems or potential for industrialization when we had no means of our own to accomplish that goal. Now that we have the means to accomplish the goal, there have been attempts to control resources and there has been insistence by the Prime Minister on participation in discussions between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and major foreign investors such as Japan. A continuing game has been played with freight rates and other transportation problems on which we can get no responsible answers. Now that we in the western part of Canada have developed a capacity for secondary industry, and consequently can define a regional identity within the context of confederation, Ottawa is clamping down.

The basic assumption of this pattern of acts and the legislation before us is that the provinces cannot be trusted; it is the assumption that provincial governments and legislatures are somehow less patriotic than this parliament or the federal government; the assumption that the tendency of the provinces on questions affecting the national interest inevitably will be to damage the national interest. That assumption of malice has two basic faults. First, there is no evidence that the provinces want to tear down the nation or damage the national interest.

Certainly, on the specific question which this legislation concerns, the question of supplies of petroleum and pricing policies, there is no evidence at all of an intention by the producing provinces to extort high prices from Canadian consumers or to act in any other way, at home or abroad, to hurt the national interest. Quite the contrary: the producing provinces, and perhaps Alberta in particular, have demonstrated clearly their commitment to reasonable prices and guaranteed supply for Canadian consumers and to responsible action abroad. Some petroleum producing regions of the world have recently used their resource wealth to hold up their customers. They have used petroleum ruthlessly, not as a lever in bargaining but as a threatening weapon. That has happened elsewhere in the world, creating an atmosphere of crisis. But it has not been done in Canada. The opposite has happened in this country. The producing provinces met with Ottawa and came to an agreement which many citizens of those provinces saw as not being conducive to their interests. They acted with the utmost responsibility. They have not offered threats, but have received them and, despite being threatened, have acted consistently in a way which demonstrates a basic and guiding commitment to the national interest. That is the first fault of this assumption of the malice of the provinces, which is at the basis of this bill. It is an assumption without evidence; indeed, it is an assumption which all the available evidence disproves.

The second fault is that this assumption, and the heavy-handed action that flows from it, offends and denies the very basis of Canadian federalism. The assumption offends our federalism because it suggests that responsible action by a province to improve its economy is harmful to the nation, while the contrary assumption of Canadian federalism is that the whole nation benefits from the development of the special strengths of our diverse provinces and regions. The logic of this bill would lead to a country in which all the important decisions were taken at the centre, where the only power of the provinces was to acquiesce. That notion is a denial of Canadian federalism. The action in this bill denies our federalism because, in effect, it amends the constitution, taking effective jurisdiction over resource policy away from the provinces which, under the law and the constitution, enjoy that jurisdiction.

It is a raid and, as other speakers have said here, could be just the first of several raids on several rights of several provinces. Indeed, it is almost certain that this raid will set a precedent, because this is an attack without provocation, a raid without reason except the reasoning which holds that federalism is dangerous. The resource provinces which are the object of this attack did nothing to deserve it, except to possess a depleting resource whose temporary value could be used to help broaden a local industrial base and help balance the industrial development of the nation. But what would happen if there were provocation?

I am not an admirer of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald). I think he has conducted a portfolio which requires diplomacy with complete lack of diplomacy. I genuinely do not know what inspires this attitude in the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Perhaps it is a simple desire to add to his personal power. Perhaps it is an arrogance that suggests that only he and his fellow elitists in cabinet are competent to discern the national interest. Perhaps it is simple partisanship directed against provinces whose governments are of parties other than his own. Or perhaps he is simply obediently following his leader, the Prime Minister, who does have a philosophy about these things or, if philosophy is too grand a word, at least a bias.

The Prime Minister's bias is that every premier has the potential of becoming a Maurice Duplessis whom the Prime Minister learned to abhor. I suspect that the Prime Minister, in influencing the policies of the government, is haunted by the memory of Maurice Duplessis. I suspect that inspires his attitude to the province of Quebec. I believe that his attitude toward the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan is against their capacity to develop and establish their own strengths and identities as full partners within confederation. I am afraid that the Prime Minister equates strong regions with separatism.

An hon. Member: What does the hon. member know about Duplessis?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): That is a highly contestable view, but one that is being imposed on this country. Does the hon. member want information about Mr. Duplessis?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): He should consult the resident expert, the Prime Minister, when he returns. As I said, the Prime Minister's fear of federalism is a highly contestable view. It is one that is evident in this legislation and is being imposed upon parliament and upon Canada. There are some Canadians—a minority, I hope—who suspect the Prime Minister of following a calculated plan to turn the nation over to socialism or to some exotic goal. I do not believe that at all. However, I do believe that the Prime Minister is much more deliberate than he seems, and that the offensive against the petroleum producing provinces should not be seen as isolated or erratic.

The next offensive could be against other provinces, on other issues. Naturally, if that happened, some of those other provinces would be tempted to fight back, just as Alberta and Saskatchewan are tempted to respond now. That could lead to an era in which both levels of government spend their energies picking fights with each other. There are a lot of fights to pick, because there are a lot of fields far removed from natural resources, where there is overlapping jurisdiction or where one level of government could cause serious problems for another. There is agriculture, the fisheries, education, environment, native rights—the list is long. And if that kind of atmosphere develops, dominated by bickering and ill-will, it will cause trouble for all of us, diverting us from important problems of substance and inspiring more people and more regions to question the value of confederation.

We should remember, sir—and it is important for this House to remember—that if co-operative federalism is a two-way street, so is unco-operative federalism a two-way street. If it becomes the fashion to get bloody-minded, we could virtually immobilize this country as the current dispute over petroleum has already begun to immobilize the petroleum industry in Canada. But in viewing this escalation of conflict between levels of government, it would be wrong to focus on petroleum. Because if federal aggressiveness moves beyond the resources field—and there are plenty of areas where ministers who want to can find justification for interference as strong, or as weak, as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has found here—the victims will not be big oil companies, which can find other fields to drill in other countries; the victims will be those Canadians who benefit from co-operation between governments and who suffer when that co-operation breaks down. They would include, for example, the Métis who are caught now in limbo between jursidictions and will be left there if Ottawa and the provinces develop an attitude of fighting instead of co-operating. It could affect educational television. It could affect agreement on freight rates and transportation policy.

We have in this bill a precedent for invasion of provincial jurisdiction for unnecessary reasons; indeed, perhaps simply for reasons which relate to the particular, frightened view of federalism possessed by the Prime Minister and expressed by the government. Members on the other side who are worried about making the nation work should worry about the precedent which, with qualifications, is clearly contained in the bill.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I believe that any look at the subject of energy in Canada requires, if conclusions are to be reached, a look first at the world scenario. In the near and medium term the growth in world energy demand must be met principally from oil and gas. Any review of events in the international energy markets during the past year would focus almost solely on this, one of the most valuable of commodities. Indeed, oil power is now being ranked in importance within the world community along with military power. It is not difficult to understand why.

The oil exporting countries will have earned about $100 billion this year, and next year's total could be as much as 10 per cent higher. It is estimated that by the end of this decade the exporting countries, OPEC, could have a surplus of gold, dollars, pounds, marks, francs and other foreign currencies amounting to $650 billion; by contrast, the present reserves of the United States are now $15 billion. This fantastic transfer of capital is currently the subject of the greatest dilemma the world has ever faced and it is placing almost impossible strains on the international monetary system.

While many of the oil producing nations are raking in riches, most of the underdeveloped nations of the world are doomed to move further into the depths of poverty with little chance of staying even. Mr. Speaker, at the present time this vital matter of oil pricing is very much the subject of international discussion, and the actions of Mr. Kissinger at the present moment are directed toward softening the stand taken so far by the OPEC nations as a group. Foreign oil prices will be influenced not only by world supply and demand balances, but increasingly by the policies of major oil exporting countries with respect to expansion of capacity and determination of production policies and the interrelation between them.

There are several very key factors in the whole matter of oil prices in the near and longer range future. These factors have very direct application to Canada as well as to other world consumers. The most significant of the factors may well be the future rate of growth in the demand for oil. This is now being affected by the present high cost in most countries. It is also affected, and likely to be even more so as time goes on, by the ever increasing efforts by consuming nations toward conservation programs and even rationing. France has been one of the first of the developed countries to act, and has set a dollar limit of about $10 billion on what it will pay for imported oil next year. This will represent a 10 per cent reduction in volume, at today's prices, and stringent conservation action will be needed to live with this reduction.

One particular country stands out amongst the world's producers—Saudi Arabia—by virtue of its huge resource potential. The actions of that country in either expanding its producing capability, shutting in its production or adjusting its prices could well spell the course that producing countries and consuming countries alike will follow in matters of oil pricing and supply.

Hon. members may wonder why such consideration should be given this rather lengthy dialogue on world petroleum, and what effect this might have on Canada. I say that the formulation of Canadian energy policy cannot take place without regard to all of the complex ingredients in the world situation. I think hon. members will agree that the events of last winter and threatened shortages to Canadians, not to mention the harmful effects of higher prices, especially to the maritime provinces, brought home to many the seriousness of cut-offs in supply from those distant parts of the world. Indeed, security of supply is unlikely to be resolved for many years when one views the current powder keg in the Middle East.

The second and decisive key element in the petroleum game as it is played around the world is how quickly sources of production other than those of the Middle East and North Africa can be brought into production. This is the key, not only to our security of supply but also to long-range pricing. At the present time, exciting production possibilities are being developed in the North Sea, the north slope of Alaska and perhaps in Mexico as well.

As in most commodities in the marketplace, Mr. Speaker, nearly everything hinges on supply and demand. The demand in Canada can be reasonably well projected over a period of years to the end of this century. This will be significantly affected, of course, by conservation programs and as well by whether, in fact, we have available either from domestic sources or imported sources the desired supply. A look at projected demand in Canada, based upon a good degree of conservation, indicates that within the next 15 years Canadians will be consuming about three million barrels of oil per day, although if demand continues to increase as rapidly as it has in recent years this figure could be closer to four million barrels per day.

On the supply side, production levels from known reserves of conventional oil production will begin to decline in about 1978, and by 1990 will be below one million barrels per day, less than half the level of today's production. I emphasize, that is production of less than one million barrels a day, with needs in excess of three million barrels a day. One of the facts of life in the energy business, however, is that one cannot simply turn on a valve to start the oil flowing. Tar sands plants require some ten years from initial planning to production. Thus, oil to be utilized in 1984 must be in the planning stages right now. A number of members here may know that several companies are at an advanced stage in oil sands planning but they are holding back on further action. The reason for this is they do not have confidence in either the oil policy or the long-term commitment of this government to the principles of free enterprise.

Arctic and offshore oil exploration is an equally confused situation. Record sums have continued to be spent, notwithstanding the fact that the risk-takers are working without any rules. Over four years ago this government withdrew all regulations relating to frontier lands, and since that time no new permits for exploration have been issued. The oil and gas industry has been running on blind faith. Off the Atlantic provinces alone this year, expenditures for exploration will exceed $100 million. Continuity of this activity means a lot to the Atlantic provinces and in the longer term it is critical to Canada's continuing security of energy supplies for eastern Canada. However, those programs are winding down. There will be but one offshore drilling rig at work at the year end. One of the reasons is that now some 90 dry holes have been drilled without success—an expenditure of nearly $400 million. Combined with this is the lack of any regulations and the ever increasing lack of confidence in this government.

It must be remembered that the western provinces in Canada have been explored and now might be considered to have found some 75 per cent of their ultimate potential. The frontiers, which are administered for the people of Canada by the federal government, have really only scratched the surface when the vast extent of the lands is considered. I believe the whole question of Canada's security of supply and continued self-sufficiency in oil and gas is bound up in the events starting with the accord reached by the first ministers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the end of March of this year. Equally important are the events which followed that historic meeting. I refer to the federal budget of May 6 and the introduction of this Bill C-32. All Canadians assumed that when the Prime Minister rose in this House on March 28 to announce triumphantly the terms of agreement with the premiers of the producing provinces. I quote the Prime Minister's words:

> It is my privilege to report to the House the details of a national agreement to meet this challenge. An agreement reached yesterday which underlies the goodwill and national feeling that exist in all provinces and regions—which stands as a tribute to the vitality of our Canadian community. As I have said, yesterday was a great day for federalism.

The Prime Minister said later in his statement to this House:

> The broader foundation of that agreement has been what I can only describe as a remarkable spirit of co-operation, of understanding and patience, for which I pay tribute to the spirit and generosity of our ten premiers.

At that meeting, Mr. Speaker, it was assumed by all Canadians, and one would assume by all those in attendance, that all parties to such an agreement would have all their cards on the table. The federal budget, which was brought down but a few short weeks later, made clear that the Prime Minister did not have all the cards on the table. The key elements of that agreement were that the wellhead price of crude oil would be increased to $6.50 per barrel, to be maintained until June, 1975; that there would be a single price for crude oil across Canada excepting transportation differences; that the full amount of the export charge would be used for a consumer cushion to bring down the price of imported oil from its international level of about $10.50 per barrel to the new Canadian level of $6.50. Now the government gives us the Petroleum Administration Act which introduces many items that are in direct conflict with the fundamental philosophies upon which that March agreement was predicated.

As we have seen in the past, this government is again demanding far reaching powers, much in excess of any reasonable need in the circumstances, and asks that these powers be bestowed upon the government permanently. This would be bad enough for any government, but when it is this government and this Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), Canadians have good reason to fear the consequence. I say to the House that this legislation, following on the heels of the May budget, invites confrontation and distrust from the producing provinces. Surely this action is not in the spirit which brought about the accord at the end of March, nor in keeping with the words uttered by the Prime Minister about goodwill, understanding, co-operation and generosity. Nor is this the kind of legislation that promotes trust, co-operation and goodwill, a vital necessity if Canada's long-term energy needs are to be met.

The bill which we are discussing today, Bill C-32, is one further step toward breaking down any confidence or trust which might have existed between the provinces and the federal government. I suggest that clause 22 in this legislation, which provides that the governor in council may enter into an agreement with the government of a producer province for the purpose of establishing mutually acceptable prices of the various qualities and kinds of crude oil, is in fact just a sham and a farce.

Under clause 36, the consultative process becomes meaningless. The clause would give the federal government the power to set aside any agreement which had been reached with a province after discussion or consultation. What a way to negotiate! What sort of blackmail is that? This action is wrong in principle and, in the view of most people, it violates the traditional constitutional position of the provinces. The bill before us is, in fact, one of the most extreme instruments for the transfer of power to a government that this country has ever witnessed in time of peace. Neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has sufficiently explained to this House or to the Canadian people why these excessive powers are being demanded.

I think it is safe to say that all Canadians breathed a sigh of relief when it was learned that agreement had been reached between the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister said, it was not an easy agreement. I quote his words:

> We have searched hard for solutions which would meet the reasonable aspirations of the producing provinces as well as the immediate and longer term energy needs of all Canadians.

It seemed clear from this statement, and from indications by the premiers, that compromises had been made on all sides to satisfy all needs for the foreseeable future, or at least until June, 1975—the needs of the provinces, of the federal government and, last but not least, of the producing companies. The reference in the Prime Minister's statement to recognition of the "immediate and longer term energy needs of all Canadians" suggests that he, too, saw at that time an agreement which would enable the vital search for oil and gas to continue.

Some time between the end of March and the date of the May budget, something changed. Something new entered the picture. I wish the government would take the House into its confidence and tell us what happened to bring about what amounts to a reneging on the March agreement, rendering it meaningless. In his speechmaking around the country, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has made much of the greed of the provinces in raising their royalties so as to take, as he says, too large a share of federal revenues. But why did the Prime Minister not make this important point very clear at the meeting with the premiers on March 27? What has not been made clear to the Canadian people is that the Prime Minister was fully aware of the Alberta royalty rates when the agreement was reached with the premiers at the end of March. Should there be any doubt about this, I would set it to rest by quoting from the Alberta Hansard a statement made by the premier on October 31 of this year:

> During my first meeting with the Prime Minister in March, 1974, I informed him it was the Alberta government's decision—which we would be announcing—to increase the royalty rates on incremental price increases to the extent of an average of 65 per cent for price increases over the existing average wellhead price of $3.80 per barrel.
> I also pointed out to him that we would end up with an average royalty rate increasing from 22 per cent to 40 per cent of gross production, that we would have a lower rate of about 28 per cent on new oil, and that as of April 1 we would take this production in kind through the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission.
> The federal government made a reservation with regard to the position we have taken to have access to the various streams of income throughout the country. I noted that reservation and want to refer, Mr. Speaker, because of its importance, to the statements made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on Thursday, March 28, 1974, the day after the oil pricing accord.

Quoting the Prime Minister with regard to his announcement of the oil pricing accord, the premier went on:

> It was apparent, however, that Canadian oil resources were limited. It was apparent that if we wished to assure the huge investments necessary for adequate future supplies, somewhat higher domestic prices would be essential and that the oil producing provinces, mainly Alberta and Saskatchewan, must be assured a fair return.

> He went on to say that the $6.50 would go entirely to the provinces to divide with the companies as they see fit, subject of course to the federal right to use the federal corporation tax responsibly. At the time that statement was made, and during the month of April, the position was that the federal government—or perhaps I should retract and say, as of March 27 and prior to that—the federal government was aware of our proposed royalty rate structure. We were not aware of any contemplation by the federal government to change, contrary to the spirit of confederation, the historic nature of the deductibility of provincial government royalties which, as the premiers have said, has been historic and traditional in our nation.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians are being told by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister that increases in provincial oil royalties are to blame for all the upset in federal-provincial relations and for the retaliatory actions taken in the May budget. Should there be any doubt about the position of the federal government with regard to provincial royalties, I would refer hon. members to a meeting of the committee on miscellaneous estimates on November 14, 1973, when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources replied to a question posed by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) as follows:

> Mr. Saltsman, we anticipate that the provinces will be moving into the situation with amended royalty programs so as to capture some, at least, of this economic rent for provincial purposes. That is why the government of Alberta has our full support in the proposed change in the royalty legislation. We were of the view a year ago that they had underestimated the capacity of royalty collection in that province. We are glad the premier has changed his mind on that, and now proposes a new royalty collection system. We hope Saskatchewan will follow suit in this regard.

To a further question, the minister replied:

I must say that in terms of the sharing of revenues it is rather a complicated account, but we feel on balance it would be preferable to leave it in provincial hands. But of course it will have some interesting consequences because of our federal-provincial fiscal measures. As time goes on, the return of additional royalties to British Columbia and to Alberta will, of course, mean an increase in the federal obligation to pay to the other provinces under the equalization provision—

The minister added that the royalties derived by Saskatchewan would, in effect, be deducted from the equalization payments the province is receiving. He went on, in his reply, to say:

Basically, at a time when there are extensive pressures on revenue at the provincial level, we feel it would be reasonable to return this royalty to them.

I think this statement makes it very clear that the government was encouraging the provinces to increase their royalties.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, it being five o'clock, the House must proceed to further business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche)—Unemployment insurance—Suggested closing of supplementary office in Edmonton—Government position; the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Finance—Government annuities—Reason for failure to adjust interest rates; the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds)—Canadian Commercial Corporation—Allegation corporation favours certain regions in making purchases—Government action.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills. There being no item under the heading notices of motions (papers) on the order paper, the House will proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions among the parties and, as I understand it, Bill S-11 will be under consideration during private members' hour. There seems to be a feeling that it can be disposed of without much delay. I think there has been general agreement that if we should complete this bill within 10 or 15 minutes, we will go back to Bill C-32 for the remainder of private members' hour, during which time the hon. members for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) and the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) would speak. Then we will continue debate on second reading of the bill at eight o'clock.

● (1700)

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have agreed that the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) and the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) be heard and that we then call it six o'clock, unless other hon. members wish to speak, and then continue with Bill C-32 at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This arrangement is acceptable to us, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Comox-Alberni) moved that Bill S-11, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill which I am proposing to the House is to amend a special act passed in 1916 incorporating the B.C. Telephone Company. The B.C. Telephone Company is composed of 12,000 employees, maintaining a service for 1,200,000 telephones, operating through more than 200 exchanges which link the subscribers of Canada's second largest telephone system. The B.C. Telephone Company is an investor-owned company. Nine of the 11 directors of B.C. Telephone, including the chairman of the board and the president, are Canadian citizens, as are the 15 officers of the company. As of December 31, 1973, there were 5,657 shareholders, holding 3,236,674 shares. Shareholders residing in Canada held 95 per cent of the total shares. Preferential or preferred shareholders totalled 18,052, of whom 17,819 were Canadian residents, or 98.7 per cent of the total.

The proposed amendments contained in this bill relate to the capital stock of the company, in order that B.C. Telephone can increase its total authorized capital stock to take care of future capital development. The amendments will also provide the company with a greater range of financing alternatives and arrangements that will be consistent with the Canadian Corporations Act. Of course, existing rights of shareholders, particularly voting rights, will remain unaltered.

At the present time, B.C. Telephone's authorized capitalization is $250 million. As of this date, the company has issued almost $200 million of its authorization. The balance of $50 million will not meet the estimated requirements for capital expenditure through 1976. Construction programs alone in 1974 are estimated to total $193.7 million. The projected 1975 construction program is $243.4 million. It is estimated gross plant additions required during the period 1975 to 1984 will total $1,582 million, assuming a 15 per cent growth rate for the next five years of the projection, combined B.C. Telephone and Okanagan Telephone which is a subsidiary. The total from 1980 to 1984 is $2,955 million, with the total between 1975 and 1984 being $4,537 million. Of this $4.5 billion, approximately one-half can be generated internally, for example from depreciation, deferred taxes and retained earnings, leaving approximately $2.25 billion of new capital which the company will have to seek over the next ten years.

Assuming a debt ratio of 50 per cent, the company will require over $1 billion in new equity capital in the next ten years and must, therefore, seek to increase the authorized capital of the company and make the capital structure more flexible in order to be competitive with other financial institutions. The company, in its act of incorporation, did not have financial flexibility such as the issue of convertible preferred shares, redemption or retraction privileges at the option of the shareholders, and other corporate financial arrangements which no modern company is now without. In order for the B.C. Telephone to be competitive in attracting investors, these recognized financial concepts must be given the company. Because of the need to obtain funds for heavy capital expenditure and to modernize the methods of obtaining investment funds, this bill is now being presented to the House. The bill deals only with those things I have spoken about and will not effect any other activities of the company.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, as a member from British Columbia, I should like to say that my party supports this bill wholeheartedly and was prepared to let it go through a couple of weeks ago, but there was a delay. We are very happy that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) has presented his bill today and hope our support will help speed his bill through all stages. At a future time when a private member's bill is presented from this side of the House, I trust we will receive the same support from members on the government side.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) that Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, to continue in respect of Bill C-32, I believe the statement of the Hon. C. M. Leitch, attorney general of the province of Alberta, made before a committee of this House during the discussion of Bill C-18 very well sets out the concerns of that province and, indeed, of all the provinces of this country. I quote from his remarks as follows:

> If one of the negotiating parties by legislation purports to reserve unto itself powers of the most dubious constitutional validity, it invites the other party to embark upon a course of judicial confrontation which to date all sides have attempted to avoid in the interests of the Canadian nation. In the last analysis and when viewed in practical terms, part III amounts to an assertion by the federal government of a right to regulate the price, the flow, the production and the sale of a provincial natural resource. It embodies a concept which, I am sure, no provincial government after measuring the consequences of its extension to other natural resources such as lumber, hydro power, potash, iron ore, asbestos, nickel, copper and coal, could accept without impliedly acknowledging that in today's economic circumstances the federal government has taken complete charge of the provinces' capacities to determine their future economic development.

In closing, I should like to enlighten the House on some of the facts of life in the province of Alberta, and more particularly in the oil and gas industry. Investor confidence is at its lowest ebb in the history of western oil and gas development. This can best be seen in the figures which indicate the level of exploration and development activity. Last year to this date there were 3,704 well completions. This year the figure to the same date is 3,339. At that time last year, the end of October, 165 drilling rigs were operating. This year there were only 133. In contrast, in many other countries in the world the number of drilling rigs and the number of holes being drilled is increasing as rapidly as those countries can find the funds, the people and the machinery to carry out their tasks.

Many submissions have been made by the oil and gas industry, as well as by the provinces, to the federal government. The industry and the provinces have been alternately warmed and cooled by events and discussions. The Minister of Finance, who seems to be able to handle negotiations much better than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has visited the provinces and has promoted discussion. On November 18 the Minister of Finance will be delivering his budget to this House, and if the compromise discussions have made progress then the feature of the last budget which disallowed the deduction of oil royalties as an expense in computing income will be dropped or substantially altered.

I wonder if hon. members realize that since the month of March, royalty oil in the province of Alberta is taken directly by the province, is sold by the province, and neither the oil nor the funds realized ever come into the hands of the producing companies. This means that the company involved is paying tax on royalty which can be as high as 65 per cent of its production and averages about 40 per cent, an amount which it never receives or touches. In Saskatchewan, the figure, I believe, is now some 60 per cent. I think that if members were to put themselves or anyone else in this position they would agree that at least it would be very demoralizing.

The entire system of export tax collection at the present time, yielding some $1.7 billion to the federal treasury, is one which if continued will eventually wipe out a satisfactory level of exploration and development. I say this because costs of finding oil are increasing at a rate which is much higher than most other costs are increasing in this country. If this should continue, the prices will have to be a great deal higher. The National Energy Board report of December, 1972, just under two years ago, stated:

> The capital investment required for oil sands processing plants is in the order of $4,000 to $5,000 for each barrel of daily oil production. Thus, half a billion dollars will be required for each 100,000 to 125,000 barrels per day plant.

In the short span of 23 months this cost figure has gone to $2 billion for a plant, or in the order of $20,000 per day of investment for each daily barrel produced, which at today's price brings $6.50. I think hon. members can place that in its proper context and ask themselves whether this is an investment that would attract their capital. Incidentally, the rate of production from the tar sands projected in that report for the early 1980s is now likely to fall a long way short. This makes it abundantly clear that if the oil sands are to be developed, as they must be very soon, higher prices for crude are a necessity.

In conclusion, I would urge this House, and especially the ministers opposite, to take serious and concerted action to remove the uncertainties that are driving out risk capital from the oil and gas energy industry. J. Arthur Smith, of the Conference Board of Canada, said to the Canadian Conference of Banking in September this year:

> Two discouraging features of this situation have been emerging. The first is that Canadians have generally been moving towards an increasing mood of nationalism. In many respects this mood is inconsistent with the realities of the need for close international interdependence as a cornerstone for great national achievements within Canada.

Mr. Smith went on to say:

> Many estimates have been made about the amount of new capital spending that will be needed in Canada over the next decade to achieve a course of outstanding development of our economic and social system through the mid 1980s. It is difficult to quantify precisely what these requirements would be. But in very round terms, I would judge that these requirements, in total, would be of the order of $500 billion.
> A very substantial part of this total must be allocated to meet essential energy investment requirements—at least a quarter of this total; probably much more.

He went on to say:

> But present prospects for actualizing energy related investment in this scale are not at all promising under the present combination of federal and provincial policies. Indeed, if the existing federal and provincial direct and indirect taxation of this sector of our economy is not adjusted quickly, not only will the total capital requirements I have suggested not be feasible, but a severe energy crisis will emerge that would simply preclude any capacity by the Canadian economy to advance along the potential growth path I outlined earlier. Governments in Canada now, surely, have a special responsibility to work out appropriate arrangements, with a realistic appreciation for the lead times required to use our vast potential energy resources to meet future needs in relevant and timely ways. At the moment, policies are simply not organized to achieve the needed results.

Madam Speaker, I would urge the Minister of Finance, in considering his new budget, to bring forward some very significant proposals directed toward investment in resources in Canada by Canadians. At the present time there is a very severe reversal of investment, particularly by independent companies from the United States, in Canadian oil and gas development. Unfortunately, Canadians are not given the necessary incentives. They do not have the favourable tax treatment that Americans have, and thus they are in a disadvantageous position compared to foreign investors in our country. Surely, one of the most important and vital things in providing that opportunity for Canadians to invest would be for the minister to alter these rules in a way which has been urged upon him for many years.

I say that federal lands at the present time have no royalty and no regulations. At the present moment we can only guess what the minister has in mind in this area, but I say that if the federal government is to attract the type of activity these lands demand and which our future energy needs demand, we will not be able to attract the capital if royalties from federal lands are not deductible. Therefore, I say if the government cannot decide the federal royalty level for its own offshore, Arctic and frontier lands prior to the federal budget, surely the minister can, with some regard to where this level of royalties may be set, provide in the budget that a certain percentage be deductible on royalties paid to the provinces.

I would suggest here that the minister might hit an interim figure of, say, 30 per cent. On this basis I feel the industry could get on with the job. At some future time when federal royalties are decided, then perhaps this figure could be adjusted upward or downward to match the federal royalty level, and thus give the provincial lands, but particularly federal lands administered by this government, the necessary action by developers and explorers. The time is now long since past when we, as Canadians, can delay any longer the resolutions to our energy future. A heavy responsibility rests on the shoulders of this government in a most critical area. I hope and pray that this is recognized by the government and that action will be forthcoming very soon.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Madam Speaker, in rising to participate in this second reading debate on Bill C-32, I should like to review for a moment, in precise terms, what is before us. Generally speaking, it is a measure to fix the price of petroleum products in Canada, that is, to give the federal government the authority to say that the price of oil shall be $6.50 a barrel until next July, pursuant to a meeting of first ministers last March. It also formalizes the taxing position that the government assumed in September of 1973 when it unilaterally, without consultation with anybody, imposed an export tax. We have seen that tax grow to a rather significant figure.

In addition to those matters, the legislation has changed since it was first introduced last April, in the last parliament, in that it gives the government power to set the price of natural gas. Also, it continues the power that was introduced in the legislation last April to allow the federal government to fix the price of oil and natural gas on a permanent basis. We have heard complaints from many speakers on this side that this legislation flies in the face of the agreement made last March by the first ministers of this country because, as we all know, the agreement was to expire next year, but the price fixing power in the bill before us will certainly not expire. Many comments have been made about the credibility of this government on this issue because it has become painfully apparent that the government just cannot be believed or trusted in what it says to the people of Canada on this aspect of our economic life. I think it is also evident in other areas, but it is most evident in this area.

My friend, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), in the remarks which he just completed referred to some evidence that was given by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) before the miscellaneous estimates committee last November. Although he applauded the move by Alberta to increase its royalties, and also at that time encouraged Saskatchewan to do the same, on other occasions he hinted that if the provinces did not bring down their royalties to a realistic level, the government would. Very evidently he was threatening the two provinces. What is so frustrating, and what I feel must cause chagrin in the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan, is that after they took the hint from the federal minister they were accused, in the last election compaign and in the last budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), of trying to take all the money from these natural resources and not leaving room for the federal government to take its share from the proceeds of these resources.

First of all, I wonder how effective the government believes its income tax legislation to be. Most people in the country seem to feel, with good reason, that the income tax legislation is pretty efficient in getting money out of people who make a profit. But in listening to ministers talk, one would think that such effectiveness did not exist. They absolutely refuse to give that mechanism a chance to work. If the mechanism is faulty, why do they not change it and make it work? I cannot accept the argument that the provinces have pre-empted the taxing power of the federal government. Of course, one must realize that the federal government has other tax sources in that industry. What about all the income tax paid by the people employed in the industry, and the potential of the secondary industry? They have not given the industry a chance to mature sufficiently to produce income, because it is only now that prices have finally come to a reasonable level in that industry.

Until recently, the price of petroleum products was incredibly low. So when prices go up and the industry is on the verge of making a profit, on 50 per cent of which they would pay substantial income tax, the government moves in and, for all practical purposes, takes 100 per cent of the profit from the enterprise. Then they wonder why people are considering leaving the scene in Canada and moving to greener pastures, as they are doing in fact.

It is of great concern to me that this country might move from a position of self-sufficiency in oil and gas to a position of shortage. I do not know what goes through the collective minds of the government. It strikes me as being a very bone-headed approach to the problems of Canada. We had an international situation in 1973 which caused a crisis in supply. But at the very time that we faced this supply problem, the government introduced measures which inhibited the increasing of that supply. I think I should draw attention to figures which were supplied by the government itself in a table that was distributed to members of the miscellaneous estimates committee this session when we were considering the supplementary estimates of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. They show a steady decrease in the past 11 years, so that in 1974 we will have the least exploration drilling carried out in this country for 11 years. Last year was tenth on the list, so in the last two years there has been the least exploration activity in the country. At a time when we should be increasing this activity, we are actually reducing it, primarily as the result of the actions of the federal government.

It seems to me that any sensible government policy in this area would consist of four things. First, we should ensure continuity of the supply of oil and natural gas. Second, it should be recognized that so far as supply is concerned, the achievement of the goal may take a long time, perhaps 10 or 15 years, because it appears to me that the government thinks that if they really face a problem they can turn on the tap a little more and thus solve supply problems. Of course, that does not work. The magnitude of some energy projects, in relation to the growth of domestic energy requirements, is such that they can probably only be developed efficiently in co-operation with the United States.

Hon. members across the aisle and to my left will say that I am advocating a continental energy policy. I am certainly not doing so, but I think we should face some facts of geography and use a little common sense. In 1969, shortly after I was first elected to the House, I made a speech in which I called for prompt action in the construction of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, because it was just a few months after the petroleum discovery in Prudhoe Bay. However, in the ensuing years the government has been flipping and flopping around. At times one has the impression that they want nothing to do with it; at other times the opposite seems to be the case. For example, during the 1972 election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the government would build a highway up the Mackenzie Valley in order to develop the valley as an energy corridor. Following that election he appointed Mr. Justice Berger of the British Columbia Supreme Court, one of his New Democratic Party friends whom he had appointed to the bench, to undertake a study of that area. With the bias and prejudices that jurist displayed before his elevation to the bench, I do not look forward to a favourable decision. In my opinion he will do anything he can to sandbag development of the project. That is the ridiculous attitude displayed by the government, Mr. Speaker. It cannot seem to come to grips with the problem at all. It should be recognized that a high degree of risk is involved in this industry, but so far the government has not recognized this.

I have heard via the grapevine that in discussions with the petroleum industry the government is inquiring if it would be happy with a 9 per cent return on the money invested in finding the oil which has been located to date, and perhaps a 20 per cent return on oil found in the future. Surely this is a rather uninformed way of approaching the problem, suggesting 9 per cent as a proper return with regard to old oil.

It might be worth looking at the amount of money that has been invested to get us to our present state of self-sufficiency in oil. Between 1947 and 1963 the industry invested $7,576,000,000; in 1964 it spent another $753.7 million, and after that until 1974 costs went up by about one billion dollars a year until they reached $2,206 million in 1974. There has been no return on that investment to date because, until recently, there was no market for the product and it was selling at distress prices.

Carrying charges have had to be paid on the money invested, and of course there has been inflation. Therefore 9 per cent return on money that has been invested for 25 years is little short of insulting, and would not inspire confidence for the future. Even at 20 per cent for new oil the industry cannot have much confidence in view of the government's record of changing its mind. I would not take its word about anything. I would want a notarized statement, or an ironclad contract before I would have any dealings with people such as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

This bill is a price fixing mechanism. In view of the government's actions to date we can be sure that it is not going to fix prices which would encourage further development of the petroleum industry in this country. Another aspect that we have to consider is the government's budgetary proposals of last May. It is attempting to expropriate all of the price increases that have been allowed by making it impossible for producing companies to deduct the expenses of their provincial royalties.

The government's pipeline policy consists of a line between Sarnia and Montreal which would carry a quarter of a million barrels a day. That is something less than half the requirement of the Montreal market alone, and represents only about a quarter of our total imports.

It is obvious that the government does not want this country to have a national oil policy in its truest sense, that is, having the country produce and distribute its own oil. It still wants to keep the option open—to allow the eastern market the possibility of getting cheaper oil. I will return to that matter later, Mr. Speaker.

Another part of the government's over-all policy in this regard is its inability to come to grips with the land use regulations which were referred to by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden). We have been without regulations for the offshore and Arctic areas for about four years. It is inconceivable to me how the government can expect anybody to go up there and spend millions of dollars without any assurance of what the return on their money will be, but the people who invest money have shown amazing faith to date.

This bill allows the government to tax oil exported at around $5 per barrel at the present time. The tax started in September, 1973, at 40 cents a barrel. On the one hand we have the example of Canada decrying the actions of the OPEC countries in raising the price of their products at the expense of people in Quebec and eastern Ontario while, at the same time, it demands from the United States the highest price possible, knowing that country requires feedstock for refineries that were built as a result of our pleading with them to take oil in the days before the crisis.

As a Canadian I am not very pleased with some memories of world war II—although perhaps my memories are not too clear because of my age—when we were not self-sufficient in oil and were dependent on the United States. Then, because of world conditions, oil was in short supply. But the United States did not impose an export tax in order to obtain the highest possible price for petroleum. United States prices did not increase at all. They were controlled. The only requirement made of Canada was that we implement a system of rationing similar to that existing in the United States. I do not think we are repaying what we received when we try to extract every last cent from the United States in the present situation. I am not proud of this country's performance in this regard in the last 12 or 14 months.

As I say, the government has proposed a pipeline between Sarnia and Montreal which could carry 250,000 barrels of oil a day. I do not think that would be a wise move. Apparently Interprovincial Pipe Line Company does not think it particularly wise either, as it is dragging its feet in the matter of construction. I do not agree with those in this House who say that the pipeline should be reversible. People who make statements like that are not encouraging the implementation of a national policy with regard to oil. Either we shall become self-sufficient, and we have the resources, or we shall not. If it is government policy that we are not to be self-sufficient, why should the producers of our resources be expected to receive low, controlled prices in time of shortage, but be without protection in times of abundance? That attitude is very selfish on the part of the government, yet that appears to be its policy.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) suggested that Ontario has subsidized western Canada since 1959, when a national oil policy was adopted, by paying two or three cents a gallon more for gasoline. This provided a market for western Canadian crude. He conveniently forgets that these resources were discovered with equipment and material which had mostly been manufactured very close to his riding. That equipment was not sent to western Canada on a subsidized basis. I do not recall people in my constituency buying equipment manufactured in Ontario at prices lower than they could obtain in the U.K. or the U.S.A. There we saw a case of manufacturing industries protected by tariffs making us pay higher prices. On the other hand high freight rates discourage the sale of our commodities in the central Canadian market.

Our industry has not been subsidized. If Ontario has paid a little more for its gasoline, let it remember that it sold goods to western Canada at inflated prices. The oil industry has created many jobs for the people in my hon. friend's constituency for a long time.

I am concerned about the proposed establishment of the national oil company. I understood that, originally, the idea was for this company to explore for oil so that we would become self-sufficient. Apparently the government does not intend to do this. A headline in the Montreal Star of yesterday's date reads, "Macdonald etches in role of state firm. PetroCan would buy".

Clearly the national oil company will not be set up for the purpose of making us self-sufficient. Rather, it will be the mechanism by which we can buy off-shore oil for lower prices. The Shah of Iran has said that he would be willing to sell oil to a government agency at a lower price. He is not in favour of oil companies collecting any extra profit. If a government agency buys, he is prepared to make oil available at a 3 per cent or 4 per cent discount.

I find this interesting. The government, under the guise of creating a mechanism to bring about a greater degree of Canadian self sufficiency, is actually creating a mechanism which could help to destroy our petroleum industry. That does not say much for the Canadianism of those who support this idea. They are willing to sell out our native industry for a 3.5 per cent discount from the Arabs. That, again, shows the attitude of the government. The Minister of Energy for Ontario, Hon. Darcy McKeough, about one year ago also came out in favour of a national oil company and proposed the building of a reversible pipeline. He wanted the best bargain for oil, but was happy to sell his province's products to what some call the hinterland of this country at exorbitantly inflated prices.

Allow me to quote from the column of the syndicated columnist Bruce Whitestone who, in an article entitled "Apportioning the Blame", written last September, said:

As the energy crisis fades as a topic of popular concern, the public is left not only with sharply higher gasoline prices but also with a distinctly jaundiced view of the oil industry and its relationship with the government.

During the crisis last winter, the public blamed the oil companies—

Largely at the instigation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, let me add:

—the producer nations, and their governments for the problems.

A significant section of the public believes that the fuel shortage was contrived. The oil companies raised their prices, and their profits soared, and critics contend that the energy crisis was sponsored by the industry with the co-operation of governments both provincial and federal.

As a result of these developments, many oil companies and government officials say that one of the most difficult problems is convincing the public, as it digs into its pocket to pay record prices for gasoline and fuel oil, that profit is not a dirty word.

While most accept the idea of sacrifice, they want to be assured that it is needed and that no one is profiting from the energy problems.

Others question why, with consumers bearing the brunt of the crisis, were the oil companies allowed to reap some of the highest profits in their history. Actually, the public should have had another reaction: with profits soaring, the public could have recognized that the 'shortage' of oil would be ending soon. High profits would ensure that it would be profitable to produce more crude and process it as well. High profits, which guarantee that companies will work aggressively to take advantage of the high rewards that now exist, have two functions. They provide a ready source of capital for investment and serve to attract capital from the outside. Thus, it is not surprising to learn that oil companies are now planning to increase significantly their refining capacity and their drilling activity.

The job of mollifying the public is made more difficult by the misconception of shortages as such. In purely economic terms, in the natural world there never can be a "shortage": the problem is only one of price. If there were free taxicab rides, insufficient taxis would be available for hire. Similarly, free medical service entails an apparent shortage of medical personnel and facilities. Hence, there appeared to be an oil shortage because prices were not at levels to balance demand.

Others could argue that an oil cartel could be artificially boosting prices. However, a monopoly complete or partial, cannot impose higher prices regardless of the consequences. Prices greatly in excess of market price levels would curb demand and adversely affect prices. Not only would the public cut back on its use of petroleum products, but substitutes would be utilized more extensively. People could use more coal, insulating materials, or even foot power!

It must be acknowledged that some of the actions of the oil companies have been detrimental to their own image and long-range interest. Not too long ago, one of the major oil companies paid a bonus of one month's salary to its non-union employees. Some oil companies have made large acquisitions, such as the purchase of Montgomery Ward.

I believe the writer is referring to the actions of Mobil Oil in the United States. In passing, I suggest the recent announcement of Imperial Oil to contribute several hundred thousand dollars to save the so-called magazine Saturday Night is an example that maybe they are not being taxed high enough. If they have that kind of money to support a magazine like that, perhaps there is something wrong with the taxation policy of this country. However, that is a decision they want to make. Probably my friends to the left applaud the decision of Imperial Oil to do that. It was probably being done with some political motive. I continue the quotation:

As for complaints that the magnitude of the increase was not necessary, that a smaller increase in crude oil would have produced plenty of funds to accomplish the goals of the oil industry, there is no accurate way to assess this claim. However, if the price rise were excessive, it would either attract more producers and greater supplies to the market, or it would curb demand so much that oil companies would have to modify the increase in order to maximize their production facilities.

When the oil producer nations virtually quadrupled oil prices last year, many assumed that these countries were acting like highway brigands. Actually, the sudden rise represented a catch-up as oil prices were level for 15 years, except for a five cent per barrel increase last year and a rise of 10 cents per barrel the year previous. Oil producer nations should not be compelled to shoulder a disproportionate share of the blame for our oil problems, therefore.

Then, cries of government unpreparedness ignore the real difficulties that were interposed whenever a new oil policy was suggested. Only now, when Canadian crude is fixed below the cost of imports is a national pipeline acceptable in eastern Canada.

One area that can be criticized is the effort of the federal government to intrude its presence in the controversy. Neither the arbitrary establishment of a price of $6.50 per barrel of oil, nor the effort to tax "excessive" oil profits in the May budget, could be justified on economic grounds.

It is apparent that if the policies of the government are allowed to continue there will be an oil shortage by 1983. A proper policy of the government should be to allow the price of oil to increase so that the oil sands can become viable. Surely it is in the interest of this country that we be self-sufficient, and not be at the mercy of other nations. It would be better to pay a higher price and have an assured supply than to take the short-run benefit of a lower price and not have a supply. It is better to pay the increased price than not have oil.

This country should be developing the oil sands. To date government policy has been discouraging. We have one plant working, Great Canadian Oil Sands, and another, Syncrude, being built. A third was to be built by Shell Canada Limited and its U.S. counterparts, Shell Explorer Limited. The U.S. part of this deal has been pulled out, and they have gone back to the United States with their money.

We should have a policy that sees further than the tip of the minister's nose. We need a policy to develop our oil sands and have a pipeline from western Canada to Montreal. It must be big enough to supply the requirements of the whole nation. We do not like inflation, but we have to accept the fact it is here. The mere fact that it is here will make these oil sands more viable. We should be working toward self-sufficiency, not suffering from a self-imposed shortage as a result of the policies of this government which will assure that result.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, much has already been said in this debate on Bill C-32. In fact there appeared to be some willingness before the House adjourned for supper to let the bill go to the committee. However, although I do not intend to cover ground which has already been covered by other speakers, there are several aspects of this question which have not so far been dealt with and which I should like to discuss.

Naturally, when we consider the participation of the federal government in oil marketing our minds go back to the famous meeting in March when there appeared to be agreement between the federal government and the provinces. Bill C-18, which has already been widely discussed, attempted to set forth criteria defining the way in which oil should be marketed in the 15 months following March. The bill before us makes no provision for a time frame, and it deals with hydro and gas, as well as with oil.

Before I address myself to the subject of energy I should like to call attention to an interesting parallel between food and energy in Canada today. Today's world is seriously concerned about supplies of food and energy. Canada itself is concerned about food and the cost of food. The government tells us that the way to bring food prices down is to produce more food—a simple answer.

On the other hand we note that a study is being made of the whole principle of marketing boards—the concept of marketing boards is being thoroughly examined at this moment in a committee, or at least I should like to think it is, Mr. Speaker. However, anyone who has studied the committee reports so far will have reached the conclusion that the necessary degree of co-operation from the provinces is lacking.

British Columbia says it is not co-operating and that it does not intend to in the area of the distribution of supplies. In name, it belongs to CEMA but in fact it does not. Saskatchewan, the next socialist province, says it will co-operate all the way; it believes in a marketing system for agricultural products. But 44 per cent of its production is not involved. You see, Mr. Speaker, it is so much window dressing, so much smokescreen—unless one substitutes a different expression for "smokescreen". We don't really believe it.

When we move on to Manitoba and study the degree of their participation, we realize that Manitoba is out for Manitoba. There is nothing strange about that. They believe they could produce cheaper than anybody else and they want all the production they can get.

Then we move to Ontario, the biggest province with the greatest consumption and, strangely enough, we find the greatest increase in agricultural production. So what I am really saying is that if one studies the whole thing in an academic way, relating marketing controls to food supply in Canada, this is an absolute farce.

Strange as it may seem, we have before the House a bill which sets up a control system on supply, on price and on distribution. I do not see that this is much different from the agricultural situation, because in this regard Ottawa says that it can control production and can get the best price. Let us examine that to see how successful it has been.

If we go back to April 8, 9 and 10 when this matter was before the House for debate, and reflect on what has changed in the thinking of the public, we find there has been a general acceptance of the fact that we are running out of supplies. My gosh, by 1983 we are going to be short of oil and will be net importers of that commodity. We are now really balancing our production.

The National Energy Board has not really published the facts, but there is a general agreement across Canada that our current known reserves will adequately meet our needs until about 1983, after which time Canada will become a net importer of oil. These facts were known in April, 1974.

Let us go back to the food parallel. We realize that controls do not increase supply, just as that is true of the energy situation. One might ask whether controls in the past few years have increased supply, and that is the real question every Canadian must ask himself now. Have interventions and controls by the federal government increased the known reserves or the known supply in Canada? Have they increased the availability of supply on the Canadian market? That is the question we must answer before we pass this bill.

If you ask for an objective point of view from any expert or even from any Joe Blow in Canada, you get the answer that intervention on the part of the federal government has in no way increased our supply. I am sure that the average person and the expert would come to the conclusion that controls and intervention by the federal government have not increased our supply one iota.

I am sure that anyone who went to the trouble of examining the situation in depth would find that over the past two years the interventions by the federal government have, in fact, lowered known reserves and availability of energy in this country. I do not argue with the fact that the federal government may have been responsible for lower costs, and perhaps the government has even been responsible for lowering the cost of distribution, but I ask myself whether these lower costs have been worth the risk of running out of supplies by 1983. That is a question all members of parliament and all Canadians must ask themselves. Was the price we paid in slowing down exploration, development and further expansion, worth this lowering of cost?

I hold the view that in 1983 oil will be more expensive than it is today, and I do not think that is an illogical point of view. In spite of the best intentions of governments and banking institutions all over the world, the OPEC countries have learned one thing. They have learned that they have power, and they are going to exercise it.

I well remember last spring when the leader of the Liberal party in Alberta made a trip to Israel. Incidentally, that seems to be the popular thing to do, Mr. Speaker. He came back and told Albertans not to worry because the federal government had set the price at $6.50. He said that was not an unusually low price because by October, 1974, oil would be selling at $6 per barrel throughout the world. He said that countries belonging to OPEC were going to reduce their world price. He said we should fear not because the federal government had been very prudent and wise in setting the $6 ceiling on Canadian oil.

Well, October has come and gone, and in all fairness I think that even the experts would agree that OPEC is not going to lower oil prices. One interesting thing when you consider whether oil prices are going to be lowered is the recent find of an unusually large amount in Mexico. President Ford went to Mexico and wanted to be buddy buddy with those fellows right away, because they have new resources and riches. He wanted to acknowledge their wealth, and he hoped that they appreciated his great country, the United States. The people of Mexico, being the great hosts they are, extended President Ford a fine welcome, but before he left they made it abundantly clear that he should not expect any oil riches from them. They made it clear that they intended to join OPEC as soon as their new oil got into production.

What does that tell any thinking Canadian? I suggest it tells us that countries in OPEC know the power they have, and that they will exercise it. Whether we like it or not, those countries in OPEC will keep the price of oil where they want it. I do not like that, but I have the sense to realize this is a fact of life. I wish most members of the House of Commons would come to that conclusion objectively. Let us forget partisanship. Let us realize that OPEC is in power.

What can we best do to assure Canadians an ample supply of oil after 1983? This bill is to control price setting, supply and flow of production. Price setting has a great deal to do with the control of supply. It is obvious to me, and I hope it is obvious to everyone in this House, that oil is an international commodity. Whether I like it as an Albertan or a Canadian does not matter; oil is an international commodity. We must have additional exploration in Canada because we have to compete for investment dollars with every other country in the business.

The United States imports perhaps 6 per cent, 7 per cent, or at the most 8 per cent of its consumption. It does not want to be beholden to the Arabs. So, huge amounts of money are spent to encourage the international oil companies to spend large amounts of money in that country so that it will be less subservient to the OPEC nations. Yet we sit contentedly in our place and say that by 1983 some stroke of hope from heaven will save us from being subservient to the OPEC nations. We may not receive that hope from heaven. After 1983 we may be subservient to the OPEC nations, just as the United States is today.

What are we doing contrary to what is being done by the United States? It is not a matter of whether one hates or likes the United States; it is going all out to encourage exploration. What have we done? Just about the opposite. We have gone out of our way to discourage exploration, which is the worst possible course we could have followed.

Some months ago a newspaper article commented to the effect that Texas had been considered drilled out, and that there was no real need for exploration in that state. Today in Texas some 900 drilling rigs are drilling for oil and gas. We must scratch our heads and ask what brought in those 900 rigs. Perhaps 50 of them are from Canada, and maybe 25 of them are Canadian owned. What brought them from our country to that country? Did we feel that we had sufficient reserves and did not have to worry? Possibly it was because oil and energy are international commodities, and they were not aware they could get the best deal in our country.

Whether I, the government, or the Canadian people like it or not, Canadian money left Canada to be used in the search for energy and oil in the North Sea, in the United States and in the Middle East. It did not remain in Canada. I am not talking about the multinational oil companies which may have some loyalty to a parent company in some other country. I am talking about Canadian money which left Canada to be used in the search for oil in the North Sea, in Indonesia and in the United States.

We must recognize that oil, gas and other forms of energy are international commodities. I once argued for years against the social credit philosophy in the province of Alberta. I said it might work if we isolated ourselves completely from the rest of the world. I think it is generally conceded that as much as we might like to isolate ourselves, this is an impossibility. It is certainly an impossibility in respect of world commodities. So, let us recognize some of the basic facts in respect of the present legislation.

I would recommend that the bill be dropped completely, but if it is to be implemented it must be used with the greatest degree of understanding on the part of the industry. Whether or not the purists believe in the marketing board concept, price eventually will determine the supply. I do not like it, you may not like it, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House may not like it, but it is a fact of life. What do we do from that point on?

We could say that price alone does not necessarily have to regulate supply for Canada. We could say that because of the tar sands our known reserves can supply Canadians with oil any time after about 1983, but we then would have to have a price not necessarily in step with the international price but a price over and above the cost of production in respect of the tar sands.

In other words, if some political party should decide that Canadians, because of our reserves, are entitled to a lower price than the international price, that would be well and good and I would not object to such a political decision. However, how much lower the price should be would have to be determined by our desire to remain forever and a day self-sufficient in respect of energy. I think every Canadian must agree with this, and say that if we have the known reserves let us not ever be subservient to the Arabs in the Middle East. Let us never be placed in the position the United States is in now, of having to depend on others for 7 per cent of our consumption. That country is subservient to the Middle East nations.

If we should reach a decision that we will always, in Canada, be prepared to supply Canadians with energy at something less than the world price, I would not object, but let us not merely pick a figure out of the air as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has done. At one time he said $4 was good enough. Then the figure was $6.50, and finally the minister changed the criteria and other things.

We should tell those in the industry the criteria on which our decisions will be based so that they can go ahead with some degree of confidence that the rules of the game will not continually be changed. If they go to the United States, they know the rules. If they go to the Middle East, to the North Sea or to Indonesia, they know the rules. One major country in the world which can remain self-sufficient forever and a day is Canada. Yet we are creating a situation in which the industry does not have any confidence in our rules of the game because these are changed regularly.

Several months ago the price was $6.50 for a 15-month period to end on July 31, 1975. Now we do not know whether the period will be shorter, longer or what. I say that the first decision we should reach on this oil question is that we will remain self-sufficient in respect of oil, and will price it for Canadians at something less than the international price, but that we will lay down some kind of criteria to which the industry can relate so that it will be absolutely clear concerning how that price is to be reached.

The National Energy Board was brought into being by the Conservative government some years ago. The board believed this was what should be done in order to create some kind of confidence on the part of industry. Today that board has become the tool of the present minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It answers to him while it is supposed to answer to the Government of Canada. It is not supposed to answer to the whims and fancies of some particular minister who may be here this year and gone next year.

An hon. Member: One can always hope.

Mr. Horner: Yes, I had a great deal of hope that he would be gone after the second last election and also the last election, but he was able to survive. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might move him to the Department of Finance tomorrow, and he would be involved in something else. Of course Canada would also be into something else in that case. Again, the Prime Minister might drop him completely from the cabinet. That is an encouraging thought. In any case, the survival of any minister in the cabinet lies in the hands of God, in this case the hands of the Prime Minister.

● (2030)

An hon. Member: He thinks he is God.

Mr. Horner: But I don't. What I am really trying to point out is that the whole concept behind the National Energy Board was to create certainty in the market and a degree of understanding as to what we are going to do with our energy. That understanding has been seriously eroded under the present minister. Regardless of whether I convinced anybody of anything tonight, I want that fact firmly established.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Thank you. That should be clearly established in the mind of every Canadian. The minister has eroded the effective work of the National Energy Board. He has made the National Energy Board into his puppet, and that cannot serve the industry in the years ahead, nor can it serve Canada. It distorts completely the whole purpose of the National Energy Board.

If you have followed me so far, Mr. Speaker, then you will agree that you and I have reached the decision that Canadians should be self-sufficient with regard to oil, and that they may well deserve a lower price than the international price. How can we best arrive at that? By creating some degree of understanding between government and industry; in other words, letting industry know what rules should be followed.

I want to advance a theory as to how much lower the price should be in Canada. The various prices that we have heard mentioned have meant nothing to me so far as some kind of a price level is concerned. These were the prices that the minister pulled out of a hat and on which some agreement was reached between Alberta and Saskatchewan and the consuming provinces, namely, Ontario and Quebec. That is not good enough; it is only a temporary decision reached temporarily by a minority government.

We should examine our known resources. Our known resources and reserves are really the Alberta tar sands. We should examine very closely what it takes to produce a barrel of oil from the tar sands and how much those costs go up every year, because inflation plays a very important part in the development of the tar sands, which development is work intensive.

The development of the tar sands will not be a simple task such as drilling a hole and finding pools of reserves some thousands of feet below the ground. It is work intensive, which means that a great deal of machinery and a great amount of momey will be needed. If you reach that conclusion, then in setting the price of oil, if we want to remain self-sufficient in energy, account must be taken of the falling off in 1983, and therefore the price must be such as to encourage development of the tar sands, and it must be a price that is adjustable, taking into account inflation.

The next question one should ask oneself is what is the cost of money, and what will be required in order to entice money for the development of the tar sands. That is the X in the equation. It is a difficult question to answer. Are there any answers today? Have we failed or have we perhaps over invested in the tar sands? The obvious answer lies in what Shell did.

We have had three major commitments to develop the tar sands: the Great Canadian Tar Sands Company, Syncrude, and the Shell project. Shell International, the American part of Shell, has said no to the further development of the tar sands. Whether or not I like it as an Albertan, or as a consumer in Ontario, I should realize that that is an indication that our oil prices have not encouraged further money going into the development of the tar sands.

There is obviously one conclusion to be reached: that the price should be below the international price but that it should be higher than it is at present or we will become subservient to the Middle East and to the Arabs by 1983. This is elementary.

The minister, in examining this bill, owes the industry one thing: to tell them how he sets the price today, how he will set it tomorrow, and how he will set it the day after tomorrow. We can then conclude whether government intervention under this piece of legislation is wisdom or folly for Canada. If he does not give the industry that equation, then no matter how pious his dreams may be, and how pious the dreams of most members of parliament are, this piece of legislation will not serve Canada well in the years ahead.

I wish to return to the solution of the problem regarding what is X, and how much X represents. Let us look at the energy requirements of Canada in the years ahead. It has been said that by 1975-76 Ontario will be running short of gas. If we are thinking Canadian, let us ask ourselves why that will occur since now we have ample supplies of gas. Let us consider what is the production formula, and what is the concept of the government in that respect.

In April of last year gas was not included in the legislation. Why is it included now? Will the federal government's intervention do anything to clear the air with regard to gas and oil sales? Let us look at the gas situation for a minute. A tremendous fight is going on, beneath the surface, with regard to gas and gas sales in Canada. I suspect that the minister is fully aware of it.

Let us take a look at the situation. We have TransCanada, a major pipeline company, assisting in the movement of gas from the producing to the consuming areas. In my belief TransCanada should be declared a common carrier. It is a common carrier of a commodity. This is as elementary as the fact that CNR is a common carrier—the term being of particular significance to anyone connected with transportation. This means that TransCanada Pipelines will carry gas for a price, regulated by the board, to a destination which TransCanada is able to serve. Then we have Pan Alberta, a buyer of gas, purchasing gas in Alberta. About 50 per cent of that company is owned by the province of Alberta. But that does not matter, they are a major buyer. Why did they become a major buyer?

They became a major buyer because some years ago the premier of Alberta saw that gas was selling at 16 cents a thousand cubic feet and he wanted to double the price to 30 cents. This happened before the energy scare. The premier of Alberta was considered to be a terrible fellow, one of the worst. But if you examine the situation, he was just a little ahead of the game.

What is the dispute now? It is pretty well accepted that here in Ontario, in the consuming area, Alberta gas will sell from $1 to $1.25 for a thousand cubic feet. Pan Alberta is bidding for gas at 65 cents a thousand cubic feet, in other words, what is called in the oil and gas language, the field price. TransCanada is bidding 60 cents. There is a neat dispute going on to decide if TransCanada is a common carrier. If it is, then it has to carry Pan Alberta gas; if it is not then it can shut out Pan Alberta and the result will be that Pan Alberta will not be able to deliver what it sells.

This House just sent to committee a bill which was designed to create more competition. If we believe in that, then we have to say of this question that it creates a greater degree of competition and that is what would best serve Canadians. It is then obvious to any thinking Canadian that TransCanada must be a common carrier, and must serve all of the competing purchasers of gas. This is an elementary question which must be settled, and when this bill goes to committee I hope that witnesses will be called in order to help solve it.

The other question I want to deal with is the matter of the supply of oil, gas and energy to the North American continent. It looks as though the Alaska pipeline to Valdez is more probable today than it was last April, when it had a projected capability of 1.2 billion barrels a day. That has been increased now to a capability, when completed, of two billion barrels a day moving into the United States. That will account for about 20 per cent of the U.S. shortfall, or U.S. imports. Mr. Speaker. Thus we can see a major demand for capital in the oil industry in order to complete the Alaskan pipeline rapidly.

If one is to study the whole question of Pan Arctic, one has to study the question of government intervention. It may be said that Pan Arctic was a dream child in order to establish federal sovereignty in the north. That may be so, but is hardly a good reason for private industry to invest money in the Arctic without assurance of a good return on it.

At the moment the industry would seem to favour curtailment of exploration by Pan Arctic because there is a great demand for further exploration in the northern United States, the Middle East, and everywhere else. Pan Arctic has made some interesting discoveries of gas, but if it is to become a successful exploration company a time should be set when the product can be expected at market. Right now the time frame is the mid eighties—say 1985. That means the pipeline from the Arctic would have to be constructed in 1980. I do not say, Mr. Speaker, whether it should be in eastern Canada or western Canada, although it seems obvious now that it will probably go through eastern Canada—through Quebec into the New England states.

We have told the Americans that eventually we will not be giving them any oil at all. That statement is not going to help solve the cost of money for our energy quest. We need to tell the industry what we are going to do. Will some of the Pan Arctic gas be made available to the midwest? If not, we should tell the industry, but if some Pan Arctic gas will be made available to the United States we should say that too. It might help solve the quest for money.

There is the tremendously complex engineering problem of building a pipeline across the Arctic ocean to the North American continent to be considered. The deepest pipeline known in the world today is something like 400 feet down, but in the Arctic it would be necessary to go down 800 feet. The best expertise possible is needed. We will not get that unless we can say that a certain percentage of gas from the Arctic will be available for export. Surely if we can look ahead one year and say that Ontario will be short of gas next year, we should be able to say what Canada will be short of in the years to come.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him under the Standing Order has expired.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could just finish my remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member requests consent to continue his remarks. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the House that I appreciate the privilege given me. I would not want to threaten hon. members with the thought that I had just warmed up to my subject, however. It is one I have become very interested in, and I have nailed down a number of very important questions facing the Canadian people today, questions which their government must answer.

In the last few minutes I have been trying to solve the problem of where the money for further development in our country will come from if we are to be self-sufficient in the 1980s, and to find the "X" in the equation. What did the government do in the case of PanArctic recently? Bow Valley Industries wanted to sell 2.2 per cent of PanArctic to SOQUIP, the Quebec government oil company. Remember we are trying to find the "X" and solve the equation of the cost of money in our energy development exercise. The federal government said no. Why? Because it felt a provincial government might interfere in the decision of the exploration route for pipelines, etc. in regard to PanArctic development.

PanArctic has not sold a thing, and will not sell a thing until the middle 1980s, yet the government jealously guards the power it has, and wants no interference from any province. How sensible was that decision? It created difficulties in the quest for money because it excluded a major supplier of money. I recognize, as a Conservative member of parliament, that provincial governments are major suppliers of money, being major collectors.

When a province of this country wanted to acquire a 2.2 per cent interest in PanArctic, the federal government refused to acquiesce. It did not want to give up any part of its power. Surely the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not so hungry for power? It might be logical to say, in the banking business, that no shareholder shall control more than 10 per cent of outstanding shares. But surely it would do no harm to allow a province even a 10 per cent share in PanArctic. Ten per cent is a nice round figure.

An hon. Member: How about 5 per cent?

Mr. Horner: I prefer 10 per cent. It is an easy figure to deal with, Mr. Speaker. The government refused the request of the province. In my opinion that was a mistake. Why, Mr. Speaker? Any decision made by PanArctic must be supported by at least 60 per cent of the voting shares. The federal government owns 45 per cent of PanArctic, which means that it has the power of veto. If Quebec, owning 2.2 per cent of PanArctic, were to insist on the construction of a pipeline or on exploration in a certain area, then the federal government, which owns 45 per cent of the company, can veto that suggestion, because 60 per cent of outstanding shares would not vote in favour.

Also because of a lack of an in depth study the federal government foolishly stopped the sale of Bow Valley Industries to the Quebec oil company. In so doing it failed to give encouragement to the oil industry, which must remain viable if Canada is to remain self-sufficient in the years ahead.

Owing to the demand for energy, three major pipelines, the Alaskan Pipe Line, the Mackenzie Valley Pipe Line and, probably, a pipeline from the Arctic to the large consuming areas of North America, are to be built. Building them will place a tremendous strain on the international supply of money, especially on oil money. Some say, "Why not use Canadian money?" Social Crediters argue that you only need to print the money. If you did that, it would not have any value and would simply accelerate inflation.

Let me discuss the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline, which may or may not make energy available to areas east of the Ottawa valley. Personally I have never advocated the building of that pipeline, and I said so when we discussed it last winter in committee. I doubted that it would be built. I remember the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources saying that it would be built and would supply Quebec and the Montreal markets with oil "next year." Well, "next year" is here, and the pipeline has not been built. It has not even been started. Why not? I will tell you why not, Mr. Speaker. Nobody is prepared to guarantee that it will carry oil, that it will be used.

We have heard much in this debate about the two-way pipeline to be built between Sarnia and Montreal. One day it will move oil from the west to Quebec, and the next, so say some, it will move oil from Quebec to Ontario. Mr. Speaker, you cannot reverse oil flow by flicking a switch, as you do on an electric motor. Building a two-way pipeline is a major undertaking, and a very costly one. It will not be built unless the pipeline company is guaranteed a certain amount of revenue. So, we are once again back to the old equation.

The question is: how much money will this country need to solve its energy difficulties? The point is that building a two-way pipeline between Sarnia and Montreal requires a great deal of money, money which is in short supply. The question then is: is it necessary to build a two-way pipeline and, is the pipeline in itself necessary? That is a political decision. The oil industry will not build the pipeline if it fears that the government will intervene in the market. It is afraid that it will supply the Montreal market one day, and the next day cheaper oil will come in from the Middle East, Venezuela, Mexico and elsewhere, and undercut the market. So the oil industry will not build a pipeline unless it is given a guarantee that it will provide the oil for the eastern Canadian market. Otherwise the Sarnia-Montreal pipeline may not produce a return on investment.

Actually every major pipeline built in North America has been built under a guarantee that it will be used. A similar guarantee was extended to the Pine Point railway which serves the north. We said that we would guarantee that a certain number of tons would move over that railway every year. Similarly, when the St. Lawrence Seaway was built, guarantees were extended. We said that we guaranteed the movement of a certain tonnage, for a certain charge, through the system each year.

The oil companies are merely saying, "Give us the guarantee and we will build a pipeline; otherwise we shall lack confidence in the stability of the market and will be reluctant to build the pipeline." If that does not make sense to any particular member of this House, I say that he has not invested a dollar in anything and is not worth the pay he is drawing. So, if the pipeline is to be built, the government must extend guarantees that it will be used. That is a political decision.

I will not abuse the courtesy of the House. I appreciate the time which has been made available for me. I shall save further remarks for the budget debate. But let me say that in the previous budget the government undermined confidence when it said that royalties that oil companies pay to provinces will not be deductible from the income tax those oil companies owe the federal government. I will not deal with that subject at present. We shall see the government's position when it brings down the budget on November 18.

Surely the government recognizes the uncertainty which the previous budget created. We shall not solve the mythical equation I alluded to earlier with such budgetary policies. That is not the way to provide the money Canada will need if we are to remain self-sufficient in oil after 1983. I, members of this House, and people across Canada will be listening to the budget on November 18, to see whether the government is willing to help you, me and the rest of Canadians solve the problem of energy.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to participate in the debate on Bill C-32, the petroleum administration measure. I have listened to some of the speeches. As this debate progresses to committee of the whole stage, I must say I feel a lot of sympathy with Alice in Wonderland, her reactions to the Mad Hatter and to the perambulations of the animals in the animal kingdom in that story.

We are talking about oil and gas. We are getting heavier in its use and shorter on its supply, be it in Canada or any other part of the world. Yet we get involved in the detailed and constitutional machinations of this petroleum administration bill which, while laudable in one sense by trying to bring some order in a centralized way to the petroleum industry, will be and is divisive. It has already had a negative effect in doing what all countries of the world will have to do for their own survival, that is, build up security of supply. They must try to develop as much supply as they can economically within their boundaries.

Clauses 36 and 52 give the minister unilateral power to establish prices for crude oil and natural gas without consultation. This is in complete violation of the constitution. It makes one wonder what we are trying to achieve.

It is rather unique that we are debating this bill at this time. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) are at a food conference in Rome, where the nations of the world are trying to define some overall plan to help the starving millions on this globe.

Not too many months ago there was a world population conference in Bucharest. The nations of the world tried to see what they could do about the exploding population, especially in those areas where many of the newborn will not see many new days in terms of our mortality tables.

We have the ingredients for an explosive situation that is just as volatile as the subject matter of this bill, be it gas or oil. We have an exploding population and we are trying to develop food resources to feed them. As hon. members know, we live in this finite globe. We knew this before the Club of Rome decided there was something called limits of growth, yet all governments of consuming oil countries in the western world still persist in keeping their heads in the sand, believing that oil and gas will flow from now until doomsday.

This bill does not get down to the basics. I wish to point out several areas of concern.

I see the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) is leaving the chamber. That is interesting because I was going to mention, in a most unprovocative way, that that minister should be engaged more strenuously in discussions with the provinces on the traditional problems connected with broadcasting, especially cable. If that minister tries to bring in a bill that unilaterally tries to do, in broadcasting and cable, what this minister is trying to do in the petroleum and gas industry, some parts of this country would forever foreclose. They would lock out any federal minister who came to discuss jursidictional problems in broadcasting or cable.

We are talking about natural resources in the provinces. As I say, this bill makes a mockery of the constitution. It is a beautiful example of how the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wants to revise the constitution and bring home the monitoring formula which he talked about in the Speech from the Throne debate. Why worry about the monitoring formula? Why worry about revision of the constitution when a minister, masquerading as the saviour, in introducing this bill in the last session in response to the Middle East crisis, tried to assure Canadians we do have oil and gas. Using that laudable objective, he produced this constitutional deformity which will do more to erode constitutional consultations than anything in the past 20 years. As I said, it makes a mockery of Victoria.

We can forget about constitutional reform. The Prime Minister better not continue to hoodwink the press and the people of this country into thinking he is sincerely interested in constitutional reform or in an amending formula. I could go on with more of these paradoxes of the Prime Minister and this government, but I would get a little emotional.

I was going to be non-provocative tonight because I believed another bill was then being moved forward, but I can see how the Canadian public and the fourth estate, the press, are being hoodwinked, sometimes by the philosophy but more often by the platitudes of the Prime Minister.

When in Brussels the Prime Minister talked about supporting Nato. He knows our support has been at such a marginal level that it makes a mockery of every protestation of support for Nato.

When the wandering troubador called the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) finally comes back from his Middle East junket and gets out of the casbahs of Tangier and Cairo, he should find out what the Department of National Defence is doing in this country. He should condescend to visit the troops in this country where the majority are, rather than making these headline seeking globe trotting trips to try to shore up a faltering ego. He knows he is not doing justice to defence in this country.

The nationalists talk about sovereignty, Reader's Digest, Time magazine and Saturday Night. The Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister know that at this time we are not doing anything in surveillance off the east or west coasts compared with what we were doing six months ago. How can we have sovereignty in the north when there will be no maritime command flights in the north until the end of this year? When Canadians appreciate what is being done they will start to wonder how true and reliable are these things.

I have been talking about the paradoxes of the Prime Minister. I shifted to external affairs. I was relating the paradoxes in petroleum and gas and constitutional problems as they sometimes have a relationship to other areas. I notice Your Honour is getting uneasy. I was just getting wound up. I would like to develop that, but I will come back to the subject matter of the bill.

First and foremost in this bill there is the fundamental encroachment on provincial rights. It is a mockery of constitutional reform that should make any parliamentarian, and indeed any Canadian, sit up and listen with a great deal of interest to what the minister proposes in committee to resolve this question.

The Minister should look at clauses 36 and 32 and renounce those arbitrary powers which make him more influential with regard to energy than King Midas was with regard to gold. Of course, there is a difference. Everything King Midas touched turned to gold, but unfortunately when the minister touches things they do not start to gleam and become valuable. They become strange and mixed up. He reminds us of that character in the Li'l Abner comic strip who is followed everywhere he goes by a black cloud. We remember the days when, as "old Thumper", he was demanding changes in the House rules to bring forth a new day. We remember how we battled throughout the long summer heat of July, until finally there was some recognition from across the way and the "Thumper" of that day was put out to pasture.

Here is a government with an anti-industrial bias, whether in the west or in Atlantic Canada, which is forcing exploration teams to other jurisdictions, whether to the south, to the North Sea or elsewhere.

Turning directly to affairs in eastern Canada, let me say that the whole question of jurisdiction over offshore drilling is far from being resolved. No progress has been made. Despite all the powers the federal government presently enjoys in this area there has been no real progress, although attempts have been made from time to time to reach agreement on how yields might be shared.

We in the maritimes believe that offshore mineral rights belong in the first instance to the jurisdiction most directly concerned, though obviously it would be possible to set up a centralized marketing agency charging administrative costs and so on. Yet here we are, moving into a brand new field before any success has been achieved in tactics to reduce a major source of disagreement in this area. Is it any wonder that we in the east are very reluctant to give these powers to the minister, in view of this inability to resolve some of the problems which have faced us for the last 20 years?

As to the proposal to construct a pipeline, I would remind hon. members that my party came out with a firm recommendation that a pipeline should be built from Sarnia to Montreal as long ago as 1969, as a result of a so-called thinkers' conference arranged through the energy and imagination of my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton). I say "so-called" because I happened to be there—greater thinkers than I were present.

I would point out that there have been three wars in the Middle East since 1947. There have been wars in that region right back to biblical times. I do not wish to sound depressing but men have not died peacefully in their beds in the Middle East since the days of Jesus Christ, and I question whether they are going to die peacefully in their beds in the not-too-distant future. Mr. Kissinger, who has been trotting around the globe faster than the Globe Trotters, has not been able to arrange a firm peace in that area, and Canada's own vote in the United Nations when we encouraged the Palestine Liberation Front, allowing them to appear at the United Nations, did not help the situation. However, I shall not go into that aspect of the matter. I suppose the idea of the pipeline will come up again during the next war in the Middle East; perhaps it will start up again before the end of the year.

One of the departments interested in these developments is, of course, the Department of National Defence. It may not do very much under its present minister and perhaps, according to him, it does not have any problems.

However, you and I, Mr. Speaker, know it does have problems. But what does the government do in its infinite wisdom? It seconds the deputy minister of that department and makes him the chairman of the task force to build a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. We deprive the department of his talents, and put him into a task force to build a pipeline. He must have been lassoed pretty well. Some hon. members may recall the days of Tonto and the Lone Ranger. They used to lasso the good guys and the bad guys. This deputy minister must have been well lassoed around the old jugular, the old vocal chords, because we have not heard of him since then. I do not know whether he has yet produced a report on the pipeline. In fact that pipeline may have the same place in Canadian history as the old ICR in our history.

Mr. Oberle: Tell us about it.

Mr. Nowlan: I am grateful to the hon. member for that intervention, Mr. Speaker. The ICR was short for Inter Colonial Railway. It was built for security reasons to help those of us who lived in the Atlantic provinces to get to Central Canada, without being cut off at the pass by invidious Americans. You know, these feelings of nationalism did not begin with Pierre Berton or even with Peter Newman. Nationalism has for more than a century been a catalyst in the creation of this tremendous country of Canada. Anyway, the government of that day built the ICR so that the perfidious Americans could not cut us off at the pass—so that we could get to Central Canada, and tramp down to York.

It is for somewhat similar reasons we are now considering the building of this pipeline. We are trying to ensure security of supply. But I venture to say it will take another war in the Middle East before we find out what that deputy minister has come up with, Mr. Speaker.

I do not wish to leave this aspect altogether without reminding hon. members that we may have resources of oil in the east. It is not easy, as I have said, to make much progress at the present because of jurisdictional difficulties—people do not know whether to get a provincial licence or a federal licence, or both. However, the prospect is there, so we say the pipeline should not go just to Montreal but that it should be built further east to ice-free water along the St. Lawrence, so that if eastern offshore oil is discovered in the future the pipeline could be used to pump it from east to west.

Rather than always dealing with the Middle East situation and concentrating so much of our time on jurisdictional and constitutional infighting relating to the central authority versus the provincial authority, particularly on those questions which involve the production of oil, we would be much better to concentrate on questions relating to the research and development of new sources of energy.

Not too many years ago there was a gentleman who taught in parables because he found it easier to make people understand through parables than in any other way. That reminds me of the government, which deals in paradoxes. The government would have us think it is seriously concerned about the supply of oil and energy generally, but it has done very little in the way of providing funds for research and development for other energy sources.

This government's entire emphasis on sciences is bewildering, and I suggest that this is evident in the changes in policy that have occurred in respect of our defence research board and our National Research Council. We continue to see policies change with transfers from one section to another section, with the government playing one department of science against another department of science.

Recently there was a Senate task force in respect of science, and I suggest that confused the situation even more. Now we have a gracious lady who has been given responsibilities in the field of science. I hope she is able to come to grips with this whole science fabrication of the government.

An hon. Member: She has been shifted.

Mr. Nowlan: Well I knew that her grace and charm would not allow her to content herself in those sterile laboratories of science. I am sure that she is now prepared to accept the wider challenges of the environment. She was not there for very long, but she has left behind her, in those areas of science where the federal government has a concern, a very demoralized staff, and I think particularly of the science aspect of our defence forces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Anyone across the way who moans and groans about that suggestion, and is a disbeliever, has not really talked to the scientists in the various sections of the federal government. Be that as it may, where is the leadership in respect of providing increased funds for research and development in the search for new energy sources? I am not going to talk about solar energy or nuclear energy, because we have some expertise in these fields. However, it has always been a mystery to me as a member from Atlantic Canada, representing the riding of Annapolis Valley, which borders on the Fundy Bay area, why the government has not done something about harnessing tidal power.

The Fundy tides are the second highest or the highest in the world, depending on how patriotic one is, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how many hon. gentlemen opposite, or in my party, have read the feasibility studies, or the review of the feasibility studies in respect of harnessing the Fundy tides. One of the facts produced by the feasibility study is that in one tide, in the Fundy Bay, there is as much water involved as the amount of water that flows by Prescott on the St. Lawrence with all the potential kilowatt energy there.

For eons that tide has come in and has gone out. We have had a feasibility study, and a review of the feasibility study. I understand we have now had a third study, or a review of the review of the feasibility study, yet there has been no decision taken in respect of the potential hydro power source in that area. That is a fundamental source of renewable energy. It is a more non-polluting source of energy than any other that I can think of, and it is about time a decision was made.

Having watched various governments in their efforts to solve the constitutional and jurisdictional difficulties in the smaller provinces, we are rather apprehensive about giving any minister, or any government, the right unilaterally to cut through constitutions and contracts in setting prices for crude oil or natural gas. That must be the fundamental objection to this proposed measure. Hopefully there will be some amendments when, and if, the bill reaches the committee.

The government must reverse its anti-industrial bias. I do not suggest that it should necessarily adopt a pro-industrial bias, but it should develop a responsible industrial bias so that we do not continue to force oil drilling crews, be they in the west or in the Atlantic provinces, to move to foreign jurisdictions. That certainly does not assist us in organizing our supply.

In closing I should like to suggest once again that the government give serious consideration to the harnessing of tidal power. We should proceed with the construction of a pipeline, and extend it past Montreal to the Atlantic provinces. That pipeline should have a reversible potential so that petroleum can flow in both directions. We must increase our funding of research and development projects. We must spend more attention and time on developing additional energy sources.

The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) might well be interested in uranium, but I suggest uranium is just a little pinch in the area of energy source when compared to the potential tidal power in Atlantic Canada. When we see how little progress there has been in ironing out many of our energy problems, one wonders how any member of this House could possibly agree to give the government additional jurisdiction to resolve these problems, particularly when one realizes that these powers will allow the government to cut through the constitution.

I wonder how those members from Quebec, that province where there is great constitutional difficulty and division as between provincial and federal governments, could go along with this bill in its present form. Surely even they will agree that there must be some changes made in committee.

I am sure there are other members who want to contribute to this debate. I hope many of these problems will be resolved when the bill gets to the committee. As I have said before, this whole matter is a little like "Alice in Wonderland". We have a Madhatter atmosphere and on we run blindly.

There are many problems in this country, and in every country of the world, that require immediate solution. I suggest that when the nations of the world get together on our food and population problems, perhaps they can get together also on our oil and gas energy problems. Maybe a solution will be found in Rome to our food and population problems, and that is to be hoped if there is to be any sanity in the world at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Morin in the chair.

Mr. Sharp: Madam Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENTS TO DEFINITIONS AND PROVISIONS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of co-operation this party is prepared to let the bill pass without any further debate. We hope this will expedite the business of the House and that due recognition of this move will be given by the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we could proceed to the consideration of Bill C-27.

Mr. McKinley: I, too, rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood it was more or less agreed this afternoon that if the House were to pass Bill C-22 that Bill C-4 would be called. I realize the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is not here, but that was our understanding. There is an amendment at the report stage of that bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). If the House would give its consent the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) would move the amendment on his behalf. We would be prepared to proceed in that way, rather than consider Bill C-27 at this time.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, apparently there has been some misunderstanding. I was lead to believe by a spokesman for the official opposition that there was a desire to postpone consideration of the bill until the hon. member referred to would be in the House, but we are very happy to proceed with Bill C-4 now.

Veterans Affairs

STATUTE LAW (VETERANS AND CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENTS ACT, 1974

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ENTITLEMENT AND ALLOWANCES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

On the order:

November 6—Mr. Marshall—The following proposed motion:—That Bill C-4, An Act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, be amended by deleting lines 1 and 2 at page 14 being Sub-clause 11(1) and substituting the following:

"11. (1)(a) Paragraph 31(3)(b) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted:

"(b) who served in the United Kingdom during World War I for at least three hundred and sixty-five days prior to the 12th day of November, 1918: notwithstanding the foregoing requirements of this paragraph, a former member of His Majesty's Canadian forces who has served less than the minimal period so required but otherwise meets the requirements shall be deemed, for the purpose of authorization and payment of an allowance, to be a Canadian veteran of World War I save that the amount of the allowance, having been calculated as if the veteran has served in the United Kingdom at least three hundred and sixty-five days, shall be reduced proportionately to an amount calculated on the ratio that three hundred and sixty-five is to the number of days in fact so served."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The Chair has some doubt about this amendment. It would appear to go beyond the scope of the bill. There is some question whether it should be considered at this time.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), I wish to say a few words about this. Before he left he asked me to explain through you, to the House, that he does not want in any way to delay the passage of this very important piece of legislation which promises to do so much for the veterans of our wars. I respect the ruling of the Chair, and I feel that if the hon. member were here he would also realize the correctness of the ruling. As a matter of fact it was discussed at length in the committee.

I think perhaps there are some money items involved in the amendment. On behalf of the hon. member I respect your ruling, Sir, and withdraw the amendment on his behalf, in the hope that the bill will receive speedy third reading and be enacted into law, so that the calculations which are necessary to give effect to this legislation will be done speedily and the veterans will receive their cheques in due time.

I would also ask the minister to take notice of the intent of the amendment. While it goes beyond the scope of the legislation I hope the minister will put into effect the intent of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe when he placed his amendment on the Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The House has heard the request that the amendment be withdrawn. Is it agreed?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment withdrawn.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Sharp (for Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan)) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

● (2140)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, our attitude toward this bill is the same as the attitude expressed a moment ago regarding Bill C-22. We think both these bills are good and have had sufficient discussion. We are glad to see both of them given third reading tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-27, to amend the Customs Tariff, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the Whole House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to see such good legislation being expedited through the House. I hope we will have the same success with this bill, which may not capture the imagination of all hon. members but I hope it will capture the imagination of some.

The bill being considered by the House this evening is Bill C-27, which implements the proposed tariff reductions which were before the House at the conclusion of the last session. On October 3, 1973, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) tabled in the House a notice of ways and means motion proposing the temporary removal of the customs duties on certain petroleum products. These tariff changes are set out in Schedules III and IV to the bill.

On January 10, 1974, the minister tabled another notice of motion providing for the extension until June 30, 1974, and in some cases, until June 30, 1976, of most of the tariff reductions on consumer goods which he introduced in the budget of February 19, 1973. These extensions are listed in Schedules I and II to the bill.

These motions were combined without change in a new notice which he tabled in the House on March 1.

In the budget of February 19, 1973, the customs tariffs were temporarily reduced or eliminated on a broad range of consumer goods. These tariff reductions were an important part of a comprehensive program contained in that budget, designed to provide continuing impetus to economic growth and at the same time to deal with the upward pressure on prices.

In selecting the products on which tariff reductions were made, special attention was given to food and other consumer products in short supply, or subject to rapidly rising prices, or on which tariff rates were higher than average. In drawing up this list of products and in deciding the depth of tariff cuts, care was taken to avoid introducing measures which would jeopardize Canadian production and employment. At the same time the desire was to ensure that the tariff reductions were of sufficient scope and depth to have a dampening effect on rising living costs.

The tariff reductions were introduced initially for a period of one year. Provision was made, however, to restore the tariff on goods to the original level where cases could be established that the reduced duties would result in genuine hardship.

Relatively few complaints were received as a result of the budget tariff reductions, and not all of the objections which were registered were well founded or well documented. In certain cases, where real problems were created, these were resolved by the reduction, by Order in Council, of the duties on materials and components used in the manufacture of end products which were subject to tariff reductions.

The February, 1973, tariff reductions affected trade valued at about $1.6 billion in that year. In line with the assurances given in February, 1973, it was decided that the tariff reductions should not be continued beyond February 19, 1974, on a few products including certain fresh fruits and vegetables, canned fruits and citrus fruit juices. Imports for which the former rates of duty have been restored were valued at under $200 million in 1973.

A number of the complaints which were received were less concerned about the reductions than the fact that they were made on a unilateral basis rather than in return for concessions by other countries. In this connection it was pointed out that the reductions were made for purely domestic reasons and, because they were temporary in nature, they did not in any way impair our future bargaining position.

In the budget speech of February 19, 1973, the minister stated that the tariff reductions would be thoroughly reviewed before they expired in February of this year. The task of monitoring the movement of prices affected by the commodity tax and tariff reductions was undertaken by officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The monitoring of prices showed that, in general, the benefits of the tax and tariff reductions were passed on in large measure to the consumer.

The government decided that it would be useful to continue most of the tariff reductions until June 30, 1974. The tariff reductions on sugar and related products, however, are being extended until June 30, 1976. These changes, which were based on recommendations by the Tariff Board, are covered by Schedule II to the bill.

Schedules III and IV provide for removal of the duties for certain oil products. The most important products affected are gasoline, aviation fuels, light heating oils and diesel fuel. Heavy fuel oils used by industry are already free of duty under a provision which was to run out on June 30, 1974. It is proposed that this free entry be continued to the same date as that for the other petroleum products, namely, October 23, 1975.

Hon. members will be aware that crude oil imported by Canadian refiners has been free of duty for many years.

In light of the current demand and supply situation for petroleum products, such as gasoline and heating oils, there is clearly no need to maintain the duties on these products. I appreciate that, at current prices, the specific rates of customs duty which vary between one third of a cent and one cent per gallon do not represent a substantial part of the cost on a per gallon basis.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mrs. Morin in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. The house in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-27, to amend the customs tariff.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On Schedule 1:

Mr. Alexander: Madam Chairman, I just want to ask one or two questions with respect to schedule 1. Recently I had a letter from a constituent who is very concerned about customs duty or tariff applied to sacred music, and I believe it was a point well taken. Some consideration should be given to the importation of such music. I was trying to find some reference to it in Schedule 1, and perhaps because of my age I cannot seem to find it, or perhaps my bifocals are not working correctly. The only thing I can see with reference to music is something about phonograph records.

I should like to know whether any consideration is being given to the importation of sacred music and whether the government is aware of the need? Is there something that would allow us to say there should be a custom duty in order to protect our own music industry? I hope the parliamentary secretary can enlighten me on this. I did send a letter because I know a great deal of concern is registered by Hamiltonians who deal with music, primarily sacred music. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary is prepared to answer or if I will have to await the official answer. I believe it is important that we show some interest in the need for sacred music.

I see the parliamentary secretary is acquiring some assistance, so I will keep on talking until he can get working on it. I believe he heard the plea I am making with regard to sacred music.

Mr. Cullen: Madam Chairman, I must apologize to the hon. member. I was endeavouring to get the information he wanted from the official. I know that basically this particular bill is a housekeeping item, and I doubt if that particular thing was covered. I want to check to see if it is being looked into, however.

I understand that if the representations have been made a decision would be made on the temporary tariff basis. The official is not aware at this time, however, if the representations went directly to the minister or to the department, but they would be considered.

Mr. Alexander: I think I can inform the parliamentary secretary that my case went to the minister in order to register concern, but perhaps that does not make any difference. I understand the parliamentary secretary is stating that the department is aware of the matter and it will be considered. I should like to be sure, so that I can send copies of Hansard to my constituents.

Mr. Cullen: Madam Chairman, knowing the minister as I do, I can assure the hon. member that if that letter is with the minister it will be considered by the department.

Mr. MacLean: Madam Chairman, I have one brief general question for the parliamentary secretary. In the list of reductions there are quite a number of raw materials for food items such as vegetables, potatoes, certain types of fruit that are widely produced in Canada, and such things as bananas which we have to import. Have representations been received from producer organizations of these types of food products, and do the reductions or changes meet with their approval? Have they acquiesced in these reductions in most cases? I am thinking chiefly of vegetables, potatoes and fruit.

Mr. Cullen: Madam Chairman, representations were made, and as a result the ad valorem rate was removed. The rate is being restored on asparagus, cucumbers, tomatoes, sweet cherries and strawberries because of the seasonal production pattern of those products. Representations were made and were given effect to in this case.

Schedule I agreed to.

Schedules II to IV inclusive, agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Cullen.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—SUGGESTED CLOSING OF SUPPLEMENTARY OFFICE IN EDMONTON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, when man bites dog that is supposed to be news. I guess it is news when a politician wants to close a government office instead of opening a new one, but these are unusual times. Government is top heavy in this country. The proliferation of social programs threatens to bankrupt us. The bureaucracy which involves their administration threatens to smother us.

I do not think it is good enough to come here and talk in general terms, so I want to be specific and tell the government it will be aiding the taxpayers, not to mention restoring our faith in the governmental process, by closing the unemployment insurance office in Edmonton-Strathcona.

I am not talking about the main office in downtown Edmonton which is capable of serving the whole city. I am not talking about reducing UIC benefits to those who have a legitimate claim. What I am talking about is the superfluous bureaucratic excess which exists in the year old UIC office—the second one in Edmonton—which occupies a floor and a half, plus store front, of the most expensive property on Whyte Avenue in Edmonton.

On October 23 I raised this matter with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), following previous correspondence which he was good enough to acknowledge, in which I had made representation to him that the office should be closed on the basis of a study I had done about its usefulness. He said at that time that, if my observations were proved valid, he would not fail to use the opportunity to reduce the service. Following that I went around and had a long conference in the office with Mr. H. Verheijen, who is the district manager in Edmonton, and with Mr. Jack Nicol, who is the manager of the Edmonton-Strathcona office. This conference confirmed me in my judgment that taxpayers would be benefited by the closing of the office.

The number of employees in the office which, as I mentioned, opened one year ago, had been reduced from 81 to 45. The piece load has dwindled by about one-third within one year; so, too has the caseload of the office downtown. My point is, and I think the facts verify this, that the total number of people in Edmonton now receiving unemployment insurance and the total number of employees processing the claims are both less than they were at the time the Edmonton-Strathcona office was opened.

At the time when this office was programmed, unemployment was high and was forecast to remain high. As we know, unemployment in Alberta is today at 1.7 per cent, surely among the lowest in the country, and there are, according to figures released by Canada Manpower, 5,752 job vacancies in the city of Edmonton alone. There are more than 16,000 vacancies in all Alberta. Actually there are substantially more job vacancies than the figures I have mentioned indicate, because some jobs are open but not registered with Canada Manpower. Actually there is a severe labour shortage in Alberta, particularly in Edmonton.

Only tonight I was on the telephone, talking to employers in Edmonton who assure me right now that people cannot be found to fill jobs open in Edmonton.

The combination of these events has brought us to the situation in which a government service is no longer needed. This raises the interesting question of whether or not social programs enacted by the government to fulfil a legitimate need should be changed, diminished or cancelled when the need changes; or are we stuck forever with a program which is designed to meet the need when the need itself changes?

I contend, and this was reinforced by my visit, that the unemployment insurance service for the people of Edmonton would be just as effective if provided from the central location at dowtown, at a great saving. It costs $575,000 a year to run the Strathcona office. There are 1,500 square feet in this floor and a half of storefront of unused space. There are extra board rooms which are empty of people but full of furniture. They are not being used. The seating arrangement of people working there is extremely loose, and one is under the impression that the management is trying to use all the space available.

We must also consider that the average length of time people are on UIC has dropped from 11 weeks to four and one-half weeks. This reflects the control programs UIC has implemented, as well as the great demand for labour in Edmonton and throughout my own province. I think it is wrong to maintain such expensive service when it is not needed.

Finally, let me add that I wrote to Senator Hastings, of the other place. I thought he could act as a liaison man between Alberta and the government because, as you know, there is a severe shortage on the government side of members from Alberta. I figured that if I could not impress the minister with my own representations concerning Alberta, perhaps Senator Hastings could. So, I wrote to him. I wanted to find out what Senator Hastings could do about this matter.

I challenge Senator Hastings to prove his effectiveness in carrying the Alberta message to the federal government. I challenge him to come to the UIC office and study it the way I did, and they attempt to justify its existence. I challenge him to tell the minister that, if he is smart, he will listen once in a while to what members of this House are saying, because maybe we have our finger on the pulse of Alberta.

Mr. William Rompkey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member in his earlier question referred to the provincial Minister of Labour for Alberta as indicating that there are 40,000 jobs vacant in the forestry and construction industry. Tonight he has given some further figures to try to substantiate his claim. We feel that the earlier figure of 40,000 was not correct and that a more realistic figure would be 12,000 to 16,000. Further, this figure applies to the entire province of Alberta, and is therefore not directly representative of the area served by our Edmonton district office.

From a viewpoint of personal service, which is supported by most members on both sides of the House, discontinuance of the Edmonton south office could prove inconvenient to a significant number of UIC claimants located in the area.

The UIC continuously reviews staff and space requirements in line with operational objectives and anticipated workloads. A recent review has not indicated any potential savings possible in the Edmonton area at this time.

The UIC has already considerably reduced operating costs by effecting a staff reduction of 70 employees in the Edmonton centre office, and 36 employees in the Edmonton south office. These staff reductions represent the difference between January, 1974, and the end of August, 1974.

The UIC review of space requirements has indicated that in total the space occupied in Edmonton meets with the workload requirement expected during the winter, and is well within Treasury Board standards to accommodate the staff levels expected. Prior to the opening of the Edmonton south office the UIC staff's union had raised a number of grievances about the inadequacy of the space available in the Edmonton centre office.

Both the minister and I share the hon. member's interest in ensuring that our UIC offices provide effective service to our claimants within reasonable cost efficiency standards. To this end the UIC will continue to review the workload and staff requirements of all our offices, including the two Edmonton offices, with the objective of maximizing the utility of both the staff and space.

I will ensure that the further facts the hon. member has presented to us this evening will be brought to the attention of the minister and his departmental officials. May I also say it is our feeling that this time of year, with winter coming, probably is not the most appropriate time to close an office. We will review the situation over the winter and possibly consider further action in the spring. I am sure Senator Hastings will be in touch with us. We will take his representations into account as well.

FINANCE—GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADJUST INTEREST RATES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) is investigating cases of profiteering, might I suggest that he look into the subject of Canadian government annuities, a subject that despite its extreme seriousness, his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), has apparently chosen to ignore.

The minister has received countless inquiries, requests and pleas from concerned constituents and opposition members to take some action. The injustices of the annuity plan, which border on government negligence and fraud, have been publicized by responsible members of the news media.

Elderly Canadians have been misled, or perhaps swindled is appropriate, by their own government out of enjoying some form of independence and security in their retirement years. Instead of the advertised reward for their labour and thrift, they find that the monetary results of perhaps 20 years of diligent toil have been so decimated by the ravages of inflation as to render them useless in coping with today's prices for the necessities of life. The government simply sits back and mutters about a contract being a contract.

When the facts are that a perpetual bond issued in 1936 at $500 is now marketable at a paltry $150, the government says, "We can do nothing," and nothing is exactly what the government has done to arrest the growth of the inflationary disease that is the cause of the worthlessness of these investments.

That was the government's side of the contract, to ensure that the Canadian dollar the annuitants gave to the government for its use would still be worth something when the annuity matured, but through irresponsibility, ineptitude, or both, the government has not fulfilled its half of the agreement, letting inflation stampede ahead unchecked. Therefore the government has an immense moral responsibility to find a fair and just solution for the holders of annuities.

Since the government has these people locked into an annuity plan and there is no chance for them to opt out, it must either bring the annuity interest and payout rates into line with today's prices, or allow the annuitants the opportunity to regain their invested capital so they may reinvest in a program which could contribute some kind of fair return toward their retirement financing. I am quite sure that almost all the people in question would welcome the chance to recover these funds which the government has sequestered and is now making use of at interest rates of more than twice what is being paid the annuitants.

But the government takes no action. As further evidence of the unfairness of this situation I cite the fact that other countries such as the United States and Great Britain have annuity programs with flexible interest rates which are responsive to the current rates in the market place, to ensure a fair return from the program.

At least one private company in Canada offers a tax deductible annuity plan which guarantees 4 per cent compound interest, plus an additional yearly adjusted interest rate determined by the earning record of investments in the previous year. A recent example is an additional payment of 3 per cent, for an actual interest rate of 7 per cent. Not only is there a much more realistic interest rate, but in this plan the principle and the acquired interest can be made liquid at any time by the investor. This is but one example of a private company turning a profit while offering annuity terms which make the government's terms seem criminal by comparison.

But over on this side of Wellington Street it seems that the government's terms cannot be brought up to a humane standard without large subsidies by way of tax dollars. This becomes difficult to believe when one considers the amounts of capital and the interest rates involved. In ball park figures, the government is paying out about $52 million in interest for the use of $1.3 billion. This compares a little too favourably to the $117 million the savings bond plan would have to pay for a similar amount of capital at present interest rates. Moreover, the annuity plan does not ensure return of the principal; this depends wholly on how long the annuitant can survive on his meagre pension and annuity payout, and in practice we find there is no guarantee he will hold out long enough.

An example is the case of contracts Nos. 160,193 and 429,625 which were combined to produce a monthly return of $100 commencing at age 50, with a 20-year minimum guarantee. At maturity in July, 1973, the annuitant had paid $14,956 in premiums, and interest amounted to $6,227, for an annuity total of $21,183 when the payout began. But after the 20-year period had elapsed, the account would still show $10,683 remaining of the amount of the matured annuity. And if the annuitant were to die, that $10,683 belongs to the government—not a penny to his widow or to his estate. To get his original principal back, the annuitant would have to exceed his normal life expectancy and live to be at least 82 years old. Is this the equitable solution the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) claims to be seeking? Does not the gravity of the situation demand that it be more than "kept under consideration"?

The 300,000 unfortunate Canadians locked into this situation need more than feeble excuses to finance their retirement. Rhetoric will not pay their heating bills or their grocery bills. They desperately need responsible government action to improve their plight, and some forward thinking from the other side of the House in order to prevent another investment plan giving cause for honest people to call their government a bunch of swindlers, guilty of fraud and gross negligence, as many people have had cause to do in the recent past when commenting on the present plan.

I would submit that the Canadian government is putting its credibility in serious danger when hard-working Canadians invest in their own government only to find it has been a bad investment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Thank you, Madam Speaker. As the hon. member knows, my time is more limited even than his, and consequently I am not able to respond to all the charges and allegations he has made. However, I know from my own experience that this question has been given very careful consideration by the Department of Finance and by succeeding ministers of finance.

What we have endeavoured to do is resolve the matter, but as the hon. member, I hope, appreciates when he looks at the over-all picture, it is not a simple matter to resolve equitably. That is one of the problems faced by the government in hoping to cope with this kind of situation, perhaps not so much as it affects these particular annuitants, but as it affects others with whom the government enters into contract.

The hon. member may scoff and say that the government falls back on that phrase, that it has entered into a contract, but in point of fact that is precisely what was done. Government annuities have always been sold on a fixed premium basis, with the government guaranteeing, through times of depression or inflation, payment of the contracted amount of the annuity.

The only way the government could index government annuities against cost of living increases would be to require increased premium payments, or by using tax revenue. As I have said to the hon. member, the government has given very careful consideration to such requests. And as he may realize, this would constitute—that is, what is being suggested—an increase in the annuity payments which the government agreed to pay in return for the premiums paid.

A government annuity is a contract, just as is an insurance company endowment policy, or any other contract whereby the purchaser agrees to pay fixed premiums over a number of years to the government and the government agrees to pay the annuitant a fixed amount in return, commencing at some future date. That is the form of contract which has been entered into in these particular cases.

CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION—ALLEGATION CORPORATION FAVOURS CERTAIN REGIONS IN MAKING PURCHASES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): I am here tonight to talk a little about the Canadian Commercial Corporation. When I attended a committee meeting of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and we had the president of that corporation, Mr. Glassford, before us, I felt, as I think did a lot of members of the committee, that Mr. Glassford was ill-prepared to answer the questions we had prepared for him that night. As a result, we put a motion on the floor asking for further information. I am pleased to say that the minister, through his department, saw that our request was met right away. I think there was a lot of important information involved.

I am glad to see the minister has recovered from his illness. We missed the opportunity of having him appear before the committee. I am glad to see him back and, hopefully, ready to answer some questions about the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

I want to quote from the annual report of that corporation, for the benefit of those hon. members who do not know its function. On page 4 we find the following:

> Canadian Commercial Corporation, which is wholly owned by the Government of Canada, was established in 1946 by an Act of Parliament for the following purposes:
> (a) to assist in the development of trade between Canada and other nations;
> (b) to assist persons in Canada
> (i) to obtain goods and commodities from outside Canada, and
> (ii) to dispose of goods and commodities that are available for export from Canada—

Another part of the annual report states:

> Canadian suppliers are selected from Department of Supply and Services approved source list;

My main complaint is that the source list from which the Department of Supply and Services operates across Canada leaves a lot to be desired. I think that this corporation has not gone across Canada seeking the advice of companies that could be supplying goods. It seems to have concentrated its advertising efforts in central Canada, that is, in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. This has been pointed out by the complaints of people across Canada, particularly at either end. They complain that their parts of Canada are being ignored by a centralized government. Possibly that is why it always seems that those parts of the country have more members in the opposition than in the government, no matter which party is in power. Those people feel they are hard done by in such a case.

I would now like to quote some figures from reports we received at the committee's request, showing companies that had tendered for contracts on $10,000 and over with the Canadian Commercial Corporation. We broke them down by provinces to show the amounts and the provinces.

These are figures which were supplied to us by the department. In Prince Edward Island the Canadian Commercial Corporation did no business at all. In Newfoundland 2.3 per cent of the business was placed. Nova Scotia received 4.8 per cent of the business. New Brunswick received .02 per cent of the business. Quebec received 47.9 per cent of the business, and Ontario received 36.7 per cent of the business. Manitoba received 5.3 per cent of the business placed by the corporation. These figures are for 1973-74. Saskatchewan received .02 per cent of the business. Alberta 2.4 per cent and last, but not least, the province of British Columbia, with 10 per cent of the Canadian population, received .4 per cent of the business placed by the corporation.

The amount of business placed by the corporation totals $210,571,315 in the year 1973-74. That is a large amount of business which could be placed in areas of this country where it could do some good.

I think this company should be instructed by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) to make sure that it co-ordinates its efforts a little more with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion because there might be some businesses which could be put in those areas aided by that department which could fulfil the needs of this corporation.

When you look at a corporation of this size which is doing 85 per cent of its business in the two major provinces, and is doing 15 per cent of its business in six out of the ten provinces, and is doing 15 per cent of its business in eight of the ten provinces, I think this shows the corporation is not doing its work. I would hope the minister would be able to do something about this in the next 12 months so that the corporation will show a business spread equivalent to the population in the major areas of our country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I had the opportunity to discuss the question with my hon. friend, and I respect his feelings on the activities of the Canadian Commercial Corporation and the fact that the Corporation does not actually buy in every region of Canada.

I have absolute respect for his views. But, as I have indicated, I believe the activities of the Corporation should be brought into larger perspective, that of my department's activities in overall purchasing.

In that context, I would stress that during the 1970-71 period we bought only $100 million's worth in certain areas, while that figure rose to $230 million in 1973-74, and this year we expect to reach the $300 million level, which undoubtedly is an improvement.

Others have also buying power, and that waged by the provinces is enormous. With my colleagues from Western provinces and those from the Atlantic provinces I tried to develop a purchasing strategy for a much closer co-operation between the provincial and federal levels of government.

Fortunately, such action is bringing results. A joint federal-provincial exhibition is scheduled for next February in Manitoba, to tell businessmen there how to do business with provincial or federal governments.

On December 6 of this year, I am going to Saskatchewan to explore the possibilities of holding a similar exhibition there, to better inform businessmen in the province on the sales opportunities offered by both provincial and federal governments.

In the Atlantic provinces, I hope we may develop a similar formula for co-operation, in order that information be made available to businessmen. We supply data through various publications and programs. But, over and above that, I believe if results are not forthcoming, the government should, and I will most certainly try to send officials on the field in order to reach local businessmen.

They show them how to do business with us, what the future opportunities to do business with us are and how they can develop their own company to make it easier for us to buy from them.

It is therefore in that spirit that I would certainly like to decentralize our purchasing in order to make sure that each area of Canada feels really integrated and that opportunities to do business with the federal government are equal for all. It is also in that spirit that, in my opinion, the remarks of the hon. member will most certainly be welcomed favourably.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

TRIBUTES TO MEMBERS OF CANADIAN FORCES WHO SERVED IN WARTIME

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members of this House that next Monday is Remembrance Day, the fifty-sixth anniversary of the day when, at 11 a.m., the guns fell silent along the Western Front. Sadly, this was not the "war to end wars" that we were told it would be. Since that day many more Canadians made the supreme sacrifice in the Second World War and in Korea. In these three conflicts, nearly 115,000 Canadians gave their lives to preserve and protect the freedoms and institutions we hold dear, not the least of them being this House itself. When I look around this chamber and see empty chairs, I am often reminded of the empty chairs in Canadian homes to which so many fathers, husbands, sons and even daughters did not return.

In this connection, I want to inform hon. members that on Wednesday of this week a book was published which will serve as a fitting tribute to those who never came home. Its title is "Silent Witnesses"; in the French language version, "Témoins Silencieux". It tells the story, in words and pictures, of the cemeteries and memorials to Canadian war dead overseas. It is hoped that the book—a joint of my department and the National Museum of Canada on behalf of the Canadian War Museum—will be a source of information and comfort to the relatives and comrades of the dead, and of satisfaction to all Canadians.

Our memorials to the fallen, both at home and abroad, pay tribute to those whose names they commemorate. We are equally proud of, and grateful to, those who returned bearing the scars and wounds of battle. These we also remember on November 11. For these and many others whose lives were tragically altered by war, this nation observes a daily act of remembrance and an acknowledgment of the debt we owe to them through the many programs of assistance to veterans. We can never do enough, but all Canadians can be proud of our achievements in this area and can rest assured that this obligation, rooted in gratitude, is being faithfully discharged.

On Monday we shall remember them in ceremonies across this broad land of ours. It is proper that we do so, for they have earned the eternal respect of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a pleasure for me, on behalf of the official opposition, to join with the minister in the sentiments he has so well expressed. As the years go by and the memories that are vivid to many of us of World War II and the Korean war recede into the distance, it is even more important that the memory of those who made special sacrifices in those crucial days are kept ever green. We should not forget that all of the democratic freedoms we enjoy were preserved by the many, many Canadians who made the supreme sacrifice in World Wars I and II.

These memories will come back on Monday as many of the members here take part in commemorative and memorial services throughout Canada. We certainly appreciate the remarks made by this minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I join in the sentiments expressed by both the minister and the spokesman for the Conservative Party in paying tribute to the veterans who fought in wars gone by. We are proud to pay tribute to them on November 11. The contribution made by those who fought in World War I was made to end all wars, but 25 years later service people were called upon to serve this country, and did so with great distinction again to end all wars.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians in the age group that do not remember the contribution made in both world wars will look at the reasons that caused those wars and will make sure that it is never again necessary to send people into battle. The responsibility is now with that age group. It seems to me they can play a better role by seeing that the world is free of war and making their contribution in that direction. They should also take the opportunity on November 11 of paying tribute to the memory of those who secured for them the freedom to make that contribution.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we join the minister in expressing our gratitude to those who gave their lives for what was called and still is freedom and peace. On two occasions, in both World Wars, Canada has greatly contributed to the victory. We won the wars, but we lost a great many distinguished Canadian soldiers whom we would have liked to spare.

I would like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the objective of both wars was to restore peace in the world. The minister has well stated that sadly this was not the war to end wars. It is somewhat like strikes, the end of one is the beginning of another and if today our dead were coming back on earth to see what is going on in Canada, I think that they would rather be still where they are than being worried like Canadians are presently by inflation and all kinds of problems.

Wars do not settle problems. We want to solve problems, but the opposite occurs. It happened on two occasions, but it does not prevent us from being deeply grateful to those who gave their lives for their country, Canada. I also believe that after having commemorated the 56th anniversary next Monday, we should, as soon as Tuesday morning, pass some legislation to avoid wars and guarantee to all the people on earth security with freedom, which would be a token of fair, solid and honourable peace throughout the world.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED STUDY OF PROGRAMS DIRECTED TO FARMERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that being what appears to be CBC policy of phasing out radio farm broadcasting in Canada in favour of a broad, and sometimes meaningless, version of agricultural information and news. It appears that the management of the CBC does not understand the importance of an informative program directed to farm and rural audiences. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the matter of program content and direction of farm programming be sent to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, and a full and open discussion of this important area be undertaken as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which, being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be debated at this time.

[Mr. Peters.]

AIRPORTS

PICKERING—PROPOSED DELAY IN HIRING PERSONNEL FOR CONSTRUCTION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. My motion arises from the advertisement in today's Globe and Mail which reads:

We have a number of challenging positions for engineers who wish to join a team of professionals involved in creating the New Toronto International Airport.

That advertisement for engineers seriously undermines the position of the Airport Inquiry Commission. For that reason I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That this House requests the government to delay any further hiring of personnel to be engaged in the construction of the new Toronto International Airport, pending the final report of the Airport Inquiry Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion which, being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, because of the rapid progress made in disposing of items on the order paper yesterday, the announcement I made about House business has become obsolete. I therefore wish to indicate the business we propose to call today. The first item will be Senate Bill S-13 respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, followed by Bill C-29, the Canadian business corporations bill; if we complete that, we shall follow with Bill C-25, the environmental contaminants bill. If we complete that we may take another look.

FOOD PRICES

EFFECT OF USE OF CREDIT CARDS—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Since the food chain stores have traditionally stressed cash payment and since they are greatly concerned with the price of foods at this time, would the Minister tell the House whether he is conducting a thorough study on the use of credit cards and its effect on foodstuffs prices?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a study is being conducted within my department, especially in respect of the use of credit cards.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Considering the concern expressed by the Canadian Grocery Distributors Institute and the Retailers' Council to the effect that the extensive use of credit cards would bring about a spiralling of food prices and since this practice is rapidly increasing, why did not the minister ask the people concerned to stop this practice, at least temporarily, until completion of these in depth studies?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I did not because we are in a free enterprise society where every individual may use the type of payment he feels proper and there is no question of limiting the people's freedom of action.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary. Has the minister raised or does he intend to raise this matter with his provincial counterparts, particularly in view of the effect widespread use of this practice might have on the price of food across the board, that is on the prices paid for food by people who continue to pay cash?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: It is an excellent suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I shall certainly follow it up.

[English]

EFFECT OF USE OF CREDIT CARDS—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the impact the use of credit cards could have on food prices in Canada, will the minister ask the Food Prices Review Board to look into this matter on an urgent basis so that we can get some indication of exactly how serious the impact could be?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member could provide me with proper evidence warranting the conclusion that credit cards have greatly contributed to the rise in food prices. If he could, I should be very pleased to refer this information to the Plumptre board for review.

[English]

SUBSIDY ON POWDERED MILK—PROPOSED APPLICATION TO EVAPORATED MILK

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely to get evidence that I asked the minister if he would refer this subject to the Food Prices Review Board which could ascertain if there is evidence. In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance who has shared responsibility. Will the government give immediate consideration to a recommendation contained in a report released by the Food Prices Review Board today on food prices in the province of Newfoundland? They recommend that the powdered milk subsidy be applied immediately to evaporated milk. Will the government give immediate consideration to that as that recommendation of the board is something that can be done immediately?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will look at that report right away.

FLUID MILK—SUGGESTED RE-INTRODUCTION OF SUBSIDY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The latest consumer price index indicates a very substantial increase of 3.7 per cent in the price of fluid milk from September 1974 to October 1974. Will the government re-introduce the subsidy on fluid milk?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been answered before. The answer is still the same.

BREAD—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the revelation in the latest consumer price index that bread prices have increased by 7.1 per cent since September of this year and noting that Maple Leaf Mills, one of Canada's largest mills, enjoyed a profit increase of 40 per cent in the first nine months of 1974 while sales in the same period increased by only 23 per cent, would the minister order an investigation into bread prices from March of 1974 to the present in order to determine whether the consumer is again being ripped off?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Food Prices Review Board has precisely been established to carry out this type of work. I am sure it is aware of the statistics quoted by the hon. member, and that it will look into this with the same drive it demonstrates generally in fulfilling its assignments.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: A further supplementary directed to the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman admit that the lack of investigations and subsidies is due directly to the fact that the government now sits in a majority position?

RISING COST OF SUGAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the same minister, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The other night on television, he was answering the questions of interviewers about the rising cost of different products. About antifreeze, for example, the minister suggested a price not exceeding $10, but felt an inquiry should be made.

With regard to the price of sugar, the minister repeated: "We will conduct an inquiry". The minister is conducting an inquiry on about every product. Now, with regard to sugar, as soon as he said that an inquiry would be made, in fact as early as the next day, the price of sugar went up by $3 per hundredweight. Is the minister aware that those companies are laughing at the government and the minister instead of taking the measures required to provide a good service to Canadian consumers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member watched closely that TV program, he will recall that with regard to sugar, I indicated that it is not an inquiry which is being conducted, but that proceedings have been taken against three eastern Canada refineries. So, we take the matter very seriously since we have taken the matter to court. Besides, if the hon. member is suggesting that there is some profiteering, I will repeat what I said in the House yesterday: When the government introduces a profiteering legislation, I hope the hon. member will vote for it.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I readily believe the minister when he maintains that proceedings are being taken against the three largest sugar refineries. But since they are just the same increasing their price by $3 per hundredweight, what does the minister intend to do in this connection? They scoff at the law, at the minister and at the government.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, Canadians have not voted for a price freeze in Canada. Secondly, when the profiteering bill is passed, we will be able to implement it. If the opposition members had maintained the government in power before the last election in order to enable it to pass that legislation, it would probably be in effect by now.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The minister urges me to vote with the government for a price freeze in order to maintain profits. I agree, but is he aware that an anti-combines legislation actually exists in Canada and that under its provisions, should the minister or the government bring this problem before the courts, those responsible can be sent to jail? I undertake in the presence of the minister and of the government to vote for the jailing of the thieves who create sugar monopolies in Canada. I shall vote with the minister then.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member is well aware that sentences are handed down by judges in Canada. In fact, there is an anti-combines act and we invoked it to take proceedings against three sugar companies in eastern Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE UNILINGUAL ANGLOPHONE WILL NOT LOSE POSITION IF IT IS DESIGNATED UNILINGUAL FRENCH

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and arises out of a speech that he made to the Club Richelieu two or three days ago in Quebec. In light of his statement that positions in the Ottawa area will be opened to unilingual French persons in the near future, will the minister undertake to the House and give us a guarantee, if he will, that no unilingual English speaking public servants who presently hold positions to be designated unilingual French will lose their present positions?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to be too restrictive but it seems to me that the hon. member got exactly the guarantee from the minister for which he was looking. However, he may put a supplementary.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, seeing that the minister is in such a good mood I thought I might get the other part of the guarantee out of him at the same time. Would the minister also give his assurance that no positions designated unilingual French will be closed to any Canadian who is prepared to learn French?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would welcome any Anglophone who wants to work in French.

POST OFFICE

EFFECT OF REORGANIZATION OF POSTAL CODES—LACK OF EQUIPMENT IN VANCOUVER OFFICE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that individuals as well as business people have spent thousands of dollars printing stationery to include the postal code and are now forced to discard that stationery because those zones are being reorganized, would the minister please inform the House whether this reorganization is now complete and, therefore, save taxpayers further inconvenience and money?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. gentleman would have to give me specific instances because his question is very general. We are presently reorganizing the post office on about 35 different fronts, so he would have to be a little more specific.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I do have a specific case regarding which the minister will be receiving a letter momentarily. As a supplementary question, may I ask the Postmaster General this. In view of the fact that the Vancouver post office does not even have the equipment to handle the postal code, does he think this expense and inconvenience was at all necessary?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, there are only five centres in Canada that do have this equipment. We think it is only logical that Canadians be educated to the code before we buy the equipment. So far as letters to the minister are concerned, I prefer to get the letters first through the mail or delivered by hand, rather than read them in the press or hear them in the House of Commons.

SUGGESTED DELAY IN REORGANIZATION OF POSTAL CODES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the new automated plants are coming on stream on a staggered basis, would the Postmaster General issue orders that there be no drastic changes in postal codes until such time as the code is actually in operation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think I am quite prepared to review the whole situation, as the hon. gentleman suggests. My main problem is not so much the staggering of equipment but the Postmaster General arriving on the job staggering!

PENITENTIARIES

SUGGESTED RESTRICTIONS ON GRANTING OF TEMPORARY ABSENCE PASSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Solicitor General which I address jointly to the Minister of Justice. I ask him this morning whether Gagné, who was given a temporary pass after having been convicted for killing a taxi driver for a theft of $20, has been rearrested. I should like to know who granted the pass and why it was granted. There is presently a high incidence of murder, with two cases in Calgary in one week, one a young fellow 17 years of age who had his throat slashed, the other a child of three, and with a doctor and a policeman killed in Montreal. With the administration of justice now at such a low ebb, is there going to be a change in this policy, or are we just going to continue to drift and make society an unsafe place?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe Mr. Gagné was convicted in 1967, at which time the eligibility date for parole was seven years. Since that time we have amended the law twice. The most recent amendment made last year was to fix the minimum parole date at ten years, with the possibility of increasing it up to 20 years. We also put in the legislation the provision that no temporary absence pass can be given until two years prior to the full eligibility date. But that law was not made retroactive; consequently the rules relating to temporary absence passes applying to Mr. Gagné provided that he had to wait three years, I believe it was. The first temporary absence pass that was given to him was five years after he started to serve his sentence. The rules that apply today provide that the minimum period will be eight years, and it could be up to 18 years before any temporary absence pass is granted.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister talks about parliament passing those amendments. It was a government piece of legislation which was rammed through by the government. I should like an answer to my question. Has this man been rearrested? Whatever the rules and regulations provide, they are always subject to interpretation. This is a serious matter. I am getting dozens of letters from people across the country regarding the high incidence of violent crimes, particularly murder. Irrespective of what the regulations provide, here we have a man who was released and who killed a doctor and a policeman.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has put his question; I do not think he should argue it.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you want murder?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out to the House, the law has been amended and temporary absence passes have now been restricted quite substantially compared with the situation formerly. I do not think there was any objection in this House last year, when we introduced and passed the capital punishment law, regarding these longer eligibility dates for parole and for temporary absence passes. If I remember correctly, the hon. member supported that part. I think he was suggesting yesterday that there be no temporary absence passes at all, that a life sentence would mean a life sentence, with no opportunity at all for release. We did improve the situation last year.

INQUIRY AS TO REARREST OF ESCAPEE GAGNÉ

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Well, Mr. Speaker, I see the minister does not want to answer the question; perhaps the answer is obvious. I ask him again, has Gagné been found and rearrested?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

TEMPORARY ABSENCE PASSES—DATE OF APPLICABILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have endeavoured to follow the minister in his peregrinations and explanations. Did I correctly understand him to state that the amendments made by parliament in the last two years concerning length of time that an inmate must serve before he can be granted parole apply only to those inmates who were sentenced since the date of the change in the law, that they do not apply to other inmates who were in penitentiary prior to the passage of the amendments?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): That is right, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the right hon. member voted for the bill to make the rules more stringent. The new rules relating to release on parole apply only to those who were convicted following passage of the law; that very provision is in the legislation. It was felt that it was not right to apply more restrictive rules to people who had been sentenced previously, and I think this is a tradition that is usually followed with laws of this kind.

HEALTH

STUDY OF MERCURY CONTENT OF FISH IN WHITE DOG AND GRASSY NARROWS INDIAN RESERVES—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the information made public yesterday in the Ontario legislature and on a CBC program that the Department of National Health and Welfare had conducted a study on the amount of mercury found in fish in the Grassy Narrows and White Dog reserve area, an amount 30 times the permissible level, would the Prime Minister discuss with the Minister of National Health and Welfare the making public of that very serious report prepared by the department?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that that report was tabled in the House in December 1973.

SUGGESTED COOPERATION WITH ONTARIO IN SUPPLYING NON-CONTAMINATED FOOD TO INDIANS ON WHITE DOG AND GRASSY NARROWS RESERVES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement yesterday by the Ontario Minister of Health to the effect that his department had suggested to the federal government that it work on a program of alternate food supplies for the Indians adversely affected in that area, which proposal was rejected by the federal government, would the Prime Minister discuss with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Minister of National Health and Welfare the possibility of working with the Ontario government to supply food which is not contaminated to the people concerned?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for developing an alternate economic base rests with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. However, this must take place in consultation with both the bands and the province and action is being taken on that front at this time. I will refer the matter to the minister who no doubt will have more information for the hon. member and the House in the near future.

GRAIN

PROPOSED REPRESENTATION OF EASTERN CANADA ON WHEAT BOARD IN VIEW OF FEED GRAIN SITUATION

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

In view of the never-ending problem of supply and of the cost of feed grains in eastern Canada, could the hon. Minister tell this House whether he intends to put forward an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, in order to enable Eastern producers representation on the executive of this Board on which only Western Grain producers are represented?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board are not representative of particular areas but of expertise which enables them to do the job of disposing of the grain produced in Canada. It does happen that one of the commissioners was born in one of the central provinces, but that is irrelevant to the situation. The present situation with regard to feed grain is progressing very satisfactorily. The early delays caused by the strike are being made up by the rapid movement of a very large volume of grain into the domestic feed grain market and I have every confidence the needs of the producers throughout Canada can be met given a new degree of alertness on the part of the agencies in this regard.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF OIL IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE IN VIEW OF GAS FIND OFF COAST OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is there anything he is in a position to state regarding the indications, if any, of petroleum products being present in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in economic quantities as a result of the recent gas find off the east coast of Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for notice of the question. The find off East Point by Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas rather than being significant in itself is significant in respect of the addition it makes to geological knowledge. Similar structures apparently do exist in the gulf which if they have similar shows of hydrocarbons would give an indication of a substantial natural gas field which of course would be of particular value to Prince Edward Island.

COMMUNICATIONS

CABLEVISION—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE OF MINISTER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION IN APPLICATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the recent charges of the Hon. Joseph Smallwood, a member of the Privy Council, and of cable television applicants, of political interference of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to delay the development of CBC facilities in Newfoundland and to block a cable television application, would the government House leader consult with the Minister of Communications and the Secretary to State in order to clear the air and remove any suspicion by having this matter referred forthwith to the appropriate committee so that rumour can be resolved with fact and allegation and answer supported by evidence.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much substance to give the allegations made by the hon. member, but I will look into the question to see if anything needs to be done. I have great confidence in my colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and I am sure he would never act in conflict with his public duty.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who I tried to reach by phone twice yesterday. I should like to ask the minister, in his ministerial duties as minister in charge of DREE through which he has contractual relationships with the Newfoundland Broadcasting Corporation of which he is a major shareholder and of which his brother is a major shareholder, if he himself would not like this matter forthwith presented before a standing committee of the House so that all these matters can be cleared up once and for all.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted to answer the question, the answer is an unequivocal yes. I am fed up with allegations. I have said categorically in this House and elsewhere that there is not a syllable of truth in it. I am sorry the hon. member was not able to contact me yesterday because I would have been glad to give him all the data which indicates that I have disposed of those shares, except for the action of the CRTC, since December of last year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Nowlan: There is no question about withdrawing. Mr. Speaker, this is not a supplementary but rather a point of privilege. I did try to get the minister yesterday. In regard to the disposition—and this is the disappointment because this matter came up two years ago at which time through an exchange on the floor of the House we had been assured there had been a disposition into the blind trust of shares owned by the minister and yet in checking the CRTC records not only of two years ago, or last year, but right at the present time I find there has been no effective disposition whatsoever of those shares under any sort of blind trust pursuant to section 19 of the Broadcasting Act. There has been no hearing by the CRTC, so the statement of the minister in this situation confuses the issue and compounds the rumour—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member began perhaps by seeking information on the subject and is finishing by coming very close to making specific charges against the minister about proprieties and, in addition, is now, in his latter remarks, coming very close to making a specific charge that the minister is misleading the House, whether it be deliberate or otherwise. In both instances, surely the question period ought not be the place for that unless under the usual circumstances the hon. member is prepared to name the minister or any other minister in a specific charge with the usual consequences on both sides.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, you have taken this thing several steps further. The minister said he had an unequivocal disposition to have this matter referred to the committee, but in the latter part of his answer he made a few statements which are not supported by the record. I suggest, and say in this House, there has been no effective disposition of the ownership or control of the shares in the name of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the clear understanding that the purpose of the question was to see whether or not the matter would be aired in the committee, it seems to me with the greatest respect that the details with which the hon. member is now dealing ought to be exactly the kind of thing that is dealt with in a more specific way in the committee.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted a question of privilege. At this stage of the proceedings I do not wish to hold up the question period. I assure the hon. member that I did not try to deceive him. What I said was that disposition had been made as of last December but that the CRTC had not held the hearing. The hon. member knows that kind of process must be undertaken. It is one over which I have no control whatsoever. When the CRTC decides to hear it, presumably it will dispose of it.

MILK SUBSIDY—POSITION OF PROVINCES ON ELIMINATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I shall address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of contradictory press reports on the elimination of the raw milk subsidy, can he tell the House whether or not the federal government decided to do away with the 5-cent a quart subsidy at the request of the provinces? If so, will he also tell us what provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, for I was not involved directly in the matter, the provincial Ministers of Agriculture all agreed, unless I am mistaken, with the federal Minister of Agriculture to recommend that the subsidy be discontinued for a while. As a result of that recommendation, we decided to do so, which was our policy, but, I stress it again, with which the provincial ministers agreed. Later on, I believe the provincial premiers changed the position taken by their Ministers of Agriculture, but the provinces changed their minds and not the federal government.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. As that policy has done much good, especially to low-income families, can the Prime Minister tell us whether the government is considering the possibility of maintaining or reinstating that policy which is truly beneficial to families?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will recall the early part of the question period, he will see that I answered a similar question very briefly by referring the hon. member to previous answers. The hon. member will then see, through those answers, that the main thing is that we are keeping the subsidy on powdered milk precisely to help the needy families.

FINANCE

EXPANSION OF CONSUMER CREDIT—RELATIONSHIP TO INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that the consumer and mortgage debt in Canada today is at the 90 per cent level with respect to consumer disposable income—and to put the question in perspective, in 1929 the figure was 45 per cent—is the government concerned about this extension of debt and will they bring some action to limit the expansion of consumer credit?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with a potential for a slackening demand in the next fiscal year, that might not be the appropriate policy, but I will go into that in more detail in the budget.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the government that this incredible expansion of debt has had any relation to the record levels of inflation that we are having in the country now?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The inter-relationship between those phenomena is a little more complicated than the question would imply.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT AID TO INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF INCOME SUPPORT PROGRAM

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Fisheries). In view of the fact that the fishing industry, especially in eastern Canada, is going through an extremely difficult period because of the markets and because of over fishing on the part of foreign fishing fleets as well as other factors, can the minister tell the House what initiatives will be taken by the government to help the industry? I realize that there is a form of subsidy now for surplus stocks, but does the government intend to take any new initiatives to help the fishing industry over this rather difficult period?

Hon. Romeo LeBlanc (Minister of State (Fisheries)): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I hope that after having solved some of the detailed problems I will be able to provide some more information next week of a positive nature.

Mr. Carter: Does the government intend to introduce an income support policy for fishermen because the present Unemployment Insurance Act discriminates against fishermen and contains many inequities? Without some kind of an income support policy it is quite possible that the industry could fail.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): It is our intention to introduce an income support program. However, the more I work on this with my officials the more I realize why since 1970 successive ministers and officials have been fighting with this problem. It is an extremely complicated area because of the variety of fishing operations and differences on both coasts.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—SUGGESTED PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING SUBSIDIES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

United Aircraft of Canada Limited is appearing before a parliamentary commission in Quebec, where they tabled several documents. However, the legal advisor representing this company said yesterday that he could not table documents concerning subsidies for several million dollars coming from the federal government, claiming he had not got permission to do so from the latter.

Would the hon. Minister be prepared, for the good of this inquiry and for the settlement of the dispute, to recommend United Aircraft to table these documents and, in the affirmative, could he invite the company to do so as soon as possible?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In view of the fact that those documents seem important for that inquiry, could the minister give the reasons why he refuses to make public the details of the grants which the United Aircraft is said to have received from the government?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, these documents are confidential documents exchanged between the government of Canada and the company involved.

PICKERING—SUGGESTED MORATORIUM ON HIRING PERSONNEL FOR CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport perhaps I can address my question to the Prime Minister, if he is listening. Like my motion under Standing Order 43, my question to the Prime Minister arises from an advertisement in today's Globe and Mail calling for engineers to do design work for runway terminal facilities and sewage facilities at the second Toronto international airport. Would the Prime Minister be willing to have his government initiate a moratorium on the further hiring or advertising for personnel to be engaged in the design or construction of the second international airport until such time at least as the Airport Inquiry Commission has had the opportunity to bring in its final report to ensure that the Airport Inquiry Commission is not reduced to a position of simply being window dressing?

ENERGY

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—ADVICE TO STELCO WITH REGARD TO GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources related to the very disturbing headline in the Hamilton Spectator reading "Pineline Limbo Worries Stelco". In view of the assertion made by the Prime Minister, I should like to know now whether the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal will be built and whether the contract with the Steel Company of Canada, which amounts to some $37 million, still stands. Has he advised the Steel Company of Canada of the government's intention?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, sir.

SARNIA-MONTREAL PIPELINE—LACK OF INTEREST OF INTERPROVINCIAL PIPELINE—DISCUSSION WITH GOVERNMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In light of the fact that Interprovincial has begun to lose interest in the general contract for the pipeline, has this matter been discussed by the minister with the Interprovincial authorities, and, if so, is there any truth in that allegation?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has been discussed. I have responded several times in the House with regard to the principal points that are of concern to the company regarding the financing of the pipeline on the current market. I hope that within a very short period of time we will make arrangements to overcome that particular concern.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the minister. When making inquiries would the minister also look at the complete study which was apparently done by her department into this matter, and would she also look into the fact that the Minister of the Environment in Alberta has indicated that he will not release this report without her consent? Would the minister inquire why a federal government is covering up something that should be revealed to the people of Alberta?

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, our policy is to make public the reports presented on matters like those raised by the hon. member.

If the report in question has not been made public yet, perhaps it is because the Minister of the Environment of Alberta has some reservations, namely that he wants to examine some particular aspects of it. However, I will inquire. My policy is to make reports public whenever possible.

POLLUTION IN GREAT LAKES—WORSENING CONDITION OF LAKE ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the fact that the International Joint Commission in its second annual report on water pollution in the Great Lakes has indicated some progress in water clean-up in Lake Erie while worsening conditions continue in Lake Ontario, has the IJC and this government in particular given up attempts to make similar progress in Lake Ontario in pollution clean-up as well as the control of highly fluctuating and dangerous water levels? If not, what further steps is this government prepared to take in order to rectify this situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): No, Mr. Speaker, we are well ahead in our clean-up program of the Great Lakes. Our concern is such that, following recommendations of the International Joint Commission, we have made representations to the Americans so that they speed up their own water clean-up program.

Water levels, as everyone knows, are subject to constant study by our services and the International Joint Commission and we keep the matter under close watch.

POLLUTION IN GREAT LAKES—SUGGESTED STIFFER PENALTIES FOR POLLUTING INDUSTRIES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that all reports, including one from the chairman of the Toronto Waterfront Advisory Board find that Lake Ontario is destined to eventually become just one large marsh, will this government undertake to introduce even stiffer penalties to industries that continue to dump polluted wastes not only in our lakes but in our rivers and will they suggest the same thing to the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the discharge of industrial wastes in the Great Lakes is subject to regulations that we established in co-operation with the provinces and by which, as far as I know, the industries concerned abide.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO WHETHER $500 GRANT TO FIRST TIME PURCHASERS TAXABLE

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs regarding the first time home buyers' program. Present inquiries to my local office indicate some confusion. Can the minister clear up the question of whether the $500 grant for first time home purchasers is or is not taxable?

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to clarify that. I have consulted with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue and the $500 first time home owners' grant is not taxable.

NUMBER OF UNITS AVAILABLE WHICH QUALIFY FOR $500 GRANT

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I respond to a question the hon. member for Broadview asked yesterday which I was not able to answer in detail. I can offer a little more detail today. It was with reference to the availability of housing which qualifies in this range in Toronto. I do not have a complete list but from a quick scanning of the newpapers, which anyone who can read can find, in the Toronto region there are 190 units in Scarborough, 300 in Islington—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps in respect to the other members, the further information might better be conveyed by correspondence. The hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister said that he had sent me a newpaper showing advertisements for homes listed at less than $45,000 and he restricted it to condominium and row housing. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not received the newspaper from the minister. Probably the only place I would find any mention of the minister would be on the comic page rather than the advertising page.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: May I say he is quickly becoming—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness, if I am not going to let the minister continue with his side of it I do not think I can allow the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Gilbert: He started it.

HEALTH

STUDY ON CORRELATION BETWEEN MALE FERTILITY AND WEARING OF KILT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I address a question to his parliamentary secretary. It is prompted by the research being carried on by a leading geneticist at a great Scottish university on the apparent correlation between male fertility and the wearing of the kilt. Can she advise if the department contemplates any such research in this country with a consultative role for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Hillsborough or do they view the whole project as an exercise in supererogation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could bring this matter to the minister's attention and perhaps he could assign me to investigate this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSING

DATE OF APPLICABILITY OF $500 GRANT TO FIRST TIME PURCHASERS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of the statement made by the minister on Friday last, could he clarify whether people who constructed homes during last summer and occupied them prior to November 1, will be eligible for the $500 bonus as indicated?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it will only apply on those homes on which the deals were closed and the occupants moved in on last Friday or subsequent to that for the next 12 months.

NATIVE AND RURAL HOUSING POLICY—NUMBER OF UNITS CONSTRUCTED—SUGGESTION GREATER PUBLICITY BE GIVEN PROGRAM

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and refers to the secret housing policy called the native and rural housing policy. It became secret when a senior official from Central Mortgage and Housing was dismissed because of revelations of the policy late last year. Today the information service of Central Mortgage and Housing indicates to anyone who wants to inquire that there really is not such a policy and that the minister's statement is the only material available explaining such a policy. Can the minister tell the House today how this policy that was announced by his predecessor on March 7 is being implemented and how many of the 50,000 homes promised to Canada's native people and deprived people, have been constructed to date?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to say that it never moves as quickly as we would wish. There are three provinces that have entered into the agreement with the federal government, British Columbia, Manitoba and Alberta and three projects are under way in British Columbia for a total of 24 units to start. I have had meetings with some of the native people themselves and will have meetings with officials—

An hon. Member: Twenty-four!

Mr. Danson: —in Vancouver early next month. We hope to see this program get off the ground a great deal faster. It is a matter of some priority to me that there are 24 units in one province. Some of the other provinces have not yet signed at all, unfortunately. We would like to see this program moving more quickly. I give it a high priority and I will be meeting in British Columbia with officials to try to speed up the program.

Mr. Oberle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister is obviously experiencing some difficulty in getting this program known to the people who could benefit from it, is he prepared to instruct his department and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to bring out information material that could be circulated among those people so that they could take advantage of it or is he hiding the program forever because he is embarrassed about the impact it could have in the housing field?

Mr. Danson: Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I am optimistic about the impact it could have. Certainly, the groups to whom I have already spoken have been well informed on it but I will check the procedure to make sure that more people are informed and that all hon. members are informed as well. Then, they may promote the program in their areas and, perhaps where the provinces have not signed agreements with us, they may encourage them to do so.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL—VISIT TO CELL BLOCK ONE WITH OPPOSITION MEMBERS

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Solicitor General. Would the minister, when he visits cell block one, take certain opposition members as well, and leave them there for a period of intensive study.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: Specify. Be more specific.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LIMITED

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. It concerns a Crown corporation known as

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I shall soon be in a position to inform the House of the steps we intend to take to reorganize completely Canadian Arsenals Limited, in order to increase our efficiency and to be able to reduce, and perhaps do away with our deficit.

REGIONAL PAY DIFFERENTIAL—REQUEST FOR EQUALITY OF TREATMENT

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the dissatisfaction that an unreasonable pay differential creates for federal employees at Canadian Forces Base Penhold, will the President of the Treasury Board make an effort to see that federally employed personnel receive pay equal to that given to other personnel doing the same category of work in the provincial labour force.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we always try to give our employees adequate compensation for the work they do. National rates are often not comparable to the rates in certain areas, such as Alberta or other places. That is why we sometimes ask for regional rates in our consultations and negotiations with unions.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY ACT, 1974

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH COMMISSION TO DELINEATE BOUNDARY

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), seconded by Mr. Sharp, moves that Bill S-13, an act respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The position of the opposition is that this bill ought to go to committee. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) and the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) have certain reservations with respect to the bill which can be dealt with in committee. We do not intend to hold up the bill at this stage. Our reservations concerning the bill are these. The bill provides for the boundary dispute to be settled by action involving the lieutenant governors of the two provinces and the governor in council, but makes no further provision for the final disposition of the matter.

Secondly, the bill does not specifically provide for public hearings, although one could infer from its language that a public hearing of the kind associated with boundary disputes involving municipalities and provinces is to be considered: there is no direct statement, although the implication is there. I thought I should express those two reservations before the bill goes to committee. We are content to let the bill pass at this stage without hearing from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) as, despite our reservations, we wish to co-operate with the government in bringing forward legislation which we consider important, always subject, of course, to our right to express legitimate differences of opinion on important questions of principle. That being so, let me say that we of the official opposition intend to give this bill speedy passage and refer it to the committee.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the same point of order, I suggest that the points the hon. member has raised can better be dealt with when the bill is in committee. His substantive points cannot be dealt with satisfactorily on a point of order. I do not know why the hon. member raised the matter in this fashion at this point.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) did not rise to make a substantive intervention in the debate at this point but, rather, to indicate that he was speaking on behalf of other members of his party who are prepared to see the bill go to committee quickly. Our present way of proceeding is unsatisfactory because we are restricted by the rules, which do not provide for the sort of exchange that is taking place. If there is disposition to refer the bill to committee quickly, we should let it go to committee. If there is disposition to debate it, we should do so. I see that an hon. member wishes to rise.

Mr. Foster: Speaking on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the bill has been properly moved by the minister. If it has, I plan to speak on it.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, may I comment further on what was said by the representative of my party, namely, that we do not wish to debate the bill but shall refer it to committee. I represent a constituency which for the past few years has shown considerable interest in the revision of the boundary. Various disputes involving local municipalities and the provincial government have arisen. As members may recall, it was suggested that the boundary between British Columbia and Alberta ought to be revised.

My point in rising is to ask the minister to give some assurance that by sending the bill to committee without debating it, we shall not be raising false hopes in parts of British Columbia. I hope the boundary dispute will not be settled solely on technicalities or by some secret arrangement between the two provinces and the federal government under which the people of the locality involved would not know what was happening. I do not want our action at the moment to be misunderstood by the people who are most directly concerned in any boundary alteration.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, speaking again on the point of order, I think these questions of substance could best be debated in second reading debate and in committee consideration. My colleague, the parliamentary secretary, will be dealing with the background of the bill. Rather than dealing with the actions of the two provinces concerned and the carrying out of our agreement on a point of order, I think we should consider the bill itself.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there disposition to send the bill to committee, or would the House prefer to hear the parliamentary secretary explain the bill?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to continue debate under the guise of spurious points of order, but it should be understood that if the parliamentary secretary speaks at this stage I shall wish to avail myself of the right to speak.

● (1220)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We must now decide whether this bill shall go to the committee without debate. If the parliamentary secretary speaks, the debate will begin and there is no indication how long it may continue. Is the House ready for the question? The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Maurice Foster (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, we are prepared to debate the bill at second reading: we are not in any great rush to send it to committee without debate. Possibly some of the points which members opposite have raised as points of order can be answered at this time, and certainly in more detail in the standing committee. I must say we are very impressed with the kind—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is highly irregular. Either this is without debate, or the debate should be called in the normal manner.

Mr. Speaker: With due respect, we have passed that point. I have already called the bill. I asked if the House was ready for the question, the parliamentary secretary rose and I recognized him. The debate has begun.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, Bill S-13, an act respecting the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, which is before us today provides for the proper management of the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, especially the sinuous southern section which is defined by the height of land along the Rocky Mountain system. The British North America Act provides the following:

—the Parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion increase, diminish or otherwise alter the limits of such province upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said legislature—

The governments of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have recently enacted legislation, to be effective upon the enactment of this bill on the Alberta-British Columbia Boundary Act. The provincial acts allow for conversion of the sinuous—height of land—boundary to a conventional boundary marked on the ground by survey monuments connecting a series of straight lines. They provide for changes in the boundary to be approved by the lieutenant governor in council, and they also provide for the survey, maintenance and resolving of disputes related to the boundary. However, these provincial enactments cannot bring about any desired change in their mutual boundary without similar federal legislation. Consequently, this bill is being introduced to provide the federal authority for confirmation and proclamation of any change that may be made.

The provincial acts and the federal bill provide for the establishment of a permanent Alberta-British Columbia boundary commission comprising three commissioners, one each from the three jurisdictions. That is the two provinces and the federal government. The functions of this proposed commission are to survey parts of the sinuous boundary as may be required, resolve disputes which may arise as to the true location of the sinuous boundary and possibly for other reasons, resurvey the surveyed portions as may be deemed necessary, and be responsible for clearing the boundary and for the maintenance of boundary monuments and markers.

Regarding any alterations to the boundary that may result from conversion of a sinuous boundary to a conventional one, the consent of the two provincial legislatures to the alteration is deemed to be given upon approval by the lieutenant governors in council of the two provinces and the consent of parliament is deemed to be given upon declaration of the boundary by the governor in council. Provision is also made for revising or supplementing the boundary map-sheets when any such alteration may be made.

The main purpose of the provincial acts and the federal bill is to enable quick reaction to resolve any doubts or settle any dispute that may arise as a result of exploitation of minerals which may be found in the proximity of any unsurveyed portion of the boundary. They will permit the ready establishment of a well marked conventional boundary without the rather cumbersome and lengthy procedures that would otherwise result each time a portion of the sinuous boundary had to be conventionalized.

With these few remarks I complete my presentation on this bill. I am sure several members on the opposition side of the House will want to speak to it. When the bill goes to committee we will be able to go into the full detail of all its ramifications.

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset we very much regret that what appeared to be an agreement to expedite the business of this House has now been broken by the commencement of debate by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Foster).

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): It was the understanding, agreement and disposition on this side of the House that we should not take time in this chamber to discuss the details of this legislation which most of us believe can, and should, be adequately and exhaustively discussed within the committee. However, once the parliamentary secretary broke the agreement that was apparently reached by House leaders on all sides, we certainly were not in a position where we could remain silent in the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There was agreement to bring on this bill last night, but I am aware of no agreement to put the bill through without debate. That just is not the fact. We wanted to deal with the bill.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time of the House on spurious questions of privilege. It is clear from the remarks of the spokesman for this party, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that we were prepared to proceed with this bill. There is, obviously, confusion on the government side. It certainly does not constitute a question of privilege in this House to simply note the government is in confusion. Were that the case, we would be engaged in questions of privilege from morning to night.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Again, I wish to indicate we regret that the agreement reached has been departed from by the actions of the parliamentary secretary. We will not take a great deal of time here, because we think the matter can be dealt with in the standing committee. There are some very important matters in connection with this bill—matters of particular concern to those of us who reside in the provinces involved. There are matters of principle, including the highly important principle of whether public business is going to be discussed in public or whether it is going to be discussed in private as is provided in this bill.

As members of this House who are acquainted with the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia know, there has been a great deal of concern about where the boundary lines will lie, and how firmly they will lie. From time to time there has been conversation about changing the boundaries in a way that would move communities from one side to the other. As one of my colleagues indicated before the debate began, it would be very unfortunate if a piece of legislation were allowed to go through this House which suggested there would be an opportunity, which may not in fact exist, to change the province of residence of certain communities on one side or the other of the present boundary. Therefore, there is now real concern within the provinces affected by this particular boundary.

There is a matter I wish to draw to the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mrs. Campagnolo) and her predecessor. There is a great deal of concern respecting this bill because many of the boundaries being discussed within this legislation lie within or adjacent to part of the system of national parks, at least in the area abutting Waterton Lakes national park in the province of Alberta and the adjacent area of British Columbia. There has been concern for some time about the possibility of extending the boundaries of Waterton Lakes national park to portions of British Columbia which contain the kind of interest that should be enclosed within a national park.

This is clearly a matter which might be considered by the commission. We believe that decisions taken with respect to national parks should be taken in public. There is danger that decisions made under the authority of the bill before us could be taken in private, hidden away and ratified by orders in council, without the public being given any opportunity to participate in them or to find out what has been done. This is a situation which we on this side of the House oppose without reservation.

Another matter of great concern is the presence of a variety of proven natural resources within the areas affected by these boundaries. We would not want decisions made in secret to alienate from one province and transfer to another province areas which contain important resource wealth. We hope this concern is not an academic one, although it might be if the intentions of the federal government, approved on second reading last night, are carried forward. For the present, at any rate, the provinces have a primary right to the resources within their boundaries and, as such, natural resources are capable of alienation.

These are some of the matters which will have to be considered. It may be, also, that some citizens desire to shift their province of residence, and this legislation as it stands might cause some of those communities to believe that this kind of transfer will be easier than it is in fact. But the intent of the bill before us which causes most concern is the proposal to establish a boundaries commission consisting of three members, one appointed in secret by the government of British Columbia, one appointed in secret by the province of Alberta—

Mr. Blais: In secret? How is that?

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): The hon. member asks what I mean by "in secret". I mean, without reference to the legislatures of the respective jurisdictions. A third member of the commission is to be appointed by the government of Canada. As I say, these commissioners are to be appointed without reference to any legislature, and they will consider these matters in the absence of any reference requiring public hearings to be held or any kind of public participation. They would make recommendations to the governor in council who would then put those recommendations into practice, again without reference to any legislature or to parliament. Thus, highly important matters concerning the provinces and affecting communities, national parks and resource development could be decided in secret. My hon. friends and I believe this to be a dangerous procedure and we want to consider it carefully in the standing committee.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Particularly with this government in office.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): That is certainly so, because the present government has shown an insistence on secrecy from time to time. In particular, we noticed in the last parliament an emphasis upon making decisions affecting national parks in such a way as to exclude public participation. In committee we shall be asking the minister to tell us why this process should not include a requirement to hold public hearings. We do not propose, either as members of the parliament of Canada or as representatives from Alberta and British Columbia, to allow these boundaries to be changed in secrecy without reference to the legislatures concerned. The parliamentary secretary did refer in his remarks to the consent of the legislatures. In the bill, as I read it, there is no reference to consent on the part of the legislatures. The process is carried out entirely by the lieutenant governors in council and the governor in council.

As I say, we do not wish to take a long time debating this issue, but since the parliamentary secretary made it impossible to proceed with the agreement to allow the measure to go through without discussion, and thus made it necessary for the House to delay its proceedings, I can say there will be other contributions from hon. members on this side. We wish to make the point that there are aspects of the measure which cause us concern and which we shall want to consider at some length in committee.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the comments made by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) and add some simple thoughts of my own. I am concerned about the effect of clause 4 which deals with the resurveying of that portion called the sinuous boundary. I notice that the last time adequate maps were prepared was in 1950 or 1953. There is no question that a new survey of this boundary is overdue.

The hon. member for Rocky Mountain has covered the ground very well and referred to a number of specific matters. I should like to draw attention to the arrangements for game management and regulation, as well as the management and regulation of fishing streams. I should like to see a member on the government side catch a trout in Alberta and get nailed in British Columbia for violation of the Fish and Game Act.

The bill we are considering might appear to be a very simple bill and one unlikely to create difficulties. Nevertheless, a number of questions arise. In the southern half of British Columbia there are extensive mining operations. Extensive exploration for oil is being conducted and there is also extensive coverage of the area by those doughty souls who are so rarely recognized. I refer to the prospectors. These people need definite guidelines on which to base their references—as, of course, do the mining and oil companies. The suggestion is that no input from the public is required in connection with this measure. What if the community of Fernie should wish to join the province of Alberta, as was suggested at one time?

Mr. Brisco: In any event, I do not wish to detract from what has been said about this bill, but there are problems that must be considered. I also take exception to the "from time to time" review of this sinuous boundary. I am wondering how long this "from time to time" review well be. Will it be for one year, or 20 years? I think a very definite commitment should be established, both with the federal government and with the provinces, to review these boundaries and markers on a regular basis. There is no point in five or ten years hence going through the same argument we are having today. I suggest we establish a firm and definite timetable so this review can be made on a regular, ongoing basis.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I realize this is a bill which perhaps under more ordinary circumstances would not seem to be controversial, but I suspect the parliamentary secretary knows that the question of boundary change has been a very hot and lively topic through a good part of the constituency that I represent. It arose in a rather odd way in the southeast corner of my constituency, the area which has in it the city of Fernie. That area had very much hoped to benefit from increased travel and tourism that would follow upon the world's fair at Spokane, but to the amazement and disappointment of the people of the area, when the provincial government published its tourist brochure for distribution at the world's fair at Spokane, the city of Fernie and the related communities of Sparweed and Elko were left off the map.

Local reaction at the time was that if these communities were not to be recognized by their own province of British Columbia, then perhaps they should petition the province of Alberta to accept them as part of that province. Considering the provocation, I thought the reaction was a natural one. It was, of course, picked up by a variety of other communities and became a local cause for some weeks. Just last week when I returned to my constituency I noticed that a community on the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska was petitioning that state. Dissatisfied with conditions in the area, the residents were requesting they be transferred from the provincial and federal jurisdiction of this country to the jurisdiction of the United States.

The feeling that boundaries are flexible is a common one. Although the parliamentary secretary may consider it too widely held, that is not quite the point. The point is that the feeling is there and as disputes arise from time to time I think people feel they can find the answer to their particular dispute in a boundary revision. It is primarily for this reason that I wish to intervene, because I do not want to let the bill go through, following the intervention of the minister, without telling him that this has been an issue in the constituency I represent. There are clauses in the bill which suggest that quite profound changes might be possible. There are no limitations to the "whereases"; for example, the following:

And whereas the legislatures of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia having consented thereto, it is desirable that provision be made to declare the boundary line to be established from time to time by the said commission to be the boundary between those provinces, at such time as the boundary line has been approved—

As I see it, the bill does not have any particular limitation of scope but the point I want to make, which I mentioned earlier, is that I suspect in some ways if we move the bill through without debate, without any statement from members on this side, we might be creating a false hope in communities that are having problems. The area with which I am concerned is, I realize, remote, much of it glaciated. There will be natural changes in boundaries, and surveys must be done. I agree with the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark) that there should be provision for disclosure of intention as changes are made, and also for public input so that people are fully aware of what is going on each time a change is proposed and a dispute arises. This becomes absolutely crucial because of natural parks along boundaries. The federal government is very much involved in control over provincial lands because of our system of national parks.

Mr. Speaker, those are the points that I wished to bring to the attention of the House at this time.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, follow my colleagues reluctantly since we did have an understanding, not just among ourselves on this side of the House but also with members responsible for the bill on the other side, that this bill should be sent to committee. We regret that the time of the House is being taken up with the matter at this time. We feel that the work of the committee will be very important. As some of my colleagues have already said, this is not a matter that we can allow to proceed without debate. Neither is it a matter to be taken lightly by my colleagues in the House of Commons or by those who will be affected by any eventual change in boundary.

My first concern is about the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources being responsible for this bill in the first place. This indicates to me that if any boundary changes are to come about, they will be made with emphasis being placed on the resources that will be affected by such change. The constituency that I represent runs for 1,000 miles along the boundary between the province of British Columbia and the province of Alberta. In this area there are some very significant resources. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the northeastern portion of British Columbia has some large coal deposits which extend into the province of Alberta, and any boundary change in that area will certainly affect those resources. My colleagues have already mentioned the national parks. Canada's highest mountain, Mount Robson, is in my constituency and lies just outside Jasper national park. The people of Alberta often identify this great landmark with their own province, yet it is situated in the province of British Columbia.

However, I am more concerned with the people who will be affected than with the resources. I represent an area of British Columbia which has made a very strong case for secession from British Columbia to the province of Alberta, not because it is a geographic area that is totally isolated from its own province's economic area but it even has two time zones. When I call my constituency, the operator will invariably say, "Mr. Oberle, do you realize it is only seven o'clock in your constituency?" and I have to tell her no, it is eight o'clock. But she will insist. She will say, "The number you are calling, area code 604, is British Columbia and there is a three-hour time difference". Every time I tell the operator that that is not so.

[Mr. Johnston.]

There is an area in British Columbia on Mountain standard time, which is Alberta time, and that is the Peace River area. The people in the Peace River country often have been alienated by their province economically, socially and in every other way. The economy of the Peace River country in British Columbia is based upon the economy of the Peace River country in Alberta. The supplies for the Peace River country come from Edmonton rather than from Vancouver. As I have said, their social and political affiliations lie with the province of Alberta as well. In northern British Columbia we do not feel it is a virtue to spread misery equally among everybody, which of course is the philosophy subscribed to by the present provincial government of British Columbia. That, of course, is one of the main reasons that part of the country has often made a case for secession from the province of British Columbia.

● (1250)

Under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion there is an act, the name of which escapes me momentarily, in respect of rural farm improvement. With regard to that act, the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan have certain privileges and rights. But the Peace River country, which has the same economic base, social problems and geographical location, does not have access to the services provided by the federal government simply because it is inside the province of British Columbia, which has never cared very much about the Peace River country.

There was always a great northern development philosophy in the province of British Columbia under a previous administration, and particularly under this administration which has really done nothing: there was a philosophy of government that all that was necessary was to build railways and highways into an area and people would look after themselves, they would move into the area, build their own social infrastructure and make life livable. That is not so in our modern day.

The government has direct responsibility in this very important area of communications. The federal department has never lived up to its responsibility. The quality of life in northeastern British Columbia simply is not the same as, and cannot be compared with, the quality of life in northwestern Alberta. I am making these comments in the form of a public statement in the hope that the government will recognize the very special need of the people in the northern part of my constituency.

We build railways and roads into this area, but only in order to plunder the resources. The giant Peace River dam never had an impact study. This was never considered by the federal government and the province of British Columbia. As a result, we have been burdened with a very grave situation. I think it would be in the interest of everybody in Canada today, particularly the federal government, to conduct a post-mortem on the Peace River dam in order to evaluate the damage done in respect of human resources, land, wildlife and the environment in general.

The province of British Columbia has plundered its northern regions. I am concerned whether the commission which would be set up under this bill would sit in a dark room, because there is no provision for public meetings or public consultation. There is no provision for the commission to meet with regional groups, planning commissions and northern development people who are concerned with the human resource. These groups have been established in the area for the purpose of helping themselves in the absence of any assistance from the provincial government. There is no real provision in this bill for the commission to take into account the very serious problems the people in that part of the country must face on a daily basis.

There is the town of Fernie to which my colleagues referred. There is a very real desire on the part of the people in that region of British Columbia to secede and join those who still subscribe to the political philosophy that has served Canada and the free world for so long, rather than surrender to something we are experiencing in British Columbia today, commonly known as socialism but which is far removed from anything I would call socialism. I am certainly upset about that situation. I want to know whether this commission would have in its mandate authority to consider the political climate as well as the social, geographic and economic climate that exists in areas with which it is to concern itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds).

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I want to make it known to the House and to Canada that if the good people in the towns and villages of British Columbia find that they can no longer tolerate their socialist government, they will be very welcome in the province of Alberta. I want to make sure that each and every one recognizes that there is a warm welcome awaiting him. This welcome is extended not only to people in the province of British Columbia but also to Saskatchewan and Manitoba. There is an important point that must not be overlooked when we are discussing the boundary between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia; that is, the fact that no doubt in the future there will be a very important highway in the Howse Pass area, going from one province to the other. There have been many discussions about this highway, and we trust that they will continue.

It is the responsibility of the federal government to complete this highway in conjunction with the province of British Columbia. The province of Alberta has completed the major portion of the highway for which it is responsible. No doubt the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan are also interested in the construction of this road that will cross the boundary of Alberta, thereby providing an alternate route into central B.C. We trust that this will not be overlooked when the boundary is considered, because the federal government has great responsibility in this area.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my party does not intend to hold up this bill much longer. In fact, we would like to see it in committee now. We would have liked it to be sent to committee right away. However, since the parliamentary secretary seemed intent on having the bill debated, members from British Columbia and Alberta felt we had a few things to say about it.

I have several concerns in this area and several questions that I would like to put. For example, there is no reference in this bill to public hearings. That is a matter which very much concerns our province because we have in British Columbia a boundary on the south side at a place called Point Roberts. At present the matter is before a public hearing and is proceeding in the proper manner. It concerns me that some time in the future this government might bring in a bill to give Point Roberts away to the Americans without allowing the people in the area any say in the matter.

There is a paragraph in the preamble of this bill which reads as follows:

> And whereas the legislatures of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia having consented thereto, it is desirable that provision be made to declare the boundary line to be established from time to time by the said commission to be the boundary between those provinces—

The term "from time to time" scares me. As hon. members may know, this is a hunting area. One week you may shoot a moose, and the next week you may go back to get it but find that the boundary commission says it is now in another province. Such examples show the loopholes which exist in this bill. It has been put together very loosely, and I ask the government to be prepared, when the bill goes to committee, to answer some very serious questions because members of this party will certainly want to ask them. Now we will agree to let the bill go to committee and hope it will be considered very soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Canadian Business Corporations Act

● (1410)

CANADA BUSINESS CORPORATIONS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR, DEPUTY DIRECTOR AND FOR ADMINISTRATION OF MEASURE

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C-29, respecting Canadian business corporations, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today, for second reading, Bill C-29, a bill which proposes a totally new law to govern federal business corporations. Because the present Canada Corporations Act applies to both business corporations and non-profit corporations, whereas this bill applies only to business corporations, it follows necessarily that a new non-profit corporations bill must be presented at a later date. In June of this year our department published a comprehensive report on non-profit corporations and is currently preparing a non-profit corporation bill generally in accordance with that report.

The federal corporations law is essentially only a technical law, but it can be fairly argued that it is of strategic importance to the Canadian economy. Although it applies to only 23,000 of the approximately 270,000 corporations carrying on business in Canada, it is estimated that those 23,000 corporations carry on at least 40 per cent of the dollar volume of Canadian enterprise. The bill, therefore, has immediate significance for business managers and professionals. The bill also has great significance for the 1.5 million Canadians who are shareholders and who must have confidence in the corporation law system in general, and corporate management in particular, before they can be induced to invest their savings in corporate securities. In the long run, the bill has even greater significance for Canada as a whole, for if it achieves its objectives of furnishing a vehicle to attract and use effectively Canadian savings, it will tend to furnish capital required for Canadian development and better enable Canadians to participate in and control the direction and pace of that development.

The present Canada Corporations Act, although substantially amended in 1964 is still largely the 1934 companies act which was a synthesis of the early federal company law and the landmark English companies act of 1929. Since that time, the English companies act has undergone one over-all revision and several substantial amendments. The English companies act is currently being reconsidered in light of the Jenkins committee report of 1962 and a number of subsequent policy papers.

Moreover, since 1960 major reports have been made on and sweeping amendment made to the business corporations laws of France, Germany, a number of commercial states in the United States, Ontario and British Columbia. The government therefore decided, late in 1966, to set up a task force to prepare a report on the federal corporation laws. The terms of reference of the task force were very broad and empowered it to review the current corporation reports and laws of other jurisdictions, to consider the functions of corporations and their role in Canadian society and to prepare a comprehensive report.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner).]

First priority, however, was to be given to several specific topics that had recently been introduced into Ontario law—insider trading practice, proxies, financial disclosure, take-over bids and investigations—which could be added as interim amendments to the present act. These amendments were made, accordingly, in 1970. Even with these amendments, however, the present act remained generally archaic with respect to a number of substantive topics and its administration provisions. As the task force explained at that time, the 1970 amendments were only an attempt to fill in obvious gaps in the existing law.

Following the task force studies, therefore, a working group made up of task force members was instructed to submit to the government a report entitled "Proposals for a new business corporation law for Canada". This report was published and widely distributed by our department in June, 1971. Following publication of the proposals, the department received a large number of letters and briefs, which have been most useful, pointing out the deficiencies and the inconsistencies in the proposals and recommending a number of changes. The original Canada business corporations bill, Bill C-213, was drafted in accordance with the general recommendations of the proposals but substantially amended to reflect the many constructive comments received. That bill was tabled in the House on July 18, 1973. It died on the order paper at the end of the first session of the twenty-ninth parliament.

Since then, in light of the comments received, one substantive amendment and a substantial number of technical amendments were made to the original bill and set out in the current bill, Bill C-29, which was tabled on October 21, 1974. To enable interested parties better to analyse the interim changes made, the minister has carried out an undertaking given by his predecessor, the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), to publish a concordance of the two bills that points out and explains concisely the reasons for these changes. The one significant substantive change is the deletion of the provision barring Canadian employees of a corporation from being counted as "Canadian resident directors" of that corporation. I shall elaborate on this topic later.

When preparing the proposals that led up to the bill, the task force established as its central objective the preparation of a business corporation law that would be clear, comprehensive and practical. And they concluded that the best means to achieve this goal would be to construct a draft law that is the best synthesis of the substantive and administrative concepts set out in contemporary corporations laws, having regard to other jurisdictions in Canada, the United Kingdom, the larger states of the United States and Europe, and constantly keeping in mind the particular need in Canada for a coherent corporation law at the federal level. The task force defined a coherent corporation law as one that achieves a practical balance of interests among shareholders, creditors, management and the public, a balance that ensures both adequate investor protection and maximum management flexibility within the over-all context of the public interest. As far as possible, the bill expresses this objective.

The bill also reflects several secondary objectives. It seeks to eliminate many of the pointless formalities that are a signal feature of the present Canada Corporations Act. Wherever possible, it substitutes clear rules and standards for administrative discretion. And, as a corollary, it provides effective remedies that render the law largely self-enforcing and obviate much of the need for administrative paternalism. To the greatest degree possible, it permits administration by exception, characterizing the administrator more as a fireman who is always ready to act to deal with an emergency, rather than as a policeman who maintains continuous surveillance. It proposes setting out in regulations the detailed contents of the many statutory forms and also the contents of financial statements. Finally, as an effective constraint on the exercise of these regulatory powers, it establishes a procedure to require the pre-publication of proposed regulations for public comment at least 60 days before their effective date.

In general, the bill is an attempt to present an exemplary act to serve as a model to be followed both by administrators of other federal corporation laws and by provincial legislatures. In no case does it sacrifice principle in order to attract more federal incorporations. In summary, then, the bill substitutes for the present Canada Corporations Act an entirely new law that applies only to business corporations, setting out the new concepts in a logical framework but avoiding change for the sake of change, particularly in respect of issues such as proxies, insider-trading, financial disclosure, and take-over bids where uniformity with provincial acts is highly desirable.

Since a number of the parts of the bill are very technical, I shall not discuss them here, knowing that they must be considered in detail by the standing committee of the House. These parts deal with securities registration and transfers, trust indentures, receivers, liquidation, dissolution, and investigations. In addition, since some of the topics that were introduced into the Canada Corporations Act in 1970 concerning insider-trading, proxies and take-over bids are largely continued in substance in the present bill, I shall therefore ignore them today. Instead, I shall underline those parts of the bill that best illustrate the objectives sought and the techniques employed in the bill to achieve those objectives.

Part I of the bill mainly concerns the application of the proposed law. The proposals had recommended that all federal corporations should be brought under the aegis of one comprehensive business corporation law. This was not practical, Mr. Speaker. However, with respect to the acts regulating financial intermediaries, first because it is so difficult to separate regulatory and corporate law provisions in those acts and, second, because it is very desirable to have both the regulatory and the corporate provisions set out in one internally consistent act, the bill applies potentially to all federal business corporations other than the financial intermediaries.

The bill only applies automatically to new corporations that are incorporated under it. With respect to all other corporations, the bill introduces a continuance concept requiring a corporation that seeks to be governed by the new law to take positive steps to become continued under that law. If it is an ordinary business corporation subject to part I of the present Canada Corporations Act, it must become continued under the proposed law within five years. If it does not become continued, it is deemed dissolved at the end of that period. There is no corresponding mandatory continuance for special act corporations, but they may be required to continue under the new law by order in council.

As stated, the objective of part I is to create one comprehensive federal business corporation law; That is, to substitute a uniform, understandable legal regime for what is now almost an arcane art.

Essential to a uniform legal regime are the formalities and procedures that govern the operation of the law. Part II, on incorporation, introduces three of the recurrent minor themes of the proposals that are reflected throughout the bill. The first is that incorporation should be a matter of right, rather than a privilege. The second is that wherever possible, administration should be in accordance with express rules of standards and not based on administrative discretion. And the third is that empty formalities, such as incorporating through legal secretaries or students, should be eliminated.

Thus, part II of the bill modifies radically the present incorporating system. Incorporation is clearly as of right. Corporate names are granted pursuant to broad statutory standards that are to be further clarified by regulations intended better to reconcile corporate name policy with trademark and trade-name policies. Decisions of the director of the corporations branch relating to corporate names will be appealable to the courts. The formalities are simple, straightforward, clear and consistent in this part and throughout the bill. To win support for more efficient procedures is a simple task.

Far more difficult—although there is broad agreement that it must go—is elimination of the ultra vires doctrine. For at least two generations, efforts have been made in Canada to seek a uniform corporation law, but most of these efforts have floundered because of the inability of lawyers in different jurisdictions to reconcile the conceptual differences between the letters patent systems and the registration systems that were based on the United Kingdom companies act. Finally, however, these conceptual difficulties have been largely overcome. Like the Ontario Business Corporations Act of 1970, the bill in effect abandons the letters patent or discretionary system and adopts a registration system, which implies incorporation as of right, as I said previously. But the bill does not adhere blindly to the traditional registration statutes. Indeed, one of the themes of the bill is to introduce a simpler registration system free of the unnecessary technicalities with which it has become encrusted over time.

One of the major problems with the registration systems has been to determine clearly the capacity of the corporation. Unfortunately, the common law during the nineteenth century withdrew from the earlier common law proposition that a corporation had all the capacity of a natural person, and equated a corporation with an agent having a mandate to do only those things expressed in its objects clause and only the powers to realize those objects that have been accorded to it by statute or by its internal constitution. As a result, corporation laws and constating instruments have become characterized by excessive verbiage relating to objects and powers in an effort to avoid application of this ultra vires doctrine.

Because objects and powers clauses have become meaningless to protect investors, they tend only to be a trap for the unwary creditor or shareholder, invoked in most cases to permit a corporation to escape an obligation. The bill, therefore, attempts to resolve this root problem instead of attacking symptoms such as limiting broad objects and powers clauses or minimizing prejudice to third parties. To preclude any inference, therefore, that the ultra vires doctrine might apply because the bill is cast as a registration statute, the bill states clearly that a corporation has the capacity and also the rights, powers and privileges of a natural person.

In short, the bill reverts to original common law doctrine and so becomes consistent with the European concept of the corporation. That does not mean, however, that the shareholders of a corporation cannot constrain management by establishing express goals in the corporate constitution. Such restrictions are expressly permitted. But part III makes abundantly clear that even an express restriction cannot prejudice the rights of a third party contracting in good faith. The third party is entitled to presume that the corporation has the capacity to enter into any contract and that its directors and officers have authority to act on behalf of the corporation. Part III, by giving a corporation the capacity of a natural person, rids the corporation law of what has clearly become excess conceptual baggage.

Part V of the bill, concerning corporate finance, deals with more difficult problems. Probably no provisions in the present act are as unclear and unsatisfactory as the sections relating to capital structure, shares, redemption of shares and dividends. Reflecting that the present law developed from several sources and on a piecemeal basis, the financial provisions are scattered throughout the act, rendering difficult the resolution of even simple problems. Some of the provisions relating to registered shares, bearer shares and series of shares are conceptually incomplete and thus engender much confusion. In addition, a number of concepts like partly paid shares and par value shares have simply become archaic, bearing little relation to contemporary market requirement and practices.

Finally, there are several provisions that are altogether absent from the present law, such as rules relating to options and rights, acquisition by a corporation of its own shares, rules relating to accounting practices and uniform insolvency criteria. Part V attempts to clear up this conceptual confusion, to abrogate a number of concepts that no longer serve a useful purpose and to legitimate those institutions that serve a practical purpose and do not prejudice creditor and shareholder interests.

To this end, the bill bars the issue of shares subject to assessment, or the issue of par value shares, prohibits bearer shares, avoids reference to concepts such as paid in surplus or capital surplus, and expressly permits acquisition by a corporation of its own shares subject to strict solvency standards. Similar strict solvency standards apply to determine whether a corporation can pay dividends, make loans or guarantees to its employees, or reduce its capital. In brief, these provisions tend to permit a great deal of management flexibility within the limits prescribed by the general solvency rules, forcing management to rely on what is good business practice rather than on technical idiosyncrasies that have become part of the traditional corporation law.

Consistent with this philosophy, the bill continues to vest in the directors very broad power to manage the business and affairs of a corporation. Indeed, it is this institutionalization of responsibility in the board of directors for the management of the business and affairs of the corporation that is the hallmark of a contemporary corporation law. But that is not to say that the directors are given a blank cheque, for the bill substantially increases the residual powers of the shareholders to control indirectly the management of the corporation. For example, shareholders have the power to initiate bylaws, to submit general proposals to shareholders' meetings, to remove directors by ordinary resolution, to vote on fundamental changes and even to require the corporation to purchase their shares where they disagree with a proposed fundamental change. It is this internal balancing of interests that raises the most difficult conceptual problems, and it is with respect to this central issue that the bill has been recognized as both imaginative and practical by the business community.

One aspect of this problem, that is, the declaration of a standard of trustee responsibility of duty and duty of care to regulate the conduct of directors and officers, has elicited a great deal of controversy. In general, however, these provisions are only declaratory of what is the common law or is generally acknowledged to be good business practice. For that reason, it is becoming a conventional provision in contemporary corporation laws. To mollify the seemingly high standard of care imposed on corporate management, the bill contains indemnification provisions that are broad in scope and that apply wherever a director or officer has acted in good faith in the interests of the corporation and not in his own interests.

Part IX also introduces the requirement that a majority of the directors of a corporation be resident Canadians. Some of the major initiatives of the government in this area in recent years have been introduction of the foreign investment review bill and the revision of the acts regulating financial intermediaries and some resource corporations in order to restrict foreign ownership and control. It was decided that the corporation law could usefully reinforce these policies by ensuring that the Canadian viewpoint will be expressed in all meetings of directors and committees of directors.

The predecessor bill, Bill C-213, contained two provisions designed to achieve this goal. The first provision, which is already law in Ontario, required each federal corporation to have a majority of Canadian resident directors. The second provision, which is altogether new in Canada, applied only to foreign-controlled corporations, requiring them to have a majority of "outside" Canadian directors, that is, directors who are not employees of the corporation.

The first provision requiring generally a majority of Canadian directors has been widely accepted as expressing a legitimate Canadian concern and as serving a useful purpose. We have, however, received an extraordinary number of heated, even passionate criticisms of the second provision, particularly from Canadian officer-directors who argue that the effects of the rule would be to compel directors to promote Canadian interests above corporate interests in contravention of their legal duty to the corporation, to place greater emphasis on citizenship than demonstrated competence, and to regulate Canadian officers of foreign-controlled corporations to the status of second-class citizens. These were persuasive arguments.

Even more persuasive, however, were the arguments of the more detached professionals, lawyers and accountants, who pointed out the two gross defects of the provision. First, because foreign investors will invoke every possible stratagem to retain control over their capital, they would tend to recruit "straw-men" who would be amenable to their control. Second, it would be relatively easy to set up a formal board of directors and then proceed to control the corporation through a management committee or advisory board, In short, the provision would not be effective. We found these arguments convincing. We therefore recommended that the second provision concerning foreign-controlled corporations be dropped and the government modified the bill accordingly.

As I stated earlier, the bill confers extensive power on the directors to manage the business and affairs of the corporation, but counterbalances that power by conferring on shareholders a number of residual powers to influence or even discourage fundamental changes, to participate more actively and more knowledgeably in the internal affairs of the corporation, and even to remove directors. Most of these provisions which are set out in part XI are not new law. In fact, the bill continues most of the substance of the present act, reorganizing the rules for greater simplicity, redrafting a number of provisions for greater clarity and adding some minor substantive rules relating to the conduct of shareholder meetings and court review of elections of directors.

The only completely new substantive provisions in part XI relate to unanimous shareholder agreements. These provisions, in effect, permit the shareholder of a closely held corporation to assume the duties and liabilities of directors, thus creating what is conceptually a partnership with limited liability. Again, although the provision is new in the statute it only reflects, rather than changes, present practice. It is included in the bill for two specific purposes. First, it legitimates direct control by the shareholders and so obviates many unnecessary formalities in close corporations. Second, it virtually compels an incorporating lawyer to consider more carefully the relationships among his clients when setting up a close corporation.

But this unanimous shareholder agreement provision is the exceptional case. The general policy of part XI is to vest residual power in the shareholders of the usual corporation to enable them to participate directly in the internal affairs and to control indirectly the management of the business of the corporation. This policy is firmly buttressed by the disclosure provisions set out in the proxy rules in part XII and the financial disclosure provisions of part XIII.

Part XIII of the bill largely continues the substantive disclosure rules of the present Canada Corporations Act but introduces two new concepts, one a matter of form and the other very much a matter of substance. The first major innovation of the bill is to provide that the very lengthy provisions relating to the contents of financial statements be set out in regulations instead of in the statute. Three arguments support this recommendation. First, the changes in future, as in the past, will be made only after discussion with interested parties. Second, it is impossible to amend a corporations act frequently enough to reflect changes in accounting principles and practices. Finally, the regulations will in any case be subject to pre-publication under the bill and will also be subject to scrutiny under the Statutory Instruments Act.

The second innovation of part XIII is to strengthen the role of the auditor as an appointee of the shareholders, following generally the policy of the Ontario Business Corporations Act. One of the best illustrations of this policy, at least in respect of corporations which distribute their shares to the public, is the requirement of an audit committee which can ensure that the auditor is responsive to the directors as the representatives of the shareholders, and not answerable only to the officers of the corporation.

I turn, now, to the fundamental changes. Reinforcing the residual control of shareholders, part XIV introduces a new legal regime concerning fundamental changes of the constitution or of the business carried on by the corporation. As I said earlier, because the present act was assembled brick by brick with little concern for over all symmetry or even internal consistency, it has become extraordinarily difficult to interpret or to comply with the new law. Nowhere is this more clearly illustrated than with respect to fundamental changes sought to be made under the present discretionary system.

Because of the amount of discretion exercised and the complicated interrelations among the present statute rules, working with the present act has become an arcane art which requires an insider's knowledge of the statute provisions, departmental policies and rules of practice. To resolve this problem, part XIV of the bill recommends two solutions. First, it makes uniform all the formalities relating to basic modifications of the corporation's constitution or business—amendment of articles, amalgamation, continuance under the bill or any other law, and sale or lease of assets of the corporation outside the ordinary course of business.

Under the bill, these modifications may be made as of right, free of any intervention by public administrators. Second, part XIV confers a right to dissent or, as it is more commonly known, an appraisal right on a shareholder who dissents from a proposed fundamental change and demands from the corporation payment of the objectively appraised value of his shares. The purpose of this policy is twofold. It permits management and majority shareholders to effect changes in the business or affairs of the corporation with a maximum of flexibility. At the same time it permits a dissenting shareholder to withdraw his investment from an enterprise which is substantially different from the enterprise in which he originally invested. In short, the rule makes it very difficult for a minority to veto a majority decision, or for the majority simply to impose its will on the minority shareholders. As I stated earlier, the goal is to achieve a reasonable but dynamic balance of power between directors on the one hand and shareholders on the other, and at the same time to ensure practical management flexibility And that is precisely what the appraisal right achieves.

Complementing the appraisal right are the shareholder remedies set out in part XIX. To ensure that shareholders can effectively exercise the powers conferred on them by this bill, part XIX attempts to strip away the self-imposed judicial constraints of the common law and to compel courts to judge on their merits the complaints of minority shareholders against majority shareholders or management. Part XIX seeks to achieve this goal in two ways. First, like the Ontario Business Corporations Act of 1970, it legitimates the derivative action in the name of the corporation to remedy a wrong to the corporation. Such a derivative action may be initiated by a shareholder in his own right or as a representative of a class of shareholders.

Second, going beyond present Ontario law, the bill adopts an amended version of section 210 of the United Kingdom companies act of 1948, the so-called oppression remedy. This remedy permits an aggrieved person—particularly a disgruntled minority shareholder—to apply to the court to right an alleged wrong, applying a very broad, just and equitable standard. In effect, the oppression remedy complements the shareholder's appraisal remedy under part XIV, ensuring that a shareholder will have a last resort remedy in a squeeze-out case where he has no grounds to invoke the appraisal right. Summarized briefly, the policy of part XIX is to furnish effective remedies to enforce expressed rights, obviating the need for excessive formality, complicated structure and excessive administrative paternalism.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate very briefly the salient characteristics of the bill. For what is an archaic statute it substitutes a modern corporation law that is tough and yet flexible and practical. For paternalism it substitutes clear rights that may be enforced by effective remedies. And finally, for a Victorian paperwork routine it substitutes clear, efficient administrative procedures.

Writing about the famous New York business corporation law of 1963, an American scholar deplored the fact that corporation law is not a topic that stirs men's souls. Although this is undoubtedly true in part, and although the original proposals and the bill emphasize the goal of a corporation law as being essential only to maintain a fair and workable balance of power within the corporate enterprise, given the pervasiveness and the great economic power of business corporations in our contemporary society, the bill cannot be dealt with casually as a technical law that interests only businessmen and professionals. For even if modest in its goals, the bill is of importance to Canada as a whole, providing a model law which will further encourage Canadian investors to put their savings into Canadian enterprises. If the bill succeeds in achieving that goal, the result will be greater participation by Canadians in the growth of the Canadian economy and also the exercise by Canadians of greater control over Canadian resources and means of production. The bill is comprehensive, clear, equitable, imaginative and, above all, practical. I therefore urge members of all parties to support it.

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally a little hesitant to speak on this bill after the impassioned address just delivered by the parliamentary secretary. Some might even suggest he was a little emotional in his approach to the subject. However, I do have some comments which I hope will be taken into account by the government.

First, I might say that we in the Progressive Conservative Party believe the bill should go to the committee. It is a detailed measure containing 266 clauses and we think that the proper place with which to deal with it is in committee. As I have indicated, we are generally in support of the main principles of the bill. This is particularly easy for those of us who come from Ontario and who are Conservative to say, because the measure we are considering is modelled largely on the Ontario Business Corporations Act of 1970.

In the course of his remarks, the hon. member expressed the hope that this would be a model bill and a basis for similar legislation in other jurisdictions. I think he has his priorities a little reversed. In fact, he is substantially following the Ontario Business Corporations Act of 1970. If there is a model, that, perhaps, is the model that is being used by this parliament and other legislatures in Canada. To support my point, even in the detailed background papers for the Canada business corporations bill we find that in justifying the legislation the government refers to Ontario no less than 25 times in explaining why the government drafted the legislation in the form in which we have it today.

Before I move on to deal with the bill specifically, I suggest that when the bill goes to committee ample time be given to business to respond to it. It may be wise to send a copy of the bill to each of the 23,000 corporations that carry on business under federal jurisdiction. It may also be wise to advertise in local newspapers and let legal counsel know that we have reached committee stage of the bill. In committee, I believe we should consider in some detail why we feel we need Dominion company legislation to start with. As the hon. member has indicated, there are only 23,000 corporations, out of a total of around 270,000, which are incorporated under federal jurisdiction, which is roughly 8 per cent. If I may put it another way, more corporations have been incorporated in the province of Ontario in the last two years than exist today under federal jurisdiction. So, surely, we must ask ourselves whether this kind of corporation serves any meaningful role in Canada, or is it something that to all intents and purposes should be left to provincial jurisdiction?

The revenue and expenditure of the department with respect to corporations roughly balances out. The department receives roughly $1.5 million in revenue from various corporate sources, and their expenditures are a little less than that. I therefore suggest that in committee it would perhaps be wise if the minister or his parliamentary secretary explained in a little more detail why the government believes this legislation is warranted and should remain on the books. I say that because I think it is very easy to create new legislation or to continue existing legislation to perpetuate bureaucracy. Any time we see an opportunity to lessen government involvement and bureaucracy, I think we should jump at the chance and do a little pruning.

I also believe the minister or his parliamentary secretary should explain more fully why certain corporations in Canada have been exempted from the provisions of the act. For example, the parliamentary secretary indicated that financial concerns will be exempted. That may or may not be wise. I am curious to know at what stage the government intends to make some of the rules that they feel should apply to private corporations also apply to Crown corporations. I find it increasingly difficult to understand why we always seem to pass legislation that requires the private sector, especially the private corporate sector, to make full disclosure and file more and more forms, yet when we ask for what appears to be basic information concerning some Crown corporations' operations we are told it is none of our business.

We had an example of this last night, Mr. Speaker, in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The chief general manager of the Industrial Development Bank was asked whether he would give us the salary range of the five senior employees of the bank. We were told that that information was confidential and not available to us. There have been other instances when we were similarly told by the bank officials that the information we sought was either not available or would not be conveyed to us. As I say, if private corporations, through this kind of legislation, are continually being required to make disclosures, it is ludicrous for the parliament of Canada to allow a situation to exist where corporations under federal jurisdiction are not required to disclose information for which we ask.

In many ways this government, through this type of legislation and through other legislation that it is proposing to bring into the House, seems to show great inconsistency of approach. Bill C-2 deals with amendments to the present combines legislation in this country. The government likes to call it competition legislation, which is a misnomer. In any event, if hon. members read Bill C-2 and then read the bill before us today, Bill C-29, they will find diametrically different concepts as to the way the law should be approached.

For example, in the competition bill, Bill C-2, the government is proposing to give highly discretionary powers to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. It is proposing to lay out certain procedures against which there is no right of appeal. In short, I suggest the government is proposing to put much of Canadian business through an unnecessary amount of red tape. Yet in the bill before us now, the government is taking great credit—and I am pleased that it is—for trying to streamline the legislation and to iron out some of the Victorian provisions, as I believe the hon. member calls them, in the existing Dominion companies legislation. Again, I hope the minister or his deputy will explain what appears to be an inconsistency of approach to the business sector of Canada.

On the same point, I am also disturbed by the continual evidence we have of how out of touch is the government with reality. This bill is really a catch-up bill; it is doing in 1974 what perhaps could have been done five years ago. The hon. member stated that a committee was working on this problem in 1966. It is interesting to note that in Ontario a committee was sitting on it in 1965, and that committee was able to produce legislation by 1970. Yet here we are, in 1974, dealing with a bill which is largely modelled on the Ontario bill.

I do not sense that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), or any responsible cabinet minister in this government really understand the position Canadian business is in at the present time. Why should we accept as an inevitable fact that there is only one Canadian company at the present time among the 200 largest corporations in the world? Canada, the sixth strongest nation of the world, should encourage and create a business climate that ensures greater participation in the international and multinational corporate world. But I suggest the government is so narrow and provincial in outlook that it is unable to understand our modern-day industrial business world.

It is the government's lack of understanding that is placing Canada in a secondary position so far as business activity throughout the world is concerned. Expressed in another way, our largest corporation ranks only 155th in terms of world corporations. That largest corporation incidentally is one which most would not assume to be a powerful Canadian company. I refer to Alcan Aluminum.

I touch on this because I believe the government, in its anxiety to try to convince the Canadian people that they are relatively well off, is ignoring the hard fact that, for example, in respect of trade we are going into a spiralling increase of trade deficits so far as manufactured products are concerned. In the year 1972 our total fabricated and end product deficit was $1.5 billion. In 1973 it was $2.2 billion, and in the first six months of this year it was $2 billion.

The only way we in this country have been able to right this imbalance is by selling off our resources and our primary products. The Canadian people must be told how we are financing ourselves in the world market at the present time. It is not through ingenuity or through expansion of the manufacturing and business sector, but simply through a substantial deficit, paying for it through the sale of merchandise such as raw materials, iron ore and so on, into the world market. Surely this is something which must be dealt with by the government in a more satisfactory way.

Touching again on that question I notice in the background papers that the parliamentary secretary today has taken credit for what the government feels is a strong stance on foreign ownership in this country. In this bill it is proposed that a majority of the directors of a corporation be Canadian residents. I do not object to that. I am pleased the earlier provision has been changed. I would point out, however, that the question of foreign ownership in this country should perhaps be studied in more depth.

A study of the Canadian and the United States economies shows rather startling figures. For example, in the years 1968 to 1973 in Canada the average corporation tax paid was 36.3 per cent. In the United States it was 45.1 per cent. But interestingly enough in the same period 9 per cent of the total corporate profit in Canada was paid to non-residents. In the United States zero per cent was paid to non-residents.

The amount paid to non-residents in that period by Canadian companies was exactly equal to the tax differential between Canada and the United States. The net result was that both countries had retained earnings that were very close—54.7 per cent in Canada as against 54.9 per cent in the United States. But here we find in the case of Canada only 9.7 per cent was paid to our residents, whereas in the United States 27.8 per cent was paid to its residents. The net result was that 45 per cent of the net profits of Canadian companies were held in undistributed form, while in the United States 27.6 per cent was the comparable figure. I suggest the government has not dealt either domestically or on an international basis with the hard fact that a tremendous amount of Canadian earnings simply are being re-invested without distribution to Canadian shareholders.

The net result is that we have an expansion of assets within a corporation without benefit being felt by shareholders. In Europe, as many members of this House know, this matter is being dealt with. Various innovative types of legislative matters are going through European parliaments. Recently one went through the German House. An attempt is being made to try to make sure there is more asset participation by shareholders and the general public with regard to corporate activity. I suggest this House might well consider that. How can we ensure that the people, be they workers or Canadian citizens generally, benefit more from the prosperity of many of our corporations in dealing with the question of dividend pay-out?

I find the most startling figures when we compare what is happening in Canada with what is happening in respect of non-residents. In the years 1956 to 1969 the average dividend paid to Canadian residents by Canadian corporations was 4.87 per cent. From 1969 to 1973—and I remind the House that in those years we had the present administration—the rate of dividends paid to Canadian residents was minus 2.07 per cent. In those years there were less real dividends paid to Canadian residents than in previous years.

Let us look at what happened in respect of non-residents. In the 1956 to 1969 period the average dividend paid was 2.51 per cent, but in the 1969 to 1973 period the figure was 4.61 per cent. What a contrast! I believe we must ask why the dividend pay-out to non-residents should increase in real terms while the dividend pay-out to Canadians decreased. These are the more basic things I feel the government should be dealing with now.

If the government feels now in 1974 that it wants to do a catching up job in an administrative sense, I can accept that, but I believe we should always remind the government that there are things more important than simply bringing in a new Canadian business corporations act. I would hope that at the committee stage we will have ample opportunity to review this bill. I believe in the free enterprise system. I believe that with less confrontation on the part of government business can continue to produce.

Our commercial system has produced the wealthiest civilization man has ever known, and I believe no legislature should continually tamper with that system unless it knows it is going to better it. I suggest there is no alternative system such as socialism, state-ism, or call it what you may, that will produce or allow us to prosper and retain democracy. The two just will not work. This is why I believe it behooves the government not only to pass this type of legislation but to get down to the basic problems that are facing Canadian business at the present time, so that business can get on with doing the job, raise the level of real income in this country, and make us more competitive throughout the world. Canada should not be on the bottom list of the big corporations of the world. We should be number one, and with proper federal government direction this nation can be number one in the world.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make the opening remarks on behalf of my party on this bill not because I am an expert in this field—I must be frank—but because the bill is being discussed on a Friday afternoon when some of our members, who have a little more knowledge of the subject than I, have other commitments.

However, as I listened to the parliamentary secretary explain the purposes of the bill and some of the provisions, I could not help but wonder why it took so long to prepare such a large and long bill to deal with what I consider, having listened to him, to be relatively unimportant matters which may be of consequence to shareholders of corporations, and there are some several hundred thousand of those, but which will in fact not give them much more power than they have had until now, and will have very little of any real value for the 99 per cent of the Canadian people who do not now own, nor are they likely ever to own shares in any Canadian corporation.

It is not often that I agree with the views of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), who just spoke on behalf of the Official Opposition, but I do agree with him when he says that this bill cannot be considered in isolation, that it must be considered together with the government's proposed legislation to deal with competition, legislation on foreign ownership, the proposed anti-profiteering legislation, past budgets, and the budget for this year which we will get in some ten days. All the legislation which we have had, and which the government proposes to bring in, such as its tax policy, is the foundation which will affect the lives of ordinary Canadian people.

When I look at what the government has done and what it proposes to do, I realize how little this bill will mean to the Canadian people. Yet we live in a society in which corporations, particularly the large ones, of which there are perhaps 100 in Canada, have fantastic powers because of their assets and because of their control of various facets of Canadian society, control which gives them the life and death power to create jobs, to destroy jobs, to develop provinces or to pull out of them, to develop or not to develop the Arctic, to develop or not to develop the Atlantic provinces.

If you look at some of these corporations such as General Motors, Imperial Oil, CPR with its subsidiaries, or International Nickel, you see corporations which have assets and which are involved in annual financial transactions which, in some cases, bring them profits bigger than those of any Canadian province. Indeed, in many cases the profits are bigger than those of most countries in the world today.

Mr. Fraser: Provinces are not supposed to be making a profit.

Mr. Orlikow: So the decisions of these corporations are important to each Canadian, whether or not he is a direct shareholder in a corporation. Yet despite that we have here a bill which, at its best, tidies up the legislation which we have had and which was passed originally, as the parliamentary secretary said, in 1934, which was itself based on British company legislation enacted in 1929, almost 50 years ago.

To a large extent this bill is based on a study done for the government by R. W. V. Dickerson, a lawyer in Vancouver. If members look at that study they will see that Mr. Dickerson makes it clear that he does not propose any fundamental change in the rights, powers or responsibilities of corporations. In his report Mr. Dickerson accepts that corporations will continue essentially as the private property of the shareholders, and that the bill can only deal with the rights of the corporation and the rights of its owners and shareholders. There is no reference in the bill, nor was there in Mr. Dickerson's study, to the responsibilities of a corporation to society.

Mr. Dickerson says in his study:

> A Corporations Act will not solve problems of industrial relations, nor can the many vexing problems of taxation be cured through some alchemy in the corporation law. We have also resisted the idea that corporation law as such has anything to do with the question of foreign investment, control of the economy, and Canadian sovereignty.

The government has accepted that view of Mr. Dickerson and I could not argue with it too much if we had, along with laws dealing with corporations, tax laws or competition laws which would really set forth the feelings of the people of Canada through their government, as to the right of a corporation to make profits. And I do not question that right so long as we have a system in our society according to which a large majority of the economy is operated through free enterprise, through corporations, large and small.

I do not see in the foreseeable future any real changes in that system, regardless of what government is in office, either provincially or federally. Free private enterprise in the foreseeable future in Canada will continue to play a major role in the lives of all Canadians. It is surely in the light of what is happening in the world today that the people of this country, and indeed of every country, have a right to expect that corporations will consider their needs, particularly the large corporations.

We are living in difficult times. We see shortages of food. A world food conference is taking place right now. There are shortages of fuel. Every person in the world has been affected and will be markedly affected in the next ten to twenty years at least by the fourfold increase in the price of oil exported by the oil producing countries of the world.

I am not now discussing whether the increase in price was justified entirely or in part. The point is that we have had the increase and the people of the industrialized affluent world, and the people of the have not nations, will feel the effects. Prices are going up, up, up. As they have gone up, so have profits. It may be that price increases were necessary for the basic commodities used by the whole world, or that they can be partly justified. As far as I can see, however, there is no government mechanism in Canada to examine this question. But we do know that the percentage of the gross national product which went to profits in the last year was higher than ever before. Last year, Mr. Speaker, 13.5 per cent of the gross national product went to corporation profits.

I do not believe that all the price increases we have been subjected to in the past two or three years have been justified. Corporation profits are at an all time high. Prices are not based on increases in the cost of labour, although that is a factor, nor on increases in the cost of raw materials, although that is also a factor, but are based almost exclusively on the judgment of the corporations of what the traffic will bear.

There is no real competition for the major commodities used by the large corporations. I do not think anyone would suggest that the price of cars which Canadians buy is set by corporations competing for the goodwill of customers. It is no secret that General Motors sets the price for cars, and the other automobile corporations follow suit. It is no secret that Imperial Oil, which is part of the giant multinational conglomerate Exxon Corporation, sets the price of gas in Canada.

A sharp increase in the price of gas in Nova Scotia a few months ago prompted the provincial Liberal government to set up an inquiry. A representative of Imperial Oil appeared and said that their price was set by world factors, not by the cost of oil laid down in Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker, but by what the world pattern suggested they could charge.

I think we need to have a lot more say about what corporations are doing in this country, Mr. Speaker, and I do not believe this bill will help in that regard. One just needs to look at the corporation profits, published almost every day in the Montreal and Toronto newspapers, or in the newspapers of any other city in Canada. As an example take Ogilvy Flour Mills. If there is one area in which prices have gone up it is in food. For the three months ending July 31 this year Ogilvy profits were $2,035,000 compared to $1,144,000 for the same period last year. Madam Speaker, that is an increase of almost 100 per cent. It is any wonder the cost of food is increasing?

Steel is used in virtually every basic implement we make. Algoma Steel profits for the period reported in 1974 were $39,910,000 compared to $18,043,000 for the same period in 1973, an increase of more than 100 per cent. Cominco profits went up to over $50 million in 1974 compared to less than $20 million in 1973. That is also substantially more than a 100 per cent increase. These are the kind of profits shown by large corporations form one end of the country to the other.

Will the bill before us do anything about that situation, Madam Speaker? I do not think so. It will not protect the Canadian consumer at all. Will it do anything for Canadian shareholders? In this respect I think it would be interesting to look at an article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on July 31. It was written by a former Liberal cabinet minister, Eric Kierans, and he was replying to a full page advertisement which had been inserted in many Canadian newspapers by the Mining Association of Canada entitled, "Does Anybody Out There Give a Damn if the Mining Industry is Taxed to Death"?

Mr. Kierans' article bore the headline, "Shed no Tears for the Canadian Mining Industry", and showed, among other things, how little concern Canadian corporate management has for the Canadian shareholder. I wish I had time to put the whole article on the record. Mr. Kierans is no flaming radical, no socialist. Before he entered politics he was president of the Montreal Stock Exchange so he knows a good deal about Canadian corporations, and he cares about their shareholders.

Mr. Kierans, by illustrating actual cases, shows that Canadian corporations are not operated for the benefit of Canadians or company shareholders; they are operated to increase the power of management and directors, at the expense of the shareholders. Certainly their activities are not conducted in the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Kierans illustrates his point by referring to two large and powerful Canadian corporations, Inco and Noranda. According to Mr. Kierans the profits of International Nickel this year after taxes will be better than $300 million. The company will have on hand, because of accelerated depreciation allowances, depletion allowances, exaggerated exploration and development expenses, and the like, which governments allow, another $200 million in extra cash. Mr. Kierans says that in the good old days, when there was real competition—if ever there was such a time—there would have been a horde of competitors in the field. Profits would have been quickly cut to ribbons. Prices would have fallen and consumers would get a break. But that did not happen in this case because Inco had a virtual monopoly. There was a nickel shortage in the world and Inco did not need to cut prices.

Mr. Kierans said the company could have passed on a substantial part of its $300 million profit to shareholders. But, he said, that is the last thing which would occur to Inco management, because shareholders might spend the money foolishly. They might buy clothing, or use it for the down payment on a house, or try to stay even with inflation. So, Inco did not intend to give this money to shareholders as dividends. Inco shareholders have received about a 5 per cent return on investment, less than they would get if they invested their money in federal or provincial bonds, or put it in the bank on short-term deposits.

What did Inco do? It purchased an American company, whose stock was then valued at $105 million, for approximately $230 million. Mr. Kierans calculates that on this $230 million Inco can expect dividends ranging from $4 million to $7 million, representing a return on capital of between 2 per cent and 3 per cent. Clearly that purchase did not increase productivity. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) keeps saying that to beat inflation we must increase productivity. That Inco purchase did not increase productivity in Canada or the United States. It merely increased the power of management and directors, and was not of benefit to the people of Canada or company shareholders.

Mr. Kierans also referred to Noranda. That company, far from being taxed to death as the Mining Association claims, this year has run up profits which are 60 per cent better than they were in 1973, when they were at an all-time high. Noranda invested $63 million of those profits in other companies and increased its working capital by another $61 million. The president of Noranda rejected the suggestion that the company should pay out, as customary, 50 per cent of its earnings in dividends. He said it made no sense to do this in view of the tremendously increased amounts of money needed for capital development in the mining industry.

Mr. Kierans points out that investors, be they individuals, pension funds, insurance companies or trust companies, are not foolish. If corporations are not willing to pay dividends, investors see no sense in investing money. The result is that although corporation profits are at an all-time high, share prices have come down. He was referring not only to International Nickel and Noranda but to most other corporations as well.

Mr. Kierans says, and I agree, that corporations are not interested in the welfare of the people of Canada or in the welfare of their own shareholders. As I said earlier, Mr. Kierans is not a radical, is not a socialist, is not one who thinks Canadian corporations should be taken over by the state and put under public ownership.

What does he think should happen to the mining companies and other corporations of this country? He says:

> It is high time that the government prevented takeovers and mergers and gave these giants three choices—reduce prices, increase dividends to shareholders, or pay taxes on the excess profits. Perhaps a combination of all three.

I ask members: has any of this happened? Prices have not been reduced; they are going up. Dividends have gone down, if not in actual dollar terms then in percentage of profits. The percentage of profits now paid out as dividends is much smaller than the percentage previously paid out, and the rest is used for exploration and for moving into fields in which a company has not previously been engaged. This applies not only to Noranda and Inco, but to Canadian Pacific and other large corporations in Canada.

Mr. Kierans also said:

> . . . if the government really wanted to reduce inflation, there would be no better time than the present to cut tariffs by 25 per cent across the board. Nothing else would do as much to put pressure on prices, wages, and profits by enforcing efficiency, productivity, and competitiveness, qualities that we are going to need in the coming struggle for declining markets.

We go through the motions. We pay lip service to GATT, but the government has made no serious effort to cut tariffs, to make Canadian corporations more efficient and force them to compete with United States or Japanese corporations and so bring prices down for the ultimate benefit of Canadians.

According to Mr. Kierans, Inco's profits after taxes in 1972 were $110 million, and in 1973 $227 million. This year they will exceed $300 million after taxes. The profits of Noranda, after taxes, in 1972, were $64 million. In 1973 they were $121 million. This year they will approach $200 million after taxes.

● (1540)

I use the argument which Mr. Kierans made in his article, and made while he was a member of this House. I cannot say for a moment that I have made it as effectively as Mr. Kierans, but I use it because it illustrates so well that in bringing forward this and other legislation it is really not the intention of the government to deal in a fundamental way with the power and growing stranglehold which the large corporations have on the life of this country.

We should look at what is being done in other countries. We should look at what the Norwegian government is proposing to do, and has already done, with regard to bringing in North Sea oil which is under the control of Norway. we should look at what the British government proposes to do about North Sea oil which is in the area controlled by Great Britain. These proposals have received the encouragement and endorsation of journals such as the Manchester Guardian which is not a supporter of the labour government. Those journals are not organs of socialist opinions.

Governments must play an increasingly dominant role in the lives of people. They must put on more controls and restraints, and plan more fields of life which affect every citizen.

If we compare the steps other countries have taken with the puny hesitant steps this government proposed in other legislation and is proposing in this bill, we see how little the government is prepared to deal with the facts of life and the tremendous problems which the world faces in 1974, and is likely to face until the year 2000.

The members of the New Democratic Party do not believe this bill does anything except nibble at the edges of one of the fundamental problems of the country, how to meet the needs of the world, and how to bring about the organization of industry and business, whether publicly or privately controlled, so that it begins to satisfy the requirements of the people of Canada. This and other legislation which the government has brought in, or proposes to bring in, does very little to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

Having said that, I say that to the extent it moves in the right direction, even though it is probably inches compared to the miles it ought to move, we will support it. We are prepared to let this bill pass second reading and go to committee where we can study it in detail. We will try to improve it there. We will be making certain proposals so that the bill will include some of the things it does not now have in it.

We have no desire to hold up this bill. We will not try to do that. However, we do not believe the bill does the job which is required. It does not meet the needs of the people of this country. Therefore we are skeptical about the value which this bill will provide for the people of Canada.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I believe there is agreement to let this bill pass at four o'clock, and for Your Honour's guidance I will conclude my remarks a few minutes before that, so the question may be put.

In many ways I welcome this bill. It is a clean sweep approach that should have been taken five or even 10 years ago. It closely follows legislation enacted in the province of Ontario.

I commend the government for finally getting around to the point of bringing in a new corporations act. I suppose it can be said in somewhat general terms that the cornerstone of commerce in Canada is a sound and clear corporations act, a workable combines act, an understandable tax act, a bank act, and supporting legislation that will complement the commercial trade structure in this country.

In this legislation we have the makings of a sound corporations act. When we get it to committee we will certainly want to study it in detail. That is where a bill of this nature should be studied.

In my remarks I will speak in a rather general way about the bill and business, leaving the details and nitpicking for committee, where I assume we will hear witnesses from various segments of commerce indicating any inequities they may see in the bill. I know that hindsight is great. We all have 20/20 vision when we look back. However, I cannot help but reflect that had we enacted this bill five years ago we might have a somewhat different condition in this country today as it applies to business.

A great deal of comment has been made in the past 18 to 24 months about the business community. I think it can be fairly said that business has been under attack for several months. Comments have been made about ripoffs, price fixing and inside trading. There have been other comments that are derogatory and detrimental to the business community.

I think it is a fair comment to say that some of those remarks are well-founded. When talking about business, corporations and how they act, the problem is that we tend to encompass everyone in those terms. Of course all business is not ripping off the general public, as is believed and promoted by my colleagues to my far left. No doubt there has been inside trading going on in respect of shares and the sale of shares, as well as divulging inside privileged information that should not have been given. We certainly know that price fixing exists.

But I think that for the most part the business community acts responsibly and is trying, under very hard conditions, to conduct business fairly as far as consumers are concerned while at the same time ensuring, of course, that shareholders receive a due return for their investment. We are where we are today because of what we loosely call the free enterprise system, and I believe that if we should ever get away from what we call the profit motive our position would be very serious indeed.

The bill before us is probably the first step to restoring some confidence in business in general. We see the stock market at a very low ebb; many of our corporations are going to the wall as a result of difficulty in raising money to carry on their operations. Traditionally they operated through the stock market. Today many of them find that their bonds and debentures are not saleable. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) tells us that the major key to levelling off inflation lies in increasing supply. We may or may not agree with this theory, but that is his point. Well, we find that in trying to raise funds to continue expansion in their operations the business community have encountered severe difficulties. Some have raised prices because there is a continual cycle of price increases going on, and they are using the retained profit to finance their own expansion.

One of the best ways to overcome a good deal of the inflation in the country would probably be to bring back confidence in the stock market so that shares will be traded again. This would allow the companies to return to their usual practice of asking for a reasonable return on their investments so that they might pay shareholders in return for the risk they have taken. This bill is a first, though limited step toward clearing up the business climate.

As my hon. friend said, the government has followed Ontario's lead. I note that British Columbia has put a new corporations act on its statute books in the last few years, and I hope other provinces will follow the example of Ontario and the federal government by enacting corporations legislation which will ensure a degree of uniformity across Canada. As hon. members realize, Canada is a difficult country in which to do business because of the vast distances between major centres; there is a tendency for a great deal of the commerce to congregate in four or five areas. This results in regional disparity. If we could promote the establishment of uniform corporations legislation across the country it would go a long way toward improving business conditions in Canada generally, and thus help to restore confidence among investors.

While the bill is in committee we might consider whether or not it provides for the exercise of any effective control over branch plant operations. From my own study of the measure so far, I cannot see that it does. However, we may find that some guidelines are set out on the basis of which branch plants can operate. This would not only encourage such firms to stay here; it would be good for the people of Canada as well as for the plants themselves. Generally, as I have said, the businessman is a straightforward, honest guy. Most of them are not nitpicking lawyers—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Kempling: I see there are a lot of lawyers here this afternoon. Businessmen appreciate legislation which they can understand without the help of expensive advice, and I congratulate the draftsmen for putting some clear wording in this measure, wording which the average man can understand. If the Income Tax Act and the competition legislation could be drafted in the same way, businessmen would probably be able to surge ahead with greater speed. I shall resume my seat, now, in order that the question may be put, Madam Speaker.

[Mr. Kempling.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

REFERENCE OF FINKELMAN REPORT TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Madam Speaker, I request the unanimous consent of the House in order to announce, on behalf of the government, the establishment of a special committee to review the Finkelman report.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lefebvre: Then I move:

That the Members of this House to serve on the special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service be Messrs. Alexander, Baker (Grenville-Carleton), Blais, Clermont, Daudlin, Dinsdale, Dionne (Kamouraska), Fairweather, Forrestall, Francis, Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier), Herbert, Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) and O'Connell; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed, on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

Mr. Lefebvre: Madam Speaker, I think there would be general agreement to call private member's Notice of Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. John's West.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is certainly no objection to calling item No. 4, but I notice that according to the order paper items Nos. 2 and 3 were allowed to stand and retain their position by unanimous consent. I presume this arrangement will continue and that they will not lose their places on the order paper.

Mr. Lefebvre: That is agreed.

TRANSPORT

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN FARE STRUCTURE OF NEWFOUNDLAND FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of reducing the present passenger-car fare and freight rate structure of the North Sydney, Nova Scotia, to Port-aux-Basques and Argentia, Newfoundland ferry service to better conform with the cost of travelling a comparable distance on the trans-Canada highway system as a more economic link between the Province of Newfoundland and the mainland of Canada.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of presenting this motion; it is the second time this year that I have had the pleasure of doing so. The first time was on April 8 of this year, when we debated the motion, but unfortunately were not permitted to vote on it. Consequently it dies on the order paper.

The subject matter of the motion is not new to this chamber. I have raised it on numerous occasions, the first time being on November 1, 1968, during my maiden speech. So you see, Madam Speaker, if persistence and determination are worth anything I think the motion should be allowed to come to a vote this afternoon. I have enough confidence in my colleagues to say that, having read the motion and listened to my speech and to others that will be made on this matter in the next few minutes, I am sure they will see things our way and will support the motion.

The ferry service to which I make reference is the only link between Newfoundland and the Canadian mainland except, of course, that link provided by the two air lines operating in and out of the province. Surely, then, this House must appreciate the importance of my motion, because the 90 miles stretch of water separating our island province from the rest of Canada is to us Newfoundlanders what the trans-Canada highway is to Canadians living in other parts of Canada. I contend that so far as passenger car and freight rate service are concerned we should not be treated any differently from people living in other parts of the country.

I might add, too, that this debate is rather timely because it was only yesterday that the Food Prices Review Board presented a report on food prices in Newfoundland, showing that Newfoundlanders are paying in certain areas as much as 20 per cent more for their food than is paid by their fellow Canadians. The findings of the Food Prices Review Board indicate that transportation is one of the major contributing factors to the high cost of food, services and other commodities in our province.

In its report the Food Prices Review Board makes certain recommendations. A number of its recommendations include improvements to the gulf ferry service. These improvements are necessary, in the opinion of the members of the Food Prices Review Board, in order to ensure a faster, more efficient and I presume cheaper transportation and freight service across the gulf separating North Sydney, on the mainland of Canada, from Newfoundland.

It is rather ironic, Madam Speaker, that today we hear members of the government talking about equal opportunities and equal rights in something as uneconomically measurable as language and as abstract as the Canadian identity. Is it not equally important that people should have equal opportunity to be accessible one to another? As the situation now exists in my province—I presume the same situation pretty well exists in other parts of Canada, including Prince Edward Island and the western end of the country—people are being denied the right of accessibility to fellow Canadians.

In 1969 or 1970 the Canadian National Railways, with the concurrence of the Canadian Transportation Commission, and with the full knowledge and consent of the Canadian government, abolished Newfoundland's rail passenger service. Since that time we have seen Canadian National take other action which has had the effect of reducing its presence in our province. This, along with the action taken by the federal government in moving some of its offices out of the province into the maritime region, leads one to believe that we are being reduced to colonial status. I do not think Newfoundlanders joined confederation in 1949 to become a colony of Canada. We were a colony of Britain for a large number of years, but I do not think we want to continue now as a colony of this country.

Newfoundland has the dubious distinction of having the highest cost of living of any province in Canada, the highest rate of unemployment, the lowest per capita income, the highest cost of shelter and, I believe, the highest cost of transportation. I do not have the figures before me, but I believe I am safe in saying that the cost of transportation in our province—the cost of buying, operating and maintaining a motor vehicle—is from 12 to 15 per cent higher than it is in other parts of Canada.

This is why I believe it is essential that the government take the necessary action to remove this inequity and to make the people of Newfoundland more accessible to their fellow Canadians. This can be done by reducing the cost of travelling on the ferry, the cost of transporting a car and family across 90 miles of water separating Newfoundland from the rest of Canada. I contend that the fare structure should be reduced to make it consistent with the cost of travelling a comparable distance along any part of the trans-Canada highway.

I do not think we are being unreasonable in asking for this. I believe that if confederation is to be meaningful to the people who live on the island provinces, certainly if it is to be meaningful to us, then the Canadian government has a very serious moral and legal obligation to provide us with a decent, modern and efficient passenger transportation service.

I am not going to talk for long, Madam Speaker, because I want this motion to come to a vote today. I realize that if I take up too much time with my remarks, and since other members also wish to speak, the motion could very well be talked out. I am hoping that by cutting my remarks short members on the other side will do likewise, and that the motion will be brought to a vote before five o'clock. I hope all members will see fit to support it. I am sure that the people of Newfoundland, as well as the people of Prince Edward Island and other parts of Canada where ferry services are essential, will be very thankful to this House and to the government if they see fit to reduce the fares as I have suggested, bringing them in line with the cost to other Canadians of travelling a similar distance.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I agree with the sentiments expressed in this motion and I realize the inadequacy of the kind of transportation to which the hon. member refers. It surely must be recognized by all members of parliament that transportation has always been, and still is, a major concern of all the Atlantic provinces. We lag far behind the rest of the country, the far north excepted, in all forms of transportation—that is, air, highway, rail and water.

Thanks to the recognition of this problem by the federal government, the Atlantic provinces now have their sections of the trans-Canada highway. But this is only one route and it is obvious that these small provinces with small populations, and an even smaller industrial base, cannot build and maintain the kind of arterial highways which modern transportation systems require.

Hence the federal government will have to continue to assist, through such financial arrangements, the continued development of a modern system of highways in Atlantic Canada. The national railway, the CNR, seems to be and has been for years on a deliberate course of making rail transport as expensive and as difficult as possible. Nowadays it may cost more to send a single package by CN than the contents thereof are worth. And unless the article has a very long life span it will be obsolete, rotten, or dead, before it reaches its destination. If indeed it escapes all the aforementioned fates, it is liable to be bent, spindled or mutilated beyond recognition.

I might point out that very often by CN rail it takes freight at least two weeks to travel from Montreal to northeastern New Brunswick. A good deal of this delay is due to inefficiency and over-haul, whereby cargo is hauled beyond its destination, stored in a warehouse, and then hauled back again.

In the field of passenger service the railways have had even greater success in their aims and objectives than in freight and express. The trains normally run late; they are uncomfortable and slow. The officials are often indifferent or even discourteous, and unless one is a millionaire it is necessary to carry one's lunch along. Maintenance is inadequate, both on the roadbed and the rails, judging from the frequent derailments experienced in Atlantic Canada.

Air service as well leaves a great deal to be desired. The national carrier obviously gives thought to Atlantic Canada only as an afterthought. The service of the regional carrier, Eastern Provincial Airways, is much, much more personalized service than the national carrier, but its scheduling requires a great deal more thought and imagination. It does little good to substitute a slow daily plane for an occasional fast one that comes in only occasionally.

You, may well ask Madam Speaker, what all this has to do with the motion we are now discussing. The answer, of course, is that I am trying to put this problem in context vis-à-vis the entire problem of transportation in Atlantic Canada.

[Mr. Carter.]

Obviously the most unsatisfactory form of transportation by its very nature is ferry service. But the government of Canada has invested a great deal in providing better ferry service between Newfoundland and the mainland, and between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Having said that, I sympathize with the sentiments behind this motion. I must ask, however, whether its implementation would not have the effect of cutting off one's nose to spite one's face.

Can one logically expect, in view of the present high subsidies, to lower fares substantially and at the same time increase service? I would suggest, however, that a look should be taken at the rate structure. It might be well to base the charge on a flat rate for a car and all of its occupants, so that families will not be penalized unduly. Does it cost more to transport a family of six than a family of four? In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I cannot support this motion because its net effect would be to create yet another disparity in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to support the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter), who has presented an excellent case. He is indeed an excellent member. He is a diligent, thoughtful and far-seeing member of this place. He has, with his usual realism and precision, zeroed in upon one of the greatest issues which troubles our region, and indeed our nation because the land is not prosperous if any region thereof is lacking in prosperity. He is dealing with an issue of national importance.

It is appropriate that he and I should be discussing it because, in a sense, we are both from islands, although I think Prince Edward Island is the only island province because the great Labrador mainland is part of the province to which my colleague belongs. In another way I suppose that might be said because in my province, in the constituency which I represent, Canada began. The 1864 cradle of Confederation conference was localed in Charlottetown, and Newfoundland so far is where Confederation has ended.

I am not saying that Confederation with Newfoundland brought the thing to an end, but this is the last expansion so far, unless the Turks and Caicos Islands join us, and other adventurous developments in the south take place in God's good time. It is tremendously important that we deal with transportation as our ancestors in this chamber from the maritimes have had to do, because by a fine, enlightened, considerate, sensitive policy the national government can do something to offset the economic imbalances which came upon our region because of Confederation.

In the days before there was the great union in the 1860's the people in my part of Canada and the people in Newfoundland were well located in terms of the economic factors of importance. They were in a good position for trade. The Atlantic was a corridor of commerce and their location, their marine centred economy and their initiative brought for them a degree of prosperity which they have never attained since, relative to other parts of North America.

Now, their location on the seagirt shore of the eastern part of Canada is not an advantage. It is often a disadvantage. As the hon. member for St. John's West says, it seems that, being the tag end of the transportation line, things cost more in our provinces. All the economic indices find us at the bottom. I refer to such things as unemployment and high wages. But in things that should be lower, such as the cost of living we are at the top. Sometimes Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland have competed in those two dreary and soul-destroying economic indices, the high cost of living and the low rate of wages. So, transportation aid must be used as an amelioration for their problems. Freight rate increases in recent years have had the opposite effect.

The kind of thing the member has suggested in this motion would be of some help to our people. I am amazed that the government supporter who just sat down has worked out that it would be unhelpful for our provinces and the people of Canada if there were lower rates on the ferries connecting the islands with the mainland.

Surely it was the belief of those who formed Confederation that the joining groups would share economic advantages and economic disadvantages. National policies are made to take into consideration regional disparities. How logical, how reasonable, and how sensible is it to say that there will be free interprovincial movement unless you happen to live in Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland?

No one has to pay $5 to go from Ontario to Quebec. There is no collecting agency on the border of Manitoba and Saskatchewan soaking those people $5 or $10 every time they go to the other province. But try getting off Prince Edward Island without paying for it, try getting off Newfoundland without paying for it, or try getting on.

An hon. Member: How about Vancouver?

Mr. Macquarrie: The hon. member mentions Vancouver. I will not talk about intra provincial transportation but interprovincial.

This is the iniquity. This is the thing that should be faced. Indeed, instead of having the presumption to increase the cost of taking automobiles and people from province to province, from our island to the mainland and back, a move should be taken to abolish such tolls. The people of Charlottetown, the people of St. John's, the people of Port aux Basques, should just as truly benefit from the trans-Canada highway as those who live in those provinces which do not have the good fortune to be islands.

However, I do not want to get into the area of psychic satisfaction and psychic income, because we are often told in our part of the country that we do not really need these hard and important economic gains because life is so beautiful in the psychic sense. All of that is true. These are two beautiful provinces that we are discussing and I cherish them both, particularly the one of my birth. But I do not find that the Bank of Nova Scotia in Charlottetown is any more susceptible to being paid in psychic funds that its branches in Ontario or Quebec.

In other words, the people in the beautiful part of the land have also to compete in the hard currencies of today's real world, and I believe that in zeroing in on one of the deterrents to the prosperous self expansion of our own economy, namely transportation, my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, has struck the right note. He struck it clearly and strongly, and I hope that my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. McIsaac), who himself is an islander and therefore is one step ahead in the comprehension of all these problems, will relate it to the minister, and that before too long we will have a real look at these bottlenecks. Indeed, it is bad enough to give us a bottleneck, but to make us pay for it in increasingly heavy doses is, in the vernacular which I rarely use, laying it on a bit thick.

So I am enthusiastically in support of this motion, and I commend it to the government. I know it is not interested in such political things at this stage of the game, the last election being so near behind and the next one so far ahead, but if it wants to win friends and influence people in our part of the country, even though that may be disastrous to some of us personally, I would suggest that the very first recipe for it to learn and to put into effect would be to take some curative action on our transportation problems, one of which was so eloquently described by my colleague today.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise to add a few words of support for this motion which was presented by my colleague and so eloquently supported by my other colleague on this side of the House. One of the reasons is that I would find it unfortunate if the first apologist for the government should feel he can go off for the weekend now that the government which he supports is the best of all possible governments, and has done everything possible for people in all parts of this country.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. To begin with, I am not an apologist for the government, and secondly, I have never suggested that we have the best of all possible worlds. If the hon. member had listened, he would have known that I enumerated the numerous problems with which we have to deal. My point was that this motion does not deal with them but simply creates another disparity.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I accept the reprimand, it being Friday afternoon. But I think he should be reminded, at least once again this week, because we have been reminding the government side of it, that there are areas in this country which have been neglected. It is being done now. Someone mentioned the west coast a few minutes ago and the trans-Canada highway. Some people in this chamber may not realize that mile zero on the trans-Canada highway is in the riding of my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), and that it passes through my riding on its way to Nanaimo.

Then there is a great gap in this magnificent trans Canada highway which joins the island on the west coast to the island on the east coast. Mile zero is on the west coast. But the gap there has to be filled by a ferry. Now, the construction of that ferry from the west to the east coast was done with funds provided in part by the province through which it passed. That gap is not being filled with funds from the federal government. This is the thrust of the small contribution that I wanted to make.

I think that one of my colleagues the other day raised the question in the House as to why there was no support for the ferry that joins Vancouver Island to the mainland, to which the reply was that the government cannot support transportation within the province. Unfortunately this is belied by some of the facts that have been brought to my attention.

There is support given in postal services on the east coast. There is also a ferry service, the construction costs for which were provided by a federal government grant to the province of Ontario even though it was from one point in Ontario to another point in the same province. So I do not want to have that sort of reply stand on the record unchallenged. There is a gap in the trans-Canada highway the filling of which has not been supported by this government, and I feel that it should be mentioned this afternoon in support of the motion before us.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Madam Speaker, I am always pleased, as the member representing a suburban Toronto constituency, when I can rise and speak with some measure of support for a proposal put forward by a colleague from the great province of Newfoundland. I am very pleased that within my own riding, if I can be political, there are a number of people who hail from his part of the country, and it will be a happy day when I will be able to investigate the "great homeland" that they talk about so often.

When I read the first part of the motion that:

—the government should consider the advisability of reducing the present passenger-car fare and freight rate structure of the North Sydney, Nova Scotia to Port aux Basques and Argentia, Newfoundland ferry service to better conform with the cost of travelling—

Up to the part in which the hon. member says that we should consider assisting them, I find that there might be merit in the proposal.

I am not an expert and have not done any deep investigation of what the subsidy level now is, but I have a few facts on it. I do believe it is reasonable to allow people to move freely and provide for them access back and forth from any part of our nation to another. I hope, later on in my comments, to point out that we do not need a water barrier of 90 miles to have difficulty communicating in transportation back and forth in Canada today.

Indeed, in southern Ontario there are examples of shorter distances than that, with hard firm land and no mountains in between, where people have difficulty commuting. They are in fact land-locked. I do not believe, as one hon. member mentioned, that there is significance in the fact that this 90 miles stretch is a borderline between provinces. It is not just a line on the map, but is a considerable boundary which isolates that province.

However, the motion loses much of its saleability when it says:

—to better conform with the cost of travelling a comparable distance on the trans-Canada highway system—

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

If it had simply said that fares should be reasonable on this 90 mile barrier it would have been better. I know there are subsidies, but perhaps they should be larger and the fares should be decreased. There are other instances in this country where there is no regular service, such as places in the far north, and there is as much difficulty there as between these two points in Newfoundland and the mainland, and where the costs are even greater. Those people are at a greater disadvantage but no one suggests that the air fare from Edmonton to some point in the Northwest Territories should be the price of the gas it would take for a motorcycle to go that distance overland. I am surprised at that comparative suggestion in the motion.

Although the price should be kept as reasonable as possible, Madam Speaker, still people must pay for service. One of my concerns about soaring medicare costs is that the federal government in forcing the provinces to join in a portable medicare program, encouraged a system where there is no requirement for a token payment for the services received. Sometimes this sort of thing doubles or triples the burden on the taxpayer because such services are taken advantage of, and in the end the people who need them are at a disadvantage because the doctors are so busy they cannot take care of everybody. In the same way I think there should be some requirement for the user to pay for transportation.

Considerable amounts of money are already being expended on transportation services, and particularly in the maritimes. The gulf service is not the only service provided on the east coast. The government provides ships and port facilities at no cost, between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. In fact there are seven ships operating between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, one between Yarmouth and Bar Harbour, and 20 others in service in that area. So there is a good deal of assistance; in fact millions of dollars in capital costs, and also help in offsetting operating costs on the route we are discussing today. Perhaps there should be more, but we should remember that the money we spend is the money of the Canadian taxpayer and there is only so much in the coffers.

One hon. member mentioned the many problems faced by the people of Newfoundland—the high unemployment rate, the high cost of transportation and the high cost of food. It should also be recognized by hon. members opposite, and I am sure it is, that the federal government has attempted to lend assistance to all parts of Canada that find themselves under economic duress. For instance, unemployment insurance aid in Newfoundland today has grown tremendously from what it was a few years ago, but there is only so much money and it must be spread in many directions.

In the last parliament I criticized the government because of the lack of an over-all transportation policy that would allow our large urban areas to relate to our rural areas, and allow people from all parts of the country to come and go easily. I am not happy that it costs more to fly from here to Vancouver or Newfoundland than it does to fly to other parts of the world at a greater distance, Madam Speaker.

I should like to point out some other dilemmas. There is a small town at the base of the Bruce Peninsula called Wiarton. It is only 20 miles from the relatively large community of Owen Sound, and only 140 miles from Toronto. But an old person there, living on a limited income, is virtually isolated. For people like that it is not just a matter of $3 for a berth on the ferry to go 90 miles, it is $15 or $20 by the time they order a cab to go the 20 miles to Owen Sound to get the bus—because there are no trains—to go to some other part of Ontario. It does not take a 90 mile expanse of water to isolate people, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Carter: Madam Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Will the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) allow a question?

Mr. Fleming: Certainly, Madam Speaker. When I complete my remarks I will be pleased to do so.

I am saying that I can see the problem and perhaps the need for further subsidies, but I am also saying that rather than move on one particular motion it is an over-all transportation program which must be demanded on all sides of the House. It is extremely important that Canadians in any part of the country not be isolated. We must not just think of transportation as being able to move by bus anywhere in the urban community, but must remember that transportation also means relating to and communicating with other parts of the country.

As I say, Madam Speaker, the cost is great and the pie must be cut in many pieces. It is extremely important that we approach the matter with an overview, and not just concentrate on the problem of the 90 mile gap. We must understand that we must subsidize in all directions, not just between Newfoundland and the mainland, or the Northwest Territories down into the provinces. People in all outlying areas must have access to others. Even if a bus runs through a community just once a week it is a chance for the people there to get about and visit.

A lot of money has to be spent and the government has pledged to improve the situation. I share the concern that ordinary Canadians should have access to transportation from one province to another, from one town to another, at reasonable cost.

I should like to make one other point about the ferry service from the mainland to Newfoundland. It must be remembered that there are also a number of private enterprise competitive services running. I am sure my hon. friends, members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, would not want to deny that party's firm belief that competition and private enterprise should be encouraged. It is true we want a good service and do not want to rely on a service where the private sector could let us down.

I know that government service is provided. But if the subsidy is too great, if the outlay of the company is too small and if there is lack of competition, service suffers. One will then find that the level of service becomes lower, that the service is less efficient, that schedules are not adhered to. On the other hand a private corporation tries to adhere to schedules, improve service, provide more comfort, and generally do better.

The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who spoke some minutes ago, said we must share; that is, Canada as a whole must share the benefits of service with the people of the Maritimes. I agree that the federal government must make sure that service is provided equitably, and that we do not say to one particular area, "We are giving you a little more." That is why I cannot accept the motion, as worded. The government must be fair; it must provide an overview. It must make sure that benefits and services are offered equitably to all.

Either the hon. member for Hillsborough or the hon. member who preceded him said we needed national policies in transportation. That is exactly what I am saying, and that is why I cannot support a motion which pleads for parochial benefits, which asks for a subsidy for one area. I cannot support that. I would, however, support a policy which would make available on the same basis service to the people in Wiarton as well as to the people in the Northwest Territories, Newfoundland and other parts of the Maritime provinces. Finally, I think it is unfortunate that the motion compares the cost of travelling on the trans-Canada highway with the cost of running a ship. That comparison is unfortunate.

Mr. Carter: Madam Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question? To strengthen his argument the hon. member used the analogy of the small, isolated farming community. Surely there is a difference between a community which is isolated by 20 miles of land and one that is separated from the mainland by 90 miles of water?

Mr. Fleming: Madam Speaker, I think it is possible to equate two such communities. Let me say that the community in Newfoundland has available a heavily subsidized service. Actually, there are six or seven private services which people in Newfoundland can use if they want to move to the mainland. On the other hand, somebody living in an isolated region of southern Ontario may need to pay between $20 and $30 for a cab, which will take him only 20 miles, and then he must start paying for public transportation.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Madam Speaker, I rise to support this excellent motion and congratulate the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the government the lack of transportation policy. It is all very well for the government to say that we must wait for a national policy which will solve parochial problems. The government keeps saying it has the answer, that it will bring forward a national policy. There has been such talk in this country ever since I was born, and the only solution to our difficulties has been the sporadic introduction of mish-mash solutions.

I applaud the sentiments of the hon. member who proposed the motion. He wants to encourage people to move across the country and visit each other. I think we should vote on this but I am afraid that the remarks we have just heard were designed to spin out this debate, to the point of precluding a vote.

As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) said, British Columbia coastal ferry services are not federally subsidized, the people of the province being forced to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to support the system. Anyone looking at the map will realize that those travelling from Vancouver Island or the Queen Charlotte Islands to the mainland must cover a fair distance over water, in the same way as those travelling from Newfoundland to the mainland must cover a fair distance of water. Clearly, coastal transportation is an area of difficulty in this country.

The government talks of uniting the country. Madam Speaker, the longer we take to cure our inequities in transportation, the higher will become the mountains of British Columbia! I know the province is not separated from the rest of the country by water, as is Newfoundland. That fact is incidental and unimportant. We need a rational transportation policy. Admittedly the motion before us refers to a subsidized ferry service for the east coast; let me point out that the British Columbia ferry service is not subsidized, for reasons I have never understood.

The argument that we only subsidize interprovincial ferries will not wash. The Library of Parliament study on Canadian ferry services, recently published, shows that $51.8 million was spent on subsidizing ferry service, largely Canadian National Railways ferry service. There is also reference to the subsidy for the Tobermory and South Baymouth ferry service.

An hon. Member: Manitoulin Island is like another province.

Mr. Leggatt: That service does not cross provincial boundaries. So, the government is being inconsistent in its approach to subsidized ferry service.

Most of us in British Columbia want to discourage sentiments of separatism which lie just under the surface. Sometimes we find this difficult, especially when we learn that the government subsidizes heavily a ferry service which owns more vessels than the Canadian navy. Such subsidies are only possible because the government has adopted an inconsistent and irrational transportation policy in the many years it has mismanaged the affairs of the nation.

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, let me thank the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) for bringing forward this motion which deals with ferry service to Newfoundland and, by implication, with ferry service to other parts of the Maritimes and other parts of Canada. The hon. member dealt with various aspects of transportation. It is in that context that we must consider this motion.

I was impressed by the comments of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who has left the chamber, and by those made by the hon. member for St. John's West. I was born on the east coast and recall how important it was to get to Charlottetown harbour on time to catch the ferry. I remember the ice boats which crossed the harbour in the spring. They crossed from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick when the larger icebreakers, the CNR ferries, could not get through because they were caught in an ice jam. I appreciate the concern of the hon. member about ferry service to his home province.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

I am not certain that I agree with everything the hon. member for Hillsborough and the mover of the motion said. I was under the impression that they were, in a way, downgrading their provinces by saying how tough things are, all because of transportation difficulties. I am sure that they did not mean to leave the impression that they were downgrading their own provinces.

● (1650)

I am sure they do not mean it that way, but they do have a lot of other attributes on both islands. The tourist traffic and tourist industry have been building up tremendously, abetted by the ferry services that are there. The improved ferry services are another factor insofar as the economics of Newfoundland are concerned. I do not think we can look at this from one side only, with even more subsidized service than now exists.

While I appreciate the advisability of the motion from the point of the hon. member who moved it, I ask hon. members to oppose it in this particular form. I will advance some arguments on why I ask that.

I can well appreciate the hon. member's concern for service to his province. That is a legitimate and genuine concern. Indeed, it is not only a concern of his and of other members from Newfoundland, but of members from other parts of Canada. Accessibility to Newfoundland is a concern of all of us. Indeed, it was a condition of confederation. In total, it is one that has been very admirably fulfilled when compared with the situation prior to confederation.

I can recall as a boy loading produce, cattle and other things on ferries out of Charlottetown bound for Newfoundland. That ferry service is a vital link in the chain of uniting our Canadian provinces, as is the ferry service to the province of Prince Edward Island and the railroad that was built years ago across the prairies and western Canada to link the province of British Columbia to Canada. All of this points out the very vital aspect of transportation, not only to Canada today but to our development as a nation.

Every time we look at a motion like this which involves ferry service to Newfoundland, we ask why it is different from ferries that run in British Columbia, across rivers in Saskatchewan, ferries to Manitoulin Island and others. The answer is obvious on why there are variations. They were all built for different reasons, and probably at different times. It is not easy to resolve this problem with a uniform policy for all of Canada, based on local needs and traditions, and how they evolved. Those are a few of the reasons why it is difficult to come up with an equitable policy for all of Canada with regard to ferry service.

How much should we subsidize ferry service to the province of Newfoundland? How much does it cost to maintain that service? How much will it cost in the future? The figures are high. What was the capital cost of the facilities now there? They were paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. What are the present and projected operating costs? These are huge figures.

When making an examination we must look at other needs insofar as capital investment in Canada is concerned. There must be increases and improvements in our transportation service in other areas of Canada.

As a matter of interest the capital costs of vessels now on that service add up to $67 million. That is a very large figure. Proposed vessels for future improved service will involve an additional $100 million. Existing terminals at Port aux Basques, Argentia and North Sydney cost $53 million. Proposed improvements for terminals at Port aux Basques and North Sydney will involve future expenditures of another $50 million.

As the hon. member for York West (Mr. Fleming) mentioned earlier, the tariffs charged for ferry crossings can in some way be compared with the costs of medicare or hospitalization premiums in that they are not related to the cost of providing the service. Certainly ferry services to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland are not directly related to the cost. There is a considerable degree of subsidy in the operation of both services.

I think that users of services such as hospitalization or ferries would be more cognizant of the cost to the taxpayer if the rates represented 50, 25 or even 20 per cent of the actual cost, and were allowed to rise accordingly. If the costs to users increased by 25 cents, 50 cents or $1 every year to cover fuel costs, or operating costs of medicare, for example, they would be more appreciative of the growing costs of governmental services.

I might point out that the rates for this particular ferry service have not increased in the last year. I say quite frankly to the hon. member who proposed the motion that when these rates are looked at, they will more than likely be revised upwards rather than downwards.

In fairness, if we look at the increases in operating costs, fuel, labour and so on, to provide these services, somewhere along the line we have to decide at what level to peg the subsidy, and what priority must be given to ferry service as opposed to the renewal of rail lines required for transportation in western Canada, a federal commitment of some years ago, and to port facilities on the west coast, another government commitment. Somewhere along the line there has to be an element of balance and rationalization with regard to expenditures to be made in the next few years. There is not much time left when we consider some of the freight that has to be moved.

When we look at the broad picture of transportation and the needs this country will face in the next 10 or 15 years, they make the problems of the last 100 years look small by comparison.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour allotted for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Tuesday at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McKENZIE—ANSWERS OF PRIME MINISTER CONCERNING AIR CANADA BASE AT WINNIPEG

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege relating to some recent answers I received from the Prime Minister to questions about the construction of a new Air Canada facility and maintenance base for Winnipeg and the construction of the new $15 million hangar. On November 4, last, in answer to my question the Prime Minister stated:

> Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport answered a similar question a very short while ago and I think he indicated that no specific date had been set when the thing was being proceeded with.

On Wednesday, November 6, in answer to a similar question the Prime Minister stated:

> Mr. Speaker, I attempted to answer this a few days ago and the Minister of Transport also replied to the question previously.

On checking the Hansard index, Mr. Speaker, I could find no printed record of the Minister of Transport making a statement on when the $15 million Air Canada hangar would be built. Could the Prime Minister inform the House when and where the Minister of Transport made his statements and what they were?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the right hon. the Prime Minister wanted to enter the discussion on the alleged question of privilege, of course I would hear him. The hon. member knows, however, that a complaint about the quality of answers received in the question period does not constitute a question of privilege. There is in fact no obligation upon any of the ministers to make replies to questions, and when they do reply, certainly a complaint about the quality of the reply is not a valid question of privilege. In addition, of course, although the hon. member gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege, he has not followed it with any motion seeking action from the Chair so there is no action the Chair could take on this particular question.

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO STIMULATE LUMBER INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter, namely the rise in the unemployment rate.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

> That this House study as soon as possible the serious problem now facing the lumber industry which is leading to numerous lay-offs, with a view to implementing measures to remedy the situation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent the motion cannot be put.

November 7, 1974—Mr. McCleave (Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments):

That the Third Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, presented to the House on Thursday, November 7, 1974, be concurred in.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, could this matter stand until Friday. There has to be some technical correction in the French version of the report which was presented to the House last week.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING GRANTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This motion arises out of the unanimous request made by the Manpower and Labour Committee of the Quebec National Assembly last week for the federal government to provide "details of agreements regarding grants given to United Aircraft of Canada Limited".

This request from the Quebec National Assembly arises from an inquiry being conducted by that body into recent activity by the United Aircraft Corporation in that province which has received over $80 million in federal assistance and has nonetheless transferred 40 per cent of this year's planned production back to the United States and plans a further transfer of production next year. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That, following the request by the Quebec National Assembly for the abovementioned information on agreements and the stated willingness of United Aircraft to provide this information, pending federal government approval, this House instructs the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to comply with this request at the earliest possible time.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which, being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I know he is in the lobby and I am wondering if he could be given the opportunity to take his seat, as I know he will want to answer my question.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING GRANTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. As the committee of the Quebec National Assembly has made the unanimous request for the federal government to provide the details of its contractual arrangements with United Aircraft concerning grants made by the government and obligations undertaken by that company, will the Prime Minister inform the House if the government has reconsidered its decision about making such information public, given the fact that United Aircraft Corporation itself says it does not object to public revelation of this information.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as the government is concerned, I shall want to look into the latter fact. If United Aircraft Company has no reservations, I shall ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to report to me and give his views on whether this material is publishable. I perhaps disagree with the hon. member, or at least have some reservations about his suggestion that the federal government should be obliged to submit material in any form to the legislative assembly of a province. However, the substance of the matter remains the same. If it can be made public, it can be made public in this House and some other forum may find use for it.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. To be clear, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is his view, and therefore that of the government, that, in the case of an agreement entered into on behalf of the public of Canada by the government of Canada on a confidential basis with a corporation, if the corporation does not object to that information being made public because it sees no competitive disadvantage to itself, that being the normal, quite understandable reason for failure to disclose certain information, the government will make this information available to the public. Will the Prime Minister give that assurance to the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is what I indicated I would be discussing with the minister. I think as a general principle, the point of view of the hon. member seems acceptable to me. Confidentiality is to protect the particular company. If they do not want it, we do not want it. However, there may be particular circumstances of which I am not aware. That is why I indicated to the member I would raise the matter with the minister and ask him to reply to the House.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ARRANGEMENTS FOR USE OF BRONFMAN JET BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR VISIT TO ISRAEL—PAYMENT FOR PASSAGE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Prime Minister suggested on Tuesday that the travel arrangements for the minister's visit to Israel were proposed by the inviting government. Will the minister tell the House if the proposal to fly on the Bronfman jet was included in the formal initial invitation of the government of Israel and is he satisfied that Mr. Bronfman or an official of his company did not first suggest that their corporate jet be used?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the hon. member that all the arrangements for my trip to Israel, which was an official visit at the invitation of the government of Israel, were made by the Israeli embassy.

Mr. Stevens: In view of the fact it was publicly reported on Thursday by the counsellor of the Israeli embassy that the embassy had not arranged the Distillers Corporation plane trip and that aides in the minister's office have said that Mr. Bronfman had invited the minister to accompany him on a trip to Israel, did the minister ever question why that plane should be used and did he inquire into whether alternative Canadian government or commercial airline transportation was available?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the aides in my office never made such a statement. A communication was made with the journalist who printed such a piece of news. No such statement was made by my aides. As far as the arrangements for the trip were concerned, I said they were made by the Israeli embassy and I relied on the arrangements made by them.

Mr. Stevens: Has the minister inquired as to whether Seagrams charged the government of Israel for the use of the jet plane used on the visit? If that has not been done, has the minister arranged to pay for his and his wife's passage?

Mr. Lalonde: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not inquired about this. It is obviously a matter to be settled between the government of Israel and the owners of the private plane concerned. I might remind the hon. member that the Israeli ambassador also travelled with me on this trip.

USE BY MINISTERS OF PRIVATE AIRCRAFT ON OFFICIAL VISITS—ESTABLISHMENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question for clarification. Did I understand the minister to say this was an official visit by the minister in a private aircraft? If that is the case, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether it is now going to be the practice of the government of Canada to have official trips taken in private aircraft?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): This might not seem important to members opposite, but it is very important to us and the people of this country. If it is going to be the intention to have trips of this kind made by ministers in private aircraft on an official basis, does the Prime Minister intend to issue any kind of guidelines that should be followed by ministers in subsequent situations of this kind.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not going to be the government practice. Indeed, I would very firmly want that it be the contrary of government practice. There may be certain exceptions such as the one we have heard about when a trip is arranged by the host government. Even in those circumstances, it might be wise to inform one's self in advance as to the means of transportation. As a general principle, however, there are guidelines that ministers travel at the expense of the government of Canada or at the expense of a particular department.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): How then does the Prime Minister distinguish the trip that has just been made on the Bronfman jet, apparently for official reasons, by the minister whose jurisdiction includes responsibility for implementation of the LeDain Commission with its recommendations regarding alcohol, advertising and this sort of thing, from the general indication he has given that the government will not approve trips of this sort in private aircraft?

● (1420)

Mr. Trudeau: I believe I gave an answer to that when I was first asked the question a month ago. I was not aware of the nature of the transportation the minister was taking. From what I understand, he accepted the invitation in good faith. I think the conclusion we should draw as a government is that in future when we accept invitations we shall also ask ourselves how we are being conveyed to the place to which we are invited.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NUMBER OF PROJECTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I shall put my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the many lay-offs in the lumber industry in northwest Quebec and elsewhere in Canada, does the government intend to increase its grants to LIP so that more of these projects may be approved this fall thus permitting us to fight unemployment in that sector?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is always pleased to note that the public as well as the opposition approve LIP projects. As for the hon. member's representation, I shall acquaint the minister with it and if he has to make any statement he will do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS PROPOSED TRADE AND COMMODITY AGREEMENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to the on-going World Food Conference in Rome from which the minister has just returned. Bearing in mind the statement by the President of Mexico, Sr. Echeverria, stressing the importance of trade and commodity agreements to the less developed countries, what attitude does Canada intend to take toward the important discussions now going on in committee No. 3?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In my statement at the conference I made it clear that Canada took a very positive attitude toward improving the terms of trade as they affect developing countries in terms of agricultural products. That is the general position. We understand there is a great deal of interest at the conference among the developing nations in the whole question of trade and we look forward to the upcoming GATT trade negotiations as an appropriate and effective forum in which these trade matters can be dealt with. At that forum Canada will, of course, continue to show the positive attitude which was indicated in Rome.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Is it Canada's intention, as apparently was indicated at a private meeting yesterday, to block or filibuster the discussions in committee No. 3 during consideration of the trade proposals put forward by Mexico on behalf of the group of 77? Does Canada still propose to encourage other countries to talk out the proposals so that none of these motions will come to a vote in the committee? Is it true that Canada did move to present a filibuster in committee No. 3?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. I was not present at the conference yesterday, but it was not the intention of the Canadian delegation to filibuster or to undertake blocking tactics. We do believe, however, that the proper forum is the GATT and we shall press, through the GATT for these and other benefits to be made available to developing countries.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I do not believe the minister replied to the specific question whether Canada did, in fact, encourage other countries of the developed world yesterday to participate in a filibuster? Is that not true?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. gentleman puts the question in those terms, certainly I can say I have no knowledge of that and I would be tremendously surprised if that did take place. If such did take place, it would be a change in the attitude that we had adopted during the period that I was in Rome. Specifically, I will inquire whether any motion or action was taken that might be remotely interpreted in that light.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CANADA'S COMMITMENTS TO SUPPLY ONE MILLION TONS OF GRAIN PER YEAR

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In terms of Canada's pledge of a million tons of grain per year, I believe it is, can the minister of external affairs tell the House whether Canada is prepared at this time to handle and to move that grain to the destinations, and also to see that this one million tons of grain is properly distributed to those countries so there is no waste whatever? Has Canada given this matter broad and thorough thought? Are we prepared to act on this, and when will we start this kind of program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, there was a proposal put before the conference by the secretary general of the conference requesting the world community to commit itself for a three-year period, commencing next year, to a total of 10 million metric tons per year in volume terms. Canada responded to this request by undertaking to commit itself to one million tons per year—certainly more than its proportional share—for each of these three years, commencing with the next fiscal year. This involves, as my hon. friend knows, a very substantial increase in financial outlay over any previous year. This particular flow will, of course, begin within the time span indicated.

Mr. Murta: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I really want to ask the same question I asked originally; the minister seemed to be hedging somewhat. I asked him whether Canada is at the present time physically prepared to handle this grain and to move it out of Canada to other countries. In addition, will we be supervising the distribution of this grain to these other countries, or will the grain be turned over to authorities in the recipient countries who will go ahead and distribute the grain? I should like a little more specific information.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, part of the Canadian commitment at the world food conference was also in response to a recommendation by the secretary general, namely that we would undertake to provide at least 20 per cent of our food aid through multilateral channels. Therefore, 20 per cent of this grain or food aid will be distributed through multilateral channels. The remainder will be distributed on a bilateral basis, and Canada will do its utmost, in co-operation with the recipient countries, to ensure that none of this precious food is wasted.

I should like to get some more information on one point, and that is with respect to the cost of carrying the grain.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS UNITED STATES PROPOSAL TO FORM GROUPS OF FOOD EXPORTING COUNTRIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. What is the position of the government of Canada on the proposal of Secretary of State Kissinger for what, in effect, would be a cartel of food exporting countries? Can we be assured that Canada will not be part of any such cartel, and that less developed countries would be represented on any authority which distributed food? My hesitancy in framing the question is due to the discussions that went on, which make it very difficult to put a question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of the Canadian delegation to support an international cartel. I believe the secretary general of FAO did convene a meeting of food exporting countries which had as its purpose really to monitor and examine the world food situation and world needs at the present time. In so far as any monitoring mechanism as to the existence of supplies and the need of recipients is concerned, then of course we would support that aspect of it, but not in the sense the hon. member has mentioned.

POSSIBLE CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE AT UNITED NATIONS ON THE MIDDLE EAST—CANADIAN POSITION ON RIGHTS OF ISRAEL

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he advise the House whether Canada intends to take any part in the debate on the Middle East commencing this week at the United Nations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter I cannot deal with definitively at the moment. I am sure there will be Canadian participation in the debate at some point, but whether it will be this week or later is still open.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise the House what position Canada will take during the debate in respect of the rights of the state of Israel?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe that if and when Canada participates in the debate this will give the Canadian spokesman an opportunity to restate Canada's position in respect of the existence of Israel, and its right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries, as the foundation stone of our Canadian policy.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBLE ESTABLISHMENT OF FOOD STORAGE DEPOTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a question asked by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. In view of the fact that some 25 per cent of all food grown in developing countries or provided to them by countries such as Canada is destroyed by rodents prior to reaching the consuming public, were any steps taken at the conference to assure that adequate storage depots will be set up in countries requiring this food and, if so, what plans were made?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as yet there have been no decisions or formal resolutions adopted because the committees had just begun to operate toward the end of last week. The question of storage, its importance, as well as the question of distribution were raised in a number of statements, but one will have to wait until the actual deliberations of the committees and their results to know whether any internationally agreed program will be developed along these lines.

ENERGY

SUGGESTED NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND ONTARIO ON SUPPLY OF ELECTRICAL POWER—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL POWER GRID

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the coal strike in the United States and the trouble Ontario is having at its Pickering nuclear plant and its Nanticoke thermal plant thereby making a very dangerous winter ahead for Ontario in power supply, and in view of the fact that Quebec Hydro is negotiating a deal to sell its surplus electric power to the United States, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to give the same treatment to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as he has undertaken between the Ontario government and Alberta, bringing these two adjoining provinces together in a mutually acceptable policy on energy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly convey that representation to the minister when he returns.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that all provinces have asked the federal government at the conference of last March 27 to start work on a national power grid, will the Prime Minister adopt this as a number one priority of his government in order to give us some basic national energy policy so that all Canadians will have first chance at all energy forms in all parts of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources commented on this at the time indicating there were very serious technical difficulties which make that grid improbable in the immediate future. The long distances between Manitoba and Ontario particularly are considerations which do not permit us now usefully and economically to set up the kind of grid about which the hon. member talks. This is perhaps something for the future. If I remember correctly the attitude of the minister, this was something that his department was looking at.

CONSULTATIONS WITH NORTHERN RESIDENTS ON EFFECTS OF RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT—POSSIBLE REVIEW OF DRILLING IN BEAUFORT SEA

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of a recent report by Mr. Robert Wicklund and his associates which suggests that oil spills in the Arctic are extremely long-lived in their effects, and in view of his suggestion that conditions in many parts of the Arctic environment are sensitive to "even the slightest bit of pollution", I should like to ask whether the government has undertaken any program to set up ongoing consultations on a permanent basis with the northern residents regarding the effect on their lifestyle and culture of resource development which will have an effect on the fragile northern environment?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there are several programs taking place, some involving Indian bands and some where consultants are involved, as well as others directly between the various resource industries themselves and the communities being affected.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, in view of the same report and a number of others recently which underline the fragile nature of the northern environment, does the minister intend to review the present offshore drilling tests which are now being set up in the Beaufort Sea?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, this particular matter is under continuing review. As a matter of fact, I was there myself in the last three or four weeks and had meetings with people of Inuvik and nearby communities. This is a subject of ongoing review with the people involved.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, the report was received only in the latter part of last week. I had the opportunity of being briefed on certain sections of it yesterday but I think it would be premature to make any declaration of intent at this time, other than to say it will receive serious consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFINEMENT OF VALENTYN MOROZ BY RUSSIANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DETERMINE HEALTH CONDITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I directed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning Valentyn Moroz. The minister replied that he had spoken to Mr. Gromyko who had assured him that as far as he was concerned, with the knowledge he had, Mr. Moroz was receiving fair treatment and was in the hospital. In the last three or four days, with indomitable spirit, Mr. Sakharov, a world famous physicist, who was in touch with representatives of the Toronto Star, spoke out when he was asked about the condition of Moroz saying he was in solitary confinement, was hemorrhaging to such an extent that his life will be immeasurably shortened, because of bleeding as a result of his being forced fed. In view of Mr. Sakharov's statement, and it takes courage to express the views he has, I should like to ask the minister what the government is going to do concerning this man?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the right hon. gentleman stated, Mr. Speaker, this matter concerning Mr. Moroz's health was raised by me with the Soviet foreign minister on September 25. I think it is worthwhile repeating the information that was conveyed by Mr. Gromyko, to the effect that Mr. Moroz's health was satisfactory in all respects. Tests had been taken, Mr. Gromyko stated, of his heartbeat, blood and so on, and all were normal. He added that Mr. Moroz was under permanent medical observation, that at present he had no complaint concerning his health. Mr. Gromyko also added that Mr. Moroz took exercise regularly.

Now, may I say to the right hon. gentleman that since that time I have noticed, as he has, reports to the effect that Mr. Moroz's health is deteriorating, and that has caused me considerable concern. I have asked that the matter be raised with the Soviet authorities and that an updating on the reports which had been given by Mr. Gromyko be sought. I intend to pursue that further.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Time is somewhat of the essence. Since September this man has apparently lost a great deal of weight; he is virtually physically impotent. The offhand way in which the minister answers this question, by saying that they are just going to ask for a further report, is too pusillanimous for a situation such as this. I ask him whether he will inquire if the Canadian embassy in Moscow has the right to see this man, because anything short of that is far removed from the kind of treatment that any person should receive for no offence other than that he had spoken his mind, as the constitution of the U.S.S.R. permits him to do, a right also assured to people in various states by membership of the U.S.S.R. in the United Nations. Surely the time has come to stop pussyfooting and speak out. Will the minister not give that assurance?

Mr. MacEachen: I can give the assurance that the Canadian government has taken this matter very seriously.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can see that.

Mr. MacEachen: The health of Mr. Moroz has been raised by the Prime Minister with Mr. Kosygin, by my predecessor with Mr. Gromyko, and by myself just recently. We intend to continue that effort on a humanitarian basis. The right hon. gentleman knows that there is a limit to the influence and effectiveness that one can have on the present situation. It may be that the course of action which the right hon. gentleman recommends, which may catch the headlines, may have a very unfortunate effect in reaching the objective that we both have in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If there is one thing that the minister and other members of this government abhor, it is the headlines. We have seen evidence of that in the last 24 hours. I ask the minister: why is no action taken, why does he not speak up? Why is he so silent? Why will the Prime Minister, with all his courage, not speak up with the authority he has?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated, I raised this very point with the highest possible authority in the Soviet Union, and I am sure it had more effect than this public enunciation with which the right hon. member is trying to catch the headlines.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An observation like that deserves a reply. Yesterday the Prime Minister showed what he thought concerning publicity, and it was completely out of keeping with the sacrifice of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONFINEMENT OF VALENTYN MOROZ BY RUSSIANS—RESPONSE TO APPEAL OF MRS. MOROZ

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that Mrs. Valentyn Moroz has directed a personal appeal to the Prime Minister on behalf of her husband, can the Prime Minister say whether he has replied to that appeal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know to what particular appeal the hon. member is referring; is this recent correspondence?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the Prime Minister not aware of the fact that Mrs. Moroz has made a public appeal to the Prime Minister, to the President of the United States, to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and to the Chancellor of West Germany, hoping for a response from each of these four world leaders?

Mr. Trudeau: No, I was not aware of this public appeal. I am generally informed of appeals which are addressed to me in particular. But obviously, as I said in my previous reply, I anticipated this and I had already made the representation.

AIRPORTS

ST. SCHOLASTIQUE—MEETING WITH MINISTER OF PARTIES EXPROPRIATED

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Last week, following a question which I asked him about the expropriated parties in St. Scholastique, the minister answered that there would be a meeting Friday last. Now, can the minister tell us what are its results and whether he has reached an agreement with the representatives of the expropriated parties? If not, will there be another meeting and when?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, at the meeting last Friday, I promised to ask the advice of our very competent lawyer in Montreal concerning the complaints of the expropriated parties and afterwards will be considering holding another meeting at a future date.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In view of the fact that before the election of July 8, the parties expropriated in St. Scholastique were promised that a conciliation and consultation committee would be established and that it was not done afterwards, does the minister think that such a committee should be formed immediately to examine the cases under dispute?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member is not well informed. The committee has been established; they had sittings for several weeks and they put forward a report. It is about the implementation of this report that people are now complaining.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE REIMBURSEMENT OF HOLDERS OF 1936 PERPETUAL SAVINGS BONDS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): My question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns his progress in devising a way to protect or reimburse the holders of the 1936 perpetual issue of Canadian savings bonds. As the minister knows, this issue, which was a $50 million issue when the dollar was a dollar in 1936, is now worth approximately one third of its market value and in terms of its purchasing power is only worth $9 of the 1936 dollar value. Could he report to the House and to the country whether he has yet devised a way to reimburse the original holders or somehow protect them in this respect?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): This is a very awkward problem. As the hon. gentleman knows, I have met with several members of the House from all parties. We are still caught with the conundrum of what to do with the registered as opposed to bearer bonds and how to be fair to those who have already cashed them in as opposed to those who have bonds the market price of which would be beneficially affected if we were to do something prior to the redemption.

Mr. MacKay: Would the minister consider either putting a definite term on these bonds or redeeming them from the original holders so that there could be no chance of any undue speculative profits, or would he consider substituting some other issue which would be more appropriate to today's capital market features than the one that is so obviously out of date and is such a blot on this country's financial record?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will certainly consider those as additional options.

POSSIBLE ALTERATION OF EQUALIZATION FORMULA—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last week the minister made a statement in Halifax to the effect that the equalization formula as to revenues between the provinces and the federal government would have to be altered. Has there been any consultation with the provinces as to this alteration and, if not, has any been contemplated or is this going to be something that will be imposed upon the provinces willy nilly and with the usual degree of consultation announced the night before?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble of the hon. gentleman. Obviously, there is some pressure on the equalization formula because of the remarkable increase in revenues from oil and gas to the producing provinces. But I have said to the provinces which are affected by equalization that we want to review this. We will be presenting some options to them in some form in time for them to be thoroughly discussed by the provincial ministers of finance and myself at our meetings on December 9 and 10.

HEALTH

NUTRITIONAL STUDY OF NATIVE PEOPLE—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO OVERCOME PROTEIN DEFICIENCY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and relates to the Nutrition Canada National Survey Report issued a year ago which showed in its preliminary findings a high incidence of nutritional deficiency among native people. Can the minister say when the special nutrition report for Indians and Eskimos promised for last spring, will be released?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member they will be released as soon as possible. I announced last spring that I expected the reports to be completed and available this fall. I understand there has been some problem with translation but it is my hope that the reports will be available before the end of the year or very early next year. I understand it is a matter of production. I would add that they have not been made available to me yet.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that a year has passed since the government has had in its possession information which shows significant protein and vitamin deficiencies among native people, can the minister tell the House if a special program has been implemented to come to grips with this general problem? Secondly, have specific nutritional measures been taken to deal with the emergency situation in the Grassy Narrows and White Dog reserves where protein deficiency was emphasized by both the special task force on mercury pollution and the Nutrition Canada report?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, as far as the first aspect of the question is concerned, I do not think there have been specific measures taken in regard to the Indian and Eskimo population in particular, but proposed regulations have been put forward and made public a few weeks ago aiming at the enrichment of food generally for Canadians. These would obviously cover Indians and Eskimos.

As far as the second part of the question is concerned, this matter was raised in the House last week and it has been discussed with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the provincial governments who have been carrying the main load in this respect.

RESEARCH

AGENCIES THROUGH WHICH INCREASED FUNDS GIVEN TO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON CONTRACTING OUT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. A week ago today in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North respecting National Research Council grants, the minister replied that one of the reasons for the decrease in NRC grants was the government policy to encourage research and development in industry. In view of the fact that funds for such programs as IRDIA and PAIT have been decreasing over the last years, could the minister indicate through what programs or agencies this enhanced support for industrial research and development is taking place?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I think I should like to correct the misapprehension that NRC grants have been cut in recent years. Indeed, that have been rising year by year but not at a rate which corresponds to other increases in expenditures. Similarly, in the case of the PAIT and IRDIA programs, they have also been increasing in levels of expenditure as distinct from the setting of targets or objectives. The actual expenditures as shown in the public accounts will indicate a continuing rise, I think. An element of this incentives program on which we are currently placing much heavier reliance, however, is the increasing research contracting done by government departments rather than doing the research themselves.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that in terms of real dollars, with the inflation removed, the support of industrial research and development through IRDIA and PAIT have been going down, and in view of the recently released Statistics Canada data that the contracting out program is not fulfilling expectations in that the percentage of research and development for contracting out to industry has not been rising, can the minister indicate what steps he has taken in his new portfolio to ensure that government policy will be implemented sometime in the reasonably near future and if not, is he going to retract the statement that this is government policy?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, at the moment I have no specific changes to suggest. We are still in the process of reviewing what is going slowly, and why.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REASON FOR REJECTION OF PROGRAM "KGB" BUT SHOWING OF PROGRAM "THE FIFTH ESTATE"

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I gave him admittedly rather casual notice of this question last week. In view of the fact that the mandate of the CBC is to give balanced programming, could the minister tell the House under what circumstances the CBC was offered the BBC production "KGB" and rejected it in view of the fact it was able to produce and show a program called "The Fifth Estate" which alleges certain things against the National Research Council as a CIA front?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will have to get information on that for the hon. member.

REASON FOR NOT SHOWING DOCUMENTARY "KHRUSHCHEV REMEMBERS"—POSSIBILITY OF INTERFERENCE WITH PROGRAMMING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question addressed to the Prime Minister. Was the Prime Minister or any one in his office directly approached by the Ambassador of the U.S.S.R. with a request that the CBC not show the documentary "Khrushchev Remembers" even though it had been advertised to be shown on a weekend? Did the Prime Minister or any one in his office intercede with the CBC to ensure that the documentary was not shown—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness, a supplementary either is or is not a supplementary. The hon. member started with a question to the hon. Secretary of State about a matter concerning a choice between programs of the BBC and another. Having got an answer from the hon. Secretary of State that he would be seeking information about that and report at a later date, it seems a little unfair to allow a supplementary to another minister on a totally unrelated question, although it involves the CBC. This is the only connection between the two.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I am one of those members who has been rather exhilarated by the fact that the question period has not been taken up with points of order and questions or privilege and you have been rather expeditious, with respect. The essence and the gist of the question is not the calibre of a program on one day or the other, but it is the potential influence and interference in CBC programming. This is the issue in my question. I think there is a very logical connection between the two, Your Honour. I completely accept, as obviously I have to, the answer of the Secretary of State but my supplementary is directed on an entirely different matter but still potentially is concerned with CBC interference.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. What I have been endeavouring to point out to the hon. member is what I have pointed out on earlier occasions, that when a minister is compelled in the circumstances to give the answer that the hon. Secretary of State has given, which is that he has to seek information on a question and will bring it back to the House at a later time, I presume in fairness, in order to allow the matter to be properly followed up the hon. member will want to pursue that subject with supplementary questions when the hon. Secretary of State does come back with the information. Under those circumstances, I think that, in fairness, the hon. member ought to hold his supplementaries until his first question is answered by the Secretary of State.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, with respect, a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: Listen to the Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be unduly provoked by any sounds from the front benches. If the sounds made sense then perhaps I could be provoked. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the thrust of the question has to do with a general topic, the detail of the question is not going to preclude a supplementary. Sometimes the supplementary is the real kicker! In this case, Mr. Speaker, the only reason that the question is raised is that the fifty-seventh anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union last week actually activates this situation with "Krushchev Remembers"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps under those circumstances it would have been a good idea for the hon. member to have started with that question in the first place as that was more important. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

THE BUDGET

SUGGESTED RELEASE OF TEXT OF SPEECH AT TIME OF DELIVERY IN HOUSE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Is his department giving any consideration to permitting the distribution of the text of the budget speech simultaneously with the beginning of its delivery in the House this year? If that is not contemplated could it be considered in order to assist hon. members on both sides of the House?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will take that under advisement.

DOCUMENTARY PROGRAM "KHRUSHCHEV REMEMBERS"—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS BY AMBASSADOR OF U.S.S.R.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has anyone on behalf of the Ambassador for the Soviet Union made any request to his office or any other government office that the program "Khrushchev Remembers" not be aired on the CBC?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received no such representation. I will inquire if any have been made to people in my office and I ask ministers now to let me know if any have been made to them in their capacity as ministers.

SPORTS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON WORLD FOOTBALL LEAGUE—ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIAN FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the CFL seems to be turning its back on the minister, who even acted as father protector of the league, by not following up on its expansion program and by suggesting its willingness to consider a merger with the WFL, is the minister prepared to reconsider the stand he took on Bill C-22 in the last parliament, in view of actions the WFL may once again take to play in Canadian cities or, indeed, to merge with the CFL.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject on which the House expressed itself last year. The House voted on it, although the bill was not passed finally. Before introducing the same bill, a similar bill or a different bill, I will have to discuss the matter with my colleagues and members of my party.

Mr. Jelinek: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Owing to the continuing deterioration in the quality of CFL teams and the resulting 6 per cent decline in attendance last season, partly as a result of WFL raiding, that league not being allowed to play in Toronto—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: —will the minister, as a concerned guardian of Canadian football, advise the House of the steps he intends to take to protect the CFL from further deterioration and prevent the possible phasing out of the Canadian Football League.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, obviously, such steps would be announced in due course.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DENIAL TO WOMEN OF THE RIGHT TO PILOT TRAINING IN ARMED FORCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be addressed to the Minister of National Defence. In his absence may I address it to the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East. As the government demonstrated its interest and concern in the status of women by a recent allocation exceeding $1 million, for promoting the status of women in Canada, and as, during World War II, women pilots ferried aircraft from Canada to England, will the minister explain why now, in a period of relative peace, at least in Canada, women are denied the right by the Department of National Defence to join the Canadian Armed Forces and take pilot training.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the girls are now going to be allowed to join the cadet corps. However, I will take his original question as notice.

Mr. Brisco: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With all due respect to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence, this member does not know about girls taking pilot training. I would ask the minister or the parliamentary secretary when this became policy?

Mr. Hopkins: With all due respect to the hon. member, I think he misunderstood my remarks. I meant that in the bill presently before parliament, girls are to be officially recognized in the cadet corps.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. When the Prime Minister put a question to me concerning the letter from Mrs. Valentyn Moroz to which I had referred, I said it was a letter addressed to four world leaders. On checking my notes, I see that it was addressed to only three world leaders, namely, to the President of the United States, the Chancellor of West Germany and the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I did not say that to put the Prime Minister a notch higher. However, if he did not receive the letter, I will send him the material I have.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COMBAT ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe) moved:

That this House, noting that international and interprovincial crime rings are operating out of control in the drug trade in British Columbia, the loan shark business in Ontario and in mafia-type conspiracies in Quebec, urges the government to act immediately—directly and through aid to the provinces—to protect the public and to bring these criminals to justice.

He said: Mr. Speaker, over the weekend, television viewers throughout the country saw on the national network the film "The Godfather" which broke all records of attendance and box office receipts for film producers.

That this telecast should have preceded by a few hours the debate we are holding today is a coincidence both happy and disquieting. Happy, because it draws the attention of the people to a truly current problem which has always threatened and still threatens the maintenance of law and order in a democratic society. Disquieting, because the idealized and romanticized screenplay and the performance of the protagonists in this violent and sophisticated game underlined what we already know: One gets used to everything, even the loathsome.

We get used to evil, we get used to the horrors of war and death, we get used to inflation, cataclysms, labour disputes, crime; there comes a time when, far from disturbing us, the remembrance of those calamities does not even stir up a defence reflex, a time when we even allow ourselves to be seduced. And so it is with organized crime. That is why, Mr. Speaker, it is urgent that we discuss it, and even more urgent that we act.

This is what I wanted to say and this is why I accepted to sponsor this debate, not that I want to blame the government, no but to wake them up, not that I want to pass judgment on them, no but to urge them to be more vigilant, to better co-ordinate their activities with those of the other levels of government and particularly to suggest that they establish a true national policy bent on fighting organized crime.

I would like this government to be more severe in handling what I would call antibiotics designed to reinforce the lymphatic system of our society which is becoming increasingly powerless to react.

Mr. Speaker, I say these things because, even though this might be a paradox, to pass judgment on organized crime, is tantamount to passing judgment on the kindliness of the good and honest elements of our society.

It is not the existence of a parallel power, a swarming and shifty power operating outside the law, which should surprise and concern us, it is rather the apparent ease with which it can operate and the calmness of our attitude towards these activities the importance of which we refuse to acknowledge. Let me use the following comparison to better describe the situation, Mr. Speaker: organized crime is like inflation.

Both are developing, running wild and playing havoc with everything because of the international context, with the support of unscrupulous go-betweens and swindlers, motivated only by profit, insensitive to the human sufferings they cause, and with the tacit complicity of politicians, who are afraid of taking any drastic action and control arguing that politics is always the art of the possible, but not more. Finally, both inflation and organized crime lead implacably to social disorder which imperil individual aspirations, rights and basic liberties of citizens by hitting the weakest first upsetting the economy of a country to such a point that, sooner or later, chaos results.

Even though this is not a problem which can be blamed upon any one government is particular, it may have political implications, if our leaders are not determined to put a stop to it.

Let us go back to the past a little.

Periodically, I would say sporadically, society has bursts of goodwill and rebels, but very soon falls back into a reprehensible apathy.

In America, at the end of the 19th century, the people were getting uneasy about the activities of organized crime and some action was taken. All of a sudden this enthousiasm cooled off with the murder of two police officers of New Orleans and New York. Then followed a ten-year period of inaction.

In the twenties, prosecutions by the United States Treasury Department put an end to the prohibition era and resulted in the conviction of a well-known Chicago figure, Al Capone. Then followed a ten-year period of inaction.

In the thirties, New York prosecutor Thomas Dewey took a series of proceedings to dismantle the well- established organization of the crime syndicate leader Lucky Luciano.

Then there was another ten-year period of inaction.

In the forties, the FBI inquired into underground organizations specializing in blackmail and criminal abetting in the movie industry, and managed to break up organized crime. The sensational arrests made at the time are still in our memories. Then, Mr. Speaker, there was another ten-year period of inaction.

After the war, the people did not show any particular interest in the proliferation of underworld activities until 1950, with the inquiry of the Senate Kefauver Committee, and 1957, when the McClennan inquiry was launched after the Appalachian meeting. We then had to wait until July 23, 1965, when the Katzenbach Committee was set up to report objectively and fully to President Johnson.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me a personal remark, I was minister of justice in Quebec, and at a meeting in Washington with Attorney General Katzenbach and FBI authorities, we exchanged data and information in order to intensify our fight in Quebec against the most varied criminal activities, especially, it will be remembered, in the field of fraudulent bankruptcies and criminal arson, a very popular activity at the time, when our prosecutions turned out to be so timely that several witnesses were silenced, liquidated and buried in quicklime. Ten years later, organized crime is still a topic of discussion in this House.

Meanwhile, we have to admit that commendable efforts have been made. The administration of justice in Quebec was drastically changed as a result of the shrewd and realistic work and recommendations of the Prévost inquiry. That fact is worth mentioning in this House.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Justice Réal Brunet and his fellow commissioners of the Quebec Police Commission, on their courage in conducting the present investigation and their remarkable patience in dealing with the many obstacles that stand in their way. I also wish to mention Mr. Justice Cliche and his colleagues and the inquiry that is going on concerning violence in the construction industry, investigation whose conclusions, at the rhythm that disclosures are being made, will probably tie in with those of the inquiry commission on organized crime.

Mr. Speaker, today we realize that the scourge of organized crime is not a film, but reality, that it is not an invention of a Crown prosecutor or police looking for promotions or publicity, but a real cancer which is daily gnawing at society.

What is this disease and what are its manifestations here and elsewhere? Mr. Speaker, if we in Quebec are different from our neighbours culturally, constitutionally and linguistically, I can assure you that in the criminal activity sector we are not only different from others but we even managed to excel where others have failed and many is the time we have surpassed them. Allow me to recall what the present Quebec minister of justice said in his white paper on police and the security of citizens and I quote:

It can be positively and unquestionably stated that there is more crime committed today in Quebec than there was 10 or 20 years ago. In fact, Quebec can be numbered among the most criminogenic areas in Canada. As it now stands, Quebec is second among the provinces of Canada for the rate of crime-indexes, just behind British Columbia.

However, Mr. Speaker, I must add, that the Quebec Minister of Justice then added the following sentence, and I quote:

However, when compared with the United States, Quebec is a relatively quiet place.

● (1520)

That was indeed, Mr. Speaker, a real comfort.

I do not know a better definition of organized crime than the one contained in the Katzenback commission report entitled: Task Force Report: Organized Crime. I quote:

Organized crime is a society that is endeavouring to operate outside the control of citizens and their government. Its action is not improvised but is the result of very complex conspiracies hatched up during a number of years and intended to insure control over a complete field of activities in order to pile up as much profit as possible. Organized crime uses most of its energy to supply unlawful goods and services: games, usurious loans, narcotics and other forms of vice. It is also deeply rooted in lawful businesses and labour unions.

Therefore, applying this definition to the spheres of activities known in Quebec, we can add that organized crime has appeared at home as elsewhere and is still appearing: first, in the area of gambling in all its shapes and forms, second, loan sharking, third, drug trafficking, fourth, prostitution, fifth, criminal infiltration of the business community and, sixth, frauds, fraudulent bankruptcies and arson.

Since we must render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, let me emphasize to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec Minister of Justice has claimed that, as regards fraudulent bankruptcies and arson, thanks to the great many proceedings instituted in the past and the improved means of control now in operation, this type of criminal activity is abating because of the incarceration of a number of the mobsters involved in 1964, 1965 and 1966. When we realize the extent of the ravages caused by organized crime in our country, we must consider deep-rooted solutions. It is not enough to sound the alarm and, in a state of panic, go to other extreme, namely, make use of illegal methods to combat crime and suspend the fundamental liberties of citizens. In my opinion, the end never justifies the means. Therefore, we have to investigate to find out the causes of the crime spread in our country instead of merely considering the effects, however dramatic they may be. Such a finding, Mr. Speaker, logically leads us to examine the government behaviour towards the essential needs of the citizens and the environment where they must live. The services which are the trading goods of organized crime would not remain the exclusive field of the underworld, if the government could meet the justified expectations of the community.

When we consider, for example, that the loan shark business in Montreal alone brings in $300 million a year and enslaves about 60 per cent of taxi drivers, should we not in all fairness, ask ourselves the following question: If funds were legally available and terms were less burdensome, would the main activity of the underworld not be seriously affected?

The most decisive action against crime, especially organized crime, which is a consequence of its extension and its increase should really be taken at social and national levels.

It would entail, for example, tearing down slums and replacing them with livable dwellings. It is, for instance, to facilitate the access to instruction and education for more and more citizens. It is to create jobs or foster their creation, instead of promoting idleness at the state's expense. It is to shrewdly suppress economic and social inequalities. it is to fight against discrimination in all its guises. It is to dare take the mask off those who are ripping off the people when it comes to rising food prices.

For a government, it is to fully assume its responsibility as regards employment in the building industry instead of resorting to a Machiavellian bargaining to buy peace.

It is making sure, Mr. speaker, that justice is for all, giving everyone the opportunity to develop more freely in a society in which democracy will not be an empty word. it is illusory to think that we can get rid of organized crime, that we can only claim to diminish its influence, if we cannot previously change the context from which that crime derives all its vigour and its impulse.

To speak of control over crime in terms of police, social workers, courts, exemplary sentences, imprisonment, and even death penalty, is to refuse to recognize the extent of the resignation, and I would even say the failure of society in that field.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, often, when speaking about organized crime, politicians begin to sound like doctors treating someone with a terminal illness. We begin to speak of our success or failure in treating the symptoms, in making society more comfortable, without coming face to face with the cause and substance of the illness itself.

Let me be frank. One need be neither a magistrate nor a sociologist to know quite clearly that certain socio-economic conditions, certain environments, produce the types of individuals upon whom organized crime thrives, individuals who are prone to become the drones and slaves of the large syndicates, carrying out the extortion, smuggling, intimidation and murder that keep their superiors secure through the use of fear and brute force. We know it is initially among the disadvantaged, the economically deprived and the misguided that organized crime gets its foothold and builds its foundation.

It is in my view, a sad commentary on our society and our concern for order and justice that we consistently seek to pursue organized crime, only through inquiries which seek, often in vain, to establish criminal behaviour and develop a case for the Crown against a person or persons. Surely it is time we moved one step further in order to come a little closer to the causes of organized crime itself and to identify the social problems which spawn generation after generation of organized criminal activity.

While the Crown obviously has a continuing responsibility to ensure that organized criminal activity is placed under relentless pressure from law enforcement agencies at all levels, surely we who legislate and shape the very laws that the Crown must enforce have a continuing responsibility to seek ways and means to reduce the conditions which spawn the criminality against which our laws are supposed to stand. For example, our urban areas are prone to the influence of organized crime because, whether we like it or not, organized crime fills a void created by social neglect, corrupt administration in some cases, and a frequent lack or failure in moral leadership. In many respects, our penal institutions become the junior colleges for organized crime, training those who are first offenders to embrace more extensive and developed commitments to criminal activity.

If crime as it is perpetrated in organized or disorganized fashion is the disease, if society in its frailty and vulnerability is the patient, then government must assume the role not only of the physician administering to the symptoms but of a general practitioner prepared to practice preventive medicine. There are those, I know, who will say that even if all poverty is erased, if you bring prosperity to all, if you grant equality of opportunity to all, there will still be a criminal element eager to make a fast buck through illegal means. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point. The point is that if there is less poverty, if there is less disparity within a community between those who have and those who have not, if there is more equity, if there is more social justice, there will be less crime.

Often, in discharging those duties that related to my years on the bench, I was impressed by one of the most basic frustrations plaguing our legal system and its ability to serve both as a source of justice and a deterrent to crime. I became aware, not without some very personal anguish, that principles of justice, concepts of right and wrong, can rarely be explained to someone who has only experienced injustice and who has never known the value of choosing right over wrong. We have to face up to the fact that for too many Canadians our system is an economic prison wherein daily indignities and injustices of a social and personal nature are the only tangible messengers of our way of life.

For many, this prison is made more dreadful by a tide of rising expectations which they can, in reality, have no hope of ever attaining. Rebuffed in their search for work, humiliated at the supermarket, restrained in their efforts for growth and self-realization, the poor and disadvantaged could very well think that our system is in itself an organized conspiracy which, as far as they are concerned, perpetrated criminal actions upon them. As a judge, I saw these people in my courtroom daily and I knew that criminal activity may have been their only outlet, their only way of saving some self-respect. Yet I knew, too, that prosecution must continue to be the front line response to all criminal activity. It is, after all, a basic line of defence for social order and balance. But that does not stop me or hundreds of others from asking whether, indeed, we have placed all our commitment in this area of balance and order purely on the enforcement side, and whether the time has not come for an equal and concurrent commitment on the side of social justice and preventive law.

Mr. Speaker, the basic principle of physics, that every reaction originated from an original action of equal intensity and strength, might have some application here, at least to help us understand the human side. We respond to the criminal with imprisonment and penalty. Do we ever ask ourselves what it is the criminal is responding to in committing the crime? Have we really been prepared to ask this question institutionally, in our governments and courts? I submit that in real terms we have not. Frankly, criminals and prison reform have never been the stuff of partisan political gain except when everyone is only too pleased to call for tougher laws or tighter prisons.

The opportunity we have today to deal with the effects of organized crime should not be allowed to exclude a more in-depth analysis of the deeper causes, both social and political, of organized crime. In my view there is a need for renewed federal-provincial interest in organized crime as something beyond the operative level of police co-operation and information-sharing. There is now a clear and present need for a program of political activity aimed at a joint attack on the conditions that cause organized crime. The inquiries into labour racketeering now being carried on in Quebec are only a beginning.

We must be prepared to look at the structure of municipal, provincial and federal government to seek out those areas wherein organized crime can gain or purchase influence. We must look at the awarding of contracts, the financial support offered politicians, all the areas that politicians prefer not to discuss. Organized crime grows when there are conditions that encourage its growth. We must examine these conditions. We must do so carefully. We must do so methodically.

Mr. Speaker, it is fashionable to make fun of royal commissions and their often meandering and lack-lustre use of time and resources in the pursuit of recommendations that are often vague and inconclusive. In the matter of organized crime, I wonder whether, rather than the creation of some new inquiry that can only really examine the superficial actions committed at the lowest echelons of syndicated criminal activity, this parliament might not consider a royal commission into the causes of organized crime, a commission that would concentrate on the social and economic conditions that breed organized crime and provide the atmosphere and sense of despair upon which organized crime depends.

The commission should, most properly, have both federal and provincial participation and seek to examine the conditions of social and economic environment that breed criminal activity; the relationship between organized crime and government at all levels; the improvement of specific areas of social and welfare legislation that would contribute to a lessening of the crime rate; the susceptibility of national, provincial and municipal police forces to infiltration by organized crime; organized crime and political influence; the role of our penal institutions in encouraging and abetting organized crime; the relationship between organized crime and labour, industry, immigration and government.

We need a royal commission because we need an ongoing commitment to a thorough examination of organized crime in its national and international context, with a view not simply to prosecution before the courts but to political action in the parliament and legislatures of Canada. We need more than a commitment to rise every few months and denounce organized crime as evil and hateful. We need a commitment to do what can, and must, be done politically to restrict the horizons of organized crime and protect our society against its growth and power.

We can begin to discharge that commitment by being first committed to finding out about the fears and vacuums in our social and economic fabric that give the bacteria of organized crime a place to grow. It is that type of commitment, to find out, that this parliament would now do well to consider.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion now under debate in the House. I think the motion is timely. The problem is one about which the great mass of the Canadian people is becoming increasingly concerned, and with great justification. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) for what I think is a very reasoned and progressive approach to this problem. The kind of speech we have just heard is one that all of us would do well to read again; it contains an element of philosophy with which I would say many in our party would agree. Certainly, the recommendation he makes of a royal commission to study this very serious situation is one with which we agree. This is an insidious problem which continues to grow, and I think by attracting a great deal of public attention to it, and scrutiny through a royal commission studying this serious matter, we might do much to attack the problem of organized crime in this country.

I should like, as a member from British Columbia, to deal with the important crime aspect of this problem. One of the unenviable characteristics of the lower mainland of British Columbia is that it now leads the country in crime statistics. There are many benefits of living in British Columbia, but this is not one of them. We have to examine carefully the reason for this situation. One does not have to look far to find it. Seventy per cent of organized crime in British Columbia is related directly to the drug trade in the province. It has now reached the point in British Columbia where it is of epidemic proportions, and it will become an epidemic in the country unless we have from this government a massive and positive approach to the problem.

[Mr. Wagner.]

We cannot say that this is a serious problem without considering some of the statistics involved. Recently, a co-ordinated law enforcement unit was set up in British Columbia. It was a unit specially organized to detect and prosecute organized crime, zeroing in on the drug trade. The government of British Columbia deserves some credit for setting up this unit, which recently issued a report outlining some very interesting statistics. I should like to quote from its report as follows:

> It has been conservatively estimated that there are 10,000 heroin addicts (in B.C.), or two-thirds of the national estimated figure of 15,000.

I might say that the report went on to say that the unit believed its figures were conservative. The report continued:

> The city of Vancouver alone is believed to have in excess of 6,500 addicts who require approximately $455,000 each day to support their habits.

To emphasize that point, I would repeat that it requires half a million dollars a day to support this insidious trade in drugs. The report then states:

> This estimate is based on the average daily use of two capsules of heroin per addict at $35 per capsule.

Later in the report it is stated:

> Coupled with this increase in heroin addiction is a rise in the incidence of violent crimes, which more than doubled in the period from 1962 to 1971 and again increased in 1972.
> In Vancouver, it is estimated that up to 70 per cent of all serious crimes are drug-related.
> In the years 1969 to 1973, 30 of the murders in the lower mainland are known to have been drug-related, and in the years 1971 to 1973 seven attempted murders were similarly categorized.

The annual cost of the drug trade in British Columbia is estimated by this unit to be $255.5 million. It comes after tourism as the second largest industry in British Columbia. The matter is out of control, and the government should again look at it in terms of its approach and the amount of attention it gives to this problem. There are incidents in our province of 12-year old school children being addicted to heroin, and the problem is reaching the elementary school level. Another fact of interest is that the Vancouver coroner reported recently that there were 1,000 drug-related deaths in British Columbia in the past three years. Under the present system, as many as 50 per cent of our prisoners in maximum security institutions are there because of drug-related crimes. I do not think those who say that the answer to this problem is to increase the penalty in respect of drug trafficking and drug addiction have read the Narcotic Control Act or considered the penalties presently provided. First of all, the maximum penalty for trafficking in heroin is life imprisonment, and the penalty for simple possession of heroin is a maximum of seven years. Unless we are going to bring back capital punishment in respect of trafficking, the penalties are there.

The fact is that the penalty has nothing to do with reducing this particularly iniquitous trade in narcotics. It is not the penalty that is important; it is the certainty of apprehension upon which we must concentrate. You can fool around with the penalties all you want, but you are not going to change the statistics. It is interesting to note that in British Columbia, when marijuana first came to the province, the court of appeal said that obviously it was a problem that was growing and it had to be controlled. In the well known case of Regina v. Adelman, the court of appeal of the province said that one of the ways to control the use of marijuana was to impose six months mandatory imprisonment upon any person convicted of possession. Following that decision, all the magistrates in the province used that judgment as a guideline and imposed at least six months imprisonment for first offence convictions for possession. Since that time the use of marijuana has quadrupled or quintupled; certainly it has reached the point where its use is greater than ever before.

I am pleased to see the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) in the House, as I know of her intense interest in the subject of drugs. She has spent a great deal of time studying the problem and I hope she will participate in this debate. Let me say something to her, through you, Mr. Speaker, regarding penalties imposed for the possession of drugs. If I am wrong, I hope she will correct me. The hon. lady had some concern that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) was about to remove the section from the Criminal Code which provided seven years imprisonment for importing marijuana or any other drug. Let me point out to the hon. member that if she had had a child who came across the border with a "joint" in his pocket, at that time the mandatory penalty, upon conviction, was seven years in jail. One of the few progressive steps we were able to get from the Minister of Justice was removal of that particular section. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was instrumental, as I recall it, in this House in pointing out the iniquitous feature of that section which should not have been in the act.

The penalties imposed are clearly not the answer; this fact has been demonstrated over and over again. The problem is out of control and the penalties we have been imposing have done nothing about it. What we do not understand, in respect of the drug trade, is the nature of the typical drug pusher. I have had the opportunity of defending pushers from time to time. The individuals who sit behind desks in New York and in Asia exporting these materials have not been convicted so far. We have not got to them, and until we adopt a whole new approach we will never get to them. The people we are getting to are the addicts. If addicts are to maintain their habit, they must sell the drug or turn someone else on. That is the insidious part of this drug problem: the guy you have addicted to the drug has to get his neighbour hooked on it in order to make a profit and maintain his own habit.

We must start treating this as a medical rather than a criminal problem. It is long past the time this government took another look at the Le Dain commission report on which we spent some $4 million. The only response we have been able to get so far from the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) is that they will move the use of marijuana from the Narcotics Control Act to the Food and Drugs Act. That is a big deal; but what will it do about this problem? What will it do to reduce the amount of crime that has developed from the use of marijuana?

I think we must ask ourselves whether this government will take a meaningful approach toward stopping or controlling drug addiction and drug trafficking. What they have done—and I give them some credit for this—is to improve their prosecution procedures. They have set up a fairly large group of prosecutors, in the Vancouver area in particular, and increased the number of convictions. Statistics show that this is a direct result of the increased enforcement by the Minister of Justice, and I congratulate the government for that gesture. However, we need to spend more money in the investigatory area. This problem will not be solved until we get down to doing the hard work of detecting, walking the streets, increasing the number of undercover people and tripling or quadrupling the amount of money that the federal government is now spending. I do not have the figures in front of me, but I hope the Solicitor General will tell us the amount of money he is spending on this problem. However, so far as I know, the new, co-ordinated law enforcement unit in British Columbia is provincially funded.

We have a national emergency in terms of heroin addiction and drug trafficking, and the problem must be treated on a national basis. We cannot continue saying; "It is your problem out there on the coast." If we do not solve the problem in British Columbia, it will crop up in Saskatoon and all across the country in our small communities.

Mr. Nielsen: We have it now.

Mr. Leggatt: You have it, but not to the same extent, because British Columbia is one of the most heavily urbanized sections of the country. In every community where you have a great discrepancy between wealth and poverty, the rate of crime is high and certainly the rate of drug addiction is high. I should like to get back to the point I was making. We must beef-up the whole investigatory branch and we must establish closer liaison between the federal government and the co-ordinated law enforcement unit in order to control this problem. This is not a provincial responsibility but a national responsibility and it is time we realized it.

We have to think about where we go in terms of the Le Dain commission report. As I have said before, the federal government has spent some $4 million gathering a great deal of evidence on the whole question of drug addiction. Let me summarize very briefly what the report said. It said that we must de-criminalize heroin addiction which, as the report states, is a medical and not a criminal problem. It is no good saying that it is wrong to use heroin and "We will lock you up if we find you using it". That is exactly what we have been doing up to now. Not only has that failed to solve the problem, but it has made our area one of the drug centres of North America.

We can no longer use that approach. We must use alternate approaches. One of the approaches recommended by the Le Dain commission offers one of the greatest hopes of solving the problem, because when you take the market away from the organized drug trade, you start to move in on the problem. In all these consensual crimes—and this is a consensual crime because no one forces the needle into your arm—all that the organized drug people are doing is satisfying the existing market; but because it is a criminal activity the market continues to grow, profits grow and the whole thing spirals out of control. The Le Dain commission report, according to a newspaper article, said:

The commissioners would empower police officers to bring any person who they have reasonable grounds to believe is an addict before a magistrate who would then decide whether the person should undergo a medical examination.

If the person was found to be drug-dependent by the examining physician, confirmed by another physician, he could then be committed to a residential treatment facility by them for up to three months.

The commissioners were quick to point out that "the goal would be to replace the initial compulsion as soon as possible by voluntary acceptance of and response to treatment".

That system has been used before. It was used in Japan. Ten years ago, Japan had 40,000 addicts; today they have 100. I know it is a different social climate and there are reasons for distinguishing the Japanese experience from our own, but I am urging the minister to let us try something. Even if it is a pilot project, let us try it and find out whether there is any merit in compulsory treatment. If we were to set up such a treatment centre on the lower mainland, I am sure the million people in the area would be delighted that some action was taking place and a new approach was being used. As I said, in Japan they have almost eliminated drug addiction with compulsory treatment. What they did is interesting. They finally cut off the trafficking routes to Japan, and they did it the hard way—by spending a lot of money, using a tremendous number of agents, and attacking the problem with the seriousness it deserves. That is what I suggest this government has failed to do. They have used the time-worn methods of controlling a disease which is growing and spiralling. We must take a new approach to the drug addiction problem. Incidentally, in the Japanese experiment there was rejection of the methadone treatment. I urge that we be very careful in the use of the methadone treatment because it has some very bad side-effects. I hope it will be rejected in any system that we adopt in this country. We also have the British experience. Britain, with a population of some 50 million people, has around 3,000 addicts. Canada, with a population of 20 million, in round figures, has around 15,000 addicts, conservatively. The British system tries to de-criminalize heroin trafficking. We must take the same route.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe dealt in some detail with the question of organized crime. Organized crime continues to feed in the consensual area. The Americans call it consensual crime. Where there is a market, organized crime will thrive. In a city where there are great discrepancies between rich and poor, organized crime has a heyday. One of the answers to this problem is to go some distance in removing these discrepancies within our cities. It is interesting that in a socially cohesive unit such as a small community, the crime rate is much lower. Social forces have tremendous influence on the whole community in reducing crime. But now we have various segments in our major urban centres which are at war with each other. There was the day when the police would grab a juvenile, take him to the old man and say, "If you don't do something to the kid, we will"—and it worked. Unfortunately, we are now so highly organized and overpopulated that this work is now being done by social workers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired, unless there is unanimous agreement to allow him to continue. Is that agreed?

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt: I would like to thank hon. members for their indulgence. I will be brief. Unless we attack the sources of crime and the social conditions which breed it, unless we attack the market for organized crime—that is, the condition which allows it to grow in such an insidious way—and unless we finally make up our minds to de-criminalize heroin addiction, and I do not mean get rid of trafficking because trafficking must remain a crime with the heavy penalties that it now has, the problem will get worse. But we are going down the road to destruction, in terms of the social cohesiveness of this country, if we do not finally attack this serious problem on a massive, national scale—and I mean with money, not gestures, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like, on starting my remarks, to congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) for having moved the motion before the House today. I congratulate and thank him for giving us the opportunity of discussing this matter, of seeing things as they are, of putting them before the government and making the required suggestions to bring the government to adopt the means and take the steps required to fight against crime in all its forms in Canada.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, crime does not exist solely in Canada. Other countries face similar problems, but we must fight against crime here, at home, against crime in all its forms. I trust that in his motion, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe did not intend to situate the drug problem only in British Columbia, the loan shark business only in Ontario, and the mafia-type operations only in Quebec.

To my mind, those problems exist in all parts of Canada; the eastern provinces and the Maritimes are not exempt from them though crime may assume there less sophisticated forms than in the larger provinces such as Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, drugs are a very important problem because they attack the whole population, though especially our young people. We must deal with drug traffic profiteers; they above all others, Mr. Speaker, must be sought out. Not only do they pounce down on our high school students; they also have the gall to attack our students in primary school.

Mr. Speaker, in 1971 the government introduced a program to fight usage of drugs. This involved a four-point research program; collection, analysis, processing and publicizing of data. At the time, I blamed the government for doing nothing against the international and Canadian underworlds that make enormous profits by selling drugs to 12-, 13- or 14-year old secondary school students.

Mr. Speaker, the information program introduced in 1971 can have no other results than a somewhat better knowledge of the problem. But what has been done in the fight against it? Some people are arrested, drugs are seized. A few days ago, in my area, an operation was launched to try and discover drug peddlers. It resulted in one arrest only. Somebody was found to have one ounce of drug in the trunk of his car. He was arrested, so much the better, but I definitely feel, Mr. Speaker, that the person was planted there to get arrested in order to divert attention from the true drug traffickers, who went off unscathed.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the fight against the usage of drugs is not waged seriously. It seems increasingly easy to go through customs with drugs that are later peddled in a variety of forms among our youngsters. This has been noticed in the past. Research is done on the matter, and we are told that international agreements exist for the tracking and capture of drug traffickers. This has been up to now definitely unproductive, because the drug keeps on flowing into the country. It is still distributed everywhere. British Columbia is mentioned in the motion. It is certainly through that province that the entry of drugs is the easiest.

Mr. Speaker, it is urgent to cope with that problem before our people, more especially our youngsters are contaminated by drugs. A press release which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) published on March 30, 1973, read partly as follows:

—extensive statistics on the numbers of persons known to have used or been involved in some way with mood-modifying drugs including heroin and other narcotics, cannabis and hallucinogens during 1972. "I received these statistics on March 29, 1973", the minister explained, "and after evaluating them considered they should be released promptly to the public".

A total of 8958 illicit narcotic users were made known to the department in 1972. Of this number, 7719 are definitely known to have used heroin; most of the rest probably did also.

Mr. Speaker, we can learn who are the illicit narcotic users, but we must above all be in a position to identify those who provide them with those narcotics and I think that by cutting off supply sources, we would more effectively control their use.

Needless to recall here the way drug peddlers, profiteers and pushers act. They have all sorts of clever tricks to force drugs into the habits of young people, and once these have taken to addiction, they feel compelled to buy drugs, and are thus almost ineluctably led to become criminals.

Mr. Speaker, in respect of drugs as well as crime in general, several discoveries have been made especially in the past two years. I should like to emphasize the fact that we fight or want to fight crime as such, but pay little or insufficient attention to criminals, whether they are thieves, arsonists, drug pushers or underground leaders. In trying to fight crime, we forget criminals. In the past two years, according to an enquiry of the Office for the Prevention and Treatment of Alcoholism and other Toxicomanias, drug consumption has increased noticeably among young people. It was also found out that in 1971, 30.4 per cent of students who answered the questions of a public survey, declared they had already used drugs, as compared with 11.7 per cent in 1969. Such a considerable increase, Mr. Speaker, should alarm everyone, educators and governments. I quote:

This is one of the outstanding facts in an enquiry on student drug consumption at high school and college levels in the island of Montreal in 1969 and 1971. That enquiry was carried out by Mr. Léandre Bilodeau, a sociologist, under the direction of Mr. Aimé L. Raic, research director at the Office for the Prevention and Treatment of Alcoholism and other Toxicomanias. It was released by Doctor André Boudreau, the director of OPTAT.

The comparison between the 1969 results and those of 1971 reveals:

That the barbiturates consumption was tripled and the consumption of hallucinogens other than LSD almost tripled;

That the consumption of marijuana and LSD was more than doubled;

That the consumption of stimulants and tranquilizers had increased by one third;

And that the consumption of alcoholic drinks and tobacco had increased by approximately one tenth;

That the proportion of glue sniffers is the same in 1971 as it was in 1969.

In 1969, the highest proportion of consumers for each type of drugs was recruted among the twenty-year-and-over age group, while in 1971, it is recruited in the seventeen-year-and-over age group.

Mr. Speaker, this inquiry has confirmed what I was saying a moment ago, namely that efforts are being made to reach our young as soon as possible, even when they are still children, and adict them to drugs. This situation is alarming enough, Mr. Speaker, for the governments to take immediate steps to combat this type of crime.

Mr. Speaker, in the second part of his motion, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe mentions loan sharking. Mr. Speaker, I have here the perfect example of loan sharking, and I intend to have it read into the official report of the House of Commons. When we talk about loan sharking, we do not refer only to the criminal activity of racketeers in the slums of Montreal, Vancouver or elsewhere. There are some people who are legitimately in business and who may be considered by some as the saviours of our people, I mean, the finance companies.

Mr. Speaker, finance companies that operate under the acts, and sometimes even outside them, are in the same class as any member of organized crime operating in the usurious loans field.

I have here the copy of a contract registered on October 7, 1971 and passed between a finance company and one of my constituents. This man needed the sum of $8,200. He went to this loan company. I do not think there is any need to name it because they are all alike and they all act in the same way. He obtained the amount of $8,200 very easily, because he could provide good collaterals. He was required to take out life and health insurance policies. The agent explained that if he paid health and life insurance premiums for 10 years, as this was to be the loan repayment period, it would cost him a great deal of money. He was told that a three-year insurance policy would be less expensive than a 10-year policy. He therefore accepted the price reduction he was offered, but the finance company agent also made him sign a loan contract for a period of three years rather than ten. The contract specified that there would be 35 equal payments and that the 36th should make up the full reimbursement, or else the rest of the debt would have to be refinanced.

After 35 months, the man realized that he had paid $5,053.65 in three years. He had also paid $299.98 for notary fees when signing the contract. He had paid $369 in life and health insurance premiums, and he realized that, while he had paid all this money, the capital of his debt had been reduced by only $1,100. The company was offering to renew his contract for the balance of his debt, or nearly the entire amount, which meant that he had once again to pay notary fees and insurance premiums. He realized that he was not better off after three years than at the time he took out his loan and that he would probably have to repay this debt all his life, and in addition, that, on his death, his succession would have to continue paying the finance company.

Mr. Speaker, usurious loans are those we must fight against with laws, but with laws that are enforced, of course, and not put on the shelves and forgotten. We must enforce them. Whatever the names of the chairmen of those finance companies might be, they must be put in prison like others when they violate the legislation made by governments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a type of usurious loan from which especially the poor must suffer. This is an important point we must also consider.

I come now to organized crime, to crime in general. We know that in the last few years the Canadian government, along with governments in the United States and in other countries, has felt pity for criminals to the extent that they have abolished the death penalty. They have made release on parole or on bail easier. They have even made it easier for prisoners to escape. It is now easier to get out of prison than to get in.

● (1620)

Now, Mr. Speaker, given those facts, we notice a sharp increase in the rate of crimes of all kinds in Canada as well as in the United States or elsewhere. Unfortunately, I was unable to find recent statistics on the crime upsurge in Canada, but I have here an article by Elmer Von Feldt and published in the November 1974 issue of Columbia magazine, and I quote:

> The real evil of the American society, that keeps pace with the inflation calamity is violent crime. It has shot up by 47 per cent during these last five years.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one can easily conclude that the situation is about the same in Canada. It is true that we have a serious problem on account of inflation but the crime problem in Canada is no less serious. The situation south of our border is about the same as the one we have here.

Further Mr. Feldt provides statistics on the kinds of violent crimes committed in the United States:

> Such statistics that make one ponder still give more weight to the recent warning sounded by Attorney General William B. Saxbe that this nation should begin to keep a closer watch on the criminal. He gave striking advice to the chiefs of police of 27 great cities attending a meeting in Chicago last August.

And the Attorney General of the United States insists on the following:

> "The tendency on the part of certain people always to blame the crime but never the criminal should be revised once more . . .
> "There was a time when most people looked upon the criminal as an abject person. Today, the criminal is more and more considered as a hero—not only in arts but on street corners also.
> "Those who kill, who rape and who rob are often considered as political victims.
> "Certain crimes—perhaps many crimes—will not be cured merely through the elimination of conditions that many people finally accepted as the deep causes of illegal behaviour.
> [Mr. Laprise.]
> "Many criminals transgress the law because they do want to. When dealing with them, the first thing to do is to increase our chances against them. We must make criminal conduct much more risky. We must ensure that chances are with society; that, when somebody commits a crime, he will be caught; once caught, he will have to face a fast and unfallible justice; when condemned, he will go to prison."

I, for one, would like to add: he will have to stay in prison.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order. I must interrupt the hon. member because the time allocated to him has expired. Unless he obtains the unanimous consent of the House, he may not be allowed to go on with his remarks.

Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laprise: I thank the House for allowing me to conclude my observations. I would have many other things to say on this subject, but others will have the opportunity to express their views. I would like to end with the motion moved by the mover, this afternoon, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe, asking that a royal commission be instituted to find out the causes of organized crime.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the member for Saint-Hyacinthe is serious about it. I hope he is. I know he has wide experience in this field since he has been a lawyer, a judge, a minister, and a judge again. I think he is one of those who best know the problems of organized crime, not only from the criminal's, but also from the victim's point of view.

For years, we have had royal commissions in Quebec, and in Canada too, not particularly on organized crime, but on other problems. Two kinds of inquiries are now being conducted in Quebec, one on crime in general and the other on the problems of building trades which, strangely enough, have some similitude with organized crime.

Several years ago, an inquiry was conducted by Mayor Drapeau of Montreal in cooperation with Mr. Pacifique Plante. What was the net result? Not very much! Another inquiry was launched a couple of years ago, I believe. What further result did it produce? Nothing much! We now have yet another inquiry. We find that crime exists, it is obvious, but what is being done against the criminal?

We have often seen hardened criminals apprehended after committing a loathsome crime. Police officers have risked their life to apprehend these criminals, the latter are put in prison and a few days later, they are back on the streets, as free men, making faces at the police officers that had arrested them.

One wonders if it is worthwhile risking the life of police officers to arrest loathsome individuals when it is known that a few days later they will be as free as wind and will continue committing more crimes. It is well known that some individuals are now free after buying their evasion way out and they are endangering everyone's life.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier and as others have pointed out, I think that we should pay more attention to criminals than to crimes.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to assure the House that, with the opposition, the government is most concerned about the growth of crime and criminal conspiracies in Canada. We would agree with the motion, that there are particular problems with respect to the drug trade in British Columbia, loan sharking in Ontario and mafia-type conspiracies in Quebec. The government has increased, and continues to increase, its activities to combat crime through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and by other means to protect the public and to bring these criminals to justice. I will speak first about the increasingly serious problem of abuse and trafficking in illicit drugs which, as hon. members have pointed out, continues to escalate in most communities in Canada. It is clear to all of us that the trafficking in and use of heroin, cocaine and the abuse of chemicals such as methamphetamine—Speed—MDA, LSD and other related drugs is a problem of increasing dimensions and a major cause for concern.

The use of heroin by the younger generation is on the rise. As recently as 1968 there were only 12 known habitual users of heroin in Canada under the age of 20. In 1973, this total had increased to 709. It is estimated today there are between 16,000 and 19,000 heroin addicts in Canada. It is also significant to note that Europe used to be the major source of supply for heroin entering Canada. During the past year, however, all indications are that most of the heroin entering Canada originated in Southeast Asia. The European supply was cut back due to rigorous enforcement in France and lack of heroin cultivation in Turkey. As many members know, the Turkish government has reversed its stand and will again allow cultivation of heroin.

With respect to cannabis, a significant development is the recent interest in importation and trafficking of cannabis drugs on the part of major criminal organizations. In the recent past, those primarily involved with the importation and trafficking of cannabis were the younger entrepreneurs. During 1973, five gangland-style murders in Montreal were directly connected to an investigation on the importation of hashish.

The Royal Canadian Mountain Police presently assumes primary responsibility for investigating offences of trafficking in drugs at all levels of police jurisdiction, local, provincial, interprovincial and international. Drug trafficking is a large, highly organized criminal operation involving contacts and resources at all levels of jurisdiction. Competent drug law enforcement requires a comprehensive and consistent process in the total community. Specialists in drug law enforcement are capable of dealing with specific situations, as is presently the practice of members of the RCMP special drug squads, but consistent enforcement at an adequate level will only be accomplished efficiently by all police forces and all members of those police forces assuming responsibility for enforcement.

As far as the federal government and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned, the following priorities for drug law enforcement are required: (a) the RCMP to provide leadership to improve drug intelligence, co-ordination and co-operation between all police department; (b) the RCMP to have primary responsibility for enforcement of drug trafficking offences at international, national, provincial and local levels and to provide assistance as required to other police forces where resources are available; (c) as a general rule, all police forces should accept responsibility for drug law enforcement within their respective jurisdictions and should be encouraged to develop the capacity for drug law enforcement where it is now lacking.

The RCMP offers a two-week drug investigation course for members of municipal and provincial police departments. In 1972-73, 38 members of municipal and provincial police departments took advantage of this course. In 1974-75, 123 members attended these courses. Hon. members should also note that the number of federal drug enforcement positions in the RCMP has increased from 102 in 1969-70 to 543 projected for 1975-76. For the fiscal year 1973-74, in excess of one million man-hours was expended by the RCMP in drug law enforcement.

I should also point out that because of the increase in the scope and size of international and national traffic in illicit narcotics, the drug enforcement program now includes international investigations. Many successful international investigations have been conducted by the RCMP in France, Italy, The Netherlands, England, Spain, Lebanon, Pakistan, India, Hong Kong mainland, Mexico, and the United States.

These investigations have been conducted in co-operation with Interpol, through close co-operative ventures such as Franco-American-Canadian meetings on drug enforcement and by sending RCMP investigators to source and transit countries to work on joint international investigations. In addition, the RCMP now has drug investigators stationed in Paris and Hong Kong to assist in international drug information liaison.

I now wish to deal with British Columbia in particular. I am advised that between 60 and 70 per cent of the total illicit drug problem in Canada is centred in British Columbia. Heroin addiction is the major problem, and it is estimated that 10,000 persons are involved in the illicit use of this drug in that province. In the city of Vancouver, a single dose, or capsule of heroin now costs $35. Each person using heroin will purchase an average of two capsules each day. This means that 10,000 heroin users will spend $700,000 each day, or $20 million each month.

During the past two months, 21½ pounds of heroin have been seized as a result of drug investigations in British Columbia. The RCMP recently conducted a major undercover operation in the greater Vancouver area during which 25 persons were charged with selling narcotics. Sixteen of those charged were considered to be major international or national drug traffickers. Unfortunately, the magnitude of illicit heroin traffic in British Columbia is such that these recent successful operations have not reduced the current availability of heroin.

There have been new initiatives, however. In British Columbia there are now 107 RCMP federal drug unit positions, of which 69 are assigned to the Vancouver RCMP drug unit. The Vancouver unit is to be increased by 17 positions by April 1, 1975, for a total of 86. The department of the attorney general of British Columbia has initiated a new program called CLEU or Co-ordinated Law Enforcement Unit. As part of this program, members of the RCMP and the Vancouver city police work together on major criminal problems. A recent successful drug investigation was concluded by a combined group of 16 RCMP members and nine Vancouver city police members.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to explain to the House the assistance given by the federal government to the provinces in the form of Royal Canadian Mounted Police, national police, services. The government provides and bears the total cost of a national police service to all Canadian law enforcement agencies as one way of helping to combat crime in Canada. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the major and central criminal intelligence body in Canada and must be in a position to provide full and comprehensive facilities for the exchange of criminal intelligence with other police forces. These national police services include: (a) an identification branch and central fingerprint bureau; (b) six crime detection laboratories, located in New Brunswick, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and Manitoba; (c) the Canadian Police Information Centre; (d) the Criminal Intelligence Service Canada; (e) Interpol; and (f) the Canadian Police College.

Of most direct significance to this debate, particularly as it concerns crime rings and criminal conspiracies, is the Criminal Intelligence Service Canada which I should like to describe in some detail. In 1962, it was decided to create a Canada-wide network of criminal intelligence units to combat the growing problem of organized crime in a co-ordinated and efficient manner. In 1970, Criminal Intelligence Service Canada was founded and it presently consists of 23 national criminal intelligence sections, six airport special squads, three special surveillance sections and 46 intelligence sections from other police departments and enforcement agencies. Two types of intelligence are handled—strategic intelligence and tactical intelligence. Strategic intelligence confirms the existence of organized crime elements and identifies the members of the group, their criminal activities, internal administration, movements, sources of income and vulnerability. Tactical intelligence is the gaining of information for prosecution and is subject to the rules of evidence.

The Criminal Intelligence Service, because it promotes a close working relationship between police forces, has made possible a number of successful joint force operations. During the past three years, joint force operations have resulted in excess of 250 criminal charges being laid, they have prevented at least two murders and located one of Canada's ten most wanted criminals. In addition, many notable criminals have been identified and a secret organization along the lines of the old mafia code was found to exist in Canada. During the past year, many of the efforts of the Criminal Intelligence Service have been directed toward the high priority areas of drug enforcement and commercial fraud. Hon. members may wish to note that in 1969-70 the national crime intelligence sections numbered 65 men in total. This year, 1974-75, the strength of these sections has been more than doubled to 146 members.

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the specific problem of loan sharking, that is, the loaning of money at exorbitant rates of interest. This is a matter of great concern to the government. I am advised by the RCMP that this is one of the most lucrative practices used by criminals. Loan sharking is difficult to detect, and under current legislation, chiefly involving the Small Loans Act, prosecution is not effective. For this reason my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), is preparing legislation for revision of the Interest Act. One feature of the proposed new legislation will be the licensing of all persons engaged in the business of lending money.

I am advised that loan sharking is in operation in many of our major cities. There appears to be no set interest rate on such loans; the majority run from 10 per cent to 35 per cent per week on the full amount borrowed. On occasion, criminals involved will borrow money at normal rates of interest and loan it out at exorbitant rates to establish themselves. Loan sharking also breeds other forms of crime, both directly and indirectly. On occasion, loans are made to finance illegal activities such as drug trafficking, gambling and robberies. Indirectly, other crimes are committed by victims as the only means to repay loans. This repayment could take the form of supplying the loan shark with information that can be used to assist in other criminal offences such as robberies. Because of lack of complaints from victims, it is almost impossible for the police authorities to accurately assess the seriousness of loan sharking operations throughout the country. We know a serious problem exists, however, and we propose to concentrate on work in this area.

Before I comment specifically on the matters raised by hon. members opposite, I should like to point out that the Department of the Solicitor General has, itself, as a principal objective, the prevention of crime and the protection of the public. I must remind the House that jurisdiction for the enforcement of the criminal law in Canada is broadly divided between the provincial governments and the federal government. The federal government legislates in the area of criminal law and for the most part the provinces enforce this legislation. The Criminal Code is enforced by provincial attorneys general—

Mr. Nielsen: Except in the Territories.

Mr. Allmand: Except in the Territories; the hon. member is correct. Other criminal law statutes, such as the Narcotics Control Act, are enforced by the federal government. With respect to the courts, judges are appointed by the federal government, and in many of the courts administration is conducted by the provinces. Probation comes under provincial jurisdiction; parole under federal jurisdiction. Jail sentences of less than two years are under provincial jurisdiction; longer sentences are within federal jurisdiction.

● (1640)

So we have a very mixed jurisdiction in the area of criminal law. It is an area where it is extremely important that there be close co-operation not only between the federal and provincial governments but also between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. That having been said, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the federal government should take a leadership role in the criminal justice system. As a result, last year I called the first federal-provincial conference in 14 years dealing with this matter.

The ministry of the Solicitor General, as I have said, is a focal point, or should become more and more the focal point, for the co-ordination and support of the fight against crime. It will support and assist the Commissioner of the RCMP in his efforts to improve co-operation between police forces. It will encourage and attempt to improve federal-provincial co-operation within the criminal justice system, and it will encourage better consultation within the national police community. In addition, it will work toward a common high standard of police training and police technology on a national basis. I should like to point out that one of the major projects of the secretariat of the Solicitor General's ministry is the conference that we are now planning, with the provinces, on the native offender. This conference will be taking place in Alberta some time in the month of February.

I should now like to comment briefly on some of the points made by hon. members opposite. I must congratulate them on the good speeches they have made. I think the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) very well described the problem of organized crime in Canada and its serious consequences. I also appreciated his comment that we must not only look to the symptoms of crime but to the causes of crime; that if we are to be successful in the long run, we must do much more in the area of the causes of crime. I should like to point out to the House that in recent years, through the ministry of the Solicitor General, we have been trying to do just that. We have had interdepartmental committees on crime and housing, dealing with the whole problem of urban renewal, slums and crime. We have had an interdepartmental committee with respect to Indian affairs and the native offender. We have had interdepartmental committees on the drug problem.

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe recommended a royal commission into the causes of organized crime, and I will take that suggestion under consideration. I can only say that the advice I have from police forces is that a royal commission would not be that useful. They feel that for the most part a probe of this kind is usually overtaken by time and events, and that generally the work of a royal commission is not that useful in assisting the police. On the other hand, I would be willing to consider, and I am considering now, the possibility of a federal-provincial conference on crime and policing. As I pointed out earlier in my remarks, this is an area which concerns the provinces. The hon. member himself said that anything that is done should be done in equal co-operation with the provinces and, as I say, I am considering a federal-provincial conferecne on this particular matter.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) suggested that we should take action, either immediately or as soon as possible, on the recommendations made in the Le Dain report. As hon. members know, the principal responsibility for implementing the recommendations of the Le Dain report comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). However, we do have an interdepartmental committee working on this particular report. My ministry is involved, other ministries are involved and we will soon have an announcement to make in this respect.

The hon. member also said that the methods presently used by the RCMP are out of date. He said they were time-worn methods, and he made reference to Japan, Great Britain and other jurisdictions with regard to things we should be doing. As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, we are presently doing some of the things the hon. member suggested, such as international policing, stationing men in other countries and following up on drug trafficking in other countries. In particular, we are participating with the provinces, especially with the province of British Columbia, in regard to CLEU. The hon. member might say that we should do more, and I agree we should and we will try to do more.

The hon. member strongly suggested that we should try to do more in the area of diversion, especially with young offenders. Again, this is a matter we are examining. We are presently working to frame and to put to the House very shortly a new young offenders act to replace the Juvenile Deliquents Act. We are working very closely with the provinces to bring about a system whereby we will be able to provide, in co-operation with the provinces, services and facilities for young offenders.

The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) concentrated to a great extent on drug traffickers, and I agree with many of the things he said. He said that there was too much tendency nowadays to be sorry for criminals, that too much emphasis was placed on helping criminals. In response, I can only say that we are introducing new programs in the area of rehabilitation—these are sometimes interpreted as being sorry for criminals—because we are hoping we will get to the causes of crime, a matter mentioned by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. These programs are designed to rehabilitate criminals. We believe that if we are to be serious about protecting the public we must do everything possible to help inmates so that they do not return to crime. I know that very often these programs are considered as being soft on crime, but they are really designed to protect the public.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister permit a question at this point?

Mr. Allmand: Yes, I would.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister ran through the functions of the various agencies in his department, but he made one glaring omission and that was the police security and planning analysis group, or whatever name the agency is now known by. The name seems to change as rapidly as do some of the faces around here. Would the minister bring us up to date on what part that group is playing in combating organized crime in Canada?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, that would take a long speech, but I can say that this group was very helpful to me in bringing together all the facts and information that I used in my speech today. Many projects are under way in this particular unit. We are studying projects on gun control and many types of preventive crime. A written question was asked last week and I filed an answer listing a large number of projects. I do not have the list of projects with me today, but in general the PSPB—the Police and Securities Planning Branch—is a research branch, an analysis branch in the area of crime, crime prevention and security matters.

Mr. Nielsen: No longer known as "Goyer's gumshoes".

Mr. Allmand: I do not think it was ever known as that. I should like to say a few words about the RCMP and its support of provincial initiatives. The role of the RCMP as the federal law enforcement agency is, in part, to prevent and detect offences against federal statutes and to conduct investigations as required. Enforcement of the Criminal Code is considered for the most part to be within the provincial governments' responsibility for the administration of justice. In saying this, however, I want to point out that in eight of our ten provinces the RCMP act as the provincial police force and in this role is responsible to the respective attorneys general or solicitors general. In the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in which the RCMP is not the provincial police force, and in the eight contract provinces, I may say that co-operation between the RCMP and provincial authorities is excellent.

I might illustrate this by pointing out that through the national Criminal Intelligence Service, and in other ways, the RCMP have responded to recent provincial initiatives, such as the Quebec commission of inquiry into organized crime, the Ontario inquiry into organized crime and the building trades, and the recent work of the British Columbia co-ordinated law enforcement unit.

● (1650)

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I must advise the House that unfortunately I must be absent this evening. For some time now I have had scheduled a visit to Alberta tomorrow to meet with Hon. Helen Hunley, the solicitor general of that province, to open a new correctional college near Edmonton and to examine the conditions under which our federal female inmates are now kept in provincial institutions. As hon. members know, we have agreed with the provinces to have our federal female inmates sent back to the provinces from which they came, under a special federal-provincial agreement.

An hon. Member: You are going to give effect to women's lib.

Mr. Allmand: I regret this absence. I notified the chief spokesman of each party this morning and I think most of them understood the situation. I might say that in my absence I will have in the galleries a number of RCMP and the chief adviser of the department to listen to the speeches of hon. members and to report to me. I will read their remarks in Hansard tomorrow as soon as I return.

Mr. Nielsen: I thought they had the place tapped anyway.

Mr. Allmand: I conclude my remarks by assuring hon. members that their points of view and suggestions during the debate on this serious matter will be taken seriously, and we are committed to doing everything possible within our jurisdiction to prevent and reduce crime and to help the provinces achieve this same goal. I know that all hon. members of the House have the same objective.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the mover, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), first of all for bringing this resolution before the House today. I can say with all modesty that I had nothing to do with its formulation or the very stable, very restrained and very philosophical approach the hon. member took in his speech in which he outlined in a very sympathetic way the causes of crime in the country. It was a speech well worth making, and I quite frankly say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I envy his oratorical powers and the way in which he made his speech. It was a speech well worth making. It is about time somebody said what the hon. member said today about crime, and I most heartily agree with him.

Let me say again, attempting to use the most restrained language possible, that I found the minister's reply today very disappointing. Now that we have had the philosophical approach from the hon. member, indicating the causes of organized crime in this country, I would suggest that my role now is to indicate in some small way the inroads organized crime has already made in this country.

I think the attitude displayed by the minister here today was good, as far as he went, but as is usual with most things we hear from across the floor of this chamber, I must say in all sincerity that his statement today was extremely disappointing and lacking in real depth as to just what has happened in this country in the last decade. I suggest that is indicated, as well, by the attendance here today. We have the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who was here for the question period but who quickly left, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who I suggest should be playing a supervisory role in this whole matter but who has not even put in an attendance today. I would indicate to the minister, as well, that I am disappointed that he has to leave in approximately five minutes as he indicated earlier.

Traditionally, in fighting crime in this country the provincial and local presence has been paramount. In the last decade especially, sophisticated uses of communications and transportation techniques by warped but intelligent men have of necessity left provincial, municipal and local law enforcement agencies far behind and virtually helpless in combating internationally-directed and syndicated organized crime. This is true, not because of lack of intent, and in many cases not because of lack of training, but simply because of their limited, restricted jurisdiction. The minister may point with pride to the divided jurisdiction in combating crime in this country.

Mr. Allmand: Not with pride. That is our system.

Mr. Lawrence: The minister may point to the system in an attempt to defend it, but I find it almost indefensible. I think we are wavering, in this country, under an extremely archaic system, one that has certainly not kept up with the times. I think the place from which initiative and leadership should come is here in Ottawa. Initiative and leadership should come from the federal government toward changing the system, because the system is clearly wrong. I think the federal government and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should have become far more paramount and should be the priority law enforcement agency. This government should be the government concerned with combating organized crime in this country. It should be far more innovative and far more supervisory in leading the fight against organized crime, in a way that so far simply has not surfaced.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lawrence: When I have finished I will be glad to entertain questions. At a time when crime statistics in this country are far more than merely alarming, and at a time when obviously there is international control and foreign direction to what is going on in this country in respect of crime, the reverse is true of this government. Initiative and leadership on the part of this government is absolutely nil, and this has been demonstrated time and time again.

Over the last decade the morale in the RCMP has deteriorated to the point now that the RCMP is no longer the proud and effective force it once was. The leadership which emanates from this government has sadly deteriorated. We need more political direction. The law enforcement agencies need more money, more help, more facilities, experts and professional people. They are simply not getting that type of leadership, they are not getting that type of financial help and they are not getting the direction they need. I suggest this is not only true of the RCMP. Our Customs and Excise Branch has simply stood still for the last 50 years. Generally speaking, the Department of Revenue investigators are simply incompetent, due to their lack of training and lack of knowledge of what has been going on in the past. I think they sincerely and genuinely need far more facilities, better training and better pay. I think, as well, they need university and research assistance in ways they are not getting it at the moment.

I think this is the reason for the debate today. This is an honest attempt by the opposition, using the only means available to it at the moment, to wake a sleepy, lethargic government out of its apathy. Today we are seeing the effects of that apathy. At the moment we have, at the most, 20 government members in the House. I suggest that we have had a very lethargic and sleepy reply from a mediocre minister. For instance, why did he not deal with the involvement of organized crime in the construction industry labour unions and in other industries which has become apparent in the last 18 months in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario? It is nonsense on the part of the minister or anyone else to suggest that this whole matter is subject only to provincial jurisdiction. We have had royal commissions in both provinces—one is still continuing—which indicate in no uncertain terms that organized crime is now linked with the construction industry in both Ontario and Quebec.

● (1700)

Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigations alone have linked certain underworld figures with the violence which plagued the industry two years ago, and last year in James Bay approximately $8,000 of syndicate money supported local 791 in its strike at an estimated cost of over $1 million in the $26 million road construction project. Known, internationally-syndicated "soldiers" were also employed on this side at the time. But today we have no comment, no information, no suggestion whatsoever from the minister. Why did he not deal today with the white-collar crime which is rampant?

Mr. Allmand: Why didn't you put it in the motion?

Mr. Lawrence: Why did he not deal with commercial fraud, phony bankruptcies, insurance swindles? Certainly we should have heard something from the minister today about those crimes. The leadership and the initiative by this government is overdue with respect to, for instance, the establishment of a national securities commission. What happened to the thrust which existed a few years ago in respect of such legislation? Since then the problem in this country has become worse, not better, and for the last three years—I am not blaming this particular minister, but the whole department—we have not heard a word about it. And it is overdue. What in the world is the sense of us taking stock swindlers out of Bay Street if they settle in New Brunswick, for instance, later to be chased away from there by the New Brunswick government? All they do then is settle on the west coast. There has been ample evidence in the newspapers—

Mr. Allmand: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is a member of the political party which drafted the motion before us today, which refers to international and interprovincial crime rings operating in drugs, loan sharking and mafia-type conspiracies. Now he rises in his place and, in a way which I believe is irrelevant to the motion, asks us why we did not deal with matters which are not dealt with in the motion. I would have been pleased to deal with all these matters had the opposition placed them in the motion, and I would ask the hon. member to stick to the matters which his own party put in the motion before us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. The Chair always has some difficulty in determining precisely how relevant are comments made in speeches to the motion or the bill before us. It is customary for the Chair to allow some degree of latitude in this regard, but I think that all speakers will wish to direct themselves to the motion that is now before the House.

Mr. Lawrence: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for that. The motion today is on organized crime, and it is to organized crime that I am directing my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I merely want to say that it is not only speculative newspaper reports today which indicate that organized crime and its many offshoots have moved into the Vancouver Stock Exchange, for example. I think that these are valid and worthy subjects that should be dealt with by us today, whether or not the minister likes it. But if he wants to talk about loan sharking, why did he not talk about it a few moments ago? Did he give us any plans or programs about the loan sharking shakedown that is now taking place here in Ontario and in Quebec especially?

We are not dealing with peanuts; we are dealing with an industry which in Ontario alone deals in hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Think of private insurance companies, private loan companies. Think of one outfit alone which in the city of Toronto has a turnover of over $100 million. There are in existence today foreign-controlled crime syndicates in metro Toronto alone which deal in that amount of money annually. One newspaper report which appeared the other day said that on the island of Montreal alone the total amount for loan sharking last year was over $700 million. We are not dealing with peanuts; we are dealing with powerful, intelligent, but warped groups which can manipulate governments and ministers as well as law enforcement agencies.

I say that the initiative and leadership in combating these groups must come from Ottawa. We can no longer rely on the attitude we have seen here today, according to which law enforcement agencies, local or provincial, are considered paramount. They cannot be, because we are dealing with international crime. Although money lending is not an offence under the Criminal Code as yet, the setting up of unreasonable interest rates is a crime and is covered by the Small Loans Act. The minister said it is ineffective. I should like to know how in the world he knows that, since the department has not attempted a prosecution under that act for the last three years.

Mr. Allmand: We do not prosecute them.

Mr. Lawrence: I am speaking of crimes relating to the terrorizing of private citizens, as well as the rapid increase in spin-off crimes which often results when borrowers are unable to repay their debts.

How about gambling in this country? Again, the attitude we see frequently is that this is something that can be looked after at the local or provincial level. That is nonsense. Gambling is prohibited by the federal Criminal Code, and at least two provinces where the abuses really exist, in the last three years have requested this government to allow them to control betting and the bookie business. It is well known, and it is openly carried on. If you do not believe me, sir, ask the guard, if you do not believe me, ask our House of Commons elevator operator, if you do not believe me, ask our messenger service who or where the nearest bookie in this building is. He will tell you, because it is done. It is a business in Ontario alone that handles at least $150 million annually, over one-half of which is bet on sports other than racing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Hon. members opposite can poke fun at it, but I say to you, sir, that this is one of the cash registers of organized crime in this country, and it can and should be prevented. I believe that it can be prevented very easily by the government itself taking over control. This has been requested by provincial governments, and it has been refused time and time again. I say that this internationally-financed ring cannot operate without its United States connections. Let me read to you a very short paragraph from a Canadian report—not a very old report:

> Organized crime provides lay-off centres in Buffalo, in Atlanta, in Las Vegas, and in New Jersey, as well as betting information centres for the provision of odds and "point spreads" where necessary. A lay-off centre is apparently essential for most bookmakers to survive. They cannot afford to refuse bets or they will lose customers, while a pay-off on some large bets would put many out of business.

This is a business that is carried on here. Today we did not hear a word about the gambling business from the minister. We did not hear a word about the new techniques, new procedures and new research that should be taking place. We did not hear that gambling and the bookie business could not carry on without some sort of co-operation from government and local officials. Nor could it carry on without the co-operation of the news media in this country, Mr. Speaker. I say that very clearly. Have you ever opened the newspaper at the sports page and seen, not just the race results but the betting odds and the amounts won in the previous day's races? I say to you that the radio stations and news media of this country somehow or other must be influenced daily to publish that type of information. I say to you there are not that many horse lovers on the North American continent who are wondering or worrying about what horse won; instead, they are worrying how much the horse won for them through their local bookie down the street. Government, at the federal, provincial and local level can and should control that, but they do not. They do not even know the problems, much less do anything about gambling.

I should like now to deal with the drug problem. We have heard some rather misleading statistics from the minister. I think he underrated the problem. Drug addiction has increased by 455 per cent in the last five years in British Columbia alone. In other words, the British Columbia total is approximately two-thirds of the national total. The minister told us that there had only been a five-fold increase in the number of investigators with federal law enforcement agencies on the west coast. I think he should be ashamed to come into this House with such information, and should not boast that he is doing something about the problem. The drug trade in British Columbia alone—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member in the midst of his speech, but the time allotted to him in this debate has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if that includes the interruptions and the points of order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I thank the hon. member for drawing that to the attention of the House. The Chair did take account of the fact that there was a point of order, and the hon. member was allowed the extra minutes that were taken up by it.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, during the hon. member's remarks I put a question to him and he said he would accept it at the end of his speech. Would he accept it now? It is a serious question, and I should like to know what he meant by some of his remarks.

Mr. Lawrence: May I continue for a moment, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The minister may wish to ask a question, and by allowing the hon. member to answer we would be extending his time in this debate. That could only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House and I do not want to trespass any more than I have to, but may I get on to one other subject—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I believe there has been a misunderstanding. The minister rose to ask a question and the Chair put to the House the question whether the hon. member could be given additional time to answer. I think that is what was requested and there is agreement to it.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I either have extra time to continue, or I do not. If I have extra time to continue, I should like to use it in another way, and I will certainly entertain the minister's question.

An hon. Member: Let him ask the question.

Mr. Lawrence: If I may continue, and I assume I may—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he has not been given time to continue. The request was for a question, and if the minister wishes to put that question now, the House has consented to allow the hon. member time to answer.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise a point of order. The last speaker who had difficulty ending his speech within the time requested extra time, and you were kind enough to follow the usual custom and ask the House whether he could have it, and consent was given. With respect, what you are saying now is that the only question is whether the minister ought to be able to question the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Bearing in mind the undertaking which the hon. member has given to take a question from the minister, may I ask, on his behalf, that you put the usual question whether he can have time to finish his speech?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. The Chair has ruled in this regard, that it should be at the end of the hon. member's speech. He did not request additional time. The Chair put the question to the House when the minister asked to put a question to the hon. member. That is the situation. If the hon. member wishes to request an extension of time, he may certainly do so and that question will be put to the House.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I thought I did request it. I thought you put the question and I thought the answer was in the affirmative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is it agreed that the hon. member shall have additional time to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Organized Crime

Mr. Lawrence: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House and I hope I shall not trespass unduly. There are a number of subjects that one would want to get into in a wide-ranging debate such as this, but I want to deal with two, if I may. One is the question of whether organized crime has infiltrated the very ranks of government itself. I should like to bring to the attention of the House the case of Mr. Charles Spatero who at one time was from Buffalo, New York. Dilly, as he is known to his friends, is what is known in the trade as a "torch". A torch is a gentleman who specializes in incendiary and arson work in Toronto, Montreal and some of our larger areas.

For the last little while there has been an alarming outbreak of arson. It is connected, obviously, with loan sharking, obviously with protection rackets and obviously with the enforcement of underworld regulations and judgments. They do exist, Mr. Speaker. I should like to suggest to you that so far in this session, in any event, I have heard no explanation whatsoever from the government or the minister as to the rather novel and alarming series of events that have overtaken Mr. Charles Angelo Spatero. He was sentenced in 1970 to the maximum sentence for arson in this country, 14 years, by Judge Martin in Toronto. On June 15, while incarcerated in Warkworth prison—which is just outside the boundaries of my riding—Mr. Spatero managed to obtain a three-day pass in order to see his wife who was supposed to be in a motel nearby.

Here is a man who received the maximum sentence on a charge of arson, Mr. Speaker. The evidence at the trial clearly indicated that he was not just on trial for one charge, but in actual fact there were five different related charges of arson. The one they got Dilly on was for pouring alcohol and gasoline all through a crowded tavern in downtown Toronto. In any event, he got 14 years. Somehow, somewhere, a man with that record got a three-day weekend pass on June 15. I do not find that remarkable because there are many other instances of people such as that getting weekend passes today. This is a novel technique that was brought about by the Trudeau government in this country. I am not so sure it has been a success, but that is not the point I am worried about today.

On June 15, on that weekend pass, of course, Dilly Spatero never returned to the Warkworth prison. Before long it was obvious that he had got into a green Cadillac—registered to a known underworld figure in New York state—in Campbellford which is just a few miles away from the prison, and obviously he was across the border in a matter of hours. That was known to law enforcement agencies in New York state, to law enforcement agencies in Canada; and it was known, as well, by the newspapers. Actually, on October 23 the reporters of two Toronto newspapers interviewed Mr. Spatero in Buffalo, New York. The point is that he was an escaped arsonist, a dangerous man. That was even the opinion of the late Mr. Maggadino, the crime boss in Buffalo who controlled certain kinds of crime in Hamilton and Toronto. Mr. Maggadino is no longer alive, but his organization is still alive. This man, Spatero, is a recognized torch. He should not have been out on weekend leave. He was out, and he got away. There has been an unaccountable delay in serving extradition papers in respect of Mr. Spatero.

Let me go over the facts again. In 1970 he was convicted and sent up for 14 years. On June 15 he escaped. Not until July were extradition papers finally signed by the Department of Justice in Ottawa. But absolutely nothing was done with those papers. Mr. Spatero was in Buffalo and everyone knew he was in Buffalo. The New York state people were doing their utmost to pin something on him so that he could be put away, because he is a recognized, dangerous figure. Reporters from the Toronto Star and the Toronto Sun interviewed him on October 25. At the same time, sir, the district attorney in Buffalo publicly indicated his displeasure because the authorities could not nail him for anything. The papers from Ottawa simply had never reached Washington. Hence, they had never gone from Washington to Buffalo because they were not in the United States.

It looks to me as if this case goes far beyond mere bureaucratic bungling in Ottawa. What happened goes beyond coincidence. I could give more examples like this, but will not bore the House with them. Events like this, linked with some of the difficulties encountered by the RCMP in Quebec, lead one to the inescapable conclusion that organized crime has put great pressure even on governments, even on our law enforcement agencies. Have we heard any worth-while explanation from the minister regarding the activities of Mr. Samson, the RCMP officer in Montreal who was involved in the July 26 bombing of one of the directors of Steinberg's?

Mr. Allmand: Ask questions and I will do my best to answer them.

Mr. Lawrence: Injured in the attempt, he is reputed to have been in contact both with Camille Gervais and William Obrunt. Gervais is awaiting sentence for conspiracy, while Obrunt has been designated by police as an underworld banker. Obrunt has been missing at least since October 16, 1974, and still does not seem to have been located. This leaves us with two questions: where is Obrunt now, and what does the government intend to do to find him and to prosecute him? I say that the Samson affair ties in with another alleged link to organized crime. RCMP officers McLery and Brunet were fired from the force in December, 1973, apparently due to their association—with whom? With Mr. Obrunt. They attempted to have their case reviewed but ran into difficulty when told that all relevant facts would be made public. They then decided not to have their case reviewed. I do not know where the pressure for that came from, whether it came from the underworld or from the RCMP; but no matter where the pressure came from, the circumstances look suspicious and the government owes us an explanation. All three of these men were involved with intelligence and with security.

On October 24, only eight days after they gave evidence that Samson was somehow connected with the underworld, it was announced that the FBI and the CIA had been asked to aid with security for the Olympic Games. The timing is too obvious to be ignored. The hypothesis is that by infiltrating the RCMP, organized crime was able to get hold of the security plans for the Olympics. Obviously, these plans would be sold to the highest terrorist bidders in the world.

I will not deal with the computation of crimes: we can deal with that another day. Let me say that I echo the sentiments which have been expressed in this debate. Our aim in this country should be to increase the deterrent to crime by increasing the chance of detection. We do not necessarily need to increase the length of jail terms or their severity. I completely agree with the thrust of the speech made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe. We need more work, more leadership, more initiative to be shown by the government in combating crime and its causes. If we can do that best by establishing a royal commission, we should establish that royal commission. The minister suggested that royal commissions, according to police experts, are not the best way of assisting the police. A royal commission might not assist the police, but it would wake up a lethargic and apathetic government and demonstrate the existence of difficulties in this area.

I suggest that we need more co-operation and communication among federal, provincial and local police forces; that we need improved co-operation and communication among federal and provincial departments of justice, prosecutors and officials. For heaven's sake, the provincial Crown Attorney system is there; why duplicate it at the federal level by establishing a new list of federal Crown Attorneys? The police need to concentrate on serious crimes involving victims, and we must investigate the feasibility of removing from the Criminal Code crimes which do not involve victims; crimes such as gambling, prostitution, liquor offences, and so on. Further, RCMP law enforcement officers are too important to be wasted. They should be given better training, and their time should not be wasted in patrolling Ottawa's NCC roads and handing out tickets for driving offences. They should be the experts trained to combat crime. Today, that is simply not the case.

One could make many suggestions. Most of all, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) must be aware of what is going on today. They must demonstrate their inherent desire to come to grips with the problem. That, sir, we have not seen.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Actually, I could ask about 30 or 40 questions, but will be content with one. At the beginning of his remarks he said that the system in Canada, under which criminal jurisdiction is divided between the provinces and the federal government, is wrong, is scandalous. Was he seriously suggesting that the constitution should be amended, or that the federal government should ignore the constitution and take away from the provinces their jurisdiction in the criminal justice field and, as well, their responsibility in enforcing the Criminal Code? In other words, was he suggesting that the federal government should take over from the provinces the enforcement and prosecution of offences under the Criminal Code?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am no lover of the British North America Act and I think it is scandalous that we, in this country, are still labouring under an inadequate constitution. For that I blame my hon. friend and his government colleagues. In this country there has grown up a duplicate system of courts, a duplicate system of the administration of justice, and a duplicate system of law enforcement. I thought I had touched on these questions; evidently the minister was not listening. There is, as well, a duplicate function of Crown prosecutors. I say those things are wrong. There has to be a sorting out period. It has to come from Ottawa.

By far the paramount group to combat internationally syndicated crime in this country has to come from Ottawa simply because the local jurisdictions, the local law enforcement people, the provincial police, do not have the jurisdiction, funds or facilities which the federal government should have. Today they do not have those. They should have them, and the blame has to fall squarely on the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the course of the remarks of my friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), he made certain references to the messengers, elevator operators, and perhaps other employees who work for us in this building. My friend is a lawyer. He is a former attorney general of Ontario. He knows these fine points much better than I could possibly understand them. However, to make a blanket reference to the employees of this building and to suggest that they are involved in activities that are—

Mr. Lawrence: You missed the whole point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says I missed the whole point. I say to the hon. member that he said either too much or too little. If he is laying a charge against the employees in this building, he should be pretty specific about it. However, if he is now prepared to say that the employees in this building are not engaged in anything that is criminal or quasi-criminal, that of course would clear the air. As one member of this House who is well served by the employees of this building, I do not like to see them maligned in this way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, may I reply to the question of privilege. The point I was trying to make is that the bookie business and gambling in this country, this province, and even in this building is a recognized business. It will not be stamped out. It cannot be. Therefore, the way to combat it is to control it. Certainly that is what I meant by indicating to the members that the location of bookies, even in these buildings, is not a hard thing to find at all. It is because we are served so well by our messengers, elevator operators and guards that they are quite willing to tell us what is common knowledge elsewhere. If you ask them, they will tell you where the local bookie is for this floor in this building.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that my hon. friend has made the matter worse.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). As attorney general for Ontario, what did you do in the heartland of organized crime, and why?

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mrs. Holt: What place does partisan politics have in such a grave social problem, a problem of national concern? Every citizen of this country is concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Unless my hearing is wrong, in his reply on the question of privilege the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) said that the business of book making is a recognized business in this building. I think that is a great disservice to those who serve us here. The hon. member should be prepared to state specifically where this is occurring and name those persons involved. Otherwise it casts an aspersion on all persons who are here. The hon. member said it is a recognized business in this building, in this chamber, in this House of Commons. I think the matter should be cleared up, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by my friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) and others with regard to what was alleged to be a question of privilege. If that is what they are going to say, I suggest with respect that this debate ought not to continue. My feeling is it does not in any way infringe upon the privileges of a member of parliament in relation to his duties as a representative in this place. That is what constitutes a question of privilege.

This is certainly not a question of privilege in parliamentary terms. If this debate is going to continue, instead of debating the very important issue contained in this motion we will spend the rest of the day protecting certain interests. That is not the purpose. Certainly it is not a question of privilege under the rules of this House.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. speaker, by the hon. member casting aspersions on the staff of this House, this is a question of privilege. He has also cast aspersions on the members of this House by stating that this is common knowledge. I would like to make it clear that I do not know anything about any such activity going on in this House. In my view this constitutes a question of privilege. I in no way associate myself with what the hon. member has said and the accusations he has made.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), I do not wish to spin this matter out now, but I wish to reserve the right, if after consulting the record I still feel there is a question of privilege, to raise it tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COMBAT ORGANIZED CRIME

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wagner:

That this House, noting that international and interprovincial crime rings are operating out of control in the drug trade in British Columbia, the loan shark business in Ontario and in mafia-type conspiracies in Quebec, urges the government to act immediately—directly and through aid to the provinces—to protect the public and to bring these criminals to justice.

Mr. Gus MacFarlane (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) for bringing before us a matter which all of us, including the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), consider to be of urgent concern.

None of us like the thought of invasion of our privacy and the taking over of our daily lives by crime syndicates, or habits promoted by them. By the same token I believe there are different ways to tackle this problem.

Many members have concentrated on police work or our laws. I tend to believe we are being a little more than unfair if we are continually to make references to those who have served us, and attempted to serve us well, by saying they are not serving us. Many of our policemen and police forces are doing a great service for us. This is recognized in each community. Indeed, many of our laws are framed in a way which were intended to help.

Unfortunately, this is somewhat of a two-edged sword. Sometimes in the framing of a law, someone uses life like a rock, and the law as a chisel, and tries to carve it in their own likeness. Then they try to impose on others their thoughts as to how life should be.

Some of us look on life as an ocean, and on the laws as sandcastles which crumble as the ocean moves. We hope there will be some around us and among those who make our laws and enforce them, who have this kind of understanding. I reject the idea that discipline will get us respect. I believe discipline is the result of respect. Therefore I believe the discipline demanded by society must to a great extent be achieved by itself.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Far too little has been said about the young in this discussion. Who are all these people who sell these drugs? Who are all these people in Vancouver? Who are all these people in the Atlantic provinces? Who are all these people in Montreal?

Mr. Ellis: Ask the minister. He should know.

Mr. MacFarlane: Are they people none of us will ever know? Are they people that only the minister or a police officer or a judge will know? Are we not the ones who must take the responsibility, rather than placing it on the shoulders of someone else? At what point do we accept this responsibility? At what point do we ask ourselves whether they are juvenile delinquents or whether they are the result of delinquent adults?

The hon. member for Sainte-Hyacinthe comes from an area I knew very well, which I was familiar with, Verdun, Quebec. I remember that we organized a series of open-air dances in co-operation with the police, though after a good deal of opposition from other quarters. We noticed that the incidence of delinquency dropped on those evenings. The police stopped the traffic for the young people; they became friends of the young people, servants of the young people, and servants of the community. As a result the young people respected them. Basically, a healthy respect existed in that community between the young people and the police force.

The Le Dain Commission Report was not the be all and end all as far as drugs are concerned. Many things have changed since that report was issued. It is about time many of us, including policemen and citizens generally, read more about drugs and discovered that this is only a passing history.

I do recall one passage in the report—it did not appear to receive wide publicity at the time—about the situation in one of the maritime provinces. It appears that the citizens did not know what was going on, and even the mayor of Moncton did not know what was going on, but when a questionnaire was sent to one of the schools they discovered that 60 per cent of the young people had experienced soft drugs, acid, or hard drugs. No one mentioned that 85 per cent of the teachers were involved. This was in a small community. I wonder what might be happening in a large community such as the one I come from, Mr. Speaker.

I am not afraid to say for the record that the people of Hamilton Mountain are concerned. They are so concerned that they have started a full-scale drug education program. They have set up a community centre with special courses for nurses, doctors and social workers who attend. They believe they should be dealing with the situation from a knowledge of drugs and the circumstances in which they are taken. Too often I hear it said that the law should take care of these offenders.

I have nothing to say against lawyers, but I must face the fact that when standing before the court each one of them can only see how correct he is—not one is called upon to question his personal position when defending a drug trafficker. The time is coming when we shall be obliged to make a decision, not as legislators, or policemen, or lawyers, but as people who should count ourselves as part of the authority, or force, which serves all of us.

The excellent recommendations which come from the universities from time to time should be adopted, along with other worthwhile suggestions from members of police forces and interested citizens. Members of the community generally should talk about these things and make their contributions toward the decision process.

I respect the views which have been put forward during this debate. Regardless of our feelings when we oppose each other for policital reasons, I believe that from time to time something will come before this House with which we can all be concerned. I am sure that those who follow me in this debate will have many more informed and intelligent things to say about the subject than I have, and I shall listen attentively.

The time has come to recognize that the way to law and order, the way to deal with the Godfather image, is through education. I believe that basically young people have a liking for and a respect for policemen. Many times that respect is taken from them by the courts, or by those in authority, or by people who seek for their own purposes to make the law or the police force look incorrect, regardless of the effect on the young.

I found that basically there was a kindred feeling between young people and policemen. Basically, you played ball in the streets, when you were too poor to have a dime, and you used the centre sewer as home plate and the two side sewers as third and first base. When a policeman came to move you he moved you as few times as he could, provided it didn't endanger your life. He didn't come driving down the street with a siren to arrest you. So many times in the past policemen have done this, and they are still doing it.

We should look to the policemen, Mr. Speaker. They must be involved in this education process. We should hear what they have to say about some of the measures we have passed as legislators. We should hear why they believe some of those measures do not help them in their tasks. We must seek ways of bringing together all the people who are most deeply involved. We should look upon policemen as those who serve us, respect them for what they do, and give them the opportunity to voice their opinion. I think many young people want this.

If I might just close with one thought in connection with any revision of our law which may take place, I would say this: there is a man by the name of George Raymond, the author and owner of the television show, "This is the Law". In September 1974, while researching material for a film concerning the Canadian children of alcoholic parents, Mr. Raymond was awakened to the depressing dilemma of hundreds of thousands of children in this country who are mentally and physically abused by an alcoholic parent, every day of their young lives.

Overwhelmed by the enormity of this single area of child neglect, and having in mind in the very broadest sense the myriad of other problems and decisions a child is compelled to face by himself, alone, every day, due to parental and public indifference, he was inspired to write

"The Rights of Man." The words are by George Raymond, the music by Tommy Ambrose.

So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since the time when that man could first write,
Since he moved from his cave to the light of the day
And he yearned for the land which was so far far away
Since he learned how to work—how to love—how to play,
He's been worried 'bout his personal rights.

So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since he first came aware of his might,
Look at all that Man's done since he climbed from his tree
How he's learned how to walk—how to sail on the sea
How he's jumped on the moon with such obvious glee,
Always worried 'bout his personal rights.
So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since priorities gave him a fright,
Since man learned how to add and subtract and divide
His material wealth—which he often would hide
While he figured the wealth of the opposite side,
He's been worried 'bout his personal rights.
So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since he first felt his halo grow tight,
How man said "If it's there—then it's good for us all"
So he worked and invented and prospered—grew tall
Or drew strength from some bottle to soften his fall,
Always worried 'bout his personal rights.

So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since the time when man first said "I'm right",
'bout the wonderful things man has said and then done
Since he first grew his food—since he harnessed the sun
How he's spread the good word since inventing the gun,
Always worried 'bout his personal rights.
So much has been said 'bout the Rights of Man
Since his genius first helped win his fights,
Look at all that he's done since he first turned the sod
How he's crippled and killed for some great nameless god
How he despoils his children while using the rod.
Always worried 'bout his personal rights.
But what of the rights of The Child of Man
As man dreams of his personal wealth?
The young child who's ignored both in body and mind
Who is lonely and hungry and cold and can't find Any shelter or love in a world where he's tossed,
To be shot—to be burned—to be bombed—to be lost.
Yes, what of the rights of The Child of Man
As man hurried through life to his fate?

While preoccupied man carries on with neglect
Of his children—while showing the highest respect
For the power and might of the sword and the gun,
And the pitiful acre dead bodies just won.
So what of the rights of The Child of Man
As man scratches along to his goals?
Where consumption of his all consuming desire
Where the dollar and status will kindle his fire
To be first—to be fastest and biggest—why not?
Who has time for the plight of some faceless young tot?

I think we have to look to those who make money out of drugs. We have to look to those who have the power to direct others. But I do say that each and every one of us has the responsibility to think of the rights of children at this time. If our laws could in some way be expressed, they would be expressed by what most of us when we were young saw, and what most of us see now—a policeman holding the hand of a small child.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it six o'clock; I do not want my speech interrupted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I am grateful that you allowed me to call it six o'clock a minute or two before that hour so that my trend of thought, if that is the expression, would not be interruped.

I think it is useful for this House of Commons to spend a day debating a matter or an issue which is of very great concern to a good number of Canadians. I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), for a very constructively argued contribution to this debate. His argument seemed to me to be progressive and positive.

When we are considering the whole issue of crime, Mr. Speaker, we have to keep slogans to a minimum. Simplistic solutions really do not help us at all. After all, the last person to use law and order as an election gimmick, the last person to use this over-simplified and pejorative phrase, the last campaign which aroused the public into a state of frenzy about law and order was that of Richard Nixon, a Richard Nixon who subverted law while invoking a slogan. We have a very great deal to learn from the very unhappy experience of the United States about what I would call an over-simple view of a terribly complex issue.

There is nothing new, of course, in organized crime, and for the purpose of this debate I think of organized crime as crime organized on a continental or worldwide basis. However, what is new, it seems to me, is the amount of technological sophistication which those engaged in organized crime are able to use for their nefarious purposes.

We have heard from our colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), and we have also read the statistics about the very grave phenomena of the drug problem of British Columbia. We have learned with horror the fact that drug addiction has increased by something like 455 per cent in the last five years in the province of British Columbia. In other words, the total there is approximately two-thirds of the national total in hard drug terms. The drug trade there has mushroomed into a half billion dollar business, and some eight syndicates in the lower mainland have used the proceeds of the drug trade to have money laundered through legitimate businesses.

Mention has already been made of the Co-ordinated Law Enforcement Unit, an enterprise, as I understand it, of the Attorney General of British Columbia. It is a co-operative effort by metropolitan Vancouver, British Columbia and the RCMP, but the spark came from the Attorney General of British Columbia.

That group found that "gang money", as they call it, is being "laundered" through legitimate business enterprises throughout the province. Law enforcement agencies estimate that up to 30 per cent of the mining and local junior industrial companies on the Vancouver stock exchange are in danger of being manipulated by criminally oriented promoters who are getting away virtually scotfree. The report also cites the securities industry, the second mortgage field and nightclubs as the three other areas that might be called legitimate businesses in their organization and concept, yet have been infiltrated by what might be termed "dirty" money.

Statistics Canada figures, from law enforcement, judicial and correctional statistics, support the agonizing situation, if I can use that adjective, in British Columbia. Statistics Canada goes on to describe the totals for Canada. It states:

> Each of the four drug classifications continue to show an increase nationally from a low of 17.2 per cent for addicting opiate like drugs to a high of 106.8 per cent (101.0 per cent in the first half of 1973) for Cannabis (Marijuana) related offences.
> While the percentage change for three of the four drug offences varied substantially from large increases to significant decreases in the provinces, all provinces showed an increase in the Cannabis classification from a low of 27.4 per cent in Prince Edward Island, to a high of 127.3 per cent in Ontario.

Some hon. members have made the suggestion that for drug trafficking we should return to capital punishment. I have taken part in two capital punishment debates in this parliament, and I have no doubt at all that capital punishment is not a deterrent to drug trafficking or anything else. As the hon. member for New Westminster reminded us, there are now very severe penalties, such as life imprisonment, for drug trafficking.

There is just one other statistic that I would like to share. There is one element of the crime picture in Canada that has taken a somewhat positive turn, and that is that the murder rate in this country in 1974 is substantially less than in 1973 by some 15 per cent. In 1973, the rate was lower than in 1972. I just put these statistics on the record as a footnote to remind some hon. members that, whether or not capital punishment is abolished, the violent crime of murder is on the decrease in Canada. I am sorry to say, and hon. members probably know this, that other forms of violent crime have in fact increased over the last few years.

What should be done about organized crime? I believe, as do several hon. members who have spoken, that our aim should be to increase the deterrent by increasing the chances of detection. I think that this is the key, and several hon. members have made this point. There is really not much point in increasing the length of jail terms or their severity—they are already very severe. I think we need several things and I should like to share my thoughts with hon. members.

First, we need improved co-operation and communication between federal, provincial and local police forces, and I think the key example, of which several hon. members have spoken, that operates in British Columbia is a very positive thing.

Second, we need improved co-operation and communication between federal and provincial justice departments, prosecutors and officials. I share the view of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) that it is too bad that we are into the business of proliferating the office of the Crown Attorney. There are excellent Crown Attorneys working in the provinces. It is a pity that these officials have not had the responsibility of prosecuting narcotics offences and that the patronage system has been operating in this federal field. Many law enforcement people to whom I have spoken have deplored this because they feel that Crown Attorneys build up a body of jurisprudence, a body of expertise, and could well handle this and other federal offences.

Third, we need the concentration by police on serious crimes involving a victim.

Fourth, we need an investigation of the feasibility of the gradual removal of victimless crimes from the statute books, such as gambling, prostitution, liquor offences, and so on. The police are now being used as sort of moral guides, and in many cases the morals which they are trying to enforce have become outdated by changed public attitudes. That does not say that all our attitudes with regard to these things have changed, but it means that in general the police are expected in some cases to be watchdogs over morality rather than involved in the much more serious business of investigating crimes where there is a victim.

Fifth, should my last suggestion be adopted, of course this would free prison space and also free the police.

Sixth, we must free trained policemen from the need to handle minor traffic offences, family quarrels, and so on. The police now are expected to cover the whole gamut of serious and grave crimes from murder to whether someone overstayed their time in a parking spot.

Seventh, I suggest that we need to investigate measures to make criminals pay restitution for their acts to victims, as recommended last week by the Law Reform Commission in a most interesting report. I will come back to that report in a minute. At present the victim is often penalized physically or financially for life, while the criminal is in jail for a short term.

Eighth, only when we are certain that victims are protected should we concern ourselves with what we might call the general welfare of the criminal, although this also must be put in perspective.

Ninth, the best deterrent is not inhumane punishment but the certainty of detection. I do not know whether any hon. members listened last night to a radio program where a person who has just come out after nine years in Dorchester, the maximum security penitentiary, kept repeating that he was not sure about the rehabilitation in Dorchester but he was very certain that what would prevent him from repeating his crime was the fear of detection. Lastly, I think we should remember that detection rates are very low in this country, that the courts are overcrowded and that punishment is seriously varied depending on where you are located.

I was going to say that punishment is also dependent on whom you know, but I do not think that is the case. I think it is a fact that a variety of people are responsible for punishment. I think that the Department of the Solicitor General is to be commended for the efforts they and the Justice Department have made toward getting supreme court and county judges and magistrates together to discuss the matter of sentencing, because I think that the variety of sentences handed out for similar crimes in this country makes cynics, not only of those caught but of many of us who practice law.

I was interested in the third report of the Law Reform Commission for a couple of reasons. First of all, it is well written. In a very few pages it sets out some recommendations and some conclusions that had been reached by the commission since its second annual report. It is a pleasure to read a document prepared by officials that is written in elegant English, and presumably the same goes for the other official language, French. It happened that the original of this report was written—and I took the trouble to find out—by Professor Patrick Fitzgerald of Carleton University.

A surprising number of people have spoken to me about the elegant or, more than that, the very clear, direct, understandable and pleasant language. I wish everybody in offices in this national capital could read this report. I do think that there are all too few reports produced in government departments that have any lasting quality. Anyway, it is the report of the commission, no matter who wrote it. The commission reminds us:

> Reforming laws means more than changing them; it means improving them. The two don't always go together. Cromwell's Parliament once passed an act outlawing Christmas—a change admittedly but was it an improvement? Was the new law a true reflection of the social need?

● (2020)

All I could do here is interpolate that if anybody were to pass a law outlawing Christmas until Christmas, I think it would be an improvement. This is away off the subject and I am ready to be taken to task for it right away, but it did remind me that we seem to start Christmas right after Halloween now.

To get back to the point, Mr. Speaker, the commission goes on to ask how we can ensure that new laws truly reflect the social need?

The report reminds us that in ancient Greece somebody who had a proposal to make for a change in the law was brought forward with a yoke around his neck. He then had to debate the change and if he were successful in persuading the citizens he was freed and, if not, he suffered the consequences. Nobody would propose such a drastic thing in 1974, I hope, but I thought that the commission report gave a rather thoughtful analysis of the difficulty of law reform.

Anybody can propose an amendment to a statute. All that is needed is paste, a pair of scissors and a parliament that is—I will not say lazy because this parliament has not been going long enough for me to make any judgment on that. But it is easy enough to change the criminal law by patchwork. To change the philosophy behind the law without the public understanding and support which are essential, is much more difficult.

I myself happen to have voted for and supported with enthusiasm the change in the provisions for bail. But, Mr. Speaker, we parliamentarians made a very grave mistake about that law because we did not take the trouble and the time to instruct the law enforcement agencies in the use of the changed rule, and did not perform our duty by taking our case—or the government's case since the credit rightfully belongs to the government—for this good reform to the public to get an understanding of it.

The Law Reform Commission discussed a couple of things that we are working on, and I will end on this note as I see Mr. Speaker is getting very nervous. In working papers Nos. 5 and 6 the Law Reform Commission made two very worthwhile recommendations. Working paper No. 5 dealt with restitution and compensation for the victims of crime, and working paper No. 6 dealt with fines rather than incarceration. The commission did a very wise and more than humane thing—I know some people will think I am being sentimental when indeed I am anything but—indeed I think a sentence to jail is often a copout. In many cases it is much easier to go to jail than to pay the restitution or a fine.

I think if the government sees fit to accept these recommendations on restitution, compensation and fines, a lot of the pressures on our penitentiary system could be relieved and the police could get on with their real business, that is, dealing with the grave and serious crimes about which many of my colleagues on both sides of the House have reminded us today.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this is really my first speech in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I am very happy that the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) brought this matter up because it has been of deepest concern to me for many, many years. I have worked on the problem of drugs, on juvenile crime—all crime right through to murder—throughout my entire career of 30 years. I am glad the hon. member brought it up as a non-partisan issue, one that every person in this chamber should be concerned about. Every family in this country, every father and mother—everyone—has been touched by this.

There was a day when I was a rarity because I knew criminals, and I knew them as a white collar worker. Today everybody knows a drug user, either in their own family or in the neighbourhood. It is the great devastation of our time; it can destroy the very fabric of our society if it continues.

I am also very grateful to my compatriot, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), who recorded most accurately the problem in the west, one that is now spreading throughout the country. I do not agree with everything he said, but I agree in part.

If oratory could solve the horrendous problem of mass killing by drug dealers, once known as merchants of death, it would have been solved this afternoon in this House of Commons.

I am deeply concerned that some hon. members are so out of touch that they believe the drug scene is the syndrome of the poor. It is not, Mr. Speaker; it is a problem of all classes of society, particularly the middle and upper classes.

An hon. Member: That is why we are dealing with it now.

Mrs. Holt: As a newcomer here I understand now why this disease has been allowed to spread and contaminate the whole country—why children have been affected and disabled by the time they reach their majority. They deteriorated and died on the streets. I watched it, Mr. Speaker. That is why I find this debating and playing games with such a serious problem so absolutely abhorrent.

I was appalled that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) made this a political debate when he, as Attorney General of the Province of Ontario only a few years ago, could have resolved many of the problems that are now endemic in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Don't get political!

Mrs. Holt: As a citizen of this great country I was saddened to think that a problem as serious as this could be treated as a matter of oratory. I hope I am not included in that because there is much I want to tell members from my experience working on the streets of Vancouver, on Mountain Avenue in Montreal, Yorkville in Toronto, Osborne Street in Winnipeg and in Calgary. I worked in Haight-Ashbury; I worked in Aspen, Colorado; and the lower east side of New York to research this problem. I have researched the basic causes of violence. So I come here not for oratory but to tell this House that we have a problem which everyone of us must put our minds to in order to solve it.

I begged for help in 1966, Mr. Speaker. I went across this country as it was exploding, and asked for help. But I was accused of being an alarmist. I tried to explain that when a house is burning and children are inside, we do not stand back and wait.

Nine year olds are now mainlining drugs and heroin. In British Columbia, 65 per cent of addicts are under 18 years of age. We are talking of children, Mr. Speaker. I can remember when I wrote a news story about a 17-year old girl using heroin and it ran on page one. That was only ten years ago, Mr. Speaker.

I can remember in the drug wars of 1955-56. When I worked behind the scenes with users, pushers and police, they only used bombs because there were just two syndicates. Now there are probably seven or eight, because the market is big enough to support them all.

● (2030)

We should be fortunate in Canada if there were only 15,000 addicts in this country. Statistics compiled by the new Co-ordinating Law Enforcement Unit, called CLEU in British Columbia, show that the average drug user uses an average of two caps a day, and that heroin addiction progresses and gets worse. In the old days you heard people talk of going "cold turkey", which was a painful experience. It simply meant that a user was trying to cut back to, say, one cap a day. In those days he paid $5 for a cap; today's price is between $35 and $40. If the user could stay on two caps a day, he thought it a miracle.

In almost every neighbourhood of Vancouver, Victoria, Nanaimo or Prince Rupert, actually in practically every village and town of British Columbia, you will find addicts. There is a well known corner in Vancouver where many known addicts used to congregate. The addict population remained stable for 10 or 12 years. Of the 3,300 known addicts in Canada, two thirds could be found in that neighbourhood of Vancouver. Today the addict population is much larger and the problem is much more serious. Young addicts are using between 15 and 20 caps a day, some as many as 35 caps. You can work out the arithmetic of the massive use and see how much crime results from a habit this big.

There has been so much oratory in this chamber today that perhaps it is time to put before hon. members some basic facts about the drug situation. I am aware of various facets of the law. I am not a lawyer but have worked in the streets and have been involved in observing nearly every facet of crime. I have worked in the courts, in the prisons, on parole cases, in the streets with addicts, and with hippies. They have even crashed my living room. I talked freely to them and learned from them. I have been close to the judiciary, to the legal profession and to the police doing law enforcement. I plan to go back to the streets again soon to bring my knowledge up to date. I spent half a day in Vancouver two weeks ago to obtain up-to-date information. I used to go out regularly, once a month, to find out what had happened since the drug scene exploded in 1966.

Today, following the drug user explosion which took place in Vancouver in 1966 and, to a lesser degree, in Toronto and Montreal, there is hardly a street in British Columbia on which you will not find drugs. Originally, of course, drugs simply meant heroin. There was little marijuana or cannabis about. Now you will find MDA, a high powered acid, amphetamines, particularly one called speed which kills—as they know in Toronto—cocaine, which we have not seen in British Columbia for 40 years, opium, the old time drug and elephant weed or Thai stick. How many of you have heard of that powerful form of cannabis?

In addition you will find cannabis in various forms. People say the drug is harmless, less dangerous than alcohol. Let me say here and now that alcohol is indeed the most dangerous drug. Who can say that if cannabis were to be freely available in society in the same manner as alcohol is freely available we will not see 750,000 cannabis addicts? If I had time I would tell you the damage cannabis does.

Organized Crime

Much research has been done into cannabis for the past 30 years. The term cannabis may cover various forms of the drug. For instance, there is marijuana, which varies in strength and degree of effectiveness. I am putting this simply because some members may not be aware of what is happening. Some having started need more and stronger cannabis. Others say, "If you have not tried it, don't knock it." I have not tried it. It is against the law, and it should stay that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: It varies in strength, depending on where it was grown, under what temperature conditions and so on. Hashish has long been known as the assassin's drug. It is 10 times as strong as ordinary marijuana. Liquid hashish is 10 times as strong as plain hashish, or 100 times stronger than marijuana.

What has happened? Despite the protestations of swingers in our society who want to be "with it", who said that cannabis is not dangerous, the number of addicts has increased from 3,300, of whom 2,200 were in that notorious area of Vancouver, to God knows what number nowadays. You will find their numbers increased dramatically in the two major cities of eastern Canada, and now, as I say, there are God knows how many addicts. You cannot walk on any street in downtown Vancouver in B.C. without seeing them.

There is a difference between the heroin addict of the old days and the modern addict. The old addict was euphoric, without the courage to engage in violence. To obtain drugs the old addict went into prostitution, shoplifting or burglary. At that time a cap cost only $5. Today the western addict is the way the New York addict has been for many years, a violent, dangerous killer. Studies show that the New York addict progressed, in the main, from cannabis to heroin. At least 70 per cent have followed that path. I am certain that the use of a combination of drugs is responsible for the emergence of violence in Vancouver.

Many professionals—doctors, lawyers, social workers, academics and other "with it" people—tried to ingratiate themselves with the young by "doing their thing". Unfortunately, the problem grew too big for the police to handle. Young people started to call the police pigs and, as you will recall, the police countered by saying, "If you are in trouble call a hippy." The police of Vancouver have done a good job, and they could do much better if their efforts were not nullified by the courts. They want people to help them. No doubt we need a larger force to cope with the problem. Often they need to do one job three times, largely because of the work of judges and lawyers.

The courts are not working to resolve the problem. Their actions are aggravating it. The police will work as much as five years gathering evidence through intensive surveillance for a charge or series of charges. The arrest is made and, within a few hours, bail is set and the accused is out on the street. These people have to intensify their drug pushing. They have to raise more money to pay their lawyer or, if there is a possibility of incarceration, to take off to somewhere else. Judges have handed down almost minimal sentences. The court of appeal recently reversed a sentence handed down by a provincial judge who had sentenced a major pusher to a fine of $15,000 with three years to pay or five months in jail. A major drug pusher can raise $15,000 within a month.

Let me tell you how quickly drug pushers can grow rich. Several years ago I was involved with a motorcycle gang.

Mr. Peters: You don't look the type.

Mrs. Holt: I will show you how to use a chain some day, if I really get rough. This young punk I am thinking of could not even afford his 50 cent initiation fee into a motorcycle gang— that's how poor he was. He could not afford to pay his dues at one time. Today, as a non-user pusher, he has at least five pieces of real estate in Vancouver and drives the latest model Mercedes-Benz.

● (2040)

In the spring of 1966 I began a book on teenagers. I discussed the changing morality of the young. I had two paragraphs dealing with LSD and marijuana. Then came Dr. Timothy Leary of Harvard, the great guru of the psychedelic cult, and all his followers. There were many in Canada, including a very famous doctor from Montreal who said that neither of these drugs was dangerous. By fall I had to stop production of that book because the situation had exploded. Originally we had only heard about this from Haight-Ashbury and the east end of New York. At that time there was nothing in Canada. It was not even enough for a footnote in a book.

In September, four months later, I sat with the young who came from eastern Canada, St. Catharines, Durham, Windsor, Hamilton. They were all eastern transients. We called them "hippies". In those days there was only one house of hippies. We called it a crash pad. Within two months every part of the city had these houses filled with circles of pot smokers. In addition, they were mainlining speed. I watched a boy mainline and rush against the wall.

They were joy popping heroin and smoking opium. Two draft dodgers in one house were showing them how to flag. That is shooting a needle in your arm and watching the blood come up.

An hon. Member: Really?

Mrs. Holt: Maybe you know about it. Maybe you are experts. But the way you talked today I did not think you knew about drugs.

The next thing we knew, they were mainlining chocolate cake, syrup and peanut butter. That was how the needle freak began and heroin started. We saw it all start. Then, as now, in this great and beautiful House members were playing their usual games and not paying attention to what was happening across this country.

An hon. Member: The Liberals were in office.

Mrs. Holt: You were all involved! You only wanted to make Hansard!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: Today this subject has been raised in a serious way. It is not political. There is only one member of this House who has made it something political, silly and immature. I must apologize, Mr. Speaker, for being rude. I have a lot to say, but I guess I had better not.

An hon. Member: Go ahead.

Mrs. Holt: Are you a lawyer? Are you a lawyer who has done what they did in Prince George? A lawyer rushed to get 14 out on bail on April 6 of this year. They are now pushing more intensively. They come in regularly with their drugs. There is a flash flood of drugs in Prince George, a little city in northern British Columbia. They come there with their drugs, and then get out before the police can do anything. These 14 are still awaiting trial. Justice delayed is justice denied to individuals and to society. That is your legal cliché.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mrs. Holt: Could I have just one more minute, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already given a minute for the applause. The hon. member can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Will the hon. member permit a question during the course of her remarks?

Mrs. Holt: Yes, it makes it easier.

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member indicated that in Vancouver drug addiction used to be restricted to about half a block. She put the figure at about 3,300 people. She also indicated that this disease now affects all classes. Does she agree that the reason we are debating this is that this disease now affects the middle class in Canada? One of the reasons we are finally waking up to the problem is that it is affecting our children. We should have been concerned for years about the same problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I absolutely agree that is true. It is now the children of the professionals and the middle class. That is what has happened. I do not disagree with that.

It was not 3,300 on Vancouver's notorious corner on Hastings Street. There were 2,200 there and 1,100 for the rest of Canada. That is an estimate. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I am not used to speaking from prepared notes and I am sort of lost.

Recently the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) was forced to move by direct indictment in order to get 24 people accused with respect to a drug ring importing from the Golden Triangle, in south east Asia, Laos, Burma and Thailand. There was a mass of undercover work and the arrest of 24 people. As a result drugs in Vancouver have temporarily dried up. Violence has increased. There is not a night goes by without three or four people being attacked. A policeman was shot within the last week. Unfortunately the minister had to move by direct indictment in order to get this case quickly before the courts.

Major cases have been delayed in coming before the courts by various stalling techniques. Two and a half years later there is an acquittal because the policemen cannot possibly handle the evidence of years before, mixed with the masses of crime that followed it.

I will simply go on to my recommendations. I have background for them. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a stiffening of public attitude toward drugs and crime. I hope there will be a stiffening here in this House.

We must fill the loopholes that now exist in the Bail Reform Act, but in the meantime we must use the 72 hour holding time which allows the courts to get information. This prevents the release of a drug pusher. If there is evidence of a massive drug operator, and that knowledge is before the courts, I hope bail will be denied. This will entail a speedy trial. I do not believe people should be kept in prison for long periods while the courts play with their cases.

There should be a review of the law on capital punishment to include the mass killers, which are what drug pushers are in our society. I know men are still in prison for life on commuted death sentences for killing one person in a fight; yet we allow these people to go out again on the street and kill thousands and thousands of young people.

● (2050)

I would recommend that we implement, as quickly as possible, Part II of the Narcotics Control Act. It is now on the books, but it has never been implemented. It would require all levels of government to achieve its purposes. It provides for the compulsory treatment of addicts. This is similar to what has happened in Japan and the way they are solving the problem there. But in Japan the addict coming for treatment and returning to drugs, immediately returns to the treatment centre. There is no secret that he must go back if he returns to drugs, and there is no such thing as mere possession. A person who is using drugs today must be a pusher, and there is no conscience among drug users; they will push it on anyone to get their own supplies.

I agree with the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe that there should be preventative correction. It goes back to day one in the life of a child, where there must be intervention to help families who cannot cope with their own problems.

We must find a way to put sanctions on countries like Turkey and those in the Golden Triangle which produce and distribute drugs throughout the world for non-medical use. It is a known fact that social solutions can never keep up with social problems. Perhaps today there was more talk than action, but on serious problems such as we are discussing today this great House of Commons should be seeking answers and solutions.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the others who have congratulated the mover of this motion, not only for bringing this matter to the attention of the House but also for his initial presentation, his reasoned, constructive, philosophical approach to this subject. I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), who has just preceded me. It is obvious to me from the manner in which she presented her case, as well as from my reading of some of the work she has written, that she is perhaps the most knowledgeable person in this area that we have in the House today.

I take it that one of the main roles of parliament is to highlight national problems as revealed to us as members of parliament in our contact with constituents, and in our mail. Organized crime, and law enforcement in connection with organized crime, are certainly one of those problems today. I take it also that the role of the opposition is to criticize from time to time, to propose courses of action, and to suggest alternatives for the government to implement.

I thought I had the parameters of this problem sorted out earlier on this debate until I heard the speech given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). He added another dimension which I find quite terrifying. Not being legally trained I was not aware of the implications of this particular aspect. In this area of international crime I find that the fracturing of responsibility, as mentioned by the minister, is one of the greatest sources of concern. It is one we have overlooked; because of split jurisdictions there is an ever present risk of breakdown in communications, of failure to take action where action is required, and of the danger that we shall fall between two stools or between more than two stools, maybe half a dozen stools, and here we are, flat, to the detriment of society.

We are pleading therefore in this debate for an assertion of positive leadership by the central government in contemplating this international phenomenon, this terrifying spectre. I underline the words "international phenomenon". Only the federal government can act in this area. It must do so.

Two weeks ago I visited all the high schools in my riding. I fondly imagined when I had made arrangements to visit these high schools that I would impart information. It turned out pretty much the other way. I came away with the feeling that I was carrying back with me a good deal more information than I had left behind. One of the most terrifying bits of information I got was connected with drugs. However, from one class—let's be fair—I learned of a community effort in trying to determine whether a pond was being contaminated because of the flow of some polluting material. That was a good community venture.

But in another class, what did I learn? One subject they wanted to talk about was marijuana. "Why don't we legalize it?" they asked. Why don't we make it possible for them to get marijuana? I argued that to do so would be leading further and further into a morass, and that it would lead to heroin. They denied it entirely. "How do you know it will?" they asked. "Have you ever tried it?" "I have never tried it", I told them. "All right, don't talk to us because we have tried it and we know. It does not lead to heroin".

I take the words of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway quite seriously because I know she has studied this seriously, and when she says it leads on, I take it it leads on. I am going to send a copy of these proceedings to that class, not because of my contribution but because of the other contributions which have been made here today.

They asked me how I knew it would lead to heroin if I had never tried it. How could I be so positive about it.

The argument continued, and they brought up alcohol and said "Why don't you do something about alcohol?" Well, we all admit alcohol is a problem. I held my ground, but I do not think I persuaded them. I said we were now confronted with a new hallucinogenic compound whose long term effects we did not know, so why broaden the permissive use of this until more is known. We have gone through the alcohol-prohibition kick. We are aware of the evils to which it could give rise, biologically, socially and domestically. We must exercise extreme caution.

Here we have something relatively new on the horizon. Are we going to take those steps which the young want, to legalize even the drug they consider the least harmful, cannabis? I am persuaded that if this is done we will not know the end of that road. We should exercise a good deal more caution regarding drug use than is the case with alcohol when we allocate funds for extensive research, something to which I shall return.

My other reason for urging that there be no extension is in the very nature of the people now using it—people with active, enquiring minds out to experiment. We all did this in our own way at that age, but happily I like to think without such inflammatory materials or quite such dangerous substances. Because of the adventurousness of these youngsters, many may try marijuana and, because the experience seems to give them some sort of a lift, they will try something else, and then they will take more and more. With the ever increasing threshold of tolerance about which we have just heard, they go from cap to cap to many caps, and the problem increases. The social consequences of this course of action are calamitous; we see some evidence of this today.

It is rather interesting to speculate why the roles have changed a little bit on the alcohol-drug scene. These children spoke about the damage that alcohol was doing in their lives. They saw their adult parents in the pubs on Saturday night, then come reeling home while the kids were wondering when supper would be served. The role is now changing: it is the children who are off on a trip and the parents are agonizing where they are, what is going to happen to them and how far they have got mixed up in drugs.

I have also been at meetings where mothers and fathers of drug addicted children pleaded for help. They did not know where to turn. They turn to the police, to social workers and to doctors, but so far there seems to be no real help given these parents, at least not within our present framework. Not enough time or money is devoted to this purpose. Closer municipal, provincial and federal co-operation is required, and I hope the day is not far off when this co-operation will be forthcoming.

There is a court record that appears regularly in either the Colonist or the Times in my area, and 80 per cent of the cases of one particular judge are in the sordid area of drug addiction. Children of 18, 19 and 20 come back to court, and back again. The rulings and endurance of this judge in face of this addiction are stoic in the extreme and he deserves the maximum support of our community. I hope that the solutions he is looking for will one day emerge.

I maintain that in present day society there has been a breakdown—this was evident from my discussions in the schools—in discipline and self-control within the family, within the schools and within the community. This promotes disrespect for law and for law enforcement. This is a subject that requires much more careful study before we can return to an era when discipline and self-control are qualities that are admirable, not qualities that people can say are of no account.

I am not all that enamoured of statistics, and we have had a good many statistics referred to us tonight showing how many drug addicts there are in Vancouver and in British Columbia in general, and how much it costs to support drug addiction. The figures I have in front of me are official, and show there are 6,500 addicts on the lower mainland, requiring some $350,000 a day to support the habit. I understand more extensive statistics suggest that this figure is closer to 15,000 and that the daily cost is $1 million. These are figures we have heard tonight, but they are worth repeating on the record of today's debate. These aberrations and moral derelictions are supported, promoted, aided and urged on by organized crime, crime that is organized on an international scale.

What can we do, Mr. Speaker, to come to grips with this problem? First of all, I suggest we must help the police. We must assist in getting the crime detection duties of our police forces assigned their proper priority, with crime detection itself at the top of the list. Professional training is needed. It has been mentioned before, but I repeat there are other duties now being performed by our police forces which might well be performed by those who are less professionally trained. These lesser duties need to be done, but not at the expense of the high priority that criminal detection requires.

Raids have been carried out, of course, and some of the drugs in use have been picked up; this fact was mentioned by the speaker who immediately preceded me. Rather than cite examples of this, I think some other facts ought to be put on the record. These are to be found in a report already mentioned by a number of speakers, the report by CLEU, initiated by the B.C. government. Federal support was given, but this report was initiated by the B.C. government, for reasons I find difficult to understand; leadership should have come from Ottawa. This report refers to the price spread of these products from when they first arrive until they get on the street. From a price of $7,500 for one pound, purchased direct from the Orient and delivered to Vancouver, the price rises to $22,000 to $25,000 when purchased by the distributor from the importer.

An hon. Member: Beryl Plumptre should look into that.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Yes, the price spread here is incredible; it just about triples. From a price of $3,000 per ounce purchased at the middleman level we go to $550 to $625 for one bundle of 25 caps as purchased by the street dealer or pusher. So hon. members can see that the price of this product multiplies astronomically. Exponential logarithms have nothing on these prices in the drug field. Prices in various parts of Canada are also cited by the report, which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on October 26, not so very long ago, page 7. This report is very definitely worth reading. Nothing on this scale would be possible without the massive intervention of organized international crime, with criminals battening on to a society whose defences are not what they ought to be.

There is mentioned, in these various extracts, the attention being focused on the many dangers of drug and drug abuse by the B.C. provincial government. There was also the provincial government inquiry by the B.C. Alcoholic and Drug Commission, and its report I think is also worthy of quoting. Since this is the library copy I did not feel I should mark it up, Mr. Speaker, so I will have to search through it for the particular item. I should really have used my red pencil to get these sorted out. There are very clear references in this report of the B.C. Alcoholic and Drug Commission report which indicate that this problem is going from bad to worse.

I have mentioned the role our policemen can play. In the community in which I live we have an extremely fine police force composed of officers who have been deeply involved and committed to community work. There are several who do a great deal in this particular field, and in the recovery of those who have lost their way in other areas and for other reasons. One particular man I think of is highly respected in the community and is always sought by the students and young people themselves. This is the sort of role a policeman should play.

I think it was the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. MacFarlane) who mentioned the need for a close relationship between the policeman and the community. He said that in his early days the policeman was always a friend. We now hear, and it is regrettable that they are all too often called "pigs". They cannot remain in that categorization in the minds of our young people. They must return to the role of being friends, counsel and advisers in our communities.

In one quotation I was unable to find from the B.C. Alcoholic and Drug Commission Report there is a passage I think deserves mention at this stage. The report suggests that it is not going to be government activity alone that will solve everything. It suggests that when people begin to take responsibility for their actions we will then be reaching the point where we will be able to do something about this. This is the line I tried to adopt when I was talking to high school students. I said their actions are going to lead to consequences of which they are not aware. I suggested that they beware of that course of action as they cannot do something like this and get away with it. This is just not possible.

We also heard the note sounded last week by the Law Reform Commission which was quoted by my hon. friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of allowing others to speak I will refrain from summarizing the various points I have tried to make.

Organized Crime

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, like many others who have preceded me in this debate today I should like to add my congratulation to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) on the philosophical manner in which he put the problems, as he terms them in his motion, of "interprovincial crime rings . . . operating out of control in the drug trade in British Columbia, the loan shark business in Ontario and in mafia-type conspiracies in Quebec".

The problems of international and interprovincial crime are, indeed, problems that have occupied the minds of the law makers and law enforcers of this nation and, indeed, of nations throughout the world since the beginning of time. In order to conquer these problems we need fundamental laws. I submit to you that this parliament in the last few years has been passing consistently such laws. We need in addition to good law enforcement—and this requires co-operation at all levels, municipal, provincial and federal, of law enforcement agencies—to ensure that the criminal who dares break the law will meet with the most severe sanctions this parliament can possibly determine.

As is the case with many problems, there are in respect of the drug addict legal problems and medical problems as well. This was pointed out by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). I feel that in the case of a person who is truly sick, the man who is addicted to the use of this most terrible drug, heroin, and who is at the same time a pusher, he is taking the place of the chain store and the supermarkets on the streets of British Columbia as well as other parts of our nation. It is through that supermarket chain that most people are introduced to the use of heroin. The man who himself must feed his own habit by inducing others to become addicted to drugs is the man who epitomizes the most serious problem we have to face in combating the addiction to drugs, especially heroin, across this nation.

If we go back in the chain of supply we must inevitably come to the commercial trafficker in drugs. Perhaps I might be permitted to call upon my own personal experience in the practice of law in citing a case which illustrates two things; the great benefit which accrues to those who are commercial traffickers in drugs, and the great courage of police officers of this country, as well as of international police forces, in attempting to curb this type of crime.

The particular case I cite took place in this city some few years ago. It involved the co-operation of the United States Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs, the RCMP and the Ottawa city police. At the time there was a quantity of heroin of a purity of about 99 per cent being offered for sale. The transaction was to take place in a prominent hotel in this city. I commend the officers involved in this undercover operation for their heroism.

There was one officer in a room with four persons who were trafficking in this drug. The amount involved was valued at some $2.5 million.

He was alone in the room and, as the criminals came in, they frisked him to make sure that he had no weapon on him. His coat was off and a gun was stuck in the small of his back. He was confronted by international elements, one of whom was a French national with a French passport, another a citizen of the United States, and two musclemen who were from the city of Ottawa. They came in to the room with this lone officer who weighed perhaps 150 pounds, a small, defenceless man, by himself, with three and a half kilos of pure heroin. He was there alone to represent the law enforcement agents of this community and in fact all of us.

As the result of good police work international co-operation and good laws in this case, as well as the result of the wiretap which was being taken of the transaction, immediately upon the transaction having been consumated and the illicit substance delivered in the hotel room in Ottawa—the money was delivered simultaneously in another hotel room in New York city, the French national, we believed, having brought the substance to the city—they were all arrested at the same time. As a result of the fact that RCMP officers were in adjacent rooms—I have said there was an undercover operator in the room where the transaction was taking place—and the good work of the Ottawa city policemen—all of whom could have been shot and killed suddenly but this was prevented by better use of detective information—everything ended well.

If I mention that story in order to point out that to combat this type of international crime we in Canada must have effective police work, coupled with good laws, and the best possible technological equipment available to help the police forces.

Let me refer back to the last parliament, the twenty ninth parliament, when, on two separate occasions, the Conservative Party and the NDP joined to vote against the government. On both occasions they produced a catastrophe for themselves and, I believe, for the people of Canada. The last one of those occasions was on July 8 when they voted against us and suffered a loss. The result of that has been a good strong government on this side. But prior to that, and the only other time that the two opposition parties joined their forces to vote against us, was when they wanted to introduce into the protection of privacy act a 90 day warning period, which would mean that 90 days after a wiretap is authorized against someone suspected of having committed a crime he would be notified of it.

Originally the period for which wiretapping was authorized was only 30 days which, in my submission, is far too short a time to allow for any proper detective or investigative work, but in the event that they do not come upon sufficient evidence to lay a charge, at the end of 90 days they would have to notify the person who is under investigation that he has been under electronic surveillance. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe and the hon. member for New Westminster brought forward that amendment which would have prohibited the type of investigation to which I have referred, which resulted in the apprehension and conviction of international criminals dealing in this most reprehensible of crimes, that is, international trafficking in heroin.

The investigation to which I have referred took many months, many months in the United States and many months in Canada, and the wiretap evidence which was produced at the trial of those individuals was secured by a court order, not a court order in the province of Ontario or any other jurisdiction within the province, but a court order obtained by the Supreme Court of the State of New York, because that was where the tap was finally put on. There was constant communication between Ottawa and New York while this transaction was taking place.

So it does not make sense for a member of the official opposition to say on one hand that we should do everything we can to combat organized crime—and I agree with that—and on the other hand to speak out of both sides of his mouth and deny agencies what they need in order to investigate and keep under surveillance at all times persons who are engaged in the most reprehensible of all crimes, that is, commercial trafficking in heroin.

The one who is causing us more problems, however, but who could not exist were it not for the former, is the one who is selling four or five caps a day and who is himself an addict and under compulsion, because of his need to feed his habit, to sell to others and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) said, to induce young children to form this insidious habit. The Narcotic Control Act dates back to 1960 when we were in a different age, a different time. It seems to me that the act needs to be reviewed in its entirety by the government in light of the changing circumstances and changing attitudes of society with respect to the use of drugs. The act has been amended since it was passed in 1960, but not sufficiently.

The riding which I represent has within its boundaries many primary and secondary schools, colleges and universities, and it is of great concern to the people in this community, as it is to the people of British Columbia and all across Canada, that we do what we can, and that we do it as quickly as we can, to point out to the young people—and as a father of five teenagers I am fully aware of the importance of this—that the use of drugs can lead to nothing but harm for them and for those with whom they associate.

The bail reform laws that we have in this country now have had a salutary effect in ensuring that those people who do not have enough money and who were formerly refused bail are now granted their freedom. However, in the prosecution of drug offences it is more the rule than otherwise that a person who is charged with trafficking in heroin is immediately released on bail. And immediately upon his release he will have to go back to his old pattern in order to feed his habit. Such people are often arrested again for the same crime.

I would suggest to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) that the Bail Reform Act should be looked at closely in view of the facts that have emerged since its introduction. Perhaps it should be amended to give precise instructions to the judges who are charged with administering it, rather than the onus being placed on the Crown to demonstrate that the person involved is not likely to show for his trial or that he is likely to commit another crime. We might get to the position where such persons would be kept in custody so long as there was evidence to indicate the likelihood of their committing the same crime again!

I understand that in Vancouver some 3,000 drug cases are awaiting trial. This is because of the Bail Reform Act on the one hand and because of legal aid too, although the latter is a good thing. The same backlog exists in Toronto. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway said a few moments ago, "Justice delayed is justice denied".

I am afraid that during the two years some of those people out on bail are awaiting trial they may commit the same crime again. Unfortunately, even if convicted of the second crime committed while on bail, the sentence is often not as severe as it should be.

If I may comment briefly on the statement of the hon. member for New Westminster, Mr. Speaker, I believe we are dealing with more than just a medical problem when we are dealing with the addict who is also a pusher. This is a very serious social problem which this parliament must face, and perhaps it will be necessary for us to review the Narcotic Control Act in order to deal with it. Traffickers may indeed be sick but they are also committing a criminal offence. There should be strict conditions for parole and medical treatment for such offenders, but not just paper parole and paper medical treatment. There should be effective supervision so that if they dare move into that field again, or induce other persons to use drugs, they would be incarcerated, whether for medical treatment or the protection of society.

Our fundamental problem is how to deter people from engaging in this and indeed all types of criminal activity, and thereby protect society. I heard the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) say that the method of fighting crime in Canada is wrong. Mr. Speaker, my investigations and research indicate that our law enforcement agencies are among the most highly respected in the world. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is one of the most highly thought of anywhere.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Let's keep it that way.

Mr. Poulin: The immediate past commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was named as president of Interpol in the last session, which would indicate that the RCMP is regarded highly by the law enforcement agencies of other nations. I think we in this House and this country should be giving our police forces the best and latest technological assistance available to encourage them in their fight against crime. This would be in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, while this country of late has been concerned with the high cost of living and the accompanying economic problems—and so it should—I am pleased that the time has come to bring attention to bear on an area of equally great concern to virtually every Canadian, even if just for a day. I refer, of course, to the ever-growing crime rate and even, in many cases, to the very issue of life and death. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) should be congratulated for bringing this matter before the House in such an eloquent manner.

The rate of criminal activity is increasing daily in our society and, quite simply, current methods of crime control are obviously not working. We find organized crime making giant inroads into every major city in this country. For example, in Toronto alone, organized crime is already well established from the loan sharking field to the narcotics trade. All resources of our police department are being utilized to the maximun and, despite this, we are falling behind in the race even to hold the line on the spread of organized crime in this country.

Of all criminal activities, the most infectious and dangerous is that of the narcotics trade. No one crime so destroys any individual. No one crime is more responsible for over-all criminal activity such as theft, breaking and entering, robbery, prostitution, and crimes of violence within the criminal community itself. For no one crime is it so difficult to convict the ringleaders. No one crime accounts for more police requirements than does this area of activity. Those criminals involved are the worst in our society, for they pick on the weak, the confused, the frustrated and the young, and they spread a disease worse than cancer, a disease that could not only ruin an individual but destroy our whole way of life.

As if this is not enough, we must consider the inroads being made by these traffickers in human misery among our children. Recent reports have indicated an increase in prostitution among 13 and 14 year old girls in an effort to feed their drug habits. In southern Ontario alone the growth of the illegal drug trade has been made painfully obvious by the huge quantities of drugs seized by police authorities. In addition, a number of illegal drug laboratories catering not only to the southern Ontario market but to the export market as well, have been uncovered. It becomes difficult, if not impossible, even to estimate the illicit drug market in this country, but several million dollars each day is not an exaggerated figure.

In spite of all this—in spite of the human misery and the increasing pressure on the police to combat the growth of this illegal drug activity, what do we find the government doing? Mr. Speaker, rather than increasing penalties for importing and trafficking in narcotics and attacking the problem head on, as New York State has done with its tough legislation, the Liberal government sounds out a policy of relaxation on such laws.

I for one would not hesitate to go as far as having trafficking in narcotics included as a capital offence. To touch on capital punishment, Mr. Speaker, when is the government going to have the backbone and guts to enforce the regulations regarding capital punishment already in existence? I refer of course to the killing of policemen and prison guards in the execution of their duty. The time has come to let the criminal element of this country know that the wanton slaying of those who uphold our laws shall be punishable with death. They should pay with their lives. We should set the example, not merely speak about it.

In addition, the parole system which has permitted convicted killers to come out of jail and kill again must no longer be tolerated. Similarly, maximum security institutions to which our hardened criminals have been sentenced must be administered by competent custodians, and not simple minded political hacks who apparently permit these killers to come and go as they please, as witnessed recently at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary for the third or fourth time in as many years.

Organized Crime

Consider this headline in today's Toronto Star, "Escaped killer admits 2 more murders". Arthur Gagnier wrote an "Open Letter to Society", which was published in that newspaper. Gagnier, first convicted of murder at 17, admitted he has killed twice more since he escaped from prison in August. For how long will the government allow this situation to exist? If Gagnier is caught, will the capital punishment provisions of the Criminal Code come into effect? This has not happened in the past, and I doubt if the present government will insist on capital punishment being inflicted in these circumstances.

No killer has the right to inflict his presence on society after he has been sentenced for murder. For if he does, he is living proof that society has no desire to protect itself or protect those hired to protect lives and property. To let him back into society makes a mockery of the law, makes a mockery of those who enacted the legislation, and of those who elected the representatives who passed the legislation.

Another area in which organized crime has made major advances is that of money lending, more commonly known as loan-sharking. In Toronto this practice has led organized criminals to place more and more funds at the disposal of such money lenders. It is estimated that upwards of $100 million is on loan in the cities of Toronto and Montreal. This figure may not be large by itself; but consider the repayment plans. Commonly, 25 per cent is taken off the top of the loan; in addition, between 25 per cent and 50 per cent is charged on the balance each month.

Surely no one is so naïve as not to believe the stories of harassment, intimidation and physical injury which result from non-payment. There are many such examples in Toronto alone. Right now an individual in my city is missing and believed dead by the police because of non-repayment of his loan to loan sharks. It is time for new legislation which will bring these loan sharks to trial. Let us plug loopholes in the Criminal Code and in the Small Loans Act which permit the operations of loan sharks.

Many other areas of crime should come under investigation. For example, to what degree have labour unions been infiltrated by the underworld? To what extent has the laundering of dirty money through legitimate business enterprises been accomplished in this country? To what extent is organized crime manipulating our stock exchanges; and, most important, what can be done to turn the tide in favour of our law enforcement agencies?

Obviously although an increase in manpower would be an asset and greater budgets for technical improvement welcome, such action alone is not enough. Without the legal tools, and without the backing of our courts, we are tying the hands of those very organizations we expect to protect us. Civil liberties organizations demand more and more rights for criminals and are getting them, at the expense of the honest, hard working citizens of this country. They have obtained so much that it has become virtually impossible for police investigation officers to secure convictions in any but the most straightforward and simple cases. In retrospect I, for one, feel that the passage of the wiretapping bill was, in the words of Toronto Police Chief Harold Adamson, "a moment of joy throughout the criminal community". Investigations which might take long months of surveillance if a conviction is to be obtained will now be limited to a 90-day period. The hope of conviction in international conspiracies is virtually eliminated.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

It is my fervent wish that after this debate we shall see established a government committee which will present new meaningful legislation to equip crime fighting agencies throughout this country with better tools and more power to combat our ever increasing criminal element. Surely the time has come to declare this country's intention to afford safeguards and protection for its citizens.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the mover of the motion, not for what he said in the motion but for the sentiments he expressed. He used to be known as a law and order judge, but in his speech he showed a breadth of sympathy which was refreshing. Let me say this, however: if we were sitting on a jury instead of in the House of Commons, we should be a hung jury. I am glad of the many changes in the law which we introduced in previous parliaments, because they certainly would not be introduced in the present parliament.

Almost everyone who participated in the debate was in favour of capital punishment for all sorts of offences. The last speaker included two or three that had not been mentioned previously. That is not the way to overcome society's difficulties. We, as legislators, must remember that we are not legislating for the present only; we are legislating for future generations. Many ideas expressed today were retrograde rather than progressive.

Little has been said about organized crime in general. An hon. lady spoke about drugs and suggested she knew more than some others about the subject. That may well be so. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) suggested that we should look at the whole problem and decide how best to solve it. The best way may not be by sending people to jail. God knows, Canada has an unenviable record in sending people to jail. We have the largest jail population, in percentage terms, of any civilized country. If we do what some members suggest, we should need even more jails. Why, we could not even keep up with the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) who seems to think that the solution to our problems is more and bigger penitentiaries.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): And letting criminals escape.

● (2150)

Mr. Peters: We have to let them escape because we can't build jails fast enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: A few moments ago an hon. member was talking about the problem of alcohol. He talked of the relationship between the problem of alcohol and problems that affected the previous generation. Today alcohol is probably the major problem in the United States. More difficulties are caused by it than all the other drugs put together.

I am interested in what happened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). Sam Bronfman is one of the most wealthy men in this world. He owns Seagrams Distillery. That institution existed during prohibition. Immense profits were made in illegal rum running across the border between the United States and Canada. The Minister of National Health and Welfare should be looking at the problem of alcohol in this country instead of accepting a ride in a private plane owned by Seagrams Distillery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Peters: Maybe there is nothing wrong with that, but it seems to me there is a hell of a lot that is not right with a minister who does not see anything wrong with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: A lot has been said about drugs. I do not know much about them, but I do know some of the problems they have created. Youth today look at most adults as outsiders.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Squares.

Mr. Peters: Yes, squares, one of the reasons is that we have not looked at the Le Dain Report with a view to legalizing or removing marijuana from the penal code.

A few minutes ago a member talked about the RCMP. He stated how wonderful they are. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, they are much like the Ontario Provincial Police who, over the years, have made their reputation tearing up and down the roads on weekends catching people speeding. Previously in this House I mentioned the problem where the RCMP broke into a woman's bathroom. That is what the RCMP, do Mr. Speaker.

What do they accomplish over a weekend? Two or three kids are caught drinking in a pub under age, and one or two kids are caught for personal possession of marijuana. Does that do anything for society? Does it help the situation?

I agree with the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe. We have to look at the problem and we have to do it in a social sense. In the United States they have said that an addict is not sick. A doctor can no longer prescribe cocaine for his patients.

Great Britain had the same problem. They handled it in a different way. They decided these people could be helped medically. They introduced the registration of addicts, and began to treat them. There are many indications of the results in Great Britain. The crime rate in any major city on the North American continent indicates the results we have had.

Members of parliament should look at this problem in the social sense. For many years they have looked at it in a sense of punishment. That is totally unsatisfactory.

It is not the people on the street who are getting rich. The people who are getting rich are those in organized crime. Even though they are known to the police, they are untouchable. There is not a member of this House who does not know where money can be obtained from one of the crime fields in the drug industry.

We have not attacked this problem. We do not appear to be prepared to attack. I agree with the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe that it is time wo looked at this problem. What are the social ills being caused by this problem? We must take steps to do something about this.

Policemen in this country are not highly respected. They do jobs that society will not support. Any police force which tries to enforce laws that society does not believe should be retained is not a satisfactory force. It does not have the support of the community.

It is time that we looked at some of the laws which allow organized crime to flourish. We must bring them into line with the thinking of society. Our police forces could then enforce laws that should be enforced. If we do that, we will not have the hang everybody attitude that most members in this debate have talked about. Members will stand up and say they are prepared to look at what society is now, and what the young people are saying. They will consider the most progressive thought possible. We will have legislation that will enable our police forces to operate in a community spirit, enforcing the laws that we make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—REPRESENTATION OF PALESTINIANS AT GENEVA CONFERENCE—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on November 1 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) if it was now the opinion of the Canadian government that the Palestinian people should be represented at the Geneva Conference by the PLO. As I indicated in my question, my inquiry was based upon the fact that all the leaders of the Arab states, including His Majesty the King of Jordan, had, at the Rabat summit conference, agreed that the PLO should represent the Palestinian people. My question was also asked against the background of the statement of the Canadian government's point of view expressed by the minister, his predecessor, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the effect that the Palestinian people should, in fact, be represented at Geneva.

For a long time I had been told that Canada would not prejudge the situation; that the parties involved would decide. I was a little surprised that the minister would reiterate this pat formula after the Rabat conference. If the Canadian government does not agree with the Arab leaders' choice, and apparently it does not or the reply to my question would have been in the affirmative, what group does the government believe should be there? King Hussein has accepted the PLO. Does Canada disagree with him?

I need hardly ask if the government of Canada desires the presence of those splinter Palestinian groups who oppose the PLO for its moderation. Does the government of Canada believe that the Palestinians should appropriately be represented at Geneva by the government of Israel? Putting it simply and directly, it is now a little late to proclaim our unwillingness to prejudge. Judgments of real significance have already been made and we do ourselves and the cause of peace no real good by protective phraseology.

I do not pose questions of this kind to embarrass the minister or the government, for, while I do not have a high regard for the latter, I have the utmost respect and esteem for the former. Rather, am I seeking to stimulate interest in this subject because I verily believe it to be one of the most serious and explosive issues facing the whole of mankind today. The Middle East, the cradle of our civilization, could also be the crucible of its destruction. Through timeless ages this small portion of the globe has heard the clashing of armies and witnessed the crashing of great civilizations. More than once in the last ten years in this House I have recalled fearfully that Armageddon, the prophetic point of no return for mankind, has its locale in the Middle East.

I hope Canada will be strong in the cause of moderation and firm in the exercise of wisdom. We are dealing with an area which has a sad and long record of bad faith, violence, super-power meddling and intense human suffering. It is not helpful now to recall that in the setting up of the state of Israel the U.N. violated one of its fundamental principles—adherence to the right of self-determination.

Nothing is gained, either, by noting that death-dealing raids on Lebanese civilians or Palestinian refugees are no less violent than raids on Israeli citizens within their country. Little is gained by recalling the Arab terrorist acts upon innocent airline passengers while forgetting or condoning the shooting down of a civil Libyan aircraft. Terrorism, violence, threats and intimidation are not the ingredients of settlement.

We must be realistic. It is as unwise as it is immoral to act as though there were no Palestine and no Palestinians. As that brilliant expert on the Middle East, Rabbi Slonim, put it recently: "Only the PLO can be dealt with politically; it is the only representation the Palestinians have. Treating it as though it were not just a monolith of irredeemable terrorists is worth a try."

These and similar counsels of wisdom are worth heeding. Let the Palestinians forsake the threat of some of their numbers to obliterate Israel. It is now a fact of life in the Middle East. On the other hand, if Israel desires peace—and no part of the region needs it more—let it recognize that its right to existence does not imply existence within borders of its own choosing.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

As long ago as 1970, at a meeting of parliamentarians in Cairo, I was presumptuous enough to advise the friends of Palestine as to the unreality of any campaign to erase Israel. At the same time I expressed the view that Israel's borders were not a matter for unilateral decision by that internationally-created entity.

It is my hope that Canada, realistically, patiently and tirelessly, will work toward a day when co-existence will replace terrorism, and violence will give way to enlightened self-interest. I bring to my support a statement by a very great scholar, former President of the Hebrew university in Jerusalem, upon his resignation from the United Jewish Appeal because of its refusal to do anything about the Arab refugees. These are the words of Dr. Juda L. Magnes: "Peace can come only if Israel and Ishmael can feel that they are brothers."

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) has made a number of important comments on the situation in the Middle East. His observations in the House are usually witty, perceptive and helpful. I shall certainly not have the time in the few minutes at my disposal to deal with the complex and delicate situation which prevails in the Middle East at the present time, or with the debates which have taken place at the United Nations General Assembly, particularly the debate to commence tomorrow on the Palestinian question.

The hon. gentleman has referred to the question of the representation of the Palestinians at the upcoming Middle East peace negotiations or discussions that will hopefully lead to a peace settlement. We as a government have taken the view that the Palestinian people ought to be represented at any discussions regarding a settlement in the Middle East. It is obvious that the Palestinians constitute an important party to a future settlement and therefore ought to be represented.

When the matter was put before the United Nations, in explaining our abstention we stated that it was not the intention of the Canadian government to prejudge what the form of that representation ought to be. I think this is an appropriate position for Canada to take. We have taken a fair-minded and objective approach to the Middle East situation, and we think we should leave it to the parties themselves to determine what form such representation ought to take.

It is true that at the Rabat summit conference the Arab countries, apparently with the concurrence of the King of Jordan, accepted the PLO as, in their view, the appropriate representative of the Palestinian people. That, of course, is a new factor in the situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret interrupting the minister but the time allotted him to reply has expired.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—ALLEGED FAILURE OF POWDERED MILK PROCESSORS AND RETAILERS TO GIVE CONSUMERS BENEFIT OF SUBSIDY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, on October 25 the Food Prices Review Board revealed that during the course of its regular monitoring inspections it found there were instances where the full benefit of the 24 cents per pound subsidy on skim milk powder was not being reflected in retail prices. This discovery was made in a number of stores in Vancouver, Victoria, Winnipeg, Sudbury and Montreal.

The board further indicated that it was not certain whether the retailers or the country's eight skim milk powder processing companies were at fault, and that it had therefore brought the matter to the attention of the agriculture ministry with a request that steps be taken to ensure that all processors and retailers of skim milk powder comply with the spirit and the letter of the subsidy program.

This revelation by the Food Prices Review Board prompted me to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) on October 28 if he would reveal what steps were being taken by his department to recover the money which had been stolen from the public treasury. The minister replied that he would refer my remarks to the Director of Investigation and Research, who would take action in accordance with the provisions of the act. May I point out here that I firmly believe that this action on the part of the retailer or retailers involved was nothing less than fraudulent, nothing less than theft of public funds. We are talking about a government subsidy being paid to stabilize the price of skim milk powder at a reasonable price to the consumer. It is public money, and it belongs back in the pocket of the consumer.

The Retail Council of Canada disagrees with me. Let me quote from the Ottawa Citizen which recorded the remarks of the Retail Council spokesman, Mr. Smith. According to the Citizen he said this:

> Stores need not pass on to shoppers the federal subsidy of 24 cents a pound on skim milk powder. The council has advised grocery stores that they are not obliged to give consumers the subsidy. Mr. Smith said retailers have been told they "run the risk of a certain amount of government criticism" if they refuse to pass on the subsidy.

The Citizen went on to say that no law requires the retailers to let government subsidies influence pricing. Mr. Smith then went on to say that retailers have the right to make their own price decisions. That should give Canadians an idea of where the Retail Council stands on the subject of subsidies. What the Retail Council was in effect saying is that they can pocket the money Canadian taxpayers are contributing in an effort to lower the skim milk powder prices. This kind of logic is really ridiculous.

I am 100 per cent positive that not one Canadian consumer wants his tax dollar going into the bulging pockets of the retailers. I should think that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would have moved on the basis of this statement from the Retail Council. But no, apparently when the Canadian taxpayer provides a subsidy on a product we have to legislate a law that retailers cannot put that subsidy in their pockets.

Let us at this point review the course of action followed by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. First they embarked on an investigation, presumably to see if the Food Prices Review Board was telling the truth. They found that, and I quote from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as reported in Hansard on October 30:

> The greater majority of retailers—with only one exception—have passed on the subsidy to consumers.

Apparently the Minister of Agriculture threatened to withdraw the subsidy if the retailer did not comply. I have no argument with that action, but again the logic is ridiculous. However the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs entered into a type of negotiations with the retailer to the effect that: "If you, the retailer, who has been pocketing the taxpayer's money, will now reduce your prices on skim milk powder to an amount equivalent and for a length of time equivalent to that which you overcharged the consumer, then we will not tell the public your name."

Well, for heaven's sake, who does the minister think runs this country? Apparently he does not know, so for his information I should like to point out that taxpayers, the people of Canada, run this country, and they depend upon the minister to make sure their interests are protected. As the minister responsible for consumer affairs he has no darn business protecting the identity of that retailer. I want to know the name of the retailer who was ripping off the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian consumer, because I do not want to shop there any more, and I bet my constituents do not want to shop there either. I can pick up the newspaper any day and read about the trial of any individual who is accused of wrongdoing. I hope that in his prepared reply the parliamentary secretary to the minister will tell me the name of the retailer who was pocketing the subsidy.

This situation has made it amply clear that the subsidy program as it is presently structured is far too open to ripoffs of the consumer by the retailer. Under its present structure the subsidy is administered by the Department of Agriculture, which pays the subsidy to the processor, who is then responsible for ensuring that the retailer does indeed give the consumer the benefit of such subsidy. If the processor discovers that the subsidy is not being passed on by the retailer, the onus is on the processor to cut off supplies of the subsidized material to the retailer. Then we have the Food Prices Review Board out watchdogging at public expense, and not having the power even to release the name of the culprit. It is fairly obvious that this Liberal subsidy program does not work for the consumer.

This brings me to my final point, Mr. Speaker. It is absolutely essential that we have a minister of consumer affairs whose purpose is to protect the consumer as he forages for his daily bread in the retail jungle. Indeed, this whole business of the minister being the minister for both consumer and corporate affairs reminds me of the biblical quotation from Matt. 6:24:

> No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other.

To paraphrase, Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot serve the consumer and the companies.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all state that, as the hon. member is aware, the responsibility for the skim milk subsidy program as such lies with the Department of Agriculture and not with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Secondly, as far as the government as a whole is concerned, it is a matter of record that the government not only hoped but fully intended that consumers would receive the full benefit of the subsidy. To this end the Department of Agriculture set up a monitoring program, and through this we know that some outlets have not consistently passed on the subsidy.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) stated in the House on October 28 that his officials have held discussions with the dairy council and the Retail Council of Canada, and have informed non-conforming outlets that the subsidy will be withdrawn from them if it is not fully passed on.

The minister stated, as recorded at page 880 of Hansard for October 30:

> The latest report I have had came yesterday. Every retail outlet was passing this saving on to the consumers except for one, and yesterday they thought they would be doing it. I have not received a report on that this morning.

As reported at page 8 of the Globe and Mail of November 5:

> A supermarket chain has rolled back a price increase on skim milk powder in face of a Government threat to cut it out of the federal subsidy program. The chain has agreed to lower the price below the regular level by as much as it increased it, and to keep the lower price in effect for as long as it maintained the higher one.

There is no doubt that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs know and understand the importance of these subsidies being passed on directly to the consumer. The Department of Agriculture has a monitoring program to ensure that that is done, and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the areas where subsidies are under our supervisory control, is doing precisely the same thing.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—METRIC SYSTEM—COMPENSATION TO SCHOOLS FOR COST OF CONVERSION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my comments tonight to the matter of metric conversion. In 1970 parliament endorsed the white paper on metric conversion in Canada, and in June, 1971, the Metric Commission was established by order in council. Its major responsibility, within its terms of reference, was to prepare an over-all plan for conversion to the metric system. This responsibility, which was accepted by the federal government and directly transferred to the commission, is, to my mind, not being fully met by the commission at present, and all the ramifications of that conversion are not apparent to Canadians.

In a recent Gallup poll which was made public on November 2 of this year it was made evident that 62 per cent of Canadians who were questioned on whether or not they understood what the metric system meant said they understood the system. Yet when they were asked to explain what it was, only 33 per cent related it satisfactorily to the decimal system. It was this minimal knowledge which was regarded as satisfactory so far as the purposes of the poll were concerned.

At present we are faced with the actual conversion to the metric system, and the paramount question with which we are confronted is public education, not only education within our public schools at all levels but the education of the public at large, if the system is to work at all. I believe that the cost of this conversion will be astronomical, and I have not as yet seen anyone come up with a clearcut figure of what the conversion will cost.

However, I should like to point out three areas of which I can think immediately where the costs would have to be substantial. One would be the area of land titles. I believe the old ones will become obsolete because they do not have metric linear measurements. Another is highway signs, which are generally the responsibility of provincial governments. I have seen some changes taking place with regard to present mileage measurements. I believe that conversion will present a major cost. Lastly, we will have conversion in the public education system. A start will have to be made to educate people in the metric system.

We should also consider the cost which will have to be borne by an individual who is, let us say, working as an auto mechanic. He will have to buy another set of tools. Surely the government should give some consideration to a tax writeoff or concession to that individual because of the extra costs he will have to bear.

It is my belief that the federal responsibility with regard to the conversion is based on the fact that the federal government made a decision to convert to the metric system. This was the unanimous decision of the House of Commons, and I accept it. It should also be clear that the federal government has a responsibility in cost sharing for all metric conversion in areas where it has not previously taken financial responsibility because of provincial rights. An example of this is education. The Manitoba Association of School Trustees estimates that the cost of conversion for individuals in the academic stream in schools will be approximately $4 per pupil, and about $50 per pupil in the vocational schools.

If we accept that metric conversion is a federal responsibility then surely it is incumbent upon the government to announce, well in advance of conversion, what form of grants or assistance will be made available to public institutions such as school boards, to cover the costs of conversion. The school boards of Canada get their primary funds from local taxpayers, Mr. Speaker, so I believe it is incumbent upon the government to clarify what steps it will take to east the financial burden of metric conversion on such bodies.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government in regard to metric conversion was outlined in the White Paper on Metric Conversion laid before the House in January 1970, and approved by the leaders of all parties. Throughout this White Paper the analysis is based on the assumption that the costs of conversion will be borne by those incurring them, just as the benefits flowing from conversion will accrue to the individual organization, either directly or through the general health of the economy.

This policy of costs being borne by those incurring them places pressure on the individual organization to apply to the problem of metric conversion, initiative and enterprise to minimize costs. In fact experience in countries such as Great Britain and Australia, which have followed this policy, confirms that conversion in individual firms has generally been achieved at substantially lower costs than were originally estimated.

In the case of education the responsibility for costs is in the jurisdiction of the provinces. Already work done by the task force of the Council of Ministers of Education indicates that, with imagination, initiative and ingenuity, costs can be kept down. Conversion is being phased in so that some advantage can be taken of obsolescence and the normal patterns of replacement.

To the extent that there may be, in some cases, an unreasonable burden placed on the budgets of individual school divisions this is primarily a responsibility of the province to meet. However, the benefits that the program of metric conversion will bring to the general health of the economy will be experienced by the provinces and to the same extent as by the federal government.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF HON. MEMBER FOR NORTHUMBERLAND-DURHAM CONCERNING HOUSE OF COMMONS EMPLOYEES

Mr. Speaker: I have received notice of the remarks made in yesterday's debate and recorded in Hansard which, in the view of some hon. members, might give rise to a question of privilege. Following that, I received formal notice by some hon. members concerning the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence).

On examining the remarks in order to understand the nature of the question of privilege, it appeared to me that they might be open to more than one interpretation. I understand the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham has indicated that his remarks have been misinterpreted and he would be pleased at this time to clarify any misinterpretations. If so, he would relieve the Chair of the burden of proceeding with any question relating to those remarks.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, you have caught me breathless. I had hoped to hear the nature of the misinterpretations. I should say for your benefit, sir, and for the benefit of hon. members who were in touch with my office this morning, that according to my understanding most of the races have been cancelled today owing to weather conditions.

Apart from that, sir, I gather from what I heard in the House last night that one misinterpretation was the following: that somehow or other I had indicated that elevator operators, messengers and guards of this House were accepting bets or acting as bookies. Of course, nowhere did I say anything like that. What I did say was that as I am certainly aware, any hon. member must be naïve and out of touch with reality if he does not think organized crime has not reached Parliament Hill. It is a very easy matter for any member to find out where to place a bet. Certainly, that is the extent of what I said last night and what I repeat today.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member has suggested that the incidence of this sort of thing is sufficiently commonplace for one to be able to inform oneself without going outside this building to learn where it is taking place, and as that is the sort of allegation which does not in any way reflect on criminal activity within the building—the interpretation that such activity does take place within the building being a totally different one—I suggest, in view of the clarification contained in the hon. member's remarks, that unless other members propose to give notice that those remarks constitute a question of privilege, I should not perhaps carry the matter any further at this time.

● (1410)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, you did not hear the words as I did from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) when he said that organized crime had reached this House. Is he alleging that organized crime is taking place in this House?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The very purpose of raising this subject, of course, was to invite the hon. member to clarify that remark. I understand from his clarification, and I trust I am supported by other hon. members in it, that the existence of the sort of thing we were discussing in the debate yesterday is sufficiently commonplace. This is the suggestion and tenor of the hon. member's remarks, that one can inform oneself without going beyond the guards, and so on, but there is not an allegation of specific misconduct on their part. I think that is important. I think that is precisely the distinction the hon. member has brought to his clarification of this matter. With that in mind, I submit it is a perfectly proper comment that does not cast aspersions on the staff of this House. That is perfectly clear. If I misunderstand the hon. member, I am sure he will correct me.

Mr. Lawrence: Perfectly correct.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was my hope that I would not feel compelled to rise on the basis of the—

An hon. Member: Don't feel compelled. Sit down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I say again that it was my hope that I would not feel compelled to rise on the basis of the notice which I sent to Your Honour this morning of an intention to raise a question of privilege on the basis of what was said in the House yesterday. Indeed, I listened with interest and attention to the remarks made just now by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) for I was hoping he would remove completely any cloud such as I think was created yesterday. I may say that some of the employees in this building, having heard reports on the radio this morning, have expressed their concern to me. Apart from that, may I say I would be satisfied not to pursue the matter any further, provided—

Some hon. Members: Good.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute. This matter is serious, very serious.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Apart from the fact that references were made to employees of this House who have no chance of replying, the hon. member twice yesterday made statements which are practically the same. I will quote both of them. On page 1242 of Hansard for yesterday, in the first column, about two-thirds of the way down, he is quoted as having said:

—ask our messenger service who or where the nearest bookie in this building is.

That is not just an assertion that you can get information from members of the staff of this House. That is an assertion that there is a bookie in this building. As recorded on page 1245 of Hansard, I raised a question of privilege, expressing the hope that the member would clarify the matter. He concluded his statement with these words, which are in the first column of page 1245:

If you ask them, they will tell you where the local bookie is for this floor in this building.

If the hon. member wants to clarify this whole matter, he should withdraw those statements about there being bookies in this building.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have no hesitancy in saying that I came into this chamber this afternoon as far from being trigger-happy as I could possibly be, not wanting to raise a question of privilege of which I gave Your Honour notice as a form of protection. However, the hon. member has now said—and he can correct me if I do not get his words right—that organized crime has come to this building. He has not withdrawn the statement he made twice yesterday that there are bookies in this building.

I still think there is a question of privilege here. I do not know these things that he says we all know. Messengers have told me that they are not involved in what he says is available in the case of every messenger, and I accept their word. I submit that, as a member of parliament, my privileges are interfered with if I am operating in a place where things are going on which are illegal and which all of us here are alleged to be condoning. I feel very strongly that the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham should clarify the matter more adequately than he has so far. If he will simply say that those two statements about there being bookies in this building are statements made in the enthusiasm of debate, but which he is not able to back up, that, of course, will clear up the matter.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not present during the debate yesterday, but the words used today by the hon. member do seem objectionable to me, and I support the House leader in this sense. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) said that organized crime had reached Parliament Hill. I am sure each member of the House would want to stand up and assert, as I do, that as far as I am aware it has not reached my office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear laughter, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member opposite wishes to clarify his statement, I would be glad to have information to the contrary because I would want to take strong action if such were the case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If all members of the House wish to dissociate themselves from this statement, I imagine we are left in the position mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). But who is going to speak for the messengers and the others who cannot stand in this House and say that they are not the focus of organized crime? The hon. member leaves us with this dilemma, and I believe he should clarify his statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to stand in this House and, for perhaps the first time this session, hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) volunteer to take action about something, because there has been precious little taken so far.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I intervened last evening to suggest at the time the question was initially raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that there was some doubt as to whether the matter involved a question of privilege. Since that time I have had an opportunity to consider some authorities. I refer Your Honour to the seventeenth edition of May's, page 109, where the following appears:

It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

The essence of a question of privilege, as I read that citation and citations 102 to 116 in Beauchesne's, is that privilege is a protection for members of the House and is not intended to limit in any way the things members can say in the House. There is a second point I wish to make. Even if a suggestion of this nature has been made, there is a question whether the persons about whom it was made are, in fact, officers of the House, in parliamentary terms. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect for the good staff which serves us in this place, and for motives about which I can only be suspicious, I think it is stretching things a bit to say that officers of the House, as referred to in the statements yesterday, could ever be implicated. As the right hon. Prime Minister said in his statement today, Your Honour is an officer of the House, just as is the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms.

I think the essence of the matter, first off, is that this is hardly a question of privilege. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised this matter last night in the course of debate, but having examined the authorities I would urge upon Your Honour consideration of those authorities and ask you to rule that this is not a question of privilege for the House, that no member's right is interfered with and that there is nothing here for the Chair to deal with except to turn down this question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I welcome discussion of this subject by hon. members. I have some difficulty with every question of privilege, of course, and this one is no exception. What troubles me about this particular matter is not simply the question of privilege itself. It may, in fact, be possible to decide on the precedents and on the strength of the arguments presented to the Chair that in fact a question of privilege does not exist. Even a prima facie question of privilege may not exist.

However, the problem is more serious than that. The responsibility of the Chair, of course, is the provision of the staff and the supervision and running of the staff that serves the House of Commons. It is the Chair's responsibility to see that the staff performs its functions not only properly but that it is free of any kind of allegation that may be made against it. Therefore, whether or not a prima facie question of privilege exists, the Chair would have the responsibility of seeing, on the basis of an allegation of this sort—if this is the kind of allegation that has been suggested—that the matter be discussed, examined, investigated and reported upon in a very thorough and complete manner.

Accordingly, there seem to me to be two problems here. The first is whether a prima facie question of privilege exists. Then, even if it does not exist, the second and more serious problem is whether the allegations made by the hon. member have any substance to them. Both are very serious and important question and for this reason I was anxious that the hon. member be given the opportunity to clarify the intent of his remarks, so as to determine whether or not there is substance to a specific allegation of any criminal activity in this building.

If there is further discussion to be presented at this time, I propose to reserve my judgment as to whether or not a prima facie question of privilege exists in this matter and inform hon. members of my decision at a later date after further discussion, if such is forthcoming at the moment. In the circumstances, both the House and the Chair might be relieved of this burden if the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham wants to make it perfectly clear, either that he has no specific allegation of criminal activity in this building or, in the alternative, if he does have a specific allegation of criminal activity, that he is prepared to substantiate it.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, normally I do not need too much of an invitation to say anything, but certainly an invitation from you is almost like a command. If that is your desire, it is also mine and I would be very pleased to indicate that in no way did I mean—and if someone misinterpreted my words, I apologize right now—to reflect upon the probity or integrity of any of the staff, servants or agents of this House, or on you, sir. For that matter, I did not mean to reflect in any way even upon people in the public service. But apart altogether from this being a tempest in a teapot, I suggest members of the public are frequently in this building. Not all people who are in this building are members of the public service or agents of Your Honour. I think this should at least seep through the skulls of some people, if they are willing to talk about this subject.

I am merely saying, Mr. Speaker, that if you want to find out where criminal activity exists around here, it is not hard to do so. I say that, sir, on the basis of some friendships that I have made around here with the staff.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: I mean that. There is absolutely nothing illegal, and there is absolutely nothing immoral involved. I am not attacking anyone's integrity. But I say again that I think it very unrealistic if members believe they cannot ask almost anyone in the corridor where this type of activity exists. That was the whole point of my remarks, to show how easily accessible and available is this type of information. In no way, I hope, am I attacking the integrity or the probity of any one of our servants. If any of them believe that, I apologize to them most sincerely.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, having reaffirmed in the clearest possible terms the interpretation I had put on his words initially, at the invitation of some hon. members, I would submit that the matter has now been laid to rest as clearly as possible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had one intervention already on this question. I should perhaps indicate again, as I did at the outset, that I will reserve judgment on whether there is a prima facie question of privilege, and give judgment at a later time.

Report on Peacekeeping Units

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT OF MINISTER FOLLOWING VISIT TO PEACEKEEPING UNITS

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this early opportunity since returning to Canada to report to the House on my trip to visit more than 2,000 members of the Canadian armed forces on peacekeeping duty in Cyprus and in the Middle East.

During the past few days I have been in Cyprus, where there are more than 900 Canadian military personnel; in Egypt, where we have more than 1,000 personnel; in Syria, where we have 29, and in Israel where there are approximately 170. In numerous conversations with members of the Canadian armed forces in these four countries, I found that generally speaking morale is high, and it is clearly evident that our personnel are convinced they are engaged in useful and worthwhile work. They are willing to undergo some of the difficult living conditions and the sacrifice of being separated from their families in order to perform the important task of peacekeeping.

In the United Nations Bolivar camp on the Golan Heights, where living and working conditions are the most difficult, I was encouraged to find that substantial progress is being made in the construction of new buildings and in the improvement of sanitation and living conditions.

Throughout the trip I found that, without exception, the political and military leaders in all four countries praised the work being done by the Canadian contingents of the United Nations forces. I do not want to over-state this matter, but I believe all members of the House would have been as pleased, and as proud, as I was to have heard some of the ways in which our Canadian personnel were described. The adjectives that were most frequently used were, that in carrying out their duties the Canadians are known to be impartial, competent and resourceful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: In conversations with President Claerides and Vice-President Denktash in Cyprus, with the Deputy Premier and Minister of War of Egypt, Field Marshal Ismail, as well as with the Defence Minister of Syria, General Tlass, and the Defence Minister of Israel, Shimon Peres, I was left with no doubt whatsoever that the contribution Canada is making to peacekeeping is welcomed and is well received in each of these countries. There is no doubt at all in my mind that the presence of our forces is helping to provide the stability, and the relatively peaceful conditions, in which meaningful negotiations can take place.

I am pleased to be able to report, specifically, that within the next few days the United Nations will be recommencing flights between Beirut and Damascus, using Canadian Buffalo aircraft. From conversations with the Defence Minister of Syria and his senior officers, I am satisfied that the tragic loss of the United Nations Buffalo aircraft on this route last August was an accident regretted by all, and was not an aggressive act directed against the United Nations.

Last week our own aircraft flew over this same route to Damascus and I have been assured that all future flights of Canadian or United Nations aircraft will travel in safety as far as the Syrians are concerned. The recommencement of Buffalo aircraft flights from Beirut to Damascus will greatly assist in the adequate supply of the Canadian peacekeeping forces now living in the buffer zone on the Golan Heights.

As a result of several on-the-spot conversations which I had with Canadian servicemen, I now intend to examine the feasibility of establishing a Canadian leave centre where personnel serving in Cyprus, or in the Middle East, can spend their leave. Also, whenever appropriate transportation arrangements can be made, it is our hope that servicemen's wives will be able to travel to this leave centre.

One good location for a leave centre would be near the airfield at Akrotiri in the Greek-Cypriot town of Limassol.

Mr. Nowlan: Why don't you be the first one to go there?

Mr. Richardson: I have just been there. We will have this location, as well as others, under consideration. It should be pointed out that this will not involve any capital expenditure—

Mr. Forrestall: You spent it all on Winnipeg.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: —but can be achieved by negotiating the use of hotel accommodation as required at a suitable location.

I would also like to report to the House that in our peacekeeping operations we have been particularly fortunate in the quality of leadership that we have had in the Canadian contingents of the United Nations forces. Brigadier-General Clay Beattie in Cyprus, and Brigadier-General Don Holmes in Egypt, each in his own way, have brought credit to themselves and to Canada by the resourceful and competent leadership that they are providing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should not fail to mention that in each of the countries visited the expression of friendship for Canada went far beyond admiration for our peacekeeping forces. The political and military leaders in these countries, without exception, expressed a desire to have closer relations with our country in trade and travel, and in other ways. These matters belong, to a large extent, to other departments, but I would be remiss if I did not report the genuine friendship for Canada that was clearly and frequently expressed by the leaders and the people of each country we visited.

As is the case with almost every Canadian who travels overseas, I found that there is a great reservoir of goodwill for Canada and for Canadians, and I have come home convinced that this measure of goodwill is being enlarged by the members of the Canadian armed forces who are serving Canada, and the world community, on peacekeeping duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY OF GENERAL ANDREW GOODPASTER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Following the minister's remarks, and before recognizing opposition spokesmen, this might be an appropriate moment to call attention to the presence in the gallery of a very distinguished visitor, General Andrew Goodpaster, retiring Supreme Allied Commander of our forces in Europe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: General Goodpaster is accompanied by the Chief of Canadian Defence Forces, General James Dextraze. General Goodpaster's excellent record in commanding the armed forces in Europe is well known and certainly I am sure members of this House will want me, on their behalf, to convey their very best wishes on his retirement.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT OF MINISTER FOLLOWING VISIT TO PEACEKEEPING UNITS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I want to express the usual thanks to the minister for having made available at an early point a copy of his statement so that it might be reviewed by us before we make our comments in reply thereto. I appreciate these courtesies which make our work a little easier. Members of the House have just heard, and I trust with some alarm, the amazing statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). One could not help but believe that all is well and rosy within the Canadian armed forces. We welcome the minister's statement to the effect that our forces are doing well and are well received in the Middle East in respect of the two particular assignments with the United Nations. Indeed, there is not a member of this House who does not appreciate the ability of the Canadian forces under such conditions, and their ability to come through very strong and do their job very well.

The minimum statement that was expected by this House, and I think by the Canadian people, had nothing to do with whether or not we are loved over there, but rather with whether or not we are able to fulfil the mandate given us and the responsibility we have over there, or whether or not we will withdraw troops from Cyprus. Why did the minister not bother to tell us more about the progress of negotiations on that torn island so that we might better understand the commitment we are asking the Canadian people and the Canadian forces to make in that area. This is what we expected as a minimum. The minister mentioned—and there was reference to this in the Canadian Press and the minister referred to it today—that he was there to see whether or not we should pull back troops. We expected him to say today either that he is satisfied with the work being done there and will leave them there or that he will bring some of these forces home.

Why could we not have had a response to questions such as these? These questions concern not only us but also our allies and partners within this joint venture in peacekeeping. It is very meaningful and very serious work. The House is no better informed now than it was the day before the minister went to the Middle East. I am sure we all welcome the fact that he did make this visit. I had hoped that he would have had the courtesy to invite some members from other sectors of this House to make this visit, then we might have had a balanced view and a little bit of hard news about the facts.

There are just one or two other brief comments I should like to make, Mr. Speaker. Our concern, of course, arises out of financing restrictions, lowering force levels, and the fact that it takes five or six men to keep one man in an operational situation. Our concern also is that we do not have the money to logistically support these people and to adequately support rotation. In other words, we cannot perform the multiple tasks assigned in the 1970 White Paper, so it is unrealistic for the minister to stand in this House and make out that all is well. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the armed forces are getting damned sick of the situation. There are very real problems in peacekeeping and we thought that the minister might have dealt with some of them today. We wanted to know what the hopes are for a settlement in these areas but we did not hear anything about that.

I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might take an early opportunity to meet with the minister and insist on the production of a White Paper which would clearly set out our requirements for national sovereignty, our international responsibilities and the priorities of our peacekeeping role, as well as the multiple taskings that cause difficulties in meeting commitments at home.

With respect to national sovereignty, I hope that the Prime Minister would urge the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) to prepare a statement at the earliest possible moment with respect to the armed forces which would reflect the very desperate situation in which the Canadian armed forces find themselves today.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this party I should like to welcome the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) back to this House. I should like to congratulate him on his initiative in travelling to the Middle East to encourage our troops and foster what looks like pretty good morale.

I can understand the minister's reluctance to invite an all-party contingent to accompany him. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) indicated some disappointment about this, but members may recall that the last time the minister offered to make it an all-party trip the visit was to Viet Nam. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East did not see fit to take advantage of that invitation, so I can understand the minister being a little reluctant to make the offer this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it quite clear that I was not invited to Viet Nam.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I do want to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East however, by saying that what we had today was a motherhood statement. It brings very little information to this House about the real problem we are facing in the Middle East. Canada, with justice, has been very proud of the role our peacekeeping forces have played. We are not a major power, not a power with territorial ambition. Our role is very important and is one which this party has supported for a very long time and will continue to support.

I think it is time, however, that we reassessed the peacekeeping role that our forces are playing. The ad hoc financing of Canadian forces is simply not satisfactory. It is time that we had decent backup from the United Nations for our forces.

Mr. Fraser: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: It is high time that this government raised this issue in a vigorous manner in the councils of the world and particularly in the United Nations. When our forces are in positions of high risk there is a lack of international support. I can only refer the House to the actions of Gamal Abdal Nasser when our forces were unilaterally ordered out of the Middle East, which action contributed to that war, and the Turkish attitude toward our forces in Cyprus which leaves a lot to be desired and to some extent is disgraceful. We must keep in mind that an attack on Canadian forces in the Middle East is an attack on the United Nations and on the world forces of order. Mr. Speaker, we are just not getting the kind of backup support from the United Nations that we should be getting.

I think we should look again at our basic role, Mr. Speaker, and ask if we are really peacekeepers or merely observers? It is time that we moved to the next stage in peacekeeping, a stage that would give some muscle to peacekeeping. It is time the world imposed sanctions on those nations that see fit to attack peacekeeping forces, and that is the kind of support we must have if the United Nations, indeed the world, is to survive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, before making my remarks, I would like to tell the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) that I am unfortunately unable to pay him the same compliments as the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) since the French translation of his statement reached us only at 2.35 p.m. I would to point out that we should like to have the French version of his statements at the same time as all other members.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that the minister is in great shape after such a hard trip, both physically and morally.

Moreover, I am happy to hear him say that the morale of our soldiers seems very good, but I would rather see them back among us.

Mr. Speaker, we have always provided help for foreign countries and we have also tried to further peace and goodwill through pacific negotiations.

The Canadian participation in the peacekeeping force does not have for its only objective successful negotiations between the conflicting parties. Mr. Speaker, it must ensure that a stable peace is enforced between all the nations of the world.

We shall continue to assert our availability and our wish to serve peace wherever we shall be asked to do so and wherever we may be useful.

Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the wives of our soldiers will be able to visit their husbands. I am certain that this will be very helpful to our Canadian forces.

I would like to note, Mr. Speaker, that a young soldier from my constituency died recently in Cyprus in the defence of peace. It is sad that such things can happen, but the role played by Canada in protecting the peace is essential.

Mr. Speaker, our most sincere desire is that the conflicts between Cyprus and Turkey come to an end as soon as possible.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before leaving this stage may I ask if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) intends to make a report on his visit to Israel which was described in this House yesterday as an official visit.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Motions. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay).

EQUIPPING OF VEHICLES WITH PROPER TIRES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity involving the armed forces of our country: It has been brought to my attention that the 2nd Battalion of the Royal Canadian Regiment, while proceeding to Camp Aldershot, Nova Scotia from Camp Gagetown, New Brunswick, on October 22, to participate in a training exercise, was delayed for a day en route because the four-wheel drive military vehicles carrying the troops were not equipped with proper tires for snow conditions.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Minister of National Defence take immediate steps to equip all our military motor vehicles with modern radial steel-belted tires with all-weather treads, so that, as obsolete as some of our armed forces vehicles may be, at least they will have proper tires to assure their mobility during varying highway and weather conditions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. As it has been proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

That the Minister of Manpower and Immigration be requested to make a detailed statement to the House disclosing whether or not political considerations on behalf of the Liberal party have been involved in the awarding of Local Initiatives Program grants in recent years and if so that the minister include in his report full details of such political considerations and that the minister advise the House what steps the government will take to prevent recurrence in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, which cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent, the motion cannot be debated at this time.

TRADE

SUGGESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF TARIFFS ON TELEVISION SETS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the matter of lay-offs at RCA Limited in Prescott and other manufacturers and the question of tariffs on imported television sets be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs for examination and review.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion which, being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43, cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put at this time.

SUGGESTION CANADA BUY SUGAR FROM EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a most important and urgent motion.

In view of the constant rise in the consumer price of sugar, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House discuss immediately the possibility for the Canadian government of obtaining its sugar supplies from the European Economic Community instead of on world markets, as it now does, and that it look into the possibility of signing long term agreements with a producing country so that Canadians might be offered sugar at reasonable price.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put.

EFFECT OF FINANCIAL RESTRAINTS ON ABILITY OF ARMED FORCES TO FUNCTION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, for the second time in nine years I wish to bring before the House a matter of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the now near absolute inability of the Canadian Armed Forces to function within the financial and manpower restrictions laid upon them by this government. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

Canada Elections Act

That this House call upon the Prime Minister of Canada to instruct the Minister of National Defence to produce a White Paper on national defence setting forth the priorities and roles within these priorities, setting forth the clear intention of this government with respect to capital equipment renewal programs, projected manpower levels, and clearly setting forth Canada's determinations with respect to national sovereignty, NATO, NORAD, other Canadian/U.S. arrangements, and all other matters that have been rendered uncertain due to the current financial restraints.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43. It requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, it cannot be debated at this time.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING USE OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-362, to amend the Canada Elections Act (use of contributions).

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Canada Elections Act, to restrict expenditures from funds obtained under it to the activities of a party in its federal capacity. In my view, such a limitation was already clearly parliament's intention in the recent legislation on election expenses, but the New Democratic Party has chosen to take advantage of the letter rather than the spirit and clear intention of the law. This bill would prevent such an abuse of the act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I seriously think that members should consider that a statement made on the first reading of a bill is permitted as a courtesy. The bill is not debatable at this stage and I seriously question whether it is in order, let alone in good taste, for a member in this context to attack another party in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Question No. 72—Mr. Francis:

Since June 25, 1972, of all appointments made under the Public Service Employment Act, delegated and non-delegated, to all positions identified as bilingual, how many of the successful candidates were qualified as bilingual at the time of appointment and how many were unilingual?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: The Public Service Employment Act does not provide for the appointment of unilingual persons to bilingual positions. However, following the Parliamentary Resolution on Official Languages through an Order-in-Council and related regulations (Order-in-Council P.C. 1973-1949) pursuant to the exclusion provisions of the Public Service Employment Act (section 39), the Commission was empowered to make appointments of unilinguals to bilingual positions under certain prescribed circumstances. Since the issuing of the Order-in-Council in question, (July 6, 1973) 869 (12 per cent) appointments of unilingual persons to bilingual positions were made by departments under delegation of the Commission's authority, and 847 (20.5 per cent) appointments of unilingual persons were made by the Commission itself. MERITS OF ESTABLISHING GRAIN ELEVATORS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 226—Mr. Howie:

Will the government consider the merits of establishing grain elevators at or near seaports in New Brunswick to try and store a year's supply of early grain to be resold at a constant price to New Brunswick farmers thus stabilizing this aspect of farm production cost?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): As indicated in the Government's announcement of the new feed grains policy a storage program at an annual cost of $40 million will be instituted. It is anticipated that this will lead to additional grain storage at various locations in Canada, including the Maritimes, and the Government will consider proposals for such storage on their merits. Pricing of feed grains in Canada under the new policy is now determined on an open market basis with users throughout Canada, including the Maritimes, having direct access to western grains. No consideration is being given to holding grain in storage for sale at constant prices in any part of the country.

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government shares in 50 per cent of the costs to the provinces of providing to persons in need items such as tools, equipment, licences or permits which are considered essential for obtaining employment. Persons who have completed federally financed adult training programs and are recognized by the province as persons in need may be eligible for such assistance.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Yes, there have been expressions of scientific concern and studies are going on. Scientists responsible for these studies are unanimous in stressing that the studies do not provide a final answer and that more research is required. If and when regulatory action becomes appropriate, it will be possible under the provisions of the Environmental Contaminants Act, now before Parliament.

UIC—CRITERIA USED IN DETERMINING DISTANCE WITHIN WHICH AN UNEMPLOYED PERSON CANNOT REFUSE EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 332—Mr. Herbert:

1. What criteria are used to determine the distance within which an unemployed person, wishing to continue to draw benefit, cannot refuse suitable employment when that person does not possess an automobile and there is no convenient form of public transportation?

2. Would the same criteria apply to a person whose spouse possesses an automobile?

3. Does such a judgment on distance vary with the length of unemployment and does it vary by region if all other circumstances are similar?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. There is no rigid rule to determine the distance beyond which a claimant can refuse suitable employment because of lack of personal transportation or public transportation at convenient times, and remain eligible for benefits. Although distance and transportation facilities are factors considered in determining a claimant's eligibility, they can be offset by other factors such as the normal practice in the area for workers required to commute to and from work daily. Lack of transportation is generally not a good cause in itself for refusing suitable work.

2. If the claimant could use the spouse's automobile, the commuting distance would then be determined primarily on the distance workers of the area normally travel to work daily.

3. Neither the length of the period of unemployment nor the geographical location have any bearing on the lack of transportaton factor if the employment offered is suitable. An additional consideration in cases of this nature is that a claimant who has no means of transportation to work generally fails to prove for all practical purposes that he or she is available for work and unable to obtain suitable employment and is not entitled to benefit.

[Mr. Rompkey.]

FUNCTIONS PERFORMED BY POLICE AND SECURITY PLANNING AND ANALYSIS GROUP

Question No. 341—Mr. Cossitt:

TRANSFER OF OLD AGE SECURITY PENSION TO SURVIVING SPOUSE

Question No. 356—Mr. Herbert:

Will the government give consideration to the transfer of the Old Age Security Pension at the time of the death of a pensioner to the surviving spouse age sixty or over, the total Old Age Security Pension payment to the survivor not to exceed the maximum payable to a single person?

Miss Coline Campbell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Consideration is not being given to the proposal at this time. Assistance is now available to all persons in need, regardless of their age, under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan through which the Federal government shares with the provinces the amount of assistance paid. The speech from the Throne announced the government's intention to provide for the payment of allowances on an income tested basis, to spouses aged 60 to 65 of recipients of OAS/GIS, effective October 1975. The Working Paper on Social Security in Canada proposed a Guaranteed Income for those persons who are not expected to work. This proposal is still being reviewed in the joint Federal-Provincial Social Security Review which is due to be completed in April 1975.

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Question No. 381—Mr. Cossitt:

Was the decision by the Prime Minister to appoint a new Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the last set of cabinet changes based in any way on information, recommendations or comments of any kind, verbal or written, received by the Prime Minister from Mr. Michael Pitfield, Deputy Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs at the time and, if so, what was the specific nature and detail of such recommendations?

NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN BORDER CROSSING

Question No. 386—Mr. Firth:

2. Have the terms of the Jay Treaty been violated and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No. Recently issued directives were intended to, and have been successful in, simplifying and expediting border crossing immigration procedures for many North American Indians.

2. In 1956 the Supreme Court of Canada found that the Jay Treaty has no application in Canada since it has not been implemented or sanctioned by Canadian legislation and consequently there could not have been any violation of it.

FINES IMPOSED UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Question No. 390—Mr. Herbert:

1. Is the government satisfied that fines imposed on companies convicted under the Combines Investigation Act are adequate (a) as a punishment (b) as a deterrent?

2. Is it recognized that the profits obtained from illegal price fixing practices are many times the amount of the fines imposed?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. No. The Combines Investigation Act is designed to improve the performance of enterprises operating in the private sector and to this end fines are more important in their role as a deterrent than as a punishment. For the serious offences like price fixing, there is no limit on the amount of the fine which the courts may impose. Evidence that the government is not satisfied with the fines usually imposed, is contained in Bill C-2 where provision is made in section 31.1 that any person who has suffered loss or damage as a result of conduct that is contrary to any of the criminal provisions of the Act or of the failure of any person to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under the Act may sue for civil damages. This is viewed not only as a matter of social justice, but as an important additional deterrent.

2. Yes. See the answer to question 1.

BRUCELLOSIS VACCINATION

Question No. 442—Mr. Cossitt:

As of the date this question is answered, what is the government's exact policy in detail in regard to vaccinating or not vaccinating cattle against brucellosis?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The Department continues to de-emphasize the use of a brucellosis vaccination for the following reasons: (1) the low incidence of the disease across Canada. (2) the vaccine does not provide immunity in all animals. (3) some vaccinates react to the brucellosis test thus causing confusion in the interpretation of the test due to the fact that it is not possible to distinguish between a vaccination reaction and a reaction from infection. Brucellosis vaccine is available to livestock owners through veterinary practitioners. The official vaccination age is not earlier than three months and not later than nine months. If an owner decides to have his calves vaccinated, the department recommends they be done as soon as possible after three months in order to lessen vaccination reactions on the blood test.

CANADA'S COASTAL AND ARCTIC TRADE TO CANADIAN REGISTERED VESSELS

Question No. 452—Mr. Forrestall:

1 With reference to the news conference on transportation policy given by the Minister of Transport June 19, 1974, does the government intend to live up to commitments made at that conference to reserve "Canada's coastal and arctic trade to Canadian registered vessels"?

2. On what date will this policy be put into effect with respect specifically, to the extractive-based shipping in the Arctic Archipelago?

3. Will such policies be implemented in sufficient time to accommodate shippers' plans for the summer of 1975 with respect to the Canadian Arctic Archipelago?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1. The government has given notice of withdrawal from certain articles of the British Commonwealth Shipping Agreement in order to reserve coastal shipping to Canadian registered vessels.

2. Withdrawal becomes effective April 26, 1975 for all coastal trade with the exception of a five year continuance for British vessels previously engaged.

3. Yes.

ICE-STRENGTHENED CARGO CARRIERS AND ICEBREAKERS

Question No. 453—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to the news conference on transportation policy given by the Minister of Transport, June 19, 1974, how specifically does the government intend to "encourage the design and manufacturing in Canada of ice-strengthened cargo carriers and icebreakers which will fly the Canadian flag and operate in Canadian arctic waters"?

2. What steps have been taken since June 19, 1974 to bring about these ends?

3. At what date does the government foresee the actual use in the Canadian Arctic of the proposed special ice-strengthened cargo carriers?

4. At what date does the government foresee the actual use in the Canadian Arctic of the proposed icebreakers mentioned in that news conference?

[Mrs. Campagnolo.]

5. (a) Does the government view the continued practice of allowing into Canada duty-free foreign designs and plans for ships of all types as conducive to and in harmony with its intention to "encourage the design and manufacturing in Canada" of ice-strengthened vessels (b) will the government consider reviewing thoroughly this practice to determine whether or not it is in accordance with government policy as outlined on June 19, 1974 by the Minister of Transport and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. Consultations with industry regarding design and construction of ice class vessels are proceeding and specific encouragement will be determined when a firm proposal has been received. The recently signed agreement with Mineral Resources International Ltd., for the Strathcona Sound project requires the use of Canadian Flag Carriers, unless otherwise authorized by Order-in-Council.

3. Depending upon availability of shipyard space and construction materials, the proposed vessels would be completed approximately three years after commitment to build.

4. The R. Class icebreakers are expected to go into service in the 1979-80 season.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION

Question No. 461—Mr. Forrestall:

In what proportion of accidents investigated by the Air Accident Investigation Division of the Department of Transport has the investigation or any party thereof been partially or otherwise concerned with any feature, aspect or facet of air transportation in Canada, including certification of air worthiness, pilot licensing, instrument accuracy, flight procedures and pilot notification, that is governed, regulated or in any other way whatsoever directed by any other agency of the Department or any other branch, agency or division of the government?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): All accident investigations conducted by the Aviation Accident Investigation Division of the Ministry of Transport are concerned with certification of airworthiness, pilot licensing, instrument accuracy, flight procedures, and pilot notification that are regulated and controlled by the relevant branches and divisions of the Canadian Air Transportation Administration of the Ministry of Transport. However, the accident investigation division does not assess whether or not an infraction of regulations has occurred because the investigators may not be qualified in regulatory matters; they establish causal factors only. The question of the adequacy of regulations and controls is subject to accident investigation scrutiny as are the technical and operational factors, and a significant number of regulations and control procedures have been adopted as a result of findings of accident investigations. In summary, it should be noted that the Ministry of Transport system of air accident investigation is based upon the determination of cause, not blame, and witnesses, be they public servants or private citizens, are offered privilege. The courts have upheld the privilege of the witness statements on two recent occasions. Also there has never been a single instance of litigation against the Crown related to inadequate regulations, or suppression and alteration of accident data, but there have been cases related to improper procedures by the Crown and which were revealed in accident investigation reports.

EXTRACTIVE BASED SHIPPING IN CANADIAN ARCTIC ARCHIPELAGO

Question No. 477—Mr. Forrestall:

Is it the intention of the government to reserve to Canadian corporations and vessels the extractive based shipping in the Canadian Arctic Archipelago and, if not, what is the basis for the continuation of this policy?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): As announced by the Ministry of Transport on September 24, it is intended to implement the recommendations of the Report of the Inquiry on the Coasting Trade of Canada and Related Marine activity, restricting coasting trade activities to Canadian flag vessels. This restriction will include vessels operating in the Arctic Archipelago. It is not, however, the present intention to limit international shipping in the Arctic Archipelago to Canadian corporations and vessels, but individual development agreements, such as that for Strathcona Sound, may provide specifically for it. Canada has pursued a general policy of utilizing the most economical bottoms available for all international shipping and this policy applies in the Arctic, as in all of Canada. This policy is under continual review and may be changed to meet altered economic or national circumstances.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. MICHAEL PITFIELD TO CABINET

Question No. 479—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to press reports to the effect that the Hon. Herb Gray stated on CTV program "Question Period" that the promotion of Mr. Michael Pitfield from Deputy Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to the position of Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the position of Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet only added to the "air of mystery" surrounding Mr. Gray's demotion from the Cabinet, will the Prime Minister issue a statement giving all details connected with both the appointment of Mr. Pitfield and the dropping of Mr. Gray from the Cabinet?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No.

PURCHASE BY PARKS CANADA OF PROPERTY BELONGING TO CLARENCE AND HELEN MARSHALL, BROCKVILLE, ONTARIO

Question No. 480—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did Mr. J. R. Malfair of Parks Canada on behalf of the government write a letter dated July 22, 1974, to Clarence and Helen Marshall of Brockville, Ontario, offering to purchase from them a dwelling located on lot 3, plan 266, Brockville, for the sum of $50,000 subject to Governor in Council approval?

2. Was a closing date of September 2, 1974, agreed on, subject to extension at government request to October 15, 1974, at a per diem increase in purchase price of $20 per day?

3. Were the Marshalls or their real estate agent, O. R. Davis and Co. Ltd., verbally informed on various occasions that in this case Treasury Board approval was a formality?

4. Did Mr. G. B. MacDonald of Parks Canada advise solicitors for the Marshalls in a letter dated August 30, 1974, that Treasury Board would not approve the purchase?

5. Is it a fact that this matter was never referred to Treasury Board and, if so, for what reason?

6. Will the government proceed with purchase of the property and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

7. Is the government prepared to compensate Mr. and Mrs. Marshall for any financial loss suffered as a result of government failure to follow through with the original offer?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. The Department's position has always been that the Offer to Purchase was subject to Treasury Board approval. Our officers have indicated that while there was normally no problem in receiving such authority, there was always the possibility of the submission being refused.

4. Yes.

5. Yes. While the Offer to Purchase was entered into in good faith by the employees of Parks Canada on the basis of their interpretation of the Parks Canada staff housing policy, it was done so without realizing that it was in conflict with an existing Treasury Board Directive. The fact that it conflicted with the policy of the Government of Canada and the Board's instruction was not discovered until an attempt was made to process the Treasury Board submission.

6. (a) The Government will not proceed with the purchase of the property; (b) The Government will not proceed with the pruchase as it is not the policy of the Government of Canada to provide staff accommodation in urban centres where it can reasonably expect its employees to provide their own accommodation.

7. The Department has informed the Marshalls that if they have suffered a demonstrable hardship or financial loss it is prepared to review any claim they wish to make.

ASSISTED HOME OWNERSHIP PROGRAM

Question No. 506—Mr. Hnatyshyn:

1. How many families have taken advantage of the provisions of the Assisted Home Ownership Program to date and to what value?

2. What percentage is allowed for subsidy?

3. Are persons allowed to work out their down payments and, if so, to what percentage?

4. Is consideration being given to extending this program to cover unmarried persons?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): 1. Since inception of the program in July 1973, 24,157 families have taken advantage of the Assisted Home Ownership Program totalling $543 million. Loans currently in process will be made available to approximately 1,250 additional families this year.

2. The subsidy varied from zero to the maximum of $1,446 depending on the circumstances of each applicant.

3. A minimum down-payment of 5 p. 100 of the value of the house is required, and this may consist of cash, land and owner-labour.

4. Because the funds available under this most successful program are not unlimited, consideration was not given to include unmarried persons.

Order Paper Questions

CLERK OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL AND SECRETARY TO THE CABINET

Question No. 513—Mr. Cossitt:

What are the names, the present and previous positions in the Public Service along with dates of same, of all persons who were considered for the position of Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet prior to the announcement of the appointment of Mr. Michael Pitfield and, in each case, for what reason was the individual found unacceptable?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Appointments to the position of Clerk of the Privy Council and Secretary to the Cabinet, like appointments to other deputy ministerial positions, are made by the Governor in Council. Advice tendered to the Governor in Council is regarded as confidential. It would be at variance with this principle to disclose anything relating to the advice tendered for the appointment in question.

CONSUMER LEGISLATION OFFENCES

Question No. 521—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs state (a) that he would do everything in his power to ensure that fines and penalties resulting from court actions for consumer fraud, product safety and weights and measures offences are in proportion to the gravity of the offences (b) that the amount of the penalties are decided by the courts?

2. (a) Does the Minister believe that the total fine for each of the 28 convictions between April and June is proportionate to the gravity of the offence (b) what action is in his power to ensure the adequacy of fines and penalties, if these penalties are decided by the courts?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. (a) Yes; (b) Yes.

2. (a) No; (b) The Minister attempts to ensure that all facts relevant to sentencing are brought to Crown counsel's attention, and that Departmental officials discuss with Crown counsel the possibility of appealing sentences in those cases where the fine is considered to be too low. In addition, the Minister ensures, in those instances where inspection activities indicate that the Department should prosecute individuals or companies for infractions of the legislation, that the matter be brought before the courts as quickly as possible to impress upon the courts the gravity of the offences, and to prevent a continuation of the illegal practices. The Minister also hopes that increased publicity given to prosecutions will have the beneficial effect of ensuring that the fines and penalties, as determined by the courts, are adequate.

OFY—PROMOTION OF POLITICAL CANDIDATES

Question No. 529—Mr. Herbert:

During the last federal campaign, were Opportunities for Youth grants used to promote candidates and, if so (a) did the government have knowledge of such usage (b) what action was taken to stop this practice?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The Trans-Newfoundland Corridor Transportation Study has been given wide circulation, not only to the provincial government but to interested organizations and public libraries. Comments on the Study have been invited by January 31, 1975 and in the light of these comments, a decision will be made on the next step. Improvements have already been made on rail freight transfer operations by the provision of increased rail cars in each direction.

TRANSPORTATION—NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 573—Mr. Marshall:

Has there been consultation between the government and the Government of Newfoundland with regard to implementing a transportation program for the construction and improvement of facilities in the Province, particularly for the purpose of improving access to remote communities and areas with proven resource potential and of strengthening and upgrading the Trans-Canada Highway and, if so, what progress has been made to date?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Preliminary consultations have been held with the provincial government and will be ongoing. Reference was made to remote access during the election campaign and a meeting with the Atlantic Province Ministers has been suggested to them for the near future. The reply to Question No. 572 applies to the rest of the hon. member's question.

PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT BY GOVERNMENT

Question No. 344—Mr. Cossitt:

Were any aircraft purchased by the government from any source whatsoever, other than new aircraft from a manufacturer, since January 1, 1968 and if so (a) what is the exact description of any such aircraft (b) what was the purchase price (c) on what date and from whom was it purchased (d) for what exact purpose?

Return tabled.

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on October 9 I placed starred question 362 on the order paper. It deals with the overhaul of obsolete aircraft at Winnipeg. I feel that Air Canada and the government have had more than ample time to answer my question. I should appreciate an answer by next Wednesday from the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I refer the parliamentary secretary to questions Nos. 53 to 61 inclusive which remain unanswered. These questions request full details of the allocation of local initiatives grants in the ridings of nine members of cabinet, and specifically details of projects, the names of those applying for grants and the names of those who recommended the grants. I placed these questions on the order paper on the first day of the present session, which means they have remained unanswered for about one month and a half. Let me remind the parliamentary secretary that exactly the same questions were placed on the order paper in the second session of the twenty-ninth parliament, beginning on March 28, 1974. This means that these questions have remained unanswered for approximately eight months.

I wish to refer to question 20 on the order paper which remains unanswered and ask the parliamentary secretary if this could be investigated as well. The question asks for the allocation of LIP funds in 1973-74 to constituencies represented by cabinet ministers. The fact that release of this information—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member has made his grievance and his point abundantly clear. It may be a point that is well taken. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member, but with respect, his point has been well made.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to notice of motion for production of papers No. 13 which I placed on the order paper in the last session. It has to do with meetings and operational plans of a management team under the Veterans Land Act. I wonder why the government refuses to table those documents. They refused to table them in the last session and again this session. This is very important because the Veterans Land Act will be phased out in five months. I feel I am entitled to have these documents tabled.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, no decision has been made on whether to refuse or accept the hon. member's motion.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRIORITIES OF TASKS ASSIGNED TO FORCES IN VIEW OF MANPOWER REDUCTIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's quite recent statement that the armed forces are now overtasked and reduction in numbers inevitably means some reduction in tasks, is the minister prepared to give some assurance today that in the course of the budget debate next week he will make a precise statement as to what tasks are going to be reduced and, more important, how priority tasks are going to be fulfilled?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is quite right that our manpower must be balanced with the tasks which the manpower is required to do. We are now in the process of re-examining the tasks of the armed forces. When changes are decided by cabinet, they will, of course, be announced. I doubt whether that will be in time for the budget debate referred to by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how long we are to be kept in suspense. I wish to ask a very specific question relating to the minister's statement that our first task and our central responsibility are nothing less than to defend Canadian independence and sovereignty. In view of the increasing allegations that that task, particularly with regard to coastal surveillance, is not now being met, has the government decided to reduce responsibilities in that priority area? If not, is the minister's budget being reshaped to provide adequate funds to permit the job to be done?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I believe very sincerely that that job is being done at the present time. There has been a lot of talk about some of our old equipment. I wish others would point out that we have four of the most modern and most efficient destroyers in the world. We are operating a large fleet of Argus aircraft. We are operating tracker aircraft. We have plans underway for a new long-range patrol aircraft. This task is being performed not only on our coasts, but across Canada.

EFFECT OF EXPENDITURE ON FACILITIES IN WINNIPEG ON TASKS ASSIGNED TO FORCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the minister's statement that the armed forces are overtasked and despite his announced austerity program in general terms, is it the intention of his department or the government to spend $40 million to $50 million on defence facilities in Winnipeg? If so, will the minister tell the House what priority tasks will be reduced to permit that expenditure?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition gets his facts from the newspaper. If he would read other pages of the same newspaper, he would find that I have already stated that that article is completely inaccurate. No sums of that kind are being spent in Manitoba. I do not know how that figure was arrived at.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with defence, but it is not supplementary.

INDUSTRY

STUDY OF STEEL PRICES—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that profits for the three major steel companies, Stelco, Algoma and Dofasco, are up 31 per cent, 121 per cent and 29 per cent respectively, and considering the Prime Minister appointed a one-man inquiry to investigate steel price increases last June, can he inform the House of the progress of this inquiry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am informed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the report should be available in a matter of days.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce assure the House that this report will be made available to members as well as the people of Canada in general?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

STUDY OF STEEL PRICES—ASSURANCE OF ROLL-BACK IF INCREASES UNWARRANTED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Will the Prime Minister or the minister responsible for implementing price roll-back legislation assure the House that if the report shows that unjustified price increases are found to have occurred, the government will act quickly to take steps to bring about roll-backs in those price increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to the Speech from the Throne, he will see the government's intentions in these regards. I can only regret that the New Democratic Party chose to defeat the government before the legislation was passed.

Mr. Broadbent: Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's crack, will he assure the House—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized for a final supplementary.

Mr. Broadbent: Notwithstanding the Prime Minister's crack, will he assure parliament that this will be acted upon within a matter of weeks and not within a matter of four years as he indicated to the House the last time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member it was not meant as a crack. I was recalling to him an historical fact. As to the intentions of the government, the Speech from the Throne is written for a session, not for four years.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SUGAR SHORTAGE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REMEDY SITUATION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Did he receive this morning a telegram from British Columbia informing him of a sugar shortage in that province; if so, is he taking any steps to correct this situation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive this telegram. I shall inquire of my staff if it has not arrived yet.

SUGAR—POLICY ON PRICING AND ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PURCHASING BOARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister made any recommendations to his colleagues with regard to the present pricing situation of sugar in Canada or proposed setting up a national sugar purchasing board in this country?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I publicly expressed my views on this matter. I made some recommendations, and the whole matter is under review by my colleagues.

POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF REPAIR FACILITIES FOR 707 PLANES FROM TRENTON TO WINNIPEG

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Is it the intention of the government to move repair and overhaul facilities for 707 transport planes from Trenton to Winnipeg? If so, would the minister explain how he justifies spending many millions of dollars on making such a move when first class facilities and trained personnel are presently located at the Canadian Forces Base, Trenton, where an outstanding job is being done?

● (1510)

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I must point out to the hon. member that we are not moving any facilities for repairing 707s because there aren't any in Canada at the present time. These are new aircraft and this is the first time they have undergone major repair and overhaul. We are establishing new facilities; we are not moving facilities from anywhere else.

Mr. Hees: As the minister knows, it would be far easier to carry on at Trenton because this work has been done very well at that base for a number of years now. Will the hon. gentleman, in the interest of saving many millions of dollars, and helping to arrest the rapid decline in morale in the armed forces, set this plan aside and desist from carrying out one of the worst examples of pork barrelling which has ever come to the surface in this country?

Mr. Richardson: References to low morale in the armed forces always seem to come from the Conservative Party.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Hees: They come from us because we talk to the people in the armed forces and you don't.

Mr. Richardson: As far as the overhaul capability in Winnipeg is concerned, what we are doing is carrying out a long-standing—

Mr. Hees: —election promise made to try to get votes!

Mr. Richardson: —commitment at the time the Air Canada base was moved to Montreal; a commitment to use our best efforts to establish a viable base in that city. It is natural and logical that our aircraft should be repaired there in order to keep a viable base and to keep a promise which was made five years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: It is simply a pork barrel.

SUGGESTED VISIT BY MINISTER TO VARIOUS COMMANDS TO STUDY MORALE OF FORCES

Mr. J. Patrick Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question, too, is directed to the Minister of National Defence. A few moments ago, the minister referred to morale in the armed forces. Since he has just returned from a trip to the Middle East and to other parts of the world—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Nowlan: The question is coming. In order that the minister may obtain at first hand an impression of the real state of morale in our forces, does the minister intend to visit Transport Command, Mobile Command and Maritime Command where the bulk of our troops are stationed? If so, when does he intend to visit these commands, something he has not done since he became Minister of National Defence?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): I am sure the hon. member knows that I have visited practically every command. I have not been to Maritime Command, but I have been to Mobile Command, Training Command and most of the others. I hope to visit Maritime Command in the near future.

POSSIBLE EXTENSION TO NINE MONTHS OF TOUR OF DUTY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Still on this subject of morale, in the course of his interviews with members of the Armed Forces, to which the minister has referred, were any grievances brought to his attention with regard to the fact that the six-month tour of duty is being extended to nine months, particularly since the accommodation available is virtually nil—troops have to sleep in their clothing and in sleeping bags out in the open?

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): There has been no decision to extend the tour of duty to nine months. It is six months. The living accommodation, as I Indicated, was satisfactory; where there was any difficulty there was real progress in making improvements.

ENERGY

REPORT ON RESERVES—DATE OF PUBLICATION—KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE OF CONTENTS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): A question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. Could he assure the House and the country that the long-awaited report of the National Energy Board with regard to the extent of our reserves of oil and gas will be made public before November 18 when the Minister of Finance brings down his budget, one which might have repercussions affecting exploration for further reserves in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have made the report available on a confidential basis to the producing governments, namely, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and have asked them to let me have their views before the government takes a final decision on the matter. This is part of our consultative arrangements with those two provinces. As yet, I have not received a response from the Government of Alberta, so I cannot give the hon. member the assurance he is seeking.

Mr. Horner: Can the minister assure us that the Minister of Finance has read the report so that he might have an opportunity of adjusting his thinking along the lines the report suggests—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: —or that many people believe it suggests—that we shall be running out of oil by 1983 and that the minister should encourage exploration rather than put a thumbs down on further exploration in his budget of November 18.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I have been keeping my colleague informed of the current situation both with regard to oil and natural gas and with regard to other non-renewable natural resources.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IDENTIFICATION OF BODY FOUND ON BORDER BETWEEN GUYANA AND BRAZIL

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I have given him notice. Have the officials of his department made positive identification of the remains of a partially decomposed body found in a shallow grave in the jungle near the border between Guyana and Brazil purported to be the body of Donald Krestel, a young university graduate from Port Rowan, Ontario?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The department is aware of the situation to which the hon. member refers but because of the inaccessibility of the area our information to date is rather vague. Our officers are seeking full information and as soon as it is available I shall advise the hon. member.

OVERHAUL BASE AT WINNIPEG—USE OF FACILITIES BY COMMERCIAL AIRLINES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister consider dropping his CAE plans to overhaul five Boeings and use his influence to persuade the government and Air Canada to establish a proper second overhaul and maintenance base in Winnipeg, since Air Canada has a fleet large enough to make a second air base viable there?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): We are building a viable base on the former Air Canada base under the management of CAE. We are also building, as the hon. member knows, a new Air Canada facility in Winnipeg.

Mr. McKenzie: As it is not feasible or practical to build a jet air base to overhaul only five planes, has the minister received any firm commitment from other airlines to overhaul their jet fleets in Winnipeg?

Mr. Richardson: There are no firm contracts yet. A number of companies, however, such as regional airlines, including Transair, the local regional airline, have shown an interest in using these overhaul facilities when they are in operation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PRICE OF ANTI-FREEZE—REASON FOR INCREASED MARKUP AND POSSIBILITY OF PROFITEERING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs following a question I put to him about anti-freeze about a month ago. In view of the fact that manufacturers of anti-freeze have told the minister that the retail price of a gallon of anti-freeze should be in the $6 to $9 range but evidence now shows that some manufacturers are charging retailers as much as $9.75 a gallon, causing the retail price to be as high as $12 a gallon, has the hon. gentleman now found any evidence of profiteering?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member has any proof he would like to give to me, I would be very glad to know it.

[English]

Mr. Symes: In view of the fact that ethylene glycol supplies have recently been imported at a cost of little over $3 a gallon can the minister explain why in 1972 the markup was only $1.52 over the import price while now it is anywhere from $4 to $6 higher than the import price, despite the fact that there are no shortages?

● (1520)

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I have already told the House, that there is no shortage presently, and every indication I get every week on the subject confirms that there is no shortage in Canada, and the prices are high especially because there is a worldwide shortage in one of the components of this product, that is ethylene. Antifreeze itself is not scarce, but ethylene is, and since it is, there are fluctuations in the price of the end product which is antifreeze.

COMMUNICATIONS

LABOUR DIFFICULTIES AT QUEBEC TELEPHONE—REQUEST FOR STUDY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Communications.

Telephone communications within the region served by the Quebec Telephone Company being increasingly more difficult because of the labour disputes of the past several months, the economy of the region is deteriorating. Although I am satisfied that this matter comes under provincial jurisdiction, and considering that this is a multinational corporation would the minister instruct his officials to investigate this matter to find out, hopefully to settle this dispute, whether the firm is violating some federal legislation in the area of communications?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we have already looked into this matter and examined the causes of the dispute. Fortunately or not, any way the hon. member will have it, we have failed to find any violation of a federal statute, and therefore cannot find reason to intervene.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRASH OF ARMED FORCES PLANE IN MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question based on the statement of the Minister of National Defence, but I see he has left the House so may I put the question to his parliamentary secretary. Further to that part of the minister's statement about the loss of the Buffalo aircraft, will the minister now make public the national defence department's own report and the report of the United Nations on the loss of this aircraft, so that we do not have to rely on the report or allegations of the minister of defence of Syria, however honourable they may be? We would like to see the government's own report and the UN report.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence has had to leave the House to meet with General Goodpaster and the Prime Minister, and that is the reason for his absence. I will take the question as notice and bring it to the minister's attention.

HEALTH

INCREASING COST OF MEDICAL CARE—GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS TO PROVINCES TO CONTROL

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the latest reports showing that medical and health care services in Canada are being crippled by soaring costs, is the federal government now preparing new proposals to put before the provinces to bring these soaring costs under control, and if not, why not?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as was indicated in the hon. member's question, rising costs in the health field corresponds in general to rising costs in the overall economy, resulting from the inflation which we are now experiencing. As for the various methods of financing health care, my colleagues from the provinces should consider some alternatives. I for one am examining whether there is a possibility of developing new methods which would be more appropriate. But, if I may repeat myself, this will take time, and I unfortunately cannot promise the hon. member to give any specific information on that matter before several months.

[English]

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Without entering into a debate, the rate of inflation in health services is much greater than the general average. Since it was the federal authority in the first place which, in my view properly, initiated medicare in Canada, does the minister not feel that it is the federal authority's responsibility to initiate these proposals with the provinces immediately?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the federal authorities have already made in the past a specific proposal to introduce more flexibility in the financing of health care which would have indirectly led to better control over costs. For their own reasons, the provinces have deemed proper not to support that proposal and it was then agreed that the provinces would consider if they had any alternate suggestion to make. I have not yet received other provincial proposals. As I indicated in my first answer to the hon. member, I am considering the situation with my officials, but I repeat once again, I will be unable to suggest a formula in the immediate future.

USE OF SODIUM NITRITE IN CURED MEAT PRODUCTS—POSSIBILITY OF BAN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, of which I have given him notice. In view of the fact that sodium nitrite, a chemical used by the meat packing industry in the processing of cured meat products, has been found to cause cancer when these products are consumed as the result of reaction in the stomach with other substances, I should like to ask the minister whether he is aware of this and whether any action is contemplated by him or his department to ban use of this chemical for this purpose?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice. I received the notice yesterday but I do not have the information readily at hand. However, I might advise the hon. member that my department is informed of this situation and is looking into it. I should like to give the hon. member a more detailed answer later on.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGATIONS OF POLITICAL CORRUPTION IN NEW BRUNSWICK—POSSIBLE INVOLVEMENT OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General, but in his absence I direct it to his parliamentary secretary or to his representative.

In view of the fact that an article in the Financial Post of November 4 last, headlined "Kickbacks flourish—New Brunswick Shrugs", alleges that cover-ups, obstruction of justice and political contributions appear to have been going on in New Brunswick both under Liberal and Progressive Conservative administrations, and that the RCMP is tightly controlled by the New Brunswick department of justice and is apparently acquiescing in the allegations, and in view of the fact that by adopting a hands off approach to political kickbacks and patronage RCMP officers achieve the very opposite of what they set out to do, making the force politically biased instead of non-political, I should like to ask the minister these two questions.

Firstly, does the Solicitor General and his department intend to cause an investigation to be made into the allegations to prevent further disrespect for law and order; and secondly, will the Solicitor General endeavour to see to it that the necessary investigations are conducted and action taken under section 110 of the Criminal Code in an effort to deter the practice of political patronage and kickbacks, which are a sure example of—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to draw the attention of the Solicitor General to the various allegations to which the hon. member refers. A good number of them seem to me at first hearing to involve the administration of justice within the province and the responsibility of the attorney general there. However, to the extent that the RCMP is involved, even though they would be acting under contract provincially, I am sure the Solicitor General would be glad to take notice of these representations.

UNITED AIRCRAFT—PUBLICATION OF DOCUMENTS CONCERNING GRANTS

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Owing to the nature of information concerning the labour conflict at the United Aircraft, is the minister ready to reconsider the request made by the Quebec government which would like to know exactly what were the grants paid by the federal government to that company?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I asked for, received and reviewed this morning the statement made by a representative of UACL to La Commission Permanente du Travail, la Main-d'œuvre et l'Immigration de l'Assemblée Nationale. I have subsequently discussed the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, since it is this department that is the contracting party on behalf of the government of Canada, and we have agreed that the contracts themselves should be made public.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBILITY OF OIL RICH NATIONS UNDERWRITING COST OF CANADIAN COMMITMENT TO SUPPLY FOOD

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the commitment of food aid, especially by Canada and the United States, at the conference, and in view of the fact that our ability to supply this food is heavily dependent on oil and oil based fertilizer, did Canada urge the oil rich nations either to make materials available or to underwrite part of the cost of this food?

● (1530)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure that I understand the full significance of the question. We did underwrite the cost of the food which we committed over the next three year period. As the hon. gentleman knows, the Canadian statement is, of course, a general statement of the Canadian view, but we did not single out in that statement any particular group of countries for special attention. I understand there is some indication at present at the World Food Conference that oil producing nations are interested in the establishment of an agricultural fund, and that in fact a resolution may be coming forward on that subject, although up to the present no money has been laid on the table. Hopefully that step will be taken before the end of the week.

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE RIGHTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—PURPOSE OF DEMARCATION LINE BETWEEN INLAND AND OFFSHORE WATERS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of a reply the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources made last week to a question I asked about a test case concerning waters off the B.C. coastline. In speaking of inshore and offshore waters, he said in reply "It would be in our interest to work out with the provinces the exact demarcation of the two." I should like to ask whether this would be done in the interests of determining legal jurisdiction per se as between inland and offshore waters, or would it be with a view to staking out claims for future revenue from resources that may in the course of time be found in these waters?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recall that in the 1967 reference it specifically dealt with those waters which were outside the boundaries of the colony, as it then was when it came into confederation with Canada. The reference to inland waters in that case is rather obscure and it will depend on the historic reference in respect of the waters as they existed at that time. In a practical sense, in administering the offshore mineral rights, we have not been renewing leases or issuing permits in respect of what we regard as the inland waters. We think it would be desirable to start by agreeing on respective areas of responsibility. Of course, if hydrocarbons should be discovered seaward of these waters they would, of course, fall to the national account.

MEDIC-ALERT BRACELETS—SUGGESTED PROHIBITION OF SALE OF FAKE BRACELETS

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary. It relates to the misuse of medic-alert bracelets. Is the minister aware that fake medic-alert bracelets have been sold in drugstores across the country for the past two years and that these bracelets are not based on a physician's advice and are not registered as are the real medic-alert bracelets? If that is the case, is the minister planning to take some immediate steps to prohibit the sale of these bracelets to the general public?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will take note of this question. I can say that my information is that the sale of these bracelets is not illegal at the present time. I will inquire as to why they are allowed and why there are no regulations controlling their sale.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

FULLERTON REPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

A few days ago the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs stated that the Fullerton report clearly aired views that are contrary to those of Quebec. In the circumstances, could the minister assure the House that none of the proposals contained in the report will be implemented before an agreement is reached with the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Fullerton report was made to the Prime Minister and will be the basis of discussion at all levels of government, and especially by the joint committee of both Houses of parliament dealing with the national capital and future plans in that regard. Therefore, the Fullerton report itself will be the subject of ample and full consideration. No one is going to make any unilateral decision. I believe Mr. Fullerton has presented some options, to some of which he gives higher priority, but the matter is for parliament to determine in consultation with all levels of government.

GRAIN

POSSIBLE ABOLITION OF CROWSNEST PASS FREIGHT RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that he stated in Edmonton a couple of weeks ago that the Crowsnest pass agreement rates might be abolished, and over the weekend in Winnipeg said we should start considering the establishment of a Crowsnest pass fund, I would ask him to indicate to the House what government policy is regarding this Crowsnest pass agreement, and whether it is the government's intention to establish a fund in substitution for that agreement, and if in fact the minister wants to abolish it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to let the hon. member have a copy of my Edmonton speech in which he will note an indication of my belief in the preservation for the prairie farmer of the benefits of the Crowsnest pass arrangement. I suggested it may well be in the interest of the prairie farmers if the benefits were conferred upon them in a different way, specifically through the vehicle of a Crowsnest pass rate fund.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, is it the minister's intention to make a statement in this House outlining government policy in this area; for example, the basis on which payments will be made to the farmers, and whether we can expect legislation in this regard?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that may well come, but at the present time, as my speech in Edmonton indicated, I put before the Canadian Grains Council the suggestion that this approach might be worthy of examination. I made it quite clear I was doing that in advance of consideration of this kind of a solution by the government. Therefore, no statement of positive policy and no prediction as to legislation is possible at this time.

TELEVISION SETS—SUGGESTED STUDY OF EFFECT OF IMPORTS ON CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that RCA Limited in Prescott, which is the largest producer of coloured televisions in Canada, has just laid off 120 employees, and there is expectation that more will be laid off because of an increase in the volume of imported television sets, some 30 per cent in this year, will the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce undertake to investigate this situation to see whether a dumping operation is underway, and particularly to determine if there is a need to reimpose the tariff on television sets, and will he in the course of that investigation undertake to review standards of fire resistance of cabinets which are lower in Canada than in the United States and determine if there is some impediment to this kind of operation that is affecting Canadian workers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly refer the anti-dumping aspects of the hon. gentleman's question to the proper tribunal. In respect of the tax and tariff policies, as they affect the Canadian computer industry, we are now in the process of reviewing all aspects of commercial policy as it affects that industry as we feel there is some room for a concrete review. I am going to refer the practical administrative matters immediately to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, but we are looking at it on a policy basis.

MERCURY POISONING OF NATIVES ON GRASSY NARROWS AND WHITE DOG RESERVES—SUGGESTED CONSULTATION WITH JAPANESE EXPERTS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding mercury poisoning in the English River system. It appears from a CBC documentary and information I have received about blurred vision, tingling fingers and other symptoms of mercury poisoning that several hundred Indians living on the Grassy Narrows and White Dog Reserves are in clear danger of losing their lives. Since the federal government is ultimately responsible for the health status of Indians, would the minister consider bringing Japanese experts in the field of mercury contamination to Canada to assist in a complete examination of these native people who, incidentally, are still feeding on contaminated fish?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, an intensive study has been made of the situation in that particular area. That study was made public and the report has been tabled in the House confirming the serious situation mentioned by the hon. member. I will certainly be pleased to look into the suggestion to see whether any advantage could be gained by bringing in a foreign expert to add to our present knowledge, but I must point out that the facts are known since they have been published. At the present time the question is more one of trying first to change the living conditions generally for the Indians in the area. However, I will look into the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ACTION BY CANADA TO OBTAIN AGREEMENT OF NATIONS FISHING IN GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE TO RESTRICT OPERATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the alarming decline of fish catches in Atlantic Canada, especially in the Gulf of St. Lawrence area, what steps, if any, has the minister taken to inform other countries of the seriousness of this situation? Has he taken any steps to obtain agreement from all nations still fishing this area to completely restrict their fishing operations in the Gulf of St. Lawrence before this spawning area for our offshore banks is irreparably destroyed?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question, of course the whole effort of the Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea Conference, and the effort of the government, is to establish a regime which will ensure proper conservation and management techniques for the coastal state. That is the position on the first part of the hon. member's question. With regard to the second part of the question, I should like to have a word with the Minister of Fisheries on that point to see what in his view might be done through other international agencies.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTION MINISTERS CONTROLLED APPROVAL OF PROJECTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the charges of the political pork barrelling that surrounds the LIP program, would the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether the practice in which ministers had complete control of approval of LIP applications within the provinces they represented has now ended and that riding allocations are now made strictly on a formula based on population figures and the unemployment figures for those ridings?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept any of the allegations. I personally did not have control of allocations in my province, nor so far as I know did any of my colleagues have control over any.

Mr. Epp: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In light of the answer given by the Acting Prime Minister, to verify his answer would he instruct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to make available to this House all riding allocations for the 1974-75 LIP program as well as population and unemployment figures used for the calculations of riding allocations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member is asking for information which will be available, if at no other time, at least when the estimates of the minister involved are being examined.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAMS—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INQUIRY INTO METHOD OF ALLOCATING FUNDS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the serious nature of the revelations made in the press in respect of the cabinet decision to clear LIP allocations in this fashion, would the minister set up an independent inquiry, which will of course not be edited as has been the case in the past, for the purpose of inquiring into all aspects of these allocations so that we in this House can have the assurance that this kind of organized pork barrelling is not going on.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the answer I gave to the first question I indicated that certainly this practice did not exist in this province in which I am a member and I doubted if it existed anywhere else. When the estimates of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration are before the House this matter can be examined. That is what Parliament is all about.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

On clause 2—Definitions.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, in recent years the House has not had too much experience in committee of the whole procedure. I wish to begin my discussion of this bill by saying that committee of the whole is part of the House. It is not an inquiry-type operation but, rather, a deliberation-type operation. It gives us an opportunity to put forward our views in short statements and to ask question of the minister. It gives us an opportunity to carry on a dialogue so that we can give due deliberation to this very important bill. I suggest to the minister, because of the importance of this bill, that he might consider allowing us a certain amount of leeway in respect of handling the various clauses in the bill.

One proposal I wish to make is that we start on the general clause, clause 1, at which time one or two general observations can be made and the minister can respond, after which we might leave the clause open so that we can move, possibly before the end of the day, to one or two other items. Clause 3 is one in which I am interested. In this way, I would have an opportunity to put forward some suggested amendments not only in respect of clause 3 but in respect of several other clauses. The minister then would have an opportunity to look at these various amendments, refer them to the law officers of the Crown for their considered opinion vis-à-vis their constitutionality and also refer them to the drafting officers, if he should accept the proposals, so they can make sure that they are in harmony with the whole bill.

This is the first request I would make of the minister; would he let us go forward and make some observations on clause 1 in a general sense, then adjourn consideration of the clause and go to clause 3, in order to facilitate the work of the House in dealing with these amendments?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member means clause 2, rather than clause 1. Our usual procedure is to automatically skip the preamble and the short title clause and go to clause 2. If the committee is agreeable, I would be quite happy to have remarks of a general nature made on clause 2. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain is a useful one. I would like to express my appreciation for his having made available to me the amendments he intends to put forward. As he has anticipated, I have sought the professional advice of my officials with regard to these amendments.

As a result of public scrutiny of this bill, particularly by those in the industry, a number of amendments of a more technical character have been suggested with regard to various points in the bill. I have been anticipating the immediate arrival of some officials with these amendments. As soon as they arrive, I will make sure that hon. members have them so they can look at them in advance of the amendments which are to be put forward by my colleagues. I look forward to having comments, and indeed will be happy to make responses if this should seem appropriate.

● (1550)

The Chairman: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain as agreed to by the minister. Is it agreed that the committee go into a more general debate while considering clause 2 of the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we will have general remarks under clause 2 and later in the debate, hopefully today, we would adjourn clause 2 temporarily and get on with clause 3 so that I can bring forward substantive amendments and have them tabled. My general remarks will be a summary of the objectives we should have in mind.

All members of the House want to produce a good bill. All members of the House want to honour the agreement made by the heads of the 11 governments at the meeting on March 27 this year. All members of the House, I think, have agreed on the principle that we should have a lower oil price all across Canada than the world price. The level below the world price is not stated at this time. There should be however, some form of time formula stated in the bill that will make it clear to industry and to the provinces that this competitive price, to ease the strain on the commercial operations of the various agencies both public and private dealing with oil and gas in Canada, can be made more certain and stable. These two principles, of a lower price and the staging proposal, have to be followed by a third principle, the cushion effect, which I think is adequately dealt with in the bill.

There are other principles I wish to refer to, as I mentioned in the discussion on second reading. I am not satisfied, and I do not think any member would be satisfied, with the fact that there is no mention in the bill, under the "purpose" provision, of a quid pro quo for the provinces. When any government is asked to make a sacrifice in the interest of the national good—in this case, a substantial amount running at the present time from $2½ billion to $3 billion per year for two provinces—I think it is only fair that we do what we can within that national purpose to make sure there is an indication by this House that, if possible, we will provide a quid pro quo dictated in principle by this House and not through informal discussions between the minister and the producer governments. It will, therefore, be our intention to move at least one, if not two, amendments on the quid pro quo principle, backing that up with a substantive amendment which will give an example of what I mean, so that the House, in effect, directs the type of quid pro quo that it thinks would be fair and equitable.

The final principle on which the main thrust of the debate will centre is the question of consultation. There is no doubt that under the British North America Act the ownership of land and resources resides entirely within the right of the province concerned. There is no question that the federal government has complete sovereign power in interprovincial and export trade. Here we have a situation where the power of one administration acting purely within its constitutional right has the effect, by incidence or by result, of influencing the actions of another legislature, another sovereign power, which in turn is acting purely within its sovereign right. I do not think that in this particular debate the issue at stake is the question of which level of government is the most greedy. What we are trying to do here, as a federal parliament, is to make certain that we bring forward legislation that will not be found unconstitutional and will serve the purpose which we all want it to serve.

I shall give an example of what I mean, Mr. Chairman. For 30 years, during the twenties, thirties and forties, the federal government—formed of both parties which held the reins of power during those years—in good faith used to lease land on Indian reservations to people who were not of Indian extraction; and they used to sell properties, part of Indian reservations, to people off the reservations. The money was turned over to the Indian bands.

This type of action was carried out in almost every province of Canada over many years. The inevitable happened. Although the federal government felt it was acting purely within its constitutional right, namely, that it was responsible for Indian affairs in this country and that it was doing the right thing in leasing land on Indian reservations and selling it with the agreement of the Indians, the moneys going back to the Indians so that it seemed a fair and reasonable activity by the federal government, somebody took the transactions to court. These actions went right up to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council, and it was ruled that when the lands were no longer used for the pure purpose of Indian reservations, they reverted to the Crown, in right of the province. Even though the federal government thought it was acting within its constitutional prerogative in looking after Indian reservations, it found itself in an ultra vires position in respect of these activities vis-à-vis land on Indian reservations.

The government of which I was a member had to face the fact that under the British North America Act, lands in the provinces that were not federal lands and mineral rights in the provinces which did not belong to the federal government, had to be dealt with through the legislatures of the provinces. In other words, we had to obtain the consent of the Crown in right of the provinces. In response to this conclusion, in 1958 the then minister of Indian affairs introduced two bills into this House. One was entitled, "An act to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves." This particular bill was passed. It has some interesting points. The facts which I have described are set out in the bill. Section 2 of the schedule reads:

> All grants of patented lands are hereby confirmed except in so far as such grants purport to transfer to the grantees any minerals and said minerals are hereby acknowledged to be the property of the province.

Even though there was agreement between the province of New Brunswick and the federal government that they would legitimize these particular transactions over the previous 30 years, the federal bill, with the agreement of the province, provided that the province still reserved the right to any minerals in these lands. The mineral rights of these lands which were transferred to the grantees, or to the people who bought or leased them, were kept within the prerogatives of the Crown in right of the province. Section 3 of the schedule reads:

> New Brunswick hereby transfers to Canada all rights and interests of the province in reserve lands except lands lying under public highways, and minerals.

I am reading this into the record, Mr. Chairman, to indicate that even though the federal government acted in good faith from 1922 to 1958 and within its constitutional jurisdiction, and felt it could handle problems on Indian reservations across Canada by taking lands out for lease or ownership, it found that it could not move without the consent of the Crown in right of the province. The British North America Act makes it clear, in sections 109 and 125, that minerals are the property of the province and the federal government cannot tax or do anything with them. If any federal action has the effect, through the principle of incidence, of hurting the interests of the other party, in this case New Brunswick, it is ultra vires. Similarly, we must consider the rights of provinces such as Nova Scotia, which provides a similar example.

● (1600)

My point is this: no matter how conscientious and hard working the minister may be, or how sincere his advisers may be, unless the minister can be absolutely certain that he is acting within the constitution we may be heading for trouble. That is why I suggested this method of proceeding, because we can consider these matters and the law officers of the Crown can consider whether, according to all precedents, what is being done under all clauses is proper. My second point concerns consent. On page 5960 of Hansard of July 14, 1959, the then minister of citizenship and immigration, Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough, is reported to have said the following, in moving second reading of Bill S-6, to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick respecting Indian reserves:

> Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the purpose of this bill, has given consent so far as Her Majesty's property rights are concerned, that the House may do therein as it shall think fit.

The circumstances concerning the prerogative of the Crown in which the bill of 1959 was introduced were similar to those we are now considering. Then the government, since the bill at that time affected the property of the Queen in right of the federal government, obtained consent of the Sovereign. The Sovereign said that the House could do as it saw fit. In other words, the Sovereign did not intend to put obstacles in the way of any decision the House might take at that time. That consent was obtained on the advice of the law officers of the Crown. According to Hansard, the minister went on to say:

> The purpose of this legislation is to ratify and confirm an agreement made on March 25, 1958, between the government of Canada and the government of the province of New Brunswick in relation to lands forming part of Indian reserves in the province of New Brunswick. The necessity for such an agreement arose from decisions of the judicial committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain in two cases involving the sale of portions of Indian reserves in Ontario and Quebec, by the federal government, following surrenders for sale given by the Indian bands for whom the reserves had been set apart . . . In both cases it was held that notwithstanding that Canada had exclusive jurisdiction over lands reserved for Indians, the radical title to the reserves was in the province and therefore, a valid agreement, after a surrender for sale by an Indian band, could only be made by the province.

The spokesman for the official opposition was the then hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. Apparently he knew a good deal about the matter before the House. He said in part, as recorded at page 5961 of Hansard for July 14, 1959:

> Certain cases were appealed to the Privy Council, and it was held that these lands were the property of the Crown in the right of the province. This means that it was necessary to take action to validate the defective grants, and negotiations between the two levels of government have been going on for some ten years and have now ended in mutual agreement.

I am making two points. First, there must be consent by both governments to any dealings affecting the property or prerogatives of the Crown. That is why the minister of that day made the sort of statement which ought to be made now in this House and whenever we are dealing with property or prerogatives of the Crown. Second, once consent to that agreement was obtained, it was ratified by legislation in the provincial legislatures and in parliament which provided the consent of the Crown in right of the province.

Speaking as a layman, I am not at all satisfied that this bill may not be declared beyond the competence of parliament. After all, the British North America Act laid down how the various powers within this country were to be divided. At present I am dealing with the narrow issue of Crown prerogatives. I submit that this bill is unsatisfactory, because the minister has not yet indicated the consent of the Crown in the federal right and there is no evidence before the committee showing that the Crown in right of the province consents to passage of any parts of the bill which affect the property of the Crown in right of the province. That being so, if I were in the minister's position I would wish to consult the law officers of the Crown before answering. That is why I suggested our present procedure: we can put our views forward, the minister can transmit those views to the law officers of the Crown and receive an answer which we can consider.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the hon. member for his observations concerning the matter we are discussing, and the constitution. The bill before us, in common with every other bill brought forward by the government of Canada, has been subject to the scrutiny of the officers of the Attorney General of Canada. They scrutinized the way in which this particular measure fits into the complicated constitutional matrix of our country. Those who drafted the bill have taken into consideration its possible effect on the various jurisdictions and considered whether parliament, in enacting it, would be acting within powers conferred on it under the British North America Act. Of course, I shall be prepared to discuss again with my advisers the specific questions raised by the hon. member.

May I respond to his argument by saying this: the situation that he recited which arose during the parliament in which he was a minister of the Crown is not precisely relevant to the present situation. I think a more relevant precedent, which also took place during the tenure of the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, relates to that government's decision to enact the National Energy Board Act and carry out the national oil policy. What is involved in the present discussion, and what was involved in the discussions in the late 1950s and 1960s with regard to the national oil policy, is the question of parliament's responsibilities and rights to act with respect to resources over and above those responsibilities coming under provincial jurisdiction.

When a resource is developed and converted into an object which is offered in commerce—that is, offered for export from Canada or in trade across provincial boundaries to other parts of Canada—it becomes at that point a resource which is not under the jurisdiction of any particular provincial government; rather, it becomes the object of interprovincial or international commerce and at that point, as clearly established by various authorities over the years, becomes the responsibility of the government of Canada. That responsibility was exercised by the government, of which the hon. member was a member, in the National Energy Board Act and the creation of the national oil policy.

Whatever the particular responsibility may have been of the producing provinces for the production and development of oil resources, a national oil policy was established whereby west of the Ottawa Valley line, in the province of Ontario, the price of oil was to be held above the actual market price that ordinary market conditions would have dictated at that time. If the price was to be held above, that was a decision to exercise the federal power to control the national market and to divide it in this way. It was a valid exercise of jurisdiction. In following that exercise of jurisdiction at that time, that act of the parliament of Canada was attacked, particularly in the Cal-Oil case. The Supreme Court of Canada held that administration of the national oil market, as part of the administration of interprovincial trade, was intra vires of the government of Canada. In this particular case, we are exercising an identical jurisdiction.

In this bill we are exercising jurisdiction by saying that once the particular commodities become products of interprovincial or international commerce, the responsibility clearly given to the federal government under section 91(2) of the British North America Act, for the regulation of trade and commerce, comes into play. At that point it is not only the right, but the responsibility of the federal government to regulate the national market. Provincial measures adopted from time to time, even in total agreement with the object of the government of Canada, cannot in themselves be effective. They could be effectively attacked by either a private party or another province.

Probably the best and most recent evidence that this continues to be a valid exercise of power is the decision taken by the National Energy Board with regard to setting a minimum and maximum export price for gas. At that point, the government of Canada, exercising its powers over international trade, which are no different in this regard from those over interprovincial trade, stipulated the price at which natural gas could be sold in Canada, not only in minimum but in maximum amounts. This stipulation has not been contested by any provincial government nor, as far as I know, by any private party. In this bill we are not expressly or consciously legislating or exercising jurisdiction with regard to a natural resource of any particular province. We are exercising our jurisdiction over a subject of commerce which has been, or is to be introduced into interprovincial or international trade.

I wish to refer to one other comment made by the hon. member. This issue has been raised from time to time both in debate on this and its predecessor bill. It is the question of quid pro quo. I suppose in every piece of legislation put before parliament it almost inevitably happens that it strikes one part of the country less evenly than another. One need only look at the equalization formula as it applies to certain provinces but not to others. One could look at each of these pieces of legislation and say, "I have to be satisfied that a particular region is getting a quid pro quo or I shall not support this bill."

In this, as in other cases, it is a reasonable observation that exercising this judgment as to what is in the national interest, this parliament should determine whether it is desirable to maintain some restriction on oil and gas prices in Canada for the benefit of consumers in not only this and other provinces, but even in the province of Alberta, in the sense that provincial pricing is accommodated to the interprovincial formula that has been followed. It is in the interest of Canadians generally that the Canadian economy should have the benefit of this price cushion. There should be a protective cushion against the kind of prices imposed upon the western oil consuming nations by the oil producing nations. Therefore, it is not a question of a bargain in this regard; it is a concept of what is in the national interest. I was not a participant at the March 27 meeting, but I take it that it was sufficiently in the national interest to motivate the premiers of the producing provinces, as well as the other provinces, to put forward this proposal.

I do not know what the question of a quid pro quo means. I do not know what the quid pro quo is intended to mean in this case. However, I do not think it is desirable for these major pieces of legislation which affect the economy, generally, of Canada to look for a declaration of a quid pro quo in so far as particular interests are concerned.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain has served a useful purpose in raising this matter as a constitutional issue. I do not share some of the views he has expressed, but I think it would be useful to have the minister's department and the law officers look into this matter so we have a clear idea of the position with respect to this legislation.

Far be it from me to pose as a constitutional expert. I am not a lawyer; I have no training in the legal field. Let me deal, first, with the matter of provincial rights. There is no doubt that the minerals, lands and forests within a province are vested in the Queen in right of the provincial government. They have all the responsibility with regard to controlling production and supervising conservation. They also have the right to certain reimbursement when non-renewable resources are exploited within their province. That is why I think it is very important, in establishing any price, that it be kept in mind that the provinces are witnessing the diminution of part of the public domain which cannot be replaced. It is not like a renewable resource such as grain or lumber. When you dispose of a mineral, oil or natural gas, the province is dispossessing itself of a resource. Once taken out, it is gone forever.

It should also be remembered that the royalties which the provincial governments receive from the development of their resources, both renewable and non-renewable, do not represent a clear gain for the provincial treasury. In a great many instances they spend millions of dollars doing surveys, carrying on exploration, mapping, building roads, and so on. If an industrial development follows their exploration, they have the responsibility of providing schools, hospitals and all the other municipal services in the area. Therefore, they are entitled to every consideration when we are talking about exploitation of their basic resources. That is why I was very disturbed when the Minister of Finance suggested in his budget last May that the royalties paid to provincial governments by resource-based industries would not be deductible from income tax. We shall go into that matter when the budget is brought down.

I think anything which appears to be interfering with the rights of a provincial government to develop its resources and reimburse its people for the exploitation of its public domain should be watched very carefully. Even in the matter of setting prices there has to be the maximum amount of consultation with the provinces and, if possible, agreement with the provinces as set out in clauses 22 and 50 which provide for an attempt to enter into agreement regarding the price to be established. In a federal system such as ours, everything possible should be done by way of consultation rather than by confrontation. This is the goal which should be pursued, and these are the means which ought to be used.

Having said this, I think we should be very clear as to the powers of the federal government. To a layman like myself, it seems there can be no argument at all that the federal government has the legislative or constitutional authority to set prices outside the province in which the goods are produced. I do not think there can be any argument about its authority to fix the price once the commodity crosses a provincial or international boundary. From my reading of this bill, that is perfectly clear. Clause 20 provides:

> This part applies to crude oil which enters into international or interprovincial trade or that is mixed or blended with crude oil which has been acquired for movement out of its province of production.

Clause 24, setting out particulars, provides:

> No person shall
> (a) sell any quality or kind of crude oil for consumption outside its province of production,
> (b) purchase any quality or kind of crude oil for consumption outside its province of production

Subsequent paragraphs use precisely the same wording. Later, we come to clause 27 which reads:

> Every person who acquires any crude oil in a province other than its province of production shall keep records and books of account at its place of business in Canada, or elsewhere in Canada—

We shall, of course, be glad to hear the comments of the minister, the opinions of the law officers and arguments of hon. members generally on this point. However, it seems to me, on the face of it, that the powers which are sought in this legislation are within the authority of the federal government. As a matter of fact, I do not know how selective price controls could be possible unless there were federal jurisdiction over goods moving into interprovincial or international trade. I do not know how there could be a two-price system for oil unless the federal government had such power.

If Canadians are to be cushioned against outrageously high international prices for oil by policies enabling them to buy their supplies at a price lower than the world price, while at the same time permitting our oil to be exported at the world price, with the governments of Canada, federal and provincial, picking up the difference between the two prices, I do not know how all this could be done unless the federal government had the kind of authority contained in the legislation before us.

The provincial governments, certainly the people I have talked to in the producing provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, recognize the logic of that position. The question they raise is the one to which the minister himself referred a few minutes ago. They ask, "What is the quid pro quo?" They say, "You are not doing this with regard to steel, cement, automobiles or machinery. You are doing nothing about freight rates which have militated for decades against western Canada and the Atlantic provinces." This argument is a valid one, in my opinion. The minister cannot very well comment on it now, but I think he should tell his colleagues that the lack of anything which can be regarded as a quid pro quo sticks in the throats of people in the producing provinces who say, "Whenever we have something the rest of the country needs, there is a price control imposed as soon as it crosses provincial boundaries. But whenever we buy farm machinery, cement, trucks, automobiles and a host of other commodities which enter into our cost of production, we are obliged to pay the going price."

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

I believe the federal government has the right, constitutionally, to the power it is seeking in this legislation. I hope it will not be used unwisely. I should like to ask the minister, for instance, what reaction he has received from the oil and gas producing provinces to the proposals contained in this bill and the list of amendments which he courteously sent over to us. Are those provinces prepared to co-operate? What are the possibilities of getting a voluntary agreement on the price of oil under clause 22 rather than having to use the mandatory clause 36? What are the possibilities, as a result of discussion, of getting a voluntary agreement on the price of natural gas as provided for in clause 50 rather than having to use the mandatory provision in clause 52? I am not objecting to clauses 36 and 52. We shall be dealing with those clauses when we come to them.

I do not think any federal government responsible for governing the nation could carry on negotiations indefinitely as to the price of oil and gas while the public continued in a state of uncertainty. I think there comes a time when somebody must have the authority to say, "This is what the price will be." Nevertheless, I ask the minister what reaction he has received from the provinces respecting voluntary agreement. There is another question I want to ask. I think the answer to it might make a considerable difference to the attitude of the oil producing provinces. What does the federal government propose to do with any money in the export charge fund that is left over after these compensation cost payments have been made? The estimate last year was that the government would probably take in $1,300 million or $1,400 million. It was estimated they might pay out in compensation costs, in the area east of the Ottawa Valley, $800 million or $900 million. I asked the minister in the national resources committee what the government was proposing to do with any money that was left over, and he quite properly said that we should wait and see whether there was any money left over. That is why he would not allocate money he had not received.

● (1630)

I should like to know whether any money will be left over, and whether any of it will go to the oil producing provinces. Originally, when the minister made the proposal about divvying up the money from oil, the provinces were going to get 50 per cent of the export tax revenue. Now, in lieu of getting a slightly higher price for the oil, the provinces have no claim on any part of the revenue from the export charge. If several hundred million dollars are left in the fund after compensation payments have been made, then I think the provinces will feel that at least part of the money, if not all, ought to go back to them.

I think the people in the oil producing provinces are good Canadians and are prepared to say that all the money necessary should be taken out of the export charge fund to compensate the people of eastern Canada so that they pay the same price for their oil, plus whatever transportation and handling charges there are, as other Canadians. But I think they would feel very much upset if $400 million or $500 million were left in the fund and the federal government said, "By virtue of the power that we have under the Petroleum Administration Act, we intend to take this money into general revenue". I think that would only exacerbate any feelings of resentment that there are.

I close by saying that I think, as every member here knows, that a federal system creates many problems which you do not have in a unitary form of government. It has advantages in that it makes for better decentralization and for government closer to the people. But it has the disadvantage that we are always concerned about conflicting interests between provincial and federal authorities. Anything that can be done to militate against these feelings of hostility, and to convince people that one part of Canada is not being treated differently from another part, ought to be done.

I think one of the ways of doing this is for the minister and the government to give very serious consideration to stating that if there are funds collected from oil that is exported which are in excess of the money we have to pay to compensate the people of eastern Canada, then either all this money, or certainly a substantial part of it ought to go to the oil producing provinces. If the minister can give us any information on the two or three points that I have raised, I would certainly appreciate it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments of the hon. gentleman which, as always, are very relevant. The questions that he has put to me are, firstly, with regard to provincial reactions to the bill. I would have to say that with respect both to the provision of the export charge to fund the compensation fund and to the creation of the compensation fund itself, since these are both the direct result of the March 27 meeting of first ministers I think they can be regarded as having the support of all provinces, including the particular producing provinces he has referred to. In this regard, of course, I am talking about crude oil.

The hon. member raised the question of the prospect of a provincial agreement with regard to crude oil. Of course, such agreement does exist with regard to crude oil up until June 30, 1975. The ongoing pricing arrangement itself will have to be a matter for discussion. I understood the first ministers to say it would have to be a matter for discussion in about May of the coming year, so we can then determine what their views are as to appropriate price levels after the agreed period comes to an end.

With regard to natural gas, in effect we are really only dealing with one producing province, Alberta. In this respect, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, every bit as much as Ontario and Quebec—indeed, one might say the individual householders in those provinces, even more so than those in Ontario and Quebec, are consumers of Alberta gas—have the same interests as others in trying to moderate price increases in so far as they may occur. I think the consuming provinces, including Saskatchewan and Manitoba, would support the notion that prices should not go as they would otherwise go under the Alberta arbitration act, but that price increases should be restrained over a period of time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I assume the same can be said of British Columbia.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): British Columbia produces a fair amount of gas for itself, and exports a fair amount more. However, because of shortfalls in British Columbia producing fields, they have now become customers for Alberta gas as well. On the whole, I take it that they would be less enthusiastic about higher interprovincial prices than they might have been a year or a year and a half ago.

The area of contestation, of course—to get right to the point—will be with regard to the concept of the federal government's exercising jurisdiction, in the event agreement is not arrived at, in the national market so as to set the price of oil. Equally, failing an agreement in the case of natural gas the federal government will similarly exercise its jurisdiction. With regard to both these commodities, the province of Alberta has made it clear that it opposes this exercise by the federal government of its jurisdiction under section 91(2), and those particular provisions of the bill before us do not have their support. That has been made perfectly clear to us and we need be in no doubt about it. With regard to the agreement with the affected provinces on gas prices, I think I would have to say that the returns are not yet all in as to whether or not it would be possible to achieve some kind of agreement.

As to appropriate staging over a period of years, we have had discussions with Ontario as one of the major consumers, as well as with the government of Alberta. We put forward to both these provinces a proposal for the phasing of gas prices over a period of time. In terms of Ontario as a consumer province, the matter has been very much narrowed down to a question of mathematics. At the moment I think it is correct to say that we have not had a further response from Alberta on whether this proposal would meet their requirements. However, we are still left with the general statement by either the minister of mines and materials or the premier himself that there could be phasing, over time, of any gas price increase; but I am unable at the moment to give a final answer whether there will be an agreement on gas pricing. There does seem to be a basis for an agreement, but no agreement has yet been finalized.

As for the disposition of funds, I think I would have to acknowledge in the most general terms that the argument put by the hon. gentleman is a reasonable one. If, indeed, at some time in the future, either by a miraculous reduction in international prices or through some other regime supplanting this particular one, a substantial amount of funds collected from the export charge were left over, then I would think that the producing provinces would have a very strong argument in saying that just as 50 per cent of the export tax funds are made available to them, so they should have some expectation of looking to some part of these additional funds.

I would have to say, however, that the prospect, in the relative short run, of that fund remaining in a surplus position is not that intensive. As hon. members know, we have been looking at propositions made by a number of provinces and by the private sector that Canadian exports to the United States should be reduced from the current level, which would move us from a slight surplus in the account over the compensation we have to pay to the point where, in effect, the compensation in relation to the export charge would be running in deficit.

Under these circumstances, I think I probably would have to repeat the same answer. For the time being we should be careful to maintain this fund in account, in case the claim for compensation should outrun the ability of this particular program to be funded out of the export charge. As I say, if ultimately a credit balance is established in favour of the treasury, then at that point there would indeed be every basis for discussion as to how it should be disposed of; but at the moment it looks as though we may have to look to other sources of revenue if this reduction is to continue in 1975 and 1976; that is, to provide for the fact that exports to the United States may be dropping in coming years.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Would not imports drop proportionately for a while?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I do not think that is likely, at least in the early stages before the pipeline flow would be going through into Montreal. In that event, exports would drop, but in fact the production would be shut in on a standby basis so that the same level of imports would continue but there would be a lower level of exports. It certainly would be true that at the time the flow was going into Montreal to the extent of 250,000 barrels a day on average, our liability on overseas selling would be reduced.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, would the minister permit a question on that point? If the compensation fund went into a deficit position, where would we find the revenue? Would it come out of general taxation, or would the government consider imposing an excess profits tax on some of the oil companies to recoup the necessary funds?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I must say that I would have to defer to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, in that regard. He has general responsibility, under the consolidated revenue fund, to meet that obligation. But it might be that we would have to look at some other available sources. I am sure he would consider the two sources the hon. member has suggested, among others.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, has some questions along the same line and I would defer my remarks until he has concluded.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I am very grateful to the hon. member for Calgary Centre for letting me go back to that point at this moment. My remarks are in reply to what the minister has said in outlining the future position on a constitutional basis. May I say at this time that I agree 100 per cent with everything the minister has said, as did the hon. member who spoke for the NDP. However, he has not met the point I was trying to put forward. I would accept the suggestion that I did not express it very clearly, because it is a very difficult point.

What I am trying to say is that property of a province in the form of land is not just subject to the legislative prerogative of that province but also to the prerogative of the Crown, and if anything happens through the principle of incidence to affect the prerogative of the Crown, then this legislation will become dubious if it goes before the courts. For example, the federal government has legislative authority to control production, whether it be of oil or gas, crossing a provincial border; but the application of that restraint on price, or control of price, has an incidence on the value of the property.

For example, if there were a surplus of $200 million, in this calendar year, of money collected by the federal government in export tax—which the federal government has the power to impose and collect—over the amount paid in compensation under this bill—and the federal government has the power to provide that compensation—I would ask, as a layman, who would own this money if the matter was brought before the courts? This is a depleting resource of the province, and in theory the property, the land or the resource is subject to the Queen's prerogative and can only be altered with the consent of the Queen in right of the province, which means its executive or the legislature. If the minister accepts the seriousness of my case, it would seem that neither he nor I can answer that question. Therefore, the amendments we shall put forward are intended to prevent this type of situation occurring. If the matter went to the courts, it would throw out the whole system which by mutual agreement we are all trying to put into this area.

Therefore, I come back to the key point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, namely, that the way to avoid all these risks and the potential danger of court action is by agreement mutually arrived at. With such a safeguard in this legislation we would protect the ownership and the rights of the federal government in this field. I would think, therefore, that the debate has come to the crunch. We are not debating the legislative competence of the federal government in fields of interprovincial and international trade, nor are we debating the fact that the provinces own these resources; but what I am putting to the minister as a question that should be of as much concern to him as it is to all of us is, what are the law officers going to say on the question of the Queen's prerogative in respect of the ownership of these resources by the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta?

I put that question to the minister because I do not know the answer. I suggest that very few of us here have an answer, but with all the precedents this matter is worthy of very serious consideration. That is why I mentioned the case of the Indian lands, because after 25 or 30 years of doing something, to finally realize one has made a big, fat boo-boo does not mean we should repeat the same mistake. That is the message I am trying to get across to the minister in a constructive way, to see if we cannot produce better legislation.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands spent most of his life on the prairies. I am sure he shares with me the knowledge that the wealth of the people on the prairies, relative to the people in Ontario and Quebec, is pretty good; but that does not resolve their difficulties. They know, as surely as they exist, that they are part of a colonial structure and even though the four western provinces produce 70 per cent of the wealth of this nation, they represent only 20 per cent or 25 per cent of our population and the representation in this House. They still get this treatment from the central provinces, even though they produce 70 per cent of the basic wealth, and there will be even more coming from our provinces. They have no say in the running of this country and no share in the national interest. We must do something to cushion the shock of the rapidly accelerating price of oil and asking that the producing provinces bear this subsidy of $2,500 million to $3,000 million out of their depleting resources.

● (1650)

The westerner keeps asking himself when he will see signs of equal status among all the provinces. Are they not all equal? Are they not all equal, not only in respect of what they receive from confederation but in respect of their responsibilities? The question I asked of the Prime Minister in respect of electricity was along the same line. Here we have one province endangering another province. I think it is potentially dangerous in the province of Ontario to have one of its plants out of operation, to have another damaged through fire, and to have a coal strike in the United States. Although this situation may not be dangerous, it could be dangerous. Ontario is still our largest industrial complex.

We all ask ourselves, on this issue, not what is right but, rather, what seems to be right; that is, when will this government apply the principle of equality on this very vital energy source, electricity, and ask the province of Quebec to consider its responsibility to the whole country and not be busily negotiating the sale of its surplus power to the United States when a neighbouring part of the Dominion of Canada needs that power.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands mentioned many other things. We think, in this House, traditionally of our transportation difficulties. What about lumber in the province of British Columbia? Last year, when the prairie provinces and Ontario were short, there was no action by this government to bring about equality of sacrifice. When it affects the prairies, do we get called upon to make the supreme sacrifice! I am simply pointing out, on the political issue, that perhaps this bill should be visualized by the minister as more than an administrative-legislative act to carry out the agreement of the eleven governments. As part of a policy of his government, I think he should recognize there is a political fact at stake, and he should put into the bill clauses which will guarantee reasonable equity to the provinces which are under the gun—in this case Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I speak with some feeling because this bill has political connotations. Westerners are waiting to see when the government will treat them as equals. I want to show the House this book by Dr. Ollivier, who once sat at the table where you are sitting now, Mr. Chairman. It has reference to the British North America Act and selected statutes. The preamble refers to the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Act and the Alberta Natural Resources Act of 1930. In 1905 we were not allowed equal rights to our resources, such as British Columbia and the six eastern provinces had. We were treated as a colony and told that the federal government could hand out grants of our forest resources and everything else.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And did.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): And did. It took years for the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta to restore those resources that were despoiled by the greedy government in Ottawa. In 1930, the government of Canada adopted the statement that all provinces were to be treated as equals. I wish to read this section.

> And whereas the government of Canada desires that the province should be placed in a position of equality with the other provinces of confederation with respect to the administration and control of its natural resources as from its entry into confederation in 1905—

Now, at this time of national emergency because of suddenly rising prices, we lose our equality. I think the minister is aware of the political difficulty of his government in respect of the prairie provinces, and therefore he should accept the fact that in this bill there should be the appearance of fairness and he should give more than sympathetic consideration to the type of constructive amendments we are trying to put forward.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, if I might refer again to the question which the hon. member raised, I do not know whether I followed his argument exactly, but it seems to me the essence of it is that the Crown in right of a province could, by exercising its right in respect of a particular commodity, thereby oust all the legislative jurisdiction of the government of Canada. If that was the question put to me, I think the answer clearly would be no. Clearly, the powers of the government of Canada given under section 91(2) would, for example in interprovincial trade, as much affect the property rights of a province as a private individual. Surely this has to be the structure of the whole statute, otherwise there would have been no basis for the division of power in the first place.

The hon. gentleman referred to a question he posed to the Prime Minister during my absence yesterday in Calgary, with regard to the possible power interconnection between Ontario and Quebec. The first comment I would make is that there is already such an interconnection. Following the January energy conference, I wrote to all the premiers indicating our interest in establishing closer interregional connection, given the unfeasibility at the moment of the kind of national connection which is sometimes talked about in the press. I received answers from the provinces.

In particular, both Ontario and Quebec have indicated approval in principle of the concept of regional interconnection, but both laid very considerable stress on the point that they would take the lead themselves, as provinces, in negotiating those types of arrangements and, if I may say so, in a rather polite way they indicated they would not thank the federal government for telling them the kind of interconnection they should have in this regard. As to the question of an emergency export of power from Quebec, of course under the terms of the National Energy Board Act the applicant, Hydro-Quebec in this case, would have to satisfy the National Energy Board that there was a surplus available in excess of that which would meet the reasonable demands of a neighbouring province. For example, the obligation would be on Hydro-Quebec to establish that there was not, in fact, a need in Ontario which could be met by the same block of power.

So the jurisdiction is already there and is established under the National Energy Board Act—indeed it is exercised by the National Energy Board—to make certain that if there are problems for Ontario Hydro this winter, and if it has difficulty and does not seem to be rushing for federal assistance in this regard, before a neighbouring province could export power which could assist it, that province would have to seek the concurrence of the National Energy Board, and the National Energy Board would have to be satisfied in that regard.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Chairman, we looked at this bill and its predecessor both during second reading stage and before the standing committee. We are now looking at it in committee of the whole house. Many of the points made earlier today have been made before, although I think some of the remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands were very well articulated and made very good sense, at least to me and, I hope, to members opposite. In respect of the constitutional argument raised, and the minister's announcement that the national policy of 1959 established a precedent, I should like to correct a remark of the minister in which he indicated that this established a precedent that there would be a higher price for crude oil west of the Ottawa Valley line. In fact, that national oil policy did not deal with price at all; it simply stated that exports from outside Canada would not be permitted into the area west of the Ottawa Valley, leaving that area available for domestically-produced crude oil.

● (1700)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Higher priced crude oil.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): The price was set by the marketplace.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, the price was set by exercise of jurisdiction.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): The price was set by the marketplace.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The price in Ontario was set by the exercise of jurisdiction.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): The minister will have to show me exactly where it says that the price was to be set by the National Energy Board or by anybody else. The price was set by the marketplace. They restricted the marketplace.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If there had been a free marketplace, and not one controlled by the government, then offshore crude would have dominated it.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): The marketplace was restricted, just as it has been restricted for automobiles and other things in the past, by tariffs. There is nothing new in restricting the marketplace. I think it is a rather generous extrapolation, however, to suggest that something like a tariff or a restriction of imports is tantamount to price control. It simply is not.

I am disappointed, Mr. Chairman, that the minister's reaction to the quid pro quo situation is that this is not in the national interest. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asked, why is it not in the national interest to be concerned about the legitimate aspirations of western Canadians? Why must a problem be located in central Canada before it is a national problem, and problems elsewhere are regional problems? This attitude is at the root of many of the difficulties we are facing today. This psychological hang-up must be surmounted if we are ever to have a sense of unity in this country.

Originally, all the funds were to go to the producing provinces. Then a 50-50 split was agreed upon, with the provinces also to get the increase in the price of crude from $4 to $6.50 a barrel. The budget came out and confiscated that, but today the minister says it will be considered. I would have to see it in writing, Mr. Chairman, before I could put any trust in it. There are four cases of revenue-sharing where a commitment was made and then immediately broken.

On the matter of rights and constitutional prerogatives, there is no question that the federal government has jurisdiction over trade and commerce, and the provinces own the natural resources. But it seems to me there is also no question that there is no such thing as an absolute right, any more than the right of freedom of speech or freedom of the press allows slander or libel, any more than the freedom of religion allows one to make human sacrifice at some temple. A right is a right only to the extent that it does not impinge upon the rights of others. It is not good enough to say that because the federal government has jurisdiction over trade and commerce, they can effectively do away with any of the normal rights associated with ownership. What does ownership mean, if it entails a denial of the right to dispose of property, if it is dictated where the property shall be disposed of and at what price? Such conditions make ownership meaningless.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands indicated that there may be some necessity for clause 36, the veto clause which would allow the federal government to impose its will unilaterally in the case that no agreement was reached on price. It is my contention, Mr. Chairman, that this clause should be eliminated for a number of reasons. Aside from the question of whether there are constitutional powers to enact that clause, it is a slap in the face for the producing provinces. It is tantamount to suggesting that we do not have confidence in their magnanimity, that we do not trust them to act as loyal Canadians. I do not believe that is a proper attitude for the federal government to adopt.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain referred to the numerous, long-standing grievances of the producing provinces which have been presented to the government but apparently have fallen on deaf ears. The present situation in terms of oil, gas and energy gives the west some leverage, for the first time in 100 years, through which it can demand adjustments in the policies that have worked against it for so long. If we were now to step aside, to deny that leverage to the western provinces, it might be another 100 years before they would be in that position again.

There are other and more important reasons why the government should seriously consider removing this clause. Under the British North America Act, provincial legislatures are not without muscle. It does not take much imagination to see that several pieces of legislative artillery could be introduced by the provinces to counteract any aspect of this legislation felt to be detrimental to their interests. The federal-provincial fight has been escalating for a year and a half. In my own province it has resulted in a lot of genuine people seriously considering the future as a separate political entity. This is of tremendous concern to myself and the majority of Albertans who are Canadians first and foremost. But it is understandable, Mr. Chairman, and anybody with a little sensitivity can appreciate why some people have arrived at that point of view.

Clause 36 was not part of the agreement reached by the first ministers on March 27, yet the federal government, in effect, is saying they are going to continue the fight because under the British North America Act they think they can win it. If they continue with that attitude, there will be very serious consequences for this country which I hope we all love. But I think the country has had enough of this bickering, Mr. Chairman. It is time we came together and talked about consulting and working together, instead of fighting.

● (1710)

The first, important step the federal government should take is saying, "We have confidence in co-operative federalism and in the federal state. We have confidence in provincial premiers who are concerned for the rest of Canada. We believe we can work out our difficulties next July, in the same way as they were worked out last March." That advice does not come from me alone, nor from members on this side alone; it is expressed in a document which the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources tabled in July, 1973, entitled "An Energy Policy for Canada, Phase 1." For example, on page 9 one finds the following:

> Federal and provincial responsibilities and interests in the energy field are intimately interrelated. No national policy can be contemplated without the fullest of intergovernmental consultations and consensus.

On page 58 one reads the following:

> While the federal government considers that it is its responsibility to take the lead in the development of national energy policies, it recognizes that, generally speaking, these should evolve from the harmonization of the priorities and policies of the several provinces and of the different regional concerns.

That is excellent advice. Lower on the same page one reads the following:

> That there can be no effective set of national energy policies developed without the participation of the provincial governments is readily apparent. The provinces own 90 per cent of the assets of the electricity generating industry in Canada, they control almost 100 per cent of the oil and gas produced in Canada today, and, when the potential of the oil sands is included, they control a majority of Canada's future petroleum potential. They also hold the rights to almost all of the coal potential which will meet future energy needs. Obviously, policies developed in isolation in Ottawa hold scant hope for success.

That is precisely true. That is excellent advice prepared by the minister's department. I wish it were followed. Some may consider this a debate on provincial rights. It is not. The provinces can look after their own rights. They can muster all the legal and legislative muscle which is necessary to take care of their rights—of that you can be sure. The point is that we, as federal members of parliament who are concerned about the entire country, cannot stand aside and allow the escalation which has been continuing for the last year and a half to carry on. We have witnessed what looks like empire building on the part of conflicting bureaucracies who say, "The people of Canada be damned." That attitude is neither acceptable nor responsible.

I shall not touch upon federal and provincial jurisdiction, preferring to deal with that matter when we deal with the appropriate clauses. The bill says nothing about supply, which is regrettable. It talks about protecting consumers from unstable prices. Indeed, it is becoming ever more apparent that we need to guarantee stability of supply; we should not worry so much about price. Unless current trends are reversed, oil and gas will not be available no matter how much we are willing to pay.

I am disturbed because the bill sets no time limit for government controls. Are permanent price controls to be introduced? The minister said this is not the case and implied that this is to be a temporary régime. I agree that no one can see into the future and we do not know what will happen. Nonetheless, introducing such controls, without saying for how long they are to last, is setting a dangerous precedent which may lead to permanent price controls. If the imposition of such controls is in line with the conscious wish of parliament, then for goodness sake let us talk about it publicly. Let there be legitimate, public debate on the question and let us not sneak into a system of controls by the back door. Also, I am not satisfied with the way in which the bill deals with natural gas. Clearly, this matter has not been considered carefully enough. The government has open to it many alternatives for dealing with natural gas. Again, past actions smack more of empire building than of any legitimate response to meet a difficulty.

The subsidy program, on which I commented previoulsy, is the most complicated one can imagine. It purports to take into account every boatload of oil which arrives in this country and, on the basis of a complicated formula, to determine the subsidy which will apply to that oil. Why is a single export tax levied on every barrel of oil produced in this country, regardless of quality, place of production, specific gravity or destination? Why is it necessary to apply a complicated formula to imported oil, a formula which is difficult to administer and which has resulted, despite the government's commitment to a uniform price system across Canada, in crude oil in Montreal being less expensive than crude oil in Toronto? The subsidy program has brought this result: crude oil in the Quebec market is cheaper than crude oil in the Ontario market. That runs counter to supposed government policy. These remarks show some of the weaknesses of the bill.

Whether we are locked into our positions, and whether it is impossible or too late for change, I do not know. I hope it is not too late. I hope, if the government is concerned about the unity of this country, that it will reconsider the necessity for clause 36 of the bill and withdraw it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I shall comment briefly on what the hon. member has said. He and his colleagues spoke about the difference in price of crude in Montreal and Toronto. Quite aside from the difference in transportation costs, the difference is qualitative, the offshore crude having a higher sulphur content than the Alberta crude and not being of the same quality.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-32. I do so because of certain statements made a short while ago by the minister in response to certain questions. Having looked at the bill, I realize that it confers tremendous powers upon the federal government. As a colleague of mine suggests, they are enough to make your hair stand on end. The bill deals with gas. According to clause 2—

'gas' means natural gas or any fluid hydrocarbon or any fluid mixture of hydrocarbons other than a hydrocarbon recovered in liquid or solid state—

And so on. Contrary to the minister's statement a short while ago, I understand that the Newfoundland government will not accept a purely advisory role in the management of our east coast offshore resources. In fact, consultations held to date on the amendment question have resulted in a provincial advisory role, this being all that the federal government will concede. The minister, in his reply, can explain to the House why this is so.

● (1720)

I would point out that as a result of this adamant stand, Newfoundland has, in its determination to seek solid provincial management rights, been forced to take independent action in order to secure greater control over its offshore resources. Unfortunately, the other Atlantic provinces do not seem as determined as the government of Newfoundland to obtain this form of management and control. This is regrettable in light of the discovery off the coast of Nova Scotia, for example, on Sable Island. It is unfortunate for the province of Nova Scotia and its future.

The minister now knows the government of Newfoundland will not easily retreat from its present stand. In fact, if negotiations with the federal government fail, it is my understanding the Newfoundland government will take this issue to the Supreme Court of Canada. This is not just a matter of dollars and cents. The first decisions in this federal-provincial dispute relate to the granting of exploration and production permits in the offshore areas. What level of government will be responsible for issuing them? The exploration and production permits will determine the terms and conditions under which the oil companies will participate in the offshore development. Under this bill, who will have final authority in this matter?

Second, Newfoundland wants a strong voice in determining the type of field practices which will be carried out by the oil companies. This is very important, because it will cover such items as conservation and the rate of production. The type of field practices carried out is also a very important question in view of the area in which exploration and development will be carried out, mainly on our offshore banks where our fish stocks are spawned and where oil pollution presents a further threat to our fish resources.

I can well understand the concern expressed by the government of Newfoundland over this matter. They, like those of us who reside in Nova Scotia, realize our lack of surveillance capability in Atlantic Canada. It is in such a difficult position as to be almost absurd. This is a very valid concern that is being expressed by the government of Newfoundland, because they realize that without surveillance just about anything can happen and is happening on our offshore banks.

Finally, the government of Newfoundland believes it must have a say in determining how any resource products are marketed and used, once they are established. In these three areas the Newfoundland government has refused to accept only an advisory role. It is only fair and proper that the minister explain to this House just what the position will be, not only for the government of Newfoundland but for the other Atlantic provinces, because this is an ongoing dispute; it has not been resolved although discoveries have been made which are worth while.

In my opinion, the federal-provincial relationship should be more of a partnership than having Ottawa end up with ultimate control of these resources. I am not a constitutional expert, but it is my understanding that under the British North America Act the resources of this country belong to the provinces. By giving the federal government final control, I believe we are playing fast and loose with the constitutional balances in this country. There is no reason why our offshore resources should be treated any differently from resources found on land. I believe our provincial governments, especially those in Atlantic Canada, should back up that concept with all the force at their command. I say this because within a few years our oil and gas resources in Atlantic Canada may well be making a meaningful contribution to our energy needs not only in Atlantic Canada but throughout the eastern part of this country. The discovery of natural gas off Labrador in two areas, for example, is very meaningful. Although it is too early to evaluate the commercial potential of these two finds, they are, hopefully, the forerunners of more discoveries in this area.

In conclusion, the absence of a federal-provincial agreement on our offshore areas has unfortunately acted as a negative factor in our attempts to spur additional exploration activity. In fact, federal proposals for heavily taxing our resource companies could have a serious and damaging effect on our rate of exploration and development activities. I have raised some very important points. I have spoken about the concerns of the premiers in Atlantic Canada, primarily Newfoundland. In his reply I hope the minister will not only answer these points but will give us a little better understanding of his concept of the British North America Act and of provincial and federal rights as he sees them under the act.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I should make it clear to the hon. member that this proposed bill does not deal with the question of exploration for and development of oil and natural gas, either in any province or offshore, or federal territory. It deals with oil and gas marketing after the product is produced and once the intention is fixed to move it to interprovincial or international trade. In that sense, the question of negotiations with the eastern provinces and the kind of regime which will apply there are relevant and important in another context. They were the subject matter of discussion with Newfoundland, for example, by myself as recently as last week. However, the Petroleum Administration Act does not deal with that question. From the standpoint of the Atlantic provinces, it provides the means and assures that consumers of oil and oil products in the hon. member's province, the other three Atlantic provinces, as well as Quebec and eastern Ontario, will not have to pay international market prices for the products they use.

The policy of the federal government is to have this cushion which has been much objected to by some producing provinces. By this cushion we have taken action to protect the hon. member's province and other provinces from the full impact of international prices. The question he raises is very important, but in another context and in another bill. There is nothing in this bill dealing with either administration of offshore resources or, indeed, exploration and production in any province, at this point.

Mr. Crouse: Can the minister explain how gas is developed in Atlantic Canada, specifically off the coast of Labrador, to the point of selling it to Quebec, for example? Will the minister explain how this can be done by the government of Newfoundland? In other words, am I correct in interpreting the minister's comments in this way, that it will be quite acceptable for the government of Newfoundland to establish its own marketing agency for gas they discover off Labrador and to sell this gas to the people of la belle province, Newfoundland or Nova Scotia without running afoul, as we say in the maritimes, of the minister's regulations? Is this a correct interpretation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No, Mr. Chairman. This government does not concede that the continental shelf is within the jurisdiction of the government of Newfoundland. That is really what the discussion is all about. In any event, if the gas finds were within the inland waters of a particular province, exploration and production there might well be within provincial jurisdiction. However, once the commodity was introduced into interprovincial or international commerce, the federal jurisdiction over trade and commerce would operate and this bill would apply to it.

● (1730)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I thought I heard the minister say that the federal government does not concede that the continental shelf off Newfoundland falls within provincial jurisdiction. He went on to say something about inshore waters. Could he tell us where the break-off point is? I have been asking a series of questions about this very matter and I am finding, to my consternation, that there are three—possibly four—regimes which must be considered when we are examining this question. I have been looking into the position on the Pacific coast, on the Atlantic coast, in the Arctic and along Hudson Bay to find out the circumstances which exist there. I find that certain provinces have jurisdiction in those areas, while others have not. The jurisdiction of some provinces goes to the edge of the continental shelf, and in other cases it does not.

Where is the cut-off point? What does the minister mean by "inshore waters off the coast of Newfoundland"? There is another question I should like to ask the minister. Can he tell us whether in his conversations last week he was able to reach agreement with the minister in charge of these matters, Mr. Crosbie, I think it is? Does he believe that his interpretation will prevail?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To deal with the last question first, Newfoundlanders, of course, maintain that they have jurisdiction, and the government of Canada maintains that they do not.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am surprised to hear that expression of surprise from the hon. gentleman, since this has been the issue for the last seven years or more. In the case of the hon. member's own province, the question was taken to the Supreme Court and it was held that the areas beyond low-water mark, with the exception of the inland waters as defined at the time of confederation, were within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada. It happens that in the hon. member's province the provincial government is more interested in preventing exploration and development of hydrocarbons than in making it possible, but that is another question altogether.

With regard to Hudson Bay, I think it is clear that beyond the low-water mark, in the grants by which the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba were given jurisdiction, was withheld from the grant and remains in the federal sector as, indeed, it does in the north.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A complicated system.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Quite right. It is a complicated system and that is because at different times in our history different parts of the nation's territory were placed under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I quite understand that there is a difficulty and that the federal authorities claim jurisdiction over certain areas off the Newfoundland coast, while the province of Newfoundland claims the contrary. Could the minister give us some indication of the manner in which this difficulty is being resolved? Is it being treated as a political matter, or will there be a reference to the Supreme Court. In that case, who will make such a reference? Or will the whole thing be left to fester?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is, of course, being treated as a political matter. That is what the negotiations of the last two years have been about. They have reached a point at which three of the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec are considering a possible regime which might be mutually acceptable. With regard to Newfoundland, I think the conclusion reached at the meeting with Mr. Crosbie, the minister of intergovernmental affairs, and Mr. Barry, the minister of mines, was that we would analyse proposals for the kind of administration we now have in mind, as a federal government, on the continental shelf and the kind of ambitions they have in mind, in an attempt to discover whether there is any real difference of opinion as to how the administration should be handled. This is a matter for negotiation and, quite frankly, my preference is to solve these disagreements by negotiation rather than through reference to the courts.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, this bill raises important questions of principle. First, it pits one region of Canada, the west, against the central market. In effect, it tells western producers that they must sell the goods they produce at a great deal less than their value. This leads us to examine the whole concept of provincial rights. In practice, the provinces are being asked to give up control over their products except that in the case of oil and gas they perhaps have a choice whether to leave them in the ground.

In the second place, the bill sets a price of $6.50 a barrel for oil without saying what is to happen in the future. Most people think the price of oil is bound to reach the world price eventually, but there is no indication here of the means by which increases in price will be permitted. At the purchase level it does nothing for conservation. By setting a lower price, consumption is encouraged. All of us recognize the need of a person to keep warm, but what about the man who drives a large car or who uses a 90 horse-power motor on his power boat when he wants to water-ski? Is he entitled to the same consumer benefits as, say, a pensioner?

The arrangements contemplated in this bill will displace the market as a means of setting the price of gas and oil. With the market no longer functioning, one has to rely on the political process, which means that one or two people with a special interest will set the price. Eventually, the whole country will suffer. In Canada, with its immense distances, market forces should prevail whenever possible or reasonable. Oil and gas are no exception. The prairie governments are very sensitive to attacks on their oil and gas interests. In fact, they are as jealous of those interests as the people of Quebec are about their language.

The struggle of the western provinces to get their natural resources back from Ottawa was long and bitter. It lasted from 1900 to 1929. Now the federal government is attempting to take those rights back again. Mr. J. W. Defoe, editor of the Winnipeg Free Press and one of the staunchest Liberals in history, did a great deal for the Liberal party in western Canada and much to keep this issue alive. We now have a Liberal government in Ottawa backtracking again. When the western provinces were first formed, Ottawa until 1935 treated them as if they were quite incapable of managing their own resources, even though section 109 of the British North America Act provides as follows:

● (1740)

All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due and payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise—

The use of revenue from resource development was accepted in principle, but when Manitoba tried to be treated like the other provinces, Ottawa refused. When the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta came into existence in 1905 they made a similar request and were also refused. This shows how seriously the western provinces regard this as an attack on the resources they own. The feeling was so great that the Conservative Party of 1911 had as one of its pledges that the western provinces would be put on the same footing as other provinces. Nothing came of this until in the 1920s the western progressives supported the Liberals and used this as a lever on the Liberal party to give the western provinces their resources. The government of the day bought off the maritimers with some sweeteners, since the maritimers said that they were entitled to some of the resources in the western provinces.

The federal government of that day sold a great deal of land, some 200 million acres, comprising school land, and so on, and there followed a long and bitter hassle over the amount of compensation to be paid. Alberta claimed for the coal, oil and gas that had been produced up till 1930, and to show that the federal government of that day was not interested in conservation—or perhaps, to be fair, did not take into account conservation—they drew the oil and gas leases in the Turner Valley and billions of cubic feet of gas were wasted. It took a special act of parliament to enable Alberta to enact natural resource conservation legislation.

Some people contend that the federal government is the only body with an over-all view of this country. They say it is the only body capable of marrying up conservation, production of oil and usage. Here we have an example of a provincial government having to step in to conserve a valuable reserve of natural gas. Ultimately, a royal commission awarded the two provinces $5 million, but by this time they were so heavily in debt owing to unemployment that this was a sort of saw-off.

It is very important to the western provinces that jurisdiction over natural resources remain within the province, even in times of emergency such as the present, if I may call it that. If there are emergencies arising because of price, we should not lose sight of the very important fact that the western provinces in particular, though I think all parts of Canada, will function better, nationally, if they remain in control of their resources. For example, we were told that the price of copper in Canada is lower than the world price, that we have a two-price system, but that Ontario is the main loser. Nevertheless, the province of Ontario must stand to gain something, with their large industrial base.

All the good things that have come to the west in recent years have been due to the wealth of natural resources. Saskatchewan has its potash as well as its oil fields, and these resources have made for a better economy. Manitoba has its hydroelectric development, which is still in course of completion and will be very valuable to the province. If this bill fails to recognize the right of the provinces to control their own resources, then I think unity in Canada is in for a very rough ride. The west has fought a long time, as I have detailed, to get possession of its resources and to keep them so as to preserve unto itself some clout in the Canadien confederation. If the federal government takes over the resources of the provinces through the instrument of this bill, then the provinces themselves will move into the field.

It has been suggested by the Hon. Eric Kierans that the provincial governments would probably take over all exploration and development of Canada's resources within a period of five to ten years. Perhaps they will, and perhaps they won't; but from the tax point of view alone, the provincial governments are almost obligated to move into the field. For example, taxes on utility companies and hydroelectric companies are such that Crown corporations are at a distinct advantage. The provincial governments almost have to take over public utilities in order to stop the federal government getting too much revenue. If the provinces do move in—and they may have to—then they could do so in different ways. One way would be to do almost what the Arabs are doing in the Middle East, which is allowing companies only a few cents a barrel to pump out the oil and to claim a heavy tax. But no matter what method is used, it will not likely make for any cheaper oil and gas in the rest of the country.

I, for one, believe that the private sector has a large part to play in the oil and gas industry. I feel that letting the provinces manage and control this industry is much the best way of extracting these resources from the ground. I see little point in the provinces themselves having to take over production of the resources. I think people in general would sooner deal with private companies for their supplies of oil, gas and hydroelectric power, assuming the price is reasonable, than deal with a Crown corporation.

Now, what about the consumer? The bill seems to indicate that it is in the interests of consumers to have relatively cheap energy all across the country. I suggest that if everything were the same price across the country we would find ourselves in an impossible situation. A bill setting the price at $6.50 a barrel, giving no indication as to when the price rise will occur or how it will come about, flies in the face of any practical reasoning. If we are to have a lower price than the world market price, let us have some priority as to those who should benefit from the lower price.

● (1750)

Canada is one of the few nations of the world which increased its energy commitments and capacity in the last year. Even United States commitments and capacity have remained almost steady. The days of cheap energy are all but over. Let me quote what former energy chief John Sawhill of the United States said, as reported in the Toronto Star of November 12, 1974:

> I think ... the time is coming when we've got to be honest with the American people and tell them the prices of energy are going to be higher in the future than in the past.

This bill seems to indicate that we will continue to have an everlasting supply of oil at prices lower than world market prices, and that we will continue to take a "head in the sand" attitude. I suggest that because of this attitude Canada is still without a rational, all-embracing energy policy. This bill indicates to Canadians that they can go on blithely convinced that we are wallowing in energy resources. That is not the case. We have lots of energy, but it is very expensive to produce or extract. For instance, it costs in the neighbourhood of $1 billion per year per plant to extract petroleum from the tar sands. On the basis of that cost we are looking at oil in the neighbourhood of $10 to $12 per barrel.

This bill sets a price of $6.50 per barrel on oil whether it is old, new, or whatever. There may be a good argument for suggesting that old oil produced in the past and based on a lower tax structure should be put into the pot at a much lower level than new oil. However, at a time when we know that the United States is operating on the basis of $10 a barrel, and at a time when our drilling rigs are moving to foreign areas, we are allowing the same $6.50 a barrel for oil produced in a tar sands plant and for oil produced from wells no matter at what depth.

This bill does nothing to encourage the development of new supplies, and that will be important. Unless this bill shows a greater awareness of that need, we are faced with a difficult future. We are in for a rude awakening very soon because we will not have enough oil, and what we do have will be at a much higher price. Unfortunately, it is hard for people to face up to the dilemma with which we are faced. We all agree that conservation is good, but none of us really wants to practice conservation measures. This bill sets the oil price at $6.50 a barrel, with no indication as to how that figure will change. To all intents and purposes, the bill perpetuates that figure.

The conservation of oil will cost a great deal of money. Many people will lose jobs and the nation will suffer from increasing unemployment. Many people in Canada think we can escape world difficulties in respect of a petroleum shortage. They feel we will not be affected because we will be able to maintain a balance between exports and imports. Many nations of the world are becoming worried because the United States balance of imports and exports is sagging—and it is the huge United States market upon which our exports depend. Even now, our manufacturing people are finding it very difficult to sell our products to the United States market. The reason the auto pact is not working well for us is that people in the United States have stopped buying cars as a result of the high price of gasoline.

This rigidity of price in the bill is one of its features that makes me doubt its benefits. I think it will perpetuate the Alice in Wonderland approach that things will be fine, everything will work out and we will escape world difficulties in respect of oil prices. This bill is not practical in that sense, and it might help if the minister would indicate, by an amendment or otherwise, how the price of oil will increase or even decrease in the unlikely event that something happens in world markets to cause such a decrease. It would be worth while if the minister would indicate what the government plans in this regard.

We are all aware of the establishment of petrochemical plants, one in Alberta and one at Sarnia. I am sure hon. members are aware of the suggestion that the petrochemical plant at Sarnia would be adversely affected if the Canadian price of oil were equivalent to the world price. Presumably that situation will come about and that plant will find itself in difficulties. Those are the few comments I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could interrupt the proceedings at this point. Under an agreement I had earlier with the minister, I would ask that we revert to the consideration of clause 3 in order that I might introduce a motion so that hon. members may consider it overnight and decide how they want to treat it.

The Deputy Chairman: I would suggest to the hon. member that he read his motion into the record at this time. It will not be accepted at this moment, but it will be on the record for consideration.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I propose to move the following amendment to clause 3:

That clause 3 of the bill on page 2 be amended by deleting line 9 and substituting therefor the following:

"province; and, where the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada does not extend to bind Her Majesty in right of a province, then to the extent that Her Majesty in right of a province consents thereto."

I will submit copies, in English and in French, to the Chair so Your Honour will have a record of this amendment for the House journals. The motion is not being moved, Mr. Chairman; it is just being presented at this time.

Progress reported.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF HON. MEMBER FOR NORTHUMBERLAND-DURHAM CONCERNING HOUSE OF COMMONS EMPLOYEES—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a question of privilege in connection with certain remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) the day before. I indicated I would reserve my decision on that question of privilege and deal with it later. I think the appropriate time to deal with it is now.

In the first instance, the question of privilege relates to an interpretation of the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. Since his remarks were open to more than one interpretation, we did take some time yesterday, at which time I felt the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham clarified very explicitly the intent of his remarks. As a result, I feel I must accept that the clarification extends back to the time the original remarks were made. Therefore, with that clarification in mind, it puts me in some serious doubt as to whether a question of privilege exists.

In addition, I have grave reservations as to whether an allegation about the staff of the House of Commons, important as it may be, in fact constitutes a question of privilege concerning the members of the House of Commons. In any case, I am not required to decide either of those matters because the hon. member did not follow up his question of privilege with a specific motion, and for this reason no action is called for by the Chair. In any case, after hearing the clarification offered by the hon. member, I have decided against finding a prima facie case of privilege under these circumstances.

MR. MACKAY—FAILURE TO TABLE DESJARDINS REPORT ON PILOTAGE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege; it is, perhaps, not a major one but it affects the rights of all hon. members and it is one which I feel creates a bad impression.

For many weeks I have been interested in the report commissioned by the Minister of Transport pursuant to section 14(5) of the Pilotage Act and entitled the Desjardins report. I have brought the matter up with the Minister of Transport on various occasions in this chamber as well as in the standing committee. I have asked for this report and I have also asked for information regarding the cost of its preparation as well as the cost of a similar one called the Marler report which was commissioned last year. I have not received this information though I wrote on November 6 asking the minister specifically whether he was in a position to let me have a copy of the Desjardins report.

It has come to my attention within the last two hours that the Desjardins report is in the hands of several solicitors in Toronto and Montreal, and to the best of my knowledge it has neither been tabled in this House nor officially released by the minister elsewhere.

With the greatest respect to the minister, and to yourself, Mr. Speaker, I suggest the omission to furnish a member of parliament with a report in these circumstances constitutes a breach of privilege. If Your Honour should find that I do have a valid question of privilege, I would move:

That the Desjardins Report be tabled immediately pursuant to the rules of this House since it has been released, in effect, to the public.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have, of course, no reason to doubt the words of the hon. gentleman. If he tells me that he knows that some people have the report in their hands, that may be possible. The inquiry was presided over by Mr. Desjardins and maybe he gave the report to a certain number of lawyers. I do not know. I cannot deny that possibility. The only thing I can say is that, as a government, we have to decide what to do about the report. This has now been decided and I believe that in a few hours, by tomorrow at the latest, I can let the hon. gentleman have a copy.

An hon. Member: How convenient!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has given me notice of his proposed question of privilege. I would find myself in considerable doubt as to its validity unless he were in a position to establish some legal or statutory obligation upon the minister to table the report. However, there appears to be no need to resolve this point since I presume the undertaking given by the minister to make the report available is a sufficient resolution of the matter.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF VISIT TO CANADIAN WAR GRAVES IN ITALY

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce that plans have been made for an official Canadian delegation to visit Italy next April and May to hold commemorative ceremonies in the Canadian war cemeteries. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has advised me that the government of Italy has enthusiastically concurred in the proposed visit.

The delegation will be headed by myself and I will be joined, on arrival in Rome, by His Excellency, our ambassador to Italy. It will be composed of representatives of the government, of the veterans organizations and of survivors of the 1st Canadian Corps who participated in the Italian campaign. This corps was in action during the period from July, 1943 to February, 1945 and involved more than 92,000 Canadian troops. More than 5,000 of them were killed or died of wounds and are buried in the Canadian cemeteries in Italy.

I am sure I do not have to remind hon. members of this House of the significance to Canada of names like Ortona, the Moro River, Rimini, the Liri Valley and the Gothic Line. These are names that will be remembered forever in our history with both pride and sorrow.

We will be holding memorial services at most of our war cemeteries in that country and, in addition, wreaths will be laid in a number of Italian war cemeteries, as the proposed dates for this visit include the thirtieth anniversary of the liberation of Italy.

My departmental officials will be contacting the commanding officers of the perpetuating units of the 1st Canadian Corps through their regimental and corps' associations for the names of those who will be included in the survivor's portion of the delegation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am sure this is one statement on motions on which members of the House will hear no controversy. My only comment is that members from all opposition parties, especially those who served in Italy, could have been included in the delegation. However, I commend the minister on what I think is a significant happening, a memorial service in Italy as an extension to our Remembrance Day ceremony here in Ottawa and across Canada. In view of the fact that 5,000 of our war heroes died of wounds in Italy, this ceremony may be able to reflect their memory for their parents or loved ones who remain in Canada. I commend the minister for the thought behind this visit and I wish him and his colleagues well on their voyage.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the spokesman of the official opposition in commending the minister for leading this delegation to Italy on behalf of his department and these survivors. I am glad he included survivors of the liberation of Italy. I think all those who had the opportunity of attending memorial services which were held several years ago on a similar expedition to northern Europe came back with a better understanding and certainly an appreciation of the job that is being done, not only by Canada and some of the countries with which we were associated, but by all countries belonging to the war graves protocol.

Seeing the care that has been given some of the graves of the fallen provokes a sympathetic sentiment in the minds of loved ones toward that ceremony. I, too, also hope that the representation is made as broad as possible, particularly the representation of those who participated in the Italian campaign, and that as many as possible are given the opportunity to join the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, doubtless our military personnel who risked their lives on the Italian battlefield during that World War, who are still living today, as well as the families of those who gave up their lives to liberate Italy, will be happy to hear today that the minister has decided to organize a delegation to commemorate the 30th anniversary of that liberation.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that during those demonstrations, it will not be necessary to set up police security of the same magnitude as that we are now witnessing in Rome during the World Food Conference. Our delegation will be much more welcomed, and accepted, I am sure, under those circumstances.

I would like to add, however, that the minister should consider, if he has not already done so, the possibility of including in that delegation the Standing Committee of the House on Veterans Affairs which study those matters.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced all Canadians would willingly accept that decision. We wish the delegation a good trip and express the hope that it will help somehow to improve our relations with Italy, though they have always been good.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FOR SURVEILLANCE OF ROY ATKINSON AND LEADERS OF NATIVE GROUPS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the shocking revelation made last night that the RCMP has been using a travel agency in Saskatoon to keep under surveillance the president of the National Farmers' Union, Roy Atkinson, as well as some leaders of Saskatchewan's native peoples.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That the incident involving RCMP surveillance of Roy Atkinson and leaders of the Saskatchewan native people, as well as the extent, the nature of, the reasons why, and the methods employed for such surveillance be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for an investigation and subsequent report to this House.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF FEDERALLY SUBSIDIZED MAINTENANCE BASES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the disclosure that federal government officials are meeting with representatives of the air industry to discuss proposals for the establishment of a chain of federally subsidized air maintenance bases known in the Department of Supply and Services as "centres of excellence".

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin:

That this matter be referred immediately to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications so that a thorough investigation can be made of these proposals and their effects on present and planned bases.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

INFORMATION SUPPLIED ON WORKING CONDITIONS OF ELLIOT LAKE URANIUM MINES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the working conditions in the uranium mines at Elliot Lake in northern Ontario. Whereas the Ontario ministry of natural resources has released statistical information that the national average of lung cancer incidence is 13.1 per cent in comparison to a 41 per cent lung cancer incidence among uranium miners at Elliot Lake; and whereas the Canada Manpower office at Elliot Lake has undertaken a massive drive to provide new employees for the uranium mines at Elliot Lake; and whereas this same office does not inform prospective employees of the dangerous working conditions which prevail in these mines; and whereas 50 per cent of the people working in the Elliot Lake mines at the moment are adversely affected by the working environment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie:

That this House instruct the Minister of Manpower and Immigration to immediately order the Elliot Lake manpower office and all other manpower offices to inform prospective employees of the Elliot Lake uranium mines of the high rate of lung cancer as well as the massive number of individuals suffering from silicosis caused by working conditions in these mines.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I might say that the problem to which the hon. member refers in his motion is certainly not a new problem. While there is great importance attached to the motion I have very grave difficulty in accepting the fact that the simple release of some statistical information about a national average takes it out of the class of continuing problem and converts it into the class of an urgent and pressing necessity. However, because of the very grave and serious content of the motion I intend to resolve the matter in favour of the hon. member, but I serve notice on hon. members that in respect of Standing Order 43 they should make abundantly clear that the matter they are discussing is not only important but is a matter of urgent and pressing necessity rather than of continuing importance.

The motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be debated.

PETITION FOR CONFERENCE ON HALTING NUCLEAR WEAPONS STOCKPILING AND TESTING

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this is not a motion under Standing Order 43 so I hope it will receive favourable consideration. I have the honour to present to the House a petition under the provisions of Standing Order 67. Very briefly the petition prays that Canada should host a conference of Pacific rim nations immediately to gain a genuine commitment from them to act with unity to stop all further nuclear weapons stockpiling and both atmospheric and underground testing, and to achieve a necessary first step in the pressuring of China and France to sign the partial nuclear test ban treaty.

This petition contains over 1,000 signatures. If it is found to be in order it is my hope that by agreement the subject matter of the petition or the petition itself can be referred to the Standing Committee for External Affairs and National Defence.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBLE CONDITIONAL NATURE OF COMMITMENT TO SUPPLY ONE MILLION TONS OF GRAIN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the report that the Minister of Agriculture has taken the position that paying for the full one million tons of food aid in the current year in addition to the 650,000 tons to which Canada allegedly is already committed would be too costly for Canada to bear alone, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Government of Canada now proposes to contribute one million tons in the current year on top of the alleged 650,000 tons already committed or whether the pledge made in respect of the commitment by the minister of one million tons this year and in each of the following two years, a total of three years, is now conditional in some way upon foreign financial support in meeting part of this cost to Canada or whether the commitment for that one million tons in each of the three years is still unconditional as we were led to believe last week.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the commitment with regard to the three year period is unconditional. It applies not to the current year but to the subsequent three years. That commitment is firm and involves an amount of one million tons per year. Under discussion at the present time at the World Food Conference is the apparent shortfall in the present supply of grain to meet current requirements. There is some doubt, some uncertainty at present, as to the extent of that shortfall. The range of uncertainty is in the millions of tons, and discussions are continuing to determine exactly what the shortfall will be. We have already committed 650,000 tons for the current year, and the proposals coming forward are for an additional commitment. We have not yet made a specific response to that. What we have said is that Canada, in concert with other nations, would do its share to meet the current shortfall. We believe that it is appropriate at this point that other nations put money on the table in line with the very extensive commitments which Canada has already made. When nations are ready to move in concert, Canada's response will be immediate and positive.

Mr. Stanfield: The government of Canada has not made any additional commitments for the current year, I understand, over and above what has already been committed, namely, some 650,000 tons. The government of Canada has not committed an additional bushel or ton of grain in the current year. I should like to ask the minister whether, when he speaks of other countries putting forward some concrete, tangible proposal of aid themselves, he has in mind a contribution toward meeting Canada's additional costs, if Canada contributes additional wheat, which seems to have been suggested by the Minister of Agriculture in Rome. Has the minister in mind that Canada will not make an additional commitment for the current year until other countries, perhaps the oil rich countries, make a firm commitment in some other areas, for food but not related to Canada's grain?

Mr. MacEachen: There are a number of separate proposals before the conference. One is with respect to the fund for agricultural development. There has been some expectation, not yet realized in the form of concrete amounts, that the oil producing countries might undertake participation in such an agricultural development fund. Canada stands ready to participate in that as well. It stands ready to participate in additional food commitments for this year. But in the light of the very substantial commitments which Canada has already made into the future, it seems to me that it is wise not to commit ourselves to an additional $200 million this year, in line with the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, until we exert every possible persuasive effort on other countries to come forward and assist in the resolution of the world food crisis. On both fronts Canada is taking a very positive attitude.

I have already indicated in my statement in Rome that there was an additional commitment of $50 million for the current year that would be made available—

Mr. Fairweather: It has been committed.

Mr. MacEachen: It has been committed but it has not been designated, and it stands ready to be designated in concert with other nations when the conference is ready to move as a unit.

Mr. Stanfield: Knowing the hon. gentleman as I do, I know that when he speaks at such great length he is in some trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You ought to know.

Mr. Stanfield: Would he please inform the House whether it is not correct that Canada has not yet committed an additional bushel of grain in the current year to feed the world's hungry? I should like to ask the minister whether Canada's willingness to make an additional commitment hinges on other countries being prepared to do something tangible with regard to some other food program or whether Canada is looking for a contribution from some other country toward meeting the cost of any additional grain that Canada may commit in the current year, which is the impression that the Minister of Agriculture has left in the statement he made in Rome?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will reiterate the statement already made that Canada stands ready to make a positive response to the current emergency situation. We have not determined the amount. We have already committed an additional $50 million for the current year that can be made available for that purpose upon government decision. We are ready to make a positive response. We are not ready to commit at this point, along the lines suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, an additional $200 million on food aid until we are satisfied that other nations accept their responsibilities and move in concert with Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): So much for leadership!

Mr. Stanfield: I regret asking an additional supplementary question, but I put the question very clearly and I think it is important that we get a clear answer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is Canada looking for a contribution from other countries toward the cost of any additional wheat that we might commit, which is the impression that has been given by the Minister of Agriculture? Is this Canada's position, that Canada wants a contribution from other countries before we commit any more bushels of wheat for the current year, or will Canada be satisfied provided other countries become involved in some other program quite distinct but supplementary to the additional grain coming from Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: There is no way in which Canada, by itself, can meet the current shortfall in wheat, either financially or by way of supply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The shortfall ranges from eight million to twelve million tons. Canada is ready to participate in meeting the current shortage in concert with other nations. I believe that at this point that is a very prudent position for Canada to take, and more in the interest of feeding the hungry than the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—AVAILABILITY OF SUPPLY OF GRAIN IF CANADA WERE TO MAKE ADDITIONAL COMMITMENT FOR THIS YEAR

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What he appears to be doing at present is hedging in his statement. If Canada were to commit itself for this year to the supply of additional grain, have we here the grain available to ship to the underdeveloped countries at this time? Do we have enough grain on hand that has not yet been committed that some could be made available for this kind of food program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): One of the efforts that is being undertaken is to assess the supply situation throughout the world. In so far as Canada is concerned, the grains group has indicated to the conference that it might be possible to supply from Canadian sources an additional one million to one million three hundred thousand tons.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF ROY ATKINSON AND LEADERS OF NATIVE GROUPS—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It has to do with the report yesterday that the RCMP had been using a travel agency in Saskatoon to keep under surveillance the national president of the farmers' union. I understand that this has been confirmed by an official within the RCMP. Can the Solicitor General say whether the RCMP were acting on his instructions? If so, why did he order the surveillance? If he did not order it, will he investigate this incident and report back to this House?

● (1440)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the RCMP that there is no truth to the allegation that they are using a travel agency to monitor the movements of Mr. Atkinson.

Mr. Nystrom: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As last night's item referred to some leaders of the Saskatchewan Indian and Métis communities as well, will the Solicitor General look into that allegation and inform the House whether it is normal practice to use a travel agency or business firm for surveillance, so that someone can be reported to the RCMP.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, following the broadcast last night I checked into the allegations with respect to Mr. Atkinson but did not check into allegations with respect to the Métis people. I will do that. I can say that from time to time for investigation purposes these types of monitoring agents are used.

Oral Questions

POSSIBLE SURVEILLANCE OF UNION LEADERS OR POLITICIANS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a final supplementary? Will the Solicitor General inform the House whether the RCMP has under surveillance other union leaders or community leaders, or, indeed, any politician in this country at the federal or provincial level.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP would have under surveillance union leaders or members of parliament only if they are suspected of committing criminal offences or if there were serious suspicions about their committing breaches against the security of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, generally speaking we use the criteria adopted by parliament in the Privacy Act as the basis for conducting investigations into breaches of security.

TRADE

REQUEST THAT CANADA BUY SUGAR FROM EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell the House whether his department is examining the possibility of Canada getting its supplies of sugar from the EEC countries rather than from the world market as it does currently, which could result in a 65 per cent decrease in the price of sugar?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this situation is under review, of course, from the point of view of the department.

Mr. Hees: Yawn, yawn.

Mr. Gillespie: However, I am not at all sure that there are plentiful supplies of sugar in Europe. Indeed, Great Britain at present faces severe shortages.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Another supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister advise us whether he or the government would be prepared to sign a long term agreement directly with a producer country in order to eliminate the middle men?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, the trade has been conducted well between members of the private sector and supplying agencies. However, the government to government aspect of the hon. member's question is a matter which will be considered.

[Mr. Allmand.]

PUBLISHING

POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN WEEKLY MAGAZINE IF INCOME TAX CHANGES MADE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Since the Secretary of State is being definitely informed that if certain changes are made in the income tax field at least one Canadian publication will be on the market in Canada on a weekly basis, can he explain the delay in arriving at a decision in this matter?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be exaggerating to say that I have been informed in such definite terms. However, any decision on the question which preoccupies the hon. member will be made in a broader context, and not necessarily at budget time as he has suggested.

PENITENTIARIES

COWANSVILLE—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PUT OUT NATIONWIDE POLICE ALERT ON ESCAPE OF GAGNÉ

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question and a possible supplementary are directed to the Solicitor General. They have to do with the case of Arthur Gagné, the convicted murderer who failed to return from a week-end pass from Cowansville penitentiary on August 18 and who is still at large, despite being accused of two killings on November 2. Is the Solicitor General aware of the fact that, although Cowansville penitentiary reported to the Quebec Provincial Police on August 19 that Gagné was wanted for escaping custody, CPIC, the RCMP computer system which is designed to alert police agencies throughout Canada about people wanted by the police, did not report that Gagné was wanted until September 28, thus giving this convicted murderer more than one month before the nation-wide police alert was issued.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, under the system we use in Quebec, when an inmate escapes—

An hon. Member: You use smoke signals.

Mr. Hees: You've had lots of practice these days.

Mr. Allmand: —the penitentiary services advises the closest detachment of the Quebec Provincial Police, which is supposed to put the warning on the police network and inform other detachments in the province.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, apparently the Solicitor General's answer was, no. As the QPP said that they entered this information into the CPIC system at 11.04 a.m. on the morning of August 19, and there was no print-out giving Gagné's name and the fact that he was wanted until September 28, can the minister explain how this happened? Will he assure the House that it has not happened on previous occasions or since then, so that convicted criminals who have escaped custody will not be allowed at least one month's freedom before the police systems in Canada are alerted through CPIC.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will check into that latter point. In the past, the procedure upon which we acted was that the penitentiary service would advise the closest provincial police detachment, which would put the news into their information system. I will check into the other part of the hon. member's question.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER CONCERNING ARRANGEMENTS FOR USE OF BRONFMAN JET FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's answers on Tuesday that all arrangements for his trip to Israel had been made by the Israeli Embassy, would the minister indicate if he had no previous knowledge of the proposed use of the Bronfman jet before the embassy made formal arrangements for his official visit to Israel; and, specifically, would the minister clarify if the suggestion to use the jet was first raised during discussions between himself and his officials and Mr. Bronfman or his officials some time before the embassy made the final arrangements for his Israel visit.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the first time it was raised both Mr. Bronfman and the Israeli Ambassador were present.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the minister present?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, that is what I said. I was present with the Israeli Ambassador and Mr. Bronfman.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARDS TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to the question I raised with him on Tuesday concerning the approach of the group of 77 and the question of adopting certain trade resolutions, particularly those to do with the export of basic agricultural products to many underdeveloped countries. The minister indicated that he knew of no action on the part of Canada to block any serious consideration of these proposals, presented primarily by Mexico. Since then, the other resolutions have been the subject of negotiation with the contact group, so will the minister indicate what Canada's attitude is on coming to some decision on important trade questions which affect almost all underdeveloped countries.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the question which was asked earlier in the week and was based, as I understand, on a newspaper report that the Canadian delegation was filibustering in committee 3, let me say that that is an inaccurate report. On the contrary, the Canadian delegation has been urging committee 3 to get on with its job and expedite its discussions.

As for the trade question, although I have not the particular resolutions in front of me, it came under discussion in that committee. The general attitude of the Canadian delegation is that the trade question should not be dealt with at the world food conference. The appropriate forum for that discussion will be the upcoming trade negotiations in Geneva. That is our general position. I have stated both at Rome and here that our attitude is sympathetic. We hope that the trade negotiations, when they do take place, will confer additional advantages on the developing countries at that time.

● (1450)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question. The minister's earlier replies indicated somewhat of an openness on the part of the Canadian position. In view of the fact more than 100 countries took the very strong view at the Rome food conference that the GATT is not the appropriate forum because of its past history in connection with agricultural products and the on-again off-again situation with respect to GATT's presence, is the minister conferring with his officials in the hope that Canada might take a more positive attitude toward the initiative of the underdeveloped countries in the hope we can make substantial progress with respect to a number of trade irritants for the underdeveloped countries and alleviate some of the causes of this continuing shortage of foodstuffs that is going to face us in the foreseeable future?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with the general philosophy of the hon. member's question. The point of difference is that it would not be possible to negotiate trade arrangements at the Rome conference. The place to do it is at the GATT. At that point we will justify the hon. member's confidence in the possible benefits that may accrue from these discussions.

APPROVAL BY CANADIAN DELEGATE OF SPEECH BY YASSER ARAFAT AS INDICATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister tell the House if the actions in the United Nations yesterday of the member of parliament for Montréal-Saint-Denis, an almost permanent member of the Canadian delegation, who ostensibly rose and greeted with heavy applause the speech of the Palestinian leader, truly reflect the approval of the Canadian government concerning the claims of Yasser Arafat, thus replacing the abstentionism which has prevailed to date?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not been aware of the results of the applause metre, but applause is not the method which we use to expose government policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE DEPORTED HAITIANS NOT SUBJECT TO REPRISALS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): While we are waiting for the minister to check what happened at the United Nations and to be handed a report by his civil servants which he can table in this House, on the same subject—the United Nations—I would like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he report to the House on the discussions he had this week at the United Nations when he met the members of the Haitian delegation, and could he tell us if he is personally capable of assuring this House that there will be no reprisals in Haiti against those who will be deported? If reprisals are possible, is the minister in a position to make special arrangements so that these Haitians can stay in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is misinformed. I did not meet with the Haitian delegation at the United Nations in New York. I met with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees who will be issuing a statement today indicating that our discussions on a whole range of matters concerning refugees, including the matter of Haitians, were extremely constructive. There was complete agreement as to the current handling of these cases on the basis of individual merit which is the standard practice of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. We also discussed other matters upon which I will be glad to inform the House on some other occasion. It was a very satisfactory meeting.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

RAPID TURNOVER OF EMPLOYEES OF TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT—ALLEGED NEW TARGET FOR NUMBER OF NATIVE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the very high turnover in Northwest Territories territorial government staff in the past few years, roughly 27 per cent in both 1972 and 1973, will the minister explain to the House what plans he has to counteract this high rate of turnover?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have been distressed by this rate of turnover. Earlier this year we established a group within the Public Service Commission known as Northern Careers. It was charged with the specific purpose of trying to reduce the turnover and to secure a more substantial number of native employees in the north, particularly in the middle and senior management positions.

Mr. Firth: As there is an extremely high rate of unemployment among the Indians and Innuits in the Northwest Territories at this time, will the minister explain why the territorial government has set a new target of 10 per cent northern staff by 1975, a cut-back of 65 per cent from targets set by the minister's predecessors? Is the minister admitting defeat in this area?

Mr. Buchanan: No, Mr. Speaker. I am not certain of this figure. I know that within the federal service the figure is roughly 18½ per cent for native employees. I will have to look into the one for the territorial government.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGATION CRTC ASSUMING ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY OF CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF REPORT "RADIO FREQUENCIES ARE PUBLIC PROPERTY" TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Now that the chairman of the CRTC has taken over the authority to administer the CBC and is trying to take over the authority of parliament itself, will the minister refer the report entitled "Radio frequencies are public property" to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts for study and recommendation?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if I may offer a personal view on the premise, I do not think there is a shade of truth in either. I will have to look into the report which the hon. member mentioned and report back to the House or to him directly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN DEBATE ON MIDDLE EAST AT UNITED NATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister today advise if the government is any closer to deciding whether Canada is going to take part in the United Nations Middle East debate, especially in view of the speech given yesterday by the representative of the Palestinian Liberation Organization?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is certain there will be a statement by a Canadian representative before the close of the debate. I am not sure when that statement will be made, but it will be made.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise whether Canadian participation in the debate will be directed, among other things, to making it clear to the world that the Canadian position that Israel has the right to exist within secure and recognized boundaries is completely inconsistent with the PLO position, which was reaffirmed in June 1974 and again yesterday at the United Nations, that its aim is to establish a Palestinian state within the boundaries of the British mandate as of 1948 which will of course mean extinction of the state of Israel.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the statement is under consideration at the present time. I hope that when it is given it will satisfy the hon. member in at least a number of points he raised in his question.

WORLD FOOD CONFERENCE IN ROME—POSSIBILITY OF SUPPLYING WHITE BEANS TO NEEDY COUNTRIES

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In answer to a question a few moments ago, after consultation with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, the minister indicated that there may be trouble supplying the amount of grain Canada might like to commit to needy countries. Has the minister given consideration to using a considerable amount of white beans from the Ontario Bean Marketing Board which are presently available and waiting to be shipped?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be pleased to know that we committed ourselves at the Rome conference to increase our non-grain food commitment by 50 per cent for the three forthcoming years. Hopefully this item can be considered for inclusion as part of our food aid.

COMMUNICATIONS

INCREASED PROFITS OF BELL CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ALLOWABLE LEVEL OF PROFITS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. When announcing the government's agreement to increase Bell telephone rates on September 6, the minister assured the House and the people of Canada that his department would consider monitoring the financial operations of that company. As the profits for Bell Canada under the old rates for the first nine months of this year represent a 24 per cent increase over the same period last year, will the minister inform the House whether his department has reached a conclusion that the previous agreement to increase rates might have been mistaken and some kind of roll-back should be brought into effect.

● (1500)

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are keeping a close watch on these developments. The figures that the hon. member has just given are probably exact, but are part of an average. They do not take into account the actual curve which might possibly lead us to conclusions that, to say the least, would be doubtful for the moment. However, we are still proceeding on this.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Most Canadians having reached the conclusion that profits are too high, would the minister inform the House at what level of profit his department would reach the conclusion that the rates charged by Bell Telephone were too high?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): I think, Mr. Speaker, that the member should know that; the pertinent figures are given in a public paper. The decisions of the CTC deal with a certain percentage of revenue, but apart from that percentage, the CTC no doubt would feel that the profits have been either too low or too high. The percentage is defined in the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission.

SUGGESTED USE OF FORMULA FOR GRANTING RATE INCREASES TO BELL CANADA

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My final supplementary relates to the comment made by the President of Bell Canada in a speech in Montreal yesterday to the effect that Bell would welcome a proposal that it be granted some kind of formula whereby it would not be obliged to seek approval for future rate increases from a public authority. Would the minister assure the House that the government has no intention of conceding a formula which would permit the automatic escalation of Bell Canada rates?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Such an assurance was given on September 6. For the time being, the government has absolutely no intention of moving to the indexation approach. At the same time it was, of course, pointed out that the government would not stifle the discussion of any subject and that if the CTC wished to hear people as to the merits or demerits of such a suggestion we would have no objection.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED RELEASE OF REPORT ON GROWTH OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that it has been established in this House that Ministers of the Crown receive reports from Statistics Canada some days prior to their publication, is the minister in a position to table the report of Statistics Canada concerning the growth of the gross national product for the third quarter—a report which the hon. gentleman will use in the preparation of his budget—so that the House may better consider the budget in its true light?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I do not have that particular report in hand. In any case, I would not want to destroy the symmetry of what I have to say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

BASIS ON WHICH MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE ACCEPTED USE OF BRONFMAN JET FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to follow up by way of a supplementary the question addressed by one of my hon. friends to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On November 12, the minister told us that all the arrangements for his trip to Israel had been made by the Israeli embassy. Subsequently, he said he relied on arrangements made by them. Now, we find out that the minister was part and parcel of the arrangements with respect to the use of the plane. On what basis did the minister think the use of a private plane would be the correct manner to travel to Israel?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): What I have said does not change anything I have said previously on this subject. The matter was raised for the first time in the presence of the Israeli ambassador and since for several months I have had a standing invitation to go to Israel, I said that if the time were convenient to the Israeli Ambassador and the Israeli government, and if this means of transport was convenient I would leave the matter of the arrangements to the Israeli embassy. And the Israeli embassy took it from there.

Mr. Alexander: I am under the impression, and I think I am right, that the minister knew, sooner or later, and more particularly before he left—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: —in the company of the Ambassador and Mr. Bronfman that he would be using a private plane. On what basis did he consent to travel in this way and on what basis did he believe it would be proper for him to use this private plane?

An hon. Member: On the basis that he could not walk across the Atlantic!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is the last type of subject on which I want to intervene. However, the minister has been asked several times on what basis he thought that this was proper and he has replied consistently, it seems to me, that the arrangements were made by the Israeli embassy. To ask the minister to repeat the same answer seems to me to be counterproductive.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF USE OF BRONFMAN JET BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): A supplementary to the Prime Minister. In this House on November 12, the right hon. gentleman, answering a question I had put to him, said that the trip by the Minister of National Health and Welfare was excepted from the prohibited kind because of the suggestion—and I quote the right hon. gentleman's words—that the trip had been "arranged by the host government." The minister concerned has now indicated to us that in fact he was present at and party to the decision to use a private jet for a public trip. Consequently, this trip was not in the category exempted according to the Prime Minister's answer. In the light of possible conflict of interest involved here would the Prime Minister agree to have this whole question referred to an appropriate standing committee of the House so that hon. members might consider in an official way all the arrangements connected with the trip and so that we could help establish guidelines which should prevail in the future in case other ministers show the kind of judgment displayed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without conceding the premise of the question, one which I don't accept, may I say that I agree, of course, with the suggestion made by the hon. member. I would remind hon. members that the government has put to the House and to the standing committee the whole question of conflict of interest as it applies to all members and, of course, any member of the House could help to bring this particular matter before that committee. It would apply to all members, of course, as well as to ministers. I am not precluding any discussion, necessarily. I am just asking opposition members, particularly, to get on with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that he has made the trip to Israel and back again in the Bronfman plane, may we expect another blast against the brewing industry in the near future?

HEALTH

STRIKE OF PHARMACISTS IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO BILL S-9

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is one I was attempting to ask last week of the Prime Minister. But since the Minister of National Health and Welfare has now returned, I will ask him whether he has been made aware of the strike of a large group of pharmacists in Quebec last week and whether, knowing the background of this strike and its serious implications, he will indicate by withdrawing or revising Bill S-9 the federal intention to protect the interest of the consumer and deter restrictive and costly retail practices?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Bill S-9, which I hope will be introduced in the House very soon, is intended to protect consumers and to improve access by consumers to information on drugs sold over the counter.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LACK OF TRANSLATORS TO PROVIDE TRANSLATIONS OF DOCUMENTS FOR COMMITTEES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Since the papers tabled at the special committee on egg marketing at the request of the members of that committee are originally in English and that there is a much too long delay before we get the French copy, may I ask the minister whether translators are scarce and if so, can he also tell us whether additional staff will be hired to correct that condition?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire. I do not know whether there is a scarcity of translators, but it happens sometimes that the demand is heavy and that it is impossible to anticipate all circumstances, especially the tabling of papers. It is difficult to expect the Translation Bureau to produce instant French versions when they have not been advised a few weeks in advance.

● (1510)

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Although I am willing to accept the minister's reasons, I should like to ask him whether, in the case of documents from an established agency, existing documents which are not new and which are necessary for the information of committee members, it would not be possible to strive to provide translations as soon as possible, I mean, within 24 hours.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have always asked, as well as the government, translation services to give priority to the documents of interest to the House of Commons.

CANADA CORPORATIONS ACT

USE OF LIST OF STOCKHOLDERS SUPPLIED UNDER ACT AS MAILING LISTS FOR UNSOLICITED JUNK MAIL

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Why does the minister or his department allow the practice to continue whereby, under the Canada Corporations Act, chapter 10, section 111, subsection (1), any stockholder of a company can receive on request the names of all other stockholders, in view of the fact that some individuals or organizations are abusing this privilege by sending out propaganda unsolicited, and indeed in many cases what is simply junk mail, to persons having no desire to receive it?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must be aware that this bill was brought before the House to be significantly amended. It has now been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and I should invite the hon. member to submit his representations to this committee where he will obtain all pertinent information either from me, my parliamentary secretary or a departmental official.

ENERGY

COAL SHORTAGE IN UNITED STATES—POSSIBILITY OF SUPPLY FROM MARITIMES AND WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the serious coal shortage which is developing in the United States, will western Canada and the maritimes be requested to supply coal to central Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, while arrangements between the provincial government and the federal government have been underway regarding a longer term shipment of coal both for steaming and metallurgical purposes to central Canada, it is not likely that those arrangements will be completed within the very immediate future.

TRANSPORT

ABILITY OF RAILWAYS TO HANDLE EXTRA COAL FROM MARITIMES AND WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Can Canada's transportation system handle this extra coal that will have to be brought from the west and the east?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I missed the first part of the question; would the hon. gentleman please repeat it.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, the fact is that central Canada is going to run out of coal as a result of a shortage and a strike in the United States. In view of the fact that coal has to come from eastern and western Canada, I am wondering whether Canada's transportation system will be adequate to meet this extra requirement?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I hope so, Mr. Speaker. We have instituted a monitoring system so that we have all the rolling stock in the right place at the right moment, and I hope this will be the case here.

Oral Questions

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

STUDY OF SITE FOR STEEL MAKING COMPLEX ON EAST COAST—DATE OF PUBLICATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On October 30 I posed some questions with regard to the Canstel study concerning a steel complex on the east coast. At that time the minister stated that translation difficulties were holding up the tabling of the report, and he said it might be tabled within a week or ten days. Has the minister any further information to give the House today about when the report will be tabled?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the situation is precisely as the hon. member outlined; the report is ready except for translation. If I can make the necessary arrangements today I will be meeting with Premier Regan in Halifax, either tonight or tomorrow, and we will be discussing the report. I will not be giving him an official copy, as it were, but I will try and get the report into the House next week as soon as the translation is completed.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF SUBJECT MATTER TO COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader. In view of the impression the Prime Minister gave that the question of conflict of interest has already been referred to committee, whereas in fact there has been no such reference in this parliament—I am sure the Prime Minister did not mean to mislead the House in any respect but he did create a wrong impression—would the government House leader give the House his assurance that he will move the reference of this question to the appropriate committee at the first opportunity?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can give that undertaking. I intend to move such a reference, just as a reference was proposed in the last session.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED ENFORCEMENT OF AGREEMENT TO PLACE LAND IN GARDINER DAM AREA UNDER IRRIGATION

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the statement in the Speech from the Throne that the government will propose a number of measures to increase food production, and in view of the statement made in Rome that world food production must be increased, can the Prime Minister inform the House whether or not the government is taking steps to enforce the federal-provincial agreement of 1958 requiring the government of Saskatchewan to place 50,000 acres under irrigation in the Diefenbaker Lake, Gardiner dam area?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the answer given to me by the Solicitor General to the question that I raised earlier today. Since the reply to my question, my office has been in touch with the travel agency concerned, and I find that the Solicitor General has misinformed the House, giving us only part of the answer. The travel agency informs me that the RCMP have been in touch from time to time with various people. They have been in touch with the travel agency some time ago regarding a trip by Mr. Atkinson to Prince Edward Island.

My question of privilege is that I think the Solicitor General should clarify some of the statements that he made. For example, he referred to the fact that the RCMP would not be checking on anyone unless they were suspected of subversive or criminal activity. Since they have been checking on Mr. Atkinson on at least one occasion and on other people, I wonder whether or not the Solicitor General does suspect him or anybody else of subversive activity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must realize that he is pursuing, after the conclusion of the question period, a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. While this may be desirable on the basis of information that he has, the matter may be worth pursuing on another question period, perhaps tomorrow. I really cannot see that further questioning of the Solicitor General at this moment under the guise of a question of privilege is permissible under the rules.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I think the question that was put to me was whether or not Mr. Atkinson had recently been subject to surveillance by the RCMP, and the answer to the question is no. Whether at some time in the past he was subject to surveillance I did not inquire of the RCMP. I think reference was made to 1971 or 1972 so I would have to check back.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the House leader whether he would make his usual statement regarding business that the government proposes to place before the House in the coming week.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we will continue today with consideration in committee of the whole of Bill C-32. If we finish that today we shall proceed to Bill C-25, followed by Bill C-10. Tomorrow, of course, will be an allotted day pursuant to Standing Order 58.

On Monday evening at eight o'clock the Minister of Finance will present his budget, and in accordance with Standing Order 60 I request that the appropriate order of the day be designated. The budget debate will be resumed on Wednesday, November 20, and unless otherwise announced will be continued without interruption on consecutive days.

On Monday afternoon and on Tuesday we will be dealing with legislation. The report stage and third reading of Bill C-14 is of high priority, since it may be best to send this bill to the other place before we become involved in the budget debate. Another urgent item is Bill S-7 which is now at the report stage.

Mr. Speaker: Is the order requested by the President of the Privy Council during the course of his remarks agreed to by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on a point of order.

● (1520)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, regarding the business of the House for the ensuing week, may I ask the government House leader whether he is in a position to report further on the answer he gave me a week ago today concerning the giving of a special term of reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing this matter with my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and we have just about agreed upon a reference.

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PRODUCTS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 13, consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale)—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, clause 2 of the bill was under consideration and it was agreed that we would have some kind of general debate on it.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, just before six o'clock last night, in an effort to illustrate the point I was trying to make, I read into the record an amendment I wanted to propose on behalf of the official opposition. To keep the matter coherent, I would suggest I read the four amendments I am going to propose so they will be on the record and available to hon. members for their consideration before we reach the clauses in question. If I have your permission, Mr. Chairman, to read the amendments I should like to put forward in respect of clauses 3, 36, 49 and 52, I will do so now.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member can do that during the course of his remarks. I do not see any difficulty in doing that if he wants to put the amendments on the record. Otherwise, he might distribute them to hon. members so they can take them into consideration. The Chair really has no objection to the procedure the hon. member wishes to follow.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): In attempting to keep this subject within some orderly form of debate, I think the responsibility falls on the official opposition to make known to the committee of the whole the general thrust of our intent. In my opening remarks yesterday on clause 2, I indicated my concern about the position of the prerogatives of the Crown. I asked the minister if he would take up this subject with the law officers of the Crown, not on the basis of examining constitutional legislative authority but on the narrow question of the prerogatives of the Crown in right of the federal authority and the prerogatives of the Crown in right of the provinces. He promised to do so. As part of that discussion, I wish to move into the question of how, as members of this House, we can protect the Queen from harm. The amendments we wish to put forward are to clause 3, clause 36, clause 49 and clause 52(1).

We want to enshrine in the legislation the principle of consultation before any policy is determined. If one accepts the principle of consultation and agreement by enshrining it into the legislation, then there can be no question about the Queen in right of the province being harmed. In other words, if the provinces, on the advice of the Queen, accept this agreement after consultation with the federal government, then the interest of the Crown at both levels is the same.

I should like now to read the amendments I intend to put forward at the appropriate time, in order that members, by reading Hansard, can follow these proposals and consider them as a unified approach by Her Majesty's Official Opposition in its attempt to protect the Crown on the matter of prerogatives. Having read the proposed amendment to clause 3 last night, I would now read our further amendments into the record and then direct my remarks to the proposed amendment to clause 3.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. gentleman whether there is any particular reason, since he is proposing the amendments seriatim, for not putting them forward when we reach the appropriate clauses, rather than during our discussion on clause 2.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have no objection to that. I was actually trying to facilitate the discussion. The minister and each of the party leaders have these amendments, so I would be quite prepared to propose them seriatim.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is prepared to put them on the record, I suggest that we can debate each one as the appropriate clause comes up for discussion, rather than debating each of them under clause 2. Perhaps I misunderstood the suggested procedure.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): That is, in fact, what I propose to do. Since I have already read the proposed amendment to clause 3, I should now like to read the proposed amendment to clause 36, as follows:

That clause 36 of the bill on page 15 be amended by deleting lines 10 to 16 and substituting therefor the following:

"Governor in Council may, by regulation, subject to confirmation by order in council issued by the government of the producer-province concerned, establish maximum prices for the various qualities and kinds of crude oil to which this part applies that are produced, extracted or recovered in that province (hereinafter in this division called the 'exporting province')."

The next proposed amendment is to clause 49, as follows:

That clause 49 on page 20 be amended by deleting line 25 and substituting therefore the following:

"prices of alternative fuels in Canada, in co-operation at all times with the province of production which, in the interests and for the protection of consumers in other provinces, has forgone to the degree necessary to this purpose its constitutional autonomy over gas as a natural resource."

The next amendment we propose to move on the question of enshrining the consultation process into the legislation is to clause 52(1), as follows:

That clause 52(1) of the bill on page 21 be amended by deleting lines 28 to 34 and substituting therefore the following:

"Governor in Council may, by regulation, subject to confirmation by order in council issued by the government of the producer-province concerned and having regard to the matters mentioned in subsection 51(2), prescribe prices for the various kinds of gas to which this part applies that are produced, extracted, recovered or manufactured in that province."

● (1530)

I should like to close my remarks at this time on clause 3, which reads:

This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of any province.

As a layman, I say frankly that I am concerned about how this legislature, at the federal level, can combine the Queen both in right of the federal government and in right of several provinces in the same clause. Surely it is self-evident to a layman that before you can bind Her Majesty in right of the federal government, there should be some indication by the minister that this matter has been brought before the Governor General, who has given the consent of the Queen in respect of the right to discuss the terms of this bill. The minister has not yet indicated that he intends to present the consent of the Crown to this House, which is traditional when dealing with the prerogatives of the Queen.

The second question is even more dubious. How can this legislature, without any evidence before it that the Queen in right of any province has given her consent, give to our executive the powers which some of these clauses do which materially affect, directly or by incidence, the property of the Queen in right of any of the provinces? I think these questions are an indication of our legitimate concern and must be answered by the minister with evidence that he has consulted the law officers of the Crown as to whether it is possible to bind Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of the provinces, at the same time in the same bill, without any evidence of consent from Her Majesty being given either to this House or to the provinces.

I hope I have made it clear that it is beyond the capacity of most of us in this House to give a clear answer to this type of question. I simply point out to the minister, as I did yesterday, that if we passed this legislation as it is drafted and a province or an individual took it to court and the court ruled the legislation to be ultra vires in respect of some of its clauses regarding the prerogatives of Her Majesty, then this legislature would be the laughing-stock of the country.

Yesterday I used an example which the minister was not sure was relevant. In that case, the federal legislature proceeded on the assumption of certain rights which it had in respect of Indian lands, and 40 years later a court decision ruled that the federal government was wrong, that it did not have the full right to alienate these lands and these lands should revert back according to the law and the prerogatives of the Queen in right of the province.

I suggest that it would be prudent for us to take a good, hard look at clause 3. Last night I read to the committee a proposed amendment to this clause which could make this legislation binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada and in right of any province. I repeat that we have had no evidence in the House that the Queen has given her consent to this legislation in right of any province. To make sure that we do not blunder on this point, I will repeat the amendment we propose to make sure that the federal legislation is sound.

That clause 3 of the bill on page 2 be amended by deleting line 9 and substituting therefor the following:

"province; and, where the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada does not extend to bind Her Majesty in right of a province, then to the extent that Her Majesty in right of a province consents thereto."

I think what I am trying to do is clear. I would like the reaction of the minister on this point.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, as I indicated to the hon. gentleman yesterday and as he may recall from experience, the tendering of a bill to the House of Commons by a minister of the Crown is undertaken only after taking the advice of the law officers of the Crown—of course, the law officers of the Crown are the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General—not only with regard to the legal efficacy of the words of the legislation but also their constitutionality. I heard that the hon. gentleman said outside the House there had not been consultation with the Department of Justice. I can assure him that in this case the bill was considered by the representatives of the department from the standpoint of the effectiveness of what is proposed and constitutionality.

The hon. gentleman raised the question of the consent of Her Majesty the Queen. In a measure of this kind, the consent of Her Majesty the Queen is given in this House in not one, but two ways. It is given, first, by the recommendation in this bill. His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to this House of Commons the present measure respecting the administration of inter-provincial, export and import trade in pretroleum and petroleum products. So Her Majesty the Queen, by her legal representative here, has in effect recommended this bill.

Further, in respect of this, as in respect of other legislation, parliament is a trinity made up of this House of Commons, the Senate and the Queen in parliament. So the act of royal assents which so many members have often regarded as a formality, really is assent by Her Majesty the Queen, through her representative in the other place, indicating that she consents, as one of the three parts of parliament, to the legislative measure being enacted. In this regard, the royal assent in relation to the Queen in right of Canada is given in that way.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of information, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would tell us if the counter-proposition applies, that Her Majesty in right of a province, in other words, being the legislature and the Crown, gives assent to a bill binding the Crown of Canada, and by doing so Her Majesty agrees that the Crown of Canada in right of Canada shall be bound.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): This is the question raised by the hon. gentleman yesterday. Of course, under our constitutional system, as the hon. member may not be aware, we have responsibility for distribution of the overall sovereignty of the country into provincial and federal governments. With regard to the rights extended to the Crown in right of Canada by the British North America Act, of course the royal assent is given to acts which fall within the competency of this parliament, in this particular case by the attendance of Her Majesty's representative in the other place.

The procedure followed in the legislature of a province would, of course, relate and be confined to its power and the constitutional authority given to the provincial government. Of course, the next question to be raised is, what about the interface between the two? The hon. member has asked to what extent the Queen in right of a province can be bound by this kind of a measure. That important constitutional question was decided long ago by the judicial committee of the Privy Council, for the reasons I indicated in response to the hon. member yesterday. It has been decided in relation to that commodity, both in relation to Canadian political history and Canadian constitutional history, which has been of such fundamental importance, namely, liquor.

I refer to the case of The Attorney General of British Columbia v. The Attorney General of Canada, reported in 1924 Appeal Cases at page 222. In that case the judicial committee pointed out that indeed the Crown in right of Canada could impose taxation on provincial property, as it could on the property of a private individual. In this particular case—I think this is the point the hon. member was raising—the Crown in right of Canada, when acting within the legislative powers conferred upon it by the B.N.A. act, can indeed bind and affect the property of the provincial government acting as a provincial government in the same way as with the property of a private individual in any province. In that sense we, by royal assent in this parliament—through the assent given on behalf of Her Majesty by her vice regal representative—have the assent required for legislation here; and that assent, extending as it does to the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, would bind the Crown in right of the province.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Chairman, I understand that we are permitted to speak on clause 2 even though there have been some interjections on clause 3 and other clauses. I should like to make a few remarks in a general way at this stage concerning Bill C-32 which, as I have said before, proposes a quartet of government of Canada proposals governing the petroleum industry in Canada which I feel is part of a general program which will create a shortage of oil and natural gas in this country before too long.

Questions were put to the minister yesterday regarding the supply situation in Canada. The minister could not answer them because he had not cleared the matter with some of the producing provinces or had not received any reaction from them. I believe the report of the National Energy Board will show that we have already reached the peak of our ability to produce and that we will be facing a period of shortage commencing in three or four years. I think this is a very serious matter for Canada. The government is adopting a sort of "fat cat" approach to the problem; it is taking a very short-sighted and short-term approach. The government is trying to appeal to the consumers of the country on a short-term basis by keeping prices in tight restraint, without giving any indication whether there will be any incentives for the producers or finders of petroleum to enable them to make a profit. I am very sorry that the government is attacking the profit motive in this area of our endeavours because, in my opinion, there is nothing wrong with making a decent, honest profit, particularly after many years of investment with very little return.

The second part of the proposals will be in the budget which we will hear next Monday night. The third part will be in the PetroCan legislation which will be coming in the new year. The fact is that the government does not seem to be able to make up its mind regarding the ground rules for the development of petroleum and petroleum products off our shores and in the Arctic area of the country. I refer to the land use regulations. It appears that over-all we have a package of proposals that creates a great deal of uncertainty.

The measure before us deals with price restraint and price control which, if it is allowed to continue, can only lead to a shortage of oil. That brings to mind the fact that this legislation results primarily from the so-called agreement of March 27 in which the first ministers of this country agreed to a limited period of price control for crude oil. This government, however, has seen fit to bring forth a document, Bill C-32, which flies in the face of that agreement by seeking to give the government power to control the price of crude oil and natural gas for an indefinite period, on a permanent basis. This is being done under the guise of powers granted under the B.N.A. Act in the area of regulation of trade and commerce.

However, I suggest that this grasping for power demonstrates the poor bona fides of the government and the actual dishonesty of its approach when it attempts to set the wellhead price of crude oil and natural gas under this legislation. I think the government would have more credibility if its power was restricted to interprovincial trade in oil and natural gas, but when it reaches inside the producing provinces to control the wellhead price I think it goes well beyond its constitutional powers.

This bill deals with many other aspects than just fixing and controlling the price of natural gas and crude oil. The powers which the federal government seeks would allow its agents or officers to enter the offices of provincial governments to conduct searches and seize documents. I do not believe that this can be considered a power granted to the federal government under the guise of regulating interprovincial trade. That is why I think the ideas expressed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain have merit and should be considered by the minister more seriously than they have to date.

It seems to me that the minister justifies price control under this bill as being a power granted to the government in respect of the regulation of trade and commerce. However, under that umbrella the minister brings in all sorts of other things. Here I differ somewhat from the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, in that he wishes to make this a better bill, while I do not think it is a good bill, nor do I think it can be made better so long as the federal government wishes to use it as a tool to discriminate against and penalize the oil producing areas of this country.

As I said before, this bill represents a continuation of the government's "fat cat" approach. It may be very popular and it may make the government appear to be a hero in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, but I wonder how popular the government will be four or five years from now when those areas will suffer from a shortage of petroleum products—because that shortage will come just as sure as night follows day, if we do not have a proper price and some certainty injected into the industry. If the price is not right, we will not have the power.

I think the possible consequence of the present figures should filter through the skulls of members across the aisle who are responsible in this area. All figures indicate that drilling and exploration activity has decreased, largely because of the prospect of this legislation and the government's budgetary proposals which will be revealed on Monday. For example, drilling activity is down by 7 per cent in Alberta and 75 per cent or 76 per cent in Saskatchewan. In the United States, drilling activity has increased by more than 20 per cent. These figures show what is happening in this country. Clearly, the aims of this bill should be changed; it should be amended. This law must be so administered as to ensure adequate supplies for Canada. The bill as presently worded will not assure adequate supplies. Its main thrust is keeping prices at a minimum level, and that policy is short-sighted.

As I said earlier, the agreement made by the first ministers on March 27 was to expire at the end of June, 1975. In conformity with that agreement, should not controls envisaged under this bill also expire at the end of June, 1975, because that was the time limit for the original agreement? There should be a new agreement to take care of provincial rights. The government would be more credible if it included in the bill a schedule showing the level to which prices shall rise. I understand that the government supports a policy of staged price increases for the foreseeable future. Oil prices are to approach world commodity price levels. It is government policy to prevent this from happening suddenly. The government wants a cushion which will allow the Canadian economy to adapt gradually to price increases. If that is the government's intention, it is not evident from the language of this bill. Instead, the bill seems designed to keep prices at the lowest possible level.

If the government intends to increase prices, it should say so now in order to clear away uncertainties and show its thinking. As the hon. member for Calgary Centre said, we would all feel more comfortable if we could see the minister's intentions in writing. Let me add, I would feel more comfortable if they were in sworn form, as he has been fast and loose with promises he has made to various people in this field, both in the provinces and in industry, during past months. In my view, the bill should distinguish between old and new oil. I contend that if old and new oil are treated in the same way, any incentive for finding new oil will be lacking. Those who drill wells at great risk and find new oil should be allowed a greater return on their investment. That would encourage exploration for oil. Of course, at present that incentive is lacking.

The people in my area doubt the government's ability to deal with our difficulties. If you consider our history, you will see that until 1930 the oil producing areas of this country were under federal control. Not until 1930 did Alberta and Saskatchewan acquire jurisdiction over and ownership of their oil resources. During the first 63 years of our history there was no great development of oil resources in this country and any development which took place was accompanied with great economic waste. Millions of cubic feet of natural gas were lost in Alberta because of faulty or negligently drawn federal conservation measures. Once the provinces gained control of their resource it did not take them long to introduce sensible and useful conservation measures which, according to many, are the best in the world. These measures were not drawn up by some Big Daddy in Ottawa. The federal government is now trying to take back what it gave 44 years ago. I find that discouraging.

Logically, the government's policies will force the provinces to nationalize their petroleum industries. I notice that Eric Kierans, in his speech to the Canadian Tax Foundation in Toronto the other day suggested this. I do not often agree with that gentleman, but I must agree with what he said. It seems to me that the only alternative left to the rightful owners of this resource is nationalization of the industry. The federal government then will not be in a position to levy taxes on the industry, as it is now.

What I am suggesting is not without precedent. In the last 15 years, practically all private electrical generating plants have come under provincial ownership. The only exception is the electrical industry in Alberta, and this exception was made possible because the federal government, in 1965 or 1966, changed its tax policies and allowed a portion of corporate taxes which would be paid by such private electrical generating companies to be returned to the consumers. Without that concession such companies could not be economically viable; they could not compete with provincial companies which do not have to pay income tax. So one can see the influence of federal government budgetary and fiscal policies upon certain private industries in the provinces.

I suppose the present measure is an outgrowth of the Prime Minister's outlook. He has written somewhere, I think, that provincial governments are useful for establishing the beachheads of socialism in this country. He now leads the federal government, and I suppose he wants to make sure this bill will be instrumental in the establishment of beachheads at the provincial level. That would appear to be the practical result of this major federal government policy.

● (1600)

During the clause by clause study the constitutionality of this bill should be put to the test. The minister should explain why the consent of the provincial Crown representatives is not necessary. I heard his explanation a few minutes ago; it certainly does not satisfy me. It may become apparent that this bill is not as constitutionally valid as the minister thinks. During the clause by clause study we should pay particular attention to writing into this bill the provision that it must be concerned with creating and maintaining a supply of petroleum products for the whole country. We must get away from the restrictive approach that is now in the bill, as it can only result in a man-made shortage of oil and natural gas in our country by the end of this decade.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister two questions. If Your Honour agrees, I will ask them separately. Yesterday the minister made reference to the fact that reductions in the export of oil to the United States would, of necessity, reduce the amount of revenue which would accrue to the export tax fund, but that this might not be offset by a reduction in imports because it would not be possible to ship oil to the area east of the Ottawa Valley until the pipeline was completed. In consequence, there would be a period of time when the surplus oil in western Canada would have to be stored or left in the ground. We could be importing almost as much as we would be exporting. Consequently, the compensation payments would be very heavy in view of the fact that revenue from the export tax would be reduced.

We will be able to discuss this bill much better if the minister will give us some information about the proposed pipeline to eastern Canada. It is almost a year since the Prime Minister announced that the government intended to have the pipeline built so that western Canadian crude could find its way into the Montreal market. I notice from a press report in this morning's newspaper that discussions have apparently been completed between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Interprovincial Pipe Line. It is suggested that a number of options are being examined. Apparently Interprovincial Pipe Line wants a guarantee that there will be sufficient throughput in the line to meet their operating costs and to retire their capital investment.

A number of suggestions have been made. First, the government should guarantee a specific amount of revenue to Interprovincial Pipe Line. Second, there should be a change in the tariff structure for the whole of the existing pipeline from Edmonton to Toronto and Sarnia. Third, the federal government might build the pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal and operate it, or a northern pipeline through northern Ontario and northern Quebec. Fourth, federal government might build a pipeline and lease it back to Interprovincial Pipe Line. Interprovincial, in turn, would buy the pipeline out of payments for the oil throughput. In that way the pipeline would eventually become the property of Interprovincial Pipe Line.

In view of the urgency of this matter, I would ask the minister whether the cabinet has made any decision as to which of these or any other propositions have been agreed upon. If a decision has not been reached, can the minister give us some idea as to how soon a decision will be reached? Can the minister give the committee any timeframe with regard to the earliest possible date for commencement of construction, and an approximate date when the pipeline is expected to be completed? This information will certainly have an effect on the compensation payments and the export charge fund. If the minister could give us some idea, it would be helpful. It would also be helpful to those who live east of the Ottawa Valley. If there is any embargo this winter, there will certainly be a good deal of fear and apprehension on the part of people who live in eastern Canada regarding assured supplies of oil. Therefore, any statement the minister can make on this point will be helpful. I would like to ask the minister that question now and then, if I may, Mr. Chairman, ask my second question later.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the pipeline and the hon. member's request that I review the record and give a current statement, he will recall the government indicated its wish that the pipeline be extended to Montreal in September of last year. Following that indication and discussions with Interprovincial Pipe Line, the company engaged in a study of the route, a survey of the route and an analysis of the requirements. In due course it presented an application to the National Energy Board as it is required to do by law. That application, which was made this spring, had to be adjourned because of the intervention of the government of Quebec which objected to the route the company proposed to follow for the pipeline as it approached within 50 miles of the island of Montreal, particularly with relation to environmental risks created in this regard.

I think I would be correct in saying that the view of the board was that the environmental concerns were appropriately expressed. The company thereupon went back to work and planned a new route which would meet the objections of the Quebec government. It came forward to the board again in the autumn with a new plan for a changed route to meet the environmental requirements. The hope had been that the original planning provided adequate time for the planning stage and approval. However, the intervention of the government of Quebec set that timetable back to this fall. In the meantime, opinions—expressed primarily by the industry—caused the company to be concerned about the possibility, not so much in the seventies but in the early eighties when the pipeline would be in operation, that depletion of the reservoir in western Canada might have reached a point where there would not be adequate throughput. The servicing of both the existing Canadian demand west of the Ottawa Valley line and the additional demand would be taken care of by the pipeline east of the Ottawa Valley line.

The company at that stage sought assurance that, having undertaken the financing and construction of the line, it would not find itself in financial difficulties if it had to bear the fixed operating costs of a project which, for the time being at least, might not be producing revenue. The government has been discussing this question with the company. I saw the report to which the hon. member referred and I can say that the statement that discussions have been completed is not true. In fact, there have been exchanges very recently concerning a possible solution to the difficulty about which the company has expressed concern. It is, of course, desirable to complete this line as soon as possible, but as well as security of supply we must take into account the element of the exposure of the consolidated revenue fund, in addition to the time necessary to investigate the environmental aspect involved.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I agree with the minister that the matters raised with respect to possible environmental difficulties should be investigated and proper action taken. However, I cannot understand why, when the government and the company were discussing the construction of the line, and when the survey of the route was being made, these financial aspects were not considered at the same time. It was the company which asked for an adjournment sine die because there was no assurance as to its financial obligations in certain circumstances. It seems to me this question should have been attended to at some point during the last 12 months and a conclusion reached.

In my opinion, Interprovincial Pipe Line has never been keen about this line. It was very much opposed to constructing it back in 1961 and I doubt whether it is any more enthusiastic about it today. I would have thought that by this time the government would either have told the company that it was prepared to offer some assurance regarding throughput, or was prepared to build the line itself. The fact that the minister cannot give us any timeframe within which construction will begin or be completed is bound to cause a great deal of dismay in the eastern part of Canada.

There is a second question I should like to ask. It has to do with a report that the Norwegian minister of foreign affairs has informed the International Energy Group in Brussels that Norway does not intend to sign the international energy agreement which is now before a committee of this House for discussion. Can the minister tell us whether or not this amounts to a complete rejection, or whether Norway is seeking some kind of associate status in the 12-nation group, as newspaper reports have indicated? Is it true that Norway does not favour the agreement because she expects soon to become an exporter of oil herself and does not, therefore, consider it appropriate for her to be a member of a group which, except for Canada, is made up entirely of oil importing countries? If that is the reason, then it should surely make us pause and think about whether Canada should become a party to that agreement.

I do not wish to discuss the agreement now; there will be plenty of opportunity to do so when the committee reports back to the House. My own feeling is that the agreement is not a good one for Canada. All hon. members may not be of this opinion. However, the arguments I have been advancing in committee are strengthened by the fact that Norway does not feel she should be required to restrict her own consumption while at the same time continuing to export to other countries. I think time will show that the concern of those of us who have questioned the value of this agreement is fully justified. I do not think the Canadian people will ever be content with a situation in which they are asked to ration gasoline in this country while we continue to maintain normal exports of oil to the United States. This could happen under the agreement to which I have referred.

The minister has undertaken that the government will not sign this agreement until the report of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works is dealt with in the House. That report may not come back to us for some time, so it would be useful if we could obtain this information. The minister may want to tell the committee what position the government is taking in light of the Norwegian government's stand and in light of the fact that the International Energy Group is pressing very hard for an immediate decision by Canada.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I thank the hon. gentleman for raising the question. First, with regard to the Norwegian decision I can confirm that the Norwegians have decided not to adhere to the agreement. One could perhaps speculate that this decision is not unconnected with the trauma they feel generally concerning their economic relations with other western European countries. I am referring to the discussions held with regard to their membership in the EEC. Specifically, though, their decision might have been taken because they anticipate that in the near future they will become net exporters of oil. Norway's position as a net exporter would, of course, be substantially different from that of Canada. Canada is a net exporter at the moment but we depend, of course, on imports from overseas to supply the eastern market, and this position is not likely to change for at least a decade.

So although Norway will be able to take care of its own needs from its offshore production, according to present expectation, there is no real prospect of this in Canada until 1988. In this sense our position is quite different from that of Norway. It is therefore important that we take steps to secure for the eastern half of Canada supplies which must enter this country from overseas, and for this reason we think we should become party to the agreement respecting the international quota program.

It has been suggested from time to time that there is a quality of belligerence in confrontation about membership in the IEG. I would just mention that while the Norwegians are not in, some of the traditional non-belligerents like Switzerland, Sweden and Austria have decided to come in, even though they were not originally participants in the ECG discussions.

The second comment I would make in answering the question as to where we stand is this: Because this matter is before parliament at the present time, because we have sought the response of the provincial governments, and because we have not yet received either the committee's reaction or the response of the provincial governments to the proposals, we are naturally reluctant to go ahead. Indeed, it would be improper to go ahead and commit ourselves to a definite adherence to the agreement. On the other hand, if the rhythm of participating in these discussions is dictated by states which, perhaps, do not have the constitutional complexity of Canada is that provisional adherence will be required in the very near future so that the discussions can continue, I have indicated to my colleagues, and they have agreed, that we should provisionally participate in the agreement, subject specifically to the proviso that Canada's participation is contingent upon constitutional requirements, and particularly upon parliament's reaction to the proposal.

One other comment I think I should make regarding the question of exports is this. I have been advised in this respect that the accurate description of the program is somewhat different from that given by one of my officials in committee. The opinion was advanced by an official before the committee that in the event of an emergency Canada would be proscribed from decreasing its exports to the United States. In a practical sense that would probably be the effect. However, I am now advised that Canada could indeed decide to reduce exports to the United States further, even in the event of an emergency, to meet its own needs; but the amount of such reduction in exports to the United States during the emergency would thereupon be deducted from the amount of oil we are entitled to receive from overseas. Thus, in those circumstances, since the matter would balance out, it is very likely that we would decide to keep the flow of oil continuing, in the expectation that oil would be delivered on the east coast. I think that is the only important change that I would make to the general presentation made in committee.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question before he sits down? The minister talks about entering into a provisional agreement. I take it this would not be binding on Canada. Could not the government at any time up until May 1 next, if it so chose, indicate that it is not its intention to become party to the agreement?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is exactly it. It would not amount to definitive acceptance of the agreement which, as the hon. member mentions, is required to be entered into by May 1, 1975. Therefore, if the government decided that it should not ratify the agreement, it could do so without any adverse international legal consequences.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to say a few words on the general terms of the bill and, in the time allotted to me, pose a few questions to the minister. I might say at the outset, though, that I find it very strange that we are debating this bill, studying it clause by clause, when so many uncertainties need to be cleared up. In reply to a question from a member in the House, the minister said: "We are going to make a decision. We have until 1975 to decide whether or not we are going to enter into this agreement with 12 other countries regarding some kind of common front for the exportation of oil". To my mind, that is a very easy question to clear up. The minister should have reached that decision before presenting this bill to the House.

This bill is supposed to answer some of the uncertainties existing in the energy field in Canada, particularly uncertainties relating to oil and gas supply. For the last two years, countries of the world have been stepping up exploration of oil and gas but we have seen the direct opposite take place in Canada. Something like 50 per cent of Canada's potential drilling capacity has been withdrawn. Thirty-two rigs out of 320 can be equated with a rate of 10 per cent, but actually 50 per cent of our potential drilling capacity has been lost. A lot of smaller rigs have remained. Nevertheless, this situation is a shame. My first question is this: Will this bill right that shame? Will it bring about more certainty by bringing back into the oil and gas industry some degree of confidence and encouragement regarding further exploration?

I was not in the chamber yesterday afternoon when the minister made his speech; I was working in the agricultural committee studying a bill having to do with government intervention in the field of marketing grain, but I did read this afternoon the remarks the minister made and found no answer to that question. I think the minister owes it to the House, before we pass this bill, to give us an answer to the question: Will the bill in any way encourage further exploration for oil and gas in Canada? If so, what particular features of the bill will do this? In this regard I should like to quote from a telegram sent by the president of Imperial Oil. He says:

> In its language and intent, the bill must reflect its transitional purpose. A specific expiry date—

In other words, the oil companies want to know when this bill will cease to have effect. In their minds, the provisions of this bill should only be temporary, as was Bill C-18. But the minister puts no expiry date in the bill. I continue:

> A specific expiry date, which would ensure reconsideration of all sections of the bill, is essential.
> Without these, Bill C-32 can only be read as a major obstacle facing the job of providing oil and gas for future Canadian needs.

That language is pretty clear, Mr. Chairman. This is one of the major oil exploration companies operating in Canada. In fact, this is the company that discovered Leduc No. 1, a company that is exploring for oil entirely on its own in the Mackenzie delta, a company that has done a great deal of what might be called wildcat drilling, which is really what we should ask oil companies to do, whether Imperial Oil or Canadian-owned companies like Home. This would enable us to discover oil and gas potential anywhere in Canada. Here we have one of the major wildcatters, a company that has had great experience, and I might say success, saying that this bill will be a major obstacle to providing Canada with its future oil and gas requirements.

I do not know how secure our reserves are, because the National Energy Board has not reported on them. We are being asked to deal with this bill with suspicion, with hunches, with intuition—not with knowledge. The bill should not be before parliament until the National Energy Board report on reserves has been printed in both French and English, and until we have had a report from the producing areas of Canada, the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. We want to know whether they agree with the National Energy Board's finding regarding the extent of Canada's reserves.

I listened this afternoon to the House leader dealing at great length after the question period with bills that had priority and bills that did not have priority, and with how far the government wanted to proceed with other pieces of legislation, including the budget, before Chirstmas. Why the urgency in proceeding with this bill? Why ask members of this House to deal with the subject when the National Energy Board has already tabulated the facts? Members of parliament should be allowed to take an ordinary, common sense approach: they should be allowed to read the Energy Board's report on our reserves. Why should we be asked to deal with this bill in a hasty way, from suspicion and intuition rather than on the basis of facts which the National Energy Board has already compiled? That is the second question the minister should answer. I have seen no evidence of an answer in his remarks. In fact, at page 1297 of Hansard for yesterday the minister is reported as having said:

● (1630)

With regard to the agreement with the affected provinces on gas prices, I think I would have to say that the returns are not yet all in as to whether or not it would be possible to achieve some kind of agreement.

So, again, in his own words he has said the returns are not all in as to whether the provinces will agree to some kind of condition in respect of the pricing of natural gas. Why are we being asked to give authority in respect of price, supply and movement of oil and gas under this piece of legislation to the commission which the minister wants to set up, before we know whether the provinces have come to an agreement on gas pricing? That it the third question the minister should answer as to how this bill will enable the federal government and the provinces to reach such an agreement.

We then come to the question of supply. When I began my remarks I said that in all the world, Canada is the only country which has been so foolish in the last two years to in fact turn off exploration for oil and gas. How will this bill increase our supply? I read in the newspapers that the minister said we were going to establish PetroCan, and PetroCan does not want to displace any exploration companies but wants to give them greater participation.

Mr. Stanfield: "Wildcat" Macdonald.

Mr. Horner: He has been referred to as an animal in Alberta, but not a wildcat. I think it was something like a mule, because of his stubbornness.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is one of the more complimentary remarks.

Mr. Horner: One can be called a name for a day or two days, but after being called a name for a year and a half one should look in the mirror and reassess his image.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Or reassess the name callers.

Mr. Horner: Reassess the name callers if you want. If one has disregard for a certain area, a certain region or a certain province, one can reassess the name callers and forget about it. If one is in an exalted position, I suppose that is fine; but when one is trying to get a piece of legislation through parliament he should treat representatives from the areas involved with a degree of respect or his bill might bog down.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Who has been disrespectful?

Mr. Horner: I would take the minister's remarks in respect of the province of Alberta as being slightly disrespectful, and as an individual who is here from a part of Alberta to represent Alberta, I react to that disrespect as I should if I am to serve that area well. The prairie provinces have fought long and hard for constitutional acceptance of the fact that resources belong to the provinces. That decision was made some time ago, as far back as 1930. A royal commission was set up to study the matter, and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were awarded $5 million for the expenditure of their resources which had taken place prior to that date. That constitutional question has been settled.

Does the minister now feel that he can move in with this bill and arbitrarily set gas prices, deciding that TransCanada PipeLines shall be the common carrier, maintaining a monopoly, with the price of gas set at whatever he wants? Does he really feel he can do that without destroying the constitutional arrangement decided on in 1930 in favour of the prairie provinces? I do not think he can really do so without first reaching some kind of agreement with the provinces. The minister clearly states at page 1297 of Hansard that he has not yet reached agreement with the provinces. Parliament would be making a colossal error in passing this bill without first allowing the provinces to reach agreement with this government, because constitutionally the matter of resources remains solely with the provinces.

Just recently Quebec announced its complete support for the Alberta position, and Newfoundland has always maintained the position that Alberta was right in this constitutional fight in respect of control of natural resources. One cannot dispute the fact that the minister, by clauses 3, 36, 38, 39 and 42 of this bill, does go against the constitutional position of the provinces. I have read what the minister said and he obviously refuses to face that question squarely. Apparently he believes this government is all-powerful and can move into the control of resources. The minister said in his remarks that by the establishment of the National Energy Board in 1959 the government in fact set the precedent which allowed him to move in. However, I suggest that no such power followed the establishment of the National Energy Board. The job of the National Energy Board is to assess and recommend to parliament certain action in respect of energy.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To the government.

Mr. Horner: Yes, to the government. But that does not mean the board is responsible for what is contemplated under this legislation. The government is responsible for this legislation, and the National Energy Board's recommendations can be accepted or rejected by the government. We in this House have not seen the most recent report of that board, although the minister has informed the House it has been tabulated, compiled and is now in the process of being translated from English into French. I suggest that is all the more reason this legislation should not proceed, so that members of the House have an opportunity to study it. I have a hunch, an intuition or a suspicion that the National Energy Board's report will clearly substantiate the case Alberta has been attempting to make, namely, that we require further exploration because our known reserves of gas and oil are not as great as one might expect.

We must ask ourselves how this bill will encourage further exploration. One need only read the telegram from Mr. Armstrong, president of Imperial Oil, to realize that this bill is harmful. The minister can say that as a result of this bill he will be able to price oil cheaply in all regions of Canada. I suppose that is true as long as there is oil available, but there is no more heavy oil coming from Saskatchewan and northeastern Alberta. The industry has stopped producing heavy oil in those areas because refining costs are so high that it is not economical. Production is being turned off and further exploration for heavy oil is being turned off because of the minister's arbitrary pricing policy.

One can question the whole area of distribution. The minister is involved in discussions with Interprovincial Pipe Line on the question of assistance in building the pipeline to Montreal. The minister should inform the House of the reason the government is not prepared to put itself in the position of guarantor with regard to the building of that pipeline. The oil companies, no matter who they may be, which own Interprovincial Pipe Line say they will build the pipeline provided they are given a guarantee that the distribution of oil will rest solely in the hands of the government, particularly after the bill is passed. They said they could build the pipeline, but then suddenly the government, with the stroke of a pen, could cut off the distribution of western oil to the Montreal market. So they say they want some kind of guarantee that a certain volume will continue to move through that pipeline.

The minister is presenting to Parliament a bill which gives this commission exclusive power to control the distribution of oil. Why does he not give Interprovincial Pipe Line the guarantee it is asking for, because this bill could make that pipeline economically sound or it could make it the worst venture any oil company has entered into—and they have entered into many poor ones, which is evident when one studies their past in respect of drilling and exploration. I believe there should be no hesitation on the part of the minister in this regard. He will be all-powerful if this bill is passed. What is the problem? What is in the back of his mind which will not allow him to guarantee the company a financial return equal to the financial return of the oil companies? If the pipeline is to be built as a government project, I would like to think there would be some guarantee that it would be an economically sound project and not some pipe dream of the minister.

From reading the minister's remarks and listening to his answers to questions, it would seem that he has avoided more questions than he has answered. Even in respect of the questions I heard him answer this afternoon he failed to really pin down the problems or offer any concrete solutions. I understand that with regard to this bill he is suggesting in the order of 15 pages of amendments. These he has sent to members on this side of the House with the suggestion that at the appropriate time he will be presenting them. Surely we need a better explanation than has been given in this regard.

Since the bill contains 39 pages, 15 pages of amendments represents nearly one amendment for every two pages of the bill. Surely the minister should reassess his desire for haste in passing this bill. The passage of the bill this afternoon or next week will not in any way change the market situation. The price of oil is set at $6.50 per barrel. The oil companies are accepting that price and have accepted it for six months now, voluntarily. They accepted the price of $4 a barrel in the early part of January and February, voluntarily, after what might be referred to as moral suasion on the part of the government. Really, there is no haste in respect of the passage of this bill. I would advise parliament not to be in any hurry to pass it until we have received some answers. We have seen government action, with regard to the energy question, based upon a short-term solution. One could almost say that in the past year and a half the whole concern of the government has been to satisfy the consumer on a very short-term basis.

Mr. Stanfield: On a political basis.

Mr. Horner: Someone mentioned politics. Certainly politics were played. I believe Canada suffered a great deal in the long term. This is the only country in the world which has been so foolish as to turn off exploration in the past two years. I think that when the National Energy Board's report is released it will be proven that we have been rather foolish because technical help and technical skills have left Canada and gone either to the North Sea area, the United States, Indonesia or somewhere else in search of oil and gas. It will take at least three or four years to entice back to Canada the technical skills required to gear Canada for further exploration.

It will not matter whether the minister establishes PetroCan. He will then have to rely on the private sector to obtain the technical skills required in Canada. He will not have very much success. There is much evidence to back up my statement in this regard. In the newspapers one can find a long list of ads for engineers, geologists and other people required by the oil and gas industry in Canada and throughout the world. In the past year we have seen short-term action by the government. Now we must take a long-term look at the producing capacity of this country. For instance, we must decide whether we are to encourage further exploration off the east coast.

There have been some interesting finds of natural gas north of Newfoundland, south of Newfoundland and around Prince Edward Island. More equipment will be required. In fact the Hudson Bay Oil and Gas Company required seven months to prove out its one find off the coast of Prince Edward Island. That gives the House an idea of the problem we are dealing with. The minister has not said that in the next four to ten years we will get on with the job of proving our reserves or proving our capability to obtain oil from the tar sands. He has not said that, and this bill does not say it. This bill in many respects has a tendency to turn off many companies, whether they be multinational, Canadian or otherwise, in respect of further exploration in Canada.

In ending my brief remarks I should like to re-emphasize few questions which I put to the minister. Why does he believe that further exploration would be encouraged under this legislation? Can he give the House and the country any idea of the formula that will be used to reach a price that will be satisfactory from the viewpoint of encouraging further exploration? You can take an arbitrary price of $6.50 until next July. Of course, some people will say that it is too low, and others that it is too high. Each person will reach his own decision. But it will only last until July 1, 1975. However, this bill will go on and on: there is no limit to it; the government will retain control over energy indefinitely. What formula will the minister use in setting the price of oil and natural gas?

● (1650)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Does he seek agreement to continue?

Mr. Horner: If the minister would answer my questions, I might say a word or two about his reply; but he will probably have satisfactory answers since he is so knowledgeable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has raised a number of interesting questions about this bill and about the oil scene generally. Perhaps first I should bring this fact to his attention, and indeed to that of other hon. members on that side of the House who have commented that Bill C-18 was a temporary measure, that it contained an expiry date: if they will look at it, they will see that it had no such expiry limit. The bill anticipated a dramatic change in the pricing of international oil which has had so much impact on Canada that we can anticipate for the future, and I suspect for a long time in the future, that the governments of oil producing states will be commanding the price of this commodity, and therefore there will be a continuing necessity on the part of the government of Canada to protect Canadians against the kind of oil prices that may be imposed on them from time to time with measures such as the ones put forward in the bill and such others as may be appropriate.

The hon. member referred to the stand taken, both in telegrams and in public statements, by Imperial Oil Limited, comparable to the stand taken by Gulf, one of the major international companies, to the effect that there should be a time limit. One cannot blame Imperial Oil and Gulf. Of course they would like to go to international prices as soon as possible. They will make a bonanza on their Canadian oil if they can go to international prices. It is fair enough for them to make the effort, but it is incumbent upon the government and this parliament to have some regard for the interests of Canadians generally when we have the ability to protect ourselves against such a dramatic increase as $5 a barrel and when we can take action through this kind of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You don't have to do all this. It is not for gas, nor for the tar sands.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Certainly, the position of this government—and I thought it was the position of the official opposition, but it may not be—is that we should have such an arrangement. Indeed, the provincial premiers agreed on the fact that there should be an agreement—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With a club over their heads.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): —with regard to oil pricing in Canada and that, to put it in the vernacular, the producing areas of Canada should not "sock it" to the consuming areas: indeed, that they should render assistance. That was the principle established on March 27 and it is one to which we adhere in the bill. As I said, of course Imperial Oil would like to be able to dictate prices; They would like to have international prices. If we have the ability in Canada, as we do, to protect Canadians generally, we should do it.

The hon. gentlemen made some comments about the report of the National Energy Board and he objected to the fact that the report had not yet been made public. The position is that, just as with the export gas pricing report, it is the advisory opinion of the board, reached after public hearings and made known to the minister under the provisions of the National Energy Board Act. It is in relation to a formula that the board will apply in deciding from time to time on the appropriate level of exports from Canada. The kind of question which the government should state in the form of a request to the National Energy Board should be: What should the appropriate export levels be over a period of years?

It is also the government's judgment that since this will actively affect production in the provinces if, for example, it is decided that the level of exports should be lower than at present, there will be some shut-in capacity which will have an impact on the revenues of both the producing companies and the producing provinces. It is for that reason we have put that report into the hands of the two major producing provinces in terms of oil export and we have sought their response to it so that their views as to the kind of scheme proposed in the report can be taken into account in the government's decision.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The conservation responsibility is theirs.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is indeed theirs, but the export responsibility is clearly ours. But before exercising our responsibility we will consider at their comments, which at the moment have not been received. The hon. member referred, also, to the question of gas pricing. As I said, we have had no final response from either Ontario, the major consuming province, or Alberta, the major producing province, to proposals with regard to the appropriate pricing of natural gas, proposals which we put to them over a month ago.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): How many days elapsed before the bill was given first reading?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It was some days before the bill was given first reading. I do not have the actual record here. The proposal has been made to them, but we have had no response as to what they would consider to be the appropriate price level for gas. The hon. member says we should not act until the province responds. Again, as with Imperial Oil, the province has special interests which it has been effectively pressing here. It would like to get the gas price as high as it can, and for that purpose it has created the entity of PanAlberta. It was created for the purpose of acquiring and selling gas at higher prices to utilities in Ontario, on the threat of withholding gas from Ontario users.

In the same way, it is in the province's interest, of course, under the Alberta arbitration act, that no decision should be made on this matter so that the arbitration procedure can take over and gas can move to commodity value. The government does not happen to agree with that stand. As in the case of oil, we take the position that, while we think natural gas should be phased over a period of time to commodity value, it is in the national interest to try to minimize the impact on consumers. May I remind the House that minimizing the impact on consumers is keeping the price down to the cost of living index.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Hon. gentlemen on the other side make regular complaints about the high consumer price index and then insist that oil and gas prices should be world prices, that gas prices should be related to oil prices and that we should "sock it" to the Canadian consumers.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): With regard to the Montreal pipeline, I made a general statement in that regard.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but, it being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the House may proceed to the consideration of private members' business in accordance with section 4 of Standing Order 15.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REASONS FOR COMMISSIONS' REPORTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that Bill C-214, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a hardy veteran, this being the fourth or fifth time I have presented it. The idea first was brought forward as a notice of motion.

The bill is short. It calls on Electoral Boundaries Commissions to give reasons for recommendations concerning changes in electoral boundaries. Recommendations for changes in constituency boundaries have not contained the reasons why commissioners made such changes.

If hon. members will cast their minds back, they will no doubt remember the last two occasions on which the provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act were to be invoked. Frankly, I can only say of that act that it is a minor, mitigated disaster. In many instances redistribution proposals were not satisfactory, and created a great deal of dissatisfaction. Actually the last attempt at redistribution created so much dissatisfaction on the part of members of the House that it was agreed to suspend the effects of redistribution until December 31, 1974. The recommendations of the past cannot be reinstituted. The commissions have changed, circumstances have changed, and it would be necessary to start all over again.

I want to see reasons attached to commission recommendations. At present members may comment upon recommendations but cannot amend those recommendations. Members may comment on those recommendations in this House, and then the commissioners may read what has been said and possibly amend their recommendations. However, experience shows that we wasted our time. The odd name has been changed, but that is about all, even though the general distribution scheme involved the wildest abortion, or totally unjust concepts, or an entirely false premise about the propriety of the suggested area of representation. I am speaking of the representation of people by representatives. The reports are almost always returned in their original form; sometimes they are mildly changed.

All members, I think, have had the opportunity of seeing preliminary reports and appearing at public hearings. I will not repeat what went on in Alberta in the last redistribution but there was universal condemnation of the proposals of the commissioners. I cannot see how these so-called independent commissions are protecting anything. They are doing a worse job than members themselves did in the past.

Be that as it may, I think the commissions can do a better job. But they could do a far better job if they would spell out the reasons for recommending particular changes. Let us know the principles which they apply within each province. I maintain that far too few commissions pay attention to demographic circumstance. Some of them tend to think in terms of numbers of votes, which has resulted in intolerable injustices.

In the last proposal in Alberta we saw rural constituencies with populations far larger than in urban constituencies. The results were fantastic and violated the principle of good representation. In other words, the public must have ready access to the member who represents them and he, in his turn, must have ready access to his constituents.

I am not talking about the difficulty of conducting elections. I wish that commissioners would occasionally become involved in election campaigns because then they would see how wrong are academic writers who blindly support the principles of the act, and how wrong headed are some newspaper editors who piously agree with some of the garbage written about the workings of the act. Only by fighting an election would they realize how stupid is our redistribution system.

As well, I think commissioners should be punished for some of their decisions by being made to service the constituencies they have drawn. In many cases that would be virtually impossible.

Mr. Lefebvre: That is quite true.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am trying to improve the workings of the act. I am not saying that members of parliament should again determine constituency boundaries, although I think they could do a far better job than many so-called independent commissions.

An hon. Member: But parliament passed the act.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All right; parliament passed that act, and there it is. But I want to see it improved. I want specific reasons to accompany recommendations. Members of parliament could then direct their attention to specific comments. At present nothing specific accompanies recommendations. There is merely a map with lines on it, but no indication why any boundary was changed. Therefore I have brought forward this simple amending bill and ask the House to support it.

The motion before the House calls for this bill to be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I believe it should be sent to that committee, where the bill can be discussed at greater length than in the House. I believe the House is disposed to send the bill to that committee. Actually, it was suggested to me through the usual channels that, in order to allow as many members as possible to participate in the present debate, speeches in the House should be limited to 10 minutes. Either at six o'clock, or after the last member has spoken, I think there will be a disposition to send the bill to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I recommend it to the House.

Mr. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to talk on this bill as, for the first time, I am in complete agreement with a member of the opposition. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) argues persuasively.

The bill, which the hon. member indicated has been before the House on three previous occasions, is timely as the government has announced its intention to present new legislation which will affect electoral boundaries readjustment and redistribution. The bill which the government will be presenting will, of course, affect only the British North America Act. It will not deal specifically with the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

• (1710)

This bill is timely because the amendment which the hon. member for Edmonton West is presenting draws attention to the latter act. I would like to see this bill go to committee because I have a direct interest in the question of amending that act. Indeed, I intend to present a private member's bill which will seek to amend Section 13 of that act which, by reference, is the one in which the hon. member for Edmonton West is interested.

When the hon. member speaks of getting the commissioners to affix reasons to the readjustment they propose, he is in effect referring to Section 13 where the reasons are set down and the criteria are determined. These are the criteria that interest me as a member from Northern Ontario.

Section 13 sets down the subdivision or quotient for any given province, based upon the total population within that province and the number of seats allocated to it according to the provisions of the British North America Act. The amalgam method, which will be the subject matter of the proposed government bill, sets down the formula by which the numbers of seats in various provinces are to be amended. However, that bill does not deal with the division of these particular seats within any given province. As I understand it, there is no proposed amendment in the government legislation which will deal with this provision of seats within a province. That is why I will be presenting a private member's bill.

Section 13 permits the commissioners under certain circumstances to augment the number of seats within a constituency, or reduce it, by 25 per cent from the provincial quotient. I will be presenting an amendment whereby the number of electors within a particular proposed boundary could be as much as 35 per cent less than the normal quotient within that province.

The reasons I will be presenting a bill is because I feel the present situation in the province of Ontario is very unfair to a certain portion of this province, that is, the northern one half or two thirds of the province of Ontario.

Under the redistribution which was presented to this House in June of last year there was a proposal to increase the number of seats in Ontario by three. However, there was a contemporaneous reduction in the number of northern Ontario seats by two, reducing the number of seats in northern Ontario from 12 to 10. Paradoxically, the whole of Ontario was to gain three seats, the net result being that the southern portion of the province would gain five additional seats over what it had prior to 1972. I objected to that position for very valid reasons.

I made a speech on this particular topic on July 5, and continued it on July 6, 1973. During that speech I stated the reasons why I felt consideration ought to be given by the commissioners to my proposal. I stated they should be permitted to increase or decrease the number of electors in one area up to 35 per cent below the normal quotient. I indicated that the provisions within the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act were very astute and complete in their consideration of the special factors that affect northern Ontario seats. I quote that particular section:

> the commission may depart from the strict application of rules (a) and (b) in any case where
> (i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, or
> (ii) any special community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province appears to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable,

The northern portion of Ontario represents roughly two thirds of the total area of the province. Since World War II there has been a tendency toward greater centralization within urban areas. On information which is now available it is projected that by the year 2000, 90 per cent of the total Canadian population will be concentrated within urban centres.

Although we in this House may pride ourselves on being able to govern the affairs of this nation, the whole power of the body politic within Canada is subdivided. Jurisdictionally and constitutionally, we have the provinces and the federal government. No one will deny those governments are located in large urban centres and their deliberations and concerns are influenced by those centres.

Economic activities within a country have a great deal of influence on the government of that country. In turn, its economic activity is guided to a considerable extent by the corporate entities within the country. Those corporate entities are predominantly located in the large urban centres. That is where they have their head offices. They are motivated by the feelings generated within those large urban centres.

The press, which has a great deal of influence on the development of a country and on the opinion of the electorate, is primarily located in large urban centres. One need only listen to the complaints from western Canada relating to CBC newscasts. All news coverage is concentrated toward Toronto. The net effect is that a direction is given to our country which is really an urban direction.

The paradox is that we have four million square miles of territory. This four million square miles is, but for a very small percentage, occupied. If we are to encourage the development of this area we ought not to start by reducing the number of representatives which flow from it into the central locations. I would be very sorry to find that northern Ontario, which is rich in all that is now in demand on the international market, would find itself without representation. I would not like to see the exploitation of that area directed from the large urban centres.

I am looking at the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling). Although he is considered to be in southern Ontario, his problems are very similar to those being experienced in northern Ontario. He understands very well of what I speak, and is very sympathetic with the position I have taken.

I will conclude my remarks and hope this bill will pass with all dispatch. I will cite one of my early childhood heroes, the Prime Minister of this country in 1946, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, when dealing with redistribution during the 1946 debate. He said:

> Do we always realize that the area of this country is enormous—from one ocean to the other, from the boundaries of the United States to the North Pole, an area scarcely smaller than the whole of Europe and somewhat larger than the whole of the United States? Of course, were it not for the fact that only a relatively small fraction of it is regarded as potentially valuable for agricultural purposes, it would be difficult to explain why there are only twelve million people in that vast area; but the representation is territorial and the territory is very large.

He places this comment in the context of the criteria which should guide redistribution, and in his mind, a very lucid and far-seeing mind, he maintains that the primary consideration should be representation on the basis of territory. Representation by population is essential, and I agree we should keep as close as possible to that standard if we are to maintain our democratic principles. Nevertheless the element of territory is very real in Canadian history and it will become even more important in the future as we accept increasing numbers of immigrants, as our own population grows, and as we occupy territories which will then be ready for more intensive development.

I am pleased to support the hon. member for Edmonton-West. There may be other occasions upon which I shall be pleased to do so, though I cannot for the moment think of any.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting afternoon. First of all I am in the position of being able to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on what appears to be the second occasion within a couple of years when he is winning something in private members' hour. A year to two ago a private member's resolution he introduced was referred to a committee, which was in itself a success, though I do not think it went any further.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): At least they reported it back unanimously.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And was that as far as it went?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, there is legislation coming.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Now here again the hon. member has a bill which has a good chance of receiving second reading, provided some of us do not exercise our right to talk it out, and I have no intention of doing that.

The other thing I find interesting this afternoon, something which almost leaves me speechless, is to hear the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) supporting a bill brought in by a private member on the opposite side of the House. His usual role in private members' hour is to oppose or talk out anything which comes from this side. Mind you, though, when the hon. member from Edmonton West and the hon. member for Nipissing are agreed, I feel I should read the legislation again and make sure that something is not being put over on us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Actually, Your Honour, I do not object to this bill. I am not wildly enthusiastic about it, but I do not object to it and I am prepared to go along with it on the understanding that it be given second reading and that the bill itself, not just the subject matter, be sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Because there are one or two things I would like to say in reply to remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, I thought I would like to make it clear at the outset that I am prepared to support the bill.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am unrepentant over the issue of redistribution by an independent commission. I have had plenty of experience of the old regime under which redistribution was done by a committee of this House. In effect, this meant it was done in the offices of some of the ministers—the key minister for each province really drew the map for that province, and the committee just went through the motions. I do not want to see us go back to that system and I am sure that nobody else does, either. Even those who are critical of the present method do not suggest we return to redistribution by the members of the House.

The constituencies belong to the people, to the country, and they are not ours to draw up or carve out, whichever figure of speech you want to use. For this reason, I wish to take a close look at the bill before us and be sure that it will not stymie or hurt the process of redistribution by an independent commission. I do not believe it does and, therefore, as I said before, I am prepared to go along with it. But I do not think this is an occasion for blasting away at the things the commissions have done.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The hon. member for Edmonton West said that the redistribution boundaries produced last time, the maps for which we received in 1973 or in 1974, created almost a rebellion on the part of hon. members. I know that in one or two provinces there were pretty strong feelings about the way the lines had been drawn, but for the most part the complaints made against that redistribution, and the complaints which resulted in legislation being introduced to postpone it, were not against the way the lines had been drawn by the commissioners it was because of the apportioning of the number of seats to each province as determined by the terms of the British North America Act.

So what members really were saying when they wished to put off redistribution at that time, was that they wished to look again at the formula for dividing the number of seats among the various provinces. I, too, think that the time has come when we should consider, if we retain a redistribution formula in which a floor is provided for areas such as the Yukon and Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, whether there are now other areas in this country which should also be protected.

However, I should not dwell on this issue because it is not the issue which is really before us today. I also want to affirm my belief that to have an independent commission do the job of redistribution is a much better way. I know that in the case of Alberta there has, in the past, been a good deal of feeling about the boundaries, but generally speaking I think the commissioners have done a pretty reasonable job. The last one, the one that has been put off, hurt me as far as my own constituency was concerned. As a matter of fact, it wiped it right out by name.

I am glad to see the hon. member for Edmonton West shaking his head at that remark.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They can't wipe you out.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member suggests that they won't wipe me out. They haven't wiped me out. Those boundaries carve up the city in a different way, that is all; it would probably be represented by this same member. But even if the commissioners have done things which some of us do not like, I still think this work should be carried out on an independent basis and that we should not snipe at them. I myself have had bitter experiences in two or three cases of redistribution by a committee of this House.

And now, having declared my faith, having said that I believe in the principle of redistribution by independent commissioners, I want to say a few words about the particular proposals in the bill presented to us this afternoon. The hon. member is asking that when the commissions make their reports to the House—reports which result in our having a chance to discuss them, though I am not sure about that; at least it is in the law—they should append explanations or justifications for the lines they have drawn. He says, and I think quite rightly, that this would make for better debate in the House. Indeed, it might in some cases do away with necessity for debate altogether.

My only concern, and I think it is probably met by the way the bill is drafted, is that the commissioners should not be made responsible for producing unnecessary explanations. Out of 264 seats, or however many there may be, decisions in the cases of 200, or 225, are likely to be so obvious that no explanation would be required. But there will be occasions on which such drastic changes are made that hon. members will be justified in asking for an explanation. The way the bill is worded, or may be worded when it comes out of committee, can take care of that.

● (1730)

I hope, as I say, that the interpretation would be that in cases where an explanation is obviously called for, that explanation should be forthcoming, but that we would not put on the commissioners the responsibility of writing a long treatise in explanation of every constituency's boundaries in view of the fact that in many cases they would be quite understandable.

So, Mr. Speaker, let me stick to the unofficial agreement that we made about keeping speeches short and say that, with these comments on the part of one who firmly believes in redistribution by an independent commission, I am happy to see the bill before the House today, and I trust that it will go to committee not later than six o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will try not to exceed the ten minutes allowed to me, but first I would like to thank the member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for having introduced that bill. He said a while ago that he was bringing it in for the third or fourth time. I suppose he believes in the saying: Practice makes perfect. This evening, he deserves our congratulations, because he prevented the government from killing his bill, since all members stated their views when the new legislation on the electoral boundaries readjustment was introduced. This legislation was not supported by all members. I think that the Electoral Boundaries Commission was blamed for its work.

A while ago I heard the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) say that he would still prefer to entrust the work to an independent commission rather than to hon. members, even if it should indeed be assigned to them. If hon. members wish to give up that work and leave it to an independent organization, we will have to make sure, Mr. Speaker, that this commission acts with full knowledge of the facts.

Insofar as my area is concerned, I daresay I believed for a moment in this commission and I went along with the others in saying that we could give this work to an independent commission. But today, I am less of a dupe and I say that we need responsible people and the responsible people in this House are the Members of Parliament chosen by the people. When one has serious work to do it is not time to give it to others, it is time to take one's responsibilities.

When I finally got to know what the limits of Roberval riding were, I tried to discuss things with the commissioners and I was told it was too late, that everything had been done and that the act was about to become law. If a Member of Parliament does not have more authority than that in this House and if such an important matter as electoral limits is left up to a dictatorial organism, I believe it is time for us to make a stand. We should not forget—and the commissioners seem to have done just that—that to trace the limits of a riding, it is not sufficient to take a piece of paper, to draw a line on it and say: "We are not going there". When a rural riding has a population of 50,000 to 60,000 with distances of 120 to 150 miles, this population is brought up to city levels, say 90,000, by taking two rural ridings and melting them into one; in the towns, it is easy, Mr. Speaker. Take four blocks and you get 90,000 or 95,000 population.

But in a rural area it is not the same thing and that is what I noticed when I examined the electoral act. I noticed that no account had been taken of the riding's demography or of the social or economic contacts of its population but these are essentials that cannot be ignored in a riding. For example, cutting up a small town of 10,000 or a parish in two and making the people go 150 miles on one side and those in the other part of the parish another 150 miles on the other side, just is not practical.

If we cannot find commissioners who are knowledgeable enough in their areas in each province and especially in Quebec to see that justice is done for the citizens of Quebec, I believe we will simply have to, not only improve the act, as proposed in Bill C-214, but repeal it and start all over again. If we can do otherwise, all the better. The government seems well disposed, but I for one was looking forward to December 31 with fear. I thought that, if the act was to be in force on December 31, and if no one did anything, it would have been a disaster, a revolution in my region. I have always thought the role of an MP was to serve his riding. At the present time, it would be physically impossible to serve a riding as big as that of Roberval that is to be created by the fusion of two ridings, those of Lac-Saint-Jean and Roberval. It is impossible and it took totally ignorant commissioners to propose such a thing.

I did not have the opportunity of appearing before the commission because I was not here at the time, but today I can say to the commissioners that they acted like dunces. If people cannot be found who are competent enough to do justice to the people, then let the job be entrusted to hon. members: they will do the job.

Of course, the Canadian population is growing. It is not absolutely necessary for Quebec to have 74 ridings. If the population increases, it is much easier, to my mind, to increase the number of ridings. Their number was increased in order to have all the Liberals on the same side. It would be much easier to increase the number of ridings, to do justice to the people, than to extend the limits of the ridings and thus make the members' task impossible to perform.

That, then, is what I wanted to say about the subject. I trust the bill will be sent to committee where it can be studied further. I am not a member of that committee, but I sincerely hope that its members will try to amend it; if need be, let them assume their responsibilities and present a bill that takes into account the needs of the people.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to thank the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for presenting this bill. I might say I enjoyed the remarks of my neighbouring colleague, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais), and was delighted that he also supports the bill. Certainly we both represent rural ridings, and along with a great many other members of parliament in this great country we want to see that rural areas are represented in the best way possible.

The previous bill before this House received a great deal of input from a great many of our sitting members of parliament who came out with the philosophy, "One man; one vote", and said this was how it was supposed to be. They asked why a rural elector should have a vote worth twice, or even more, that of a city elector? I am well aware of the great populations in our cities, especially those two great metropolitan areas, Montreal and Toronto. However, there are exceptions even in those areas where certain ridings comprise perhaps 20 by 30 city blocks containing a terrific number of electors. This, to a rural member, is absolutely crazy.

I can think of two ridings in metropolitan Toronto, I believe Spadina and Trinity, where there is a relatively small number of electors, much smaller than the number of actual residents. A great many people who reside in those ridings are not citizens and probably will not gain citizenship for some time, yet they are counted in the total population. Those members of parliament tell us to look at the number of people living in their ridings as compared to my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, for instance, which encompasses some 10,000 square miles with a population of 62,000 to 63,000 people, and an electorate of 43,000. This is one fact that ought to be drawn to our attention.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), one of the sages of this House, who suggested that perhaps members of parliament cannot be entirely trusted to set boundaries, and for that reason an independent commission is much more appropriate.

There is some truth in that, but in a great many cases the members of parliament know a lot more about the boundaries and where they should be set than any independent commission. As I understand it, in the last drawing of boundaries some of the commissioners sat in their ivory towers in the cities of Toronto and Montreal without ever going to the actual ridings. They were, therefore, not familiar with natural boundaries such as rivers, highways and so on. Certainly members of parliament might have a bias in respect of boundaries, but most of them are more knowledgeable as to proper location of boundaries than any independent commission.

I understand this bill is to receive approval on second reading and that there may be others who wish to speak, so I will not take any more time except to say that I support it, and I am pleased to see support for it from all sides of the House.

Before concluding I should mention that, as a result of the bill which is to come before the House next week or in the very near future, the province of Ontario will gain the greatest number of seats of any province—I believe seven to be exact. These seven additional seats will probably go to that golden horseshoe, the great metropolitan area of Toronto, and we in northern Ontario will again be left out, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Darling.]

I want to point out to the hon. member for Nipissing that I class myself as part of that great northern part of the province, and we want to be damn sure that we are not going to be shortchanged or left out in the cold again as a result of that bill, while the great metropolitan area gets even more representation than that to which it is entitled. We know the population, of course, is in that area. I was again discouraged to hear the hon. member for Nipissing refer to the fact that over 90 per cent of the people living in Canada by the year 2000 will be living in that metropolitan area. That is not an encouraging fact for those of us who are living in the rural parts of Canada.

This again focuses attention on the fact that the British North America Act should perhaps be amended, throwing down the drain the 10 provinces and substituting five provinces, namely Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, and I guess Winnipeg, with the other province being rural Canada. Let us hope that does not happen because rural people are entitled to the very best representation possible. Representation by population should not be the only criterion, any more than what some of us suggest, namely, representation by acreage.

Perhaps we should require a minimum of 5,000 square miles for each riding. If that were the case Toronto and Montreal would come out on the dirty end of the stick, but there has to be some reasoning in order that rural areas of Canada are protected. If independent commissions are to set these boundaries for redistribution, that is fine, but I think they should have some guidance from members of parliament.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to confirm what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has said, that there will shortly be introduced in the House a bill to amend the British North America Act. However, that bill will only deal with redistribution of parliamentary seats as between provinces, and will not deal with redistribution of seats within provinces. It will provide for a modest increase in the size of this House, and I can assure hon. members that I am not telling tales out of school because those members who were active on the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections during the last parliament are aware of these details.

Let me now make a few remarks about the bill before us, put forward in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). One of the things frustrating all members is that, when looking at previous maps, we find that proposed redistribution will not only affect us individually and personally but will also affect the constituents in our ridings.

We are frustrated when trying to discover any logical and coherent philosophy behind the decisions of the provincial commissions. To compound that confusion, very often there is no continuation of any common philosophy on the part of the commissioners as between provinces. In other words, we find 10 different philosophies in respect of redistribution within a province. I do not deny, because of the way the population is spread out through our country, that this is desirable. However, I do feel that this bill provides a correction to the kind of laissez-faire attitude commissions take in determining how redistribution is to take place.

• (1750)

Those who have the responsibility for taking a decision it seems to me should also have the responsibility to provide reasons for having taken that decision. Right now the commissions are in the position of being able to take a decision without having to give any reason. I cannot think of anything more irresponsible. However, the legislation permits that, and this amendment would have the effect of forcing the commissions to make a reasoned argument to justify what they are doing in a province. It may have a much more substantial effect in respect of the way in which redistribution takes place within a province than is now the case.

I feel the principle of having to explain the reason for a decision is a good one, not only in respect of redistribution but in respect of other spheres of activity. Therefore I am happy to support this bill. I am pleased that it will go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I would hope that when the bill goes to committee we would have an opportunity to focus attention on the principle in the redistribution bill concerning the distribution of seats within a province.

My last comment is to remind hon. members that this bill is no solution to the problem of distribution of seats within a province. It does not touch on that. I do not think it is right for members to raise expectations where there are no expectations possible. It is a very limited bill. I think it will have a very desirable effect. It is a desirable amendment, and I am delighted to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business is now deemed to have expired. Perhaps the House will agree that we go back to Committee of the Whole before the Chair calls it six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PETROLEUM ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING THE ADMINISTRATION OF INTERPROVINCIAL, EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND PETROLEUM PRODUCTS

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-32, to impose a charge on the export of crude oil and certain petroleum products, to provide compensation for certain petroleum costs and to regulate the price of Canadian crude oil and natural gas in interprovincial and export trade—Mr. Penner in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: When the Committee of the Whole rose at five o'clock it was considering clause 2 of Bill C-32, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had the floor.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I was responding to a number of points which had been put to me by the hon. member for Crowfoot who was with us at that time. I dealt with his query about oil pricing and said that of course the major international companies, such as Imperial Oil and Gulf, would like the price to go up to the international price as soon as possible, but that this government does not happen to agree with that and we think we have the means to protect the Canadian consumer.

The same is true with regard to natural gas. While we think that over a period of time it would be desirable to move to a commodity value relationship between oil and natural gas, we do not think that this should occur in one year. There have been some suggestions by members, such as the hon. member for Crowfoot, that this would be of exclusive benefit to central Canada, as though there was something wrong with that particular group of Canadians being protected in this way.

With regard to natural gas perhaps I can remind the House, and members from Saskatchewan and Manitoba in particular, that they too are the consumers of Alberta natural gas, indeed that a far greater percentage per capita of individual householders in those two provinces than of householders in Ontario and Quebec use natural gas. They as consumers would also be grievously affected if the price of gas were allowed to go to commodity value at this point.

It is for that reason that the government has proposed a formula for phasing up the price of gas, over a period of years, to commodity value in a way that would be fair to the producing provinces, but at the same time softening the impact on the individual consumer.

One of the questions which the hon. member raised was with regard to the financing of the Montreal pipeline. He said that the government should give an undertaking to the company in question which, as he pointed out, was a subsidiary of a number of major international oil companies, in order to make certain that the pipeline would be built.

The position which the government has been taking is that the public purse should not be exposed to any more expenditure for building this pipeline than absolutely necessary to make certain that it goes through. In other words, in certain circumstances we could indeed give some very expensive undertakings to the company. We think, however—and this has been the tenor of our negotiations—that we should achieve our objectives without exposing the taxpayer to a substantial potential expenditure in the future if the contingency about which the company is concerned should in fact take place.

The hon. member for Crowfoot raised a question about the number of amendments which I have distributed to other parties on behalf of the government, and which we intend to put to the House in due course. As I said when I introduced this stage of the proceedings yesterday, there have indeed been a number of amendments worked out by my advisers as a result of representations made following scrutiny of the bill by the general public. I make no apology for that. It seems to me that that is exactly what the three readings procedure of our House of Commons is about, that the bill should be given first reading and that members of the public who will be affected by it, who may be in special situations which may be adversely affected by the application of any clause of the bill, should have the opportunity to respond. The government should take account of this kind of response and, in due course, put forward amendments. That seems to me to be a reasonable and sensible course of action, far more sensible than saying, "We put the bill down, it is graven in stone and we will make no changes."

Finally the hon. member for Crowfoot asked what would be the formula for the pricing of petroleum after June 30, 1975. I think that probably the best answer is the answer that was given by the ten provincial premiers and the Prime Minister when they met a week or so ago in connection with inflation, that is, that the appropriate oil price after the end of the agreement which they negotiated on March 27 should be a matter of further discussion and negotiation in May, 1975.

I think that at that time there will obviously be some conflicting views coming in, on the one hand from the producing provinces saying, "Let us go to the highest possible international price right now so that we can get the full benefit," and on the other hand from the consumers, namely, British Columbia and the provinces to the east of Saskatchewan, saying "Come now, let us keep the price down so that we do not have to absorb this in a short period of time." This will be a matter of negotiation between the premiers of the different regions under the leadership of the Prime Minister.

The hon. member has been saying that we should conduct this kind of negotiation rather than adopt, by fiat, and in advance, the kind of formula which it is suggested will be followed. I think I have responded to the questions raised by the hon. gentleman and will be glad to clarify further, if I can.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, I have a further question to put to the minister and I should like something clarified. First, let me comment on something the minister suggested before supper. No member on this side of the House believes, so far as I know, that Canadians should suffer because of fluctuating oil prices, or because of high prices charged on the world markets for oil. We want to see stable oil prices and a mechanism in this country which will keep them stable. Further, we want to make sure that oil exploration in Canada is not discouraged.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Before supper the minister was somewhat political in his remarks. The trained seals behind him thumped their desks at the suggestion that the Liberal party stands for cheap oil for central and eastern Canada and the Conservative party for world oil prices for all Canadians. This House must meet any such suggestion head on. We must assure Canadians in all parts of Canada that we are all in favour of continued energy supplies, and that no Canadian will be asked to go short of energy today in return for some possible benefit in the future. The minister has suggested that there must be a trade-off between our needs of today and those of tomorrow. I do not think any Canadian has ever agreed to such a bargain. We suggest that the price should be high enough to encourage continued exploration in Canada.

The minister said that the $6.50 per barrel price will prevail until July 1, 1975, after which he, or the commission to be established under the bill, may renegotiate the price. That brings me to my point. Why are we dealing with this bill today? Why has it been given such high priority, in view of the imminence of the budget which is to be presented on November 18? The previous budget of May created great uncertainty in the oil and gas industry, as it proposed that royalties paid to provinces should not be considered as an expense. Yet here we are discussing a bill to do with energy, a bill which will confer certain powers on the commission to be set up, and we do not know what the next budget will propose.

The people in the oil and gas industry are uncertain. The minister has been in western Canada and talked to the people of Calgary who, I am sure, were not bashful in presenting their views. He knows the extent to which the coming budget will affect employment and exploration activities. The companies are waiting. They have made out their expenditure programs, but want to see what the budget will propose. The minister did not touch on that topic at all.

To show how ridiculous this debate is, let me quote from a transcript of an interview which the Prime Minister gave Ron Robert on November 13, 1974. Mr. Robert was discussing the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. I will not read the question, but the Prime Minister said this, in answer to whether the pipeline would be built:

> No, this is a policy which has been discussed in caucus. I don't think that the caucus has been divided on it, I mean in terms of regions. There are individuals of course who feel strongly against the Mackenzie pipeline, and those who feel very strongly in favour of it. You know the government's position on it.

Now comes the key phrase:

> It is one of waiting for the National Energy Board to state, well, the facts of the situation:—

The point is that we are being asked to pass this legislation tonight, but the Prime Minister said that the government policy is one of waiting for the National Energy Board to report. I continue quoting:

> —how much energy do we have, how much it will cost, and so on. It's only after that that the government will have to give precise answers as to timing and financing and so on, and at that point, caucus will be involved. They can give their opinions too when they've seen the National Energy Board report.

The Prime Minister wants his caucus to read the report from the National Energy Board, but he wants this House to pass this particular piece of legislation at this time. He does not want this House to exercise the judgment which his caucus will be asked to exercise. How foolish can one be. Before supper the minister suggested that the National Energy Board report to the government, that the report will not necessarily be made available to parliament, but that out of the graciousness of his good heart he will let the two producing provinces, Saskatchewan and Alberta, see it. At no time did he suggest that the report will ever be made public, not even after it has been printed in French and in English!

Actually he hinted it may never be made public. Such failure to disclose would be a sin against the Canadian voter. What did the Prime Minister say? He is the guiding light in this country and he knows how important is the report of the National Energy Board. He said that the government's position is "... one of waiting for the National Energy Board to state, well, the facts of the situation." Only then will the government give precise answers as to timing, financing and so on, and at that point caucus will be involved. According to the Prime Minister, "They can give their opinions, too, when they've seen the National Energy Board report."

Although I have not consulted my colleagues, I think I speak for them when I say that it would be proper for someone to rise and move the adjournment of this debate, and ask the House to deal with other legislation. Surely we are entitled to the same privileges extended to the Liberal caucus. Surely we should be asked for our opinion after we, too, have read the National Energy Board report. Asking us to pass this bill now is an insult to our intelligence and an insult to the intelligence of parliament, especially in view of what the Prime Minister said on November 13.

An hon. Member: But you are not asking a question.

Mr. Horner: That is exactly right. We are in committee of the whole and I can make another 20-minute speech if I like. I say to the minister, why does he not rise in his place and ask for adjournment of this debate. Let us deal with something else, until we have the facts. I think the minister said he would send this report to the provinces.

● (2020)

We should also have before this parliament the advice of the producing provinces. It is foolishness and irresponsibility on the part of the government to ask us to deal with the question before the fact. The press gallery, the fifth estate—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The fourth estate.

Mr. Horner: That is right. The fifth estate is the mafia. I am sorry I got them mixed up. The minister knows well of the fifth estate. It has a been a tradition within our democratic system that the fourth estate makes certain that government answers to the people.

If the official opposition were irresponsible and readily accepted the plausible, saleable position of the government in trying to put this bill forward, it would be a contradiction of what the Prime Minister does by insisting on knowing all the facts. How can constructive criticism be expected from the opposition until we have all the facts from the National Energy Board report?

Will that report be made public before the November 18 budget? I ask this question because of the very important position of the budget and also to satisfy the hon. member to the minister's right.

Mr. Béchard: Thank you very much.

Mr. Horner: Will the minister state that those facts will be given to the public before November 18 so that we will know the impact of the budget on the production capabilities of our industry for the betterment of all Canadians? That is the question.

All or most exploration companies, both Canadian and international, are waiting for the budget. The report of the National Energy Board should be in their hands and our hands before the budget comes down so that we can appraise the exact attitude of the government with regard to further exploration.

As I said before the dinner hour, this is the only country in the world that has turned down exploration for the past two years. Was it foolishness, extravagance or do we really have that much that we can turn off exploration? I think the National Energy Board report will make it abundantly clear that we were in fact foolish to turn off exploration. We have lost a time gap which was ours. We could have caught up and met our needs after 1983. Regardless of whether Petro Canada pours millions of dollars into the tar sands, we will still be in a deficit position until after 1983 when production from the tar sands should catch up with our demand. Also, we must uncover more resources than are now known in both the oil and gas fields.

Will the National Energy Board report be made public to members of this House and the industry, or will it be kept solely for the purpose of the Liberal Party? Will it be made public prior to the evening of November 18? I will give the minister an extra half day and only ask for it prior to that evening.

It is of vital importance to the industry and all Canadians to know where they are going. If the minister really wants to serve Canada, he will stand in his place and ask that this debate now cease. The House Leader can bring in other pieces of legislation. We could deal with some of the Senate bills that are before the House if the government wants to kill an extra hour and a half tonight.

Let us treat parliament with some degree of respect. The minister should show the same amount of respect that the Prime Minister is prepared to show the Liberal caucus.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think the basic theme of the hon. member's remarks were in his last few words when he talked about killing the remaining hour and a half this evening. There is an important point that should be made for the record. The Leader of the Opposition is making threats about continuing the debate. That is fine. I hope the record will note that.

I am sure the hon. member for Crowfoot would not want to mislead this House or the readers of Hansard in what he said. The National Energy Board report that Mr. Robert referred to in his question was not the report about which the hon. member questioned me yesterday. The report he was referring to was the one with regard to the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline which will be produced by that board after a full set of hearings for which application is now being made before the board.

I am sure the hon. member would not try to mislead the House by taking quotations out of context. With regard to the National Energy Board report on oil, I responded to the hon. member on this question as reported at page 1286 of yesterday's Hansard. I indicated it had been put in the hands of the provincial government. It has not yet been put in the hands of my colleagues, either of cabinet or caucus. It will, of course, be made public as soon as we are in a position, as I indicated before supper, to announce our intention with regard to the appropriate export level.

It is important to get the reaction of the government of Alberta on this. It will be of serious importance to the level of production in that province. I agree it would certainly be of assistance if we had it at this point, but unfortunately we do not. The government will wait with patience for the provinces. If in due course they are not prepared to respond, we will have to take our responsibility.

I am sure parliament will want to react to it. I hope members will react intelligently. What the government will do is make its decision as to the proper level of exports, taking into account whatever level of exports the province of Alberta may think appropriate. We will take our responsibility in this regard.

I look forward to any meaningful substantive response which the Leader of the Opposition or his colleagues may have in this regard. I will welcome it. When it gets down to the substance of dealing with this energy question, I think I can say that the Leader of the Opposition has been almost the least informative man in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, this is my first opportunity to speak in this debate. I would say that the minister's true colours are now coming out. As far as the oil and gas business are concerned, prior to September, 1973, I thought that all he knew was that gasoline came out of a pump and oil was brought to your home by a truck. I thought that was all he knew about production and the background of the industry.

On Labour Day 1973, this government imposed the export tax. That was the beginning of the intervention by this government. If there ever has been an industry in this country that has suffered from ham-handed amateurs not only tinkering but slamming with sledgehammers, it is the oil industry.

Hon. members think the oil industry is something that exists way out somewhere. They do not bother with it. I say to hon. members that businesses in their constituencies later this year and next year will have cancelled orders for unfilled sales because the supply firms that deal with the oil industry have to cut back.

We must look at the number of drill rigs that have left. We must look at the capital that has been committed elsewhere by the oil companies. Over 60 per cent of the wells drilled in this country are drilled by independents, but because of the action of the government, the tax proposals of last May and the attempted long range control of the industry, Canadian companies are unable to raise capital and have been forced to cease operations with the result that Canadians are being laid off. If the government only knew the damage it was causing to Canadian industry! But that is beyond its ken.

● (2030)

We know there was a meeting in January, but that was a preliminary meeting. Neither the government of Canada nor the premiers of the provinces knew much about what they were discussing at that time. We hear talk about an agreement in March. There was no agreement—no voluntary agreement. The premiers of the producing provinces were told they could either accept the price or it would be legislated. Yet we hear this talk about sweet agreement being reached in March. Nothing doing!

Part of this bill represents the working out of a one-price policy. If the government wants to take credit as far as the levelling off of prices in Canada for domestic consumers is concerned, let me point out that this suggestion came first from my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition. If that be the objective, it can be done out of the revenues of the government itself. It is not good enough to say that prices are to be levelled off on the back of the industry which is not getting the export tax.

I have not heard that the Province of Quebec is not allowed to sell its lumber at world prices. On the contrary, it is allowed to sell any product it chooses at the world price. British Columbia is able to sell its lumber at world prices. The people of Saskatchewan and Alberta pay world prices for farm machinery and also for automobiles and trucks. I say this is a policy which is politically motivated. The extensions which follow from this policy, as far as natural gas and the tar sands are concerned, are on the basis that the government wants to lay a heavy hand on the natural resources of the province in order to control those natural resources. It feels it can get away with it. But it would not dare to try it in the case of the Province of Ontario.

[Translation]

That would be unthinkable for the province of Quebec, but since Alberta and Saskatchewan are the ones involved, they will be saddled with that.

[English]

As a result of these proposals and the budget proposals combined, every province is threatened and a precedent is established for the federal government to move in on the natural resources of any and all of the provinces.

Mr. Béchard: For the good of all of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All of Canada! This is only happening because the oil and gas of Alberta are bringing $5.20 less to the operators. I do not hear of operators in other provinces being faced with an export tax. Will there be an export tax on the electric energy of Quebec or of Newfoundland when it is exported? I say there is a political motivation. We hear about an agreement in March. Well, it did not touch natural gas. That is a new intervention. Consider the tar sands. What business has the government with the tar sands or their development? But ministers are putting their hands on it now. They want to get in, even though they do not have the knowledge.

It would be very interesting, I am sure, if I were to stand here in my place and suggest that the government of Canada devise a system to deal with the interprovincial distribution of electrical energy in this country, and then set the price. I can hear the screams from across the way. "Keep your hands off", they would say. What about the iron ore of Ontario? We need it in Alberta. Are we not entitled to have it at a lower price? I am amazed at the hypocrisy of some of the people who defend this policy.

Again, we heard references today to the mythical pipe line the government was going to get built in six months, or thereabouts—a period which has now, it seems, been deferred indefinitely. It is supposed to be a two-way system. There are claims that Quebec wants it to be a two-way proposition, and so does Premier Regan of Nova Scotia if he can get an extension built that far. Why? So that should offshore oil get cheaper they will be able to funnel oil back through the pipe line. And then, bye-bye to the oil producers in Alberta—"Too bad, chaps, but your oil has become too expensive, so you can keep it; we can get it from abroad more cheaply." This won't wash. We sometimes hear about separatism in Quebec which is on a cultural basis. I want to say to the government in all seriousness, keep this up and you will hear a lot more about separatism in western Canada, and it will be on economic grounds.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): These great western experts who come from eastern Canada have never been out there. Let me assure them that this can be one of the totally unwanted but natural consequences of this type of action, which is directed at one, possibly two provinces. When we talk about the tar sands we are talking about one province.

● (2040)

Mr. Béchard: This bill is designed to help Canadians.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member says it is designed to help Canadians. Let the government follow through on the suggestion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain regarding an electricity grid. Let us see whether the government will accept that.

Mr. Béchard: In the same circumstances, yes.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My colleague from Crowfoot dealt with the question of the pipe line and a guarantee of supply of throughput. I suggest that it is not quite as simple as the minister indicated. One of the uncertainties that exist relates to a point that the hon. member for Crowfoot and I have been making concerning the actions of the government since September, 1973, and its export tax, as well as the budget. The uncertainty that has been created has driven the industry into a marked decline. We saw the same sort of thing happen once before, though the situation was not nearly so bad. This was in connection with the government white paper on taxation. That was bad enough. The tax bill that followed was not nearly so bad, but it did unsettle the industry no end.

If hon. members think that the petroleum industry is financed from Friday night to the following Monday morning, then they have another think coming. Funds have to be committed 18 months to two years ahead of time. Drilling programs and exploration programs have to be worked out over an equally long period of time. But all this can be knocked down overnight, and this is what is happening now. That is why there was such a violent reaction on the part of the people of Alberta and from us as representatives from that province to the government's program, which singles out one particular industry in one particular region of the country for particularly discriminatory treatment.

I will have more to say about the bill when we get further into it. I shall have something to say later about the idiocy of the thinking that one Crown can bind the other as to licences, offences, penalties and other consequences that flow from the bill, as a result of the wide statement made in clause 3.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make just a few general comments on Bill C-32, which is to become the national petroleum administration act. At the outset let me say that I am a strong nationalist and that the welfare of all Canadians must be our first concern. I believe that we as Albertans, because of our past actions, have shown this to be the case. But what disturbs me is that the federal government now wishes to fleece the western region of our country. This bill will seriously undercut Alberta's constitutional authority. I say this not only as a concerned Albertan but as a concerned Canadian. If the federal government is allowed to invade provincial authority in this area, what is going to stop it from invading provincial authority in other areas? Other provinces have other resources that may well be on the chopping block of this federal administration.

Throughout history natural resources have been a lot more than mere financial problems of provincial and federal governments. It now appears that the federal government wants all the gravy. For 50 years the west lived or died on its agricultural base. Now the oil fields and gas fields have changed that considerably. A great many of the benefits that have emerged in the west over recent years are the result of our natural resource development, and the same is true for the future. It is not only a matter of money, but the principle of Ottawa's interfering where it ought not to be interfering. Ottawa is intruding simply because it wishes to have part of the bonanza, only because it wishes to have part of this wealth.

Ottawa's interference is going to stagnate our oil development. Rising world prices should be serving to stimulate the exploration of oil development, but this will not happen with the system that the federal government plans to impose. This government has responded with great enthusiasm, hiring more people to survey, to collect data, and to search for reasons as to why it should be involved in this area. As far as I am concerned, the government has created more problems that it has cured. The more government becomes involved, the more it is going to cost us. If it takes 20 per cent of the wage earner's money now, it will take 30 to 50 per cent after the government has taken control.

It is hard for me to understand why so many people want more government involvement. In Manitoba there is a government that wishes to control everything, yet one of its own corporations, Manitoba Hydro, is contracting out more of its work to private individuals because it gets no efficiency out of its own departments.

The federal government is putting artificial props in certain places and plugging certain holes at different times, and the result is total confusion. Now is the time to stop this confusion and to formulate policies so that one area is not discriminated against in the way that this bill provides. We, as elected representatives, have a responsibility to guard against these interferences, and now is the time for us to act. Bill C-32 is an intrusion on provincial authority, and for that reason I do not believe it is worthy of our support.

● (2050)

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Chairman, this debate now going on on Bill C-32 is rather important, I would say very important, since it concerns federal-provincial relations on energy development and use.

The development as well as the use of energy have until now been matters of provincial jurisdiction and reasonably accepted as such.

However, because there have been for a couple of years restrictions or an alleged shortage of energy, the federal government took the initiative in poking its nose in provincial matters. It has not been doing so for only two years!

I remember very well, as do my colleagues who then sat in the House, the ferocious battle the government of British Columbia had to fight against the federal government with regard to the agreements British Columbia and the United States had concluded about the Columbia River Treaty.

Ottawa thrust its nose into that to embarrass the provincial government and, in the end, the provincial authorities were fairly victorious. No Canadian province wants the federal government to interfere in its affairs. Be it Alberta, British Columbia, Quebec, the Maritimes, each one cherishes its autonomy and refuses to be dictated to by Ottawa.

This, Mr. Chairman, does not prevent meetings between Canadian provinces and the federal government, in the mutual respect of the two levels of government, but with constant consideration for the provincial rights so that they may not be infringed upon and so that the provinces may take their own decisions. I think that there is no Canadian in Alberta who would want the Maritimes to suffer and that there is none in the Maritimes who would wish such a fate for the western provinces. This is my conviction. That there should be elements protesting against one another, elements from the west against those from the east or from the east against the west, this is obviously inevitable. These people hinder not only the development of our natural resources, but the spirit of Canadian unity because they are taking completely foolish positions.

Recently, I had occasion to meet, in Toronto, on Pierre Berton's program, Mr. Harridence, a separatist lawyer from Alberta. He lives in Calgary. I believe he was at one time either leader of the Conservative party in Alberta or a candidate to the leadership of that party. He is the fellow who said, out west, during the pseudo energy crisis: "Let those eastern bastards freeze in the dark." A separatist—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In French, please!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): "Laissez ces bâtards de l'Est geler à la noirceur!"

That reflected the same spirit that animates some people we hear in the east who say: "If things are not going well in Canada, it is because the west spends its time begging for help. The west gets more than the east." Some even make of it a French versus the English problem.

In the meantime, all hell breaks loose; hardly any problems are solved and the federal government, instead of putting out the fires, instead of setting up a consultation system, throws oil on the fire, compounding the problem. So, this is where we are now, Mr. Chairman, and I think the federal government should play a leading part and assume its own responsibilities, not by restricting provincial rights but by gathering the provinces at a round table and having them agree to let all Canadians benefit from our natural resources. Then, Mr. Chairman, I think Canadians would be satisfied.

Anyone today can say: We have oil out west, so who cares about the others. But who can tell that in five or ten years oil will still be in as great demand as it is today? Will nuclear energy not be used for pacific purposes, or will it not replace oil just as oil supplanted coal? The federal government then has to interfere with coal mining activities, not only in the maritime provinces, but also in the western provinces, to help them develop those natural resources. But that is no reason why the federal government should say: Those riches belong to us because no province wants to share what it has got.

In Quebec, the magic word is hydroelectric power, and that is natural, we have more than enough—and then some. Same thing as regards forests. Sometimes, a province may own riches required by the whole population, then later it has to turn to another province to get another commodity. So why should we say: We are going to tax Alberta because its products are selling so well at the moment. Its products are in such demand that we are going to tax it to punish it for having too many natural resources. And the same attitude would apply to Quebec and Ontario. Why should we say that?

In the mining field for instance, some mining companies are now urging the federal government to let them go ahead with the development of new mines. That is as far as it goes because the government would immediately be told: you take from us our gains, our profits. So, the companies are not interested in working for the benefit of the government.

Same situation in Alberta, where nobody is interested in working for the benefit of the government. Saskatchewan owns other natural resources, potash for example. Is Saskatchewan willing to have its policy dictated by the federal government? No.

The federal government's role is to maintain balance and harmony among all the provinces, and the only way to do so is to respect the authority and autonomy of every one of them. I believe the federal government should act as a conciliator, but also as the agent which will examine the possibilities for Canadians to benefit from the development of those natural resources on the international markets.

Mr. Chairman, there is not one provincial premier in Canada who wants to kneel before the federal government to get the permission to exploit the resources of his province. The former premier of Saskatchewan—he is sitting on my right—did not want Ottawa to dictate what he was to do. He had to take his responsibilities, he wanted to take them. The same thing is valid today for the other provincial premiers.

I, for one, say that Ottawa should not penalize a province because it has natural resources, but it should help that province get the maximum out of its natural resources and always keep in mind first, the fulfillment of the needs of the Canadian people, and then consider exports, if we have something left to trade with others. Exports should not be taxed in one province to punish it because it is exporting oil to the United States, for example. Quebec should not be penalized for exporting electricity to Ontario or to the United States; that would be absolutely ridiculous.

Bill C-32 would allow us to tax provinces with production surpluses or natural resources. Mr. Chairman, that bill will not last ten years before some government, whoever they might be, will regret it and will probably have to, if not cancel it, at least amend it to allow the provinces to get on with their own business and be shown the respect they deserve.

[English]

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, this debate has been good in that it has drawn attention to certain factors that have been overlooked. The main question is whether the government's stand on the price of oil will assure us of a supply in the next four, five or 10 years. Canada has an abundance of energy resource for the foreseeable future, but it will be expensive, and we are now being warned by industry that we could well have a shortage in the early 1980's. Even taking into allowance industrial over-statement, I think we might well have a shortage of conventional crude in the 1980's and become more dependent on foreign supplies.

I think we face this possible future shortage because of the rigidity in setting the price at $6.50 without encouraging development. We are assuming that because $6.50 is high, companies will still continue to search for oil, when in fact oil companies feel they might as well cease exploration and take whatever they can get now, then when the oil runs out they will not have lost anything. I think we are making a grave mistake because we are now at the stage the United States oil industry found itself in the early 1950's. At that time the price of oil and gas was such that it encouraged wasteful use rather than conservation. That wasteful use is now taking place here, and I cite, for example, the use of natural gas to fire some of Ontario Hydro's generating plants.

I do not think that this pricing mechanism of the government will encourage the supply of oil and gas. Coupled with this price the government has set of $6.50, and no indication of what will be done to encourage production and exploration, we have had the budget of last spring which was termed a disaster so far as the oil industry was concerned. Certainly until the twin problem of setting a proper price for oil and the mechanism for doing it is devised—until we know what the government intends to do so far as this is concerned—we really will not have any meaningful discussion of the problem.

Obviously the oil industry can only continue exploration if it is allowed a fair return on its investment. It is stated that the cash flow in respect of new oil would be $1.66 in Alberta on the basis of the May budget proposals, whereas in the United States for new oil the cash flow would be about $5.06 after allowing royalties of 12.5 per cent and a corporate tax of 48 per cent. Exploration is more attractive in the United States.

Apparently some 40 companies have opened offices in Denver, Colorado, and 10 per cent of Canadian drilling rigs are down there. Until we at least reach a normal level of exploration it would seem that we face considerable difficulty. It has been forecast that out of 250 drilling rigs which have been available in Alberta and British Columbia only 110 will be available in these two provinces by next January. This means that we are losing these rigs—the minister has not denied this—and are also losing experienced personnel. This is an indication that in Canada we cannot isolate ourselves from the United States or world markets.

What is the problem in respect of the $6.50 per barrel price? The system is rigid. There is no premium for new oil. There is no differential between old oil, adolescent oil or new oil, and with the present tax situation the industry does now know where it is headed.

As I have said, I suggest there is too much rigidity in respect of the pricing of oil by the government. I would hope that by his attitude the minister would show that he hopes to have some sort of a differential for new oil flows. There must be a standard method of encouraging production. If this were the situation the bill might be seen in a better light. But certainly the pricing of oil as set forth in this bill would indicate that the exploration and production of oil are secondary to holding down the price. While this might be advantageous to all of us, because we like to have low priced oil, it will not do us much good if the result should be a shortage in four or five years.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the minister rather than make any general remarks I should like to address a few short questions to him. First I should like to ask the minister whether he considers this price control regime to be permanent?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, one cannot, given the uncertainties of the international market, be certain of that, but I think it is very likely, as I said earlier in the debate, that the OPEC countries will continue to the extent they can to enforce their prices on the consuming countries.

From the standpoint that if it is to be a government which controls the price of oil in Canada, it is the feeling of the government that it should be the Government of Canada rather than the governments of the oil-producing countries. This will depend very much, I believe, on where the international price goes. I think if we have learned anything from the events of the last year it is that there has been a series of highly mercurial developments. One thing I think that is clear is that the impetus within OPEC will be to keep the price up, and to that extent, and to the extent we have this power in Canada, I think we should try to cushion the impact of high international prices against Canadians.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): I still have not received an answer to my question. I doubt that there is any point in repeating it because I probably will not receive an answer. Numerous remarks have been made by a number of members during this debate, and of course, there have been remarks made in committee, as well as numerous comments in the press to the effect that there has been a decrease of oil exploration and development in Canada, and that in fact Canada is the only petrolific area in which there has been a decrease in exploration and development in the last year and a half.

Having an awareness of this situation does the minister feel that the situation has reached a point of some concern? In other words does he, as the minister presumably responsible for healthy industries, feel the current situation in absolute terms and in terms of the trends that are developing is a matter of some concern which requires some different action?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I think we naturally would have preferred that some of their energies had been deployed in Canada, rather than moving down to Montana and Wyoming, for example. We recognize, on the other hand, the appeal of those rather more attractive geological deposits over those in the western Canada sedimentary base. Very naturally, if there should be any substantial drop in exploration, particularly in the more productive areas of Canada—and I am talking about the north and the offshore—this would be a matter of great concern.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): This is the second question to which I have not received an answer. Let me try again, because this is a matter of just more than minor importance. The fact of the matter is there has been a considerable loss of personnel and equipment to other areas, not just to the United States. I have in mind the North Sea, Indonesia and other parts of the world. The fact remains that surely it must be of concern to the government, and to this minister, that we are the only petrolific area in the world that has had a decrease in exploration and development in the last year and a half. Surely that fact must be of concern.

I suggest to the minister that there must be some encouragement, some indication that he appreciates the problem, and will not in fact allow a deterioration of drastic proportions in the oil and gas industry. If there were such encouragement it would certainly help. Perhaps it would not cure the situation, because we need some positive action. However, we should at least have some indication that he is aware of what has happened and that his government feels it has some responsibility in this regard.

Again I ask the minister: what contingency plan does he anticipate to restore the necessary exploration and development activities so that we will remain a self-sufficient nation in respect of the hydrocarbon energies?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I can only say that I have responded numbers of times to the hon. member for Calgary Centre on these various points but he keeps on putting the same questions. I do not expect ever to satisfy him with these particular responses. He knows, or should know that, for example, oil exploration ebbs and flows, the primary determinant is the geological potential at any particular time. Of course, the North Sea being a particularly hot area at this point and Indonesia being another one, this capital in a highly mobile industry will migrate to those areas. On the other hand the position that the government has taken—and I think it is a little difficult to understand where the official opposition stands on this—is that we should not increase the oil price.

Certainly one can attract a lot of money by increasing the price to international levels, but would it be in the general interest of Canadians to do so? We do not think it would be, Mr. Chairman. We think it would be desirable to have an appropriate division of revenue so that industry gets its share, and this is something which my colleague will be dealing with in the budget. However with regard to the rather apocalyptic terms in which the hon. member likes to describe that industry, I suppose he has to do a little puffing for his clientele, for his constituents in Calgary. We do not happen to see it in the same apocalyptic terms that he does.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Chairman, I suppose I could say that the minister does not see it in the same terms as I see it because it is not his constituents and friends who are moving. But, for goodness sake, he is the minister responsible for the energy industries in Canada and I do not know why he cannot take a lesson from his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, who makes no bones about being concerned about the health of the industry for which he is responsible.

I realize that there are more political points to be gained by taking pot shots at Gulf, Imperial Oil and so on. Perhaps he could leave that sort of activity to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, because that is more in line with that minister's responsibilities. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is supposed to be concerned about the long term health of the industry which employs many thousands of Canadians. Perhaps they do not live in his constituency, but they live in Canada and they are concerned about their future. People who live in his constituency have to heat their homes, and unless this trend is arrested we will be short of hydrocarbon and we will become a net importer. It is tragic that we should get ourselves in that position when it is so unnecessary.

The minister has stated deliberately that it is the view of our party that the price of crude oil should go up to the international prices now. He knows full well that this is not the policy of our party and that it has never been that. In fact our party was the first party to recognize that there should be a uniform price for crude oil across Canada, and that it should be less than the international price.

With regard to a just share of the income, let me remind the minister how we arrived at what is a just share of the petrodollar. A couple of weeks after the freeze was applied on September 4, 1973, the export tax had to be invented because of the National Energy Board Act, and 100 per cent of that export tax was to go to the producing provinces. That was a commitment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No.

Mr. Andre (Calgary Centre): Then that commitment was changed to 50-50. But indirectly, 100 per cent was to be spent in the producing areas. That was the first promise. The second one was that the producing provinces would get 50 per cent of the export tax. Then the government said: no, we will use the export tax to subsidize eastern consumers. I will not go over the whole history. Suffice it to say that the March 27 agreement was the basis for it, and indeed the minister, in speaking on the predecessor of this bill in the last parliament, stated that one of the major reasons for the price of crude oil being increased from $4 to $6.50 was to provide the industry with the extra money which it would require to justify its exploration and development.

At that stage I thought, aha, at last the minister recognizes that there must be some incentive or else people will not explore and develop. Exactly one month to the day later, his colleague, the Minister of Finance, came in with a budget which confiscated that extra revenue.

If the minister will state frankly and make a personal commitment right here and now that he, as the minister responsible for the energy industries in Canada, will give his word that he will ensure that this industry is allowed to retain a sufficient proportion of the petroleum dollar to allow it to proceed with the type of exploration and development we, as a nation, need to remain self-sufficient, that would go a long way. If he makes that commitment and later, in the back halls or wherever decisions are made, he is forced again to swallow his words, or his colleague, the Minister of Finance takes action that would make this minister's words meaningless, perhaps he will have the honour, displayed in the past, to submit his resignation.

There was a time when I was taught in school that it was part of the British democratic system that when a minister gave his word, you could depend on it because, if he could not keep it, honour dictated that he resign. Little did I know. I will have to find that teacher and tell him that he has not met Donald Macdonald.

There is one point that I would like to make regarding gas price controls, a subject which has not been discussed to any great degree. The minister indicated that he feels it will be necessary to control gas prices up to commodity value. I hope that everybody heard him say "up to commodity value" because, based on past experience, we can expect some pronouncements in the not too distant future regarding the meaning of commodity value, a meaning which might be totally remote from any realistic meaning. Although it may not do any good, let me remind the minister that that would be another broken commitment.

I think it is worth mentioning that the price of natural gas in Canada has never been at commodity level. It has always been underpriced. Tragically this has resulted in waste, and this is probably the best view fit. In terms of its potential for producing fertilizers, chemicals and other higher value added commodities, it is a tragedy to be wasting this fuel in generating electricity and in other ways.

It is certainly high time that we brought this valuable fuel up to commodity value so that this wastage can cease. I think it bears mentioning—although that probably will not have any influence on the government—that the only thing that is preventing natural gas from seeking its fair value, its commodity value on the market, is the fact that we have a monopoly purchasing situation. You can remove that monopoly, that bottleneck, from the entire market if you require TransCanada Pipe Lines to be a common carrier. If you take that simple action the market place will establish the true and fair level of gas prices. We do not need a hired bunch of experts. We do not need big brother interfering in industry and other aspects of life. What we need is that simple action.

I am sure the minister is aware of my ideas, and I am sure they run counter to his philosophy. Only occasionally does he feel it necessary to genuflect to the principle of free enterprise. The rest of the time he seems bent on doing what he can to destroy free enterprise in the oil and gas industries.

Before sitting down, let me echo something the hon. member for Crowfoot said. I am truly saddened to see that the minister responsible for our security of energy supplies has brought forward this bill which, according to its stated purposes, is designed to protect the consumer from the vagaries of supply. Yet the minister shows no apparent concern about decreasing exploration and development activity in Canada. Without such activity this country will become a net importer of energy in a few years. Instead of being concerned about this, the minister seems bent on winning the battle with the provincial governments. I say that a minister with priorities so distorted should seek another portfolio.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I want to spend a few minutes discussing this bill calmly and quietly, in the way the minister does. It seems to me that several important questions of principle are involved in the bill we are discussing. One, of course, is the constitutional question, the question of the relationships between the federal government and the provinces in the control and development of our natural resources.

The least that can be said is that we are witnessing a two-pronged power play on the part of the federal government which is seeking to take effective control of the commerce in the natural resources of this country. If that is what the Canadian people want, fine. I do not intend to be inflammatory, but am amazed that members from Quebec can sit back and watch what is going on, because it seems to me that this process is fundamentally opposed to everything I ever thought the government of Quebec and the people of Quebec believed in, Mr. Chairman. I think they still believe in those things. As I say, we are witnessing, in this bill, one prong of that attack. The other prong was the budget of last May. Presumably we shall see it again in the budget which will be brought down on Monday night. We shall see the government using its fiscal power to supplement the efforts the minister has made under this bill.

What is happening should be clearly understood by the House and by the people of the country. If this is what they want to happen, fine. I happen to feel strongly that this is not how it was contemplated the country would be governed. Here we are seeing confrontation, a federal government policy which attempts to overwhelm and beat down the provinces instead of working things out through consultation. The government deserved a fair amount of commendation last spring for working out a price agreement. I favoured the agreement for one price across the country; I still do. I advocated it.

An hon. Member: Conservatives were in favour of price controls.

Mr. Stanfield: Here we are dealing with a question of principle, and that question is not at issue in connection with this bill. I thought the government was entitled to commendation for negotiating that agreement. I thought the provinces concerned were, too. I must say that I feel the government of Canada ought to have been charged with bad faith immediately after that negotiation because it changed very substantially the ground rules governing the fiscal aspects. I do not think it is going too far to say that the government of Canada behaved dishonestly toward the petroleum producing provinces. The government negotiated the agreement on certain terms, but very shortly afterwards changed the rules.

What we are now witnessing is a very powerful, very determined attempt by the government of Canada to take full control of natural resource development in the country. This is to be done through this bill, which is to be supplemented and complemented by the government's fiscal thrust, as witnessed in the budget of last May, and as we shall presumably see renewed.

The concept of relations with the provinces, the concept of the country, the concept of our constitution and the concept of our confederation—all this is being substantially challenged. We should recognize what is taking place, what is being proposed and what the government is attempting to accomplish.

Second, I am greatly concerned about future supplies of energy in this country. I will not talk in terms of corporate profits or corporate returns, although one could. I do not say that is an invalid approach. I am not suggesting that. Rather, I want to concentrate on the issue of future supplies of gas and petroleum, and of energy in general. When this subject is raised with the minister he usually resorts—I think this is the fair way to put it—to demagoguery.

An hon. Member: That is putting it kindly.

Mr. Stanfield: I intend to discuss this question in calm terms. When he is asked questions on this topic he says, "The consumer should come first." Although he said in the committee, tonight, that he felt he would never satisfy the hon. member for Calgary Centre on this issue, he has not given us any answers. Although we are discussing this bill, I do not think he has faced the fact that one cannot help but notice, no matter from what part of Canada one comes, the decline in the rate of exploration in many parts of the country, including the western provinces. I cannot help but be concerned about what this means for the consumers of the future. Yet the minister seems to think that this is not really important. That is the impression I got.

We do not have the findings of the National Energy Board about inventory. The minister does not seem to think it important for us to have this information. I hope he will understand that those of us who are concerned about what is going on, who are concerned about our future energy supplies, are most concerned about what the NEB report may show. We are very uneasy about being compelled to consider this bill in the absence of that information.

● (2130)

Can the minister reassure us by pointing out there is no need for us to be concerned about future supplies of energy in this country, and not simply saying it goes up and down, or that the North Sea is attractive now so people are moving out of Canada? He must know that is only one factor in what is happening. It is only one factor in the decline of exploration in Canada.

The minister must be aware that there is tremendous inequity in the industry. It is not entirely due to his administration and the attitude of the government toward the energy problems of this country. However, it is substantially due to concern about the attitude of the government and of this minister in particular.

When asked a question, the minister does not deal with it. He skirts all around it. He resorts to demagoguery. He will attack me, as he always does, and say I am not very forthcoming. He can do that if he likes, but that is still not answering the question.

The minister is not facing up to the need in this country for the development of future energy supplies. If he wants to say that uncertainty in the industry about his intentions is not important because his government is going to resort to reliance upon governmental activity, PetroCan, we will know where he stands. We will know how to judge him. However, I plead with the minister not to treat us as having so little intelligence as to be satisfied with the kind of answer, "Well, it is the consumer who comes first." Naturally, the consumer comes first in the sense that consumers are Canadians, but it is not just the consumers of 1974 and 1975 who are of concern. We have responsibility to the consumers of 1980 and 1985.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister may have perfectly satisfactory answers. He may be able to reassure me and others in the House on this question. However, I think it is fair to say he has not done so yet.

There is a great question of principle involved in this bill as to whether this is the direction we want this country to go, with this government developing this two-pronged massive assault on provincial control and development of natural resources. Canadians should realize what is happening.

The minister should be prepared to recognize that our concern about future supplies of energy in this country are genuine and justified in light of what we see happening. It is our belief that much of what has been happening is due to the attitude this minister and his government have been taking. We are concerned that the passage of this bill will intensify the deterioration in our energy outlook. I ask the minister to believe that that is genuine concern. I should not have to emphasize that. It is obvious. What is going on now is alarming. It is alarming to anyone who is prepared to look ahead 10 years or so.

Will the minister honestly face up to these questions in this committee and, if he can, give us that assurance? Otherwise it will be very difficult for us to support this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, to pin down the Leader of the Opposition on his intervention, I think the significant point is that we are now getting to where it will be difficult for his party to support the bill. It is not unfair to go through the essentials of this bill and see to what extent the remarks he just made bear relevance to the proposition put forward in the bill.

An hon. Member: Evading again.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, debating again. This is debate.

An hon. Member: You have had wax in your ears for a couple of years. It is evasion.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the loud mouthed member for Rocky Mountain wants to shout, that is fine. I listened to his leader. I think his leader might be a fair man and might be prepared to hear what I have to say.

Mr. Stanfield: I am happy to listen.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Taking the Leader of the Opposition's analysis apart, the critical question was: how are the measures put forward here going to prejudice the future supplies of energy to Canadians? What is more, are there measures in this bill which, if taken out, would satisfy the opposition in terms of ensuring future energy supplies for Canadians? I suggest that if anybody has been evading this, it is the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): While the bill has some complex legal terminology, it is relatively simple. It is divided into a number of parts. The bill provides for compensation for eastern Canada in relation to oil imports that may be brought into that part of the country so as to keep the price down to the current Canadian price level, which is related to the gathering price of oil at $6.70. Would taking that part of the bill out make it any more certain there would be oil supplies for Canadians? I suggest it would not. The Leader of the Opposition chose to refer to it as demagoguery, but it is a fact that Canadians in the eastern part of the country would have to pay more for offshore oil. We would be no more certain of having oil in this country by paying $11 a barrel to foreign producers than by paying $6.70 now.

Look at the part with regard to how the fund is paid for, the provision with regard to collection of the export charge. Would Canadians be better off if that export charge were not used in that way? Would they be better off paying through the general taxation system for that cushion in the eastern part of the country? I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition they would not.

Dealing with the setting of the domestic price for oil, we will want to look hard at the remark by the Leader of the Opposition and compare it with some of the other remarks made by hon. members on that side. The Leader of the Opposition said he accepts maintaining the lower price, but does maintaining the lower price for Canada—

Mr. Stanfield: I said the one price and the lower price.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The Leader of the Opposition says the one price and the lower price. All right. The part of this bill with regard to a one price and lower price which the Leader of the Opposition says he accepts—does that make it any less certain there will be oil supplies for the future?

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister asking me a question? What makes the future uncertain is the fact that the federal government is taking unto itself authority to set the price without reference to anybody else, without any reference to or negotiation with the provinces.

● (2140)

Mr. Blais: That is not so.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): All I can say to the Leader of the Opposition is that though he has made an interesting statement up to this point, he has clearly not read the bill. The first part of the bill, to which I have referred, contains substantial provision for just that kind of agreement and negotiation. The Leader of the Opposition argues that prices should be set by negotiation. But what if negotiation fails and a producing province insists on going to world prices? Is a single province, then, to exercise a veto over the Canadian market?

An. hon. Member: Right!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): An hon. member from Alberta at the back says "right!" That is really the essence of the matter. There is to be this veto power. That is the essence of the difference between members of the Official Opposition and ourselves.

We hold that if responsibility is to be taken for the development of a national market it should ultimately be taken by the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suggest the same applies with respect to natural gas, so if there is failure to arrive at an agreement, provision is needed for the final decision to be made by the national government with regard to the pricing of gas.

I have gone over all the major parts of the bill. I have demonstrated that none of them would make any difference to the prospects for the future supply of oil in Canada.

Mr. Horner: You have never demonstrated that.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There may be arguments which the hon. gentleman would like to put forward in the course of a budget debate. There have been indications this afternoon that hon. members opposite may be waiting for the budget debate. Well, that is fair, I think, from their standpoint. But I say the provisions we have made in this bill to establish an appropriate price for oil and gas in all parts of Canada are provisions which the government feels should be enacted on behalf of Canadians generally, and having heard the hon. gentleman's statement we are more than ever left in doubt as to whether or not he has really taken any position at all with regard to the kind of oil policy which should be followed in this country.

Mr. Stanfield: I intend to be brief, Mr. Chairman, because I do not think it is very profitable to discuss this matter with the minister. One does not get anywhere.

Mr. Cullen: Not when you are wrong.

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. gentlemen opposite can view this as just a lot of political hoo-ha if they like, but there are some basic questions involved here. The minister has made it very clear which way he is going—he did not need to tell me because I know it. He is taking the position that this is ultimately the responsibility of the federal government. He confirms what I have said on a number of occasions. He puts it in terms of "taking the final responsibility". I put it in terms of taking full control over the resources of the country.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is a gross exaggeration.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister says that is a gross exaggeration. I do not believe it is, Mr. Chairman. In terms of present policy I say it has not yet been demonstrated that there is a need in this country to resort to the dominating centralist position which this measure proposes. The government has succeeded in reaching an agreement with the provinces in connection with price and, as far as I know, there is no reason to believe it cannot do so in the future I might say, though, that it will be more difficult next time because the provinces feel they were cheated subsequently by the government.

An hon. Member: Which provinces?

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Mr. Stanfield: The producing provinces, because of the change in the ground rules affecting tax. The minister completely ignored my concern about future energy supplies. He tried to pretend that the bill has nothing to do with future supplies of energy or the difficulty the country is now experiencing in moving forward in this area. He evaded that whole issue. One important factor in determining the outlook for energy will be the dominant position in which the bill before us purports to place the federal government.

The minister expressed no concern about future energy supplies. He did not respond to my invitation to tell us what he thinks will happen to arrest the deterioration in present prospects. If he wants to content himself by repeating that I have nothing to contribute, that's O.K. But that is not the point, in any event—although if I wanted to take the time of the committee I could probably show that I have contributed far more in the way of constructive energy policy as Leader of the Opposition than he has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What modesty!

Mr. Stanfield: That is not the point. The point, as it relates to the bill before us, is not what I might be putting forward. The point is, what the minister is putting forward. I resume my seat saying, simply, that we are seeing in this bill something I had never thought I would see Quebec members quietly accept, that is, the spectacle of the central government assuming a completely dominant position with regard to natural resource development in Canada through the control of prices, and, second, a Minister of Energy who totally ignores genuine concern about deterioration in the energy outlook in the country and who refuses, apparently, to give us any indication as to how the energy outlook is likely to be improved.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The remarks of the Leader of the Opposition were hardly a demonstration of humility on his part. Probably what he had to say can be taken as seriously as that. We are dealing with a bill to meet the energy crisis in Canada. Let me make the point very briefly which I made previously in the course of debate on the bill. The Leader of the Opposition has asserted that the bill will make supplies of energy less available in Canada. I have pointed out seriatim, part by part, how there is absolutely no foundation for that suggestion.

● (2150)

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting in this House now for a few hours listening to this debate. I am going to make a few brief remarks and then ask a simple question, to which, I frankly doubt, I will get a simple answer. As my colleagues have discovered, there do not seem to be any answers forthcoming. I am not going to duplicate many of the points the Leader of the Opposition made far better than I could regarding the constitutional difficulties concerning this particular piece of legislation.

As a member from Ontario I have asked questions in the House and expressed concern regarding transportation in my province. I have pointed out on different occasions errors that have been made to the tune of hundreds of millions of dollars in the public works estimates, and I have asked questions about unemployment insurance involving expenditure of almost $1 billion. However, last winter many of my constituents, including myself, began to become concerned about a shortage of fuel. At that time we were told, after talking to some of our colleagues from Alberta as well as provincial officials, that they are Canadians first and that, as far as they were able, they were not going to see Canada short of energy.

It then became obvious that to fulfil this promise a pipe line was necessary. It was also obvious that the pipe line which, for want of a better word, had been imposed upon this country by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert a few years previously was indeed one of the smartest moves this country had ever seen.

It is a fact, of course, that we in Ontario have for a number of years been paying a premium on our oil. That is fair enough; we have paid premiums before. Then we started hearing talk about this pipe line which was necessary to carry oil further east, and we also heard some nonsense about having a two-way pipe line. Now, Mr. Chairman, any huckleberry from Ontario knows that you cannot suck and blow at the same time; it does not take much expertise to find that out. So we are concerned anew with the energy situation.

We are now faced with Bill C-32. Despite the government's obvious dislike for price fixing or price controls, and with the government's heavy accentuation on combines legislation, we now find out that a price is going to be forced on the province of Alberta if negotiations do not meet with success. We do not know what the price is, but a price will be forced upon that province.

It seems to me that this is a particularly large club. If that club were being used against the province of Ontario in connection with its nickel, or its uranium, or other products of a similar nature, the minister would have a bigger fight on his hands than he has right now.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Crowfoot. I think it is fair to say that one thing that the hon. member for Crowfoot and I have in common is that we rarely agree on things. But I think that anyone who misjudges his intelligence on a subject like this, and that of his many colleagues, makes a very real mistake.

I must admit that the longer I sit here the more concerned I become. Indeed, I am also a little confused. My colleagues from Alberta used terminology and referred to quantities that are a wee bit beyond my ken, perhaps; but the single thought comes through that there is something wrong with this legislation. There is something here that does not sit well with Canadians, and I remind the committee that these members from Alberta are Canadians.

To take this a step further, during the question period my next door neighbour and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings often ask questions about the level of production in Canada compared with the level of production throughout the world, and the fact that Canada's balance of payments is getting into a bit of trouble. If there is less exploration of our resources and we are not able to export some of our products, what is going to happen to our balance of payments? Where will we get the money to pay the tariff on incoming oil, so as to guarantee a single price, if we do not export?

I am sure that the calm, reasoned and logical approach of the Leader of the Opposition, when put up against the hon. "flim-flam" man from Toronto and some of the things he said this evening, is going to appeal to the people of Canada. Certainly I have not heard the minister give us any answers this evening.

I have one question I want to ask, and it is a very simple one. Will the minister tell me categorically that this legislation is going to enable more oil to be found, that it will enable Canadians, and specifically the people in Hastings riding, to get a sufficient supply of oil? I can stand a little bit of cold, but young people are growing up in Hastings county and I should like them to have oil for the future. I am not sure that we have had any answers to this particular question. I guess I should call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before the minister leaves could he let us know if it is his intention to deal with this matter on Monday and Tuesday next?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the House leader has indicated, as a result of discussions with the hon. member, I take it, or with others, that there was no prospect of making progress with this bill, so I think he listed other business for Monday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—INCREASE IN PRICE OF PERSONAL HEALTH CARE PRODUCTS—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in following up questions I asked the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs in the last session of parliament I asked the present minister on November 5 whether he has directed an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act into the unwarranted increases in the cost of personal health care products.

It is my contention that the ripoff cliché could not be better applied to unwarranted profits than in the field of most personal health care products. It is obvious that despite all the time and investigation by responsible authorities we cannot seem to find solutions to control the cost of food, but certainly there are many commodities used in the home which are increasing in price almost as fast as foods, along with clothing and housing. I refer particularly to costs of personal health care products which take up a goodly portion of the family budget, and which could be controlled by responsible and reasonable government legislation.

Surely we can see just how much money is being wasted by housewives as a result of advertising hucksterism used by advertising agencies and most cosmetic firms. Surely we could show the consumers the waste, and thereby save them many millions of dollars in their budgets, which would leave them more dollars to acquire the essential foods they need for their families.

Not only are the consumers the victims of cosmetic hucksterism, being ripped off, they are using products which might even be injurious to their health, or which are indeed of little or no use.

I was pleased to note that after the many references I have made to the subject over the past two or three years, but to no avail, the CTV program "Inquiry" exposed the matter recently on television, for which it should be commended. It revealed the phoniness which exists because of artificial freedom of enterprise.

Apart from the fact that the television program revealed that some half a billion dollars is being spent for personal care products, and most of that money is being wasted as a result of saturation advertising, and that a product costing a few cents can be sold for many dollars, depending on the name and the advertising clout of the firm promoting the product, this situation still exists.

I took it upon myself last year to purchase two cans of hairspray, one at a cost of 98 cents and another at a cost of about $3. I sent them to the Food and Drug Directorate for analysis, and I should like to read you the results in part:

> The limited analysis available so far suggests that the majority of the spray (97 to 99 per cent) is made up of propellants and solvents . . . with other lubricating, perfuming, and coating agents making up the balance. The products are similar in composition, though the amounts of individual ingredients will naturally vary somewhat.

The details could not be provided because it was given on a confidential basis for branch use only.

A similar situation exists, I am sure, in respect of most other cosmetic products, and I mention anti-perspirants, hairdressings, nail polishes, lipsticks, mascara, creams and lotions. In this regard I would refer you to the "Consumer Contact" report of September, 1974, and I quote:

> Cosmetics in Canada are required by federal law, under The Food and Drugs Act, to be free of injurious substances, to be packaged in safe and non-deceptive containers and produced under sanitary conditions.

Later in the same report it states:

> Rare or precious ingredients are seldom, if ever, included in cosmetic formulas and there is no need to pay a high price to obtain an effective product for any cosmetic use.

For example, the report states:

> Deodorants are designed to eliminate the odour of perspiration without checking its flow. Use of mild soap and water has always been effective. Prolonged and repeated use of aerosol underarm deodorants, if they are inhaled, may have adverse effects in the lungs, while feminine hygiene sprays may cause some local irritation.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The report further states:

> The skin is nourished by normal food consumption and not by externally applied creams, lotions, or other substances.
>
> Hair cannot be restored to bald heads by application of salves, ointments, and other preparations applied externally, nor by shampoos, manipulation and various mechanical devices.

In another area the report states:

> Dandruff is readily removed by washing the hair and scalp with any good shampoo. Indiscriminate use of medicated products may result in severe skin reactions.
>
> Reduction of excess weight can be achieved safely and effectively only by a proper diet, a decrease in the amount of food eaten, and to some extent, by a good deal of exercise. There are no solutions, preparations, or devices applied externally, or pills taken internally that can truthfully claim to have a slimming effect without an accompanying reduction of food intake on a low calorie diet.
> Lipstick of the long-lasting indelible type is a frequent cause of irritation. There are, however, a number of lipsticks that do not contain the bromoacid dyes which are usually the chief offenders. Look for what are called 'Hypo-allergenic' brands.
>
> Organic or 'natural' cosmetics have become quite fashionable, but they have no special values.
>
> The most common sources of allergic problems are perfumes, antiperspirants and deodorants, dyes, chemical depilatories, nail lacquer and other nail preparations, indelible lipsticks and sunscreen preparations.
> Good looks are derived from good health. Cultivate it by eating wisely, keeping regular hours, avoiding excess use of liquor, soft drinks, and other sweets.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a number of points in his remarks tonight. He referred to such things as possible misleading advertising. If that is in fact the case and he has evidence, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would be interested in obtaining such evidence so that it would be able to take appropriate action.

Further, there has been mention made of possible health hazards in respect of such products as cosmetics and other things to which the hon. member referred. This is not part of the responsibility of our department, but I am sure the Department of National Health and Welfare would be very interested in any evidence the hon. member may have in respect of real health hazards for Canadians.

The hon. member referred to an information program which appeared last weekend on CTV in respect of cosmetics and their usefulness or lack of it. I think that kind of approach is very worthwhile in terms of informing the Canadian people as to the merits or demerits of products or lines of products in the cosmetic field.

I would compliment the CTV and others who provide this kind of public information to the people of Canada. I must admit I do not really have the view that the people of Canada are so naive as not to be able to recognize the quality of many of these products but because of simple cosmetic vanity are inclined to use them.

The hon. member asked whether the minister was proceeding with an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. As the hon. member realizes, such investigation must be carried on on a confidential basis. Therefore the minister is not in a position either to confirm or deny that such an investigation is taking place. However, if the hon. member, or any other hon. member or members of the public generally, feel that there is justification for charges to be laid under the Combines Investigation Act, they can rest assured that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will take appropriate action on the basis of any valid evidence submitted.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—PRICE OF ANTI-FREEZE—REASON FOR INCREASED MARKUP AND POSSIBILITY OF PROFITEERING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, on November 13 I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) whether he found any evidence of profiteering in the anti-freeze industry in Canada, and his reply was no. I wonder how the minister can be so complacent in the light of the present situation.

Today anti-freeze is selling at 100 per cent more than a year ago, and in some cases even higher than that. In 1973 a consumer could buy a gallon of anti-freeze for $2.40. In 1974 prices range between $6.88 a gallon and $12 a gallon. Indeed, in my constituency of Sault Ste. Marie at the retail level the price of anti-freeze varies from distributor to distributor. At Canadian Tire the price is $6.88 a gallon; at Western Tire, it is $7.98; at Esso, $8.00; at Fina, $8.95; at Gulf, $9; at Texaco, $9.50, at Supertest, $9.95; at Sunoco, $10; at Shell, $10.95; There are variations among service station operators, some charging as high as $12 a gallon.

What, I ask, are retailers paying to the wholesalers for their supplies? Figures I have obtained from a co-operative store in Oshawa indicate the following: in 1972 the retailer purchased anti-freeze from the distributor at an average price of $2.25 a gallon; in 1973, the average price was $2.65 a gallon; but in 1974 the price varies from $6.15 a gallon to $9.75 a gallon that the corner gas station must pay to the wholesaler.

Why is there this tremendous mark-up? The minister says it is because the cost of the raw material, ethylene glycol, has gone up due to shortages. True, the cost has gone up somewhat, and we should try to determine whether they are real shortages or not, sufficient to justify anti-freeze selling at $9 to $12. In 1972 ethylene glycol was imported at 73 cents a gallon; in 1973 it was imported at $1.08 a gallon and in 1974 at $3.35 a gallon. I have found out that in 1972 the mark-up was roughly $1.50 a gallon over the import price, but today the mark-up is from $4 to $6 over the import price.

How does the minister justify a $6 mark-up over the basic import price of ethylene glycol? He cannot. The evidence is that the middleman and the manufacturer have conspired to raise prices unjustfiably. I charge that the Canadian manufacturers of anti-freeze have deliberately avoided increasing their production capacity at a time of rising demand, thereby creating an artificial scarcity of ethylene. Coupled with this, they spread rumours of a scarcity of anti-freeze, which resulted in consumer panic buying which allowed companies to raise prices and to keep them high.

I should like to quote from the Toronto Star of October 30. An anti-freeze retailer, a gas station operator says:

"It's all just one big ripoff," charges Walker who claims this year's anti-freeze shortage is as "phony" as last year's energy crisis.

"We are being dictated to by these companies that are bigger than government," he continued.

Pointing out that he bought bulk anti-freeze last year at $1.95 a gallon, Walker claims suppliers and manufacturers today are making exorbitant profits while the service station operators are being "crucified".

We know that there is no scarcity but we are still confronted with anti-freeze ranging from $7 to $12 per gallon.

In view of the facts I have outlined, and in view of an inquiry launched by the Minister of Financial Institutions in Quebec, which also concludes that an artificial scarcity was created, will the minister launch an investigation under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act, to prohibit such blatant profiteering by anti-freeze producers in this country? Will the minister act to protect consumers?

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has built up an impressive case to show the extent of the increase in price of anti-freeze in this country. He did a good job in demonstrating differentials in prices across this country. Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs investigations confirm, without specifying particular instances, that the substance of the hon. member's information is correct. In our investigations last week we found that a gallon of anti-freeze in the Toronto area sold for as little as $5.80 a gallon and for as much as $12 a gallon. Clearly the price differential is large.

When the department is asked how it justifies such increases, the answer is that we, in the department, do not justify them. We do not say that we feel they are justified. The simple fact is that we lack the legislative base for dealing with what may be termed profiteering. An anti-profiteering bill was introduced in the last parliament but was not passed. The election intervened. Another similar bill will be introduced in the present session of parliament and will deal with that question.

Touching on the Combines Investigation Act and evidence of violations under that act taking place, let me say that this is a matter of judgment. As I said in responding to the question immediately prior to this one, the department is not in a position to comment whether it is presently engaged in investigations under the act or whether it plans to become so engaged. As I said before, if any Canadian obtains evidence of price fixing, or of collusion in the market place which violates the spirit and content of the Combines Investigation Act, members of this House and of the general public can be assured that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will take appropriate action to see that Canadians are protected by laws under which we work and which have been passed by parliament.

HEALTH—PHARMACISTS' STRIKE IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, in my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr.

Lalonde) today I assumed that the minister had been informed of a shutdown last week of most Quebec pharmacies. They were showing support for a proposed bylaw which could drive discount drugstores out of business. It was against this background that the minister introduced Bill S-9 which, incidentally, passed Senate third reading yesterday.

Let me state at once that my question suggesting the revision or withdrawal of Bill S-9 is in no way a criticism of the principal intent of the bill. Putting quantitative ingredient information on the label is desirable. The real concern is the ability to sell products presently registered under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act in non-pharmacies in Canada. There is no assurance that non-drug sales will be permitted after repeal of the act. Assurances have been given that the pharmacy acts of the various provinces will be amended to allow proprietary medicines to be sold in stores other than pharmacies. But this assurance may not be fulfilled, and it may be the intent never to fulfill it.

The federal Department of National Health and Welfare has no direct authority over the pharmacy acts of the various provinces. Knowing the concern of the pharmacists about having any medicines sold in non-pharmacy outlets, the provinces may be reluctant to pass the enabling legislation.

The discount store has had a major influence on proprietary medicine prices. The consumer interest in this vital matter must be recognized, not only as it affects the price which the consumer must pay but also in the ready accessibility which is afforded by the freer sale of any product.

The consumer must be able to obtain full information concerning the use of his medicine, and the public must have a free choice to pay the lowest possible price.

It is my firm belief that the federal government has the duty and responsibility to exercise to the full its powers and authority in the interests of the Canadian people as a whole. That is why I questioned the minister's answer today. I again ask him how he can reconcile the undoubtedly good primary thrust of Bill S-9 and its unfortunate possible future implications for the consumer?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for his interest in this particular subject and his well-known concern for the interests of consumers. It is a concern which is shared by most members of this House, expecially as it deals with the price of drugs to Canadian citizens. He mentioned the great advantages that had resulted to consumers from discount drugstores in some provinces. His worry that they may disappear is certainly well understood.

I wish to stress that the question of legislation authorizing such drug sales is a matter which comes under the responsibility of the provinces at the present time. It will remain under the responsibility of the provinces after passage of Bill S-9, if the House decides to approve that bill.

I have had several contacts and communications with my provincial colleagues over the past year in connection with this bill, particularly at the federal-provincial conference of health ministers in February, 1974. My colleagues unanimously agreed that we could repeal the PPM Act and substitute another bill which would provide for greater disclosure than exists at the present time.

There was a meeting on October 3, 1974, of the Registrars of Pharmacy of the various provinces. Particular consideration was given to the changes that would be required in provincial pharmacy legislation to accommodate the repeal of the PPM Act. I might point out to the hon. member that a resolution was passed unanimously at that meeting supporting the actions taken by the Health Protection Branch in the matter of repeal of the PPM Act.

During the discussions it was agreed that there was adequate time to effect the changes required in provincial legislation since they were considered to be minimal. In general, present provincial legislation allows for the sale of proprietary medicines in non-pharmacy outlets by referring to products registered under the PPM Act. It is anticipated that the major change required will be to refer to the new regulations concerning proprietary medicines under the Food and Drugs Act.

Bill S-9 provides that the bill will come into effect in July 1976. That allows a year and a half to ensure transition. There should be no reason why any province has not passed the necessary legislation in the meantime. I might point out that provision will be made for progressive implementation of the act in the interim period.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:25 p.m.

TABLING OF SECOND REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the second report of the Clerk of Petitions.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind the importance of the statement made this morning that a settlement of the land claims of the native people of James Bay had been reached involving expenditures, programs and constitutional commitments by the federal government, I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the Prime Minister or one of his colleagues to make a statement on motions outlining the terms of this settlement in order that the House may be informed of the precise nature of the federal commitment.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the Prime Minister or anybody else for that matter can be asked a question by an hon. member speaking on a point of order. Perhaps it may be regarded as a request that the Prime Minister make a statement on motions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

KNOWLEDGE OF PRIME MINISTER OF TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday outside the House the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that the possibility of a trip to Israel in the Bronfman jet was first raised in a discussion between himself and Mr. Bronfman. In view of this possibility of accompanying Mr. Bronfman to Israel, the health minister then turned to the Israeli ambassador and asked whether it would be convenient for the minister to visit Israel officially in such circumstances. The minister added that he had asked the Israeli ambassador to make the necessary formal travel and business arrangements if, in fact such a visit were convenient.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he was aware of all those circumstances when he stated in this House on November 5, as reported at page 1053 of Hansard:

I was aware, of course, that the minister had been invited to Israel by the Israeli government and that the Israeli ambassador had arranged transportation on this particular aircraft.

The Prime Minister thereby gave the impression that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was simply going to Israel in a way arranged by the Israeli government. When the Prime Minister made that statement in the House, was he aware of the circumstances that the minister disclosed outside the House yesterday as to what actually took place?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not the details of them, Mr. Speaker, but I was aware of what I told the House, that the arrangements were made by the Israeli ambassador. I was not aware of the exact timing as to when the matter had actually been raised.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Prime Minister aware of the fact that arrangements had been made between the minister of health and Mr. Bronfman, as disclosed by the minister outside the House yesterday, and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had asked the Israeli ambassador to make arrangements for the trip on that basis?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the minister said yesterday outside the House. My understanding of the facts is not that the minister asked the Israeli ambassador to make the arrangements, but that at a meeting between them the offer of an aircraft was made and that the minister suggested to the ambassador that he make the arrangements for the trip.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition may put a final supplementary.

TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): The minister of health told this House on November 12, as reported at page 1221:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the hon. member that all the arrangements for my trip to Israel, which was an official visit at the invitation of the government of Israel, were made by the Israeli embassy.

In view of the fact that it now appears that the arrangements were first made by the minister himself with Mr. Bronfman, and that the minister asked the Israeli ambassador to make the arrangements on that basis, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he will personally conduct an investigation, not merely into the question of conflict of interest, but as to whether the minister has been frank and open with the Prime Minister and with the House, and if after the Prime Minister makes that investigation he finds the minister has not been frank with him and with the House will he ask for that minister's resignation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as being frank with the House is concerned, from my reading of yesterday's Hansard it is exactly along the lines of what the Leader of the Opposition says the minister was saying outside the House.

Mr. Stanfield: No, it is not.

Mr. Hees: You haven't been reading very well, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think it might be worthwhile reading what the minister said yesterday, as reported at page 1316 of Hansard:

The matter was raised for the first time in the presence of the Israeli ambassador—

He has admitted it was raised in the presence of the Israeli ambassador. He then said:

—and since for several months I have had a standing invitation to go to Israel, I said that if the time were convenient to the Israeli ambassador and the Israeli government, and if this means of transport was convenient I would leave the matter of the arrangements to the Israeli embassy.

Subject to further discussion, I do not see that there is anything there that is in conflict with what the minister said outside the House.

In so far as being frank with me, Mr. Speaker, I can say unequivocably that the minister answered the questions I asked him in this regard. The main point I tried to ascertain was whether the minister had derived any personal benefits of any kind from this trip, and I am satisfied that he did not. I am not saying that there are not some disadvantages, and that is why I referred to the practice which we would be following in the future. In so far as benefits are concerned, the only benefit I can see would be the benefit to the Canadian taxpayer in the sense that the minister did not have to pay for the trip out of public funds.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I must say that I am shocked by where this all leads. In view of the circumstances that have come out inside and outside the House, and the nature of the discussions that took place between the minister and Mr. Bronfman, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he felt justified in saying what he said in the House on November 5? He now says that the minister was completely frank and that he knew of these circumstances, so I am wondering if he feels he was justified in what he said in the House on that occasion which gave the impression that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was simply going to Israel in a conveyance that had been arranged by the ambassador of Israel, and that was only the polite thing for the minister to do? I think the very least the Prime Minister owes this House is a full explanation of what he said on November 5, and a full explanation also as to the standard of behaviour and frankness that is expected in the House. In view of the statement made by the minister on November

● (1120)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Leader of the Opposition misinterpreted what I said. I did not say that before November 5 I had had these discussions with the minister. Indeed, I could not have had. I had been in France and Belgium and the minister had not returned, so I could not have had this discussion with him. On the contrary, I indicated to the House very frankly that I had not been made aware of the means by which the minister was going to Israel. I had approved his trip but had not discussed the means of transportation.

Mr. Stanfield: You had approved the trip?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I approve all trips.

Mr. Stanfield: Had the minister discussed the method of transportation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter has been raised by way of a question and two supplementaries, and now under the guise of a point of order a further question has been raised. I certainly do not want to restrict the questioning in any way but I feel we have to keep the matter on track. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary—all right; let the Prime Minister go ahead if he has something more to say.

TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL—SUGGESTED CORRECTION OF PRIME MINISTERS' STATEMENT ON NOVEMBER 5

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On November 5 the Prime Minister, in a reply to a question by me stated:

I take it the hon. member knows of no better way of having a minister accept an invitation than by doing it in a way the inviting government proposes.

Would the Prime Minister indicate why, when he learned this was the means of transportation proposed at a meeting between Mr. Bronfman and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, he did not at least attempt to correct the impression he left on November 5 that this was a proposal which originated from the Government of Israel as opposed to something that was acceded to at a later date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must remind the hon. member as I was telling the Leader of the Opposition that I had approved the trip but I told the House clearly I did not know what means of transportation was envisaged but approved it on the basis that the inviting government usually makes proposals for means of transportation. I would go further and say, had I known it would be by private aircraft I probably would have advised him to take other means.

Mr. Alexander: You were misled.

Mr. Trudeau: I did not discuss the means of transportation with the minister. I learned about it, as other members of the House learned about it, and I indicated that in the future we would not be using that type of transportation. But I must make it quite clear to the Leader of the Opposition and hon. members that I said to the House that I did not know the means of transportation and approved the trip. That is what I said and that is what I repeat.

KNOWLEDGE OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This being an official visit according to the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, was the minister's department consulted about the official visit? Did they make the arrangements for the official visit and if so did they know about the use of the private jet and did they question it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I knew about the visit. The Miinister of National Health and Welfare and I exchanged correspondence on the visit. But to my recollection, and I am sure my recollection is correct, the mode of transportation was not involved.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings on a final supplementary.

PROPRIETY OF TRAVEL ARRANGEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE FOR TRIP TO ISRAEL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare recently publicly criticized and lectured one branch of the liquor industry, the brewing industry, on how it should conduct its business—and if it followed his suggestion this could seriously affect its business—does the Prime Minister consider it right and proper that following that the minister should accept a favour from the president of the largest liquor industry in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member does not seem to understand is that the minister was not accepting a favour from the liquor industry.

An hon. Member: Of course he was.

Mr. Trudeau: He was being invited by the government with which we have friendly relations, the government of a country to which many other members of this House have travelled, including members of the opposition. He was going by means which had been arranged, obviously with his knowledge, by the Israeli government. I have made it quite clear in the House that this is a practice which I do not encourage ministers to follow, and I am sure that in the future they will not. I have ascertained that the minister has derived no personal advantage, apart perhaps from travelling with people he knew on the same aircraft, but that certainly could have been derived travelling commercially. Those are the facts as I know them. I am certain that there is no conflict of interest. I agree that there is a question as to whether this is the best way of doing it, and that is why I indicated that that is not the way we should follow in the future. I suppose that in future ministers will consult the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself on their means of transportation if there is any doubt.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REASON FOR SURVEILLANCE OF ROY ATKINSON

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that he said outside the House yesterday that Roy Atkinson, president of the National Farmers' Union, had been under surveillance at one time by the RCMP, and this has been verified by a journalist who has a statement on tape from the travel agency to that effect, would the minister inform the House at this time of the reasons Mr. Atkinson was under surveillance at one time by the RCMP?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I checked on this matter and I find that the RCMP did check with the Saskatoon travel agency to see if Mr. Atkinson was to travel to Prince Edward Island. At that time there was an interest in his activities, not on the basis of subversion or security but on the basis of information received that the National Farmers' Union were planning to illegally disrupt certain peaceful activities in PEI, such as the Charlottetown Old Home Week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: The RCMP had been asked to find out if this information was correct and, if so, how many people were travelling from Saskatchewan to participate in these particular illegal activities.

I might say that the National Farmers' Union had previously been involved in certain massive tractor blockades in PEI and certain arrests had taken place and charges laid. So at the time the RCMP did check with this agency with respect to this possible disruption of peaceful activities in PEI. I might say that whatever was to take place did not take place and there have been no further checks on Mr. Atkinson since that time. That was the only time.

Mr. Nystrom: The minister said in the House yesterday, as recorded on page 1312 of Hansard, that the only time someone would be under surveillance would be if they were suspected of committing a criminal offence or if there were serious suspicions about breaches of the security of this nation. I should like to know whether or not the incident to which the minister referred is the reason Mr. Atkinson was put under surveillance. There was a tractor demonstration in August of 1971, and I found, on checking with Mr. Atkinson's lawyer this morning, that the charge against him under section 381 of the Criminal Code was conspiracy to intimidate the public from the lawful use of a highway for no valid reason. The case was dismissed at a preliminary hearing in magistrate's court. I should like to know from the minister whether or not the only reason Mr. Atkinson was put under surveillance, was subversion or whether it was the intention to commit a criminal offence, to which he referred in the House. That is a very serious question and we want an answer to it.

Mr. Allmand: As I mentioned a few minutes ago, the RCMP received information that the National Farmers' Union were planning certain illegal activities to disrupt peaceful activities in PEI. The police had an obligation to check this out to see if the stories were correct, and that is what they did. When they found out that they were not correct, they stopped any further checking on Mr. Atkinson.

● (1130)

REASON FOR SURVEILLANCE OF LEADERS OF NATIVE GROUPS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, in the House the Solicitor General made a commitment to check into the possibility that certain native leaders in Saskatchewan were under RCMP surveillance. I wonder whether he can now provide that information.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Prior to the arrival of the Indian caravan, the RCMP had received information that certain individuals associated with it were considering the use of violence and other illegal activities in Ottawa. As result of this information, the RCMP tried to determine through buslines, rent-a-car agencies and travel agencies, how many participants were coming to Ottawa and whc they were so that they could perhaps take preventive measures against the use of violence and anti-legal activity. They did contact this travel agency to find out if any of the Indian leaders were coming to Ottawa with the caravan.

HEALTH

GROUND BEEF—REGULATION OF FAT CONTENT AND IMPROVEMENT OF INSPECTION

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In June 1974, the Food Prices Review Board made a report and recommendations to the government concerning the passing of regulations requiring that ground beef sold by retailers be labelled to indicate the maximum fat content. Can the minister say whether or not he intends to implement the recommendation of the board?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we are now looking into the possibility of passing regulations to that effect. I trust I shall be in a position to announce them in the very near future.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Is the minister also considering the possibility of improving the meat inspection system, especially where less expensive meats are concerned such as ground meat and others? We recently heard disquieting reports in this regard.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I made a statement to that effect in the House around fifteen days ago.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF LAND CLAIMS OF JAMES BAY INDIANS—REASON FOR ABSENCE OF MINISTER—POSSIBLE USE OF SETTLEMENT AS GUIDE IN DEALING WITH FUTURE LAND CLAIMS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The first question must naturally be why the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is not in his place to inform the House of the federal government's commitment, participation and constitutional responsibility in the James Bay settlement, particularly in view of the fact that he is divulging this information to forums outside the House. I would ask the Prime Minister personally to tell the House if it is his government's intention to use this settlement, as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has stated, as a benchmark or model in negotiating all other outstanding land claims?

Mrs. Iona Campagnolo (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this is an historic day of agreement—

An hon. Member: Where is the minister?

Mrs. Campagnolo: I am going to tell you if you have time to listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: This is an historic day of agreement in principle between—

Some hon. Members: Motions.

Mrs. Campagnolo: —the James Bay Cree, the northern Quebec Innuit, the province of Quebec and the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Motions.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down!

An hon. Member: Just listen.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rocky Mountain on a point of order.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the parliamentary secretary to the minister is attempting to bootleg into this House—

An hon. Member: She was asked a question.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): —a statement which bears no relation to the question asked. It constitutes a statement on motions which the government refused to deliver during the appropriate period of this House, but instead sent the minister away to make an announcement outside this House. The minister was here at 10.30 last night. This indicates a clear contempt of the practices and privileges of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point of order is not without some merit—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —not because it relates to the presence or absence of the minister but because the question that was posed really was to the Prime Minister and not to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As I recall, the first part of the question to the Prime Minister was, why is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development not present in the House at this time? The point of order may be valid, not because the parliamentary secretary is proposing to give information on behalf of her minister which, as I think I have said on previous occasions, is a very important aspect of the work of parliamentary secretaries—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Motions.

Mr. Speaker: —but simply because the original question was to the Prime Minister.

However, in fairness the question also sought information on the nature and whether the government proposed to use this as a "benchmark" I think the word was. I believe that information was sought and was what the parliamentary secretary was trying to give. However, to keep it in order perhaps the Prime Minister might like to answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will need guidance from you. Members of the opposition generally direct questions to me if a minister is not in the House, and my practice in such cases is to turn either to the acting minister or the parliamentary secretary. If we agree that parliamentary secretaries should play some role—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —it is obvious that this parliamentary secretary was going to explain why the minister is not in the House. It is because he is in Montreal doing certain things. I could obviously answer the question, Mr. Speaker, but the House would be better informed if it were prepared to listen to the answer of the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: On motions!

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of further points of order I have to consider that the Prime Minister has answered the first part of the question but the second part ought to be answered by the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, on that particular question—

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo on a point of order.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I think there would be a disposition on this side of the House, if it were agreeable to the government, to give unanimous consent to revert to motions so that there could be a proper response to—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the minister is not reporting in the House today as he has accepted the signing time and place at the behest of the two native groups and their schedule has prevented him from being here.

An hon. Member: Bourassa's schedule.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, the good faith of those involved has been amply demonstrated for all to see. However, specific details of the agreement cannot be made known at this time as the signing does not take place until noon today. I therefore feel, Your Honour, that further comment might be reserved to be placed before the House on the return of the minister. It should be noted that this is an agreement in principle only and is subject to further negotiation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, a point of order. In view of the information provided by the parliamentary secretary, I wonder if the House would give unanimous consent to revert to motions at two o'clock this afternoon so that all parties would be given the opportunity to respond to the information on a matter of highest priority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There won't be enough of you guys around.

Mr. Hees: Same old rotten gang!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH ARCTIC BASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In light of avowed Canadian needs for policing and servicing in the Arctic both to protect our sovereignty and to foster economic development, can the minister tell the House whether he will study proposals for an Arctic Canadian base as proposed by the Naval Officers' Association of Canada?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ADEQUACY OF ARMED FORCES TO PATROL COASTS AND PROTECT SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister still hold to his position, as stated in this chamber on November 13 in response to a question by the Leader of the Opposition that the job of protecting Canadian sovereignty and coastal surveillance is being done adequately at the present time and does he plan to take action on the recommendation for nuclear submarines and icebreakers made by the Naval Officers' Association of Canada?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in response to the question of the Leader of the Opposition I stated that surveillance of our coasts was taking place. I did not at any time suggest that we could not continue to improve our capability. I have made it known that we are actively studying the acquisition of a new long range patrol aircraft which would greatly increase our capability to survey Canadian coastal waters.

IMMIGRATION

CONSEQUENCES FOR HAITIANS OF DEPORTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the importance of this matter, especially for Quebecers, in view of the fact that yesterday the Prime Minister received a call from Mgr. Grégoire on the deportation of a certain number of Haitians, and since the Minister of Communications has stated to the press in a telephone interview that the cabinet has indeed undertaken to examine the possibility of deciding favourably on the Haitians' condition, could the Prime Minister advise us today whether the cabinet is still examining this matter and hoping to come with a solution which, as everybody is hoping, will protect completely the security of those Haitians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the question, we certainly want the federal government to take the right solution to protect all the people involved, that is Haitians as well as Canadians themselves. We do not feel that we have ruled in any but a favourable manner. I think the Minister of Manpower and Immigration reported to the House yesterday a statement made by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. As to the other part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we are still reviewing it. The minister is always watching for new methods to solve this problem in a fair and humanitarian fashion and he is always in touch with his colleagues.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Does the Prime Minister's reply mean that there are no changes possible to the decision already rendered and announced by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? Since the act contains a special clause dealing with the persons concerning whom there are reasonable grounds to believe that they are likely to come to serious harm, could not the government avail itself of this clause, out of pity and for humanitarian reasons, to grant days of grace to the Haitians concerned, should it deem it necessary?

Mr. Trudeau: It is precisely because of this clause that the minister and the government have made sure that each case will be heard and decided on its own merit. We do not intend to render global and collective judgments but find out whether the humanitarian or refugee aspect could be invoked in respect of each and every one of these cases. I do not understand what the hon. member means by more global solutions. If he really wants to change the spirit and the letter of the law, he will quickly realize that a lot of those who come to Canada as tourists eventually try to stay here on a permanent basis. The issue we are dealing with now is likely to come up over and over again, so that it is essential that the government and opposition members agree on procedures which are both fair and humanitarian.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REASON FOR FAILURE OF SOME CABINET MINISTERS TO DISCLOSE INTERESTS—DATE FOR DISCLOSURE BY SENIOR CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister also relates to the general question of conflict of interest of cabinet ministers. Before putting my question, I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister, even though it is a year late, on finally setting up the simple administrative procedures which resulted this morning in the opening of a public registry which, I am told, indicates the holdings of some of his cabinet ministers. My question relates to some cabinet ministers only. Why does the public registry opened this morning relate only to the holdings of those cabinet ministers who were cabinet ministers on July 8? Why is it taking so long to indicate the holdings of the newer cabinet ministers? Has the Prime Minister set a deadline for them to indicate their holdings?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe I indicated to the newer ministers in a general way that I expected them to comply by the end of this calendar year, but I must check on the facts. Insofar as I am aware, I thought that every minister except one, including the new ones, had complied, but I will look at the facts. I am sure they will all comply by the end of the year with the possible exception of one minister who will be in a more difficult situation in resolving this problem in a way which will be satisfactory to the House. It is not a question of conflict. It is a way of finding a just method of divesting himself of any interest he might have in ongoing contracts.

Mr. Lawrence: Now that this principle has been accepted by the government for cabinet ministers and knowing the propensities of this government in many cases where senior civil servants have more to do with setting policy than even the cabinet, will the Prime Minister advise when we may expect the same principle, machinery and public registry to be set up for senior civil servants?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that when I made the announcement on guidelines, I covered not only cabinet ministers but senior civil servants, order-in-council appointments and, indeed, we took dispositions to regulate every member of this House, the latter part having been referred to a committee of this House in the last session. Insofar as the registry may be applicable to any other persons other than cabinet ministers, I will have to ascertain the date which was fixed for them. If my memory is not incorrect, it was some time in the early spring, but I will check that out.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL FOR PURCHASE AND PROCESSING OF BEEF FOR NEEDY COUNTRIES—WILLINGNESS OF GOVERNMENTS OF SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA TO PARTICIPATE IN PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Prior to the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, departing for Rome, the Minister of Agriculture was sent a telegram by the National Farmers Union requesting the government to set up a special program for the purchase and processing of beef as an important means of providing aid to many countries of the world which are in need of such foodstuffs. It would also provide assistance to Canadian farmers and producers who will be confronted with a particularly serious situation this winter. Was such a program considered by the Canadian delegation prior to going to Rome? If so, what conclusion was reached on this proposal?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge I cannot say that such a program had been explicitly considered by the delegation. There is a provision in our proposals made in Rome under which we can increase non-grain food aid. Presumably it would be under that umbrella such a proposal could be considered. My understanding is that the possibility of using canned beef, for example, in developing countries for the relief of starvation is not an easy one because of food habits, particularly cultural practices with respect to the consumption of food. With that qualification, I am sure that the Canadian International Development Agency, in its food program, will be searching out every possible way to provide non-grain food aid. If appropriate, it will consider that possibility as well.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, this request was made by the National Farmers Union. The governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan have indicated agreement in principle to take part in such a program. If I understand the minister correctly, the federal government has not taken that position. The minister is simply saying they might consider doing that, but as far as he is aware, there is no active consideration of the policy taking place at this time. I would like the minister to clarify that all he is saying is the government might consider such an approach. Is that correct?

● (1150)

Mr. MacEachen: Where the use of such foodstuffs in the food program is appropriate, it is always under consideration by CIDA. The hon. member referred to the desire of two provinces to take part in the program. I think this is a positive indication of the interest being taken in Canada, and we shall certainly be following up on our side the possibility of involving those provinces and others in the food aid program.

WILLINGNESS OF GOVERNMENTS OF SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA TO PARTICIPATE IN PROGRAM TO SUPPLY PROCESSED BEEF TO NEEDY COUNTRIES—REASON FOR FAILURE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO RESPOND

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A final supplementary for the Prime Minister. Since two provinces have indicated their willingness to put up dollars as part of their contribution could the Prime Minister explain why, given the urgency on the international scale and the problems producers are facing right now, the federal government has not responded to this proposal?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The House will want to know that when I met with the premiers toward the end of last month at 24 Sussex Drive, I did bring up this question and I received a very favourable response not only from the two provinces which have been mentioned but from the provinces generally. They were disposed to help in any way they could. At that time our plans for the Rome Conference were well advanced and there was no question of involving the provinces in anything which might be said in Rome. The main thing is that we have their agreement to assist in some way and, as the minister has said repeatedly, our posture in Rome was not the final word on this question; there are other measures we are considering in cabinet and I am sure we shall find means of involving any provinces wishing to concern themselves in any way.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF PROJECTS APPROVED BY ADVISORY COMMITTEES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In connection with LIP projects, the department has asked us a few months ago to suggest the membership of advisory committees responsible for recommending projects to the department. Now I have been told that projects recommended by advisory committees in some constituencies are rejected by the department, while others recommended by political friends are accepted. I do not want to be partisan, but when it came to the membership of committees which we suggested, I did not ask myself whether they were Liberal, Progressive Conservative or Social Credit. I wanted them to be representative of all political parties.

Can the minister tell us whether projects recommended by an advisory committee are rejected while others which are not are accepted by the department?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am able to assure the hon. member that in principle this is not the case. When the department receives applications, some of them may not satisfy the initial criteria at all, that is, the criteria established for screening as to eligibility, but even those applications are forwarded, for information, to the constituency advisory group where such a group exists. The function of the advisory group is to examine these applications on the basis of community needs and of their suitability, and to recommend priorities within the budget allocation. I do not usually interfere if there is agreement that the project is eligible, if it has been approved by the constituency advisory group and if the hon. member involved has not made any particular or valid objection to it. In such a case it would be almost automatically approved subject to the budget available. If the hon. member has any instances of a specific nature to show there has been a departure from this process I would be very grateful if he would register them with me. I will follow through and find out what, and why, deviations, if any, have taken place.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING INDEPENDANT ACCIDENT INVESTIGATION BOARD

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council. In view of the extensive and regrettable loss of life in the recent crash of a Panarctic air liner near Melville Island, can the hon. gentleman inform us when the government will be bringing forward the legislation promised in the Speech from the Throne to establish an independent accident investigation board?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): I cannot give an exact time. As the hon. member knows, a number of urgent measures are still before the House. I hope they can all be disposed of quickly so that we can get to legislation such as the hon. member has in mind, legislation which I, like himself, regard as important.

Mr. Stanfield: You can bring it in any time, you know that.

Mr. Sharp: We must get the other bills through first.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT IN UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT EFFORTS TO SECURE MORATORIUM ON CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to a letter sent by the Canadian embassy to the state department of the United States on October 23, 1973 and I would ask the hon. gentleman to bear in mind that this was one year, three weeks, one day, 22 hours and 58 minutes ago. In that letter, the government of Canada made an urgent request that the government of the United States should establish a moratorium on further construction of the Garrison diversion unit. Does the minister not consider that this has been a long time to wait for a reply to an urgent request? Will he tell us what is presently the status of this diversion scheme?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): One thing the hon. member has proved is that his question is certainly disqualified under the rules of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. MacEachen: The policy of the government on that particular point is still unchanged.

Mr. Whiteway: In view of the fact the construction has been speeded up, and that they are digging while all we are doing is hoping, may I ask what concrete action the minister is taking to ensure that this memorandum will be answered either affirmatively or otherwise?

Mr. MacEachen: I am afraid the hon. member's facts may be out of line. However, I want to reassure him we have been in frequent communication with the United States government with respect to the proposed diversion. Studies have been conducted in collaboration with the province. The hon. member can be assured that the interests of Canada are being upheld at all times and that our point of view is fully understood by the United States government.

HOUSING

ALLEGED OFFER OF ARABIAN MONEY FOR INVESTMENT—PERSONS TAKING PART IN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Would he inform the House as to the terms of the loans being offered by Arab oil concerns for investment in the Canadian Housing market? Who were the government officials and the other individuals, aside from government officials, involved in the negotiation of these investments?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I do not think there have been negotiations. I suppose I get a call a week from an individual representing concerns with large sums of foreign money to invest. I do not discriminate against money on the basis of its nationality; I am constantly concerned about there being a regular supply of mortgage money to the market. The fact is, if one tries to pursue these offers, nothing happens. I have not seen this one reach fruition, or a concrete stage. There are many things to be taken into consideration. I would have to be guided by my colleague the Minister of Finance. Certainly, this would have to be handled through proper financial intermediaries. I suggest that they speak to the banks and trust companies about this, or the mortgage investment corporations. Certainly CMHC is not directly involved in this respect.

● (1200)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am not really sure what happened to the government of Canada just a few moments ago. I do not know whether they had an offer or not, but considering the way this particular money is coming in would the minister express his opinion on whether or not he considers that the acceptance of Arabian funds in the housing market would jeopardize Canada's position with respect to international relations between either the Arabian countries or Israel?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member, with his long years of experience, knows well when he either hears or poses a hypothetical question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

BANGLADESH—REQUEST FOR AID—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise the House whether the government is considering, apart from the Rome conference milieu, some further special urgent measure of aid to that long suffering and anguished country, Bangladesh, where a situation exists so grave and perilous as to compel the compassion of mankind? Is the minister in consultation with the authorities of that government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that apart from the Rome conference the Canadian government has already extended assistance to the people of Bangladesh. I am sure that apart from our commitments made at Rome we would want to do anything further that would be justified in the circumstances. I do not think our commitment in Rome precludes action in other stricken areas.

REASON FOR FAILURE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE TO REPORT ON TRIP TO ISRAEL

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the government House leader and relates to the previous questions asked about the trip to Israel by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the fact that it is established custom in this House that, when a minister represents Canada on an official visit to another country, upon his return to Canada he makes a full and complete report on what took place to the House of Commons, such as did the Minister of National Defence earlier this week, what is the reason that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has yet to report on his official visit to Israel.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is no such government policy, and I am sure that the House of Commons would resist ministers getting up and reporting every time they went abroad.

TRANSPORT

FREEZE ON RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES AND LINE ABANDONMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House whether a decision has yet been reached on the future of the railway freight rate freeze and the freeze on rail line abandonment; and if a decision has been reached, would he tell the House when an announcement will be made?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this question was studied last week at length. I will have to get in touch with the railways. As the House knows, under the kind of commitment that we have we never actually froze any rates; we asked the two railways not to increase rates. This commitment will, of course, terminate on December 31, and I am now trying to see what they intend to do. I hope that by next week I will be in a position to tell the hon. member what the exact situation will be.

PUBLIC SERVICE

NUMBER OF FORMER EXECUTIVE ASSISTANTS TO MINISTERS NOW IN SERVICE—GUIDELINE FOR SUCH APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that the Secretary of State has appointed his former executive assistant as the new director of the Company of Young Canadians, will the Prime Minister tell the House how many other former executive assistants to ministers are now in the public service, and whether any guidelines have been established or instructions given regarding the appointment to the public service of personal assistants to partisan ministers. If the Prime Minister is not prepared to give the House that information now, would he make a specific reference of this question to the appropriate committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will appreciate that that kind of information is properly solicited in another way.

Mr. Clark (Rocky Mountain): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, although I hesitate to rise I have tried to seek that information by way of a question on the order paper, and I was roadblocked in the attempt by a reply, which I would call misleading to say the least, from the President of the Privy Council. I think this should be brought to the attention of the House. At any rate, I will raise the matter at ten o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE INCREASE OR DECREASE IN STRENGTH OF MILITIA AND RESERVE FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that there is a thrust towards reducing the size of the Canadian Armed Forces, would the minister indicate to the House what his intentions are regarding the militia and reserve forces so far as either increasing or decreasing their strengths, since the regular forces are being reduced?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, although I do not accept the preamble to the question, it has been publicly stated on a number of occasions that we are strengthening the reserve forces and militia. They have more funds and more equipment and they will be increasing in numbers.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the fact that General Waters indicated in a press release today that they were increasing, would the minister make a statement on motions later as to the feelings of the conference of defence associations regarding the status of the militia reserves and their deterioration?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I am quite frequently making statements on the reserve. I do not think it would be necessary to make one on motions in the near future.

HOUSING

USE OF ALUMINUM WIRING—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROHIBIT IN VIEW OF FIRE HAZARD

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. In view of the conclusions reached by a team of investigators of Ontario Hydro to the effect that aluminum wiring used in house building constitutes a dangerous fire hazard, what steps does the minister propose to take to protect Canadians against this hazard in view of the widespread use of aluminum wiring in house building in Canada?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this report but I am sure that my officials in CMHC are. In any event I shall have to check with them and get a full report on the situation. They are right on top of these things as soon as they happen.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY LINE ABANDONMENT—PROVISION BY RAILWAYS OF FIGURES ON REVENUES, COSTS AND TRAFFIC VOLUMES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Vegreville. In view of the fact that the January 1, 1975 date is approaching very rapidly and that on this date the abandonment of many railway lines in western Canada is possible under the National Transportation Act of 1967, and in view of the fact that in 1967 the minister promised parliament that before abandonment there would be public hearings in each case of request for abandonment and that the railways would be required to provide the public with figures on revenues, costs and traffic volumes, according to page 11780 of Hansard for January 12, 1967, has the minister received from the railways any indication that they have these figures ready for the public?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not have such a good memory that I can say that this is exactly what I said. I know that my colleague, the Minister of Justice, stated something along the same lines, but we told the western provinces that we would act very carefully in the field of abandonment of branch lines and that no branch lines would be abandoned unless we found a proper substitute or that our producers had proper service.

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF WHEAT POOLS GIVING FIGURES ON REVENUES, COSTS AND TRAFFIC VOLUMES OF RAILWAY BRANCH LINES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister, then, make available to interested members of this House the report received by his department from the western grain pools giving these figures from the years 1943 to 1965? I think the minister will find this report in his department.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have to make sure that I received the report and not the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the Wheat Board, and I will tell the hon. member early next week.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I want to rise briefly on a point of order, which perhaps is a euphemism for a point of information. There has been a great deal of reference made in connection with the now celebrated trip of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), as an official visit or official trip. Without the benefit of the experience and knowledge of some of my more august colleagues as to the rules, I am puzzled as to what exactly constitutes an official trip or visit by a government minister to another country, that is what special qualities mark it as an official trip. I was wondering, as a matter of information, if perhaps someone on the other side of the House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), could tell me briefly what marks it as an official trip, assuring me that it is, and the minister might then table the itinerary so that whatever qualities it has that constitutes it as an official trip could be then open to the scrutiny of the House.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE LEADERSHIP IN SOLVING WORLD FOOD CRISIS

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure, both before and during the World Food Conference in Rome, to provide leadership concerning the food crisis facing many developing nations, and calls on the government to give real leadership on this most acute problem of our time by increasing its commitment of food and other agricultural assistance to such nations and by adopting a trade policy favourable to their future development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in opening this debate on the world's food crisis and Canada's responsibility, I want to quote from a group of scientists and economists who met on the eve of the World Food Conference. This group was led by economist Barbara Ward, and this part of their statement puts the problem in the urgent perspective from which we must not hide, despite the natural human desire to put such urgent, depressing and complex problems from our minds. As someone has said, there is no subject, however complex, which if studied with patience and intelligence will not become more complex. I quote from the statement:

Even if official development assistance almost doubled by 1980, the poorest countries containing at least 20 per cent of all the world's people are threatened with an actual decline in their already precarious living standard.

A panel of experts addressing the United Nations-sponsored gathering at Rome put the urgency of the problem in the very short run, for the next eight or nine months, in even starker terms that we can all understand:

The primary question before us is how many of the world's people may not survive until the next harvest.

The Food and Agricultural Organization of the UN estimates the shortage in food grains as between 7 million and 11 million tons, broken down in this way: India, 3.4 to 7.4 million; Bangladesh, 1.9 million; Pakistan, 1 million; Sri Lanka, 200,000; and 20 other nations, mainly African, including the sub-Saharan section, 1.3 million.

I now want to make an evaluation of Canada's response to this need. We are now well aware of the essential response of Canada, made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), at the World Food Conference. He promised, on behalf of Canada, one million tons of food grains for each of the next three years. The government House leader, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, told us in the House a week ago last Wednesday that the countries at the Rome conference were asked to pledge a total of ten million tons of grain annually for three years. Canada has consented to contribute 10 per cent of that total.

The House leader said on that occasion that this would mean an "enormous increase" in money for food aid. He did not mention, though, that for this country's 180,000 wheat farmers, the 36.7 million bushels—which is the equivalent of one million tons a year—is worth about $940 to each of them in income. He also neglected to tell the House, of course, that Canada had contributed some 1.3 million tons of food aid, worth about $90.8 million, in 1970 when the world food crisis was not nearly as threatening. Our GNP was then $85 billion, and today it is in the vicinity of $120 billion. He mentioned that Canada would be prepared to increase substantially the allocation of commodities other than food grains. He did not mention, however, the steady sag in food aid by this federal government in the past four years.

The government House leader seemed euphoric and boastful in the House about Canada's contribution, but many of us found his attitude somewhat narrow and parsimonious, depicting sort of a complacent attitude, especially in view of the desperate seriousness of the world's pressing poverty problem. After all, the amount of wheat promised to the poor countries by us at Rome represents only half the amount of wheat we Canadians eat each year. A million tons of wheat makes enough flour to produce some 1.5 billion loaves of bread, or about three loaves for each of the some one-half billion hungry people in the world. Indeed, Canada's emergency food grains pledge works out to about one slice of bread per person every five days. So much for the question of immediate aid. What about helping them in the long run?

I want to speak about Canada and the fertilizer problem in the developing countries. The House leader did not mention anything about providing fertilizer to these needy countries. At present we are giving none. Many concerned and knowledgeable people insist that if we are serious in wanting to help solve the longer term crisis, we will have to contribute at least 150,000 tons of fertilizer to these countries for at least 10 to 15 years, if they are to learn to feed themselves. One ton of fertilizer can produce 10 to 15 additional tons of grain in India and Bangladesh. The extent of the catastrophe facing the fertilizer industry in developing countries is scarcely believable. During the period 1965-71 the fertilizer industry in Canada, Japan and many western countries was plagued with overcapacity. This turned out to be a blessing for the least developed countries: they could buy low-priced fertilizer on world markets and this helped to make the so-called "green revolution" a reality.

By 1972, world demand had caught up with supply. The oil price crisis of 1973 made things much worse for the very poor countries. Certain petroleum products, especially naphtha, have become the principle feedstocks for nitrogen fertilizer. Price increases in these petroleum products have thus led to further price increases in fertilizer products. Canada can really help these countries develop their own food capacity by supplying them with elemental sulphur and potash, both basic raw materials for potassic fertilizer. We are one of the largest producers and exporters of potash in the world, as I recently found out during a visit to Saskatchewan. We also have an abundance of elemental sulphur in Alberta. The federal government should, for purposes of helping the least developed countries, subsidize both of these abundant commodities for export to these very poor countries.

If I can ever get your attention, Mr. Speaker, this should be clearly kept in mind while the federal and provincial government of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hogan: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. This should be clearly kept in mind while the federal and provincial government of Saskatchewan play tug-of-war over the question of taxation and royalties connected with the potash industry. Another alternative we can quickly look into, to help overcome the all but hopeless handicap of the poor nations with regard to fertilizers, is to use some of the extremely abundant, known coal reserves of Alberta—which compared to the reserves of Nova Scotia, from where I come, are minute—for the production of nitrogen fertilizer by means of a coal gasification process now being perfected in Alberta.

● (1220)

Alternatively, we can see if it is possible to help India test whether the Alberta technology for coal gasification can be used in turning India's large coal reserves to production of nitrogen fertilizer. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, if we are serious about helping these countries develop their own capacity to grow their own foods, we should sincerely and quickly consider these and other possible options.

Now I wish to speak for a few minutes about the priority in respect of food production—which should be present in this country and is not. It seems to me, though, as I mentioned in my maiden speech in the House, that over at least the next decade Canada has to build an almost new agricultural policy based on the premise that, while we cannot feed the world's starving, as one of the few grain exporting nations left we have to make a contribution that is second only to the United States; unless, that is, we prefer to watch on our television sets the horror of hundreds of thousands dying because we, along with other nations, have failed to mount the massive, complex and extraordinary effort necessary to meet the problem of food aid to these impoverished human beings. They, regardless of colour or distance, are our human brothers and sisters under the skin.

As one with some specialized training in economics, I know that this may be very costly for us and may even mean notable changes in our life-style. But again, realistically speaking, do we have any other alternative, whether we call ourselves Christians, Jews or just humanists? If I am right, this should mean that this nation will have to give the highest priority, for at least the next decade and likely longer, to the production of food. The farmers, of course, will have to be guaranteed a just price so that they will not suffer from the surplus-shortage syndrome that they have had to carry in the past. Little wonder that they are cynical if they are asked to go all out. These and many other difficult problems must be solved within Canada and between the nations who in Rome pledged their support.

Our party does not want to take a "holier than thou" attitude, but we sincerely ask this government to take a strong lead in this, one of the most serious problems to face mankind in its history. After all, the United Nations, and especially the Food and Agricultural Organization, has been warning us of the day of reckoning since at least 1963. This country, and others, I repeat, must place the highest priority on food production. We must develop our latent food capacity and stop using prime agricultural land for non-farm uses. Of course, what we all must realize is that in pressing for very increased production, what the economists call the principle of diminishing marginal return on productivity enters into the picture. In everyday words, when you start seeding and planting new lands you increase the cost of production. Every new acre you bring into production will generally tend to increase the marginal and average price.

We must also improve our grain transportation facilities which all the western members of parliament deplored in debating the grain handlers' strike earlier in the session. It goes without saying that all the countries which pledged their commitment at Rome must also help the very poor countries to improve their delivery systems. Some estimates suggest that only 60 per cent of the grain sent to India ever gets inland to the hungry.

Now I want to talk for a few minutes about the food crisis and population growth in these poor countries. The food crisis is, of course, tied to some extent to their rapid population growth: 74 per cent of the world's population already lives in the Asian, African and Latin-American regions where poverty, poor health and malnutrition are widespread. By the year 2,000 these regions will account for between 81 per cent and 84 per cent, whether fertility declines or not. At the same time, the share of the world population living in the comparative luxury of North America and Europe will decrease from 26 per cent to between 16 per cent and 19 per cent.

I am quoting from the International Monetary Fund projection made in December, 1973. The recent population conference in Bucharest, also sponsored by the United Nations, made clear, though, that the problems of these poor countries is not population growth as such. Population is, of course, a factor in development, but so is international economic equity. The opening paragraph of the "Plan of Action" adopted by consensus of the delegates at the Bucharest conference emphasized that—

> The basis for an effective solution of population problems is above all socio-economic transformation.

That idea is recurrent in the document. High fertility rates cannot be lowered by the mere provision of family planning information and material, important as that is. Declines in birth rates and family size are associated with development and modernization, as our own history testifies. Population, moreover, is not the critical source of pressure on the earth's resources and environment. It is consumption that matters, whether by large populations of poor countries or by high per person consumption and waste in the rich countries. In this connection I wish to quote from The Scientific American of November, 1974, at page 49:

> It is imperative that all countries, and within them all social sectors, should adapt themselves to more rational utilization of natural resources without excess so that some are not deprived of what others waste.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding these remarks I wish to summarize my thoughts by saying that in the short run the very poor countries with starving and near-starving people need our aid, and we should give it as generously and as efficiently as we can. There is, moreover, the question of trade, as well as aid, which the Canadian delegation at Rome—despite what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said—seemed to sidetrack by their filibustering methods. It should be evident to us that these poor countries need access to our markets at stable and decent prices. They also need help from all the better-off countries, in terms of technology and capital.

On the other hand, Canada, the United States and other donor countries should not be expected to do the following, and I quote Richard N. Garner, professor of law at Columbia University, the originator of the imaginative notion of a "global survival pact" who is referring to the United States but the same sentiment would hold for Canada:

> —be willing to give endless amounts of food to an Indian government that cuts its family planning budget, mismanages food production and distribution and invests scarce resources in the testing of nuclear devices.

That quotation is from the New York Times of November 11, 1974, at page 1. In conclusion, I wish to speak on leadership and generosity. Surely we can all agree that the impoverished nations must in the long run feed themselves and must learn to control their population through family planning that does not seem to them to be destroying their dignity or smacking of an imperialistic and racial plot on our part.

● (1230)

It should now be obvious to all of us that it is very difficult to initiate the practice of birth control in a country in which there is little social and economic progress. Surely it behooves Canada and the other "fat cats" of this world to go an extra mile in helping them with very generous aid in the short run. This will mean, if millions are not to starve over the next decade, that we and the other donor countries will have put together something much more extensive, in food terms, than a Marshall Plan. I submit that this is a frightening and complex challenge, but only then will we have time to witness new agricultural developments in these poor countries and the hope of adequate population control. I think that the Canadian people will show the depth of their generosity as never before, if they are given leadership on this acute problem of our human family. I say this, coming as I do from an area of Canada where poverty and near-poverty, in Canadian terms, is not unknown to us.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), I am pleased to have the opportunity again to take part in a debate on a major international crisis being faced in the year 1974. I am grateful that the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has presented this motion, and for the opportunity to speak again at length on this subject.

Hon. members may recall that on October 21 of this session of parliament I presented a private member's resolution with respect to the establishment of a world food authority. This gave hon. members a brief opportunity to consider the importance and dimensions of the present world food crisis. I think that of immediate concern to all hon. members, and surely to most Canadians, is the question: is there indeed a food crisis? Indeed, we have been inundated in the past few years with a variety of international crises. We have heard of the monetary crisis, the ecological or environmental crisis, the energy crisis, the population crisis and, more recently via the news media, we have heard of the food crisis.

I suppose it is part of the expression of the world in which we live that all of these crises in their turn—and they have considerable dimension—are not confined either within a national boundary or within a regional territory. In a very real sense, they have worldwide dimensions. I suppose we are faced with the situation that one of the problems in dealing with monetary, energy, ecological and population questions is that we have not yet evolved the kind of institutions which can satisfactorily deal with these problems. But I believe it can be said, without fear of contradiction, that the basic necessity of food for human sustenance and survival is so elemental that no subject could take precedence over it.

We have been told repeatedly and increasingly that food shortages in parts of Africa and Asia and in other localized parts of the world are so acute as to cause severe malnutrition and death, and we realize that we are faced with the greatest crisis of all. It is a grave crisis by any stretch of the imagination, whether or not we talk about it in terms used recently in the New York Times, which indicated that 32 nations are close to starvation. Some of the nations mentioned were Bangladesh, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Ethiopia, a whole variety of countries in the northern part of Africa, and specific countries in this hemisphere such as Haita, Honduras, El Salvador and Guyana. These 32 nations which account for hundreds of millions of the world's population have reached such a low-nutrition level that it's becoming increasingly certain that we are on the brink, or are already in a situation of the gravest possible nature.

I should like to read the opening paragraph of the preparatory document put forward at the World Food Conference, which perhaps better than any other document presents the situation in which we find ourselves. It reads:

> The present world food crisis, originating from a combination of longer term problems and temporary setbacks, suddenly emerged in a pronounced form in 1972. In that year the output of food in the world declined for the first time in more than 20 years.

That indicates to us that we are not dealing with the age-old problem of an insufficient amount of food for specific groups of people related to poor harvests and weather conditions, inadequate trade, or a whole variety of events, some man-made and some that are not within the control of man. We have been told repeatedly in this century that more people in this world go to bed hungry every night than people who go to bed having had sufficient nourishment. That is not the problem to which the World Food Conference in Rome is addressing itself, it is not the problem that we are faced with in 1974, nor the problem that we are discussing today. We are discussing a crisis situation.

It is a well known fact that the year 1970 marded a kind of watershed in world food production. Until 1970 there was a continual acceleration of food production which was marginally greater than the growth of the world's population. But we know that following 1970 there was a series of new factors which created a growing gap between the world's productivity and the necessity for the vital elements of food. These relate to a number of man-made factors, such as increased prices and cost of production, decreasing revenues for developing countries, more rapid expansion, in certain instances, of population growth, and a disastrous quadrupling of oil prices in a short period of time which subsequently caused shortage of fertilizers and pesticides so badly needed for improved agriculture in the world.

We are faced with, as a result of these factors—I should also include weather and climatic changes— the most serious kind of famine situation in more than 30 nations of the world. It is interesting to think of that situation vis-à-vis our own domestic situation, because 1970 was a peak year for food production in Canada. It was the year in which we had very large domestic production, so large that we had a large food aid program. I think one would have to say that those two went together. The production was so large that we instituted a program to induce farmers to stop producing. Hon. members will recall the now infamous Lower Inventories for Tomorrow program. It seems a shocking program, in light of what we are facing in 1974.

So there is a food crisis. We read the reports published a few months ago by the executive director of the Children's Fund, who warned that the threat of severe malnutrition or even starvation faces 400 million to 500 million children in poorer countries; and hon. members cannot look with equanimity on the fact that large numbers—in the hundreds of millions—of those who are most dependent, women and children, are near starvation. That, of course, is the background of the present World Food Conference taking place in Rome. It is the reason we are being asked to address ourselves to the important question of food aid, changes in the distribution system in the world and in trade, and development programs that are currently locked into a whole range of international relations.

One of the most outstanding happenings, with respect to our country, at this conference is the commitment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) for a million tons of food aid each year for the next three years: it was welcomed in Rome, and I believe it was welcomed in Canada, as an important move toward the alleviation of the immediate food shortage. I think all Canadians support this gesture. However, in the last two or three days there has been a disconcerting approach to the most immediate aspect of the problem, which is, of course, the next 12 months or even the next 8 months because this is the period of most elemental need in a number of countries.

Last Wednesday we were told that our government was prepared to make an announcement, on an immediate basis, of an additional .6 million tons of food aid to countries facing acute food shortages. Yesterday, however, in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) the Secretary of State for External Affairs backtracked. We have heard that the Secretary General of the Food and Agriculture Organization, has lashed out at countries like Canada who are refusing to respond to the most immediate aspect of the problem. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), in Rome, and here at home the Secretary of State for External Affairs, indicated that they are waiting, to put it in the vernacular, to see who else is going to put money on the table before Canada makes its move. In Rome, the Minister of Agriculture apparently expected to see some quid pro quo either from the oil producing nations or other nations who might make a financial contribution that would pay for the aid we are supposed to provide during the current year.

Apart from the commitment we have announced for the next three years, if you look at what has happened in Canadian food aid since 1970-71 you will see it is a sorry story in comparison to world food needs. In 1970-71 we gave 1,271,000 metric tons; in 1971-72, 1,663,000 metric tons; in 1972-73, 782,000 metric tons; in 1973-74, 637,000 metric tons; and the expectation for this year, before the commitment in Rome, was 570,000 metric tons. That is not a record to be proud of in light of the current food situation.

I wonder where the government stands, Mr. Speaker. If we can do nothing else in this debate today, hopefully the Secretary of State for External Affairs or some government spokesman will clarify the government's position with respect to immediate food needs. I think Canadians will be flabbergasted to realize that we have talked magnanimously about contributing a million tons a year for the next three years, and then have completely held off making a contribution when it is needed most, that is, during the next few months. It is monstrous to think that people who are starving can hold out in the expectation of food aid 12 months from now. They will not have the capacity to survive that long.

I do not want to speak only about that, Mr. Speaker, although I think it is vital that it be clarified in this debate, but I also want to speak about Canada's general attitude to the World Food Conference. It is an attitude which has depressed me and many members of this House. I think we have seen very clearly, in this conference, a tremendous vacuum of leadership. Major world nations such as the Soviet Union, the United States and China have, for different or perhaps similar reasons, not been able to provide vital leadership to the conference. In potential, Canada has had a tremendous opportunity. In many ways we were the ideal country to provide leadership to the conference. In a sense, we straddle the fence in that we are one of the more developed nations and yet have many of the characteristics of the underdeveloped world, particularly in the utilization of our natural resources and our energy. We are undoubtedly a major world producer and exporter, as well as a major trading nation.

In view of the absence of leadership by the great nations at this forum, it would have been logical if our two ministers and our official delegation at Rome had worked both at the preparatory conferences and during the past two weeks at the final conference to provide leadership on key questions that have not yet been resolved. But what has our leadership done? We have said, in the first instance, that we are prepared to give food aid for the next three years but we are not prepared to commit ourselves for the immediate future. We have said that discussion on questions of trade and development is not appropriate at this forum and should be discussed under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

In answering questions that I put to the minister on Tuesday and Thursday of this week he seemed to be trying to assure me and other members that if I would only be patient, something beneficial for the developing countries would come out of GATT. If there had been representatives and observers from developing nations in the gallery, I think they would have been shaking their heads sadly to realize that Canada is still committed to an institution which has shown so little responsibility toward freer, fair trade practices in respect of the developing countries. Many years ago GATT was dubbed "the rich man's club". It is basically in response to the failure of GATT to develop appropriate trade relationships with the underdeveloped world that we have had three conferences sponsored by the United Nations Conference on Trade, Aid and Development. Often the shortcomings revealed by the UNCTAD meetings have been the result of the GATT nations only being willing to "talk turkey" in their own forum.

Why cannot this country recognize that we have not yet found an appropriate institutional arrangement through which the underdeveloped countries can develop satisfactory trading relations? The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he did not think a discussion of these issues at the Rome conference was appropriate, and that we must wait. I find that difficult to understand, Mr. Speaker. The opening speech of the Secretary General of FAO, and the major documents that were prepared for the conference and for the preparatory meetings, offered not only an abundance of evidence of need for restructuring the international economic community, but a series of very specific resolutions. The Third Committee, entitled National and International Programs of Action, recommended specific objectives and measures in the area of international trade and adjustment which are relevant to the food problem, including measures toward stabilization and expansion of markets for exports from developing countries.

Our responsibility at Rome was to provide some leadership, some link between the underdeveloped countries of the world, who often focused their presentations on the Group of Seventy-seven, the developed nations and those that are oil producing. Canada is almost unique, in that we have characteristics of an underdeveloped country because we export willy-nilly too many of our unprocessed resources as well as a great deal of energy, and we are heavily integrated with the economy of the United States; and, because of our oil producing capability, we have the opportunity to talk to the OPEC countries. But the Secretary of State for External Affairs has told us that in respect of this conference we will adopt a "wait and see" attitude. That is not international leadership, Mr. Speaker; it is the path of least resistance. Indeed, it is the path of the cowardly lion. I shudder to think that our response to the world food crisis so far has followed that path. Canadians will not hold their heads high in regard to our performance to date on the question of the world food challenge.

I hope it is not too late to take action. There will be conferences, in February of next year, of the United Nations Conference on Trade, Aid and Development—UNCTAD—and following Rome there will be ministerial meetings. I hope that our ministers and their officials will review what has been said in this country. I think there is a substantial and growing body of public opinion that is far ahead of this minister and this government with respect to the problem. I believe Canadians expect much more leadership on this problem than we have received to date. When the minister responds today, I hope he will indicate that he is taking the matter seriously. In the last few months there have been outstanding meetings of non-governmental agencies in Ottawa and in regional centres. Meetings of agribusiness organizations have indicated they are prepared to make a commitment. The opportunities are immense for the minister to respond to the appetite for leadership, and I hope we shall see the first evidence of this in the debate today.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity I have to speak on the motion before us which seeks to blame the government and reads in part as follows:

—condemns the government for its failure, both before and during the World Food Conference in Rome, to provide leadership concerning the food crisis facing many developing nations, and calls on the government to give real leadership on this most acute problem of our time—

Mr. Speaker, our judgment of the proceedings at the latest World Food Conference in Rome must not be one-sided. The first question we ask is what has Canada done until now and what should it have done. We must also ask what have and should have other countries done.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

That is why it is said that Canada should give leadership or even take the initiative in those matters. Any ordinary and simple man must not aim at doing a giant's work. Without inferring that Canada has done all it could until now, we may assume that it certainly cannot accomplish as much as more powerful countries, because we must remember that its population is only 22 million people and its doings must be related to its size.

As for the needs of underdeveloped countries, no one will deny it is urgent that producing countries offer them help.

When I examine the whole situation, I can see that the main enemy to this aid that all producing countries should be offering to the population of underdeveloped countries is the profiteer. And there is quite a number of profiteers. Mr. Speaker, whether it is an individual, a cartel, a chief of state or even a nation, whoever wants to can find a way to use this aid to make what is known as big money, money which is the economic blood stream of all nations. I believe that in this as in other things, it is still he who controls finances who is often the cause of the atrocious famines which are devastating certain countries.

Mr. Speaker, Canada should concentrate more on the production side and lend a hand to the food industry, expecially agriculture. If we are really living in a favoured country, rich in produce of all kinds, we must stop going against the grain of nature by preventing production, even going to the length of paying farmers to prevent production with the excuse that we will have too much grain and too much beef. The western producers have been paid to prevent them from producing wheat for fear of having too much the next year. Subsidies were granted to egg producers and they were paid to kill chickens because there were too many eggs. Producers in almost every field in Canada are paid to prevent them from producing while two thirds of the world population is starving to death.

That is the ridiculous situation we are living in, here, in Canada. That is why the government should, in future, grant subsidies to that industry par excellence which is agriculture instead of allowing further slaughterings like those which have just been witnessed in my region as a protest against the government. The government should stop granting subsidies to the tune of $100 million and $200 million to multinational corporations and should rather give them to those who produce so that entire populations might live. That is the only way that Canada will be able to help the underdeveloped countries.

May I say that it is one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

[Translation]

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before the House took recess, I was saying that if the government is to fulfill those promises they made at the World Food Conference, namely to supply underdeveloped countries with more grain, they should give Canadian producers some incentives. I know that if we want to double our production, the only way to encourage Canadian farmers to do so is to double farm aid, because we have to admit that if we are going to help underdeveloped countries, we shall only be sending them our surpluses. We know that Canada has production surpluses and can produce more provided production is not being stymied, and farmers are enabled to cultivate every tillable land in Canada.

Today, Mr. Speaker, 40 per cent of farm lands in my area are not being used for agricultural purposes. In view of world needs, I think this is a shameful situation. We are just behaving like cowards in respect of two thirds of the starving people of some countries who are awaiting their leaders' decisions.

Canada has provided them with grain and a certain amount of money, but I believe the greatest need of those countries is for technical help. I was just reading part of a statement in which the minister said, I quote:

> It is therefore likely that the conference will concentrate on the means of increasing food production in developing countries. The conference will however also deal with the necessity to increase world food safety by improving medias and coordinating storage activities.

I believe the major problem of developing countries today simply lies with technical help. We agree that we have to send them food to help them survive until they are in a position to provide for their own needs by themselves. Not only do we have to feed populations for a few months or a few years, but above all to provide them with the means to ensure their own survival. I think we shall have to work harder in that direction in the next few years.

The minister announced in his report that to fertilize the lands in underdeveloped countries, our nation should provide fertilizers and expertise in drainage techniques. I agree with that.

I think that right now those countries are in greater need of water wells than oil wells.

Today all the money is devoted to the oil wells, forgetting the important thing, that is drilling water wells to fertilize the land and allow people to live in a country which can supply them with food and clothing, provided technology enters those countries.

That is what Canada has been doing and can do in the future. I was also wondering what the other industrialized or producing countries were doing. The minister mentioned in his report he would do everything possible as long as the other countries would do their share and also make a commitment, and that is normal. The oil producing countries today do not know what to do with their oil, even in areas of starvation. I suggest the leaders of those countries are criminals and the United Nations should bring them back to order and force them to produce not only oil and arms, but also and more particularly food. I have here an article of La Presse of November 12 entitled "I feel war is close." I quote:

> Following the Rabat summit last week Saudi Arabia and a few other oil producing countries undertook to supply annually $1 billion to Syria and Egypt, $300 million to Jordan and $50 million to the PLO for the purchase of arms. That led an observer (cf Times 11-XI-74) to say: "If the United States try to do as much for Israel, their balance of payments will remain in the red forever".
> According to Mr. Arafat, the Pentagon intends to do as much for Israel and is currently making haste to deliver huge quantities of arms to them. Why so much money? Why so many arms? If eggs are broken it must be because there is an omelet in the offing.

Such articles, Mr. Speaker, make serious nations shiver. We all are aware of the feeding needs of some people and a war is being prepared with billions of dollars.

The nations which still believe in peace and justice in the world should rise and protest against these things. One will say that they are oil producing countries. If we wanted to use oil today for the sustenance of people, we could do fine things. I read in the Courrier de l'Inde in connection with the struggle against starvation:

> Oil proteins should be sold on the market for feed grain, beginning in 1970. A synthetic meat is being developed in the United State from soya beans as well as synthetic milk for human consumption. The congress of the British Veterinary Association is discussing what is called the new era of food.

● (1410)

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be much more profitable for those countries to get back into this new era of food and to stop playing war, because that is a very dangerous game.

Mr. Speaker, when we look at the other countries, we wonder what they have done with the aid that Canada has given them. Every one knows what has happened in Ethiopia where Canadian gifts have been used by financiers and members of government to line their own pockets.

As for Pakistan, Bangladesh and all those other countries, Canada has taken its responsibilities. The authorities of those countries also have great responsibilities.

I always think of India when it is suggested we send meat to those countries when the people of India still have beef walking around in city streets.

An hon. Member: Sacred cows!

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Sacred cows!

Well, I, for one, think that the population should eat those sacred cows instead of letting them walk around in their cities.

I think that world organisations should warn those countries, help them technically and also give them the means to feed their populations.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see that in all countries, the governments are sacrificing production to improve their finances and the position of their financial backers.

As I said before, the greatest enemy of all is still financial interests. There will always be people who will think of their financial interests before thinking of saving human lives. While two thirds of the world population are starving to death, those who are holding the purse strings are playing games. The international fat-cat financiers, although they are protected by governments, know that it cannot last. That is why they are looking for an opportunity to provoke a world war to serve their financial interests once again with a deluge of human blood. That is the present situation!

Mr. Speaker, some people say:"It's no use reasoning with a hungry man". The underdeveloped countries are ready to do anything to get a meal a day.

Mr. Speaker, my time is almost gone. In conclusion, I hope that the producing countries will awaken and become aware of the situation in the underdeveloped countries and provide them with assistance.

● (1420)

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to particularly congratulate the mover of today's motion for a statement that set a very good level of debate in this Chamber. I listened to him with a great deal of attention, and there was very little in his speech—a very serious, but moderate speech—with which hon. members of this House could disagree. I think the second speaker for the official opposition, and the hon. member who followed him, also set the tone for this debate concerning a problem we all recognize as being most serious.

On this side of the House we often wonder what the opposition will choose as its subject to present against the government. I think it would have been equally in order for the opposition to have chosen a motion dealing with inflation; they could have talked at some length about the increasing cost of food production and the need for a subsidy on bread to keep the price within the limits of the people of Canada. Their motion could have called attention to the problems of agriculture, and they could have said that the government should do more to stabilize prices to consumers in Canada. That would have been a good and realistic case requiring an answer.

The case of our international responsibility has also been put—that Canada should take the lead in pledging more food to other countries of the world, especially those which have been described in such startling terms as facing famine in our generation. There is no question that the case is good, and convincing. The responsibility of the government is to balance priorities—priorities on the domestic front and on the international front—to meet the total program that is to be presented.

The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) asked a rhetorical question, "Is there a crisis of food production?" Of course, he was very well able to document the fact that there is a crisis. I did not hear him, in the course of this debate—and I regret that I did not hear his previous statement on a private member's motion—amplify his reference to climatological changes which are taking place. This is a subject that has disturbed me and, I am sure, other members of this House. Those of us who have read the works of Professor Reid Bryson, director of the Institute of Environmental Studies at the University of Wisconsin, would have very grave reason to be concerned if just a small fraction of what he is predicting is true.

I should like to call the attention of hon. members to an article that appeared in Science on May 17 of this year, volume 184, No. 4138. It is called "The Perspective of Climatic Change," by Professor Reid Bryson. It is written in fairly technical terms and is a paper presented to the American Association for the Advancement of Science. It is not the kind of article which the average reader would be able to digest in terms of the technical discussion, the data, charts and evidence. A much more popular version appeared in Fortune magazine in February of this year, by Mr. Tom Alexander. It is entitled "Ominous Changes in the World's Weather". I know there have been prophets of doom from the day of Thomas Robert Malthus, and there have been grave predictions about what is happening in relation to problems of food supply; but many of us have learned that these prophesies of gloom have been grossly exaggerated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It started with Adam and Eve.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggests that perhaps these prophesis started in the days of Adam and Eve. I do not think we can dismiss the evidence lightly, and we have an obligation to look upon it. In quoting Bryson's findings, he suggests that we have always assumed in the past that changes in climate are a matter of geological record; they are in the deep and distant past and we do not have to take them very seriously. But Professor Bryson and his institute have, over a period of several decades, carried out very careful studies on changes in the climate in Iceland, careful probes of Greenland's ice-caps, and they have tried to assess over a long period what has happened to our climate.

If there is anything that will send shivers up your spine, it is the reading of some of their predictions. They say that for nearly half of the current century mankind was apparently blessed with the most benign climate of any period in at least 1,000 years. During this kindly era the human population more than doubled, and now there is good reason to believe that the world's climate is reverting rapidly to its less beneficent form. I know that somebody will say at this point, "We have heard that story before," but I suggest there is an obligation to look at the evidence—and the evidence is startling. One of the scholars associated with the team which was considering the long-term trends said:

> One of climatology's more surprising recent conclusions, derived from investigations of sea-floor sediments, is that for at least the past 700,000 years, global mean temperatures have been as high as they are now only about 5 per cent of the time.

Then it is said:

> —sometimes transistions from one major temperature regime to another have taken place with astounding rapidity, often within a century or so.

Bryson attempts something that many scientists say is still unproved; that is, to provide a global hypothesis of climatic change. I am not competent to do justice to it, but the essence of the forecast is that something is happening around the polar ice-cap which is disturbing wind patterns on the surface of the globe. He refers to changes in the monsoon in northern India and to patterns in southern France and the northern deserts of the Sahara. He relates this to areas in which droughts are occurring where they did not occur before, and where floods are occurring where they did not occur before. He puts the thesis to us that we are indeed facing a major diminution in food supply areas of the world. If a fraction of what he says is true, the consequences are most serious. He predicts, for example, that the monsoon will not return to northern India in the foreseeable future. Such a prediction would have incalculable consequences to large numbers of people in all parts of the world, should it prove to be true or should it prove to be true for a few years only. There is a crisis. We all accept that. I simply call attention to these two articles because I have not heard reference to them, and the evidence presented is not of a nature that we can lightly or quickly brush aside.

The problems of world food production have been outlined by other hon. members. I have a brother who has spent most of his lifetime studying this matter. He is a professor of food technology in a United States institute. I can barely discuss nor can I read his articles and understand them. But in the course of fishing expeditions in the summer, when we get together, he has said that we should consider what is happening to a number of food exporting nations in the world, particularly those that export proteins. For example, Argentina has ceased to be a food exporter in recent years. What has happened there can only be construed as a tragedy. It cannot be construed by many people who know the field as anything but mismanagement of the food resources of that country.

The failure of the Soviet bloc to develop the agricultural technology which would permit it to take its place among the food exporting nations of the world is a tragedy of our times. The potential food producing areas within the political domination of that bloc are equivalent to those of North America. It is to the North American economy that the world is looking for leadership and for supplies of food. I do not think we in Canada should take a narrow, parochial view of the question of the supply of food on this continent. It is easy to say there are certain techniques in North America, and in so doing we may be accused of being continentalists. Every speaker mentions Canadian food production and agriculture as though this existed on its own without reference to patterns of food development on this continent.

I am proud, as I am sure all hon. members are, of the target pledged by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) when speaking on behalf of Canada at the World Food Conference. Members participating in this debate rightfully have said we should be able to do more. The emphasis clearly is on leadership. We accept that. I do not think anyone in this House would dispute it. We must recognize that there is a very close and intimate association, not only in respect of technology and the means of producing food but also the problems the world faces on a broader front, including the crisis in respect of energy and the crisis in respect of the balance of payments, which is a very serious question; it has caused dislocations in western Europe in countries such as Italy and the United Kingdom.

The spokesman for Canada at the World Food Council—the minister—said, very properly, that it is a matter of long-term, collective planning. We are prepared to accept more than our proportionate share of responsibility because we have the resources and the food capacity; we accept the responsibility because of these facts. We have the responsibility of making sure that our agricultural industry does not follow the lead of countries such as Argentina and others where there has been waste. We must continue to take our place with other food exporting nations of the world. However, I am sure we would be deluding everybody if we were to suggest that a permanent solution of the world's food problems can be found on the basis of the continuous support of large exporters of food to other areas dependent, as they are, in the short term.

I was particularly interested in the reference by opposition spokesmen to world population problems. The hon. member who introduced the subject was careful and I found myself in substantial agreement with everything he said. But he did make one remark which gave me a little concern. I think I know what he intended. He said that the problem is not population but, rather, consumption so far as large areas of the world are concerned. He said Canada should give the lead by consuming less and exporting more.

I think that is a fair statement of his position. Few of us could disagree with that. However, as a matter of practical politics and a balance of priorities which the government must face, I think we must say there is a very serious problem of population in many areas of the world. It is not just a matter of our consuming less. It was a matter of regret to me to read in the record of the world population conference at Bucharest of the failure by large sections of the world and many countries to accept the responsibility that they clearly must accept in our time. The hon. member who introduced the motion said social and economic development and population policies must go hand and hand. We agree, but these must both progress. There is no way in which the planet can continue to support the population being generated in some parts of the world without the most profound and distressing social consequences for millions and millions of people.

Recently I had the opportunity to visit the General Assembly of the United Nations, where I looked at the population commission forecasts. I believe the member who introduced the motion said that 80 per cent or 84 per cent of the really seriously underprivileged people of the world will be found in the Asiatic regions by the year 2000. I have seen forecasts that are even more shocking. Projections must be made on the assumption of increases in population in our country in our time. We have come very close to something like zero population growth in respect of those who are residents of Canada.

I hope we will always provide a haven for those who suffer from problems of persecution in other countries of the world. We have been a country which has welcomed people from other parts of the world and I am sure we will continue to do so, but I think most of us who have given thought to this matter are beginning to say, and some of my colleagues on this side of the House have said, that the world must relate certain things. It must think in terms of its numbers. It must think in terms of policies which relate to those numbers. It must think in terms of its food supply and must adopt—and the difficulties technologically and economically are immense—social and cultural measures which will lead us to a more rational development of our food supply. The world must plan, not only the use of this food technology but also its energy resources in such a way that there is not serious disruption in respect of other nations attempting to pursue the same goal.

I believe we can do more and I am sure we will do more: I am sure Canada will do more in the short-term and in the long-term. I am sure we will maintain an efficient agricultural industry which will be one of the finest examples to offer the rest of the world.

I am sure that in the councils of the nations of the world we will continue to call attention to the many fronts on which progress must be made before the spectre of hunger can be averted in our generation. It was the historian Toynbee, a very well read scholar, who said that the tragedy of the twentieth century was that it had the potential and technology to overcome the ancient scourges of illness, famine and lack of shelter, but it could not find the means to apply them.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today condemns the government for its failure to provide leadership in the food crisis facing us and asks the government to adopt a trade policy favourable to the future development of countries which are in distress. I am pleased to take part in this debate because I represent one of the great sunshine, food producing areas in Canada, namely, southwestern Saskatchewan. There is growing, worldwide respect for agriculture, and this is as it should be. In Canada we can produce enough food for 60 million people if we go full-out in respect of agriculture. However, in India alone there was an increase in population in the last four years of 70 million people.

We are all aware of the World Food Conference which just ended in Rome. I am sorry to note there were not more firm decisions taken. But now the major grain traders of the world have put off making a decision until they meet in London, England, on November 29 after the regular International Wheat Council meeting. It appears that the immediate need will be for between 185 million and 200 million bushels of wheat in the next 12 months. Canada will be giving away in the next 12 months almost 50 million bushels of wheat. So it is obvious that priority must be given to the agricultural industry and, most important of all, to the producers themselves.

As I said earlier, Canada's food contribution will be mainly in wheat, so I would like to say a few words about this grain. Canada is the largest exporter of high quality bread wheat in the world. Our American friends export more bushels, but it is mainly of the soft, winter variety which is not so well suited to bread-making. Wheat has been connected with the development of man as far back as we can go. A grain of wheat by itself is a small thing, and man by himself is also a small thing. Yet this tiny seed of the grass family changed man's world because, with wheat and bread, he moved out of the cave and was able to control his environment—not be controlled by it. Wheat gave him an everyday food from a grain he could store and plant in a field where he wanted it to grow. Then man went on to live in villages, develop a language and establish laws.

Some men hunted and others planted. With wheat in his hand, man literally walked out of the Stone Age. He went on to build cities and then civilizations. Wheat has a trait denied all other grains. The Egyptians discovered that yeast made wheat dough rise, and this is how they produced bread. The value of wheat was well known in bygone days. In the days when Rome ruled the world, each legionnaire carried a ration of wheat on his back. Wheat was so greatly revered in China that the emperor made the first planting every season. "Bread" was the loudest cry in the French revolution, and Napoléon's generals wept when they discovered that the Russians had burned the wheat fields which lay ahead. Our young visitors in the gallery today will know that war was never started until the harvest was ripe.

I could go on and on, but with all the progress that our grain industry has made, it must be realized that it still starts from a tiny seed in a wheat field. It knows no race, no creed, no colour, no nationality and no politics. However, in Canada we have never been able to separate wheat from politics. I should like to quote the following words from a radio report of the largest grain handling organization in Canada, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool:

> Recent federal government action in Canada—and in some cases lack of it—came under heavy fire November 12, from E. K. Turner, president of Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.
> Speaking at the annual meeting, Mr. Turner said:
>
> "I would like to see the federal budget introduce measures designed to curb inflation, but the interests and priorities of the government appear to lie in other direction."
>
> The president also said pool members, as farmers and operators of a business, "must express our concern about the heavy-handed interference of the federal government".
> Mr. Turner is further quoted as saying:
> "Now we are finding that, increasingly, marketing decisions are being made by politicians and civil servants. Decisions relative to our own operations are being imposed from outside. Farmers' choices are being limited by government decree".

Those are strong words, but unfortunately they are true. Mr. Ira K. Mumford, general manager of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, in reviewing problems of concern to farm people said the following at the same meeting:

> "Excessive public debate about the future grain handling and transportation system and new government grain programs are confusing and unsettling to say the least".

This government seems determined to keep our agricultural industry in a state of turmoil and confusion. Nobody seems to know where we are going. Over the past decade we have been subject to an ideological and political war in Canada over the future of this basic agricultural industry. On the one hand we heard economists conclude from their statistics and projections that agriculture was a poor yield investment and the agricultural industry a dispensable social problem. Quite dispassionately, and on what appeared to them to be perfectly logical economic grounds, they declared both the agricultural community and our wheat industry to be expendable. We know now that that was wrong.

On the other hand, just as scientific and dispassionate in their approach and their arguments were the nutritionists who looked mainly at projected increases in world food needs, and the demographers who studied the frightening rate of increase in the world's population. So on one hand we had a group of experts telling Canada, in effect, to get out of agriculture and into some other, more profitable sphere of industrial output, to cut our heavy social overhead by guiding people off the farms and into urban centres of industry, and on the other hand we had another group of experts saying, "Make agriculture more technology-oriented, more productive, more widespread, more active, not only in the national interest but in the interest of all mankind." We know now that the latter approach is the correct one, but it took us a long time to get there.

We must make sure what this is all about because, after all, it is people and not institutions and systems that we should be worrying about. The problem in the world today is the widening gap between the demand for food and its production, especially in the developing world. The question is, how did we arrive at this situation, and for what reasons, because all the developing countries are predominantly agricultural and yet find they cannot produce to feed themselves? This, then, is the key question.

I notice that in the motion before us the government is being urged to adopt a trade policy favourable to the future development of these countries. I think the answer has its roots in the past 25 years or so in the western world when we stressed massive development and planning. Most of the money and effort in agriculture has been going into capital investment projects for cash crops for export, so as to earn foreign exchange to pay for imports. In the developing countries most of the staple foods are grown by peasants who were neglected in most of the aid and economic development plans. So the ineviatble happened: when you neglect the staple food producer, food production will stagnate and population and costs rise. Sooner or later the gap causes problems.

That is where we are now, and none of us can escape the worldwide consequences. Hundreds of millions of peasants were drawn into the world's market economy as consumers, not as producers. They were taught to want education, to become doctors and engineers, to want transistor radios, king sized cigarettes and Coca-Cola. Mr. Speaker, we should forget about trying to build up a middle-class hooked on our western standards. These people were not taught how to grow and produce more goods to pay for all the things they had learned to want, nor to feed all the extra mouths better health had brought them.

It is interesting that last night the Canadian Wheat Board stated that of the grain we give to Asian countries, about 20 per cent is spoiled by rodents and infestation. That means that if Canada is going to give up to 50 million bushels of grain per year, at least 7 or 8 million bushels will be spoiled. I assure that grain is worth about $7 per bushel laid down in those countries, which means that about $50 million of the taxpayers' money would be wasted every year. Surely there is an opportunity for the government to do something to correct this situation.

These are several attitudes toward foreign aid, Mr. Speaker. The cynical opinion, of course, is that it is an instrument of international exploitation on a grand scale. Another view is that the rich countries were genuinely committed to providing money to promote development in the rest of the world. We all like to think that the poor countries will seize the opportunities and resources offered and that there will be a dramatic eradication of poverty, ignorance and disease in those countries. Surely the truth must be somewhere in between. The rich countries do have interests other than the welfare of far away people, and the governments of the poor countries are as interested in their own political survival as in economic change.

Only now we are beginning to realize the seriousness of the situation which was spelled out so well by the World Food Conference held in Rome. Farmers should not hesitate to speak out, because they have the biggest stake in the agricultural business. Grain policy must emanate from the farm. The misfortune of other people around the world has helped our agricultural industry in Canada, so we can take no credit for policies developed here. Our agricultural industry has survived in spite of the government's action.

A group of farmers, members of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers, attended the World Food Conference in Rome as official observers but as a non-governmental body. They announced that they were very upset at the way the view of producers were being ignored by the conference secretariat. Mr. Charles Munro, the Canadian president of this international federation, said there had been a marked lack of consultation with farming interests when the conference agenda was drawn up. He said that the people who actually produce food have more right than many governments or economists to make decisions.

The question now, Mr. Speaker, is whether the nations of the world will co-operate in this food crisis, or will each nation see its special advantages as a weapon? Canada must re-examine the priorities and practices of her food production. We have tended to pile more and more plans and papers for the solution of food and population crises on the desks of the overworked civil servants of these developing countries. We need more than glib moralizing. I repeat what the hon. member for Egmont (MacDonald) said earlier: there is a growing body of public opinion in this country whose thinking is far ahead of that of this government.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in the short term, food grain must be rushed to the famine-threatened areas. In the long term, world grain production must increase dramatically. Canada must do her share, starting with some clearcut policies by this government.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to join in the debate on this important topic. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) has done us all a service by raising the matter for discussion. While I do not agree with his criticism of Canada's performance to date, I certainly support his concern that Canada's contribution be as effective as possible.

Canadians have always been deeply concerned with their moral and social responsibilities as world citizens, and have tried to give expression to that concern in ways that are practical, effective and acceptable to the other countries involved.

Our approaches to international aid have involved giving both immediate, practical aid and the kind of assistance toward long term planning that allows developing nations to improve their capability to handle their domestic food production, and so on.

One good example of this kind of broad approach is our assistance to the six countries of Africa's droughtstricken Sahel region following a study by CIDA. In addition to supplying food and transport trucks, our projects were aimed at solving problems in agriculture, transportation, food storage, stock raising, reforestation and the provision of fresh water to villages and grazing areas. The project to provide 85 wells in 85 villages in one region of Niger was tied in with existing development plans. I think this kind of careful long term planning may be one of our strengths.

The world food conference had a twofold aim, Mr. Speaker. The immediate problem was to deal with depleted world grain stocks, high prices for food grains, the shortage of fertilizers and so on, and next, to deal with the problems in the longer term.

Canada's response to the need for immediate assistance was prompt. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) announced a gift of one million tons of food grains annually for each of the next three years, and requested other nations to follow this example. A prompt, generous and direct gift of food is a necessary short term solution or answer to an emergency situation; the longer term answer is surely to help nations produce their own food. The $1½ million we granted to Bangladesh to help buy new crop seeds for fall planting, for farmers whose properties had been flooded, was useful. It would have been less useful had it not been made in relation to an ongoing program of Canadian food aid and a knowledge of local conditions, which made it possible to introduce new kinds of winter crops to areas normally left unplanted during the dry season.

I understand that Canada's aid program in 1974 will be about $733 million, including $100 million for food aid and fertilizer. I believe we have attempted to strike a responsible balance between direct aid and helping people to help themselves. Helping people to improve their competence will become increasingly important in the future. I believe this is a role particularly well suited to Canada. We are trusted by the developing nations because we are not a major power and because our commitment to human betterment is well known. Individual Canadians are usually well suited to this role. Anyone who observes this House will of course see that we are very modest and conciliatory people.

● (1500)

Seriously, I think our young people overseas with CUSO, and some of our retired people who have gone to lend their expertise in various projects have been very useful. They have shown their ability to accommodate to local conditions, a respect for local knowledge, and a capacity and willingness to work patiently with a situation rather than impose an alien technology. It has been said that we are going to be asked in the future to lend our best people for projects overseas. I would like to think that perhaps our greatest contribution in the future may be made by giving people expertise rather than direct aid, important though that may be.

[Miss Nicholson.]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) for reminding us, if indeed we needed reminding, that one of the most vital of the many conferences that seem to proliferate in the world these days is taking place in Rome.

We have a term of reference that I think is somewhat apt, by a great poet, Auden, who said wisely "When truly brothers, men don't sing in unison but in harmony." I hope very much that the results of this debate will mean just that. Although there may be political differences, the harmony that can come from such a debate is a will on the part of the government to do what other speakers have said is uniquely in the capacity of this country to do, that is, to provide the type of leadership the world must have if people are not to starve.

In another context I heard a reference to what must be one of the most cynical phrases of the age, that is, that the world is suffering from compassion fatigue. If I knew more about the method man uses to communicate with others, perhaps I could share with the House some observations about this. Some day it might be useful to have a debate on the fact that we are now almost shock proof. Statistics of death, destruction and famine come to us at such momentum that we somehow turn them off, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that is not deliberate. If it is, it is the end of civility as we know it.

The other what I think must be an obscene part of contemporary man is that although mankind is quite able to find cash for armament, we do not seem to have evolved any system of finding cash for those who hunger.

We have had a fairly careful analysis by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) and others of the immediate problem. The immediate problem is the real hunger of south-east Asia and the south Sahara region of Africa which, we understand, face a grain shortage of between seven and 11 million tons. We have also had the statistic that 15 per cent of the production of fertilizer in the United States is devoted to what might be called a trivial use, that is, for lawns, gardens and golf clubs. If that could be diverted to assist in growing crops a real impact could be made in countries where there is need.

We realize that those who have the most surely have the greatest obligation to sacrifice the most. Perhaps that is a trite observation, but no one taking part in this debate thinks that any solution can be found without personal sacrifice and also sacrifice by our government and the governments of the other developed countries.

My colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), reminded us of another immorality of the last decade. That was a program known as LIFT. The interesting point is that two privy counsellors mentioned the immorality of LIFT, one a former Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), and the other, the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan).

In his former capacity the Minister of Agriculture—and I quote from a book "Hard to Swallow" by Walter Stewart—spoke or wrote to several members of the federal cabinet from his position in the back benches warning the government of the results of that wrong-headed policy.

The minister is deserving of a great deal of honour for his foresight.

In a debate about hunger we have to remember that wrong-headed policy. There is no point in sloughing it off and saying it did not happen. It was a deliberate policy of the government, which undoubtedly directly affected the lives of a great many of our brothers and sisters in the world.

I wish to comment on something rather unique that has been happening in Rome. Most of those involved perhaps would not wish me to mention them by name, but I want to mention a very helpful combination of the Canadian Council of Churches and the CCIC. They have provided a sort of latter day truth squad for the benefit of all members of this House.

This GATT-FLY organization went to the UNCTAD Three Conference in Santiago. However, at that time it had not developed a means of communicating quickly with members of parliament or, for that matter, ministers. This time the GATT-FLY group were supported by technical people who were the match of the public servants.

I have no reason to condemn the dedicated public servants who serve the government. The problem is that many of us do not have enough access to those public servants. However, access was provided by GATT-FLY. I commend them for their important addition to our knowledge of this subject. They have informed us on a daily basis of what the government of Canada is up to—they have urged us to commend when commendation is due, and they have urged us to get more information when more information was due us.

As a matter of fact, within the past few minutes they have been in touch with us about a rather negative decision made in the third committee in Rome. That went on just as this debate went on. It was, really, a retreat on the part of the developed nations, including Canada, in the face of the draft resolution presented by Mexico. Many of the requests contained therein were turned down by Canada and other developed countries. As a matter of fact, there was almost no reference to terms of trade.

● (1510)

The reference to just prices for exports in relation to imports was deleted. Deleted, too, was the reference to refunding customs duties, as was the specific reference to the maintenance of reserve stocks of basic cereals with the aim of improving market stability. Most of the references to UNCTAD were deleted, while GATT was played up—

Mr. MacEachen: What's wrong with GATT?

Mr. Fairweather: Well, GATT is the rich man's club after all, isn't it?

Mr. MacEachen: I wouldn't have said so.

Mr. Fairweather: So, what has happened is this: there has been a weakening of international economic order, a weakening of the principles enunciated during the special conference on world economic order held by the United Nations last year.

May I add that the GATT-FLY organization has been efficient, and I hope many other reports from time to time will give members of parliament on a cross-party basis the benefit of this latter-day truth squad, as I have described it.

It was my privilege last weekend to take part in a conference at Aurora, made up of churchmen and others, who tried to reflect on the Christian in politics and the theology of social change. We sent a telegram to Ottawa—I do not know whether the minister received it or whether the Minister of Agriculture received it. That telegram was sent as a result of unanimous agreement reached by a broad cross-section of this country.

It was our feeling that the government is to be commended for the initiative shown in the short term but that, having earned this commendation, the government cannot be allowed to hive off its responsibilities on a world food board, for instance. We also asked for long term solutions to be integrated into measures for economic reform, perhaps by the United Nations. Obviously, we lost that wicket because now we see what happened to the resolution proposed by Mexico. The result leaves much to be desired.

I suppose we all have various ways of manifesting our love for our country. I think it is right that each of us has an individual way of evoking what Canada means to us. The test I have for this country—and I hope many of my colleagues share this feeling—is how we treat our fellow men, or our fellow humans, to put it in the contemporary vernacular. Mr. Speaker, there has not yet come from the Rome Conference, and I am sorry to say this, any sign that Canada is able to meet the test of treating our fellow humans with civility and compassion. This, I regret very much.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in the debate following that of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) and the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) will make it rather ecumenical now. Perhaps, though it was not designed to be that way, it does have its own kind of symbolism, because what we are really talking about is not so much an agricultural, or even a food problem, supposed to be the substance of the debate today, but rather, a moral issue. In many ways it is the central moral issue of our times. The question is: to what extent are we as a people, as individuals, as a nation, prepared to move away from our own self-centredness and start thinking of others?

I was interested listening to the remarks made by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). I always enjoy his contributions, and I would like to reply to some of the things he said in the serious way in which everyone is discussing these serious problems today. On the question of government priorities the hon. member pointed out, and it is true, that government has all kinds of priorities in the same way that people have all kinds of priorities. There is inflation that they are worried about; there are priorities with regard to employment. But how do those priorities really compare with the priorities being faced by millions of people in the world who are nearing starvation?

In our society we have become accustomed to taking each other apart about things which, at best, are merely increments to our already high standard or living. When you place the problems we face against those faced by much of the rest of the world, certainly our difficulties pale by comparison. Can there really be any question of juggling priorities when so much of the world is facing death from starvation? Is it not time we realized that there is one central priority—our responsibility to other human beings? If that means there must be some belt-tightening in this country, if that means we have to slow down somewhat the rise in our standard of living, surely this is what we as human beings, we as a nation, must be prepared to accept.

There has been a reference to Toynbee, a writer many of us have read, and his contention that though it is within our power to put an end to hunger and many of the diseases which afflict mankind, we have yet to devise an effective technique to achieve these ends. The great failure of modern society has been its failure to find this technique. Toynbee's solution is a return to religion. But if you want to take it in a broader sense, what Toynbee is really suggesting is a return to morality. Now, for many, religion has lost its hold, but surely the basis of religion, the idea of morality, has not lost its hold and should not lose its hold on the western world.

It is true we can do all these things mentioned by Toynbee, but we have to see this as a moral issue in order to meet the challenge we face. The hon. member for Ottawa West said that we had to plan the use of the resources of the world. We do not even plan the use of our own resources in this country, let alone plan the use of the resources of the world. We must make a start on planning within this country, particularly in the agricultural field.

Traditionally when we considered the problems of agriculture and food supply it was always in this kind of setting: either we have viewed them from the viewpoint of the consumer—how we can keep food prices down, or how we subsidize consumers; or we have viewed them from the point of view of the producer—will over production affect prices, will the producer be disadvantaged, what is the trade-off between the consumer and the producer?

It seems to me that a third element has now entered into this debate. We can no longer look at agriculture exclusively from the viewpoint of the price paid to the producers by the consumers. We have to look at it from the viewpoint of all out production in order to prevent a great many of the people of the world from starving. This is the kind of approach we should now take to agriculture. This is the kind of planning we must do in our own country before suggesting that the world should also plan.

When you look at agriculture in those terms, you get an entirely different perspective. I think we have made a decent gesture at the food conference in offering one million tons of grain a year. That is a start. But even if we give more—and I think we should give more—and start to plan now to bring more land under cultivation, and to employ our technology better, there are many people who say that we are too late, that regardless of what action we take now the problem is so severe we will be unable to produce sufficient food to head off starvation.

Knowing that there is a distinct possibility that we may well be too late and that starvation will occur despite our best efforts, we are faced with a situation where we must do everything we possibly can, not because we alone can stave off starvation, not because we can eliminate it entirely, but because we have to live with ourselves and to ask ourselves what we did to alleviate the situation confronting humanity. And we must come up with an answer that does not offend against humanity.

In formulating a new agricultural policy we must think in terms of meeting the world's needs. I do not know that our traditional methods of farm or consumer subsidies are going to be appropriate. It seems to me we cannot ask the farmers to bear the cost of our generosity toward humanity. The farmer is, of course, a member of society and will bear his share, but this is a cost that has to be borne by all members of society, not one particular group.

We must guarantee to the farmer an orderly marketing system for his products, rather than let the farmer produce products he cannot sell and thus go into bankruptcy. Today there is a market for food, but there are not many people who can afford to pay the market price.

At the same time there must also be a willingness on the part of society to reduce consumption. The other day I introduced a private member's bill which would amend the Criminal Code to make the destruction of food a criminal offence. Many people have asked me where you stop. The bill appeared to be pointing at the farmer. I was not pointing at the farmer but to society in general. I was pointing to the fact that in a world where people are dying of starvation it is wrong to destroy food. It is wrong to destroy food in order to increase one's own benefit. That was the principle I was trying to establish.

People came to me and asked me what I was going to do to a man who orderd a huge dinner that he could not possibly eat, and then sent it back because the food did not have the right sauce on it. I was asked whether my bill would send that man to jail for destroying food. It is patently impossible either to send that man to jail or to send anybody else to jail in such a situation, but it is not impossible for society to say that such a man is committing a wrong. The fact that he can afford to send back his steak does not give him the right to destroy that food, food that would sustain life somewhere in the world.

This is one of the issues society has to face, and it is one of the lessons we must teach ourselves. In the course of debates on this subject people hesitantly ask, perhaps with the best of intentions, whether it is not their own damn fault that these countries are short of food. I do not think any member of parliament would make the point in quite those terms, but that was the implication of what was said. People would say: "These countries have too many children and are not practising birth control. They are ignoring the advice that we give them. They are letting food rot and spoil. There is a lot of corruption in their society, so isn't it their own damn fault?"

No doubt there is fault somewhere, but the point is that we are destroying much of the food that these people need. This is no time to lecture people. We used to do this with our own poor. I can recall some hesitant ventures in this regard when we were talking about elderly people who reached their old age without a pile of money in the bank. It was said that it was their own fault because they did not save their money while they were earning. Or it was said of someone who was ill that he should have been more careful and not had his accident. Or it was said of someone who had more children than somebody else approved of that is was their own damn fault to have so many. Now we no longer point this kind of accusing finger.

We have now reached a level of understanding. We appreciate that when we eliminate some of the disadvantages experienced by these poor people we do not have to lecture them about birth control or about saving money; they respond in their own way.

The underdeveloped countries make the excellent argument that you cannot deal with their social problems by lecturing them; you can only deal with them by finding some way of giving them a sense of security and support. To some people who live in underdeveloped countries, having children is security in their old age, particularly when they know that famine might take some of their children away. To tell these people not to have so many children is to take away what to them is social security. Until we can tell those people that if they get sick, or that when they get old there will be support for them from the western world, we are not going to change the pattern regarding family size.

● (1530)

As much as we talk about what we are going to do for other people, we also talk about what we are going to do for ourselves. I do not really believe that our society is going to sleep well if it knows it has not taken action to prevent human starvation. I do not see how we are going to have a society of affection, respect and love when we narrow this to our own boundaries or our own families. Whatever we do, and it may appear on the surface as a form of generosity, we are really doing it for ourselves as well. We do have an obligation to others and to ourselves to do everything we can in food aid to stave off a disaster that is facing the world.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure, both before and during the World Food Conference in Rome, to provide leadership concerning the food crisis facing many developing nations, and calls on the government to give real leadership on this most acute problem of our time by increasing its commitment of food and other agricultural assistance to such nations and by adopting a trade policy favourable to their future development.

I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) deserves to be congratulated for bringing the question of the World Food Conference and the world food crisis before the House of Commons, and in that commendation I am sure I am supported by other members of the House. However, I must confess that I find the language of the motion in that context excessive, irresponsible and uninformed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Apart from the argumentation that may have been produced in the debate the resolution seems intended more to berate the government for its failure to feed the hungry. I do not accept the suggestion that the Canadian government, before the conference, did not pay appropriate attention to the seriousness of this issue. In fact, my predecessor, speaking this past winter before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and again when he addressed the United Nations General Assembly in special session in April, identified the food crisis in the world as being of top priority.

From the first meeting of the preparatory committee of the World Food Conference last February, Canada has been very active and has participated in all of the important preparatory conferences. Our ambassador in Rome has been given special responsibilities in attending the preparatory meetings in order to express Canadian concern and advise the Canadian government as to developments.

A special task force was set up within the government in February to prepare for the conference. The deputy secretary general of the conference was in Ottawa in May for intensive discussions on how to get the best results out of the conference. I attended the final part of the agro-industry meeting in Toronto which took place under the auspices of the World Food Conference, consisting of a wide group of the executive and agro-industry people throughout the world, for the purpose of determining how they could contribute to the results of the World Food Conference.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) held discussions with all the provincial agriculture ministers on this problem in July, and out of that conference came a decision to name two provincial representatives to the World Food Conference as members of the delegation, one of whom is the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan. I doubt whether he would share the language that is found in this motion as a commentary on the attitude of the Canadian government.

Federal officials have travelled from one end of Canada to the other to brief provincial governments on the issues, and to advise them on how we saw the conference developing. As hon. members know, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his provincial counterparts discussed the world food situation at the recent conference on inflation, and they agreed on the necessity of close federal-provincial co-operation in ensuring that Canada plays its full role in helping to meet the emergency and the long-term situation.

We did have a good delegation in Rome composed of representatives of the public service, ministers from the provincial governments, members of parliament who attended all delegation meetings and, as hon. members who spoke earlier know, persons from non-governmental organizations.

I did attend the first week of the conference in Rome, and I should like to convey to the House the impressions I formed during my short stay about problems of food and malnutrition in the world. We are all acutely aware of the dimensions of this problem in the world, and of the many difficulties in the way of solving the problem and eliminating hunger in the world. If there is any doubt about the difficulties that have been implied and disclosed in the proceedings at the World Food Conference, I am ready to say that the week I spent in Rome has convinced me, beyond any doubt, that the problems are even more acute than we suspected, and I think now demand an unprecedented urgency.

When I left, the debate was still continuing in the plenary session and the committees had just begun their detailed work. But I can say, apart from reporting on the results of the detailed work, which I am unable to do, that a general consensus did emerge at the conference on the urgency of the problem and the necessity of immediate measures to deal with it.

Again on behalf of the Canadian government and the Canadian people, the Canadian statement at the conference outlined the measures Canada intends to adopt to share common endeavours toward a lasting freedom from want for all mankind.

Our position can be summarized in seven points, and I believe they ought to be put on the record in light of the importance of this debate.

First, Canada is prepared to accord a high priority in its assistance program to the agricultural development of countries which are mobilizing their own resources to increase food production. Let there be no doubt about it, Mr. Speaker, that even with the best of goodwill and with the most vigorous efforts on the part of the developed world there is no way by which starvation in the developing countries can be overcome without the acceleration of food production in the developing countries themselves. There is no doubt about that.

Even if we did have food in the developed world in millions of tons in the future there is doubt whether it can be transported or distributed to the needy people in light of projected population increases over the next period of time. The Chinese delegation, speaking at the conference, said, "Do as we have done; feed yourself". In a sense that was good advice, but it certainly was no answer to the critical short-term food shortage in the developing countries.

Second, Canada will do what it can to mitigate shortages of agricultural input in respect of such things as fertilizer, and will see to it that access to these is maintained internationally on an equitable and non-discriminatory basis. Reference has been made to fertilizer. It is an essential input. Earlier this year, before the Rome food conference, we did commit an additional $100 million to food and fertilizer. I think $43 million of that has been spent on providing fertilizer, but we are limited in what we can do because we do not have, for distribution abroad, the nitrogenous fertilizers which are needed in the developing countries.

Reference has been made to potash. Potash is not wanted. Therefore, we are not able to help in that direction. Rather, Canada intends to play its full part in the accelerated programs that we are asking the competent agencies to devise to make a sustained attack on the problem of malnutrition, particularly among children and other vulnerable groups.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

It is to be underlined, as one of the saddest pieces of information emerging from the conference that 200 million children and nursing mothers are malnourished at the present time. That problem has not been highlighted very much, but we have said to the United Nations agencies, to UNICEF and others, please take note of this problem of malnutrition and we, as a government and as a country, will be prepared to support your efforts in tangible terms in order to reduce this problem of malnutrition.

Fourth, Canada has committed itself to making available, in each of the next three years, an average of one million tons of foodgrains toward a minimum world target of 10 million tons for food aid purposes. We have also committed ourselves to a significant increase in the non-foodgrain commodities which we allocate to food aid. We have agreed to channel some 20 per cent of our total food aid through multilateral food programs such as the World Food Program. All these were proposals put before the conference by the secretariat. I regret to say that in the first week of the conference relatively few countries made any effort to respond directly to the proposals that had been put before the conference by the Secretary General, the former minister of agriculture from Egypt.

Mr. Gillies: Why?

Mr. MacEachen: Why? That is a good question. I wish I knew the answer. Very few countries did. I hope to reach what their commitments were and possibly compare them with the Canadian commitment. I agree with hon. members who have said we ought to be generous, forthcoming, and show our humility in Canada, but when we do that in a responsible way let us not denigrate what we have done.

Let us take the responsibility for telling the Canadian people what the Canadian response has been. In respect of the 3 million tons, 1 million each year, in volume terms not in dollar terms, the Secretary General pleaded with the world community at the conference to please commit 10 million tons per year in volume terms, as a minimum for the next three years. We committed one-tenth of that, which is more than our proportional share, in the expectation that that would induce other countries possibly to come forward and increase the total commitment beyond that 10 million tons. That is the benchmark against which we were working—the proposal made by those who prepared for the conference.

Let us not underestimate the financial consequences of that commitment. One million tons of wheat, at at least $200 a ton, each year will cost us at least $200 million. The reason we have asked to make it in dollar terms is to ensure that the wheat goes forward regardless of the possible increase in the price of wheat in the next few years.

Mr. Stanfield: Dollars or quantities?

Mr. MacEachen: I am sorry; in quantities.

Mr. Hogan: Why do you say that the 10 per cent is more than our proportional share?

Mr. MacEachen: It is very difficult to get an acceptable measurement for all. It seems to me that, when giving our initial response, we were entitled to consider the request that had been put before the conference by the Secretary General who had asked all the world to please give, as a minimum, 10 million tons per year for the next three years. We took 10 per cent of that. Surely on any count that is more than proportional to the financial resources of Canada in its position in the world. This was so recognized by the conference itself.

It is reported in the press that the Australian delegates immediately sought instructions from Canberra, from their Prime Minister, to match the Canadian contribution. The Secretary General of the conference publicly stated that the statement made by the Canadian delegation was a turning point in the conference itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: This statement was also made by the developing countries. I am talking about people who were in Rome, not people who have not been in Rome and who are judging the conference by a very fragmentary and, in some cases, inaccurate report.

Mr. Fairweather: Would the minister answer a question?

Mr. MacEachen: When I finish my speech I shall be happy to permit a question. We are talking about Canada's commitment. We are talking about the fact that it was regarded as the turning point in the conference, so stated by the Secretary General, and so stated by the newpaper put out by the non-governmental organization to which my hon. friend gave such praise. This newspaper states about the Canadians:

They've come up trumps . . .

Canada and Australia put their money on the line yesterday during speeches in the Plenary . . .

The Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Allan J. MacEachen, started the ball rolling in the morning session . . .

I refer to another editorial comment that was made by the Christian Science Monitor, because it was referred to at the Rome conference by one of the most distinguished columnists. That editorial stated:

Canada is to be commended for its pledge at the World Food Conference to boost its food aid to hungry nations by 20 per cent in the next three years.

● (1550)

In fact, in terms of volume the commitment next year to the world food need is double the commitment we have made this year. The editorial went on to say:

Hopefully, this initiative will meet vigorous response from other nations as well.

If I may, I would like to refer to a very interesting report that was on the CBC this morning, made by a correspondent from the BBC, who is attending the conference in Rome, and who is on the spot. This commentator said:

Canada has succeeded in making a very favourable impression in spite of the criticism being voiced in the Canadian press at home. She has been one of the very few countries to make specific pledges, both of aid and cash. One million tons of grain a year for the next three years and $50 million for agricultural development. The Canadian agricultural minister, Eugene Whelan, has been one of the few ministers of cabinet rank to stay in Rome for the whole fortnight of the conference . . . A group of 32 most seriously affected countries which got together earlier in the week, spoke approvingly of Canadian attitudes.

Mr. Fairweather: So did we.

Mr. MacEachen: I am delighted that the hon. gentleman disassociates himself from the resolution which seems to condemn the government for its performance at the Rome Food Conference.

Canada has endorsed the principle of a voluntary undertaking in world food security, and will become a party to it when the necessary arrangements have been worked out, Mr. Speaker.

Sixth, Canada supports, as it has long suggested, a general freeing of trade in food products and will press this objective and other benefits for the trade of developing countries in the forthcoming multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva.

I am happy to say that despite the charge levelled earlier today that the Canadian delegation was filibustering and that we were not taking a helpful attitude in committee III, today the world conference in committee III has completed its work and reached unanimous agreement on grain measures. It is a reasonable text, and the Canadian delegation has played an active part in reaching this good result which will lay a foundation for the detailed negotiation that will take place in the upcoming discussions at GATT.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You don't even believe that yourself.

Mr. MacEachen: Surely the developing countries, which unanimously agreed to this resolution, are in a better position to determine their own interests than is the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald).

Finally, I want to conclude the point form presentation of our position by saying that Canada announced its decision to allocate at once $50 million of our development assistance to be used in ways that will make an effective impact on the present critical world food situation.

My hon. friend has asked: what about today, what about the current situation? Of course it is a critical situation. Up to the present we have committed more than 600,000 tons of grain for this year. The problem that has been bothering the people at the conference is the basic one of supply, the determination in the next months about what is available in the world in the way of supplies of grain in order to meet the requirements in the developing countries. We have participated in that exercise to determine what is required.

It is estimated that we have an amount of 1,300,000 tons which could be made available. It is obvious to hon. members that for Canada to finance in this current year, in addition to 600,000 tons, an additional 1,300,000 tons is an enormous commitment ot undertake at this stage. What we have said on this point is that we have already put forward $50 million that can be used for food aid in the current year, and I have been informed—but I would like to check this information further—that we have completed further allocations at the conference, among needy countries at present, from this amount. However, I would like to make sure that that is absolutely right.

So we are not finished yet, and I hope hon. members opposite will believe that there beats in our souls, as energetically as in theirs, an interest in this problem, and that the love of humanity does not only exist on the other side.

Mr. Fairweather: Nobody said it did.

Mr. MacEachen: We demonstrated our intentions, our proposals, in a more concrete way than any other nation in the world. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond asked, "But what is the standard?" Perhaps he would accept Sweden as a standard. The NDP has always been applauding the great social system that exists in Sweden. It is a country that has a higher per capita income than Canada, and yet I think that our contribution compares favourably with that country's. Sweden has committed to make available, on call each year, a substantial amount, 75,000 tons of grain.

An hon. Member: How much grain do they produce?

Mr. MacEachen: I would remind the hon. member that you can supply grain or you can finance it. There are two ways to do it. So let him not hedge the situation by that comment. If we go down the list of donors we find Iran, Saudi Arabia, Poland, the European Economic Community, Norway, Austria, and if you compare their creditable showing and ours—and I do not for a moment take anything away from them—Canada has shown leadership.

It is false to say that we have failed to give leadership at the conference. It is true to say that if the leadership provided by Canada had been followed, and its contribution matched by other countries, the conference would be adjourning tomorrow with a much greater message of hope to the starving people of the world then they will be given when it concludes tomorrow evening.

I want to say, as I said to the non-governmental organizations when I met them in Rome that this is only the beginning of the effort, because it is an effort that will engage the attention of mankind probably for the next decade, to feed the starving people of the world.

● (1600)

I regard the problem of hunger as great if not greater than any of the other global problems. I assure the House, particularly any hon. members who may have been uncertain, that the Canadian government is giving leadership and will continue to do so—leadership that might not be applauded by hon. members opposite but which has received plaudits around the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) wishes to ask a question. The minister completed his speech at the moment his allotted time expired, so the question can only be asked with unanimous consent. Is the minister willing to accept the question?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House give unanimous consent?

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to give the minister time to cool off.

Mr. MacEachen: I am cool.

Mr. Fairweather: There was no indication of it.

An hon. Member: Somebody had to speak out for Canada.

Mr. Fairweather: There are quite a few Pharisees here, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well fed ones, too.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to be sure that the minister had an opportunity to correct the impression which I think his speech left, that the GATT-FLY group here in Ottawa and in Rome did not give accurate information. That was the charge made by the minister, or at least that is what I took from his speech. I would hope that the minister would want to dispel that impression.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member giving me the opportunity to clarify the situation. I have no way of knowing what information the GATT-FLY group conveyed to Canada. I am not suggesting they were the source of any inaccuracies. I was referring to reports that have been made here and there—for example the report about filibustering by Canada in the third committee, which I regard as an inaccurate report. That is what I have in mind, not the NGOs.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the World Food Conference in Rome has come and gone; previous to its commencement some 12,000 people per day were dying of starvation. With the conference over, 12,000 people per day will continue to die of starvation. While the government can accept some small pride for its efforts, it is cocooned in a notion that it really did something, that it took some small steps. I have to underline the word small because although the leadership it claims may be apparent to it, the fact of the matter is it did almost nothing to solve the world problem of hunger.

The pre-planning conference committee had three points on its agenda—first, to increase food production in developing countries by at least 35 per cent by 1985; second, to improve distribution to make consumption more equitable and third, to establish food reserves as insurance against crop failures and other disasters. United Nations Secretary General Kurt Waldheim opened the conference by asking for a double onslaught by all countries on world hunger. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that our contribution is nowhere near the kind of commitment requested, or the kind of commitment necessary to cope with the problem at hand.

We can note four or five points of criticism of Canada's participation at this conference, Mr. Speaker. First, there is not enough aid; second, there was no argument for an adequate structure for the distribution of aid throughout the world nor the leadership to encourage such structures; third, little was done in terms of helping developing countries to provide for themselves; fourth, little has been done to ask us to change our lifestyle in terms of food consumption; and fifth, there was little or no suggestion that Canada ought to be increasing her present food production.

Let us look at some of the things we have given the developing countries. It would seem we have given them one slice of bread every five days. According to international experts, by 1985 the poor countries of the world will need 85 million tons of grain per year from the developed world. It could well be they would require something in excess of 100 million tons of food or cereal grains per year in less than a decade.

Even if such an amount were available, it could not be moved, Mr. Speaker. One of the things this conference can be criticized for is the lack of planning for the transportation of foodstuff around the world. We should remember how our ports and railroads were fouled up when Russia bought 15 million tons of grain from us. Canada has failed to show leadership by not suggesting discussions on the problems of transportation, or giving any commitments in that area. Even if we had enough grain there would still be a problem because it cannot be transported.

Even before the problem of transportation, there comes the question of whether we can grow enough grain. Little has been done to encourage improved agricultural production in Canada or in the developed world. The minister did suggest that aid be given to those countries that have shown the greatest degree of mobility in agricultural production. That might seem like a good arrangement at first sight, but really those are the very countries that do not need the food as much as the less developed countries. Starvation is not occurring in those countries that have mobility in agricultural production. That is where the minister suggested our aid should go, but that is not at all really giving in the true sense of giving.

The minister also pointed out that we would be doing more trade with cereal grains under GATT arrangements. One has to question why GATT is involved in the situation at all in view of who the aid recipients are, Mr. Speaker. They are the peoples who spend 80 per cent of their dollar on the purchase of food. Should food be supplied by the developed countries under the protection of GATT? In a sense that is not giving anything at all; it is simply another ploy to use the poor to reap wealth for those who already have.

Kurt Waldheim said we have to double the onslaught on world hunger. We are a long way from that, Mr. Speaker. We are something in excess of 22 million tons short in food reserves at the present time. Food production must greatly increase, yet we see very few incentives for what ought to have taken place.

● (1610)

One of the real situations in which we must see a change is in the concept of world structure. We have talked about aid, but we really need to have a world structure that talks about food, distributed through a system such as a world food bank. Only to give aid away is simply a short-term plan, and not a leadership position. We need something like a world food bank that has a long-term assurance of food and the other advantage, avoiding political ties on a bilateral basis.

If there is anything we need it is something that parallels the International Development Agency of the world bank which allows us to collect on a world basis foodstuffs to feed the hungry and distribute them without any political association on a priority basis according to the needs of people.

That was not the government's commitment at the conference in Rome. What it is telling us is that it is going to be giving food to those who have shown the highest degree of mobility in their own agriculture. I suggest that that will not do very much to lower the rate of starvation and malnutrition as it is presently experienced on the planet earth. The situation is extremely serious. In this debate today we are not just talking about the situation that exists at the Rome conference. The motion before us states:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure, both before and during the World Food Conference in Rome—

The key words are "before and during." We have experienced LIFT. It would have been more appropriately called GOOF.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: How in the world could we possibly have had an agricultural policy in this country within the past three or four years that talked about not growing grain? Surely the relevant figures have been before us for something in excess of two decades. Scientists have told us for a considerable period of time what was going to happen, yet in this country, in 1974, we find it acceptable to bury millions of surplus eggs and kill cattle in protest.

The government has not taken the full responsibility before or during the food conference in talking about the need for food and giving it to those who need it most. The situation is extremely serious.

Another area we heard nothing about at this conference, either before or after, concerns what is to be the Canadian or North American role in terms of our consumption of food. That is a question that needs a response. The fact of the matter is that one of the very critical factors that affects the supply of food in the world today is the amount in excess of their need that people in the developed countries are consuming.

One piece of research states that economists and food experts suggest that probably the central theme of the World Food Conference ought to be that Americans and other affluent people had better eat less or face the confrontation of half a billion hungry people.

To give an example, the United States spends more money on pet food than on foreign aid. And I am not going to suggest that Canada is very much better off. We also see other situations. More money is spent in North America putting fertilizer on lawns and golf courses than is used in the whole third world.

With these kinds of problems it is not enough to go to Rome and make a promise. This is a case where we must have a personal commitment; it has to be a commitment from us. We cannot maintain that our standard is right and that we will help only to the extent of our own comfort. If we are to be at all giving, we must give of ourselves as well as giving tangible objects.

North Americans consume directly or indirectly five times as much cereal grain, a principal source of protein, as the average citizen of Latin America, Asia or Africa. When we talk about aid it is important that we do it in terms of reducing our own consumption of food. Putting it in perspective with the minister's statement today I wish to share with this House information that shows the smallness of our commitment in Rome.

It has been estimated that if Canadians ate one less hamburger per week, one million extra tons of grain would be available to feed an additional five million people. The commitment the Canadian people gave in Rome was equivalent to one hamburger per week. I suggest that is a pretty trifling contribution to make to a world that has needs that are so great.

I have tremendous respect for the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan). I respect him for bringing this motion before the House. I differ with him on one position he took. He said that population is not the problem, it is the people and their rate of consumption. To put it in a more correct perspective, consumption has to be seen as very important, but paralleled with it must be the population explosion.

If consumption is the problem, who is it that is consuming all this stuff except people? Obviously it has to be a people problem. The hon. member quoted from Scientific American to illustrate his point. Another article on page 43 states, and I quote:

> In accordance with the same law of geometric progression, the human population has reached its present size through comparatively few doublings. Even if we again assume that humanity began with a hypothetical Adam and Eve, the population has doubled only 31 times, or an average of about once every 30,000 years.

The fact is we now know that population doubles every 28 years, even though the historical average is something like every 30,000 years.

I suggest that at the conference of Rome there is not enough talk about incentives for decreasing population, or at least stabilizing world population. There can be no hope for humanity if we do not reverse the trend of filling the earth plumb full of human beings. The balance of the ecology simply will not accept that kind of filling up. The earth cannot support it. One of the things that must happen is that we must accept a whole new attitude about food.

I have asked questions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) about whether there was ever to be a guaranteed nutritive analysis attached to human foodstuffs. That question has relevance because of the fact that when we go into supermarkets today to buy weiners or bologna, we assume we are buying protein. The fact is in many cases we could buy cheaper protein if we bought roasts or steaks.

It becomes important that we put nutritive values on foods because we need to start educating people to think differently about food. The sale of food products is based on taste, colour and style. We have to realize that the food shortage we talk about in the world is not really a general food shortage. There is enough carbohydrate to go around.

What this world is experiencing is a protein shortage, and a transportation shortage. There is not enough protein; there is not enough transportation.

The government must ask Canadians to set the example. Canadians should be asked to change the amount that they use in luxury foods for pets. The amount we throw away or waste each year is enough to feed a major portion of those who are starving. When I say we, I mean all North Americans. When you note that the United States spends more money on pet food than foreign aid, something is seriously wrong.

Something else that is critical when talking about the "before and after" of this motion is that the government has done virtually nothing to preserve the resources that allow us to produce food. There are only two sources for the production of food, soil and water.

All across this country we see the deplorable situation where acres upon acres of high quality food-producing soil are being taken out of production. The federal government may suggest that is a provincial responsibility and that it has no obligations in that field. However, that is not so.

I give just one example out of a large number which might have been chosen. A decision was taken to build a satellite airport encompassing 1,445 acres near the community of Villeneuve, North of Edmonton. Three sites were available. The site chosen covered 50 per cent class one soil and 45 per cent class two soil. Mr. Speaker, many countries in the world do not have class one or class two soil. An alternative site was available three miles to the west which would have used class five and class seven land only—class five soil is non-improvable pasture, and class seven is non-agricultural.

Every year in this country large tracts of agricultural land are being removed from production to the extent that by the turn of the century it is estimated 50 per cent of the highest grades of soil will have been destroyed. At the present time there are virtually no incentives forthcoming to reverse this trend. How serious is it? According to soil science professors at the University of Alberta it is serious to the extent that, if the present trend continues and if the Canadian population doubles by the year 2,000, as predicted, this country will have great difficulty in feeding itself, let alone building up reserves of grain to distribute to the developing countries.

To give another example. In the last seven years the City of Edmonton has expanded over agricultural land, 19,438 acres of which were in the top two soil classes. That amount of land would easily have raised 80 million bushels of wheat over the next hundred years. I speak in terms of a century, but the anthropologists tell us that man has been on this earth for some 50,000 years. I am sure that cities would not be allowed to spread over this kind of acreage if, underneath the land, were tarsands, nickel, iron ore or any of the other resources we consider to be of value today. There is simply not enough attention being given to food production in this country and in the world generally. This, also, is a subject which calls for leadership.

In summary, while I realize the government would like to take pleasure and pride in what has been achieved so far, I do not believe it can properly do so. The minister said that the mover of this motion used language which was excessive, irresponsible and deplorable. I would reply by saying that anyone who reads today's Hansard will realize that a lot of information has been put on record today. It certainly was not irresponsible to show concern for those in the developing countries where between 400 million and 800 million people are suffering from malnutrition. And it can hardly be called excessive to ask that more should be given, when the pets of North America live in circumstances far better than any which exist for the greater part of the human community.

The cause is mankind; the need is great. The country must go beyond platitudes and talks concerning agreements on tariffs and trade, if it is to show leadership. We cannot expect people who have nothing to get their food through trade arrangements with the rich. I think that the government's position is deplorable, is excessive, and that it is irresponsible.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to put forward a few points of view in this debate. I had intended to begin by congratulating the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) for expressing his concern on this subject, and for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I must say, though, that I question how seriously he or his party are committed to this motion when I see only one member of his group in attendance in the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How many Liberals are here?

Mr. Stanfield: Where is the cabinet?

Mr. Milne: I should like to make a few comments which may appear to be somewhat apart from the core of the question we have been considering. I believe the government should be commended on the stand it has taken, the concern it has shown and the commitment it has made in this situation where millions in the undeveloped countries of the world are facing starvation.

It appears to be the wish of many people that Canada should make a very large commitment of grain to help meet these circumstances. This, in my view, is commendable. After all, Canada grows a lot of grain. Grain is a product which has a long shelf life; it can be used almost directly for human consumption, or indirectly through livestock feeding. But this raises another issue.

We in this House are aware that from time to time food surpluses arise in this country, and there is a disposition to send these surpluses to under-developed countries should it be possible to do so. For example, in the riding I represent there was, recently, a surplus of potatoes which had been damaged by frost. These potatoes are unacceptable to the Canadian table trade. One of the solutions might be to have them made into flakes or instant mash, which might then be made available to the world food program. When I looked at the arithmetic involved, though, I realized how expensive it is to proceed with this type of approach.

Canada could, perhaps, be offering many of these other food items but it is not possible to do so because of the very high cost of processing and packaging—the packaging is necessary in order that the product may be distributed without waste, spoilage, or, perhaps, pilferage, after it reaches its destination. When the government is considering making funds available for food relief programs I trust it will not ignore the need for storage refrigerators and an adequate distribution system within the countries we are trying to help. Without doing this we are restricted to commodities such as grain that require no refrigeration and can be distributed through very low quality systems.

I listened with interest last evening to the representative of the Canadian Wheat Board who appeared before the agricultural committee. He put forward a view I think we would do well to reflect upon, Mr. Speaker. He made the point that world population is increasing at the rate of 2.5 per cent to 3 per cent a year, as the hon. member opposite mentioned, but that world food production is increasing at only 2 per cent to 2.5 per cent a year. So it appears world food production is falling behind the gain in population.

This official put forward what I thought was a rather interesting viewpoint. He said the problem for the future will be related more to the cyclical nature of food production rather than the total amount of food production. It was his point of view, if I interpreted it correctly, that there would be periods of severe food shortage, as we are now experiencing, whereas at other times we may have a very high inventory as a result of good crop years. This leads me to agree with the previous speaker who said one of the things we should seriously consider is the establishment of a world food bank, so that when grain and other commodities are available in some quantity they can be stored and handled by a central agency, and be available in real time of need without disrupting the economies of the food producing countries.

One question has been avoided by a number of members who have addressed themselves to this problem, and now perhaps is the time to raise it, and I do so on a personal basis. It seems to me it would go a long way toward correcting some of the difficulties that have been referred to if refrigeration facilities, storage facilities, transportation facilities and distribution facilities were substantially funded.

Perhaps this might be a good investment for some of the countries today that are accumulating large amounts of world currency. Generally speaking, these countries—I speak particularly of the OPEC nations—are not major food producers, and through this medium they would offer direct assistance. In addition, many other countries could respond very vigorously in supplying expertise. I hope that in fulfilling our commitment of large grain shipments, both now and in the next three years, we will not ease up on sending to the needy countries those people in Canada who can do so much in helping them become more self-sufficient. In this regard I sincerely applaud the opening remarks of the minister; nothing could be more true.

Irrespective of the commitment of this country or any other country, the end solution has to be self-sufficiency in as many countries as possible. As I say, the best way of achieving this is to provide expertise, and I think in this regard Canada has something to offer in terms of research into grain production, growing and harvesting.

The question was raised this morning of why we were not sending more fertilizer to the third world. In my past occupations I have had some experience with the fertilizer industry and its problems, and I have reservations about whether this is a very viable suggestion. I am surprised that the mover of the motion we are now debating did not make the point that we should contribute toward building fertilizer plants in countries of need. I think what escaped the hon. member was how very expensive fertilizer is, if it is manufactured in this country or the United States, by the time it gets to the third world. How much more economical it would be if they had their own fertilizer plants and we shipped the necessary ingredients to them.

This brings me to another area that is even wider. Any country that is hopeful of a real future must be self-sufficient both in energy and in food. Unfortunately, at the present time, with trends in pricing set by many factors of the sort we have been discussing during the last couple of weeks, the price of food and energy on the world markets is accelerating at a rapid rate. This puts the underdeveloped nations in a much less favourable position than they ever were before.

I am sure all Canadians, as most other people, sincerely want to do the best they can to assist in the present crisis, but what is so disheartening to them is that things are getting worse, and probably will continue to get worse since the underdeveloped countries are becoming increasingly incapable of purchasing food, fertilizer and energy. As I say, if they are to have any hope of a future we must address ourselves to the question of how we can narrow the gap.

I was quite impressed with the remarks of the previous speaker, not only with what he said and the manner in which he said it, but in terms of the attitude that he said some countries we are trying to help adopt in relation to population trends. This question embraces more than simply consumption of food and food availability; it is a question, addressed to the whole world, of the capability of the world to meet food demands.

Somewhere the two points of food production and world demand will meet on the graph and cross. A number of speakers have indicated that perhaps this point in time is not that far into the future and no amount of talk is going to change that. As we are approaching this point we must recognize that, if we want to live on this earth in peace and give the underdeveloped countries hope for the future, we must address ourselves to these two questions of world food demand and the capability of the world to produce that food.

I do not want to talk about energy today, but in relation to the food crisis there is an old saying which is quoted many times, that a hungry man knows no God and knows no boundary. If we cannot effectively solve the present problem and give these hungry people hope for a final resolution of their problem, then we will be facing a much larger problem some time in the future. That is why it is terribly important to take action now.

One very important point that the minister mentioned, and which I want to adopt, is that despite the crisis we are facing today, and the very generous offer Canada has made to help to the best of our ability, the key to the problem is to make the third world as self-sufficient as possible in terms of food production. In this regard those nations too have some responsibility to do something about their population trends.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very good debate this afternoon on the World Food Conference and the situation in the world generally. The case has been very well put forth by the opposition parties, and we have heard a defence on the part of the government of what it has done and contributed.

● (1640)

I should like to say a little bit about what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) has outlined as one of the concerns of the World Food Conference in Rome, and that is in respect of the supply of food, or the lack of it. This afternoon the minister was very thin skinned and felt that Canada had made a tremendous contribution. I do congratulate the government for what it has done, but I think it should do more in relation to the amount of agricultural production we have in Canada.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in his speech in Rome, and I take this out of context, said that what is obviously needed now is a world agricultural policy, and there is not one. I would say the same thing to the government of Canada, and the producers in Canada have been saying this for a number of years. What is obviously needed in Canada is an agricultural policy, and there is not one.

In 1968 and 1969 we had an agricultural congress which was supposed to develop an agricultural policy for Canada. We still do not have an agricultural policy, due mainly to the lack of leadership on the part of the government over the years. I suggest that the agricultural congress was held as the result of producers in Canada saying the government had adopted a cheap food policy, a policy of bringing cheap food into the country from anywhere in the world to compete with our producers, putting them out of production. I suggest that that is what is taking place in the beef industry today, and as a result of this policy Canada is now a net importer of food.

We are only producing at about half throttle. We certainly should be concerned about lack of food supplies when countries such as Canada are not producing at full throttle, particularly in light of the present situation in the world in which the peoples of some countries have no food at all.

The argument that we are not really producing as much as we can in Canada can be well documented. We have had many programs in the past few years aimed at reducing or halting production. Whenever we have had a surplus of production we have faced a real problem in disposing of the surplus. I suggest that problem has been aggravated by the policy of this country to import cheap food. This has resulted in a lack of faith on the part of our producers, hence they are hesitant about going into high gear in the production of food. No one can argue with the suggestion that we are not producing as much food in Canada as we could. If we are going to get production into high gear in Canada we must develop programs to take care of surpluses.

Some hon. members have referred to a world food bank. Such a program could not operate unless we had means to take care of surplus production. I have never felt it would be wrong to have a year's supply of grain in storage in Canada. Very often we see weather changes that inhibit production, and this is true of almost every farm commodity.

Very often shortages of supply can be related to programs that inhibit production. We must have a program to take care of over-production such as we have in beef at this time. Our production structure should not be such that it creates bad faith on the part of beef producers, and that is the situation today. Beef producers are reducing their basic herds, and before long this will result in an under-production which will do nothing at all in our effort to help feed the people of the world.

There are many people who will ask how we can afford to feed needy people, or if we can afford it at all. I suggest that we can to some extent by using the money that we are now using for programs such as LIP. The taxpayers of this country are paying a great deal of money in the way of unemployment insurance benefits because of high unemployment. If we adopted a program of constructing canneries and granaries to take care of agricultural surpluses we would put a lot of unemployed to work, cutting down on high unemployment and on taxes required for unemployment insurance benefits. Many people who are working on programs such as LIP could be put to work in more productive areas, and I suggest that what will precipitate such a change is a crisis such as the food shortage.

We hear a lot about change, and many books have been written about it, such as "Future Shock". We hear a great deal about how people will have to change because of manufacturing devices that put people out of work. The biggest change in our outlook in Canada and, indeed, on the North American continent, is the change in respect of producing enough food to feed the world. I suggest we will have to stop wasting fertilizer, sprays and that type of thing, and here I think of the waste in respect of lawns, gardens and golf courses. We will need that fertilizer to produce food.

The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) suggested that we should construct fertilizer manufacturing plants in other countries. I cannot subscribe to that idea. If we build more plants of this type we should build them in Canada, close to the source of the raw material. In this way we would create more jobs for our unemployed here.

If we have to give others the product I think that is much better than giving it to people in our own country and teaching them how not to work. For instance, Mr. Speaker, we have the raw material here. We know there is an abundant supply of potash. We also know that if energy is required in order to produce fertilizer, we have that energy.

We also know that when there was an increase in the manufacture of fertilizer in western Canada several years ago, quite a lot of the increase was based on agricultural production of the day. However, just as companies were building plants in order to increase the production of fertilizer we had the LIFT program which took a lot of land out of the production of grain. Because the companies were building plants it was necessary for them to sell their production in order to have a source of income. Since the production of grain was being reduced, the product was exported out of Canada.

Last year the government told us that the way to beat inflation was to produce. When we asked about a shortage in fertilizer we were assured that there would not be a shortage, but of course we know from experience that there was a shortage. We also know that a large proportion of fertilizer production was exported from Canada. I do not blame the fertilizer companies because it is obvious they cannot pay for their plants if there is insufficient production.

We know that, because of the price of fertilizer over a number of years, it was really not profitable to develop some of the raw materials we had in Canada. These were imported into Canada more cheaply. However, with the price of fertilizer what it is today there should be programs to urge fertilizer manufacturers in Canada to use some of the basic minerals we have, and develop them so that there will be a greater supply of fertilizer products manufactured in Canada from basic materials within Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am sure in the next few years a new outlook must be developed in this whole area. We can see ourselves having to accept a much lower standard of living, perhaps not too much lower, but certainly a lower standard of living. I believe we in Canada have an obligation to produce more in the agricultural field, and to do a better job than we are doing now in feeding the world.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, in the four remaining minutes—I just lost 30 seconds—I would also like to join with those who spoke before me in thanking the mover for the opportunity he gave the minister to right the impressions the World Food Conference had left in Rome.

It is quite obvious that the motion introduced by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) was based on doubtful information, information gathered from doubtful sources. Perhaps, he could have gone deeper into things and inquired of the personnel of the department about what really happened, instead of listening to the catch lines, as the minister called them, that spread all sorts of falsehoods about the position of the government of Canada in Rome. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it is a clear improvement on the motion discussed Tuesday and introduced by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), and which was in fact another one of his witch hunts, and it is quite typical of that member to find dishonest people and criminals all over the place. Some were even found in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, the information and explanations given by the minister will nevertheless right the facts. Canada was the country which took a position of initiative, of leadership, about the problems facing developing countries. I am somewhat disappointed, Mr. Speaker. However, I would like to say in the remaining seconds what I would have liked to have enough time to say in a more specific and elaborate way. I was somewhat disappointed that nobody dealt with the cause of the problems facing those African countries. I am talking about countries faced with starvation, more particularly Niger, Mauritania, Upper Volta, Sahel, Bali, Chad, and Senegal.

Mr. Speaker, it is all a series of disasters after disasters which brought about that situation in those unfortunate countries. I heard hon. members of the opposition blame the government for its lack of planning. There is nothing more difficult to plan than agricultural production, food production, because one is always at the mercy of the elements. How can one be sure things will work out exactly as planned, as wanted, as foreseen if, as we have noticed in the countries mentioned earlier, in that central strip of Africa there are calamities, floods and droughts?

Somehow, I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that those problems were not dealt with adequately. My colleague from Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) barely touched upon the subject when he mentioned the phenomenon of the weather which, in fact, cripples us in any serious undertaking. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but unfortunately it is five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Penner): Order, please. It being five o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, proceedings on the motion have expired. This House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

TABLING OF REPORT ON STUDY OF EFFECT OF INCARCERATION ON PRISONERS OF WAR IN EUROPE DURING WORLD WAR II

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I wish at this time to table in both official languages a report of a study on Canadians who were prisoners of war in Europe during World War II. I hope it will be possible in the near future to refer this report to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs for consideration.

Hon. members may recall that in June, 1972, the standing committee recommended that the government should arrange to have a study made to identify any physiological and psychological long-terms effects which incarceration might have had on these veterans. The government accepted this recommendation, and on January 31 of last year I announced that the study was being undertaken by Dr. J. Douglas Hermann of Ottawa. This work has now been completed. The author of the report not only offered his conclusions on the medical effects of imprisonment but also volunteered a number of recommendations. On the whole, the government considers that these recommendations should not be accepted, but is withholding its final decision until its receives the report of the standing committee.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for sending me a copy of the Hermann report following a study on Canadians who were prisoners of war in Europe. While it is quite complex and will require extensive deliberation by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, we welcome it and commend Dr. Hermann for producing the facts which will enlighten those who are concerned with the effect on the lives of Canadian veterans who suffered health defects as a result of treatment in prisoner of war camps.

I am disappointed, though, that the minister indicated in his statement that the government considers these recommendations should not be accepted but is withholding its final decision until it receives the report of the standing committee. This is the kind of promise that is not a promise. I hope that in the standing committee we can change the government's mind in view of the recommendations we will bring before parliament as a result of our deliberations.

It is significant, Mr. Speaker, that after so many years we are only finally determining, with facts, that the Dieppe prisoners of war have experienced a higher mortality rate from cardiovascular disease and other heart diseases than others, and identifying the psychological and physiological long-term effects. This emphasizes, to me, our continued responsibility toward our war veterans as long as they live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: It is our responsibility on a continuing basis because most prisoners of war have aged prematurely and will continue to have a shorter life span than those who were lucky enough to return unharmed or who were lucky enough to remain at home. The details of the group study points out the high percentage of survivors who were forced to resort to pensions, comparative low standards of earnings and low standards of homes, with a resulting number of premature deaths.

● (1410)

Finally, we have a responsibility for those who returned maimed and disabled and continue to struggle to maintain a normal, reasonable standard of existence. I hope that this report will be referred to the standing committee as soon as possible so that we in parliament can continue to recommend legislation in order to fulfil our commitments to the veterans of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) in commending Dr. Hermann on a thorough study and an excellent report on Canadians who were prisoners of war in Europe during World War II. The study deals in particular with those who were prisoners of war following the Dieppe engagement but it also covers other prisoners of war in Europe.

However, sir, like my colleague from Newfoundland, I am deeply disappointed that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), even before most members have seen the report, has announced that the government considers that these recommendations should not be accepted.

For the past two years, veterans who were prisoners of war in Europe have dared to hope that because a study of their case was being made, recommendations meeting their needs would come forth and that the government and parliament would act on those recommendations.

The recommendations are very few. In the main, it is recommended that there be appropriate compensation on a continuing basis over and above all disability pensions already awarded to Dieppe prisoners of war. There is a recommendation that appropriate compensation also be granted to prisoners of war in other parts of Europe. The third and very important recommendation—it reminds me of one that was in the Woods report—calls for widows whose husbands were on less than 48 per cent pension at the time of death to be awarded pensions prorated, rather than nothing at all as is the present case. The other recommendation has to do with continued study.

It seems to me that these are excellent and appropriate recommendations. I believe they will commend themselves to members on all sides of the House. I believe they will commend themselves to veterans and veterans' organizations and that the Canadian public would want these recommendations to be accepted, and I regret that the minister has said no right off the bat. I trust that when this matter is referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the whips will be off, and that the committee will be free to make its own recommendations back to parliament on what is to be done as a result of this report. If this is the case, I believe the recommendation will be that the Hermann report be implemented.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I join the previous speakers in extending my thanks to the minister for having sent us the report published by Dr. J. Douglas Hermann on the facts concerning the prisoners of war.

I am convinced it is never too late to do well and I am very happy that, at long last, some attention is being paid to the fate of those prisoners who left behind part of themselves in enemy prison camps. Once again, I am very happy to join my colleagues in working, in committee, on a bill that will allow us to alleviate the hardships of those prisoners.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED STATEMENT ON EFFECT OF FINANCIAL RESTRICTIONS OF OPERATIONAL ROLES OF FORCES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. This is the first such motion I have ever moved. I have an opinion about how dubious this procedure is from time to time. However, because of the subject matter I am presenting the motion at this time. I am asking for unanimous consent to move this motion of urgent and pressing necessity in view of the pathetic statement made to this House by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) on November 13, and his statement on Friday last, that surveillance of our coasts was taking place. Since sovereignty of our shores is supposed to be the top priority of our forces and present restrictions in the operations of Maritime Command have reduced our surveillance in the north to one flight every six months, next to no effective coastal patrol and no joint exercises whatsoever with our NATO allies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the Minister of National Defence forthwith make a statement outlining what we are not doing now, which we were doing before present financial restrictions affected defence operations, and what plans the minister has for the future, so that some purpose and commitment can replace the present mood of despair and depression which presently permeates our forces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There not being unanimous consent the motion cannot be debated at this time.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BEEF INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering the recent severe and disproportionate action taken by the United States government in restricting exports of beef and pork products to the United States with probable major negative effect on our producers and this coming at a time when our beef producers in particular are already undergoing severe difficulty, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House instructs the Minister of Agriculture to embark forthwith on a full scale inquiry into the beef industry and to take steps immediately to set up a national beef marketing agency.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The house has heard the terms of the motion. It being proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 it cannot be debated without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be debated at this time.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

SUBSIDIZATION OF CANADIAN COUNCIL OF RESOURCES MINISTERS

Question No. 101—Mr. Allard:

Does the government subsidize the Canadian Council of Resources Ministers and, if so (a) for how many years (b) through what department (c) what amounts were granted in 1971, 1972 and 1973 (d) did the government make a grant as capital for the Council at the time it was created or at some later stage of its development?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment): The federal and provincial governments share the cost of operation incurred by the Canadian Council of Resources and Environment Ministers. The cost-sharing formula established at the time the council was created, and still in effect, requires the federal government to pay 33.3 per cent of the total annual costs. (a) Payments have been made since the council was established in 1962; (b) The payments are made through the Department of Environment; (c) 1971/72, $83,916; 1972/73, $162,504; 1973/74, $136,530; (d) No capital grants have been made to the council as such, however, additional contributions have been made toward the cost of CCREM sponsored conferences. The same cost-sharing formula between federal and provincial governments was used and the following federal contributions have been made: 1965/66, Pollution Conference, $28,638; 1970/74, Man and Resources Conference, $133,200.

NOTE: The latter payments were made in four annual installments of $33,300 each.

VETERANS LAND ACT

Question No. 114—Mr. Marshall:

1. Is it the intention of the government to extend the Veterans' Land Act beyond the March 31, 1975 deadline and, if not, for what reason?

2. Is it the intention of the government to repeal the October 31, 1968 deadline for certification under the Veterans' Land Act and, if not, for what reason?

3. Is it the intention of the government to (a) increase the mortgage loan ceiling (b) reduce the minimum lot requirements (c) reduce the down payment (d) expand the programme to allow veterans to purchase condominiums or mobile homes (e) introduce programmes to allow veterans to improve their homes?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1, 2 and 3. For the reasons indicated in my speech in the House on November 5, 1974, it is not the intention of the Government to make the changes referred to in this question.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Government is not considering the funding of a study of the weekly newspaper industry in Canada at the present time.

PROPOSED CHANGES IN NATIONAL ANTHEM

Question No. 201—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Are any changes proposed to the wording of (a) the English version (b) the French version of our National Anthem "O Canada"?

2. In each case, what changes are proposed?

3. Has consideration been given to restructuring the Anthem so that the meaning is the same in both English and French versions and (a) if so, what is the nature of such consideration and proposals resulting therefrom (b) if not, for what reason?

4. Are any changes being considered in the French version to include references to our North and to our unity from East to Western seas, as are included in the English version but not in the French version at present and (a) if so, what form will such changes take in each case (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): 1. (a) Yes. (b) No.

2. Changes to 1 (a) are reflected in Bill C-11 tabled on October 4, 1974.

3. Many proposals were considered by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the National and Royal Anthems. In their final report to Parliament dated February 19, 1968, it was unanimously recommended that the government be authorized to adopt the two versions as presented in Bill C-11. For further information see "Minutes of Proceedings No. 3, dated December 8, 1967, to February 15, 1968".

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE IN YELLOWKNIFE, N.W.T.

2. What, if any, would be the problems encountered by the Post Office Department if the present service were continued?

3. What is the estimated cost of (a) implementation of letter carrier service (b) annual salaries for the necessary manpower (c) expanding the present postal facility in Yellowknife?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): 1. Inauguration of letter carrier service is tentatively set for May 1975.

2. Insufficient space due to increased demands for lock boxes and inadequate space in the working area of the post office.

3. (a) $51,776; (b) $175,168; (c) $270,000.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—ASSURED MAIL SERVICE

Question No. 234—Mr. Reynolds:

Does Surrey, Richmond and New Westminster have a new assured mail service and, if so, can the Postmaster General advise when the Municipality of Delta will be going on this service?

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Yes. Our original plans called for assured mail service for Delta in late fall of 1974. However, during the final planning stages, it became evident that the inauguration of this service would not be possible prior to spring 1975.

*FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO INSTITUTE BARILOCHE IN ARGENTINA

Question No. 310—Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain):

1. Did the International Development Research Centre provide financial assistance to the Institute Bariloche in Argentina and, if so, what were the terms, conditions and amount of that financial assistance?

2. Will any studies, led by Mr. Amilcar Herrera, arising out of assistance referred to in Part 1 be tabled?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is as follows:

1. The International Development Research Centre made a grant of $81,000 in July, 1972 to the Fundacion Bariloche in Buenos Aires, to help a team of Latin American scientists design a mathematical world model as an alternative to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology model that was popularized in the book "The Limits of Growth". A supplemental grant of $31,500 was made in November 1973 to allow the group to complete their project and to pay, among other items, the cost of extra computer time. The funds were paid in three instalments, and a condition of the grant is the requirement that the Fundacion make a financial reporting of the expenditures incurred during each instalment period.

2. A first progress report of the early results of the group's work was presented at a Club of Rome meeting in Tokyo in December, 1973. The work was further elaborated during 1974, and a more complete presentation made in Vienna in September, 1974. A draft report, about 80 pages long, summarizing the work and conclusions of the Bariloche group is now being revised by its Latin American authors in the light of comments from the Vienna meeting and elsewhere. The International Development Research Centre hopes to publish this document as soon as possible after its revision and, if so, it will certainly be available to members of parliament.

CENSUS TRACT BULLETIN, 1971

Question No. 459—Mr. Forrestall:

1. For what reason is the Census tract bulletin, 1971, catalogue number 95-732(CT-2B) June 1974 entitled "Halifax", when it encompasses the two Cities of Halifax, Nova Scotia and Dartmouth, Nova Scotia?

2. Will consideration be given to naming subsequent editions "Halifax-Dartmouth", following the precedents of the editions titled "Ottawa-Hull" and "St. Catharines-Niagara"?

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. For the sake of brevity, the front covers of the census tract reports of the 1971 census simply stated "Halifax", "Saint John", etc., instead of the full title "Census Metropolitan Area of Halifax" or "Census Metropolitan Area of Saint John", etc. However, the tables and maps inside the reports immediately make it clear that the figures refer to the metropolitan area as defined for census purposes.

2. When the Metropolitan Area of Halifax was first delineated for census purposes, the town of Dartmouth represented only a very small part of the total population of this metropolitan area. Its recent growth, together with annexations, is such that it now forms a significant proportion of the total, and consideration will be given to naming it the Metropolitan Area of Halifax-Dartmouth in the forthcoming 1976 census and the reports examining therefrom.

Return tabled.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I placed a question on the order paper, starred question No. 760, on November 5. It is a very simple question. What is the total strength of the armed forces, how many are engaged in office or administrative duties, and how many hold the rank of corporal. A period of 13 days has gone by, and I wonder whether the minister has forgotten the armed forces or does not have this information. I suggest that starred questions should be answered more expeditiously. This delay indicates the attitude of the department.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question regarding my question No. 39 dated September 30 regarding the sale of munitions from this country. An identical question was raised on April 8 in the last parliament. I am appalled at the possibility that we are selling so much abroad that it takes seven months even to get an invoice.

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention question No. 2 on the order paper regarding the seizure of 20 pounds of heroin. It appeared on the order paper on September 30 and it was also asked in the last parliament. I should like also to refer to question No. 4 regarding Tofino Fisheries Limited and the ARDA program which was also brought up in the last parliament. I hope that the government will see fit to answer those questions quickly.

● (1420)

Mr. Cossitt: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like again to draw the attention of the hon. parliamentary secretary to questions Nos. 53 to 61 asking for information pertaining to local initiatives programs grants in the ridings of nine cabinet ministers. I raised this question a few days ago and I wonder if the parliamentary secretary is now in a position to say exactly when the information will be forthcoming.

An hon. Member: Never!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects all members of the House and the work of the House. This afternoon the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) tabled a price list outlining the increase in the initial price for wheat, oats and barley in a brief statement which I think should have been made on motions. It has been the practice in the past to make such statements on motions so that the House and the whole country may know exactly the amount of the increase in the initial payment. This gives an opportunity to members of all parties in this House to comment on the increase and to ascertain whether the government will be able to get the wheat needed to fill sales commitments as a result of the price increase. I think this practice of just tabling a statement like this should be brought to your attention and to the attention of the House; it should not pass unnoticed. In the past such statements have been made on motions and members of the various parties have had the opportunity to reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to check this for the hon. member but it is my memory that this is exactly the procedure that has been followed previously.

Mr. Horner: No, it is not, only by you, Otto.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

AGRICULTURE

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO BEEF INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and arises out of the announcement made by the United States government of quotas on beef and pork. Can the Prime Minister inform the House what his government's response will be and whether it intends to make a protest?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we envisage raising the matter in the forum of the GATT, but at this time no specific decision has been taken. The Minister of Agriculture returned from Rome only over the weekend. The matter is before a group of my colleagues and this afternoon we will study the situation and advise what action should be taken.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the action was telegraphed to some extent I thought perhaps the government would have prepared itself to take action. In view of the length of time that a GATT would presumably take, can the Prime Minister tell the House if the government intends to take any action in the meantime to ease the position of the pork and beef industries, particularly in view of the difficulties already faced by certain aspects of our beef industry. Is it the government's intention to provide any help to the livestock industry immediately in view of the difficulties it faces?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is because of the concern of the government for this and other aspects of the matter that we are studying it most urgently. If I had an announcement to make today it would have been made but I repeat, we are looking at it and will take whatever action is best for the Canadian people.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to establish an independent inquiry into the beef industry as has been suggested from time to time by the Minister of Agriculture and would it be the government's intention to delay any decision on interim aid at least to the beef industry and the livestock industry in general until such inquiry is completed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the matter of the inquiry was discussed on the eve of the departure of the Minister of Agriculture. Now that he has returned we will be looking at the work that has been done in his absence and will decide what action should be taken.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—LINKING OF CATTLE WITH TRADE IN OIL

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is the minister prepared to tie in a certain number of livestock with a certain amount of oil in trade with the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is a very novel and interesting suggestion which I shall consider.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER TO UNITED STATES

that asked by the Leader of the Opposition. In view of President Ford's week-end Washington announcement of retroactive United States quotas on Canadian cattle, beef, hogs and pork, which are based on a single 12-month period from March 31, 1973 to March 31, 1974, a period which clearly distorts our traditional trading pattern with the United States, and in view of Canada's quota policy applying to the average of the last five-year period, will the minister indicate if he intends to advise Washington of the facts of the total U.S.-Canadian cattle picture as indicated by Canadian cattlemen at the Washington hearing a short time ago; and, in particular, will the minister suggest, hopefully in his own special way, that while our Canadian cattle industry can be hurt by this new quota policy, we will not be intimidated.

● (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member ought to know that he has the right to pose a question, but when he goes on to tell the minister what the answer must be, I think he is in the area of argumentative questioning. In any case, as the question was addressed to the minister, the minister may want to answer.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: —we have not had time to analyse fully the action which the United States of America has taken. I am fully aware of what the Canadian cattlemen said in their presentation at the hearing and I agree with them. The government delivered a statement to the United States government telling it what we thought about these proceedings, etc. Mr. Speaker, I will be in a better position, possibly tomorrow, to answer the hon. member's question in a more detailed form. I should be able to say what action this government intends to take.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—EFFECT ON CANADIAN MARKET

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the 10 to one ratio of the respective cattle and human populations of the United States and Canada, and in view of the current oversupply situation of fat cattle in the United States, our Canadian position being very current, does the minister not agree that under present conditions the lifting of the Canadian quota and DES regulation will not resolve the current United States market price problems but that this could have a disastrous effect on our own cattle market structure.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have said before that I think our quota system and our actions concerning DES were both responsible and fair, and I stand by that statement.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES ON EFFECTS ON INDUSTRIES IN BOTH COUNTRIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to communicate with the United States government on the subject of beef, and make clear that the United States government's policy of dollar for dollar retaliation, of limiting imports to inflict a $100 million damage in retaliation to our $100 million quota, will have disproportionate effects on the industries of both countries in view of the relevant strengths of the industries in the two countries and, therefore, as meaningful counteraction the American action is entirely unfair, especially if that country wants to maintain good trading relationships with a neighbouring country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, we hoped that the United States would take no counteraction at all. As to the figures put forth by the hon. member, of course they will be pointed out to the United States.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—SUGGESTED REVIEW OF OIL AND GAS EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce along lines of one asked earlier. His reply seemed to be facetious. I will direct it to him, and hope that he considers it in the sense in which it is asked. Assuming that the reaction of the American government in limiting beef and pork exports to that country is unjustified, in view of the relevant scales operation of those industries in the two countries, can the minister inform the House whether our government will seriously take into consideration the review of our oil and gas export commitments to the United States.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I made no reference to oil and gas, or cattle and oil and gas. I think the hon. member is referring to another question put to another minister.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I inadvertently referred to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I, of course, meant to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wonder if he would answer that question.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the hon. member. I thought he was directing the question to my colleague and I did not follow it.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, as usual, one member of cabinet does not know what another member is doing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: May I ask the minister if his department will react to this unfair action by the United States by reviewing our current policy for exporting gas and oil to the United States and giving serious consideration to reducing that commitment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the reaction will be a total government reaction, after close and intimate consultation on this question in the cabinet.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—ACTION TO AID INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the difficulties experienced in the Quebec lumber industry, and especially in my area, may I ask the minister whether or not he has received representations from sawmill operators concerning those difficulties and ensuing lays-offs? If so, will the minister introduce measures to help that industry and protect the workers?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have had representations from sawmill operators from both sides and the centre of Canada. At present this matter is under discussion between myself and my cabinet colleagues. When I have further information to give the House, of course I will give it.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Concerning the great number of dismissals in the sawmill industry, he answered last week to my colleague from Richmond who asked him if supplementary estimates would be granted to the Local Initiatives Program for the creation of jobs during the winter that he would discuss the matter with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I would like to ask the Prime Minister today whether he is in a position to tell the House if supplementary estimates will be granted to LIP?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No decision has been taken to that effect, Mr. Speaker. If we must take a decision, we will announce it to the House in the usual manner.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MINIMUM PRICE TO FARMERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question really is supplementary to some already asked, and is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, whom I welcome back to this House. I join with others in that. When he was in Rome he spoke in a way Canadians understood, and I appreciate that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not speaking about the actual embargo, because this government has known for weeks that it would happen, and it did not come as a surprise. During the last month or so, with cattle prices plummeting and production costs rising, farmers in some parts of our country have become virtually desperate. I have been to Alberta and found everywhere this feeling. Will the minister, in his desire to give agriculture a fair deal, do his part in having declared at the earliest possible date a minimum, basic price for beef, after which the government should pay to the farmers an allowance equal to the difference between that basic price and the price that today is being received, a price which is far below the cost of production. The consumer, of course, is receiving none of the benefit of these low prices. Will he do that and preserve the beef industry which, today, is in an even greater panic than it has been during the past two weeks as a result of the action by the United States, the danger of which can be overdrawn in its effect. I believe that action will add little to the price situation, or otherwise. I ask, what will the minister, under such government action, do to assure farmers who are producing beef of a fair and proper return?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the right hon. gentleman knows that I cannot tell the House exactly what the government intends to do. But I can tell him this: We shall be discussing this later this afternoon, as well as several propositions I have to bring forward.

● (1440)

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—PRIOR REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES ON IMPORTATION OF PORK—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question, too, is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is related to the beef and pork issue. In the light of events which took place in Washington at the United States trading policy conference, on October 25, which clearly indicated that the United States government was being persuaded to take action with respect to the importation of hogs, not just beef, would the minister tell us what representations he or his departmental officials have made to their counterparts in the United States subsequent to that meeting on October 25 and prior to last week's announcement with regard to the United States position on the importation of Canadian pork products?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): The action the Canadian government took concerning quotas was within our trading agreement—within GATT. We never suspected, or, at least, I did not, that any action taken by the United States would be outside the GATT, but from what I know now it appears they have taken such action. We were under no impression that the United States would take this action. We knew they would be requested to take it but we did not think they were going to take it.

Mr. Jarvis: In the light of the minister's answers to previous questions today, would he tell the House whether he proposes to take immediate steps to protect the hog industry as well as the beef industry, since the hog industry will be particularly hurt unless appropriate steps are taken?

Mr. Whelan: The actual damage is now being assessed. We shall be getting a full report from our officials later today. Our action will be determined by that information; we shall have to go on from there. There could be further consultations with the United States on the matter. As the hon. member knows, we had several consultations in Rome with the United States Secretary of State and, though it may amaze some people, we are still on speaking terms.

UNITED STATES QUOTAS ON BEEF AND PORK—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PROTECT CONSUMERS AND PRODUCERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Is it the minister's intention to meet immediately with his United States counterpart on this matter in view of the short term consequences of the U.S. decision to Canadian cattle producers and in view of the long term consequences to Canadian consumers.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): My concern has been, and always will be, both for the consumers and for producers, whether cattle producers or producers of other food products. This is the very thing we have in mind when presenting legislation to the House designed to stabilize the livelihood of food producers so as to give them a reasonable return for their efforts and enable them to provide food at reasonable prices. Our officials will be in touch with United States officials tomorrow. I know that some of them are making inquiries today to clarify points in the document the President of the United States has signed. They are asking these questions and I am meeting with them later on this afternoon. I cannot tell the hon. member for sure what I shall do.

TRADE

ALLEGED DROP IN EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COUNTERACT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Does the minister intend to treat as a serious matter the 6 per cent drop in the volume of Canadian exports during the first nine months of this year as compared with the 10 per cent real growth in industrial world exports as reported by GATT recently? Does he intend to do something constructive to correct this situation? Or does he intend to treat it in the same light-hearted manner as shocked the annual meeting of the Canadian Exporters' Association recently?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I have tried on various occasions to describe the various ways in which we are supporting the Canadian export effort. I have personally led three trade missions to various markets of the world; the Prime Minister has visited half a dozen countries. Clearly, the government is doing everything it can, through trade missions, through amendments to the Export Development Corporation Act and through the program for export market development, to assist Canadian exporters to find new markets and compete internationally.

Mr. Hees: Since it is very obvious from the minister's performance that Canada is not measuring up to the record of other industrial nations, and since the trade missions are not producing the results intended, will he get on with the job which should be done, and which he is paid to do, instead of running around the world and accomplishing nothing?

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—PROPOSED INCENTIVE PAYMENTS TO ENCOURAGE PRODUCERS TO MAINTAIN BREEDING STOCK

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): A question to the Minister of Agriculture supplementary to previous questions which have been posed with respect to the beef industry. In the light of the warning issued by the Food Prices Review Board to the effect that Canadians could experience a serious beef shortage next year unless action is taken to encourage producers to withhold breeding stock from slaughter, is the minister actively considering a program of incentive payments which will encourage producers to maintain adequate breeding stock by ensuring them that at least a portion of the costs incurred by them will be covered?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I can only give the hon. member the same answer as I gave to the right hon. member for Prince Albert. We are considering several different programs at the present time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE JAMES BAY SETTLEMENT NOT USED AS GUIDE IN SETTLING LAND CLAIMS OF OTHER NATIVE GROUPS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development arising from the recent James Bay settlement. Since the position of the native people of Northern Quebec with regard to land claims is vastly different from the claims of those in the Northwest Territories, and taking into account the hydro-electric project being carried out, can the minister assure the House that the Northern Quebec settlement will not be used as a precedent or model for settling land claims in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I do not think there is any doubt that the agreement is, in fact, a precedent, dealing, as it does, with the first large, modern, comprehensive land claim. However, I have frequently endeavoured to stress that each region is different, each situation is different as the hon. member indicated, and that settlements will accordingly vary from region to region; and that the interests of the people concerned will also vary.

JAMES BAY SETTLEMENT—PROTECTION OF INTERESTS OF MÉTIS AND NON-STATUS INDIANS

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, have the interests of Métis and non-status people in Northern Quebec been protected under the terms of the announced settlement?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I believe there are, roughly, 200 non-status people involved in the area concerned in northern Quebec.

REDUCTION IN BANK RATE BY BANK OF CANADA—PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the House whether the reduction in the bank rate announced by the Bank of Canada on Friday was made after consultation with the minister, and, if so, will he say whether this is part of the climate for the budget which is to come tonight?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The Governor of the Bank usually consults me about movements in the bank rate. He consulted me on this occasion; of course, he has the prime responsibility for the movement of monetary policy. He stated clearly in his release explaining the decision that it was responsive to market forces and to the movement of short term interest in the United States in the last two or three weeks. It also had particular relevance to the termination of the Canadian Savings Bond issue.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—MINISTERS' ADVICE TO PRODUCERS CONCERNING PRODUCTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the hon. gentleman appears to regard himself as the Messiah of Canadian agriculture, can he tell the House what he is advising beef producers to do at this time? Should they increase their production or cut back?

● (1450)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister wanted to answer the question I asked, which is a very important question to the beef producers of this country.

Mr. Speaker: Whether the minister wanted to answer it or not, and regardless of the importance, it is not in order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR REMOVAL OF TROOPS FROM MIDDLE EAST AND CYPRUS—EFFECT ON PREMATURE REMOVAL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of National Defence, first of all, whether or not we have any contingency plans in place to remove troops from the Middle East, including Cyprus, though separating the two, and is it the view of the government that given the nature of our supporting role, any premature removal of our troops prior to renewed open hostilities might not constitute a negative contribution to further stability in that area?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, we do have contingency plans for evacuation from all places where we have peacekeeping personnel—Cyprus, Egypt, Syria and Israel. In reply to the second question, I would agree that a premature withdrawal from the peacekeeping role would be disadvantageous, but that is really hypothetical.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Yewchuk: I am sorry to be interrupting the question period once again, but I fail to understand why the question that I have put to the minister, which dealt with a matter of basic government policy, is not in order. I think we are entitled to know why.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member realized that is not a valid question of privilege. However, I may add that the reason for holding the question out of order was that, as I recall, the hon. member asked the minister not only for an opinion, which itself is out of order, but in addition asked what the minister would advise farmers to do at the present time. This would call for a very lengthy answer and, in addition, would call for an expression of opinion. His question was specifically: Would the Minister of Agriculture tell the House what he would advise western farmers to do at this time? In those circumstances, it called both for an opinion and for something other than a specific point of information from the minister.

HAITIANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION ON DEPORTATION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Communications.

Following his weekend promise to intervene with his colleagues and the Prime Minister, in respect of the Haitians problem, in order that legalism give way to humanitarian sentiment, could the minister report to the House on the success of his eleventh hour representations?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the premises of the hon. member's question are consistent with the facts. I do not believe either that the situation is at the eleventh hour, and finally I do not believe it is appropriate to answer the House to questions dealing with internal discussions held within the Cabinet.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Considering the negative answer he has given would the Minister of Communications advise the House whether he feels bound by the decision taken by his colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I don't know what decision the hon. member is referring to, since several have been taken on that problem. However, if the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe wants to refer to the statements I made, he will see they are within the spirit of the law, the spirit of the government's action and the compassionate position the government has tried to adopt in respect of Haitians and will endeavour to find better means of incarnation, if possible.

FUTURE PLANS OF DEPUTY MINISTER OF DEPARTMENT UPON RETIREMENT—POSSIBLE USE OF CONFIDENTIAL DOCUMENTS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister confirm whether the deputy minister of the environment is retiring shortly and will be engaged in a private consulting business specializing in northern pipelines?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Minister of the Environment will reach retiring age at the end of December. I am not aware of the type of work he will undertake after retiring.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On November 1, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said in the House, with regard to the Berger commission, as reported at page 966 of Hansard for that day, that:

—there are other documents, for example cabinet proceedings and other proceedings of that kind, which while not covered by statute, have traditionally been regarded as confidential to the executive.

Would the minister tell the House what is being done to ensure that that sort of information is not, directly or indirectly, made available by the retiring deputy minister, in his future private business, to those parties interested in the proceedings before the Berger commission or, ultimately, before the National Energy Board?

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that, although he will have left the Public Service, the Deputy Minister of the Environment, who may have had knowledge of certain documents during his tenure, will feel that he is still bound by his oath of secrecy.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF PROPOSED PLANT TO SUPPLY ENRICHED URANIUM ON SALE OF CANDU REACTOR—SAFEGUARDS ON SALE OF ENRICHED URANIUM

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the Prime Minister's remarks in Paris last month that an enriched uranium plant, to be built in conjunction with the French government, is under discussion for the James Bay area, can the minister say whether any assessment has been made of the impact that a Canadian project to supply enriched uranium to western Europe could have on the sale of our CANDU reactors that utilize a competing system and to which the government has already devoted so much financing?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have to recognize that all but a small percentage of the reactors now in operation in the world today, and which will be in operation for many years to come, are ones using enriched uranium, are light water reactors, rather that the CANDU system. In this sense Canada has an opportunity if we choose to be, as we are, both a major exporter of uranium and an exporter of technology in the form of CANDU.

With regard to the question of an enrichment facility, the government by no means has accepted the concept that such a facility should be established in Canada. The hon. member may recall that we set out an elaborate set of guidelines which any applicant for such facility—at that time it was Brinco—should meet in terms of bringing an application before the government. I think we would want to make an assessment, in this case with the province of Quebec, whether over $1 billion and 2,000 megawatts of power are best used for uranium enrichment or, rather, put to better use in other activities in Canada.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that discussion is now going on with regard to the establishment of an enriched uranium plant, and in light of our previous experience of exporting nuclear fuel and technology, would the minister say what safeguards and restrictions on the use of a nuclear component are being planned with regard to the export of enriched uranium?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the hon. lady, there is no commitment of any kind that there will be enriched uranium for export from Canada. In general terms, whether we are talking of natural uranium, enriched uranium—if indeed we should have that in due course—or nuclear technology, either in research form or in the form of nuclear reactors, we are following the standards set internationally by the International Atomic Energy Agency, though certainly there are more rigid standards which we would on a bilateral basis impose upon the contracting parties who buy any one of these commodities. Perhaps this is not the time to talk about this in detail, but I would be glad on another occasion, and perhaps in a committee of the House, to go into this question at some length.

SUGAR—POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE FROM CUBA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I want to address to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister is quoted as having said outside the House that talk on future sugar supplies had been held with the Cuban ambassador, but, the Cuban embassy has issued the statement that up to this point no negotiations whatsoever have been started or conducted. Would the minister explain to the House the apparent discrepancy between these two statements and say whether in fact talks have been held on the subject of reaching an agreement regarding sugar imports from Cuba, or whether in fact they have not been held.

● (1500)

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to clarify this point. It is clear that my statement has been greatly expanded; all I said in reply to a question is that I had had talks with the Cuban ambassador. I was seeking the information I needed to better intervene with my colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the great importance to Canada of expanding its exports to Cuba and the necessity of Cuba being able to expand its exports to Canada so that it will be in a position to import more from Canada, will the minister see that these talks referred to are in fact expedited and take place as quickly as possible?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that if such discussions are to take place, they will be held with the minister in charge and not with me. Which does not prevent me, however, from looking further into this and obtaining as much information as possible.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs this question. In view of what he has told the House perhaps he would like to clear up a statement he made to me two weeks ago that we would have to wait for a policy with regard to the increasing price of sugar, which is still going up in price, and indicate when may we expect that statement on policy?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE QUARTERLY INDEXING OF DISABILITY PENSIONS—SUGGESTED INCREASE OF PENSIONS OF HONG KONG VETERANS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there will be great disappointment resulting from the statement that the government does not accept most of the recommendations of the Hermann Report, does the Minister of Veterans Affairs intend to rectify some of those inequities by introducing amendments to the disability pensions as we have done with war veterans allowances?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this involves a matter of policy, and if it is decided that this should be done it will be announced in due course.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that one of the recommendations denies to widows of prisoners of war the right to have their pensions increased to 48 per cent in order that widows would qualify for death benefits, would the minister indicate to the House if he is considering the recommendation of the committee on the question of Hong Kong veterans, to bring those pensions of veterans who were forced out of the labour force to 100 per cent?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, this is now under scrutiny by our department and we will have some information on it at a later date.

POSSIBLE USE OF REVENUES FROM FUEL EXPORT TAX TO REDUCE FUEL COSTS OF NORTHERN RESIDENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in connection with the application of revenues from fuel export tax which benefit the federal government, and which are being applied in the reduction of fuel costs to other Canadian consumers. Are any discussions now underway between the minister and officials of the territorial government in respect of the application of some of these moneys to the reduction of fuel costs, particularly home heating fuels north of the 60th parallel in the Yukon and Northwest Territories? If there are such discussions underway, when can northerners expect some relief from the extraordinary high cost of home heating and other fuels being imposed upon them now?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there are discussions going on in this area, and I have had discussions with the Commissioner of the Yukon, but as yet there is no determination as to how we can find an effective method of reducing their fuel costs.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE IN UNITED NATIONS ON MIDDLE EAST—POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the Canadian delegate is expected to speak during the United Nations Palestine debate this week, and possibly within 48 hours, is the Prime Minister now in a position to inform the House what will be the official Canadian position taken at the United Nations regarding the Palestinian Liberation Organization proposal for a Palestinian state?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no official position on whether we would speak has as yet been made, but if we are to speak at the United Nations during this debate I can assure the House that the House will be informed of the substance of that statement.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware that at the time of Mr. Yasser Arafat's gun-toting arrival at the United Nations assembly one of the government supporters, the hon. member for St. Denis, found it necessary to join other member nations delegates in a standing ovation and, if he is aware of that, does he agree with this representative from Canada who chose to so endorse Mr. Arafat?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will refer to Hansard of a few days ago he will see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked a question along similar lines and gave an answer which I believe had to do with applause meters.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED EMBEZZLEMENT AT FORT GARRY HOTEL, WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General, and I might say that I have given him notice. As the RCMP has begun an investigation of a suspected embezzlement at the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg, will the minister report on the investigation and indicate if any charges have been laid?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that investigation is under the jurisdiction of the province of Manitoba.

[Later:]

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, as the hotel is under the jurisdiction of the minister, has the Minister of Transport launched an investigation into the charge that there are poor accounting procedures at the Fort Garry, and other CNR hotels, and has he investigated the charges made by a former hotel employee which I have forwarded to him?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the argument which would justify the assertion that hotels are under my jurisdiction. I am not aware that they are.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning an answer given to the House a moment or two ago by the right hon. Prime Minister wherein he said that no decision had been made to speak during the Middle East debate. Through you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of members of this House I suggest there seems to be some inconsistency between the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister today and the answer given to me on Thursday, November 14, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in response to my question as to whether Canada would take part in this debate:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is certain there will be a statement by a Canadian representative before the close of the debate.

In view of that, I ask the right hon. gentleman to clarify for this House what the position really is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member well knows, questions about inconsistencies or comments on the quality of answers received which may be the subject of debate have scarcely any precedents whatsoever as grounds for a question of privilege. However, the House having heard the hon. member, I feel that before finally coming to a decision on the matter it may be appropriate to hear a comment from the opposite side.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would gladly attempt to clarify the matter. It appears that it had been the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to have a statement made on behalf of the Canadian delegation, but it was not certain whether he would make it himself or have someone make it on his behalf. If the latter is to be the case, the minister proposes to make his statement in the House around the same time. These were the plans which were laid but they were not absolutely decided upon and it would depend on the nature of the statement itself. The intention was as the minister indicated, but I am not saying there will be no change.

STUDIES LINKING CHLORINATED WATER WITH CANCER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and relates to recent studies originating in the United States and the Netherlands which suggest a link between the use of chlorinated drinking water and various forms of cancer. I should like to ask whether similar studies have been conducted in Canada, particularly in our industrial areas and, if so, what are the results of these studies? Will the minister also indicate if she will undertake with her Canadian counterparts in the provinces a thorough review of the present standard of water for human consumption and report the findings to this House?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the quality of drinking water is a matter of very great concern around the world and we are conducting a number of different studies in respect of this particular subject. I cannot say at this particular point if the aspect the hon. member has mentioned is the subject of any particular study, but I will inquire.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

In view of the difficulties being experienced by the textile industry, particularly in my region, where more than 150 workers have been dismissed these last few days by two companies, can the minister tell us whether he intends to take special measures to correct the situation and improve that sector of the industry?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I met with the labour-management committee of the textile industry on Friday last week. At that time I indicated to them I was going to refer, I think perhaps 8 or 9 textile products, to the textile and clothing board for urgent examination.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the Day.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have two points of order. The first applies to myself directly and also the business of this House. The second refers to my colleague the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). Taking that question first, Mr. Speaker, I would ask Your Honour since when are general questions of a government policy as to whether it is government policy to change its policy out of order. In other words, as I understood it the hon. member for Athabasca asked the Minister of Agriculture whether it was government policy to still stimulate and increase beef production or to cut it back. I think that question must be seriously considered by all members of the House and by Your Honour so that the time during the question period is not complicated and confused in respect of deliberations between members and the Chair. I think this is a very serious point.

The question was very specific and dealt with government policy. The whole election campaign was fought on the basis of increasing production in all facets of the agricultural economy and here we have a situation where a specific question is put to the minister and Your Honour rules it out of order. That is my first point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not know how I can construe the hon. member's intervention except by way of some sort of suggestion that further consideration ought to be given to a decision that the Chair has already taken or that the position somehow ought to be reconsidered or reversed. In the light of the change in the regulations of the House which abandons appeals from the Speaker's rulings I do not know how I could possibly consider the hon. member's remarks as being in order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am just as aware, if not more aware, than members opposite of the rules of the House. I fully appreciate, and I am not challenging, the ruling of the Chair on this particular issue, except that for future questions on orders of the day I think we need some clarification concerning how far members on this side can go in asking direct specific questions of ministers on government policy. I think the question of my friend from Athabasca fell within the ambit of whether there is to be a change in government policy because of the changes which occurred in Washington over the weekend. Mr. Speaker, if we cannot explore that type of question, then the question period is even more castrated than a lot of members feel it is at the present time. That is my only question on that point. I have felt this way for some time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Any member opposite who groans, if he would open his eyes as wide as his mouth, would know that the Committee on Procedure and Organization for the last eight years has been trying to review the procedures of the House, and the question period, in order to make the question period more relevant and a heck of a lot more constructive than perhaps it is at the present time. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, that is my first point of order. I sincerely and seriously ask the Chair to say why a specific question relating to government policy—whether it is still government policy to increase or decrease production—falls flat before the Chair.

My second question of privilege is not as fundamental. It is a little more personal. The Minister of National defence gave a statement on defence on motions on Wednesday, November 13, in this House. I tried to get your Honour's eye on November 13, and again on November 14. Today, because of the gravity of the situation which is affecting the armed forces of this land and because of the apologist for defence who happens to have the clothes of the Minister of National Defence, I moved, for the first time in my life in this Parliament after nine years, a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. I stated at the time to Your Honour that frankly I thought motions under Standing Order 43 should be reviewed and substantially altered if they are to make any sense in this House. My direct question to Your Honour on my second point of order is: is it now Your Honour's direction from the Chair that a member who moves a motion under Standing Order 43 will not be recognized by the Chair, because up until now almost every member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I find a great difficulty in taking the hon. member's point seriously in respect of being recognized during the question period. To be specific with regard to a reply to the hon. member's remarks, which I find difficulty to put in conformity with any point of order, it seems to me that it was only Thursday or Friday of last week that the hon. member was recognized on a supplementary question on the subject of national defence and declined to pursue the matter.

Under the circumstances I find great difficulty in taking the hon. member's point seriously.

Orders of the day.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege and demand to be recognized.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have been as reasonable as any member of this House but I must say there is something wrong with the auditory system between this chair and Your Honour's chair when on my second point of order I was asking specifically if in the future Your Honour was not going to recognize members who moved motions under Standing Order 43 which might have an expeditious result in respect of the business of this House so that many members who wish to move motions under Standing Order 43 in abundance will know they will not have a chance to be recognized by Your Honour from the Chair.

That is the reason I am asking as a second point of order whether it was just an accident or coincidence that three days elapsed before I was able to get Your Honour's eye or whether it is to be a future policy of Your Honour not to recognize members who move motions under Standing Order 43 on the basis—as has been argued before the Committee on Procedure and Organization—that if a member has the floor of the House under Standing Order 43 he is taking up perhaps too much of the time of the House under Standing Order 43. That is another argument which I sometimes recall.

Mr. Speaker: For the benefit of the hon. members who may be interested in the point, I am sure an examination of the record will amply demonstrate that on several days in this session members who have risen in their places to put motions under Standing Order 43 have also been recognized in the same question period. Some days they have and some days they have not. The Chair has absolutely no firm and fast policy in any respect by way of a connection between motions under Standing Order 43 and the question period.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to the question I put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). I am sorry he has left, but I see that his parliamentary secretary is here. He recognized my question on October 18 with regard to the embezzlement charges at the Fort Garry Hotel. As the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) has pointed out today this has been put in the hands of the Attorney General of Manitoba. I understood the Minister of Transport today to say that this is not under his jurisdiction. I should like to point out that the Fort Garry Hotel is part of the CN chain and is the direct responsibility of the Minister of Transport. When public charges are being made I challenge the Minister of Transport to make the statement that this is not in his jurisdiction. I should like the parliamentary secretary to bring this to his attention and I would appreciate an answer just as soon as possible concerning what he is doing in respect of the embezzlement charges at the Fort Garry Hotel.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT

MEASURE TO INCREASE BORROWING POWER OF COMPANIES AND AUTHORIZE ISSUANCE OF SUBORDINATED NOTES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-7, to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay this item of business but I should like to draw to the attention of the House the fact that there is one provision in the bill which I think should be drawn to the attention of the public.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would wait until we proceed to third reading. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the following clause from page 7 of the bill. It is merely to emphasize what I think is advertised time and time again with regard to trust companies. It reads:

(16) Notwithstanding the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act or any bylaw made thereunder, money received by a company from the issue of a subordinated note or by way of a subordinated shareholder loan shall be deemed not to be a deposit for purposes of that act.

There are far too many people in this country who, when they see an advertisement with regard to a guaranteed deposit of a trust or loan company, believe that the investment is guaranteed as to repayment. We have had some unfortunate incidents in the past where that has not been so. The only guarantee is that the obligation is guaranteed as to the rate of interest that will be paid. I am glad to see this provision in the bill, and I hope that trust companies will emphasize that any investment under a guaranteed certificate is not guaranteed as to payment under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. That is all I have to say on this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF ADVANCE PAYMENT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the cash advance legislation has been an important part of the available means for farmers to obtain cash in the prairies apart from actual delivery opportunities. At the time the legislation was first introduced there were long delays in the delivering of the farmer's crop to the Canadian Wheat Board. We were in a situation for a number of years where the whole of the farmer's crop could not be delivered during the course of the crop year. The situation has changed considerably and in that regard we have been going through a period of years, including this year, when quotas have opened rather rapidly and indeed to very high levels during the course of the crop year. At this point, for instance, although we are only several months into the crop year there is not only a significant quota on all grades of wheat but the quota for the top grade is in fact open, so that farmers have a tremendous delivery opportunity.

Notwithstanding this, the cash advance legislation should not be neglected, and in our view should be kept in tune with the possible needs for important cash early in the season in advance of delivery opportunities. Indeed, it should be noted by the House that the commitment to increase the maximum in the cash advance legislation from $6,000 to $15,000 was part of the over-all review of our feed grain policy and the introduction of the opportunity for farmers to deliver their feed grains and wheat, oats and barley to the domestic market without delivering them to the Canadian Wheat Board. At that point we wanted to emphasize that while the farmer should have that opportunity—the choice to deliver domestically outside of the board or, particularly for export purposes, to the board—we wanted him to make a judgment on the basis of the merits of the two opportunities and not on the basis of cash pressure in the event he wanted to deliver to the Canadian Wheat Board.

In the case of deliveries to the board, the farmer receives an initial price for his wheat which does not represent its total value. In the case of the open market, he normally receives the full value that he would receive for the grain and he must compare an immediate, full cash price with another price which may well be greater but which will be partly cash and partly a payment to be made in due course when the various circumstances which affect the market have had their play and the Wheat Board is able to determine the total balance of the pool and make a distribution to the farmers. It may be noted that on occasion the initial price and the total receipts of farmers have differed fairly widely, although ordinarily final payments have been fairly modest. Just today I indicated in a notice to the House that initial prices were being increased effective Monday, November 25, to recognize the current buoyant circumstances of prices for wheat, oats and barley. We are increasing the levels of these initial prices to those in effect in the last crop year from March 1 until July 31.

In the case of No. 1 CW, and in the case of barley, we are raising the prices specifically to those levels. In the case of oats, we are introducing a 10 cent increase in the initial price, which will make it 10 cents higher than was the case in the latter part of the last crop year, in recognition of market conditions in regard to oats. I should emphasize, in passing, that the prices announced today are for the basic grades only. The actual prices for the other grades, the differential for Durum, the differential for grades in tough and damp condition, and all the differentials for other grades except these base grades will be announced within the week as determined on the recommendation of the Canadian Wheat Board, having regard to all the circumstances that affect these various grades and conditions. They may well vary in degree in the increase in those initial prices from the increase in the base grades that have been announced.

This bill is relevant to the feed grain policy because it will assist the farmer by providing cash advances, thus allowing him to receive a portion of the cash he will be entitled to when he delivers his grain later to the Canadian Wheat Board and to receive the cash advance without at that point having a quota to deliver on. To the extent that need for cash would otherwise be a pressure upon him to deliver to the open market, whether his judgment leads him there or not, that pressure is removed by these cash advances. It was with this in view that we thought the level of the advances should be raised in terms of the maximum per producer. When the program was introduced, the maximum was $3,000 for producers. Several years later it was doubled to $6,000, and now we propose to increase it to $15,000.

These are simply advances on the amount of money that farmers would otherwise receive upon delivery of their grain, but they are made as though they are payments in advance and for that reason they are, generally speaking, interest-free. The cash, therefore, is in the hands of the farmer as though he had a delivery opportunity early in the season, rather than later. Cash advances will always be less useful or necessary, I suppose, when the farmer's cash receipts are higher and therefore he has cash available and is in a better position to meet his needs. The current cash position in the grain producing area is extremely favourable. Hon. members will have recently noticed figures for the whole of Canada which show that farmers' cash receipts are up to more than 43 per cent in the first nine-month period of 1974.

They will have noticed, too, that in the province by province analysis the greatest increases have taken place in the prairie provinces. Saskatchewan leads the way with cash receipts which have moved to $1.93 billion for the nine-month period, from $1.02 billion for the corresponding period a year earlier. That is an increase of approximately 90 per cent for Saskatchewan, over what I believe was itself a record. If one were to take grain figures alone, this situation would be further emphasized. Indeed, it is demonstrated by the way in which the Saskatchewan—and, to a lesser degree, Alberta and Manitoba—figures of cash receipts for farmers perform during the same period. Farmers may, nonetheless, require cash earlier in the delivery year because of the necessity to obtain supplies, such as fertilizer, for the fall and the following season. Even in such a buoyant year, cash advances may be an element in the over-all farm picture. This increase is therefore proceeded with at this time notwithstanding the buoyant position.

On at least one occasion in the past, cash advances were used as a form of stabilization. Several years ago, when delivery opportunities fell to their lowest ebb, cash advances were allowed to exceed the actual amounts that could be recovered on them. Our decision to proceed with a logical and full-scale stabilization program for grains in the prairie region means that this will no longer be necessary. The increase is desirable, however, for other reasons, particularly to allow the farmer to have his cash in advance of delivery opportunity and therefore to balance the fact that this cash is available to him in full in the open market.

The bill increases the maximum available for an individual farmer from $6,000 to $15,000. It also permits recognition of the fact that in certain circumstances more than one person per permit is engaged in full-time farming. The new limit of $15,000 will, therefore, be multiplied by two or by three, as the case may be, where there are two or more real farmers represented by the permit book.

Cash advances have had an extraordinarily good record of repayment by farmers who have benefited from them. In many past years, 99.99 per cent of cash advances were repaid in due course by farmers in the prairie region. This is an outstanding record and I know it will not surprise those hon. members who are conscious of the attitude of the farmers in question and know their willingness to co-operate in plans which they can see are for their benefit.

This legislation was proposed in the last part of the previous session of parliament before dissolution. At that time it would have been possible to introduce the higher maximum for the current crop year. The dissolution of parliament and the ensuing election rendered that impossible, but we hope the legislation will be passed now and will be in operation for the next crop year. I think it is an important part of our over-all endeavour to protect the prairie farmer and to give him a total system of cash and returns to meet his needs, not only in terms of the amount of that remuneration but in terms of the time period in which he will receive it.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore commend Bill C-10 to the House and invite hon. members to refer it to the Standing Committee on Agriculture with dispatch for examination in detail. I think this has been recognized on all sides of the House as an extremely useful program for prairie farmers.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill C-10, I must say that I was interested to hear the minister explain the reason for the bill. It should first be pointed out that cash advance legislation was introduced by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) some 15 or 16 years ago. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) suggests it was 17 years ago, and I believe that is correct. It is interesting to note that the Liberal Party has had a change of heart in the interim period.

At the time the legislation was introduced they said this could not be done, they would not do it, and if it was ever done it would cost the companies huge sums of money, the farmers would not pay it back, and so on. They violently opposed this legislation at first. Now they are enlarging it and the minister gave two reasons for this. I will paraphrase what he said, Mr. Speaker. First of all the minister said that cash advance legislation must be updated. Well, it must keep up with inflation. The cost of production has been going up, and I am pleased to see the government recognizes that. By increasing the cash advance limit from $6,000 to $15,000, the government acknowledges that inflation plays a part.

The minister said that the other purpose of this legislation was the cash pressure on the farmer to sell his grain on the open market. I have come to the conclusion that this is the main reason the legislation is before the House today. Last year the government introduced a feed grains policy which allows the farmer to sell grain to either the Canadian Wheat Board or to the elevator companies. That grain is kept on the open market; it is bought at whatever the going price is and sold at the going price. The minister says this legislation is necessary in order to avert the cash pressure on the farmer to sell on the open market. It is my understanding that grain companies are to keep 10 per cent of their storage capacity open for feed grains on the open market.

The minister also spoke about the increase in the initial price. Members on this side of the House have long advocated the setting of the initial price based on a formula related to the expected price. I have used the figures of 75 per cent to 80 per cent. In other words, the initial price should be 75 per cent of the final price. The minister has played around with the figures for the beginning of this crop year, but in fact at the end of the 1972-73 crop year the initial price received was $3.75 per bushel of wheat, basis Fort William; $2.25 per bushel of barley, basis Fort William; and $1.10 per bushel of oats, basis Fort William. The announcement made by the minister today merely reinstates the initial price for wheat and barley and adds ten cents per bushel to the price of oats.

The minister has not followed any formula in setting initial prices, and this bill does not guide farmers. The original intent of the cash advance legislation was to provide cash to farmers who had about one billion bushels stored on the farm. The farmer who operated under the acreage or permit book system could go to the elevator company and receive a cash advance of up to $3,000. Subsequently, the amount was raised to $6,000 but the basic principle of the legislation was not changed. The cash advance program eased the pressure on the farmer who was short of cash. Under this bill, the government wishes to encourage farmers to sell through the Wheat Board and not on the open market. The government is saying, "We do not want you to sell on the open market. Sell through the Wheat Board and we will give you a cash advance."

Cash advance legislation was introduced 17 years ago for justifiable reasons. It is to be reinstated on the statute books, but this time it is designed to offset the weak feed grains policy which the minister introduced about one year ago. So let's not kid the troops. This is not the same old cash advance legislation, and the minister knows it. The amount of grain in storage on farms at the end of the 1973 crop year does not compare with the amount in storage 17 years ago. Today, farmers are not worried if they can sell grain or get cash for it. The minister has told the House about the number of farmers who deferred collecting money due to them from grain sales made this fall. He did not tell us how much money the Wheat Board is holding back in deferred payments. I suggest that the board is holding back about $500 million in deferred payments which farmers could collect if they wanted to. But the minister did not mention that. The announcement made today reads:

> With the higher initial payments, Mr. Lang also announced that an adjustment payment will be made to all those producers who have already delivered wheat, barley and oats to the Canadian Wheat Board since the beginning of the current crop year on August 1, 1974—
> Mr. Lang said that these payments from the Canadian Wheat Board will be in the mail to producers after the processing required, probably after the mailing of the cheques for the 1973-74 pool accounts in January.

The minister said he would not make final payments on 1973-74 pool accounts before January 1. Two years ago, when the minister found it politically expedient to do the opposite, he did so. At one time, final payments were never made before January or February. In the year of the October 30 election the minister said that the pool accounting system could be speeded up and payments made on August 1, before the end of the crop year. Now the minister has changed his mind and has said no final payment will be made on the 1973-74 pool account until January next because farmers are worried about income tax; that is, the payment on grain already delivered will not be made until January.

Even those who know absolutely nothing about farming should realize that if the final payment on the 1973-74 crop year is not made until the 1974-75 crop year, it may look as if initial payments have been increased. Actually, all that will have happened is that certain payments have been deferred; farmers will receive deferred payments for crops they have sold. Quite conceivably, such deferred payments could amount to between $400 million and $500 million next year. So one can see what happens when farmers do not pick up all their money. The question is, why is the minister pretending that this new legislation merely updates the former cash advance legislation, when he knows that we need to correct the situation created by his feed grain policy? I think the minister is worried about that policy. I ask the minister to consider the fact that the companies are buying feed grains at an alarming rate on the open market and this is undermining the government's policy of encouraging farmers to hold their grain and sell it through the Wheat Board in return for the privilege of cash advances.

When he introduced the legislation this afternoon the minister did not say if the amount per bushel advanced is to be increased, or how cash advances are to be paid back. When the minister introduced his first proposal covering cash advances, I prophesied that farmers would draw money out more quickly than they could pay it back. I said that the fund would not work. A year of so later the minister adjusted the program. I gather that under the present program there is to be no change in how much a farmer may have advanced to him. There is to be no change in the amount a farmer can receive as an advance and there is no change in the manner in which it is to be paid back. Therefore, we must examine the concept of the policy the minister is introducing.

For many years, if a family farm corporation worked under one permit book it was entitled to a cash advance as a single entity. Now, each member of the corporation, if it is a partnership or co-op, can borrow up to $15,000. This means that two shareholders, or farmers, can receive up to $30,000 in cash advances. Three or more shareholders, or partners, can receive up to $45,000. Clearly, a corresponding amount of grain must be sold. Thus, the minister has changed the permit book system substantially and the practice followed over the years is to be changed. I suggest that the minister has brought forward this legislation as a result of faults which have developed in his feed grains policy.

We have experienced many difficulties in grain production and in agriculture and the minister has done little to help. He made a great speech to the Grains Council a month ago suggesting that the Crowsnest pass rates should be done away with. Doing this, he said, would facilitate the movement of feed grain at a cheaper rate. How he arrives at that conclusion would be difficult to explain. In any case, it is now well established that farmers are not delivering their grain to the Wheat Board. They are withholding it for a variety of reasons: one has to do with income tax; and another is that they want to determine what they are likely to get for it on the open market as feed.

Recently a number of farmers asked me how best they could sell their barley, whether to sell it on the open market or through the Wheat Board. They wanted to know where they would get the best return. In announcing today that the initial price is to be increased, the minister did not tell us by how much. We understand that demurrage charges with respect to the crop year 1973-74 are to be carried over the crop year 1974-75. This may well affect the final payment for that crop year.

Some months ago there was a great deal of discussion about hopper cars and the Wheat Board suggested that producers would be in the business of buying and building hopper cars. The question that occurs to me is this: would the cost be charged against the Wheat Board account but not against grain moving under the feed grains policy? Some months ago, prior to an election, I think, the minister went to great lengths to suggest that the government would pay for repairing box cars. Are we to learn that this money will come out of the Wheat Board account and not out of receipts from grain sold on the open market for feed in Canada?

I believe it may well come out of the Wheat Board capital account. Why? Some months ago I asked the minister a question in this House about the demurrage charges incurred at Vancouver because grain was not being loaded. It was not being loaded through any fault of the farmer or of the grain companies; it was the fault of the government—the government had intervened to bring about a situation which lasted for some three months. The minister replied unequivocally that demurrage charges would come out of the Wheat Board account. I said at the time that this would mean more than $10 million coming out of that account because of the failure of the government to act with regard to the grain handlers strike. If the minister can tell us that the demurrage charges should come out of the Wheat Board account, why should he not tell us also that the money for the repair of boxcars would come from that account; that is, if one follows the minister's logic? I cannot do so: it is very difficult because the minister works in mysterious ways.

Mr. Lang: The hon. member knows perfectly well that the treasury is paying for these repairs.

Mr. Horner: The minister wants farmers to believe that this cash advance legislation is needed for the same purpose as similar legislation 17 years ago. He told us that some kind of subsidy would be devised in connection with ending the Crowsnest pass rates. Farmers were told, in effect, "Don't despair. Instead of giving money to the railroads, we will give it directly to you." Of course, that was before the election. I often think the farmer may get something periodically, two months or so before an election. On one occasion, before the election which was held on October 30, 1972, the minister was a little late with the payment; he announced it 15 days before the election. Farmers resented that open bribery and rejected the minister on that occasion.

However, the minister moves in mysterious ways and he wants to convince us that this legislation is necessary for the same reason as the cash advances of 17 years ago. It is not. Why, then, is he bringing this measure forward? The answer is that he wants it to offset a weakness in his feed grain policy: he is afraid that too much will be sold on the open market rather than through the Wheat Board. Anybody who has grown grain on the prairies realizes the strength of the Wheat Board. A number of people find fault with the board. It has not always worked well, but by and large most farmers support it.

Mr. Benjamin: As long as it is left alone.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) says, "As long as the government will let it alone." I recall a speech in which I pointed out that the minister had intervened in the affairs of the board more often than any of his predecessors. I listed all the hon. gentleman's Liberal predecessors: he had tinkered more and caused more concern than all of them put together. Yet at times he does not tinker enough. We saw a railway strike last something like 60 days. The chairman of the Wheat Board was almost in despair over loss of shipments. Then we saw the grain handlers' strike prolonged because of the minister's intervention and the intervention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro). We saw that strike go on for two or three months longer than it should have.

Even after the railway strike, terminal workers in some parts of the CN system took part in what is commonly called a slow-wheel movement, at the port of Vancouver. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool contacted the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to ask for assistance in ending that slow-wheel movement which lasted nearly a year—from February, 1973, almost to February, 1974. The president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool says the sale of 16 million bushels was just purely because of that situation.

● (1600)

The minister now comes forward with a small piece of legislation that will have no real effect on the financial and economic climate on the prairies. The last crop year was a relatively good year for grain sales and grain marketings and farmers borrowed $20 million under the cash advance legislation. In 1969, some $272 million was borrowed under the same legislation; but this was the year of operation LIFT, and that and a number of other circumstances made farmers short of cash at a time when there was plenty of grain still in the bins. Each year from 1969 until today the farmers have paid back more than they have borrowed and now net borrowings are down to a low figure.

I suggest the minister would be unable to make any member of the House believe that this cash advance legislation is any cure-all for the difficult marketing situation that may arise this fall, especially with grain that is unsuitable as milling grain. This bill will offer no particular assistance in this regard. Perhaps the minister is attempting to build up for some large, wealthy corporate undertaking cash advances interest-free. For example, $45,000 borrowed at today's interest rates would mean $4,500 in interest alone. This is the largest amount that any corporation, company, partnership, or father-son operation can borrow under this legislation, provided they have the necessary grain. So I would not be at all surprised to see some grain farmers in parts of Saskatchewan borrowing $45,000 from the elevator companies, putting the money in the bank and collecting the interest on it.

Mr. Benjamin: What an awful thing to say!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member suggests that that is an awful thing to say. I readily admit that the truth sometimes hurts. The point I am making is that if the minister wants to enable the farmers to set aside money which they can reinvest at the opportune time—in other words, to set aside a fund to smooth over some of the ups and downs in their operation—then he should do so by greatly changing the system, by introducing something similar to what I might call a registered retirement savings plan, in which farmers can build up a nest-egg to help them over difficult periods. This kind of system would be helpful to the agricultural industry, particularly the livestock breeders.

The members of the agriculture committee will have to take a very close look at this bill and the whole question of cash pressure exerted on farmers today due to the change in feed grains policy. The committee must determine whether this cash pressure is encouraging farmers to sell grain on the open market which normally would have gone to the Canadian Wheat Board. If that in fact is the case, surely we require legislation that more directly deals with this question, rather than using legislation that is already on the statue books.

I would be remiss if I did not bring another matter to the attention of the minister. When he introduced the new feed grains policy he also assured the livestock industry that their cost of transportation would be comparable to the cost of transporting grain via the railroads to eastern Canada. If the minister regards this bill as being part and parcel of his feed grains policy, then we on this side of the House will be waiting anxiously for the other part of his feed grains policy. I wonder why the minister has not introduced that part this year, at a time when the price of stocker cattle in western Canada is so low. Why has he not lived up to the obligation he undertook?

For example, he could have increased the price of calves a cent or two per pound, which would have meant a great deal, particularly at a time when farmers have been asking the federal government to assist the cattle industry, whether in the Peace River area, in northern or southern Saskatchewan, Manitoba or, for that matter, in the Cariboo in British Columbia. The cattle industry has been looking to the federal government for some over-all recognition that the price of feeder cattle today is not what it should be, and they are also looking for freight rates comparable to the rate for moving feed grains.

Having said that, I will watch with interest the progress of this legislation, since I think its purpose has strayed a long way from its original purpose 17 years ago. One wonders whether the minister is doing all he can to live up to his feed grains policy, and whether his feed grains policy will do all he and many others thought it would do when it was announced in the first part of August.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that all members of the House will support this legislation in principle. This has been the case since it was first brought before parliament in 1957, after many years of requests for the legislation from farm organizations, certainly from my own party and, I believe, from the party to my right during the late 1940s and 1950. Since there is no argument about the principle of the legislation, there is no need for the debate to go on at any length; but there are some questions that I hope the minister and his colleagues will consider and do something about when the bill goes to the committee on agriculture.

I have a few points to make and I pass them to the minister for consideration; he may already be aware of them. I understand there is concern among the grain companies over the administration of the cash advance legislation. They are somewhat anxiously waiting to see what agreement the Wheat Board will be submitting to them, since the agreement requires the grain companies, and subsequently the grain elevator agents, to be liable for the loss of any cash advances. I readily agree with the minister that there has been little or no problem since the legislation was first introduced. In fact, if the government were as reliable as the farmers in respect of cash advances, we would be much better off. I would remind the minister that the elevator agent can only take the word of the farmer regarding how much grain the farmer has, when issuing a cash advance. It is not practical or feasible for the elevator agent to go around inspecting every farmyard and granary to see whether farmers have the grain for delivery in order to repay cash advances.

The other point I want to make, on behalf of the elevator agents, is that while they have a liability in respect of the recovery of cash advances, they receive no compensation for handling what is probably half the administration involved in the cash advance legislation. These agents do a great deal of paperwork. This relieves the government and the Canadian Wheat Board from at least this administrative aspect, yet the elevator agent receives no compensation. It should be incumbent upon the government to see that when agreement in respect of the administration of this legislation is arrived at between the grain companies and the Canadian Wheat Board, some measure of compensation is made available to the elevator agents who administer the legislation and are faced with some liability under it.

Regarding the new limits in the legislation, I should like to ask the minister whether he would consider some change in respect of co-operative farms which may have anywhere from 5 to 20 members, in view of the fact that the $45,000 maximum is often insufficient. I have already spoken to a member of the Matador co-op farm, of which I believe there are presently 19 members, who said that in periods when there are many deliveries the $45,000 cash advance maximum is entirely insufficient. I appreciate that this does not involve a large number of farmers, but the minister and I know there are a number of co-operative farms with from three to a dozen or more members, and the maximum cash advance will not be very useful to them. I hope he will consider making exceptions in the case of co-operative farms with a large number of members, thereby providing higher maximum cash advances.

I was pleased to hear the minister announce today an increase in initial prices, as this has been demanded by members on this side, as well as farmers and farm organizations, for many months. There is no question in my mind that the low initial payments being made were nothing more than coercion on the farmer to get him to deliver grain on the open market. As long as the initial prices were below open market prices and the farmer needed cash to meet his harvest expenses, and so on, he had to sell his grain on the open market and most of the time he was not inclined to do so. I hope the new initial price structure the minister has announced will bring the price into line with the open market price.

Having regard to the argument that has been going on between the minister and myself and between the minister and farmers and farm organizations, let me say that it will continue. The whole policy in respect of feed grains is something the farmers thought they got rid of once and for all after the world war. When the minister brought in this feed grains program he told the farmers it was a good program and said he was fully in support of the Canadian Wheat Board and orderly marketing. Although he said the feed grains program was good, he hoped farmers would not deliver grain on the open market but would sell it to the Canadian Wheat Board. For many months the initial price was so low that many farmers had no real choice but to sell on the open market.

I hope that this increase in the initial price will do a great deal to encourage farmers not to deliver grain on the open market. I suppose in this one area the minister and I agree, in that we both hope his feed grain policy will collapse, with no deliveries being made on the open market. This whole policy can do nothing but cause deterioration in orderly marketing and the effectiveness of the Canadian Wheat Board. It seems there was no reason for bringing in that policy other than to detract from the principle of orderly marketing. The farmers did not ask for this feed grains policy, and I am sure neither the grain companies nor the wheat pools asked for it. Farmers' organizations and others still do not know why the minister was moved to bring in this policy or why he felt it was necessary. As far as I am concerned, there was only one reason for it; that was, to try to restore some degree of strength in the Winnipeg commodity exchange to the benefit of speculators and others who like to make a living off the backs of others without doing very much themselves.

The announced increase in initial payments will be welcomed by the farmers and the grain companies. In fact, the minister's announcement today in this regard effectively cut my speech in half, because I intended to say a lot more but now find it unnecessary. In any event, I should like to make a couple of other points on the issue raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). For some time now, successive governments in Canada have played off grain growers against livestock growers, and vice-versa. For years the livestock growers had things pretty good and the grain growers had things pretty bad. Now, with higher grain prices, the situation is reversed, with the result that grain growers are better off and cattle prices are in a mess. These two Canadian groups are almost at each other's throats because of the inadequacy of national policies in this area.

Here again I should like to put forward the suggestion that the two-price system which applies to feed grains is just as logical in respect of grain for human consumption. There is no reason why the Wheat Board's world asking price cannot be put in place, with a second price being in place for domestic consumption whether it be for human consumption or livestock feeding. That price should have some relation to the farmer's cost of production, and the world price would be of benefit to the producer. This would mean that the price of feed grain would be such as to take into consideration the needs of the livestock industry. I hope the minister and his colleagues will move in this direction.

Such a system with two prices would work a disadvantage to the private grain operators and speculators on the Winnipeg commodity exchange, but I am hopeful that the minister and this government are prepared to move in this direction. I can assure the minister that my colleagues and I will continue to promote this idea. Such legislation is urgently required by farmers in times of high grain deliveries. It would offset the situation which often occurs when we have a winter such as the last one. I might add that the situation is aggravated by the fact that the railroad companies have done nothing to improve the standard of hundreds of miles of their trackage: this will mean that many farmers in a number of areas will not receive rail service and will not be able to deliver their grain.

These advances will be welcomed and will be used particularly by the growers located on what the minister and his experts call low-density lines. They are low-density because the railways do not run trains over them. This is another way of coercing farmers to deliver grain over longer distances to secondary or main line points. The farmers must either do this, at higher cost, or take advantage of the cash advances.

This is another reason I hope farmers will take advantage of the cash advances when they find themselves in this kind of situation and will refuse to deliver grain over longer distances to suit the policies of the government regarding branch line abandonment, designed for the convenience of the railways and the grain companies rather than for the convenience of the farmers and the public.

As I have said, we support this legislation in principle. I hope the minister will consider the two points I have made. The first is that there should be some measure of compensation for the elevator agents, who have to do most of the administering of the program and receive nothing in return, while being subject to some liability under it. Second, I hope the minister will consider an exception to the legislation in respect of the $45,000 maximum in the case of co-operative farms with more than three members, so they may have use of cash advances in proportion to the use that may be made by one, two or three farmers. I am pleased to say that we will support the legislation, and hope it will pass quickly.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-10. First of all I would like to congratualte the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) for the help extended to western grain producers. I listened earlier to the Tory spokesman who said that farmers had been waiting for this bill for a long time. A few moments ago the NDP spokesman asked the minister who had prompted him to introduce this bill because he said it seemed co-ops had not asked for this bill. We have here one of the minor inconsistencies that may crop up in this House.

That bill was introduced by the Tories nearly 17 years ago. We note ironically that the Liberals of that time had voted against that bill. Today, they are the ones who want to strengthen it, recognizing the need for such a bill after 17 years.

I am quite happy for the western grain producers because the recommendations read as follows, and I quote:

—to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act to increase from six thousand dollars to fifteen thousand dollars the maximum amount that may be paid to a producer as advance payments in respect of grain to be delivered under a permit book, and under the circumstances prescribed, to privide where a producer is a multi-farmer unit of two shareholders for the maximum amount of thirty thousand dollars, and where the producer is a multi-farmer unti of three or more shareholders for the maximum amount of forty-five thousand dollars.

I think it is simply normal. After 17 years it is time to get in line with today's prices, keep pace with the economy, in view of the spiralling increase in grain prices in recent years.

I think it was simple logic. It is not a favour that the minister is presently doing directly to western producers, he is only following a logical line of thought for the purpose of giving more freedom to western farmers. I think it is the only way for western farmers to go on the open market without always being a little bit of a victim of the Canadian Wheat Board, even though the latter has always done a great job in western Canada. I believe that is the option of competition and it gives western producers another ace in the hole so that they can go to the open market without always being faced with a financial problem.

All that is very nice for the West, we are very happy about it and we also would wish—and I have said this several times since I have been sitting here,—to have an association so that we may obtain federal aid. We too would like to have an association responsible to a minister just like today's Canadian Wheat Board. We, in Quebec, would like to have feed grains organization responsible to a minister. So that the three western provinces could at last trade directly, on equal footing, with the eastern provinces.

I think that is the root of the problem and the origin of all those skirmishes going on between Eastern and Western Canada. We never agree. Why? Because there is always some middleman who is interested in provoking these skirmishes and that middleman is the marketing agent. As long as we are not ridden of those marketing agents we will always be faced with problems. Such is the situation in Quebec these days. After so many years, we still must go through marketing agents to get our wheat from the Prairie provinces. There will be justice in the Eastern provinces only when we have a similar agency in the East to bargain directly with the Western provinces. That organization, for example, an eastern Board responsible to a minister. Why not?

The West has a minister who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. To be fair, let us put a minister in charge of it and get rid of those financial agencies that gobble up the profits of western producers and eastern consumers. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker. As long as we hang on to those agencies, as long as we refuse to grab the bull by the horns and say: The East is going to be responsible for its purchases from the West, and the two groups will negotiate and come to an agreement without the financiers keeping the better part of the pie, the situation will remain the same.

That is the point I particularly wanted to put before the minister, Mr. Speaker. I am happy that bill has been introduced because it gives us the opportunity to discuss a problem that has been denounced in this House for 10 years but that no one wants to deal with. Neither Quebec nor the other eastern provinces dare make a move to discuss things with the western provinces. The Easterners criticize the Westerners, and vice versa. Everyone seems to be wearing dark glasses that keep them from locating the problem.

I therefore urge the minister to reflect on this problem and I point out to the members of the committee that while I agree with that increase other remedies are indicated which might mean prosperity for the eastern provinces and peace between East and West.

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter this debate on Bill C-10 until the minister aroused me from my lethargy by putting on record the income that farmers in western Canada are earning. If any person has to be straightened out on this issue, it is the minister. First, I would like to say, for the sake of clarification, that the cash advance legislation of 1957—and this holds true in 1974—is not a hand-out by the federal taxpayer to the western farmer. The farmer pays it back. It is a moral acceptance that when a man earns wages during a calendar year, he has the right to some of them in the year in which he earned them and should not have to wait for that income for two or three years, as was the case in the 1950s.

I was the minister who drafted the legislation in the fall of 1957 as a member of the Diefenbaker administration. I well recall the time when advisers to the government said it was impossible to bring in this type of legislation. It had been put forward in the previous administration on two separate occasions, and for the several reasons advanced by the advisers to the government the previous administration had turned it down. That shows us the great power in the early 1950s of the advisers to take over the minds and souls of the Liberal Party. Nothing has changed. I mentioned the year 1957 for another reason, that is, that at that time farmers all across the country were in a desperate position; hunger was growing in the world and we were sitting on our reserves in Canada. Now that the clock has turned full-cycle and the country is becoming aware that we are in another cycle of great food shortages in the world, suddenly this government becomes interested in the world food program.

I go back in my mind to the years 1973 and 1974 and find the record shows that only one member of this House was asking questions about the shortage of food in the world.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Now everyone is on to the thing and I am stepping out as the one member letting all these people carry it forward. But the problem has been there for 25 years and it will be there longer than 25 years. I am glad to see other people taking up the cudgel.

Let me return to what the minister said. When he said that cash receipts over the first nine months of this year were 90 per cent higher than they were last year, he left the impression that he wanted to carry across this country—that western farmers were rolling in dough. I know something about the income of western farmers. The difficulties they have had since the 1930s have been told over and over again in the House. Believe me when I say that the first year the western farmer broke even so that his operating expenses and interest on the money invested equalled his income was 1972. In 1973 in Saskatchewan, when all these high prices were in effect, he not only paid his expenses, paid himself the interest he had never paid himself before, but made the tremendous amount of $2,200 per family for a whole year's work! That is a fact of life. The year 1973 was the best income year in history for the Saskatchewan farmer, who produces 60 per cent of the grain for export, but he made only $2,200 per family.

I had the impression, from listening to the minister, that now that our income is up so much we are rolling in dough. I would like to see most Canadians across this country trying to live on $2,200 a year. The minister did not mention that in the last three years the average expense of operating a western farm had increased at the rate of 20 per cent, plus, a year. We do not have the figures yet and will not have them until next June for the year 1974, but it seems that the expense increase will hit 25 per cent. As a person who comes from one of the prairie provinces, I know that these expenses will go up. While the average expenses of Canadians have gone up 3 per cent a year, the farmer's costs have gone up 7 per cent. Now that the cost for the rest of Canada is going up by 10 per cent and 11 per cent, farm costs are going up by 20 per cent to 25 per cent. All I know is that when prices go down, costs do not go down but keep on going up.

That brings me to the main point I wanted to make to the minister in all seriousness. He and I have fought across the west on this issue for many years. I hold to the belief that the minister followed the wrong policy from 1968 until 1972 when the government sold western grain on the export market at a price below the cost of production. He argues that that was the right course to follow. That is his view; I have mine. I well remember the election campaign of 1972 when I believe I spoke on behalf of all the farmers who knew how much grain they had in their granaries and on behalf of all those who believed in the organized selling of our grain through a marketing agency which sells grain rather than imposes controls and restrictions. I remember very well saying that we had run out of grain. The price should have gone up in the fall of 1971, on the basis of the information before the government. But the minister, during that hot summer of 1972 said, "There is lots of grain". When the election was over and the price was up to $3 or $5, he was very quiet because there was no grain.

The minister has made horrible blunders in his assessment of the international grain market and that cost has been met by the farmer. In all the years 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971 and 1972 the minister and the government kept grain prices down deliberately on the basis that this was competing. The minister said, "We must remain competitive." That is one point. The second point is that the minister and this government brought in a program in 1970 to take the western grain farmers out of wheat. This minister not only told them to get out of growing wheat, and gave them the inducement of $6 an acre to move into other crops or to summer fallow and hold the land idle, but said, "If you do not do what you are told, you will not be allowed to sell on quota and"—by inference—"you will not be allowed to pay back your cash advances." That was the first time a government of this country had ever forbidden a man to grow food—and it was done by this minister. Now he comes here today and has the gall to say that income in 1974 is 90 per cent higher than it was in 1973.

Mr. Lang: Cash receipts in Saskatchewan, in the first three quarters.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): He says that cash receipts in Saskatchewan, for the first three quarters, are 90 per cent higher. He has the colossal gall to bring that figure to the attention of this House and leave the impression that farmers are rolling in dough. I am saying that when you take off the expenses of operation and interest charges, the farmer has barely enough to pay minimum wages. Let us compare the situation with that of 1973. In 1973, all the Saskatchewan farmer received in the full calendar year, after expenses and interest, was approximately $2,200 per family. This is the type of living condition that the minister calls rolling in dough.

● (1640)

Mr. Speaker, the western farmer, rightly or wrongly—but certainly of his own free will—has entered into a socialist system of marketing. He has put his fate into the hands of the Canadian Wheat Board, and quite willingly, but he expects that in return it will endeavour to get him the highest average price possible. Generally speaking, the Wheat Board has an excellent record. But having put his fate in the hands of a socialist agency over which parliament or the minister has no control, or should not have, he expects in return that this government will protect him against rises and falls in world prices.

From 1932 to 1949, farmers fought for some form of international rule of law on prices and the allocation of wheat. That was achieved in 1949 by agreement among some 50 nations, and from 1949 to 1967 wheat farmers in Australia, Canada, Argentina and the United States had the protection of an international agreement that set a floor and a ceiling on prices for a three-year period. If the price rose too high, then supply had to be guaranteed. If the price dropped to the bottom, then the demand had to be met by recipient countries on a quota basis.

This rule of law on price and allocation gave farmers a stable, though not large, income from 1949 to 1967. That held until this government, along with others, destroyed the International Wheat Agreement and replaced it with an International Grains Agreement which never took hold. All that remains is the shell of an administration framework in London, England. For the first time in a generation, wheat farmers of the world are without an international agreement on price and allocation of supply in case of emergency.

I have sat in this House during 1972, 1973 and 1974 and have heard all about a two-price system for the little 50 million or 60 million bushels that go into domestic supply, but not one speech have I heard from the government about the billion bushels that go for export each year. Today, the grain farmers of the world who grow coarse grains and feed grains are as naked as a jay bird. The farmer in the wheat growing areas of the world, without any protection as to world price, is a streaker and does not know it. He worries about how long prices will last, because he knows that if there is a surplus of grain in the world the $5 price will drop to nothing. How will he then meet his expenses, his heavy interest rates, and so on?

The minister's talk of getting rid of the Crowsnest pass agreement has been worrying farmers. That agreement was made some 70 years ago. With 300 million bushels of grain going to export positions, the railways broke even, and now with putting a billion bushels a year into export position, the railways are making money on the Crowsnest rates. Why should the minister stir things up by saying this rate should be looked at? Two years ago he said he was going to look at the open market, and now we find ourselves in it so we must assume the minister is serious when he says he is going to do something. I did not take him seriously when he said he was going to bring us into the open market, but he did it. If he is serious about the Crowsnest base rate, we have no choice but to fight every inch of the way.

When we start talking about branch line abandonment and inland terminals, they will be tied up in our minds with the minister's new concept of western Canada. Our elevator system is 50 years out of date and our transportation system is 25 years out of date and should be replaced. We need to spend $3 billion or $4 billion on port facilities for the west coast—and goodness knows how much on the east coast. We need all these things now, and we have the technology. But all the minister does is brag about how much the farmer makes. It makes him look like one of these Montreal organized-crime types. Really, the farmer is barely earning a wage.

Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say to members of the Social Credit Party. No farmer in Canada suffers more than the farmer in eastern Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes. We in the west talk about how we were just getting proper wages in 1973, but even in the good years of 1973-74 the eastern farmer was not making enough money to pay the interest on what he invested in his operation. He therefore has no income at all as far as wages are concerned. In February, 1962, a bill called the eastern feed grains assistance act was introduced in this House by this party, but was not passed because our government was defeated. There has been no indication since that successive governments have been aware that we need every eastern farmers in order to help feed a hungry world. They produce commodities that we cannot produce in western Canada because we are a desert. They can produce trees. Some hon. members will remember when a forestry act was introduced setting up a department of forestry because of the desperate need for fibre.

I do not see any sign of eastern farmers shifting into a combination of beef and tree production. All I see is a comedy of blunders in the beef industry this past year and a half. Canada does not produce enough beef to feed her own people and has to import 15 per cent of her needs. We draw on the protein supplies of the world for 15 per cent of our needs. By unilaterally removing our tariff in 1973 and encouraging farmers to flood our market with a few thousand head of cattle, the government destroyed the price base and has played ping-pong with beef ever since.

Madam Speaker, I think this legislation, regardless of its apparent function—and it is there, obviously, to carry out a firm moral principle—is sound legislation. The $15,000 ceiling now is the same as the $6,000 ceiling in earlier days. The purpose of the legislation is fundamentally sound, that is, to keep the farmer from going too deeply into the open market system at the present time. In the main, I think the legislation should be supported.

● (1650)

I conclude with this fundamental position. I ask the minister to take his mind off the Crowsnest rates for a while and to re-establish the International Wheat Agreement so that farmers who produce grain will be governed by a stable rule of law which will take care of prices and allocation of supplies for the next 10 or 15 years. If he does that, he can make his next four years in parliament worth while.

Mr. Frank Hamilton (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Madam Speaker, Bill C-10 amends the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, an act that has been well accepted across the prairies and was brought in by the government headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as previously stated. It was introduced during the 1957-58 crop year. Back in those days the advance was paid at the rate of 50 cents per bushel for wheat, 20 cents per bushel for oats and 35 cents per bushel for barley, the maximum of $3,000 being paid to any one producer.

The amendment before the House shows the dramatic increase in operating expenses for western grain agriculture. The act was amended in 1968 and payments were increased to $1 per bushel for wheat, 40 cents per bushel for oats and 70 cents per bushel for barley. The maximum for any producer was increased to $6,000. These cash advances are based on wheat, oats and barley harvested and in storage in the farmer's bins. The farmer, of course, must await quota levels which will allow him to deliver his grain to the Wheat Board and he pledges to deliver the committed grain as the quotas open. As has been said, the cash advance is not a hand-out by the federal government; it is actually the farmer's own money, paid to him while he is awaiting delivery quotas. If the producer is in default, appropriate action is taken even up to prosecution.

The present legislation places an additional administrative burden on the Canadian Wheat Board and country grain elevators. In 1972-73, the number of accounts in default totalled 3,538. Altogether, 1,468 accounts were taken to the Federal Court of Canada. Overdue accounts tend to create bad feeling between the grain buyer and the grain producer. Over the years, more than $1 billion has been taken by the producers in cash advances and the repayment record has been very good, only a small fraction—less than 1 per cent of accounts owing—remaining unpaid. This year, already $28 million in cash advances has been taken out by producers, clearly establishing the need for this legislation.

As I said previously, the Canadian Wheat Board has been assigned the responsibility of administering this act which has been in existence now for about 17 years. The effects of grain companies being agents of the Wheat Board have filtered down to the country grain buyer. Thus we see the government continually sloughing off its responsibilities to grain companies. They are forced to act as agents of the government, with all the political implications involved. When the producer gets a cash advance, he goes straight to the bank or credit union with it. That is where the transaction should take place. Initially the forms might be held by the country elevator and, if necessary, signed by the grain buyer or a commissioner for oaths, as happens at present. Nevertheless, the entire administration of cash advances is properly the business of our banking system which should be responsible for the collection of this money.

We have piled far too much work on our country elevator operators. I have talked to these people, and it is apparent that unless the system is changed we shall experience real difficulty in recruiting men to fulfil this function. Only in the last two years have country grain buyers in Saskatchewan been relieved of the responsibility of collecting overdue municipal taxes. That was an unjust responsibility. The federal government is still piling responsibilities on these companies and involving them in this greatly expanded cash advance legislation.

The fact that advances are to increase to $15,000 per individual, $30,000 for two people and $45,000 for three, shows the extent to which farm production costs have escalated. Although $15,000 may sound like a lot of money, it represents two truckloads of flax or, in other words, 1,500 bushels of flax or one hopper car of wheat. The producer is to pay full income tax on the advance in the year in which it is taken out. He may exercise the other option, of course, and take out a bank loan; in that case he will pay the tax in the year in which it is repaid. I should think the government could give the producer a break by deferring payment: it could require him to pay tax in the year he repays his cash advance.

I support this legislation, with two reservations. This is just one more law which tends to isolate the producer from the marketplace. For instance, during the west coast grain tie-up producers were not affected directly because so many laws come between them and their actual pay cheque. This is another such law. Finally, I ask the minister not to overload grain buyers with paper work. Let him be careful to avoid that in this and in future legislation.

Mr. Towers: Madam Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): As the House will be considering different business at eight o'clock, the hon. member might wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Towers: I so move.

On motion of Mr. Towers the debate was adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE DEDUCTIONS FOR VOLUNTEER SERVICES PROVIDED FOR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS AND GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide for deductions for volunteer services provided by a taxpayer on behalf of either a charitable organization or a federal, provincial or municipal agency.

He said: Madam Speaker, volunteer workers comprise one of the main groups in this country who keep certain activities alive in our communities. I know the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) has great concern in this respect. During the last election campaign he mentioned across the country that he was going to set up a committee or a council on voluntarism. Two weeks ago the minister was speaking before the advisory council on voluntarism, and I should like to read into the record a report by the Canadian Press calling attention to some of his statements:

● (1700)

The advisory council on voluntarism should suggest ways in which the federal government and voluntary organizations can co-operate to improve the quality of life in Canada, Secretary of State Hugh Faulkner said Sunday.

Faulkner, speaking at a conference of national voluntary organizations, announced the appointment of 15 members to the council.

Establishment of the council, which has a two-year mandate, was announced during the election campaign in June.

The minister suggested that the problems of recruiting members and financing volunteer organizations be studied by the advisory council.

He said: "There is a great need for more collaboration between the federal government, the voluntary organizations, the foundations, and the corporations to avoid duplication and to encourage a more rational use of limited resources. The council's advice in this area would be particularly welcome."

The minister also suggested that further study be made into the government policy of subsidizing organizations which oppose its policies. He added: "I believe it is a sign of healthy and vital democracy if governments feel able to subsidize constructive dissent".

He mentioned as examples of this policy grants to women's groups and native organizations which often criticize government.

The possibility of subsidizing intervention by voluntary organizations before regulatory bodies such as the National Energy Board or the Canadian Transport Commission should also be studied by the council, he said.

The conference has gathered for the first time leaders of about 60 national voluntary groups such as the Red Cross, the Boy Scouts of Canada and La Federation des Femmes Canadiennes Françaises to discuss matters of mutual concern.

Volunteers in this country are doing a great job: I do not think anybody would deny that. We have cases of people throughout this country driving their cars once a week from, for example, my constituency which is 20 miles from a major hospital where a great deal of work is done. People use their cars to drive others who cannot walk and are in wheelchairs to hospitals every morning. This costs them a great deal of money for which they are receiving no compensation whatsoever. We have people coaching soccer teams, football teams and hockey teams. They go to great expense. I know in my own case, as a member of parliament often away from home during the week, the coach of my three sons soccer teams has to come to my house to pick up my children because there isn't a bus service in the area, this involves his driving an extra 20 miles every time they play soccer, which is six time a week for the three of them.

These are expenses being met out of people's pockets, sometimes people who cannot really afford it. Yet they look around and they see OFY grants and LIP grants that are not always meeting the needs of various areas. I do not want to be too critical in this area because many of us have set up advisory groups for these programs and they are much improved over what they were a couple of years ago. But I still think there is a bad taste left in many people's mouths over some of the grants that have been handed out in the past.

These volunteers are seeing a society that seems to be spending more money on welfare than they think should be spent. They are seeing waste by government. I think a good case of waste is the government's funding of this volunteer organization to the tune of $10,000. Is this the type of money we want the government to be spending? The volunteer organization which the government is supporting and setting up may come up with many useful ideas; but one of its main points, we hear from the minister, is that it is to recommend to various volunteer organizations just where they should go in government to obtain money. I thought Information Canada was set up for that purpose. Why do we need another bureaucracy to tell people where they should go to get funds from government? Information Canada was set up for that purpose and it should be used for that purpose, as should the minister's offices.

I do not intend to speak very long on this subject because I think it is straightforward. It is explained in the motion. We are asking the government to consider the feasibility of allowing volunteer workers to get a tax deduction for the amount of money they spend out of their own pockets on volunteer work. This is being done in many countries. I do not think it is too much to ask the government to consider this suggestion. I know, in a motion of this type and in a major financial area such as this, the government will want time to study the proposal and determine whether it is feasible. I am not an economic specialist and I do not know whether it is totally feasible, but I think at least we should bring the subject before a committee so it can be discussed. That is where full discussion should take place, in committees of the House and not in organizations outside the House of Commons.

I have spoken to many volunteer organizations that are having a hard time getting volunteers to work for them. They are getting a throwback from these people who are saying, "I would love very much to take Mr. Jones down to the hospital twice a week in my car, but with the cost of gasoline today and the cost of everything else, I can't afford to do it." Let us not stand here for an hour and talk about this, Madam Speaker: let us put it into a committee and discuss it. I think we can discuss it in committee on a non-partisan basis because I do not think it is a partisan subject. I hope the government will not take up the 47 minutes that are left. I am going to sit down, and I hope we can agree to send this subject to committee so that we can discuss it, examine the pros and cons and come up with a solution in the long run.

Mr. Alan Martin (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, in proposing that the government consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act to provide for deductions for volunteer services provided by a taxpayer, in addition to the normal deduction already provided in respect of monetary contributions, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) touches an area which at first sight does seem to give rise to an inequity in the Income Tax Act as it now stands. On the surface, it would seem reasonable and fair that a taxpayer who devotes considerable portions of his or her personal time and energy—

Mr. Reynolds: And services.

Mr. Martin: —and services to a worthy cause should receive some form of tax benefit in the same manner as benefit is provided for those who donate cash or kind to the same worthy cause. The proposal further tends to appeal to one's sense of equity because very often these devoted individuals in the final analysis are responsible for the existence of many worthy charitable organizations, whereas the donor of cash or kind is able to make his or her donation without the need for further personal follow-up or involvement.

Assuming that we were to proceed with the motion as put forward by the hon. member, we would have to make some attempt to examine the feasibility of the proposal from both the administrative and the revenue aspect. Let us consider for a few moments the administrative factor alone. Only in comparatively recent times has adequate control been implemented in the approved methods of handling books, accounts and receipts for cash donations to charitable institutions. For many years there was some question whether receipts in a number of instances were legitimate in terms of the nature of the charitable undertaking or, indeed, whether the organization was substantial enough to warrant the granting of valid receipts for donations for income tax purposes.

Recent tightening-up has introduced certain new administative ramifications in respect of the operation of numerous charitable organizations throughout the country. But on the whole I think the new procedures have been generally well accepted as a necessary move by the government to ensure equity and fair play in all instances. However, a move to enlarge the scope of donations so as to entitle one to a receipt in return for services rendered, would serve to introduce new administrative procedures of a scope which would tend to bury many of our voluntary organizations in a deluge of paperwork and office arrangements with which, in all likelihood, they would be unable to cope in normal circumstances.

A few illustrative examples come to mind, Let us consider the church workers who spends many hours each week and each month on projects associated with his or her church which are most important to the individual concerned and which, indeed, rank high in the list of priorities for the use of personal time available over and above that associated with the normal course of employment. To operate the system proposed by the hon. member with any sense of equity it would be necessary for each church across the nation to maintain careful records of the time devoted by the individual, and then ensure that a value was placed on his or her time in order to determine the appropriate amount for a charitable receipt that would presumably be issued at year-end. I select this example of a church worker because it seems to me it is one that could be multiplied thousands of times across this nation. It could be repeated for the volunteer in Scout or Guide work or in scores of other philanthropic and essential Canadian institutions.

The two more obvious questions that immediately arise relate to the appropriate value to be placed upon the services of such an individual and the procedural methods by which the time that such individuals devoted to the charitable organization would be logged. I do not think I need go further to illustrate the potential difficulties involved.

Next we might take the example of two individuals of substantially differing income brackets who volunteer their services with the same charitable organization. How would the value of the respective services of these two persons be determined? Would it be fair to determine, in one case, a value for services that is considerably higher than in the other case because of their differing income situations? Alternatively, would it be fair to equate the time they both spent at the same value? I think that either method would produce a degree of inequity that would tend to make the proposal, from this aspect alone, extremely difficult to justify and administer. If we were to accept that differing values should be allotted to people of differing income brackets engaged in the same type of volunteer social work, the question then becomes one of determining who should make such judgments and how extensive would be their authority in this regard. This, in turn, leads to all sorts of speculation as to how this particular aspect of the question would be resolved.

I would like to return for a moment to the matter of equity as it relates to the proposal put forward by the hon. member. I mentioned at the outset that the proposal would initially seem to provide more equity under the Income Tax Act if, indeed, donations for services rendered were to be permitted as a deduction in accordance with the treatment given to donations of cash or kind. I do not think however, that we should accept this argument at face value without examining it a little more deeply. Such examination, I believe, tends to dilute the equity argument somewhat, as may be seen in the following example. Mr. A., who works a standard 40-hour week and earns $5 per hour, is a devoted subscriber to the cause of the mentally retarted in Canada—I use this only as an example—and donates four hours of his time every weekend to assisting the recognized group in his area on various projects associated with the cause of the mentally retarded. In this straightforward and probably unusual type of example, Mr. A. clearly donates a value of time that could be calculated at $20 per week to this particular volunteer organization.

A neighbour of his, Mr. B., who also works a standard work week and earns $5 per hour, is also interested in the cause of the mentally retarded in his area. Rather than taking Mr. A's approach, however, Mr. B. feels that his particular contribution would be more valuable in the form of cash. Accordingly, Mr. B. takes on a part-time job each week end at which he works for a period of four hours and earns an additional $5 an hour for this extra work. Mr. B. then proceeds to turn over the $20 so earned to the cause for the mentally retarded and makes his donation to the association with whom Mr. A. is engaged on a volunteer-time basis.

In this way, the approximately $1,000 per annum that Mr. B. earns over and above his normal salary is turned over to a charitable organization and he is issued a receipt for $1,000 in recognition to this donation. The $1,000 earned, however—this is the important point—is added to his taxable income and reported on his T-4 slip at the end of the year. The charitable donation receipt simply allows him to revert to his normal salary for income tax purposes. It becomes a deduction. In other words, the additional $1,000 of income is offset by the $1,000 charitable receipt. His position for income tax purposes, vis-à-vis that of Mr. A., is thus identical.

Were Mr. B. not provided this taxable benefit for $1,000 of additional income turned over the charitable organization, he would indeed be in an inferior position to Mr. A. for income tax purposes. Alternatively, if Mr. A. were given special recognition for his four hours of time donated to the charitable organization each week, he would accrue a $1,000 charitable receipt benefit which would have the effect—this, too, is an important point—of putting him in a more favourable position than Mr. B. who has donated his substance to the charitable cause by way of tax donation.

In other words, the proposal of the hon. member would, in the instance covered by this illustration, serve to introduce an inequity into the tax system that would favour the individual who was donating time rather than cash. I think this is an important point in that it does tend to dilute the equity argument that seemed in the first instance to be relatively strong in relation to the proposal put forward by the hon. member. Only when one comes to look into this question does that particular equity argument tend to diminish.

Finally, I would like to make reference to what I think might be interpreted as a philosophical approach to the question at hand. The selection of priorities against which an individual will devote portions of the 24 hours available to him or her in any one day is a very personal matter that frequently relates to the basic make-up of the individual, as well as to the situation in which he or she may find themselves in relation to the simple matter of time available for worthy causes of a non-income producing nature. I am not at all sure in my own mind that it would be desirable for the income tax laws of the country to attempt to influence these priorities. I believe this is particularly worthy of consideration when one considers, as one must, that such influence in favour of encouraging more time to be devoted to volunteer organizations would be accompanied by a substantial drain on the public purse that would have to be made up by the imposition of additional taxes at some other level.

For example, it seems to me that the pensioner who elects to donate some of his or her experience gained over the working years to a charitable organization by way of free provision of his or her services for a portion of each week, would be making such a decision based on his or her own philosophical approach to how they wished to spend some portion of the free time available to them. I do not believe the Income Tax Act should attempt to reward such individuals, however, for this particular selection of priorities. The income earning individual who has not yet reached retirement age might wish to make a similar choice of priorities as to how to spend his or her time, but is simply unable to do so by virtue of the continuing necessity to spend most of this time earning a weekly salary or wage.

The same argument could be made, probably more tangibly, in the case of the wealthier individual whose high rate of income is not dependent upon the need to work for a living in the normal way. I simply do not think it would be just for the Income Tax Act to provide a benefit for such persons because of their ability to devote so much more time than their neighbours to their favourite charitable cause.

I think the motion put forward by the hon. member has merit. However, I would suggest that the arguments against it are sufficiently strong to justify continuing the provisions under the Income Tax Act by which no recognition by way of a tax benefit is given in the case of services rendered on behalf of a charitable organization or a federal, provincial or municipal agency.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): I had not intended to participate in this debate and I will be very brief, but I become somewhat disturbed by government backbenchers playing the role of talking out motions such as this one, which I think has considerable merit, and by the way they do it—by setting up straw men in anticipation of the legislation and knocking them down with all kinds of arguments. The motion before us merely asks the government to consider the advisability of allowing tax deductions for taxpayers who contribute volunteer services to charitable organizations. The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), whose motion this is, merely asks that it be sent to committee for further study. I think that is a perfectly reasonable and legitimate request.

It is my belief that all Canadians, and certainly members of this House, are cognizant of the important role volunteers play in our society; they are aware of the need for dedicated people to help the less fortunate. The human touch a volunteer organization gives cannot be replaced by any kind of government agency or bureaucracy which tends to be very legalistic and removed from people's everyday needs.

It seems to me the motion is even more advisable in this day and age of increasing inflation, when it is all the more difficult for a person to donate the level of volunteer service he may have donated in the past. Let me give one example of a volunteer driver who is driving, say, pensioners or disabled persons to an administrative office in town, to a civic function, a shopping centre or to the doctor. Today this has become even more expensive because of huge increases in the cost of gasoline. This puts an extra burden on the person who is already willing to devote time and his own money in the form of driving his car and paying for the fuel. Therefore, it seems to me that if a volunteer could be given some kind of relief or some kind of cushion by being able to deduct some of this expense, it would at least maintain the high level of volunteer participation we have today, and would perhaps even encourage a higher level in the days ahead.

The hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) raised a number of objections on behalf of the government. His first point was that to implement the idea of a tax reduction for voluntary services would cause great administrative problems for the government. I do not know the degree to which this would be complicated, because already we have travelling salesmen who are able to deduct car expenses and a portion of the expenses of maintaining their residence used for business. This is a simple procedure already provided for in the Income Tax Act and I do not see that it would make it much more complicated if we added another section to our income tax forms allowing for deductions for volunteer services.

The hon. member also raised the problem, as he stated it, of extra paperwork for volunteer organizations in that they would have to place a value on volunteer services. I think a set of tariffs could be produced in the regulations that would make it very easy to decide which services were justified for tax deduction and the amount to be allowed.

The hon. member on the government side also raised the problem of the inequities that would exist, in that one income group could take advantage of a deduction not available to somebody else. He assumes that the deductions would bear some relation to income. Why could there not be a set rate for tax reduction for different services provided, with a maximum amount of money deductible, and on top of that a total maximum deductible for volunteer services for all taxpayers no matter what their income level, as is now the case with charitable tax deductions?

If we allow this matter to go to committee, we can look at the so-called problems, alternatives and merits of the motion. Surely it is a reasonable request by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta that we look into his motion in order to bolster the role of volunteer agencies and volunteers themselves in our society. Unfortunately, I know that these comments will fall on deaf ears because several government backbenchers will rise during the next 35 minutes to talk out this commendable motion.

Mr. A. C. Abbott (Mississauga): Madam Speaker, speaking on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), let me say that I think it is particularly appropriate that hon. members in this private members' hour should be dealing with a taxation measure, considering that tonight the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will be introducing his budget. All of us are looking forward to this great evening, especially those of us who are in the House for the first time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are due for a let-down.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member suggests that we are due for a let-down. But, of course, the great let-down was for the opposition when it proceeded last spring to defeat the Minister of Finance's previous attempt to introduce a budget. The consequences of this ill-advised procedure were many. First, Canadians were temporarily deprived of some beneficent tax measures which the minister was attempting to make into law; second, certain members of the opposition were unfortunately, from their point of view, unable to return to join the thirtieth parliament. Of course, every cloud has a silver lining and the result of that defeat, unfortunate as it seemed at the time to so many Canadians, resulted in the return of a majority government in which Canadians take such pride and pleasure today.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) has cast a skeptical eye on this debate and the response of government backbenchers, characterized by the scholarly and fulsome comments of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), in which he attempted, with a very high degree of success, to elucidate the complications and complexities this ill-considered motion contemplates. To simply suggest that the purpose of the thoughtful remarks of that hon. member was merely an attempt to talk out the bill is absurd. I think, also, it was an unfair characterization of the words of the hon. member for Scarborough West who was able to show the House with great precision and skill the pitfalls of any such contemplated measure.

● (1730)

The illustrations used by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta were somewhat personal in character. They referred to the importance of his position in this House of Commons and his absence from home, which resulted in his being unable to fulfil his fatherly obligation of conveying his children to hockey games. The question which must be asked is whether the charitable gesture of the coach or friend was a donation to the people of Canada the better to enable the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta to deal with his important responsibilities, or whether it was a donation to a charitable cause represented by the athletic endeavours in his community.

I should like to refer to the Commercial Clearing House Report, CCH Canada Limited. The comment at page 2513-3, dated 1973, states:

> The Minister of National Revenue made the following statement in the House of Commons with respect to amateur athletics (Hansard, 7423): 'Organizations formed for the purpose of furthering or promoting amateur athletics are not considered to be charitable organizations within the legal meaning of that term as used in the Income Tax Act. Contributions by business and industry to any branch of amateur athletics are not deductible as charitable donations for income tax purposes. The only exceptions to this general rule are for national organizations, donations to which have been allowed for many years.'

In supporting his contention in respect of this motion the hon. member has selected, I believe ill advisedly, a form of activity which in itself is not charitable in nature as defined by the Income Tax Act. Therefore even a financial donation would be ineligible if made in respect of this particular form of activity. This characterizes and demonstrates the difficulty of attempting to appraise what would be the form of service rendered by an individual in carrying out an activity for a supposed charity which is not, in the circumstances, indeed a charitable endeavour.

It can readily be seen by the chosen example of the hon. member that he would not be able to deduct the expense of his automobile. He would not be able to donate a cash contribution which he might properly make in light of the fact that he is absent from his community and unable to fulfil, on a voluntary basis, the support which I am sure he would normally give to this kind of worthy athletic endeavour. In any event it demonstrates that the tax apparatus which we must follow defines the limits of the donation and the type of organization in respect of which the charitable donation might be made.

Hon. members might think me remiss if I did not quote again from the CCH in respect of the meaning of a gift, which is what we are considering, that is now permitted by the act. It states:

The accepted meaning of a 'gift' is that it is something parted with for no consideration. If the donor expects some benefit or enjoyment in return, it is not a true gift. 'Gifts' are sometimes made by corporations to charities for business reasons and may be deductible in full—that is, not subject to the 20% limitation as business expenses. However, a gift to a foundation for the advancement of knowledge in a field closely related to the taxpayer's business was held to be a charitable donation . . . The Department has stated in its Information Circular . . . that the following payments are not eligible for deduction: private benevolence; payments for membership and tuition fees where a benefit may accrue to the donor; amounts paid in 'loose' collections where a donor cannot be identified; the value of services rendered;—

That is what we are discussing this afternoon.

—donations of merchandise where the cost has been charged as a business expense; donations of old clothes, furniture, etc.; and amounts paid for tickets for card parties, bingos, lotteries, etc. even where the events are held for charity. There are exceptions to this last prohibition, however, as already stated, where there is a clear intention to make a gift over the normal value of the entertainment.

In considering once again the matter of the friendly constituent, no doubt of the hon. member driving his children to a hockey game, it is a question of whether this act is done purely out of charitable instincts, or whether it is done in an effort to give the hon. member a comfortable knowledge that everything is being looked after on the home front, and that a feeling of appreciation is engendered on the part of the hon. member to which he may respond in some form at another time. So again the question is whether the value of the service could properly be termed charitable. I shall not labour this.

I believe I have made clear the point that in an attempt to define charitable donations, even if they should be proper charitable donations under the present act, there are real difficulties created which I believe have been elucidated by the hon. member for Scarborough West.

Another question arises in the case where the contribution may be deemed to be a valid one, not taking into consideration a service such as driving children to a hockey game but perhaps the provision of voluntary services for a clearly demonstrable charitable purpose. In this case there are administrative problems for the department. For example, let us assume that two people volunteer to drive a car for the Red Cross, one of whom is a doctor whose time is worth perhaps $150 an hour or more, and another who is perhaps a wife, who does not earn.

Mr. Forrestall: A tax consultant like you probably gets $250.

Mr. Abbott: At the moment I am earning considerably less than that.

Mr. Forrestall: Why don't you have them do something about that?

Mr. Abbott: Surely that is a question for another day on another subject.

One driver might receive $2 an hour if he were paid the minimum wage. However, because the minimum wage in British Columbia is higher, in that province he probably would be paid $3 or $4 an hour. The question is: should the volunteer driver receive $150 an hour, or $2 an hour, or some other figure? If we say $150 an hour, then obviously the housewife receives a huge windfall, and if we say it should be $2 an hour obviously the doctor would not volunteer his services.

In addition there is the problem of determining what is the fair value of the service rendered. Revenue Canada can verify these contributions by going to the charitable organization and auditing its books with a cross-reference to the return of the taxpayer. However, this would require massive bookkeeping operations on the part of the charity in question in respect to the records of volunteers for the purposes of Revenue Canada.

I suggest that the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, while putting for the consideration of the House what appears to be a laudable measure, is in actual fact suggesting something that will create problems, confusion, inequities, and a whole host of other difficulties. In fact, it will have a negative effect even on the charities that might legitimately qualify. Almost certainly if a person's services, which previously could be rendered on a voluntary basis, could now be deductible from his income tax, the likelihood is that cash contributions would decrease to that charity while services, voluntary in the past, would be rendered in lieu of cash so that the charity would suffer.

I suggest also that all those who live in communities are more than aware that the whole foundation stone of charities that are truly meaningful is support by voluntary effort. I suggest that even the election of a member of parliament is a worthy project, and it is made more worthy by the fact that thousands and thousands of Canadians of all political stripes are ready to work voluntarily for this purpose without later trying to claim it as a tax deduction.

I suggest that so often these casually, ill conceived motions which seem to contain laudable and equitable purposes, when a stern and qualified eye is cast upon them, such as that of the hon. member for Scarborough West reveal their true colour, which is that they are inadequate, frequently inequitable and frequently hopeless in their practical enactment. So, when the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) suggests that we are simply talking out this measure, I suggest to him that perhaps these measures are not passed due to the fact that there is determination on the other side to see that they do not get passed, and this has happened even in my limited experience. I also suggest that if a list were compiled of worthy measures that did not see the light of day as a result of being talked out, this measure would be very far down on the list of worthiness.

Mr. Symes: So you are the judge and jury.

Mr. Abbott: We will deal with this measure in a democratic fashion. I am simply putting forward my own humble view on this important matter. As I said, it is important because tonight we will hear from the Minister of Finance some real tax measures, some sensible reiterations of the measures that the minister attempted to introduce in the House last May. I am sure that all of us will be stirred positively by the message he will give us tonight, perhaps with the exception of one or two members on the other side. But even though they might be filled with grudging admiration for the minister, in their heart of hearts they will hope that all these measures will be rapidly passed and enacted into law.

Mr. Symes: You have 15 more minutes.

Mr. Abbott: I wish that the subject of the motion proposed by the hon. member had more merit; I wish it contained more meat and more thought so I could speak on it for 15 more minutes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are allowed a total of only 20 minutes.

Mr. Abbott: If the motion had more content I may have come to the point of exhausting my time, if not the patience of the members of the House. I want to say that while I know that the instincts of the hon. member are laudable, and that his purpose is not simply to provide a tax deduction for the person who drives his children to a hockey game—I know he has wider concerns for Canadians—I want to urge him and other members who propose tax measures to contain themselves, listen to what the Minister of Finance says tonight, and then frame motions which contain more substance and are of more benefit to the people of this country than the one proposed this evening.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, since it appears that this motion will be talked out I might as well take two or three minutes. I do not intend to get into the back and forth argument that has been taking place with regard to the workability of the proposal made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds), but I think he is to be commended for presenting the House with a motion that emphasizes the importance of the work done by volunteer groups. I should like to say to hon. members opposite that, instead of just turning down this proposal and finding all sorts of faults with it, they would render a service if they would urge their government to do something which they might regard as better.

Earlier today in the question period one of the hon. members to the left of us raised the question about there being additional money for LIP grants. I know that LIP and OFY grants have been the target of a fair amount of criticism and abuse, but I think that in the main these grants have found their way to groups and organizations that have done a great deal to help older people and others.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They have seen to it that snow gets shovelled, they have helped people to clean up their homes, they have repaired their electrical appliances, they have provided day care, they have organized drama groups, and so on. I think that in the main the money that has been spent in these ways has been well spent, and I suggest to my friends opposite that, instead of just criticizing the suggestion that has come from the Tory benches today, they should go to the government and say that there is a need for more federal funding of volunteer groups that are trying to make life a little better for many of the people of this country.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, frankly it was not my intention to participate in this debate. I had assumed that the mover of the motion would have more to say on the positive side rather than simply to indicate that anybody who speaks against it, or suggests that it might be lacking in some areas, is denigrating the work that might be done by volunteers.

As is known, parliamentary secretaries from time to time are called upon to speak on motions as they affect their particular departments, and the approach I have adopted is that rather than indicate to the people I ask to speak that they should simply fill up the time speaking against a particular motion, I have tried to adopt the approach of giving them the motion and asking them to do some research work on it, and to reach their own conclusions as to whether it has merit or not. If the hon. member will check he will see that members on this side did not speak the full 20 minutes allotted to them but spoke just long enough to put their particular positions forward.

I was very pleased with the research work that was obviously done by the two members on this side who preceded me. They could not find merit in moving the motion to a committee. It seems to me that the mover of the motion has the obligation of indicating the positive aspect, and of telling us why he feels that this motion should go to committee or why it should be studied and considered by the government.

● (1750)

I think the hon. member should be commended for focussing the spotlight of the House of Commons on the people who do volunteer work in this country. If members on this side had found merit in the motion I think it is something they could have talked about with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), or the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), as the hon. member has done. I think the hon. member, at least in part, was commending the minister for setting up a council which was giving recognition to volunteers. I was with him for a while, but then he lost me when he said this commission was not worthwhile. I think it is worthwhile, Madam Speaker.

From the little research I have done on the hon. member's concept I find it interesting. I am sure there is hardly a member of parliament who has not done voluntary work for some church or organization, or even for some political party or government. It seems to me that if we feel this kind of voluntary effort should be recognized through a tax exemption, we are really taking away from the individual part of the contribution that has been made.

Long before the Province of Ontario moved to do anything for retarded children I worked with people in Sarnia who devoted thousands of hours trying to help return such children to the community, have them educated, given workshops and placed in homes. I believe I would have felt it wrong if I had been compensated for the time that I donated as a lawyer compared to the taxi driver who worked beside me. He was doing the same work, and probably doing it better. I would have felt somehow that a shadow had been cast on my efforts had I been able to claim a tax exemption. Rather than encouraging people to volunteer, just the opposite might result.

I think the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) must both be aware of the administrative nightmare that could be created if this motion went into effect. I believe it is a good idea that the bills and motions proposed in private members' hour go to committees. One of my motions went to committee and I was pleased to have the opportunity of presenting it and hearing some excellent criticism of it. But surely, Madam Speaker, before we send a motion to a committee we should be certain that it warrants the time that would be spent on it.

There are other ways that volunteers might be given credit or assistance, Madam Speaker. I think we would be wasting the time of a committee to refer the subject matter of this motion to it when we do not feel it would be feasible to administer the funds from such a complicated source.

I heard some snickers from the other side when the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) was speaking of volunteers A and B working on the same job, one making a financial contribution, the other a contribution of his time. That illustrated just how extremely difficult this would be to administer.

We hear many complaints about the number of documents and forms that have to be filled out in order to help the government do its work, whether it be tax collecting or gathering information. Just to take churches as an example, a frightening amount of paperwork would be required from them for their voluntary workers. The lady who cooks for the potluck supper might sit down and eat when she is through. Would she then be considered a part time volunteer or a full time volunteer? Imagine the work entailed in preparing T-4 slips for volunteers within a church alone.

The same thing can be envisaged with respect to service clubs. There is the volunteer who spends 2½ hours a week to help run the bingo game. Is he contributing more than the individual who spends 2½ hours every Saturday coaching the hockey team? Who makes the decision? Obviously it has to go to the board of directors.

I think the time of the House and the committee can be better served by dealing with matters that have some merit and some possibility of being administered for the benefit of all Canadians. It is correct that there are inequities at the present time. The man who makes a lot of money and gives cash donations is allowed credit on his income tax and the individual who gives time and effort is not, but I do not think the inequity can be corrected this way.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Morin): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on May 6 of this year I introduced a budget. It was the first budget in our history to be defeated in this House of Commons. It was also the first budget to be reinstated by the Canadian people.

The essential purpose of the May budget was to maintain healthy economic growth and reinforce the attack against inflation. I proposed to do so by a series of measures aimed at increasing the supply of goods and services, moderating the prices of certain products of importance to Canadian family budgets, maintaining the real income of those Canadians least able to protect themselves against the rising cost of living, and aimed at helping to stem the erosion in the value of savings. These continue to be my objectives.

Two of the measures proposed in that budget have already been implemented. The average yield of outstanding Canada Savings Bonds has been increased and the sales tax on clothing and footwear has been removed. The government believes that all of the remaining proposals included in the last budget are required to deal with current economic conditions and it is my intention to reintroduce them, modified as necessary to meet the requirements of today.

These broad measures need, however, to be supplemented and extended because economic conditions and prospects have changed significantly both at home and abroad.

[Translation]

The widespread expectation six months ago that the tide of world inflation would begin to recede this year has been frustrated. Poor grain harvests in Canada, the United States and elsewhere foreshadow a resurgence of food price increases. The decline in prices of a number of industrial materials has been less than forecast. Wage and salary costs are accelerating sharply in Canada and other countries. Interest rates climbed from already high levels because of the continued surge of global inflation, the disturbance to international financial markets, and restrictive monetary policies in some key countries. The slowdown of economic growth in the major industrial nations has been more pronounced and persistent than predicted. Massive balance of payments deficits and surpluses resulting from the fourfold increase in world oil prices are imposing serious strains on the entire world system. For many developing countries the shortage and high cost of food and fertilizers and the drastically increased prices of energy have raised the spectre of disaster.

Canada has participated actively in efforts to strengthen international institutions and in the arrangements they are making to help deal with these problems. Since these issues have crucial implications for every country in the world, their ultimate solution depends heavily on international co-operation. I have had lengthy discussions on these developments during the past few months with my counterparts from every major industrial nation and from the Commonwealth.

But we have a duty as a nation to keep our own house in order. We must also try to offset the impact on our economy of adverse developments abroad to the extent that is possible without compounding the difficulties of others. Constructive discussions were held among First Ministers in Ottawa late last month and I was given an opportunity to brief them on international developments and the economic situation in Canada. Over the past several weeks, as members are aware, I have had extensive meetings and consultations with my provincial colleagues.

[English]

We in this country are confronted by two major economic challenges—dealing with persistent, deep-seated inflation and at the same time maintaining a good level of production and employment. This will require us to steer a narrow course if we are to avoid more inflation on the one hand and the risk of a recession on the other. And in doing so, we must also do everything we reasonably can to protect Canadians who are least able to protect themselves from the ravages of both. That is what this budget is all about.

International Developments

I should like to turn my attention first to developments on the international scene.

You will recall that strong inflationary forces had emerged even before the energy crisis of late 1973. An enormous build-up of international liquidity arising from U.S. balance of payments deficits and concurrent economic expansion among industrial countries had created demands that could not be physically satisfied. Crop failures added to the problem of inflation. Then, in December of last year, came the cutbacks in the supply of oil and the explosion in its price. The full consequences of the quadrupling of oil prices, coming on top of these underlying problems, cannot even yet be known with certainty. But it is clear that they have precipitated a combination of economic and financial difficulties without precedent. In these circumstances, it would be unwise for any of us to underestimate the threat to world economic and social stability.

● (2010)

Let me outline the nature and dimensions of this predicament. Consumer prices in the major industrial nations may average about 14 per cent higher in 1974 than in 1973, with Japan suffering a 24-per-cent increase. The view now is that in 1975 the average rate of inflation for these countries may not be much lower than 12 per cent.

At the same time, there has been a pervasive slowdown in economic activity. Last year member countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development achieved average real growth of 6.3 per cent. In 1974 they will show virtually no growth. Next year it is expected that expansion, if any, will be marginal.

Associated with these developments is the emergence of huge balance of payments deficits of oil-importing countries. OECD nations had a current account surplus of about $2 billion in 1973. In 1974 they will have a deficit of around $40 billion, and this may be repeated in 1975. When the deficits of other oil importers are taken into account, including developing countries, this figure will be upwards of $60 billion this year and could be of the same magnitude next year.

The speed with which these problems have emerged and spread to virtually all countries is a measure of their high degrees of economic and financial interdependence. It underlines the need for close and effective international consultation and joint international action. These problems demand continuing surveillance by world organizations that can take a comprehensive view and muster concerted action. Canada is playing a very active role in the development of international initiatives.

We assisted in the establishment of the new Interim Committee of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund and the Development Committee of the Fund and World Bank. Canada sees these committees as important instruments for bringing the collective political will of the member countries to bear on solutions. I intend to give these efforts all the time I can.

When it next meets in January, the Interim Committee will address itself to the monumental problem of recycling oil money. This is urgent because not all countries in deficit will, on their own, be able to find the funds they need. There is real doubt that the private financial system will be able to transfer the huge surpluses of oil producers to oil importers without severe financial strains. We hope that the Interim Committee will be able to make positive recommendations so as to ensure that the recycling process goes forward without seriously disrupting international trade and payments.

[Translation]

But recycling will only tide us over the immediate problem. It will not provide a long-term solution. In time, many countries will have to reduce the rate at which they are accumulating debts. This means that they will have to bring their external payments into better balance. Many approaches will be needed—perhaps lower oil prices, conservation in the use of energy, increased exports and the sale of equities and real property to the oil producers, more aid from them to less-developed countries, and other measures. Our ability to co-operate internationally will be severely tested, but we see nothing to be gained from policies of confrontation.

There is the danger that balance of payments difficulties will lead countries to resort to restrictions on trade. Such measures cannot solve the world's difficulties. They can only make them worse. It is for this reason that the Canadian government has strongly supported international pledges against the use of trade restrictions to deal with payments problems.

I hope that we will soon be able to proceed to the active stage of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations initiated last year at the GATT Ministerial Meeting in Tokyo. We must carry forward the attack on unnecessary barriers to trade and contain the pressures of protectionism. We must also examine the international trading rules to ensure that they meet the needs of our times and that they assist the over-all process of adjustment in the world economy.

It is critically important that the United States administration get the legislative authority it needs to play its full part in these negotiations.

I am deeply troubled by the potential disaster facing many of the poor countries of the world. A number of them can no longer pay for food, fertilizer, fuel and many other essentials. All countries, including Canada, must review their foreign aid programs in the light of these tragic developments.

Canada must, at a minimum, help these countries meet the most urgent and basic need of their people—food. My colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), announced at the World Food Conference in Rome that Canada would increase its contribution under the Food Aid Convention to provide three million tons of grain over the next three years. We intend to expand our contributions of other forms of food aid just as quickly as we can. We attach a particularly high priority to helping developing countries increase their own food production. These are moral commitments. We intend to fulfill them.

[English]

The Canadian Economy

I turn now to the economic picture in Canada and our own prospects for the future. I have already noted that world economic trends have shifted toward slower real growth, more protracted inflation and deeper payments imbalances. Consequently, the outlook for the Canadian economy is less bright than when I brought down my budget last May. Output, employment and income will all continue to grow in 1975, but at rates below potential. The disappointing harvests in North America and elsewhere, continuing high prices of some commodities, and cost escalation in Canada have all combined to postpone the expected relief from high rates of inflation.

The Canadian economy began 1974 with the momentum from last year which had carried it to peak of productive capacity. This momentum was maintained until the late spring. There were widespread scarcities of materials and many kinds of labour. Since early summer, however, signs of slowing down have appeared. One of the principal causes was the deteriorating economic performance of the countries to which we export. Another was the decline in new housing starts—especially in rental housing, where construction was curtailed by the increasing squeeze of costs against rental income. We also suffered from a very serious loss of production as a result of extensive work stoppages caused by industrial disputes.

Our economy, however, has firm underpinnings. The volume of consumer buying is keeping pace with the continued increase in real income of Canadians. Capital investment by business is growing strongly.

When the record is all in, the Canadian economy will probably show a real increase in Gross National Product this year of 4 to 4½ per cent.

In the May budget I forecast that employment would increase in 1974 by more than 300,000. In fact, it has increased in the last 12 months, by some 390,000 and over the last two years by some 870,000—a phenomenal achievement by any standard. The unemployment rate is now lower than it was a year ago.

● (2020)

During the strong economic expansion in Canada since 1970, unemployment did not dip below 5.2 per cent in any quarter. Yet there was evidence of widespread tightness of labour markets, particularly in late 1973 and early 1974. There was a sharp increase in job vacancies and help-wanted advertising. Frequent complaints of scarcities of labour, particularly of skilled workers, were heard in many parts of the country. Our economy now seems to reach a condition of widespread scarcity and strain in labour markets at somewhat higher unemployment levels than in earlier postwar cycles. The explanation would appear to lie in changes in composition of the labour force, together with changes in our social policies and improvements in family incomes which enable people to take more time to search for the jobs they want.

Canada, like other countries, has had a continuing upsurge of inflation. Some commodity prices have fallen in the last several months. As I noted before, there had been hope earlier that good harvests around the world would ease the rise in food prices. This hope has faded for the present. In addition, the response to earlier international price increases has provoked domestic forces of cost-push inflation in Canada. Profits have risen strongly this year. Wage-rate increases have accelerated.

[Translation]

Many private forecasts of Canada's economic prospects through 1975 have been made recently. In respect of real growth they range from 1 per cent to over 4 per cent. Their views on inflation range from a little more to a little less than we are experiencing this year. Their projections for unemployment are from 6 per cent to nearly 8 per cent.

Our own view of the prospects for real growth in production and employment next year—in the absence of any policy changes—was not nearly as pessimistic as the low forecasts, but less optimistic than the high ones. Here is how the situation looked to us as we started to plan the budget. The poorer outlook for the economies of the United States and other major industrial nations indicated that Canadian exports would not be a source of strength. The prospects for Canadian housing activity in 1975 looked to be substantially poorer than this year. We expected that the volume of goods and services bought by consumers would continue to increase because of the underlying strength and stability of the real income at their disposal. But we did not expect that consumer spending would lead economic growth, as it did earlier in the business upswing. We considered that the strongest element in the picture would continue to be private capital investment in new plant, machinery and equipment. For 1975, the latest readings on investment intentions, building permits, contracts awarded, new orders and work in the hands of architects and designers indicated continued strong real expansion in business investment. But the uncertainties of the situation, particularly with respect to costs, sales and financing still raised the possibility that some projects would be postponed or cancelled.

Given the weaker outlook for exports and continued strong imports because of relatively stronger growth in Canada than in other countries, we expected some increase in the deficit of the current account of our balance of payments.

We believed that the increase in prices could be more moderate in 1975, since the easing in world non-food commodity prices already underway would work through the Canadian price structure in the next few months. We expected that the easing of interest rates then beginning would also contribute to lower costs. Energy prices would certainly not be the engine of inflation that they were during the past year. Taken over-all, however, the prospects depended heavily on food prices. If grain harvests were good and the output of other farm products rose, there would be a slower increase in food costs. But we felt that a slowing of inflation in 1975 would also depend on moderation in the setting of prices and incomes in Canada.

[English]

THE THRUST OF POLICY

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to the thrust of policy that I believe to be appropriate in the light of this appraisal of the pre-budget prospects. We are confronted by the twin problems of inflation and slower growth. They are very closely related, since inflation—if allowed to get out of hand—threatens the continued growth of real income, production and employment. Inflation creates major uncertainty and undermines that intangible element of confidence that is so important to the maintenance of continued healthy growth. It erodes savings and distorts and disrupts financial markets so vital to the smooth functioning of our economy. Inflation can also jeopardize our international competitive position.

We must solve these twin problems together. We cannot choose to deal with one and neglect the other.

There are some who say: "Let us live with inflation; it's not too bad as long as we ensure full employment and protect the weak." There are others who say: "Inflation is so great a menace to our economic, social and political life that it must be rooted out, even at the risk of a serious recession and massive unemployment."

I reject both extremes. The first is unrealistic; the second is inhuman. The only objective which is acceptable to me, to this government and, I believe, to this House, is good economic performance in every respect.

What does this objective call for in terms of policy? No single approach can do the whole job. A combination of policies is needed. Let me outline my broad approach before describing specific measures.

The first essential is action to sustain demand. In the light of the present outlook for the next 12 to 18 months, this is imperative if we are to achieve a rate of growth of production and employment that more closely approaches our potential. This will be a major goal of our fiscal and monetary policies. It must be remembered that much of what we propose tonight will not bite in economic terms until well into next year. Politicians, journalists, even some economists, are often inclined to underestimate the time lags in the impact of economic policy.

Second, the fiscal stimulus should come primarily from a further cut in taxes, rather than an additional increase in expenditures. I believe that tax cuts can help to reduce prices and costs directly or indirectly and thus slow down the upward momentum of inflation. An indiscriminate or excessive increase in expenditures would exacerbate the pace of inflation.

Third, we must do all that we can in these circumstances to restrain the growth of governmental expenditures, particularly those that do not contribute directly to an increased supply of goods and services, that do not help those Canadians least able to protect themselves, or that do not directly moderate price increases. We have sought and shall continue to seek to cut out waste, to place limits on the growth of the public service and to approve only the most essential new programs. A tough line has been taken in the planning of expenditures for 1975-76. In present circumstances, we must do all we can to ensure that outlays grow no faster than the economy as a whole. For the year 1975-76, the rate of growth of our expenditures will be significantly lower than it has been in recent years.

Fourth, we should apply stimulus selectively where we can help to buttress weak points in the economy. Similarly, we should constrain governmental capital projects in those parts of the country where conditions continue to be tight. This selective approach as well as our regional development policies, is especially important when the economic situation is so mixed, with shortages continuing in many sectors and regions and surpluses developing in others.

Fifth, we must ensure that private capital investment remains strong. This is a key factor in terms of maintaining demand now, generating new productive capacity and employment, and moderating the rise of prices in the future. I have stressed consistently the importance of encouraging the growth of supply as an essential part of any effective anti-inflationary strategy. The outlook for capital investment remains good, but there are potential difficulties arising from the slowdown in the demand for exports and the problems of financing. We want to make sure our efforts to modernize and expand our industry do not falter.

Sixth, continued attention must be given to mitigating the effects of inflation on the more vulnerable members of our society. I have said before that I do not intend to fight inflation on the backs of the poor, the weak, the unorganized or the unemployed.

● (2030)

The final element in our over-all approach is a comprehensive series of consultations with all sectors of the economy to seek to develop a co-operative national effort to slow down increases in costs and prices. This can make a key contribution to success in solving inflation and slow growth.

I have referred earlier in my remarks to the changing character of recent inflation. The difficulty now is to be found not in general excess demand, but in other factors. I have already spoken of the absolute and relative increases in prices of food and energy throughout the world. We must recognize that these increases reflect a fundamental change in the supply of cheap resources in the face of constantly increasing demands. Consumers cannot escape the impact of these structural price changes on their standard of living. Much higher prices for food and energy have made more difficult the task of reconciling the efforts of the various social and economic groups to maintain or increase their shares of the national income. Given the inflation which has occurred, no one group is willing to exercise restraint unless it knows that others will also exercise restraint. Rather each group feels compelled to seek protection against the highest rate of inflation which it thinks might occur.

The hard truth remains, however, that in this struggle the sum total of all the claims on the nation's resources—however justified they may seem to be—clearly exceeds what is in fact available to be shared. No group is likely to succeed is getting the full share of the real national pie to which it feels entitled. So long as each continues to attempt to enforce its claim by pushing up its price, its wage, its interest rate or tax rate, the outcome can only be further inflation. We have to find a better way of reconciling the competing interests of the various groups which make up our society. No group need lose in this search. Indeed, if we succeed, all can gain because the over-all performance of the economy will be enhanced by controlling inflation.

This is why we need a national consensus about what the various groups can safely take from the economy over the next few years. Co-operation must be the watchword. We will give leadership, but we will not try to impose solutions. The common objective must be to bring the rate of inflation down, year by year, to acceptable levels.

As a result of the extraordinary progress made over the last several decades in developing food and energy, we came to regard them as relatively cheap and abundant. That has all changed in the space of a few short years. We have become painfully aware that our capacity to produce both these essentials is not unlimited. The growing scarcity of these resources compels us to husband them wisely.

On a world scale, it is not just an economic problem. It is a moral issue, because for many people and for many countries it is survival which is at stake. Many countries haven't enough energy to meet the basic needs of their people. Millions of people haven't enough to eat. For Canadians this is not a question of economics; it is a matter of conscience.

Should we live as high as we do?

Should we waste as much as we do?

Do we not have a duty to conserve energy? Do we not have an even greater duty to conserve food in a starving world?

These are not properly matters for a budget. But I do believe they are matters for the conscience and private conduct of 23 million Canadians.

Governments can, of course give a lead. Canada has pledged more food aid. The more we save, the more we can pledge.

As far as energy is concerned, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, will shortly be bringing forward important conservation proposals.

BUDGET MEASURES

Resource Taxation

Mr. Speaker, before I turn to new budgetary measures I wish to address myself to the taxation of our natural resource industries.

When I introduced the federal government's new proposals for resource taxation last May, I said that in developing our policy we had the following objectives in mind:

> "First, it is essential that this sector bears a burden of tax on profits that is reasonable relative to the share borne by other sectors of the economy. Second, it is essential to ensure that all the people of Canada derive a fair share of the substantially increased revenues that flow from the higher value placed by the world on these resources. Third, the federal government should recognize the special position of the provinces with respect to the taxation and charges on resources within their boundaries. Fourth, the federal government must ensure that provincial royalties, provincial mining taxes and other arrangements having similar effects do not unreasonably erode the corporate income tax base. Finally, over-all Canadian tax policy must have regard for the position of these industries in terms of international competition and in terms of the financial resources they require to bring forward the supplies needed in the years ahead."

I stand behind these objectives. And, more than ever, I recognize and respect the aspiration of our Western provinces to use the proceeds of their resources to diversify their industries and to broaden the base of their economies. Western Canada wants, and is entitled to, its place in the sun.

The May proposals have been criticized principally from two sources, industry and provinces.

The petroleum and mining industries argue that they are being overtaxed. In some parts of this country, that charge may well be true. But I believe that it is not the federal government which is overtaxing. Surely all Canadians would agree that the Canadian people as a whole are entitled to a reasonable share of the profits earned by these industries. In fact, many industry representatives to whom I have spoken agree that the federal share, as proposed in the May budget, is not excessive. Rather, they contend, it is the combined effect of federal and provincial levies that is excessive.

From my many conversations with industry representatives during the last six months, I have obtained a better understanding of their problems, and their investment needs. I think that those in industry have also obtained a good understanding of my position. Let me repeat my conviction that Canada must have strong private resource industries if we are to obtain the supplies needed in the years to come. They need a sufficient cash flow to undertake further exploration and expansion and provide a fair return to their shareholders.

Although the provinces are by no means unanimous, the core of their criticism is that the disallowance of provincial royalties, taxes and other similar payments is somehow an attack by the federal government on provincial ownership and jurisdiction over natural resources. I have talked with provincial ministers from all 10 provinces and I have tried to reassure them that this is not so. No one is questioning the provinces' ownership or jurisdiction. But it is abundantly clear that the British North America Act gives the federal Parliament the right to tax profits derived from these resources.

Obviously, only part of the solution lies within the federal domain. The other part is clearly a responsibility of the provinces. Each level of government is sovereign in its own sphere. Yet a knowledge and understanding of what the other level of government is doing and an effort to harmonize objectives should contribute to reasonable policies. I have reviewed the May 6 proposals and concluded, in a spirit of accommodation, that I should propose some changes which would be helpful to both industry and to the provinces.

Before discussing them, I would like to outline those proposals which I made last May that I believe should not be changed.

First, I proposed that the national rate of tax on resource production profits should be set at 50 per cent.

Second, I proposed that the special abatement of 15 points of federal Tax in respect of mining production profits, which had been scheduled to come into effect in 1977, be applied immediately. The result of this special abatement was to reduce the federal rate of tax on mineral production profits to 25 per cent.

Third, I proposed that automatic depletion be terminated immediately and be replaced by the new system whereby depletion had to be earned. Furthermore, I proposed that depletion be permitted only up to 25 per cent of production profits as a deduction from taxable income; the previous limit was 33⅓ per cent.

Fourth, I proposed that royalties, taxes and other like payments to governments should no longer be recognized as a deduction in computing income for tax purposes. My reasons for this action were described in the May 6 budget and I have elaborated upon them since. I am satisfied that this is a necessary step in order to avoid the erosion of the federal tax base.

I have considered carefully permitting deductibility of royalties and I have concluded that this approach does not offer a practical solution.

I acknowledge that royalties in respect of property rights have traditionally been deductible as a business expense. However, in tax reform, we began the process of disallowing certain income royalties in the mineral field and substituting federal tax abatements. Today, it is evident that a royalty is no longer a royalty in the traditional meaning of the word. There have emerged various provincial charges which are thinly disguised income taxes.

Today provincial charges take many forms. They are no longer limited to flat charges against a unit of production. Now there are provincial charges that are determined by price, profit and volume. In addition, there are provincial claims exercised through joint ventures and marketing boards. In fact, there are so many kinds of provincial charges and claims that it would be virtually impossible to draft workable legislation which could distinguish between bona fide royalties, traditionally deductible, and other taxes and charges.

● (2040)

That being so, we have chosen to disallow the deduction of all these levies and to make room for the provinces by giving additional tax abatement. In this way, the provincial taxes and charges and the federal taxes will each be discrete, and visible decisions, which each can take in the light of what they know the other is doing, giving full recognition to the needs of the industries.

Surely the goal is to find a compromise which gives reasonable results in financial terms to the provinces, to the industries and to the federal government. This is what my proposals aim to do.

I would like now to take up the May proposals in which I am making major changes.

First, in respect of oil and gas production profits, I proposed in May a new abatement of 10 points of federal tax, resulting in a federal rate of 30 per cent. I believe that a 30 per-cent rate of federal tax is reasonable for the year 1974, given the current strong profitability and the healthy cash flow of the petroleum industry.

I have tried, however, to look ahead and the picture is changing. Our demand for energy is rising and our known reserves are declining. New sources of supply, given their nature and location, will be expensive to find, develop and bring on stream. Our reading of the situation is that the industry's need for funds as they carry out this program will build up over the next two or three years. Clearly, if industry is to do the job that must be done, it will need adequate financial resources and a prospect of a reasonable return on its investment. For these compelling reasons, I propose that the federal rate of tax on petroleum production profits be reduced from 30 per cent in 1974 to 28 per cent in 1975 and to 25 per cent in 1976 and subsequent years. By 1976, the federal rate on oil and gas production profits will be 25 per cent, the same as on mineral production profits.

Second, Mr. Speaker, in the May 6 budget, I proposed that the rate of write-off for expenditures on exploration and development for both petroleum and minerals be reduced from 100 per cent to 30 per cent. At that time, I felt that such a lower rate was more appropriate in the light of the existing circumstances of the natural resource industries. However, I have been persuaded by the arguments presented to me over the past several months by both large and small companies that exploration in Canada is becoming ever more expensive and risky. It is difficult, particularly for smaller companies, to borrow exploration capital and, therefore, there is a heavy reliance on internally-generated funds. On the other hand, expenditures on development are more similar to the capital expenditures incurred by other industries. Hence, for both petroleum and minerals, I am proposing to restore the 100 per cent write-off for exploration expenditures, but to retain the proposed 30 per cent rate of write-off for development outlays.

For the year 1974, I estimate that the changes I am proposing tonight will improve the position of the oil and gas companies by about $100 million and of mining companies by about $15 million as compared with my May proposals. This saving for the resource companies affected is a full 25 per cent improvement over the May position. It is more difficult to estimate the value to the companies of the tax reductions I am proposing tonight for subsequent years because of the many uncertainties about price, volume and other factors. Nonetheless, I can say that the saving will be at least $185 million for these companies in 1975 on any reasonable assumptions as compared to the May proposals. For the petroleum companies, the benefit in 1976 will be even greater because of the further reduction in the federal tax rate.

Mr. Speaker, both for the current period and for the decade ahead, I believe that this modified series of measures represents fair and reasonable federal taxation of these natural resource industries. Moreover, the effect of the modifications to the original May proposals will be to improve significantly the financial position of these industries both in the short and long term.

We have pulled back from our original proposals. We want resource industries adequately taxed; but we want to see their financial position sufficiently strong to enable them to develop and to deliver the supplies needed in the years ahead. We have done our part. I now appeal to the provinces, which also have a responsibility to these industries and to the Canadian people, to do their part. I have no doubt that if the provinces respond to the needs of the industries and the nation as I have tonight, the problem for those industries will be resolved.

Equalization Payments

Closely related to taxation and other developments in oil and gas is the matter of federal equalization payments to the provinces. Hon. members know that the rapid escalation in oil and natural gas prices has caused the revenues of the oil and gas producing provinces to grow enormously. If all of the new revenues were to be equalized, the additional cost to the Canadian taxpayer within the next few years could approach $2 billion annually—and that is on top of current payments of about $1.7 billion. Under certain circumstances, even the province of Ontario could be receiving equalization. This would not make sense.

In the face of the extraordinary situation brought on by the world oil crisis, we have sought three things. First, to protect the basic equalization formula. Second, to ensure that total provincial revenues from this program continue to meet the needs of the provinces receiving equalization. Third, to ensure that the Canadian taxpayer is not heavily over-burdened. In short, I believe in the principle of equalization and I want to preserve the viability and credibility of that system.

When this problem emerged last winter, I expressed my great concern about the threat posed to the equalization program. During the First Ministers' meeting last January I said we would prefer to find some way to shield this program from the consequences of the oil crisis, without attempting a fundamental restructuring of the entire system.

When First Ministers met for a second time in March, a solution was sought under which producing provinces would set aside a portion of their increased revenues from oil for energy development rather than use these funds for general purpose spending. The revenues so set aside would not be equalized. The remaining oil revenues would be, however, adding at least $100 million to the equalization program on account of oil.

We have been making payments to the provinces on the basis of our understanding of the amounts that would be set aside by the producing provinces. As a result, payments are currently some $163 million higher than our original estimates for this year, of which oil royalties account for $126 million. The necessary legislative changes to give effect to this understanding have awaited the establishment of the capital funds by the provinces. All of these funds, however, have not yet been set up. Alberta is enjoying an increase in its revenues from oil and gas of a magnitude unprecedented for any government in Canada. It is not surprising that Alberta has experienced difficulty in deciding how its new revenues should be allocated. Nonetheless, in the absence of such a fund all Alberta oil and gas revenues would, technically, be subject to equalization. And the amount of equalization payments for which the federal government would be liable could be drastically affected, by the unilateral decision of one or two provinces. For all the reasons I have stated, we simply could not put this enormous additional burden on the Canadian taxpayer. Rather than restructure the entire equalization program now, I have chosen to protect the basic formula and give effect to the intent of the understanding reached last March in a simple way.

This new proposal will relate both to oil and natural gas revenues. When the international oil situation was discussed by First Ministers last March, the crisis had not yet reflected itself in significantly higher natural gas prices. Consequently, natural gas did not figure in the discussions at that time. We now know that natural gas prices are also rising sharply. It is possible that within the next few years increased provincial revenues from natural gas could add another $1 billion annually to the burden the Canadian taxpayer would have to bear if these revenues were to be equalized in full. We would then be faced with a further threat to the viability of this program. The reasons for limiting the equalization of oil revenues are equally applicable to revenues from natural gas.

According to the understanding reached by First Ministers last March, the establishment of capital funds by producing provinces would have taken up in total about two-thirds of additional oil revenues, and left about one-third for general purposes. What I am proposing now is a change in the equalization formula which will have the effect of including all of the oil and gas revenues related to the pre-crisis situation, plus one-third of the additional oil and gas revenues related to the subsequent tax and price changes.

Before bringing this new formula into effect, I will consult the provinces at the next meeting of Ministers of Finance and Provincial Treasurers in a few weeks.

I come now to the specific new measures to give effect to the budgetary policy as I described it earlier.

I have already referred to the short-term prospects for construction of new housing. The projected weakness in this sector of our economy troubles me a good deal. It threatens to reduce employment, raise production costs and increase housing prices and rents. Even more important, a reduction in the supply of new housing could lead to a lower standard of accommodation than Canadians deserve.

The government is determined not to let housing construction drop to unduly low levels. Measures proposed in the May budget should make an effective contribution to this end, and will be reintroduced. Additional programs by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have recently been announced. This budget contains further major new initiatives.

Before I turn to a discussion of new responses, let me recall to Members the measures announced last May. First, I proposed that the carrying costs on land awaiting development would not be chargeable against other income, but could be taken into account only when the land was sold. My colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and I have both listened carefully to the debate on the merits of this proposal. We are both persuaded that this measure will indeed assist in bringing more land on to the market more quickly. Hence, I propose to reintroduce this measure as originally announced.

Second, in my last budget I proposed to eliminate the sales tax on construction equipment and on materials used in municipal water distribution systems. These sales tax reductions will become effective tonight.

Finally, in order to assist young people in accumulating the capital required for a down payment on a house, I announced last May, and I want to reaffirm tonight, the introduction of a new savings vehicle to be known as the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan. I hope and expect that the bulk of the savings flowing into this plan will provide an important new source of mortgage funds to finance the construction of the new housing we require in this country.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the foregoing is of itself a formidable and effective range of programs, but I am not content to rest there. Still more thrust is needed.

The issue of the sales tax on building materials has long been the subject matter of debate in this House. Up to now I have resisted reduction of this tax for two principal reasons. First, it is a costly step and governments are always confronted with hard choices among competing priorities. Second, I was concerned that such a step would overstimulate an already strong demand. The housing picture, however, has altered significantly in the last few months. As a result of these changed prospects, I propose that, effective tonight, the rate of sales tax on building and construction materials be more than cut in half to 5 per cent. This measure will cost the federal government in a full year $450 million. I am confident that this measure will add stimulus to the industry and will, at the same time, contribute to a moderation of prices for housing.

For reasons already discussed, I am particularly anxious to provide a quick and strong incentive to the construction of new rental housing units. I therefore propose to relax for a period the rule whereby capital cost allowances on rental construction could not be charged against income from other sources.

Specifically, in respect of new, multiple-unit residential buildings for rent, started between tonight and December 31, 1975, the capital cost allowance rule will not apply. This means that an owner of an eligible rental unit will be permitted to deduct capital cost allowance against any source of income at any time. I am confident that this measure will attract a significant amount of private equity capital into the construction of new rental housing.

In my budget of last May, I proposed steps to assure the fullest possible allocation of mortgage funds to housing of more moderate cost. They included a request to the principal lenders to confine high-ratio loans to middle and lower-priced housing. When labour, materials and money were in short supply, it was desirable to direct them in this way in order to benefit the greatest number of people. But the situation has now changed to the point where all demands for new housing can be met. I am therefore withdrawing this request for the time being.

Hon. members will not need to be reminded of the $500 grants to be provided by CMHC for one year to those purchasing new, moderately-priced housing units for the first time. This time limit will increase its effectiveness as an immediate stimulus to housing construction.

Moreover, I am assured by the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Danson) that the policies of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be adapted to the changing needs of the economic situation. The Assisted Home Ownership scheme has proved its value and will be extended. Much greater emphasis will be placed on stimulating new construction of rental units for persons of moderate income. Moreover, these programs will be a very effective use of government funds because they will provide the incentive that will attract capital funds from the private mortgage market. Legislation to give effect to these new approaches will be introduced at an early date.

I am confident that the combination of measures which I have announced tonight and those originally proposed last May will provide the impetus necessary to increase the housing stock in this country at a healthy pace and fulfill our commitment to place decent accommodation within the reach of every Canadian.

Measures to Sustain Capital Investment

Mr. Speaker, I have referred often tonight to the two main issues we must confront. First is the need to moderate price increases. Second is the necessity in the year ahead to ensure that our economy continues strong, and that our capacity to expand supply keeps growing. In addition to providing stimulus to demand and having a moderating effect on price in the housing sector, the reduction in the sales tax on building materials will help to sustain investment in non-residential structures and to exercise a similar moderating influence on prices in this sector. In a longer perspective, the economy should benefit from an enlarged industrial capacity and lower overhead costs.

The transportation industry is a vital part of the infrastructure with which our economy must operate. But it is being exposed to cost pressures which are both weakening its vitality and forcing it to translate these cost pressures into price increases. These increases in turn pyramid into cost increases throughout the economy. In an effort to bring some relief to this situation, I am proposing to eliminate the federal sales tax on transportation equipment effective tonight. The equipment covered by this reduction includes railway cars, large trucks and buses and commercial aircraft. It has an estimated annual market value of approximately $1 billion and the cost of the tax reduction to the federal government for a full year will be about $100 million.

Finally, in the area of business investment, I wish to announce the extension of a measure which has made a major contribution to the strong investment performance, which is improving our productivity, enhancing supply, creating new jobs and helping to sustain the Canadian economy at a time when the economies of many other nations are faltering. This measure is the two-year write-off of expenditures on new machinery and equipment for manufacturing and processing in Canada, which is scheduled to expire at the end of this year. I am now proposing that it be extended without a terminal date. This measure will reduce the federal tax liabilities of manufacturers and processors in 1975 by $150 million.

In addition, I wish to announce that I am renewing the fast write-off for pollution equipment, now scheduled to expire at the end of this year, for a further two years.

[English]

Personal Income Tax

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to discuss in detail major proposals affecting the personal income tax. I have in mind the need to sustain the growth of purchasing power over the period ahead. Just as important, I want to protect Canadians as much as possible from what is happening to their own family budgets because of inflation.

Under the existing law—as a result of my budget of February, 1973—taxpayers are entitled to reduce their federal tax liability by 5 per cent, subject to a minimum of $100 and a maximum of $500. Last May, I proposed that, commencing in 1974, the minimum cut would be increased from $100 to $150. This proposal, which is of most benefit to the lower income groups, will of course be reintroduced.

● (2100)

Let me now turn to 1975. First, members will recall that provision was made in tax reform for successive reductions in the rate for tax applicable to the first $500 of taxable income. For 1975, this will mean that the first bracket rate will be reduced from 12 per cent to 9 per cent. Second, indexing will bring about major tax reductions for all taxpayers. Just a few weeks ago, I informed the Canadian people about the tax decreases that will occur in 1975 as a result of the automatic indexing of the personal income tax system. Indexing will reduce the tax liability of Canadian taxpayers by $950 million in 1975.

Mr. Stanfield: That is not an honest statement.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is an honest statement. I now propose new personal tax measures for 1975. In view of the need to add some stimulus to the economy by reducing taxes, I propose to ask parliament to approve another major extension of the tax cut for 1975. Specifically, I propose:

First, that the basic reduction be increased from 5 per cent cent to 8 per cent of federal income tax otherwise payable,

Second, that the maximum be increased from $500 to $750,

Third, an most importantly, that the minimum reduction be increased to $200.

This measure assists every taxpayer in the country. But the foremost consideration is that the benefits are concentrated among the more moderate income groups. For 1975, this means a reduction in taxpayer liability to the federal government of $615 million and of this amount two-thirds or more will accrue to those earning less than $12,000.

It should be noted that a married wage-earner with two children under 16 would pay no federal tax in 1975 on income up to $5,871. This compared with $4,830 in 1974.

Tax deductions at source will be adjusted next January to give effect to this new measure. Taxpayers will thus start to enjoy early next year an increase in their take-home pay resulting from the combination of four factors: the reduction in the rate of tax on the first bracket of taxable income; indexing; the increase first announced in my May 6 budget speech in the minimum tax cut to $150; and this further increase in the tax cut which I have just announced. As a result of these reductions, the take-home pay of a married taxpayer with two dependent children will rise in 1975 by $214 if he is earning $6,000 per year. If he is earning $10,000 his take-home pay will rise by $250 in 1975.

This $250 is a large part of the increase in the cost of that family's food over the past 12 months. It is apparent, therefore, that these reductions will make a significant contribution to the support of people's real incomes this coming year. I would urge all Canadians to bear this fact in mind when making their demands through their union officers or to their employers concerning their wages. For the average worker this contribution through the tax system is worth a good deal more than an increase of the same amount in wages, which would be taxable. This same message is relevant for Canadians who get their incomes in forms other than wages and salaries. And I ask them to take into account the benefit of these tax reductions to them when setting their fees, their prices, their rents or other charges.

The Protection of Savings

The House will recall that in my budget of last May, I proposed several measures to protect people's savings agains the eroding effects of inflation. One measure was the introduction of an exemption for the first $1,000 of interest income received by individuals. This amendment will be reintroduced for 1974. In addition, for 1975, I propose to expand the scope of this exception to include Canadian dividend income similar in character to the types of interest income which qualify for that exemption. This should encourage the purchase of Canadian stocks and thereby assist Canadian companies in financing their investment projects through the equity route. It should also provide some welcome support to the market.

I am also proposing to introduce an amendment to the Income Tax Act which will permit recipients of cash bonuses on Canada Savings Bonds to treat the cash bonuses as interest, thus qualifying for the exemption, or as capital gains.

The problem of protecting savings against the erosion of inflation is particularly acute for older people. Generally our senior citizens rely on pension incomes as their main source of support and, for many of them, the real value of those pensions has been shrinking. I have in mind, for example, a person who retired 5 to 10 years ago on a pension which, at that time, appeared to permit him or her to live in modest comfort. Simply stated, for many people the recent spate of inflation has turned the prospect of a secure retirement into a struggle to make ends meet.

The federal government has already taken certain steps to remedy this unsatisfactory condition. First, we have raised the special exemption for those 65 and over. Second, we raised Old Age Security payments and the Guaranteed Income Supplement and indexed them along with the Canada Pension Plan to offset increases in the cost of living.

Third, we have cut taxes within the past two years, and the further substantial tax cuts I have announced tonight will benefit the elderly along with other Canadians.

The $1,000 exemption for interest and dividends to which I have just made reference will also help those who have saved privately, but it still leaves unprotected the future of people who have saved through private pension plans. Therefore, I wish to propose a further measure which will be of direct assistance to people receiving private pensions, by which I mean pensions other than those provided universally through OAS and GIS, the Canada Pension Plan and its counterpart, the Quebec Pension Plan. I propose to exempt from tax the first $1,000 of pension income effective January 1, 1975. This new exemption will be available to anyone in receipt of a private pension and to people over the age of 65 in receipt of an annuity from a Registered Retirement Savings Plan or a payment from a Deferred Profit Sharing Plan.

There is another measure of direct assistance to older couples that I am also happy to announce. Under the present Income Tax Act, each person 65 years or older is entitled to a special exemption. As a result of indexing, this exemption will be $1,174 in 1975. Consider the case of an elderly couple. If each has sufficient income to be taxable, then each spouse can take advantage of the old age exemption. However, it is often the case that only one spouse is in receipt of income—for example, a pension. In this case, the old age exemption of the spouse without income is wasted. As another step to relieve the plight of many older couples, I am proposing that to the extent one spouse cannot take advantage of the special old age deduction, then the other spouse will be able to make use of it. This measure will be effective January 1, 1975.

The combined impact of these various measures will bring significant relief to older people. Take the example of a couple both over 65 and retired where one partner has some private savings and is collecting a private pension. Both are receiving Old Age Security pensions. As a combined result of their basic exemptions, the transferable old age exemptions, the interest and dividend deduction, the pension deduction, and the tax cut, the person in this example could receive up to $8,258 in income next year before becoming liable for federal tax.

Other Tax Measures of the May Budget

Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned briefly at the beginning of my remarks tonight, it is my intention to reintroduce the May 6 budget measures unchanged to the extend possible. I have already made reference tonight to a number of these measures, confirmed that they would be reintroduced for 1974, indicated where they would be modified, and described how they would be enriched and extended for 1975.

For clarity, let me state the situation with regard to those measures to which I have not yet made reference:

First, the 10-per-cent surtax on corporate profits earned from May 1, 1974, to April 30, 1975, will be reintroduced substantially as originally proposed.

However, corporations will not be required to adjust their monthly tax instalments to reflect this surtax, since almost seven months have now elapsed since the commencement date of this measure.

Second, the proposal to advance the timing of the final payment of a corporation's tax to the end of the second month, rather than the third month after the end of the corporation's fiscal period, will be reintroduced.

Third, the proposal to reduce the level of the tax-free reserves of large financial institutions from 1½ per cent to 1 per cent on eligible assets of over $2 billion will be reintroduced effective for 1974.

Fourth, the general increase in excise levies on spirits, wines and tobacco products proposed last May will be reintroduced effective tonight.

Fifth, the special excise taxes on high energy consuming vehicles are again being proposed in this budget, effective tonight, but subject to some important modifications. I have already spoken about the need to conserve energy.

Hence, I propose to reinforce these measures by increasing the applicable rate. For motor cars, the rate over a base weight will be $20 for the first 100 pounds, $25 on the next 100 pounds and $30 for each subsequent 100 pounds. For all but small motor-driven pleasure craft and for all privately-owned aircraft, the special rate will be 10 per cent. For heavy motorcycles, the rate will be 5 per cent.

[English]

I have now commented on the revenue-raising measures announced last May. I should also like to make reference to other tax cuts proposed in that budget which have not yet been discussed.

First, members will recall the proposal to eliminate the sales tax on clothing and footwear. In mid-July of this year, the government gave immediate effect to this sales tax reduction under the Financial Administration Act. I wish now to deal with this in a more formal manner by including it in the Ways and Means Motions to be tabled tonight.

Second, the other sales tax reductions announced last May will all be reintroduced effective tonight. In addition to those items already mentioned, such as construction equipment and municipal water distribution equipment, this measure includes the elimination of sales tax on bicycles and municipal transit systems, certain purchases by day-care centres and clinics, and certain aids for the handicapped.

Third, I want to reaffirm the proposal to increase the incentives available to incorporated small businesses. As previously announced, for 1974 and subsequent years the annual limit of $50,000 to which the lower rate of tax applied will be raised to $100,000 and the cumulative limit will be increased from $400,000 to $500,000. This provides up to $11,500 in additional cash flow to every eligible small businessman in the country. For example, he can use it to expand his business, finance inventory, meet his bank charges, or to build up his working capital. Under current circumstances, I have no doubt that he will be able to make good use of the money.

Fourth, in my budget of last May I announced an important change in the rules concerning registered retirement savings plans. The new proposal would permit a person to contribute not just to his or her own plan, but also to that of his or her spouse. In addition, I announced a number of changes relating to the treatment of medical expenses for tax purposes. All of these measures will be reintroduced effective 1974.

A large number of improvements of a technical nature were put forward in the ways and means motions of last May. Since then I have received representations and suggestions on not just the major policy proposals of the last budget, but also on many of the detailed measures. These have led to a large number of technical improvements and additions, details of which will be found in the ways and means motions. The remaining technical motions proposed last May are being reintroduced as originally announced.

Tariff Changes

There were two sets of tariff measures included in the May budget. The first would have continued from July 1 until December 31 of this year the temporary tariff reductions on a wide range of consumer goods in order to moderate the upward pressure on prices.

I am reintroducing these tariff reductions, but with some changes. I said last May that when they were reintroduced they would not be made retroactive. I have reviewed this group of tariff reductions with the object of proposing a significant group of tariff cuts that can be put in effect for a longer period than was proposed last May. I am proposing that these reductions, which become effective tonight, remain in force until June 30, 1976. Because of the longer period the items of this group will be in effect, because of the introduction on July 1 of the General Preferential Tariff for imports from developing countries, and because of changed price and supply circumstances about which I have received representations, I have made a number of exclusions from the May list of reductions. A reduction of the tariff on refined sugar, as recommended some time ago by the Tariff Board and recently by the Food Prices Review Board, has been added to the list of reductions.

The trade covered by those items on the revised list covered by tonight's proposal was valued at $1 billion in 1973.

Authority is again being sought to withdraw any tariff reduction by Order in Council if it results in adverse effects on employment and production in Canada.

It is my view that these tariff reductions as now proposed will not prejudice our negotiating position in the GATT negotiations.

The other tariff changes in the May budget included the important proposal to increase substantially the exemptions from duties and taxes on goods brought back by Canadian residents from trips abroad. Let me remind Members what the proposed changes were. The quarterly exemption available after an absence of 48 hours will be doubled to $50 from $25. The annual exemption, now available after an absence from Canada of 12 days or more, will be increased to $150 from $100. Moreover, the minimum period of absence required to qualify for the annual exemption will be reduced from 12 days to 7 days. These changes will be of considerable value to the vast number of Canadians who travel outside the country each year and will also be welcomed by our trading partners.

Provision is being made to permit the operation of duty and tax-free shops at border points, in addition to those that already operate at airports.

My May budget also proposed the extension of the duty-free entry for aircraft and aircraft engines of types or sizes not made in Canada, and a few other amendments. The only change I am proposing is that the free entry for aircraft and aircraft engines run to June 30, 1975, rather than June 30, 1976. Details of all these tariff changes, which come into effect tonight, will be found in the Ways and Means Motions.

[English]

The Economic Outlook and Fiscal Position

With the benefit of the measures I have announced tonight, I expect the economy to grow at a rate of about 4 per cent in 1975 and that about a quarter of a million new jobs will be created. These projections are based on the assumption, of course, that there will be no unforeseen deterioration in the international economic environment next year and that we experience no unforeseen shocks here at home. Such a rate of growth will be much stronger than that expected in most other countries. Given the weakness of foreign demand for our exports, it would be extremely difficult to achieve more. To attempt more would intensify the rate of inflation. To attempt less would increase unemployment.

The housing component of this outlook is of special interest to hon. members and to the country. It is my expectation that the combination of measures I have announced, together with some ease in interest rates and borrowing conditions, will lead to a recovery of housing starts from the most recent levels. For 1975, I hope it will be possible to achieve a level of 200,000 starts or better.

We cannot expect to eliminate inflation overnight. It will be a prolonged and tough fight. But we are striving to get the rate of inflation down below the two-digit level next year. It will take a determined effort on the part of all sectors of our society. Self-discipline and a good measure of political courage to get it down to 5 per cent over the next few years.

Mr. Speaker, may I now briefly sum up the fiscal position of the government, taking into account tonight's proposals. I estimate that total financial requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions will amount to $1 billion in the fiscal year 1974-75. This estimate represents a 50-per-cent reduction from the $2 billion that I forecast last May. This reduction reflects the effect that a higher-than-expected inflation rate has been having on our revenues. The inflation has also increased our expenditures, though in lesser degree. Our expenditures would have been higher but for the efforts of the government to restrain their growth.

● (2120)

The total financial requirements, excluding foreign exchange transactions, will build up steadily to reach a figure of $3 billion in fiscal year 1975-76. This does not reflect any relaxation of the government's policy of restraining spending. In fact, our outlays, that is to say budgetary expenditures, payments under OAS and GIS, and our loans, investments and advances, are expected to increase in 1975-76 by 15 per cent as compared with 25 per cent in 1974-75. This financial outcome is the result of the deliberate change in fiscal policy I am introducing in this budget for the express purpose of dealing with economic developments as we see them evolving over the next 12 to 18 months.

Current estimates imply a surplus on a National Accounts basis in 1974-75 of $250 million and a deficit in 1975-76 of $1.5 billion.

Relative to the size of the economy, the financial requirements of $3 billion expected for 1975-76 are no larger than they were in similar circumstances in the past. Our cash balances are high as a result of the buoyancy of revenues this fiscal year and the success of the Canada Savings Bond campaign. The expansion of the capital market—including the banking system—involved in the expected nominal growth of the economy will be adequate to finance these cash requirements without undue pressure on other borrowers or on interest rates.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

I believe that the large cash requirement for the next fiscal year is appropriate to meet the risks of a weaker economy and an uncertain world. This posture is not a relaxation of spending discipline, as I said, but is dictated by my view of the proper response to the state of the economy over the next year or so.

I must remind hon. members that the figures I have presented tonight on the outcome of our accounts are estimates. The actual outcome will reflect the decisions of this House respecting legislation which is now before it or which will be placed before it during the course of this session. All estimates, Members will recognize, are subject to particular uncertainties in the circumstances of today.

With the permission of the House, I should like now to include in today's Hansard supplementary tables showing estimates of Government of Canada cash requirements, details of the budgetary revenues, federal government revenues and expenditures on a National Accounts basis and reconciliations of these figures with those compiled on a Public Accounts basis. The information in these tables applies to the fiscal years 1973-74, 1974-75 and 1975-76.

I should also like to table several notices of ways and means motions setting out the changes I have proposed tonight, and I would ask that they be appended to today's Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: The minister seeks leave to table certain documents. Is it so agreed and ordered by the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I now sum up briefly what we see to be the problems ahead of us and how we intend to deal with them.

We believe that the principal threat to the growth of our production and employment comes to us from abroad. The world economy is in a fragile and precarious state, suffering from severe inflation and the gathering forces of recession. If the efforts to deal with the unprecedented balance of payments deficits on oil account are unsuccessful and some governments are unable to carry on with the policies required, the economic results for the world could in those circumstances be severe.

Canada in the past year or so has outperformed most of its trading partners, and the prospect is that with continued good fortune and sound economic management, it will continue to do so. But given our heavy dependence on trade, and our close financial and investment links with the rest of the world, we will not be able to escape unscathed should the international situation deteriorate even more. Therefore, Canada's first line of defence in economic affairs lies, as it has for years, in international co-operation.

It will take all the wisdom, courage and effort that human beings can muster to forge co-operative endeavours of an unprecedented nature, to put aside narrow national self-interest, and to respond generously to the needs of the weaker nations. But that is what is required if we are to come through the next few years whole. Let me assure you that by deeds, by good counsel, by leadership where such opportunities are given to us, and by generosity within our means, we will do what we can to help resolve the dangers which confront us.

Nor will we ignore the problems right here at home. Two-digit inflation, whatever its origin or nature, and regardless of however favourably our situation compares with others, is simply not acceptable to this government. Nor is growing slack in our industries and the threat of rising unemployment for our people. We shall not try to stem inflation by deliberately inducing slack in our economy. Nor will we give fresh impetus to the forces of inflation by driving the economy to excess. We shall need to steer a prudent course.

I have tried to set such a course in this budget.

In our present circumstances, we should moderate government expenditures so as not to add to the pressure on available resources. But while doing this, we must continue to look after the needs of our less fortunate citizens and to enhance the supply of essential goods and services which government is called upon to provide. Governmental expenditure during the year ahead is planned to grow at a considerably slower pace than during the past few years.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Through our taxation system, and in other ways, we are encouraging the private sector to maintain a healthy level of activity now and to build new capacity to increase the supply of goods and services for the future. I am more persuaded now than ever that this is a prerequisite for moderating prices in a lasting way. The taxation measures I have announced tonight in respect of housing and resources and for the processing and manufacturing industries, have been designed with this goal in mind.

We have acted directly on prices, reduced federal taxation on building materials and transportation equipment, and supplemented the measures proposed in my May budget to put downward pressure on the prices of goods that figure importantly in the cost of living or in the cost of putting essential capital stock in place.

Personal income taxes have been reduced further. Taken together with the measures of last May and the automatic reductions through indexation, these steps will boost the take-home pay of Canadians, help to maintain the level of production and, I trust, ease the pressures at the bargaining table.

The special measures to assist Canadians of modest means in receipt of investment and pension income are further steps in a policy I have been pursuing since I became Minister of Finance to protect those of our citizens hurt by inflation who are least able to protect themselves.

Our twin goals are to moderate inflation and to achieve sound growth of production and employment. These are goals which I believe every Canadian supports. But in today's circumstances, the achievement of one depends on the attainment of the other. Inflation is the enemy of sustained good economic performance. This is why we will pursue, with vigour and perseverance, efforts to achieve a national consensus—to proceed not by edict but by consultation—on ways to moderate the inflation. I know this will not be easy. But I have confidence in the Canadian people and in their sense of justice and fair play. I am convinced that if we can be shown that the other fellow is pulling his weight—and not getting away with anything at our expense—each of us will be willing to make a full contribution to the national effort.

I have always been frank with the Canadian people. I have not tried to understate the challenges which face us. I have not claimed that we can be sure of success, no matter what happens elsewhere. Nor have I pressed any panic buttons, because I am confident that, working together at home and abroad, we can overcome our difficulties.

The situation may change. If so, I will not hesitate to recommend a change in course. But this is how I see the issues today—and these are the policies I believe to be suitable today, the policies I recommend to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2130)

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I dare say there are some who came to this House tonight expecting to witness the grand climax of the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau's) wrestling of inflation to the ground. We have just listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) for about an hour and a half in a demonstration of verbal wrestling, and I got the feeling half way through, in fact before half way through, that he would have been very pleased indeed to settle for a draw. I just want to say to those who came here to see inflation wrestled to the ground that I am very pleased they did not have to pay to get in!

The Minister of Finance keeps telling us that he does not propose any cure-alls for inflation. Well, I agree with that. He does not propose any cures at all. He says he is not going to propose any cosmetic cures for inflation. I would agree with that too. Obviously his view is that a little dab will do, but that is not cosmetic. He says to us that the cure is not going to come quickly. Under this government and this minister you can sure bet on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: An official from a European country recently visiting Canada asked me how we in this country managed to achieve an inflation rate of 11 per cent when we are self-sufficient in oil and petroleum and buy it at $6.50 a barrel. He expressed amazement. I asked him whether he had ever met our Minister of Finance, who certainly is an over-achiever when it comes to inflation.

[Translation]

I was hoping that in a general way the minister and this government would have changed some of their orientations from what they were evidenced in the budget introduced in this House last May. This was too much to expect. We have before us tonight a budget that still displays the same two flaws—antagonism and self-conceit.

[English]

As to the resources industry, sir, the minister has made significant changes in taxes as they directly affect the industry. He seems to have pretended, at least, to have backed off a bit with regard to the provinces, but the essence of his position is still one of confrontation. Having in May created the confusion that he created in the industry, leading to a very substantial reduction in exploration in this country, which was an act of madness by any standard, he confirmed his position here tonight in so far as he has made any changes. We will see what the effect of these proposals is on the provinces, but we have already seen the disastrous effects of the minister's policies which he presented in May.

While the government has been bloody minded with regard to resources, as far as inflation is concerned it is still a paper tiger. In his presentation tonight the minister goes a step beyond his past practice of making a virtue of necessity; he is now attempting to dignify gutlessness in the name of prudence. And he attempts to dignify it in a welter of words, which indicates to me that the government has given up trying to wrestle inflation and is taking the new approach of trying to tell the House the same old story long enough and often enough to bore it to death. He is even sending his ministers to sleep. I say that, sir, in the full recognition of my own sometimes accidental expertise in achieving such an objective.

[Translation]

This budget follows close on the heels of an election through which the Canadian people gave this government a clear mandate to govern this country. It does not now face a minority situation in this House.

An hon. Member: It is all in its interest.

Mr. Stanfield: Still, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) claims all the credit for it, saying that they could not win without his help. As much in its own interest as in that of the country, the government could not be in a better position to exercise strong leadership and undertake a large scale program to fight inflation.

[English]

The government has no fear of being defeated in this parliament. There is no need to gloss over things because an election might be imminent. There is not even a vestige of legitimacy left to any claim that things are not serious enough to call for strong measures. Things have long since been demonstrably serious; even the Speech from the Throne recognized that. The government is in a strong position from which to take significant action, and still it presents a totally inadequate, out of touch rerun of the May 8 budget, with variations on that theme.

This is the minister's fourth budget—I think I am right in that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are right in that.

Mr. Stanfield: If he keeps on like this we will be able to recite 90 per cent of his fifth budget from memory. We will just have to remember to make a few minor changes to take care of inconsistency, and we will have to presume those important little inclusions to allow for the gutlessness and the intellectual dishonesty.

In that vein, Mr. Speaker, what could have been more dishonest than the minister's year and a half long sermonizing on supply? This was to be the key to bringing down prices—increase supply. This was the government's thrust. The minister wanted us to believe that he was the helpless victim of anchovies with bad compasses. And let us not forget the trouble the poor fellow had with the weather.

We warned, time and time again, that price increases caused by supply dislocations were becoming serious enough to trigger mounting inflationary expectations, and that these expectations must be dealt with firmly or cost-push inflation would sweep through our society like wildfire. Those words were pooh-poohed. It was just a temporary supply problem, according to the minister; evidently just another one of those very irritating aberrations which never ruffle the feathers of finance ministers, past or present, in this government.

● (2140)

Here we are now, Sir, just over six months since the last budget which was still promoting this single line of attack against inflation, and the minister's feathers seem to be in some disarry.

An hon. Member: Not as much as yours.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The feathers have been flying as the chickens have been coming home to roost, not to mention the eggs, Sir.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister was wrong to begin with, way back when he focussed solely on the supply aspect of the inflation problem. Then having focussed on it, to the exclusion of the terrible dangers of substantial cost-push inflation, and even having focussed on supply to this extent, the government made a horrible botch of things. Look at the livestock industry, the poultry industry, the fishing industry and the lumber industry. I wonder whether the minister is talking about the same country I know and visit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Look at what the minister's inflation policies have done to the armed forces. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson) has not done that all by himself. Look at these dislocations today, and today's prices, and give the minister his score for performance in stabilizing and improving supply and prices. He deserves to be scored in more than one sense of that word.

Then, as it became clear that this sandcastle about inflation was disintegrating, the government developed a new cover up story which was presented in the Speech from the Throne. It was suddenly time to get out and talk to a lot of people about this terrible international problem of inflation. Some sloganeer in the bowels of some Liberal library dredged up a couple of phrases about "sharing the pie" and "achieving a consensus". Both these pursuits are quite legitimate when they are honestly dealt with, but the way the government is kicking them around these days provides another example of dishonesty, and there is no other word for it.

On November 7 my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), asked the Minister of Finance what progress had been made in his talks with principal groups in the country; talks which both the minister and the Prime Minister said were aimed at a co-operative effort to fight inflation and to seek a consensus on fairly sharing the national productivity pie among wages, prices and profits. The minister replied that talks were in progress and he said he hoped "to provide further clarification to the House on budget night". This was only one of a long list of undertakings the minister hoped, or wished, or promised to follow through on tonight. In his reply he went on to say: "As the program develops, it will be fully apparent to the House and to the people of this country". But I ask any fair minded member of this House—

An hon. Member: Don't look that way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Is there anything at all in what the minister reported tonight on that program? Did he say anything here tonight at all except to make it very clear that, from the start, it was a complete hoax and a complete fraud on the part of the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I think those fellows better relax because this is just a warmup tonight. The minister tried to create the impression tonight that he is imposing restraints on the share of the pie going into the federal treasury. There, too, he was far less than honest, and I accuse him of dishonesty.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is not fair.

Mr. Stanfield: That is not fair? It is not only fair, I am going to document it, but not tonight because I have some mercy for those miserable sinners across the way.

The minister tried to create that impression, and tried to achieve an illusion by sleight of hand. He said expenditures had been trimmed, but expenditures reported now for the current fiscal year are some $450 million higher than even anticipated in May. That is real trimming. It is not the expenditures of this government that are getting trimmed, it is the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The minister is able to show a balanced budget because he has, in fact, raised the real rate of taxation in this country this year, and not reduced it as he pretends.

The minister has not come clean with Canadians, and this government has not come clean. It is not offering leadership, and it is certainly not offering leadership by example.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Would you run again, Bob?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one thing to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), and I want to say it in a way that is not rude. I wish he would just keep his mouth closed enough so that he would not blow my papers all around when I am trying to speak.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance talked about a consensus, but that really smells of "con", and not consensus. It is all too apparent that any talk about sharing the pie really means sharing what is left after the federal government takes its share. If discussions go ahead on this basis we are doomed to failure, and properly so, and this minister, this government and this prime minister will be responsible for that failure.

On that positive note, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), that the debate be now adjourned. I hope you will all be here on Wednesday to hear the remainder of my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the motion to adjourn the debate I should bring to the attention of hon. members that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) not only laid certain documents on the table but has requested that they be recorded in Hansard and Votes and Proceedings. I presume that the order that was made at that time would include that request as well. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On motion of Mr. Stanfield the debate was adjourned.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (President of the Privy Council), seconded by the Minister of State for Science and Technology and Minister of Public Works (Mr. Drury), moved:

Motion agreed to.

PUBLISHING

"TIME" AND "READER'S DIGEST"—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON TAX STATUS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question or two to the Prime Minister relating to certain matters that were not clarified by the budget address last evening. The first relates to the tax status enjoyed by Time magazine and Reader's Digest. Is it the decision of the government to continue with the present status?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Obviously if nothing was said in the budget, nothing is contemplated at this time. This does not preclude any further action.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand what the Prime Minister is saying is that no decision has yet been taken. If that is the situation indicated by the Prime Minister, when may we expect a decision since the general impression has been created that perhaps the situation would have been covered in the course of the budget.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we cannot be responsible for that general impression the Leader of the Opposition has gleaned from God knows where, but so far as the first part of the question is concerned, that is right; no decision has been taken and the matter is still before cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition on a final supplementary.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY REGARDING LIMITATION OF SIZE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is another matter of some obscurity relating to the remarks made by the minister with regard to the size of the public service, the minister having said he would place limits on the growth of the public service. I should like to ask the Prime Minister precisely what that means. Does it mean there is to be a pause in the recruitment of the public service and that it will be held to its present size? Has any decision been taken of a precise nature or was this simply a generalization which the minister does not ordinarily use?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as the statement is meant to have effect, I suppose it will be judged only by the effect it does have in due course. I can only emphasize that the minister's statement was a serious one and the opposition and the country will have to judge us on our ability to administer it.

INCOME TAX

MINIMUM SAVING FOR TAXPAYERS IN 1974 and 1975 AS A RESULT OF BUDGET CHANGES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the minister would be good enough to clarify some confusion which exists in the minds of a number of people as a result of last night's budget, namely, that the minimum saving which will occur as a result of this budget for the 1974 taxation year for Canadians is in fact $50 and not as has been reported by a number of people $150?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, for 1974 it will be $150 and for 1975 it will be $200. Obviously, in terms of the deductibility tables this will not be implemented until the deductibility tables are changed early in January.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has not clarified but rather has further confused the situation. Will he correct me if I am wrong that the $100 minimum deduction was passed in the 1973 budget and all that the minister is adding in the current budget is a $50 reduction for 1974?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is perfectly right with regard to the February, 1973 budget. There was a five per cent reduction, a minimum of $100 and a maximum of $500. In the May 6 budget, the minimum was proposed to be raised to $150 for 1974. That was implemented last night in the ways and means motion. In addition, for 1975 the minimum will be raised to $200 and the maximum raised to $750.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has acknowledged that there is only a $50 reduction in addition to what was proposed in the 1973 budget.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like him to clarify that for 1975, in contrast to what has been suggested by a number of people, the real minimal saving in terms of those who are paying taxes in 1975 is simply an additional $50 over what they will get in 1974. I would like to hear the minister's opinion on this also since he did not document what he expected in the form of inflation. Given the rate of inflation which will inevitably take place, that $50 inevitably will be eaten away by inflationary pressures. Is that the minister's opinion?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The hon. gentleman is engaging in a little game of semantics here. Certainly, he will recognize that the May 6 budget was defeated largely as a result of the efforts of the hon. gentleman and his friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When I entered the House last night, the minimum tax reduction, as the hon. gentleman states, was $100. I reinstated at one stroke the $50 which would have been implemented had the hon. gentleman passed the May 6 budget, plus another $50, for a minimum of $200. Two thirds of that tax reduction will apply to taxpayers at $12,000 or less.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he say if the chartered banks will soon reduce their prime rate now that the Bank of Canada has decreed the ½ per cent reduction last week?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it behooves the chartered banks to react as they want about the rate reduction prescribed by the Bank of Canada and so we have to wait.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Has the minister met the Canadian Bankers Association to ask them to do their share by lowering the prime rate with a view to stimulating the Canadian economy which is something the minister seems to hope?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I imagine the banks will follow the market, Mr. Speaker. I have always told the chairmen of the nine or ten Canadian chartered banks that priority must be given first of all to the economically weak regions, as well as to the small contractors, farmers, fishermen and independent businessmen in Canada.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary.

The minister still has not told us whether the Canadian Bankers Association agrees with stimulating the Canadian economy through lower interest rates?

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT POLICY WITH REGARD TO PRODUCTION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I should like to have a clarification of the policy with regard to beef. On many occasions in the past the Minister of Finance has indicated that the way to beat inflation is to stimulate and increase production in various phases of the Canadian economy. In view of the events announced in the United States a couple of days ago with regard to beef and in view of the fact that it appears now that beef production is being reduced by the producers, could the Prime Minister inform the House what the government policy is in fact with regard to beef production specifically? Is it to stimulate greater production of beef or to ask farmers to cut back production of beef?

● (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, over the long haul we do want to increase supply but as the hon. member realizes there are specific points in time over this long haul where the supply cannot be disposed of, such as the examples we saw earlier this winter. As far as the question of the United States action is concerned, the government decided to send a note to the United States which has been sent to them this morning.

Mr. Stanfield: Not by mail, I hope.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, it is being presented to them in the usual manner.

TRADE

ALLEGATION CANADIAN DELEGATION WRECKED SUGAR AGREEMENT—REASON FOR PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of allegations that the Canadian delegation played a leading part in wrecking a sugar agreement which would have provided sugar at 11 cents per pound, can the minister explain why sugar is now selling in Ottawa at about 70 cents a pound and is likely to go to more than a dollar per pound by next spring?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no substance whatsoever to that allegation. The reason that it has not been possible to negotiate a new international sugar agreement is that the producing countries do not at the moment consider it in their interests to come to the negotiating table.

SUGAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON ENSURING TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT OF DOMESTIC MARKET FILLED BY CANADIAN SUGAR BEET PRODUCERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the minister's counter charge could lead to debate as I certainly believe the facts to be different. I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Since Canada and Japan are the largest importers of free market sugar in the world, is the government at this time contemplating the formulation of a national sugar policy which would ensure that at least 25 per cent of the Canadian market would be filled by Canadian sugar beet producers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question in the form of a representation by the hon. member and will consider it.

SUGAR—STOCKS ON HAND AT REFINERIES ON JANUARY 1, AND JULY 1, 1974

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and concerns the price of sugar which is being outrageously advanced without regard to anything except the profits of the refining organizations and the sugar corporations. May I ask whether the minister is able to inform the House how much sugar was on hand as of January 1 this year among these various refiners and how much of that sugar was still on hand on July 1? Does the minister have that information? If he has, I think it would indicate that what is happening is that the sugar companies are simply, with stock on hand, piling up additional costs to the Canadian taxpayers who are perfectly defenceless because of the fact that the Combines Investigation Act has never been used.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As a result of the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I got in touch with the refineries requesting information. I have received part of that information. I expect the second part of those details within the next few days. I shall be pleased to communicate them to the House as soon as I have received all pertinent information.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question and I thank the minister for his courtesy in advising the House that he has at least communicated with these people. When he receives a communication from them I hope he will investigate to see if it is as far removed from the truth as some of the defences the sugar companies have recently revealed in connection with prosecutions.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member and all his colleagues that, each month, Statistics Canada makes public some information on the volume of sugar we have in reserve in Canada. He can therefore by himself and on his own initiative check the amounts, which are general and do not apply to specific refineries. I could have given him that information, but since the question is more precise and refers to the amounts of sugar of each refinery, a detail that is not made public by Statistics Canada, I have been forced to ask the refineries themselves. If they agree to give the information, I will be pleased to disclose it in the House.

STATISTICS CANADA

REPORT ON FOOD PRICES IN ST. JOHN'S—POSSIBLE IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FOOD PRICES REVIEW BOARD IN VIEW OF DISPROPORTIONATE INCREASE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Expansion. As the regional cities price index released by Statistics Canada at one o'clock today, showed a dramatic increase in food prices at St. John's, Newfoundland, which are largely influenced by the increase in the price of sugar and other items, and as the 3.8 per cent increase in food prices in one month represents an annual increase of 20.8 per cent in food prices for St. John's, Newfoundland, may I ask the minister what steps he is taking to implement the recommendations of the Food Prices Review Board, bearing in mind especially that most food consumed in Newfoundland must be imported from the mainland.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, to the extent that this report comes under my responsibilities, I am of course as concerned as the hon. member, and I think this deserves further investigation and action. On the matter of transportation, which is one of the factors involved, I propose to consult with my colleagues, the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There are some studies under way already, and have been for some time, on the improvement of service. I point out that, at the moment, subsidies in excess of $50 million are paid on the gulf service alone. As to the more substantive part of the report, which I hope the provincial government has taken into account, the Food Prices Review Board has of course made strong comments about the distribution system on the island. I will be glad to talk to them about it and see if we can find some cooperative arrangement to improve it.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

FOOD PRICES IN NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ELIMINATE DISPARITY BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND OTHER AREAS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who answers in this House for the Food Prices Review Board. Has he examined the recommendations of the board on food prices in Newfoundland. Also, on the basis of his examination, is he now prepared to recommend to his cabinet colleagues measures for closing the disparity between prices for food charged in Newfoundland and in the rest of the country?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REASON FOR GOVERNMENT POLICY ON RESOURCES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the manner in which the Minister of Finance dealt with natural resources last night, and bearing in mind the way his colleague has also dealt with the question of natural resources, will the Prime Minister take part in the important budget debate and explain in clear terms to the House and to the country why the government has decided to act as the architect of disunity in Canada.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it appears after that debate has begun and proceeded that some members like the hon. member still do not understand, not because of prejudice but because of inability, I might even invite the hon. member to lunch, and explain this to him.

Mr. Baldwin: But I understand very well.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We understand only too well. That's the trouble.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF BUDGET PROPOSALS ON SIZE OF PUBLIC SERVICE—CONSULTATION WITH STAFF ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I address my question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as minister and also in his capacity as the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. My question relates to a statement made in the budget speech to the effect that fiscal stimulus will come from something other than an increase in expenditures. May I relate that comment to the Public Service of Canada and ask the minister, both in his capacity as minister and as the member for Ottawa-Carleton, what are his plans for reducing the numbers serving in the Public Service of Canada. How big a reduction does he have in mind, as a member of parliament and as a minister, in the size of the Public Service of Canada—because if the budget means anything, it suggests such reduction—and what methods does he intend to use to achieve the aims of the budget. Can he answer this question?

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Despite the importance of the question, I have some reservation about the hon. member's ability to pose a question to the minister in his capacity as the member for Ottawa-Carleton. The fact is that questions can only be addressed to the minister, and therefore only to the minister in his capacity as Minister of Finance and not in his capacity as the member of parliament representing his important constituency or any other. In addition, it appears to me, unless the minister wishes to answer the question at this time, that the question is of a kind which ought to be put on the order paper. However, if the minister wishes to answer, he may.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member would probably rather have an answer to his question, I prefer to answer at this time. I suggest that he has misread the budget speech. We were not talking about reductions in the Public Service. We were talking about restraints in the increase of expenditures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And, restraints in the increase of expenditure will obviously involve some restraints on the increase or growth of the Public Service. The Prime Minister has indicated that will be determined as the government reconciles its priorities in its various government programs.

● (1430)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Has there been consultation and agreement with the Public Staff Association through the National Joint Council with the government with regard to the position the minister now indicates is the position of his government?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): To begin with, Mr. Speaker, there was no need to negotiate something that was not in the mind of the government. We are not talking about reduction. The hon. member really would not expect me to negotiate that aspect of the budget.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FAILURE TO TELEVISE FINAL INTERCOLLEGIATE FOOTBALL GAME

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State, I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Is the government aware that the CBC does not plan to televise the final game in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union schedule between the University of Western Ontario and the University of Toronto this Friday evening, in spite of the fact that these finals have been televised for many years, and the CBC has exclusive telecasting rights which prevents any alternative arrangements?

[Translation]

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make note of the question. I will refer it to the minister.

INDUSTRY

LUMBER—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT ACTION TO AID INDUSTRY

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It relates to the study he is making into possible assistance the federal government can give to the lumber industry. My question is twofold. When can we expect a statement in the House as to what the federal involvement will be? Has the minister discussed with his colleagues the possibility of making changes to the Bank Act to allow for government guarantees of loans made under Section 88? This would certainly be of immense help.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be discussing a number of these questions with my colleagues this afternoon. As to when I might make a statement in the House, I can only estimate that it might be sometime next week.

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR VARIATION BETWEEN PROVINCES IN LOSSES UNDER GUARANTY FUND

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General of which I have already given him notice. It relates to payouts from the post office guaranty fund during the last fiscal year based on figures supplied to me by the department. A province by province breakdown of the losses caused by the most part because of conversion and postal employees indicates very wide variation and I want to ask the minister why, for example, losses in Newfoundland appear to be $25,000 while there are no losses indicated at all for PEI, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Also, why in the province of Quebec were there losses of nearly $70,000 while in the neighbouring province of Ontario, having an approximate comparable population and number of employees, there was a loss of only $6,000? Can the minister indicate why these conditions and inconsistencies exist and what he proposes to do?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member with his usual courtesy informed me several days ago that he intended to ask this question. I wish to answer it in two stages; one, orally and, two, with a written answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have reservations about the extent of the question posed by the hon. member as to whether it is a proper question for the oral question period as opposed to the order paper. It seeks detailed information about comparative losses on operations in different provinces. It seems to be a proper question for the order paper. However, if the minister can answer in a brief preliminary way, he will be permitted to do so.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, there exists a guaranty fund that began in 1890 and ended in 1920. It was collected from postmasters in order to financially compensate for inefficiency or criminal action. This fund is still in existence. Last year there was a considerable loss in the province of Quebec. It was related to three specific instances, one a criminal action and the other two negligence or lack of collecting COD charges. I will follow with more specific written information.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILE—POLICY ON IMPORT QUOTAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Considering the uncertainty and insecurity that prevail in the textile industry, particularly in Quebec, of which both the minister and the Prime Minister are well aware, does the minister intend to do something about the import quota policy, an area where his department has been slackening for some eight months, so that the quota of our industry, that increased from 35 to 50 per cent, be raised to 65 per cent and, finally, about at least the protective measures his predecessor brought forward in 1971 so that they be revewed for three more years?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question from an hon. member yesterday, I mentioned that I had referred eight or nine particular textile product groups to the Clothing and Textile Board for urgent examination in terms of the situation. I expect to receive their report in the near future at which time we will consider what quotas or other actions we should take.

[Translation]

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Does the minister intend to take steps, either alone or in co-operation with his colleague responsible for regional economic expansion, to help the textile industries which must recycle or transform their production and if so, could he tell the House where in the throne speech was there reference to that assistance to the textile industry, particularly in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I think the problems now affecting the textile industry are caused by a world situation of over-supply, distress selling and a turn-down in the major markets for the producers of these products. This is the situation which has created difficulties for the Canadian textile industry. The Clothing and Textile Board will be examining this on an urgent basis.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT INTENTION WITH REGARD TO ECONOMIC POSITION OF THOSE OVER SIXTY-FIVE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Minister of Finance has taken steps to improve the position of the 40 per cent of Canadians 65 years of age and over who have other income, what steps does the government propose to take to provide a meaningful improvement in the economic position of the 50 to 60 per cent of Canadians over 65 who rely exclusively on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement and who already pay no income tax?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member probably knows that the Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Mr. Hees: —is travelling again.

Mr. Trudeau: That shows how badly informed the opposition is. The minister is meeting with the provincial welfare ministers today to discuss the whole problem of a policy paper published a year and a half ago, I believe, on welfare in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that on more than one occasion the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that from time to time there have to be adjustments in the basic rate of old age security, may I ask whether consideration is being given to increasing that basic rate during this session?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO MAKE PRODUCTION OF FOOD MORE PROFITABLE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Can the minister tell the House if, in accordance with the statements made lately by the representative of the Canadian government in Rome, his department will take steps to increase the efficiency of the Canadian agriculture in order to encourage the production of food and thus fight more effectively the problem of hunger in the world? Following those statements, when will the minister announce these new long term measures and make the agriculture industry really efficient?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman knows that most agriculture in Canada is profitable today, certainly more profitable than it has been for many years.

An hon. Member: What about the beef producers?

Mr. Whelan: There are some sectors of agriculture that may be suffering from a short term problem at the present time, but the intention of the government is to provide stabilization to agriculture. We said we would and we will.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

APPROPRIATE PERCENTAGE OF INCREASE IN WAGE RATES TO FIGHT INFLATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as in the budget speech last night the minister made a good deal of the need for restraint in fighting inflation, is not the minister's position that the various segments of the Canadian economy should take the 15.6 per cent increase into their calculations in dealing with their negotiations and things of that sort?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, every sector will have to look at its own position. The message of the budget was that, all taken together, there are only limited resources in the economy, and that the consensus that we have built up should keep that in mind. The hon. gentleman will recognize that on the basis of the increased expenditures contemplated for the next fiscal year it is just slightly above the rise in the gross national product in normal terms.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. The minister talks of a consensus among segments of the economy as to how to deal with the problem, but inasmuch as there is an enormous number of labour settlements coming up, I take it that the position of the government is that the 15.6 per cent increase in wage rates in these labour negotiations will be appropriate in terms of fighting the inflation battle?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I would hope that just as business should take into consideration in setting prices the additional cash flow given them by the budget last night, so working men and women will also take into account the additional money returned to them in terms of disposable income in the next fiscal year. If this is done, increases need not be anywhere near the range the hon. member suggests.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EXPORT OF WATER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that United Nations figures released at the world food conference in Rome indicate that the global demand for fresh water will increase by 240 per cent during the next five years, and in view of the fact that the government has no policy regarding the export of Canadian water, does the Prime Minister still hold to the view that: "I don't want to be a dog in the manger about this, but if people are not going to use it, can't we sell it for hard cash?"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION WITH GUIDE LINES—REQUEST FOR OPEN DECLARATION OF INTERESTS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, last week there was made public the permutations and combinations of declarations of interest of ministers of the Crown vis-à-vis conflict of interest—frozen trusts, blind trusts, over declarations, everything, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reaction that the Prime Minister has obviously had to this confusing situation, will he, including himself and the rest of his ministers, not insist that an open declaration of their affairs, including assets and liabilities, be made and given to the Clerk of this House, thus levelling with the Canadian people?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be promoting his own brand of openness. The principles which guide the cabinet were set before the House. We would welcome discussion on them if the House wants so to discuss them, but they are the principles that the cabinet is following.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since traditionally this has not been a question for House discussion but a question of the leadership of the Prime Minister, will the Prime Minister resolve the matter in that way? What I do as a private member of parliament is different from what the Prime Minister decides for himself and his cabinet. Would the Prime Minister insist on this kind of procedure that I suggest?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have been prepared to give, and indeed do give, the kind of leadership that I thought best. The leadership that we are not following is that of the hon. member. Nor, indeed, are the rest of his colleagues following that leadership.
