the morale of the country, aside altogether from the immediate effect of the breach of the broken law, and it C. E. Russell is not too much to say that in this Colony more harm is being done by Act than by all the alcoholic liquor consumed in consequence of such breaches. And so the Government has felt compelled to introduce this Bill at this session, promising to consider sympathetically all that Commission may report hereafter and to seek at subsequent session of the Legislature all amendments that may seem desirable. This, submit, Sir, is a much better method of proceeding than delay to hear representations to a Committee would be, for the latter is not usually very satisfactory tribunal, and Commission will have power to summon and swear witnesses who would not care to come before a Joint Select Committee. REFERENDUM.

It will be objected, also, that as the Prohibition Act was adopted by the people, by referendum, its repeal ought not to take place except as the result of another referendum. But that devise is only a means of clearly ascertaining public opinion, and that opinion, we hold, was unmistakably expressed at the recent general election, by frank appeal and unmistakable response. Some will say, other issues complicated question and reply, but so did other issues at the adoption of Prohibition, when religious and patriotic emotion, and in adequate comprehension of all that was involved, powerfully contributed to the result. Personally, I entertain little respect for the un-British method of transferring responsibility for enacting laws from representatives ferendums. They are socialistic con trivances, American in application, and contrary to the sound constitutional principle of representative the top step by step. government, as Britons understand it. that laws shall be made by chos- attitude of "Let the other fellow do en representatives supposed to be chosen for their intelligence, and to some extent at least for their expert training as law-makers. But whatever may be said in favour of referring to the people themselves measure so coercive of personal liberty and destructive of individual habits as strict Prohibition threatened to be, nothing so cogent and logical can be said about a measure aimed to restore normalcy, to confer liberty of action, and to end a reign of lawlessness after the high endeavor of Prohibition is universally admitted to have largely failed. A referendum would cost a very large sum of money (perhaps $100,00), and in any event would cause grave delay. The Government, have, therefore, felt compelled to proceed with
