As sufferers by the fire become better bark Aronca, 586, Henderson, Trinide, Wm acquainted with the nature and extent of their losses, the feeling of confidence their losses, the feeling of confidence shall last, master Sch Ada Louisia, 76, Kingston CLEARED.

A gossipy correspondent, writing of the Queen's household, says: Possibly all that is said may not be strictly true of "Sharp," otherwise known as the Queen's collie. In personal appearance "Sharp" is a respectable specimen of his class, without presenting any striking features of beauty. He seems to be a living examplification of the adage that "some are born to good look." But let that seet. "Sharp," as his name betokens, is a "cut-looking animal, jet black, with just a streak of white in the form of a star to give effect to his head, very intelligent eyes if it were not for their "uncanny" glitter at times. He is of light build, lithe, and not cumbered with superfluous flesh. He is a native of Crathie and was reared under a decent man's roof, under whose care he remained until the Queen became his mistress. His puppyhood, if became his mistress. His puppyhood, if report speak true, was not highly creditable. "That thief Sharp" was the sobriquet under which he was best known in those days. His depredations, however, were trifling, restricted chiefly to milk or cream or any little delicacy of a tempting nature. His aversions are cats and strangers, and he has an unpleasant way of showing his dislike, even in the presence of Her Majesty. Some laughable stories are current auent "Sharp's" bad manners in this respect. Into one cottage where he was taken by his Royal Mistress, a favorite kitten happened to be playing under the table, which "Sharp" espying, immediately gave chase to. Pussy took refuge under the bed; but her pursuer was not to be done. To the rescue flew the Princess, and "Bad Sharp, Bad Sharp," eried the Queen, "Bad Sharp, Bad Sharp," cried the Queen, clapping her hands in displeasure, "Sharp," however, showed a determined spirit of rebellion, and had to be forcibly dragged away from his intended victim by John Brown, to whom he was consigned in disgrace by Her Majesty Like spoilt favorites in general, he presumes a good deal or his "importance," and takes liberties than a less distinguished "subject" would nevet dream of. But we come now to his fine points. As a matter of course, "Sharp" is a collie of the first water, sound as a bell, and firm as a nut; he is courageous, independent, faithful, and incorruptible. Devotedly attached to his Royal Mistress, he guards her with the most fierce jealousy, Devotedly attached to his Royal Mistress, he guards her with the most fierce jealousy, and will hardly allow any one to approach her in his presence. He keeps always close by her side when on duty, and his favorite resting place is the Queen's chair, of which, when he obtains possession, he holds at pleasure. Should Her Majesty happen to appropriate it to her own use during "Sharp's" absence, he quietly jumps up behind and makes room for himself at his Royal Mistress's back, but like a trusty sentinel he keeps watch and ward with ceaseless vigilance, and in virtue thereof sleeps with one eye open.
