LONDON, Sept. 19.—This is often called a "war of attrition" against Germany. The full meaning of the term is disclosed by the following list of casualties among the infantry of the Prussian Guard in May and June.

Article That Will Enlighten Public Here as to This Subject.

So much speculation has been heard on the subject of the proposed "billeting" of soldiers in Canada this winter, that it seems advisable to explain just what this would mean, and under what conditions it would be resorted to.

The figures show that during the two months when General von Mackensen fought his way from Dunajec to the San some 35 of his best infantry battalions lost on the average two-fifths of their strength.

MATTERS NOT YET DECIDED ANENT LOAN

New York, Sept. 25.—Members of the Anglo-French financial commission, who are bargaining for the best terms on which they may establish a half billion dollar credit here for Great Britain and France, observed the half-holiday to-day after a brief session, and prepared to leave the city over Sunday.

Before the next half holiday rolls round, it was the general expectation of bankers to-day, an agreement will have been reached over the details of the proposed loan. Tentative proposals at present fix the maximum at $500,000,000 with the possibility that the sum may be lower.

Whether negotiations had reached a point where an actual program had been placed before the British and French governments for approval and French governments for approval was a matter on which Wall Street speculated to-day. One banker was quoted as having said that such was the case. Another, presumably equally well informed, asserted that nothing had been finally decided, and that until all details were agreed to, it could not be accurately stated that any had been settled.

WOMEN'S PATRIOTIC LEAGUE

Annual Reports are Given Out; Good Progress.

Interesting reports covering the past year's work were submitted by Mrs. W. C. Livingston, president, Miss Taylor in charge of the rooms, and Mrs. Watt, financial committee convener, at the annual meeting of Women's Patriotic League on Wednesday last.

The reports follow:
PRESIDENT'S REPORT
In presenting the first annual report of the Women's Patriotic League, one must earnestly pray that it may be the last annual report. Mr. Little, a year ago, when the local office in the new society, stated that their services would not be required for more than six months. The work has become so extensive that I find it very difficult to give a comprehensive report in a short review.

BERT INGLIS THE MEN'S MEN 102 DADHOUSE ST.

This raising of money became very wearing and the suggestion of Miss Hollinrake, our committee convener, a house-to-house canvas. There were many willing canvassers, who all spoke of the cordial way they were met by the citizens.

Early in the fall our hearts were all touched with the Belgian situation and a call for clothing, both new and old brought forth a most generous donation. Since then a consignment of condensed milk, for the Belgian babies and a shower of canned goods for the Belgian soldiers have been sent.

Our wool committee has had an arduous year. The difficulty of getting many branches of work open to us who stay at home is a great need. Peace. Many of the brave men who left with the first contingent, have lost their lives in France and many are now returning wounded and maimed for life. Can we not even put forth greater efforts than we have yet done in their behalf?

Through the kindness of Mr. Burt and the board of the Collegiate Institute we are given the use of the assembly hall free of charge, until the weather becomes so cold that the Y. M. C. A. opened their hospitable doors to us, as they have done to all branches of patriotic work since the war began.

Before bringing my report to an end, I wish to move a hearty vote of thanks to Mrs. Taylor, who has undertaken to make up a cup of tea every Tuesday and Friday afternoon. To her and the social committee of the meetings, This has become some task as our meetings are so large just now.

I trust that you will give the committee officers, who will be nominated for the coming year, the same splendid support that you have given us in the past.
Charlotte Livingston President.

everything we did undertake was carried through with a more or less substantial balance.
Our first venture was the publishing of a "Woman's Expositor," which was suggested by Mr. T. H. Preston, and which through his constant kindness and material assistance became a accomplished fact, netting us a little over $300.00. Then the proceeds of the 2nd Children's Concert were offered us if the Finance Committee would become responsible. Following this came the Carnival at the Alfred St. Rink in February, the Patriotic Tea in March and Prof. Leacock's lecture in June, the latter netting $228.00, half of which was sent to the Franco-British Relief Society.
Though all these efforts were a success financially, we were all becoming rather weary of always having to plan something to get money for the next month. Miss Hollinrake brought in a suggestion which she had given her in Toronto, of a house to house canvas, asking the citizens to pledge themselves to give so much a month for six months for Red Cross purposes, and we would pledge ourselves to give anything in aid of the Red Cross in the meantime. This committee discussed the plan fully, readily adopted it, and brought it before the League. We met with much encouragement and "The Red Cross Campaign" was launched. A large number of volunteers faithfully canvassed the entire city, and in almost every case were met most graciously by the citizens. The response was most generous and encouraging as the result gives us about $500.00 a month. Of this it was decided to send $100.00 a month to the Red Cross Society headquarters in Toronto to be spent in medical and surgical supplies, which we could not purchase profitably either here or elsewhere, but which they spend in England in the most advantageous way. The remainder is used for the purchase of gauze, absorbent cotton, and various other things necessary for the numerous surgical dressings made each week in our rooms. We fear we may have to ask the citizens for a further continuance of their pledges for another six months, as there seems at present to be no hope of "a lasting peace" being near at hand.
All of which is respectfully submitted.
Margaret C. Watt, Convener of Finance Committee

Submarine Dreadnought on Which Experts Are at Work.

© 1915 BY N.Y. HERALD CO.

This submarine will have large guns intended for long range fighting. As the submarine has no fighting masts, the range finders will be in aeroplanes at a considerable height, connected with the submarine by wireless. Americans are already at work on this idea. The big guns will not be in the interior of the ship, but will be on the superstructure and will be in self-bailing structures, with light armored gun shields over them. Smaller guns for defence against aeroplanes will be carried. The submarines will be much larger and heavier than the present type. The recent discovery both in the United States and in Europe of steel that will not corrode in water has made it possible to submerge the guns with the bomb without rusting the guns. This does away with the heavy, complicated gun carriages and strengthens the ship. At present one of the greatest difficulties the navy has to contend with is the periscope, but when the telescope makers really tackle this comparatively, as they are beginning to, the periscope will arrive. Engines are at hand, and the rest is easy, at least comparatively so.

BULGARIAN GENERAL SAYS TURKS SAFE

Thinks British and French Are Unprepared for Attack on Dardanelles.

SPECIAL DISPATCH, BERLIN, Sept. 25.

Under a Sofia date the Prazer Tagblatt prints an interview with General Kovatchev, commander of the Fourth Bulgarian army, who during the Balkan war distinguished himself at the battle of Bular. He gives his views of the Russian retreat. "The Russian army is at present so situated," said General Kovatchev, "that there is little chance of it taking the offensive again for some time. To my mind the principal reason for the Russian defeat was lack of strategy on the part of the commanders, the scarcity of officers and ammunition, and the incapacity of the average Russian soldier. Another important factor is the lack of harmony among Russian commanders and their failure to co-operate with their English, French and Italian allies. They went ahead with the campaign without any proper consultation with their allies. I am convinced that if the Entente allies had only conducted an offensive campaign against Serbia with the object of establishing a connection with Constantinople there will be no chance of the Balkan States entering the war against them.

"The Dardanelles are now the chief theatre of war, and events have shown clearly that the British and French there are actively unprepared to combat successfully their Turkish adversaries. The operations thus far have been a failure. The British and French will have to effect a landing at the point which was our objective during the Balkan war. The Dardanelles constitute the key to the whole situation, which the Allies must obtain at any sacrifice, no matter how great. However, it appears to be almost too late now, as the Turks are so strongly entrenched as to make success against them almost impossible."

AN OAK TAUBE FOR FAIL-DRIVING USE

SPECIAL DISPATCH, BERLIN, Sept. 25.

All kinds of statues and monuments have been erected in the cities and towns of Germany in commemoration of the great war, among them Hindenburg statues without number, big iron crosses and knights and soldiers in wood, in which knights can be driven to a far greater degree than even Belgium saw France and England at Liege last year. It is no exaggeration to say that the people have trusted their rulers and their governments, and that their statesmen, for the most part, subordinating personal ambitions to the desire for the country's industrial development, have deserved well of it almost overnight, having discovered that being an appendage of Austria was unprofitable and reactionary. Thirty-three years of pipe-dreaming came to an end. Therefore, since 1911, Roumania has leaned toward her natural relatives in Macedonia suffering tortures not pay Roumania in 1912.

ROUMANIA, 'GENDARME OF BALKANS,' NOT LIKELY TO REMAIN NEUTRAL

Stopped the Last Balkan War in 1912 by Show of Force and Got the Dobrudja Province, Promised Her in 1878, and Has No Love for Teutons or Bulgaria.

(By a Student of the Balkans.)

Diplomats of all countries, neutral as well as belligerent, are watching anxiously the third struggle between Latin and Teuton that has begun since Austria's ultimatum to Serbia. This third struggle is between Roumania and Bulgaria; the earlier two were, of course, that between Mr. Camdon and Prince Nicholas in London and that between Prince von Buelow and Baron Sominia in Rome. In both the earlier struggles the German protagonist failed in his endeavor. What will result from the present encounter?

Such lack of affection as exists between Roumania and her neighbor, Bulgaria, is no mere difference caused by proximity. To be sure, the Bulgarians chafe dismally about the fruits of victory being snatched from them by the treaty of Bucharest in August, 1913; but it is an old fact that Roumania asks nothing from Bulgaria and covets no possession of her neighbor. All that she wants is a square deal. And if a Roumanian talks rather cynically about his country's hopes of ever getting a square deal from Bulgaria one must remember that his cynicism is not without some reason.

A fruitful, generous country sustains a easily governed population as a rule, and to this axiom Roumania is no exception. Her last participation in actual warfare was in 1878, when her troops defeated Osman Pacha at Plewna, saved Russia from the Turk to a far greater degree than even Belgium saved France and England at Liege last year. It is no exaggeration to say that the people have trusted their rulers and their governments, and that their statesmen, for the most part, subordinating personal ambitions to the desire for the country's industrial development, have deserved well of it almost overnight, having discovered that being an appendage of Austria was unprofitable and reactionary. Thirty-three years of pipe-dreaming came to an end. Therefore, since 1911, Roumania has leaned toward her natural relatives in Macedonia suffering tortures not pay Roumania in 1912.

Now, above all nations, it was Bulgaria which was responsible for that change. At the conference of Berlin, in 1878, which settled peace between Russia and Turkey, Roumania was forced to give up her rich productive vineyards of Bessarabia—because that province was strategically necessary to Russia, and rights for the Little States, in the eyes of Bismarck, who presided at that conference, were about as real as dreams of Elysium—and to accept in exchange the small Dobrudja province, marshy, sandy and utterly infertile, which was to be handed over by the newly created State of Bulgaria, envisaged to Turkey by the treaty of the conference.

No Bulgarian statesman has ever explained why Bulgaria did not hand over the Dobrudja, as the treaty stipulated; but the conference had done its work, signed its treaty and gone away and that Bulgaria's dishonored acceptance was never met; it was the Balkan prodigal to Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg's "scrap of paper."

It may well be imagined that staring hard for thirty years at a broken promise to wavers, then to a far greater indignation Roumania with no kinder feelings toward Bulgaria as time went on. And yet the desolate Dobrudja was not worth a war. Nor was the Concert of Europe vastly concerned by Roumania's grievance. To the Concert, indeed, it was as academic as somebody else's toothache. Roumania was incensed against Russia, which had snatched away from Austria to act the part of the big brother; for one thing, such attitude kept the awkward question of Transylvania quiet. Public opinion in Roumania began to waver, then to alter. And then came the Balkan War of 1912. At this point a bit of secret diplomatic history is worth recording. The present writer was in Bucharest in September, 1912, when the war between Bulgaria, Greece, Montenegro and Serbia on the one side and Turkey on the other was begun by the withdrawal of the Montenegrin Minister from Constantinople. Three months previously it was known to a few, but never chronicled, that King Ferdinand of Bulgaria had privately met King Carol at Sinia to obtain Roumania's promise of neutrality in the forthcoming war. King Carol, consulted by his Ministers, agreed, subject to King Ferdinand's assurance, readily enough, given that the war was to involve no territorial acquisition for any of the Balkan League, but was to be in the line of the amelioration of the Christians in Macedonia suffering tortures not pay Roumania in 1912.

Under the Moslem heel. When the Turks fell back at Lule Burgas and Kiri Kilisse as the result of German army contractors' plundering in ammunition and their own Young Turks' backslashed, the Bulgarians decided that they would like to keep the land they had won in the fighting. I make no doubt that King Ferdinand was quite sincere in June, 1912, but six months later Dr. Daneff had his act and Gnesloff, with his English commercial training and his notions of playing fair, had been deposed. Viewing the change of mind, seeing themselves being hoodwinked again by another Power, the third time in thirty-five years, Roumania's army was mobilized and strolled casually, like a lot of gamblers, into Bulgaria while that unhappy land was engaged in fighting Greece and Serbia.

Not without some irony, in reply to King Ferdinand's protests, King Carol refused to regard the march of his own army as a military maneuver; his attitude earned him the sobriquet of the "Gendarme of the Balkans." The Roumanian army fired not a shot, but King Carol made the warring States compose their differences, and the treaty of Bucharest was signed and sealed in a fortnight. Incidentally, the Roumanians of the Dobrudja, a little State, after all this waiting, and King Ferdinand got another Prime Minister. In less healthy countries Dr. Daneff would have had a fatal accident for making a fool of his royal master.

It will be seen from this chronicle that the conflict is between two opposing schools of thought, alike different in diplomacy and strategy. Like the Germans, the Bulgarians believe in shock tactics, in using all the strength at the beginning, and keeping up the effort until somebody is winded. Like his German relatives, King Ferdinand is apt to allow principle to wait on expediency. Like the French, from whose ancestors, the Latins, they also spring, the Roumanians have long memories and they believe in using a reserve force quite swiftly at the right moment. In common, too, with the French, they have the intuition which tells them when that moment has arrived. As a prophesy regarding what Roumania's course will be in this war, it would seem to one accustomed to their methods of thought that even if they are not attacked by their gentle Teuton friends with the object of seeing that ammunition shall go through their neutral hands when that moment has arrived, they will probably well remember that in the Balkan League, but was to be in the line of the amelioration of the Christians in Macedonia suffering tortures not pay Roumania in 1912.

HAS CONFIDENCE IN FRENCH GENERAL

Views Expressed by Colonel Barone, the Well-Known Italian Military Critic.

SPECIAL DISPATCH, PARIS, Sept. 25.

Great confidence in the military situation on the western front and in the ability of General Joffre and the high French command is expressed by Colonel Barone, the Italian military critic, in an article which has just appeared in the "Preparazione." After having paid a visit to the French lines and having examined the trenches and the positions where the most furious fighting has taken place, Colonel Barone is convinced that the supreme French command will adopt the offensive directly at the opportune moment arrives, and that then, "despite the great difficulties to be overcome, the action will be continuous, with the probabilities of victory all in favor of France."

Colonel Barone considers that both in the first line trenches and in the second-line defenses the French troops are admirably trained; that an excellent understanding exists between them and their officers, and that both the newly joined recruits and the seasoned campaigners are full of confidence and ardor. In these circumstances, he is convinced of a final victory, and is prepared to make any sacrifice.

Colonel Barone has reason to believe that a very different spirit prevails among the German troops. The Germans have been obliged to reduce their garrisons in Belgium and on the western front, and their troops are convinced that very few of them will ever return to Germany. The number of desertions is increasing daily, a fact which he regards as peculiarly significant. In these circumstances and also in view of the fact that the Germans are wasting their forces in Russia, he feels sure that the German Titan will soon be at his last gasp.

BOTTLE WITH MESSAGE FROM THE BLUECHER

SPECIAL DISPATCH, BERLIN, Sept. 25.

The Danziger Zeitung reports that a bottle was cast up on the beach at Stolmuende in which was enclosed a paper with the following message, evidently written in haste: "A last word from S. M. S. Bluecher, Lieutenant von Gersdorf. My parents live at Bahnhofsstrasse, Hamburg. Kindly send this to them." As the Bluecher was sunk by the British North Sea last January this bottle had travelled hundreds of miles. It followed the North Sea current eastward, then made a voyage around Denmark and into the Baltic, finally being cast up at Stolmuende. The vessel, which was the German liner, was captured by the British in the North Sea. The vessel was captured by the British in the North Sea. Correspondent Writes That in the Greek the Allies Seem Far Off.

ENTENTE ALLIES ARE FAR AND IMPOSING

Great Worry of Greeks, However, Sympathize with England and France.

SPECIAL DISPATCH, LONDON, Sept. 25.

The view of the war and her desire to take part in the great conflict is the subject of a letter from an Athens correspondent, who writes that the people here are by no means "entirely" convinced of the certainty of a victory of the Allies over the Central Powers and their military achievements of the last few months. "The German armies," he says, "look formidable when viewed from this distance, and the possibility of a breakthrough through Serbia or Rumania, thus creating an unbroken line from Berlin through Vienna and Budapest to Constantinople, is one which must necessarily be the gravest misgivings in the minds of the patriotic Greeks.

In some circles, therefore, it is argued that Greece would be running very great risks in taking sides against the German Powers and Turkey, who, after their successes in other directions and after establishing their supremacy over the remainder of the Balkan Peninsula, would probably turn and crush the Hellenic kingdom. At such moments, when the furious Greek regards the prospect of a German, Austrian, Hungarian and Turkish advance being through the neighboring States, England and France and Russia seem very far away indeed, and the persistent efforts made in Greece to magnify German successes add to the reluctance to intervene in the struggle of giants.

"If this feeling in Greece, which can also be found in other neutral and non-aligned countries, were fully understood by the Allies and not ignored as one of the unpleasant factors of the general situation, and if a clearer perception of this frame of mind had existed at the beginning of the year, the mistakes made in connection with the initiation of the Dardanelles operations might well have been avoided.

"The doubts which exist regarding the outcome of the war are very largely due to the organized German propaganda carried on so thoroughly since the beginning of the conflict to influence Greek public opinion. This propaganda is similar to that conducted in Austria, Hungary, the Scandinavian countries and elsewhere. There are some features of it especially adapted to Greek conditions, contemplating the effort put forth to influence the Greek press and to impress Greek public opinion. It is worthy of note that almost openly anti-Turkish and anti-German propaganda has been carried on in the Chamber of Deputies, and German propaganda has been more or less repeated in America and Holland, and in these places, and the historical and the great sympathy for England is the most important factor in counteracting the German propaganda. Every Greek who is a child to the part played by English sympathizers in the struggle which the Allies have created.

But the long and friendly relations of the century-old sympathy have been somewhat in some degree by certain events which occurred here in the early part of the year, when Greece was on the verge of declaring war against Turkey in connection with the Dardanelles, there was a remarkable demonstration of sympathy with the Allies on the part of a number of the public men, and a number of resolutions and support, signed by members of the cabinet and other prominent men, was given in London, as well as the support of Great Britain.

The evacuation, created by the well-known unhappy protestations of the Hellenic people, was in many circles in Greece regarded as the actual as well as the support of Great Britain. HESTER, AND A LEGACY

On the third morning the answer came—the conditions were accepted. Lord Lynnouth did not write to her again as she had half expected that he would, and she only heard through the lawyers that he had agreed to do what she had suggested. Whatever feelings of resentment, pride, and unrequited love rose up and possessed her at this moment of what seemed to her but common courtesy, they were not allowed to appear on the surface, and she talked and laughed with Nancy, and entered into all the arrangements for moving into the country with apparently as keen an interest as if she had been the heart-whole, happy girl she pretended to be.

Mrs. Vavasour also wrote urging her to accept the offer she had made at Lynnouth Chase, since she intended to winter abroad. Mrs. Philips saw no objection to her daughter taking the post. And, as for Hester, since she still meant to work for her living she felt that the companionship to Mrs. Vavasour, though less as it would be, was to be handsomely paid, and that the complete change of scene in other lands would be the best thing for her much-tried health and spirits. So that at the end of three weeks she joined that lady in London and they travelled together to Rome, where Mrs. Vavasour meant to spend the greater part of the winter.

Through all the change of scene and surroundings of the next six months Hester did her best to forget Lord Lynnouth and get over the infatuation that had possessed her. She succeeded to some extent—that is to say, the first acute pangs of the "madly" being over, she settled down to the fact that he had gone out of her life for ever, and made the best of the things as they were. She did not always succeed, it is true; there were moments when the old longing rose up and her heart ached as sorely as ever. But she got through them somehow, and took up the burden of her life again with a quiet courage that slowly but surely added strength to her whole character.

They were back in London for the season next spring, and Hester had begun to wonder whether it was wise for her to remain with Mrs. Vavasour now that there was a chance of meeting Lord Lynnouth. By means of a little skilful questioning she succeeded in dragging from his cousin the information that he was "in Egypt or somewhere" and he stayed so long, comparatively at ease on that point she settled down until the danger should threaten her more nearly.

One afternoon Mrs. Vavasour's bell rang sharply and Hester rose from her letter-writing and went into her room. She found her reclining on a couch near the open window of her bedroom, through which came the roar and rattle of London streets. She was dressed in her morning gown, and was supported by a pillow and soft silk cushions of artistic colors. On a table at her side stood smelling-salts, a bowl of rice and some grapes. It was evident that the lady was in severe suffering on the day in question. She opened her eyes slightly as Hester entered the room, and said in a faint voice—

"Madame Victorine promised my dress by 'What an idea!' exclaimed Mrs. Vavasour, 'I could not possibly do without you now that I no longer have Kate. I wouldn't travel alone with Elsie for worlds! She would make the stupidest mistakes, and I doubt if we should ever arrive at all. The luggage would be lost for me. I know, and then when I left again she would pack abominably and all my things would look like rags. No, I cannot possibly do without you. If Kate had been with me it would have been different. Besides, Lady Montague especially mentioned you, and said that I could bring you if I liked, as she had room for everybody.'"

They passed on up the Row, and Hester turned back and made her way to a seat in the shade of the trees. She sat down on the seat and stared across the grass to the water in the distance, where groups of little children, in charge of their nursemaids, were sailing boats and feeding the ducks. But she saw nothing of the green stretch before her; her mind was revolving between two pictures—the one she had just seen of the riders in the Row, and the other of Lord Lynnouth's words and actions when she had seen him last eight months ago. Yes, it was only eight months since they had met, yet it might have been eight years, so long the time had seemed and so much had been crowded into it. During the time she had been eight months she had day by day and hour by hour drilled her memories into oblivion, and now in a moment the hard work of all those days and hours was swept away.

A glance at the well-remembered features had brought back all the old intensity of feeling—resentment, jealousy, pain, and whatever else may have lurked in her heart under protest. The years of her life at Lynnouth had been packed into her mind with a vividness that was painful. She was not cured, that was evident; and, unless she wished the "madly" to return in full force, she must put herself out of the way of these chance views of him and of an even more dangerous meeting. Mrs. Vavasour was his cousin, and although he was not particularly attached to her society, a meeting was possible at any time, and she must no longer safely "in Egypt or somewhere," but in London, Hester made up her mind that she must leave her present situation as soon as she could.

When she rose to go home she felt as tired as if she had been walking for many miles. She went slowly, with a dull, dead weight at her heart; the sunshine no longer seemed lovely in her eyes, but effusive in its intense glare, and the gaiety of the people was a mockery in the midst of the sadness of life. When she got back home she found Mrs. Vavasour wide awake and apparently perfectly recovered.

"Who do you think has been here?" she exclaimed, anxiously waiting for a reply. "My cousin Dudley! He looks so well, so sunburnt and handsome! He is just back from Egypt for the wedding. I am so glad he is going too; I was afraid he would not be back for it. And he stayed so long—quite an hour, I think. What made you so late? I thought you would have been back hours ago."

"It was such a lovely afternoon that I was tempted to sit down in the Park a little while. I thought you would not want me as you were so busy." "I should have preferred to have you here. But now you are back, you may as well begin to pack at once. What did Madame Victorine say about my dress?"

Hester gave all information and began to fold and pack as directed. "Do you think you could do without me at Woodville during the wedding?" she said suddenly and abruptly, as she folded a long silk gown into precise folds. "I don't think I shall be needed at all, and I should be very glad to go home for a few days."

"What an idea!" exclaimed Mrs. Vavasour, "I could not possibly do without you now that I no longer have Kate. I wouldn't travel alone with Elsie for worlds! She would make the stupidest mistakes, and I doubt if we should ever arrive at all. The luggage would be lost for me. I know, and then when I left again she would pack abominably and all my things would look like rags. No, I cannot possibly do without you. If Kate had been with me it would have been different. Besides, Lady Montague especially mentioned you, and said that I could bring you if I liked, as she had room for everybody."

Hester's lips compressed themselves just as she felt a self-restraint as she bent over the trunk. "My invalid sister is not well," she said, "and I thought you might spare me while you are at Woodville." "No, I really cannot. I want you more there than at home. It is most unreasonable to think of such a thing," exclaimed Mrs. Vavasour fretfully. "As for your sister, she is always ill, and I don't suppose she is any worse than usual." And she ran on with a long string of reasons, reproaches, and lamentations.

open, and Hester could see in it a faint resemblance to Lynnouth Hall. As they drove up to the door they passed a man and a girl in a pretty summer dress chatting together on a seat among the trees at the side of the avenue; another couple was sauntering across the lawn, a third was just emerging from one of the ground floor windows, a fourth was disappearing in the direction of the lake. The mischief and heart-breaking that were sure to be going on among them all were pitiful to think of, but, judging merely by appearances, it all looked nice and inviting enough.

Old Lady Montague came out into the hall to welcome the new-comers and spoke very kindly to Hester. "I am so glad you have come, Miss Philips," she said. "I wanted particularly to number you among my guests. I can never forget how kind you were to my poor sister, Lady Lynnouth."

Hester was considerably astonished at this unexpected show of hospitality and would have been still more so had she known that it had been offered her chiefly at Lord Lynnouth's instigation. "He was glad that Miss Philips was coming, he had told his aunt, as he hoped she would have an opportunity of showing her some of the respect and admiration he felt for her; she had behaved as few women would have done over that unpleasant affair of the will; it was indeed owing to her generosity that he possessed Lynnouth Chase at all, and considering all things, might it not be as well if he took her into dinner once or twice? It would be a little attention on his part which he was sure she would feel that Miss Philips deserved."
