Poetry

THE SWELL ABOUT TOWN.

AIR.—"THE JOLLY YOUNG WATERMAN."

One night, when the moonlight so soft and so tender

Was beaming o'er mountain, o'er strand, and o'er dell,

A mother was warning her child at the feeder,

When Polly ran off with "a desperate swell."

And Polly, like a hawk, in the dark, on the ocean,

"Mined stays," and was wreck'd on "the cold flinty rock."

"Mangled the childer at home was the deuce's commotion,

And the mother had had her to die with the shock."

Oh! ladies, beware of "the swell of the water,"

They are very much gayer to drench or to draw;

But remember, ye mothers, with growing-up daughters,

These are innocent swells to "the swells about town."

And a Miss may be missed from men stay and her pillow,

And a Miss may be missed from a series of ways,

They're swells about town always dressed with taste,

White shirt and spence eravat, bright boots and tight coat,

He tempts all the damsels to hang round his waist, ma'am,

Flow smoothly enough with the dear little heels,

But from dress of the swell of the water will vary

From green to sky blue, and from white to dull

He's as dandy as a spangly, contrary and airy,

But less dangerous far than the swell about town.

Remember then, mothers, that pilots for ever

Must "keep a look out" at the helm for a squall,

And that daughters, though ye may be cunning

Will venture near swells, and are likely to fall;

The current of life may from fifteen to twenty

Flow smoothly enough with the dear little heels,

But after that age, 'twill be told you by plenty,

They're frequently followed by "desperate swells."

THE SOLITARY FRIEND.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR.

I think it will not be more than twelve years—it may be thirteen—since the Jacob Morgan, a ship of seven hundred tons burden, sailed from Brunswick, Georgia, bound for the East Indies. She was a noble ship, but if we believe the assertion of one who sailed in her, she was built for misfortune. She was launched from her stocks at mid-day but yet the moon was seen in the heavens, when she gave her first impress to the salt water. Several years subsequent to the period when our story opens she was driven upon one of the Martyr's Reefs, and her ill-fated timbers were strewn upon the sands of Florida.

At the time of which we write the Jacob Morgan was commanded by Capt. Ben Wallace, a powerful broad chested man, but as kind and considerate as he was fearless and strong. Seamen were scarce, and the ship's crew were obtained with great difficulty, and under the circumstances men had been hired who would otherwise have been contemptibly rejected. The ship had been six days out when the first mate, Mr. Gwynn, from Providence, R. I., was suddenly taken sick, and on the next day his lifeless clay was consigned to the deep grave of the blue Atlantic.

This untimely event left Captain Wallace in a critical situation. Nat Faulkner, his second mate, was by no means qualified for the office, nor would he have taken the responsibility had the Captain desired it. There was but one man in the ship who possessed sufficient knowledge of seamanship for the mate's berth, and though Wallace found that to him he must give the office, yet he did so with many misgivings. This man's name was Tom Roland, haughty and overbearing in his disposition, seeming by his general conduct to have been in the habit of commanding, rather than obeying, on shipboard, and who had already begun to exercise a sort of control over the crew. But the case was one of necessity, and Tom Roland was installed into the office of first mate; and quartered in the cabin.

For several weeks things passed on extremely well. Roland proved to be a thorough seaman, a finished seaman, and a ready and efficient officer; and Captain Wallace began to think that his misgivings were entirely groundless. Over the crew, Roland had a most thorough control, and even those men who had evinced towards the captain marks of insubordination, moved without a murmur at the slightest beck of the mate.

One morning when Captain Wallace and his second mate had the morning watch, they both kept the deck while Roland had finished his breakfast, and when the latter took his watch below. When they reached the cabin, Mr. Russell the supercargo, was just rising from the table, and taking a book from the head of his berth, sat down upon a stool at the foot of the ladder and commenced reading. He possessed a few observations upon the weather, as the captain and his second mate took their seats at the table, and then went on with his reading.—Some five minutes had passed, when Wal-lack and Faulkner were started by a sudden exclamation of pain from the supercargo, and on turning they saw he had dropped his book, and sat with both hands pressed upon his stomach, while his features had assumed a livid hue, expressive of the most acute suffering. The captain sprang quickly from the table, and laying his hand upon the sufferer's shoulder, he exclaimed: "What is the matter, Mr. Russell?"

"O, God! I don't know. Here it is! I burn!" uttered the supercargo, as he pressed his hands harder upon his stomach.

"What have you been eating? What have you been drinking?" asked Wallace in a frenzy of anxiety.

"Nothing, nothing. Oh oh!" groined the poor fellow.

Wallace cast a trembling glance at his second mate, and for a moment they both remained silent.

"It's strange," at length uttered Faulkner, "poor Gwynn was taken in exactly the same way."

The captain made no reply, but his countenance wore a strange shade of doubt and suspicion, as he gazed upon the tortured features of the supercargo.

That night the broad Atlantic rolled its ceaseless waves over another of the ships company. Mr. Russell had breathed his last. Capt Wallace and Nat Faulkner had the last dog watch. Roland had gone down into the cabin, while the foremost hands, with the exception of the man at the wheel, were forward.

The captain paced the quarter deck in a thoughtful, troubled mood, ever and anon casting his eye toward the cabin companion way, where his first mate had disappeared a short time before, and then turned his gaze to the forecastle where the men were congregated.—Faulkner was by the wheel and several times as the captain approached him in his walks, did he start to join him, but a fearful suspicion kept him back, and until the watch was changed neither he nor Wallace spoke a word, save such as related to the management of the ship. At 8 o'clock Roland came on deck for the first watch. The ship was upon the starboard tack, close hauled upon the wind, and just able to stand upon her course.

As Capt. Wallace gave up the deck, he requested the mate, if the wind should haul round to the eastward any, to call him.—Roland replied kindly that he would, but beneath the half-curling smile that rested upon his features, the captain thought he could detect a lurking spirit of evil. He let not a shadow of his doubt manifest itself upon his countenance, but with a bland frankness he wished his mate a pleasant watch, and then went below.

"Faulkner," said the captain, as he turned a furtive glance at the head of the ladder, "let not a word escape you, unless it be of common place affairs, until we have turned into our berths; but keep your weather eye open and follow my movements."

Faulkner did not start at this request, for the same thoughts seemed to be passing in his own mind.

"Let's see," said the captain in a tone loud enough to be heard on deck, "I must run over my reckoning before I turn in, Mr. Faulkner just hand me that chart, if you please."

As Wallace spoke he reached over into his berth and took out his pistols, which he proceeded carefully to load, taking care the while that his back was turned towards the companion-way. Faulkner followed his example, and ere long the candles were extinguished, and the two men retired, but not however, to sleep.

"Faulkner," whispered the captain, "we're in a snug fix, for I have reason to believe that there is mutiny on board. Gwynn and Russell have both been poisoned."

"So I believe," returned Faulkner, in the same low tone, "and if I'm not mistaken, there'll be poison in our coffee-cup to-morrow morning."

"Ha! have you seen anything?"

"Yes, I saw Roland give the cook a small paper to-night, and they held quite an earnest conversation about it. I knew from their manner that there was mischief in their minds."

"Then in God's name, what shall we do?" uttered the captain. "Their plans must be all formed, and I suppose they have made arrangements for the disposition of those in the forecastle who do not join them.—Would to Heaven I knew how many of them there are."

"You have a passage between the decks to the forecastle bulkheads," suggested Faulkner.

"Yes."

"Perhaps you might gain some information by listening."

"No. If Roland leads the plot and I know he does—he would not dre to carry on his conversation upon the subject there for the rest would hear him."

He bent his head from the bunk, and caught the following word, which he knew to be from the lips of Roland:

"They are both asleep before this time,

Hal, You look out for the deck a few minutes while I see the boys in the forecastle."

"He's going to the forecastle, whitey, ed Faulkner. 'Now's your time to follow him."

"No you had better go, Faulkner, for it may be that some one will come down to see me, and in that case our knowledge would be discovered. There's mutiny and so mistake. You know where the passage runs between the boxes; just abait the mainmast it takes a short turn to starboard, and follows along the choke down to the tanks. Slip out from your berth, and go over to where the supercargo used to bunk, and move that panel. It moves easier than mass does."

Faulkner lost no time in obeying the captain's directions. There were two secret communications to the hold of the ship through the cabin bulkhead, and through one of these the second mate soon made his way. Nearly half an hour elapsed ere he returned, and during that time the Captain's mind was tortured by various fearful emotions. Until the death of Russell, he had not held a suspicion of direct mutiny, and his former fears with regard to Roland and his former fears with regard to Roland had nearly been quieted, but now the suspicion had been sudden, and it was strong even to the very certainty. A thousand little instances came back to his mind which, singly, had appeared as nothing, but which now helped to solve the mystery of Gwynn's death: Wallace had medical knowledge enough to know that his supercargo had been killed with white arsenic, and he now knew that his first mate had come to his end in the same way, though the dose of the latter must have been much smaller than that which had sent poor Russell to his untimely end, and his symptoms had not been so palpable.

While the captain lay thus racking his brain, Faulkner returned to his cabin, and as he crept stealthily past the foot of the bunk, Wallace fancied he could hear his heart as it beat in his bosom.

"What news? asked the captain almost a ruid to put the question.

"We are lost—lost!" uttered Faulkner, as he clasped his hands in silent agony.

"Lost!" reiterated the captain. "No, no, that cannot be. Some of them will surely help us."
