The house met at four o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at four o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (5:20 p.m.)

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

As my words are being broadcast throughout Canada I should like to begin on a personal note. I want to say that I am deeply conscious of the possibilities for good for Canada of my new office and duty—that which brings me here today to open the Centennial Session of Parliament. May I renew my pledge at the ceremony of Installation: that my sole purpose and effort will be to merit the confidence which had been reposed in me by Her Majesty our Queen on the advice of her Canadian Ministers and by the countless Canadians from every region who have so freely offered their good wishes. My wife and I are deeply grateful for such messages and greatly encouraged by them.

On this occasion we feel again the sadness of our loss in the recent death of His Excellency General Georges Vanier, my much beloved predecessor. His courageous and lifelong devotion to all that is good and honourable sets an example to inspire all Canadians.

The careers of my two distinguished Canadian predecessors have added to the traditional and constitutional functions of the Governor General as the representative of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada, that of representing the Canadian people in a broad range of their activities and attitudes. In this role I shall try to encourage the best features of our national life, in all its diversity, and to symbolize the unity and continuity of the Canadian people as expressed in their federal institutions.

With you, I look forward this summer to the visit of Her Majesty the Queen and other members of the Royal Family. The presence of our Sovereign and the Heads of State of other countries will bring added joy and festivity to our land as it celebrates the centennial of its Confederation.

This Centennial Session of Parliament provides an opportunity to begin to give effect to our aspirations for the second century of Confederation.

The weak colonies joined together in 1867 have grown today into a prosperous and dynamic country. That so much could have been accomplished in the face of great difficulties is a tribute to the courage, determination and faith in human progress of countless Canadian men and women of all origins. It is also a tribute to the wisdom and foresight of the Fathers of Confederation who created the constitutional framework without which much of this progress would have been impossible.

Our country was not founded in 1867. It is far more deeply rooted in time than that. But, one hundred years ago, our predecessors—men of many races, creeds and tongues—embarked upon a great exercise in statecraft of which we, today, are the trustees. They laid the foundations. They anchored them in a fundamental sense of unity that generations of conflict had taught was vital to the common weal. With this realization they erected a structure of government for the freedom, welfare, and prosperity of all who might come in time to inhabit this land. They built according to a federal plan because they knew that unity, with cultural and regional diversity could be harnessed to a positive and enriching rôle in no other way.

The concept of Confederation was a call to Canadians to occupy and develop half a continent. In terms of physical effort, it demanded constructive work of a magnitude and in the face of obstacles never before tackled anywhere in the world. In terms of intellectual endeavour, it required the revolutionary application of federal arrangements to a parliamentary system in a sparsely populated country of enormous area.

The path of Confederation has been beset with great difficulties—some natural, some inevitable and some of our own making. Succeeding generations of men and women, however, had the courage to overcome these difficulties and make possible the material and social progress we today enjoy. They had the conviction of their forefathers that a sense of basic unity alone would secure the preservation of both the individuality and the diversity which they cherished. They knew that, while Confederation could never be perfect, it was in the last analysis the mainstay of their various interests and that, while there would inevitably be occasional failures in the tolerance and understanding essential to our political system, a fundamental friendship between our people remained and could be relied upon. They knew, above all, that there was no difference of opinion so great, no misunderstanding so deep, that could prevent men of good will from repairing the particular in order to preserve the whole.

During the past one hundred years the world has changed beyond the recognition of anything within the experience of those who laid the foundations of Confederation. That our constitutional structure has endured and served so well the progress of our country is a measure of the basic soundness of its principles as well as the willingness of those concerned to adapt their application to changing needs and changing conditions.

It is in this spirit that the government has in recent years actively promoted the reform of detailed federal-provincial arrangements which, with the fundamental law, compose the constitutional structure of our country. Such reform includes improving procedures for federal-provincial consultation and coordination that are increasingly vital to the effective operation of modern government.

The government is aware of its unique responsibility to ensure that our fundamental law is readily adaptable to our changing social needs. It is also conscious that the advantages and disadvantages of the present constitutional structure are deeply intertwined. While orderly reform may well be the best way of preserving and strengthening our heritage, the most careful consideration must be given to what we do. Studies to obtain the best advice on this important matter are now underway with a view to subsequent consideration of the whole problem by Parliament.

It was possible to think, in 1867, of the public responsibility primarily in terms of state responsibility. The new challenges, which we must and will meet, require the involvement of the whole society and the efforts of all our people. In this time of fast-changing dimensions, the central concern of Canadian society must be the well-being of each individual, so that, regardless of his place or station at birth, he will have an equal chance to realize his full potential in the economic, social, political and cultural sense. A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

[Mr. Speaker.]

With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

During the first one hundred years of our Confederation we have been evolving, out of our bilingual and bicultural beginnings, an ideal of statehood that promises a new dimension of democracy: the dimension of social and cultural diversity within a political unity. Out of the two great cultural streams of our beginnings, we have evolved in Canada an independent statehood which has welcomed and been enriched by people of many other cultures. As we enter our second century of Confederation, we can take pride in a sense of purpose that, while taking account of our own national needs, also includes a unique capacity to contribute to the whole world community of man.

Today relations among industry, labour and governments at all levels are taking on a new significance. To maintain and improve Canada's economic strength it is necessary to exercise wisdom and restraint in our demands upon one another; to show a high degree of cooperation and a sense of responsibility in dealing with each other and with our respective institutions, including all levels of government.

The government is conducting a fundamental review of the many significant factors involved in the relationship between industry, labour and government. From this review, it will secure the best advice available in shaping new policies and determining the most effective day-to-day rôle for the federal government.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

As our Centennial Session opens, more Canadians are employed than ever before in our history. To ensure that jobs keep pace with the labour force, the capacity, quality and productivity of Canadian manufacturing industries must be increased. The government will take further appropriate measures to promote an environment in which industries can develop in the broad interests of the country, and promote increasing employment opportunities.

The government will also take special measures in particular designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized. While efforts by the government in this regard during recent years have met with a large measure of success, they are to be made even more effective. Parliament, therefore, will be invited to broaden the scope of the Area Development Incentive program and to provide increased funds for it. Continuing encouragement will be given to the work of the Atlantic Development Board in promoting industrial development in the Atlantic Region.

Our strong and dynamic economy has made possible a broad program of social security which is available to all Canadians. Social legislation in Canada has been advanced to a remarkable degree in recent years. This does not mean to imply that all our programs are complete. Improvements will be required, such as the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which Parliament will be invited to consider.

Parliament will also be asked to enact a measure further to assist Canadians when moving from their homes in order to obtain employment. This will be accompanied by administrative action to increase the effectiveness of Canadian manpower centres. A full service will be developed for counselling individuals looking for work and for helping all workers to take advantage of employment opportunities. At the same time the adult retraining program will be strengthened and, in consultation with the provinces, a number of pilot training projects will lay concrete plans for new approaches in manpower development.

While the government is conscious of the desirability of a greater degree of domestic control of our resources and our key industries it is also aware of the continuing importance of inflows of foreign investment in order to ensure an optimum development of the economy. To enable Canadians to gain a clearer understanding of these issues, a White Paper on this subject will be laid before Parliament.

The government attaches great importance to opening up new ways for the participation of our people in the ownership of our industrial institutions. You will therefore be asked to consider a bill to establish a Canada Development Corporation in order to further the industrial development and trade of this country by reinforcing the supply of Canadian equity capital ready to share the risks as well as the rewards of investment in Canadian business.

Federal-provincial cooperation through the Fund for Rural Economic Development will permit a major effort for regional planning for particular areas in Canada. Implementation of development projects in Northeastern New Brunswick, at Mactaquac in New Brunswick and the Interlake area of Manitoba will provide the Federal Government with tools of knowledge and experience for the benefit of other regions throughout the country. You will also be invited to approve the establishment, with the Government of Nova Scotia, of a Crown Corporation to phase out the uneconomic coal mining operations in Cape Breton, while creating alternative industrial employment.

Greater emphasis and encouragement, consistent with federal responsibilities, will be given to community development programs throughout Canada. In no case is the need for these more fully demonstrated than in the case of the Indians and Eskimos of Canada who face grave problems in their attempts to share the benefits and opportunities of our society. The government will therefore put before the Centennial Session amendments to the Indian Act and it will take other administrative measures to encourage the process of community development, for the benefit of the Indian and Eskimo people.

In foreign affairs Canada has put its major effort into the pursuit of peace. Our diplomacy aims at strengthening Canada's position in the councils of nations so as to work towards that world peace and stability that is the agreed objective of all sectors of public opinion in this country.

The most serious situation in the world today remains that in Vietnam. The government continues to attach the highest priority to initiatives designed to bring about a peaceful settlement of this conflict and we will continue to exert every effort to this end through diplomatic and other peaceful means. The government is prepared to cooperate in the establishment of an international presence in Vietnam to provide the assurances and guarantees which may have to form part of any settlement. We are also prepared to assist in the economic reconstruction and rehabilitation in that area once peace has been restored.

The government will also continue to press vigorously for effective international action in the field of disarmament. It regards curbing the nuclear arms race as a first and essential step on the road to general disarmament.

With these objectives in mind, Canada is joining with its NATO partners in a review of the future tasks of the alliance. Besides the changing requirements of collective defence, we will have in mind the progressively important political role which NATO has undertaken in the pursuit of a peaceful settlement in Europe.

The United Nations remains for Canada a major consideration in foreign policy. Until the end of 1968 Canada will have the responsibility of membership on the Security Council, and in that rôle the government will strive to strengthen the capacity of the United Nations fully to discharge its proper functions.

It is also expected that the "Kennedy Round" of International Trade and Tariff Negotiations will soon be completed in Geneva. In the light of its conclusions, you will be asked to approve changes in tariffs and related laws necessary to implement the undertakings Canada will give in order to gain improved access for Canadian products in export markets.

The government also intends to play an active part in the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, as it attaches great importance to the trade problems of less-developed countries.

Unless there is a concerted international endeavour to promote economic, technical and social advances in the developing countries, the world will soon face a major crisis. The advances painfully won by the nations of Asia, Africa and the Americas must not be lost through the lack of aid or through impediments to trade. Steps will be taken further to develop Canada's special relations with the Commonwealth countries of the Caribbean.

The government also intends to seek approval for a substantial increase in the external aid program, as a further step towards the aid target of one per cent of national income.

External aid, trade and the activities of a host of international agencies today bind the peoples of the world more closely together than ever before in human history. There is an international flavour to modern life that was unknown to all but a select few in years past, but which will become commonplace for people generally in the years ahead.

All this is dramatically demonstrated by Expo 67 which recently opened in Montreal and by the Pan American Games to take place in Winnipeg this summer. These are features of our Centennial party, to which the whole world has been invited. Expo provides an extraordinary opportunity to extend hospitality to those who join with us in celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of Confederation. It is attracting visitors to Canada in greater numbers than ever before, and provides us with an unprecedented opportunity to display our achievements to the rest of mankind. Our country will also be receiving an increasing flow of people who will remain with us, to add to the variety and strength of our country. You will be asked to consider a complete revision of our immigration legislation.

If the century that has passed can be characterized by the development of the resources of our land, it is likely that the century to come must be marked by an increasing concentration upon the development of the resources of the mind and the spirit.

The government has already embarked upon a number of programs to increase substantially the level of scientific innovation, but much information of potential use in upgrading the technological capability of our country is not being fully utilized. The government has therefore initiated a study which will lead to a program to provide for the efficient dissemination of the latest scientific and technological information throughout Canada. The government also intends to recommend substantial expansion in its assistance to science and technology in their broadest senses and to develop a climate conducive to more expenditure in this area by Canadian industry. Particular attention will be given to developing a climate of cooperation among governments, universities, and industries, that will provide effective solutions for the great problems associated with our environment: with health, transportation, energy, communications, housing and urban renewal, food production and many others that have particular relevance to this country.

The arts, humanities and social sciences also have an importance to our future that needs no elaboration. In recent years the government has taken vigorous action to ensure unprecedented support for those branches of learning essential to the enrichment of the spirit and to the government of men. More remains to be done so that there will be provided a host of challenging opportunities to Canadians of all ages: opportunities of the kind that will excite the interests of our best minds; opportunities that, accepted with spirit and vigour, can lead to progress of exceptional significance in the social and economic life of Canada.

Recognizing that broadcasting is an important cultural instrument the government supports a comprehensive and balanced national broadcasting service for Canadians of all ages, interests and tastes. Toward these ends a measure will be put before this Session for better regulation and use of broadcasting privileges and responsibilities. Legislation will also be placed before Parliament concerning the provision of broadcasting facilities for educational purposes.

The government is profoundly aware of the economic, social and cultural issues concerned in the development of satellite communications. Studies of this important matter are now underway and will be pressed to completion so that you may be thoroughly informed on all aspects when grave decisions as to use, ownership, regulation and control must be reached. A committee of Parliament will be invited to study the issues involved in this new means of communication.

In one form or another science is already reaching into the very heart of the community to transform the lives of each of us. It is essential that the control and development of our environment keeps apace. We have built towns and cities, canals and railroads, highways and other great works of construction at an unprecedented pace. But we have too often in the past made beauty the poor sister of material gain and careless workmanship the price of easy profit. We must lose no more time in making ugliness in our environment as unwelcome as financial losses in our balance sheets.

One of the great challenges of the century will be our capacity to plan our urban development so that Canadians in the future will continue to enjoy the benefits of living in health and harmony with their surroundings. To this end, the government intends to propose to the provinces that a special study of urban development be undertaken in close consultation with all the authorities concerned, which would be available to the federal, provincial and municipal governments and to the public generally; so that all Canadians will be aware of problems which lie ahead and so that governments at all levels, will have the best possible advice to assist them in their own planning and in their respective contributions to this great problem.

You will be invited to consider new housing programs which, while recognizing the primary responsibility of the individual and the other levels of government in the provision of housing, will help to fill requirements that clearly lie ahead.

The impact of science, industrialization and urbanization and the changing conditions in Canada and abroad also demand that our agricultural goals and policies should be kept under continuous examination. The government, confident that Canada can look forward in its second century to continuing as one of the great agricultural countries of the world, proposes to establish a Special Task Force under the Minister of Agriculture. It will be charged with projecting agricultural goals for the future and recommending policies to meet these goals. A firm basis should thus be provided for the development, in full cooperation with the provinces, of a national agricultural policy. This national policy will be designed to bring greater returns to the efficient farmers of this country consistent with those of other segments of our economy and consistent with the contribution to our well-being that is made by the agricultural segment. At the same time plans will be developed that will permit the retraining of those who wish to leave the agricultural field.

The changing needs of rural communities also deserve special attention. During the present Session, you will be asked to approve legislation to provide long-term loans to agricultural and fisheries associations and corporations to permit them to develop facilities commensurate with the needs of such communities. The pattern of agriculture is changing and with the change there is increased need for capital to permit the development and maintenance of a competitive agricultural structure. Therefore you will also be asked to broaden the scope of the Farm Credit Act, in particular to enable young men and farmers' sons to develop or acquire efficient and viable production units.

The great natural resources that we take into our second century will be vital to us in meeting our needs and in maintaining our position as a major world trader. Measures will be introduced by the government at the present Session arising out of the need to conserve and preserve the great wealth with which Canada has been so richly endowed. Water itself is becoming a more and more valuable resource. Efforts to combat pollution are taking on an economic as well as a social significance and the federal government intends to press forward in cooperation with the provinces. In keeping with this objective, you will be asked to approve a new

Canada Water Act which will provide a framework for the improvement and implementation of Canadian water policy.

At the same time, the search for new resources hastens the opening of the North. Substantial progress has been made in recent years in the government of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and the government intends to undertake new incentives for industry and regional economic planning intended to strengthen the economy of the North.

The encouragement of scientific and intellectual endeavour, and the development of natural resources, will be of no great benefit to Canadian society in its second century of Confederation unless a concerted effort is made to bring about a better relationship between the individual and his government. The government therefore attaches great importance to administrative and law reform so as to assure the citizen an understanding and sense of identification with what is going on, the better to assure his support of and participation in the social institutions of our country. You will be asked to examine legal procedures and administration, not only with a view to their efficiency, but also as regards their simplicity and efficacy in so far as the individual citizen is concerned. Canada must set itself the task of developing a society in which every citizen can become an informed and real participant and plan a rôle to the measure of his wishes and abilities.

The Standing Committee of the House on Privileges and Elections will be asked to continue its study of the Report from the Committee on Election Expenses. When this study has been completed, the government will put forward proposals for your consideration.

You will be asked to consider reforms in our laws governing divorce. The government will also put forward a proposal concerning capital punishment. In all of these matters where decisions depend so much on personal judgement and belief, careful consideration will be given to procedures for handling them in Parliament. Early action will also be taken to seek other amendments to the Criminal Code.

In the highly complex society of today, the interests of the consumer must be taken fully into account in the formulation of government policy. It is abundantly clear that in the whole area of matters affecting the investor and the consumer, the federal government has special obligations arising out of its general responsibility for the economic well-being of the nation as a whole.

The rights of the consumer can be advanced through corporate and individual responsibility but they also impose an obligation on governments at all levels. At this Session government measures recommended for the promotion of consumer interests will include the designation of a department of corporate and consumer affairs. Within this department there will be created an organization responsible for developing new policies and coordinating programs undertaken within the federal government to assist the consumer and protect the small investor. It will also maintain liaison with the provinces in these fields.

The government also attaches great importance to the encouragement of more efficient allocation of capital resources and to the creation of a situation in which any Canadian can invest in companies operating in Canada on the basis of comprehensive and accurate information. To this end, you will be asked to approve amendments to the Canada Corporations Act. They will ensure that federally incorporated companies are obliged to respect modern and high standards of financial disclosure and that their affairs are conducted in a way which will encourage a favourable investment climate.

Related to this is the improvement of the efficiency and stability of financial markets and institutions. Important changes were brought about in the last Session of Parliament with respect to banking legislation and the control of other financial institutions. The objective of the government is to encourage development of efficient financial institutions, with full regard for the public interest including the provision of adequate safeguards for depositors and investors. The government is prepared to exercise its responsibility in fields where it has jurisdiction. In these fields as well as in areas where jurisdiction is divided, it will seek to cooperate with all provincial governments.

Another matter of fundamental importance in our highly industrialized society is safety. The government proposes to review the whole area of its jurisdiction with respect to the setting and enforcement of safety standards in all the areas where they are required if the day-to-day life of the average citizen is to be adequately safeguarded.

As we observe this year the beginning of a new century of Confederation, we who find ourselves in positions of authority must always remember that it is our responsibility and our opportunity to serve the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people. Ours is a proud past. Together we in Canada have a future as promising as that of any other country in the world. But, above all, we are a people of the present. It is well that in giving thought to the goals of the second century of Confederation, we be aware that, as our success and promise of today rest on the actions of the past, so what we have tomorrow will depend on what we do today.

Members of the House of Commons,

The legislative program that the government proposes is large, and many of the issues it contains are complex. This has consistently been the case in recent years. It is a natural result of the growth and development of our country, the involvement of government in many matters, and the increasing technicality of modern society and the methods of its regulation. Parliament today requires virtually the full-time attention of its members, and this has been appropriately recognized. Likewise, you have recognized that the rules and methods of parliamentary government must be revised. In the last Session you established a Committee on the Rules of the House which made valuable progress in this regard. In this Session you will be asked to continue and expand that Committee's work. Canada in embarking upon its second century of federal government, must provide its Parliament with every facility to ensure that efficiency and thoroughness of deliberation which, in the consideration of every item of public business, is alone the sure protection of the liberty and well-being of our people.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required for the services and payments authorized by Parliament.

Congratulations on Canadian Centennial

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

It is our honour and privilege to be responsible for the government of our country in this one hundredth year of confederation. It is our duty to govern well.

In addition to the measures already specified, you will be asked to consider a number of other legislative proposals.

In conclusion, I would end today, as the first Governor General of our country did one hundred years ago:

> "Within our borders peace, security and prosperity prevail, and I fervently pray that your aspirations may be directed to such high and patriotic objects, and that you may be endowed with such a spirit of moderation and wisdom as will cause you to render the great work of union which has been achieved, a blessing to yourselves and your posterity, and a fresh starting point in the moral, political and material advancement of the people of Canada."

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency, delivered this day from the throne to both houses of parliament, be taken into consideration later this day.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

RESOLUTION OF CONGRATULATIONS AND BEST WISHES FROM U.K. PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Right Hon. Horace Maybray King, Speaker of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom, conveying the text of a resolution of that house, as follows:

The Prime Minister
Mr. Edward Heath
Mr. Jeremy Thorpe

Centenary of the Canadian Parliament: Resolved, nemine contradicente, That this House, mindful of its debates in February and March 1867, which led to the passage of the British North America Act and to the establishment of the Parliament and Dominion of Canada and recalling the hopes then expressed that the foundation had thereby been laid for the development of strong and self-reliant parliamentary institutions in that country; notes that these hopes have been amply fulfilled in the continuing vigour and vitality of the parliamentary system in Canada and sends most friendly greetings and warm congratulations to the Canadian House of Commons on the centenary of its establishment, and all good wishes for the second century of its existence.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of congratulations which you have just read and which, as you have said, was moved in the British House of Commons by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, was passed unanimously by that ancient and illustrious body which two years ago celebrated its seven hundredth anniversary in the same hall at Westminster where it first met.

Very generous remarks were made when this resolution was being considered at Westminster by the Prime Minister, Right Hon. Harold Wilson, by the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Heath, and by the leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Thorpe. I am sure all members of this house share my appreciation of this generous and friendly gesture, and I am sure that all members would wish this appreciation to be suitably expressed and recorded, for transmission to Westminster.

As has been the case with many countries, we inherited our own parliamentary institutions from Britain, the home of the mother of parliaments. Indeed, one of the bonds holding together that unique organization, the Commonwealth of Nations, is this shared parliamentary heritage.

In Canada, parliamentary institutions have played a vital part in the development of our Confederation. They have served us faithfully and well in war and peace, in bad times and in good. They have enabled our country to grow with a maximum degree of freedom for our people, and with a maximum of consideration for discussion and dissent in the solution of our problems. It is difficult to imagine a more stable or suitable governmental foundation for future progress as we contemplate our second century of confederation. The capacity of our parliamentary system to adjust itself in response to the requirements of the moment, without sacrificing its basic characteristics, has been demonstrated in the past. We must hope that the subtle, durable mechanism, of which this house forms such an important part, will successfully meet the even more difficult and important challenges of the present by adapting itself to the new conditions we face.

We often forget that it was the combined genius of Anglo-Saxon and Norman French that brought about the birth and development of the parliamentary system in Britain. In Canada there has been a similarly enriching association of these two races in our parliamentary evolution. In working out our federal system of government, parliamentary institutions have enabled English speaking and French speaking Canadians to settle their problems and find acceptable accommodations for their difficulties in a framework of rational discussion and intelligent co-operation.

I feel confident that we can look forward to continued steady parliamentary progress, and that we shall not betray the great achievements of the last hundred years or prove unworthy of the generous sentiments that the resolution of the British House of Commons so graciously emphasizes.

In introducing this resolution into the House of Commons at Westminster, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom quoted the words of Lord Carnarvon, the Colonial Secretary of the day, when he moved second reading of the British North America Act in 1867. He said then:

> We are laying the foundation of a great state—perhaps one which, at a future day, may even overshadow this country. But, come what may, we shall rejoice that we have shown neither indifference to their wishes nor jealousy of their aspirations, but that we honestly and sincerely, to the utmost of our power and energy, fostered their growth, recognizing in it the conditions of our own greatness.

It is good to know that the British House of Commons, 100 years later, continues to have these same generous and warm feelings about our country.

It is my pleasure and my honour to move, seconded by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, the following resolution:

> That this house, acknowledging the Resolution of the British House of Commons, conveying most friendly greetings and warm congratulations on the centenary of the establishment of the Canadian House of Commons, and all good wishes for the second century of its existence;
> Recalling the unfailing good will extended to it by the British House of Commons at the time of confederation, and throughout the century that has followed;
> Mindful that parliamentary institutions, our heritage from the mother of parliaments, have served Canada well during the past hundred years;
> Requests Mr. Speaker to express to the British House of Commons sincere and grateful appreciation for its kind greetings and congratulations.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I join the Prime Minister in the sentiments he has expressed on this unique occasion. The message from the parliament of Westminster re-emphasizes, as the Prime Minister has said, it was in Westminster that the system was developed which we in our country, subject to but few changes, have applied to the operations of our parliament. Indeed, the cradle of freedom at Westminster gave us parliamentary democracy and the rule of law. From it we obtained the common law, trial by jury and habeas corpus. These are the monuments of freedom around which Canadians stand with pride.

In the dark days from June, 1940, until December, 1941, the parliaments of the United Kingdom and Canada together with the other dominions in the commonwealth stood alone for freedom. In 1941 the nazis attempted, by destroying the physical structure at Westminster, to at the same time undermine the moral determination and power of our people standing together for freedom. They destroyed the buildings, but the soul was unimpaired.

We recall it was here in this chamber in December, 1941, that Right Hon. Winston Churchill, with winged words of power and determination, mobilized the thinking, the aspirations and hopes of free men everywhere.

These are the things that come to one in reflecting on the history of our country's institutions. It is well to recall the contribution made by that parliament in Westminster to the Canada of today. The Prime Minister mentioned it was a result of the co-operation between Anglo-Saxons and Normans that the parliamentary system, which we hold as of right and not of grace, was achieved and established.

It is well to remember the parliament of the United Kingdom gave to Canada of that day, in 1774, freedom of religion for Roman Catholics many years before it was attained in the United Kingdom itself. It was the United Kingdom parliament which made possible the abolition of slavery in Canada in 1793. It was in that parliament the eloquence of Fox, Pitt, Sheridan and Burke brought into being the beginning of representative government in Canada. Fox enunciated the dictum that the only way of retaining distant colonies with advantage was by enabling them to govern themselves.

Here in Canada—sometimes we forget it—a French Canadian gave leadership which brought about responsible government in our nation. Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine joined with Robert Baldwin in bringing this about. He maintained that parliamentary government without the crown cannot and will not be envisaged. These are some historical episodes which come to mind.

The British parliament consistently and generously protected minorities, their religion and their language. The Prime Minister quoted the words of Lord Carnarvon as the British statesman concluded the introduction of the B.N.A. bill in the House of Lords in 1867. Strange as it may seem today, it was the Quebec Act of 1774 allowing religious freedom and preserving those rights which were guaranteed in 1760, which in large measure was the cause of the 13 colonies revolting in 1776; they took strong objection to what had been done in Canada.

These are things we do not forget. These are things of the spirit, golden threads in the tapestry of our parliamentary system. It is with deep appreciation of what the British parliament has done for our country in preserving the freedoms we hold so dear, freedom of religion, freedom of speech and free, responsible government, that I speak today. For all these things we are debtors to that parliament at Westminster. So long as it lives, freedom will live.

It is my honour to join with the Prime Minister in seconding a resolution of appreciation for a message which touches the hearts of all of us.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): My colleagues and I desire to support most enthusiastically the motion which has been moved by the Prime Minister and seconded by the Leader of the Opposition. We deeply appreciate the congratulations and good wishes which have been received from the parliament at Westminster.

As has been pointed out, the British parliament gave birth to confederation. While we very naturally think with pride of the Canadian fathers of confederation, it is true that the work they did could not possibly have come to fruition had they not had the co-operation of the statesmen in Great Britain, and had they not been helped tremendously by the foresight of British leaders like Lord Durham. Therefore we are greatly indebted to the British parliament, to the men who have sat in it over the years, for the help they gave in laying the foundations of Canada.

With the passage of time we have become more and more independent and we have insisted increasingly, generation by generation, on being masters in our own house. I do not think for a moment that this has caused any displeasure in the British parliament or among the British people. As a matter of fact, when they launched Canada on its way it was part of their hopes and their aspirations that Canada would become a great sovereign power and an equal partner with Great Britain. It must be a source of satisfaction to them now to see Canada, as an independent, sovereign nation, working closely with Great Britain in the Commonwealth of Nations, in the United Nations, and in the affairs of the world.

We, Mr. Speaker, in this house, and in this country have a deep affection for Great Britain. Part of it comes from our ties of blood, but I suppose roughly two thirds of the Canadian people do not have ethnic relationships with Great Britain. However, we do have ties of common appreciation for the parliamentary system, for the British system of justice, and for the concepts of freedom and liberty which Great Britain gave to the world and which we, in our turn, have accepted and seek to perpetuate.

William Pitt once said in one of his famous speeches, when the Napoleonic wars were at their height, that Britain had saved herself by her exertions and Europe by her example. I think it can be said with equal truth today that Great Britain, in spite of innumerable difficulties, is saving herself by her exertions and the world by her example. I hope that we here in Canada as we enter into our second century will continue to march in step with Great Britain, and that we, with Britain and the other members of the commonwealth, may play an important part in promoting peace, stability and prosperity throughout the earth.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in the name of the Ralliement Créditiste, I should like to join the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in thanking the British House of Commons for the resolution which it kindly sent our government on the occasion of our centennial. We appreciate all the kind words and good wishes contained in the message of the London government. Other countries will certainly send Canada their congratulations this year. It should nevertheless be remembered in listening to these congratulations—we are overwhelmed with congratulations—that tomorrow is another day and that all those kind words are not necessarily true.

We sincerely thank the British government for their good wishes on the occasion of the centennial of confederation. In fact, it is quite an event for Canada to have survived during these hundred years after the agreement reached in 1867, if we consider the government of the time and particularly the two great men who, in 1867, laid the basis upon which Canada developed and expanded.

Have we now reached the ideal suggested by these two great men? I have always found that no ideal can be fully attained. Nevertheless, it can be said that we are on the way toward such an ideal and that living under this agreement has been a fortunate experience for all Canadians in general.

Just to simplify my reassuming, let me say that I have always seen in the agreement of the 1867 confederation something similar to a contract between husband and wife.

Mr. Speaker imagine a couple receiving congratulations from everywhere on their hundredth wedding anniversary. While the husband is being complimented on his achievements, on his progeny especially, the wife harbours other thoughts which she dares not express. That is all very well as far as the husband is concerned, but often the wife thinks to herself: That is not altogether true.

Well, we French Canadians, with regard to the English speaking element within the context of confederation, are somewhat like the husband and wife to whom I have just referred.

In 1867, our ancestors took up the challenge. They tried to play their part and I think that if something went wrong, in short if we have to complain about something as French Canadians, it is not so much about the letter itself of the British North America Act as about its application. But, on this anniversary, in order not to cast any gloom over the occasion, we will act somewhat like the woman who is party to the marriage contract: we will let those who want to celebrate fully do so, even if we cannot keep pace with them. We congratulate our predecessors just the same for having made the necessary efforts to attain the ideal which the two men mostly responsible for confederation undoubtedly had in mind.

We are asking ourselves what confederation gave us after a hundred years. To answer that question, I think that we should analyse the situation and ask ourselves whether our present system of government is as sound as it was 100 years ago as well as the foundation of present system, which I approve of because I have always been in favour of a democratic system.

I believe that the years to come will give us the answer to that question and we hope wholeheartedly that our democracy will grow not only in words but in action, in short that it will become an accomplished fact in Canada.

That is the wish of the French Canadian people in general who live in Canada as it must be also the wish of the citizens of all the other ethnic groups which make up our great country.

I think that our democracy is far better than other forms of government which have been launched or tried out in other countries, but we must reflect upon the accomplished fact and be satisfied with the work done, even with the effort attempted although that effort, in my opinion, was not fully successful.

Mr. Speaker I hope the new century which lies ahead will be the century of understanding, the century of justice and the century of peace.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted just a few moments, I should like to assure the members of this house that we in the Social Credit party are in full support of the resolution which has been moved by the right hon. Prime Minister and seconded by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

It is always good to receive greetings on special occasions and, on the one hundredth anniversary of Canada's existence, it is doubly gratifying to receive greetings from the mother of parliaments. I have just read the message which was sent and I notice that reference is made to the debates which led to the passage of the British North America Act and the establishment of the parliament of the Dominion of Canada. I believe this message expresses a hope which is greater than the expressions of opinion which were made at the time of Canada's formation by those on that side of the Atlantic who predicted the early demise of this country as an independent sovereign nation.

Canada is but a baby, so far as the nations of the world are concerned, but I believe her place in the roll call of nations will move on the maturity, and that she will make her contribution to the world in general.

Motion agreed to.

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1967-68

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1968, was presented by Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUMANIA—TABLING OF LETTERS RESPECTING CONSULAR AND CLAIMS MATTERS

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table exchanges of letters with the government of Rumania dealing with consular matters and claims. These follow the exchange of letters tabled in the house on April 4 concerning the establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and Rumania.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table these documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GREECE—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO RESTORATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and ask him whether the government of Canada has made representations to His Majesty King Constantine II of the Hellenes for the immediate release of all elected political representatives and other citizens unconstitutionally arrested, and for the immediate restoration of the constitutional rights of the Greek people, their parliamentary procedures, and their right to schedule free elections.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Of course we have an embassy in Athens which is keeping in touch with developments, but we have made no representations to the government of Greece of the kind suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Starr: Then I would ask whether the government is considering withholding the $1.5 million granted to the Greek army as economic aid under the NATO defence assistance program until such action as I suggest has been taken.

Mr. Pearson: That is another question. I shall be glad to look into it and see whether in fact those are the accurate figures.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has received any information as to the attitude of the government of Great Britain in these circumstances.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps this information is available in the Department of External Affairs. I have not seen it as yet, but I will look into that aspect.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the Prime Minister. Is the government aware of cases in which Canadians of Greek origin are currently being detained in Greece and, if so, is any action being taken to alleviate their situation?

Mr. Pearson: I am informed we have no knowledge of any Canadians of Greek origin being detained, but we shall make direct inquiries.

VIET NAM—REPORTED REFUSAL OF CHILDREN'S REHABILITATION CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding a press statement attributed to his parliamentary secretary to the effect that Saigon had turned down a tentative offer of a childrens' rehabilitation centre by insisting on a military hospital instead. May I ask whether this statement has reference to the children's rehabilitation centre which was proposed by Dr. Gingras and, I believe, endorsed by the minister?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes. As the hon. member knows, the government had been anxious to contribute to this rehabilitation centre. I have in my hand a letter which has just come in, and which I have seen for the first time, from the minister of health in South Viet Nam. It says that our proposal for a separate rehabilitation unit is an undesirable means of producing the result we have in mind. We do not agree with this, but we shall continue our discussions.

Mr. Douglas: On January 9 I asked the minister a question as recorded at page 11536 of Hansard:

> Is the government of South Viet Nam withholding approval in respect of Dr. Gingras' proposal because of an insistence that the doctors and members of the staff come under military medical personnel?

The minister's answer was "No, Mr. Speaker". I want to ask the minister whether the situation has changed since then.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That must have been one of the days when I was not hearing well. What was the date again?

Mr. Douglas: The date was January 9. Has the situation changed, or was the minister misinformed at that time?

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Yesterday the minister was reluctant to answer a question I put to him, one which suggested a solution to this problem. Can he tell us today when we may expect a report on the possibility of bringing these Vietnamese civilians to Canada for rehabilitation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think I indicated that this suggestion was being examined.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): But when may we expect a final report on it?

An hon. Member: In due course.

FLOODS

FRASER RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE EMERGENCY ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Could he indicate to the house any decision that was reached at the recent federal-provincial conference regarding measures to be taken in the event of a flood emergency in the Fraser river valley?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this question should have been directed to the Minister of Industry, who is responsible for EMO. May I ask him to answer it.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, some time ago a telegram was sent from the Prime Minister to the premier of British Columbia offering the assistance of the federal government in respect of the potential flooding situation in British Columbia. I would be glad, if it would be of interest to the house, to table that telegram and the reply to it from the premier of British Columbia. Both these have already been published, and with leave I would like to table them.

I might also add that recently during discussions between Mr. Williston of the British Columbia provincial government and my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Williston assured my colleague that all the necessary steps in respect of planning and preparation for floods were being taken by the province which of course has primary responsibility, and that the fullest co-operation was being exhibited between the federal and the provincial governments.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table the communications to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Patterson: As a supplementary question may I ask if the question of the implementation of the recommendations in the Fraser river board report was discussed in that conference?

Mr. Pepin: That is under my responsibility, Mr. Speaker. I can say that the ministers have come to agreement on a certain project and Mr. Williston and myself are going to take up this project for approval by both our cabinets.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Some weeks ago it was stated that early action would be taken by the government regarding the case of Mr. Justice Landreville. Has the government now made a decision as to the action it intends to bring before the House of Commons, and will this matter receive early attention immediately after the speech from the throne has been voted on?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this matter will receive early attention and I hope to make an announcement before long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister in a position to say that the matter will be placed before the House of Commons by way of impeachment?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that the right hon. gentleman wait until I make the announcement in the house concerning the course we will recommend to parliament.

FINANCE

QUEBEC—PROVINCIAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Since the passage of the Canada Deposit Insurance Act have the minister, his officials or any of the officers of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation had any discussions with the government of the province of Quebec with regard to the separate scheme which that province has indicated it wishes to set up? In addition, is it the minister's information that the federally incorporated chartered banks will be subject to a double impost in the event of there being a provincial scheme?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the question should be placed on the order paper.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GENEVA TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he can make a report to the house in respect of the current tariff negotiations at Geneva and, in particular, whether he can say if a breakdown is as imminent as seems likely from this morning's news reports. If so, what initiative is the Canadian government taking to protect Canada's trade in wheat and other important commodities?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations at Geneva have reached another of their delicate and critical stages. The secretary general has just issued a communiqué saying he still is hopeful that agreement can be reached through concerted effort and good will on the part of those concerned. Most negotiating teams have returned to their countries to receive further instructions. It is expected, however, that negotiations will resume later this week, probably on Friday. Sunday has been set as the termination date. It is hoped that agreement in some degree can be reached by that time.

So far as the role of the government is concerned, we have been in close consultation. I have been in Geneva myself a number of times, as have some of my colleagues. I am returning to Geneva tomorrow and will be accompanied by the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board. A number of wheat board officers are there now, and it is likely that by the end of the week I will be joined by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Apart from the movement of bodies does the government plan any new initiatives?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, this has been a process of continuing initiatives. I think the role of Canada is clearly understood by all our negotiating partners.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask what progress is being made toward agreement concerning cereal grains. I have particular reference to the statement which appeared in the press to the effect that the two groups of governments which were bargaining were getting close to a figure which has been mentioned as $1.72 to $1.74. Can the minister give us any information on this rather strange figure which has been quoted in the press?

Mr. Winters: That is purely speculative. We never have revealed the precise figure because we are negotiating; otherwise there would be no negotiation. We are, however, asking for a substantial increase over the present price under the I.W.A.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us whether he will still be receiving the advice of the Minister of Agriculture on or about May 24?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Did he authorize the premier of Saskatchewan to indicate that the increase in the price for wheat under the international agreement would be 20 cents?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Could the minister advice the house when he expects to present his budget to the house.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the date has not yet been fixed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STATEMENT BY QUEBEC MINISTER ON CULTURAL EXCHANGES WITH FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is the minister aware of the wild statement made by the Quebec minister Jean-Noël Tremblay to the effect that cultural exchanges with the French government concern Quebec only, and can he state categorically what attitude the central government has adopted with regard to that touchy matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have read a report on the speech the minister made in Montreal last Sunday. If I am not mistaken, I believe he criticized us because we decided to grant subsidies to a benevolent organization known as AUPELF. I feel that in the interest of unity and amongst French-speaking countries, the help and initiative of the federal government should be supported.

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the house what prevents the province of Quebec from taking its own stand in this particular matter, without turning to federal members of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is out of order.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have asupplementary quetsion for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with the statement he has just made. Can he tell the house what prevents the central government from consulting the Quebec government, as regards other French language countries—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is as much out of order as the previous one.

Mr. Allard: They are afraid to answer, Mr. Speaker. The government is lousy.

CONSULTATION RESPECTING CULTURAL AGREEMENT WITH BELGIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the recent cultural agreement between Canada and Belgium. Has the central government consulted the provincial governments in general and the Quebec government in particular before concluding such an agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Allard: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Did he receive a request from the U.C.C., the O.F.A. and the O.F.U. for a meeting on May 24 and, if so, what was his reply?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I received such a request and also a request from the dairy farmers of Canada for a meeting, which was held last Friday afternoon. I suggested several alternative dates to the other organizations and I am awaiting their replies in this regard.

Mr. Winkler: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it true that the reply to this request on the part of these three recognized organizations was sent on the evening of May 5 but dated May 1?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING MINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the disastrous effects of the Carter commission report on the mining industry, particularly in British Columbia, will the minister be making an announcement soon regarding the government's intentions in respect of that aspect of the commission report relating to taxation of mining companies?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question today.

EXPO '67

REPORTED UNDERWORLD CONNECTIONS OF ASSOCIATED FIRMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Solicitor General, and relates to the statement last week by the former minister of justice of Quebec, Mr. Wagner. He suggested that four companies in Montreal working at Expo were fronts for the underworld. Is the government making any inquiries in this regard and, if so, will the minister report to the house on this matter as soon as possible, if not today?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by Expo officials that these allegations are being investigated by the Quebec provincial police and Expo security officials. As have officials of my department, I have been in touch with Expo officials, and the R.C.M.P. are co-operating in this investigation.

Mr. Langlois (Mégantic): Will the minister give further details to the house regarding this matter when the reports have been received?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA RESPECTING BROADCASTING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has entered into an arrangement or agreement with the Soviet union or the Kremlin in connection with broadcasting, and what are the terms of the arrangement, if any?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether they dealt with the Kremlin, but I read in the newspapers that such an agreement had been negotiated. I will have to check the information in this regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It could be with no one else if it was with Russia.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—PROTEST RESPECTING LEASING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, asking whether he has received a petition signed by 324 residents of Banff protesting his policy with respect to leases. What does he plan to do about this matter?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have received a number of letters from individuals, but if a petition with 324 names has been sent this has not been drawn to my attention.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR SIMULTANEOUS TRANSLATION OF PRESENTATIONS TO BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration as member of the special cabinet committee inquiring into the Canada Labour Relations Board.

Is the minister in a position to say, further to the charges made by the C.N.T.U., of which he is a former president, that it could not be heard nor present its requests in French before the Canada Labour Relations Board, whether he now intends to take the necessary steps to have the French language recognized and to have simultaneous translation of the proceedings of the Canada Labour Relations Board?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: I hardly think that this question is so urgent, and the hon. member may agree to put it on the order paper. If he feels I am making a mistake, he may bring it up at ten o'clock.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I am putting this question precisely in view of the fact that the C.N.T.U., through its television and film employees union, is to appear in the next few days before the Canada Labour Relations Board. Consequently, it is urgent to know whether the mother tongue and the rights of these workers will be recognized.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has made representations to the minister.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO STIMULATE SPRING STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing housing crisis in the country I would ask the Minister of Labour whether the government is seriously considering acting on the measures discussed in the speech from the throne, in order to stimulate spring housing starts.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is much too general in its terms and cannot be accepted.

Mr. Grafftey: It is not very general when you are looking for a house; it is a very specific problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government house leader. In view of the great emphasis on housing in Canada and its problems, is the government giving consideration to setting up the standing committee on public works and housing so that we may go into this problem thoroughly and try and find some solution to it?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the matter of house committees is under consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—POSSIBLE EXTENT OF STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I wonder whether the minister could advise the house of the extent of the storm damage sustained by lobster fishermen particularly on the eastern and western shores of Nova Scotia; and could he advise the house whether the damage is of such proportions that the government might consider taking some immediate action to offset the loss of the season?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware that there have been a series of storms in that section of Nova Scotia which have caused serious damage to the lobster traps. I have asked the officials of my department to assess the damage and report at the earliest possible date. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the fact that any loss or disaster of this kind is also a responsibility of the province in assessing the damage and making representations to the federal government if it is found that the damage sustained is of disaster proportion and is away beyond the means of the provincial government to deal with.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Now that we have had the throne speech and the Cape Breton Development Corporation has been mentioned, can the right hon. gentleman advise us what position this legislation has on the house agenda and how soon we may expect such legislation to be introduced?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are making progress and will be able to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. May I ask him whether the personnel of the corporation will be appointed prior to or after the introduction of the legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that this question is in order.

WATER RESOURCES

REPORTED AGREEMENT TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which is of urgent and prime national importance. Is it correct that the federal government has accepted in principle a resolution that has been placed on the order paper for over five years by the hon. member for Kootenay West, by an agreement in principle between the federal and provincial resource ministers to establish a national advisory council on water pollution? Can the minister inform the house of any such proposal or agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question and the hon. member's assertions are acceptable at this time.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the interest in the water pollution council would the minister be prepared to ask the consent of the house to return to motions so as to answer my question?

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED SALMON FISHING BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, if I may phrase my question in the idiom of my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries, of which I regret I have not given him notice, which is of vital interest to thousands upon thousands of sports fishermen everywhere and sportsmen particularly in the west. Has the minister received a telegram from the Amalgamated Conservation Society of British Columbia expressing their intense concern over his department's proposals on commercial salmon fishing boundaries in the straits of Juan de Fuca; and if so, is the minister prepared to discuss this matter further at a meeting with the society before arriving at a final decision, which he must do soon?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have received not one but a number of telegrams and letters from sports organizations regarding the matter referred to by the hon. member. A meeting has taken place between officials of my department and representatives of these sports organizations. While no definite decision has been reached, the matter is under study, and at this time I am not in a position to assure the hon. member that a further meeting will be held before a decision is reached.

CO-OPERATIVES

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I wish to direct to the Prime Minister. On April 4 the Prime Minister, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir), indicated that the hon. member should await the throne speech to see the proposals regarding legislation affecting co-operatives. In view of the absence of any specific mention of co-operatives, is it not now the intention of the government to proceed with any legislation in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are a good many pieces of legislation with which we propose to proceed that were not mentioned specifically but were included in the omnibus paragraph toward the end of the speech from the throne. Perhaps tomorrow I will be able to mention them all specifically.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning a subject I have raised now in the house for some five years.

An hon. Member: It cannot be urgent, then.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I do not understand the reaction, Mr. Speaker, but the subject is even more urgent today than when it was first raised five years ago. It concerns the continual and continuing critical shortage of hospital beds in metropolitan Toronto, where there are long lists of people awaiting urgent surgery. In view of this continuing crisis I wonder whether the minister is now prepared to reconsider the somewhat niggardly grant made by the government—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): —toward the construction of hospitals so the municipalities can expand this construction and try to take care of the long lists of people who are urgently awaiting surgery.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might want to put the question on the order paper.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might also put the supplementary question on the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege, if I may, and ask Your Honour, in view of the ruling you made on my earlier question, why it is that the health and welfare of some two million people is not a subject which can be raised as a matter of urgency on orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: The question raised by the hon. member is not a question of privilege, as I am sure he knows, and he should rephrase his question.

COAL

ALBERTA—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FREIGHT RATES ON SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the question asked by the hon. member for York South in reference to the important matter of the export of coal from western Canada to Japan, and in view of the minister's reply that his answer might be involved, would the minister be prepared in the next few days to made a statement on motions in reference to this large contract with Japan which has now been usurped by the C.P.R.?

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would think that in the course of the next day or two the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or I would be able to make some statement about this matter. I certainly hope so.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the Minister of Transport whether in making his reply he will include any discussions he has had with the Canadian Pacific Railway with respect to running a coal type commuter train between the Crowsnest pass and Port Moody, B.C.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not a commuter train; it was a unit train. But I think that is what the hon. member really meant.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SUGGESTED FILMING OF ARMED FORCES TATTOO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. I would ask the minister, in view of the excellence of the armed forces tattoo now touring the country, whether the government has given any consideration to the preparation of a film of this event so as to made it available to Canadians in smaller communities across the land.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this suggestion to the minister should be made by way of a question at this time.

AIR CANADA

USE OF U.S. PILOTS IN LEASED DC-9 AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Will United States pilots be used for the DC-9's leased by Air Canada from the United States? If so, have Canadian pilots filed injunctions against Air Canada in this regard, and what is the attitude of the government?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): There are so many "ifs" "ands" and "buts" in the hon. gentleman's question that I think I should get advice before answering it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Will the minister report to the house on this?

OIL

REPORTED U.S. PRESSURE TO REDUCE IMPORTS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the repeated press reports of pressure being exerted on the Canadian government by the United States government to curb the growth of oil imports from Canada into the United States, can the minister assure the house that these oil exports to the United States, which are so necessary to Canada's economy, will be continued?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): What I can say is that conversations between Canada and the United States regarding oil are now in progress, and each side is pressing its views with vigour.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of the question and the minister's answer will he be prepared to made a full statement in the house with regard to the government's policy on petroleum, if it has a national policy at the present time?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I think I can make it now. Our policy is to sell as much as we can in the United States, which is part of the national oil policy.

GRAIN

MANITOU SEED WHEAT—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF EXPORT EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In consideration of the fact that even at this late date there is still a large surplus of Manitou seed wheat in the hands of Canadian growers, is it the government's intention to lift the export embargo on this grain going to the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the last official information I had in this regard was to the effect that the agricultural association was satisfied with the policy being pursued. However, I will be glad to give it a current look.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Inasmuch as subsidized transportation costs have been mentioned in the speech from the throne I wonder whether the minister could tell us if this subsidization will be available to the 500,000 unemployed people of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEVEN TRUSCOTT—CONSIDERATION OF GRANTING OF PAROLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his indication yesterday morning that he would look into the parole aspect of the Steven Truscott case, may I ask whether he is yet in a position to make any announcement on this matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the two ministers concerned and it is not our intention to take any action at the present time.

HAL BANKS—INQUIRY AS TO LAYING OF PERJURY CHARGE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It has to do with the phantom Hal Banks. Is it true that the R.C.M.P. has come to the conclusion that it has sufficient evidence upon which to charge Banks with perjury and that it has already laid or is about to lay the necessary information?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what the Minister of Justice stated just before the recess in reply to a similar question. If I remember correctly, at that time he informed the house that members of the R.C.M.P. were awaiting further advice from the attorney general's department.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I then direct my question to the Minister of Justice. Is it a fact, as reported in the press, that the R.C.M.P. has advised the attorney general's department of Ontario that there is sufficient evidence to indict Banks for perjury, and that the R.C.M.P. has laid or is about to lay the necessary information to start the wheels of justice turning?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the question as asked is not acceptable. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition is asking the minister to confirm or deny a press statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I was doing that to help. May I then ask the minister the following question. Is it true that the series of questions I asked are based on fact?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman knows that in this case the administration of justice is in the hands of the provincial attorney general, that in this particular investigation the R.C.M.P. which is acting as his agent is reporting to him, and that it is he who will have the answer. Personally I do not know whether the allegations to which the right hon. gentleman has referred are well founded.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government of Canada has been very solicitous of Banks.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OF U.S. CAPITAL INVESTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance with reference to the policy of the former minister regarding the investment of United States capital in Canada. Can the present Minister of Finance inform the house what steps are being taken to control United States capital investment in Canada, which according to estimates by the United States commerce department reached a record of $2.3 billion in 1967?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is much too large in scope and I do not think it can be asked now.

BANKRUPTCY

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Registrar General. I asked it in the latter part of the last session, and Your Honour advised me to ask it in the new session, which I am doing now. Is it the intention of the Registrar General and the government to establish a special committee in this new session to study the complaints against bankruptcies which have been made all across the country?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Registrar General): Mr. Speaker, a three man committee has been sitting for over a year studying the question of a general revision of the bankruptcy law. However, I will be glad to take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration.

EXTERNAL AID

INDIA—REPORTED LOSS OF FLOUR THROUGH FAULTY BAGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I wonder whether he can now bring us up to date on the case of the broken flour bags in India. I ask this question in view of the fact that according to press reports the minister has issued a denial of the allegations in this regard, but press reports still continue that a large quantity of our flour is being dispersed out of broken flour bags.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already made a statement on this subject. I will see whether, in view of this question, anything further should be added. However, I do not believe there is anything I can add.

PILOTAGE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Now that we are in the new session I wonder whether the minister has any new information regarding the long awaited report of the pilotage commission, and when we can expect it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, sir, I have. I happened to meet the chief commissioner by accident at the launching of a ship in Quebec the other day, and he told me he hoped to have the report ready some time in June. I hope so, too.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM ADJUSTMENTS IN PENSION RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and ask whether he has yet received the report from the committee which is studying the question of pension rates.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received it.

Mr. Patterson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he would now consider the advisability of further interim increases in view of the delay in receiving this report.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now making a submission, not asking a question.

• (3:20 p.m.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. DON JAMIESON AND SECONDED BY MR. FLORIAN CÔTÉ

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. Don Jamieson (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

This, Mr. Speaker, is my first speech in this house and I know I can expect from you the tolerance and understanding for which you are so widely and properly noted.

It is my privilege to extend the thanks of this house to His Excellency the Governor General. We are proud, I am sure, that the duties of opening this historic session were performed so well by one who was so recently a member of this assembly. No one is more aware than he that he follows a truly great Canadian. Our deep sorrow at the passing of General Vanier is revived today by the proceedings of this new session. We recall the many previous openings at which he presided and the inspiration that flowed from him because of his love of country and his deep sense of dedication.

We remember too his most gracious wife. This house will never be more unanimous than in expressing the nation's gratitude to the Honourable Madame Vanier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jamieson: May she enjoy many tranquil and happy years secure in the knowledge that she is held in deep affection by all Canadians.

Our new Governor General is a fitting inheritor of the tradition of selfless service. Our respect and our best wishes go with him and his charming lady as they undertake the heavy responsibilities of this centennial year.

It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that I am honoured to have been chosen for this assignment. I even dare to suggest that, in some respects at least, it is appropriate that at this centennial session this task should be performed by a Newfoundlander. My province has a centuries old loyalty to the crown and we are pleased, as are all Canadians, that Her Majesty the Queen is going to participate in our national celebrations.

We Newfoundlanders, sir, also have a deep and lasting loyalty to Canada. Although we have been a province for only 18 years, it is encouraging and I am sure heartwarming to all of you to know that 500,000 of your newest citizens are participating enthusiastically and with enormous pride in centennial observances.

I have to confess, Mr. Speaker, that my own loyalty to Canada was given grudgingly at first. I voted twice against becoming a Canadian. When this status was thrust upon me against my will, I had to assay Canada's worth. A stubborn recalcitrant, I demanded that this country demonstrate that it justified and warranted my loyalty. After 18 years, and against this background, let me say without qualification that today I would choose Canadian citizenship over that of any other country on earth.

I and my fellow Newfoundlanders took little part in the achievements of Canada before 1949. Therefore I can say with less self-consciousness than most that Canadians deserve to be proud of what they have done. This country has survived and flourished because its people have been prepared to fly in the face of conformity. The very existence of Canada, I suggest, proves the claim that most worthwhile things in this world are done by people who, when they are told that their dreams are vain, go on to realize them anyway.

This belief is not foreign to us in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker. Our forefathers may well have invented it. No people have clung more tenaciously to their traditions or worked harder to wrest a living from what we all know can be a cruel sea and a stern and forbidding land. By joining with you we have reaffirmed a truth that is as old as confederation. We Newfoundlanders, I believe, have demonstrated that in order to gain the new it is not necessary to disregard or eliminate the old, that new experiences can enrich an established and proud culture. Today, Mr. Speaker, while we in Newfoundland continue to give our loyalty to the land that made us we are totally committed also to the broader national objectives with which we are all so deeply concerned in this house. Thus, I suggest that the promise of confederation has been renewed and also the wisdom of its founders vindicated.

The speech from the throne made reference to the importance and value of unity with diversity. No Canadian embraces this concept with more enthusiasm than Newfoundlanders. We know that if we are to preserve those rights which we hold so dear we must show the same respect for the rights and distinctive ways of other Canadians.

The speech from the throne makes many references to the various aspects of federal-provincial relations. It seems to me that among the most important of these are the plans to continue study of the involved constitutional question. To the extent that the layman thinks about this matter, I believe it creates a measure of bafflement and perhaps vague concern—indeed, perhaps something of both.

It is imperative, of course, that this country have a workable charter, but I suggest that unless it reflects a true concensus and unless it is the product of painstaking deliberations it may well be a patchwork of harmful compromises seeking vainly to meet diverse and transient needs. It has become commonplace to say that Canada is in a period of transition, but the statement is no less true on that account. In these circumstances the decision to refer this matter for further intensive study and exploration with the provinces is a wise one.

What we do in this house, Mr. Speaker, to define national goals can have an immeasurable effect upon the resolution of constitutional problems and questions. We represent all the people of Canada. I believe we know better than most what Canadians want for their country. I believe that in our frequent encounters with our constituents we learn that where needs exist it is not enough to tell our constituents that in denying them aid the various levels of government are performing in their proper constitutional manner. An appropriate division of powers is essential, of course, in our confederation, but I believe that Canadians would not long endure a system so rigidly enforced that it threatened our nationhood.

Let us make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker. As one who has travelled widely in Canada, from the background I have described I am convinced that the basic desire of all Canadians is one of pride in the whole country. There is across this land an anxiety for and a commitment to unity. It would be tragic if specific regional needs, legitimate as these may be, were used to suppress the growing concern of Canadians with the well-being and welfare of their fellow citizens everywhere.

I am pleased that the speech from the throne reflects this broad outlook. I welcome the news of new regional programs. No part of Canada demonstrates more than my own riding the economic justification of such programs. Before confederation nothing stood between the people of Burin-Burgeo and stark, terrible poverty but an uncertain fishery. Today, with government assistance, many modern fish plants have been built. There are 12 within 500 miles in the southern part of my riding. Many trawlers equipped with all modern aids and equipment steam in and out of harbours where tall-masted schooners formerly sailed. Our fishermen have been freed of the curse of immobility by far reaching government programs, and in all respects a liability has been converted into an asset. A group of decent, hard working Canadians has been given an opportunity to earn a living, which is all they ask.

I say there is economic justification for these regional programs, and I welcome the strengthening of such organizations as ARDA and the Atlantic Development Board. The Atlantic Development Board has helped enormously in my riding. Today we have a massive new power development at Baie d'Espoir, resulting in the more ready availability of hydro with new benefits and new industries, the effects of which are felt throughout all Canada.

Perhaps the greatest economic revolution that has been brought about in my province has been as a consequence of the completion of the trans-Canada highway. This government is also committed to a program of trunk roads, the economic effects of which will be as great as those of the trans-Canada highway. I am sure that the benefits to the economy of my riding and to other parts of Canada will be profound.

The problems of our rural areas, Mr. Speaker, are in sharp contrast to those of our tangled urban regions. In every great metropolis and in many cities of smaller size a host of problems has come together to create a baffling and intricate crisis. No part of the speech from the throne is more important than that emphasizing the need for action in this extremely critical area. The elements of the crisis are well known to us, and the solution will require imagination, boldness and creativity. The standard answers of the past will not do nor, I suggest, is this a time for hair splitting over areas of authority. The test of leadership at all levels may be the manner in which we deal with the problems of urban development.

There is truth in the contention that even the greatest problem can be turned to advantage. The very magnitude of our difficulties in the cities gives us an opportunity to change the entire nature of our urban environment. Expo '67 graphically demonstrates that we have the talent to reshape our cities in the image of tomorrow. I hope we take advantage of our talents. I hope that in redeveloping our decayed built-up areas and in conceiving new residential sections we are not afraid of the unconventional. Let us draw on the vivid imaginations and farsighted genius of those who can add new dimensions of enjoyment to our way of life.

Here we have an opportunity, it seems to me, to free ourselves from the stifling mediocrity of most large centres. I believe that we can restore to our children of the streets their rightful heritage of broad open spaces and good, clean air. But this will not be done by cold-blooded theorists or by slide rule administrators. This is not something that will appeal to those who believe that man is content with clothes on his back, three square meals a day and a roof over his head. The challenge is to those who would free the human spirit and relieve the monotony of our every-day lives. It is to those who would create new horizons of beauty to delight the eye, new cultural experiences to stimulate the mind, and peaceful havens where we can relieve the tensions of our hurried pace. That dream has stirred the hearts of men since the beginning of time, and I believe that if we have the will we have the ability to make it a reality. Nothing could be a greater challenge in this our centennial year.

I am not unaware of the difficulties. I have been a member of this house now for nine months. During that time I have heeded the advice of Ecclesiastes that "there is a time to keep silence." I have also followed the advice, and good advice it is, of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition who maintains that a new member ought to keep his peace for a considerable time. There is much to learn here and much from past experience to forget. I am more conscious than before of the complexities of our system, of the intricate way in which each life touches every other life in our society and of the need not only to act but to contemplate reaction. It has been a sobering, humbling and altogether salutary experience. I have a greater appreciation for the value of our parliamentary system and a much greater respect for those men of all parties who have devoted their lives to service in this house.

Most, I am sure, will agree that there has been a decline in public esteem for parliament. Nine months ago, as a brash observer from the outside I was prepared to assert without qualification that this house was the author of its own misfortunes. I am no longer certain. I agree, as all hon. members do, with that part of the speech from the throne which says that we must move quickly to change our rules and procedures and equip ourselves with the means of doing our task more rapidly and effectively. Since coming here I have been impressed by how much has been accomplished despite the present frustratingly slow methods. The record of the last session was one of the best in a hundred years. The work of the committees was excellent. Yet there continue to be those who regard parliament as a noisy cockpit where members are obsessed with senseless bickering and the pursuit of personal vendettas.

We are not without sin of course, but by the same token I believe we are the victims of an increasingly cynical and sceptical age. It may be cold comfort, Mr. Speaker, but parliament shares with the church, educational establishments and other institutions the ill concealed scorn of the iconoclast, the doubter, the disbeliever. The reasons for this widespread mood are varied, deep-seated and in many instances justified. It is sufficient today, sir, because of the limitation of time, to observe that material progress alone is not enough to solve public unrest. An increasingly acquisitive society is an increasingly uncertain society. Greater security and a higher standard of living give us more time in which to reflect on and regret the inadequacies of our way of life. At the same time, sir, we are becoming increasingly conscious of our neglect of many of those elements contributing to the totality of human existence.

The speech from the throne offers many proposals which are designed to improve the quality of our national life, and I believe that in this centennial year these may well be the most important. If we were to follow simply the dictates of materialism I suggest that we would be hard pressed to defend the case for independence. Since becoming a Canadian I have become aware that there is a rationale behind our continuing efforts to maintain our identity. It is the justifiable conviction that we can build on this part of the continent a better society than would be possible under any other arrangement. This, sir, is not a chauvinistic view, nor does it suggest that we are intellectually superior to other men. It is simply an acknowledgement that faith, geography, history and the wisdom of our founders have created a set of circumstances almost unparalleled in the opportunities they offer.

More and more Canadians are becoming aware of this potential. Not many are clear yet as to how it can be achieved. But our young people in particular are convinced that the standard, routine methods are not the answer, nor do our present values bear any great relevance to the conception they have of national objectives. This, I suggest, is why many institutions, including this house, are held in something less than awe by the younger generation which now makes up such a large part of our population.

We ought not to ignore or dismiss as inconsequential the ideas of these young people, most of whom are committed to the future of their country. They believe in it. Our task is to involve them constructively in the nation-building process. We must be prepared to listen to them and must convince them that they can learn something from us. Most young people know that protest is not enough. They are aware that the path to progress is not across the ruins of every value which has been built up over the centuries by wise and dedicated men. What they ask is that we re-examine the old values and add new ones which will enable us to eliminate what the speech from the throne calls "social injustice, cultural mediocrity and spiritual poverty."

These young people are deeply involved with the world around them. Theirs is an outward-looking nationalism which possesses a kinship with the whole of mankind. We might well emulate their desire to share our bounty not only with those who come among us but with those in other lands who in this shrinking world are in every sense our next door neighbours. I hope and believe that this house will endorse wholly and enthusiastically the plans in the speech from the throne to humanize still further our immigration policies and to expand our foreign aid commitments.

The role of Canada in the world, however, does not consist merely in providing money, supplies and skills to the underdeveloped countries. We have demonstrated repeatedly that we in this country possess a great capacity for making a substantial contribution to the preservation of world peace. The idea of a United Nations force conceived originally by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has proved invaluable, and I am sure every Canadian takes pride in the fact that we have contributed effectively to every one of the United Nations peace keeping efforts. I believe the day will come when we shall be able to make a decisive, important and constructive contribution to a settlement in Viet Nam.

All Canadians are aware of the problems in that tortured land. All of us are conscious of the death and destruction and of the threat to world peace which must exist as long as that war continues. I believe too that there is a sense of national depression because the efforts of so many men of good will from many lands have failed to turn the participants toward the paths of peace. Surely we can agree wholeheartedly with the statement in the speech from the throne that we must pursue every avenue which may lead to a solution. I believe we are doing just that. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) has advanced many constructive, well thought out proposals and suggestions. I believe he also made it abundantly clear that we must persist in our present quiet and little publicized efforts to find a basis which will bring the parties together and result eventually in a settlement. This attitude may not be welcomed by those who condemn the actions of the United States or, indeed, by those who ask that we be totally committed to the United States point of view. The role of the peacemaker is never easy. But I am satisfied, and I am sure most hon. members are, that it is an appropriate role for Canada in the world and, what is more important, it is one that is exactly in tune with our national temperament. I am sure that the policies we are following in this most difficult area meet with the approval of the vast majority of the Canadian people.

The tragedy of Viet Nam and the high emotion it generates reflect what I believe to be a communications crisis. It is one of the supreme ironies of our time that with more ways of communicating than ever before we seem to be talking at each other with little apparent effect. There are many reasons for this, and I think we shall find they exist in our national life as well.

The speech from the throne makes reference to dozens of proposals requiring complex negotiations between various groups of people. The secret of the success of these programs lies in the effectiveness of the ability to communicate. This is the vital element. Yet so frequently prejudice and stubborn singlemindedness as well as a subjective concern with our own desires are blocking the flow of free and full expression. We seem increasingly to be rejecting concepts which do not fit wholly into our preconceived notions and ideas. If this is so there are many contributing factors, and one of these is broadcasting.

We are shortly to introduce new legislation in this field, and I hope to have an opportunity to comment on it in detail at that time. Today let me simply call the attention of the house to the effect of broadcasting upon what I have described as the public mood. I have been involved in broadcasting all my adult life and have grown up in television. I do not pretend to know all the answers by any means. But I want to say to this house with all the conviction at my command, and with the plea that hon. members accept my sincerity, that what we know about television is dangerously little. I am appalled by the comments made so frequently by so many people, and with such conviction, on the basis of so little hard evidence.

I am held in awe sometimes by the power of this medium, by its ability to reach millions of Canadians at the turn of a switch. I shudder at the casual, offhand manner in which television sometimes deals with issues which can affect the survival of mankind. We hear a great deal about television's "hidden persuaders" and their ability to induce people to buy brand A in preference to brand B, a quality which is frequently condemned. What is too often overlooked is that those same hidden persuaders can also be used to sell ideas and doctrines which are not necessarily in the public interest. I do not suggest that television is being used subversively. The tragedy is that even if it were we do not possess enough knowledge to know.

I urge the government, when it brings in its legislation, to make provision for comprehensive and objective research which will enable us to know not only what broadcasting is doing to our society but will let us know with some certainty how it can be used more effectively to advance national goals.

Unfortunately there is not time in which to deal with all the matters referred to in the speech from the throne. Perhaps hon. members will say that is fortunate. But there is scarcely an aspect of national life which is not affected by broadcasting. Many of the matters we have before us now which deal with the greater recognition of the human being, the individual, are matters in which broadcasting can be of great assistance.

We in this house ought to remind ourselves more often than we do that it is in fact the people's house and that everything we do here affects the lives of people. The great grey, anonymous bureaucracy may have no alternative but to deal with statistics and references to units of population, samples, cells, and all the other jargon of the trade, but as members of parliament we are involved and must be concerned with human beings. The machinations of our political parties, the conflicts that occur between parties and between individuals naturally attract a great deal of attention, but they are really the froth of public life. The substance lies in what we do here and, Mr. Speaker, I can only hope that 100 years from now when this house, as it will, continues and those of that day look at the history of this centennial session they will agree that it was one that made the nation proud.

[Translation]

Mr. Florian Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I was extremely happy to learn that the right hon. Prime Minister intended to honour the riding of Nicolet-Yamaska by asking its representative here, in this house, to second the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am all the more happy to do so because this is the centennial session of our Canadian parliament and it will probably leave a lasting imprint on my memory.

May I be allowed first, in the name of the people of the constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska and in my own, to express our deepest sympathy to the family of His Excellency General Vanier and to wish them the necessary strength to overcome that most severe test. I should also like to pay our highest respects to the man who has accepted the heavy responsibilities of governor general of Canada.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my warmest congratulations for the impartial and intelligent way in which you chair the debates in this house.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate those who have accepted such high posts as those of Minister of Justice, of Solicitor General, of President of the Privy Council and Member of the Administration, as well as the two new parliamentary secretaries.

I am quite sure I am expressing the feelings of all the liberal members from Quebec in congratulating most warmly the hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) our new leader. His appointment pleases the whole population.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): My congratulations to the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) for the great ease and easy command with which he proposed the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Truly, Mr. Speaker, I wish I had his ease, his fluency, in order to express myself as eloquently as he did. But let us say that Providence did not mete out its blessings equally and that I accept what little talent it has given me. The fact that I have been asked to second the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, in a different language, is evidence that here in Canada, no matter what language we may speak, we can unite our forces to build a greater Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): The interest taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is not limited to asking me to second the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In fact, since the coming into office of the Liberal party, all my constituents, mainly those in the rural areas, have been pleased with the numerous advantages they have had, as they were perhaps the group most forsaken in the past.

[Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska).]

Since my election I have not taken part in the debates very often, and the same is true of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. Perhaps I understood the statement of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I did not speak often, although I could have done so on many occasions, in view of what I know about farming. I do not wish to offend anyone but I will try to dot my i's and set the record straight about various things I did not find quite normal in some speeches made in this house. However, when some hon. members in great flights of oratory criticized the farm policy of the present government, I could have taken the floor quite often on some particular points and proved to those speakers that they did not know anything about rural life in eastern Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): Instead, I tried to understand them, but I realized that what possibly mattered was simply to filibuster. Yet, when they had the opportunity during six years they were in power, from 1957 to 1963, to implement the great appreciation they had for agriculture, particularly for eastern Canada, they did not act. So, to me who sat and listened, it was difficult to take these statements seriously because, after all, for us who live in eastern Canada, perhaps in a rural environment, we have built much and brought forward claims which were not considered at the time by those who now create this opposition.

Listening to the speech from the throne, I noted that many beneficial measures are provided for, particularly as far as the rural people are concerned, the people whom I represent being from Nicolet-Yamaska.

Nicolet-Yamaska is a constituency bordered by the St. Lawrence river to the north, to the east by the constituency of Lotbinière, so well represented by the present member (Mr. Choquette), and to the south by the constituency of Drummond-Arthabaska, represented by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin), who so ably supports the efforts of our leader here in the Canadian parliament, and by the constituency of Richelieu-Verchères to the west.

The people of Nicolet-Yamaska, a riding which is agricultural to the extent of 80 per cent, are deeply attached to the finest French-Canadian traditions. Their generosity prompts them to share in every joy as well as in the greatest hardships. We take pride in many institutions, such as the two seminaries of Nicolet; several religious orders, the Agricultural School, educational institutions which have always shown an untiring devotion to duty. I am not overlooking either the test and experimental plant of the Department of National Defence in Nicolet, and the most recent investment of $106 million, wholly financed by the federal government, for a thermo-nuclear plant in Gentilly.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege, a week ago, of being present at the benediction of a cultural centre. The federal government had provided $50,000, that is, 50 per cent of the cost of construction. The centre was built in Saint-Grégoire, in one of the seven municipalities of the new town of Bécancour. The heaviest Canadian industries may settle in that town, which came into being only a year and a half ago, for there are plans for building ironworks there.

Nevertheless, as I was saying earlier, the county remains agricultural. In fact, it is a potato growing and hog breeding county, but dairying is the main occupation. Since I am a farmer, I could not help but deal in my speech with matters connected with agriculture. I thought of everything the present government has done in that field. I must say I am proud of it, even if we have not yet achieved the objectives which the farmers are claiming through their professional association.

To illustrate that point, I will refer to 1957. Again, I do not want hon. members, especially those on the other side of the house, to feel that I am trying to criticize systematically, because I do not think it is normal for a citizen to try to build something by destroying everything. I would not want to be like that. But in the light of the facts and of the speeches I heard, I must try to draw a difference with what I have experienced, because you must keep in mind that the figure to which I will refer are figures I have experienced.

In 1957, on my own farm, I was selling milk at $2.90 per hundredweight; with a production of 300,000 pounds of milk, that meant an income of $8,700.

Six years later, in 1963, I was selling the milk at $2.76 per hundredweight. That decrease, after six years of administration, brought down my income to $8,280. That was a difference of practically $400, and yet, the cost of living had risen for farmers as well as for other classes of society.

From 1963 to 1966, under an administration which perhaps understood the problems of eastern Canada and of the Canadian dairy industry, I could sell milk for $4 per hundredweight for a production of 300,000 pounds of milk, which means that I could receive an income of $12,000.

If I refer now to the dairy policy announced by the hon. Minister of Agriculture in March 1967, that price was raised to $4.75. Therefore, anyone who produces 300,000 pounds of milk will now receive $14,250. This is a rather large increase, and I think that it is fair to mention it. No other member knows better than I do the needs of our agriculture, because I personally experienced those problems.

In the light of those figures, perhaps I can appreciate the soundness of the policy or of the measures put forward by the present government.

The situation was the same in hog breeding in 1957, when the then government handed over the administration of the country to another government. We farmers in eastern Canada and throughout the country were guaranteed at least $23 per hundredweight. No one could not make ends meet with $23, but at least we were sure the price would not fall below $23.

In 1958, agricultural specialists went around in my area, as they probably did everywhere else throughout Canada and told us: Farmers, produce milk, produce pork and your prices will be paid, because the government plans some sort of evolution in agriculture. We put our trust in the government, and what were the results? In 1959, more specifically in the second week of January, I sold my pork for $17.80; the following week, for $18.10, and that under a government in which Canada had placed its trust.

It was sad to hear a father tell his sons that they were going through what he had experienced in the years 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932. Maybe we had to exert quite a bit of pressure, so much so that we who lived in rural areas had the reputation of always complaining. That is why I will be proud in a few moments to come back to a question put by someone opposite in order to clear up a few things.

Ever since I first came to this house and started listening to those who formed the government during the time we called "the dark period", it has been difficult for me to take them seriously. How many other pieces of legislation did we not ask for? For instance, a Canadian board for the dairy industry, a government agency for the distribution of feed grain in eastern Canada, unemployment insurance for farm workers.

As for pressures, I exerted some myself, since I was an official in my own professional association and I cannot understand how those who, today, understand fully the farmers' problems, seem to be anxious to help them but did not understand them while they had the opportunity, when we voiced our requests; today, we are faced with a kind of understanding which seems to stem from the change of government.

Therefore, it is difficult for us, from the rural areas, to know exactly what is going on. That is why I am proud to be here, to find out what really happened and that is why, Mr. Speaker, I could, on a number of occasions, have risen on specific points as I stated before, but I chose to wait and try to understand, and today the light is bright enough.

I would now like to add a few words, not as a Liberal member or as a representative of a Liberal party, but as a farmer.

I heard a little while ago a member asking the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) whether he knew about a date; he mentioned May 24.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking all the hon. members not to use the agricultural class, the farmers, as a political football. The producers of manufacturing milk will perhaps be coming here, in the national capital, to voice their needs and not do as many may think, that is to criticize the government. On the contrary, farmers are more intelligent than that. They will support this government in its efforts to help them in the face of all other classes of society.

And I would not want to see somebody rise in some corner of the house and try to prove that the march that the farmers are going to make on Ottawa is a strong criticism of the whole government policy. I was surprised at the comments of those who did not understand us. In fact, it is said that it would not be logical for the government not to grant $5 per hundredweight. But if we farmers had asked for $6, there is no doubt that some hon. members would have risen and said: It takes $6. If we had asked for $7, others would have risen and said: It takes $7. And had we asked for $8, perhaps the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) would have risen and said: It takes $8. But that is not what we farmers are asking for.

We are only asking to be able to live like the other classes of society. We are, I think among those who were elected to administer Canada. We must remember that within that same Canada there is what is called the rural community. And it may be the social class which contributes the most to the country's economic progress.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): I would like it to be understood on both sides of the house that if we of the government party, who administer the business of Canada, are responsible for deciding that such or such a thing must be done, then we must also decide where the money will come from. We must also ask ourselves what will be the repercussions of this or that step we will take. It is not for us only a matter of saying: We must do this. No, we must administer and to administer means to anticipate.

When I think that the farm income has increased in the past three years and a half and reading over the speech from the throne, I have no hesitation in visiting every part of our rural areas, because farmers are aware of what the government has done for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): I should not want to overlook a certain part in the speech from the throne, the one about our relations with foreign countries. In fact, I am happy to note that in the field of diplomacy, Canada will stress its efforts, particularly through the United Nations, to promote world peace. That long-sought peace, we have experienced it, so to speak, on the opening day of Expo 67 when everybody rejoiced.

At the Place des Nations, after the usual speeches and the official opening by His Excellency the Governor General, as every country taking part in this great world event was named, we could see floating in the blue sky the flag symbolizing its pride. All participating countries were named. The last one was ours, and our flag, the flag of all Canadians was raised to the sound of cheers. Then a complete silence ensued. Perhaps everyone present was meditating on his participation in that world event. And this joy through which we have lived, Mr. Speaker, we owe it to a great Canadian, the hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): We also owe it to the Liberal members who have fought night and day to obtain this flag, a symbol of our independence and a source of national pride.

Mr. Speaker, for all these reasons and many others, it is an honour for me to support earnestly the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. MacEachen the house adjourned at 4.17 p.m.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SILVER CROSS WOMEN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will bear with me when I mention that in the gallery there are a very large number of members of the Silver Cross Women's Association, women who gave their husbands or their sons in the last war. To them this house would wish to do honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the house is grateful to my right hon. friend for calling our attention to the presence of these distinguished visitors. There are no people in Canada more worthy of our honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—STATEMENTS RESPECTING CANADA'S POSITION ON CONTROL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to an article by Gerald Clark, associate editor of the Montreal Star and to a C.B.C. statement by Tim Ralfe which placed before the Canadian people a situation in regard to Canada's membership on the international control commission which, if untrue, in the interests of our relations with the United States and with the free world demands the strongest condemnation and, if true, requires full and complete investigation of the operations of this commission.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention, of course, has been drawn to these articles. I have already issued a statement emphatically denying their accuracy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has also issued a statement denying the accuracy of these reports and I would be glad, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps not at this moment, to table both these statements to show there is no foundation for these allegations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the interests of securing the widest possible publicity for the denials that have been made would the Prime Minister have both these gentlemen, who were in Viet Nam and who have always had a reputation for responsibility, brought before a committee of parliament—the external affairs committee would be an example—so they may tell their story there and be subject to cross-examination?

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, to give consideration to this. I think it is an interesting and important suggestion by my right hon. friend that when the committee on external affairs is meeting it might be a very good thing to have these gentlemen appear before the committee and substantiate their statements.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member for Greenwood a supplementary question?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition asked the supplementary I intended to ask.

VISIT TO QUEBEC CITY BY BELGIAN PRINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Further to statements and rumours of all kinds, is the minister in a position to advise the house whether Prince Albert de Liège, accompanied by his wife, will visit the city of Quebec?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe so. The government of the province of Quebec has invited the prince to visit the city of Quebec and we are all very happy that he has accepted to travel to the old capital.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received from the premier of Quebec, Mr. Johnson, some details as to the recognition by Quebec of the status of Mr. Paul Tremblay, Canadian ambassador to Belgium?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the question is in order.

LABOUR RELATIONS

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO UNION DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries regarding what is almost a disastrous situation in the fishing industry at Prince Rupert, British Columbia. Is the minister or the government in a position to establish an inquiry into the problems in the fishing industry of Prince Rupert, which are seriously interfering with the fishery and preventing the fishermen from engaging in the halibut fishery which opened a few days ago?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I fully share with the hon. member his concern about this serious problem involving a dispute between two unions on the British Columbia coast and affecting the halibut fishery. I have received a number of telegrams regarding this situation. I also contacted the minister of labour of that province in this connection. Although I have been advised that it is only the provincial government which has legal jurisdiction in the matter, I am prepared to consider any useful assistance which my department might render in an effort to settle the dispute if such assistance is requested by the provincial minister of labour.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because of the seriousness of the matter, and knowing of the minister's undoubted interest in it, as well as the fact that I understand the representations to the provincial government were made some time ago, would the minister mind once again taking the initiative in contacting the provincial government to solicit their interest and support, in this question?

Mr. Robichaud: I will give consideration to that request.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING CLAIMS COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister give the house any idea when the Indian claims commission which was promised several years ago will be set up?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am committed to one section of the Indian population, namely that in the province of British Columbia, to postpone introduction of such a bill pending their having an opportunity to get together to discuss with us the so-called British Columbia land question. I have told them we cannot wait indefinitely. I understand at the present time they are trying to get together a representative organization which can meet with us.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR MATERNITY PROTECTION FOR FEMALE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, just before the prorogation of the last session I asked the Minister of Labour, in view of the findings of the women's bureau of the Department of Labour that women workers in Canada lack maternity protection—and I do not refer to the pill—whether the government would take the necessary steps to secure this protection for women workers under federal jurisdiction. The minister was kind enough to say he would take the question as notice. Has he been able to look into this situation?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a short progress report to the hon. lady, but that is as far as I can go at this time. There have been discussions with the provinces regarding the I.L.O. conventions which are involved. I regret that I cannot give more than this very limited progress report at this time.

FISHERIES

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SEASON FOLLOWING LATE OPENING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and relates to the very unusual and serious ice situation in district 7B. I am wondering whether the minister or his department will give consideration to the introduction of a special fall fishing season this year because of the late date on which fishermen will be able to begin in this area this year. This is a question of some urgency, because the fishermen are now wondering whether there will be any season this year during which they can fish.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, no decision can be made until after the spring season is completed. I realize that the date of the opening, which has now been fixed for May 16, is very late. However, toward the end of the lobster season in the last week of June we will be in a position to reassess the situation and decide what action it would be desirable to take in this regard.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): I have a supplementary question. Can the minister give us some assurance that it will be possible to open the season next Monday as he suggested a moment ago?

Mr. Robichaud: No, Mr. Speaker, because this depends on the ice conditions.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister is making a decision as to whether there should be a fall fishing season in district 7B will he have his officials check all parts of that district before reaching that decision?

Mr. Robichaud: We always do so, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question to direct to the Minister of Fisheries. I wonder whether, in light of the very serious situation that is developing on the eastern and southwestern shores of Nova Scotia, the minister would approach his colleagues and ascertain whether there is any possibility of easing the net fishing regulations so as to offset the very extensive damage to the lobster fishery in those two areas.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member understands that we also have the responsibility of protecting the salmon fishery, which is sometimes affected by the use of certain types of net for fishing cod. In this connection I am aware of the situation and have asked officials of my department to report immediately, and if we could ensure that the salmon fishery would not be affected we would be prepared to ease the present regulations.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour concerning the announcement he made on January 30, 1967, when he said that loans were to be granted to contractors for the building of 20,000 houses.

In view of the strong demand under this program, would the minister tell us whether he would agree to raise the quota announced on January 30 last?

[English]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when it was announced earlier this year that the government would direct C.M.H.C. to make 20,000 direct loans to builders without pre-sale guarantees, it was explained that this was intended to get a spring house building program under way with a minimum of delay. It was also intimated at the time that consideration might be given to increasing the number of direct loans available without pre-sale guarantees later in the year. Yesterday I indicated I would be making a statement in this house within the next day or two. In the meantime I can only tell the hon. member that the chances of increasing the number of direct loans at this time are not great. I am happy to say that such action may not be necessary for the present at least.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Forrestall.]

On April 20 last, the minister stated that the program he had announced on January 30 would not in any way reduce direct loans.

Could the minister tell us why the corporation refused recently four loans in the town of Amos?

Mr. Speaker: That is an argument. The question is not in order at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—REPRESENTATIONS AS TO RESTORATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has he had an opportunity yet to investigate my question of yesterday regarding the Greek situation, and Canada's annual grant to the Greek army through the NATO defence assistance program?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have asked for the facts in respect of this matter. I have not received them yet, but I hope to be able to answer the question tomorrow or the next day.

FORMATION OF ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH SPEAKING PARLIAMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the creation of an international association of French-speaking parliaments.

Has the central government invited the Quebec government to send representatives?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that in such a matter, and in order to achieve what we have in mind, we must have the co-operation of all sections of the French-speaking world, of sovereign countries and sections of sovereign countries.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Precisely to get delegates from all the French-speaking sections of the world, could the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs suggest to the heads of that international association of parliamentarians coming from French-speaking countries that Quebec should be authorized to send representatives of the Quebec parliament?

INDUSTRY

SHOES—REPORTED REDUCTION IN PRODUCTION BECAUSE OF INCREASED IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it a fact that the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada has made representations to the government to the effect that their production last year decreased by 2,750,000 pairs of shoes and 3,000 workers are out of work because of importations from low cost countries—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman should ask the question directly without supporting it by a statement as he is now doing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have sometimes found it necessary to give the government information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand these people have asked that some effective action be taken. If representations of that kind have been made, has any action been taken?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, because my right hon. friend has indicated a number of facts in his question which may not have very much relevance to the question, I should like to take the question as notice. We are conscious of the problem of the shoe manufacturers, but I should like to make sure that representations have been made and what our response was to those representations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Were not the representations made to the minister?

Mr. Benson: I believe I received a copy of the representations but they were made, as they should have been, to the Minister of Finance who is in charge of tariff policy in this country.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ASSISTANCE TO CANADIAN GROUPS FROM U.S. INTELLIGENCE AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. This question has nothing to do with fishing. Has the minister been informed of the organizations, groups or persons in Canada who have received financial assistance directly or indirectly from the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This would be a good question for the order paper.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TELEVISION BROADCAST SHOWING EQUIPMENT AND TRAINING OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence concerning a program last night at 10.30 on C.B.C.-T.V. showing the equipment and training of the armed forces. Did the minister authorize the preparation of this film and approve of the distorted and inaccurate statements of the commentator?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, how do I get information as to who authorized the showing of an inaccurate film? Is the minister not responsible?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am not the minister through whom the C.B.C. reports to parliament.

Mr. Starr: Who reports to you?

Mr. Churchill: I have a supplementary question, then. Does the minister not give authorization to people who wish to take photographs and film strips of the equipment and training of the armed services?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is argumentative.

Mr. Churchill: Then I have another supplementary question. This is a search for information, Mr. Speaker. Can I not ask who on the government side gives authority for films of that nature to be made? Is that not a fair question, sir?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether it is a fair question, but it is not one that can be asked at this time.

Mr. Churchill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I respectfully ask you when that question may be asked?

Mr. Speaker: That particular question cannot be answered by the Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF DIVORCE REFORM AND CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the house leader is not present today, so perhaps my question can appropriately be addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with the forecast of legislation dealing with reform of the divorce laws and of the Criminal Code with respect to capital punishment. The question is as follows. In view of the successful and purposeful obscurity in the speech from the throne on this particular point, can the Prime Minister tell us whether these measures will be discussed and decided so far as the government is concerned free of the pressure of the party whip, or whether they are to be regarded as questions involving confidence in the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is a matter for consideration, Mr. Speaker, and that consideration, in respect of one of these matters, and perhaps in respect of both, should be reserved until we receive the reports of the parliamentary committees which are dealing with these matters.

Mr. Fulton: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister inform the house what parliamentary committee is dealing with the question of capital punishment?

Mr. Pearson: I must have misunderstood my hon. friend. I did not know he had mentioned capital punishment. I was thinking of divorce and the amendment of the Criminal Code, both of which will be before committees very shortly.

So far as capital punishment is concerned, it will be decided by the government how and when to introduce it and, as I have already stated, I think there will be a completely free vote on it in the sense that every hon. member, particularly on this side, will vote according to his conscience, irrespective of the manner in which it is introduced.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR BAN ON USE OF HIGHLY INFLAMMABLE FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Transport is now in a position to answer the question I asked him on Friday, April 21. The question was as follows:

In view of the request of the International Transport Workers Federation that jet airliners be prohibited from using JP4 because of the high inflammability of this fuel, is the minister considering taking steps to ban the use of this fuel by Canadian air lines?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): No, sir, because it is felt that the information, or perhaps I should say the opinion, contained in the hon. gentleman's question is not supported by such scientific evidence as is available.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION FOR DONATIONS TO TORNADO FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Has he received an application for income tax exemption for donations to the Huron-Perth tornado fund, and if so has such exemption been granted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL DECISION ON PERPETUAL LEASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Before going ahead with the debate on the motion regarding the setting up of a crown corporation to deal with property in the national parks of Canada, would the minister consider referring the legal aspect of this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada? I placed this question on the order paper last session but it was not answered.

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I placed my question on the order paper at Your Honour's direction, asking whether the matter of perpetual renewal leases would be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. The answer I received on May 8, 1967 was that the perpetual leases were not legal. However, before the parliamentary committee in Banff the deputy minister, on the advice of his legal officers, expressed the opinion that these perpetual leases were legal. Therefore there is misrepresentation on the part of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: That is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows that to insist on an answer is not a point of order. He has the right to ask a question, but the minister has the right not to answer it.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I feel I have the right to ask the question but the minister has the duty to give the proper answer and not to misrepresent the facts in this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not a question of privilege to disagree with an answer given by a minister.

Mr. Woolliams: May I speak further on the point, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no question of privilege, unless the hon. member has a different one.

Mr. Woolliams: Your Honour did not hear me very well so far as the point of privilege is concerned. The minister has misrepresented the facts. This is why he will not answer my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can say that the facts have been misrepresented. He cannot say, and I am sure he does not want to say, that they have been knowingly misrepresented. I suggest to the hon. member that there is neither a point of order nor a question of privilege which the Chair can accept at this point.

Mr. Woolliams: It is obvious the minister is convicted by his silence.

EXPO '67

INQUIRY AS TO PRIORITY GRANTED TO ROYAL ANTHEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister who attended as I did myself, the official opening of Expo '67 on April 27 last.

I should like to ask him why the army band played, on three occasions, the national anthem of Great Britain before our official national anthem "O Canada"?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is out of order. The hon. member can place his question on the order paper, but under the circumstances, it is out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think Canadians were somewhat disturbed to hear the national anthem of another country played at the world exhibition.

Since there are regularly official manifestations at that place, I should like to know why the anthem of another country is played instead of ours?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may also put this second question on the order paper.

Mr. Grégoire: At ten o'clock tonight for the show.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the report issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics this morning showing an unprecedented rise in the cost of living in Canada during the last month, is the minister planning any emergency measures to prevent a further drastic rise in the cost of living?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I looked into the reasons for the increase in the cost of living, and was informed that two of the most important reasons were the increase in the sales tax in Quebec and the increase in doctors' fees in Ontario. There are other factors involved also, but those were the two main reasons for the rather remarkable rise.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

As he has just mentioned, the sales tax has brought about an increase in the cost of living in Canada, the Quebec sales tax and medical costs in Ontario, but have the tax increases of the present Minister of Finance not equally contributed to raise the cost of living in Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an argument rather than a question.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL TRAINING

INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE TO HANDICAPPED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, following requests from the employment office coming under the manpower centre, I put this question to the minister concerned.

Could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us whether the adult occupational training program provides for special assistance for the handicapped, as was the case in the past under program 6?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, our present program for the handicapped is being continued, providing there is an agreement with the province.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister of manpower tell us whether handicapped persons in Canada will be retrained?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

LANGUAGE USED ON OPEN POSTCARDS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Postmaster General. In so doing may I follow the lead of my seatmate, the hon. member for Kootenay West, by saying this is a most urgent and serious matter of great importance to all hon. members. May I ask the Postmaster General whether he read, agreed with and endorsed the written statement, which I now have seen, issued by the director of postal rates and classification concerning the open postcards being sent to members of the House of Commons containing such phrases as "Anglo-Saxon chauvinism; the enforcer R.C.M.P.; the intimidator, Ontario provincial police; the Bible thumping hypocrite; the Jew Fascist; the black Uncle Tom, and that other whoreson, the pseudo-reformist representative". Here I quote the director of postal rates:

—while the writings might be somewhat abusive, they are not considered objectionable—

May I ask whether the minister agreed that they were abusive but not objectionable? Did he authorize that statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Caouette.]

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have now embarked on the centennial session of parliament. My first words must be to express agreement with the eloquent words and expressions of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson). His speech was one of those that make parliament the institution it is. I congratulate him, as well as the seconder (Mr. Côté, Nicolet-Yamaska), for the power and eloquence which each of them displayed. To the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo I would say that through the years I have followed him and listened to him but not with the same degree of agreement that I did yesterday. However, the manner in which he spoke to this house when he moved the address in reply leads one to believe that if perchance the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) decides that the minister reporting to parliament for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be one who understands it, then the hon. member would be able to accept the position without having the high ambition to occupy the presidency of the C.B.C. which apparently is the privilege of another.

So far as the seconder is concerned, his speech was not his first in the house. He dealt at length with the agricultural situation. As an experienced farmer, he spoke for himself alone when he said how happy the farmers are. Indeed, if he ever delivers such a speech on May 24 when the farmers gather in Ottawa the reception he received yesterday will be nothing compared with that which he will receive from them.

I join too in the expression of all good wishes to the new Governor General and to his wife. He was a House of Commons man. In the intervening years he has had experience in diplomatic affairs. We know that he will discharge his duties in a manner worthy of the traditions and greatness of his office.

I should like also to mention that I was somewhat surprised that in the session to celebrate our centennial we should have produced to us a throne speech containing many words and much repetition. Canadians in future generations, as those of today, will look on that speech as one that contains very little vision and inspiration. As I listened to the hon. member who moved the address it occurred to me that the house may yet expect an even greater speech when, some time in the future, he speaks on a subject more productive of inspiration than the document which is before us. If he could be stirred by that document, what would he do when there was one with some material in it?

I wish to begin by speaking of my country, the country of which all of us are proud to be members. It is not a time for effusive oratory but a time when we, as Canadians, look back over 100 years of our confederation and from a knowledge of the past secure a vision of Canada's future. Canada is a land of opportunity, a land which, beginning with two basic races, has welcomed people from all parts of the world with their cultures and their beliefs. One thinks too of the dramatic history of this nation, of the first hunter, the first human being seeking game, who crossed the Bering isthmus. One thinks of the Vikings, those mighty men of valour, who ventured forth into the uncertainties of the sea and came back to report to their homeland of this land beyond the sea. We think of the navigators and explorers, the priests and the peasants, the traders and the millions that have come to this land for freedom. It is a story to inspire. Too often Canadians are afraid to speak out.

One of the great and powerful instruments that has contributed to making the United States great is the knowledge of history by its citizens from school age up. They have an appreciation of the past and a unity based on the achievements of the present.

We are all deeply proud to be called Canadians. We hope that we shall never falter when principles are at stake and that we shall never falter in the face of false pretence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not often refer to words I have used on other occasions but I shall refer to something I said in 1960. From earliest days I looked forward to the time when I might contribute to bringing about within this nation a Canadianism that would know no discrimination and in which colour, race, religion and those things that separate us sometimes would not be regarded as disqualifications for Canadian citizenship. I summed up those views in these words:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

That, sir, during the years has been my purpose and objective. When some look at the other side of the house and wonder whether there is anything in public life, my answer is that monetary satisfaction cannot equal that which comes to those who endeavour to do what they can do for their country, in peace and war.

Before I deal with the speech from the throne I shall refer to some of the events of the years. They will show something of the history of this country and its background, something of the speeches made at the time of confederation and prior thereto, something of the general sentiment held by Lord Dorchester, Richard Uniacke, Chief Justice Sewell, Bishop Strachan, Brenton Haliburton, William Lyon Mackenzie, who had the idea of confederation before he became a rebel, Alexander Morris, today often forgotten, a strongly prophetic and compelling advocate of confederation for Canada and the man who first uttered by motion a resolution in favour of confederation, and Alexander Galt. I also think of Cartier, one of the first in French Canada to support confederation, despite the fact that he had been with Papineau in 1837.

George Brown joined with them at a historically critical moment, acting in a manner that permitted others to push ahead with the great design. And, of course, there is Sir John A. Macdonald, the indispensable, without whom confederation would never have been possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No one denies him the title of the great architect of Canadian confederation, except in some of the literature put out by the Centennial Commission. To those who share the view expounded in that literature I recommend the words of Laurier. This is not a centennial for Liberals alone. This is a centennial for all Canadians. This is not a centennial to rewrite history.

Mr. Hellyer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is not a centennial where any leaders of the nation may say to any member of the Centennial Commission, "Forget about the Tories of confederation; let us think about the present." This is Canada's centennial. I am sorry to have to say this, but often one wonders these days whether the centennial celebrations are not becoming the monopoly of the party in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We see that happening everywhere. One of the most interesting examples is Expo. That is now embraced as a Liberal project. We brought it in, we fixed the site, and they finished the work because they won the election. All that we did is now forgotten as the present government apparently concludes that the centenary is a time for national partisan celebration.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the centennial document I have it is set out that George Brown brought in Macdonald and his Tories and that this finally resulted in confederation. For those of another view I recommend the words of that peerless parliamentarian, that orator among orators, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said:

—the place of Sir John Macdonald in this country was so large and so absorbing, that it is almost impossible to conceive that the political life of this country, the fate of this country, can continue without him—

I think it can be asserted that for the supreme art of governing men, Sir John Macdonald was gifted as few men in any land or in any age were gifted; gifted with the most high of all qualities, qualities which would have made him famous wherever exercised—

Then he goes on to say that no one can deny Sir John Macdonald a position above all others among the makers of this nation. I find it necessary to refer to these words because the Centennial Commission has begun to rewrite history in 1967.

Then we come to the debates, and it is well to read those debates. I suggest that hon. members read the speeches of Macdonald, Cartier, Brown and D'Arcy McGee, made in 1865. Those men knew what confederation was. One thinks of Cartier when one hears of the doctrine of two nations in Canada. That doctrine was swept aside by Cartier 102 years ago. He said it was a preposterous notion. He went on to say this:

It is pretended it will be impossible to carry out confederation on account of differences of race and religion. Those who hold that opinion are in error. It is precisely on account of the differences in race and local interests that the federal system should be established and that it will work well.

We have often read in the newspapers that it is a great evil to have such different races, such a distinction between French Canadians and English Canadians.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

He goes on:

We shall form a political nationality—

Not a dual nationality.

—with which neither the national origin nor the religion of any individual will interfere.

Today we should reread what the fathers of confederation said. When they finally concluded their deliberations they celebrated the event. A few days ago there was a celebration in the city of New York. The press of Canada wrote it up. I should like to read a description of another event.

A few days after the close of the circus—

That is the way the meeting of the fathers of confederation was described.

—a great public ball and supper is announced; the evening of the day arrives; the proud and the gay, arrayed in fashion's gauds, flock to the scene where revelry presides . . . Pleasure, panoplied in smiles, meets and embraces joy—the fascinating dance goes merrily, and the waltz with its entwinements, etc.

It is the story of a great revel. In those days the press wrote like that. It is not a picture of the recent ball in New York. This was the ball given at Province House in Charlottetown at the end of the conference in 1864. Read the story of confederation. Let Canadians know.

What about the centennial train? That too has been appropriated by those sitting opposite. In 1942 I suggested a train to go across Canada to display the cornerstones of our freedom. When we set up the Centennial Commission we stated that first priority should be given to arrangements for a centennial train. This has done a great deal to show Canada to Canadians. But it lacks something. It lacks the inspiration which comes from the greatness of the lives of those of the past. For some reason or another Sitting Bull was made the representative of the great Indians of Canada until the train arrived at Calgary, when Sitting Bull sat. They put an end to that. What about Tecumseh and Piapot and Mistawassis, those great Canadian chiefs? They were forgotten on this train while an American was named as a great Canadian.

The Queen had no place on this train until I raised the question and the Queen's picture went in. No Canadian entering that train will ever see the Queen's picture unless he walks backward. When we complained to the Centennial Commission the answer over the telephone was: "This is a Canadian train".

Let us catch something of the inspiration of this nation's past. Let us not forever chisel away at our traditions. There has taken place in this country in the last four years a denigration of the principle of monarchy. Tradition is removed from our armed services. "Royal" disappears. They reveal this government's course.

I hope something will be done this year to give young Canadians a knowledge of their country. Many Canadians ask: "Why should I worry about history?" Mr. Speaker, "he who does not history know, does not know his country".

Let us build in this nation this year something of that inspiration which I had hoped to secure on reading the speech from the throne. Let it not be said that such sentiments cannot be embedded in the speech from the throne, that they are too general for inclusion. If ever a speech from the throne was packed full of generalities it is this one. It is a serious matter to put into the mouth of the new Governor General 45 minutes of words constituting in large measure a repetition of what has been said in the past containing nothing to inspire or lift up the heart. There is nothing which will ever be quoted except in this debate. Instead of this speech from the throne being a prospectus for Canada it is a record of unfulfilled promises. Those who have responsibility for drafting these speeches have been working on it for a long while. They have produced a pale, colourless creation, vague and uncertain. It contains 29 different items or promises of expected legislation, only three of which are new, and nothing at all regarding the constitution in this year of 1967 except "we are looking into it".

Well, Mr. Speaker, there used to be governments called "Breeches governments"—foolish governments—in the United Kingdom. We have never before had a government which qualified to be called the "we-are-looking-into-it" government. Now we have. On April 21 we heard an embryo speech from the throne by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson). We shall have another today, no doubt—a new compendium of broken promises and unrealized aspirations offering to the Canadian people the pretence of action.

I am going to review the recommendations in very short order. They include a department of consumer affairs, long-term loans to a agriculture and fishing co-operatives, and a crown corporation to run the Nova Scotia coal mines, something that the members from Cape Breton on our side of the house have been trying to bring about for a long while. So far as agriculture is concerned it is a wonder that the seconder of the address in reply said everything is well. All that is going to be done for the farmer, with prices falling and the cost of the things he has to purchase rising, is a task force for agriculture, as if agriculture is not in enough difficulties now.

There is nothing in the speech from the throne to premise incentives for free enterprise and there is no hope of tax reductions. The government would not set out tax reductions at this time but it could give an idea of what it is going to do on behalf of tax-ridden Canadians.

What do they promise? I have referred to the B.N.A. Act. Then they are going to extend the designated area program, amend unemployment insurance provisions, and bring in a white paper on investment. This is an example of the government's "Gordon syndrome." Every time he does anything he gets them into trouble. They cannot live with him, they cannot live without him. They are going to have him as chairman of a committee to decide whether foreign investment is any good. Well, Mr. Speaker, we know he is free from bias in that connection. That is the reason he was chosen as chairman of the committee.

There is another victory over the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and those of the right in the Canada Development Corporation. That hoary chestnut has been dug up for the third or fourth time; this is resurrection in triplicate.

Sir, the speech from the throne is an amazing document. There are going to be amendments to the Indian Act but we do not know what they are going to be. We gave the Indians the vote when we were in office. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) brought in a bill for votes for Eskimos and we supported it.

There is something amazing about international affairs. Here is a government full of international experts. Yet what do they produce in respect of Viet Nam? The government, knowing that the United Nations turned down the proposal of Canada and associated nations for the setting up of a peace force, under the United Nations, now proposes an international presence. General Allard says that our forces are going to be made over as an international force. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to let the Canadian people know that without NATO freedom cannot survive.

There is to be a complete revision of the Immigration Act. This has come back for the second or third time. It is only a few months since the government brought in changes through the medium of a white paper. This was revised when it became evident, as we pointed out, that they discriminated against sponsored immigrants. Now there are to be further revisions.

Urban development is also resurrected. I can just see the members of the cabinet saying to each other, "What did we ever say that we did not carry out? Let us put down our broken promises in order." There are to be new housing programs. Canada is in the worst housing mess it has ever been in. Nothing would be more beneficial than the removal of the sales tax on building materials. But the government will not do that.

It has also produced a rephrased vision of the north. Members of the government now recognize Canada's northland which they once ridiculed. Now they want to do something about it.

They brought capital punishment and divorce together in the one line. One ends trouble and the other begins it.

Miss LaMarsh: Which is which?

Mr. Diefenbaker: But they left out the other corner of the Prime Minister's social trilogy, the abortion promise. They left that out.

Mr. Pearson: We are leaving that to the opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government's proposal respecting financial disclosure by corporations gives lip service to the principle of protecting the investor. They say they are going to revise safety standards. They forgot to put in the code of ethics. This, Mr. Speaker, is a cursory summary of what they say they are going to do.

It is said, Mr. Speaker, that parliament is not effective. It is just because of this kind of thing that it is not effective—a government that produces a speech from the throne full of generalities and replays its record of broken promises. One of the most effective portions of the speech by the hon. member who moved the address in reply came when he spoke of parliament. He said that he came in here believing that this institution measured up to the criticism of those who have never seen parliament.

Recently I talked to one of the outstanding Canadians of our time and he told me parliament was deficient and ineffective. I asked him, "How many times have you seen parliament in action?" He replied, "I have read about it." Parliament is always criticized. It is criticized in Britain today. It is criticized in Australia and in New Zealand but somehow or other the critics in all generations find that what they criticize is the effective embodiment and protection of freedom.

Parliament is not a sausage machine to grind out legislation. Parliament is a place in which the freedom of the individual is preserved. That is its first purpose.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Parliament is not a place that is to be efficient. That is the civil service idea, that all that is necessary is for a bill to be introduced, a crank to be turned by the government and out will come an act of parliament. That is not the concept that has made for the greatness of this place in the British tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that those in the press gallery will not agree but I say to some of them who criticize parliament, as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) said a few months ago, those who have the responsibility of communicating what happens in parliament to the public are not reporting what takes place here in a way that enables Canadians to weigh the issues. What is happening is that less and less space is available for factual reporting.

They complain about attendance in the House of Commons. Mr. Speaker, there is too much absenteeism. There is no doubt about that. I am not one of those who have insisted on a roll call but there is a roll call in the Senate and also in the Congress of the United States. But I do say that we members of the House of Commons cannot justify our absences unless we are on some business connected with constituencies or the responsibilities of office or the responsibilities of those who lead parties.

Then there is the idea that one can understand parliament by going upstairs and staying out of the house. I have heard that mentioned all through the years. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo has been in the house. He has listened; he has caught something of the spirit of the house. He could not have got this by being absent from the house. We will not reform parliament until we have an attendance here which is not like that of the past few years. I know some of my colleagues will not like this. This has never been a factor to impel me not to face facts. As members we need the determination to be here. We could do more for parliament provided the press, radio and television would report something concerning what is said by every member. When a backbencher gets up and makes a carefully prepared speech he does not even receive honourable mention. We will never build parliament in that way.

I notice that the new house leader has come up with a new idea. He says that he is not receiving enough advertising. In the Ottawa Journal of May 6, 1967 the following appeared under the heading, "Orders Surgery on Health Dept. Image."

> Health Minister MacEachen has directed his department to adopt "a radical new public relations approach" to improve its present "poor image".

It does not say whether that is the minister or the department. He goes on to say that from now on he does not want the public relations men to inform the public of the programs but that what is needed is information.

That, above everything else, is what I suggest parliament needs today. Friends of mine have sat in the gallery and when it was all over they said to me, after they read the press account the next day, they could not recognize the parliament they saw. The number one project for this year is that parliament should project itself. Many changes in the rules are necessary to enable us continually and more effectively to discharge our responsibilities. These changes, however, should be made by agreement, not compulsion by the government as a matter of parliamentary expediency. The house would solve a great deal of absenteeism if some part of the proceedings were televised. It would not be very long before constituents in all parts of Canada would be pointing out that they could not find their member. The impelling result of this publicity upon all of us in public life would be amazing.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, there was very little in the speech from the throne. What are some of the things which should have been and are not in the speech from the throne? First, there should have been a declaration that parliament will put a stop to the removal of our traditions. Let us end this race to remove those things which made possible our sitting here. Had it not been for successive British governments Canadians would have had no rights. The argument advanced at the time of confederation was that unless we confederated and stood together the rights of language and religion would be lost—

Mr. Diefenbaker: —if we became a part of the United States.

I ask the Prime Minister, what has happened to the war on poverty? Certainly a cease-fire has taken place. It may well be that the war is over. We have been told nothing at all about that. Why is there no reference, except in a general way, to broadening economic expansion? Why is there no reference to what parliament will be asked to do in the event that the Kennedy round of negotiations collapses—and I hope it will not. They have been talking for four years and now the various countries face and impasse.

What is the government of Canada going to do provided the United Kingdom does what it believes is best for the United Kingdom and joins the European common market? What will happen to our agricultural market? I read the other day that the prime minister of the United Kingdom said that so far as possible the United Kingdom intends to preserve and protect those preferences. What has the government of Canada, aside from silence, done in the face of a situation which, if the United Kingdom enters the European common market without some qualification, will have a detrimental effect not only on agriculture but also on our aluminum industry and several other industries? Why was there no mention of that?

Why is there only a generality about confederation? In the last four years we have seen this government go through all kinds of transformations. To start with we had "two nations' and the "opting out" provision. Then we had one pension law for the rest of Canada and one for the province of Quebec. If the "two-nation" proposition was a good one when it was enunciated by the Prime Minister in April of 1963, then the idea that any province can enter into treaties is a tenable one. Why was nothing said about that in the speech from the throne?

When we convened a conference on February 4, 1963, to discuss Canadian confederation we did it on the basis of the words of Sir John Macdonald when in his seventy fifth year he said in the House of Commons:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that, by any mode whatever, there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other. I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible.

That has been the stand of the Conservative party ever since 1890.

Confederation was achieved by a partnership of English speaking and French speaking men who believed that the destiny of the north half of this continent might be achieved in unity but not through uniformity. We have done well. Changes, however, must be made in the light of changing conditions. I opposed the setting up of the commission on biculturalism. I said it would not work. To this day they have spent $7½ million and have divided this country as it never has been divided before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would be easy to get votes to support that proposition. I thought it was wrong and my colleagues agreed. We wanted to bring the provinces together in what my friend the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) calls in his own way a "family gathering". We wanted a meeting for the purpose of restating the goals of Canadian confederation, a gathering designed to correct any injustices that have taken place during the past hundred years, a gathering of Canadians to round out and restate these goals for the second century, not for the purpose of splitting this nation. We were defeated. We sent out invitations but no meeting has been called.

In the light of our experience during the past four and a half years we believe that what we asserted as being necessary in 1963 has been proven so and that it is time now for action rather than this pusillanimous, diplomatic approach that somebody somewhere is looking into this matter who will finally come up with something so that we will be in a position to call together some kind of a meeting.

There is not a word in the speech about crime. I do not intend to fill the record with statements of recent days about the Mafia but there is no doubt that there has been and is today a continuing disregard of the law by persons responsible for this situation. There are people who believe that by simply convening a gathering and endeavouring to bring pressure on the government they can destroy the rule of law. The time has come to do something in connection with the crime explosion.

We were criticized when we suggested a link between arson and bankruptcies. This is now accepted and there are today over 200 investigations taking place. We believe that the crime situation must be faced by this nation; otherwise everything we hold dear will be eroded. I suggest a royal commission to look into the whole picture of crime and its expansion. That commission should report within a period not exceeding six months. The records show there is increasing crime in the United States and the United Kingdom. They are trying to do something. Because of divided jurisdiction within our country this problem is not being faced on a national level.

What about a national transportation policy in order to make available greater facilities and shorter routes? I will go into that in detail on another occasion, but there is nothing in this speech except generalities.

Let me now turn to a matter which was dealt with by the mover of this motion, and that is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. No one in this house is more qualified than the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. He knows about the problems. What did he warn us of yesterday? He warned us of the danger to Canadian thinking resulting from a mass application of propaganda through the medium of radio and television.

Last night one of the reporters for the C.B.C. told about conditions in North Vietnam, confirming what Mr. Clark, the assistant editor of the Montreal Star, had stated. No matter what is done the seeds have been sown by that broadcast and that article in the minds of the Canadian people to the effect that we in Canada are a variety of high class international double-crossers. That is what it amounts to. We are accused of using our neutral position as a member of the international control commission to help the United States. That is a very serious matter and I hope action will be taken to look into it.

To be perfectly frank, is there any hon. member who can deny that more and more the C.B.C. is not giving the people of this nation a reasonably equal presentation of the viewpoints? There is great conflict within the news operations of the C.B.C. There are charges of power grabbing. Serious infighting is taking place in this government organization because of the lack of leadership. In this regard the government is responsible because of its failure to appoint a man in charge and a vice president. Everybody is boss now and those who should be running the organization have abdicated their authority.

The C.B.C. is not a plaything. It will spend $150 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money this year. There are reports that the Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) offered to take the job of running this organization but apparently there were no takers. Operating costs for this year have increased by $29 million; yet my information is that the C.B.C. is at least 16 to 20 months behind in its routine bookkeeping and accounts. Money is being wasted on every hand. The organization sent a crew to Uruguay to cover the O.A.S. conference at a cost of $20,000. It set up a West Indies broadcasting service and sent a man from Toronto at $29,000 a year to direct it. This kind of spending cannot continue.

The C.B.C. was set up by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett and his government as an institution to make available Canadian culture for Canadians. It has become an institution engaged in a race with private enterprise to obtain advertising. Chaos now reigns in the C.B.C. What is the government going to do about it?

The director of news and public affairs for the C.B.C. has only very recently been confirmed in his position. The news department is in a state of disintegration and one has only to listen to the news to realize how the quality of news items has deteriorated from even a year ago. Yet the news department spends $4 million a year.

Surely Canadians have a right to expect that the C.B.C. shall preserve a pride in their nation, shall let them know something of our various cultures. I am told that the national television news on the opening day of Expo was half an hour late in its broadcast. Whether this was because of disagreement between Toronto and Montreal, I do not know. But the C.B.C. is leaderless and rudderless today. I asked the question yesterday, and it has not yet been answered, whether an agreement had been entered into with any foreign government, in particular with the U.S.S.R., for the purpose of ascertaining what that agreement was and what the circumstances were. The C.B.C. in 1967, our centennial year, should be made to realize that its purpose is to play its part for Canada and build in this nation a feeling of Canadianism. Canadian culture is dealt with in C.B.C. broadcasting in a very minimal way.

Next I come to the question of educational television. The government decided to bring that in by the back door through an estimate. We stopped that. I feel that it should be under the C.B.C. and there should not be another member of this vast, increasing family of bureaucracy. Indeed, sir, in the last three years the government has become the biggest business in Canada.

Next I deal with a matter about which we will not be told anything today by the Prime Minister—tax reduction. I hope that action will be taken to reduce taxation and cut out wasteful expenditures. I can give particulars of these wasteful expenditures at any time. The implementation of the Glassco report is long overdue. These are matters we should be facing this year. We should be carrying out a re-examination of Canada's fiscal policies and arrangements, keeping in mind the principle that in the interests of confederation the collecting authority should wherever possible be the authority which spends.

There should be the immediate establishment of a national scientific institute to enable Canada to restore prestige in the scientific field, to mobilize scientific effort in industry, universities and government and to achieve a better balance in co-ordinated scientific advancement. Today there is duplication between government and industrial activities. In this technological age we need to move forward in that direction, not by replacing and supplanting the efforts of the National Research Council but by setting up an institute as a co-ordinating and assessing body not engaged in actual experimentation.

In agriculture what is the situation? Talk to the farmers. Despite the eloquence of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), the farmers of this country are up in arms. There must be legislation at this session to ensure a fair deal for agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about relations between labour and industry? The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) is repeatedly saying that everything is out of date and something should be done. There was nothing in the speech from the throne to meet this problem, one that is exercising the leadership both in the United States and the United Kingdom and one that cannot be indefinitely postponed. Pollution has been mentioned. Over and over again various hon. members have raised the need of a national crusade against pollution in co-operation with the provinces. True enough there is some reference to this matter in the speech from the throne, but a policy must be formulated that will be effective.

This is a matter that could be placed before a committee of the house to go into the problem in detail at this session and thereby assure that this question, which is assuming proportions far and above anything that could have been contemplated a few years ago, will receive attention.

Mention was made in the speech from the throne of some action for Indians and Eskimos. I suggest that the government might set up a department of native affairs having as its deputy head a native Indian of Canada or an Eskimo, and that senior positions on a representative basis be filled by natives wherever possible. These are just a few of the matters that have been left out.

Now I come to a major matter, the question of education. Education falls exclusively within the jurisdiction of the provinces and it must so remain. But surely we are not going to leave Canada in a position behind the other countries of the world in the tremendous impetus that is being given to education. When we were in office, as a result of the efforts of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) and my colleagues we were able to bring about a system acceptable to the provinces in the setting up of technical and vocational schools. That is ending now; this government does not want it to survive.

We must face immediately the need of a massive educational assistance plan for both universities and secondary schools. Somebody will say this will cost money. I will not be asking for the expenditure of moneys in respect of matters that are not of vital importance to the nation. What happens in the cities and towns today? The man who owns his home is the one who is paying a major portion of the taxes for education. Too great a load rests there. I would like to see a committee of the house study fully the whole problem of education and then in co-operation with the provinces we would nationally provide assistance while fully respecting and regarding the jurisdiction of the provinces.

I mentioned earlier that we wanted to convene a national confederation constitutional conference. We have tried to get this government to act on it. We have been put off from month to month and from year to year. The constitution is being eroded by private deals. The culmination of this—the fruit of the family tree planted by the Liberal party in the last few years—was the declaration, acceptable to both parties in the legislature of Quebec, on the subject of international relations and the making of treaties. Where are we going? Are we going to be a series of Canadian satrapies with each province entering into international agreements? They may be the popular thing to support but, sir, popularity comes second to the future of this country. Canadian unity cannot be preserved if we continue to chisel away the principles that made confederation possible and which are still the law and constitution of this country.

We suggest that a conference should be convened at once to be attended by federal and provincial representatives as well as representatives of all the political parties. I would like to see representation from all classes and groups in our society, including labour, industry, business, agriculture and so on. This would not be a conference for a day or two but a conference of Canadians for Canada's future.

There is a spirit today in this nation that I have never seen before. There is a willingness to co-operate. I have noticed the change in the years I have been here.

I have noticed a tremendous change in the thinking of Canadians in all the provinces. There is a willingness to try to bring about a rapport that has not existed for many years. When I came first to parliament when anybody spoke French everybody else left because they did not understand it. It was slightly different when somebody spoke English but those who were English speaking often left also. A few years ago, we made this House of Commons bilingual as the constitution provides. It is very interesting today to watch questions being asked in English and answered in French and vice-versa. When we made this house bilingual it was not popular but it is now. There is an attitude among people in all the provinces that if they could only get together and understand what each one wants there might be not too great difficulty in arriving at arrangements acceptable to all. What better year than the hundredth year of our confederation to sit down at a conference methodically and purposefully, without heat, bias or prejudice. We do not want to limit the conference to a few days. It took weeks and months in 1864 and 1866. Such a conference would bring about a fair and reasonable assessment of what changes are necessary and practical. All those present, if I mistake not the feeling of the Canadian people, would be activated by a single aim and by one desire, namely the common good of all Canadians and of Canada as a whole.

I make this appeal again to the Prime Minister. I say that the tinkering that has gone on is arousing antagonism throughout the country. The constitution cannot be changed by whittling it away. If I am charged with overstating the question, I will refer hon. members to the speech made the other day by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) in which he said among other things that opting out and the like have weakened the Canadian constitution.

At a confederation conference I would look for representatives of every province in Canada to appear with solid, practical suggestions. I would hope that representatives would come with open minds and in a spirit of Canadian fraternity to endeavour to meet the situation. It will not, in my time, tear this nation asunder but if the constitution is to be circumvented, undermined or departed from on an ad hoc basis, Canada will not long survive.

That is the essence of what I have to say today. I make this appeal to the house. To secure the viewpoint of the members of this house I shall move an amendment. What should be put in it? I do not like omnibus amendments. I like an amendment which will strike at the heart and raise the hope of men and women across this nation. We could incorporate in the amendment that Canadian-American relations are in a very bad state and that internationally our image as a result of our stand on Viet Nam is one of pusillanimous neutrality. We could incorporate an item to the effect that nothing has been done to meet the overriding problem in so far as the economy and industrial and labour relations are concerned. It could include a demand for a reduction in unnecessary expenditures and an end to those climbing expenditures which have gone up $3 billion since we held office.

I hear so much about youth today. Where is there anything for youth in the speech from the throne? I hope that today the Prime Minister will announce again the 10,000 scholarships which are like sugar plums hanging in the air for four years. Those who expected them and voted for them have graduated. I could deal with the cost of living which according to the latest record rose 1.3 points over the month of March, the April report being in today. I could deal with the failure to assist the farmers and agriculture with the exception of the addition of one more task force which will have only one effect. Nobody needs to assess the task; everybody knows it. The force, however, will postpone action. We could include the housing crisis. According to the Financial Post of April 29, and it is always right in financial matters, the crisis is the greatest ever. We could deal with the need for action, as the No. 1 project of parliament today, in the reduction of taxation. All of these things could be included. However, this is centennial year and in my opinion, as well as in the opinion of all hon. members I am sure, national unity comes first. These other matters, therefore, may be dealt with when the budget comes up or when motions to go into supply are advanced. In order to give Canadians an opportunity of knowing whether this parliament means to act effectively in connection with our national problem of unity, I shall not deal with these several matters and many more with which I could deal.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard):

> This house regrets that Her Majesty's advisers have failed to submit any program to give effective direction with regard to Canada's constitutional development in this centennial year and has failed to provide for the calling of a national constitutional confederation conference to be widely representative of the governments, federal and provincial and of the territories, and of all political parties for the purpose of repatriating Canada's constitution and revising and amending it as agreed upon so that Canada's future course may be charted in the interests of all the people with a declaration of national goals based on the confident assurance of success that was so selflessly and patriotically displayed by the fathers of confederation.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): My first words, Mr. Speaker, must be to join with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in congratulating the mover (Mr. Jamieson) and seconder (Mr. Côté, Nicolet-Yamaska). I have been in the house a good many years, not as long as the right hon. gentleman but long enough to have listened to a great many speeches moving and seconding the address. I have never heard it done better. I think the two hon. members are to be very sincerely congratulated. I am sure they will get satisfaction out of the fact they know they have done their job well and will be appreciated in the parts of the country from which they come.

I should like, if I may, to congratulate the right hon. gentleman in opening this debate in predictable fashion. I feel a sense of relief, however, because his speech was less predictable in one sense. He was not quite as hard on the government and the leader of the government today as he has been on other occasions. Perhaps he is saving that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the centennial spirit.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to reciprocate that centennial spirit by taking out of my remarks anything that might indicate a reflection on the wisdom, energy, devotion, determination and all the other good qualities which the right hon. gentleman possesses. At the end of his very interesting statement, he said that he was not going to move on this occasion an omnibus amendment. I must say that at first glance this one seems to be rather omnibus, although it does concentrate on the calling of a constitutional conference to revise and rewrite our constitution. I shall have something to say about this later.

At one point in his remarks he stated that this country was never so divided as it is now. I do not agree with that. However, I do agree with what he said later and which I hope represents his more considered opinion. He said that there is in the country now a spirit of unity and willingness to co-operate of which we all, as Canadians, can be proud.

In his introduction to his remarks the right hon. gentleman presented his own version of Canadian history. He was very eloquent indeed, and with what he told us I have no quarrel except perhaps to point out that when he charges us on this side, as he so often does, with trying to put into effect in this country a two-nation policy in the political sense, and when he quotes Sir John A. Macdonald to underline the enormity of that kind of policy he should remember, and I am sure he does remember, that it was Sir John A. Macdonald who said once of French speaking Canadians, "Treat them as a nation and they will act as a free people generally do."

The right hon. gentleman complained, and I certainly do not quarrel with this, about the length of the speech from the throne and the inadequacy of the material in the speech having regard to its length. It was a long speech, Mr. Speaker, though I seem to remember when I was in opposition standing behind the bar in the Senate chamber for more than 41 minutes on more than one occasion. I promise to do my best next January, February or March to keep it down to about 25 minutes, and I am sure the Governor General will co-operate with me in that regard.

Having mentioned the length of the speech, however, the right hon. gentleman quarreled about the fact we had not included in it a great many things which he mentioned and which, if we had included them in the speech, would have extended it another 40 or 45 minutes. It is quite true that no speech from the throne, however long it may be, can encompass all the legislative plans of a government over a period of what is now normally about 12 months. I will try to mention some of the things in detail that were not included in the speech from the throne but with which I hope this parliament will be able to deal in our centennial year.

The right hon. gentleman referred to us as a "look-into-it" government. When we are faced with problems we look into them by setting up commissions of inquiry. This is quite true. My own experience has taught me that it is quite wise to look into things before you act. But having complained about this weakness, as he termed it, on our part, he proceeded to recommend two further inquiries, both of which might be quite useful but which would require in one case setting up a royal commission and in the other a parliamentary committee into education.

I wish to make another promise to my right hon. friend which arises out of the statement he made in Winnipeg when he intimated that as a crafty, cunning politician—those were not his words but that is what he meant—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pearson: —and I know that he meant these words in a kindly way—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had not that in mind.

Mr. Pearson: I never had it in mind either. But the hon. gentleman, speaking as a politician, said that I might well take advantage of any disunity and division in the Conservative party and call a quick election in centennial year. I wish to assure him and the house that I have no such intention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course the Prime Minister said the same thing in 1965.

Mr. Pearson: If there is an election this year it will be only because of defeat in the house on a motion of non-confidence. My right hon. friend has just moved such a motion of no confidence, and that of course cannot be supported by those sitting on this side of the house.

I was moved by what the right hon. gentleman said about the effect of centennial year on the national spirit and national unity. I agree with him, and I am sure all hon. members share my feeling, that this celebration of our centennial of confederation is strengthening the pride and confidence of Canadians in their own country. This spirit has given us a greater sense of unity and strength and an appreciation and understanding of what we have achieved and what we can achieve.

It seems to me that we have arisen from the psychoanalyst's couch; we are up and doing things again. We are more aware also of what we have done, and therein lies the value of the lesson of history. We have a strong faith in our future and in our ability to solve the difficult and complex problems facing us. I think that Expo '67 has itself made a brilliant and important contribution to this new Canadian feeling.

The right hon. gentleman mentioned some of the proposals in the speech from the throne. I should like to deal with some of those and some that were not mentioned in the speech. No speech from the throne includes all of a government's legislative proposals. I remember that when I was sitting opposite the right hon. gentleman produced some most exciting proposals after the speech from the throne had been read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They were only amplifications.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I have improved on that technique by bringing forward certain proposals before the speech from the throne was read. A good deal, of course, is before us, and I hope that the house is able to take action before any summer adjournment on certain matters which I shall mention. The debate on the address has to be disposed of. We must have approval of the main estimates and the budget has to be introduced and debated. Certain bills I think ought to be dealt with before any summer recess. These are the immigration bill, the Cape Breton Development Corporation bill, the Canadian Wheat Board bill, the Canadian citizenship bill and the interpretation bill. Because I agree completely with what the right hon. gentleman has said about the importance of broadcasting in our national life and the necessity for action by the government and parliament, I hope that we shall be able to introduce before the summer recess the broadcasting bill, even though it may not be dealt with until autumn. I also hope it will be possible to introduce in an appropriate way the resolution on capital punishment.

We have a list of legislative proposals, and a good deal of this legislation appeared on the order paper in the previous session. A good deal of this legislation ought to be completed during our centennial year. It includes the budget bill and appropriation acts—these can be left until autumn if we make satisfactory progress—changes in the divorce law, criminal code amendments, including provisions relating to abortion, contraception and hate literature, the revision of the rules of the house—we have already set up a committee for that purpose—the revision of the Canada Corporation Act, Food and Drugs Act amendments, amendments to the Publication of Statutes Act, an amendment to Parliamentary Secretaries Act, the Canada manpower and immigration council bill, the National Museum bill, and certain other measures not previously introduced or mentioned in the speech from the throne but which may be dealt with either this summer or autumn.

If I seem to have produced a long list, may I remind hon. members that in the last session of the House of Commons we brought into law 83 bills. If we could pass 83 bills during the last session with all the diversionary difficulties we encountered I hope we shall deal without too much difficulty with the following list of legislation: National Parks Act amendments, the federal co-operatives bill, Pension Act amendments, Post Office Act amendments, National Energy Board Act amendments, Juvenile Delinquents Act amendments, Farm Improvement Loans Act amendments, Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act amendments, Canadian National Railways Financing and Guarantee Act amendments, 1967-68 Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act amendments, Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act amendments, and hazardous substances legislation.

That is the kind of program I hope we shall accomplish during our centennial year, and there are other, smaller, non-controversial bills which I hope by agreement may be brought forward whenever the opportunity arises. I have listed these pieces of legislation, apart from those which I hope will be passed before a summer recess, not in any necessary order of priority. I am aware that if we are to pass these bills, if we are to accomplish this program, we shall have to organize the business of government and the business of parliament. I hope, with this organization in mind, that there can be advance planning with the house leaders meeting regularly so that the business of parliament and the legislation I have listed in Hansard may be proceeded with expeditiously. I hope that this organization can be worked out by collaboration and agreement, after discussion with representatives of all parties, even before the question of the priority of legislation is discussed at all-party committees. If we can do that, if we can work out general agreement as we approach specific pieces of legislation, not only will we get through this centennial program of legislation but we shall have added greatly to the effectiveness and efficiency of our parliamentary system, and that is something we all wish to do.

The last session was the longest in our parliamentary history. It was also one of our most productive. Eighty three bills, not including appropriation bills, became acts of parliament. I should like to discuss this afternoon some of the actions that still need to be taken and why I think they are required. Many of these proposals could not be brought forward during the last session, not because they were not on the order paper but because of the time required to pass the 83 bills to which I have already referred.

The speech from the throne reflects in general terms the need for government to improve the opportunities for every Canadian to live a better life. A great deal of the legislation I have mentioned comes within the context of improving people's opportunities to better their own lives. Like people everywhere, Canadians want at least a basic minimum of economic opportunity and social justice as a starting point for personal fulfilment. I believe we have made good progress in this parliament and in this country in establishing this basic level of opportunity and social security. We have achieved a national living standard and a system of social security of which we can be proud.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Pearson: Of course, there is always room for improvement even though the basic structure has been well laid. There is, for instance, a growing interest in this country as in other countries in the idea of a guaranteed minimum annual income for every family or even for every citizen. This is a sweeping idea and an increasingly popular one with many complicated and far reaching implications. There is one view that the provision of a guaranteed income might be a more effective and more economically efficient approach than separate pensions and social security measures in ensuring that basic human needs are provided for. It may be that we could provide the social welfare services we are now providing at a smaller cost even through such an approach. But the opposite might be the case.

Studies have been made in this field for the purpose of obtaining further information. The report of a Senate committee went into it many months ago, not in an exhaustive way, of course. Perhaps it would be useful at some fairly early date, in line with my tendency to look into things, to have all the implications and possibilities of the idea of a guaranteed income thoroughly examined. Such a study ought to be made solely as a means of determining as authoritatively as possible whether this idea is a desirable and practical one which should be considered by parliament.

Having said this, I should add we must never forget that only out of an expanding economy with full employment and rising production can social security be maintained or strengthened as required. In that sense, financial and economic policy is an essential part of social security progress. I do not intend to deal with financial and economic matters today. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) may have an opportunity to participate in this debate as, indeed, may other ministers.

We have a well developed economy and this poses for us the challenge of how best to use and enjoy our unprecedented progress and good fortune both in our national interest as a society of free individuals and in fulfilling our international responsibility in this world community of man. I think most Canadians now realize that social justice cannot be measured in economic terms alone. It must also be measured in terms of standards which are more than material and of opportunities for personal development and fulfilment. This means we must be prepared to recognize in our laws changing social values. It is with this approach in mind that parliamentary committees have been set up by this house and are considering what might best be described as new social law dealing with matters like divorce, contraception, abortion, capital punishment, penal reform and that kind of thing. It is my hope, as I have just indicated in the list I have read, that this session we shall at least be able to make certain changes in this area which are required to bring the legislation into line with current conditions and current thinking.

We are also, as the speech from the throne states, giving consideration to what I consider to be an important and legitimate new federal initiative in the area of consumer affairs. Until the day comes when individual and collective integrity are to be depended upon as the only regulation which is required—in other words, until we reach Utopia—Canadians will expect their governments to do what is necessary to protect the public interest and ensure fair and honest practices for the protection of consumers.

We intend to meet whatever federal responsibilities are required to be met in this area using the present Department of the Registrar General as a department of consumer and corporate affairs and, as such, the main instrument for discharging and coordinating federal responsibilities in this field. We intend to recognize the growing demand for greater consumer protection in so far as these matters fall within federal jurisdiction. And when they are not within federal jurisdiction there is no reason why we should not take the initiative in discussing them with the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: We are also considering with a view to parliamentary action certain recommendations made by the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on consumer credit including a proposal that large companies should be required to make public more information about their business operations. Whole sectors of our economy today are, if not dominated, very largely influenced by a few large corporations. This may well improve our capacity to compete effectively in international markets through specialization, consolidation and maximum efficiency but at present there is not enough information disclosed about their business operations to permit Canadians to judge whether companies wielding such large influence are doing so with the public interest primarily in mind.

For instance, so-called private companies have the right under existing law to keep all their activities private not only from governments but from economists, lawyers, politicians, the rest of the business community and prospective investors. There is a growing and, I think, justifiable demand within our business community and outside for more information about the operations of corporate business whether private or public, Canadian or foreign-owned.

In the course of his speech the right hon. gentleman mentioned housing. I should like to say a few words about it because I agree with him that this is one of the most important problems facing this country at the present time. There is today an urgent need to do all we can in co-operation with and by way of assistance to the provinces which have the primary constitutional responsibility in this field to make more housing available to Canadians, especially to those in the lower and middle income brackets. In the course of this debate my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) will, I hope, have the opportunity to say a good deal more on the subject.

But I think we should also pay more attention, as we are beginning to do, to the still larger problem of community development and environmental planning in Canada. I believe the federal government has a duty to suggest new ways in which it may help the provinces and the municipalities, without interfering with their responsibilities to cope more effectively with this larger challenge which is rapidly becoming one of the most urgent confronting every level of government in Canada today. I read the other night in a comment on the speech from the throne that in proposing to deal with these large subjects of community planning, environmental life and all that kind of thing we were off in the distant future speculating about what we should do in this field. There is nothing of the distant future about it. This is an urgent and immediate problem in Canada and it cannot be solved without the co-operation of all three levels of government.

As the speech from the throne indicates, the government is seriously concerned about the need to find more effective ways for all levels of government to co-operate more closely in providing Canadians with a better living environment, both in our urban and in our rural areas. With the steady growth in our population the need for more housing can only increase in the future, and that need is great now. Virtually half of Canada's existing housing stock of 5,400,000 dwellings has been constructed since the end of world war II over a period of little more than 20 years. Much of this housing has been facilitated, if not made possible, by federal assistance, as indeed has progress in urban development generally, assistance in a form which has been quite substantial but also acceptable to all the provinces and municipalities.

Despite generally good progress in the housing field so far, however, Canada's programs have fallen very far short of need, especially for persons of low levels of income. For example, of the approximately two and a half million new dwellings constructed since the war only 56,400 units were directly intended to meet the needs of our low income people. The challenge that this involves to all three levels of government in Canada today is going to increase in the future, and in the very near future. In little more than the decade that lies immediately ahead we will have to produce another two and a half million dwelling units just to ensure that Canadians are adequately housed. That is as many new units as we have produced since the war, and we are going to have to produce them now in less than half that time. That is the immediate and most urgent problem but there is a need also for a better quality of living environment in Canada which goes along with this need for housing.

Housing itself is of first importance but it is also important that we do not get just horizontal rows along streets and vertical rows up and down elevators. Therefore I hope the government will be able to put forward proposals for legislation at this session which will help the provinces and cities in dealing with the housing problem and also ancillary problems of urban development.

There is also a growing need for federal co-operation with the provinces in reserving land as open space within urban areas and in developing new suburban communities. Urban living is becoming steadily more concentrated. I was informed a few days ago, although I do not know whether the statistics are accurate, that in a very few years 80 per cent of the people of Canada will be living in half a dozen great metropolitan areas. This emphasizes the need for recreational open space to be shared in the form of parks and conservation areas.

It would not be sensible to offer assistance in the development of new urban communities without being able to see these developments as parts of a whole city and metropolitan region. It is only within a regional framework that intelligent decisions can be made about the main transportation routes and utilities, about open space and built-up space, and about the focal points of communities where traffic, high density housing and commercial services will be concentrated. The federal government is prepared to discuss with the provinces—indeed discussions have already begun with my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson)—how it can usefully co-operate in these wider matters, as it already does in urban renewal.

We have the same problems and same requirements existing in less developed and less urbanized regions of our country, and here the same kind of public effort and private effort at all levels of government is needed to solve them. For instance, the regroupings of populations in Newfoundland, New Brunswick and in the prairie provinces, aided both by the ARDA programs and the provisions of the National Housing Act, are also in a sense exercises in urban development. Better housing and community facilities are essential steps for many Canadians, and are essential steps to be taken by Canadian governments.

These ideas, Mr. Speaker, are ones which I hope we will be able to put before the house before the end of this session. They are very much before our minds as a government now. If they are finally agreed upon in whole or in part they would involve extensions and improvements in the federal assistance role under the National Housing act, and we propose to bring amendments before the house during this session which would make that kind of improved assistance possible. But before we do this, since on the federal level we do not have information on all our regional and local needs I think it would be desirable for the government to explore this idea with the provinces as to how best we can work out co-operatively programs of this kind. I hope we will soon be in a position to invite the provinces to join us in practical discussion of these matters leading to a co-operative inquiry. This would perhaps be something new in our history, and this is the kind of constitutional development that can take place without any amendments to the constitution. It would be inviting the provinces and the federal government to conduct a joint inquiry, if you like, a federal-provincial royal commission, reporting back to both levels of government. This, I think, is something worthy of consideration.

The right hon. gentleman had a great deal to say about the constitution and how we should take advantage of centennial year to set up machinery for its revision and alteration and, indeed, the amendment he has moved deals with that particular question. Canada has accomplished great things under its present constitution. In the last 100 years that constitution has shown itself adaptable to change in days when change, I admit, was much slower than it is now. We have had our constitutional difficulties ever since the very beginning of confederation, federal-provincial constitutional difficulties almost from the first year of confederation, but those we have had have not prevented the great achievements of our first 100 years.

This is especially creditable when one considers that we in Canada are trying to do something that no other country in the world is trying to do in the same circumstances—to develop and administer with relatively few people a confederation that is continent-wide, a confederation in a country of vast distances, east and west, north and south, which at its founding included two basic languages and cultures, and in its development many others, to the great advantage of the country. We are doing this, moreover, under a federal structure of government which is far more difficult to operate than the unitary centralized government which Sir John A. Macdonald and many others wished for in 1867. Canada has shown by its own record of achievement that a federal system does not mean weakness at any level and that a country can develop under a federal system of government.

The accommodations and compromises we have had to make did not mean weakness or we could not have done what we did and would not be here today. This, however, has not been easy. Our size alone creates problems of government, not only physical ones. It produces differences of interest, of points of view. It often makes for regional emphasis, politically and economically, especially when things are going well. Moreover, language and cultural differences introduce politically complicating as well as nationally enriching elements in our society. They bring about differences in value, attitude and viewpoint. But we have always reconciled these differences under our present constitution. We have made federal democracy work even though democracy requires a maturity, restraint and discipline which is far more difficult to maintain in the jet age than in the horse and buggy days of 75 years ago.

Today the constitution remains the most important single element in our government. In some ways, perhaps, it is the most important single element in our achievements. It is the source of the rights and jurisdiction of the provincial as well as the federal governments. It is a protection for all the people, especially minorities. So an obvious and vital factor in our national growth is our constitution. An obvious and vital factor in any constitution is a method for changing it. In 100 years we have not yet found a way to do that, although we came very close to it a few years ago.

Changes can alter and upset the balance of rights and powers. Indeed, they are bound to do so if they are of any substance. There are two possible ways to bring about changes in our constitution. The first is by the process of gradual revision of what we have. In this process we start out with the British North America Act. The first stage in that process is to agree on how to change it. If we cannot agree on that, we are not likely to agree on any substantial changes.

If we can agree on that, the second stage is to use the amending formula in order to make the required changes. We have done this three or four times in the last four or five years through the amendments concerning the retirement of judges in 1960, the retirement of senators in 1965 and the old age pensions and supplementary benefits in 1964. Changes of this kind can be relatively minor—two of the three I have just mentioned are relatively minor—or very far reaching as one of them was. Indeed, change of this kind could end with a total revision if all governments concerned so agreed.

The essence of this approach is not that it results in a limited change, a whittling away, or imposes restraint on what can or should be done. The essence is that it starts with what we have. It never incurs the risk of total breakdown by total agreement at a total formal conference. It permits of orderly change without limitation. It adapts to change and adapts the constitution to change by modernizing and strengthening an existing structure. In addition, constant and progressive adaptation of our constitution to new needs has been made outside formal amendment to the British North America Act through federal-provincial agreements and conferences.

This, of course, is the way the present constitution was developed over the century. It was done not by formal action but by consultation. So those who think that Canada is frozen in an ironclad constitutional document do not, in my opinion, show much knowledge of what our constitution is or how it works.

The fact is that the Canadian constitution has shown a very high degree of flexibility and adaptability. This flexibility, however, does not mean that the British North America Act in itself is a document which cannot and should not be re-examined and changed when necessary. As my hon. friends know, some provinces already have commissioned and published studies on constitutional matters and the experience of these commissions in the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario should be studied very carefully by those who feel that what we should have now is a full dress constitutional conference.

The province of Quebec, for instance, for a few years now has had a committee of the legislature studying such matters. I understand that it is not finding it too easy to come to any agreed conclusion. The province of Ontario also has authorized constitutional studies by experts. They reported to the government a few weeks ago their varied views and conclusions concerning what should be done. The government of the province of Ontario also has suggested the convening of a conference on confederation goals, the nature of which at the moment is not very precise. As to the federal government, apart from our special role—and I believe in constitutional matters the federal government has a special role; it is not one government among 11: it is the federal government and has a special role in these matters—in the field of federal-provincial discussions, interdepartmental studies have been under way during the course of the last year. We have been preparing for these discussions and for parliamentary discussion by an interdepartmental committee which has been studying from the federal government point of view our constitutional problems and what in our view might be done to make our constitution more effective in terms of the problems of 1967.

To expedite these discussions the government has decided to set up in the Department of Justice a section especially concerned with constitutional matters. I believe I mentioned this point in the house. That section will be under the direction of a distinguished Canadian lawyer with extensive experience in federal-provincial matters. We will be able to rely not only upon excellent departmental resources for advice but will also be able to call upon outside help if we deem this to be advisable. I hope that this section will be in operation within a matter of days.

There is, however, another way to bring about constitutional change, that is, to devise a totally new structure or bring about an early and wholesale revision of the present constitution at a great constitutional conference, a national estates general with representatives, as the right hon. gentleman put it, of all governments, all parties, all leading agencies in the country, labour, business, finance and universities, and bring them together in a great centennial conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That would not be an estates general.

Mr. Pearson: The idea has a great attraction for many, but I think it also has great risks. It is comforting to hope that problems arising out of our present constitutional structure could be solved most quickly and effectively by starting over again completely and putting up an entirely new shiny glass and chrome structure on the old foundation. But if a constitution has succeeded for 100 years in providing free, successful, efficient government resulting in a productive, affluent competitive society, in my view it would be irresponsible to scrap it.

We believe that as a government it is our duty, and we will abide by this, to resist any constitutional leap in the dark which might be proposed on the spur of the moment or because of the occasional and temporary dissatisfaction of a particular government with this or that particular situation—a conference, for instance, where a province might bring forward a proposal to give any or all provinces certain international rights and obligations. Having said that, however, I should add that I admit that the federal government has a special responsibility to discharge its obligation in the constitutional field by doing what it should do through parliament to bring our constitution, as I have already said, in line with the problems of the day. We will actively pursue our own studies as a basis for federal proposals, and I hope we will not be too long in completing those studies. They will be used as a basis for consultation with parliament and the provinces.

Some weeks ago I wrote to all the provincial premiers suggesting that we should have an informal meeting in Ottawa on July 5, after the swearing in before the Queen of all the premiers as members of the Canadian privy council. This in itself I think is a significant centennial ceremony.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: I would hope that such a meeting would provide us with an opportunity for a free exchange of views on how we see the future of our country and our confederation. While I would not expect such a meeting to go into detailed discussions of constitutional matters—indeed, it would be impossible at any such meeting to do so—I would hope that we could see whether there are likely to be some matters on which there is fundamental agreement among all concerned and which could be made the subject of an early joint effort in the constitutional field.

I have an open mind on this matter but it would seem to me that one of the most important items in the constitutional field with which we could start federally and provincially would be the adoption by all Canadian governments, provincial as well as federal, of a bill of rights for all Canadians, enshrined not only in federal law as it now is but in provincial law. This would be the first statement by all governments in Canada of the basic foundations upon which they want the Canadian society to be established and to grow. It could be argued that such a bill should even precede specific constitutional reforms. Surely, before we can seriously hope to agree on structural changes, we should endeavour to agree, federally and provincially, on a statement of common values and on a declaration of our basic individual and collective rights as Canadians.

This is an area where several provinces and the federal government have made progress during the last few years, and it would seem to me that the centennial year of our confederation might be a good occasion for all the provinces and the federal government to get together and try to define a common statement guaranteeing the basic freedoms and rights of Canadians. I would hope that this could be based on the existing federal bill of rights, which will always be associated with the name of my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition.

I have just one or two other matters I should like to mention. I think all members of the house will agree that the government has been trying to advance the idea of more open government, if I may call it that, at the federal level, based on broader parliamentary discussion through committees. Of course we have set up more and more committees during the last few years and the more we set up the more difficult it makes it for hon. members to acquire that educational benefit which my right hon. friend suggested should be available to all members.

We have shown a willingness as a government to submit policy proposals to parliament for real and meaningful discussion and for revision when the government is convinced that revision is needed. We have taken this approach on a number of legislative proposals, notably the transportation and immigration measures.

We want to make parliament a more efficient place so far as decision making is concerned, and a committee for that purpose was set up during our first day of meeting. We also want to give parliament a chance to become a more effective forum for debating and influencing the decisions proposed by government.

Governments can more effectively discharge their responsibilities to the public if they can have more freedom to bring forward ideas and suggestions for discussion first and then be able to make necessary changes in the light of such discussion in parliament without being accused of weakness or retreat. At the same time the government must be able to stand firm on what it believes to be a right course without being accused of obstinacy or without debate being prolonged to inordinate lengths in order to force a change.

Today's media of communication have completely altered the possibility of democratic debate on public issues. My right hon. friend referred to this aspect very impressively a few moments ago when he was talking about broadcasting. In a sense the swiftness and comprehensiveness of our communications make it possible to conduct political debate on a nation-wide basis as it used to be conducted at the town meetings of our distant past. Issues can very quickly be made the focus of a nation-wide debate through today's communications media, but the issues are far more complicated than they used to be. The public can very rapidly be informed of the pros and cons and can make its weight felt on one side or the other almost overnight. This provides a new element of protection for the public interest in open and thorough airing of public issues, provided the public is honestly, objectively and adequately informed.

I believe this necessity of public exposure to issues must soon be given greater recognition in the procedures of parliament. I would like to join with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in expressing the hope that during this session some experimentation in regard to televising our procedures might be attempted, beginning perhaps with committee deliberations. In this way the people of Canada themselves could be brought more intimately into contact with the processes, the aspirations and the problems of their government institution. This might have quite an effect on the attitudes, the words and the manner of our debates, particularly if we knew they were going into the drawing rooms of the nation.

If I may be permitted a personal reminiscence, when I was sitting in the chair as president of the United Nations general assembly I was, as is my custom, doodling while a long speech was being made by a delegate. I do not know whether this would happen if we should have television cameras in this chamber but in those days the cameras could take close-ups from long range. While I was sitting there doodling I received a note from one of our delegates in the delegates' lounge who was watching the proceedings on television. His note read: "The television camera is on your hand; stick to those geometric patterns." We might have to be a little more careful if we have television in the house, and perhaps we should start in the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the only place they doodle?

Mr. Knowles: There are no geometrics there.

Mr. Pearson: In this way the people of Canada might be given a more meaningful picture of our debates, and the Canadian people might then get a better idea of the problems and difficulties we face in trying to govern this vast country in these most complicated and fast changing times.

I should like to conclude by saying a word about one aspect of international affairs. There may be an opportunity during this debate for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) to take part, during which time he would deal at greater length with these matters. My right hon. friend said that one of the subjects for an amendment might have been—I hope I am quoting him correctly—pusillanimous neutrality with regard to Viet Nam. The alternative to neutrality is involvement; we can leave the "pusillanimous" part out. Involvement means supporting one side or the other. I do not think it would improve our opportunities in working for peace if we took an active position as a government, with the responsibility of government, on one side or the other in the particularly difficult and dangerous situation in Viet Nam, because it is a dangerous situation and is, I think, causing more anxiety today than it has at any time since I have been trying to follow it. I think the present situation is making it more difficult for diplomatic initiatives to succeed in the direction of negotiation and peace and, if I may say so, there is no person in the western world who has worked harder to bring about negotiations for peace than the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: If that is our objective, and of course it is our objective to do what we can with the means at our disposal, I do not think that as a responsible government it would be wise or desirable or necessary for us to publicly condemn or publicly proclaim. I think it is better for us to play our part as a member of the international commission and of the international community and work in a quiet, not spectacular but as effective a way as possible, to help bring about an end of hostilities and to work also as a good friend and neighbour of the United States of America, which does not prevent our speaking out when there is an obvious and inescapable duty to do so, whatever may be our responsibility as a government. But I think there is imposed on us the obligation not to do that unless it is inescapable; otherwise I believe we would not be able to act in a way in which our suggestions would be listened to by the United States government when we put them forward through the channels of diplomacy.

My increasing anxiety in regard to Viet Nam, which I know is shared by a great many people, arises out of my reading of the situation which indicates that the possibility of early negotiation has receded, that a quick military victory is not possible nor a military solution.

Mr. Herridge: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The situation, then, in these circumstances becomes more dangerous internationally. I have no comment, of course, to make on the effect of a prolonged military struggle on the United States itself. If the fighting goes on, it seems to me likely that its scale will increase—I believe the word we have to use now is "escalate"—and the ultimate result of this is an increasing threat that fighting will not only increase but expand and in any event it will mean the destruction of Vietnamese people wherever they are.

I think it would also mean, if my analysis is correct, the indefinite involvement of the United States of America in Viet Nam militarily and politically, with all that this implies. It might mean the indefinite continuation of the cold war so far as the U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. are concerned at a time when this seems to be the only major obstacle in the way of an amelioration of the cold war. If that is the case, it is likely to postpone indefinitely any hope for an east-west detente which will include the United States of America and the U.S.S.R. In that event there will be increasing pressure brought to bear on Europe to make its own arrangements with eastern Europe, with the damaging effect on the Atlantic coalition and collective security that this would have. As my right hon. friend said in his address, and I am only paraphrasing, NATO and collective security are still essential for the protection of freedom in Europe and the Atlantic area.

So, Mr. Speaker, all these possible results do not cause me to be very optimistic and they do not give me any cause whatever for comfort. But all we can do as Canadians—and we have a special responsibility as the Canadian government—is everything we possibly can to bring our worries and anxieties to the notice of those who are more immediately and directly involved in the hope that our advice and counsel will be of some help to them. I am thinking particularly of Washington and the terrible problems they face there. I hope we will be able to discharge that duty and continue to discharge it in the way that I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been discharging it ever since he took on this portfolio.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think I should end where I began with a reference to our centennial year, to all that it means to us in terms of unity and strength as Canadians and what it is doing for us. I acknowledge the eloquence of the right hon. gentleman in this regard. As he has so often pointed out, in this house we have our strong and strongly expressed differences of opinion, but at a time like this these are very minor things compared to our pride in our country and our desire, indeed our determination, to do what we can to serve that country. There is nothing I would like better than to be able to say this is a good amendment on the part of the right hon. gentleman and we will all support it. Perhaps that would be my centennial project.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I cannot go as far as that because this amendment is a vote of no confidence in the government and was moved as such. I hope that in view of the record of what we have achieved in the last four years this house will feel that we should not be defeated on a vote of no confidence of this kind in the centennial year of confederation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, having consulted the other house leaders may I, on behalf of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), move the adjournment of the debate. My motion is seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MacEachen the house adjourned at 5.41 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 11, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will notice there are on today's order paper about 100 public bills listed for introduction by private members. It would be difficult if not impossible for the Chair to review the provisions of each of these bills at this time. May I therefore suggest to the house that we adopt the procedure that was agreed upon by the house in the past five sessions, namely that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of these bills so that each may be scrutinized between now and the time appointed for second reading in order to determine whether there be any defect therein with respect to the practices and usages of the house.

Therefore, in order to save the time of the house, taking into consideration that perhaps more than two hours would be required to introduce each of these measures separately, it is suggested that by unanimous consent all the bills listed for introduction on today's order paper be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the house, subject of course to a subsequent examination as to the regularity of each bill.

Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE AND STATEMENT ON AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, regarding this semi-formal federal-provincial meeting to be held in Ottawa on July 5 I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would table the correspondence that has been sent to the various premiers; would he advise what is on the agenda and whether, as suggested in the press, that this was a subject discussed between him and Premier Robarts on the occasion of the opening of Expo? Was the determination of this meeting made then.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad indeed to table the letters I sent to the provincial premiers in regard to this matter, and I shall immediately ask their permission for that tabling. I should think there would be no difficulty about that, and I will deal with it as quickly as possible. The letter itself will indicate the nature of the meeting. Also the date of the letter will show that it went out some time before I met Mr. Robarts at Expo in Montreal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say whether there is any prepared agenda, or is this just a kind of handshaking meeting?

Mr. Pearson: I hope it will be a handshaking meeting. Also I hope it will be more than that.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—STATEMENTS RESPECTING CANADA'S POSITION ON CONTROL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister with regard to his denial of the statements made by Mr. Gerald Clark of the Montreal Star and Mr. Tim Ralfe of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the effect that Canadian military personnel attached to the Canadian mission of the I.C.C. in Viet Nam have been passing on information to the United States authorities. Before that denial was issued was any attempt made to get in touch with either of these two gentlemen to ascertain what evidence they have upon which they based their statements?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question perhaps I should read the following statement which deals with it. Members of the Canadian delegation in Viet Nam are not engaged in clandestine or spying activities. I repeat that, Mr. Speaker. That was the reply I gave yesterday.

These Canadians, just like the other members of the international truce commission, carry out a quasi diplomatic task which includes observation of local conditions and discussions with the local authorities of both North and South Viet Nam. The Canadians in Hanoi have been working under difficult circumstances now for 13 years, along with Poland and India, and have done and are doing their best to meet their international assignment.

With reference to allegations that the Canadian delegation in Saigon prepares its reports in duplicate with one copy for Ottawa and the other for the United States embassy in Saigon, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that the allegations in question are based on pure speculation. The Canadian delegation reports to the Canadian government and the Canadian government only; it is for the Canadian government to decide in the case of these reports, as all others, what use is to be made of them in the course of normal diplomatic exchanges with other countries. Any departure from this procedure would be entirely contrary to established practice, and there is no authority for it.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister or anyone in the Department of External Affairs made any inquiries of the Canadian mission in Viet Nam to secure assurance that no information such as photographs, tape recordings or other information has been turned over at any time by any Canadian military personnel to the United States authorities? Has the government obtained this assurance, or was the denial by the government made before such assurance had been obtained?

Mr. Pearson: The government's denial was made with reference to the allegation that Canadian personnel on the international truce commission were engaged in clandestine activities. I repeat that. As a result of my hon. friend's question of this morning and the reports which have appeared, the whole question is now being exhaustively examined in all its details.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a specific question so there can be no mistake whatsoever. Was the statement attributed to Tim Ralfe, a reputable C.B.C. man who was there, correct or incorrect when he said that copies of dispatches funnelled through the Canadian headquarters in Saigon were sent to the American embassy even before they were transmitted to our external affairs department here in Ottawa? That is the simple question. It is not answered by a statement that we have no spies. We know we have no spies. Is that a true statement?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that in the statement I just made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the question he will not answer is a very simple question.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC—STATEMENT RESPECTING PROPOSED CENSORSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Can the hon. minister tell us whether she has received from the Quebec government recommendations asking to "block the present tendencies" towards television programs being broadcast by the C.B.C. which are morally injurious, in order to enable the Quebec province to better censor the films shown in theatres?

[Mr. Douglas.]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): I do not think so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question I believe to be of the utmost importance. I am sure we all agree that no armed forces commitments should be made without the knowledge of this house.

In view of the decision of the United Kingdom and United States governments to reduce by some 35,000 their military personnel in Europe under NATO commitments, will the minister inform this house as to Canada's position regarding the withdrawal of armed forces from Europe? What presentation is being made at this time on behalf of Canada by the Associate Minister of National Defence at the high level conference now taking place in Europe? I think that is the urgent part of this question.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this meeting was called to review the work of defence planning groups which have been studying various contingencies within the NATO framework for a number of months under the direction of ministers, and to provide an opportunity for the ministers to give further guidance to the defence planners.

In so far as future commitments are concerned, they will be made known to the NATO planners by the individual member countries later this year. The principle being adopted is to give an indication five years in advance of what are the plans of the countries then to make commitments on a yearly basis in advance. The Canadian government will be studying what might be the appropriate contribution for this country, and I assume there will be further discussions in this regard in the house. Perhaps when the national defence estimates are being considered that might be an opportune occasion to discuss what might be appropriate for us to do in the years ahead.

Some time later this year, before the ministerial meeting in December, we will make known to NATO what we will commit for the year ahead and what our plans are for a five year period.

Mr. Winch: In view of the statement just made by the minister let me ask him this important and specific supplementary question. Will the House of Commons be given an opportunity to discuss what our commitments should be before there is any fait accompli in this regard?

Mr. Hellyer: As I just suggested, Mr. Speaker, when the defence estimates are being considered—and I hope that will be sometime within the next two months before the summer adjournment—there will be a full opportunity to discuss the roles and missions of our forces for the years immediately ahead. I think this would be the best available opportunity for members on all sides of the house to give the government an indication what they think would be an appropriate policy for Canada for the next five years.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of what he has now stated, will the minister indicate the government's views to the committee on defence in order that they may be considered?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE TRANSCONTINENTAL PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of an alleged report that the C.N.R. may eliminate or drastically alter transcontinental passenger services, will the minister give us an assurance that no such drastic change in present rail service will be made until this whole question is fully considered by the house?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I know nothing of any such rumour, Mr. Speaker, and I think I should investigate it before giving any assurances.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, will the minister make it clear to C.N.R. officials that such a move would be against the wishes of the transport committee, which performed a very effective job in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure hon. members recognize this as a hypothetical question.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED DENIAL OF ENTRY TO CERTAIN BOOKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue and ask whether his department has adopted a new policy of censoring books, and forbidding the importation of certain books because of their contents.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): There has been no change in our policy, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: I should like to ask the minister whether the reports are incorrect that certain books have been forbidden entry into Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question cannot be asked at this time.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS OF FEED GRAIN AGENCY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the minister of forestry. May I inquire whether the members of the feed grain livestock agency have held any meetings, and when they will be in a position to accept briefs or representations from the grain trade.

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): They had a meeting, Mr. Speaker, on April 25 and 26. The office in Montreal will be opened some time this month, and they are already in a position to accept any briefs or submissions from interested parties.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROPOSED SALMON FISHING BOUNDARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria (B.C.)): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister received telegrams from the fishery associations of British Columbia and B.C. Packers protesting the department's contemplated closure of area 19 and part of area 20 to commercial salmon fishing? That is my first question. I think I have a supplementary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If that is the only thing the hon. member wishes to ask, his first question is unacceptable.

Mr. Groos: Then may I rephrase my question and ask the minister whether there is any doubt that the closure of salmon fishing in area 19 and part of area 20 in the straits of Juan de Fuca is still in fact to take place, in view of the representations he has received from the commercial, sports and wildlife preservation societies in British Columbia?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did receive a telegram from the sports organization claiming that the closure of the areas mentioned does not go far enough. I also received a telegram from the fisheries association stating that it is going too far, so I can say there is a conflict between the two groups. The matter is under consideration at the present time.

[Later:]

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries apropos the question asked by the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) with regard to the apparent conflict between net fishermen, troll fishermen and sports fishermen. Will the minister refer this matter to the fisheries committee so they may go out to the Pacific coast and hear evidence from these groups with a view to finding an equitable division of the resources?

EXPO '67

REPORTED UNDERWORLD CONNECTIONS OF ASSOCIATED FIRMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

Further to the charges made by Mr. Claude Wagner, a member of the Quebec legislative assembly that the Mafia has infiltrated the world's fair is the minister prepared to get in touch with his colleague responsible for Expo in order to check the truth of these statements and recommend that the necessary steps be taken by whoever may be concerned?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member is repeating a question that has already been asked.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

[Mr. Groos.]

Mr. Speaker: There can be no supplementary question, the first question having been ruled out of order.

Mr. Grégoire: In that case, another question on the same subject, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have already recognized the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather).

[English]

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INVITATION TO U.S. PRESIDENT TO ATTEND CEREMONIES IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether his attention has been called to news reports to the effect that President Johnson of the United States has so far failed to acknowledge Canada's invitation to him to attend centennial ceremonies in the national capital? If these reports have been drawn to the attention of the Prime Minister, does he propose to make a statement on this matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the President has indeed acknowledged our invitation and has expressed the hope and expectation of visiting Canada and Expo during our centennial year. Two dates were put forward. One was the latter part of May—I think it was May 25 that he would arrive—and I think the other was toward the end of July or August. I have not the exact dates in mind. It had been hoped he would be able to accept the earlier date, but I understand that is not now possible and we expect him to be here on the later date.

TRANSPORTATION

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Because of the thunderous silence of the throne speech on this point, would the Minister of Transport assure that legislation relating to maritime transportation will be dealt with in this centennial session?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I could not possibly give such an assurance, Mr. Speaker. It would be very presumptuous on my part to say what this house would deal with.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could the minister tell us whether his department is considering the possibility of establishing a special program in order to help students in urgent need of money who are looking for a summer job?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any special study in that connection. However, I know that our manpower centres are making every effort to find jobs for students.

FINANCE

ALLEGED CONTRADICTION BETWEEN BANK ACT AND BANK OF BRITISH COLUMBIA ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I apologize for not giving him notice, but the question is quite simple. Has the attention of the parliamentary secretary been drawn to the contradiction between the Bank Act and the Bank of British Columbia Act, which is causing some furore in British Columbia at this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt very much that this question is in order. I cannot accept it.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, this matter is causing a lot of difficulty and comment in British Columbia at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is causing me a lot of difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the question cannot be asked at this time.

COAL

ALBERTA—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FREIGHT RATES ON SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question. I refer him to page 18 of Hansard, where two days ago he undertook that in the course of the next day or two he or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would make a statement in reference to the negotiations with the C.P.R. and the coal operators in Alberta with respect to the export of coal to Japan. Has he any statement to make today?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Great progress has been made in this matter even today. Possibly tomorrow I hope to be able to be a little more explicit in the matter, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that in respect of the one company which has negotiated a long term contract, great progress is being made.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, is it the view of the minister that the negotiations which are taking place will be concluded without the need for a government subsidy?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, there is a well known rule that you should never count your chickens before they are hatched.

Mr. Kindt: One often does, and I would like to state that the people are waiting for the information.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF CHAMPIONSHIP AMATEUR HOCKEY TEAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Patrick-T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I should like also to take this opportunity to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of a delegation from the Drummondville Eagles, winners of the Allan Cup.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe): This city is located in the eastern townships.

I would ask the minister whether he intends to convene soon a federal provincial conference on amateur sports in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question is an excuse for the statement and I do not think it is in order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR MATERNITY PROTECTION FOR FEMALE WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I gave a brief progress report in reply to the question asked on April 17 by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway as to when the government proposes to ratify the maternity protection convention passed by the I.L.O.

The convention in question establishes the right of mothers to get maternity leave without losing their jobs and to collect cash and certain medical benefits to be provided out of public funds or by means of a system of insurance. It does not specify the methods by which its requirements should be implemented by the ratifying nations. Since the convention is deemed to be partly within the authority of this parliament and partly within the authority of the legislatures of the provinces, ratification can only be envisaged when effect is given to the convention by legislation in the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, only two provinces have laws allowing maternity leave and forbidding dismissal because of pregnancy. The legislation in two other provinces provides for regulations to be adopted in the matter but that is as far as they have gone. Consequently, the laws of those two provinces are not yet operative. We favour ratification and are working toward making it possible.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Would I be in order, Mr. Speaker, to inquire which provinces those are?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid not.

SHIPPING

CHURCHILL—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO LENGTHEN SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the numerous requests that have been made over the years for a longer shipping season for the port of Churchill, can the minister assure the house that his department is aware of the desirability of this action?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am very much aware of it, sir. I went and looked at Hudson strait recently myself to see if something could not be done about it.

Mr. Simpson: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister then say what was the basis for the reply he is reported to have given during his recent visit to Churchill when he was asked if his department could not do something about it? He is reported to have said that they would if it were brought to their attention; "I am quite sure they would."

Mr. Pickersgill: It was right after that interview I went to look at Hudson strait.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

PRAIRIE RAIL NETWORK GUARANTEED AGAINST ABANDONMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): May I address a question to our good humoured Minister of Transport. Has the minister been made aware that the order in council passed last month which sets out the prairie rail network guaranteed against abandonment departs in a significant degree from the announcement the minister made?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am not only aware of it but my face is very red indeed. The mistake has been corrected or, at least, I have asked my colleagues to correct it. I am confident they will do their best to make an honest man of me.

Mr. Schreyer: I should like to ask the minister if it is the intention to pass a supplementary order in council or a relieving order in council.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it would require an amending order in council. Speaking quite seriously, I am regretful about this error. I take all the blame myself because I did not compare the recommendations with the map carefully enough. It does sometimes happen that when there are these recommendations which contain a lot of detail, it is assumed they are in order but sometimes they are not. I take all the blame. If the error has not actually been rectified I have enough confidence in my colleagues that I feel sure it will be.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In connection with this whole matter of the new transport commission, I should like to ask the minister if he has made any appointments as yet, and if not why not?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I believe, sir, this question does have an element of urgency. The commission has not yet been set up because there is a little problem of finding some place for them to rest their heads. There is also the very complicated problem of the drafting of the rules. I am making the life of the Minister of Public Works miserable trying to get quarters for the commission. Great progress has been made in the drafting of the rules. Meanwhile part V containing the amendments to the Railway Act, which I think were the most urgent of all, is in operation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INDEMNIFICATION OF FAMILIES OF VICTIMS OF CRIMINAL ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General.

Since a number of honest citizens think that our society makes many efforts to improve the lot of criminals, I should like to ask the minister the following question.

Is he giving consideration to setting up or interesting the provinces in setting up a program of compensation for crime victims of the families of crime victims?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this question has also been raised by certain correspondents. I am studying the problem at the present time. As the hon. member is aware, there is also here a question of constitutional law, for such compensation could come from the provinces instead of the central government. However, in that case, negotiations could be undertaken with the provinces.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—PROTEST RESPECTING LEASING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): The other day I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who answers in this house for the national parks, if he had received a petition signed by 324 residents of the Banff area objecting to the lease policy of the department. At the time he said he had not received it. Now that there has been a sufficient lapse of time to allow him to receive it, has he anything to report to the people of Banff and to the house concerning this matter?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Well, Mr. Speaker, I made inquiries yesterday and it still had not arrived. I think the hon. member should send over the copy he asked to have sent to him.

Mr. Kindt: I will be delighted to do so. My colleague has just informed me that he too has a copy.

WINTER WORKS

REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT OF 1967-68 PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I am wondering when the minister might be prepared to announce the plans of his department respecting the winter works program for the year 1967-68.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether the matter is so urgent that the question should be asked at this time. I have serious doubts about it.

Mr. Irvine: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is very important because the municipalities must make their plans and set up their budgets for this purpose. I believe on that basis it is very important the announcement should be made right away.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I believe last year the announcement was made during the course of the month of July. I am hoping that this year it will not be later than that.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the minister's reply I am confirmed in my suggestion the question should be on the order paper.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN FEDERAL INTEREST RATE

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Finance.

Can the minister tell us, since the average yield of the federal government short-term bonds is less than 4½ per cent, if therefore any ceiling imposed on the interest rates which can be charged by the chartered banks has been removed?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member's question could easily be discussed during the debate on the motion for adjournment.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is quite conceivable that this matter could be discussed during the debate on the adjournment motion. However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) was still listening to the translation.

Mr. Speaker: The decision with regard to a question put by an hon. member is taken by the Chair and not by the minister.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Can the minister tell us what is the position with respect to the details of the off-reserve housing program for Indian people, which was approved in principle by parliament shortly before the end of the last session?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I would hope that might be done almost at once. There have been a couple of details which have held it up unduly or it would have been announced before this.

[Mr. Noble.]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I have a question I should like to address to the Secretary of State. Should not the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert have been advised earlier, when they were asking about the antics of the C.B.C., that it is useless to make inquiries in that regard because the C.B.C. is accountable to no one for anything it does?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting proposition.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY—REPORTED LACK OF SAFETY EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. I apologize for not giving him notice, but the matter has just come to mind. Has the minister received representations from the rank and file—not the leadership of the union—of the operating crews on the Kettle Valley railway urging the need for improved safety equipment, stretchers and other things which at present are not supplied, thus contributing to the dangerous conditions under which they operate?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether the hon. member is seriously suggesting that this question is acceptable now.

If he is, then I will allow the minister to reply.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at this time is that I will have to take the question as notice.

FINANCE

PROVISION AGAINST LOSS OF PRINCIPAL INVESTED IN FEDERAL BONDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that many members of the House of Commons are being deluged with correspondence about the loss of principal invested in what I understand are called federal government perpetual bonds, is any action contemplated by the minister to ensure that in future investment in government bonds will not result in any loss of principal?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have made a number of statements on this matter. I have nothing to add, save that there is no safer investment in this country than investment in Canadian government bonds.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my first words are words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both did themselves, their constituencies and their party proud by the able manner in which they moved and seconded the address in reply. Both dealt very cogently with subjects with which they were entirely familiar.

I wish they had written the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker. The speech from the throne is a lengthy one. Its length is in inverse proportion to its content. It seems to have used its verbosity to cover up its scarcity of ideas. There are a great many clichés, much purple prose, but very little in the way of specifics. The government is going to conduct studies, it is going to call conferences, it is going to submit white papers to the house, but there is very little to tell the Canadian people what the government specifically proposes to do about some of the major crises that are facing this nation.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that in this centennial year the speech from the throne would have been a call to action to the Canadian people, that it would have been a document that challenged the Canadian people to enter Canada's second century with their heads high and with a firm determination to make the second century of confederation an even greater one than the first. Instead we have this pallid document largely consisting of a lecture in history and a collection of long term dreams and hopes.

This is probably exemplified best by the fact that the government says very little as to what it is going to do about Canada's constitution. For years the government has talked about patriating the constitution, about bringing it into line with the needs of our day and generation. The government no longer talks about patriating the constitution or bringing it up to date. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) now wants to embalm the constitution, to put a little rouge on it and dress it up. But it will still be dead.

That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). We certainly agree with the first part of that amendment which points out the necessity for dealing with the constitution in this, our centennial year. However, we feel that calling a constitutional conference will have very little value unless before that conference is called parliament has had an opportunity to agree on the specific areas which must be dealt with so we can put before such conference specific proposals. The members of this party have been advocating for years that an all-party parliamentary committee be set up to study the constitution and that we invite the legislatures to do the same so that out of these discussions involving all sections of the Canadian people the government might then be able to promulgate changes in the British North America Act which could be submitted to a federal-provincial constitutional conference.

I am going to move a subamendment which will incorporate that idea. The subamendment I will move, seconded by the hon.

member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), is as follows:

That the motion moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition be amended as follows:

By striking out all the words after the words "centennial year" in the fourth line thereof, and adding the following thereto:

"And has failed to prepare and present to this parliament proposals for amendment to the constition of Canada as a necessary preliminary for a national constitutional conference, and has failed to make the proposals necessary

(1) to set out the legislative powers of parliament necessary for the maintenance of an effective confederation;

(2) to provide an appropriate special status for the province of Quebec;

(3) to provide for a constitutional Bill of Rights;

(4) to provide for the patriation of the Canadian Constitution."

• (11:50 a.m.)

In this our centennial year there are many things of which the Canadian people can be proud. Ernest Renan once said that "a nation is a body of people who have done great things together in the past and hope to do great things together in the future." I think this is a good definition of Canada. This nation has done great things in the past. We and our forefathers have built in the northern half of the North American continent a great nation. Our forefathers cleared the forests, tilled the virgin soil, built their homes, churches, schools and hospitals, built roads, canals, a great railroad system, an inland waterway, built industries and made Canada one of the great trading nations of the world. We can be proud of what this country has done in the past.

The question facing this parliament today is: What are we going to do together in the future? We in this party believe that Canada as it enters its second century must set for itself social and economic goals and must call on the Canadian people to rally together to bring about the achievement of those goals. The New Democratic party believes that if we are to make our second century an even greater one than the first the governments of this country, particularly the federal government, must play a more effective and dynamic role in the social and economic affairs of Canada. This does not imply the imposition of restrictions, the erosion of freedom or the loss of private initiative and enterprise. On the contrary, through our democratically elected governments we Canadians can broaden our freedom, provide increased opportunities for our people and assure higher standards of living. Above all, we can impart a new dimension to our national life.

[Mr. Douglas.]

I am sure those who have visited Expo '67 must be proud of this great accomplishment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It demonstrates what Canadians can do given participation by all levels of governments and all sections of the community.

The role of government has always loomed large in Canada's history. In 1867 the setting up of confederation was a political act in defiance of geography. It called for government intervention and for government direction. The national policies on tariff protection for infant industries, western land and resource development, the building of an east-west railroad, the building of a water transport system, and later the building of the greatest inland seaway in the world, all called for far reaching political decisions. The depression period compelled even reluctant governments to intervene in the economy in order to combat the waste of unemployment, to control the issue of currency and credit through a central bank, to control monopolies and to provide a more equitable distribution of income by fiscal policies and a greater measure of social security through a system of family allowances and the Canada Pension Plan. And now we are to have medicare.

In spite of those who talk about laissez faire economics, we have developed and are developing in Canada a mixed economy in which government enterprise at all three levels of government, private enterprise and co-operative enterprise are working together for the benefit of the people of this country.

As we move into our second century we must clarify what the role of the federal government is to be. The need now is for more dynamic and creative government leadership in social and economic affairs. There has been a failure on the part of this government to fulfil its well-established responsibilities. Even worse has been its dismal inertia in facing the challenges of a rapidly changing world. The performance of the Canadian economy has lagged far behind its potential capacity. Let me give the house a few indications of the extent of this failure: (1) Recurrent heavy unemployment; (2) slow rate of growth in our per capita income; (3) successive spurts of inflation and price increases; (4) periodic international imbalance of payments; (5) mushrooming foreign ownership and increasing foreign control of the Canadian economy; (6) regional disparity of income and economic growth.

Some of these factors are due to external forces beyond our control but most of them are cases where the responsibility can be traced to the weak policies of the government and its reluctance to intervene in the economy with the necessary vigour, imagination and long range common sense.

If we are to progress as a viable and expanding nation in Canada's second century there are seven goals which we believe the government and the parliament of Canada should set for this nation. In the time at my disposal I can mention them only briefly. First, there must be greater economic growth and increased productivity. The Economic Council of Canada points out that between 1957 and 1965 Canada fell $21 billion short of its potential production. That is $1,200 per capita or $6,000 for a family consisting of a husband and wife and three children. Had we been able to maintain across Canada the same unemployment rate in 1966 as obtained in the province of Ontario, 2.4 per cent of the labour force, we could have increased Canada's wealth production by $650 million.

The O.E.C.D. report points out that the output per man employed in Canada from 1960 to 1965 was lower than in any other member nation except Great Britain where the figure was 2.5 per cent. In Canada it was 2.6, in the United States, 2.9 and in Japan 8.3. The average for all the O.E.C.D. countries was 3.7 per cent. Had we had that rate of economic growth the increased wealth production would more than have paid for all the economic programs that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) said would cost $900 million when we proposed them in the house during the last session of this parliament. In 1965 Canada's gross national product increased in real terms by 6.9 per cent. However, in 1966 it increased by only 5.9 per cent. That is a loss of over $500 million of wealth we did not create, wealth we did not enjoy.

The second goal we must set for ourselves is full employment because only by full employment can we hope to have adequate incomes for the great mass of the Canadian people. The Economic Council of Canada says we must keep our unemployment figure to a maximum of 3 per cent. It is now running around 4 per cent, and most economists are predicting that this year it will be about 4½ per cent. The last figures obtained, I think on March 18, show 400,000 unemployed in this country, with unemployment in some areas much worse than in others. The government is not grappling with this problem.

The training and retraining program is ineffective. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) has already built for himself a bomb-proof shelter against future attacks by saying that we must depend on the provinces to supply the training facilities. By loading on the provinces the responsibility for upgrading educational qualifications of unemployed persons, and by making the provinces responsible for supplying the facilities for vocational training and retraining, the government has put the major part of the burden on the provinces and now hopes to evade its responsibility. I warn members of the government that the people of Canada will not allow them to evade their responsibility in this manner. It is a disgrace in a country which needs homes, schools and hospitals, which needs reforestation and anti-pollution measures, that we should have 400,000 unemployed persons at any time of the year.

The third goal we must set for ourselves is price stability. Where economic growth has been experienced inflationary pressures have stolen back from people some of the gains they have made. Every once in a while the Minister of Finance assures us that the economy is cooling off. It is cooling off because we have deprived old age pensioners and other people on fixed incomes of part of their real income. Every time the cost of living goes up their standard of living goes down. We are cooling off the economy at the expense of the section of the economy which is least able to carry the burden.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: In its annual review the Economic Council of Canada said that we must set 2 per cent as the maximum increase in prices per year. In 1965 prices went up 2.8 per cent and in 1966 4.6 per cent. According to the figures which came to our desks just this morning the price index rose from 143.2 in April, 1966, to 147.8 in April, 1967, an increase of 4.6 points.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the most inequitable form of taxation. Inflation puts its hands into the pockets of the people and takes $4.60 out of every $100 from their savings accounts, from their insurance, from their pay cheques and from their old age pension cheques.

The government has been content to depend on the Keynesian techniques of monetary and fiscal policies. We believe those policies by themselves are not sufficient and that there must be a broad spectrum of policies to maintain a proper relationship between production and price levels. That is why I suggest as a start that we ought to set up a prices review board which would make it possible for the government, parliament and the country to know specifically the reason for the increases in prices, to know how much is due to increased prices of raw materials, how much is due to increased wages, how much is due to increased profits, what are the pressures that are causing the increase in the cost of living, and who is responsible. Knowing who is responsible, parliament then would be in a better position to cope with the situation.

The fourth goal which we suggest for Canada's second century is that there must be social equality for all Canadians and a more equitable distribution of our national income. There is little value in talking about increased wealth production if a disproportionate share of that income goes to the "haves" while only a few crumbs are allowed to trickle down to the great mass of the Canadian people.

Our distribution of income has varied very little over the years in spite of our so-called affluent society. In 1951, 16 years ago, the bottom 20 per cent of our population got 4 per cent of the national income. By 1963 the bottom 20 per cent of our income earners got only 4½ per cent of the national income. They were only half of one per cent better off, but in that same year the top 20 per cent of income earners got 42½ per cent of our total wealth production or almost ten times as much. Eighteen per cent of the non-farm families live on less than $2,000 a year and 29 per cent of the non-farm families live on less than $3,000 a year. If we add the farm families we will find that in this country 40 per cent of the people are living either in poverty or on the verge of poverty.

What has happened to the war on poverty that the government trumpeted about in previous throne speeches? Has an armistice been declared? Has the war ended? Who has won the war? The government makes a great deal of fuss about it, but nothing happens. The Chinese have a proverb which says there is a great deal of noise on the staircase but nobody comes into the room. That is exactly what is happening with respect to the war on poverty. There are still 40 per cent of our people living in desperate straits in this land of ours.

The government has to do something about this problem. I noticed that in the speech made by the Deputy Governor General winding up the last session the government boasted about the fact that under the new Canada Labour (Standards) Code working conditions have been improved. Why does the government not tell the Canadian people that because of its dilatoriness, because of its supineness, 95 per cent of the workers who come under federal jurisdiction are not getting any benefit from the national labour code. If we are to have a better distribution of national income, labour legislation must affect 100 per cent of the workers who are supposed to benefit from it.

There must be income support measures for farmers and fishermen, and at this point I want to mention the fact that there are things the government can do for farmers and fishermen that would not cost it a nickel. For 40 years the co-operatives in this country have been asking for legislation on co-operatives. For the last four years the government has been promising at every session to bring down a co-operatives bill.

We are repeatedly told the matter is being studied, the matter is before a committee, the matter is being looked into, but the government has not yet produced a co-operatives bill. I want to tell members of the government they are going to get no peace until they do produce a bill. Private corporations can organize and register on a federal basis and do business all across Canada. Why cannot the co-operatives be allowed to do the same thing? It is because the government lacks the initiative to bring down the necessary legislation.

If we are going to improve the distribution of income in Canada we must improve minimum wages, we must provide for price supports for farmers and fishermen and, Mr. Speaker, we must have programs to deal with drop-outs, unskilled people, so that we can put every able-bodied person in Canada to work to help increase our productivity and to provide them with an adequate income.

If we are to deal with the problem of poverty in this country there must be an increase in the old age pension across the board for all old age pensioners, without any means test. The so-called guaranteed annual income which has given some of the old age pensioners an additional $30 a month has resulted in a situation in which the federal government is giving the money with one hand and the provincial government is taking it away with the other hand by reducing the provincial government supplementary old age pension contribution. If we are to improve the lot of those in the low income brackets in this country medicare should be brought into operation much sooner than July 1, 1968. If the Minister of Finance last year had any excuse—and I do not think he had—for postponing medicare because of the threat of inflation that threat now is gone. There is no longer any reason for delay. Under the act the government has the authority to introduce medicare by July 1 this year or at the very latest January 1, 1968.

The fifth goal is better allocation of the wealth which we produce. The keynote of this second century should be equal opportunity for every Canadian irrespective of where that Canadian may reside. It is not enough to raise individual incomes. We must also improve the social amenities by providing better schools, better hospitals, better homes and better recreational facilities. We must have clean air and clean water.

I suppose there is no question before the Canadian people today which is so demanding of attention as housing. Housing now has reached the proportions of a national crisis. The Economic Council of Canada says that it will be necessary to build 170,000 new houses every year just to hold our own. That will not cut into the backlog of the half a million families who are living in substandard housing in Canada or the 20 per cent of the homes in Canada which have only primitive toilet and bathing facilities. To meet the needs of the Canadian people we ought to be building at least 250,000 houses a year in order to keep pace with the annual demand and reduce the backlog of substandard housing. The other day the minister told us that the best we can hope for is 150,000 to 155,000 housing starts this year. We not only need houses but we need them at a price which people in the middle and lower income brackets can afford to pay.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: Some of my colleagues will be having more to say about this in greater detail as the debate progresses.

The sixth goal is that we must have greater Canadian control over the Canadian economy. No one denies that foreign investment has benefited Canada, particularly in securing technological and managerial skills. But we have reached the stage today where some 67 per cent of the major segments of our economy are in the hands of foreign investment. We have reached the stage where the decision-making power which affects our daily lives and our economic expansion is in the hands of investors outside this country. The government as usual is playing the role of "Mr. Facing Both Ways". The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) is going around the country making speeches in which he mentions the danger of foreign investment. The Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé) is going around the country making speeches in which he says there is no danger in foreign investment, that foreign investment is fine and we need more of it. It may be a marvelous political attitude to be all things to all men, but surely the time has come when we ought to know what this government is going to do about the increase in foreign control of our economy.

The government says there will be a task force to prepare a white paper and that it will be headed by the President of the Privy Council. The President of the Privy Council was appointed by a previous Liberal government to head up a royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. He made a full report in that regard. He also wrote a book entitled "Whither Canada". He is supposed to be an authority. Why do we need another study and another white paper? Does the government not have a policy? It pretended it had a policy when it faced the electorate during the elections of 1962, 1963 and 1965. We have reached the crossroads in Canada. We have reached the point where we are losing the decision-making power in respect of decisions which will affect our future welfare and development. We have come to the place where the interest and dividends on past investment are affecting our balance of payments. Retained earnings are now pyramiding our indebtedness. As we enter our second century we ought to ask ourselves who will own Canada by the year 2067? How much of Canada will our children and their children own, control and direct?

We are reaching the point in Canada where the decisions concerning whether our economy is to increase, stagnate or expand are not being made by the government or by parliament but by foreign corporations outside the boundaries of Canada. The making of economic decisions also has some effect of course, upon the making of political decisions. There is no doubt that the timidity of this government in matters pertaining to foreign policy is a direct reflection of the economic control which already is exercised on this country by the United States.

For years members in all parties of the house have paid lip service to the idea of recognizing mainland China and voting for its admission to the United Nations. Why does the government not do this? It will not do it because it does not want to incur the displeasure of the United States government. There is no doubt in my mind about that.

Our policy in respect of Viet Nam is one of timidity and hesitation which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) calls quiet diplomacy. It is a policy of neutrality under which last year we sold $318 million worth of armaments to the United States, one of the combatants. When Pakistan and India were fighting we stopped shipments to both sides. When Turkey and Greece were fighting over Cyprus we stopped shipments to both sides. When Israel and Egypt were fighting we stopped shipments to both sides. We have sold armaments to the United States with no assurance that they are not being used in Viet Nam. In Washington they have their hawks and doves and in Ottawa we have our parrots.

I say to the government that we must have something much more satisfying than the denials we have had from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) regarding the serious accusations which have been made by Mr. Gerald Clark of the Montreal Star and Mr. Tim Ralfe of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. They are highly reputable and highly regarded correspondents, and when they state they are convinced that films, tape recordings and information of an important military nature are being passed on to United States authorities by Canadian military personnel attached to the Canadian delegation to the international control commission, this warrants a full investigation. It is not enough for the Prime Minister to rise and say there are no spies. I do not think anyone has said there are spies.

What we want to know is whether or not Canada's role as a neutral in Viet Nam is being undermined. We want to know whether or not our honour is being impugned and whether or not any official or officials connected with the Canadian delegation are passing on information to one of the combatants in this very unhappy and undeclared war. If the government is serious about this situation it should bring in a motion to send this matter immediately to the parliamentary committee on external affairs. That committee should not only call the two correspondents but also those who have charge of the international control commission so that we will know exactly what is done with information collected by the Canadian delegation.

The seventh and last goal I want to suggest is that during its second century Canada must help the underdeveloped areas of the world. McLuhan has said that the world is now a global village. We cannot build an island of prosperity and stability in a sea of human misery. Peace in the world depends on our narrowing the gap between the per capita income of the "have" nations and that of the "have-not" nations. That gap is not narrowing but widening. More than half the people of the world are living on per capita incomes of less than $150 per year. The gap between the wealth of the western nations and the poverty of the underdeveloped areas is widening year by year. No wonder Secretary General U Thant said:

> The world will not live in harmony as long as two-thirds of its inhabitants have difficulty in living at all.

Social justice demands and common sense dictates that we should be giving a greater share of our wealth production to help the needy people of the world. I do not need to point out to this House of Commons that this does not mean shipping dollar bills but rather shipping Canadian goods, food, material and labour. It means laying the basis for future trade with those countries when they have been properly established.

Aid in itself is not enough. There is an old Chinese saying that if you give a man a fish you solve his problem for today but if you teach him how to fish you solve his problem for the rest of his life.

What the western nations must do as their real contribution is help these underdeveloped countries to help themselves by giving them the benefits of our modern technology, by persuading thousands of our young people to go as doctors, nurses, scientists, teachers, engineers, agronomists, forestry experts, trained artisans, social workers and psychiatrists to help these people acquire some of our western technology and some of our social organization so that they can raise their living standards. Our task should be threefold, to give aid, to promote trade with these countries so they can sell some of their primary products to us without prohibitive tariff barriers, and to help them acquire some of our technology.

This country needs bold leadership as we enter our second century. This government and this parliament must set themselves the task of making Canada a place where every child will have enough to eat, where every student who wants to study will have the opportunity to do so, where every person who wants to work can find a job, where every family that wants to own a home can build one. We must make this a land where old people can walk the earth with dignity and young people can live useful and meaningful lives. Above all, we must make this a land that shares some of the gifts of divine providence with those less fortunate than ourselves.

There is a sentence in the throne speech which says that what we have tomorrow will depend on what we do today. I endorse that sentence. If it is true that what we will have tomorrow depends on what we do today, let us get busy. In the words of the late President Kennedy, "Let us begin".

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member in his remarks, because I was interested in what he had to say and also out of courtesy, but as soon as he moved his subamendment, I got a copy of it and was surprised to see that there was no French copy.

I assume this is a clerical error or an oversight. I cannot believe it as a deliberate action on the part of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas).

Anyway, may I ask him whether there are French copies and whether we can have some?

[English]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I make my apology to the hon. member and to the house. Yesterday I fulfilled an assignment from the Canadian Centennial Commission accepted some weeks ago to address an international convocation on Canada's centenary. I got back very late and had little time to work on the subamendment. I have not yet had the translation completed, but I assure my hon. friend that we will do so as quickly as possible and see that he gets a copy.

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to congratulate the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), and the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté).

I listened attentively to the mover who, only 18 years ago, was not a Canadian citizen—he was a Newfoundlander—and I greatly appreciated the way he talked about Canada, because 18 years ago he voted against Newfoundland joining Canada. But after 18 years as a citizen of this country, the hon. member tells us with sincerity and enthusiasm about the happiness and satisfaction he now feels about being a Canadian citizen and that he would not change his identity for any other in the world. He is proud to be a Canadian.

The mover of the address in reply belongs to a well-known family whose roots run deep in the province of Quebec. He took pleasure in praising the government. He talked about something which is close to our heart, namely the farm problem, and I will say a word about it later.

Before dealing with that part of his speech on agriculture, Mr. Speaker, I must say how disappointed I am with the speech from the throne. It is a disappointment which I have felt every year now for five years, I would even say for 21 years. As a matter of fact, I was elected member for the riding of Pontiac in 1946, and the speeches from the throne over that long period of 21 years look very much alike.

It contains vague statements and good intentions, but if the road to hell is paved with good intentions, it is to be wondered where we are heading with those senseless words. The measures being promised are only repetitions, as pointed out yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). For instance, the proposed establishment of the Canada Development Corporation is again included in this speech from the throne. It was mentioned last year, the year before and even three years ago.

All I can find in that speech likely to open the eyes of all Canadians is the following statement:

> With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this contingent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

Now, Her Majesty's advisers, namely the government, recognize that we must fight against social injustice, because such injustice actually prevails in several areas of our country and not merely in one.

The people in Quebec are heard to say that poverty exists in their province because of the presence of French-speaking Canadians there. In every part of Canada that I have visited, I have seen social injustice among English-speaking Canadians. I have seen poverty-stricken English Canadians in the western provinces. Therefore, the province of Quebec is not the only one justified in complaining.

The second point is cultural mediocrity.

We agree or recognize that our intellectual culture is mediocre in the sense that we do not know exactly whether we have a true and distinctive Canadian culture.

We are wondering rightly whether our culture is not more American than Canadian. Since we are living on the American continent, we may be influenced by the United States from every point of view, cultural, economic and even political. Anyhow, we realize that in Canada we must fight against cultural mediocrity, spiritual stagnation and all forms of intolerance. We have suffered from intolerance for many years.

Mr. Speaker, our country exists in its present form, or nearly so since 1867, and we are now celebrating the centennial of confederation. Some people are happy to celebrate this centennial, others are not. Some criticize the celebration of this centennial, others accept it willingly and most cordially.

When the Fathers of Confederation, Cartier, Macdonald, and the others, in 1867 put on paper the terms which gave or were to give birth to the Canadian confederation, they were looking forward to a promising future for all the provinces then joining the Canadian confederation, as well as for the provinces which would join in the years to come.

Everyone admits that confederation has gone through difficult times. Everybody also admits that confederation has had its weaknesses. It is also admitted that confederation has suffered its fanatics on both sides. We know some of them, particularly in 1967, at a time when we are celebrating the centennial of this confederation.

Mr. Speaker, even with all its defects, confederation has nevertheless enabled the whole country, all the Canadian provinces to develop at a pace unknown in almost all the countries of the world.

In fact, we have reached in Canada a standard of living far superior to that of many other countries in Europe, Asia, Africa or elsewhere.

We may have suffered from injustice, but this has not been felt by one isolated group only. It has perhaps been the result of a lack of understanding and contact between the various elements which make up our country, now and in the past. When I was a youngster, I was taught that the English, or English-speaking Canadians, were fanatics, all of them. English Canadians were taught the opposite, the French-speaking Canadians were all fanatics and people with whom it was impossible to come to an understanding.

When people are isolated, each in his corner, and when there are no communication facilities, these things become ingrained in their minds, as they were in our minds some 30, 35 or 40 years ago. However, Mr. Speaker, when we have the opportunity of communicating with Canadians of other origins in other provinces, we realize that there are real and good Canadians everywhere.

For the last five years, in particular, I have had the opportunity of visiting the western provinces and the maritimes, where the majority of the population is English-speaking. For example, I met in the west workers and farmers as well as university people. I had the privilege of going to the University of Toronto, for instance, in our neighbour province. I gave a conference at Trinity Hall, in Toronto, where thousands of students came to hear me. I also had the privilege of speaking to university students in Manitoba, in Regina, Saskatchewan, in Vancouver and Victoria in British Columbia, and also at the University of Alberta, in Edmonton.

Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that I am a French-speaking Canadian and that I fight for the recognition of French Canadians throughout Canada. It is indeed a duty for me to say that I have had a friendly reception in all those provinces; I might even say that I have had a warmer welcome in the western universities than in the University of Montreal, in my own province of Quebec. And these people out west, these young students, these farmers or whoever they are, are most hospitable. We are welcomed like kings in those provinces. Even if these young people do not speak our language, they are eager to welcome us, to hear our problems, to learn to know us, to know what we want and who we are. It was most interesting to meet these people, irrespective of political affiliations, as Canadians from a province other than theirs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we certainly agree that there are fanatics in those provinces. As a matter of fact, we have some in Quebec too. And it is precisely those fanatics who jeopardize Canadian unity because they adopt a definite position and will not listen to reason. They think they live in a different kind of world than the one in which we live at the present time. Instead of seeing the human being in mankind, they see only their own sect and they believe that their own sect has every right, while all the others are completely wrong.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the Canadian confederation has enabled the two main ethnic groups of Canada, the Ukrainians, the Poles, the Italians, the French, the Germans, in short, everybody, to develop according to their own aspirations, inasmuch as financial system made it possible. Both parties or elements, the two main ethnic groups of Canada, are suffering from the evils of the same system which is leading them to dissension, misunderstanding and even hate of each other.

Mr. Speaker, I often repeat what John Adams, President of the U.S.A. from 1825 to 1829, said more than 125 years ago and I quote:

> The difficulties, the confusion and the anguish of the United States are due less to the weaknesses of their constitution or their confederation, a lack of honour or virtue, than to sheer ignorance of the nature of currency, credit and money circulation.

Mr. Speaker, one could apply the same statement to Canada, today in this centennial of our confederation, when there is confusion and worry in some parts of the country. People do not understand confederation, they do not know the Canadian constitution, yet, they denounce that pact, that confederation and that constitution without having considered the pros and cons of the system.

Mr. Speaker, we could now apply to Canada the words of President John Adams who said: The difficulties, the confusion and the anguish of Canada, in 1967, are due less to the weaknesses of its constitution, of confederation, a lack of honour or virtue, than to sheer ignorance of the nature of currency, credit and money circulation.

Mr. Speaker, the amendments moved during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne deal precisely with matters concerning confederation and the constitution.

The main amendment read as follows:

> This house regrets that Her Majesty's advisers have failed to submit any program to give effective direction with regard to Canada's constitutional development in this centennial year and has failed to provide for the calling of a national constitutional conference—

Imagine the benefit the Canadian people will derive from this, Mr. Speaker.

> —to be widely representative of the governments, federal and provincial and of the territories, and of all political parties for the purpose of repatriating Canada's constitution—

Mr. Speaker, this motion was moved by the Conservatives, and see how many of them are in their seats. Not a single one. There is one who is coming in because he heard me. That shows how serious is the amendment for repatriating the constitution. The hon. member is here doubtless to repatriate the Canadian constitution.

• (12:50 p.m.)

But, Mr. Speaker, what is repatriating Canada's constitution going to give us? It is not even respected and there is talk of repatriating it. People are not familiar with it and yet speak of repatriating it. It is not being studied and yet there is talk of repatriating it. For five years now we hear on all sides: repatriate Canada's constitution. Let us get those sheets of paper in London and bring them to Canada. What is it going to give us if it cannot be respected? If the Conservatives and the Liberals in Canada had only started by respecting the constitution such as it is, we would not witness today such anxiety and confusion with regard to the Canadian confederation.

The amendment goes on:

> —revising and amending it as agreed upon.

Mr. Speaker, what has been agreed upon for amending or modifying the constitution, so that Canada's future policy might be aimed towards the interests of the people as a whole, through a declaration of national objectives based on the assurance of success so selflessly and patriotically displayed by the fathers of confederation.

Merely from a literary or logical point of view, Mr. Speaker, something is askew here. Based on the assurance of success. There was no assurance of success, especially as displayed so selflessly and patriotically by the fathers of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I met members of the Conservative party two days ago in order to ask them this: why do you not bring in an amendment for the revision of the agricultural policy of the government, because that is more important than repatriating the constitution. The Conservatives were afraid to move an amendment dealing with Canadian agriculture in general which is the basis of this country's whole economic structure. To prevent us, in the Ralliement Créditiste, from moving an amendment dealing with the dairy industry, for instance, we are served a terrible constitutional mess which the Conservatives themselves do not understand.

Mr. Barnett: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: With regard to the subamendment, Mr. Speaker, it must of course relate to the amendment; so, it is virtually as bland as the amendment itself.

And in addition to that, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) fully realizes that I am right, for he says: "Hear, hear". They are obliged to move an amendment which is meaningless.

What does the subamendment say? I have to read it in English, Mr. Speaker, since we have not yet received the French copy. I quote:

[English]

By striking out all the words after the words "centennial year" in the fourth line thereof, and adding the following thereto:

"and has failed to prepare and present to this parliament proposals for amendment to the constitution of Canada as a necessary preliminary for a national constitutional conference, and has failed to make the proposals necessary

(1) To set out the legislative powers of parliament necessary for the maintenance of an effective confederation;"

[Translation]

The first point, Mr. Speaker, is that the powers are actually defined or established in the present constitution: provincial and federal legislative powers. But they are not observed. There is talk of repatriating the constitution to amend it. Let us first follow it. Let us avoid trespassing on provincial fields; let us deal with the federal areas, yes, let us deal with them.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Second:

[English]

(2) To provide an appropriate special status for the province of Quebec;

Undoubtedly, that is the reason why we do not have French copies of the amendment. I understand the explanation of the leader of the N.D.P. but translating seven or eight lines does not take that much time. There are competent people here in parliament who can easily translate that subamendment.

If this were the first time it happened, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) should be excused. We would say: It is not for lack of goodwill he did not have the time. But the same thing happened last year and, the year before. In fact, this is the third time I have to tell the hon. member of Burnaby-Coquitlam that under the special status the province of Quebec should have, according to him, he forgets to introduce his subamendment to the House of Commons in French also.

Mr. Speaker, we must nevertheless be logical. It is simply to win votes in the province of Quebec that some speak of a "special status". No doubt it is for that reason that Mr. Cliche calls for a special status especially for the Montreal area. I think it is for Montreal only, a special status for Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, what do they mean by "special status"? Isolate Quebec from the rest of Canada? What do they mean? They give no explanation. Is it mere window-dressing for Quebeckers—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: —that they are told: You are entitled to a special status.

I am a genuine Quebecker. My forebears arrived in what is now Quebec city on the St. Lawrence in 1668. My family has therefore been in Quebec for quite a long time. I never asked for a "special status". I do not need one. I want to be a French-speaking Canadian I want to preserve my French culture; I want to be respected by all other Canadians who have a different language and culture. That is all I ask for.

When I hear what some nincompoops have been asking for in the province of Quebec: a "special status"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: —I wonder if it is a special status or special statues that are requested for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the third point:

[English]

(3) To provide for a constitutional bill of rights;

[Translation]

A bill of rights probably. Of course, rights must be respected. We agree. The fourth point:

[English]

To provide for the patriation of the Canadian constitution.

The same thing for the Conservatives. But the main point is left out.

I understand that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has to dress up his subamendment to make it consistent with the rules, which provide that the subamendment must relate to the amendment.

It is a little embarrassing for everyone. It is embarrassing for me, because to relate a subamendment to an amendment such as that, it is embarrassing. You have to be very well educated, Mr. Speaker, to present an amendment to an amendment which means nothing.

All this means that the Conservatives should have moved an amendment concerning an important sector of our national economy, that is farming.

I am led to deal somewhat with the speech made by the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. Do we adjourn at one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Yes, the house is to adjourn at one o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: One o'clock.

• (1:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members that the fact that the hon. member's time will expire at one minute after one o'clock. It is just about that time now and he may have about one minute left. Would hon. members suggest that he be allowed to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: I have only one minute left, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: According to our rules, and the hon. member is quite aware of this, speeches are limited to thirty minutes during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member has about one more minute.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, as I would need ten more minutes, I wonder whether the hon. members would not agree unanimously that I continue at two o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree unanimously that the hon. member continue his remarks for ten more minutes?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, you should permit the hon. member to have his ten minutes at 2.30.

Mr. Speaker: It is agreed that the house will recess until 2.30 and that the hon. member for Villeneuve will be allowed to pursue his remarks for a further ten minutes?

Mr. Churchill: I think people will now see the disadvantage of allocation of time. It destroys a really good speech.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, this house stands adjourned until 2.30 p.m.

[English]

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, before the sitting was suspended for lunch, I was saying that I would like to deal this afternoon or rather right away with the speech of the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Florian Côté) who supported the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I respect the member for Nicolet-Yamaska highly. He is a farmer, he knows agriculture, he is a very active member of the organization grouping Quebec farmers, that is the C.F.U. But note, on reading his speech, that the member for Nicolet-Yamaska did not speak on behalf of the C.F.U. but on behalf of the Liberal party.

He felt it was his duty, under the circumstances, to support the dairy policy of the present government and not the repeated requests of the members of the Quebec C.F.U.

He forgot that he was a farmer and considered himself only as a Liberal member; that is what I gather from his speech. If he were not a member of parliament and if he were a supporter of the C.F.U. of the province of Quebec, he would have delivered quite a different speech on agriculture and, more particularly, on the government's dairy policy.

The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska says, for instance:

> In 1957, on my own farm, I was selling milk at $2.90 per hundredweight; with a production of 300,000 pounds of milk—

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that farmers who turn out 300,000 pounds of milk per year, in the province, are relatively few. In fact, most of the farmers we meet do not produce more than 100,000, 135,000 or 150,000 pounds of milk.

To produce 300,000 pounds of milk, Mr. Speaker, a dairy herd of 55 to 65 head is needed; that also means a big farm. And even if the hon. member realized on his own farm a gross income, not a net income, of $8,700 he is well aware that to earn his salary of $18,000 a year as a member of parliament he has to work much less than he did to keep a herd of dairy cows sufficient to produce 300,000 pounds of milk which brought him a gross income of only $8,700 a year.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member added:

> From 1963 to 1966, under an administration which perhaps understood the problems of eastern Canada and of the Canadian dairy industry, I could sell milk for $4 per hundredweight for a production of 300,000 pounds of milk, which means that I could receive an income of $12,000.

Then again, $12,000 is a gross income. But are there any farmers with a $12,000 gross income in the province of Quebec? Where are they? The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska may have made that much money, but once again, it was a gross income. Tractors, a small truck were required to operate that farm, it was necessary to feed the cattle and so on.

Last Sunday, I was in Quebec and I met a farmer of Joly, in the riding of Lotbinière, whose dairy production reaches 138,000 lbs. per year. That farmer, considered well off in the province, had a gross annual income of approximately $5,800.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska maintains—

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not want the house to be induced in error, according to the Farmers Association a proficient farmer should produce from 175,000 to 200,000 pounds of milk—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hon. member for Villeveuve.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) thinks that a proficient farmer should produce 160,000, 170,000, of 175,000, pounds of milk. However, facts are facts.

In the riding of Lotbinière, those who produce 150,000 pounds of milk are considered as real dairy producers.

In my neck of the woods, we have farmers who produce 200,000 pounds of milk, others who produce 150,000 pounds, but also some who produce only 75,000 pounds.

Now, according to the government's recent policy, a farmer will get nothing at all for any increase over his contract or his production of last year. And the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska will approve the government to introduce such a legislation in the House of Commons, which is detrimental to farmers and adverse to an increased production in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska speaks here as a supporter of the Liberal party and not as a farmer, on behalf of Quebec farmers.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting officials of the Catholic Farmers Union, and when the hon. member says that the farmers are preparing to come to Ottawa on May 24 next, not to blame but to commend the government, I will tell him that he is wrong. The C.F.U. people I met will be here on May 24 because they are dissatisfied with the dairy policy of the present government.

Moreover, when the hon. member says that if the farmers claim $6—this is serious—some members are prepared to rise and ask for $6. Should the farmers ask for $7, members would rise and ask for $7, and should we ask for $8, the member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) would rise to ask for $8, I must say that I am bewildered.

Mr. Speaker, if that is how the hon. member views the agricultural question in Quebec, I can assure you that the professional farmer's association to which he belongs himself will not take him very seriously, for he takes a stand in parliament but he has another story when he comes before the farmers.

When the hon. member met the members of the C.F.U. in his own constituency, they asked him to demand in Ottawa $5.10 per hundredweight of manufacturing milk. The hon. member accepted and told them that he would be their spokesman in the Canadian parliament.

Mr. Speaker, who is in a position to determine the minimum price asked by farmers and dairy producers in Canada or in Quebec. Is it the members of the house or rather the experts of the C.F.U. or those working for the Canadian farming association or the dairy producers of Canada?

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, did the hon. member understand, as the Canadian press did, the statement of the member of Nicolet-Yamaska who asked the representatives of all the political parties to refrain from playing politics with the agricultural class, contrary to what he is now doing? I did not speak against the farmers, but on the contrary I tried to persuade the members of the opposition not to play politics, petty partisan politics with the farmers. And yet, this is what he is now doing.

Mr. Caouette: Precisely, Mr. Speaker, such a foolish statement as the one made by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska is received with applause. Can one imagine that the member for Nicolet-Yamaska should fear that we play politics with agricultural class when he has never done anything else in his own constituency and the whole province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, those are the people who go about rural areas asking the people's support so that they can make claims on their behalf here in parliament. But when we assert their rights, we are attacked, we are accused of trying to use the farmers for political reasons. The member for Nicolet-Yamaska brought up the matter himself here in the house the day before yesterday.

I ask the member for Nicolet-Yamaska who knows the C.F.U.: who are the people aware of the needs of the farmer? The farmers and their specialists have stated that $5.10 per hundredweight of manufacturing milk is the minimum price—minimum and not maximum price—which can enable the farmers to make ends meet.

I meet farmers. I have some in my constituency. I meet some elsewhere in the province and when it is recognized today—the hon. member would be the first to do so if his government were not in power and if he was not a government member—that the farmer barely makes $1,900 to $2,250 net per year. That is the farmer's income. Yet, the hon. member is against our giving $5 or $5.10 per hundredweight of industrial milk. When I moved an emergency debate on the government's dairy policy the other day, why did the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska not rise at that time to defend the farmers of his own constituency of Nicolet-Yamaska? No, he stays in his seat.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand there was some agreement as to the extra time to be given to the hon. member and I must advise him now that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I shall close my remarks by saying that we clearly maintain our attitude towards agriculture and milk producers. We maintain that Canada can improve its economic, political and social position insofar as everyone co-operates to its improvement. We can make Canada a prosperous country by permitting the provinces to develop according to their own aspirations and by consolidating our unity in the greatest national respect.

[English]

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, on taking part in the throne speech debate I would first like to offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jamieson) and seconder (Mr. Côté, Nicolet-Yamaska) of the address in reply. One may not altogether agree with everything that was said by these two gentlemen but I believe they made a contribution to this debate consistent with their convictions and discharged the role assigned to them in a very commendable fashion. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo presented in a very clear and concise manner many of the views and convictions I had intended to stress during the course of this debate. But even though it may be somewhat repetitious and even though my remarks will possibly be expressed with less emphasis and clarity, I would crave the indulgence of the house as I make some comments on the speech from the throne and on Canada's centennial in general.

One hundred years ago Canada was born as a nation and we are now in the midst of our one hundredth anniversary party. Already across this nation from coast to coast celebrations are taking place in all sectors of the population, in the provinces, the cities, the villages, the towns, the hamlets, and in many of the rural communities. These celebrations are being participated in by people who are proud to be Canadians, who appreciate the foundations that were laid for this great nation and the fact that over the past 100 years Canada has moved forward to achieve a place in the history of nations that I believe is very commendable. Elaborate planning, prodigious labour and substantial financing have gone into the arrangements, and with the advent of the summer months we anticipate an unprecedented flood of visitors from all parts of the world who are coming here to meet with us and to share in the celebrations of this memorable occasion.

Of course, at the very heart of our celebrations is Expo '67, an event which has been referred to as the greatest exposition ever held. Opened by His Excellency the Governor General, the personal representative of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada, on Thursday, April 27, it is a huge, spectacular exhibition which many of us have already been privileged to attend. It now appears that the success of this great project will be far beyond the greatest dreams of those who have had the responsibility for the planning and programming of this event.

As we begin this centennial session it is only natural that we should look back to the years which have gone by. I remember a quotation from Edmund Burke often referred to in this house and elsewhere. He stated that people will not look forward to posterity who never look back to their ancestors. It would seem to me that in this our centennial year we ought to look back and remember with pride those very fine and courageous men and women who laid the strong enduring foundations of this great nation. They were representatives of many nations. They were adherents of a variety of faiths. They were subscribers to different political philosophies. By setting aside their natural differences they accentuated their common purpose. As they laboured and toiled together they hewed out a kingdom in this land. They were the men and women who in full measure paid the price for what we are as a nation today.

While we pride ourselves on the marvels depicted in "A Man And His World", let us not forget the pioneers of this and of other lands who braved the dangers of their day, who travelled thousands of miles by canoe to search out and chart the vast expanses of this continent, who travelled in creaking wagons to build their homes on the frontiers of civilization and beyond and who, while not realizing it, set the stage for the vigorous and growing nation which we are proud to call our homeland today. So it is well, in this our centennial year, that we should pause to pay tribute to those who laid the foundations of our nation. May I say also that we should not fail to give thanks to God for the achievements of these 100 years and for the blessings of which we in this nation have been the recipients.

Having looked back, we think of the challenges which confront us today. I should like to refer to several of these challenges which I believe are most important. We must continue the development of our many natural resources. I do not think anyone would disagree with the statement that we have made tremendous progress materially in Canada. If we contrast present-day conditions with those which existed in pre-confederation days, and if we contrast as well what we have today with what we had in those days, I am sure all of us will agree that we have made tremendous progress from the material point of view. We must admit too that we have made tremendous gains technologically. While this country saw its beginnings in a mainly agricultural economy, and very limited at that, Canada today has achieved great success in the development of an industrial society. When we think of our resource development, again we have something of which we ought to be proud.

When we contemplate the progress which has been made in the development of our material resources, I think we ought to remember that the contemplation of this development alone will tend, rather than having beneficial results, to react unfavourably on mankind. Dr. Werner von Braun, director of the development operation division of the army ballistic missile agency, was asked recently:

Do you feel that modern man worships too much the golden calf of material progress?

His reply was:

> Nothing has probably retarded human progress more than idolatry of our own achievements. By worshiping our own scientific achievements we kill humility. By adoring our own technological advancement we kill the urge for improvement.

I think these words should have some application and that we would do well to remember them on this occasion. We must remember as well the importance of the development of our human resources.

It is not my intention to deal specifically with the items in the speech from the throne. Actually it was rather difficult to find them. One had to wade through a great deal of verbiage to find the proposals and suggestions. I will not deal with many of them specifically today. I do, however, recognize the fact that there are references in the speech from the throne to a number of very important issues such as housing. I suppose that is one of the major problems facing us today. In the course of the debate it has been pointed out that we are not even keeping pace with the demand for new units. Because of our immigration policies and the natural increase in population in this country we all know there is a growing demand for housing. I believe, therefore, that the government must take this whole matter under careful advisement and not be satisfied just with surveys, studies, analyses and the other exercises in which they are so prone to engage. They should come forward with very constructive proposals in order to meet this crisis.

As I say, housing is an important issue. Health care is also an important issue. Job opportunities present another tremendous challenge. Then there is the subject of education. We must remember that all these matters are important only because they contribute to the welfare of men and women, the citizens of Canada. Therefore even in the light of the emphasis which has been placed on increased productivity and so on we must ask what is the purpose of production. It is to meet human need. Therefore I believe there should be consideration of all these problems. We must relate them to men and women who today require that their needs be satisfied and who must have the right and the opportunity to provide for these needs in this affluent society.

It has been said that inadequate men are a social liability. Perhaps this is true. The Royal Bank of Canada monthly letter of June, 1964, had something to say about this. Some people may not think that a bank document can say anything too important to us today. The newsletter states:

> Being forced to live on anything below adequate food makes a man a social liability.

It is speaking of only one area.

> He cannot work effectively on an empty stomach; he cannot study and learn as he must in order to improve his condition; he cannot think beyond the dominant immediate need, which is his next meal; he cannot build up resistance to wasting disease; he holds back not only the economic and social development of his own country but also the prosperity of the world.

I say this afternoon that what is true with regard to food applies to all the major needs of mankind. If man's needs are inadequately met he is ill prepared to meet the challenges of today and provide for his own needs, let alone make a contribution to the common good of his nation and other countries round the world. Therefore, in considering all the legislation, proposals and recommendations that come before this house, some of which have been referred to in the speech from the throne, we must remember that they must be related to humanity and individuals. Only in this way can they fulfil their function in our society.

Drastic changes are taking place in Canada and in our world. I believe that all these things to which I have referred as well as training and retraining must prepare our people to fit into their particular role in society and in the changing situations in which they find themselves. We believe in the development of human resources and the importance of the individual. I read a very interesting statement in the notes for the Prime Minister's speech to the national centennial conference dinner on April 24. On page 3 we find this statement:

> As we move toward our second century, I dream of a Canada where the individual is never forced to shape himself inflexibly to economic and political systems, but where he can enjoy a maximum of freedom and opportunity to fulfil his most cherished personal aspirations; and to develop his full potential as a human being.

One would almost think the Prime Minister had for once become a Social Crediter because that is exactly what we have been emphasizing throughout the years. One of the very first principles underlying our movement is an emphasis on the importance of the individual and his right to the opportunity to develop his personality as he sees fit as long as he does not endanger the same privileges of his fellow man.

Mr. Herridge: Does the hon. member not realize that the Prime Minister once voted for Social Credit?

Mr. Patterson: We hope the time will come when he will vote for it again.

In spite of what the Prime Minister has said or may say, we are living in an age when government intervention and control are extending into every avenue of life. This is one thing about which Canadians are becoming very disturbed. In fact, there is a reference to it in the speech from the throne. I shall not take the time to look it up but it related to the government and the increasing role it plays in the affairs of the citizens of Canada.

I have before me an editorial which appeared on May 9, 1967 in the Globe and Mail. I will read two brief portions of the editorial:

> Toward its end yesterday's speech from the throne referred to "the involvement of the government in many matters." Those eight words somehow capsule the intention of this centennial speech from the throne. In the early years of our history the tendency of governments was toward participation in those areas of our society where we could not individually achieve our aspiration—we went on the basis that the best government was the least government. The trend has been manifestly in the opposite direction since the second world war, but perhaps it has never been stated with such emphasis before.

Toward the end it goes on to say:

> But what distinguishes this speech, apart from its scope, is its preoccupation with an intensification of governmental presence as Canada begins its second century. The speech puts it this way, "We who find ourselves in positions of authority must always remember that it is our responsibility and our opportunity to serve the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people."
> The difficulty, of course, will lie in making sure that those in "positions of authority" remember the word "serve".
> It is a word that is often forgotten when the emphasis is on "the involvement of the government in many matters."

I suggest that the Prime Minister and the government pay attention to those words because they are significant in light of the Prime Minister's emphasis on the right of individuals to live their own lives and develop their own personalities according to their wishes.

There must be a development of our moral and spiritual resources. If we follow Canada's history from its beginning we will see the important place that faith and religion have occupied in the development of this nation. Today as we face change, with old concepts discarded and old foundations crumbled, we must ask ourselves what is to happen to the old precepts, concepts and foundations upon which this nation was built.

Let me refer again to a statement in the speech from the throne which has already been placed on record:

> With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

This is a rather gloomy portrayal of the Canadian scene today. One wonders how this statement fits into the rest of this document which refers in glowing terms to what the government has accomplished and what it intends to do in the future. In the middle we find this dismal portrayal of the scene today. Without over-emphasizing its importance, I think we should give some consideration to the meaning of that statement. If it is accurate the time has come for us to look to our moral and spiritual moorings. I confess that one cannot legislate righteousness but I say that we ought not to legislate anything that will undermine righteousness. This statement should give us plenty of food for thought as we consider the situation which exists in this country today. Perhaps that thought was in the mind of Right Hon. Vincent Massey, a former Governor General of Canada, when he said some years ago that Canada's centennial would provide a good opportunity for spiritual stocktaking.

In the midst of our material progress and technological development, as well as the development of our human resources, let us tie in this other consideration because it has application and a message for us today. Canada has come a long way. Evidence of this is all around us, but we must not neglect those things upon which our nation was originally founded. If we do we do so at our own peril.

Earlier I mentioned that I did not intend to deal specifically with the speech from the throne but I should like to mention one or two things generally. The time has come when we in this house and in this parliament ought to set our house in order. This is a trite statement, I suppose, and it has been said over and over again, but I should like to place additional emphasis on it today. We must set our own political house in order right here in the House of Commons. The country is not impressed with the way its business is being handled. I do not think there are very many in this house who would disagree with that statement. In fact, many have made similar statements in the past. I suggest that if the democratic processes are lost to us it will not be because some military force has moved in and deprived us of them but because of our own failure to use them wisely and effectively in the discharge of the nation's business.

Reference was made in the speech from the throne to the rules changes that have been implemented and which will be considered still further. I believe we have made good progress in streamlining our rules and procedures in the house, but I suggest we have only made a beginning. I say this because our last session lasted 15 months. We will either have to shorten debate or lengthen the year. I sometimes think it might be easier to lengthen the year than shorten debate. Nevertheless, I believe that this matter must be pursued actively and resolutely in order that our rules will provide for the effective dispatch of the public business in a reasonable length of time.

I believe the time has come when we must give some thought to the Canada Elections Act and parliament as a whole. I suggested some time ago that perhaps we should consider the system in use in the United States where there is a stated period of four years for the term of office of a government. I believe this would have two very beneficial effects. First, it would curtail a lot of the politicking that takes place under our system. It may be said that this is the place for politics. Perhaps it is a place for some politics but it is certainly not a place for continuous politicking. If there were set times for the sitting of parliament and perhaps the provision of safeguards and opportunities in respect of want of confidence motions at certain stated times, I believe this would contribute substantially to the effective discharge of the nation's business. Furthermore, it would cut down on the number of election campaigns in this country.

I know that some of our friends in the official opposition say that the reason for so many long sessions is that there are too many parties and we ought to get back to the two-party system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: I notice that our friends in the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, for example, do not look at it this way, because as soon as a provincial election is called they are right in there pitching, trying to upset the two-party system. What they really mean by two parties is Liberals and Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: Surely not. I suggest the reason we are so far behind in the nation's business is not that we have too many parties but too many election campaigns. Therefore I believe that the proposal that there be a four-year period of office for a government is worthy of consideration. I believe also that there must be stated times for sittings and recesses of parliament. If we cannot organize our business any better than we have been doing in the past several years, how in the world can the people expect us to discharge their business effectively?

I know it has been and will be said that we should sit all summer in order to get through the business before the house. It is said that we should make martyrs of ourselves in this respect. But the people are a little wiser than that and they do not think we are martyrs; rather, they think we are stupid because we cannot discharge our responsibilities in a reasonable length of time and get back to our ridings to discharge our obligations there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: Time allocation for debates is another matter I bring to the attention of the house. I know this has been suggested before. It is said that there must be freedom of speech and we have heard cries of "guillotine" and so on. But I do not think the people take such cries seriously any more. In fact, I think the guillotine, if that is what it is to be called, should have been used a good deal more than it has been. I say that necessity requires and common sense demands the orderly dispatch of the nation's business.

There should also be a system of priorities so that we do not become bogged down in relatively unimportant matters while major issues facing the country remain unattended to. I believe that if we set our political house in order we must also recognize our responsibilities farther afield. Canada is in a wonderful position and has a wonderful opportunity, after it sets its political and material house in order, to make a contribution to the world and assist those nations which require assistance. I have before me statements pointing out the needs of people in various countries of the world who are hungry and starving to death, living in alleys and so on. In this respect I am reminded of the words of the Scriptures where it is said, "Give ye them to eat." I believe that we, with our superabundance of material things, are well able to provide a goodly measure to meet the needs of the hungry in other lands as well as technical assistance which will help them raise their standards of living and provide for their own needs.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canada must press forward and fulfil its role in the world as a peace keeping, peace loving and peace making nation. Canada has fulfilled its responsibility in this respect. It has risen to the challenge and we have made a tremendous contribution in this regard. Our serving men abroad have established an excellent record. I believe that we must continue to do so in order that Canada will be looked upon as a nation which not only knows how to organize its own affairs but is able to contribute from its abundance and play its part in order that people everywhere may enjoy the fruits of their labour and their rights in keeping with the dignity of mankind.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker as one of the representatives from the province of Nova Scotia, which was one of the four original provinces which joined in confederation to form Canada, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate in our centennial year.

First of all I wish to take this opportunity to express my sympathy to the family of the late Governor General Vanier who served Canada with such great distinction. I also wish to take this opportunity to express my congratulations to the new Governor General, His Excellency Hon. Roland Michener, who I know will carry on his duties with dignity and in a manner befitting the high office to which he has been called.

I also extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address, the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté). They expressed their viewpoints very well and in a capable manner, reflecting credit on the constituencies which elected them to this house.

One hundred years ago Nova Scotians had already developed many proud traditions, and following confederation we looked to the future with confidence. The throne speech states the following:

> One hundred years ago, our predecessors—men of many races, creeds and tongues—embarked upon a great exercise in statecraft of which we, today, are the trustees. They laid the foundations. They anchored them in a fundamental sense of unity that generations of conflict had taught was vital to the common weal. With this realization they erected a structure of government for the freedom, welfare, and prosperity of all who might come in time to inhabit this land. They built according to a federal plan because they knew that unity, with cultural and regional diversity could be harnessed to a positive and enriching role in no other way.

This was the concept. However, many of our hopes and ambitions have never been realized, and our dreams of equal opportunities with other Canadians have all too often fallen short of accomplishment. Despite these facts we have always tried to carry our share of the load, to be builders of this nation, and I hope the ideals of our forefathers will serve as a guiding light to future generations of Canadians who will be faced with the task of continuing to build a stronger and a united Canada.

Nova Scotians have learned a great deal in the past 100 years, and it is useless for us or for anyone to minimize our problems. We have them in both human and material terms, in the expansion of our primary and secondary industries and in the proper development of our educational facilities. However, in recent years we have gained recognition in the international industrial world for our stable institutions, our intelligent and adaptable labour force, and for our strategic location in the trading world.

Progress, however, is not just a matter of new and bigger industries, but also of people at work, trained in new skills so that they can take their place in performing new and exciting tasks. If progress is to have any real meaning it must be related to improved living standards for all our people. When we examine the present and look at the past we have a right to feel encouraged, but we can hardly feel satisfied. Average incomes in Nova Scotia are rising. In fact in 1966, according to the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, our average income increased to $1,586 from $1,485, which is the highest per capita income in the four Atlantic provinces.

Despite this fact we have not narrowed the gap between average incomes in Nova Scotia and those in central and western Canada. We still lag behing in the Atlantic provinces, with average incomes a third below the workers in the rest of the nation, and our unemployment rates are double the national average. The third annual review of the Economic Council of Canada leaves no doubt that the relative standards in the Atlantic provinces, when compared with the nation, are not improving, and that the gap is not closing. It would appear that we are still too dependant upon forms of employment which do not offer good prospects of growth.

It is evident that we in Nova Scotia must continue to modernize our economy. We must emphasize the importance of Nova Scotians changing with the times. To do this we need help at all levels, both federal and provincial. For these reasons I wish to make some proposals which I hope will have the support of the federal government and which will be beneficial to the people of the Atlantic provinces and to Canadians as a whole.

A visit to the French pavilion at Expo '67 is an exciting experience at any time for anyone. However, in my opinion, one of the outstanding exhibits is the detailed description of the hydro power development through the use of the high tides near the river Rance in Brittany. I would suggest that anyone who has any doubts about the feasibility of generating electricity in this manner should take time to study the French exhibit. I believe that if members of the present government followed this course, steps would be taken to speed up the engineering studies and the development of the tidal power potential of the bay of Fundy. It is my understanding that a study is planned by some nine companies, but it is estimated this survey will take some two years to complete at a cost of approximately $1.5 million. While this study is welcome news, I cannot help but express regret over the delays during the past four years in starting this survey. Studies of Fundy power development were to be undertaken, away back in 1963, under the Atlantic Development Board. In fact, one of the main reasons for the establishment of the board was to carry out tidal power development if feasibility studies justified it. All the preliminary work at that time indicated that it was an investment that would offer immense rewards.

I ask this government, why the delay? Why is it dragging its feet on this project? The tides at the eastern end of the bay of Fundy rise 40 to 50 feet, day in and night out, carrying a 60 million horsepower potential in a six and one half hour period between high and low tide. Even 10 per cent of this is almost twice the total power capacity in Canada today, and even this small portion of recovery would make this the largest single power development in the world.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, why is the government dragging its feet? It is possible that the joint findings of the nine companies recently appointed will confirm the belief long held by experts that tidal power installations in the area could produce power at a price to compete favourably at the present time with nuclear energy. But I would point out that the cost of nuclear power is bound to escalate, because the prices of raw materials and wages are certain to increase over the years. However, in the case of tidal power, once the initial capital investment is made, the amount of manpower required to maintain the operation is small, and the motive power is provided forever by the sea.

According to the speech from the throne the government is concerned about inflation, and with good reason. It does not say so directly, but there can be no other meaning to the paragraph on page 2 of Hansard of May 8 which reads as follows:

> Today relations among industry, labour and governments at all levels are taking on a new significance. To maintain and improve Canada's economic strength it is necessary to exercise wisdom and restraint in our demands upon one another; to show a high degree of co-operation and a sense of responsibility in dealing with each other and with our respective institutions, including all levels of government.

On page 5 the words are a little different, but indirectly they imply a concern over inflation. They read:

> In the highly complex society of today, the interests of the consumer must be taken fully into account in the formulation of government policy. It is abundantly clear that in the whole area of matters affecting the investor and the consumer, the federal government has special obligations arising out of its general responsibility for the economic well-being of the nation as a whole.

These are high sounding phases, but I say this to the government: If it wants to do something for the benefit of the Atlantic provinces, it should proceed immediately with tidal power development. This power would afford the best possible protection against inflation. Once it has been developed, the price of power becomes constant and operating costs are constant. The ebb and flow of the tides, properly harnessed, provides on conversion very cheap and economical power, with the cost factor stabilized.

Think of what this would mean to future generations. The government's present fiscal policies are causing Canadians outside and inside the present cabinet to call out in dismay. They are saying to this government that in times of so-called prosperity it has a responsibility to bring revenues and expenditures into balance. Surely we can pass on to our children something permanent besides our debts, which are looming high and stand as a monument to this government's inability to manage our finances or take advantage of our opportunities.

This government and the Canadian people should not look upon tidal development as an Atlantic project. It is a national project, one that should commend itself to the Canadian people as a whole. In my opinion the development of Churchill falls in Labrador and the mighty power of the Fundy should go hand in hand in lighting the North American continent. A combined power grid from both these sources would more than satisfy Canada's demands, and we would have surplus power to export to the United States.

There is no fear of saturation, for the power needs of New England and New York double every ten years. I believe one of the most important reasons for speeding up this tidal development program is the fact that nuclear and thermal power plants must be fuelled by uranium, coal, oil or gas, which are non-renewable resources. If we hope to improve the over-all standard of living of Canadians, we cannot be wasteful of any of our resources. With the rising demand for energy in our modern society, it is nothing but sheer waste to ignore this vast source of power, which could bring about a golden era of industrial development in the Atlantic provinces.

A moment ago I mentioned the Atlantic Development Board. I think it is imperative that the present Liberal government cast partisan considerations aside and make available to this board funds in relation to the magnitude of the problems with which the Atlantic provinces are faced. This board, established by a Conservative government, only started to function in April, 1963. In the past four years the board has done as much as possible within the limitations imposed upon it by the financial resources provided by the federal government. The initial conception of the board called for a substantial federal investment over a ten year period. It was hoped that this would stimulate private investment.

This is exactly what has happened in connection with Expo. We see massive capital investment by the federal government, and this in turn has encouraged investment from other countries and by private industry. This is what we had hoped would happen in the Atlantic provinces. However, when the government changed in 1963 a new act revised the original conception and only $100 million was allotted initially to improve conditions in this vast area called the Atlantic provinces. A further $50 million was later voted, and a special road investment of $30 million was added, bringing the total resources of the board to some $180 million.

Now, what does the throne speech say about the Atlantic Development Board? This is what it says:

> The government will also take special measures in particular designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized. While efforts by the government in this regard during recent years have met with a large measure of success, they are to be made even more effective. Parliament, therefore, will be invited to broaden the scope of the area development incentive program and to provide increased funds for it. Continuing encouragement will be given to the work of the Atlantic Development Board in promoting industrial development in the Atlantic region.

This is fine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we see when we turn to this year's estimates? On page 508 of the blue book an amount of $33 million is to be credited to the board to assist in financing programs and projects, while $14 million will be voted as the federal share of the cost of a trunk highway program in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. This represents a total of $47 million. It is simply not enough, Mr. Speaker.

Is there no one in the present government aware of the vast area over which these funds will be spread, or of the tremendous economic problems faced by the people of the Atlantic provinces? When we look at the funds allotted for development in the Atlantic provinces and compare them with the government's bill for housekeeping, for example, we begin to realize the lack of consideration being given to our problem. Let me point out, just for the record, that the administrative overhead for the nation's government in terms of staff and office cost was $1 billion in 1963. However, the cost jumped to $1,325 million last year, a whopping 30 per cent increase. What possible justification exists for this astonishing increase, nobody knows. Apparently nobody in the government is troubled by a feeling that a full explanation is owed to parliament and to the taxpayers of Canada. But when we ask for development funds in the amount of $1 billion spread over a ten year period in order to provide self-liquidating projects in the Atlantic provinces and raise the standard of living of our people a bit closer to the national average, our request is denied and we are turned away with a pittance.

It is not my intention to criticize the board when I say that, to date, far too little has been done. However their first task was supposed to be an assessment of the Atlantic region, and the over-all provision of a development plan to overcome the disparity of wages and incomes between this area and the rest of Canada. To the best of my knowledge, no such assessment has been made public up to the present time. This assessment would have to include fisheries, agriculture, mining, manufacturing, all secondary industry and, last but not least, a study of transportation costs since these costs alone influence all other sections of the Atlantic economy. Members from the Atlantic provinces were trying at the tail end of the last session and the beginning of this one to find out from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) where we stand on this study of transportation costs in the Atlantic provinces, but to no avail. In my opinion, until this type of assessment is completed and recommendations are made concerning our special problems it is evident that the assistance provided will only continue to be on an ad hoc basis.

However, sir, let there be no doubt that our problems are real and very serious as revealed by the third annual report of the Economic Council of Canada. The Atlantic Development Board was set up to remedy these conditions, and this it has failed to do. In this year of our centennial celebrations I feel I would be remiss in my duty as a representative of the Atlantic provinces if I did not do everything in my power to make the government conscious of the deplorable results of confederation in this region of Canada. The Atlantic provinces have suffered from a system which has provided protection for the industries of central Canada. We have to pay through the nose for the necessities of life. Manufacturers, under the protection of tariffs, have allowed Canadian prices to be raised at our expense. The price of everything from a bag of groceries to a motorcar is higher here than in the United States, so that Canadian manufacturers in central Canada may prosper.

Despite these facts the federal government, instead of providing the help required, continues to pass legislation which imposes additional tax burdens upon the provincial governments. It is much more difficult, for example, for the Atlantic provinces to find the 50 per cent required to pay their share of costs in joint programs than it is for the wealthier provinces in Canada. It therefore follows that a national standard of public service cannot be enjoyed in the Atlantic provinces without imposing an additional tax burden upon our people. Unless this fact is recognized, we maritimers cannot enjoy national standards of public service. In fact the system presently followed actually accentuates the differences in our national standards.

Generally speaking, the people in the Atlantic provinces find themselves in a position where projected expenditures are increasing more rapidly than sources can be found to pay them. For example, in the field of education costs, our requirements in the years ahead are frightening. While the federal government has taken on a greater share of the cost of secondary education, it is equally true that it has moved out of the field of paying for vocational training, except in the case of adults. Vocational training is the most vital requirement in our system of education today. The Atlantic provinces need even greater aid to cover the extension of their highways programs.

Unless this money is forthcoming from the Atlantic Development Board in greater amounts in the future than in the past, we shall continue to place a severe strain on the financial resources of the people living in those provinces. One project I suggest which is worthy of consideration by the Atlantic Development Board is the establishment of lobster trap depots in the Atlantic provinces. For example, on April 28, 1967, a freak storm of severe proportions dealt havoc and destruction to the lobster traps set along the coast from Guysborough to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. In some areas trap losses may exceed 90 per cent of the fisherman's entire holdings. I point out that while the loss of the traps creates severe financial problems for the fisherman concerned, this is not his greatest loss. In this business, time is of the essence and when a lobster fisherman loses his traps at the beginning of the season his major earning period may well be wiped out, along with the traps, because it will take him three weeks or longer, working around the clock, to rebuild his traps.

This industry is worth something like $23 million to the Atlantic provinces and something like $13 million to the fishermen of Nova Scotia. I mentioned that the recent storm destroyed approximately 90 per cent of the fishermen's traps in some areas of Nova Scotia. This is not an isolated catastrophe but one that occurs with harsh frequency. In fact, only two years ago pack ice, which is always a menace on the east coast, destroyed a large number of traps. I believe the lobster fishermen have suffered five major disasters in the past seven years.

In order to make it possible for these lobster fishermen to continue immediately in the lobster fishing industry following a heavy trap loss, I wish to propose the establishment of at least four major lobster trap depots in Nova Scotia. One of these depots could be located in the Yarmouth area, another on the south shore in Queens or Lunenburg counties, another on the eastern shore between Halifax and Guysborough and a fourth in the Pictou area. Each depot would carry a stock of at least 6,000 lobster traps, and in times of disaster lobster fishermen could draw upon these pools for new supplies. These wooden traps could be made by shore fishermen during the closed season; and since each trap is valued at approximately $7, the total cost of 24,000 traps held in reserve would amount to $168,000 plus the cost of four storage sheds.

The cost of this project could well be borne by the Atlantic Development Board in support of one of our major inshore industries. It is an idea that could well be applied not only to the lobster fishermen of Nova Scotia but to all lobster fishermen in any one of the four Atlantic provinces. Once established the stock of pots could be maintained by the lobster fishermen.

When the loss is sustained, three quarters of the loss is generally covered by lobster trap insurance, which the fishermen could sign over to the administrating authority in payment for the traps obtained, or they could replace the traps by constructing them when the season closed. The design of traps varies in different areas, but the design to be stocked could be worked out with the fishermen concerned. I hope some action is taken on this proposal, which I believe would be beneficial to many of Nova Scotia's lobster fishermen.

While I am on the subject of fishing, I would refer to the recent news release put out by the Department of Transport concerning the loss of the trawler Cape Bonnie which was believed due to a navigational error. This tragic event will long be remembered by the people of Nova Scotia. It would appear the report of the accident as prepared by the officials of the transport department is factual and complete. However, the report does state that the Decca navigator chain which serves the area did produce an unreliable signal for a period of time, and if the captain of the Cape Bonnie was depending on his Decca navigator entirely and took a reading during the period the signal was unreliable, it may well have caused him to set the wrong course for Halifax harbour.

[Mr. Crouse.]

In the light of accidents which have occurred in the area of Halifax harbour in recent months, it is my opinion—one that is endorsed by many mariners—that in the interests of protecting the lives of our seamen the government should give favourable consideration to returning the Sambro lightship to its regular station. I believe a lightship was on station in the area for some 52 years, and with the strong signals sent out by this ship there was no question in the minds of our mariners about their proper location.

Since we hope and believe that Halifax will become the Nova Scotia terminal for giant bulk cargo vessels in the not too distant future, and we want to encourage as many deep-water ships as possible to call at our capital city's port, I believe maximum assistance in navigational aids should be provided them when approaching the harbour. For these reasons, and for many others I could cite, I hope the government will take early action to see that the Sambro or a similar ship is put back on the job.

Another development which should be studied and supported by the Atlantic Development Board is the proposed construction of a corridor road through Maine. This is not a new proposal, but I ask the government what progress is being made in discussions with our American friends on this important trade and tourist route, which would shorten the distance between the maritimes and central Canadian marketing areas by approximately 140 miles.

> Parliament will also be asked to enact a measure further to assist Canadians when moving from their homes in order to obtain employment.

Shades of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon). We in the maritime provinces have heard this old chestnut ever since the hon. member produced his report on our economic prospects. This has become a standing joke in our area. We would like him to know—and I think I am speaking for all maritimers when I say this—that we want to stay in the Atlantic provinces. We feel that, given the right opportunities, we can build our part of Canada equal to any other part of this nation. We do not want a one-way ticket to some other part of Canada, and we resent this intimation that we do.

I would suggest to the government that they spend some of this money in an effort to try to develop a corridor road through Maine. Has nothing been done in this regard? Is there no one on that side of the house who can tell us what progress is being made with this international development? Surely they could ask somebody in the United States to give us a report on the possibilities of working out a joint highway development in Maine. My understanding is that a bill has been introduced in the Maine legislature calling for construction and improvements on several portions of state route No. 6, a section of the long proposed corridor road. In my view, this is a step in the right direction; but I ask the government whether any representations have been made to the governor of the state of Maine by the federal government indicating our interest in developing this corridor road.

Think of the tremendous savings in transportation costs for our fishing industry, for our farmers and for our newly developing secondary manufacturing industries if a road between Nova Scotia and Montreal could be built which could shorten the distance by 140 miles. This is a project which has been sleeping for far too long, and I hope that some action is taken immediately by the government to bring about international co-operation in this matter, which would be beneficial to a large area of both countries.

What action has been taken to establish a second ferry between New England and Nova Scotia? Our tourist industry is calling out for this type of assistance. Yet all we hear from the federal government are vague promises. There is nothing in the speech from the throne about this particular project, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of a second ferry to our agricultural industry, our fishing and tourist industry, I think it is high time that some action was taken on this important matter.

The throne speech states that legislation will be put before this session for better regulation and use of broadcasting privileges and responsibilities. In my view, this cannot be introduced too soon. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is literally like a rudderless ship without a captain, drifting about in a fog on a sea of uncertainty. It is way past the time for the government to take some action in appointing a program boss for this organization, a crown corporation which is causing great concern to many Canadians.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, because we see in this year's estimates the amount of $143,960,000 for the C.B.C., which is an increase of $29,476,000 in one year. In its original concept the C.B.C. was to operate as a free agent, but we are now aware that there is no such thing as free speech. If this were a private organization, by this time it would have gone broke. With the so-called creative minds in charge of the C.B.C. today, it is evident to the public that they believe this gives them the right to be irresponsible, to deal in sensationalism and to show bad taste.

There are times, Mr. Speaker, when I doubt whether the C.B.C. employees want freedom for the C.B.C. I think they want freedom only for themselves. When I was first elected in 1957 the C.B.C. estimates were approximately $52 million a year, and I can well remember making a speech about it at the time and remarking that $1 million a week seemed to be a lot of money to subsidize one service. I thought the figure was too high then, but today the figure is almost three times that amount. It is high time that we carefully examined this entire organization and its spending program.

Part of the throne speech calls for assistance to housing and urban development. I say that this proposal is fiction, not fact. It presents the vision of new urban living, small towns with their own community life, instead of the present concrete jungles that we call our cities. I am not going to criticize the government for looking ahead, but dreams are no substitute for necessities. Canada today is in the grip of a serious housing crisis. Rents are skyrocketing, and as a result of high levels of taxation imposed by this government in the wake of wasteful extravagance, the price of homes has reached a level far beyond the capacity of the average wage earner to pay.

It is in the Atlantic provinces, in my opinion, that Canada's policy makers should be putting forward a tremendous effort. I say this because, though we have manpower resources, we need new job opportunities. Great progress has been made, but more needs to be done and I hope the government will realize that though we have moved forward we still require assistance from the Atlantic Development Board armed with sufficient funds to help finance continued economic expansion in our area. This should be the goal, and there could be no better undertaking for the Atlantic provinces and for Canada in this our centennial year.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate my first words must be words of congratulation to the mover (Mr. Jamieson) and seconder (Mr. Côté, Nicolet-Yamaska) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Rarely, if ever, on the several occasions when I have been present as a member of this house for the past five years and as a visitor during earlier years have I heard a more thoughtful, more inspiring or more eloquent address than that made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo on Tuesday afternoon. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska also acquitted himself with distinction, and I heartily congratulate them both on their contribution to the debate in this chamber.

I also wish to avail myself of the opportunity to join in the expression of good wishes and congratulations to His Excellency the Governor General upon his assumption of this responsible and onerous duties. As has been said frequently during recent weeks, our new Governor General has served Canada with great distinction both at home and abroad. If you, Mr. Speaker, will permit a reference to a personal experience I am sure hon. members will find it of interest.

In January of 1966 I had the honour to represent Canada at the funeral in New Delhi of the late Prime Minister Shastri. While there I was a house guest of His Excellency and his gracious lady. As one might expect, during the two days I was there I saw a great deal of His Excellency who was then serving as our high commissioner. I was in his company when we met the acting prime minister, other leaders of government and equally prominent people in India. I was most impressed. I was very proud as a Canadian of the way in which our high commissioner was received by almost every person with whom we came into contact. He was received not only with respect but with warmth and, on one or two occasions, almost with affection. I was very proud, as I have said, to know that we were represented by such a fine person. I am sure his excellent work in India enhanced our prestige and that his work in the important new office he now holds will further increase that prestige.

Under normal circumstances a member of the government taking part in the debate on the address might be expected to deal at some length with the amendments which have been proposed to the motion. In his excellent speech yesterday, however, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) dealt so effectively with the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and also, perhaps by way of anticipation, with the points raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) in his remarks earlier today, that I do not feel it is necessary for me to do so. The speech of my right hon. leader—and reference to Hansard will bear this out—dealt with those submissions so effectively that I feel my time could be spent to better advantage if I were to supplement what the Prime Minister had to say about Canada's serious housing situation. Your Honour will recall that some days ago I assured hon. members that I would be making such a statement and I am afraid I shall need all the time permitted under the rules if I am to do so even in what might be regarded as an inadequate way.

In view of the serious setback that we faced last year because of the disturbing drop in housing starts amounting to roughly 30,000 fewer than we would have liked, housing has been the focus of attention for a great deal of comment or criticism, if you like, during recent months both inside and outside this house. It might be advisable to point out that in many instances the critics have demonstrated a complete lack of understanding of the true situation, and this applies to the remarks made on the subject yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. Repeated attempts have been made to magnify our difficulties out of all proportion to the actual position. Hence the importance of an up to date report on Canada's housing situation.

I would begin by saying that the government is fully aware of the large number of new housing starts necessary to maintain and improve our national stock of living accommodation. But if we are fair with ourselves, however, we must recognize that housing is inevitably subject to the same economic pressures as is every other major industry in this country.

In this connection let me make it clear to a great many people who do not seem to appreciate it that the disquieting experience of 1966, and admittedly it was a disturbing one, does not represent anything new even in our postwar housing experience. Hon. members from western Canada, more particularly from British Columbia, will recall the situation which developed some years ago in downtown Vancouver when people moved into the old Hotel Vancouver, walked in from the street and took over. This is nothing to be proud of but these are the facts of life. The significant thing is that great progress has been made in housing within a period of 20 years. We can look with great satisfaction on the housing record from 1962 to 1966. Every year from 1962-63 through to 1966 there have been not only more completions but, with the exception of 1966, more starts. And even in 1966 we reached a figure within approximately 1,000 of our target for completions. How many people in Canada know that? We have maintained a good average over a period of years.

I am certainly not suggesting there have not and may not be times when certain problem areas in Canada exist and will continue to exist, areas where a shortage of housing will bring hardship to many families needing new homes. Nor would any responsible person suggest that this parliament or the government could sit back and allow the situation which we know exists in some of these areas, especially in metropolitan Toronto, to continue simply with the hope that sooner or later it will correct itself.

The Prime Minister in his remarks yesterday made the government's position perfectly clear. Aggressive action was needed and undoubtedly further action is needed at this time, but I might remind the house and the people of Canada that very effective action has been taken by this government during recent months. The mistake has been that we have been too busy with other things and have not told the people what has actually been done in this field.

And I would also remind the house, as became clear through a series of meetings I attended earlier this year, that the solution of our problems will not be found through the efforts of the senior government alone. Housing today is a most complex problem. In one province in order to get a public housing venture under way you have to go through some 14 different boards, agencies and bodies, which on occasion has taken as long as 28 months. Housing is a complex problem that will be resolved only with the full support of governments at all levels and with the wholehearted support and co-operation of every other responsible body and organization genuinely interested in finding a solution for the problem.

It was our attempt to find an answer that lay behind the series of meetings I convened earlier this year, not on my own but in co-operation with my provincial colleagues, endeavouring to generate a concerted program of effective action which would produce not only the greatly increased number of homes that were needed but housing of the type required to match our expanding variety of needs, including the replacement of near slum areas with decent, clean and warm housing.

I see some hon. members in the house who attended some of those conferences and I am sure they will bear me out that the conferences were well attended and were very worth while. They were informative. The responsibility was placed where the responsibility should be placed, and if there were shortcomings on the part of the federal government those shortcomings were pointed out, but the greater part of the criticisms was not directed toward what the federal government was attempting to do and was doing in this field.

There were nine of these meetings, jointly convened by the provincial ministers and myself, and they have been followed more recently by meetings with the representatives of the principal groups of private mortgage investors in this country, operating in both the conventional and N.H.A. fields, including the banks, trust companies and assurance companies. Yesterday I met for four hours with the presidents and senior vice presidents of every major assurance company in Canada and of many of the smaller ones.

Both series of meetings, the ones sponsored jointly with the provincial ministers and the ones attended by the representatives of the investment institutions, have given me confidence that notwithstanding a very slow start during the first quarter of 1967 this year we will see, and in fact are now experiencing, a very substantial return in housing. It was unfortunate that we had a very slow start in the first quarter of the year, but how many people stop to think that the reason we had such a drop in starts in that quarter was that we had diverted funds that would normally have been made available early this year to the last quarter of last year in order to improve the situation in 1967? I might say that the upturn in housing will surpass by a good margin our earlier expectations for the year.

My confidence is borne out by a reference to some figures. The figures indicate that as of the end of last month, April 30, loans under the National Housing Act were running at during the same period of 1966. In the last approximately three times the level reached four months requests for undertakings to insure by approved lenders and direct loans by C.M.H.C. numbered 35,000 as against 12,556 in the same period last year.

This surge of activity is, of course, just now beginning to be reflected in actual housing starts. You first do your planning, you apply for the funds, you get them and then you start to build. The results are now clear. Preliminary figures for April show a total of 8,200 starts, up 26 per cent over the figure for the same month last year. I might say that April is usually a very good month and, as I say, the figure this year is up by more than 26 per cent over last year. This indicates house production at an annual rate considerably higher than in 1966.

More recent figures indicate that the rate for all areas in Canada is already close to a level of 160,000 units per annum and, Mr. Speaker, there is every indication that with a continuation of the increased level of lending the next month or two will see the yearly rate of production top our objective of 170,000 housing starts per annum. This 170,000 is not a mythical figure picked out of the air. It is the figure that we see quoted repeatedly in the newspapers as having been given by the Economic Council of Canada as the target for 1967, 1968, and the two or three years to follow. It is the figure which many people feared was completely unattainable for several years to come without vast increases in the number and amount of direct loans by the federal government.

Just to give you some idea of what it would mean if we did not get the private investors back into this field, the 20,000 starts that were authorized as of April 1 called for expenditures by the federal government, which this parliament has to authorize, of $300 million, and we must remember that we need 170,000 new starts a year. Any person with a sense of responsibility will realize that the thing which required to be done was to trigger increased participation by the private investors in this field and increased interest in public housing to take care of the wants of those in the lower and middle income tax brackets.

But, Mr. Speaker, the accomplishments that we have recorded thus far this year—and I think this is most significant—have been achieved without the very substantial impact on housing which will accompany the return by and the greatly expanded operations of our chartered banks in mortgage lending. How many people in this house know that the largest single factor which went into the building of houses in 1954 and 1955 was the lending by the chartered banks of this country? They went out of this field because of an unrealistic interest rate, the 6 per cent rate, at a time when under the National Housing Act interest rates were 6¼ per cent, later 6¾ per cent and for a short time 7¼ per cent.

I am happy to say that officials of the banks assured me just two weeks ago that we can look to them for very active participation in mortgage lending for housing. They were not permitted to re-enter this field until May 1 of this year but we have their assurance that they will enter it on a very substantial scale. This was welcome news. It was encouraging news to the government because it came as a direct result of action taken by the government and by parliament as a result of governmental action in bringing about changes in the Bank Act, given Royal Assent in late March, giving the banks freedom to provide money to operate at the same rate as the other lending institutions. With the N.H.A. rate at 7 per cent, as it appears to be today, the banks will be in actively at that figure, but how could one expect them to lend when they were forced out of the market by the bank's interest rate when it was frozen at 6 per cent?

Hon. members will be interested, I am sure, to know that there were a number of important factors which contributed to the development of the encouraging potential for new housing in 1967. First, to a substantial degree there has been a relaxation of the economic pressure which affected the residential scene so greatly and so adversely last year. I feel, however, that many people have not fully appreciated the significance of the government's action at the end of last November with regard to the establishment of a new formula governing the maximum interest rate under the National Housing Act. You will recall that we started out at a level of 7¼ per cent 1½ per cent above the long term yield on government bonds. In my opinion this realistic move on the part of the government is responsible in a large way for the upswing in housing which we presently are beginning to enjoy. By allowing this automatic adjustment on a quarterly basis, according to the return on the long term yield on government bonds, the rate now for the first time in history is sure of a competitive place among investment returns generally.

Representatives of the private investment community—and I have met a great many of them in the course of the last 100 days—have assured me repeatedly during recent months that this has been the most significant move in bringing them back into the field on an increasing scale. This, of course, should result in a stable, not a spasmodic, flow of funds into housing. What possible chance was there to get a mortgage company, trust company or any other investment institution to lend money at a rate of 6¾ per cent, and before that 6¼ per cent, when they could get rates of 7¾ or even 8 per cent or more on money lent for the building of a warehouse or a factory or something of that nature? There was an insatiable demand for funds in the years 1964, 1965 and even more so in 1966. There was a demand for every available dollar for the construction of major power projects, pipe lines and projects in all these fields. I believe that any responsible person heading one of these lending institutions would have an obligation to see that the institution received not an excessive return but at least what the market was paying as a general rule. That return was not available from most investments in housing.

One very important thing in respect of this temporary increase to 7¼ per cent in the lending rate is the flexibility feature. I am sure it was gratifying to every member of this house to learn that the formula which was adopted at the end of November has already resulted in a decrease in the effective rate. It dropped from 7¼ to 7 per cent at the end of March automatically and may well result in a further reduction by the end of June. I am sure all members hope that it does.

Another vital factor in our progress this year, of course, is the success of the government's unprecedented spring program of direct lending to builders. Again this is a new move, a new venture. Although I, and I believe most of my colleagues, felt confident toward the end of 1966 that the year 1967 would see the return of the private lenders to fuller participation in housing, at the same time it was obvious there would be a time lag before some of these investors, especially the banks who had been out of the picture since 1956, could resume their lending position.

A heavy volume of starts in the spring, the prime building season of 1967, was imperative if new houses in adequate numbers were to reach completion during 1967. It was for this reason the government directed Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make up to 20,000 direct loans available to builders without any pre-sale guarantee. These loans were to be made available between April 1 and May 31. Actually, applications for such loans were accepted beginning on March 1, in order to enable builders to prepare enlarged production programs as soon as the snow was gone and the cold weather was behind us. This was to cover the period April 1 to May 31. However, by April 30 request for direct loan assistance had been received from all parts of Canada for almost the full 20,000 units. I think the figure was between 19,700 and 19,800 just before the final counting. I know that by April 28 the exact figure had exceeded 19,400.

In the same period last year, when loans were offered only to prospective home owners and builders who were constructing houses which were pre-sold, the applications totalled about 5,600. So we have 5,600 against 20,000 in the same period. Most of this has been during the period of just one month. In total, N.H.A. loan applications for approved lenders and for direct loans during the first four months of this year covered approximately 36,000 units compared with 14,655 units in the same period last year. Happily, Mr. Speaker, there also has been a very substantial increase in the number of conventional loans for housing since early March. This is in respect of apartment blocks and loans which generally are financed by the mortgage companies, insurance companies and trust companies. As I said earlier, there was a drop last year in starts of more than 30,000. However, the way loans are being made now the indications are that we will reach the level of 170,000 starts per annum in the very near future, perhaps within a matter of weeks.

The pace of mortgage lending by the private companies has quickened of late. The very important and heartening thing about this is that the great bulk of these funds are earmarked for the construction of sorely needed apartment units in major cities and municipalities, particularly in metropolitan Toronto and in Montreal. If you follow the news media—the newspapers, periodicals and air communications systems—you will realize that this is the area where the need has reached the most serious proportions. I look forward with confidence to a concentration of effort by these private lenders in alleviating as quickly as possible the serious situation which now exists in Toronto and to a lesser extent in one or two other major metropolitan areas.

I was questioned a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, about the effects of the amendment to the National Housing Act which made possible loans for the purchase and improvement of existing houses. That legislation received royal assent in December of last year. This was new ground, involving new procedures. Actual purchases were at a low ebb in January of this year and they were not too active even in February. However, as a result of increasing activity in March and even more so in April, by April 28 approximately 1,300 loans had been made under this new arrangement, the majority within the last four or five weeks.

Although all but one of these purchases involved direct C.M.H.C. loan assistance, we anticipate as a result of discussions we have had in the past three or four weeks that in coming months we will note a number of loans from chartered banks because they are the institutions in the small communities where houses are available. We are sure they will join in our attempt to bring home ownership within the means of lower income families. By the end of April loans were being processed at the rate of about 500 per month. That is a very encouraging trend, representing some 6,000 per annum.

While there are many good reasons for optimism regarding a brighter housing picture this year, within the first few months of 1967 there has been an acceleration of national housing assistance to meet some of the more urgent and specialized problems which face us today. I refer to the attempt to provide accommodation for our elderly citizens, families and individuals with low incomes who are denied any real opportunity to compete for housing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must advise the minister that his allotted time has now expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Nicholson: I do not know whether it is agreeable to hon. members for me to continue for a few moments.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to allow the minister to complete his remarks?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances we would allow the minister to continue. However, this government insists on the allocation of time by compulsion and I think we should follow that procedure.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Mr. Nicholson: I shall, of course, abide by the wish of the house, but I recall that additional time was granted to two of the last three speakers from the opposite side as well as others.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with others who have preceded me in offering sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the speech from the throne, the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté). As usual they lived up to the traditions of this house in the quality of the speeches they delivered as their maiden contributions. I am sure we will hear from them again but I should warn them that sometimes the heights which hon. members reach in delivering such formal speeches are never again reached as long as they sit on the government side. I hold out to them the inducement that in the not too distant future, perhaps at the time of the next election, they may yet come over to this side where they may enjoy the greater freedom which comes to those who are members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. At that time they may give full effect to the quality which they displayed and which I doubt they will have the opportunity to display again.

Let me apologize to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) for not dealing specifically with the subject matter of his very interesting speech. Let me assure him, however, that in the opposition lobby the line is already forming of hon. members who are eager and anxious to come to grips with the minister on that subject matter.

We are still involved in wrangles about the constitution and federal-provincial relations. The government has moved a step closer to the position some of us advocate and have advocated for a long time, namely, that there should be wider and more public discussion of this problem. Frankly I do not put too much stock in what was said in the speech from the throne, and this feeling was borne out by what the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said when he spoke yesterday. It seems the government and its senior advisors cannot get it into their heads that this issue at this time should not be the prerogative of a privileged few. True enough, any changes made must take into account the existing jurisprudence, and the views of all experts in the respective governments will be needed when in due course firm proposals are drafted and legislation enacted.

In the first instance, surely these are matters which deeply concern the average Canadian. Surely he is entitled to participate in the discussion, to hear what is being said and to indicate whether in his view the federal or the provincial government is the instrument he would select to exercise jurisdiction in certain fields. These might include educational television, about which we have heard much lately, as well as external affairs, air and water pollution and assistance to urban development. The average person living in this country, regardless of whether he is a resident of Quebec, Ontario or some other province, is deeply and continually concerned about these issues. He may decide in his judgment that these things could best be handled by the provincial governments or by the federal government. It seems to me that what the government is doing by referring this matter to its technical committee is refusing to bring it into the open for discussion, and this is not consistent with the idea of hearing the views of the majority of the people. I suggest this idea of "big brother knows best" is a most aggravating and arrogant assumption.

I feel I am entitled to make these comments because my position has been consistent. I first raised this matter in this party four or five years ago and have dealt with it in speeches in the house. I placed a resolution on the order paper on March 13, 1964, reading as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should forthwith consult with the provinces for the purpose of establishing a centennial constitutional conference to consist of a given number of Senators and Members of Parliament and an equal number of members of all of the provincial legislatures; which conference should meet in Ottawa and in all of the provinces to consider amending the British North America Act in accordance with the experiences of the past, the exigencies of the present and the needs of the future, including in such consideration the determination of those subject matters which are logically suited for general federal-provincial consultation—

That was well over three years ago and no attention was paid to it at that time. I placed another resolution on the order paper, in somewhat different terms but dealing with the same subject matter, which was debated on February 14, 1966.

If such a conference has been initiated in 1963, 1964, 1965 or even 1966 we might at this time be crowning the results in this year of our centennial celebrations by a new and useful approach in legislative form to our federal-provincial difficulties. Instead we see the problems magnified and deepening, dividing our country regionally and, unfortunately at times, racially. I can only say that the government's offer is too little and too late.

I cannot support the subamendment offered by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), without quarreling with its content. That attitude is consistent with the position I am now taking in that it is premature in the same way that the government's proposal is premature at this time. The result will be to bury this matter by referring it for consideration by a few technical experts. The first thing that is essential as a condition precedent is a thorough and wide-ranging public discussion on all levels.

After those words of criticism I am glad to say a word or two in commendation of the government for its proposal in the speech from the throne to consider new incentives for industrial, regional and economic planning in the north. I came into this house over nine years ago primarily to push the government into projects of this kind and became immediately concerned with the construction of a railway to Pine Point, which had been talked about for almost 40 years but which no government had ever looked at. The issue involved not only the railroad but the route, and it ultimately proved necessary to have the then government set up a royal commission to consider this issue. Despite opposition which came from all sides of the house and from many of the larger companies and industries involved, the former government was persuaded ultimately to select a route through Peace River and the railway was launched and built. Because it was built, and was built on the right route, the costs of construction were decreased, the time for building was lessened and the great mine at Pine Point came into production, other mines and mineral fields were discovered, and great timber resources which we knew of were opened and are now producing large quantities of lumber and plywood. The construction of the railroad and the collateral improvement of the Mackenzie by the government of Alberta and the federal government accelerated the exploration and discovery of oil and gas in the huge Rainbow lake fields, and thousands of people came into the country. Exploration was stepped up in the Northwest Territories. This was all done through a partnership arrangement among the government, the railway company and industry. To the extent to which the present government will take this as a model in their development of the north, they can count on my completely non-partisan support.

For the rest of my time, Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss two statements contained in the speech from the throne which are worthy of consideration, and in fact should be enshrined in the annals of this house. The first one is this:

> If the century that has passed can be characterized by the development of the resources of our land, it is likely that the century to come must be marked by an increasing concentration upon the development of the resources of the mind and the spirit...
> In one form or another science is already reaching into the very heart of the community to transform the lives of each of us. It is essential that the control and development of our environment keeps apace. We have built towns and cities, canals and railroads, highways and other great works of construction at an unprecedented pace. But we have too often in the past made beauty the poor sister of material gain and careless workmanship the price of easy profit. We must lose no more time in making ugliness in our environment as unwelcome as financial losses in our balance sheets.

And so on ad nauseam. If I were allowed to wear a hat in this house, I would take it off and bow three times at those beautiful words, words with which we must all agree but which have no place within the four corners of the speech from the throne which the government gave to His Excellency to read. The speech from the throne, as I construe it, ought to be a document envisaging a legislative program that this parliament will be asked to deal with in the course of the session to come. I can only surmise that somehow these fine words were misplaced and were probably intended to be used by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) at some ceremony in the future when he would be receiving an honorary degree at a university and have by error found their way into the speech from the throne. The fact is that these statements and others like them, and the whole tone and content of the speech from the throne, are an indication that this government has now come into the open to indicate its determination to involve itself directly and substantially in all aspects of human life. Its actions in the past and this speech from the throne in the present is a periscope to look ahead into the future.

I recognize that governments must be strong and powerful within the limits of their authority; they must be armed with the right to act swiftly. But the point I wish to make is that this must always go hand in hand with the necessity of making a government accountable, and answerable, and if it is the intention of this government, as appears certain, more and more to take over the authority to tell people what to do, how to do it and when to do it in every field of human activity, then some way must be found to make them responsible.

Governments are becoming increasingly activist; they are moving into all areas of human activity. They act as transfer agents to redistribute wealth. They invade our privacy. There is not one area of human relations where this government is not intending to move. In short, they propose to become all-powerful and all-encompassing. This might be all very well if wisdom, intelligence, moderation and understanding were present to modify and mould their decisions. But governments are in the grip of and held firm by ordinary human beings. All too often politicians are looking to the next election, civil servants are engaged in empire building and struggling for prestige and promotion, pressure groups are seeking special privileges, there are even and a few purveyors of corruption. They are no worse, but certainly no better, than the rest of us ordinary people.

The laws that the government does pass are increasingly restrictive, curtailing and intruding upon our lives; and this means more than the laws we see on the statute books. Hardly a bill is brought into the house today that does not give to the executive uncontrolled discretion to legislate in secret by order in council or ministerial regulation. They even demand that we delegate this right to boards and tribunals. In this respect, unlike most other democratic countries, this backward and reactionary government has so far refused to establish machinery to permit this type of delegated authority to be examined and scrutinized under formal procedures.

Some years ago when we were debating the report of the first committee on procedure I asked the Prime Minister whether he was prepared to establish a committee to examine the delegating of authority. At that time he said he would consider the question and went on to say that the government was considering appointing an ombudsman. He said this consideration was to continue. It is still continuing. The time has come when members of this house must tell the government to do something about it. I hope that through the medium of the procedures committee some improvement may be brought about in this regard, because there must be some reform to compel the ever-growing power of the executive to be answerable and responsive in these matters.

The speech from the throne makes special reference to parliamentary reform, and I am happy to see that this question is contained in the speech. I should warn the government that there is more to parliamentary reform than merely arming the government with the guillotine to shut off debate and curtail discussion at their whim. Our rules and standing orders are not the property of this or any government or of any group or person. The right to set conditions under which the house operates is and must continue to remain the exclusive privilege, collectively, of the individual private members, without regard to political affiliation.

It is for all of us in our capacity as members to arrange these rules so that we may do our duty according to the oath which we took upon becoming members, which takes precedence over all other loyalties. After all, this is not a private debating club nor is it an institution which meets meekly to place the seal of approval on the proposals of the government. Many of us are here because our people sent us to find answers to some of the tough and complex problems which perplex us. If we cannot even come to grips with the necessary requirement of our own procedures to permit us to do this job, there is not much hope for the country.

Yet this does not have to mean that the writ of the government must run 100 per cent in every matter of detail and on all collateral issues. Surely, once the basic policies and fundamentals of spending and legislative proposals have been adopted and decided in the house along party lines, there should be opportunity for the private members from all parties to speak, act and vote on the details, particularly through the committees system, with a less rigid party system than is now the case.

I am glad to hear the Prime Minister suggest the likelihood of this on some of the issues proposed for the coming session. Certainly on capital punishment and divorce and certain proposed changes in the Criminal Code and on several other items, there should be declarations as soon as possible that on matters such as this, which to a greater extent than in other issues so deeply affect the individual conscience and beliefs of the members, there should be complete freedom, even though the measures may be introduced, as they should be, by the government.

I hope that we will come to this position in a great many more of the questions which we have to consider. It is my belief that the party system has substantial benefits, but it can go hand in hand with more objectivity and independence on the part of the private members. As a matter of fact, I believe this objectivity and independence will strengthen the party system, certainly in the eye of the public.

We all belong to a party because we have great belief in the creed which it professes, and on the fundamental and philosophic problems there is an opportunity for parties to consider their positions and vote accordingly and to divide on such lines in the debates in the house on the basic programs. But there must be freedom of conscience and opportunity for the private member on the question of detail. Hand in hand with this we need to remove from the government the fear that every defeat need mean an election.

Procedures which will permit a more objective examination of bills and estimates before they have been poured into the mould of government enactments which harden and become inflexible must be worked out. For this to happen there will have to be a greater emphasis on quality rather than quantity.

Today when I hear the Prime Minister and other members of the government gloat and boast over the variety and number of the bills which they have enacted and intend to enact, I suggest to them that they restrain their enthusiasm until these bills have come back for amendment, change and modification in the light of the facts, because most of them contain substantial defects.

Governments—and this government in particular—have forgotten the cardinal principle of legislation, namely that the best bills and the best acts and legislation are those which conform to and follow the normal pattern of human behaviour, rather than run contrary and adverse to human nature. All too often in the last three or four years we have passed bills with too little regard for the capacity of the economy to absorb these measures or of the ability of the people to digest them, or even of the civil service to carry them out.

Without weakening government or diminishing leadership, it is plain that the elected members must assume a more useful and meaningful role in the machinery of democracy, and the frustration and weaknesses of the present system are not an environment in which freedom and independence can flourish.

All too often the decision a member has to make on a vote is a difficult and an agonizing one. This is particularly so for those who might harbour the treasonable idea that the pronouncements from the top and the dictates of party may be loud, but are not always clear. It is only given to the truly faithful to be able to detect the divine nature of some of these revelations.

However, partly because of the shrill cries of those who are still fighting the doctrinaire battles of long ago, sometimes to carry out the pet schemes of civil servants, and frequently because of pure, political opportunism, the state is moving constantly and on a broad front to legislate, tax and spend: legislate, tax and spend.

I readily concede that there are still large areas affected by poverty, disease and ignorance where the public sector must intervene because the private sector has not been capable of solving the problems. This is something which is accepted in our society as it is today. But I dislike the interference, the red tape the increasing bureaucracy and the dwindling freedom of the ordinary citizen which this government involvement means. All too often, in an effort to deal with a particular evil, we end up by legislating in such a way that we invade the general rights of everybody and affect the entire community. We invoke the whole massive apparatus of the state when a more selective approach would be adequate. It is like using a nuclear missile to gun down a marauding crow. There is this constant deterioration in the capacity to enjoy freedom, to live life as a human being, fashioned in the image of the Creator, as a separate, distinct and highly individualistic person.

The state towers above us, huge, immovable, impersonal, with all the rules in its favour; with forms, red tape and bureaucracy squeezing out the colour and life of ordinary human beings, and with a future ahead of us looking more and more as a dreary, dull wasteland, adjusted to conformity, with the ultimate loss of the divine spark of individuality. No wonder people are being driven into the bog of television and other synthetic enjoyments, despite the bad taste of some programs, and the mealy-mouthed mediocrity of many of the public affairs programs and commentators.

The question which comes to me over and over again on these issues as they come up in the house for discussion, consideration and voting is: What is the real cost, not only in terms of actual dollars, but remembering that after the tax structure established by spending programs is reflected in the cost of living there is a very little real net return to those who are on the receiving end of these programs?

A year ago, on April 22, I referred to this particular issue in the house when I said the following:

> I have an idea that people would like us seriously to consider the problems presented by inflation. That word, of course, is a bland euphemism used by those in authority to express the fact that the prices of meat, milk, bread, shoes, taxes, rent and so on are all going up and up, so much so that there is reason to believe that one of the unidentified flying objects about which we have heard so much has been identified as the cost of living index.

Since I made that speech the cost of living index has gone up 4.6 points, and the cost of many of the programs which have been put into effect during the course of the last year has not yet been fed into the economy. This fact, the steady and relentless whittling away of the rights of the individual, and the enormous growth of the government, is the price we are paying for these reforms. The question then is: What must we do in this house to be able to reform our procedure and our rules so that when the government, as it apparently proposes to do, moves ahead on this broad front dealing with every aspect of human life, we in this house will be able to discharge the obligations to our constituents who sent us here to examine, scrutinize and analyse these things, to make sure that the price which is paid in the loss of human freedom and human rights is as small as we can possibly make it.

I fully realize that many bills will be passed, but the price which we are paying is far too great. We must have an opportunity to examine, scrutinize and make certain that the amount of liberty which is lost is as small as possible under the circumstances. More than that, when the government acting under the legislative proposals enacts orders in council and ministerial regulations there must be a procedure and a means whereby those can be brought back into the house for examination and scrutiny, so that we can ascertain their effect and impact upon the public. At the present time there is no means of doing this, and this constitutes a grave gap in the duty and responsibilities which we as members should exercise, on behalf of the people who sent us here. In looking many months ahead, which I believe we have to do if we take the speech of the Prime Minister and the speech from the throne seriously, we must organize, change and modify our rules and our means of carrying on the business of the country and the business of parliament so that the private members, through the committees structure and through changes in the rules, will have opportunity to a greater extent than ever before to exercise the authority and the rights which we as private members must exercise.

There are many ways by which this can be done and I am not at this time, Mr. Speaker, going to go into them. As a member of the procedure committee I consider it my responsibility to wait until the committee is in session to bring forward my ideas. I hope, however, that we will have an opportunity to change, to moderate and to improve our antediluvian and anachronistic practices. I think we are farther behind in this regard than any nation in the commonwealth. There are many reasons for that and I do not think I need to deal with them at this stage. I do not want to usurp the functions of the chairman of this committee, but as a member of the committee I would invite hon. members to bring forward their ideas since it is literally impossible for all private members to appear before the committee.

As you may know Mr. Speaker, there is a very interesting practice in the United Kingdom under which the very distinguished Speaker, Right Hon. Dr. King, the party whips and party house leaders do appear before a committee considering procedure. The proceedings of this committee are conducted with the help and assistance of these distinguished members of the House of Commons in Westminster. There are transcripts made of the committee proceedings. We find, however, that the House of Commons in the United Kingdom, the Congress of the United States, the House of Representatives and the Senate in Australia are all struggling with the same problem. They are all feeling the frustration of the private members who desire very earnestly to make some contribution to the government of the country, but the rules do not permit them to do so. They find the government becoming increasingly powerful and less and less inclined to listen to the views of members. They are trying to work out a means of accommodation between the necessity for carrying on the multitudinous activities of the country and at the same time reserving to private member every opportunity to intervene, when in their view they have a duty to do so.

In this country, Mr. Speaker, with its diverse economic and geographical conditions, it is more than ever essential that this right be acquired. I hope that hon. members who have been in this house for some time and who have, I am sure, experienced the difficulties and frustrations, sometimes the agony, of attempting to make their contribution on behalf of their constituents or their country, will let us have their views. I believe that only in that way can a consensus be arrived at. I believe this is essential. I think we are at the crossroads because of the activities of the government which I have mentioned, and so there must be some considerable reform of our procedure in the near future or else, in my humble opinion, the institutions of democracy as we know them will pass out of existence.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, while I have been sitting here this afternoon listening to the other speakers in this throne speech debate I was informed that Margaret Konantz, who was a member of this house in the years 1963 to 1965, had died while in Fredericton where she was preparing to address a gathering on the subject of UNICEF. As you know, Mr. Speaker, she was the Canadian president of UNICEF and had spent many years of devotion to the interests of children. I know that everyone in this house will be most saddened to learn of the passing of one of Canada's great ladies. I can do no more this afternoon in honouring her than perhaps convey to the house some of the achievements of this lady, for they are worth recording in Hansard as the achievements of a magnificent woman.

She was born Margaret McTavish Rogers in Winnipeg, Manitoba. Her mother's family was connected with the Hudson's Bay Company. Her great great grandfather, Sir George Simpson, was the first governor of the Hudson's Bay Company and one of Canada's outstanding pioneers in the development of the country. Her mother, Edith Rogers, was the first woman elected to the Manitoba legislature which Margaret Konantz herself adorned with such distinction. Not long after her marriage to Gordon Konantz in 1922, she began a long life of service to Canada in addition to rearing her family of one daughter and two sons through whom she gained seven grandchildren.

From 1924 to 1929 she was a volunteer worker and treasurer of a convalescent hospital in the city of Winnipeg. In 1929, and for the next two or three years, she was associated with the Junior League of Winnipeg and responsible for starting the Ellice Avenue Thrift Shop. She became Canadian representative from 1933 to 1935 of the Association of Junior Leagues of America. Then she became campaign chairman of the women's division of the Community Chest of Winnipeg, at a time when the campaign was organized through volunteer boards of member agencies. From 1935 to 1938 she was a member of the board of the Council of Social Agencies. In 1936 Mrs. Konantz became chairman of the Manitoba campaign of the Canadian Welfare Council concerning child care. During the war years she was one of a committee of five women who between September and November of 1939 organized the registration of women for war service and community service in Winnipeg. There were 7,000 women registered, and a mass meeting of the group decided that the organization should be called the Central Volunteer Bureau. While Mrs. Konantz was president of the Central Volunteer Bureau from 1940 to 1943 it engaged in many other war activities in connection with the Community Chest and the Red Cross.

This organization was also involved with the Patriotic Salvage Corps, and Mrs. Konantz was a vice president and trustee of that organization. Mrs. Konantz was also connected with the Bundles for Britain program, since she organized and maintained the downtown workroom for sewing and packaging of bundles for overseas. She was involved with the Greater Winnipeg Co-ordinating Board for war and welfare agencies. She assisted the Council of Social Agencies to form this board in 1941 and it included the Royal Canadian Legion, Knights of Columbus, I.O.D.E., Salvation Army, Canadian Red Cross, Y.M.C.A., Y.W.C.A. and the Navy League.

In 1944 she was requested by the Minister of War Services to visit Britain and make a survey of women's voluntary services, then report back to the federal government. Her report was used by women's volunteer service of Britain as a handbook for many years. Following this survey Mrs. Konantz travelled across Canada telling Canadian women of the appreciation expressed by British women for work done for them by Canadian volunteers. She was involved in the White Cross Guild which was organized in 1946 to provide service to the Winnipeg General Hospital. She then became vice president of the Crippled Children's Society in 1950. In 1955 she was invited by Lady Reading, chairman of the Women's Voluntary Services of Britain, to go to England. She spent one year there as a volunteer working with women's voluntary services studying principally their civil defence arrangements.

From November 1957 to February 1958 she visited the Asia region of UNICEF, now known as the United Nations Children's Fund. She saw work in Japan, Formosa, Hong Kong, Thailand, India, Pakistan, Iraq, Lebanon, Jordan and Israel. I recall her once telling us of her trip from Jordan to Israel and how she had to cross "no man's land" between those two countries. She had to pick up her bags at one station and walk several hundred yards across sandy desert to the gate at the other side, carrying her bags all alone through the desert, and how welcome she found the English voice calling to her as she entered the checkpoint on the other side.

She has promoted UNICEF work in Winnipeg since that time and has been speaking at many Women's Canadian Clubs in Canada. Many of us were familiar with her talks and slide shows and were immensely impressed by work of this nature which she did. In 1961 she was Manitoba campaign chairman for World Refugee Year. In 1961-1962 she was national vice president of the United Nations Association as well as national chairman of the membership committee for the United Nations Association in Canada. For her war service she was awarded the O.B.E.

Both this house and the country, Mr. Speaker, will indeed regret the passing of this woman and will rejoice that in Canada there has risen from such a distinguished family as hers a woman of such distinction to serve Canada.

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I deem it a pleasure as well as a duty to participate in this debate on the speech from the throne. Like other previous speakers, I should like first of all to congratulate the mover and the seconder upon the splendid speeches they have made. I listened with a great deal of attention as well as pleasure to the speech of the mover and also to that made by the seconder. Afterwards I thought that if they had written the speech from the throne it might have something in it which was more in line with what they said, and would be of a nature which could be complemented.

I also listened with keen attention to the speech by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in this debate, and I should like to deal with some of the questions he brought up. I have no doubt that he was sincere in his statements when he said he wanted to make this parliament work, that he wanted first of all to bring in measures which would improve the work of this parliament and make it more smooth and efficient. If I address a few remarks to the house along this line it might be of some help both to him and to other hon. members.

I have been critical before, Mr. Speaker, but I think that anyone dealing with a subject of this kind must be critical; one must come to grips with the problem. We were told by the Prime Minister that he is going to experiment with the use of television in committees, but he did not tell us why he wished to do so. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested the use of television in this chamber so that our constituents and the people in the country could see what the members of this house are doing, what they are saying, be in a position to judge for themselves as to the attendance of hon. members and also to formulate their own opinions of the house. I see nothing particularly wrong with having television in this house, Mr. Speaker, but I do see a lot wrong with using it in committee sittings.

Let me deal with this point for a few moments. There are members of this house who, when the committees are set up, belong to three of those committees. Since there is no schedule man, there is therefore no one appointed to avoid the clashing of the times of committee sittings. Those who set up the committees simply go their own sweet way and schedule committee meetings, and if you are a member of two committees which meet at the same time, then obviously you cannot be in two places at once and have to choose one or the other.

Let us assume, Mr. Speaker, that the one you choose is not having its proceedings televised. In this event your constituents would note your absence from the other committee. The letters would start to pour in: "Ah ha, Mr. Member for East Kootenay, you were not in your seat in the committee". Of course, the reference might be to the member for Macleod or any other member. But the point I am trying to make is the practical one of avoiding conflicts and being fair to everybody. It would not be fair to the hon. member for East Kootenay if his constituents received the impression that he did not attend that committee simply because he had another committee to attend which, in his judgment, he felt of more importance. No one has yet come up with a solution to a problem of this sort, Mr. Speaker, and my guess is that no one has even thought about it.

There are many other aspects to televising committee proceedings in order to popularize them. It might be used to force attendance of Liberal backbenchers in committees. I have attended committees on many occasions and waited half an hour before we had a quorum.

Mr. Choquette: Just look at the attendance over there now.

Mr. Kindt: I might say that we always waited for Liberal members to attend committees before we could proceed. The hon. member who has just taken his seat stated the other day—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to mention the fact that there are only four Conservative members present in the house, and I want that to be recorded on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Churchill: There is no Liberal minister in the house either.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt) has the floor.

Mr. Kindt: I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time there are only ten Liberals in the house, and I want that to be on the record. There are at least a dozen Conservatives behind the curtain smoking and listening.

Mr. Danforth: And there are no cabinet ministers.

Mr. Kindt: I am trying to deliver a talk here with some principles in it which will assist in the running of this parliament. The people who are laying down the ground rules for television are doing so to ensure the attendance of Liberal backbenchers and all other backbenchers. I am one hundred per cent opposed to using public money to buy T.V. time in order to ensure that backbenchers in the Liberal party attend committee meetings. Hon. members opposite can laugh and snort all they like, but he who laughs last laughs best. I am only telling them the truth.

Why is attendance at committee meetings so unsatisfactory? What is the basic cause of the failure to attract backbenchers? I will tell the house what the trouble is. These committees are not set up in such a way as to allow people to take part and feel that they are making a real contribution. That is the problem. This is a situation which has existed for a long time, and members opposite have perhaps inherited it. If these committees are to work properly, those who sit on them must be given something constructive to do. It is not enough merely to try to keep them busy.

There is a feeling among frontbenchers, none of whom is present to hear me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kindt: I am talking about frontbenchers, there is not one of them here. They are very good at handing down rules for backbenchers to follow. But they never sit on these committees.

Mr. Winkler: They never show up.

Mr. Kindt: When they do attend committee meetings they come to instruct backbenchers, not to receive advice. This is what has been happening ever since I became a member of this house, regardless of the party in power. This is the problem which must be faced if the weaknesses of the committee set-up are to be corrected. They will not be solved simply by putting television cameras into committees in an effort to ensure attendance, relying on the effect of letters from constituents, and so on.

As far as I am concerned I would be delighted to have television in committees.

Mr. Orange: Colour?

Mr. Kindt: Anything. As far as I am concerned it would be a good thing. But the principle of putting television in committees in order to attract attendance is a false one. It was inherent in the statement of the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Kindt: Those members opposite who laugh are just types who will never do anything to contribute in any way toward improving the procedures of the house.

I served on the committee dealing with Indian affairs and northern development. We held meetings. Let me say, first of all, that every one of these committees has a preponderance of Liberals on it. All they do is pop up to support the minister and his policy. As far as the work of the committee is concerned, this is absolutely useless. If anyone cares to contradict what I have said I should like to hear him do so.

Mr. Choquette: Right now?

[Mr. Kindt.]

Mr. Kindt: I say that the committees simply do not operate effectively as they are at present set up. They do not work in a way which allows people who are elected members of parliament to be men among men. Members on the back seats over on the other side can snigger and try to poke fun, it does not disturb me one bit, because I just consider where it comes from. I take it as I would a kick from a mule, and say the poor brute does not know any better.

Mr. O'Keefe: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: I shall be glad to answer questions when I am finished.

The front benchers of the Liberal party make decisions as to what backbenchers shall do. They expect backbenchers to sit on these committees. After all, that is why the committees were set up—to give hon. members something to do and make them happy. This purpose has certainly not been accomplished. The members on these committees are not happy, otherwise they would attend meetings and it would not be necessary for the Liberal whip to telephone government supporters in an effort to get them there, and then wait half an hour for the meeting to begin—and then, often, without a quorum. There is something fundamentally wrong.

Committees of this house lack basic, fundamental authority and this weakens the work of parliament. To correct this weakness a way must be found of giving to the people's representatives a role of importance to play; regardless of whether they sit on the front or on the back benches of this house an opportunity must be given for their thoughts to find their way into legislation. As things are now, the committees are not functioning effectively. Hon. gentlemen opposite intend to resort to television in an effort to make them function. Isn't that stupid? Is that not typical of a decision made by someone on the front bench who does not even sit on committees?

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: After I have finished I should be glad to answer all questions.

I have said before that if and when television is introduced into committees it will be necessary to appoint a schedule man to set up these various meetings at different times.

An hon. Member: That's it.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to ask that fellow to get out of the room because he is doing nothing but interrupting. I do not interrupt him when he is talking and I would ask the same treatment from him.

Mr. Choquette: Him? It's him.

Mr. Orange: No, it's him.

Mr. Kindt: He is just an hon. member of the house and if he has not learned yet, because of his brief stay in the house, I will tell him he is supposed to keep quiet, and I think it is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to act on my request.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should point out that the hon. member for Macleod has the floor and under standing orders he has the right to make his statement without being interrupted, except to ask questions or to raise a point of order. I would ask hon. members to observe the standing orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kindt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Choquette: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Kindt: I have already indicated to others that I shall be glad to answer questions at the end of my speech because there is a time limit on it.

Mr. Choquette: Is it a long speech?

An hon. Member: Is that your question?

Mr. Kindt: One of the things which the Governor General indicated in the speech from the throne is that the Prime Minister intends to have another vote on capital punishment. Much less than a year ago we had a vote on capital punishment. It was a free vote, but since then the government has not carried out the will of parliament. Therefore I ask, what is the use of backbenchers even attending or being in parliament? We voted on capital punishment but what has the government done? They have laughed at parliament; they have not carried out its will. Now they are going to have another vote, rigged in some way so that it is a government measure, and so that when the government pulls the string it will have the backing of its supporters, and thus bring about a favourable result. That is their intention.

I say to the government that if they want to have another test on capital punishment, then let them put it in the form of a plebiscite to the people of Canada. Let the people of Canada decide, instead of the government deciding. Parliament has already decided and we don't need another vote: All we need is a government that will carry out the law as it now stands.

In my view all votes in this house should be free votes. The free vote on capital punishment was the first in my almost nine years in this house in which I thought my vote was helping to decide an issue. I thought that issue was decided; but now the Prime Minister says we are going to have another vote. He did not like the last one.

I do not want to become personal, but the people in the country are talking about this. They have talked to me in my riding and said, "You had a vote and decided the question of capital punishment less than a year ago. Why are you going to take another vote? The issue is just the same as it was six months or a year ago." My suspicion is that the government is going to wrap this thing up in some way that will make it more palatable to members of parliament.

We have laws concerning capital punishment on the statute books, and if the government is not going to enforce them, then what is the good of this parliament? What is the use of backbenchers if, following their vote, the government decides it will not handle things the way parliament wants them handled? I say we are up against dictatorship; and we are up against dictatorship when it comes to the workings of committees. These ministers opposite don't give one damn when it comes to committees. They pay no attention to committees. We have discussions in committees and make recommendations from committees, but the ministers go their own sweet way.

If parliament is to work we should have a proper mechanism whereby ministers attend committee meetings where committee members can ask them questions and ascertain their views on various subjects. It is our hope that the ideas which come from committees may be translated into legislation, but that for the most part does not happen now.

Frontbenchers on the government side listen to the civil service establishment but not to backbenchers on either the Liberal or opposition side. Ministers like to get committees working so that backbenchers will feel happy, thinking they are doing something constructive. Those ministers have a philosophy about committee work, that it is like a log going downstream with 10,000 ants on it, and they want backbenchers to feel that every ant is steering the log. But what ant has got anything to do with steering the log? Each ant is just there as a fixture—and we are all in the same boat.

What I am saying is that we are not grappling with the problem of making parliament work effectively. I have talked to many Liberal backbenchers, and much of what I am saying today stems from their reactions. Backbenchers on both sides of the house share these views. If the Liberal party now in power wishes to improve the working relations among members of parliament, let it grapple with this problem. Let it come up with some ideas that will meet this feeling which backbenchers have. Give backbenchers something to look forward to. Give them a feeling that they are a part of this show. Give them something to do that is constructive.

Ministers say committees will discuss this particular legislation and that particular legislation, but after the committees have done their work the ministers do not even read the committee reports. They don't even look at them: They laugh at them, and backbenchers know this. If you are going to make this parliament work, come down to brass tacks. This is a feeling which is shared on all sides of the house. We should get down to the fundamentals of change so as to make parliament work better.

This is being disregarded. Cold water is being thrown on the efforts of parliament from one end of the nation to the other. A provincial conference is convened, the federal cabinet meets with all the provinces, and then comes up with some finished thought on the subject. Then perhaps they put it in the form of a government motion, which means it is rubberstamped. But not even the backbenchers on the Liberal side of the house have anything to say even in caucus about this policy. This is what they tell me.

If we are to correct some of these things we must grapple with them and find a solution to them. Parliament in its present form and in the way its committees are set up is not working. We are not getting the best there is from these people.

I should like now to talk about one or two other points. First of all, this morning I mentioned to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) that there are many things going on which he should know about. There is in particular the petition from 324 people of Banff who are protesting against the policy of this government on leases. In this connection I should like to read an editorial from the Calgary Daily Herald of Saturday, March 18, 1967. It reads as follows:

Residents of Banff and Jasper national parks have every right to be upset over recent news from Ottawa. A Commons committee which has been examining new parks leasehold policy being proposed by the parks branch of the federal department of northern affairs has approved it. In so doing, it has rejected objections which leaseholders in the two parks had registered against the new policy.

Under the new policy, commercial leases will be granted for a limited period of forty-two years without the leaseholder receiving payment for the improvements he has constructed on the property at the time the lease runs out. Vague assurance is given that the lease might be renewed under some partnership principle, but the simple fact is the investor will no longer own his buildings and improvements. Since it might be expected that a leaseholder would want to retire and turn his business over to someone else before the forty-two years was up, he would find himself in a difficult position. Who would want to buy up his business if it had only a few more years to run? Who wants to invest in a business which lacks the prospects of permanence? And who wants to build up a business which someone else is going to grab without compensation?

Furthermore, what businessman would continue to pay the costs of maintenance in first class condition of a building or buildings during the final few years of the lease, knowing that a fair value return could not be expected when the property had to be turned over to someone else without so much as a thank you when the inevitable deadline finally arrived?

Hon. Arthur Laing, the minister of the department in charge of the national parks, continues to have an unfailing instinct for keeping the people in the two big mountain parks in an unhappy state of alarm and dissatisfaction.

Despite his many protestations to the contrary, he and his staff of Ottawa civil servants still cling to the outdated concept that the mountain parks must be maintained in a semi-wilderness state to be passed on unimpaired (which can only mean practically unused) to future generations. This constitutes an utter denial of the more realistic view that the great scenic regions should be opened up in reasonable measure to growing numbers of scenic-hungry people.

What is the point of having beautiful scenery if it cannot be enjoyed at leisure except by a fortunate handful of people?

The towns of Banff and Jasper are there, whether or not some people wish otherwise. The railroad lines, the modern highways are there. And people want to travel over them. They want to find hotels and motels and camp grounds and services there. They want modern services and amenities. And who is supposed to provide these things? Not the government, we hope. This sort of thing has to be done properly and governments rarely do anything properly.

If private enterprise and private investors, who know how to do these things properly, are to be expected to go in and develop the service areas, they have to have inducements of reasonable financial rewards and reasonable treatment.

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kindt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

It is high time the mountain parks were taken out of the hands of bumbling Ottawa bureaucracy and placed in the hands of someone, not a new wing of bureaucracy such as the proposed new leaseholds corporation which is a creature of the federal department based in the east, but someone who knows what the problem of park development is all about.

We have here and now a vivid example of that.

So, Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude by saying that I could go on to mention half a dozen other matters which I have on my list, all of which I feel are problems which should be solved by this government, not only in order to ensure that the work of the house would be carried out properly but also in order to get things going properly in the country.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin this afternoon by expressing my sympathy to the family of Margaret Konantz, a former member of this house, who died this afternoon. Although I did not sit in this house when Mrs. Konantz was a member, I have known her for many years through her work with UNICEF. I always admired her. On several occasions I had an opportunity to meet her at conventions of this party. As has been mentioned by another hon. member, she leaves a great legacy for Canadians.

I should also like to congratulate my colleagues of the backbench who moved and seconded the speech from the throne. I believe the speech given by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) was one of the greatest I have heard in this house in the year I have been here. He certainly makes it difficult for other backbenchers, including myself, who follow him.

In the speech from the throne which was given this week there was mention of parliamentary reform. It seems that many members of this house are interested in this subject because many of them have used it as the basis for their speech. As a matter of fact, this afternoon three speeches have been on the subject of parliamentary procedure. The speech from the throne in one part said:

Canada in embarking upon its second century of federal government, must provide its parliament with every facility to ensure that efficiency and thoroughness of deliberation, which, in the consideration of every item of public business, is alone the sure protection of the liberty and well-being of our people.

In his speech to the house yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) reiterated that wish and made more specific recommendations. This afternoon I should like to take the opportunity to support those statements and to make a few observations and recommendations of my own. Let me refer to some of the things that the novice member of parliament, immediately to reform our rules to put parliament, when observed in action from the floor or the galleries.

We often find it difficult to understand why there is so much irrelevancy and repetition, why the house often is empty, why it takes so long to introduce and pass a bill, why a small minority can obstruct the country's business, why the house cannot defeat a government bill without defeating the government and many other similar things. Many such things disturb observers of this house in action. After one hundred years of confederation the people of Canada are no longer satisfied with either the productivity or performance of parliament. They feel something must be done immediately to reform our rules to put parliament into the twentieth century.

In his speech yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that parliament is the embodiment of our liberties and freedoms, and therefore it cannot be efficient in the same way as a business or company is efficient. That is true, because parliament is a debating forum and a place where policy is discussed and ideas are exchanged, rather than a monolithic administrative process similar to a business or a company. As the Leader of the Opposition said, parliament cannot grind out legislation like a sausage producing machine.

Nevertheless this does not mean that our rules are as satisfactory or as efficient as they might be in order to promote the real purposes of parliament. Before we can really discuss reform of our parliamentary rules we must decide what are the real purposes of parliament, for it is only in knowing where we are going that the purposes, goals and ends of parliament can be determined. Once we have decided this we can determine how effective are our rules.

Let me refer briefly to the functions and purposes of parliament. Among other things parliament is a legislature in which we enact legislation. It is a forum in which to discuss the policies of government; a body to keep a check on the administration and to examine their spending estimates. It is a body to vote funds necessary to support government programs. These are the purposes or parliament and our rules must serve them effectively.

At this point I should like to make some recommendations in respect of our procedures. I realize I am a relatively new member and that many of these recommendations may have been made before, but I should like to put them on record. Perhaps they will be of some help to the parliamentary committee on procedure. It was the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who said this afternoon that he was a member of that committee and would welcome recommendations.

First, with respect to irrelevancy and repitition, standing order 34 (2) reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker or the Chairman, after having called the attention of the house or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition may direct him to discontinue his speech, and if then the member still continues to speak, Mr. Speaker shall name him or, if in committee, the chairman shall report him to the house.

It would seem to me that one of the rules which is violated more often than others in this house is that rule in relation to irrelevancy and repetition. I have often wondered why that rule has not been enforced more strictly. I think if it were we would have a much more efficient and interesting parliament.

Second, I should like to propose that the debate on the speech from the throne be limited to three days. The eight day period may have been acceptable 20 or even 10 years ago, but today we no longer have time for such indulgences. In the United Kingdom the debate on the speech from the throne is limited to five days, and I believe they have more than twice the number of members we have in Canada.

Third, I should like to recommend that the debate on the budget speech be limited to three days, and that members be restricted in their speeches to matters referred to in the budget or to matters of national economic importance omitted. Again in the United Kingdom the debate on the budget speech is limited to three days.

Next, and fourth, I should like to recommend that speeches in the house be limited to thirty minutes, and in the commitee of the whole to twenty minutes. It is my belief that anything one might want to say can and should be said in that time, and that such a rule would provide for a greater number of speakers and greater interest in the house. It becomes very boring when one sits here for 40 minutes or an hour listening to a speech. If we had shorter speeches we would have a greater variety. They would then be of greater interest and more members would be able to participate.

My fifth recommendation is that the business committee be used throughout the session of parliament and that an allocation of time be given to all items. When a session opens, the government should immediately place a great portion of its business on the order paper to be referred to the business committee where it would be given a priority and allocation of time.

Sixth, I would recommend that parliament itself should be given a fixed timetable for its sessions, adjournments and recesses. In this way the government, opposition and all members of parliament would be better able to plan their programs.

As my seventh recommendation I would suggest that when divisions are called in the house the ringing of the division bells be limited to a maximum of 15 minutes. I cannot remember the number of times I have sat in my seat for 30 minutes or more while the bells rang, waiting for members to come in to vote. Again to refer to the United Kingdom, there the division bells are limited to six minutes; yet the city of London is much larger than Ottawa and it is more difficult to get to parliament to vote. I do not think we can afford the luxury of an unlimited time in this regard. It only encourages absence and inefficiency.

As my eighth recommendation I suggest that votes in the committee of the whole be organized so that they may be allowed to stand at the request of a certain number of members. When we are dealing with a long bill with hundreds of clauses, such as the transport bill which was dealt with last session, there may be as many as 20 votes in an afternoon without any bell or notice. In such a situation it is necessary for all members of the house, including members of the cabinet to be on hand at all times. I might note that on one occasion the government was defeated on one clause by one vote. This is a serious hindrance to ministers and members of the house who must remain in attendance and leave their departmental work and other commitments.

May I offer as suggestion number nine that the question period should be organized so that each minister will be scheduled to answer questions at certain set periods throughout the week, and that they be given at least 24 hours notice of each question unless it is of urgent national importance. Again, this is the rule followed in the United Kingdom.

This system has several benefits. It allows ministers to better organize their time for departmental duties and helps them to prepare answers to questions. I believe it would also provide a more useful question period with better questions and more information, and with less time devoted to political barbs and announcements. On several occasions in this house during the question period I have observed that more than half the allotted time is used for asking questions which are ruled out of order, and rulings by Mr. Speaker giving reasons why they are out of order. If 24 hours notice were required and questions addressed to specific ministers were limited to specific times, I believe we would have better questions and answers and a better question period. I might add that under such a system, just as in England, supplementary questions are allowed from the floor. I think that is quite proper.

My tenth suggestion is that it might be a good idea if private members had the right to second any government or private members bill or motion and that this seconding should be registered in the orders of the day and Hansard. In this way a private member would be able to come out in favour of a bill or motion without making a speech, and he would be on record in Hansard as being in favour of the particular proposal, whether it be a government or private members bill or motion.

Eleventh, Mr. Speaker, I would recommend that the reading of newspapers in the house be banned. We do not allow smoking, eating or drinking in the house, and I do not think we should allow the reading of newspapers. I very often hear from visitors to our gallery that the thing that disturbs them most, although it is really not that important in substance but causes the greatest scandal, is the reading of newspapers in the house. We do not allow the smoking of cigarettes or cigars, eating or drinking in the house, and I do not think we should allow the reading of newspapers, because of the scandal that is caused in the public mind. The reading of reviews and textbooks is necessary in the house because sometimes hon. members need them in making a speech, but I do not think the reading of newspapers is necessary and it should be banned.

Twelfth, with respect to committees I would propose that they be given a larger staff and budget in order to do a better job. Committees have done a very good job. In this respect I differ with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), who thinks they have not done a good job. If committees were permitted a larger staff and budget they would be able to do the job still more properly. I think committees are an excellent way of studying legislation in detail and bringing expertise and outside opinions before the house. In the United States and Canada experts cannot come to the house and give their opinions, but through our committees system we could hear expert opinions and thereby do the best job for the Canadian people.

Also with respect to committees, I recommend that they be allowed to sit throughout the session, including periods of recess, and have the power to travel whenever they decide to do so. I also recommend that the quorum for committees be reduced to one third from the present one half of the members. I have studied the rules that apply in the United Kingdom and the United States Congress, and in both those places the quorum is one third. I believe that the volume of business we have to do in the house, in our offices and the library, and considering the number of committees hon. members have to attend, makes it impossible to achieve a quorum of one half of the members. I think this quorum is unrealistic. I disagree with the hon. member for Macleod that many committee meetings had to be delayed because of lack of a quorum. I know that the committees of which I was a member, and I was a member of four, were not delayed for this reason, although I have heard from time to time that committees have been delayed because of lack of a quorum. However, I think this has been the exception rather than the rule.

My thirteenth recommendation is that the proceedings of parliament be made more acceptable to the public. In addition to the televising of parliament and committees, I think something should be done to make Hansard more attractive and more widely distributed.

Before dealing further with that matter I should like to make a few remarks on the comments made by the hon. member for Macleod. In the speech which the hon. member made just before I rose, he suggested that the Prime Minister had recommended the televising of committee work in order to guarantee the attendance of members. To put the record straight I should like to read what the Prime Minister said. From my reading of Hansard, he recommended that the televising of committee proceedings would help to communicate to the public the work of parliament. He said nothing whatsoever about the attendance of members. The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 55 of Hansard:

> I would like to join with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition in expressing the hope that during this session some experimentation in regard to televising our procedures might be attempted, beginning perhaps with committee deliberations. In this way the people of Canada themselves could be brought more intimately into contact with the processes, the aspirations and the problems of their government institution. This might have quite an effect on the attitudes, the words and the manner of our debates, particularly if we knew they were going into the drawing rooms of the nation.

The Prime Minister said nothing about the attendance of members. I agree that the televising of our proceedings would have something to do with the way in which debates are carried on, because when we know there are people from our constituencies in attendance in the gallery we try to put on a better performance than we would otherwise.

I made reference to Hansard and said that I thought it should be made more understandable and accessible to the general public. I think that Hansard right now is too much like an academic treatise and is too foreboding for the general public. In addition, it is too difficult for them to obtain. I think Hansard should be printed and bound more attractively, better indexed and perhaps accompanied by monthly summaries. In this way the ordinary man could have access to it and find out what his member of parliament has done and said with respect to a particular subject. Hansard should be distributed in a way in which it will reach a much greater number of Canadians than is now the case.

Fourteenth, Mr. Speaker, I believe that parliament should be provided with more research staff. This should apply not only to the cabinet and the official opposition but to all private members. With respect to private members, I liked the private members resolution which was placed on the order paper last session and discussed during private members hour, to the effect that a certain number of graduate students on a special scholarship should be assigned to assist private members with research. I believe the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) made that suggestion, and I supported it at the time.

Finally, and fifteenth, with respect to votes on government bills and motions it is my belief that they should not be considered as votes of want of confidence. In the present situation, whenever an hon. member votes on a government bill he is not only voting on the goodness or badness of the bill but also on the acceptance or non-acceptance of the government. From time to time a member is faced with the situation where he cannot support a government bill but still has complete confidence in the government. Faced with this situation, he is usually forced to vote for the bill or abstain, rather than defeating the government and forcing an election. I believe that parliament would function much more efficiently if the government could be defeated only on specific non-confidence motions. Such a system would encourage greater responsibility by individual members, would result in more research, better informed members and probably better legislation.

As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I am putting these suggestions on record not because I believe they are necessarily new, the last word or without flaw, but merely as a basis for discussion perhaps by the committee on procedure. One thing of which I am certain is that we must do something in this house to improve our procedures and rules, because the volume of business before the house demands it and the Canadian people demand it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have consulted the house leaders on the other side of the chamber and it is agreeable that we revert to motions in order to permit the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to make a short statement. If this is agreeable to the house, I ask that it be done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house agree to revert to motions for the Minister of Finance to make a statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON TAXATION COMMISSION REPORT RESPECTING MINING AND PROSPECTING

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government has announced that it does not intend to come to any conclusions concerning the recommendations of the royal commission on taxation until after it has had an opportunity to receive the views of taxpayers, experts and various associations. We plan to begin taking decisions in the fall of this year as to the major aspects of the tax reform.

In the meantime a number of taxpayers have made representations to us that in some instances the very uncertainty introduced by the royal commission report is causing them to act as though the recommendations of the commission had been adopted by the government. This is particularly so with respect to the incentive provisions which the commission recommended be withdrawn.

We have given careful study to see what we could do at this time to minimize these uncertainties without prejudicing the government's freedom of action in determining the ultimate shape of the tax reform it will propose to parliament. We have concluded that it is appropriate for us to give two undertakings so that people can carry on with the development of important projects in respect of which the incentive provisions now in the law are quite important.

The first undertaking concerns the three year exemption for new mines. We have concluded that should the government decide to propose the removal of this incentive, it would not do so in a manner that would remove the exemption with respect to income earned before January 1, 1974, nor would it in any essential manner change the method of application of that exemption before that date. The effect of this undertaking will be that companies which now have projects in the planning stage will have the years 1968, 1969 and 1970 to come into commercial production in time to receive a full 36 months exemption. In establishing this period we have taken account of the time required to bring large projects into production, particularly in areas where transportation and weather are important factors. This period will afford companies the time necessary for the extensive preproduction development work and the construction of ore processing facilities required before commercial production can begin. It is felt that this undertaking should permit companies which will be faced between now and the end of the year with decisions involving a commitment of substantial sums of money to proceed in the expectation of receiving the benefits of the three year tax exemption.

The second undertaking concerns the treatment presently accorded to prospectors and their backers under section 83 of the Income Tax Act. Should the government decide to propose the withdrawal of this incentive, we would not do so with respect to amounts received before January 1, 1969 that relate to properties or interests acquired before January 1, 1968. We believe that this undertaking should minimize the effect of the commission's proposals upon 1967 exploration programs.

I wish to emphasize that this announcement does not mean either that the government has adopted the commissioners' recommendations or that we have rejected them.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, all I want to say is that in the absence of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who asked yesterday whether the minister would make a statement, and on his behalf, I should like to thank the minister for clarifying the situation.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I also asked this question several days ago and received the same answer as did the hon. member for Skeena I wish to say that I too am very pleased, and I am sure that the government and the people of British Columbia will be very pleased by this announcement, because some half a billion dollars worth of projects were put on ice as a result of the uncertainty with regard to this situation.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway would allow me to make a short statement. The house will then be able to hear the hon. member at eight o'clock.

Before leaving the chair, I think it might be helpful if the Chair were to make a brief reference to the adjournment proceedings.

In accordance with section 3 of standing order 38, the subamendment proposed earlier this day by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), must be disposed of before the house adjourns at the close of this sitting.

That being the case, it is the opinion of the Chair that the adjournment proceedings which might otherwise have taken place at 10 p.m. tonight, will be suspended. In this regard, I should read to the house section 5 (b) of the provisional standing order 6 which, in the opinion of the Chair, applies in this case. That standing order is as follows:

When a sitting is extended pursuant to section (6) of this order, or when it is provided in any other standing order that the business under consideration at the ordinary time of adjournment shall be disposed of or concluded, the adjournment proceedings in that sitting shall be suspended and that sitting shall not be adjourned except pursuant to a motion to adjourn moved by a minister of the Crown.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Douglas.

[Translation]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne was awaited impatiently this year by all Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They were waiting hopefully, expecting that in this year of the centennial, the government would mark this anniversary by giving a clear indication of the first legislative steps essential to resolve some of the most urgent problems facing the families of this country. Their hope and their expectations were increased when the Governor General said these words:

This centennial session of parliament provides an opportunity to begin to give effect to our aspirations for the second century of confederation.

What did the government give them? A legislative program? Not at all. A 5,500 word composition filled with pompous generalities. A vision of the promised land without a single road map to reach it.

But even before the speech ended, one could not avoid the suspicion, almost the certainty, that with the present leadership, we would never reach it. There are too many studies in depth, too many white papers, too many task forces that risk misleading us.

[English]

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to prove myself bilingual I shall turn to the language I know better. I want to say that the speech from the throne sounds very impressive until one begins to reflect on the wide gap between the government's glowing promises of a Canada filled with many, many good things, and its actual performance. Consider the question of housing, for example. I do not intend to deal with it in detail because some of my colleagues will do that, but I wish to refer to it. At the moment this is Canada's No. 1 domestic problem; yet in this 5,500 word speech there are just 38 words devoted to the problem of housing. I shall read them:

You will be invited to consider new housing programs which, while recognizing the primary responsibility of the individual and the other levels of government in the provision of housing, will help to fill requirements that clearly lie ahead.

I want to say that, in my view, today the primary responsibility for providing the housing that is needed in Canada lies with the federal government. In addition the federal government, together with the provinces, should make an over-all assessment of what is required. In my view, that is the primary responsibility today. It is not the primary responsibility of the individual, as the government claims, because today many individuals are quite helpless in so far as their housing needs are concerned.

This afternoon the minister responsible for housing spoke to this house. In view of the statements made in the speech from the throne, we expected he would give us at least a brief outline of what was in store, in the line of housing legislation. He did not do so. Actually what he gave us was a review of the policies of the last few years which resulted in a shortage of at least 20,000 homes, last year to say nothing of the great backlog of housing needs that has been piling up over the years. He referred, in a tone of satisfaction, to the years between 1961 and 1966—I believe those were the years he mentioned. He said that we could look with great satisfaction, and he repeated "great satisfaction," to our achievements in the field of housing. Yet just two years ago, within the compass of the period he mentioned, the minister made this statement with regard to housing:

For all the talk about what we intend to do, for all our efforts, nearly 100,000 Canadian families live every moment of their waking lives under housing conditions that are really appalling—a disgrace to the communities in which they reside.

I may add that they are a disgrace to the country in which they reside and to the government which is charged with looking after the needs of these people. I see no cause for complacency. I know the minister is deeply concerned about this problem, but I see no reason why he should be complacent about it or mislead people to believe that the problem is under control. It is very far from being under control today. The situation is infinitely more serious than it was when the minister pronounced those words two years ago.

One does not have to take my word for this or the word of housing people or social welfare workers. The joint Senate and House of Commons committee on consumer credit and the cost of living has just tabled a report in which the committee used these words,—and I want to emphasize them:

> Your committee feels that there is an overwhelming need for a national housing plan based on the premise that every Canadian deserves a decent place to live in. Good intentions in this field have abounded but progress has been unsatisfactory ... After hearing testimony on the subject your committee concludes that housing has been a neglected poor relation for far too long.

The report ends by recommending that the federal government assign a higher priority to the problem of housing in Canada than is the case at the present time. We must remember that this was an all-party committee composed of members of the Senate and the House of Commons. It was the considered opinion of that committee, after taking testimony across this country, that for far too long housing has had a low priority on the government's agenda. The committee urged that it be given that low place no longer, that it no longer be considered a poor relation. Probably the minister hit the nail on the head this afternoon when he said the mistake had been that we had been too busy with other things. I sincerely believe that has been the case, and that these other things were not half as important as the question of housing.

I turn now to that part of the speech which deals with the government's intention to set up a department of corporate and consumer affairs. I would recall to the house that the establishment of a department of consumer affairs has been demanded for years. It was first of all demanded by the Canadian Association of Consumers, now known as the Consumers Association of Canada. In the last three sessions this demand has been put forward in the house, first by the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott), then by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie), and last session by myself.

It was not until food prices had risen to twice the level of other items in the cost of living index that anything was done by this government to deal with food prices. In the comfortable insulation of this chamber we find it very difficult to realize just how these boycotters and protesters felt as week after week and day after day they watched the price of food creep upwards in our supermarkets, with the knowledge that the portion of their income which was left after food bills had been paid was shrinking in proportion to the increase in food prices. It was not until the boycotters and protesters from coast to coast rose up and took action that this government referred the matter of the cost of living to the committee on consumer credit.

I now want to recount briefly a few of the things that have happened since then. Let me say very bluntly that the major recommendation made by the committee was for the creation of a department of consumer affairs with a full time minister in charge. The government has given notice in the speech from the throne that it is going to thumb its nose at our major recommendation, that it is going to thumb its nose at the committee. Because instead of saying that the government is going to put forward legislation to establish a department of consumer affairs, the speech reveals that the government is going to establish a department of corporate and consumer affairs.

In the committee we made it perfectly clear, in the first instance in our recommendation last Christmas and in our later report, that what is needed in Canada is a department the sole purpose of which is to protect consumers. We recommend that we should gather together the bits and pieces of consumer protection which are scattered throughout various government departments and bring them together into a single department, the sole purpose of which would be to protect the consumer.

This point was made by every organization which spoke on the subject as we travelled across Canada. Not one single organization asked for a department of corporate and consumer affairs. Neither was there a single organization which asked to have consumer affairs dumped with any other affairs into one government department. This was to be something new. At long last we had risen to the point where we hoped this government would be ready to establish a department to look after consumer affairs, not to look after sectional interests in the community. We have the agriculture department, the fisheries department, the labour department, the industry department, and so on, and we hoped that the government would now be ready to set up a department which was consumer-oriented, the sole purpose of which would be to protect the consumers of this country and recognize them as such.

Mrs. Plumptre, the long-time president, recently retired, of the Consumers Association of Canada, made it crystal clear in her evidence that what we needed was a department in charge of consumer-oriented people who would study the needs of the consumer and the effect of various conditions upon him and her.

But, Mr. Speaker, what action do we find the government taking? We find this government sneaking a sectional interest in by the back door, presumably because it is handy for them to do so. I want to say with all the strength at my command that in my view this will nullify any effect that this department would otherwise have had. The people of this country ought to be told that the major recommendation of our committee is being summarily thrust aside, even before we have had a chance to discuss it in this parliament.

A tremendously important step is being taken here. We find that what is being set up is a department where the loyalties of the minister will be divided. We are told that a man cannot serve two masters. Yet this government deliberately sets up a department the minister of which will be asked to serve, on the one hand, the consumers, and on the other hand a particular section of the community—the investors.

I realize that there is reference made to "small" investors in one part of the speech. That is a modern version of the widows and orphans who from time immemorial have been trotted out as a screen behind which the big corporate interests and other great concerns were looked after and protected. This practice is wrong. This corporate and consumers affairs department which the government proposes to set up will be the hole in the dike through which a whole flood of special interests will be allowed to rush in, completely destroying the dike which should protect the consumers of this country. This I say as clearly and loudly as I can, because I think the consumers ought to know what the government is proposing to do.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

In the committee we proposed that the consumer be given protection. Protection from what, Mr. Speaker? Here I think the committee was of one mind up to a certain point, and I want to make perfectly clear where the majority opinion lay, and where the minority opinion departed from it. I want no misunderstanding about this.

All of us believed that a department of consumer affairs ought to protect the consumer from abuses in the marketplace; from unjust practices, I will put it that way. We wanted to protect the consumer from unjust practices. Our report put forward a great many excellent recommendations for doing this. We made recommendations for consumer standards having to do with labelling, packaging, weights and measures and other matters. In the second place, we made recommendations for protecting the consumer from deceptive practices of various kinds. In the third place, we made recommendations for protecting the consumer from her own lack of knowledge and her own misplaced trust in others than herself.

One recommendation, about which we were all very enthusiastic, was that it should not be left entirely to the consumer to make herself into a good, all-round shopper, though the consumers association does hope to do this. However, she does need help and information. We all felt that a department of consumer affairs should have as one of its objectives the handing out of information and the establishment of good, regular consumer information programs; not dead, dull, factual things but good, lively television shows which could hold their own with programs like "Yogi Bear", or advertisements for "whiter than white", or "the hands you love to touch", or similar advertisements which hold many people spellbound—at least according to the advertisers.

This is what we want done; this is what the whole committee agreed to do. Every one of us believes that the consumer should be protected from unjust practices in the market place. There was a minority on the committee—I wish to make it perfectly clear that it was not a large minority—which thought that more was necessary. We believe that not only should the consumer be protected against unjust practices but that he should be protected against unjustified prices—note, I said "unjustified", not "unjustifiable". This is why we feel that as part of this new department a prices and practices review board should be established for the purpose of protecting the consumer from unjustified prices as well as from unjust practices. We believe that manufacturers and processors should be brought before this board to justify price increases which are deleterious to the consumer. This view has not yet been accepted by the committee as a whole. In my opinion this issue is part of the unfinished business before the committee, and I hope that in future sittings the majority may be persuaded to accept such a course as I have suggested.

Should anyone think this is nonsense, let me draw to the attention of the house the fact that it was unjustified prices rather than unjust practices which gave rise to the pressure of public opinion which resulted in the reference of this whole subject to the committee. Consumers will not be well served nor will they be content until machinery for dealing with unjustified prices as well as unjust practices has been established. I will have more to say on this when the legislation is introduced.

I wish to comment now on the generality of the report. We pointed out that a survey made in 27 countries showed that Canada is not faring badly by comparison with other countries with regard to the trend of consumer prices from 1958 to late 1966. Indeed, Canada showed the second lowest rise in consumer prices during that period. Other countries were suffering more. We made no reference to a statement which I believe to be most apt in this context. When the head of the Swedish economic council appeared before us he pointed out that in Scandinavia the effect of high prices was cushioned by government pensions and allowances set in accord with the cost of living and the level of productivity in order to protect lower income groups.

However, we did say this in our report. I think it is important, and I wish to quote it:

> Any general and persistent increase in the price level has a profound effect on both the economic and social fabric of a country. When the rate of increase exceeds some critical level it produces unrest and inequities and may create economic problems which have a high social cost. Parts of the population may be able to adapt to rising prices but in general these will be those who have economic or market power and whose earnings increase sufficiently fast to maintain their real income. That part of the population which is disadvantaged and economically weak will usually suffer. The handicapped, the aged, the pensioners, the underemployed and the unskilled workers bear an undue share of the burden of rising prices. One major contribution which could be undertaken by the federal government would be to carry out surveys of family expenditure patterns at frequent intervals to provide some objective assessment of the impact of rising prices on the disadvantaged. While it was not your committee's duty to inquire in detail into incomes policy, your committee feels that one aim of such studies would be to facilitate studies of the feasibility of establishing guaranteed minimum incomes for all citizens.

I am sorry the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) is not in his place; he likes to "rib" me about my views on a guaranteed annual income. I am in favour of it today, I was last June, and I was last December. But I was not in favour of what the minister put forward last fall under the guise of a guaranteed annual income, when he brought down the supplement to the old age security pension. That was as bad a case of the prostitution of the English language as I have seen for a long time.

Even members of the government are beginning to realize it will be necessary to establish a guaranteed annual income in this country. But they will have to produce a much better specimen than was produced last December in connection with this income supplement for old age security pensioners, which no more resembles a guaranteed income than a piece of jagged glass resembles a diamond. A guaranteed annual income must be based on what it costs to sustain a modern standard of living—modest, if you like, but modern—and it should rise both with the cost of living and the productivity of the country.

Let the government provide a guaranteed income of this sort and they will find that we in this group will be the first to support it wholeheartedly.

I feel that our committee has produced an excellent report as far as it goes. As I say, there is some unfinished business to be dealt with. I have mentioned the establishment of a practices and prices review board. Included among this unfinished business is consideration of the whole sector of selling costs—the business of promotion and advertising generally. We made no recommendations in this important sector, which in my view is responsible for a great deal of the rise in the cost of living which has occurred. Nor did we deal with another great sector, the monopolistic character of industry today. We were appalled, like everyone else, at the revelation as to the extent of the Weston empire. We felt something definite would have to be done about it, but we were not prepared to make a recommendation with regard to monopolistic control of industry. We did say this, though:

> Your committee noted that the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act reported the discontinuance of a study of concentration in the food retailing industry in Canada on March 15, 1963 (Report of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act for the year ended March 31, 1963). Your committee recommends that this study be resumed on a continuous basis and broadened to cover both food retailing and manufacturing in Canada with a particular view to examining concentration, market power and trade practices in the relations between retailers and suppliers.

There is another subject I wish to mention. The committee took no stand one way or the other on the value, either actual or potential, of the consumer co-operative movement.

Some of us are very strong in our view that the consumer co-operative movement is one of the best agencies for standing up to private monopoly control in this country. We know its effect is potential rather than actual, but our committee did make a recommendation. We said that quite regardless of the value of the co-operative movement, actual or potential, we felt that "legislation governing the incorporation of co-operatives is long overdue."

I think I have just about taken up my time and covered my points, and am about to bring my remarks to a close. I believe the members of the committee were hard working and co-operative. They were a fine group of people to work with, and I felt we advanced well, working together and sharing each other's points of view. We were clear and open about our differences but we found that the edges of our agreement were quite numerous.

In closing I would emphasize that the longest journey begins with a single step. In my view the first steps to the promised land are legislative measures designed to meet the bread and butter needs of the people. I do not think there is any use talking to a man about a glorious sunset when his stomach is empty. There is no use talking about the glorious things that can be introduced by way of legislation in years ahead if we are not going to deal with the bread and butter needs of the people today. I hope the government will concentrate on the first steps which are necessary to achieve this better living about which it is so eloquent in the speech from the throne. If it does so, it will have the co-operation of all of us, all the way.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I join with others who have extended their congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), who have done as best they could with a document which can only be described as a political catch-all in an effort to cover up and to fill in the terrible gaps and the deficiencies of the government in this centennial year.

We in the Yukon, sir, are very cognizant of the issue that has been raised by the amendment put forward by the official opposition. We have been pressing the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing), who I am happy to see in his seat this evening, for a greater measure of self-control, but we have had nothing from him, from his officials and from the government but lip service, empty promises, meaningless phrases and downright, fraudulent answers to our legitimate demands. The minister has said that we are moving toward a greater control of our own affairs in the Yukon. Nothing could be further from the the truth: Indeed we are moving in the opposite direction. But there will be other occasions upon which I can deal specifically with the Yukon.

Today we are dealing with a matter of transcendant importance to all Canadians, a description by which Yukoners are very proud to call themselves, in this day of division and this day of confusion, confusion which has been aided and abetted by the N.D.P. with their subamendment, which we find completely unsatisfactory. The only result that can be expected from the N.D.P. subamendment is further delay and further division. If accepted it would delay any hope of a constitutional conference this year. It would divide those already estranged by the failure of the government to act in the critical area of national unity.

The subamendment is typical of the party that produced it: long on theory and surface gloss and completely lacking in practicality. The N.D.P. subamendment is simply a smokescreen. It is, sir, a watered down version of Liberalism and an escape hatch for the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the government. I am sure those on my left know that the Prime Minister desperately wants to avoid a constitutional conference because the inevitable result of such a conference will be to expose the folly of Liberal policies of opting out, the two nations theory, the two pension plans, from which the Prime Minister is desperately trying to disengage himself.

The subamendment that the N.D.P. proposes gives the Prime Minister a way out, and this in itself is regrettable because if such a conference is to be at all effective, the maximum effect can be attained in this year above all other times. There is great danger in waiting; but that is what the N.D.P. would have us do, by their subamendment.

The basis of the deterioration in the relationship between Quebec and Ottawa was laid by the policies of opting out, of two nations, of treaty making powers for the province of Quebec. There is only one author and originator of these policies, and he is the Prime Minister.

The subamendment suffers from further defects. It suffers from a basic disability to understand or appreciate the constitutional issue, or even the nature of the constitution itself. It sets out "proposals for amendment to the Constitution of Canada as a necessary preliminary for a national constitutional conference." This shows the shattering inability of the N.D.P. to seize the nature of the issue. The whole purpose of the conference which has been proposed by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), first in the last days of the session of 1963, is to work out an agreement whereby specific amendments would be arrived at which would provide the basis of a new unity in the country.

This was the same folly and the same danger as was inherent in the Fulton-Favreau formula adopted by the government so short a time ago. It was a pig in a poke. We were opening the door into a constitution with no indication of where we were going after the door was opened, and the N.D.P. want us to repeat that error.

A confederation conference, as we understand it, would set out in specific terms those matters upon which agreement could be obtained, as being necessary to Canadian unity in the future. No such conference can be in the position where the government or the parliament dictates ahead of time what that course will be, and yet that is precisely what the N.D.P. subamendment would have us do.

Those who vote for the N.D.P. subamendment are voting to bind the conference in advance, and are voting to place Quebec and French speaking Canada in a position of increasing isolation. That way lies, not survival, but a continuation of the erosion begun four years ago.

Subparagraph 3 of the subamendment refers to "a constitutional bill of rights." What is a constitutional bill of rights? A Bill of Rights has been passed by parliament. How many do they want? Section 4 of the subamendment speaks of repatriation of the constitution. That will come following the agreement on amendments arrived at at a constitutional conference and following the adoption of those recommendations by parliament. The recommendations of that conference would be brought before the house, and parliament would enact a new act having as its base the B.N.A. Act with amendments as proposed by such a conference. I believe that across this country there is a demand for the resolution of this question of unity. Since this government assumed office we have had a continuing and worsening constitutional crisis. This was aggravated by the unskilled attempts of the government to produce one of those quick and easy solutions for which the Prime Minister now is becoming notorious.

There has been only one constructive proposal—and one only—for the resolution of the constitutional problem, and that is embodied in the amendment of the opposition. It is the proposal put forward by the then prime minister of Canada in 1963, in the dying days of the session, for a national constitutional conference. That proposal since has been embraced by the premiers of Ontario and Quebec and has been given the tacit approval of the premiers of Manitoba and Nova Scotia. It is a concrete and positive proposal for bringing together those elements in the Canadian political structure whose views must be recorded and whose consent must be obtained in order to resolve the question of unity.

The Prime Minister has a different view. He wants to be the sole architect of the constitution, just as he was the sole architect of unification, and just as he was the sole architect of the new flag. He wants a constitution disinterred from the subterranean recesses or the back room of the Liberal party, a constitution presented as a fait accompli, a constitution under the new rules designed and brought about in this house, which will be shoved down the throats of Canadians. Nothing could be more damaging to the unity of this country. The Prime Minister and the government have dealt destructive blows to national unity. Who else is the architect of the two nations theory? The Prime Minister. Who else is the inventor of opting out? No one else but the Prime Minister. No one else is the designer of one pension plan for Canada and another pension plan for Quebec. No one else is the designer of a student loans plan for Canada and another one for Quebec.

The Pearson government has followed the course of separating Quebec from the rest of Canada through the opting out formula, and all the other divisive policies. Time and time again the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has spoken about one Canada. What are we getting? We are getting divisive and destructive policies. Above all, in this year of the centenary of our confederation, as I have said before, instead of opting out we require opting in, recognition of the existence of two cultural groups, the founders of the original confederation. We require for all French speaking Canada, not just Quebec, an emphasis on the recognition of the cultural identity and cultural integrity upon which our country must be built to survive.

The Prime Minister is the originator of the two nations theory. Here is what he said at La Malbaie, Quebec, on August 17, 1963:

> At this time when we are preparing to celebrate our centennial, it is advisable that confederation should be reshaped to meet the requirements of the present hour. We want a nineteen sixty-three model.

In his speech yesterday he threw this completely overboard. The answer is that under the leadership of the Prime Minister the Liberal government consistently has pursued a wrong and dangerous course on the question of national unity, since assuming office. They have opted out; they have created two nations; they have set Quebec apart, and they have provided the machinery whereby Mr. Lesage has signed international treaties. Now they see the end of the road. At the end of the road is dissolution. They draw back in fear, like the Hindu snake charmer who has lost his flute. They have no alternative to offer. This government, following the Prime Minister's leadership, has created a Frankenstein monster of division and discord.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear jeers. Let those who jeer listen to another statement of the Prime Minister made at La Malbaie in 1963 when he enunciated the motherland theory. He said this:

> I know, as well as you do, that the province of Quebec is different from others, because, while being a province of Canada, it is the motherland of people living in other provinces.

Constitutionally it is the federal government, not any one of the provinces, which is the defender of minorities. If we are to adopt the principle espoused by the Prime Minister on that occasion, then we must say that it is logical that the government of Manitoba should concern itself about Ukrainians in Montreal, that the government of Ontario must take an interest in English speaking citizens in Saskatoon. What a crazy quilt of national chaos this conjures up. This is the motherland theory unveiled by the Prime Minister in 1963.

In the same speech the Prime Minister said that he would work to establish a status of equality between the two partners—Quebec and Ottawa. What that status of equality was, never has been explained. According to Premier Johnson it never existed. All along, the Prime Minister and his government have committed the blundering error of failing to distinguish between Quebec, a province, and French speaking Canada, a cultural entity recognized in the constitution of 1867 but not necessarily identified with Quebec, any more than English Canada can be identified with Ontario. Is any English speaking person living in Montreal—I ask this question of the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey)—any less English speaking because he lives in Montreal?

This kind of Balkanization of which we have been warned by the Leader of the Opposition, has been deliberately fostered by the dangerous, destructive and divisive policies of the Prime Minister and this government. The Prime Minister bumbled into an impossible position and now is trying, with the rather desperate assistance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) to extricate himself. Meanwhile Canada's unity has suffered and is suffering irreparable damage. That speech at Murray Bay was the classic unfolding of the co-operative federalism doctrine, embodying the theory of two nations, a blueprint for disaster. The Prime Minister took the attitude that Quebec in fact is a separate and distinct political entity, like Switzerland or Ghana, and dealt with it at arm's length from then on, as though dealing with the ambassadors of a foreign state. He forgot that Quebec is part of Canada. It is time he took off the rose coloured glasses.

For three years there has been a concerted attempt in the Liberal press to make black look like white and to cover up the dangerous and damaging errors of this government. The fact is that when this government gave to Mr. Lesage the right to deal with foreign states it dealt national unity a blow from which it has not recovered. The right it created for Mr. Lesage it now withholds from Premier Johnson, and unity deteriorates. This government grovelled before Mr. Lesage and gave him everything he wanted—everything for victory. No price was too high, including the wooing of the Creditistes and the aid of Mr. Doyle, who at the time was being pursued by the former government for $3 million in income taxes; and he still seems to be the recipient of preferential treatment.

There is one statement in the Murray Bay speech to which no one can take exception, and it is this:

> I believe that there can be a Canadian nation within which the two basic cultures can develop in full and equal partnership.

No one has ever disagreed with that. It is exactly what the Leader of the Opposition said earlier and better in February of 1963. The quarrel lies in the means of carrying this principle into effect.

The other day the Prime Minister produced the incredible argument that we must not have a confederation conference because some provinces might demand the right to deal with foreign states. What does he take parliament for, a kindergarten class? Judging by some of the jeers which I have heard from those opposite, he may have a point. It was he and his government who created the treaty signing rights enjoyed by Mr. Lesage. Now the Prime Minister employs it as a cheap threat to discourage a confederation conference.

A confederation conference could agree on amendments to be made, and the constitution would then become a Canadian document. We would then have laid the foundation for a second 100 years of unity. There is no other way in which this can be accomplished. Premier Robarts knows this; Premier Johnson and others know it, and the Prime Minister also knows it. But to adopt it would be an admission that for four years his policies have been divisive and abortive. This government has placed the prestige of the government above that of Canada—and not for the first time.

This government has not only embraced but has propounded the theory that federal legislation would commence its application in the west, proceed to Ottawa, stop at the Ottawa River and resume in the Maritimes —having leap-frogged over the province of Quebec. This is a philosophy that is destructive of our national integrity, ruinous to our sovereignty, and that isolates the province of Quebec from the rest of Canada. It was cooked up between Liberals in Ottawa and Liberals at Quebec for the sole purpose of producing seats. It did that, sir, but in the process it did that at the expense of Canada.

We now have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) in his speech to the Reform Club denounce those very terms which formed the basis of the Prime Minister's co-operative federalism. In so doing he showed a concept of Canada and a personal integrity that might stand as an example to a government not conspicuous for any determination but partisan determination in the past three years.

One cannot but wonder at the latest stand by the Prime Minister. It seems to be a product of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) just as his earlier stand was a product of Mr. Lamontagne and Mr. Favreau. His attitude now is: The constitution, right or wrong. He seems to be saying: It has served us for 100 years, why change it? A few years ago the Prime Minister said in one of his celebrated sweeping-away efforts: We need a constitution for 1963. Do we not need a constitution for 1967? Perhaps 1963 was a vintage year for constitutions.

Let me quote now from an article which appeared in the Montreal Star in July of 1962 of a report of a speech made at Brockville by the Prime Minister. He is reported to have said:

> Re-examination of the whole basis of confederation will be one of the first tasks of a new Liberal government.
> Liberal leader Pearson told a rally here Saturday night that the confederation worked out in 1867 was no longer satisfactory for 1962.
> 'As Prime Minister, that's one of the things I'd like to deal with,' he said.

What a metamorphosis in the Prime Minister. As I have said on past occasions, he is one with an elastic mind, and this is but another example of that. What a change from the Prime Minister of the Charlottetown conference in 1963, when Mr. Lesage said "I don't like it—" and went on to deal with section 91 (1) of the B.N.A. Act. There were no scruples then, and no qualms.

Can this be the same Prime Minister who in 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965 and 1966, was ready to drive a truck through the constitution with the Fulton-Favreau formula—who said over and over that the constitution had to be brought up to date? It must be brought up to date, but not by a hand picked task force with no responsibility to the people. What hypocrisy this is.

The Prime Minister's speech yesterday was most revealing of these facets of his character; his readiness to throw overboard previously held convictions when he thinks the wind has changed, as it has in Quebec; his determination to deal with problems in the back room, the responsibility relegated to experts, rather than face the light of day and reasoned discussion, and his penchant and the penchant of his government for producing a fait accompli such as the flag and unification bills, assuming a take it or leave it attitude. They adopt the position that they are infallible because they are Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: That applause is another example of the myopic view those on the other side take. These are the same people who were here in 1956. The Prime Minister is now at the height of his power, basking in the sunlight of approbation, riding along on the publicity of a centennial for which the groundwork was laid before he came to office. But, his method of procedure, the reluctance to stick to his convictions and to take the people into his confidence, and his refusal to take the clear and direct course, have led increasingly to an accumulation of vexations for Canada. These are matters that are increasingly under question.

• (9:00 p.m.)

The Prime Minister has been able to overcome his difficulties. He has been able to turn political gerrymandering into an appearance of statesmanship, something to which his backbenchers would dearly love to aspire, especially those who do not have the courage to say on their feet what they say from their seats. The Prime Minister has been able to survive the debacles which should have destroyed his government, one reason being the unfailing and unswerving support of his allies in the press. Every word, every gesture—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members opposite laugh, Mr. Speaker, but their leader himself makes the same criticism. As I was saying, every word, every gesture of the Prime Minister is magnified out of all proportion by those journals committed to his cause. They have forgiven his gaffes—and they have been many, God knows—placed his career above Canada's needs, and stuck to him through thick and thin. Even a milk and water production like the so-called throne speech, which gave no indication of any plan or program and was simply a turgid collection of gleanings on the style of Whitaker's Almanack, was hailed by one paper as the second Sermon on the Mount. As soon as that publication printed those words they retracted them in this morning's issue. This government has come to represent mediocrity enthroned. It represents willingness to sacrifice at every turn the very basis of our democracy in order to secure seats. That cannot go on indefinitely. Already the wheel is beginning to turn and Canadians want and expect something more.

All the distinguished state visitors, all the Expo puffs, all the banquets, dinners and speeches cannot conceal the fact that national unity is in trouble and that this government is doing absolutely nothing about it. This was the enunciation of the two nations theory. It was the genesis of opting out, the two pension plans, the two flags and all the other divisive theories moving Quebec away from Canada, including the signing of treaties with foreign states. This was dangerous and divisive, not only because it was destructive of Canada but because it was untrue.

Quebec is not more than a province, any more than Ontario is more than a province. To erect one province above the other provinces is not only to destroy that province through isolation but it is to destroy confederation. What this government should have said was that each and every province is equal and will get equal treatment under the constitution, rather than treatment proper to a foreign state. This is what the Leader of the Opposition has been saying for so many years when pleading for one Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Rochon).

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-L. Rochon (Laval): Mr. Speaker, we have just concluded the longest session in the history of our country.

The Liberal government, re-elected in 1965, in an endeavour to prove itself worthy of the trust of the Canadian people, has introduced and asked parliament to pass, despite what the previous speaker may think about it, a whole series of measures the benefits of which will be felt in every sector of our national activity and economy, from which every class of our society will benefit, rich and poor, powerful and humble alike. Those legislative measures will prove that on this

North American continent, there lives a noble people, who take pride in their past, who look with confidence upon the dawn of a new century, a people who live in a country with boundless horizons, and whose aspirations are worldwide in magnitude.

The violent discussions of the last session, the bitter wrangling which took place are now things of the past. The bitter blows that were dealt and sometimes hurt, are forgotten. The Centennial session started a few days ago. The first anniversary of confederation, which has perhaps not always been consistent with the aspirations of every ethnic group in our country, has nevertheless made of our country one of the greatest nations of the world, respected and heeded. On April 27 last, Montreal, its metropolis, welcomed the whole world and laid before it the exhibition "Man and his World" which will be, as reported in the world press, the event of the century.

Mr. Speaker, instead of going into an analysis of the major legislation announced in the Speech from the Throne, others have done it and more will do so; instead of taking you into the verdant areas of my great constituency of Laval and have you admire the sites; instead of speaking of this second largest city of Quebec, the city of Laval—I will have the opportunity during the budget debate to tell you of its needs—in short, instead of following the established custom I felt—after living through the historic moments of the official opening of the world's fair, as most of my colleagues—that I could take a few minutes to give you, in the name of my electors and in my own name, their impressions and mine of the century which is ending and of the next one opening before us into such a promising future filled with hope and days of glory.

If, Mr. Speaker, you will read the history of nations, if you will skim through each of the eras, you will realize that, in ancient times as well as in the Middle Ages, in the earliest times as well as in our modern days, when a state sought to increase its strength or enlarge its territory, it joined with its neighbours, and when a nation sought to acquire interior strength and foreign respect, it entered into alliances with its friends; the same was true when countering the aims of one or more overly ambitious neighbours was involved. History supplies the names of several well knows alliances entered into for common defence.

That is about what happened in Canada in 1867, when Upper and Lower Canada united with the maritime provinces to protect themselves should the Americans have too great designs for our land, or should their influence be felt too strongly as compared to the extraordinary advantages arising out of the opening of the way to the Atlantic and the St. Lawrence, which provided the Maritime provinces with an invaluable passage to the sea.

Faced with this eventuality, and for other reasons also, the English Canadians of Upper Canada, who believed that if ever the country became American they would lose their own identity, and the French Canadians, who feared for their language and their religion, accepted without taking too much exception, what was a marriage of reason in which both groups saw one of the best ways to protect themselves and to remain themselves. Thus, in 1864, the Commons of Canada addressed to the government of Her Majesty Queen Victoria a request to have a measure passed. I quote:

> A measure to unite the colonies of Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island under a single government.

The said measure was to be based on the resolutions passed at the conference held in Quebec city on October 10, 1864. The project was accepted and 1867 saw the beginning of that confederation whose centennial we are celebrating this year.

I was saying a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, that one of the reasons for confederation was to protect the identity of English Canadians of Upper Canada and the language and faith of French Canadians of Lower Canada. But the main reason was the magnificent dream of the fathers of confederation. At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I will undoubtedly be allowed to recall these words by Mr. Robert Choquette, former associate commissioner of the centennial commission. I quote:

> For many, in 1864, whoever talked about a union between the Maritime colonies and Canada was slightly touched; those who were bold enough to imagine a Dominion from one ocean to the other were ready for confinement. However, a handful of men with vision materialized that thought. It was not easy. They had to struggle against ignorance here and chauvinism there, the distrust of some, the intolerance of others. They had to fight against all those who refused to look ahead for great things. To the defeatists, to the cynics, those dreamers replied with virile optimism. They did not delude themselves. They knew full well that nothing can be built without effort, that the only construction easily built is the sand castle due to vanish with the first wave. They did not delude themselves, but they had confidence in themselves. That dream of a united Canada they believed with all their spirit and all their heart. They set to work and shaped a great country out of the future.

As remarkably conceived by the fathers of confederation, that union of the maritime provinces, of Upper and Lower Canada, that confederation system proved to be the most efficient means to make us grow up and to assert ourselves as a nation. I shall not go as far as to say, Mr. Speaker, that everything was perfect, that we in Quebec in particular, did not have any cause for complaint; I shall return to that in a moment, but the fact remains that this century, these hundred years from 1867 to 1967 enabled us, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) said in Quebec city on April 24 last during the national conference on centennial, and I quote:

During our first century of Canadianism, we have built up a powerful and prosperous national economy.

A powerful and prosperous economy, Mr. Speaker, so that this dream of the fathers of confederation is no longer a dream but a wonderful reality extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, making of Canada today one of the pillars of civilization and, for the people of Asia and the Far East, a centre of scientific, moral and material riches which enabled them to survive and often prevented them from dying.

Mr. Chairman, what is one hundred years in the life of civilizations that are thousands of years old? Nothing, or almost nothing. In the life of a young country, like ours, it is a great deal; it is even a whole era, and what did it mean to us? During that period the colonial status which was our lot disappeared; we grew in stature and asserted ourselves among the Commonwealth of British nations; trading posts disappeared to be replaced by the trading system which prevailed between great powers; Canada came to be represented abroad in all the capitals of the world; a mature Canada signed its own treaties, without having to call upon another country to set its seal upon them; Canada became the world granary, so to speak; on Vimy ridge in 1917, Canada suffered and shed its blood for the sacred cause of freedom; Canada was able to respond generously to the plea of one of the greatest men of this century, Sir Winston Churchill, who uttered within these very walls, when freedom was being crushed under Nazi heels, these memorable words: "Give us the tools and we will do the job!"

During that period also Canada became the sponsor of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to put a stop to aggression by the U.S.S.R.; Canada, through its various secretaries of state for external affairs, advocated steps accepted by the United Nations; Canada became a partner of its giant neighbour beyond the 45th parallel, in a position to act as a buffer between the two greatest world powers, Russia to the north and the United States of America to the south.

In certain quarters, Mr. Chairman, English-speaking as well as French-speaking confederation seems to be entirely wrong; one side feels it is the victim of an arrogant majority and the other blames the authorities for being too lenient towards a minority.

That we in Quebec have not always had our proper share, that the constitutional agreement of the British North America Act might not have been respected to the letter, I will not pretend that it is completely without foundation. Some of it even a lot of it is true; but if you stop and think, might it not be that we have been ill-served by our own individualism? Might we not have asked, at a conference table, a better observance of the agreements? Instead of crying "The damn English", instead of driving them to exasperation and insulting them, might we not have been more practical?

The unfortunate part of it might also have been our failure to reach an earlier awareness of our own worth, a worth which, today, brings home to all provinces of Canada the fact that the country needs Quebec, our thinkers, our scientists, our engineers and our technicians.

The unfortunate part of it also might be that we lock ourselves in our ivory tower and believe, as some of our compatriots, that we can live without Canada, not realizing that separatism would lead us to a very sad end. Fortunately, a very small part of the population thinks this way.

On the other hand Mr. Chairman, there are some who feel the authorities are too lenient towards the vocal minority of Quebec. I blame those of my Anglo-Canadian compatriots who look with a jaundiced eye upon our efforts to assert ourselves and who feel that we should be playing second fiddle. They do as much harm to the Canadian nation as those Quebeckers who favour a separate nation. Fortunately, there is only a handful of them, in a century that is above their comprehension, and they are condemned by those they would fawn upon. One thing they forget which they should always bear in mind, when they think of the secondary role we should hold, and that is the past, the proud reply of those who, in 1815, answered General Washington who had sent commanding officer Arnold to take over our country. That answer gave history the glorious page of Châteauguay where de Salaberry and his light infantrymen put an end to the ambitious dream the United States had of making of Canada a new American state.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rochon: In this, our centennial year, Mr. Speaker, we must forget all those vicissitudes. We must look to the past so as to better prepare the future, look to the past without bitterness so as to correct, if possible, what faults there may be. For, lest it be forgotten, while we celebrate the first century of confederation, we also celebrate the dawn of another.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Some would like that an interprovincial conference be convened immediately to study the possibilities of amending or redrafting the constitution. We must be very careful and proceed methodically, and I think the government and the authorities concerned are right when they say, in the speech from the throne:

> During the past one hundred years the world has changed beyond the recognition of anything within the experience of those who laid the foundations of confederation. That our constitutional structure has endured and served so well the progress of our country is a measure of the basic soundness of its principles as well as the willingness of those concerned to adapt their application to changing needs and changing conditions.
> It is in this spirit that the government has in recent years actively promoted the reform of detailed federal-provincial arrangements which, with the fundamental law, compose the constitutional structure of our country. While orderly reform may well be the best way of preserving and strengthening our heritage, the most careful consideration must be given to what we do. Studies to obtain the best advice on this important matter are now underway with a view to subsequent consideration of the whole problem by parliament.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government re-elected in 1965 understands the situation thoroughly and, in the conditions prevailing in Canada today, it is behaving as the Fathers of Confederation themselves would have. The government wants to adapt itself to the present necessities; they want to show themselves worthy of the past in order to prepare for the future; in short, and I quote another paragraph from the speech from the throne, this is what they want to do:

> With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

At the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I said that instead of trying to analyse the great legislative program announced in the speech from the throne, I would say a few words about the centennial of confederation. However, there are two points which I should like to refer to, because they are of very particular interest to my constitutency. The first is the proposed legislation concerning a better control of broadcasting and the establishment of broadcasting facilities for educational purposes, and the second is a special study on urban development made in close consultation with the appropriate authorities.

Considering that at the last election, I had more than 125,000 electors, representing a total population of nearly 400,000 or almost half a million; considering that that number, includes almost 125,000 school-age children; considering that nearly two-fifths of educational institutions at the primary, secondary and scientific levels are located in my constituency; considering that the second biggest city in Quebec, the city of Laval, has a population greater than that of Quebec city, Trois-Rivières and other cities in my province and that it makes up half of my riding, one will understand why my electors and myself strongly support a plan to organize educational television in a way that would increase scientific progress.

We are convinced that such a step must be taken. We believe that it is one of the best ways to put a stop to those indecent or too daring programs which unfortunately corrupt our children when they do not deprave them.

Besides, as far as television is concerned, the speech from the throne provides for the granting of wider powers to the Board of Broadcast Governors which will be better able to see to it that the rules are obeyed.

I do not have to emphasize the special study on urban development; a city like the city of Laval which as I said, is the second in importance in Quebec, was created three years ago by amalgamating the 14 municipalities on Ile Jésus. It is a wonderful site. The island is surrounded by two rivers: the Prairies and the Mille Iles rivers. Secondary industry is attracted and economic possibilities are tremendous. So many people are leaving the centre of Montreal to settle in Ville Laval, that local authorities need the assistance of the senior governments to settle their problems. The Quebec government, both the one in power before June 1966 and the present administration, have done their share. The central government has helped within the limits of its jurisdiction. It is therefore with enthusiasm that local authorities have learned about this important piece of legislation of which they expect so much.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks I would be remiss if I failed to say a few words about the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, like the previous speakers.

They lived up to their electors' trust. We are proud of those Canadians. I would also like to congratulate most respectfully the new representative of the Queen of Canada, His Excellency Roland Michener. May his reign be long and fruitful in the best interests of our country, our dear and great Canada.

[English]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I commence my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jamieson) and seconder Mr. Côté (Nicolet-Yamaska) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I thought they performed their tasks very well indeed. I was most interested in hearing from the mover of the motion, who eloquently and ably presented his opinions to the House of Commons. I was particularly taken with the common sense he showed when he told us he waited for a great many months before expressing his opinions in the House of Commons. This very sound advice has been given over the years to new members, not to plunge in too rapidly but to find out first how this place operates. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo apparently did just that. He waited, watched and listened and then finally made his contribution.

He touched upon a number of subjects which are of great interest. One of the points he made which attracted my attention was his acknowledgement that he had changed his opinion of this institution after arriving here as a member, from the opinion that he held before he entered parliament. Like a good many people across Canada, he thought that this institution was somewhat ineffective and outdated. However, having been here as a member and having become acquainted with the nature of the institution, he has changed his mind.

I think that would happen and has happened to most people who enter this chamber. A great many have a wrong idea of parliament, and when they come here as new members, if they are patient and willing to learn they soon discover that, despite its weaknesses, which everybody acknowledges, this is still the best system that has been devised for the government of mankind. It is subject always to criticism. It is subject to improvement. We are living in an age when we have seen around the world the misuse of power and the overthrow of governments of one kind and another. I presume there is in the world at the present time almost every known form of government, but I doubt whether there are many people in Canada who would want to change what we have for what various countries abroad have. We do not want to be placed in the position where we can be subjected to a coup d'état by military personnel who are unhappy about the way things may be going on in parliament. Neither do we want to be subjected to a revolution by a group that may want to change our whole social structure. Nor do we want to establish an absolute monarchy or a dictatorship.

All of these things we have seen in the world within the last generation. In looking abroad at these other countries I think we can be very thankful that we have this type of institution, this type of government, which can be changed by the will of the people when the opportunity is presented. It does give one a chance, through the freedom that we enjoy in Canada, to express a variety of different opinions without any worse effect than, perhaps, the jeers and ridicule of those who have a different opinion; and that is not a very serious burden to bear. Sometimes I think we do not count our blessings. Yet we should, when we look abroad and see the disturbed state of the world.

How has it come about, Mr. Speaker, that during the 100 years of our confederation we have not been bothered by great upheavals within our society that have in any way affected the nature of this institution? The foundations have been well and truly laid.

May I interpose this comment, Mr. Speaker. I had not intended to speak tonight. However, I discovered that there were others here who wanted to speak tomorrow or Monday and had a carefully prepared speech which they did not want to break up. I am also informed that there are some members of the House of Commons on both sides of the house who are busily engaged with our friends from the south and are counting on a little more time for their interviews and social intercourse. So there had to be a sacrificial lamb tonight to fill in the last 15 minutes, and it is a strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that on this side of the house my colleagues seem to think of me when these occasions occur.

Consequently, sir, I am now addressing the house, not because I had a prepared speech ready, with that profundity of thought that should be given to speeches that are presented in this house; rather I am here to express some of the thoughts that have occurred to me from time to time, and some of the thoughts that I would have put into a speech had I had the opportunity for preparation. For I am a great believer in this institution, and I think that people who enter parliament and students of the history of our country would do well to pursue a course of study that will give them the background of the development of our system of government. If people would do that I think there would be less careless criticism of this institution.

I recommend to the hopeful young people of this country who are looking forward to taking a place in the government of Canada, and who already know that they are much more able than some of us who are here in this building, that they make an intensive study of the development of parliamentary institutions. I recommend to them a study of the history of Great Britain in the seventeenth century, when the fundamental freedoms were established, when the absolute monarchy was reduced in its power, and parliament started on the course of becoming the supreme governing body in the kingdom. They should then pursue that study through the eighteenth century, and particularly the nineteenth century when the adult population, with the sole exception of the women, who did not reach our exalted state till the twentieth century, was given the right to select its rulers.

With that background of information with regard to this institution and our system of parliamentary government, I cannot understand, sir, how anyone could criticize this system, other than in its smaller details, such as methods of procedure and things of that nature. I cannot understand how, with that knowledge and understanding of the long years of struggle to obtain the freedoms that we enjoy, anybody could attempt to undermine in any way the foundations of this system.

I think that some of those who carelessly criticize parliament have not the background of knowledge that, in my opinion, they should have. It has been a long struggle over centuries to obtain freedom—freedom to do exactly what we are doing here, to express our opinion on any subject under the sun without fear or favour.

That freedom was not enjoyed in earlier years. There were great restrictions placed upon people who spoke out of turn, just as that restriction is applied in some countries today. It is only a few days ago that in the country in which human freedom originated, Greece, the liberty of the individual was restricted. Pleasant as it might be to imprison your political opponents to get them out of the way, and while we sometimes toy with that idea here, when we get a little aroused, nevertheless we realize that that is not the way in which free men can live and enjoy freedom and develop their country and civilization. It takes only a matter of hours with a properly prepared coup d'état to destroy a free institution—whether temporarily or permanently, who knows?

There has been a great deal of criticism of parliament during the last few years. This is not new. I happened to be reading a book dealing with the year 1808, about the letter writer Creevey, who at that time was a member of parliament. He was a voluminous letter writer, and in one of his communications he was talking about the apathy and indifference of the public to parliament. This as I say was away back in 1808, Mr. Speaker, when the Napoleonic war was still going on. Great Britain became engaged in the Peninsula war assisting Portugal and Spain. Yet Creevey, a member of parliament, writes about the apathy and indifference of the populace of Britain to parliament.

And so it goes on. We know of all the apathy and indifference in this country with regard to issues which we are discussing here, and which appear to make no appeal to people abroad. Nevertheless, despite the occasions on which parliament appears not to be in touch with the public and the occasions when the public appears to be disinterested in this institution, all that is required is some crisis and immediately the people turn their attention to parliament and ask for consideration of the problem which confronts the nation. And immediately the members of parliament flock into this chamber to listen to or participate in debates.

So in some ways we act as a fire department to protect our country and our people in case of emergency. Then on occasions, when there is no crisis, and no great issue is in front of us, we carry on at a lower level and our work is largely routine.

Mr. Speaker, I find I shall have to carry on with my observations tomorrow because there are some other thoughts creeping into my mind which I cannot develop in the course of the next minute or so. I do not intend to deal with the speech from the throne as a whole, because it has been effectively demolished by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Neilsen) and others.

I wish to deal specifically with the emphasis which the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is placing on the management of the business of the House of Commons. This has become a favourite topic with him. Periodically he talks about what we must do here to organize the business of the house so that things may be done more efficiently and effectively and so that there may be some streamlining of this institution. With this preview of what I shall say tomorrow, I now resume my seat.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty pursuant to standing order 38, subsection 3, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the subamendment now before the house.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVES OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. Speaker: May I be permitted to bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the galleries to my left of a very distinguished group of representatives from the United States Congress.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: These Senators and members of the House of Representatives, accompanied by their wives, are attending the tenth annual meeting in Ottawa of the United States-Canada interparliamentary group. Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—OPPORTUNITY FOR EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN VIEWPOINT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Secretary General U Thant made a frightening statement regarding the danger of the world slipping into world war III. He made the suggestion that a bombing pause or cessation at this time might be conducive to bringing about discussions at the conference table. Will the Prime Minister say whether within the next two or three days an opportunity will be given to this house by resolution for this parliament to place before the world the viewpoints of the Canadian parliament and people in this connection? The suggestion of U Thant was that unless something is done it will be too late to prevent a world conflagration.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government and I am sure parliament share the concern expressed by the Secretary General of the United Nations, a concern which I indicated I felt myself when I spoke during the debate on the speech from the throne on Wednesday last. I do not think anyone can predict what may happen in Viet Nam if hostilities continue unabated, but the prospect of the indefinite prolongation of such hostilities is obviously fraught with dangerous possibilities. That is why the Canadian government has been doing everything it could to help bring these hostilities to an end.

I recalled the other day the efforts we had made in this direction. I should perhaps recall also the suggestion put forward on April 11 of this year by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he proposed that the first phase in this process of ending hostilities might envisage a cessation of the bombing of North Viet Nam together with effective supervision of the demilitarized zone. I think I should also recall that the United States government has indicated its willingness to begin negotiations at once on the cessation of hostilities on both sides.

The right hon. gentleman has suggested that a resolution might be brought forward in the house in respect of this matter. We are now on the throne speech debate, and during the next four or five days there will be an opportunity for hon. members who wish to speak on this subject to make their views known. Perhaps we should reserve our consideration as to whether any formal action of the kind suggested is required until this debate has been completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the Prime Minister would consider the possibility of a resolution giving the opportunity to parliament rather than the government, to present the views of all Canadians.

Let me now ask the Prime Minister this question. What about Hanoi? Has there been any reaction by Hanoi to the representations from the Canadian representative? The other day there was the suggestion that Hanoi had been approached and that certain secret discussions had taken place. Hanoi, which has been very provocative throughout, and unrelenting in its attitude, has stated that there was no such discussion with the Canadian representative and that no consideration whatever was given to Canada's representations in this regard. Would the Prime Minister comment on that?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to answer that question, as he has been in direct touch with our representative on this point.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I saw the statement in yesterday's press attributed to a spokesman for North Viet Nam. I will say again that our representative on the international commission went to Hanoi at the end of April; that this visit and the talk were at our request and in accordance with normal practice; that in the course of his discussions with North Vietnamese representatives he drew attention to the statement which I made before the external affairs committee on April 11. But as I said in this house, and as I say now, I have no evidence, nor have we at any time suggested that we had any evidence, that the general approach reflected in the Canadian statement has been favourably received by the government of North Viet Nam.

I want to take this opportunity also, and I regret having to do so in this way, of categorically rejecting the charge made by the government of North Viet Nam that, as they put it, "The four-stage plan of Canada is only an American plan, a part of the United State aggressors' peace negotiation hoax. It has been put forward according to a well co-ordinated program previously arranged with the Johnson clique." Indeed, as I informed the house on May 8, the proposal that there might be a cessation of all military activity against North Viet Nam, balanced by a resumption of full and effective control of the demilitarized zone by the international commission, has not met with specific acceptance by the government of the United States any more than it has been accepted by the government of North Viet Nam.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and at the same time express the hope that the government will give serious consideration to introducing a motion on Viet Nam so the house may express its opinion on this very important matter, possibly affecting the survival of mankind.

In view of the fact that it is essential that Canada's effectiveness on the international control commission be maintained, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends in the course of the next few days to introduce a motion referring the statements of Mr. Gerald Clark of the Montreal Star and Mr. Tim Ralfe of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the committee on external affairs just as soon as that committee is set up.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have already twice in this house denied the statement that Canadian members of the international commission have been guilty of spying or any clandestine activity. So far as an appearance before the external affairs committee and discussion on this matter is concerned, the committee is master of its own procedure and when it is set up—and we will set it up without delay—it will be able to decide whether it wishes to discuss this particular matter.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has already indicated his willingness to have this matter discussed by the committee on external affairs, and in view of the fact the committee cannot deal with a matter unless it is referred to it by the house, would the Prime Minister consider submitting a motion to the house referring this question to the committee on external affairs for full investigation, with the power to call witnesses and examine them under oath and to call for all the relevant documents?

Mr. Pearson: I will look into this matter, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it true that Hanoi has rejected the peace proposals he has put forward and is he in a position to say also whether he intends to make new peace proposals to North Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a fact that the Hanoi government has not, as I stated yesterday, accepted the four points that I have raised. When I raised them, I said that I held no hope at the time that such suggestions could be accepted by either side.

Naturally, the Canadian government, just like other governments, is concerned with this question and we shall seriously consider whether another modus vivendi can be found concerning this situation. However, I must say quite frankly that, in the present situation, there are very few reasons for optimism.

PRESENTATION OF BRIEF BY ONTARIO FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture or his parliamentary secretary. With the announcement that the brief by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture will be presented on May 24 here on parliament hill, can the minister tell the house whether plans are being made to meet this important delegation on that day and whether the topics in the brief will be discussed?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice and discuss it with the minister. Plans are being made to receive this delegation.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent (Ont.)): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I know that because of Expo '67 the Prime Minister has many additional appointments, but in view of the serious matters involved may I ask the right hon. gentleman if an opportunity will be provided for him as well as the Minister of Agriculture to meet the farm representatives on this occasion?

Mr. Pearson: I would hope I could do that. I point out that the delegation leaders did fix a date without consulting me, and it was a date on which I could not possibly receive them. However, I am hoping to make arrangements so I can do so.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCLUSION OF ADDITIONAL SERVICES UNDER PROVINCIAL PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare; in his absence perhaps it could be taken as notice. Does the minister's statement on page 15087 of Hansard for April 19, that a consensus must develop within the provinces before any further health services would qualify for federal assistance, mean that he is repudiating his commitment made with regard to these services—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On December 6, 1966 the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, said that the construction put on the proposed amendment was correct, namely that it would be possible for one or any number of provinces to admit any health services. On April 19 he said that this was impossible; therefore I think it is quite in order for me to ask him—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is only confirming what I said a moment ago, namely that the question is argumentative.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST THAT REFUGE BE GRANTED GREEK NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Milton L. Klein (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, but in his absence perhaps it could be answered by his parliamentary secretary. Will the government grant refuge to, and suspend all deportation proceedings against Greek nationals until a democratic government has been restored in Greece?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will be pleased to draw this to the minister's attention.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GENEVA TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, now that the zero hour approaches in connection with the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations in Geneva, is the Prime Minister in a position to give a report as to whether there is any hope or optimism that the deliberations will bring about the possibility of a substantial reduction in tariffs? Can he also inform us what if anything has been decided in connection with agricultural products, and wheat in particular since there are markets for it in Europe, as well as aluminum?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Agriculture are both in Geneva, and I hope they will be returning early next week with good news about an agreement, which we all hope can be achieved. The news has not been very encouraging in recent days, although there has been an improvement in the situation in the last day or so with the return of the representatives of the European common market. Perhaps in this case it will be the dark hour before the dawn. I hope the minister will be able to report on the dawn when he gets back next week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the answer of the Prime Minister indicate a roseate hope that there will be a dawn?

Mr. Pearson: I certainly hope there will be a dawn and a very rosy dawn. I had better not commit myself until I see what is happening to the clouds.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister disclose now whether there have been any discussions with Prime Minister Wilson of Great Britain concerning the export of western grain and the price of that grain, in relationship to Britain joining the European common market?

Mr. Pearson: All these matters were discussed at the recent United Kingdom-Canadian ministerial conference in London.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister prepared to tell us what discussions took place in that regard, and what was the position of the Canadian government?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a report on the matter. I have nothing to add to what he said at that time, and certainly not until the negotiations are complete.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER TREATY—FURTHER COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION IN VIEW OF EXCESSIVE COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in very appropriate circumstances. In view of the definite reports that expenditures under the Columbia river treaty will exceed the amount received by the government of British Columbia by over $200 million, will the minister consider referring this treaty to the appropriate committee so it can be examined again and the committee can hear officials as well as persons who would like to make representations?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): This matter has now become the exclusive responsibility of the government of British Columbia. Only last week I was assured that that government could take care of the situation without help from anybody. I would add that because of the fact that some of these dams will be completed earlier than the date foreseen in the agreement, there will be added benefits which will help compensate for some of the increased costs.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister realize that this treaty was strongly recommended to the committee by the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By the whole house.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON TELEVISION SETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I have a question for the Minister of Finance which arises out of a report that the television industry in Canada is suffering from a near depression because of the luxury tax on colour television sets. This tax is also having an effect on the market for black and white sets. It has been recommended by the Carter commission that this tax should be removed, and there would be an opportunity for the minister to remove it at an early date.

An hon. Member: You would look good on colour T.V.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I have heard these representations not only from the hon. gentleman but from others, and the matter will be considered in connection with the budget.

Mr. Winkler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the remark made by a backbencher. I hope he will be ready to play ball on the 24th.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO STIMULATE SPRING STARTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Earlier the minister told us he would make a statement within a few days on the problems connected with housing. He made a statement yesterday, but after half an hour he had not really told us anything new, so I am wondering whether he is going to participate in the debate again and perhaps complete his speech.

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Minister of Labour): I ask the hon. member to read the speech made yesterday. There was some very interesting information in it, if he would only read it.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question I should like to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very large number of guests who will be coming to Ottawa this summer, and in view of the Prime Minister's reported and very appropriate concern about the condition of Ottawa streets, will the Prime Minister consider requesting his colleagues to have Colonel Churchill of Expo fame, who did such a good job there, seconded to take charge of this problem in Ottawa?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING OPENING OF LOBSTER SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My question is for the Minister of Fisheries, but in his absence I will address it to the acting minister who I presume would be the fisherman from Bonavista-Twillingate.

Following the questions which have been posed in the house in the past few days with regard to the lobster districts, would the minister consider delaying the opening of the season in district 6B in view of existing ice conditions? This question is brought about as a result of wires that I have received today.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to bring the hon. gentleman's representations to the attention of the department. I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries will be able to give a report at the beginning of the week.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): A supplementary question to the Acting Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries is announcing today the postponement of the opening of the lobster season in district 7B, I wonder whether the acting minister would ask the minister to reconsider this decision and to check with the many fishermen in all parts of the district, as he stated he would do in answer to a question I asked, on May 10.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, as soon as it is possible for me to leave the house—and perhaps someone is listening who can do it even sooner—I will see that the hon. gentleman's representations are brought to the attention of the fisheries department.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CORRESPONDENCE WITH ONTARIO PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister had any formal correspondence with the premier of Ontario in regard to the constitutional conference proposed by the premier of Ontario? If he has, would he make it available to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already tabled certain correspondence on this matter. I told the Leader of the Opposition yesterday that I was asking the approval of the provincial governments to table the letter I sent to them dealing with the proposed talks on, I think, July 5. As soon as I get that approval I will be glad to table that letter.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL TRAINING

AGREEMENT BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO HANDICAPPED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration about an answer I have received concerning the adult training program, but in view of his absence I shall put it to his parliamentary secretary. Can he tell us if there is now an agreement between the federal and the Quebec governments concerning the handicapped? If so, is he in a position to so advise the employees of the employment bureau who even yesterday knew nothing about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a suggestion of which the minister will take note.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Finance has somewhat relieved the concern of the mining industry by his statement of yesterday, I wonder whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development could relieve the urgent concern of the industry with respect to when it might be expected that amendments to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act will be introduced.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we would hope at an early date. Some conversations are taking place now between my officers and the two sections of the industry concerned, and we hope they will be satisfied at a very early date.

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister on behalf of the government anticipate that those amendments might be before the house this session?

Mr. Laing: It would be my hope, yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—STATUS OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO BELGIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Prime Minister an urgent question about a recent incident which could endanger the sovereignty of the federal government in the field of international relations.

Has the federal government or one of its officials received a telegram from the chief of protocol of the Quebec government to the effect that the Canadian ambassador to Belgium would be considered persona non grata by the Quebec government during the visit of Prince Albert de Liège and his wife?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the question is urgent at this time.

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the urgency of my question is based on the fact that, in Quebec city, a former Conservative member by the name of Jean-Noël Tremblay is in the process of undermining confederation by all sorts of unacceptable statements and attitudes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Choquette: All separatists are former Conservative members—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: Jean-Noël Tremblay.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely the hon. member for Lotbinière knows that he should resume his seat when the Chair asks him to do so.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, since Jean-Noël Tremblay, former Conservative member of parliament and separatist, and Yvon Groulx, former Conservative candidate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member resume his seat? The hon. member is supposed to put a question to the house and I am sure he knows that he cannot preface it with a series of considerations.

Mr. Choquette: I will rephrase my question. I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, and I put the question to the Secretary of State or her parliamentary secretary, whether the Laurendeau-Dunton commission will make a thorough study of the actions of the Conservative party in order to find out why all the members from Quebec are becoming separatists?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROPOSED TELEVISION BROADCAST OF HISTORY OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Secretary of State. Parliament voted a specific amount to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for centennial purposes. One of the plans was that parliament and the history of parliament would be televised. That plan has now been cancelled by the C.B.C.

I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would communicate with the C.B.C. with a view to having this program reinstated, for certainly this is the year when to the greatest extent possible parliament and its operations should be made available to the Canadian people.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring this matter to the attention of the C.B.C. I myself did not know that a program of this kind had been cancelled. I did receive a letter from the president of the C.B.C., I think yesterday or the day before, referring to statements that had been made in the house on Wednesday and offering the co-operation of the C.B.C. in every way possible so as to televise the proceedings of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this plan was not for televising parliament in general but for an historical story of parliament with the television cameras in parliament so the Canadian people, and particularly the school children, would have a better knowledge of this institution.

Mr. Pearson: I would be very glad to follow up that matter at once.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF BILL TO ABOLISH THE SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the government would consider expediting the consideration by this house of my bill to abolish the Senate, so we can get the bill to the other house and find out how many senators agree with Senator McCutcheon's views about that institution.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): My hon. friend should not be so pessimistic about his chances of becoming a senator.

Mr. Knowles: I want to get the Senate abolished so that all our chances will disappear.

GRAIN

MAINTENANCE OF ATLANTIC PORTS SHARE OF EXPORT BUSINESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's intimation in the house the other day that the National Harbours Board may dispose of its grain elevators in the maritimes as well as in Quebec, will the minister alleviate fears in the maritimes by stating that maritime ports, regardless of the ownership of the grain elevators, will get their fair share of the grain export business, particularly in the winter season?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman's question, as is sometimes the case with his questions, is a bit complicated, but I think if I dealt with the first part it might allay any fears. As far as I know—and I think I would know but I will ascertain whether I am right—there are no negotiations for any change in the ownership of any government facilities either at Saint John, New Brunswick, or at Halifax.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Even at that, Mr. Speaker, would the minister assure the maritime ports, now that they may be in competition with privately owned grain elevators in Quebec, that they will get their share of the business?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the government does not actually control the movement of the wheat, but anything I can reasonably do to see that Saint John and Halifax get even a little more than their share of the business I would have a certain sympathy with.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE TRANSCONTINENTAL PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer a question asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre based on a rumour which I am happy to say turns out to have been ill founded. Canadian National Railways has no intention whatever of reducing its transcontinental passenger service during centennial year; indeed, they are making every effort to carry as many passengers as possible because of the immense amount of traffic being offered.

INCOME TAX

QUEBEC—EXEMPTION FOR CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Since most receipts for charitable donations given by parish priests to Canadian workers have been reduced by the department in the last two years, could the minister tell us whether this period of time has been long enough to lead the people to think that parish priests are liars?

Mr. Speaker: Order. For many reasons, the question is out of order.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF STATUS OF THE BLIND

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare may I direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. Has the national convention of the remembrance association which we honoured two days ago in the gallery, the Silver Cross Women of Canada who gave their husbands and sons, communicated with the minister respectfully requesting the government seriously and immediately to review the status of the blind with respect to their allowances and the rules relating thereto, and requesting that the means test be abolished? If so, what is the government prepared to do?

Mrs. Margaret Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government had a representative at the meeting, and I am sure the subject matter of the hon. member's question has been drawn to the minister's attention.

INSULIN—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF USERS FOLLOWING PRICE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): My question is addressed to the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare and has to do with something of national interest, the announcement today that pharmacists across the country will increase the price of insulin by up to 100 per cent. Does the government contemplate doing anything about this? Has the situation been looked into, to protect those large numbers of Canadians using insulin?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a representation which will be noted, I assume.

[Mr. Godin.]

Mr. Winkler: May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister if it would be possible to submit this matter, because of its national implications, to the standing committee on drug costs and prices?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to look into this matter. I assume my hon. friend is referring to the increased price of insulin?

Mr. Winkler: That is correct.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON PENSION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has he received the report of the Wood commission? If not, would he advise the house when he expects the commission to submit its report?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received a report; the chairman at present is in Europe and I expect his return this coming week. I shall attempt to obtain an answer to the second part of the question after he returns.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, last night when I unexpectedly entered this debate I made a few remarks about parliament. Because of words that have been spoken in the debate and the interest which is being shown across the country in this institution, I spoke about it, expressing regret that the Prime Minister and the cabinet have been using a certain amount of their time in addressing the public outside this chamber and finding fault with the institution of parliament.

In centennial year of all years I thought we should all draw our people's attention to the values of our parliamentary system. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition has done so repeatedly, as have other hon. members on this side. I had hopefully expected that Liberal party members, led by the Prime Minister, might pay respect to the development of our parliamentary system and encourage young people of this country to show the veneration that this institution deserves.

Unfortunately that has not been done. We have reached the stage where for the first time, I believe, in the speech from the throne a reference has been made to the internal management of this place. I wondered, when listening to the speech, why the internal management of the business of the house should be mentioned. Surely that is for the members of this house to deal with.

Then on the first day of the session the Prime Minister asked for and received unanimous consent to re-establish the committee on rules and procedures. That again was most unusual. He dwelt at some length, when speaking two or three days ago, on the necessity for modifying rules and procedures of this chamber. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has been appointed government house leader, in his turn has been discussing outside the house what he thinks ought to be done, as he put it, to streamline the procedures of this chamber.

Changing the rules and streamlining procedure apparently is one of the matters uppermost in the mind of the government, and across this country the impression has been created that something is seriously wrong with parliament. Editorial writers take a hint from the Prime Minister and the cabinet and write articles about how matters ought to be conducted differently and how the house business ought to be speeded up.

When editorial writers write of unnecessary delays and length of debates they miss entirely something of fundamental importance; that is, the preservation of freedom which rests with this institution. We have here an alarming situation. Gradually, in a typically Liberal way, this institution is being hamstrung by restrictions. Over the years we have changed the rules substantially, and in most of the changes I have concurred. Nevertheless, restrictions limiting the time for discussion have been imposed; the length of time members may speak has been reduced. A number of restrictions have been introduced within the last ten years most of them, unfortunately, restricting the time in which private members may speak.

Matters have now reached the stage where the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) suggested further limitations yesterday. He said that the speech from the throne ought to be reduced to a three day debate. That would mean that only 30 members of this house would be able to speak. Of those 30 members how many would be backbenchers? About half only, I suggest.

He suggested that the budget debate be reduced to three days, once again placing a limitation on the private members of the house; because the cabinet ministers, the front benchers on this side of the house, and the leaders of the various parties, small or large, would be the ones who would participate in the debate. Once again he was suggesting that the private member be restricted.

Government ministers view the private members of this house with indifference. They are like the Gadarene swine, dashing down the slope to destruction. Private members, if the government's intentions are carried out, will become mere puppets in this chamber, just rubberstamping things put in front of them. That is the situation that is facing us, and I think there should be a revolt on the part of the private members in this chamber.

Mr. Allmand: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Allmand: Has the hon. member studied the rules in Great Britain, where the budget debate is limited to three days and they have over 600 members?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, I have made a very careful study of parliamentary institutions and of the rules in the United Kingdom. They offset some of these restrictions by other methods. They have special debates more frequently on urgent matters of importance, debates which we cannot have here. If the opposition in the British House of Commons asks for an immediate debate on the subject of Viet Nam, Rhodesia or West Africa, it is granted. How do you get an immediate debate in this house? You don't. It is a rare thing to have a request like that granted here. We have to wait for a supply motion or something else. Consequently, unless the system is changed we have to rely on these general debates such as the speech from the throne or the budget debate. That is why interim supply has been misused by both major parties when in opposition because the opportunity is not provided for immediate discussion of some matter of great public importance.

I do not think we have to follow the British system entirely. I believe we can work out our own methods. Theirs is a unitary system of government. We operate under a federal system, and we have problems ranging from coast to coast which have to be disclosed and discussed in this chamber. That makes this chamber somewhat different in its methods from the chamber in the United Kingdom.

It is important to look at the rules and procedures of this chamber but I think that should be done as it used to be done, under the direction of the Speaker with agreement among the parties, rather than by the acceptance of government proposals which can be forced through the house by the majority which the government can obtain through the support of various smaller parties in the house. That is the weakness of what has happened during the last two or three years. It is a compulsory alteration of the rules of this chamber, and the more the restrictions are applied the more is freedom of speech denied.

Mismanagement of government business has been the cause of a great deal of this. We have just had the longest session in Canada's history, and that was unnecessary. The session should have closed last December and a new one should have been opened in January. On the one hand the Prime Minister complains about the length of the session. On the other hand he boasts about the number of bills that were passed last session. He mentioned 83 as the figure. I will wager right now that not many members of this House of Commons could name more than six of those 83 bills that were passed. There were only about six that were of major importance. It is not quantity but quality that is desirable.

I recognize that we are living in an age where everything has to be instant. We have to have instant news. Now we want instant legislation. This will lead us astray. We should take our time in debating matters which are going to affect the people of this country for many years to come, in order to make sure that mistakes are not made.

Over the years I have been in this chamber I have been unable to discover a bill that has been unduly delayed. If a longer time is spent on one bill than on another it means that bill is controversial, badly drafted, or will have ill effects unless modified. I have reviewed this situation time and time again. I have discovered that 40 to 60 pieces of legislation are passed through the house in a normal session of parliament. The restrictions that are going to be imposed by the government will have a bad effect on this institution.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I am sorry I do not have time to dwell on this matter, but I want to mention two other things that are closely related to it. We talk about this institution failing to meet the desires of the younger generation. The younger generation is very vocal. It is well educated, which is a good thing, and the earlier it accepts the responsibilities which some of us have carried for many years the better I will like it. I want to become an armchair critic, to be able to say "You are not doing things right down there in the House of Commons." However, I may say I will not start criticizing my own party; I will start criticizing the other parties.

Our young people have a great future ahead of them, and I hope we will turn over this institution to them unimpaired and in good working order. In this connection I would point out that even as attentive an observer as George Bain in an article in this morning's Globe and Mail says that half the voters are under 25 years of age. This is something that was written by Peter Newman 18 months ago and has been slavishly copied by every newspaper in the country ever since. All you have to do, Mr. Speaker, is look to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to find that 50 per cent of the people of Canada are under 25 years of age, but not all of them vote, at least not yet. We have not gone into the cradle, and if you look at the voting population of the country you find that those who are age 35 and over comprise 67 per cent of that population. One does not need a research staff to discover this; it is given in the D.B.S. figures.

The other matter I wish to mention is the suggestion which has been put forward that the proceedings of this chamber should be brought more closely to the attention of the people of the country through the medium of television. I think this is something that is coming, not that it is important how we appear on television. If entrance to this chamber were based on our appearance on television I think 90 per cent of us would be excluded immediately. What is important is our attention to debates in the chamber, the arguments we advance and our attendance, not to mention the manner in which we look after the problems of our constituents. However, it has been suggested that our proceedings be televised. Instead of television I would be inclined to start with radio, because television in its technical aspects is still in a very primitive state. It requires miles of cable, scores of lights and much cumbersome equipment.

Then I point out the danger of it. Dennis Braithwaite writes on these matters with considerable knowledge, and in his article in the Globe and Mail this morning he has already settled the issue. He has determined for himself that the Liberal front bench is photogenic and will carry everything before it. The backbenchers again are left out. But he says the Liberal front bench is fine and that the Liberal team will shape up very well under the leadership of the Prime Minister. However, he closes with this paragraph, and here is where the danger lies:

> Who should edit the videotapes, the Speaker of the House or some other so-called neutral functionary? Not at all. Editing must remain the sole responsibility of whatever producer is in charge, or someone he selects for the job.

• (12 noon)

So there you have it; it has all been prepared. Television will be brought into this chamber. The photogenic cabinet will appear on the screens. There will be a careful editing. We will have a Grit film strip for distribution across this country. This is the reason I suggest we should start with radio. This is a sophisticated medium, to use the modern term. No equipment is needed. All you need is a little gadget in front of you on the desk.

Then I say let it be a live program, unedited, unexpurgated and, to use Arthur Meighen's phrase, unrevised and unrepented. Let the actual words go out to the people of the country, not somebody's expurgated edition. I have often taken part in some of these little radio and television interviews. I have spoken freely to the interviewer for 15 or 20 minutes. Then two things have happened. Either I do not appear at all on television, which is understandable, or only a sentence or two is extracted from what I have said.

I do not mind my words going out over the air in the same way they are uttered in this chamber. Many people sit in these galleries and listen to what is said and form their own opinions. I do not mind if a million radio listeners have the same opportunity. So I would start with radio. Let us see what the result would be; let us have an unedited, unexpurgated edition go out to the people. I should like the people of this country to hear the evasive answers of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). I should like to listen to the million gasps of utter astonishment when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) gives one of his tortuous, involved, meandering answers to questions in this house. Then the people of this country really would understand what is going on here. When it is heard it is much different to what it is when it is read.

This is where I would make my start. I would take the proceedings of this chamber to the people of the country. If the people of this country realized the fundamental purpose of this institution I believe there would be less criticism of it. I deplore members of this chamber who contribute to this type of criticism which is expressed across this country—

Mr. Churchill: —led by the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet. Last night when I was speaking on this subject I said this is the year when we should thank God that we have a democratic institution like this, free from coups d'état and revolutions. For 100 years this institution has remained relatively unimpaired with its foundations not under attack as they have been in recent years. This is what I hope we will guard against here.

Two or three days ago when the Prime Minister was talking about the necessity to organize our program for this session he did exactly what he has done every year he has been in office. He has locked himself in; he has locked the House of Commons in. He holds a club over the House of Commons right now. He did it in 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, and now he is at it again.

Let us take a look at what has happened. He outlined to us the things which he considers should be done during this session before there is what had been previously referred to as a summer recess or summer break. He listed certain items. All one need do is take a pencil stub and a piece of paper to discover the things he would like to do before there is a summer break. It would take 70 sitting days to complete the list. In other words it would take us until the middle of August. Therefore I announce now to members of this House of Commons that not until the middle of August will they have any opportunity to be with their constituents during this centennial year, or to participate in any of the centennial celebrations which will be going on in their home towns or cities, because the Prime Minister already has set the pattern. He has said what he wants done.

I should like to quote the words of the Prime Minister as they appear at page 49 of Hansard:

> I hope that the house is able to take action before any summer adjournment on certain matters which I shall mention. The debate on the address has to be disposed of.

That will take ten days when we count the two opening days.

> We must have approval of the main estimates—

Under the allocation of time rule that will take 30 days.

> —the budget has to be introduced and debated.

That will be another six days.

> Certain bills I think ought to be dealt with before any summer recess.

He listed those. In addition there are the supply motions, normally four. That will take eight days. How much time do we allow for each bill? Do we allow a half a day, one day or two days? On the average over the years two days are spent on a bill. On that basis 14 days would be spent on the seven bills. These figures total close to 70 sitting days.

So there you are; no summer adjournment, no centennial celebrations for the members of parliament. We will stay here and the Prime Minister will be off with the visitors who will be here from foreign countries. He will be at Expo and all across the country. The cabinet members will be travelling all across this country, and while they are doing so they will be complaining that parliament is not getting on with its business. This is the position in which we find ourselves during this centennial session.

Last winter we were told that this session would start early in the spring, that no legislation would be introduced and that we would have a reasonable summer adjournment because of the special nature of this year. We were told that then in the fall we would get down to business and complete the necessary work. But the Prime Minister has set the pattern. We are here to stay. If we want to get away for the summer, we must get rid of the speech from the throne. We must finish the debate.

Someone over there claps. He is a backbencher; he has nothing to contribute to the house. He does not want to speak, and we can do without him. So we must finish the speech from the throne speech debate today. We do not need a debate on the budget; just listen to the presentation given by the Minister of Finance, let the press commentators and the editors study it overnight and then let the newspaper, radio and press commentators tell us what is good and bad in it.

What about the supply motions? Why have four? The suggestion is that we really do not want to bring up the dairy problem, the problems of the farmers, and have votes on these matters. Oh, no; just ignore that; bring in the estimates of 22 departments in one fell swoop. Don't take 28 or 30 days to discuss them department by department; just chop it all off in seven days. After all, you can trust this government. You know, they just take the money from you and spend it. We are given to understand by this government that the people are not interested in how this money is spent or whether it is carelessly spent. So it is not necessary to spend any time discussing either the estimates or the bills. The Prime Minister in effect is suggesting that if we want a summer recess these bills which have been carefully prepared will be placed in front of us and all we need to do is rubberstamp them and let them go through.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) says. He says the backbencher in the Liberal party is nothing but a puppet.

Mr. Churchill: Yes, rubberstamp the bills. Every major bill introduced by the Liberal party during the last four years has been subject to amendment in this house because of careless drafting and careless preparation. We are now told in effect by the Prime Minister, let us speed things up by not taking time to discuss the legislation and just rubberstamp it. That is the situation.

If this house is to adjourn at the end of June, for example, some telescoping of the business of the house must happen. If members take a different point of view from that of the government then the government will say it is sorry but we will have to continue through July and August because we must press on with the business of the country. That is the situation that faces us and we might just as well realize it right now.

I suggest that by just rubberstamping government proposals we will turn this institution into a legislative sausage machine. I think that is fatally wrong and shows bad organization on the part of this government which thinks nothing out in advance. Where is the government house leader today? He is not here. Did he advise the Prime Minister that this course should be followed? Is he the man who is to head up the committee on rules and procedure, get people together and say that we must allocate the time for debate because we want to get out in the summer?

Let me tell hon. members what is going to happen if we have an allocation of time in advance of the consideration of legislation. Let me give fair warning to the three independent members, the five members of the Social Credit party and the eight members of the Créditiste party. Their opportunity to be heard in this house will virtually disappear because, unless the Conservative party backs away from its responsibility, the 96 members of that party are going to insist on their proportion of the time during these debates. If two days are allowed for a specific issue we are going to take up 96/264ths of that time because we intend to be heard. How much time will that leave the Social Credit party, the independents or the Créditistes? How many N.D.P. members will be heard?

The allocation of time will result in the restriction of speech. In spite of the small numbers in some of these parties I know of no occasion throughout the years when they have suffered from any restriction of this kind that has not been greater with respect to our party. On many occasions we have not insisted on our full time, permitting those members to be heard as they should be heard in this institution where free speech should prevail. They have views to present which are just as good as any views that may be presented by members of the Liberal or Conservative parties. They are entitled to be heard because they have been sent here in the same way we were sent here, by the votes of the people in their constituencies. They have been selected, rightly or wrongly, to represent their constituents here and their views should be heard as expressed by their members in this chamber. If an allocation of time is imposed, as has been forecast in speeches by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), the new house leader, and by hints from the Prime Minister, this restriction will be painful to the members of those small parties because they will not be heard in this chamber.

I regret I have no further time to devote to this very interesting subject but I do suggest that we are launching ourselves on a very dangerous course. If we follow it we are going to weaken this institution to the point where it will become almost useless and we will be paving the way for any subversive force to take it over. We must keep alive the flame of freedom here. Let us forget time allocation. Let us sit longer hours on occasion. What is wrong with an all-night session? It does not do anyone any harm. The people of Canada can sleep soundly in their beds while we are here debating and deciding issues which are important to our nation.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before making a few remarks, may I first of all congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté). Both of them, although taking an active part in the debate for the first time, did a very good job in congratulating the government and singing its praises. It reminds me of a son who, after discovering his father's faults, is very careful not to publicize them. It is a good thing for the party but is it a good thing for the people who want to know and who are entitled to know the facts?

I would not want to miss this opportunity to congratulate our ever impartial Speaker who agreed to serve devotedly during another session. I hope he will continue to show as much patience as he has shown in the past and, especially, perseverance, so that he will not follow in the footsteps of some others who succeed one another in various positions, probably becauce they find the work too compromising. We can assure you, Mr. Speaker, of our fullest co-operation in all fair and just matters.

I wish also to congratulate the deputy speakers who have always shown that they know how to hold the fort in the absence of the Speaker.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this session, we listened patiently to several speakers, one after the other, and first of all the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to whom I listened religiously, because it is always interesting to hear him. He looks so convinced, especially when he speaks of the reforms to be brought about in this house and particularly when he sees certain old dusty practices being discarded to rejuvenate Canada. This always prompts me to laugh, because when the great Leader of the Opposition sees rules with a capital "R" discarded, he nearly has a heart attack, and I am afraid that some day one of these attacks will carry him off. But he is certainly sincere and we, the younger, who would like to have a renewed and great country, consider that the name of "Canada" does not begin with a

"R" but with a "C". That is why we want to see the "C" taking precedence over the "R" in the future.

We heard yesterday other speakers making wonderful speeches which really sounded at times like flights of oratory after the manner of Papineau. This makes for colourful debate, but I have just heard an experienced speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), refer to the allocation of time in the house and he seemed to fear that if we maintain our present procedure, the members of the smaller parties will no longer have time available to express their views.

I must say that, while listening to him, I shared his fears, but when he said that if the Conservative party failed in its duty, eventually it would no longer have time to speak. Mr. Speaker, those very words reassured me, because the Conservative party is always failing in its duty. That is why I am practically convinced that, in the future, we shall have more and more time to make ourselves heard.

I certainly shall not comment, Mr. Speaker, every item of the speech from the throne which, in spite of its length, amounts to very little, namely: studies, study groups, study conferences, planning studies. In fact, for more than five years, we have been hiring students whom we call technicians to make plans, external aid programs for foreign countries to which interest-free credits are offered, while efforts are multiplied to find new loans to increase the debts of the Canadian citizen, all this to the tune of national unity, and we finally realize that the more the federal government emphasizes national unity, the more it acts in a manner causing national disunity.

Retraining is also mentioned. This reminds me of the various names given unemployment in the past. In my area for instance, we have training for carpenters, labourers, bricklayers, etc., without any concern as to whether they can find jobs once they are qualified.

I think we are afflicted with a new type of unemployment, namely the retrained unemployed. I know a minister who is very good at this type of discovery and, Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid extending my remarks over the whole speech from the throne, I wish to limit my remarks to the dairy policy.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the Conservative party can be paraphrased as follows: This house regrets that Her Majesty's advisers have failed to submit any program to give effective direction with regard to Canada's constitutional development in this centennial year and has failed to provide for the calling of a national constitutional confederation conference.

Mr. Speaker, I was very surprised to hear such an amendment being read, for it seems that when the last session was adjourned in April, I called on opposition parties, and especially on the Conservative party, to move an amendment on the farming problem.

A while ago, I heard the previous speaker say that the government feared an amendment or a nonconfidence vote on the farming problem. I wonder, however, which of the two was most afraid at that point, the Conservative or the Liberal party, because I feel that it behove the Conservative party to introduce an amendment in keeping with the promises made when the previous session was adjourned. Moreover, I believe the leader of the Liberal party was sincere when he promised to start the new session with the agricultural question.

As a result of the amendment of the Conservative party, we completely and intentionally by-pass the agricultural question. But in a while, I shall introduce a subamendment in an attempt, during this debate on the address, to tie in agriculture. But the amendment has been so well thought out, by a great politician, that it is almost impossible to slip in a word on agriculture and to introduce the subamendment all the farmers hoped for.

Mr. Speaker, I am simply saying that the Conservative party was not right, since the agricultural question is a problem, the urgency of which can be compared to no other. In fact, the Conservative party did not want to face the government—or it did not dare—through an amendment that would have permitted to force once again, the government to give the farmers what they expect.

In the speech from the throne, what do we find concerning agriculture? Just like in all fields, and more so than in all fields, more studies, committees, conferences, circumferences, which means that we are going around in circles. That is what we find in the speech from the throne. On page 4, we find the following:

> One of the great challenges of the century will be our capacity to plan our urban development so that Canadians in the future will continue to enjoy the benefits of living in health and harmony with their surroundings. To this end, the government intends to propose to the provinces that a special study of urban development be undertaken—

The study has been going on for a long time.

—undertaken in close consultation with all the authorities concerned—

After the study there is always the report. During the last five years, I have seen a great deal of studies and reports.

—which would be available to the federal, provincial and municipal governments and to the public generally;—

When there are studies and reports, the provinces and municipalities are not forgotten.

—so that all Canadians will be aware of the problems which lie ahead and so that governments at all levels, will have the best possible advice to assist them in their own planning and in their respective contributions to this great problem.

And further down it reads:

The impact of science, industrialization and urbanization and the changing conditions in Canada and abroad also demand that our agricultural goals and policies should be kept under continuous examination. The government, confident that Canada can look forward in its second century to continuing as one of the great agricultural countries of the world—

Not the way things are proceeding.

—proposes to establish a special task force under the Minister of Agriculture. It will be charged with projecting agricultural goals for the future and recommending policies to meet these goals.

Still nothing tangible: studies, programs, reports. And further down:

At the same time, plans that will permit the retraining—

—again the retraining in the field of agriculture.

—will be developed for those who want to leave the agricultural field.

And that is the way farmers are to be helped. I have seen some of the results of this policy in my riding. When a young farmer expresses the wishes of returning to the farm the farm credit inspectors send him to the city instead. That is the way our agriculture is to be developed.

The changing needs of rural communities deserve special attention. During the present session, you will be asked to approve legislation to provide long term loans to agricultural and fishery associations—

I think that so long as we have studies and teams to prepare plans and more plans, supplying us with reports which in the end will recommend lending more money to our farmers and putting them deeper into debt, we shall be barking up the wrong tree.

Today our farmers want to be guaranteed a reasonable price for their products and assured of a market for them.

These are the two main goals which we should try to achieve. Farmers must get a fair price for their products if they want to extend their farms, their property, and increase their production. They do not want to borrow for those things; they would like to do it with their surplus income. It is possible for a farmer to have a surplus income, but his yearly income must exceed $2,500 or $3,000, especially if he has eight or nine children at home.

It is imperative that the government discuss such agricultural matters with a more practical approach, in order to be, at last, in a position to assure farmers that they will get a decent price for their products. In the matter of prices, farmers claimed $5.10 per hundredweight. They were not joking, for $5.10 is a minimum.

In my last speech, I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) to use the price of fluid milk, which at present ranges from $5.70 and $5.80, as a basis. That is quite different from the $4.75 maximum price. I say maximum because it is said that the government guarantees $4.75. Now, that is not true. The federal government only guarantees $1.11. So let us stop lying to the people. The government has nothing to do with the price paid to producers by processors. As a matter of fact, processors, and we have ample evidence of this today, pay producers the price they choose, or rather, that which they can afford. And I have precisely the proof here. I maintain that it is untrue to say that the price of $4.75 is guaranteed to farmers. Let us stop lying to farmers and frankly admit what we are giving to them. It is just like saying that farmers are helped with loans. But do you believe that the government is lending to farmers? Capitalists are lending to farmers and the government is merely allowing capitalists to get farmers into debt; the government does not give anything.

In this case, an amount of $1.11 per hundredweight has finally been granted to farmers, but it is alleged to be $4.75. This is not true. It amounts to $1.11 provided that the processor pays to the producer $3.70 or $3.80. If he pays $3.80, $1.11 is quite satisfactory. I think that may be the price paid in some districts. But in my particular area, Mr. Speaker, and this is what I want to call to your attention—we have the Mistassini dairy.

Now, the Trappist monks, owners of the Mistassini dairy, write:

A new dairy year has started on April 1 and 2 since that date, you have been waiting for our prices.

I will not read the entire letter sent to all producers but I will give you the prices and I quote:

We shall then pay $3.10 for second class milk and $3.20 for first class milk.

Now, if you deduct 11 cents from this you will see what remains: $1.11. It is easy to count. This is the report of the Mistassini dairy.

• (12:40 p.m.)

According to the latest statements of March 31, and April 15, milk, testing 3.6 per cent butterfat was paid $3.07 plus $1.11 as a total of $4.18. Which is far removed from $4.75. These are the statements.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): That is a national average when they talk of $4.00.

Mr. Gauthier: That is right but I am talking about my region. I think there is a problem. I do not mean that this extends to the whole country, but I want to consider the problem in my area. And I want to be sincere.

An even more serious problem which I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, is that resulting from the outbreaks of contagious diseases in my region during the past three years. Some breeders lost half their herds. It is absolutely essential that the farmers rebuild their herds. And, in fact, some of them have done so and their herds are back to normal today. They made sacrifices, they bought other livestock, and now they are faced with the threat of quotas. Imagine how disastrous that is for our region. The farmer who used to produce 200,000 pounds, and who only produced 100,000 pounds last year because of the outbreaks of disease, must produce 200,000 pounds today in order to make a living. But, because of the 100,000 pounds quota, instead of $1.11, he will only get 55 cents per hundredweight. That is a very serious problem and one which I want to draw to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), for this situation prevails not only in my parish, but in the four counties of the Saguenay-Lake St. John region.

That is why we can read in La Terre de chez nous:

Federation of the Catholic Farmers Union of Sherbrooke.

1,000 farmers are studying the new dairy policy.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

And they precisely raise the matter of quotas which are a disaster in our area. I do not know whether areas, having a normal production are affected, but in our area, it is really a disaster.

Moreover, we have to consider the 25 cents subsidy given formerly by the provincial government and which will no longer be given because it will be deducted from the federal subsidy; that is greatly prejudicial to the farmer and reduces the assistance he used to get.

That is why I say, Mr. Speaker, that we can prove that our farmers get this year, under the present conditions, less than last year, because of the conditions imposed, because of quotas, and because of the loss of the 25-cent subsidy and the 11-cent premimum for transportation, on the whole previous amount. If only the 11-cent premium for transportation was limited to the quotas, but no, it is applicable to the total amount to the whole production.

This is extremely dangerous, Mr. Speaker, and is prejudicial to our farmers at present. We shall have the opportunity to meet the farmers shortly and they will readily tell us that the purpose of their march on Ottawa is not to congratulate the government, as some Liberal members suggested, yesterday, but rather to protest against that dairy policy. The following item appeared on May 3, 1967, in La Terre de chez nous:

Mass protest of Quebec and Ontario farmers—March on Ottawa on May 24.

Their protest is fully justified. They are right because that policy does not suit them at all. There is an absolute need for a round table discussion so that the facts may be fully looked into, and I know that some members are responsible and anxious to look into them.

I admit that, in certain areas, things are not too bad. But in our area, conditions are unbearable. The farmer is unable to improve his lot and that is why we have so many farmers giving up their land.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the time allotted to me is running out, and I should like to connect with the amendment of the Conservative party a subamendment which will be accepted, I hope, by the Chair, so that we may at last take a serious vote on this agricultural question.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Simard):

That all the words after the words "Centennial year" be struck out and the following be added thereto:

"and have neglected taking the proper measures for the invitation of the Canadian provinces to fully respect the aims of the British North America Acts which clearly define the proper prerogatives belonging to all the legislatures of Canada and its provinces. And further, that they neglected, in this centennial year, to give the essential directives regarding Canada's constitutional development to ensure that the agricultural class receives all the attention necessary to maintain the constant economic growth in our country in such a manner as generous and patriotic as desired by the fathers of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, I have copies of the amendment in French and English. I do not want to teach someone a lesson, but I hope this subamendment will meet with your approval. I am sure every member will agree that this subamendment is called for and that it is imperative to draw the attention of the house to this situation and even to bring about an emergency debate on the farm problem across Canada.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there are some members of the house who would like to comment on whether or not this subamendment is in order I would be pleased to hear them now.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I think we will leave it in your hands to decide whether or not the amendment is proper. I believe the rules have been strained quite a bit in order to bring about this amendment but we will leave the matter in your hands.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that its ingenuity overwhelms me.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question before the house, of course, is the amendment moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. This amendment to the main motion deals with constitutional matters. The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Roberval deals essentially with constitutional matters. I recognize the ingenuity with which he has introduced another subject but in my view the other subject he has introduced is not the main part of the subamendment. In the opinion of the Chair, therefore, the subamendment is in order.

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the short time available to me before we adjourn for lunch I should like to offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was very taken with the maiden speech of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson). It was a credit not only to himself but to the constituency he represents.

I intend to confine my remarks in this debate to the belated recognition by the federal government of the role it can play in urban matters. I was very happy to read the statements made by the government in the speech from the throne as well as the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on May 10 with respect to providing a better urban environment for the citizens of this country. There was reference to the provision of open spaces and the calling of a federal-provincial inquiry. I intend to limit my remarks to what I believe are the urgent problems of the cities and some steps toward a solution of them.

In recent years Canadians have become aware of something fundamentally wrong with our urban areas. H. G. Wells saw the signs at the turn of the century when he said:

You will find that many people who once slept and worked and reared their children and worshipped and bought all in one area are now, as it were, delocalized; they have overflowed their containing locality and they live in one area, they work in another, and they go to shop in a third. And the only way in which you can localize them again is to expand your areas to their new scale.

Since world war II our prosperity, the increased birth rate, increased immigration and advancing technology have greatly accelerated the process of urban growth in this country. Urban expansion has resulted in a sprawling metropolitan region made possible by the private car, the extension of power and telephone connections, all-weather roads and the lowly septic tank. The symptoms of discomfort of this urban growth are known to all of us: the traffic congestion in the central parts of our cities caused by increased dependence on the private automobile for movement, the rapid decline in systems of mass transit, the shortage of downtown parking space, the strain on the water supply, the great expense of providing means of sewage disposal, the spectacle of an affluent society permitting suburban development without adequate parks or recreational space, the enormous increase in school costs; the deterioration of large industrial, commercial and residential areas in the central areas of cities and the decline of central business districts.

These are but a few of the irritations and problems of our metropolitan areas. The forces which have created the metropolitan explosion will not abate in the near future. We face a crisis of political and social reorganization. For Canada today is now an urban nation. In 1961, 70 per cent of the population resided in urban areas. It is estimated that by 1975 some 80 to 85 per cent will reside in or around urban metropolitan areas. The movement from rural to urban areas continues at a rapid pace.

Canada has become one of the most highly urbanized countries in the world today. Thus the lives of the vast majority of Canadians are greatly affected by the condition of our cities, the quality of the homes in which they live, the ease of transportation, the opportunity for education, access to recreation, and so forth.

A United Nations report in 1965 stated that next to war the problem of all urban areas was the most consequential question facing the governments of the world. Yet, Mr. Speaker, for all their importance, and considering the many problems that they face and will face in the future, our cities have been somewhat neglected by the federal and provincial governments.

The federal government cannot afford any longer to ignore our urban and metropolitan areas, and this is recognized in the speech from the throne. More than 40 per cent of our population now lives and works in our 18 largest city areas in this country with populations over 100,000. The metropolitan environment today has assumed a large and growing significance in Canadian social and economic life. Thus, Mr. Speaker, remedies on a national level are necessary if the problems of our cities and our metropolitan areas are to be solved within a reasonable time. I suggest that the federal government must come to play an increasingly significant role in urban affairs to fill a governmental and financial vacuum.

It is the city and our metropolitan areas with which we will have to deal in the last 30 years of this century. Lewis Mumford, that great student and interpreter of city affairs, has said:

> We must restore to the city the maternal, life-nurturing functions, the autonomous activities, the symbiotic associations that have long been neglected or suppressed. For the city should be an organ of love; and the economy of cities is the cure and culture of men.

The problems of metropolitan regions today are national in scope; yet no one is responsible for making sure that all the federal programs which impinge on our metropolitan and urban regions make part of a coherent whole. Nor is anyone responsible for making sure that all the provincial programs fit into a general scheme. Within the metropolitan region itself no authority exists which has the power to harmonize local plans by the local governments in that metropolitan region.

It is time we raised the basic question of how we in this country can get an institutional framework which will make it possible to treat the metropolitan region as a coherent whole, as we must. This means that we must have new groupings of governmental authority. No longer can we tolerate independent power sources, each with the capacity to thwart the rational development of the whole. Conflicting opinions about the future of the metropolitan area are desirable but conflict without a referee, I suggest, is like a street brawl in which everyone loses. We must invent machinery of government with sufficient power to resolve these inevitable conflicts.

What are some of the problems of the city and our metropolitan areas, Mr. Speaker? I would list them as follows: First of all, there is the movement of people from rural to urban areas and, second, from the centre of cities to the suburbs. Urban population growth has severely strained the existing physical forms and structures of our cities. Provision of basic housekeeping services, light, water, sewage, police and fire protection, are major burdens on the financial capacity of municipal governments which have had to rely for their revenue on the archaic real property tax to deal with today's complex and expensive problems. Also the existence of poverty is a very real consideration in every Canadian city. It retards growth of our cities and drains scarce resources from use in improving facilities and services.

Large scale movement of people into the central cores from rural areas and through immigration has thus introduced serious problems for our local governments in just maintaining satisfactory standards of simple, everyday services and has expanded the problem of dealing with the many disadvantaged Canadians who still just exist in the midst of today's affluence. However, Mr. Speaker, the increase in population in urban Canada has not been followed by a similar increase of urban political control, especially in provincial legislatures across the country. There is across Canada gross underrepresentation of the urban areas. This is the reason, I suggest, that provincial legislatures have been largely insensitive to urban problems and incapable of providing leadership and direction. Even within cities themselves the ability of local government machinery to provide real leadership is sadly lacking. Our system of local government is the classic case of horse and buggy methods in a space age.

One of the distinctive characteristics of Canadian cities and our metropolitan areas—and it is a sad one—is their extensive, spatial dimensions. They spread all over the countryside. It has been said that the automobile has been the magic carpet to whisk us out to the universal dream world of green grass and open spaces. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been the magic genie that supplies the wherewithal for every man's castle. The result has been a vast explosion of building and people in the suburbs of our cities, closely followed by a similar movement of retail, commercial and industrial outlets who must go where the people are. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was discussing the vast explosion of buildings and people in our suburbs and the resulting serious problems in our cities and metropolitan areas. The exodus to the urban fringes has seriously affected the central core of our cities and has resulted in lost business, a decline in the economic base and in difficulties in maintaining adequate standards for those who are left behind, the poor, the aged, the disabled and those not able to afford housing in the urban fringes. We must face the difficulties and complexities created by downtown deterioration and blight which depress whole communities and endanger their economic prospects.

Second, I wish to deal with housing. The supply of adequate housing for everyone ought to be our objective and we ought to achieve it in this year of planning. The construction boom of the fifties and sixties has left untouched the need for low cost modern housing. We will not solve anything by building so-called low cost houses on high cost land. Through planning our urban growth in advance we ought to be able to build low cost houses on low cost land, thus easing the lot of the middle income earner and the poor. Nevertheless there is a difference between supplying the housing needs of an area and creating decent areas in which our citizens can live. To our housing projects we must add commercial, industrial, business and service establishments, and we must add them on a scale which will fill the needs of those living in the area. There must be adequate access to a full range of housing. Also, there must be adequate access to a full range of work.

Our attempts at urban renewal, rehabilitation and conservation are not enough. It is not good enough to build office buildings and luxury apartments and leave the family needing a decent, low-cost house in the lurch. Too often, in erecting low-cost housing projects, we attach the stigma: "These are houses for the poor." That cannot be tolerated, Mr. Speaker. We have not yet begun to face the crisis of the city's centre and the housing shortage that exists therein. No level of government has launched a full scale attack on this problem.

The third subject I wish to deal with, also involving the centre of our cities, is urban transportation. In a world that is becoming increasingly urbanized the most critical of all problems involves urban transportation. Henry Ford once said, "we shall solve the city problem by leaving the city," and he provided the means for that. The automobile, however, is capable of coming back to the city. There is growing evidence that traffic congestion strangles the growth of many of this continent's great cities because total transportation needs have been neglected.

The automobile which moves in metropolitan areas is no respecter of boundaries. It passes indiscriminately through county, township, suburb and the central part of the city, and each of these areas has its own type of government. The attempt to reconcile the frequently opposed interests of all these levels of local government, while attempting to pay due regard to private interests, complicates the solution of urban transportation problems. Communication is the life blood of the city. Transportation is the key to whether the city will continue to serve as a unifying core for its surrounding metropolitan regions or whether it will be utterly fragmented. The basic dilemma is that the building of more and more transportation facilities to keep the central core accessible may carve so much space out of the heart of the city that little worth while will remain.

The birth rate of the automobile is far in excess of that of mankind itself and threatens to push the human population on this continent into a tight corner. Victor Gruen, the noted architect and planner, had this to say about the automobile:

The space required from birth (manufacturing plant) to the death (automobile cemetery) and the intervening needs for moving, storing, housing, repairing, beauty care, mechanical health of the automobile are such that the total expenditures made for these purposes are higher than the analogous ones for human beings.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in spite of having been invented and constructed as a means of mobility the automobile has robbed us of that very mobility in our city centres and surrounding metropolitan areas by congesting streets and highways. Of course, many of the costs of congestion cannot be calculated. How does one estimate the cost of strained nerves, frayed tempers and depression in experiencing or even contemplating the traffic ordeal?

We have approached this problem in our cities in two ways, first by fleeing to the suburbs and thus bringing about the scatterization of our cities and, second, by surrendering to the automobile by expanding and broadening our streets, by demolishing human habitation, destroying our parks, bisecting established communities, and by giving over more and more human living space in the form of car storage areas, parking lots and garages, service stations and repair shops, to the automobile. However, Mr. Speaker, both of these actions have not pacified the insatiable appetite of the automobile. That appetite has nearly succeeded in destroying the desirable qualities of cities and has converted many of our city cores into economic graveyards and our suburban areas into monotonous cultural deserts. Cars, Mr. Speaker, do not pay property taxes but buildings do, and where automobiles have taken over our city streets revenues have been lost to our local governments.

The automobile as a means of urban transport is probably going to stay with us and even grow in importance, at least for the foreseeable future. Thus we will have to devise ways and means of living in the automobile age but still remain masters of our environment. The solution, I suggest, is not complete dependence on the private automobile but upon a co-ordinated system of transport where both the private automobile and public mass transportation can assume their proper roles. We will have to reorganize our urban pattern and our entire approach to land usage in our cities and metropolitan areas.

Transportation facilities have always had a dominant effect on urban land use and therefore on the shape and character of cities. There is a close relationship between transportation, land use and urban development.

Urban development in Canada is still largely determined by the undirected forces of necessity and expediency. What is needed to come to grips with the problem of urban transportation, just as it is with the problem of urban housing and development, is the use of urban planning. At present we do not really plan our cities. Urban planning has been given lip service in most Canadian cities. I speak as a former alderman in the city of Hamilton, and I know that every city hall across the country has filing cabinets and shelves full of expensive plans gathering dust. When I speak of planning I speak of the need to establish basic objectives for the growth and development of the city, objectives based on expected needs in housing, business, industry, education, transportation and culture, and these arrived at by discussion and participation at all levels of government and with the citizens themselves.

Many have come to learn the lesson that if you pick up one urban problem and start to unravel it you discover pretty soon that the urban environment is all of one piece and you have the whole business left in your hands. They have come to learn that a comprehensive approach is necessary. Comprehensive planning at all levels of government—I notice this was one of the matters discussed by the Prime Minister in his speech in the house on May 10—means that neither growth in the metropolitan fringes nor decay in the older areas of the central city can be sorted out conveniently and considered alone. They are interdependent and it is now generally agreed that urban area planning must be comprehensive and must include planning of transportation facilities. Transportation planning must embrace the complete transportation system of an area; otherwise it makes no sense.

I turn now to the other problem of the urban areas, that of municipal taxation. The cores of our metropolitan areas are the victims of the financial squeeze that develops as population moves out to the suburbs. Decentralization of population takes with it a large chunk of the city's support by way of real property taxes, and at the root of the urban financial difficulty is the narrowness and rigidity of the base upon which the tax burden rests. Thus we must find ways to eliminate the financial problem which threatens municipalities and leads them to place obstacles in the path of urban development undertakings.

What is needed is an overhaul of the system of taxation for urban areas, and it is needed urgently. Far greater assistance is needed from senior levels of government, especially in the areas of housing, transportation, parks, recreation and open spaces. There is no doubt that the problems of the city and of the people within it cannot be met without a much larger commitment of funds by the senior levels of government. With the major bite from municipal revenues taken for education costs and with the demand for services in new and old areas of the city, local governments usually have little, if anything, left over to build and create decent communities for their citizens. One way of doing this, and I support this proposition, is the deducting from income tax of residential real property taxes which our citizens pay to their municipalities.

Another problem is that the outward expansion of the urban areas has created its own particular form of political headache. As the urban metropolitan area grows it absorbs many smaller towns and municipalities, all governed by their own leaders who are more often than not parochial in attitude. Thus the means of governing this complete fabric is divided into many jurisdictions which, more often than not, compete rather than co-operate on mutual problems.

This competition retards the over-all development and implementation of any over-all plan or design for the metropolitan area because of the jealousies and the conflicting standards of land use, zoning, etc. Thus, Mr. Speaker, the progress, growth and development of our cities often depend on the task of getting from five to 20 different municipalities, with different political jurisdictions, harnessed and pulling together. We must devise ways and means of improving our political structure and putting metropolitan areas under one political jurisdiction.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, to meet the multitude of urban problems requires the full scale attack of all levels of government. Our approach to urban problems can be a shining example of creative federalism in action, with each area of government working and acting in a way which best complements the activity of the other, a nation-wide approach in which all three levels of government would jointly share in the establishment of policy and planning programs. Thus there must be an integrated, co-operative attack involving all levels and resources of government.

What is the basic problem of urbanization in Canada in this our centennial year? As I see it, it is nothing less than the building of a new Canada. It involves a complete recasting of the urban environment in which most Canadians will live. By the year 2000 something like five million people will live in a metropolitan area connecting Oshawa, Toronto, Kitchener, Hamilton, and the Niagara peninsula to Fort Erie. By the year 2000 Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Montreal, St. John's and Halifax will account for most of our population and they will all, I emphasize, be on the metropolitan scale.

Thus it will be readily seen that if we want decent living conditions we must plan the form which these areas are to take in terms of their physical growth. Cities are the outward expression of the values and the attitudes of a civilization. Strong metropolitan planning at all levels of government is essential for the new Canada. Mr. Speaker, what better challenge is there to Canadians in our centennial year than the challenge to plan and build new towns in and around our largest cities? New towns planned in advance of need will provide us with the opportunity to solve the urban problems as stated earlier of supplying adequate housing for everyone. With new towns of adequate size we could plan ahead for school sites and parkland and preserve each new town against decay by surrounding it with useful and functional green belts.

Some of the remarks which I have made previously in this house I should like to put forward again now. These are a few suggested solutions: First of all, I believe the first priority should be the creation on a major cabinet level of a department to handle housing and urban affairs. I believe this should be the spearhead in attacking the problems of cities. It would combine all aspects of urban involvement undertaken by the federal government, for example, by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, by urban transportation authorities, by municipal governments and so on.

This department would co-ordinate the various urban programs throughout the country and establish comprehensive objectives and priorities. It would sponsor research and experimental and demonstration projects in order to find solutions to urban problems. It would take the lead in arranging and formulating an effective working relationship at all levels of government in dealing with urban matters. Further, it would develop and recommend policies for fostering the orderly growth and development of our urban areas.

It would provide technical assistance and information which would include a clearing house service to aid provincial and municipal governments in developing solutions to community and metropolitan development problems. It would conduct continuing comprehensive studies and make available findings with respect to problems of housing and urban development.

Certainly in the field of research and trained personnel increased research is essential to identify and better understand the forces causing the problems of central city deterioration and suburban sprawl and to provide a basis for program improvements which will bring about workable solutions. The federal government should establish a fund for urban studies so that grants could be made to the various universities for the creation of institutes and special programs devoted to research and teaching of urban affairs.

The problems of urban areas are of increasing scope and complexity. Our universities must be major participants in this respect and must establish centres where there will be accumulated the best data and analyses available. They must also be actively engaged in the training of men and women in urban culture and its problems.

Third, as I said in a speech on April 20 this year dealing with urban transportation, there should be a federal-provincial conference on urban affairs to set up task forces to study the various aspects of urban problems. Those taking part in these task forces should include federal, provincial and municipal government experts, various non-governmental experts and members of the general public. They should be commissioned to search out immediate and long-range needs and to suggest solutions. I was pleased to see in the speech made by the Prime Minister that this is being considered by the government.

With regard to urban transportation there is an immediate need for the establishment of a transportation policy for both intercity and intracity communication. I certainly hope, with the new commission set up under the national transportation legislation, that the research branch might be able to undertake this. Provision of mass transit in cities goes completely unaided by government despite the fact that it often is penalized through taxation while other modes have all kinds of subsidies. Thus, a program of mass transit assistance by the federal government is important. The federal government should undertake establishment of a research centre in urban mass transit and undertake a demonstration project to test out alternatives.

There is a national interest involved in the sound economic development and redevelopment of Canada's urban areas. Our Canadian cities are afflicted by a wide variety of serious problems growing out of a tidal wave of urbanization, industrialization and metropolitan population redistribution. Unfortunately they have been unable by themselves to find adequate solutions to these problems because of financial and jurisdictional limitations.

The responsibilities of the federal government lie in promoting balanced economic growth in Canada. The cities have become the sources of the fastest growth in the Canadian economy. Thus, federal spending on urban matters can be used as an instrument of national policy and federal expression of commitment to material growth, for it is in the urban areas of Canada that the main potentialities of economic growth lie.

The people of Canada have a right to expect the parliament of Canada to do what it was ordered to do, that is, to promote the general welfare of Canadians as a whole. But we are not going to accomplish any of this or do what we want to do unless we work together. Benjamin Franklin said, "You either have to hang together or you are going to hang separately". We either do things together or we do not do them at all. There is not a single problem confronting this nation today of any size which does not require the combined resources of public and private endeavours of the Canadian community—not one. The problems of water pollution cannot be solved by government. The problems of slum clearance cannot be solved by government. The problems of jobs and job opportunities cannot be solved by government. We cannot name one single problem that we can solve in Ottawa, in the provincial capitals, or in the city halls. We cannot solve the problems alone.

The Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Speaker, I have just one more sentence if I may be permitted to continue.

The Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the permission of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Speaker, we will be judged as a people by how well we handle the next phase of urban development. I believe that we as Canadians will respond to that challenge.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to take part in the throne speech debate because it is a good way to break the ice at the start of each parliamentary session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. He spoke about breaking the ice. Is this to be an historic declaration in favour of ice breaking?

Mr. McCleave: I shall have some answers for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) later. I thought the metaphor I used was perhaps appropriate considering the late spring but I had not considered how quickly the hon. gentleman can spring from his seat to interrupt the start of another member's speech.

It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to see you in your place. I might borrow the words of a poet, it is so nice to have you back where you belong.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: I would hope that someone would pass along our regret that the deputy chairman of committees of the whole, as reported in the Montreal Gazette, had to reenter hospital in Montreal this morning for an operation. We will miss him and we hope for his speedy return this time with complete recovery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McCleave: While I have used poetic words in respect of our officers I do not use them in respect of the throne speech. It could have been a stirring call to Canadianism. Instead I compare it to a menu with many items which have appeared so constantly in the past, such as the Canada Development Corporation, that they now have become a sort of Liberal helping of hash.

I should like to compliment the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) for their very interesting and well delivered speeches in initiating this debate. I believe they were most effective when they brought before us their own particular fields of knowledge. If I differ in any way with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo it would be in respect of his remarks on youth and its disillusionment with things political today. I suggest that perhaps one reason for the disillusionment is the gentlemen with whom the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo now finds himself associated. Solemn promises were made in regard to some $10 million for university scholarships but these promises have not been kept. Surely that would disillusion anyone. I have also heard the cry that there are not sufficient facilities available at universities or colleges to look after those students who would be the recipients of the $10 million in scholarships. That is a feeble excuse for not educating our young men and women. Many of them will not receive the necessary education simply because there are not sufficient facilities.

Many members on all sides of the house, including the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), have areas of poverty in their constituencies. I have such areas in my constituency and I know that the only way the vicious cycle of poverty which has encompassed some families for several generations can be overcome is by providing higher education to the young boys and girls. Of all the sins of omission that this government has committed this is the most conspicuous. No wonder the youth of this country are disillusioned with this government.

The throne speech made no reference to the problems confronting maritime transportation. We dealt with that aspect of national transportation at some length last year. Yesterday I directed the following question to the Minister of Transport:

> —would the Minister of Transport assure that legislation relating to maritime transportation will be dealt with in this centennial session?

His answer was:

> I could not possibly give such an assurance, Mr. Speaker. It would be very presumptuous on my part to say what this house would deal with.

We all realize that the government initiates and proposes legislation which this house eventually disposes of, and I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make that kind of remark. I hope he will now pop up in his seat as he did at the beginning of my speech to indicate that such legislation will indeed be brought before the house during this session. Surely that was an assurance we were given last year.

We do know that the special study on maritime transportation had some reference to the Minister of Transport's empire because Mr. Victor Gruen of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald referred to some very interesting points uncovered by that study. I hope the minister will not engage in some of his puzzling magic but rather come to grips with these problems and place a solution before us. I will have more to say about this subject later.

Also conspicuous by its absence from the throne speech was the so-called war on poverty. Apparently the knights in their shining armour have crawled back into their Cadillacs and left this field.

I should like to compliment the last speaker on a truly excellent speech. Let me second the ideas presented by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) on urban development. There is some reference to this subject in the throne speech. I feel that if some imagination and common sense can be found by members on the government side, of which there is some doubt, something could be done in this field. The hon. member referred to Victor Gruen's work, with which I am familiar. He is a man who seems to have the idea that we can save our large cities from stagnation and decay, and I hope that everyone will read what the last speaker said in this regard.

I do not intend to repeat what the last speaker said about Mr. Gruen's work but I should like to refer to one statement Mr. Gruen has said that for every car that moves into the heart of our large cities in North America one individual is driven out. That is paradoxical because one would think that every car moving in would bring in the number of people that can be carried by that vehicle. Nevertheless Mr. Gruen has proven his statement to be accurate, particularly in the older downtown areas. I hope that government will show some imagination in tackling problems relating to urban development.

In recent days I have travelled from coast to coast and have discovered an interesting fact. In this jet age one can have three breakfasts while travelling across Canada before having lunch. I left Halifax at five o'clock on Monday morning and arrived in Victoria, B.C. by one o'clock. I had breakfast before I left home, breakfast on the jet to Toronto and breakfast on the jet between Toronto and Edmonton. The unnerving part of the whole trip was the cloud cover over the whole area which prevented me from looking down to see precisely where I was at any moment. I really did not feel I was getting any closer to Victoria. Fortunately the stewardess eventually came with a lunch tray so I knew I was making some progress against the hours of the day. During my trip I discovered that the question most often asked across Canada was: Have you been to Expo or are you going to Expo?

I think Expo will undoubtedly be a gem in the crown of our centennial year and something of which Canadians may be very proud. Perhaps I say too much about Expo, but if I do I do so because of a man who was a member of this house at one time but became a victim of the foolish perversity with which we treat each other very often. I refer to a former associate minister of national defence. As I recall, he was the one who brought the first legislative measure dealing with Expo before this house. He had a pretty miserable time here, and his wife, daughter and two sons must have gone through hell last year. They can now travel through Montreal looking at what this gentleman at least in part accomplished.

I think the mood of parliament has changed from that of last year. Some reporters have suggested that we have since then redeemed ourselves, and I believe they are probably correct. We are now living in an era which requires a streamlining of our procedures. Let me put forward my own thoughts in this regard. We should use time allocation as an experiment when we are not dealing with issues which drive us apart as parliamentarians. We should only use this method of streamlining our procedure after the five parties in this house have learned to work together in a more disciplined manner. Perhaps initially we should experiment with allocation of time after the committees of this house have had a good hard look at legislative proposals. I presume that even after the broadcasting committee has dealt thoroughly with the proposed amendments to the Broadcasting Act we in this house will still have a great deal to say about them. Divorce has been considered carefully and is a subject about which there are a great many opinions. Perhaps in this case, as in others, time allocation can be applied without any injury to the legislation itself or to the rights of members to express their opinions in this house.

On the other hand, the training bill which we dealt with a few days ago did not go to a committee in the first place and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) came forward with about a dozen amendments to a bill of some 24 clauses. Obviously this sort of bill could not be dealt with under an allocation of time formula. With allocation of time we might wind up with three quarters of the bill passed but with some six or seven amendments that should be made still outstanding. I suggest that if we utilize time allocation we should do so in non-contentious areas first so we can see how it works and without everybody getting into a real dander and froth. This is a sort of discipline that we somehow have to impose upon ourselves, especially in an age of proliferation of parties.

I mentioned the divorce bill. I suggest to the house leader that he try to secure agreement from all parties in respect of this bill. I think this would be possible. In this connection I believe the joint committee with the other place should be reactivated as quickly as possible. We are working against a fairly tough schedule. We have a lot of tough ideas to deal with. I should not say tough ideas, but we have at least five major areas with which we have to deal in this connection, and I think the sooner we get at it the better it will be from the point of view of helping all those people who need help. In this country there are some 60,000 deserted people who have been crying out for relief and have not been able to find any under our present archaic system.

I make only one other comment in respect of this field which has been a specialty of mine for nine years. The legislation we bring in will be a monument to our oldest parliamentarian, Hon. A. W. Roebuck who, at 89 years of age, is in the other place one of the top performers on parliament hill. I do not propose to say what he will suggest to the committee and parliament except that if accepted it will bring us from the dark ages to the best divorce law in the civilized world.

I spoke about wasted human resources and the 60,000 deserted people in Canada. In a way they are wasted or at least crippled human resources. Most of them are unable to set up new liaisons and bring forth new families but are damaged cogs in the wheel of an archaic system.

Dealing with the unused human resources in Canada, I hope we can place a different emphasis on our thinking with regard to the war on poverty. I hope we can do what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) has sugggested in the past and call a national conference on human resources, on what can be done to help the retarded, the crippled, the people who suffer disabilities, so they can play their part in the development of a greater Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, I would not approach that problem with a particular emphasis on welfare. I would treat it as a somewhat larger problem, perhaps from the standpoint of an economic one, so that everybody no matter what his abilities can at least give the best of himself or herself to this Canada of ours.

I should now like to deal with local problems. Yesterday the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) mentioned the idea of lobster trap depots at different places along the coast of Nova Scotia. The common sense of this idea lies in the fact that the lobster seasons are different and therefore the equipment can be transferred from one place to another without seriously dislocating the operation of any lobster fisherman. This idea was first conceived by my colleague from Halifax, the other hon. member from my city. It was because he could not be here that he suggested the idea to our friend from Queens-Lunenburg who is an expert in the fishing industry. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg certainly presented the idea very well yesterday. I do not labour it except to say that we have talked with lobster fishermen and they seem to think it is a good idea. Therefore I commend it to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Robichaud).

Now I come to my beloved friend, the jumper-up from Bonavista-Twillingate, and transportation problems of Atlantic Canada. We have gone through a winter that from the standpoint of employment in two of the great ports of Canada had to be seen and still could only be disbelieved. The potential of those ports in the handling of general and special cargoes was not utilized to the extent to which it has been in recent years. I hope the Minister of Transport will be able to get the study being made out from behind closed doors and take some action before another winter season sets in, because the stevedores and longshoremen of Halifax and Saint John will simply not put up with what they have had to put up with this year.

The economics are now so out of joint that a ship with a cargo destined for Montreal waited in Halifax harbour for three or four days. We have a general idea of the expense involved in a ship waiting in harbour for several days for ice to clear so that it may go to Montreal and unload its cargo. Yet we have the Maritime Freight Rates Act and a good rail system between Halifax and Montreal. One would have thought that the railway in co-operation with the shipping authorities would have got that cargo to Montreal a few days earlier. But this was not to be. This was one of the most shattering experiences in what was a most miserable year for one of our great ports and one of the great national assets of this country.

A few days ago the minister provided information on the experiments with hovercraft in this country. I think the department should be encouraged to proceed with more haste and perhaps even more zip in testing hovercraft. They are not only useful in southern Canada but they might be the one great way of solving transportation problems in the north. A hovercraft can best be described as a sort of automobile that can be used on water, snow, tundra or anything that has a reasonably level surface to be used as its highway. It is as manoeuvrable as an automobile. If big ships are setting a course toward each other and are even miles apart they can still collide because of their inertia and the difficulty of manoeuvring. But a hovercraft is as manoeuvrable as your automobile, sir, and mine. It can stop very quickly within its own length. It can carry out very fast manoeuvres and changes in direction on water. I suggest it is not only the answer to transportation problems such as exist between Saint John and Digby, Nova Scotia, in the Minas Basin, and even the shorter runs such as in Halifax harbour but might be used on the Northumberland strait or some of the wide rivers of Canada and in the northland. I hope the minister will eagerly seize the chance to test hovercraft without delay in Canada's north.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to respond by saying that I made arrangements yesterday to visit the hovercraft factory in the Isle of Wight and test hovercraft on June 2.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, the minister has done me a very great favour because I can throw that part of my speech away, which I accordingly do. I am grateful to the minister because I am running out of time. You cast your bread forth upon the waters and sometimes it comes back ill "bread" and at other times it comes back well "bread".

Mr. Pickersgill: In a hovercraft.

Mr. McCleave: I have such a wealth of material to deal with that I am in some difficulty in choosing what to use as I believe I have only five more minutes left.

First of all I would like to deal with the problem of the restoration of the Sambro lightship to its position outside Halifax harbour. The minister and his department have made the point that the most efficient aids to navigation in the world are outside that harbour at the present time. This is quite true and I do not quarrel with that at all. There are lights on Sambro island, Chebucto Head, Devils island and Maugher beach. The new fog signal on Sambro island, together with the fog signal at Chebucto Head and Maugher beach and the whistle and bell buoys, provide adequate sound signals for navigation during periods of low visibility. A new powerful radio beacon is in operation on Sambro Island and a radio marker beacon is situated on Hartlen Point. In addition to all of this there is excellent coverage by the Loran and Decca navigation systems. So no ship need approach Halifax harbour with any reluctance.

However, I think the point that must be made—and I am thinking of the Cape Bonnie tragedy in which 18 or 19 men lost their lives—is that even with all the aids the small fishing vessel may get itself in difficulties. I am sorry to see that the minister did not accept the suggestion which was advanced by the fishermen in the area, by Rear Admiral Pullen, by my colleague, by myself and by the hon. member for Lunenburg-Queens as well as by others. However, since time is running out I will deal with that matter later.

Then there is the situation at the dockyard in Halifax but that also will have to be dealt with later. All I will say now is that it is regrettable that while the workers in the ship repair classification have been given increases, those in motor transport and the labourers have not. This will have to be dealt with at a later time because I wish to conclude with the following thoughts.

This is our centennial year which I hope will afford an opportunity for Canadians to travel and see their country. I should like to mention four or five places which I think it would be interesting for any person to visit. I have seen them all since the start of this year. First I should like to mention the gardens at Saanich and Victoria on Vancouver island. I was driving around there on Monday, Tuesday and part of Wednesday and I found only one place where the home owner had not mowed his lawn. This area was most attractive. There were rock gardens in one place and right next door regular gardens. It was a sight for sore eyes, particularly eyes which have been made sore by the long Canadian winter through which we have gone in the less fortunate parts of Canada.

Another place which I should like to recommend is Niagara Falls where man has conquered nature and used such vast amounts of water for the purpose of hydro development. People do not believe me when I say this, but I am assured it is true, that man has done so well that the water can be turned off at night if necessary. A certain amount of water is always allowed to trickle over the falls because honey-mooners want to see it, but at night it is not so essential and at times of drought it can be slowed down, if necessary, to a mere trickle. I do not believe it has ever been cut off entirely but I am told this is possible.

Then I must speak of a visit to my friend Freddy, the largest lobster in captivity. I met Freddy in the biological station of the Department of Fisheries at St. Andrews, New Brunswick. He is the largest lobster in captivity. I would imagine he is completely inedible; he looks pretty tough to me but he is a friendly fellow. He likes to see people. He flips his claws in the water and splashes water in people's faces when they go to see him. I believe he weighs about 50 pounds, which is a heck of a lot of lobster, though people are better off with 50 small lobsters than one large Freddy. When he sees people he puts on a performance. There is a bit of ham in Freddy, the largest lobster in captivity.

Probably there is some ham in me because I would also suggest a visit to the Halifax area which is particularly nice in summertime when heat waves hit the rest of the country. I would suggest a tour along the eastern shore to a small place called Ship Harbour where there is a lovely harbour. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) and his department and the provincial government are working on the development of a national park there. I believe this will be one of the great recreational areas, particularly for eastern North America, and I certainly urge everybody to go and see it, both before and after it becomes a park.

Finally, all of us must see of course the great city of Montreal and mighty Expo '67, the jewel in our centennial crown which will show us the achievements of which we as Canadians are capable and will bring us all together in this centennial year. Perhaps I could interject at this point a more prosaic note. Let me say first of all that I am not advancing a new idea but one which has been mentioned previously and about which people have written to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). I am referring to the idea that in some way the cost of Expo trips be allowed as an income tax deduction. Perhaps the minister may be able to apply such a scheme not only to trips to Expo but to any trips this year which take Canadians from one province to another. It has been a late spring but this may be a harbinger of a very fine summer. In any event it behooves us in this great country of ours to see that as parliamentarians we play our part. I am sure this will bring us all together with a greater sense of pride in being Canadian.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to exercise my right under the rules. I did not want to bob up a third time while the hon. gentleman was speaking but I wish to say—and I accuse him of nothing but good faith—that he exaggerated to a certain extent what I said and certainly anything I ever intended about legislation with respect to maritime transportation. I did say that I hoped there might be a possibility of dealing with this matter, in the initial stage at any rate, before the end of this year, but I would not expect it to be disposed of in this session. I believe the transportation study will be ready and generally available about the end of this month. I am trying very hard to get it completed. I feel the study will require a lot of examination and perhaps rather heated debate before any of us will feel very confident about what is the right thing to do, and it is perhaps more important to do what is right than to do it in a rush.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks, I should like to extend my most sincere congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

The former spoke with the eloquent and earnest voice of a Newfoundlander who is proud of his new country; the latter told us with freshness and humility, but with clearness, about the aspirations of a genuine Quebec farmer.

Both of them carried out their duty outstandingly well. Both raised the prestige of this house and gave a very propitious impetus to this centennial session.

In my capacity as representative of one of the northern ridings of New Brunswick, I was very happy to note that some of the legislation as proposed in the speech from the throne directly affects our region. I refer more particularly to the statement that the federal and provincial governments will join in a major regional planning effort in northeastern New Brunswick through the Fund for Rural and Economic Development, better known as FRED. I hope this unequivocal and specific confirmation will re-assure our people that both governments intend to proceed immediately and actively with the development of the pilot region.

Mr. Speaker, it was on September 20 last, in Fredericton, that the first cannon shot went off, confirming the declaration of war against poverty.

That is the time and place where the federal and provincial ministers signed the agreement to implement the development program of the northeastern area of New Brunswick. It was the first plan of that kind in the country and, if I am not mistaken, the first try at rural planning in North America.

That agreement was signed under ARDA, passed by parliament here in 1961, and more immediately under the Fund for Rural Economic Development Act passed by the Canadian parliament last May.

The Fredericton agreement binds the two governments to co-operate in a joint program and to set up the administrative machinery needed to implement it.

I am particularly interested in the pilot area, Mr. Speaker, because it includes the ridings of Restigouche and Gloucester as well as the parish of Alnwick in the neighbouring riding of Northumberland. That area was chosen because it meets the requirements: low incomes and excellent development possibilities.

The two areas of Dalhousie-Campbellton and Bathurst-Belledune have welcomed in the last few years new industries including Radio Engineering at Atholville, Restigouche Abattoir at Campbellton, CIL and Allied Chemicals at Dalhosuie as well as a vast chemical and steel complex at Belledune.

Enlarged pulp and paper facilities will be provided at Atholville and Dalhousie, and the latter is also to have a new seaport.

New mineral deposits have recently been discovered in the area and large sums of money have been and are to be invested in their extraction, especially in the vicinity of Bathurst-Belledune and Upsalquitch.

However, the adjoining areas, including the town of Campbellton, which is a railway and commercial centre, do not yet fully participate in this new economic expansion.

And so this pilot area is most suitable for a concerted government effort in the field of planning. As I said earlier, it presents the conditions required: a low income level, great development potential, recent industrial expansion and a population anxious to move ahead.

This desire of the population to participate actively in this pilot project is evident and very stimulating. Regional and local groups have been constituted rapidly and are very active at the moment.

The French-speaking group, CRAN, and the English-speaking group, NRDC, are meeting once a week on a regional basis. Furthermore, several of their local committees get together each month in various localities of the pilot area.

Those tasks forces have received the assistance of leaders, who have analysed the problems in their own regions and put forward concrete projects. Naturally, they expect action from the governments.

I was very pleased to learn last week that one of the pet projects of CRAN and NRDC, as well as of the local chambers of commerce, had been approved and that construction would start as early as July. I am referring to the announcement made by the minister of public works of New Brunswick with regard to the construction of a road section in the area between Saint-Quentin and Bathurst.

Provision had already been made besides, for that proposed section in clause 42 of the Fredericton agreement which reads as follows:

—Federal financial assistance for the construction of a road for the development of resources in a westerly direction from Saint-Quentin.

That proposed road, 74 miles long, which will cross an area rich in forest and mine resources, will contribute to development within the pilot area.

Other plans have already been submitted or will be submitted by the planning groups I just mentioned, namely CRAN and NRDC, as well as the chambers of commerce and others, as well as by myself, on various occasions.

But I would like to take advantage of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to point out once again these projects to the attention of those who have the power to carry them out, and especially those who will be responsible for the implementation of projects in the pilot area, according to the Fredericton agreement I mentioned a moment ago.

The southern region of Restigouche constituency, through its geography and its economic situation, is particularly handicapped. I note that the speech from the throne states as follows:

The government will also take special measures in particular designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized—

• (3:40 p.m.)

Parliament, therefore, will be invited to broaden the scope of the area development incentive program and to provide increased funds for it.

We know that under the ADA (Area Development Agency), not to be confused with ARDA, new industries coming into designated areas may benefit from a federal grant equivalent to one third of the cost of establishment. The region I am speaking of, being a pilot area as well as a designated area, can benefit from both these programs.

It is encouraging, Mr. Speaker, to note in the speech from the throne that the government will not only maintain its industrial assistance but that such aid will be increased in designated areas.

We hope that all this assistance will help bring new undertakings in our area.

Returning to the south Restigouche area and the projects to be undertaken in that area under the Fredericton agreement, the authorities must, I believe, seriously consider the development of blueberry fields in the Kedgwick area.

Similar projects have been drawn up in the lake St. John district. Blueberry growing, I think, could also be profitable in the Kedgwick area. Such a program should provide for the preparation of soil, the construction of a cold storage, the organization of producers and the search for markets.

Some years ago, blueberry crops were quite profitable in that district. I do not see why the new operations made on a scientific basis and on a large scale could not be still more successful.

Mr. Speaker, the speech of the throne also stresses that, in the past, governments and individuals built cities, canals, roads and other works, sometimes without considering aesthetics and beauty.

One of the most picturesque corners of this country—and I believe that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) who spoke before me should add it to the list he proposes to all Canadians to celebrate this centennial year—is the valley of the Restigouche and its tributaries. But we cannot say that this wonderful land has been defaced by too many extensive works. On the contrary, visitors can still enjoy a natural, peaceful landscape and there are tremendous tourist possibilities.

A tourist project called Miscou Trail or Acadian Trail was prepared for the pilot area, by Mr. Raoul Landriault, of Ottawa. It provides for the construction of a tourist and historic route along the south shore of the Restigouche river and the coast of Caraquet. That study provides for the development of parks and hotels scattered along the route. Along the way, as those who visited it, well know, the summer beaches are splendid. There are plenty of hills, mountains and snow for a long skiing season. For the enthusiasts, there is salmon fishing in the summer and deer hunting during the hunting season.

To the Acadian Trail project can be related the park developments in Eel River and Campbellton as proposed by the local committees of the CRAN and NRDC.

I, therefore, strongly suggest to the proper authorities to take advantage of those extraordinary opportunities which are offered to us through the federal-provincial agreement in order to carry out those projects and others.

However, I fully realize that to carry out successfully the planning and development of a pilot area, a great number of studies, preliminary surveys and several millions of dollars are necessary. Since such an amount could be spent only once therefore the first test must be a success because there would not likely be another chance. Furthermore, the future of other pilot areas established elsewhere in the country depends upon the satisfactory result of that initiative. We must not forget in particular that for the remedy to be effective, it must really go to the root of the problem, which is the great weakness of our educational services. People must be prepared to assume positions of responsibility. They must fully participate in the economic recovery of the area.

The Fredericton agreement clearly states that if firm measures are not taken to quickly improve the education and the professional training of the workers, the people of this pilot area will not profit by the new positions that will be offered and will hardly enjoy a better future.

Thus, the agreement provides for, and the province has already started, a widespread amalgamation of schools and school districts and the improvement of teachers' training. A huge program will be undertaken in the field of educational television through the most modern methods.

The federal Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) will provide financial assistance to vocational training for a period of ten years. Furthermore, the prime minister of New Brunswick has already announced that a technical school will be built in the area.

The scheme provides also for a better use of lands, the purchase and reforestation of non-productive farms, the development of fertile farms and the opportunity for rural population to move closer to areas that offer better employment opportunities.

This is then, Mr. Speaker, a scheme both complete and complex, a scheme that will require the mobilization of a great number of experts and specialists and especially the enlistment of all the people's interest, support and dynamism.

It means all-out war against poverty, war where escalation is not only allowed but desirable. Such general mobilization cannot be accomplished overnight. However, if the people are to be patient, it is normal that the government be required to show diligence.

I am told that the three federal deputy ministers who are to be members of the special steering committee provided for in the agreement have already been appointed. The federal and the provincial directors will be appointed shortly. I must emphasize the importance of choosing competent and dynamic directors who know the area well. These two directors will become the real leaders of the program. Finally, the greater part of the burden, the initiative and the achievement will rest on their shoulders.

All the people concerned in that area will be pleased to learn that the services of the internationally known Canadian company Kates, Peat and Marwick, of Montreal, have been retained for programming the undertaking.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I must repeat that this special development program brings hope to the people of that pilot area. It will give our people an outstanding opportunity to increase their income, get caught up in their education, improve their living conditions and share fully in the affluence of our country. Moreover, the awakening of that wealth which now lies dormant will enrich the whole nation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are some things in the speech from the throne that I like. I realize that that is a form of heresy when it is uttered by a member on the opposition side of the house, but I should like to assure you that I will recant the heresy before I sit down. However, may I take a moment or two to underline my suggestion that there are things in this session's speech from the throne that are welcome.

[Mr. Dubé.]

I like its tendency to look to the future and to be concerned about some of the tremendous problems that will face this country and mankind in the decades and in the century that are ahead of us. I like the reference to our needing to be concerned with our Canadian quality of life. I like the concern about our cities, on which the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) expanded in his speech today. I like the suggestion that the time will come when we must do something to remedy the pollution of our air and water. I am impressed with the suggestion that we harness the miracle of modern science to make a better life for the people of Canada and for those around the world. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister expand on the idea of a guaranteed annual income for all our people. It was significant that he said the other day that the time might well come when every family—indeed, every person —would have a guaranteed annual income. In other words, we may come to the point where we divorce the right to live, the right to an income, the right to enjoy the things our society can produce, from work as we have known it over the centuries.

These ideas are good, but the events they envisage will face us so quickly that we ought not to regard them as occurring in the year 2000 or 2067. We are living in times of explosive, catastrophic change, and unless we act decisively we may find, instead of enjoying a golden age, that we will be living in some kind of computerized brave new world which has no concern for the individuals in it.

I welcome the foreward-looking note that is in the speech from the throne but I wish to recant from the heresy of an opposition member finding good in the government's speech from the throne by stating two serious qualifications.

First, there was more truth than jest in the Prime Minister's reference the other day to his tendency to want to look into things. He referred to this tendency as though we ought to praise him for it. Yes, it is good to look into things, but it is not good enough for a government to do only that, and the trouble with this government is that that is all it does. Problems are crowding in on us and we must act now. It is good to look into the future, but the time to do something about that future, if we are to secure it for ourselves, our children and our grandchildren, is now. On this score, this government cannot be trusted.

The other qualification I wish to make is that fine as it is to be concerned with the world of the year 2000 or later, surely we ought not to forget the needs of our people today, the needs that face us in this country and in the world at the present time. I want to refer to a few subjects concerning which there ought to be action now to benefit those poeple who are with us here and now.

May I first refer to a request made this morning by the Leader of the Opposition and supported by my leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlan (Mr. Douglas), that there be presented to parliament with the least possible delay a motion to enable this house to speak to the world about the tragic international situation facing us at this very moment. The words of U Thant cannot be lightly brushed aside or regarded as academic utterances only. The world's top civil servant is telling us that, as he sees it, we are in danger of drifting into world war III. The request made today that this parliament be given a chance to speak out on this issue ought to be granted.

The Prime Minister's reply was that as we are debating the address in reply to the speech from the throne members can speak about this issue to their heart's content. Yes, every member who rises can say something about this issue and may refer to his concern with the deteriorating international situation. But I think—and here I am endorsing what was said by the Leader of the Opposition and by my own leader—that it would be far more effective for parliament to speak by passing a motion, declaring our opposition to the continuing hostilities in Viet Nam, declaring our wishes about the whole situation in that part of the world. The motion need not be debated, or we could settle for a short debate on it. I call on the Prime Minister to give further thought to this matter over the week end. I suggest to him that he call into his office the Leader of the Opposition, my leader—the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), and the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson), to see if they cannot agree on the terms of a straightforward resolution that could be presented to this house so that this house may express itself in that more formal and more direct way. That could be done without much debate, or at most one speaker from each party might speak. I urge on the Prime Minister the proposition that a motion agreed on by the five party leaders and passed by the House of Commons would show more clearly to the world than any desultory debating during the eight days, we spend on the address in reply to the speech from the throne our concern, over this matter.

The future of this country, the future of civilization as we know it, may well depend on the quick resolution of the conflict in Viet Nam. We cannot let this go on for five or ten years because no one can predict what the result might be. I urge the Prime Minister to do something about this matter over the next two or three days.

The next subject I wish to raise, under the heading of wanting parliament to do something for our people who are with us here and now, relates to our senior citizens. During the last session of parliament we discussed pensions for days and weeks on end. I know that the members on the government side think that something wonderful was done when the legislation providing for an old age pension supplement was passed. I know they think that we who attacked the attaching of an income test to that supplement, to the top $30 of what is now the $105 pension, were just indulging in carping criticism. But, Mr. Speaker, many thousands of Canadians now realize how right we were in protesting that income test, that means test as they are calling it. Indeed many thousands of Canadians are already finding out how bitter is the experience to have to report their income and, as a result, in thousands of cases to have the amount of the supplement they get cut down. The dignity our older people were given when we removed the means test 16 or 17 years ago is already being chiselled away by the way in which this income supplement is being administered by the government.

In addition to the fact that there are thousands of people who in the ordinary way are feeling the indignity of this test, there are some particular cases. I refer first of all to those who are on both war veterans allowance and the old age security pension. The stories we get from these people are tragic and pitiful. In case after case a person is told by the old age security people that the fault lies with the war veterans allowance, but is told by the war veterans allowance people that the fault lies with the old age security administration. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) was so determined to tell us that things like war veterans allowance would not affect his income supplement that people got the wrong impression, but they are now learning in the fine print from the war veterans allowance people that although they can get the old age pension supplement despite war veterans allowance, they lose part of their war veterans allowance, or all of it, if they get the old age security supplement.

The same sort of conflict is taking place between the federal and provincial authorities. Each one is blaming the other and I suggest this is a far cry from the principle of dignity in old age which parliament established when it decreed that the old age pension in its entirety should be free of a means test of any kind. This could have been avoided in the last session if the government had agreed to make the $105 a month payable to all pensioners as a matter of right, without any means test, and I think this is something we still must do. As a matter of fact the matter can be solved quite readily if the government would agree to a resolution standing in my name which is now on the order paper. It is No. 19 and it reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the Old Age Security Act to provide for the full amount of the income supplement provided thereunder to be incorporated into the basic pension, and for the eligible age to be lowered immediately to 65, so that all persons in Canada 65 years of age or over who meet the residence requirements will receive the full pension of $105 per month without any income test, the full amount of the old age security pension thus being recognized as a matter of right.

While I am dealing with pensions, Mr. Speaker, and again thinking in terms of the needs of people who are with us here and now, I urge the government to act immediately on the report that was made on the last day of the last session by the joint committee on the public service of Canada, calling for increases in the pensions of retired civil servants. It has taken a long while to get this recommendation placed before parliament and the government. I hope the government will act on it immediately.

There are other groups that should receive similar consideration. I think for example of retired pensioners of the C.N.R. whose position is very similar to that of retired civil servants, and I hope when we get action for the one group we will get action for the other as well.

I am glad to see at long last that there is a reference in the speech from the throne to unemployment insurance amendments. I hope we will not have to wait very long for them. In particular I insist that the rates of benefit provided under that legislation, which have not been changed for the last eight or nine years, should be increased without further delay, and so should the ceiling on the amounts under which people can pay into the unemployment insurance fund.

Medicare is again something members may feel we are through talking about, because it was finally passed during the last session, but it is still a fact that for all the talk about the great century that is ahead of us, the tendency of this government is to put things off. July 1, 1968 may not seem so far away now, some 13 or 14 months, but I insist that is too long to ask our people to wait for the implementation of medicare. I insist that the reasons that prompted the government to delay implementation from July 1, 1967, to July 1, 1968, do not stand, and that the government should use the provision that was written into the act to bring that legislation into effect at an earlier date. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, what are we to take from offers to write such provisions into measures that we are debating? What is the point of such amendments if no use is made of them?

In the same vein I would like to refer to something that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) asked about on orders of the day this morning, and which I had intended to raise. When we were debating the medical care legislation, we had before us at great length the question of including optometry and other paramedical services under the provisions of that legislation. After a while we got an amendment, and the amendment says clearly that certain other services can be added if an agreement is made between a province and the federal government. When asked about it in the course of the debate, the minister made it clear that this was in the same category as the legislation generally, that there was no need for all or for a majority of the provinces to agree, that just as the legislation itself as a whole could come into effect in one province if only one province agreed to it, so these additional services could be added by an agreement between any one province and the federal government.

That is in the act. It is in the statement that the minister made when we were debating it; but now when it becomes an issue, when some of the provinces have appealed to the federal government to make agreements, the minister says we must wait until there is a consensus of the provinces. That is an interesting word. It was not defined by the minister as to whether it means two or three, the majority, or all of the provinces. But I submit it casts a very bad light back on the kind of thing done in the debate on medicare when in two cases we got amendments which the government is now apparently prepared to do nothing about.

In the one case there was an amendment to make it possible to bring the date forward. We have had no action on that. In the other case there was an amendment to make it possible to bring in paramedical services even if only one province requested them. Now the government says there must be a consensus. I understand that a number of the provinces, three or perhaps four, have already requested that certain branches of optometry and perhaps other services be included in the provisions of the Medical Care Act, and I urge that the government realize that these are things that ought to be done because our people need them. They also ought to be done to demonstrate the good faith in which we assumed the government was acting when it agreed to these amendments during debate on the legislation last year.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, these things, the problems of old age pensioners and war veterans allowance recipients, of superannuated civil servants, of retired C.N.R. pensioners, and of people needing medicare, are with us here and now. Many are the problems of old people who helped bring Canada through to the conclusion of its first century. While it is fine to be talking about the future, about the next few decades, about the glorious era of 2067, the responsibility of this parliament is not only to do some thinking and some planning now to cope with the problems of the future, but it is also its responsibility to meet the needs of the people who are with us here and now, and I call for action on the part of the government right now on the questions of a social nature about which I have spoken.

I return to the first plea I made, namely, that over this week end the Prime Minister consider favourably the suggestion that he call together the leaders of the various parties of this house with a view to reaching agreement so that by passing a motion early next week this parliament can speak to the world with a clear voice in expressing our concern that there be an end to the war in Viet Nam, that there be sanity in international affairs, so that there might be a world for our children and those who come after them.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, to start with, my first words will be directed to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo and Nicolet-Yamaska (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté).

Those two hon. members did not only present works of art but their speeches were also quite interesting and carefully prepared. They are experts in their respective fields, the mover in the media of communication and the seconder in the field of agriculture. I think that the government should call more often on our experts in the House of Commons, so that our bills might be better prepared and better suited to the needs of the Canadian people. Therefore, they do deserve our sincere congratulations.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with several points, in the few minutes available to me during the debate on the address. I do not intend to deal with them according to their relative importance, because all these problems are in my mind of the utmost importance, whatever they may be.

Nevertheless, I think that today in Geneva the representatives of the various countries are gathered to deal with the customs tariff under GATT. This is what is called the Kennedy Round. Well, I think this is a most important day for world trade and the discussions now taking place are crucial for the outcome of this meeting.

I hope that every member of this house wishes that this meeting should succeed. The time allowed for completion of the discussions will expire in the near future, unless those believe that this is one of the greatest means to raise the standard of living of mankind. concerned agree to go on.

I am a firm believer in free trade, in unfettered commerce throughout the world, and I I know that our trade minister (Mr. Winters) is in Geneva, and that his experience will serve the cause and help enlighten those who are slow to understand that these talks must achieve some results.

Many questions were touched upon in the speech from the throne Mr. Speaker. It is claimed that it lacks the depth of the preceding one. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, it may be felt that the government after accomplishing so much and after having parliament pass a very considerable number of measures that the government in this centennial year has decided to give priority to more human problems.

Constitutional reforms are required and I am surely not the only one to think so. Unemployment insurance should be amended and this project has been shelved for years. I am taking in several items, but I believe that the war in Viet Nam and the steps to be taken to bring it to an end, as well as world peace, are surely among the greatest concerns of the government. They are, by the way mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Customs tariff amendments will undoubtedly follow the Kennedy round. Then, space communications and control of water and air pollution will be dealt with; I consider this one of the most important points of the speech from the throne. I hope the government will act immediately on it. I see that the minister who is responsible for the consideration of this problem is in the house. And, finally, assistance to Canadian consumers will be dealt with.

I do not intend to list all those problems, Mr. Speaker. There is capital punishment also. I had an opportunity to refer to this at other times. I made my views known on this problem, and I do not hesitate to say that, in the last session, I voted for the retention of capital punishment. I regret to a certain extent that the government has decided to settle that matter by leaving us free to defeat or pass not a bill but a private member's bill. I, therefore, have doubts about the result of that free vote.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that problem is secondary to the rehabilitation of the inmates. The problem of capital punishment affects only—I say only and I think that I will be criticized by some people for saying it because no one is above criticism, Mr. Speaker—those who have been found guilty of first degree murder after having gone through all the stages before our courts of law up to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Speaker, I leave it to the government to decide whether or not capital punishment should be abolished. Personally, I do not intend to change my mind about it unless the government—and I think it must do it—introduces a detailed plan for the rehabilitation of the inmates in our penitentiaries.

It is much more important to look after the living than the dead. Even if we abolish capital punishment, even if we vote for life imprisonment, I still consider them as dead. Therefore, what is important is the rehabilitation of the inmates in our penitentiaries.

And among the important subjects which deal with rehabilitation, there is the suppression of the criminal record. I have had the opportunity to discuss that matter before a committee, during the last session. In my opinion, it could happen two years after the sentence has been served but no more than five years in order to give the prisoner a chance to take advantage of that measure, to make a new start in life and, in particular, to give him the hope that a new life is possible.

I know that the Canadian association of chiefs of police is not in favour of that measure, however their concerns is not rehabilitation but rather the custody of the prisoners.

I think that a planned educational program is necessary in our penitentiaries, so that the prisoners may improve their education and, if possible, obtain degrees or certificates, and become eligible to try the civil service examinations.

I do not see what organization is in a better position to help prisoners than the government. Private enterprise is surely not to be called upon to deal with that problem if the government fails to do so.

Positions in the civil service, in the public service, whether federal, provincial or municipal, should be made readily available to these people in order to encourage them to start afresh. I am not suggesting that this be done without appropriate measures being taken, for instance, through the establishment of a supervisory board, but I think that some hope should be given to prisoners. I feel it is the only way to rehabilitate that class of people or at least part of them, because, first of all, they represent an essential source of manpower for our country and, secondly, it is very costly for the government to keep those people in institutions and to maintain their families who suffer hardship. There is no doubt that I will have the opportunity to return to this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would be advisable to make intensive research in order to come to a realistic and efficient division of jurisdictions between the central and the provincial governments. I know the federal government and the members of the house are concerned with this matter.

In my opinion, it would be advisable to explore seriously the possibility of establishing a Canadian common market for the purpose of trade planning. Since the provinces are competing for business at the present time, this does not help our trade and our exports. Therefore, we should promote the idea of a Canadian common market in order to plan our production and, consequently, help our export trade. This is a prerequisite if we want to maintain and improve our standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, there are essential parliamentary reforms and also administrative reforms which are imperative for the proper operation of our administrative system. It may be advisable to set up a board of directors for federal-provincial affairs. If we want the Canadian administration to improve and answer the present requirements of our modern world, we must plan our governmental administration and organization.

It may be advisable to set up a board of directors for federal-provincial affairs, with a permanent seat in Ottawa, where each province would be represented, to review regularly all the problems which are or could be debatable, with respect to joint jurisdiction. I think that it would then be advisable to create a department of federal-provincial affairs.

Mr. Speaker, as for the field of constitutional reforms, I think that it would be more than ever expedient to appoint a court to settle those constitutional problems which can crop up between the central government and the provinces or among the provinces themselves. This court could sit ad hoc, if necessary, to hear the constitutional issues and could be made up of, let us say, 13 judges, or rather 11 judges for the 11 provinces, plus four judges of the Supreme Court and that would make a total number of 15 judges. Then, it would not be necessary to appoint new judges, there would simply be a court made up of four judges of the Supreme Court. Why four? There could be five. Anyhow, we must come to a certain number, a certain balance, and the chief justice or his deputy in each province.

This court, which would automatically include the chief justice of the Supreme Court, or his deputy as chairman, as well as three other judges, and the chief justice or his deputy in each province, could then be called upon to settle constitutional problems or disputes between the central government and the provinces, or between the provinces themselves. Any matter referred to it would be heard forthwith, and this is as it should be, and a report would be submitted to the various parties within a maximum period of three months or rather six months.

I do not think we should wait till a magic solution has been found before we amend the constitution, or till an agreement has been reached before we draw up a new constitution. It matters little what doctrine certain people preach. I do not believe we should wait till then to set up a court to solve the problems or disputes between the central and the provincial governments, or between the provinces.

With regard to parliamentary reforms, Mr. Speaker, discussions could be very lengthy. The matter interests me highly. If we do not reform our parliamentary institution, I fail to see how we can find solutions in the administration of our country. To my mind, the matter at hand is one of self-determination, of self-discipline. I cannot see why the house should not be able to find the means, although perhaps not all of a sudden, to improve our parliamentary system, and more particularly the standing orders.

I should like to raise a very specific problem here, namely that of French debates reporting. I think, sir, that the existing system is not adequate.

French language reporters—I would like to be corrected if I am mistaken—take shorthand notes of the debates at the same time as proceedings are recorded on a sound-tape system. After that, typists copy directly from those tapes and, unlike what some people think, including members of this house, it is the tape recordings that are used for transcribing speeches, not the shorthand notes.

Then, those copies go to the press gallery before the editors have had an opportunity to correct them, while it seems that a different system exists for English language reporters. The English reporters take the speeches down in shorthand, transcribe their notes and, of course, the work which is done by those reporters is more complete than the transcription from the tape because the reporter takes all the words down at the same time. When the newspapermen get the speeches made in English, these have been edited, and corrected by the reporters, whereas the speeches made by the French-speaking members are sent to them before they have been read and corrected by the French-speaking reporters or editors.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, that the typists are not miracle workers and that most of the time we get a lot of nonsense and gems which are not of the best quality. I congratulate the members of the press gallery for not using them more often.

In my opinion, nothing prevents the house from taking the required steps so that the blues of the speeches, either in French or in English, be revised by the official reporters before being sent out, wherever it may be.

Even if it is considered difficult to find the required staff so as to obtain the same results and treat everybody equally, as regards either the French or the English official report, I feel that a solution must be found.

Every member should get the copy of his speech, what is commonly called the blues, and take the responsibility of making his own corrections. French-speaking members no longer get the blues, or at least I think that only ministers, former ministers and parliamentary secretaries get a copy of their speeches.

Let every member receive his "blues", the copy of his speech, let him make the necessary corrections and take full responsibility for his speech. After all, it is not literature but spoken words. It is only a transcript of the proceedings, and if hon. members do not correct their speeches, the latter will appear in Hansard next day as they were taken down, with mistakes, naturally, and will be corrected only in the next seven or eight days, as our stenographers or rather the proofreaders or editors are doing now.

The same should apply to committee proceedings, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members never receive the copy or blues of their speeches or interventions. The whole thing is sent directly to the room where the debates are transcribed and from there to some editing committee, I do not know where. Finally, hon. members never see their speeches until they are printed and distributed.

I think the same system should be used, all the more so since committee proceedings are seldom printed before two or three weeks after the committee sittings. So, the day after such sittings, or the second day after, copies should be sent to hon. members who should take the responsibility of correcting their own copy and returning it in within one week. In this way, hon. members would have the satisfaction of correcting their own text, or they could have it edited by someone if they wished to hire someone, or by their secretary.

But what currently happens is that some texts of speeches given in French in the house which find their way to members of the press gallery—whom as I said, I thank for not using them more often—are not quite the same as what was uttered in the house. Of necessity, the tapes and the voices overlap often and completely change certain words. I will not give any examples here, but there are nevertheless words which can stangely change the meaning of a sentence if a P is used instead of S, M instead of R.

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I would like to talk about Expo. As a member for a riding in the island of Montreal, I am proud of that joint achievement of the federal government, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal. I want to thank sincerely all members of the House of Commons and all Canadians who contributed to the completion of this project which will certainly become a wonderful instrument of culture and better understanding between all citizens in Canada and the whole world. This is a unique opportunity for Montrealers and, in a lesser degree, for their neighbours to broaden their cultural and general knowledge. That is why I should like to offer my sincere thanks to the members of this house and to all Canadians for having helped with this wonderful achievement.

I particularly wish to thank those who are responsible for this monumental undertaking. The house will perhaps allow me to mention a few: Commissioner Dupuy, His Excellency the Ambassador and his team, and Mayor Jean Drapeau and his team. They did wonders, one could almost say miracles, and the result is here for all to see.

Now it is time to think beyond Expo. I think that with the co-operation of the central government and the provinces, it will be possible to create an international cultural centre in Montreal, a free port. This is essential to the development of the country. Moreover, I think we will have helped in making that fantastic undertaking, Expo, a real monument to the genius of man.

[English]

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to join with the two hon. members on the other side of the house who spoke yesterday about a former colleague of ours, a member of this house from my own province of Manitoba. I refer of course to Mrs. Konantz. I should like to say how deeply we regret her untimely passing. She was a person who gave freely of her many talents and abundant energy to a variety of organizations helping mankind. I should like to extend to her immediate family my deepest sympathy at her passing.

May I also, in the time honoured tradition, offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. I do not say this in a perfunctory manner because both of them have acquitted themselves in a fashion which does credit to them, to their constituencies and to their party. I feel confident that in the future we will hear them express their opinions on subjects on which they both appear to be experts.

On occasion we find that a speech from the throne will reveal everything. On other occasions the reverse is true, depending upon the type of manoeuvring the particular government in power has in mind. In my opinion this one revealed only one thing, namely that this government is still afflicted with fumbling indecision. It is trying to be everything to everybody and does not really know in what direction it should go. In a speech from the throne the government can either promise to do everything or not promise to do anything, and this one seemed to be constructed in such a fashion that the government could take either of these two alternatives and still say that it fulfilled its promises contained in the throne speech. As a matter of fact, it was so vague in that respect that one would be tempted to believe that it was the joint effort of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). I cannot help but think that there must have been some contribution made by both of these gentlemen in this particular throne speech.

If we can interpret correctly anything that has been said in the throne speech, we can take it that the government will bring in a measure of parliamentary reform. I do not want to tresspass on the ground that was covered so ably this morning by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), but I share with him the concern that this government, either deliberately or inadvertently, is placing this institution in a strait-jacket from which it will not be able to manoeuvre, where freedom of expression by members of this house will be lost and where the government will be able to do at will whatever it pleases, without being called to account for it.

One of the things which I believe have made this country unique in the eyes of the world has been the happy balance we have been able to maintain between freedom and respect for law and order. I think that to a large extent our institution of parliament has been the instrument through which this measure has been achieved. I am afraid that to disturb the role of parliament such as we know it here in Canada could either cause the loss of freedom of the people of this country or a loss of their respect for law and order.

I hope that this centennial year will give each of us an opportunity to assess our present and our past. I hope it does not degenerate into a splurge of emotional flag waving or vain boasting, because I do not think that this is what will make our country great. What has contributed so much to our prosperity has been the effort of every individual Canadian to make his own part of the country a better place in which to live. Collectively, then, we have built a better Canada. I should not like to see that kind of initiative, which has been developed through the years, taken away from our people so they will feel that the government, and the government alone, is the answer to all their problems. I share with my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the fear that this is the state into which we are being driven.

There are a number of measures mentioned in the throne speech upon which I should like to comment, particularly since they affect my own area of this country. Reference was made to the area development program. Although it is difficult to determine just what changes are intended, it is stated that parliament will be invited to broaden the scope of the area development incentive program and to provide increased funds for it. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that not only will they broaden the scope of this program but that they will change some of the criteria used to enable areas of this country to qualify under the program.

I happen to represent an area that is largely within the Winnipeg National Employment Service district. The city of Winnipeg has not suffered from the unemployment problem which has afflicted other areas of this country and, on an average, has had a relatively high level of employment. This situation, however, does not hold true in the rural areas surrounding that city. When the people in the area I have referred to find themselves lumped in with the city of Winnipeg for the purpose of qualifying under the area development program, I think they are justified in complaining and feeling discriminated against.

In the areas of Altona, Steinbach and Morris, considerable effort has been made by community development corporations to induce industry to settle in those areas. They have met with some success. A great deal of attention was given to the problems of the urban areas and they were very eloquently and ably presented by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) earlier today. I share his concern with the problems of the urban areas. However, it seems to me that with all the difficulties that they face such as transportation, providing housing, providing the services that are necessary in order to accommodate the ever increasing urban population, it would be far better to attempt to remove some of the industries into the smaller rural areas where there is a labour force and where there are facilities that will accommodate the development of industry. In the Pembina valley they find that, as a result of the application of this area development program, they are competing unequally, first of all with the city of Winnipeg and, second, with the other areas of the province of Manitoba that have been included in the area development program. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is grossly unfair to the people of these areas and adds impetus to the exodus of the young men and women in these areas.

It seems to me that the criteria used for the establishment of an area should be based not so much on the unemployment insurance figures as on the income figures. Some attention should be paid to the suitability of the area for industry and the availability of water, communications, power and so on. Last, but perhaps not least, it seems there is an ever growing tendency in this country to locate our urban areas on the best soil in Canada. This is being done at a time when everybody is talking about the need for expanding the production of food. It seems to be the height of foolishness to place concrete on the best land we have in this country. Here is the situation in which we find ourselves. The government is providing incentives to increase urban development on the one hand, and on the other hand is talking about the need for expanding food production. They talk about rural development and about diversifying industry, yet the incentives are provided in the wrong direction. I hope when this matter comes up for review by the government, and when it is brought before this house, steps will be taken to ensure there is no discrimination against some of the rural areas of Canada that are endeavouring to pull themselves up by their own bootstraps. I hope, too, no further barriers will be placed in the way of the development of the rural areas.

I should like now to deal briefly with the question of agriculture. I noticed also in the throne speech that there was a reference to providing credit to agriculture and co-operative societies. I welcome this measure since on numerous occasions, I have drawn the attention of the minister to the need for such a program. I am happy to see it included in the speech from the throne this session. I hope they will proceed with the program without delay. The hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) seemed to be quite happy with the measures suggested in the speech from the throne so far as they applied to agriculture. He made some reference to some measures that have already been adopted by the government in order to deal with farm problems. I should like to believe, myself, that farm problems do not exist, but reality forces me to the obvious conclusion that such is not the case. Certainly, the buyers' strike we find out west is not an indication of happiness on the part of the farmers there. Certainly, the march that is going to take place on Ottawa by the dairy farmers would not lead one to believe there is complete happiness amongst that group. The housewives of this country have formed protest groups against the rising cost of living. These and other signs certainly seem to indicate to me that the government has plenty to worry about so far as agriculture is concerned.

On several occasions the minister has made trips out to western Canada, and on each of these occasions he has bravely tilted at windmills. First it was the railways that caught it, then the banks, and on the third occasion he was out there he railed away at the big business interests. But when he comes back to Ottawa, Mr. Speaker, he is all meek and mild. I want to tell the minister that he is fooling nobody, certainly not the farmers in this country. He had better not consider them rustics who like to hear pious platitudes. The farmers want action, they demand action, and action they will get.

What does the speech from the throne contain in the way of remedies for the agricultural situation? One reference: The government is going to appoint a task force—as if it was necessary, Mr. Speaker, to appoint a group of people to study the problem further. We know what the problem is; what is required is the application of policies which will remedy the situation.

It is not simply a question of appointing bodies to administer subsidies; that is a deadly palliative that will have no effect at all in relieving the situation. There is a whole range of policies that need to be applied if this government is to come to grips with the problems of agriculture. It involves such things as marketing boards, where these are desired by the producers. It requires more leadership under the ARDA program. It requires an expanded farm credit program. Almost every session we seem to be amending the Farm Credit Corporation Act, and still never quite catch up to the technology that is advancing upon us. It requires some basic changes in transportation policy. With the ever increasing volume of farm products moving to markets, and particularly into export markets, we cannot hope to move these products in the time required unless some very fundamental changes are made in our transportation policy.

A more extensive application of crop insurance across the country is also a requirement. Up till now most of the provinces have toyed around with this, with the exception of my own province of Manitoba where it is available on the basic crops to farmers in the province. More marketing research is also required, processing products so that they can be more readily moved into export markets. We also require some enlightened trade policies. As I said, Mr. Speaker, the appointment of boards to administer subsidies just is not enough. Because what is being done is simply to place the farmers in the pockets of the administrators.

Some time ago the then minister of trade and commerce, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), during the time sugar prices rose sky high, bravely announced in the house that he was going to seek commodity agreements with some of the world sugar producers, so that the producers of sugar in those countries would receive a half decent price for their efforts. What has happened to that brave promise, Mr. Speaker? We have not heard one single word from the minister since that time and today our sugar beet industry, particularly in southwestern Ontario, is on the verge of elimination.

Increasing the subsidies which are provided under the Agricultural Stabilization Act is not going to resolve the problem. What are required are more fundamental and basic solutions. It seems to me that this government is either unwilling to come to grips or is incapable of coming to grips with these problems.

Apart from the appointment of such bodies as a feed grain marketing agency in eastern Canada, a dairy commission in Ottawa and a few other boards that administer subsidies, this government has not introduced any policy at all to deal with the deep-rooted and basic problems in agriculture. My suggestion to them is that, rather than appointing task forces, the implementation of policies would be a far better way of dealing with our agriculture problems.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to compliment the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Theirs were inspiring addresses and I am sure we have all benefited from them.

I want to concentrate this afternoon on only one aspect of the speech from the throne, which is the government's program for the coming session, and that is the broad area of transportation. More particularly, I should like to talk about urban development. I should like to talk about urban development in much the same light as other speakers in previous years have talked about rural development.

I think that the national government, the federal government, the government here in Ottawa, must take an interest not only in the lives and manner of living of the people in our rural communities across Canada, the population of many of which is declining, but also must take an increasing interest in the problems facing those who in greater and greater numbers are coming to live in our larger cities and towns.

The speech from the throne was a rather lengthy document. It contained flights of oratory, as well it might in our 100th year. It also contained a number of passages which were crammed with the lists and brief descriptions of pieces of legislation which will be dealt with by this house in the coming months. I am particularly concerned about the studies which the federal government proposes to undertake, in co-operation with the provinces, in respect to urban development. I believe that within this lengthy list of items of legislation we must establish certain priorities. Close to the top of the list I would put the problems faced by the developers of our large metropolitan areas, particularly the manner in which the development of future areas is planned and how it is to be paid for, so that we may have the best possible communities for the future.

In a vast country such as Canada, a country of great distances, with a limited population, we must put the accent on mobility and flexibility. Increasingly the emphasis is being placed on greater opportunities for individuals, and this is as it should be. We should observe the underlying, statistical trends which have been traced by the Economic Council and other learned bodies, societies and government agencies in this country. We must learn as much as we can about these trends, and endeavour to correct them as best we may.

The trend I first wish to describe is that which has gone on for half a century, away from the primary industries of this country—away from agriculture, fishing, forestry, the outlying areas, individual farms and woodlots, into cities and even into vast megalopolises, those clusters of big cities joining up one with the other.

There is a trend toward ever widening markets, toward more highly skilled jobs and greater specialization. This is coupled with the need to upgrade one's skills, to move from one occupation to another, perhaps several times during an individual's lifetime, or to move from one community to another, so as to improve the lot of individual Canadians.

In identifying the extent of the trend from the country to the city, or from the primary industries into other industries which exist in our big cities and towns, we see that at the turn of the century 50 per cent of the Canadian population was employed on farms, in fisheries, or in forestry, in the elementary sense of that word. By 1950 that figure had dropped from 50 per cent to 15 per cent. I am told that at present about 7 per cent of our labour force could efficiently produce all the food and primary forest products that Canada generates. The forecasts are that by the mid 1980's only about 5 per cent of Canada's population will work in the primary industries. In other words, during this century, terminating in the year 2000, we shall have moved from a situation where half our population lived in rural areas of the country to less than 5 per cent there.

Many who move into our big cities find work in factories. Others to an even greater extent move into our service industries, which become essential as our standard of life rises. Most are moving into a few large cities. Recently I read a report showing the extent of this trend. I learned, surprisingly enough, that during the last five years only the Montreal area in Quebec had increased in population. The rest of the province had remained static in population terms. I also read that in southern Ontario young people are moving in great numbers from rural communities, from small and medium sized towns, to large cities. Only in large cities is the population in the 20 to 30 year old bracket increasing rapidly, and this is an indication of things to come, which further underlines the trend to the big cities of the future.

I contend that if we devote a great deal of energy, time and money to rehabilitating our outlying areas where a declining number of Canadians earn their living, we ought also to devote more effort to improving the lot of those living in our major metropolitan areas. In the minds of some people the federal government has taken over too many matters of provincial jurisdiction. True, ARDA, which has been on the statute books since 1961, has been improved and modified. But it has brought to our rural problems the expertise of various departments of government—departments such as agriculture, forestry, fisheries, transportation, industry, public works, manpower and immigration, and finance—and that expertise has been brought to bear on areas of declining employment and chronically low income. Those departments, with their task forces working in concert, with provincial departments, are doing excellent work in telling people locally in rural areas what the opportunities are, where employment exists, and where they may obtain higher incomes for themselves and their children.

In the main this has meant to many people in rural areas a continuing improvement in their standard of living. We need a similar, comprehensive approach to our urban areas. Latterly we have created a department of rural affairs which is responsible for ARDA. We need a similar federal department to concentrate its attention on the majority of the Canadian population, those living in our fast growing, vital metropolitan areas. We need a department of urban development.

We have our Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act; we need an urban development act—not an urban redevelopment or an urban renewal act. We do not want to repeat our mistakes of the past: We wish to improve the lot of our people in the future.

We face here an opportunity to co-ordinate the work of some federal government departments. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is involved with urban renewal in the old fashioned sense, and the Department of Transport must be interested in national policies governing railways, pipe lines, air lines and the trans-Canada highway. We ought to make certain that long distance modes of transport are knit effectively with local modes so that our transportation system may be efficient and serve those who wish to travel from one province to another, or internationally. We need an over-all approach to problems of metropolitan development.

Metropolitan planners, though often frustrated by difficulties of communicating with the provincial and federal governments, have endeavoured to adopt this approach.

We also need a cost sharing formula, or series of formulae, which will enable the different levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal, to share the cost of co-ordinated development. I suggest that we should take a similar approach, or at least a leaf out of the book of those who have been responsible for developing our rural development legislation.

I think the federal government might well bear 100 per cent of the cost of the initial over-all economic, and perhaps even engineering studies of broad metropolitan development, and that as we proceed from initial planning to the final construction phase, the federal contribution might decline. It might decline, say, to the order of 50 per cent. So I can imagine legislation which would see the federal government contributing to the cost of a freeway through the city of Toronto, for example, to the extent of 50 per cent, with the province and the municipality putting up the other 50 per cent perhaps on the basis of 25 per cent each. However, these ratios, this cost sharing formula, or series of formulae would evolve. They would be worked out and perhaps might vary, depending upon the city, the problems facing that particular metropolitan area, the local municipal-provincial relationship, and so on. We have many examples in this country of the need for over-all planning, for an over-all approach to the transportation difficulties faced by people living in our large metropolitan areas. The city of Ottawa is a good example. Ottawa of course is our national capital. Many prominent visitors arrive in it by air. They arrive at an excellent, up to date international airport, but their passage between that airport and the centre of the city is beset by all manner of difficulties. Clearly no one authority has been responsible for ensuring that an adequate, appropriate twentieth century avenue of approach be designed for servicing Ottawa.

In a few years people will be able to travel across entire continents in a few hours. But it will take them the best part of an hour to reach the centre of the city, bumping along, being jolted over roads which do not compare favourably even with some of the back roads in outlying parts of the country. Obviously this is not desirable. The problem lies essentially in poor communications, and in a lack of co-operation between our several different levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal in this country.

I contend that in the last analysis the responsibility must lie with the federal government because I would imagine that more than 50 per cent of those who are travelling from the Ottawa airport to the downtown part of the city are people who originate their trips entirely outside the province of Ontario. Certainly they have come great distances. They are interprovincial travellers, perhaps even international travellers, and I think we can do better.

We have a similar problem in the city of Vancouver today. The new international airport there located on an island is being developed on an appropriate scale. The construction of the new airport is being carried out by the federal Department of Transport. A beautiful new two-lane highway leads from that nearly completed building to the north arm of the Fraser river and there it stops, and there it will be stopped for a period of several years because it has not been decided what formula will be used, or indeed if there will be any co-operation whatsoever among the federal government, the provincial government of British Columbia and the city of Vancouver.

We need a tunnel under the north arm of the Fraser river to bring the traffic from the airport to downtown Vancouver in a matter of 15 to 20 minutes. As it is, traffic goes over a narrow swing bridge which sometimes is opened for river traffic and may remain open for half an hour or more at a time. This is hardly good enough. Obviously this constitutes a vacuum. We have a lack not only of co-operation but of vision, a lack of over-all planning. We have a need for co-operation, and I believe we need to have greater initiative shown at the federal level in order to obviate problems of this kind.

These are only two specific examples. There are undoubtedly many other places served by excellent national modes of transportation, such as Air Canada, C.P.A., the C.N.R., pipe lines and so on which face similar problems. When the air line has delivered its passengers near the city, when the rail line has unloaded its passengers near the major metropolitan centre, the passengers are immediately confronted with difficult problems of transportation. The rest of their journey is difficult. But it need not be difficult. These inconveniences are time consuming, and time means money. This means inefficiency, it means we are less productive than we might be.

Having so few people and such great distances it is a shame that, with the benefits of modern technology which tend to reduce the penalty of distance, we are still living with a penalty of distance in Canada which is man made. It is a penalty of distance which is largely confined to our big metropolitan areas. It is within our ability to solve, but the initiative must rest in good part with the federal government to help tidy up the situation.

I suggest that basically the federal government take just as comprehensive an approach to the problems of urban development as it has taken to the problems of rural readjustment and development, that it take a comprehensive attitude, that it take a constructive attitude, that it be not too afraid of provincial and local jurisdictions, that it move into what is obviously a vacuum, and where the local jurisdictions are both willing and financially capable to assume their appropriate roles, they will certainly do so.

We do need at least at the federal level a body of expertise, a repository of information. We require not only research but a group of high level planners, if you like, who can be consulted by our local planners in order that, nationally we may do more efficiently what we would otherwise have to do separately and sporadically in various metropolitan areas across the country.

I now want to focus my observations more directly on the problem of transportation, particularly highway transportation in our cities. We will undoubtedly be building more throughways. We may also in the fullness of time be concerned with the redevelopment, that is the establishment of new modes of rapid transit in Canada. We shall have to pay for these new developments and they will be very expensive developments.

Anyone who has visited the city of Los Angeles, that great and sprawling megalopolis with a population roughly half of that of all of Canada, cannot help but be appalled by the vast acreage of pavement, of roads, streets and highways, which extend throughout the city. I am told that as much as 25 per cent of the total land area of the city of Los Angeles is paved over. We can learn from the experience of Los Angeles.

Recently I read an article attributed to two engineers, one of whom used to live in my riding in Vancouver. I see they are now both resident in Toronto. In the article, which appeared in the Globe and Mail on September 9, 1966, they are quoted as saying to the Good Roads Association of Canada that:

> Canadian urban areas are moving toward a density of 6,000 persons to the square mile.

They go on to say:

> A circle of ten miles radius at this density contains 1,800,000 persons; within a radius of 100 miles there would be 180 million persons.

This is the sort of megalopolis toward which we are moving. They go on to say:

> Irrespective of the size, it can be served well by a simple grid of high-standard transportation corridors at approximately three-mile spacing, containing immediately high-standard freeways, but with provision for future automatic ways and/or transit. In addition, there are urban arterials at one-mile spacing.

They go on to say that these transportation facilities require about 18 per cent of the land. In their view efficient transportation arrangements might reduce the figure of 25 per cent for Los Angeles to 18 per cent for Toronto. One can imagine the immense saving not only in land but also in money, time and materials if planning on this scale were commenced at a relatively early date in the history of our major cities.

They also say that the total capital investment for transportation facilities is about $500 per capita, assuming the land to have been purchased before development. They say that distributing this cost over 20 years gives $25 per capita per year, which is less than the current expenditure on urban roads and streets in Canada. In other words we can have a better system of transportation in our urban centres for the same number of dollars which we are spending today on what is a manifestly inefficient system.

Piecemeal additions to our transportation complex will not do. This is expensive, inefficient, frustrating and time consuming. With some foresight, co-operation, by comparing notes, and by using the best information available from other cities and other parts of the world, we can do better. We can have the best in the future for the same number of dollars which we are spending on urban transportation today.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Macaluso) who spoke on the subject of urban development and transportation today has given a good deal of thought to this subject. He has spoken on other occasions. At some length he has told us about the impact of the motor vehicle on the lives of the people, not only of Canada but throughout North America, and in the other more advanced parts of the world. He has told us how this has tended to decentralize construction, how it has affected land values and how it has led to the downgrading of the core areas of our large cities. He has also told us how, with a properly planned transportation system, we can not only speed up communication but make a better use of our land, improve the mobility of the people living in these areas and extend to them more opportunities for a better life in the future.

I should like to refer briefly not only to the expenditure side, but also to how we might well pay for these developments. I think that, in the main, the amendments to the National Transportation Act which were passed during the last session were well advised. One aspect of them with which I heartily concur is that the principal modes of transportation should be self-liquidating; that is, they should pay for themselves by revenue garnered from that form of transportation. This in itself should be enough to pay for the means of transportation. In other words, wherever possible we should pay as we go, rather than subsidize the development by placing a tax burden on other forms of economic activity.

So, continuing on in this vein, I think that on our new throughways, arterial roads, highways within cities, tunnels under harbours and so on, we should either charge tolls or levy other taxes on the users of these new facilities. I read with some interest a recent speech given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp). He said he was told that property taxes in Canada in relation to income are higher than they are in any other advanced country of the world.

We cannot load too much more on to property, nor should we tax unduly improvements to property. We should not discourage people who wish to improve their homes, factories, office buildings, and so on. We should levy the tax on those who use these transportation arteries. The type of tax I have in mind is the tax on gasoline. A tax on gasoline and diesel oil was referred to and indeed recommended in a recent report in Quebec.

I think we might look to the United States for a good working example of how to finance these transportation arteries. I am now referring to a good textbook on the subject of urban transportation entitled "Urban Transportation; The Federal Role". The author is a man by the name of Smerk, and it was published in 1965 by the Indiana University Press. In the United States there have been numerous pieces of legislation dealing with highway construction, road construction, urban renewal and, latterly, federal assistance for the development of highways and throughways within municipalities.

On page 131 I read that in the mid 1950's the United States embarked upon the construction of the national system of interstate and defence highways, under the terms of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956. An interesting feature of the act of 1956 was the establishment of the highway trust fund, marking the first time that a tax income from motor vehicles and highway expenditures had been linked. The aim is to make the highway program self-financing. A recent federal publication in the United States, as quoted in this publication, states:

> The federal aid highway program operates on a pay as you go basis and its cost is paid entirely by highway users. No revenues from general taxes, such as the income tax, are used to finance federal aid for highways. The federal tax on motor fuel and certain other highway-related taxes go into a highway trust fund which provides the money for the federal aid payments to the states.

The order of magnitude of these expenditures is very interesting. It is very considerable and runs into billions of dollars. These funds represented nearly 50 per cent of the $7 billion invested in the construction of roads and streets by all levels of government in the United States in 1961. These figures are even higher today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in my first words to this crowded, hushed and expectant chamber I should like to congratulate the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) upon his most impressive and interesting address. As one representative from the province where confederation all began 103 years ago, I should like to say that we welcome his province, the latest province to join confederation. I hope it will not be the last. I hope that in the future there will be other provinces and that they too will be islands. I wish also to congratulate the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) and say to him that while he may not have been so extensive in his remarks as the mover he did show a great deal of daring because no timid man would go out of his way to exalt the agricultural policies of this government. I would be loath indeed to try to convince the potato growers of Prince Edward Island of the excellence of the said government's policies.

There is a general tendency to scorn and denigrate this particular type of debate, the throne speech debate. Members of the press constantly say that it is a case of droning on and that usually it gets worse as it goes along. As I am the last speaker today I know where that places me. Some say it is a waste of time. I do not make such a suggestion; nor do I welcome the idea that the throne speech debate should be curtailed, although I am not by any means one of the most loquacious men in this parliament.

We are here as a representative assembly and representative government antedates responsible government. We are not here as a legislative mill for the executive arm, but here because a number of Canadians freely elected us to be here, and we cannot serve them unless we are able to speak freely once we get here. This is of course what indirect democracy means. I suppose if one wanted to look at it studiously he would find that much of the legislation which finally emerges as the outpourings of the government began with the suggestion of some humble private member whose voice went unheard year after year and was finally picked up by some government.

I agree with what the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) said this morning, that we must be ever zealous of the rights and privileges of private members, and I have detected during my ten years here a continuing encroachment in this regard. Let me say right now that I for one have no intention of accepting during this session that development which occurred in the last session, the continuous obliteration of the private members hour. All sorts of interesting things were on the order paper last session but we never had a chance to discuss them.

Of course some improvements in our procedures are necessary. I am a Conservative, but I am also a progressive, but I should like to have some reasonable conviction that a change is also an improvement before I want to make that change. Some improvements have been discussed by members well versed in our rules. I think we must reach the stage when we have a fixed adjournment. There is nothing in my opinion more degrading than the constant dangling before us of an adjournment, to which we have been subjected for the last several years. I find this altogether degrading, that we must do such and so or we will not get out. No schoolmaster would treat underclass children in that particular way.

Since I have been here we have spent 25 or 27 sitting days on this foolish process of waiting for votes to be taken. Again let me say that I am in favour of the electronic voting device.

The lengthy speech from the throne this year dealt with things other than announcements of government policy. I think that is commendable and satisfactory. Surely this is a time to branch out and outline a sort of state of the nation address. But why did it have to be so loquacious; why did it have to be so long, and why did it have to be so verbose? I read somewhere that it was the cornucopia of government planning. I think of a different metaphor, that it is the warehouse of second hand goods.

One thing I did not hear in the speech from the throne was the pronoun "my". Down through the years when the head of state opened parliament under our system he referred to "my" government, and "my" ministers. One observes in this long speech the expression "the" government. What is the reason behind that change? The Governor General is in fact the head of state under the Queen; he is the apex and all the rest under our constitution comes under him. I am wondering about that change. Surely it was not accidental, and if it was not accidental, then what does it mean? Does it suggest that the role of the Governor General is less significant? Does the word "the" instead of "my" suggest a separation of the vice-regal office from the government process? I hope not.

I am not what one would describe as an emotional monarchist. I do not get emotional about the concept of monarchy. But I am a rational monarchist, because I think this is the system that works best in our particular type of society. If there are those in this country who believe that some other system is better, and down through the years there have been those, let them say so. Let us look at the issue. I do not quite agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), that if Canada became a republic I would go somewhere else. Probably I would rather be in a republican Canada than somewhere else. But I should like to know if we are moving in that direction, and I want to have a chance to say that I think a monarchy is better. I want this whole thing freely and openly discussed. I do not want to be subjected to subtleties, subtleties and still more subtleties which move us toward a lack of appreciation for the monarchial system, because I think it is one of the things that makes Canada unique among the North American nations, and one of the things that makes our system as good as it is in many, many ways.

There have been discussions about constitutional matters, and we heard a most excellent speech yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on this very subject. Quite typically, not a word of that speech was reported in the press. It is appropriate that we discuss the constitution during this centennial year. We must, in any dynamic society, look at our governmental structure and constitutional framework to see wherein it needs change, and the compulsion to look is all the greater in a federal state.

We must study our constitutional apparatus, and the biggest part, but not the only part, is the B.N.A. Act. It has been said that this is not a very thrilling document, and many say it is inflexible and rigid and does not excite, like the United States constitution or like some of those great constitutions which some new republics have drawn up—and ignored. However, it has provided a valuable framework upon which, with great difficulty, has been constructed and retained, a splendid and varied political community whose hundredth birthday we are celebrating this year.

I confess to a little impatience sometimes with those who begin their constitutional discussions by suggesting that the B.N.A. Act be thrown out. Some suggest that we should have a Canadian document: Let us have something that is made in Canada, they say. The B.N.A. Act is a Canadian document. By geography it may have been completed in the United Kingdom but its inspiration came from Canadians. Sir John A. Macdonald said that 90 per cent of it was decided in Charlottetown. It was made by Canadians for Canadians and it is a worthy document. Let it be changed. Perhaps after open discussion it may be totally amended. But let us not look upon it as a kind of strait-jacket in which we cannot flourish. Indeed it has been changed many times. My maritime forebears made many changes in the subsidy provisions, and we should make a lot more or we are going to be in a bit of trouble.

I think we are not facing up to the importance of our constitutional problems. It would be a most unfortunate thing if in this centennial year our euphoria led us to believe that everything was fine and that all our problems were in the past. I think we would celebrate our confederation more realistically if we recognized our problems, that they exist, and that there are difficulties and jurisdictional problems of great magnitude.

We must begin our second century with a firm determination to deal with some of these constitutional problems and, as many of my colleagues in this house have said time and time again, we must have greater federal leadership in this field. Months have passed since the Fulton-Favreau formula was torpedoed. While I was never so fearful of that as some people were, I was most distressed that nothing was suggested in its place. Month after month we have asked what is being done, and month after month Canadians have looked for federal initiative. We all know what happened. It was left, incredibly, for a provincial premier and for the opposition in this house to take the initiative in this matter. Premier Robarts called for a Confederation of Tomorrow Conference and his call was treated with pained petulance by the Prime Minister of this country.

Now, finally, we hear that some gesture is to be made on July 5 at a time when the premiers are being sworn in as members of the privy council. We learn there will then be a brief discussion of some of these matters. Surely there is no connection between the privy council oath and that day. Surely this is not an indication that the federal government wants to wrap an even heavier cloak of secrecy around dominion-provincial discussions. I think that is one of the things that has been troubling this country in recent years and months; far too many things are discussed behind closed doors by dominion and provincial governments. We here and in the legislatures of the provinces, know nothing about them until a fait accompli is presented.

I like the suggestion that has been outlined by our amendment and set forth as a practical plan of action by Premier Robarts. He is able to do something about it. In this house our voice will not be heeded. Happily, however, Premier Robarts in his position of executive authority can take an initiative. He has called his confederation of tomorrow conference and has made preparation for it. I would suggest that the documents prepared at his request by some of the leading constitutional experts in Canada make the finest contribution I have seen in many, many years to this discussion of federal-provincial matters and constitutional problems generally.

I like Premier Robarts' suggestion, not only because it has followed careful preparation, the kind of preparation that we called for time and time again when we asked that a committee be set up to look into this matter—how often have we pleaded for that—but because he plans a conference in which the public, who after all have some interest in this matter, will be aware of the discussions and decisions. I should like to quote from the Globe and Mail of today:

> Mr. Pearson, who prefers to approach constitutional change in private, so that the people do not know their future until it is upon them, may be dismayed at the thought of a frank and open discussion, however friendly. Perhaps it should be pointed out that while this may not be the way of diplomats, it is the way of democracies.

That is a very, very fine appraisal of a very, very important matter. I hope that the government—perhaps it is a faint hope—will not be content with putting forward some gesture which may seem to take the edge off an extremely good suggestion that has been coming from the opposition, or an initiative that has been taken by the premier of a province. I hope the government will seriously, regardless of the source from which the idea came, take every means possible to bring men of good will and legislators from the provinces together, and with the spirit of 1867 but the problems of 1967 will use the techniques that are the tools of the politician —free, frank and full discussion. I have faith in politicians. It is so easy to denigrate them. We are used to being caricatures. But as a very distinguished Canadian said not long ago, it was the politicians who made this country. Surely it is the politicians who can make it greater.

But let us have an initiative. Let us say that we must take a full look at our constitution. Let us draw in all the best ideas from the provinces, and let us start it right away. This is my appeal to the government. There is nothing better we could do for our country than improve its constitutional apparatus. I know that from this part of the house there will be no lack of co-operation. I think the record of the many things that have been said in recent years indicates that there will be no lack of valuable and sound ideas. Let us all get together. Let us have a committee of this house study the problem. Let the hand of Premier Robarts receive the handshake that was mentioned the other day; but more than a handshake. Let us not fret about whose idea this was. Let us participate fully in Premier Robarts' conference and move on to newer ideas and fresher initiatives. Perhaps if that is the result we can forgive all the prolixity of the speech from the throne.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill as its title indicates is to give parliament an opportunity to express its will that a parole be granted forthwith to Steven Truscott. The bill does not dispute the opinions or decisions of the courts in respect of either the question of guilt or innocence, or the right of Steven Truscott to a new trial. However, it would grant him an immediate parole without prejudice to his right to continue to seek a new trial or to pursue any other legal course available to him.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPEECH OF PRIVY COUNCIL PRESIDENT ON VIET NAM—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to move a motion. Unfortunately I was unable to secure the translation into French, and I offer my regrets to the house. It is the first time this has happened to me, but the translation was not returned to me in time. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill):

That the house do now adjourn under standing order No. 26, on a matter of urgent public importance, namely the crisis in international confidence brought about by the speech of the President of the Privy Council on Saturday last in Toronto, which constitutes a public declaration of policy of the gravest national and international significance in that it gives the greatest of encouragement to the communist world and reveals deep enmity toward the policy of the United States administration with regard to the war in Viet Nam, and will result in further and accelerated deterioration in Canada's relations with the U.S.A.; and furthermore, is a travesty on this house which has been denied the enunciation of policy of the government which was made in the said speech outside of this house while parliament is sitting.

Speech by President of the Privy Council

Mr. Speaker: Will the right hon. Leader of the Opposition address the Chair and the house on the question of urgency of debate? I have at this point to remind hon. members again, as I do from time to time when such motions are made, that what has to be debated before the motion is accepted by the Chair is whether there is urgency of debate in the sense that it is proper for the Chair to grant the adjournment of other business of the house for the purpose of debating a specific question.

This is the only matter which concerns us at the moment, that is the urgency of debate on this particular matter and the advisability of adjourning the ordinary business of the house for the purpose of permitting such a debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this motion is made in order to give the house the opportunity to discuss a matter which is of transcendent importance nationally and internationally, and to secure the views of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whichever one is directing the foreign affairs of our country.

It might be said immediately that this matter can be discussed in the debate that is now before the house. This is true enough; it can be discussed, but this house has the right to know from the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs what is the government's policy on this question, not the expurgated brush-offs that we have been receiving lately.

Now that the matter has been brought firmly to parliament in the address delivered by the President of the Privy Council I take it that what he enunciated was government policy. To accept any other conclusion in that regard would be to disregard the fixed constitutional principle that cabinet solidarity denies individual ministers the right to enunciate policies. If Your Honour were to say this matter could be dealt with in the debate now before the house, that would in no way clarify the situation. Parliament and the country have the right to know whether the minister was putting forth government policies. The wording of his speech indicates that it was written elsewhere or by those close to the Department of External Affairs. It has all the appearances of having been inspired by the government in order to create a smokescreen in respect of policies of this government. It has all the outward indicia of being a reflection of government policy which this house has not been able to secure.

We have the right to know whether this was a declaration of policy, because no minister can sit in the cabinet and make ad hoc statements on policy contrary to the views of the cabinet, and I must refer to one or two of the statements made in order to found my argument. I wish to read two quotations from that speech, which was delivered to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At page 2 it reads:

> I suppose the answer to these queries—

That is about the world situation in so far as Viet Nam is concerned.

> —depends upon our individual consciences—

That statement, sir, is a denial of parliament. Then there is the policy enunciated on page 3:

> To me it seems that U.S. policy in the Far East has been a succession of unhappy errors beginning with a gross misconception of the weakness and corruption of the Chiang Kai-shek régime in China and then failure to appreciate the relative strength of Mao Tse-tungs' communist government which took power in 1949.

That statement is a slap in the face to one of our allies as well as to a member of the security council of the United Nations. Then there is this statement, which is contrary to the enunciation of government policy by the Secretary of State for External Affairs last June:

> The U.S., for its part, has become enmeshed in a bloody civil war in Viet Nam which cannot be justified on either moral or strategic grounds.

Sir, if ever there was a circumvention of constitutional policy that is it, because it is the antithesis of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said on June 10, 1965. I refer merely to the date; those who wish to look it up will find that the minister took the stand that this was not a civil war. Now we have a minister occupying the No. 1 position in the cabinet, the President of the Privy Council, saying this is a bloody civil war.

Then he went on to give his views with regard to bombing, burning and extermination by a foreign power which is taking place in Viet Nam. He said:

> In this war, the strongest nation in the world has taken sides in a savage civil struggle and is using its tremendous power to force the other side to quit.

Such statements bring hope to communists in every part of the world, and this is an enunciation of policy by a man occupying a high and honoured position. Then he refers to the fact that United States troops are obeying orders, as is their duty, and says:

> Unfortunately, in a war like this, there are bound to be acts of barbarism on both sides ... If the escalation of the war continues, as seems probable, and the North Vietnamese do not give up soon, one may wonder if the United States will be driven to use nuclear bombs or to spread germs or exterminating chemicals.

If ever there was a case of urgency, this is one. If we have this discussion in the debate on the speech from the throne we can talk but we cannot get an answer from the government. Finally the minister said this:

> From Canada's standpoint the grave dangers in the present situation are fourfold:
> 1. The present conflict may reinforce a natural distrust of all westerners and of all white people on the part of millions of non-whites throughout the world—
> 2. The second danger is that Russia and China may become reconciled as a result of their opposition to U.S. action in Viet Nam—
> 3. The third danger that could result from a further escalation of the war is the direct involvement of red China—
> 4. Finally, there is the gravest danger that if the United States uses nuclear weapons, the Russians would retaliate immediately.

Then he concludes:

> I have read the suggestions put forward by U Thant, by our own Prime Minister, by the Honourable Paul Martin, by General Gavan, and by other thoughtful and informed Americans. They do not differ in essentials.

If ever there was a case for an instant debate, Mr. Speaker, so this government can tell us where it stands, so we may bring out from the hidden recesses the true facts of this government's policy, this is it. I say there should be an immediate debate for that reason, and because of the gross travesty on the rights of parliament when policies are enunciated outside this house which are a direct contradiction of what the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said in the last few weeks.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The purpose of the right hon. gentleman's intervention at this point was to assist the Chair in determining whether there was a matter of urgency of debate, according to the standing orders and the practice of this house. I may tell hon. members that I am ready to make a decision now. I do not, of course, want to stifle debate in this regard, but I can assure hon. members that what they will be saying now will not change my mind, and thus cannot help the house in any way.

A motion has been made. It is for the Chair to determine whether it is acceptable, and I am prepared to reach a decision. However, if some hon. members feel they should contribute either in opposing or supporting the motion that is now before the house I will hear them for a moment.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, though the members of this party are diametrically opposed to the terms in which the motion is couched, I think there is a case for urgency of debate with regard to the speech by the President of the Privy Council, as well as for a statement by the government with reference to Canada's position in connection with the war in Viet Nam.

The President of the Privy Council has made a statement. It is a statement we welcome, one which we think sets forth with very great clarity and realism the situation which now obtains in Southeast Asia. We feel the government should give an opportunity at the earliest possible date for a full discussion of this matter in order that the house may have an opportunity either of endorsing or repudiating the statements which have been made by the President of the Privy Council.

In his statement in Toronto he set forth the position very clearly when he said "that Canadians in all walks of life and in all political parties, including especially the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, should do all they can to press the United States to halt the bombing." "If we fail to do this," he said, "we must be prepared to share the responsibility of those whose policies involve the greatest risks for all mankind."

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of that clear, clarion call to all Canadians and to members of all political parties, that some opportunity ought to be given to this house to echo that call. We are not going to have an opportunity to do this, Mr. Speaker, unless the government is willing to initiate debate on the whole question. For some time we have been pressing the Prime Minister to introduce a motion in the house in order that parliament as a whole, rather than the government, may state its position on the situation in Southeast Asia. Since the government has failed to do this it seems to me that the speech made by the President of the Privy Council offers this house an excellent opportunity to have a debate and state its position. We would hope, of course, that the statement of our position would not be in the terms of the motion which has been presented but would be a statement endorsing the position which the President of the Privy Council has taken. In our opinion this would express the view of the great majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to repeat to hon. members that in my view they are not assisting the house too much at the moment by expressing views either for or against the admissibility of the motion. There is before the house a question of procedure which involves whether there is an opportunity to debate this question within a reasonable time. That is what the Chair has to decide. To my mind the solution to the problem is easy enough, but as I say I will certainly hear further representations or submissions on the point if hon. members desire to make them.

Hon. Robert Winters (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, who is in Montreal, and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has been detained with the president of Czechoslovakia who is at present visiting Canada and whom I had the honour of seeing earlier this morning, may I say this. I discussed this important matter with the Prime Minister, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as the President of the Privy Council. The President of the Privy Council asserted again that what he had said were his own views.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But a minister cannot do that.

Mr. Winters: The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs told me that I was free to tell parliament—and I am sure parliament understands this—that the government's position has been clearly set out by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and remains unaltered.

This question ought not to be debated at this time, I submit, under those rules for debate referred to by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. Most hon. members, I think, would also regard it as inopportune to debate the matter when the Secretary of State for External Affairs and spokesmen for the government on this question of policy cannot be here. On those grounds I submit that this would not be an opportune time to debate this subject.

[Mr Douglas.]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I believe the time has come for parliament to take a stand on the war in Viet Nam and I suggest the motion moved by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) is one which has great value, because it would permit members of parliament to made their views known clearly on what is now going on in Viet Nam.

And when the Leader of the Opposition, says for instance—

[English]

—namely the crisis in international confidence brought about by the speech of the President of the Privy Council on Saturday last in Toronto, which constitutes a public declaration of policy of the gravest national and international significance in that it gives the greatest of encouragement to the communist world—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is the most important point we have to debate, for we often hear virulent attacks against the Americans. The President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada (Mr. Gordon) precisely repeated those charges last Saturday, but we do not hear anything, for instance, about the communist involvement in that war.

[English]

—and reveals deep enmity toward the policy of the United States administration with regard to the war in Viet Nam, and will result in further and accelerated deterioration in Canada's relations with the U.S.A.; and furthermore, is a travesty on this house which has been denied the enunciation of policy of the government which was made in the said speech outside of this house while parliament is sitting.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, our group also endorses this motion of the opposition to the effect that we should, at the earliest possible time this very day if possible, discuss this most important question, because Canada should take a stand, and the whole world should know where Canada now stands in the continuing war in Viet Nam.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe this discussion is truly urgent and that such a debate would surely bring some enlightenment.

[English]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is unusual to set aside the order of business in this house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. Occasionally that does happen, and obviously there must be a serious reason for that to happen or we should continually be changing the business unexpectedly. In this instance we are justified in asking for the normal business to be set to one side to discuss a matter which has been accentuated by the speech the President of the Privy Council made on Saturday.

The speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne normally are diverse, covering as many subjects as are covered in the throne speech. Though international affairs and the war in Viet Nam might be dealt with during the next few days, it is significant that the government earlier refused to bring forward a resolution which would permit debate on this matter. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition on Friday urged the government to provide this opportunity for debate.

The President of the Privy Council, doing something that is most unusual for a cabinet minister, has made an enunciation of government policy without giving prior information about his intention to the House of Commons. The seriousness of this action requires that the attention of this house be focused on it. When the Secretary General of the United Nations a few days ago warned the world that there was grave probability of a third world war, many people in this country became disturbed. The President of the Privy Council has taken a stand on behalf of the government which is diametrically opposed to the policy of our closest friend and strongest ally, and jeopardizes Canada's position in international affairs and her alliance with the United States.

Those are some reasons—and there are others—for this matter which is of interest to parliament and the nation to be discussed today, that the government may clearly and decisively answer our questions on this disturbing situation.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief on the point of urgency. In my view, and this is going to the pith and substance of the question, the Secretary General of the United Nations, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre stated, last week issued a clear warning to the world about the possible effects of the war in Viet Nam.

When this house convened to debate the speech from the throne the Prime Minister enunciated government policy, and it was clear that he led the house. Nevertheless we find the President of the Privy Council making statements in Toronto that are diametrically opposed to enunciated government policy, and that is not an isolated incident. Though the Registrar General had not the forthrightness of the President of the Privy Council, he spoke over the week end in Montreal and his speech was of a tenor that was diametrically opposed to enunciated government policy.

What happens is this. The Prime Minister enunciates policy in this house; then—and this is par for the course—he sends out his go-go ministers to attract the votes of the new life, the younger generation, on the hustings. That is cynical politics, as cynical as one may ever see it, and the younger generation will not be taken in.

My position is this. We do not have the luxury in Canada of the Prime Minister saying one thing and ministers another. The Prime Minister made a policy statement—

An hon. Member: On Viet Nam?

Mr. Grafftey: On Viet Nam and on the international situation, and the Canadian people at this hour of tension want leadership. If there is a gap between leadership and what the people are thinking today it is because of this sort of cynical performance.

• (11:40 a.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we appeal now as we have never appealed before. This subject is too important to be allowed merely to take its chance in the pot luck of the debate on the address. Why is the Prime Minister not here today after one of his senior ministers has contradicted statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding one of this government's most important policies? Where is the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Where is the Registrar General? The Prime Minister is saying one thing in this house and the Registrar General is saying another. We must debate this today; we cannot take pot luck in the debate on the speech from the throne. The entire population of this country is waiting for leadership in a tense situation.

I ask for your protection, Mr. Speaker. I ask that you allow this debate to go on so as to provide an opportunity for a clear cut statement to be made. I for one feel, as a backbench member, that we should adopt many of the features of United States government, but I do not believe a minister should enjoy the luxury of speaking as a private citizen on a question of government policy.

We cannot allow that to happen if this system is to work at all. The Registrar General having made the speech he made in Montreal; the President of the Privy Council having made the speech he delivered in Toronto, and in the light of the statements made on this subject last week by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister, I say the time to debate this issue is now, and I am sure I am speaking for the whole of the Canadian people even if the government is not.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their views and for the assistance they have extended to me. However, as I said at the outset after listening to the argument put forth by the Leader of the Opposition, I felt that in view of the precedents and the long established procedure accepted by all hon. members, for perhaps a hundred years, and in view of what is contained in Beauchesne it was rather obvious what decision should be reached by the Chair in the circumstances. I even hesitate to read again the well worn citation from Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 100 (3):

"Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate"—

This indicates that an adjournment of the ordinary business of the house is to be granted when there are no other opportunities for debate. I have no statistics to support this, and I have not looked at the precedents, but I doubt very much whether at any time in the history of the Canadian parliament the Chair has granted a motion for the adjournment of the debate on the speech from the throne for the purpose of initiating another debate. My understanding is that the debate on the speech from the throne is intended precisely to enable all hon. members to debate exactly what they wish to debate. Hon. members have all agreed that this is a matter of extreme importance and extreme urgency. In an hour or so they will all have an opportunity to debate for the rest of the morning, this afternoon and this evening the subject which has been brought to the attention of the house by the Leader of the Opposition. Representatives of all parties can do this, one after the other.

The right hon. gentleman said parliament has the right to know whether the minister was enunciating government policy, and the right to know what government policy is. He may be quite correct in this suggestion; I certainly have no right to argue with that proposition at all. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition has the right to ask of the Prime Minister or of someone speaking in the name of the government whether a minister speaking outside the house is enunciating the policy of the government. It is the right of any hon. member to ask such a question during the question period. But I doubt whether the granting of this motion would make it easier or more possible for the government to enunciate its policy, or whether the government would wish to do so during a debate brought about by a motion for adjournment under standing order 26 as distinct from a debate provided under the rules for consideration of the speech from the throne.

For these reasons I see no other possible determination of the matter on the part of the Chair than to refuse the motion advanced by the Leader of the Opposition.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—SPEECH BY PRESIDENT OF PRIVY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that a question might be asked at this time prompts me to do so. I would ask the President of the Privy Council whether the Prime Minister has given members of his cabinet the right to say what they want to say regardless of whether it represents government policy. He made the statement in the course of a speech copies of which were delivered to the press, to the Prime Minister and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that "the United States for its part has become enmeshed in a bloody civil war in Viet Nam which cannot be justified on either moral or strategic grounds". Does this represent any change in the opinion of the government as expressed in the words uttered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on June 10, 1965, when he said:

Suffice it to say that if North Viet Nam succeeds in taking over the whole of Viet Nam by force, if the rest of the world is prepared to sit back and see this happen, saying feebly that it is after all only a domestic rebellion so why not accept the inevitable, we would I think be guilty of an error of the same nature as the mistakes made at Munich, and before that, in the League of Nations.

Would the minister say whether a new code of cabinet ethics has been issued giving him this freedom? We should like to know.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the Leader of the Opposition misunderstood the suggestion I made with deference, and supported I believe by precedents. It was that questions might be asked of the Prime Minister or of the Acting Prime Minister whether a statement made outside the house by a cabinet minister represented government policy. Unless the President of the Privy Council is the Acting Prime Minister this morning I doubt whether the right hon. gentleman's question can be directed to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, everybody knew this matter would be raised, and regardless of the importance of other events the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs should have been here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In their absence I will not ask the minister whether he was uttering public policy. I will simply ask him whether there has been a new code of cabinet ethics—

An hon. Member: Cheap.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and whether it was under this new code that the minister made those outrageous statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret that the second question is very much like the first, and is subject to the same procedural limitation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether a copy of the speech made by the President of the Privy Council was given to the Prime Minister before it was made, and whether any attempt was made by the Prime Minister's office to get in touch with the President of the Privy Council before he delivered it.

Hon. Robert Winters (Acting Prime Minister): I can only repeat that the Prime Minister's Office and the Secretary of State for External Affairs told me the same thing, that a copy of the speech had not been seen by them before it was delivered.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In view of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister has informed the house that he discussed the matter with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, can he tell us whether the statement made by the President of the Privy Council represented government policy?

Mr. Winters: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated government policy on this issue as clearly as I can recall any policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winters: I think the position of the government has been made abundantly clear.

Mr. Lewis: That was not my question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Acting Prime Minister, in his argument and in what he has just now answered, mentioned that he had a conversation with the Prime Minister, would he now tell us whether in the conversation with the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council there was mention that the President of the Privy Council is going to resign again.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the contents of the Registrar General's "once upon a time" speech to the convention of the Association of American Editorial Cartoonists in Montreal last Saturday, would the Acting Prime Minister inform the house whether it now is the government's intention to announce foreign policy in parables?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what we have been getting for the last couple of years.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is a supplementary question.

[Later:]

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce referring to his previous remark that later this day he might ask for permission to revert to motions so he might make a more complete statement. As acting minister, at the same time will he arrange to have the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs here to clarify the other matter in respect of Viet Nam?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, I think the Viet Nam matter is disposed of so far as this sitting of the house is concerned, but I will convey the hon. member's question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate to the house whether muzzles have been distributed among the cabinet ministers until the Prime Minister does return.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

When the President of the Privy Council declared in Toronto that the Americans should stop bombing North Viet Nam, did he not at that time also intend to ask the communist Chinese to stop bombing South Viet Nam?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is argumentative.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the United States officially or unofficially, verbally or in writing brought to the attention of the government as yet the speech of the President of the Privy Council? Has there been any communication at all in this regard? Mr. Butterworth usually butts in on everything. Has he not been in on this?

Mr. Winters: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker; but to assure the hon. gentleman beyond doubt I will have to take the question as notice.

INQUIRY AS TO RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of recent statements by some members of the cabinet is an announcement regarding recognition of red China imminent?

Hon. Robert Winters (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can add nothing to what has already been said so clearly in this house by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Does the government consider the confusion caused by the various statements of ministers of the crown regarding foreign policy an enhancement of Canada's image abroad?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows this question is not in order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce with regard to the stories which have been circulating in the press and over the radio to the effect that there is to be an increase in the price range under the international wheat agreement of some 22 cents a bushel. Is the minister in a position to give us any information concerning how the negotiations are proceeding and what the price range is likely to be under the new international wheat agreement?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped I would be able to make a statement on orders of the day, but negotiations still are going on in Geneva. I am hopeful that later this day I will be able to ask hon. members for permission to revert to motions so I may make a full statement. However, with your tolerance, Mr. Speaker, and that of members of the house, I should like to answer this question so far as I am able to do so now.

A great measure of agreement has been reached on the main issues under discussion relative to the GATT agreements. But, as all hon. members know, it is not always the main issues which determine whether a contract can be agreed to. There still are a number of details to be worked out with respect to cereals and, until they are, one cannot be certain there will be an over-all agreement. On this point, however, I remain confident.

In the light of the fact that figures have been used so widely in the press this morning I think it would be well to clarify them in Canadian terms. It has been suggested that what is being agreed to in Geneva is $1.73 per bushel for No. 2 hard winter wheat at a gulf port, and that there would be a differential between No. 2 hard winter wheat and No. 1 Manitoba northern of some 22½ cents a bushel. This would be a significant and welcome increase in the international minimum and maximum prices of specified qualities of wheat and would substantially strengthen arrangements for co-operation to maintain market stability for No. 1 Manitoba northern in store at the lakehead.

New maximum and minimum prices on this basis would be $1.95½ and $2.38½ Canadian respectively. This would represent a 21 cent increase over maximum and minimum prices under the current international wheat agreement. The minimum price f.o.b. Vancouver would be $2.03½ and the maximum would be $2.46½.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the 21 cent increase, which the minister mentioned, over the price established some six years ago represents less than the increased cost to produce a bushel of wheat during those six years, has the government given consideration to supplementing the return to the farmer or is the farmer to take the loss?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows, these are simply minima and maxima within which the world price can and does fluctuate. The world price still is determined largely by supply and demand, having regard of course to the maximum and minimum referred to here.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether the government is giving consideration now to restoring the 17 cents a bushel which was taken away in the price two years ago, and which has caused a loss to the western farmers of $90 million a year since?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, that amount was substantially restored by the payments made last year to the western wheat growers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the minister is not saying that the payments made to the western farmers last year had anything to do with the 17 cents per bushel which was taken away from them. Surely the minister is not that serious.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he does not think he should await the return of the Minister of Agriculture before he attempts to gauge the benefits which might accrue to the producers.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce another supplementary question. Will Canada be making a financial contribution to the 4½ million tons of wheat which will be set aside for the needy countries and financed by the western industrial nations, and if so on what basis?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, that is one of the items which has not yet finally been determined. I hope later today, however, that I will be able to include that in a statement to the house.

TRADE

ENTRY OF CANADIAN CEREALS INTO EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in view of Britain's application to enter the European common market and having in mind the position in respect of Canadian wheat entering the British market, whether there has been any additional progress made in so far as cereals entering the European economic community are concerned.

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. The negotiations were separate from anything which might be contingent upon the British entry into the common market.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN FORCES FROM NATO AND NORAD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether it is the intention of the government to withdraw Canada's forces from NATO and from NORAD, as has been advocated by the President of the Privy Council in a policy speech he made last Friday.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not. The policy remains that which was stated on behalf of the government by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he addressed the house earlier this year.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): How are we to know what the policy is when one minister says one thing, the Secretary of State for External Affairs says another, and the President of the Privy Council says another?

Mr. Speaker: That is a very interesting question, but it appears, at least, to be argumentative.

Mr. Churchill: The answer would be interesting, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It may appear to be argumentative, but I am seeking information because it is difficult to know what the policy is when so many speakers say different things.

Mr. Speaker: It is rhetorical.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Was the President of the Privy Council outlining national defence policy in a recent speech calling for the withdrawal of Canadian troops from Europe under our present NATO and NORAD commitments?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I indicated to the house that generally speaking the procedure to be followed by hon. members asking questions as to whether statements made outside the house represent the policy of the government is to direct them to the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Winch: Then may I amend my question, Mr. Speaker, by addressing it to the Acting Prime Minister. Was the President of the Privy Council outlining government policy in a recent speech calling for the withdrawal of Canadian forces from Europe under our present NATO and NORAD commitments?

Hon. Robert Winters (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that question was answered a moment ago by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. Is it the intention of the government to withdraw Canadian forces from Europe under NATO and NORAD commitments?

COAL

ALBERTA—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FREIGHT RATES ON SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport who has been promising a statement concerning the negotiations which are of interest to the coal operators of western Canada. Can he tell the house how the negotiations are progressing in respect of coal exports to Japan, and whether those contracts will be filled?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is still very promising and so are the negotiations, but they have not been concluded.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALMON FISHING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries in connection with the opening of the salmon fishing season today. Has the minister received any complaint or criticism from the salmon fishermen, particularly in the Bay of Fundy area, concerning the new fishing regulations and, if so, what was the reply?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have received a few complaints from individual fishermen who would like to enter this particular fishery but have not qualified for licensing. As the hon. member well knows, the commercial salmon fishery has to be restricted or at least controlled if we are to maintain this important resource for future generations and make it profitable for the fishermen who are actually engaged in this type of fishing.

I may add that this is not an entirely new regulation but the implementation of salmon licensing controls which have existed for a number of years and which have been amended in order to make them more applicable and more effective.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I have a supplementary question. Will the minister cause these applications to be checked over again to make certain no severe hardship is being imposed on bona fide fishermen?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, although the fishermen who are applying are bona fide fishermen, I still insist there must be control or restriction in the number of licenses that are awarded. Every application is being looked at carefully, and if there are extenuating circumstances consideration is being given to the applicant.

NOVA SCOTIA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE AFTER STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and I know that he is aware of the tremendous loss of lobster traps off the coast of Nova Scotia and that he has indicated a study will be made of the situation. When may we anticipate a statement of government policy which will be helpful to these fishermen in recouping some of their losses?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member is well aware of the policy which exists in respect of such incidents. That policy has not changed for a number of years, and is exactly as I suggested in reply to a similar question asked last week by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Forrestall).

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON ACCESS NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has his department reached an agreement as yet with the government of British Columbia concerning access to the Vancouver international airport and, if not, can the minister report any progress?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no agreement has been reached, but some discussions have been taking place and I believe I can say progress is being made.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—MAINTENANCE OF SPREAD BETWEEN U.S. AND CANADIAN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that the president of Chrysler Corporation of Canada in an address to the Calgary Chamber of Commerce said that the spread between automobile prices in Canada and in the United States is here to stay? Will the minister look into this situation to determine whether this kind of attitude is in keeping with announcements made in this house?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING INCREASED MOVEMENT FROM FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration, whose star still shines bright in the political firmament.

Over the week end the minister engaged in some discussions with the premier of Quebec with regard to French-speaking immigrants. Is the minister in a position to inform the house of the results of those discussions and to announce a new policy in that respect?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had no discussions with the premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Is the minister going to have some discussions in the near future with the Quebec premier?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I read in the newspapers that the Quebec premier intended to meet me. I shall be happy to do so if ever he expresses that wish.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to another minister whose star appears to be rising, and I refer obviously to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Benson).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: After that I hope I will receive a favourable reply to my question. How soon may we expect government legislation implementing the recommendation of the joint committee on the public service of Canada that the pensions of retired civil servants be increased?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee is presently under study by Treasury Board officials. In due course I will make recommendations in this regard to the cabinet.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask as a supplementary question whether, in the event there is further delay the government will consider making any such increases retroactive?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, all aspects of the situation will be considered.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INSULIN—REQUEST FOR PROTECTION OF USERS FOLLOWING PRICE INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of a question I asked last week in his absence, concerning the increase in the price of insulin and the maintenance of provincial support programs. Can the minister inform the house and the country whether the government is prepared to do anything to assist those users of this drug in meeting this additional burden?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have read the hon. gentleman's question. There is now a question on the order paper in respect of insulin. It should be kept in mind that the price increase by Connaught Laboratories is the first increase by that agency in the price of insulin since its discovery in 1921. The price today is lower than it was in 1938. The director of the laboratories has stated that the price has been kept as low as possible, and that this increase is the result only of additional costs.

At the present time there is no direct federal government support for insulin users, except through sharing in the Canada Assistance Plan. I understand that two provinces do assist insulin users where necessary.

Mr. Winkler: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was aware of the information just given by the minister, and I have no quarrel with that statement by the director. I simply wish to ask the minister whether the federal government is prepared to offer some support where this increase in price has placed a heavy burden upon users.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the federal government is assisting the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia in respect of insulin users through national health grants. Presumably the same method of support would be available to other provinces. I would be glad to explore this point further.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EXTENSION OF AMNESTY OR PAROLE DURING CENTENNIAL YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Solicitor General. Is the minister able to inform the house what progress has been made with respect to the suggestion that special consideration should be given to amnesty or parole of those persons who warrant a gesture of mercy during our centennial year?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member with respect that I gave a written reply to a similar question approximately six weeks ago. The gist of the reply, as I recall it, was that the setting up of the National Parole Board provided for an automatic review of the sentences of all inmates of federal institutions, and consideration was not being given to granting a general amnesty this year.

PENITENTIARIES

REPORT ON CONSTRUCTION OF MAXIMUM SECURITY FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Solicitor General. It is one that surely needs an answer now in view of the imminence of calling for tenders. Could I ask the Solicitor General whether consideration has been given to the report of the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate on the design of maximum security prisons, and will the recommendations of the joint committee be included in revised plans for the construction of the new maximum security prison at Millhaven as part of the Kingston complex?

Hon. L. T. Pennell (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee is being studied by the officials of my department at the present time.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. Will no call be made for tenders for the maximum security prison at Millhaven before the report of the joint committee has been fully considered?

Mr. Pennell: I am prepared to give that undertaking, Mr. Speaker. We will look at this report very seriously and will consult the architects to see what revisions are necessary in light of the report of the committee.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHURCHILL—MOTION ON ORDER PAPER BY MEMBER FOR LOTBINIÈRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege affecting the rights of parliament. My question of privilege is based on the publication of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. I find at the bottom of page 21 a private member's notice of motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) which reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the possibility of symbolizing the supreme authority of this country in an authentically Canadian manner other than by the British crown and of amending the constitution accordingly.

I submit, sir, that a motion like this should never have been permitted to appear on the order paper. It is calculated to subvert the constitution, and it is in contravention of a member's oath of allegiance. I accordingly move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith), that this motion be struck from the order paper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pugh: You should have had Ralph Cowan second that.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to allow a debate on this matter. I will receive the motion written by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and give a ruling on it. I will at least read the motion.

After reading the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: —by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I must come to the conclusion that the motion cannot be moved at this time. There is no possible way I can think of, according to the rules of the house, by which a member can rise and propose such a substantive motion, because this is substantially a substantive motion, without due notice. The hon. member may wish to find some other way to propose this motion which would be acceptable under the rules.

There is a point of order which is entirely different from the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. He states that the motion in the name of the hon. member for Lotbinière should not have been accepted. There may be arguments in favour of the proposition advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, and if he will allow me to do so I will take that point under consideration and in due course, because I do not think it is a matter of extreme urgency, render a decision as to whether it is in order to allow this type of motion to be on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the Acting Prime Minister to consider the motion presented by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) suggesting that we should abolish the royal power of dissolution? I ask this question so hon. members can see there are on the other side of the house some people who are anti-crown.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF PRIVY COUNCIL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council would discuss with the government house leader the possibility of having the estimates of his department referred to one of the standing committees, so that committee might have an opportunity to consider the matters that are under his responsibility.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss that matter with the house leader.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the house leader as chairman of the committee on procedure. How soon can we expect action by the procedure committee on the suggestion put forward by the broadcasting and agriculture committees, and endorsed by the Prime Minister last week, that electronic news media be given full access to parliamentary committees?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I hope the committee on procedure will meet at an early date. We will be happy to consider this proposal within the committee, and following that consideration will be able to give a more definite opinion.

The Address—Mr. Honey

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, May 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gauthier.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Durham): Mr. Speaker, it is traditional in this debate to compliment the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am pleased to do so, not only because it is a traditional gesture but because the mover, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), delivered speeches which indicated a great deal of background research and study, and delivered them in a manner fitting the record of responsibility and sincerity they have already established in this house.

In this debate I would like to spend the time available to me in a discussion of the dairy policy of this government, and later to make some suggestions with respect to a school milk assistance program. By and large I think the philosophy of our present dairy policy is good. Some of the details are disturbing, and I will mention them shortly in the hope that the Minister of Agriculture will have an opportunity to reflect on my suggestions.

Before making my suggestions I want to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for the generally good job he has been doing for the agricultural industry in Canada. The minister has obtained the confidence of Canadian farmers as one who is genuinely concerned with their welfare. He is concerned with the income of Canadian farmers as a whole, and he is anxious to bring it up to the standard of all Canadians. He is striving to see that all Canadians, including those in agriculture, should be able to live well, to educate their families and generally share in the good Canadian life which is being made available by this government.

Having said this I want to caution the minister on one point, and I am sure he will accept it in the spirit in which I make it. My words of caution to the minister are that he be careful about putting too much faith in the opinions of his senior officers and advisers. I do not say this as a criticism of the abilities or sincerity of the minister's advisers and those who hold office on various boards and commissions. However, I do suggest that these officials on some occasions may not have the practical background in agriculture which leaders of farm organizations possess. If, before announcing the new dairy policy in April, the minister and members of the Canadian Dairy Commission had given greater attention to some of the ramifications of the policy he would not now be faced with the genuine concern being experienced in the dairy industry.

Indeed, the situation we now have is that the dairy policy appears to be in conflict with the policies of other government agencies such as the Farm Credit Corporation and the ARDA administration. For example, to announce suddenly that quotas for manufacturing milk produced in 1967 and 1968 will be based on 1966-1967 production is a serious blow to those producers who have advanced plans to increase their production and move into more economically efficient units. I do not quarrel with the principle of quotas, but I do criticize strongly the practice of dealing with quotas without proper and reasonable notice being given to the producers. We are also told that quotas will be refused to producers who were not in production in 1966-1967. Such a drastic step without reasonable notice to the industry is surely not justifiable.

Another point of criticism I have is the lack of notice to fluid milk producers that the federal subsidy would be cut off almost overnight. I agree that the provincial governments have the essential responsibility in this field. I think, however, it would have been prudent for the federal department to have given the provinces a year in which to assume their responsibility and give notice to all, including the fluid milk producers, that the federal government would continue to pay subsidies to fluid producers in this current dairy year. The producers would then be put on notice that they had a year in which to convince the provincial governments that they should pick up the subsidies, and if the provinces indicate they would not do so the producers would then have a year in which to adjust their production as they might see fit.

In the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal at some length with a matter which is directly related to the dairy industry but with respect to which I wish to direct a generally overriding argument, that of the health of Canadian children. I wish to address myself not only to the Minister of Agriculture but to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The topic is that of supplying milk to Canadian school children.

I am deeply concerned over the results of official surveys made in recent years which clearly show that a large proportion of our school age children are undernourished. The strange fact is that this condition is not the result of poverty but rather seems to stem from the affluence of our society. This is borne out by D.B.S. figures which show that shipments of soft drinks between 1956 and 1966 increased by 79 per cent while fluid milk production for consumption rather than manufacturing increased by only 1.74 per cent. On a per capita basis our consumption of fluid milk has decreased in those years from 322 pounds to 264 pounds. I made a quick comparative calculation and discovered that if our per capita consumption in 1966 had remained at the 1956 level, we would have drunk 1,160 million pounds more. That is about equal to the soft drink industry's increase over that period. For every additional pound of soft drinks we consume we stop consuming an equivalent amount of nature's most perfect food, milk.

So, while the high aims toward a better life as laid out in our recent throne speech are very laudable, we need direction in how to best use our blessings. Our children need education regarding the principles of nutrition. They are eating what tastes good to them, but very often they need most what they do not like. An important step that should be taken to correct this matter is to establish now a national school milk program. This should be financed and promoted by the federal government without delay. I would like to remind the government and hon. members that this was part of the Liberal platform in 1962 and 1963, and the funds then allotted should have been augmented by now.

The need for such a program is supported by unquestionable authority. I refer you to the pamphlet "Nutrition for Health", volume III, No. 1, November 1963, published by the Ontario department of health. This describes a research program to assess the habits of adolescents carried out by the department's northwestern, Wellington and Welland units. Its results are based upon records kept of 2,436 students.

According to the minimum requirements of the ten basic food groups, as laid down by the Canada food guide—milk and cheese, eggs, meat and alternates, potatoes, vegetables, fruit, sources of vitamin C, bread, whole grain cereal and vitamin D supplements—a shocking 55 per cent, or more than 1400 students, rated "poor" to "very poor". In this group the average calculated intake of vitally needed calcium was not up to the recommended level. The report states that the neglect of milk was most serious since it is a prime source of calcium. Only 34 per cent of the boys and 25 per cent of the girls drank the amount recommended by the Canada food guide to supply adequately this food element along with the others that are supplied by milk in a near perfect combination.

The report sounded an ominous warning for girls. It stated that while growth and development may proceed normally, the bones may not be properly calcified. This brings a danger of nutritional debt which can be dangerous when pregnancy follows shortly after adolescence. The report states further that students who reported their soft drink intake averaged 3.9 bottles a week for boys and 3.4 bottles for girls. Further, the boys drank an average of 7.7 cups of coffee and tea a week while girls drank 6.9 cups.

The 1962 report of the committee for the study of the distribution of milk in the schools of the province of Quebec states that milk is an essential food for children because it is the principal source of calcium and riboflavin. It concludes that without milk a child is not adequately fed because insufficient calcium leads to many difficulties arising from poor bone formation, and can cause teeth cavities. Riboflavin is a vitamin whose need is so well documented it need not be dealt with at length here.

The findings give support to the statements made in the House of Commons on November 20, 1962. At that time I recommended, among other things, that the federal government should definitely proceed with a school milk program. I stated the government should not only support such a program financially but should sponsor education to stimulate and enthuse parents of school age children on the necessity of supplying their children with milk each day.

Today I repeat this recommendation and introduce positive suggestions as to its implementation. I am absolutely convinced it is a matter of vital importance to our nation's health and the teaching of health principles in our schools. In addition, my proposals cannot help but bring far reaching benefits to the dairy industry if they are put into effect.

If we compare our distribution of school milk to that of the rest of the world we should, in this centennial year, hang our heads in shame. Here are some facts I have gathered from the publication "School Milk in Canada", published in December 1961 by the Canada Department of Agriculture. Our consumption of milk in schools accounts for less than 1 per cent of our total milk consumption, compared to 4 per cent in the United States. The Quebec report to which I referred earlier states that England, Japan, Norway, New Zealand and Sweden are equally well advanced as the United States in the areas of school milk distribution and lunches. In some of these countries the milk is provided free.

The publication "School Milk in Canada" states that the oldest successful school milk program in elementary schools in the country has been carried out by the Montreal Catholic school commission. Its efforts won national recognition in an article published by School Progress magazine entitled "Here's a Blueprint For Solving Your School's Milk Problems". That program, suggested as a model for Canada, had to be discontinued during the 1966-67 school year because the cost of milk increased and subsidy money wasn't available to make up the difference. Between one quarter and one third of the children were given milk free through benevolent efforts of service organizations and contributions by the school commission itself.

The most effective program in terms of amount of milk distributed is in Windsor, Ontario. The Department of Agriculture report states that the average consumption per pupil day in all outlets excluding vending machines, which are noted for lower turnover, is only 2 ounces per pupil day. The average of our four best cities, Montreal, Windsor, Ottawa and Hull, was less than one third of the United States figure in 1961. With the Montreal Catholic schools discontinuing their program, at least temporarily, the situation has become worse.

United States consumption averages 5.8 ounces per pupil day, the Canada Department of Agriculture report states. It also affirms that if United States methods were used here we could probably raise Canada's over-all consumption to a desirable 5 ounces per pupil day.

There is little doubt that our low consumption results to a large extent from the high prices our children must pay. Spectacular results occur when prices are lowered. The Department of Agriculture report tells about studies made in St. Louis, and in the state of Wisconsin. In St. Louis when federal subsidy permitted the price for an 8 ounce container to be lowered from 7½ cents to 3 cents, consumption increased 180 per cent. In Wisconsin when elementary school prices were dropped from 6 cents to 3 cents per 8 ounces, sales increased by 208 per cent.

The number of children participating in Wisconsin was 100 per cent when the price ranged from 0 to 0.9 cents per carton. At 3 cents to 3.9 cents it was 79.3 per cent. Canada's school milk participation by students, averaging about 20 per cent, looks very sick by comparison. Despite all pressures of its international commitments the United States is not disturbing this activity. Last year, according to an article in the Economist magazine, President Johnson asked for $20 million for school milk and Congress raised the amount to $100 million.

Mr. Ronald H. Clark, proprietor of Clark Dairy Limited of Ottawa, stated in a speech to the National Dairy Council meeting on March 21 of this year that he doubts that a single dairy in Canada, trading solely in fresh milk and cream, is earning a profit. Profits, such as they are, come from other products. The average earnings on sales by the dairy industry is 1.9 per cent compared to 4.9 per cent in all manufacturing industries, Mr. Clark said. The low profit position of this industry makes it impossible for it to assist school milk programs by lowering prices. Such action was suggested by the Quebec provincial committee studying school milk distribution in its 1962 report, and no doubt others have made similar proposals that arise from the assumption that there are significant profits to be reduced.

Another suggestion made by this committee was that low cost school milk would stimulate the lagging desire by the children for it, and that dairies should look upon the cost of their assistance through lower prices as part of sales promotion and advertising costs. The sad state of the industry rules out this suggestion also. Mr. T. B. Cooper, president of the National Dairy Council, stated this year that sales charts for the past 10 years show a lack of promotion spending on products using the most milk. He explained that the profit situation did not allow such activity, while the promotion budgets for alternates and substitutes show an ever increasing trend.

Promoting the drinking of milk by children is an activity that will bring the ultimate in long term benefits for our children with a subsidiary benefit for the dairy producers of Canada. Milk tastes, developed in childhood, often remain throughout the lifetime, and if there is a full realization of the nutritive values involved they will be passed on to future generations. Today's children appear to be losing their taste for milk, and this trend must be reversed.

This requires a substantial educational campaign, as I have stated before in this house. Co-operative activity by the national farmers and dairy organizations could help in this effort. This is exemplified by the literature distributed with milk in Windsor, Ontario, by the dairies supporting school milk. Sometimes a one week health survey, such as that conducted in co-operation with the Ontario department of health at Porcupine, Ontario in January 1963, can be used as an excellent base for education. There the health classes in the schools were told of the dangers accompanying their low average intake of milk as indicated by the survey. This was shown to be a major reason for the diet classification of two thirds of the students being rated as "poor" to "very poor".

Proper nutrition in children is needed for effective teaching generally. Mr. Guy Labelle, former principal of the Jacques Viger public school in Montreal's poor St. Henry district, made a study of the children sent to him who were problems in class. According to the article in School Progress magazine mentioned earlier, he found that 75 per cent of them had not eaten enough breakfast or none at all. In pacifying these children, milk had the effect of improving learning capacity. Mr. Labelle's observations are supported by the article "Food for Thought" published in the December 1966 issue of Monsante magazine. There it was reported that the Nutrition Foundation Incorporated of the United States had found that a deficiency of two of the important constituents of milk, namely protein and carbohydrates, can retard a child's mental development by as much as three years. A school lunch program in Mexico City, featuring milk, is reported to be improving not only health but scholarship.

An adequate intake of milk is not only an objective that health education in schools should aim toward, but is a need for the teaching process itself. Therefore a substantial educational campaign is required by the federal department of health and welfare to draw the attention of the public to the need for instructing children about its vital position among the essential foods. In this effort it would, of course, work in co-operation with provincial departments of health and education. The most important step to be taken, however, is the lowering of the price of milk itself. The price must be substantially lower than the bulk price paid to stores or milk delivery drivers. The only sure way this can come about is through federal assistance, in co-operation with the provinces. Studies by the Quebec provincial school milk committee mentioned above and experiences in the United States show that the price should be about 3 cents for an 8 ounce container, or about half the bulk price in stores.

I therefore propose a national school milk assistance bill under the authority of the department of health and welfare. This would make funds available, through the provinces, to school boards participating in the program. It would follow a similar pattern to that in the United States. Our objectives should be first to educate both parents and children to the need for milk, and second to increase our national consumption to 5 ounces per pupil per day, as suggested in "School Milk in Canada", published by the Department of Agriculture.

At present our national elementary and secondary school population is about 5,125,000 pupils. At 5 ounces per day they would consume 656 million 8 ounce portions, or about 328 million pounds of milk in a 200 day school year. If the government paid 3½ cents per portion the cost would be $29 million. However, acceptance will not reach this level immediately and an initial grant of about one half this amount would be enough to get the program going. This was the experience in the United States, as reported in the article "The Classroom, Our Untapped Market for Milk" that appeared in the May 20 issue of the Family Herald in 1960.

It is an economic fact of life that any industry must expand its sales to be healthy in our economy. The dairy and farming industry have shown what happens when this does not take place. In order to achieve industrial efficiency there is a continual need to purchase expensive improved production machinery and plant. With a stationary market this has come about in the only way possible; through the large units buying out their smaller competitors. Thus we have seen the number of dairy farmers and processors dropping constantly during the years since the war. During the period from 1956 to 1961, for instance, the number of dairy farmers dropped from 398,604 to 308,980.

We are proud of Canada, Mr. Speaker, as a great and modern country where our people generally are well paid and our families enjoy a high standard of living. Many of us have assumed that because of this our children are well fed and do not need milk in school. The facts prove that they not only need milk but require education as to why they should drink it.

Our dairy industry is suffering because of a declining per capita consumption of milk. A school milk assistance bill will provide the most effective means to reverse this trend. It will bring back a desire for milk in today's children. It will give these children knowledge about the vital role played by milk in their own good health. Then they in turn will see to it that their children, the next generation, will not return to the bad habits of today.

This is a matter of great national importance, Mr. Speaker. I suggest it should be the prime concern of the Department of National Health and Welfare as well as departments of health in the various provinces.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I make the plea that we catch up with the other advanced nations of the world in the area of school milk distribution. Our reason should be the same as Australia's when it established its states grants act in 1950 to provide milk to school children. It gave its reasons as "to help maintain their health and establish milk as part of their daily diet".

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, to begin with may I express our admiration and appreciation of the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker and those who piloted us through the marathon session that has just ended. We regret that this house has not been able to give them a well deserved holiday. I also wish to congratulate the mover of the address, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), and to state that the contents of his remarks and the manner of their delivery could well be the envy of many of the front benchers in this house.

I also wish to congratulate the seconder of the address on his speech. His eloquence was very appealing, but he launched into a criticism of Conservative agricultural policy and sang the praises of the policy of the present Liberal government. I suggest he read the address just delivered so ably by the hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Honey). His eyes might be opened to the failure of the present government to carry out its election promises. I also suggest to the seconder that he must have failed to read the record of the Conservative administration from 1957 to 1962, because he would have learnt that the idea of Expo, about which Canada is so enthusiastic today, as well as its present location, originated with the administration headed by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

I would further point out that the Saskatchewan river dam would never have been conceived, let alone built, had the Liberals continued in the drivers' seat, as they are today; and they are now very happy to see this project being completed. They are also very happy to name it after a Liberal. They did not have the courtesy to name it after the man who really initiated the dam, a project which the Liberals were afraid to touch. It must also not be forgotten that crop insurance, cash advances to farmers, ARDA and other measures originated with the Conservative government, measures which this government have tried but failed to improve. I think credit should be given where credit is due.

With regard to Canada's one hundredth anniversary, it is marvellous to see how enthusiastically those who were born in Canada as well as those who have entered the country more recently have joined together in the celebration of our centennial. And well they might, because few who were born in 1867 are still living to celebrate our hundredth birthday. I also suggest that few who were born either this year or last year will live to celebrate our second hundredth anniversary. They must therefore make the most of this occasion, and I am glad all have taken our celebrations to heart.

I realize that on occasions such as this we must pause to take stock, to make a short résumé of the past in order to understand the present. We think we have difficulties and face problems, but I feel we should understand how these problems arose in order to get some inkling of how perhaps we can best find solutions. The history of Canada did not begin just one hundred years ago, Mr. Speaker. If my memory serves me correctly the history of Canada began 475 years ago. It started with the landing of Jacques Cartier and the hardy French explorers and pioneers who broke the first sod and lived through indescribable hardships in the early days of this country. They were the ones who laid the foundations for this nation. We cannot forget or ignore these people because, as I say, Canada was not born just 100 years ago.

To these people, Mr. Speaker, I take off my hat. I cannot help but point out that it was these same French pioneers who firmly implanted in this land their language, their culture and their religion, which still exist to this day. They should be very proud of the fact that their cultural heritage which they brought from their motherland of France is still adhered to to this day.

The British conquest in 1763 made very few changes to New France; the only change was in the name. After the British conquest British servicemen stayed in the country, and after the American revolution many United Empire Loyalists settled in what was then Upper Canada, now Ontario. The Germans, Dutch and Swiss came after the British, and in 1799 German speaking Mennonites came to Ontario. They show that they are still among the best farmers in Canada. One year earlier, in 1798, the Irish came.

Anybody who maintains that at confederation, in 1867, only English and French were here is twisting history and not telling the truth, because there were at least seven ethnic groups in Canada at that time. Apart from the English there were Irish, Scottish, German, Dutch, Swiss and others. Whether they were consulted about confederation is something else.

Shortly before confederation we saw a Selkirk settlement in Manitoba, and in 1877, ten years after confederation, the German Mennonites came to Manitoba. They have proved themselves the best of farmers. All these people made a considerable imprint on Canadian life, entering the civil service, politics, the judiciary and the teaching profession. They have been a credit to this country. The same can be said of the first Icelandic immigrants who came to Manitoba in 1875, five years before it was organized into a province. It is not difficult to find descendants of these people occupying high posts in the civil service and provincial and federal governments.

Seventy five years ago last year the Ukrainians came, and last year they celebrated that seventy fifth anniversary. Politicians and outstanding persons of Ukrainian origin took part in the celebrations lauding the achievements of the group which is now half a million strong. Seventy six years ago, with no physical resources, the Ukrainians came as poor immigrants from the Austro-Hungarian and Russian part of the Ukraine because they were oppressed economically and politically. They were men in sheepskin coats who were ridiculed and laughed at; their women wore babushkas. Today what lady in Canada is shy about wearing such head covering?

Mr. Dinsdale: They set the fashion.

Mr. Mandziuk: I bow my head to the pioneer Ukrainian women who helped their husbands to build homesteads in parts of the country without roads, who lived in small shacks and brought up children while their husbands went away to earn money with which to buy farm implements. Those women helped to clear the land. Those people have survived. Have they contributed nothing to this nation? I can easily prove my point. We see descendants of Ukrainian origin in every facet of Canadian life, and they enjoy the privileges and rights of citizenship which their forefathers undertook to uphold when they became settlers.

Old loyalties had not worn off when the first world war came. It was too soon after the immigration; yet records show that 10,000 of Ukrainian origin joined the Canadian forces in answer to the call. One man who had worked in the House of Commons before his death several years ago was of Ukrainian origin and won the Victoria Cross. His name was Konowal. In the second world war 40,000 sons and grandsons of the first pioneers from the Ukraine answered the call and served in Canada's forces. Some reached high rank; some were decorated; all have been a credit.

In saying these words I pay the same compliment to the peoples of all ethnic groups in Canada. After one generation the sons and daughters of every ethnic group become Canadians. They know no other land, and having made this land their home they hope to make it better for the future.

I am about to quote from the Prime Minister. May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Mandziuk: I wish to quote from a speech which the Prime Minister delivered in Edmonton on July 17, 1966 on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of Ukrainian immigration to Canada. In the presence of some 25,000 people he said:

> You have continued the faith of your forefathers. Through the years you have maintained your own identity, your culture and your institutions, inside the Canadian nation. You have enriched Canada greatly by your contributions to its political, cultural, agricultural, industrial, professional, educational development. Your love of the land; your passion for freedom, personal and national; your belief in democracy—these have been captured and expressed in your poetry, your songs and dances. These are now part of Canada's heritage.
> By preserving your own identity, therefore, your own language and traditions, you have added something of value, of strength and colour, to the Canadian character.

These words could be addressed to any of the ethnic groups which have found their home in Canada. They would apply to Canadians of Italian origin. They would apply to the Poles and all the others; I do not restrict myself to any particular group. The wonderful part of it is that all these various ethnic groups have adopted a common language so they can understand each other. In most cases, they have adopted the English language. They have established trust and confidence in each other; they have exchanged cultural habits; they have intermarried. All are playing their part in the development of this nation.

On behalf of all those of ethnic origin, people who compose around 26 per cent of the Canadian population, I take issue with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who concluded a statement he made on March 4 by saying that Canada will never be one people with one dream. We who are of ethnic origin believe Canada is becoming a country of one people with one dream, if it has not yet become so.

I agree with the attitude taken by a great Canadian, Hon. J. T. Thorson, Chancellor of the Exchequer Court and at one time a minister in the federal government. In an article which appeared in the Edmonton Journal, we read the following:

> The Honourable J. T. Thorson, former chief justice of the Exchequer Court, said in Edmonton this week that Canada is being "brainwashed" into believing it is a bilingual country. It is not, it never has been and, as Mr. Justice Thorson said, bilingualism as a national policy is not in the national interest.

Hon. members may wish to know what is my own attitude toward bilingualism. I believe in it, my understanding of the phrase being that it means knowing two languages. Ethnic groups in Canada have adopted this point of view. Bearing in mind the words spoken by the Prime Minister to that Ukrainian gathering in Edmonton, every ethnic group has the right or possibly the obligation to maintain its language and propagate its culture as well as to learn one of the official languages, either English or French. Maybe it will not suit some people but most of the ethnic groups in Canada have adopted the English language. Some of them, a good 25 per cent, use the English language to the extent that it has even become the mother tongue in the home.

What will Canada be like 100 years from now? I am sure the fathers of confederation, when they were trying to mould this country into a united dominion, could not have foreseen what conditions would be like 100 years in the future. They could not have foreseen that Canada would develop from a colony of Britain into a completely sovereign and independent state. We cannot be sure what Canada will be like a hundred years from now when the second anniversary of confederation comes around. Who can foretell?

Of course there are forecasts. There are those who doubt whether there will be a Canada at all. Some feel that Canada will be absorbed by the United States. Some feel that we are now dependent upon the United States economically and therefore will become a part of that great nation. Some believe we should have a two nation structure. They envisage something like the situation which existed in respect of Austria and Hungary up to the end of the first world war. I and most Canadians believe—and it is safe for us to prognosticate because we will not live to celebrate another hundredth anniversary and will not be called to account—that Canada geographically will remain what it is today. I believe it will be completely independent, despite rumblings to the contrary. It will be a powerful nation of one hundred million people at least, fearing no one. Those who live to celebrate the two hundredth anniversary will feel proud of this nation. Canada will have one way of life. We now are laying the foundations for a distinctive Canadian culture containing the best of all cultures. We have contributions from those from other nations who have been here and have developed their own cultures.

Today we damn, condemn and fight among ourselves; we do almost anything to try to put Canada in a strait-jacket. Some people say Canada never will be anything but what it is now. Other people say that Canada is a nation already or, if it is not, that it is in the process of becoming one. As I have said, a two nation concept would be logical were it not for two historical facts. History cannot be denied. When this nation entered confederation there were seven ethnic groups. In addition, because of the open door policy of this nation, millions and millions of other people have come to this country. We must treat this nation as a whole containing many varieties of races, many varieties of cultures, and people with many varieties of ideas. The newcomers to this nation who brought with them their cultural heritage assumed their full obligations as Canadian citizens. In return for assuming those obligations as Canadian citizens they have a right to expect, and were given that right, the same rights and privileges enjoyed by those who came before and those who had been here for generations.

In peace and war these people have not at all been lagging behind the others who claim a special status because their forefathers had been in this nation for generations. These newcomers have integrated into the new life. They have shown that they can perform their essential duties. All they ask in return is that their opinions be heard, that they have a hand in shaping Canada and in determining what it will be during the next one hundred years. Otherwise they will be second class citizens who, in spite of the obligations they have assumed, will have no rights.

The trend followed by this government is to ignore these other people. I will not mention a name, but one politician when speaking to a Jewish ethnic group a year and a half ago said—and I will paraphrase—that all the other peoples in Canada must accept the language and culture of either the English or French groups or else. He did not finish the "or else". Where does that put us? I do not like referring to the third force; it is not that. These other groups of Canadians have the same rights as those who had been here for hundreds of years. They are here because they were invited and welcomed.

Mind you, all these groups who came here did not have their passage subsidized. They suffered the hardships of pioneer life; they have done much more, and have assumed all their duties in this nation. They must have all their rights. Whatever Canada is to become in the future, they feel they should have a voice. As I have said already, this government does not consider them full fledged citizens. Rather they are considered to be second class citizens.

History repeats itself. Other nations have gone through the same process. They have developed from a mixture of various cultures. We might take the example of Great Britain, which went through these throes and finally became one nation. This is what we are in the process of doing in Canada. It is difficult to tell what Canada will be like in one hundred years from now, but as I said I have every hope. During centennial year I think we should instil in our minds the fact that we are going to work for a strong, united Canada.

There are two other matters I should like to mention. They are unrelated but may affect Canadians as a whole. This year on October 5 the Soviet union will be celebrating the anniversary of its revolution. Here in Canada we have many people who came from behind the iron curtain. These people will be celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of liberation. They had gained freedom but lost it because of the iron curtain. I know many persons, and this includes ministers of the crown, who will be asked or who have been asked to speak at these various functions. We should keep in mind that these persons should not be accused of having a double allegiance or anything like that. They cannot help but have strong feelings about the fate of the land of their fathers or forefathers. Canadians express concern about what happens in the Congo and what happens in Viet Nam today. Why should these people, whether they be Russian, Ukrainian, Polish, Czechoslovakian, or whatever their origin, not be understood in the same way? Why should this sympathetic feeling not be expressed in respect of these people and what is happening behind the iron curtain?

Another thing which disturbs me as a Canadian is that in this country we have certain groups which lead protest marches against the United States for what goes on in Viet Nam. Show me one group in Canada which leads these protest marches against the United States in Viet Nam which at the same time leads protest marches against the U.S.S.R. which is supplying armaments to North Viet Nam, and against China which is also supplying armaments to North Viet Nam. Why should there be no protest against them? I cannot understand why Canadians are so gullible. Perhaps these protest marches are communist inspired; I do not know.

I cannot understand why the United States is damned and condemned just because it is the bulwark of the free world against communist aggression. Had it not been for what the United States has done in NATO we would not today have a free western Europe. Today the United States is preventing the further spread of communism in Southeast Asia. Some people get carried away in their protests against the United States, but I suggest in all fairness they should protest against the U.S.S.R. Where are the Migs made which are fighting against United States boys if they are not made in the U.S.S.R.? I suggest that we should leave the North and South Vietnamese to settle their own problems, providing Russian and Chinese support is withdrawn. I do not believe the United States has any imperialistic designs so far as Southeast Asia is concerned. They have a more palatable morsel here in Canada, and they have given no indication that they want any part of it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the people of the constituencies of Burin-Burgeo and Nicolet-Yamaska for electing two outstanding representatives to the House of Commons. They can feel proud of their members' performances in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I have never heard better presentations delivered in this house during the nine years I have been a member. I heartily congratulate them.

The tradition of moving the address in reply was greatly enhanced by the remarkable message of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, which could not have been more appropriate for the beginning of this centennial session. It has provided a splendid opportunity to dwell on some of the aspects of the history of this glorious land. The right hon. leader of the official opposition and the Prime Minister dealt with the subject with an eloquence which I do not presume to approach. They dealt with the years of Sir John A. Macdonald, and the hon. member who just spoke dealt with the history of some of the ethnic groups which have immigrated to Canada. With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I intend to go further back to the days when the white man met the red man on the coast of Newfoundland and the shores of Quebec.

Being one of the few members of this house who came to Canada as an immigrant I find this an occasion which inspires me to say that Canadians of other than Anglo-Saxon and French origin have a special feeling for Canada. I need not remind anyone in this house that five years after the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus another Italian mariner, Giovanni Cabot, in the service of King Henry VII of England and in honour of his native city of Venice, planted the Venetian banner of St. Mark side by side with the British flag on Canadian soil. It is interesting to know that the exploit brought him fame but no fortune. King Henry, grateful but stingy, paid John Cabot ten pounds sterling, the equivalent at the present rate of exchange of approximately $30, for the discovery of Canada.

Although Britain and France are recognized as the two founding nations, neither country can claim credit for the first person to set foot on our shores. Some people claim that the Norsmen were the first Europeans to set foot on our soil 500 years before the flag of Britain was planted in Canada. If this is true they left no records and told nobody about it. The fact remains that the British flag was planted in Canada not by an Englishman but by an Italian. And without taking away any glory from Jacques Cartier, who is generally recognized as the first man to explore New France, it was another Italian, Giovanni de Verrazano, who led an expedition to Cape Breton in 1524.

But if Britain and France were not the first to arrive here, they were the two nations which did most to build our country and give us our laws and customs, and for this reason they alone are considered Canada's founding races.

The next Italians to come to Canada were mainly soldiers, priests and artists. There was Enrico Tonti known as Henry DeTonti, whose father Lorenzo, a Neopolitan living in France, invented the tontine, a complex pension scheme or annuity. Henry DeTonti, who had lost one hand in battle and wore an iron substitute, earning him the nickname "Main Defer", was LaSalle's faithful lieutenant and played a large part in the great French explorer's success.

When Montreal's existence was threatened by the Iroquois Indians in 1665, France sent out the famous Carignan-Salieres regiment. Part of that thousand man unit was raised in Savoia, and most of the soldiers and officers were Italians. The regiment was ordered back to Europe three years later, but 400 members remained in New France as settlers. Taking courage from the departure of the soldiers, the Iroquois Indians renewed their attempts to destroy Montreal. They wiped out the settlements of Lachine and La Chesnaye and stood posed for massacre in Montreal in 1691, when they were roundly defeated by a militia force one of whose leaders was the Italian Captain Tommasco Crisafe.

The most illustrious Italian in New France, which as everyone knows is now Quebec, was Francesco Burlamacchi, knows as Francois de Bourlamaque, third in command after Montcalm, the famous French general who died on the Quebec heights in the battle fought on the Plains of Abraham and Levis. He was in charge at Montreal after the defeat of Montcalm and surrendered to the English only on the orders of General Vaudreuil. He returned to France, where he agitated long but with no success for a reconquest of Canada, and ended his days as governor of the island of Guadeloupe. The mining town of Bourlamaque, Quebec is named in his honour.

As everyone knows, one of the stipulations of confederation which brought Upper Canada and British Columbia together was the building of a railway system from coast to coast. This condition of federation brought large numbers of immigrants to Canada from Italy, Germany, the Ukraine, Poland and many other countries of Europe to build the C.P.R., the Great Northern and the Grand Trunk, the latter two forming the present Canadian National Railways. To accomplish this tremendous undertaking, when machines were unknown and everything had to be done by hand, pick and shovel, much cheap labour was needed. Italian labour agencies were set up and workers hired by the shipload. By 1900 there were in Canada 11,000 families of Italian origin.

Immigrants from many lands, the forerunners of hundreds of thousands who were to follow during the course of this century, sailed up the St. Lawrence to the promised land of Canada. They came with great expectations which for only a few were ever fulfilled, but by their toil and sweat they laid the rails to form the link that was to unite Canada. They were mostly single men, or men who had left their families behind hoping to become rich, but few returned and many never saw their families again.

At the time of confederation, 100 years ago, Canada had a population of little more than three million, and of these only 8 per cent were of origins other than English and French. In our last national census of 1961 the British ratio had shrunk to 43.8 per cent, the French was 34.4 per cent, while people of other nationalities represented 25 per cent. These facts should remind us that Canada, in the words of our Prime Minister "is not a country of two races only, of two cultures and traditions, but a country of many races and many cultures and many traditions. We are fortunate in our multiple heritage, in the challenge that comes from building a united country, one with the strength and richness that comes from diversity."

The 25 per cent of non-British and non-French origin may well become the cement binding the founding races into a composite whole, and achieve that unity of purpose which the Fathers of Confederation hoped to achieve. Senator Paul Yuzyk in his book "Ukrainian Canadians", which I think was published only recently, in a chapter entitled "Partnership of the Canadian Elements" has this to say:

> Canada was conceived as a country of plural culture. Her self government and independence were gradually achieved by the co-operation of the French and British peoples through our parliamentary institutions and common allegiance to the crown, which has been the binding force throughout the history of Canada.
> Our common experience of the land, the history, the democratic institutions and the economic prosperity has developed a spirit of pride and unity in Canada, which is equally shared by Canadians of all origins, who have also made contributions to Canada's progress. As the concept of equality evolved, the British and French in free association emerged as partners. The idea of partnership is gradually being extended to the other ethnic groups, which can only serve to enhance Canadian unity, rather than weaken it as is believed by some sceptics and pessimists.

The beginning of the second century is a good time to consider a resurgence in the development of our country. The development of a ribbon of civilization above the 49th parallel received the attention of our Canadian pioneers in the first century of our history, and as this widened further north, unlocking vast treasures of timber and minerals, and settlements prospered on the prairies, it was a period of great achievement which the generous immigration policy at the beginning of the century made possible. I venture to say that if successive governments had kept an open door immigration policy after the first great war we would today have a population not of 20 million but of 40 million. Only recently, since this government took office, has there been a more realistic immigration policy which has made it possible to almost triple the number of immigrants admitted to Canada in 1966 from a low of 72,000 in 1962.

I have been rather critical of the immigration policy of the former Conservative government for lack of vision concerning immigration. I have consistently advocated a more generous policy to encourage people to make their home in Canada. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration is to be congratulated for accepting several recommendations of the joint Senate and House of Commons committee on immigration designed to allow prospective immigrants to enter Canada without the skills and educational standards contained in the white paper, with a modification of sponsorship regulations which were considered too drastic if applied according to the original draft of the white paper. Canada needs men and women with skills, but equally the need for unskilled persons, if not as great today as at the beginning of the century is nevertheless substantial and important to the development of our country.

Indeed, Canada's history is laced with the story of people from many lands coming to Canada in search of peace, freedom and prosperity, building a new life; people from every country of the globe and from every walk of life enriching Canada with character and tradition. I anticipate that with the approval of legislation based on the committee's recommendations the annual number of immigrants will be no less than 1 per cent of the total population, which will ensure the admittance of at least 200,000 per year. I maintain that is a modest figure but is relatively substantial and, all things considered is a great improvement over the early years of the 1960's.

The opposition characterized the throne speech as a rehash, which can be interpreted as the ranting of frustrated politicians. Unbiased people will look at it objectively and see in it many good measures designed to give Canadians good, sound government.

The promised revision of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, as an example, is a heart warming decision. The act dates back to 1908 and has remained virtually unchanged since 1929. It is badly out of date and unduly harsh on young people. The changes will include authority to juvenile courts to make fuller use of probation and parole services and suspended sentences.

The John Howard and Elizabeth Fry societies are doing a tremendous job with most limited and inadequate financial resources, and here I wish to appeal to the government to be less stingy in granting financial assistance to these societies, which are composed of men and women dedicated to the rehabilitation of the unfortunate young and old who happen to fall into the channels of crime.

To give an example of the niggardly extent of federal help to these organizations let us mention that the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry societies of the district of Thunder Bay, which includes my own constituency of Fort William, are not affiliated with the John Howard society of Ontario solely because of a lack of necessary funds. Mr. Keith Couse, assistant director of the Ontario John Howard society, speaking at an annual meeting of the Thunder Bay society in Fort William in January, 1966 stated there were 2000 inmates from the Thunder Bay area serving time in various penal institutions in Ontario. More than 20 per cent of the total population in the Stony Mountain penitentiary in Manitoba are from the district of Thunder Bay.

This society exists on a budget of $7,750, of which $4,500 comes from the United Appeal, $2,000 from the provincial government and $800 from local memberships. The federal government is contributing the magnificent sum of $450. I call it a shame. This budget is expected to cover the operation of an office, a case worker, a part time secretary, and financial assistance for the basic necessities of their clients such as work clothes, food, lodging or relocation expenses. I need not point out the obvious, namely that they cannot afford the services of a professional case worker, or even to affiliate with the Ontario society which could give professional guidance to an unqualified worker.

In brief, the effectiveness of this society is very seriously impaired by lack of funds. Rehabilitation must begin behind the prison walls to prepare the inmate for the numerous problems he will face, to gain his trust before he leaves, to arrange family readjustments, to find him a job, and in short to be ready to receive him immediately on his release.

The importance of this procedure will be realized when we understand that 86 per cent of these inmates will not be on parole but will have completed their sentences. They will not have supervision. They will find they cannot make it alone. The majority, too suspicious to knock on the door of the office for assistance, will revert to crime and return behind the prison walls. The answer is frequent visits to these institutions. Thus we complete the vicious circle, and we face the lack of funds.

Let us look at the results. Here in Canada we have six times as many people in jails, per capita, as countries such as Denmark or Holland, which parole 80 per cent of their inmates, 52 per cent of whom complete their parole satisfactorily while in Canada less than 15 per cent are paroled, and of this small number half are paroled to the John Howard agency with 10 per cent of that number completing parole successfully. Our penal institutions are crowded, our jails are overflowing, and we must spend millions of dollars to build better and bigger jail houses.

The John Howard society, with its fine record of rehabilitation, could do much to eliminate this overpopulation in jails if it were given reasonable grants from this government. The Thunder Bay society with its extremely limited budget handles six parolees a year and less than 100 annually of those who complete their sentences. Their success rate is high, but without guidance from the Ontario society and a professional case worker they cannot begin to perform the required job. Should the government move toward mandatory parole, which is being studied now by the attorney general, how could an agency such as this one even begin to do an adequate job? The board of directors of this society is very concerned and hopes the government will consider most seriously a generous grant to the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry societies which serve the whole district of Thunder Bay, including the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, the record of which in providing parolees with direction, shelter, clothing and jobs is second to none in Canada.

Such hon. members have been complaining about the length of the speech from the throne. May I suggest to you, sir, that in the nine years I have had the privilege of sitting in this chamber I have never heard a throne speech with so many references to consequential legislation designed to assist the economy of the nation in every sphere of national activity as the one delivered by the new Governor General.

In the development of incentive programs I urge the government to extend the designated area to include northwestern Ontario, a 200,000 square mile area of great natural resources, many of which are still untapped. Northwestern Ontario has been more or less neglected in favour of the more affluent eastern parts of the province. I suggest to the Minister of Defence Production that he give consideration to the resolution of the Northwestern Ontario Municipal Association, the Northwestern Ontario Associated Chambers of Commerce and the Northwestern Ontario Development Council urging the establishment of incentives to industry because, in the light of the obvious fact that industry is going where the free gifts are, these three groups have had more to do with the development of northwestern Ontario than any others. They state that none of the measures taken so far have proved effective and that this resource-filled area is being bypassed and ignored even though it qualifies as a development area in every apparent way.

Not only is the designated area program denied to northwestern Ontario but every suggestion toward an area-based handling of such aids to industry is turned down. The northwestern Ontario area desires an incentive program to attract secondary industry, business and individuals.

The proposal to amend the Indian Act to benefit the Indian and Eskimo people should be welcomed by every member of this house. Being a member of the standing committee on Indian affairs I have a particular interest in the welfare of our original Canadians. Of course I am not alone in appreciating the government's concern in accelerating assistance in an effort to secure for them greater participation in the affairs of the nation.

The legislation to provide long term loans to agricultural and fisheries associations to permit them to develop facilities is indeed a welcome move. This government has done a great deal for agriculture since it took power, and the announcement of the establishment of a special task force under the Minister of Agriculture and the broadening of the Farm Credit Act are also measures that the farmers of my constituency, and no doubt many other constituencies, will appreciate and welcome.

The promotion of consumer interests will include the designation of a department of corporate and consumer affairs. This feature will have the effect of stabilizing consumer prices and prevent the spiralling cost of commodities affecting every household in the country. These are only a few of the 30-odd items contained in the speech from the throne for the specific purpose of making life for the Canadian people easier and happier. In the words of the Prime Minister I say:

> —the speech from the throne reflects in general terms the need for government to improve the opportunities for every Canadian to live a better life.

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, may I be permitted to particularly commend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) upon his masterful maiden speech. His effort was outstanding and appeared even more remarkable when compared with the document he was interpreting. I suppose it is only normal for government members to find much more cause for enthusiasm in the speech from the throne than members of the opposition. We on this side, without too much trouble, can recall other speeches from the throne and other legislative programs which produced more disillusionment than ecstacy.

The pith of the throne speech, if it can be called such, in this centennial year was a preamble on our hundred years' history which sounded more like a conducted tour of a factory than the description of the emergence of a nation. The lavish description of our contemporary social, cultural and economic environment is exceeded only by the dynamic and challenging future which will come about as a result of the implementation of the added superlatives, pious platitudes and worn out cliches which together are the framework of this current document. This speech, like the authors, is trying to provide all things to all people, and in its desperate attempt to cover every field of endeavour the government is becoming more socialist than the socialists. In so doing the government is crowding the private enterprise sector of our economy into ever narrowing and restrictive limits.

This country of ours was built largely by the efforts of free and private enterprise, and it is sad and humiliating for a Conservative to be present and watch a government which finds hanging so obnoxious but permits the slow strangulation of our traditional economic system and the erosion of our hereditary symbols. There is nothing in the speech from the throne which provides any positive proof that closer ties with the commonwealth are advantageous, that the monarchy provides the best type of parliamentary government or that our constitution which has stood the test of time could not be improved by judicious amendment.

A nation needs a strong spirit as well as a healthy body, but if the body politic is partisan and amoral, the body social dependent and sterile, no amount of legislative action can heal and no amount of penance absolve. A young country in order to expand and develop needs strong initiative from its people, but this will not be developed by the introduction of a guaranteed annual income or any scheme to give cradle to the grave protection supplied by a paternal government.

My leader, in the course of his timely and enlightened contribution, pointed out some of the omissions in the speech from the throne, but his chivalrous treatment of this document indicated that without continuing support from its sponsors it might well collapse from the weight of its own preponderance. It has been noted that while there have been no rave notices in the newspapers on the content of the speech, neither have there been any wholesale condemnations. There has, however, from all quarters been indifferent and desultory sniping indicative of an elusive and indefinite target.

The most tangible contents seem to have originated in committees by way of recommendations during the past year, or in private members' bills which emanated from the backbenches, so long overlooked. One would have thought, too, that in centennial year those who made a contribution to the peace and safety of our country might well have been given some consideration. The veterans, however, seem to have been forgotten. On more than one occasion members of this party have put forward some sound ideas for the improvement of the Pension Act. While it may be conducive to orderly planning to wait for the report of the Wood commission before making any changes, it should be borne in mind that contrary to the words of the old wartime song, old soldiers do not live forever.

The treatment of the veteran is not unique; while the government transports us in flights of fancy, in esthetic dreams of cultural ecstasy, the material things of life which sustain the average individual are daily becoming more costly to obtain. The ever increasing rise in the cost of living, coupled with a similar rise in the cost of production, is nowhere more visible than in the agricultural industry. The proposed march on Ottawa by eastern farmers must be looked upon with sympathy by Canadian farmers in general because the agricultural sector is one area of our economy where the cost of production has far outstripped returns to the producer.

The fact that the government has proposed a special task force for agriculture indicates that some concern is held for the future of this industry. However, some guide lines are needed if those who may form this combat group of Joe Greene's giants can be expected to produce anything constructive. While the special task force can do little to influence the Kenndy round of trade negotiations where the cereals committee of GATT is concerned, or to initiate any action under the I.W.A., there are definite fields in which improvement can take place. For instance, the beef industry will soon be in jeopardy unless thousands of acres of pasture land are found in the immediate future. This country will be importing beef in three years unless suitable grazing land is found to support the cattle which will be needed to meet our increasing demands.

The transportation and storage facilities for agricultural products might also be examined. There has been little change in our livestock and grain cars in the last 60 years. Our country elevators are certainly not models of efficiency, and it does not seem unreasonable to expect that one or two modern elevators at each shipping point would be much more effective than the number that are in operation to meet present day requirements. It also seems absurd that thousands of bushels of dockage is shipped to the terminal elevators every year, thus wasting time, space and money when this by-product could be utilized in local feed lots and by local industry in the form of prepared stock feeds. If at any time this anticipated force is in any doubt as to the path of progress, it might well investigate those responsible for the construction of dams in Saskatchewan and why they were not named accordingly.

However, a serious situation has developed in Saskatchewan and it is this. At present P.F.R.A. officials are unable to proceed with needed projects because of the inability of the government to decide which department is responsible for the very essential programs which in the past have been the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture but are now disseminated among the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Forestry and the Department of Agriculture. The Prime Minister has said this is an important question, and since adequate supplies of fresh water are one of our greatest assets it behooves the government to make the necessary decisions as soon as possible in order that these water and land conservation projects may be proceeded with at the earliest convenience. With the conclusions of work on the South Saskatchewan river dam the P.F.R.A. authorities will be available for other extensive works, and they should not be kept in ignorance because of indecision on the part of government departments.

Our agricultural industry and its potential is in the hands of Canadian citizens, and the same could be said of our other industries if Canadians had confidence in their own future. Canadians are the world's greatest savers. By investing in our own future, by expanding our industries, by extending our trade to all parts of the world, by processing our materials at home and by the proper inducements to save for ownership, we will not only own the corporations that develop our wealth but will be supplying capital to others as well. The benefits of corporate capitalism have been well demonstrated. They have raised not only the level of our own living standards but forced socialistic countries to re-examine their economic systems as well.

The occasion of our Canadian centennial invites us to examine the progress of the last hundred years. But it also invites us to remember that Abraham Lincoln was assassinated a little over a hundred years ago. Legend has it that he once spoke these wise and eloquent words:

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves.

This is a philosophy which can be accepted by all men of good faith no matter of what political affiliation, and if applied in this centennial year as a basis of progress for the future the higher standards of quality and service, honour and integrity, will be well served by this and succeeding parliaments.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the other members who have preceded me in this debate in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address on their excellent speeches. Before turning to the main subject matter of my remarks I should like to congratulate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) on what he recently said about the war in Viet Nam. I should like to re-echo his words when he said "I believe all of us have a duty to record our growing horror over what is going on in Viet Nam. If the present policy leads to disaster, the extermination of millions of unfortunate Vietnamese, or possibly global nuclear war, our failure to speak out will always remain on our conscience."

I find it hard to phrase a more scathing indictment of the government of which the President of the Privy Council remains a member. Their policy in this issue has been one of mute, inglorious neutrality, of silence in the face of some of the greatest moral issues which have faced this or any other generation.

The recurring theme in this debate has been future constitutional arrangements for Canada, and this is the matter I should like to discuss. The celebration of 100 years of our history as a nation provides the occasion for a look at our fundamental institutions, a look backward that can be one of gratitude and thankfulness for our growth as a nation, and a look forward that enables us to assess whether we need changes for the future.

The constitution, as all hon. members know, is the fundamental law or framework within which our governments operate. The powers conferred on governments by the constitution and the limitations imposed on governments by the constitution are of the utmost practical importance to all Canadians. In my view there is a need for change in our constitution, not necessarily radical change but nevertheless change that is real.

In our view, Mr. Speaker, our confederation will be seriously endangered if we are not prepared to make the necessary changes but accept the static and laissez faire attitude which seems to dominate the thinking at the present government. Constitutions, of course, by reason of the fact that they represent the fundamental law of the country, cannot be subjected to constant change; they do require a degree of permanency. But they are human institutions, and as such should not be considered immutable or unamendable. As we all know, our present constitution is the British North America Act, a statute passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom as long ago as 1867, a time when Canada consisted of a group of isolated colonies with agricultural economies totally different from the modern industrialized society that is Canada today.

As all members of the house realize, the British North America Act has been amended in small details from time to time and then, of course, has followed the due process of interpretation by the courts. But there are two reasons, in our view, for changing our constitution. The first is that it is an obsolete document. This is not surprising. Indeed, it would be strange if a document which was drafted to fit the circumstances of a group of isolated agricultural colonies a century ago remained appropriate in the totally different context of a modern industrial nation. It is trite to point out that we are living in a world of constant and rapid world-wide change. The functions of government today are totally different from the functions of government 100 years ago.

The second basic reason, in our view, that we need a new look at our constitution arises out of the crisis—an overworked word, perhaps—caused by the emergence of what has been called the quiet revolution in Quebec. It does not seem to me a particularly appropriate phrase because it has not been particularly quiet, and I do not think "revolution" is a very apt word. But the fact is clear—and I think this should be welcomed by all Canadians—that a new spirit, a new and vigorous sense of identity, is abroad in the province of Quebec and among French speaking Canadians generally.

Some people seem to think that the sense of discontent in Quebec will just go away if we do not bother about it. Indeed, that seems to be the attitude of the present government.

I prefer the view expressed by men such as Claude Ryan of Le Devoir, by the 15 members of the B and B commission, by the premier of Quebec and by many others when they tell us that the aspirations of Quebec have created a genuine crisis and for a solution require revisions to our constitution. Mr. Ryan, editor of Le Devoir, a few weeks ago said that Quebec was not eager to secede from Canada but desired expression in the constitution of a clearer and more satisfactory status. In his view the articles of the constitution need to be gone over one by one and a definition drawn of the new status. I am convinced that we ignore the pleas of such well informed and devoted Canadians as Mr. Ryan at out peril.

What are some of the fundamentals of our constitutional structure that we should take account of in the process of revision? We need not be revolutionary in the sense of discarding that which has worked well in the past, but I suggest there are some guide posts to necessary change. First and simplest, we should discard the obsolete and meaningless sections in the constitution. They were transitional in 1867 and are meaningless today. At least 50 sections of the British North America Act could be eliminated.

Second, I believe we need a new preamble to the constitution, and it ought to refer to the historic partnership of English and French speaking people and the contributions of Canadians of other ethnic origins. It ought to make clear that the foundation of our system of government is respect for individual and minority rights, the protection of historic rights of religion, education and language, and a legislative system based on the British parliamentary model. In my view such a preamble would not be mere rhetoric but would be of very definite educational value not only for school children but for the many thousands of immigrants that we expect to welcome to Canada from all over the world.

We ought to entrench in our constitution a constitutional bill of rights. We have at present a bill of rights which was passed by parliament, but its inadequacy is obvious. It does not apply to provincial legislatures, and may be repealed by parliament at any time parliament chooses to legislate in a manner inconsistent with it. According to our courts it has no effect on existing federal legislation. A constitutional bill of rights would be valuable for the defence of our traditional liberties and a useful educational tool to set out explicitly some of our fundamental institutions.

I was glad to hear the Prime Minister say that he will discuss a constitutional bill of rights next month with the premiers of the various provinces. I hope the proposed constitutional amendments incorporating the bill of rights will be made available for discussion in this house before, not after, they are submitted to the provincial authorities.

The core of the constitutional problem is the distribution of legislation power between federal and provincial authorities which is embodied in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. I think these two sections ought to be reviewed with two aims in mind. First we ought to consider what are the necessary and characteristic functions of modern government in the second half of the twentieth century; also, how are those functions to be allocated between federal and provincial authorities and how are resources to be allocated to enable alloted functions to be efficiently fulfilled. The other point to be borne in mind is whether it is wise, in our revised constitution, or necessary to allow Quebec a special status. The expression "special status" is very general, and it is necessary to be precise when dealing with it. I propose later in my remarks to define more precisely what we in this party mean when we say we are in favour of a special status for Quebec.

Nearly all governments in modern industrial communities, irrespective of ideological background, have been forced into assuming functions quite different from the traditional functions of government. The scourge of unemployment in the '30's has lead to the adoption of Keynesian theories that the government must maintain full employment. This is as true of the United States, which emphasizes its devotion to private enterprise, as it is of various Scandinavian countries that have accepted the philosophy of democratic socialism. Both have moved toward a mixed economy, a sort of partnership between government and private enterprise. Full employment policies, in their turn, create a risk of inflation and rising prices. This leads to demands for government action in price control, and on the other side of the coin governments are asked to assume responsibility for economic growth through public investment and selective intervention in the economy.

Exponents of all political faiths, with the exception of a few dinosaurs, have accepted the theory of government intervention in economic planning. These theories were denounced as socialistic a few years ago, but they are now the stock in trade of all parties in modern societies. The problem is to make economic planning work.

Governments have also accepted responsibility in fields of social security. Lastly, governments today are called on to provide services which I like to call the infrastructure of modern living. Here I refer to housing, health, vastly expanded educational services, urban development and redevelopment. Without government intervention in these fields we could not live as we now live in this modern age.

It is necessary to review government functions to see where different levels of government fit. In our view a federal system of government offers distinct political and economic advantages which would disappear if federal authority were undermined in key areas, those advantages including political stability which is necessary to attract foreign capital and to mobilize domestic capital, a stronger political voice and bargaining power in international affairs and international trade, the maintenance of a free trade area from coast to coast, and a bulwark against foreign domination.

To this end we believe that federal authority must be preserved in such fields as credit, banking, investment, monetary and fiscal policy, tariffs and transportation, to name a few only. There is no room here for special status for Quebec or any province. We have been concerned about the gradual erosion of federal powers in the fields I mentioned which has become apparent in federal-provincial conferences over the past few years.

The responsibilities of various government levels in fields of social security must be clear, that those responsibilities may be adequatey discharged. It is desirabe to have federal control in fields such as family allowances, non-contributory old age pensions and the like. There are some fields such as hospitalization and health services where the present system of provincial administration and partial federal financing works well, and where it should be retained with great advantage in transferability of benefits throughout Canada. Here also the federal contribution helps equalize the burden as between provinces.

In other fields of social security provincial governments, being closer to the people, should have sole responsibility. But if we are to make progress toward the goal of regional equality, equalization payments from the federal treasury will continue to be required. In the field of social security, while a clear allocation of authority is required, I can see no urgent need for a special status for Quebec.

It is in the third field of the collective services or infrastructure, as I have called it, that a special status for Quebec is called for. Quebec does have an historic tradition, culture and language of her own, of which she is justly proud and which she proposed to develop on her own lines. Undoubtedly connected with this fact of cultural difference is the whole field of education at all levels and the development of urban services. If Quebec desires to do these things alone, why not? But if the other nine provinces believe that university education, adult retraining and urban development can be more efficiently planned and financed through the intervention of the federal authority, why should they be held back by the desire of Quebec to be on her own in these matters?

The special status for Quebec which we in this party advocate is not some sort of political concession made to win the political approval of voters in the province of Quebec; it is merely a recognition of the facts of life, namely that people with a special culture of their own are entitled to retain complete control, if they so desire, over matters intimately connected with that culture such as education. On the other hand it must be recognized that it is the people in the other nine provinces who ought to be most insistent that Quebec should have a special status and that federal intervention should not be restricted to the level desired by Quebec.

If I understand the doctrine propounded by the Minister of Justice it is that the present constitutional arrangement, interpreted in such a way that the federal government should stay strictly out of the fields of provincial jurisdiction, is quite sufficient to satisfy the aspirations of the province of Quebec. I do not know whether this is so. However it may be, there is no reason why this doctrine should be accepted by the rest of Canada. There may well be fields of action in which federal intervention is desired by the other provinces although unacceptable to Quebec. If so, the device of a special status for Quebec can be used to meet the aspirations of Quebec on the one hand and the rest of Canada on the other. I am afraid I have no time to give illustrations showing how this would apply.

It appears to me that in this whole field of constitutional reform the government has lamentably failed to give leadership. This is clearly demonstrated by the words put into the mouth of the Governor General in the speech from the throne. This Liberal government was elected four years ago. We have been in a constitutional crisis throughout this whole period. The necessity of taking a look at the constitution has been urged on the government by many different people including many members of this house.

The government, we are told in the speech from the throne, "is aware of its unique responsibility to assure that our fundamental law is readily adaptable to our changing social needs". It is so fully aware of this that after four years in office the best that can be said on the subject is contained in the following phrase: "Studies to obtain the best advice on this important matter are now under way with a view to specific consideration of the whole problem by parliament".

Who will compose this anonymous committee? When will they report? We are told nothing.

What an extraordinary neglect is admitted in these words. The government is so aware of its unique responsibility that now, after four years of constitutional crisis, it is apparently starting to study the subject of constitutional change.

The initiative has passed to provincial governments which are setting up committees, calling conferences and so on. But there is a reason for this federal neglect by the government. The reason is that the government is frightened of parliamentary democracy and is unwilling to submit to the elected representatives of the various parties the urgent problem of the future constitution of Canada.

The view of the government is described inelegantly as the can of worms theory or the theory of Pandora's box. It is feared that if there is open discussion of our constitutional future excessive demands may be made, and the desire to make political capital will prevail over a sense of responsibility. It is thought that discussion by the members of parliament will add to the difficulties and create disunity rather than consensus. I have no doubt this is the reason the government has failed to set up a parliamentary committee to discuss the future constitution of Canada.

In my view this is a tragic underestimate of the sense of responsibility of members of parliament. It is my opinion that Canadians are capable generally, and elected Canadians are especially capable if they are given the opportunity, of getting down to the difficult but by no means hopeless task of solving their constitutional problems.

As I understand it, it was the practical politicians who laid the basis for confederation at a time when the divisions and distances in Canada were much greater than they are today. This house is representative, as no other group of people can be, of the people of Canada as a whole. We represent every region of Canada; we represent nearly all the politically significant viewpoints of Canadians. We represent practical political views vital to the solution of these problems.

It will be a grave disservice to the future of this country if the present lack of leadership continues. It is, of course, possible to exaggerate the importance of written documents. The unity of Canada does not depend on merely constitutional solutions. It depends upon a modest pride among Canadians; it depends upon good sense and patience. It also depends upon a willingness to tackle problems rather than shove them under the table.

The need for revision of the constitution is one of the most urgent tasks which face this country. We do not need constitutional revolution but we do need constitutional revision and we ought to be getting on with the job. We in this party entirely agree with the opening statement in the motion by the Leader of the Opposition, namely that this house regrets that Her Majesty's advisers have failed to submit any program to give effective direction with regard to Canada's constitutional development in this centennial year. But we do not believe that the calling of a constitutional conference at this stage would be useful. Such a conference, in order to prove fruitful, must be preceded by a great deal of study in this parliament and by a statement of the federal position. A conference called without a background of firm federal preparation could turn into a fiasco and be of little help. I was interested to see that in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition there was no indication of the direction in which change should take place, no guidance as to the stand the federal authority might take.

I should like to refer now to the subamendment introduced by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier). We are frankly at a loss to understand what this amendment means. It was perhaps the product of a great deal of procedural ingenuity so as to fit it within the framework of the rules. We are, of course, very much concerned about the present day difficulties of dairy farmers. We have clear views as to the policies required in order to deal with those difficulties. But the subamendment refers to some sort of constitutional change or amendment—it is very vague—and it does not seem to us to have any bearing whatever on the present problems of dairy farmers or any other farmers, for that matter. We believe in the general statement of concern that is expressed in the amendment, but again we do not think it produces any sort of remedy which to us seems to make any particular sense and therefore we will not be able to support it.

In conclusion may I say that to many people a discussion of constitutional issues is a tedious and boring matter which they like to leave to constitutional lawyers. I believe, however, that it is one of the most practical and important matters which face us. I believe our workers and our farmers, all our people, can be aided in their search for a better life if we in this house, in parliament and in public life, tackle the problem of a careful thoughtful revision of our constitution. I think it would be wrong for any of us to attempt to lay down hard and fast prescriptions as to precisely what changes we think are necessary. I have outlined some of the changes which we in this party think are necessary. I call on the government to do what it heretofore has failed to do and start to give the needed leadership to the people of Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to direct a question to the hon. member.

Am I right in thinking that special status as he defines it implies no change in the present constitutional situation toward a further decentralization in favour of Quebec particularly?

Mr. Brewin: I do not think it implies any change. I think that whether or not we give a special status there is plenty of room for a process of decentralization, particularly decentralization of federal intervention. I believe this is desirable, but I do not think that meets the problem of whether there is a special status required in such matters as education and perhaps urban renewal, to take two examples.

Mr. Pepin: Special status, the way the hon. member for Greenwood understands it, would seem to me to mean a special status in relation to changes which the hon. member would like to see brought about in the constitutional system. It seems to imply that the special status itself is only the constitutional status quo, as it exists now.

Mr. Brewin: I do not think so. As I said, one of the big difficulties is that we use expressions like "associated state", "special status" and so on which may mean many different things. Many people say that there already is in the B.N.A. Act a special status for Quebec which recognizes the historic fact of a different culture. All we are saying is that in the expanding function of government we believe there are some things which the province of Quebec might want to do alone and therefore should be exempt from federal jurisdiction but that the other provinces which may want to do these things together under federal jurisdiction should not be held back because legitimately and properly the province of Quebec says that this is something which affects its culture and therefore it wishes to retain control over it.

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think we all agree that their speeches were of a very high standard. At this time I should also like to pass on my sincere sympathy to the family of Mrs. Konantz, one who was truly loved and respected by all members of this house.

The day following the speech from the throne one of our leading daily papers summarized it in this way: "Something for everyone". I am very sorry to say that one type of business was not mentioned in the speech from the throne, one which plays a very important part in the economy of this nation. This type of business has also not been mentioned in many throne speeches in the past. I have in mind small business. Often we are led to wonder whether small business, like the small farm, is on its way out. There is certainly little doubt that small business is having one of the toughest times it has ever had to survive, and the cause is not solely competition from large corporations as many people seem to think. There are many other factors and I will deal with them separately.

There still is and must be a place for small business. Except via the small business route where else can an individual with the desire, the initiative, and of course always with a limited amount of financing, start. Be it industrial, retail, farming or fishing, it is all small business. Many of the large corporate business of today had their start in this very medium. As a member of the government party I almost hate to say this in the House of Commons, but while checking not with one but with many small businessmen not only in my own constituency but elsewhere in the province of Ontario and in other provinces throughout Canada I found that the one main factor that is working against small business is the autocratic bureaucracy of all governments in legislating their new way of life. It is a good life and it is all right to have such legislation, but by the time the small businessman meets the demands in respect of all the social and other benefits of government there is little left for his efforts. These efforts are not completed in an eight hour day or a five day week. They extend anywhere from 12 to 14 or 15 hours a day and in many many cases for seven days a week. The corporate business is better able to cope with the current trend since it is better equipped, better staffed and of course has greater financial stability than the struggling merchant or small industry.

A recent report of the Department of Finance pointed out that the steady decline of net income of non-farm, non-incorporated businesses from 8.5 per cent in 1949 to 5.5 per cent in 1965 continued downward to 5.1 per cent in the first half of 1966. I should like to point out that this drop in profit would appear to be exceeded only by farm operators, who represent another form of small business.

While talking to different businessmen throughout my constituency and in other parts of the country, a local small businessman pointed out to me recently that many small businesses are acting as a training ground, which they can ill afford to do, for employees who are being taken by larger businesses. Many of these small businesses have spent a year or more training employees in the managerial aspect of their businesses only to have them grabbed up by big business. The experience gained by employees in small businesses enables them to obtain better positions at the expense of the small businessman. Small businessmen realize that this is part of the game they must play and they accept the fact, but this is an illustration of one of the additional problems the small businessman must face.

I am sure that the government wants to do something for these people operating small private enterprises, but the truth of the matter is, I am sorry to say, that the government does not realize their true plight. The local merchant to whom I referred suggested that wages and other benefits for labour are increasing. He suggests there is nothing wrong in this regard but feels that the government should direct some attention to the rather rocky road being travelled by those who wish to succeed in small private enterprises. Have we thought about these small businessmen who make up the heart of our economy? These are people who are ambitious to the extent they will work longer than a five day week or an eight hour day. If the efforts of these enterprising Canadians are to be curtailed by an overbearing bureaucracy then this nation will be brought to stagnation by two classes of people, those who want shorter working hours and those who are resting comfortably at the top of the business ladder. Surely this country does not want to see that happen.

In the majority of cases small businesses are family businesses, and I include in this category small farms and fishing operations. People in this category are becoming very disturbed about the fact that these are the only types of corporate enterprises not able to employ wives, pay them a salary and deduct their wages at the end of the year as a business expense as other corporate businesses are allowed to do. This creates an extreme hardship on the small businessman. Large industrial concerns are not particularly concerned about employing wives but many enterprises take advantage of the fact that the salary of wives can be deducted as a business expense. This leaves only the small businessman and the professional man as exceptions to the general rule applying to incorporated businesses.

In many cases the professional man is not interested in whether his wife works, but the small businessman often has to employ his wife in an effort to succeed. In this case the wife takes a greater interest in the business than an ordinary employee and puts in longer hours when the husband is away on business such as buying trips. However, at income tax time her efforts in helping to maintain the community enterprise are not rewarded as are the efforts of her counterpart in many other cases.

We as members of parliament must realize that there are valid reasons that no changes have been made in the act in this regard. However, we must realize that with the continuing trend toward amalgamation some thought should be given to easing the income tax restrictions regarding the part wives play in the successful operation of small businesses. I hope the government will give sincere and serious consideration to easing the restrictions in this regard.

When talking to these small businessmen one hears a great many different stories, but I should like to give one factual illustration of the discrimination which takes place. One young retail merchant I know lost his top employee not many months ago to a franchise grocery chain. As a result his wife had to increase her number of working hours until a replacement was found. That happened two months ago and a replacement has not yet been found. This is a young family with small children and a part-time housekeeper had to be hired to look after the needs of the children. Had this family been in a position to hire a full-time housekeeper they could deduct this expense as a business item. The family was not in a position to do so and as a result cannot classify the housekeeper's wages as a business expense. Something is wrong with our system when some sort of adjustment cannot be made to help small businessmen under these circumstances.

Originally under the Small Businesses Loans Act the government guaranteed chartered bank loans to small enterprises engaged in manufacturing, wholesaling or retailing or service industries to a maximum of $25,000. These loans must be secured and may be repaid over a period of up to ten years with an interest rate of 5½ per cent. One might think these people could go to the bank and easily obtain a loan but nothing could be further from the truth in the past few years. I know of dozens of small businessmen who have not been able to get a loan from a chartered bank under any circumstances. Many of them were advised by bankers to try to obtain a loan somewhere else because of all the red tape involved. I am not suggesting something that is not factual. The banker who gave me this information told me that from the time a small businessman made his application to the time he received the loan from the bank he would forget what he wanted it for. Let us face the facts. In plain language, during the past few years at least —I am not going into the future but am talking about the past—the banks were just not interested in making loans to small businesses. Let nobody, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), suggest that they were, because they were not.

Under a recent revision of the Small Businesses Loans Act by the Department of Finance, companies in construction, transportation and communications will qualify for small business loans for the first time. The maximum gross revenue of companies eligible for loans has been doubled from $250,000 to $500,000. This should benefit particularly small trading firms whose profits are at a low percentage. The interest rate is, of course, 5½ per cent as before.

It may be asked, what is the difference now? The difference is found in the atmosphere created by the changes in the Bank Act. With interest rates dropping and the prevailing rate holding at about 6 per cent it is now felt that, having regard to the 5½ per cent guaranteed by the government of Canada and the 6 per cent charged by the banks, a difference of only half of 1 per cent, the banks will now be more generous in lending money to small businesses. We hope this will be so.

Everything nowadays points to expansion in business, in farming and every other line of industry, the thought being, of course, that the larger the unit the more economic it is to handle. That is all very fine, but let me say now that bigness in business is possibly getting a little too big, and its coming is doing away with incentives to the average individual who does not want to become just another link in a chain that is putting incentives in the hands of a very few. Let us not forget that when an individual loses desire because of little or no incentive it is not only bad for the individual but for the community and the country in which he lives.

I do not think the good old opposition on the other side of the chamber will disagree that the economy of the country has never been better than at the present time. But—here is that great word "but"; if it were not in our language I do not know what we would do—what will happen if the economy of the country should slacken off rather drastically? No one will ever want to see a return of the conditions of the 1930's, no matter what party forms the government. But who is to say this is not possible? The thinking now, as we hear it from the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and other people, is to the effect that the future will see a guaranteed average income for the people of Canada. That is fine. I only hope it will prove to be true. We all hope it will prove to be true. But as the Prime Minister very forcibly pointed out, this can only be accomplished if the economy of the country is kept at a very high level.

May I, as a very ordinary backbencher who has had the privilege of being in this house for at least three sessions, give this little warning. A friend of mine said that backbenchers do not have much say in this house. That is wrong, because we do. There is no argument about this; the proof of the pudding is in the eating. But let me issue this little warning. No matter what we do in Canada to promote our economy, a country such as ours which depends so much on its exports—the Kennedy round of negotiation is just finishing—in order to keep its economy sound can only be as financially sound as the nations with which it deals. If we had to export only 10 per cent of what we produce in this country, that would be different. In other words, the future economy of Canada depends upon the future economy of the countries of the world.

I would like somebody to answer this question before I conclude. What happened to large business and industry in the 1930's? What would happen to large business now if there were a sudden drop in the country's economy? I believe that any person in business knows that many businesses are existing on a very marginal profit at the present time. I would like to deal with the situation in the 1930's because there are many young people in parliament and the young people will be running our country in the future. They have the education to enable them to do this but they have not had the experience of the 1930's. Very often it is a good thing to have had experience. Nobody can deny that big business crashed in the 1930's, taking thousands of large and small investors with it as well as the workers in those industries. What happened to small business in the 1930's? Small business carried the load and managed to survive and those that did not survive hurt but a few.

Before the 1930's it was my privilege to work on a large ranch in the Okanagan. I am very sorry that some of my good western friends and those from the prairies are not in the house at the moment. It may be difficult for people to believe, and even more difficult for me to believe now, that I actually hitched up and drove eight horses at a time. I worked on a very large ranch of thousands of acres. While there I made a friend who had a 25-acre fruit farm. Before the 1930's he was doing well. Mrs. Roxburgh and I had the privilege of going back there a number of times during the 1930's and later. During the 1930's my friend with his small, 25-acre fruit farm, his Chinese cook and very limited help during harvest, was able to make a small profit. That small profit was enough to allow him to go south for a couple of months during the winter.

There were two large ranches in the area. What happened to them? I will not mention any names in this connection. The two large fruit, grain and cattle ranches of a few thousand acres in size, which had been doing nicely before the 1930's, lost money and had to sell packets of land of 25 to 50 acres to people coming in from the midwest so the owners could pay their water rates and taxes. My friend with his small business did not have to do that. I understand that eventually one of the larger ranchers went completely bankrupt.

In conclusion I simply say: Let us not be carried away by all this bigness because it can become too big for our good. This government or any other government must somehow make it possible for small business to carry on so that it can not only play its part in the economy of the country but, what is most important as far as I am concerned and I know as far as all hon. members are concerned, provide the opportunities for advancement which it offers to the people of Canada. To keep small business alive is a must.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin by congratulating the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), the mover and seconder of the address in reply. I think their speeches were of very high calibre and I would like to congratulate the mover especially.

I think the throne speech debate should be a free expression of views and ideas by all members of parliament. This should be an occasion when ideas come up from the grass roots to the government rather than the reverse, which is what happens most of the time in a session of parliament when the members of parliament are required to pass judgment on programs which are put before the house by the government. Over the years I have heard many good ideas put forth by private members in various parts of the house in this and other debates of the session. When they were not considered newsworthy, regardless of their merit they seemed to go completely unnoticed and now they exist only in an embalmed state in the tomes of Hansard. Sometimes I think there should be some sort of group, either composed of members of the press or perhaps of members of the research branch of the parliamentary library, which might prepare a digest of the debates so that the public could receive in capsule form information about what the members of parliament are thinking and speaking about because, generally speaking, the public seems to think that members of parliament are mainly engaged in squabbling with each other and that they never come up with anything that is really constructive.

This is our centennial year and I believe we should attempt to look not just one year ahead, as we usually do at the opening of a normal session of parliament, but to look ahead at a whole century. We will not be very successful in doing this but the mental gymnastics involved will at least be helpful, I think. That being the case, of course, we will only be able to look at the high spots of these very greatly widened horizons and the details will have to be examined at some other time.

Members of parliament usually speak as representatives of their constituents and their constituents are considered to be the only people they represent. I think this was probably true to a large extent 100 years ago but owing to the fact that the world is shrinking members of parliament, elected representatives and leaders in all fields are becoming more and more the representatives of a greatly widened constituency. They are becoming the representatives of the whole of mankind. What we do or fail to do may well in the future determine the success or failure of the whole of humanity.

If I were to choose a theme for the rambling remarks I intend to make perhaps I would suggest that it be terre des hommes, man and his world, which is the theme of Expo '67. I realize that I am running a great danger here because the title of the book which gave its theme to Expo was translated into English as "Wind, Sand and Stars". It might be said of my remarks that I intended to make a windy speech throwing sand in the eyes of my opponents so that they would see stars. However, I should like to point out that this is not my intention because in this book the wind is the wind of the spirit, the sand is the earth from which we sprang and which gives us sustenance, and the stars are our place in the cosmos.

My interpretation of the theme "man and his world" bears absolutely no relationship to the one given by Expo, but I should like to say that man's relationship to the world has changed rapidly over a relatively short period of time. In the days of the Greeks and the Romans, the civilizations from which most of what we cherish has sprung, the known world was a very limited area around the Mediterranean sea and everything beyond that was terra incognita. It was the unknown world. But as time progressed and Marco Polo and others made contact with other civilizations in other parts of the world, man's horizons began to widen. Later came the marvelous era of discovery across the oceans. Nevertheless during this period the thoughts of men were governed by the fact that, as Aristotle said, the earth was the centre of creation and everything revolved around it.

About 300 years ago a new, revolutionary and earth-shaking philosophy was put forward by the astronomers of the day who were made to suffer for their views. Galileo, Brunnow and Copernicus put forward the shocking suggestion that perhaps the world was not the centre of everything and that we, the little egocentric beings, were not the most important or the whole of God's creation. Then, as men's vision began to widen they saw that their place in the universe was not as great as they had previously supposed. With the aid of telescopes men perceived the grandeur of the constellations. They began to realize that space was a vast extent. They believed, however, that the sun was the centre of creation and the planets revolved about it. The other stars were of no significance.

With the building of bigger and bigger telescopes developed by amateurs like Herschel they began to realize the magnitude of creation. In a paper which he read to the Royal Society in 1785 on the construction of the heavens Herschel, who professionally was an organist in Bath, England, explained why he found it necessary to build larger telescopes. He stated that to the unaided eye the milky way appears as a diffuse band of light across the sky. Through a small telescope it seems to be a collection of stars but many nebulous patches remain unresolved. Herschel said that as the power of the telescope is increased an observer perceives that those objects which had been called nebulae are evidently nothing but clusters of stars. He finds their numbers increase upon him, and when he resolves one nebula into stars he discovers ten new ones which he cannot resolve.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The British astronomer, Professor Lovell, points out the difficulty encountered by the mind of man in resolving his insignificant place in creation. He said that the egocentric idea was so firmly embedded in men's minds that even after the acceptance of the motion of the earth and the planets around the sun it was still believed that the solar system was in the centre of the universe of fixed stars. He says he was brought up on the idea that the sun was in the centre of a stellar system of many millions of stars distributed throughout such a volume of space that light would take 20,000 years to traverse the universe. Then he goes on to say that in later years he realized that we are not only cosmically small but we are in a rather undignified position amongst the stars of the milky way.

I should interject here, Mr. Speaker, that occasionally since I have been a member of parliament I have tried to make the odd speech which would expand our view and look at things in perhaps a philosophical light. Like most speeches of that type, they went completely unnoticed. As I have said, they are embalmed in the tomes of Hansard. Once in a while I am moved to make another just to keep them company. This introduction to my remarks merely serves to point out that in the last 100 years there has been a tremendous expansion of imagination, of thought and of understanding of our world. We have to rise to the occasion to assess and understand the significance of our world better than we did in the past. We know now that our galaxy is only one of millions of galaxies in the universe. Our galaxy, which is the milky way, is so large that it takes light about 100,000 years to cross it from side to side. However, it is minute compared with the whole of the universe.

As a matter of fact, galaxies like ours are so numerous in the heavens that they are counted in the thousands of millions. With the modern equipment which has recently been developed it is possible to locate and measure these galaxies out in space. The Harvard observatory has become so efficient in this operation that they are able to locate and chart new galaxies as large as ours at a cost of about $52 a hundred. However, each of these galaxies contains up to thousands of millions of stars, each one as significant as our sun.

As a result of world war II there have been tremendous advances in man's understanding of the environment in which he lives. This has been brought about chiefly by three things. The first was the putting into operation of the 200-inch optical telescope at Palomar in California, then the development of radio-astronomy, and finally the artificial earth satellites. We have now reached the place where we can probe into space a distance of about 6,000 million light years. A light year, of course, is the distance that light will travel at a rate of 186,000 miles a second in a year. However, the expanse of the universe is so vast we can no longer assume we are alone. Even if we assumed that the chances of a star like our sun having in its orbit another earth like ours that would be suitable for life were only one in a million, there would still be hundreds of millions of places where life probably exists.

How do we shore up our ego when we realize we are no longer the centre of creation and that we are only a recent phenomenon? We have not proven our ability to survive. We can create no impression of significance as a result of size or anything of that sort. This probably makes us feel rather humble and insignificant. When men believed they were the centre of everything, the centre of creation, a certain type of piety was very common. It still exists, even amongst members of this house. I can think of one case in the group to my left and one amongst the government of a very strong sense of piety, but it is a piety that stems from a reverence for the supreme being based upon his supposed resemblance to themselves. This idea is no longer enough for us. We must find some other reason to give meaning to the fact that we exist.

To what can humanity turn now to justify its existence? I think, Mr. Speaker, the thing that is unique about us is the human mind, the ability to wonder, the ability to record our own history and the opportunity, very rarely taken, to learn from the experience of our species. There is the ability also, which apparently no other form of life has to any great extent, to anticipate the future and try to plan for it. Unlike many forms of life, such as insects which come into the world inheriting all the knowledge they need, man has to learn. This puts a very great load on him as our fund of knowledge increases. It means that the learning process must be efficient and probably must be ever increasingly longer. There is, of course, the opportunity continuously to rise to higher and higher levels of understanding, something that is denied other forms of life. This is what has enabled man to achieve such glorious developments.

There is a great place for youth in our society but there is a great onus on youth to learn from experience and not to believe that youth knows it all already. I think that one of the great problems of our society which will be facing us in the years ahead is succinctly stated in the old German proverb which says that our difficulty is that we get wise so slowly and get old so quickly. One of the great questions which has to be solved in the years ahead is to develop medical science so as to eliminate premature senility. In this event, having educated a person we can then draw upon his knowledge, experience and judgment for as long as possible.

As a nation we are in terms of average age becoming older and older. A great deal of nonsense is uttered on this subject in newspaper editorials. I am shocked and surprised that editorial writers do not bother to consult easily procurable facts but try to create the impression that there are more young people in the country than was ever the case before and therefore we should immediately hand everything over to people under 25 or under 35, depending on the view of the editorial writer concerned. The fact of the matter is that we are becoming older and older as a nation. It is true that in 1966 it was estimated that 49.4 per cent of our population was under the age of 25. But in 1871, Mr. Speaker, 62.2 per cent of our population was under the age of 25, so we are becoming an older and older nation as time goes by.

The next most important question facing us as a nation and as a civilization is the struggle that is going on for the conquest of men's minds. We in the west seem to be oblivious almost to the titanic struggle for men's minds that is occupying those who would destroy our way of life. I fear that we are frequently being brainwashed without even knowing it. It is the avowed purpose of the communist world to attack our institutions by talking about peaceful co-existence, planting in our minds the idea of peace at any price, world disarmament, one world government, east and west trade, all of which are good.

They also preach atheism and tend to promote an attempt to destroy the family, the basic unit of our civilization. They promote class warfare in one form or another. They instigate all kinds of vice and degeneration, especially among our youth. They disparage everything and everybody that made the nation prosperous, strong and respected. They deride the armed forces, especially the police. They stress and magnify all the ancient problems of humanity as if they were something particularly limited to the capitalist system. This is not the case.

We are also faced with the great problem caused by the tremendous development in mass media communication. All of us listen to radio and television. These are media which could be a tremendous force in giving our civilization and our people information. However, usually they peddle propaganda, either consciously or unconsciously.

If this debate served no other purpose than to put on the record some of the words of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, I think the time spent by parliament would be richly rewarded. The hon. member said, as reported on page 25 of Hansard:

> But I want to say to this house with all the conviction at my command, and with the plea that hon. members accept my sincerity, that what we know about television is dangerously little. I am appalled by the comments made so frequently by so many people, and with such conviction, on the basis of so little hard evidence.
> I am held in awe sometimes by the power of this medium, by its ability to reach millions of Canadians at the turn of a switch. I shudder at the casual, offhand manner in which television sometimes deals with issues which can affect the survival of mankind. We hear a great deal about television's "hidden persuaders" and their ability to induce people to buy brand A in preference to brand B, a quality which is frequently condemned. What is too often overlooked is that those same hidden persuaders can also be used to sell ideas and doctrines which are not necessarily in the public interest. I do not suggest that television is being used subversively. The tragedy is that even if it were we do not possess enough knowledge to know.

I wish that extract from the hon. member's speech could be framed and included in the price of every television set so that all could read it before turning the set on.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

If we are to survive, Mr. Speaker, I believe our objectives should be truth, excellence and character. In this connection I should like to quote from a very worthy newsletter recently published by the Royal Bank of Canada:

> Everyone's life is spent in the pursuit of self-fulfilment, but not everyone reaches his objective. The man or woman who succeeds is a person who has realized in time that satisfaction does not arise merely from being good at something, but also from being a certain kind of person.
> Such a person is not content to dedicate his life to small purposes. He has quality in his ambition. He does not strive to amass stuff to feed his vanity, but does his best to become somebody who is esteemed. He wishes to be, not merely to appear, the best, for this is the mark of quality.
> The person of quality realizes that there is something beyond success: it is excellence. One may be successful in the eyes of the world without touching the Golden Fleece of excellence, for excellence is in the person and is not conferred by the greatness of the office he holds. It is typified in what the goddess Athene said of Ulysses, that in him "deed and word notably marched together to their deliberate end".

I believe I have another five minutes, Mr. Speaker, so I should like to devote about one minute to each of the subthemes of "Man and his World", first of all, "Man the Explorer". In the next 100 years man the explorer must devote his attention to exploring the cosmos, the sea around us, and the planet on which he lives. Most important, he must explore his own mind to realize its weaknesses and its potential.

I speak of "Man the Creator". If we are to have a creative society in the next 100 years we must develop an environment where man will have time to contemplate, as Newton had in his orchard, where man will have the incentive to create, where our spare time is not devoted to useless and terrible escapism from the world, but rather where man will face the problems of the world and try to solve them. Man the creator must appreciate excellence. We must discover what the good life is, set it as a goal and progress to it.

I speak of "Man the Provider". In the next 30 years as many more people will be added to the population of the earth as live on the earth now. Demand for food and clothing is going up by geometric progression, and our ability to meet this demand is not going up at such a rate. Man must learn to provide for his increased numbers or he must learn to limit his numbers. This will be one of the great problems in the first quarter of the next century.

I speak of "Man the Producer". We are on the threshold of an age of marvelous productivity brought about by the harnessing of energy that 25 years ago most did not dream existed—atomic energy.

My time is almost up. I could go on for another half hour but I shall conclude in one more minute by saying that the most important science for man to learn is the science of producing and distributing wealth. The science of economy is no more advanced today than was the science of medicine 300 years ago. We are surrounded by economic quackery and economic witch doctors on all sides. They try to apply their nostrums to the curing of man's material wants. It cannot be done that way.

We must have research and we must develop thought on how man's needs may be met. Most important, the meeting of man's physical needs should not be an end in itself but a means to an end to allow man to live the better life which will justify his existence, though he knows that he is a recent phenomenon only, existing on a speck of dust in a far off corner of the sea of space.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, after the others, I should like to express my deepest sympathy to the family of Mrs. Konantz whose charitable spirit we have learned to appreciate as well as the exceptional qualities of her character. All who sat with her were deeply grieved when they learned of her passing.

I should also, Mr. Speaker, like to express the usual congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech of the throne (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté). The usual congratulations also to the new Governor General, the Right Hon. Roland Michener who is the worthy successor of a worthy predecessor. He is the symbol in Canada of the supreme authority; he is also the representative of Her Majesty the Queen. In such circumstances, all zealotry should be set aside and the merits of such a distinguished function as that of Governor General should be recognized.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, this does not prevent the hon. members of parliament, even if they can conform to the requirements of the constitution and of respect to the authorities, to consider the reforms that must be made and which become necessary with the passing years.

I can understand that the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) should be galled to find reformist elements in the Liberal party. All the more so because he belongs to a party reputed for always looking to the past. On this side of the house, we see no sacrilege, we see no desecration of authority, when members prove capable of envisaging reforms which sooner or later will become realities.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the time is most appropriate for making the observations I should like to make, especially in view of the intervention of the member for Winnipeg South Centre this morning. I take the liberty to point out to him that there has been quite a change since 1945, let us say in the symbolism of Canadian sovereignty.

Before 1945, Canada's official flag, or at least the flag recognized, was the union jack. It is a flag which still deserves honour. After the war, it was realized that Canada has sufficiently matured to assert its sovereignty by means of a distinctive symbol. Thus, on a temporary basis, the red ensign, another flag which deserves honour, was flown as the Canadian flag.

A little later on, in 1952, when all previous governors general were British, the decision was made in a spirit of better Canadianism, to appoint a Canadian-born governor general.

In 1953, Queen Elizabeth succeeded George VI who was not only king of England but king of Canada, as sovereign of Great Britain. As a matter of Canadian pride, it was decided through some point of law to make of the sovereign of Great Britain the sovereign of Canada and to see in the person of the sovereign of Great Britain two separate persons: the British head of state and the Canadian head of state.

A little later, namely in 1964, Mr. Speaker, always in order to eliminate the symbols of colonialism, always in order to stress even more our Canadian pride, it was decided to adopt a distinctive Canadian flag, a flag which is honoured today by all Canadians whatever their political allegiance. And later again, that is in 1967, "O Canada" was officially designated as the country's national anthem.

What does it mean, if not a steady evolution towards the symbolic assertion of Canada's sovereignty? And since we are caught up in that evolution, why try to create a scandal, suspect a revolutionary spirit or accuse of sacrilege whoever foresees the possibility of the supreme authority of the country eventually being held by a Canadian-born citizen? There is nothing scandalous in that. In addition, this does not mean that the supporters of such a reform have no respect for the constitution, or for the British sovereign.

Mr. Speaker, all those things are not said by a so-called French Canadian, but by a Canadian period. We are all Canadians and we are even prouder in 1967 to be Canadians. That is why, belonging to the younger generation, I think it is normal to foresee the possibility of all symbols of colonialism disappearing.

Mr. Speaker, that may not be the official policy of the Liberal party—I think it is far from being their official policy, since the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) himself said that it was not and that Canada remains a monarchy—but the members of the young generation have a right to look forward to reforms which will one day become a reality.

Mr. Speaker, I say that because I am happy to be in the Liberal party, for no Conservative would be able to speak like that without being considered a pariah or a renegade by the members of his party. What a scandalous way of talking! This proves that there is democracy and freedom of expression within our party, and we owe that above all to the Prime Minister, who is perhaps the greatest democrat Canada has ever known.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Choquette: It is the more true that there is a lack of democratic principle within the Conservative party that since 1964, the same pople who accused us of using a gag —how many times have they not recalled the famous pipe-line debate and even, sometimes, the debate on a distinctive flag when closure had to be applied—are those who, on three occasions, have prevented members from introducing bills or resolutions. Do you want proof of that?

In 1964, I presented here a bill so that Canada would no longer be a dominion. What scandal! Who objected? The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who rose to prevent me from introducing my bill. That is democracy as understood in the Conservative party.

In 1966, I wanted to introduce a bill so that the cabinet could withdraw from the field of commutation of death sentences. Who rose to stop me from presenting my bill? The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself.

[Mr. Choquette.]

That is democracy according to the Conservative party.

And this morning, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre rose to prevent me from moving a resolution. That is democracy, according to the Conservative party, a party which wants to curb democratic freedoms.

That is why in the province of Quebec, where democracy and individual freedoms are appreciated, our friends will not make much headway at any time in our history, since they do not know how to adjust to the Canadian fact.

The hon. members for Prince Edward-Lennox and Cumberland (Messrs. Alkenbrack and Coates) made statements similar to that of the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan). Once, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox objected violently to the policy of bilingualism put forward by this government. The hon. member for Cumberland has also written some scathing articles to denounce the stand taken by this government towards bilingualism. The same political-philosophy was expressed by the hon. member for York-Humber.

The difference lies in the fact that the other side of this house registered no official disapproval of the remarks made by the hon. members for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) and Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Alkenbrack), while on this side of the house, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) was officially blamed for his remarks. Why? Because these remarks reflect precisely a philosophy which is inconsistent with the Canadian fact.

The best indication that the Conservative party will never adjust—at least has never managed to adjust to the Canadian reality—is the frustration felt by all those from the province of Quebec, who belonged to that party, for instance, the former hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay), who sat in this house from 1958 to 1962 and who was the colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), as he will remember since they attended the Conservative caucus together.

What has become of the one who was the member for Roberval from 1958 until 1962? He is now a separatist, anti-confederation; such is the corollary of a party maladjusted to the Canadian fact.

In 1958, there was a Conservative candidate, by the name of Yvon Groulx. Today, he is the president of the so-called Société Saint-Jean Baptiste. He is also against confederation, a professed separatist. He was a Conservative candidate in 1958.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), who sat at the Conservative caucus and was a colleague of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, or better his colleague and friend, what is he now? He does not miss any opportunity to state theories which border on separatism; he never misses an opportunity to expose the actual or imaginary faults of confederation.

That is what comes of a party which never learned to adjust itself to the Canadian fact. Therefore, all the Quebec members who once belonged to this party are now either disillusioned, down hearted or separatists. That is why an ill-adjusted policy is unfortunate. On the other hand, thanks to the generous leadership of the present leader of the government, the policy of the Liberal party makes allowances for the true situation in Canada, that is, a policy designed to integrate the French fact to the Canadian reality.

Mr. Speaker, many false notions should be eliminated with regard to the policy of bilingualism. First of all, it should be clearly stated that it will never be the government's intention to compel anyone to learn a language. It would be an anti-democratic move and we could never support a government trying to force anybody to learn a language. This is the first prejudice that must be dispelled with regard to the policy on bilingualism put forward by the present government.

The second prejudice that should be eliminated is that in the Canadian constitution—the British North America Act, to use if you like an expression more attractive to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—section 133 states:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the Debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

Such a section, Mr. Speaker, does not give any priority right whatsoever to one or the other of the two languages: It simply consecrates the official character of one as regards the other.

Mr. Woolliams: What section are you reading from?

Mr. Choquette: Section 133 of the British North America Act.

He simply recognizes the existence of two languages, without giving priority to one or the other. Why are both languages firmly rooted? It is very simple: there are 12 million English-speaking people and between 5 and 6 million French-speaking people in Canada, and as long as the Canadian situation remains the same, it is obvious that both languages will be respected, accepted and considered as official languages in Canada. It is not legislation which gives superiority to one language over the other.

The third prejudice which must be eliminated, Mr. Speaker, as far as bilingualism is concerned, is that you cannot request every citizen to speak both languages perfectly. You simply have to provide an individual with the possibility of speaking in his own language and being understood by the person to whom he is speaking, and the latter, if we wants to speak in his own language, must be assured that he is understood in his turn. It is not a matter of demanding that someone speak both French and English with great fluency but rather a question of being assured that one will be understood when speaking in his own tongue and of having the technical facilities to allow this.

This means that when the policy of bilingualism is well understood, when it is free of all prejudice, it is obvious that the steps taken by the present government are merely of a nature to seal Canadian unity and prevent certain extremists, of whom some former Conservative members or candidates, from taking advantage of a sometimes confused situation to try to break down the structures of the country, which structures we want to strengthen.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, I should like to say a few words about the amendment proposed by the member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and pay tribute to his exceptional ability in having managed to introduce, in the course of this debate, the amendment he has moved.

The farm policy of the government of necessity has some weak points; one must not fail to be objective to the point of saying that it is beyond criticism. But it can be said as a preamble and to motivate rejection of the motion introduced by our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste that it is better to support a government which has unfailingly considered the needs of the farmers with a clear sightedness and understanding never shown on the opposite side of the house.

When the farmers asked for the establishment of the livestock feed agency, the present government introduced and implemented legislation. When the farmers asked for the establishment of the Canadian Dairy Commission, the present government introduced the bill and granted the request of the farmers. When Quebec farmers asked for crop insurance, the present government amended the federal Crop Insurance Act and thus enabled the provincial government, the Quebec legislature, to adopt a similar bill not so long ago.

When the farmers asked for the extension of unemployment insurance to farm labour, the present government understood their request and agreed thereto. For several years, farmers have benefited by substantial increases in the price of manufacturing milk. One remembers—and this was repeated several times—that before 1962, milk sold for approximately $2.70 per hundredweight.

Within a short period of time, the price of milk was raised to $4.75 per hundredweight, and when I say $4.75, that includes the export subsidy.

Mr. Speaker, considering all those measures, one would rather support the present government, which put them forward, instead of criticizing it and voting against its policy. This does not mean that no reservations could be made, and that is what I would like to do. I would like to ask all those who support indiscriminately all representations and demands, wherever they come from, if in those circumstances there is not a little demagoguery in their attitude.

If the farmers had asked for $7 per hundredweight, some hon. members in this house would have said: We must give the farmers $7 per hundredweight. If they had asked for $8 or $9 per hundredweight, some hon. members would have said: We must give the farmers $8 or $9 per hundredweight. And that, without asking themselves if it would be possible to grant such subsidies to the farm people.

Last year, subsidies paid to the dairy industry amounted to approximately $90 million. This year, they have gone up to $120 million, that is, an increase of $30 million. No one, more particularly among our Créditiste friends, has told us exactly where the national budget should be cut so that the demands of the dairy farmers might be met.

Their demands have merely been shouted with strength and vigour without anyone specifying how they could be satisfied. This often points to the lack of responsibility of members of the opposition. While being sympathetic to the farmers' demands, the administrators must nevertheless be responsible enough to maintain a budgetary balance and avoid any extravagance.

The farmers should be asked whether or not they intend to request the provincial authorities to make up the balance they claim.

The government of the province of Quebec should also be asked to fix a guaranteed price which the manufacturer would have to pay the producer.

Such a policy exists in Ontario and British Columbia. The Quebec government has not seen fit to implement it. The farmers could perhaps request its implementation since, as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) rightly pointed out the other day, a number of factories do not pay the fixed price of $3.54 which, added to the federal subsidy, gives the total price of $4.75 announced in the dairy policy this year.

Since this falls within provincial jurisdiction, I feel that it would behoove the Quebec authorities to set a minimum price, as it already exists, and then they could address themselves to the Quebec parliament and organize marches to obtain it.

Mr. Speaker, I could make another suggestion which concerns the federal authorities. Manufacturing milk is now subsidized on the basis of its fat content, but it is proved that the non-fat solids also have some value; it often happens in the milk industry that some non-fat solids are of superior quality in some milks than in others This goes to say that milk could be subsidized, not only on the basis of butterfat, but also on the basis of non-fat solids.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to suggest that it might be most advisable for the government to re-examine or rather to make representations with the Canadian Dairy Commission, for that is the body which took the final decision to base quotas on the 1966-67 production.

Perhaps that was a hasty decision that should be reconsidered, and perhaps it would be appropriate to urge the Canadian Dairy Commission not only to pay the subsidies and to fix quotas based on last year's production, but also to provide for increased production and to subsidize a proportion thereof.

It means that if the farmer produced, in 1966-67, 150,000 pounds of milk, the quota under which he will receive a subsidy for his 1967-68 production will be set a 150,000 pounds of milk.

What will happen to the farmer who will produce 200,000 or 250,000 pounds this year? That is where I feel the Canadian Dairy Commission should provide for a readjustment of quotas and allow part of the increased production to be subsidized.

Finally, a last suggestion to the federal authorities, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be advisable to put into operation a program which, for one thing, was already forecast in the 1962 election platform, when a program dealing with milk consumption in schools was under study? It may be a way to avoid overproduction and enable farmers to dispose of their production. The establishment of an extensive program of milk distribution in schools would also satisfy a wish expressed throughout the years.

On the whole, Mr. Speaker, and in spite of those reservations, I must say that I am very pleased with the policy set forth by the government. Our concern for the farmers has been sincere and we therefore deserve their confidence. That is why I shall readily vote against the motion introduced by our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the throne speech debate it gives me great pleasure to join with other members of the House of Commons in congratulating the mover and seconder. I have always believed it to be a great honour for the members who are chosen by the Prime Minister. They have, I am sure, felt that honour and have discharged their tasks with great distinction, and I say that in all sincerity. I have been a member of this house for some years and I feel that their contribution to this debate was perhaps greater than any they may make later.

It always gives me great pleasure to follow my good friend the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) because he has far different ideas about things than many other members. Perhaps this is what makes this place so refreshing. I always think of him as the hon. member for Windsor Castle. He is the great republican in Canada. He is a man who can take his oath on the Bible swearing allegiance to the Queen and accept his pay 30 days later without bother to his conscience. Be that as it may, perhaps we need people who think differently in this house because when everybody thinks alike there is no thought.

Today I intend to speak about the law of expropriation, but before getting into the meat of that subject let me say that we as members of parliament can never be sure what will happen during orders of the day. I cannot help but think back to 1962-63 during the Cuban crisis when the older frontbenchers of this Liberal government were sitting on this side asking us at that time to rubberstamp everything done by the United States. It is amazing to note the change in attitude and responsibility of those hon. gentlemen when they moved from one side of the house to the other.

At this time I should like to ask the Liberals in this house what happened to the marriage between certain powerful people in the United States and the Liberal party which allowed them always to take two sides on every question in order to safeguard the government's position in maintaining power. I have always found this very unusual. They are the people who jumped right in with both feet with the United States on any foreign affairs policy without asking any questions. That was the position taken by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) long before he thought he would be the minister of external affairs.

According to the headlines appearing in the newspapers today the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Winters) would not say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) would repudiate the position taken by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) so far as Viet Nam is concerned. They were able to repudiate that position outside the house because they fear what might happen to public opinion so far as they are concerned.

I am not going to get into a debate on the situation in Viet Nam. I think this house knows my personal position with regard to that situation. But one thing I often wonder about is, how many of us in this House of Commons, how many people who endeavour to speak with some degree of intelligence on Viet Nam, know the facts and what is behind those facts? As the hon. member for Queens

(Mr. MacLean) and somebody else on this side of the house said this afternoon, the very least we can do if we do not know the facts is to remain silent.

Mr. McNulty: Then why don't you do so?

Mr. Woolliams: I have not passed an opinion on the war in Viet Nam in this speech up to now, but I say that the very least one can do if one does not know all the facts is to remain silent. I am not talking about members of parliament in particular but rather the protest groups referred to today by one hon. member.

I suppose everyone would like to take a few minutes in this debate to say a few words about our centennial year. I believe all members of parliament were asked by Malvern Collegiate Institute in Toronto to make a prediction about what would happen 100 years from now. I could not help thinking, after listening to the speech of the hon. member for Lotbinière this afternoon, that perhaps many of us are too parochial. I am not completely clued in myself in this respect, but perhaps many of us are so parochial and so regional that we really cannot see what is happening beyond our own communities, not only in the rest of Canada but internationally. We worry about languages, we worry about cultures. But when you get outside Canada and pick up a newspaper you wonder whether Canada exists internationally because you are lucky to find two lines dealing with Canadian affairs in any international newspaper.

We are so parochial and regional-minded that I was prompted to answer the collegiate and make the following prediction about what the situation would be 100 years from now. I think these words apply to all of us. I sincerely believe that the most important thing for Canada today is that we work together, become unified and stay together. I believe we must have open minds. I have an open mind about the hon. member for Lotbinière. He does not like the Governor General, the Queen, and similar institutions. In Britain he could make a wonderful speech in Hyde Park and deliver that kind of message. But let me read my predictions for the year 2067. This is what I said:

> In a century, Canada as a people and territory will become part of a solitary nation, or a new world of few nations.
> The portion of our national political and social culture to be contributed in survival, will depend upon how soon we discard our narrow parochialism, responsible for such unnecessary time-consuming national energy. Instead of preparing our people for the international oneness of mankind inevitably coming with compelling haste, we are extravagantly spending time on flags, anthems and cultural tangled squabbles.
> The failure of this nation to grasp the significance of its greatness and the dethroning and wastage of our mental resources could mean its dissolution in less than 25 years.
> With that premise, may I predict that by 2067:
> 1. We will be a nation of 200 million, sharing a world unity.
> 2. We will be a part of a world knowledgeable about outer space, having found life there in an either less or more developed state than human beings.
> 3. Leisure time will be in abundance, and its use will determine our moral and social values.
> 4. Regulatory birth control will be a necessary part of our new social order.
> 5. Parochialism here will be dead . . . narrow nationalism will be dead . . . but internationalism will flourish, and only in world oneness or nearness will any facsimile of Canada's culture survive.

In that prediction I say that unless we change our narrow, parochial, regional thinking this nation is doomed because it will be dissolved in 25 years. But I think many of us can rise above regionalism and parochialism, see both sides of the question, understand each other and draw closer together. It is most regrettable that we continually read in newspapers that this or that province will separate from our confederation. Canada is a great nation. We can work together, we have to work together as we have in the past, and in that way we can overcome this narrow parochialism and regionalism.

We in the House of Commons fight about language. Let us look at some of the statistics of language. If we consider the population of North America we find that 80 million people on this continent speak Spanish. The statistics show that approximately 250 million people today speak English, and 25 per cent of the world's population speak some form of Chinese. If we are really concerned about the problem perhaps we should be learning to speak Chinese so we may understand these people, because it is in free intercourse one with the other that we will bring about understanding, particularly at a time when we are talking about international crises. Of the world population 8.3 per cent speak Russian. Seventy per cent of all the letters written in the world are written in English.

I do not know why we spend so much time arguing about language. I appreciate anybody speaking in another tongue. I wish I had had the opportunity as a young man in my formal education to learn many languages. I wish that when I went to school I had had the opportunity, like other members of my family, to learn two or three languages. I think it is wonderful to understand languages. But why spend so much time on and be supersensitive about whether something is written in French, Spanish or English? What does it matter? This narrow regionalism and parochialism is eroding and sapping the very spirit of the nation.

I now wish to turn to another subject with which I think any government should come to grips. I want to come to grips with the question of the expropriation of land in this nation. As counsel I have had some experience with expropriation law and expropriation cases. I have also been most active, as a member of parliament, in the northern affairs committee since coming to the House of Commons. The reason I have been so interested in this matter is, I suppose, that I have had the privilege, opportunity and indeed the honour of representing Banff National Park, one of the beauty spots of North America.

We talk about civil rights. I am not pointing an accusing finger at the present government when making this speech because the abuses in expropriation to which I will draw attention have occurred in every province under provincial law and federal law. The abuses that have occurred under federal law are the worst of all. I hope that the speech I make today will have some impact in solving this problem for those who are in the chamber and those who may read my speech later. The Bill of Rights is involved in this problem. Let us look at the Canadian Bill of Rights. I have always felt it to be most regrettable that the courts have refused to give effect to the Bill of Rights. They refuse to give it meaning and significance. Perhaps the courts believe the Bill of Rights is not a constitutional change, but it is pretty definite in some of its language and it was approved by parliament. The Canadian Bill of Rights provides:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely—

What are they?

> —the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

When I talk about the expropriation of land I shall deal with civil rights in the enjoyment of property. The right to own property in this nation is a civil right. That right should not be taken away from the individual without due process of law as set out in the Bill of Rights. With all due respect to the Bill of Rights, I might go so far as to say that this was the law before the Bill of Rights was enacted.

What is the federal authority in respect of expropriation? It has the authority and must have the authority to expropriate land for public works. It has to have the authority to expropriate land for a railway. People cannot be allowed to stop the development of the nation. It also has to have the authority to expropriate land for national parks under certain circumstances. I will have more to say about that later.

The next question I ask is, how does expropriation in Canada operate under our laws? Let us take the case of the national parks. The officials of the public works department get together and prepare an order in council with a description of the land. When it is drawn up it is then approved by the executive. The order in council is then filed in the land titles office. That is how it is started. No notice is given to the owners. I can show hon. members hundreds of cases where no notice has been given. In fact, in the case of national parks it has been a deliberate policy of the department not to give notice of expropriation.

In one of the cases before the Exchequer Court in which I acted as counsel no notice was given to three men who were pioneers of western Canada. Their land was taken away from them, and even under cross-examination we have been unable to find out the reason for this action. However, the cat came out of the bag in an examination for discovery, and the case has just been completed so I can discuss it here. It is the case of Lake Louise Ski Lodge Limited v. Her Majesty the Queen involving three people who owned 60 acres of land of which the pivotal point is Lake Louise. Today multimillion dollar enterprises, including a visitors' centre, are being built there by the government, which had some trouble in negotiating a financial agreement in expropriating land for the trans-Canada highway. All the government needed at that time was four to five acres of land for the roads, but when I cross-examined the officials they told me they could not complete the kind of deal they wanted and the price for the four or five acres was not right. I asked the director of the national parks what was his answer to that, and he replied:

> Such action did not appear necessary at that time if the land for the right-of-way could have been acquired for a reasonable amount.

Then I asked him:

> So that it was really, then, the result that as you were not able to negotiate for the highway that you did actually expropriate the other land?

To which he answered "yes". In other words, 55 or 56 acres were taken over for the sake of four or five acres. Surely this is not taking over land under due process of law.

Of course the right to expropriate could be challenged, but who can afford this legal procedure? Let us consider what happens after the land is expropriated, and this is the worst part. The onus is then on the owners to try to negotiate with the department of the government, and if they cannot reach an agreement they must start an action in the Exchequer Court of Canada. This means that an owner, who may be a man with very limited means, must hire a good lawyer because one cannot go to the Exchequer Court without a lawyer with a good deal of skill. It is also necessary to hire a top appraiser, which is costly. In the Lake Louise case the judgment given by the Exchequer Court was about $96,000.

The original letter offered these people $13,000 for the land, so they had to hire a lawyer. They had to get appraisers and engineers. This does not sound like much, but before you can place your case before the Exchequer Court you have to allow about $20,000 without even considering a dollar for your lawyer or for experts to assist you.

I say that the law in this regard is wrong. I realize that to run the country efficiently land is needed for parks, highways and railways. Individuals cannot be allowed to hold up the development and progress of the nation. However, I say that the expropriation law is being spelled out by certain officials of the department so as to make it work for them and not the owner. I believe the law should be changed so that if negotiations are unsuccessful the crown should start the action. A time limit should be set for the negotiations, after which the crown must start an action. The crown should carry the ball and the onus should be on it to prove what the land is worth. The owner should then take the defence. Today the onus is on the owner of the land. Under the Bill of Rights no one should lose the enjoyment of his property without due process of the law.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Today if an owner is financially crippled and his property is expropriated he cannot get justice because he cannot afford to buy it.

Let us take a look at another situation where leases are being taken over in the national parks. No one on the government side has raised a voice in protest. It is a most shocking situation. The reason may be that there is no national park in Ontario or Quebec. There are land ownerships in fee simple. Leases in perpetuity were granted years ago and this is almost the same as a title in fee simple. Then there are 99-year leases and 42-year leases with the right to renew for 21 years. The department has denied this. The officials say that this cannot happen. But it does happen. A parliamentary committee met in Banff, and at that time the national parks branch filed a big yellow bible on their policies. I did a little homework that night and I found something which I should like to put on the record. I am referring to the advice of the Department of Justice given to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing). It reads as follows:

> On normal renewals of perpetual renewal leases, the department can probably be forced (legally) to issue renewal leases also containing the perpetual renewal clauses . . . on a normal renewal of a perpetual renewal lease we cannot legally force the lessee to take only a 42- or a 42 plus 21-year lease in its stead.

In spite of this advice what did the minister do? I have hundreds of letters on file, but here is one from someone in Jasper. I will not give his name because that might cause his ruination. He was told that the department would approve the registration of his mortgage for the building provided he gave up his lease in perpetuity to the crown and in return took a 42-year lease. I say that this is blackmail. This would be considered duress under any law. The crown in the name of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is guilty of this sort of thing. It is going on continually.

I have already spoken about the difficulties involved in placing an expropriation case before the Exchequer Court. I put the following simple question on the order paper:

> Will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development take the appropriate action to have referred, pursuant to the provisions of section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, to the Supreme Court of Canada, the questions (a) whether the so-called perpetual leases in the national parks were legally granted by the Crown—

The officers of the crown swore before the committee that these leases were legally granted. They said they would have to renew them under the present terms and conditions. The minister and his department say they will not allow a person to build or will not approve the mortgage unless he gives up what he has and accepts less in return.

I asked that question and what kind of answer did I get? It was an amazing answer. The officials stayed up all night so I would not get the facts. I asked the government to take the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada and this is the answer I received:

I am advised with respect to so-called perpetually renewable leases granted by the minister of the interior prior to the enactment of the National Parks Act in 1930, that the minister of the interior did not have the power to grant a right of renewal in those terms and therefore that portion of the leases was ultra vires his power and authority—

I asked the government if they would refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada to ascertain whether or not the leases were legal. They said they were not legal. Why do I want the government to take up the matter with the Supreme Court of Canada? I desire this because it costs a citizen so much money to go before the Exchequer Court. Where does the Exchequer Court sit, Mr. Speaker? It sits in Ottawa but will go to other places. Every time there is a procedural question it has to be argued in Ottawa. No citizen can afford, unless he is a wealthy man, to become involved in a lawsuit in the Exchequer Court of Canada. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce wishes to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

REPORT ON RESULTS OF GENEVA TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, almost 50 countries accounting for 80 per cent of the world's trade have for some four years now been negotiating the Kennedy round of trade expansion at Geneva under the provisions of GATT. Basic agreement among major trading countries was reached about an hour ago in Geneva. There is about $40 billion worth of trade in products in which concessions have been made.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) joined me in Geneva last Thursday and we participated with our delegation in the last critical stages when crucial decisions were necessary. During that time we had policy discussions with representatives of our important trading partners, the United States, the United Kingdom, Japan, the Common Market, the group of Nordic countries and Australia. With some heads of delegations we had more than one meeting. I also met on several occasions with Mr. Eric Wyndam White, director general of GATT, the organization under whose auspices these important trade negotiations have been held. He has been a tower of strength and we all owe him a debt of gratitude for his contributions to world trade.

I believe these talks made a constructive contribution to negotiations, both from a general viewpoint and particularly in terms of Canadian trading interests. Many of the final points revolved around agriculture, and it was both opportune and helpful to have the Minister of Agriculture with me.

From the Canadian point of view, concessions which have been negotiated in foreign markets represent the most important trade pact in this century and affect some billions of dollars of trade. From a world point of view, negotiations have achieved a most important advance in lowering tariff and other barriers to trade.

For example, in the United States tariffs have been reduced or completely eliminated on $1 billion to $1.5 billion of Canadian goods moving into that market. Also the lowering of tariffs should make it possible to sell goods we have not previously been able to merchandise there. In this market we have gained markedly improved access over a very extensive range of products which will be of great benefit to our industry, our agriculture, our fisheries and to our industrial development generally.

In addition to making substantial tariff reductions over many thousands of items, the United States has agreed to eliminate its tariffs on a large number of Canadian products. These tariff cuts will greatly enhance our export prospects, and I know that our exporters will take full advantage of all these possibilities which will become progressively available over a period of five years, starting January 1, 1968.

Reductions to be made in Canadian tariff as part of these reciprocal arrangements will be of benefit to Canadian consumers and to users of a wide variety of imported products. This will help reduce costs of production for our farms, fisheries, mines and industry. But to make our way in a more competitive world, we will have to be alert to opportunities that are presented. To take full advantage of these changes, our businessmen, our workers, our farmers and, indeed, all Canadians will have to accept the reality of a more competitive world and make necessary adjustments to reap rewards from this new situation.

While it is not yet possible to make public detailed results because not all GATT countries have, as yet, had the opportunity of agreeing to them, I can say with respect to wheat that the basic elements of a new international wheat arrangement have been agreed between major exporting and importing countries. We have achieved a significant and welcome increase in international minimum and maximum prices for specified qualities of wheat, and substantially strengthened arrangements for co-operation to maintain market stability. For No. 1 Manitoba northern, in store at the lakehead, new minimum and maximum prices will be $1.95½ and $2.38½ Canadian respectively. This represents about a 21 cent increase over minimum and maximum prices in the current international wheat agreement. Minimum price f.o.b. Vancouver will be $2.03½ and maximum $2.46½. A growing volume of Canadian wheat is being marketed through this port.

The minimum price agreed upon is $1.73 per bushel for No. 2 hard winter wheat, United States funds, with a quality differential of 22½ cents for No. 1 Manitoba northern. Allowing for differentials in freight between gulf ports and lakehead ports, and between United States and Canada currency, this works out to the Canadian figures I have mentioned above.

Agreement has also been reached on a new food aid program totalling some 13½ million tons over three years, under which responsibility for providing food assistance to developing countries will be more equitably shared by the member countries of GATT. Canada's share in this program is half a million tons a year. The fact that for the first time industrialized importing countries have agreed to co-operate with wheat producing countries in this joint program represents a major achievement and an important forward step in international co-operation designed to help meet food needs of the developing world. Canada played a prominent role in the realization of this aim.

During the critical phases of the negotiations on wheat, the Canadian delegation included senior representatives of major producer organizations in western Canada who are members of the public advisers committee of the Canadian Wheat Board. I refer particularly to Messrs. Charles Gibbings, chairman of the advisory committee and president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Roy Atkinson, president of the National Farmers Union, Dr. Bill Parker, president of Manitoba Pool Elevators Limited, Mac Runciman, president of the United Grain Growers Limited, and John Stevens of Morinville, Alberta. Their advice made a most valued contribution to the satisfactory result attained. I am advised that the new price range and other arrangements which have been agreed carry the full support of the public advisers as, of course, they do of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Tariff cuts which have been secured from the United States, the Common Market, Japan and other countries will confer benefits on all sectors and regions of our country. The degree to which this applies depends upon our diligence and skill in pursuing the opportunities they present.

Tariff reductions which Canada and other industrial countries are making will also be of benefit to developing countries of the world. A number of such countries have participated in these negotiations and have offered improved trading opportunities for Canada.

In agriculture, reductions which we have secured in foreign markets over a broad range of products will benefit farmers from coast to coast. Important tariff cuts have been made by other countries in respect of our exports of basic materials, metals and forest products. Major gains have been made through elimination and reduction of tariffs of fish and fisheries products.

Reductions which will be made in industrial tariffs of the United States, E.E.C., and other countries, many on a uniform basis of 50 per cent, will help Canadians to increase both variety and volume of our exports to these markets. Improved access to foreign markets which has been secured should, through expanded exports, significantly help our manufacturers to achieve economies of scale and specialization which are so necessary to improving our efficiency, productivity and competitive position.

A new anti-dumping code has been agreed by Canada and our major trading partners, designed to improve existing practices in world trade while safeguarding legitimate interests of our domestic producers.

Benefits for Canada have been secured not only through bilateral negotiations with our most important trading partners but also as a result of indirect benefits which will accrue to Canada from agreements which have been reached between other pairs and groups of countries participating in the Kennedy round. This was an important factor in these successful multilateral negotiations.

Detailed elaboration of agreements which have been reached is now going forward; formal legal documents should be ready for signature before the end of June. Shortly thereafter it is planned that detailed results will be announced simultaneously by all participating countries.

Canada can take great satisfaction that success has crowned efforts which we and others have made over the last four years to conclude this largest ever world trade negotiation started through the initiative and statesmanship of the late President Kennedy.

People, Mr. Speaker, are the essential ingredient in any endeavour, and in this prolonged, sometimes frustrating and most difficult of all trade negotiations, this was the determining factor. Our negotiating team, led by the deputy ministers of the departments concerned, was highly competent, devoted and tireless, often negotiating right through the night.

In the early stages of the Kennedy round our team was led by Mr. Norman Robertson and supported, until recently, by Mr. Hector McKinnon, an experienced veteran of many multilateral trade negotiations. More recently our work at Geneva was guided and coordinated by Mr. Sidney D. Pierce, a distinguished diplomat whose resolute optimism was finally rewarded. It was a matter of comfort to all of us that our ambassador and permanent representative to the European office of the United Nations, Mr. Sol Rae, was always so readily available with help, guidance and encouragement.

On behalf of the government and, I presume, parliament as well I wish to pay tribute and to express our gratitude to all these devoted public servants in whom Canada can be justifiably proud.

Report on Geneva Tariff Negotiations

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) I am concerned about the second point he raised which was not about goods in general but about wheat. The minister said that he could not tell the house what the situation presently is. I hope we shall not have another automotive pact situation. We shall look forward with interest to what will take place between Canada, the United States and other trading nations. Agreements sometimes look good on paper, as did the automotive agreement, but their reality is not as attractive as the words with which they are painted.

I am glad that the minister mentioned Charles Gibbings, the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, who assisted the government to come to terms on wheat in reference to the world wheat agreement.

Canada is the only nation in the world that exports wheat and does not subsidize its farmers for growing wheat. People in other parts of the country often think that when the farmers receive wheat board payments they receive money from the Canadian treasury. That is false. The wheat board operates as a pool. It receives an initial payment and a second payment which, added together, constitute the pool price and is a price paid the farmer from the sale of his wheat.

It should be understood that the 21 cent increase will apply only to those countries that are signatories to the agreement. Countries such as China and Russia which are outside the agreement will not be affected, except indirectly. We must conclude, that the farmer tonight or tomorrow will not receive an extra 21 cents per bushel for the wheat he delivers to the elevator. That should be understood, and I am glad that the minister did not misrepresent this fact.

As was said some years ago when Britain applied to join the European Common Market, Great Britain over the years has been Canada's best wheat customer. It will be interesting to see if this agreement will affect the price of wheat sold to Great Britain. The farmers well remember when another liberal minister of a Liberal government some years ago promised Great Britain that it could have wheat for $1 per bushel on a five year deal. That promise cost the western farmers $600 million.

The western farmers also remember that in Calgary in 1963 and 1964 the Prime Minister promised the farmers $2 per bushel for No. 1 northern wheat. He did not specify whether that was the price at the local elevator, the lakehead, Fort William, or Vancouver. Considering that 5 per cent only of western wheat is No. 1 northern, the Prime Minister's promise, even if it had been kept, did not amount to anything.

For years there has been talk of a two-price system. When the Conservative government was in office it considered that Canada consumes approximately 100 million bushels of wheat annually for human and other consumption and the western farmers received a bonus to help them combat the cost-price squeeze. The farmers in 1967 will look at the present situation carefully in the light of recent increases in farm machinery and other agricultural costs. A pusher combine which five or six years ago cost $10,000 now costs the farmers at Rosetown and Kindersley $17,000 to $18,000. The inquiry set up by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) is strangely silent in view of the increasing cost of farm machinery. In fact, farm unions of Saskatchewan and Alberta are boycotting farm machinery companies at this time because of high prices.

The agreement may help farmers somewhat but it will not guarantee all farmers another 21 cents per bushel. Unless farmers can earn more they will not be able to pay the high costs for farm machinery they are presently forced to pay. The farmers today are caught in the worst cost-price squeeze in the history of agriculture.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that there will be widespread relief that the negotiations at Geneva respecting the GATT agreement have finally come to a successful conclusion. Had the Kennedy round not been successful it would have been tragic and a major setback to the economic growth of most nations which are members of that agreement. This house and the people of Canada welcome the minister's announcement. I congratulate him, his colleagues, and those officials who took part in the arduous negotiations. Undoubtedly they did not get everything they wanted, but nobody ever does at the negotiating table.

The fact that they have been able to secure extensive reductions in tariffs will undoubtedly have some potential effect. The minister quoted a figure of $1.5 billion worth of Canadian goods entering the United States to which either reduced tariffs or no tariffs at all will be applicable. This will certainly be of great benefit to Canada. At the same time, of course, the agreement will bring problems with respect to the increased competition which Canadian industry will face both in Canada and elsewhere.

There can be no doubt that freer trade and the freer movement of goods from country to country will have a beneficial effect in the long run not only upon our economy but also upon the economy of the whole world. We shall, of course, be able to discuss this much more intelligently when we see the various tariff items which have been removed or changed and have an opportunity to study a breakdown of the items affected. But the fact that the Kennedy round under GATT has reached the stage at which the minister is able to make this announcement is in my opinion a source of great pleasure and a cause for congratulation.

The announcement the minister made about wheat is, of course, of tremendous interest to all Canadians, particularly to those who live in Western Canada. It would have been a stark tragedy had the international wheat agreement come to an end without some satisfactory settlement about the terms of its renewal. I think the farmers of western Canada are completely wedded to the idea of the international wheat agreement which again is of two-way benefit. It gives protection to importing countries inasmuch as they know there is a maximum price above which they will not be required to pay, while bringing the assurance of a minimum price to exporting countries. There is a stabilizing effect.

While it is true, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) said, that the 21 cents a bushel increase will not directly affect the price of wheat sold to nations which are not members of the international wheat agreement, the price range established under it is bound to have an indirect effect upon the general world price for wheat.

The minister announced there would be an increase of 21 cents which means the price range will be $1.95½ to $2.38½ for No. 1 wheat at Fort William. Most farmers have been hoping for an increase of 40 cents. The farm organizations have been pressing for this, so there will be some disappointment that 21 cents is all that will be given under this new agreement. The present price range of $1.62½ to $2.02½ was set six years ago and the cost of producing a bushel of wheat has increased very substantially in those six years. I have just noticed the figures issued by the federal Department of Agriculture. The composite cost to farmers, excluding living costs, which in 1961 was 282.2 had by the end of 1966 reached 346.2, an increase of 64 points or about 22 per cent. In the same period the index of returns for field crops, which includes crops other than cereal grain, dropped from 191.2 to 169.6, or 22.1 percentage points.

In these circumstances an increase of 21 cents a bushel for the prairie farmers will not make up for the increased cost of production which has taken place since the present price range was established. I need hardly remind the minister that his leader, the Prime Minister of Canada, made a promise to the western farmers in 1963 that the Liberal party if elected to office would establish a two-price system for wheat with a guaranteed minimum of $2 a bushel.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We shall have to get Gordon after that.

Mr. Douglas: If the government intends to make up to the farmers the difference between the 21 cents increase under the international wheat agreement and what they need to meet the increased cost of producing a bushel of wheat in 1967 and subsequent years, it will have to consider seriously carrying out the promise it made to establish a two-price system for wheat.

There are some other matters on which we should like further information. The minister will probably be in a position to give it to us tomorrow. I am sure we are all pleased with the idea of setting up a pool to supply food to the needy nations of the world and to hear that some 4½ million tons are to be put into that pool. The minister indicated that half a million tons would be contributed by Canada. I hope the minister will explain soon whether Canada will contribute this as a gift or whether we will be paid for it and make our contribution financially on a pro rata basis. I hope it is the latter. If it is, I trust the minister will tell us what our financial contribution is to be and how it compares on a pro rata basis with that of the other nations.

I hope he will tell us too about the anti-dumping provisions, because these can sometimes be used to obstruct trade by introducing a value for duty basis for tariffs and assessing an artificial value for duty purposes which has the effect of nullifying the reduction in tariffs.

On the whole I think the minister's statement is very gratifying. I hope he will give us further details later. I also hope he will speak to his colleagues about the desirability of supplementing the 21 cent increase to the wheat producers of western Canada by introducing a two-price system which would make up the difference between the 21 cents they will get and the 40 cents they expected.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) concerning major changes in tariffs following the meetings now concluded in Geneva will certainly be welcomed by many people in Canada as well as in countries abroad.

At least the Kennedy round of negotiations did not end in complete failure. All the months and years of negotiation did not come to an end without some final conclusion being reached even if it was not wholly satisfactory. I will say no more about this aspect because, understandably, the minister was unable to give us very much detail as to the way in which the new arrangements will affect specific products important to the export and import markets of Canada.

I turn to the announcement respecting the price of wheat for the next three years. I am sure the minister realizes this will be greeted with a somewhat mixed reaction on the part of farmers in western Canada who produce most of this wheat. It is at least a little encouraging to see that there is to be some increase in price for the next three years. At the same time I believe that the farmers justifiably expected something more than the 21 cents the minister has announced because, as has been pointed out by the two members who spoke immediately prior to me, this certainly does not make up for the increased cost of producing wheat over the years.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) mentioned that the increase is 21 cents over a price that was agreed upon six years ago. I am sure the minister knows very well that a price of slightly over $2 as a maximum is the price at which Canadian wheat farmers have been selling their wheat for about the last 15 years. If this agreement runs at this price to its conclusion on July 31, 1970, this means there will have been an increase of about 10 to 12 per cent over a 15 year period. I am sure there is no other commodity in Canada which has had such a small increase during that period of time. Certainly there is no comparable increase in the cost of anything the farmers buy. The increase in the cost of the goods the farmers buy has been many times 10 to 12 per cent from 1952 or 1953 up to the present time.

If this trend continues the cost of the things the farmer must buy will continue to rise until the end of this agreement. Increases in wages and increases in incomes in almost all other sectors of the Canadian economy have been substantially—in most cases many times—more than 10 to 12 per cent over this 15 year period. However, as I have said it is at least encouraging to see that there is some increase in the price of wheat because when the negotiations closed in London a few weeks ago the signatory countries to the international wheat agreement could not agree on any price and it appeared there would be some uncertainty in the wheat market for the next three year period. Although, as I say, the increase is not satisfactory in relation to costs, at least there is a small increase.

In so far as Canada's contribution to food aid is concerned, we welcome the announcement that many of the other countries in the western world will now share in a food aid pool that will be of benefit to the countries which from time to time need this kind of support, I suggest that 13½ million tons over a three-year period is a rather significant amount when it is coupled with some of the other aid programs which I am sure many countries will continue quite outside of this agreement. Canada's share seems to be a reasonable amount in this situation.

I would hope the minister would give some consideration to including some wheat flour in our aid because we have in the past supplied the wheat and it has been shipped to other countries for milling and then on to the recipient countries. This has happened even when our own flour milling industry was down to less than 50 per cent of its capacity. I think we have an obligation, particularly when Canada is making the contribution, to see that the processing is done by Canadians in Canadian mills when Canada is paying for the wheat. I suggest, therefore, that there might be a substantial increase in the amount of flour in our food aid programs. At the present time there is a drop in orders to our Canadian flour mills for export purposes and therefore many men will be laid off very shortly unless additional export orders are secured in time.

In conclusion I should like to say that we think there are some good points in the announcement the minister has made but we cannot agree, and I am sure the minister himself possibly is not satisfied, that the increase really is in keeping with the increased cost of production.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Speaker: The house will now return to the business which was interrupted at eight o'clock.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Gauthier.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment I was at the point where I was recommending reform in the expropriation law of Canada. I used as an example my own experience in several cases and one in particular. Before I set out what I recommend should be done I should like to review at this point what does happen so that there will be some chronological order in my address which was interrupted by the statement on motions. At the present time in order to expropriate land for public works, parks or some other purpose, all that is necessary is an order in council passed by a minister. The order in council is filed in the land titles office and it is not necessary that notice be given to the owner of the land which is to be expropriated. The department then moves on to the land unknown to the owner.

In the case I mentioned which went to the Exchequer Court the mineral rights of the C.P.R. were expropriated for a five year period unknown to the C.P.R. until I brought it to their attention. I had occasion to search the title and found that the C.P.R. had lost all mineral rights. I understand that recently in Banff particularly, where much of this action has taken place under the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing), land was expropriated which recently belonged to the C.P.R. and to other people. The land was returned to the C.P.R. but the land of the other people was not returned to them. Of course there is one law for the C.P.R. and another for the other people in Banff.

What are my recommendations in this regard? In making my recommendations I should like to point out that in this field the crown is all-powerful. The crown decides whether it should take the land. The crown has the money and the power. The crown has the right, the power and the money to hire highly paid appraisers. The crown has the right to do so and hires the most competent lawyers it can obtain. The owner only has his land and in many cases can afford neither an appraiser nor a lawyer.

I have no real criticism of the Exchequer Court as it operates except to say that it really is part of the federal government in the sense of federal jurisdiction. When land is expropriated in Alberta, in Saskatchewan or in other parts of western Canada, it is necessary for the lawyer to come to Ottawa in many cases to present his argument. For example, in the Lake Louise case in which 60 acres were expropriated I had to start proceedings when after a six year period we could not reach a settlement with the government. The crown refused to produce the director of parks for examination for discovery and I had to obtain an order. When the director of parks was produced he refused to answer some questions. I then obtained an order and had to return again to Ottawa.

Under the expropriation law in Canada it can be said truthfully that there is one law for the owner and one for the crown. I say that the jurisdiction in expropriation proceedings should be in the trial division of the Supreme Court of Alberta or in the Queens' Bench, or whatever it may be called, in other provinces. If an agreement cannot be reached between the parties after a specified period of time the onus should fall upon the crown to initiate an action. An individual should not have to commence an action against the crown, as in the famous Fraser case referred to by Mr. Justice Cartwright. Under our laws an individual must commence proceedings and hire appraisers and experts in order to obtain a fair and equitable price for the expropriated land.

I think of a particular case in 1936 where the crown offered to pay $13,000 for a specific piece of property. The owner of that property commenced action and got a judgment for approximately $96,000. I need not say more about that case but I hope what I have said may lead to further consideration on the part of hon. members. My point is that individuals who are the victims of our expropriation laws should not be saddled with the onus of initiating litigation in order to obtain equity.

Perhaps the attitude of crown agencies in this regard is of benefit to the taxpayers, but I suggest that the crown should pay the initial offer into court and that the owners of the property should be entitled to withdraw that money to pay for the cost of an action initiated to obtain a fair and reasonable price for the property subject to expropriation. I also suggest that in cases where property is expropriated and an action is commenced, which might last for a number of years the crown should be subject to a reasonable interest charge on the original offer during the settlement of such action. The law in this regard should be absolute rather that discretionary in order that the trial judge may assess a 5 or 6 per cent interest rate on the original settlement for expropriation while a determination is being made.

In this regard let me make a special plea to the government, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to look into the whole matter of expropriation in areas such as Banff. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to the legality of expropriation by the crown in respect of lands in national parks under the jurisdiction of the department of northern affairs. I suggest that this whole question should be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. We have, of course, received opinions from the legal officers of the department of the Minister of Justice, but in any event these actions should be initiated by the crown rather than by private individuals in areas such as Banff and Jasper, Alberta. I might point out that there are other areas in Quebec and Ontario similar to those in western Canada which are subject to the same type of grievous action. There has never been a minister who has occupied the position of the minister of northern affairs who has acted in such a high-handed manner as the present minister in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, like those who preceded me in this debate, I want to express my admiration for the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Those two members, the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), through his outstanding eloquence and his truly deep understanding of the current national problems, and the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), through his full knowledge of agricultural problems, set the lead, I trust, for the debates to take place in this house in this, our centennial session.

This year, we celebrate the centenary of that historical event which set up, after long deliberations, the framework and the rules within which our country and its citizens have evolved for a century already, while bringing to it the changes necessitated by such circumstances as marked Canadian life since 1867.

So the Canadian people are celebrating this year, with great éclat, that century of coexistence of the two ethnic groups which founded and built together what we know today, with the subsequent contribution of other ethnic groups which came to join the British and the French, and who chose freely to participate in the greatness of the adopted land they cherish and want to see united from coast to coast.

A talk to our new-Canadian fellow-citizens is enough to make us realize very quickly the affection and love they nourish for Canada and their new fellow-countrymen and their great desire to become familiar as soon as possible with one or the other of our two official languages, and sometimes with both.

Surely, all that we admire today, after 100 years, was not always conceived and developed in perfect harmony. Obvious diversities between the two groups, English-speaking and French-speaking, on the cultural, language and traditional levels, are sufficient to explain the frequent clashes of a century of living together.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Let me, Mr. Speaker, be shown a family, whatever the language, the religion or the race, where there is not some difference of opinion! It is perfectly normal. But if certain people, some irresponsible, others with some authority, unceasingly claim that we are celebrating a century of injustice while others, without stating it clearly, hesitate, argue, hem and haw, stand on the fence for demagogic or electioneering purposes, to these people I say they are unfair and dishonest in striking such an attitude. Let it be known that they are not representative of the French Canadian majority opinion, in Quebec and in Canada.

[Mr. Béchard.]

Our language and our religious freedom were guaranteed to us by the 1867 constitution, on the same footing as the English language. Injustices have been committed and will surely be committed again, but should we always blame and accuse our English speaking brothers? Is it their fault if we had such difficulties in finding our place in business, trade and other fields? In certain cases, this is undoubtedly true.

But, Mr. Speaker, let it be explained to me why, at the time of the conquest, our mother country abandoned us? Why did the French financial powers of the time not do to their brethren, whom France had brought to this new and remote land of America and left scattered there, what the British financiers did? Is it any fault of the latter?

In spite of such desertion, which I might even call treason, the French Canadian people, determined to survive, overcame every difficulty and every obstacle. They gave themselves institutions of high learning to train our clergy, our political men, our businessmen, our industrialists of whom many made and continue to make their mark in this country, thus contributing to the economic progress of Canada. Less than ten years ago, Quebec, tired of marking time, thanks to a people willing and determined to assume its proper place and to improve its economic, cultural and social condition, thanks to the alert mind of an elite and thanks also to the arrival on the local political scenes of dynamic leaders, Quebec became increasingly aware of its problems and of the role it should play within confederation. A new impetus was given to education, our economy and our federal-provincial relations. It was an almost complete transformation in every field, and thus an awakening, perhaps belated, but how thrilling, for a population accustomed to the drab routine of laissez faire and traditional inertia.

That new awakening of Quebec upset a number of people, namely the Quebec people, and their determination to contribute more and more to the administration of the country, Canada, disturbed the peaceful life of more than one of our English-speaking brothers who felt panic in the face of that clear stand and fear of losing their place.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec do not want to supplant anyone. They do not want to take anyone's place; far from it. What they want is to take their place, that which belongs to them, as there is one for their English-speaking brothers, in their country's administration. They want to take a greater part in the economic, social, cultural and political development of their country and, to that effect, thay want not only to be heard but to be understood when they talk and write their own language, one of the country's two official languages. The people of Quebec do not want to separate and they do not want a separate status such as some politicians looking for publicity and votes are now advocating in Quebec and which would be equivalent to separation. What they want is to be respected and understood when they speak to the administrators of their country in their own language and above all, to live decently, have a job and earn a sufficient income to meet their obligations, as well as to be fairly well off to avoid falling prey to communism, a constant menace to the world, that poverty and destitution, so exploited by unscrupulous demagogues, can foster in our country. Communist propagandists always make the most of disagreements and crises of all types to spread their beliefs.

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has fully understood the legitimate demands of the Quebec people for equal opportunities.

That is why, since 1963, the policy of the present government has tended to create a situation more favourable to the development of the country and of bilingualism, particularly within the public service, and to provide equal participation and advancement opportunities for French Canadians and secure for them the status of first class citizens in Canada.

If that is not working for national unity, Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves what concept of unity have those who are always talking nonsense of the kind we again heard in this house recently from the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who follows the example set by his leader and many others.

It is obvious that he does not understand the problem of unity in the slightest and that he has not yet asked himself the question: What does Quebec want?

Referring to the member for Yukon, he would have done better, after three or four short appearances in this house, since October 5, 1966, busy as he was, I suppose, collecting material for scandals so as to better play his role of character assassination with his accomplices who are just like him, he would have done better to refrain from destroying, by his ridicule, everything positive achieved by the Prime Minister and his government since 1963, and rouse feelings that were dying out.

You only have to travel through our vast country and speak with our fellow-citizens, whatever their origin, to notice the tremendous evolution which has occurred in the direction of the principle adopted by our present leader of the government confronted by the consciousness of Quebecers since 1960.

Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me, I cannot deal in detail with all the proposals contained in the speech from the throne. However, I should like to discuss briefly a very delicate and controversial matter: television and radio broadcasting. I will conclude my remarks by speaking of the dairy industry in Canada, particularly in the Gaspé peninsula, adding some comments on other matters of local nature, but considered very important for the riding of Bonaventure in particular.

The speech from the throne had this to say concerning television and radio broadcasting:

> Recognizing that broadcasting is an important cultural instrument, the government supports a comprehensive and balanced national broadcasting service—

I have already made my position clear to the house concerning the quality of certain programs shown particularly on television.

I do not have to take back a word of the speech which I delivered in this house, as recorded in Hansard of February 25, 1964, except the reference to a greater state control. After the affair of "This Hour Has Seven Days", when the matter of internal control was publicly discussed, endangering the basic authority of that institution, I said that a direct control and intervention of the government in those matters of administration and programming in and out of season would turn that state corporation into a weak instrument in the hands of the government, whatever the party in power, which I could not accept.

However, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is highly important to establish a well-defined authority in the hands of management and to empower the latter to exercise such authority efficiently and advisedly.

The producers should be shown that bad taste and displays of immorality have no place in public, in a civilized country. Let us have an opportunity, from time to time, to make a clean sweep of these free-thinkers, who, under the cover of freedom of speech, use the state networks and others to distil drop by drop the ferment of revolution and subversive ideologies which are unacceptable in a free democratic country—and here it must be understood that freedom does not mean licence.

Radio and television are too valuable information and culture media to be used too often, in my view, to infect our population. I hope that the new legislation will see that a body such as the board of governors, for instance, is granted the necessary power to prevent any excessive abuse of airwaves, as is unfortunately too often the case.

The farm policy which was the subject of a subamendment moved last Friday by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) was officially announced in the house by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) on March 22 last for the dairy year 1967-68. It will be recalled that farm and dairy producer organizations asked for $5.10 per hundredweight of milk. The policy announced by the government set that price at $4.75. When the terms of that policy were published by the Canadian Dairy Commission, quick response arose from professional farming quarters.

Attempts were first made, in certain circles to intimate that the farmers were overdoing it and that they had no cause to fear that they could not receive the national average price of $4.75 per hundredweight. For some areas, where the dairy industry is very well set up from production to processing and marketing, I would agree that such an argument might be true, but for an area such as Bonaventure and other less advanced areas where the number of dairy producers is less than a thousand with about 40 per cent having to look elsewhere for a supplementary income, those claims are fair and legitimate.

Some will say that the government policy is intended to develop an efficient and healthy dairy industry in Canada mainly through the expansion of dairy farms.

I am all for it, because in my opinion we cannot expect some day the dairy farmer for instance to go on his own, if his unit is not economical, which means sufficient cultivated land, a quality herd with a sufficient number of milk cows, adequate equipment and plant facilities, a market for his dairy products, if certain farms, which have never assured a decent income to their owners are kept in operation by maintaining the present system. For some dairy farms, a $20 subsidy per hundredweight would not even be adequate.

However, taking into consideration what was mentioned earlier with regard to my area of Bonaventure, the manufacturer at the processing plant will not be able to pay this year, on the basis of last year's production on which the quota will be established, more than $2.94 per hundredweight. Add $1.21 to that, less the 11 per cent premium for exports, and you get a total of $4.04 per hundredweight. That is a far cry from $4.75 per hundredweight, although it is much better than the corresponding figure for last year. The quota policy, although well inspired, took many by surprise. In my area, particularly, it certainly does not encourage consolidation of farms or the expansion of our dairy farms.

Indeed, the farmer who last year gradually added a few cattle to his dairy herd, will not be able to benefit from the resulting additional production this year, if I understand correctly the data of the Canadian Dairy Commission.

I therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture to study seriously this whole question of quotas, with a view to modifying it in such a way that dairy producers in our area, as in many others, might hope to become more efficient and capable of earning a decent income. That is all the dairy producer wants, and only that.

On the other hand, I would like to remind the house that the assurance that the farmer will be paid the specified amount of $3.54 per hundredweight of milk by the plant can only come from the provincial government, which is the only body able to legislate in this matter.

Ontario did it, and the Quebec government, with its department of agriculture headed by a man who left his mark by his criticism of the federal Department of Agriculture, should act without delay. In this way, the Gaspé farmer too could derive greater profit from the generous policy of the federal government.

A vote in favour of the subamendment of the hon. member for Roberval tonight, Mr. Speaker, would not mean $5.10 per hundredweight, but could result, if the government were defeated, in an expense of some $18 to $20 million for Canadian taxpayers, an amount which I suggest could be put to better use.

I will now address my remarks to the minister responsible for the implementation of public works which are of great importance for us in the riding of Bonaventure. As matter of fact, harbour facilities are needed by the fishermen as well as by the present industries and the ones to come, and that means building new facilities as well as repairing the existing ones.

Important works just begun at Paspébiac were made necessary by the recent development of the fishing industry.

On the other hand, in the fall of 1965, after many representations, I secured the lengthening of the wharf at Carleton from where about forty million feet of lumber are shipped each year. The traffic is heavy from April to January.

Now, that work has been left in abeyance in the spring of 1966 because the department considered it unacceptable. Since then, after every conceivable recrimination, nothing is being done to correct that situation and the wharf is in such an alarming state of disrepair that I am now wondering whether it would not be better to build a new one. Those who use the wharf, the municipal authorities and others, are constantly making representations to me and I am wondering why certain people are so slow in requiring immediate action on the part of the contractor. Such a situation has lasted too long and it is urgent to put an end to all this red tape.

My riding being located almost entirely along the Baie des Chaleurs, properties are therefore constantly threatened by the normal erosion of the sea, and sometimes storms like the one we had in late December 1966, the worst in thirty years, cause damage that owners are financially unable to repair. Up to 1956, the federal government allotted a certain amount to make good such damages, but since then, thanks to their ingeniousness, certain officials were able to convince the then minister to replace such a policy by the famous "federal responsibility when erosion is caused by navigation or the presence of a federal structure". Certain properties are gradually disappearing hopelessly. During a storm last December, several properties in St. Omer, Carleton, Maria, New Richmond, Caplan, St. Simeon and all along the coast, were seriously damaged; I call for the special attention of the government for the immediate construction of retaining walls.

Means of transportation are for our area, far as it is, Mr. Speaker, of the utmost importance. In this atomic age, our area is deprived of air service of any kind. A daily service would perhaps not be economic, but so long as there has been no experimentation in this field, that will be impossible to prove. A Gaspé company—Air Gaspé—is operating a service between Gaspé, the Magdalen Islands, Ste-Anne-des-Monts and the north coast. Let the Minister of Transport help it to operate the service between Gaspé and Quebec, via Bonaventure, of course, where an airport belonging to the provincial government could, I think, be bought easily, and Gaspé will then welcome with enthusiasm and relief an innovation made necessary by the need to connect us to the great centres in the country.

During the last few years, the public organizations in Gaspé and the members from the south coast of the province, speaking on behalf of the population, have been asking the C.N.R. for a passenger train operating directly between Montreal and Gaspé.

Now, it so happened that last March, the authorities of the C.N.R. finally agreed to our request and on May 31, 1967, the new era of a direct train from Montreal to Gaspé will begin. At this point, I want to thank all the public bodies as well as the Canadian National Railways for their co-operation and the Minister of Transport for his efficient participation in the final success of our efforts to this end. However, as was to be expected, once again Gaspé could not count on complete enjoyment or achievement. In fact, we are informed that the "Chaleur", upon arrival at Matapédia, at the junction of the Maritimes and Gaspé lines, the trains will not immediately start on the Gaspé run, but will have to go to Campbellton, New Brunswick, at least 13 miles away to be cleaned, serviced, fueled, etc., and return to Matapédia before going on to Gaspé. This shuttling, plus service time, means about an hour and a half, very conservatively.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of Bonaventure riding and Gaspé and the travelling public in general cannot accept these early-morning and night-time side trips into a neighbouring province. We do not accept it and we shall not accept it.

The argument is that this situation is temporary; we are afraid of these temporary situations which suddenly and ordinarily become permanent. We see the trap and we refuse to fall into it.

Further, if we look at the train schedule recently published by the C.N.R., to be in force from April 30 to October 28, 1967, we are surprised to note that the "Chaleur" will make only 14 stops on the Matapédia-Gaspé run as against 32 by the present self-propelled coach. A matter of saving time, I will be told. In such a case, why lose from an hour and a half to two hours, morning and night, to go to Campbellton? The trap becomes increasingly evident.

• (9:10 p.m.)

But that is not all. The rate we will have to pay for the so-called favours of the C.N.R. is even higher. Trains Nos. 245 and 246 will be eliminated May 31, 1967, according to the previously mentioned schedule. On these freight and express trains, a coach was attached to serve passengers unable to use the self-propelled coach. All this will be eliminated on May 31, thus depriving many employees of their livelihood. And this, Mr. Speaker, has been decided upon without any consultation with the Gaspé population, by a decision of the C.N.R. authorities.

The people of Bonaventure riding and Gaspé will not be fooled this way. The population is now warned and constantly alerted.

Consequently, I urge the authorities of the Canadian National Railways to reconsider their decision and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) to use his influence and good offices once more to persuade the Canadian National authorities to correct those deplorable errors without delay, before May 31, 1967. The service of the "Chaleur" can very well be done at Matapédia or elsewhere along the line, which will make unnecessary that intriguing eventual pilgrim to our New Brunswick neighbours and will really give satisfaction to the travelling public.

I would have many other subjects to deal with tonight, Mr. Speaker, but in view of the passage of time, I will reserve for other occasions the pleasure of doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member allow the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) to ask him a question?

Mr. Béchard: Yes.

[English]

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Bonaventure whether he agrees with the policy and the requests with regard to agriculture that are being brought before the government by the U.C.C. of his province.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks a few moments ago I explained very clearly the position I take on that policy.

Mr. Winkler: Do I understand then that the hon. member is opposed to the present government policy?

[Mr. Béchard.]

Mr. Béchard: I am not at all opposed to the present policy of the government.

Mr. Winkler: The hon. member surely is.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in participating in this debate for the next few minutes I should like first of all to join those who have offered their congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

There are a number of serious problems in my own constituency, Mr. Speaker, to which I intend to draw the attention of the house. I had intended to make a rather lengthy and detailed speech respecting wheat prices and wheat marketing in western Canada. As you know, and as other hon. members know, within the last hour we have had an announcement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) respecting this matter. We realize it is not easy in negotiations with other countries for the representatives of any country to get all they feel they need for the people they represent.

The 21-cent increase in the maximum price over the next three years certainly does not constitute a reasonable increase in keeping with the increased cost of producing wheat. For example, I have in front of me a brief prepared by a committee in my constituency. This brief was taken to a lot of meetings throughout the constituency and presented to the farmers to find out whether or not there was a measure of agreement with respect to what the current selling price of wheat ought to be. After much consideration the very reasonable people in the farm community decided that to keep pace with the increased cost of production during the last three years there was now justification for demanding not less than $2.75 a bushel to the farmer. This is substantially more than the amount suggested by the Minister of Trade and Commerce today. I know the minister agrees that if an increase in the selling price of wheat were made in direct proportion to the increased cost of production, then $2.75 in 1967 would not be an unreasonable figure.

This group of farmers in my constituency addressed a brief to me and in the résumé of their brief they asked me to support their request for a two-price system for the sale of wheat of at least $2.75 per bushel for the first 4,000 bushels sold by each farmer and then whatever can be obtained on the international market for wheat sold in excess of 4,000 bushels. They give these reasons for their demands:

1. The rising costs of farm operations.

This is well known to members of this house and everyone else who is at all familiar with the farm community today.

2. Competing incomes of those in industry to the incomes of farmers.

3. Departure of farmers from farms to positions in industry.

4. Impending food shortages in Canada and in the world.

I am not sure I can agree that there is an impending shortage of wheat in Canada but there certainly appears to be an impending shortage of foodstuffs available for people throughout the world. Therefore the announcement this evening, with respect to the future price of wheat, while it represents a slight upward adjustment, certainly is not in keeping with the rising costs.

All the other negotiations between the signatory countries to the international wheat agreement were carried on in a situation where there was a huge surplus of wheat, particularly on the North American continent. In 1960 and again in 1963 and 1964 there were huge surpluses of wheat in the United States and Canada which had been carried over from year to year. I suggest that in this kind of situation it is reasonably easy for the purchasing countries to demand that there be no increase or in some cases that the maximum price be decreased. In that kind of situation, when we are trying to sell against continuing surpluses from one year to the next, it is rather difficult for the Canadian negotiators to convince the purchasers there should be an increase in price. However, in 1967 there are no huge surpluses left.

Over the years the farmers have accepted the argument advanced that it was difficult to get an increase in price as long as we were producing far in excess of current market demands. This situation has changed. There are no longer any huge surpluses of wheat in the United States. After Canada has fulfilled all the commitments under the agreements that we have made to date there will be no huge surpluses left in Canada either. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, had it not been for the substantially larger than ordinary crops in western Canada during these last three years we would be unable to meet the commitments we have made to date. Last year wheat production in Canada amounted to over 800 million bushels, a record far above the production level of any previous year. The year before we had a record-breaking crop of over 700 million bushels. But the demand for food, and particularly for wheat, has gone up to the point where these surpluses no longer exist. Surely, this fact should have been taken into account. I am not going to spend a great deal more time on that subject this evening because I am sure that as this session progresses there will be other opportunities to discuss the matter of a just and reasonable price for wheat.

I want to turn now for a moment to the matter of the very severe snowstorms we have had in southern Alberta during the last two or three weeks. I spent a number of days in that part of my constituency which was most severely affected by these storms. The situation is tragic. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) came out and after listening to some of the ranchers and farmers in the area termed it a national disaster. It is difficult to believe until you see it. In southern Alberta, where spring usually arrives about the middle of March, we have had as much as 70 to 100 inches of snow. The snow actually reached the point where it halted surface traffic regardless of the kind of equipment used. The snowplows were unable to cope with the heavy, wet snow.

In many parts of southern Alberta heavy bulldozers had to be brought in to break trails to bring food to livestock stranded on the summer pastures. Even this equipment found difficulty in opening trails. The emergency measures organization in Alberta was able to obtain the assistance of a number of helicopters. While they could not move in sufficient food to keep all the animals from starving in these isolated places, they certainly were a great help. We should recognize the tremendous advantage of having an emergency measures organization which can move quickly to give the kind of assistance which was required in southern Alberta during these very trying three weeks.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I also think we should pay tribute to the United States Air Force. They were asked if they had any helicopters in the area, I believe on a Sunday, at a time when it became apparent that emergency action would have to be taken. Through the United States consulate in Edmonton, and I presume also through Ottawa, in a very few hours two large helicopters were sent from one of the air force bases in Montana. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, they were first on the scene. This kind of co-operation and rendering of immediate assistance in response to a request for machines in the area is something for which we Canadians should be grateful. We should be grateful that we are living alongside a neighbour who responds so quickly to this sort of request.

We also owe a great debt of gratitude for the co-operation received from all of the municipalities to the north of where the storm struck. For example, the city of Calgary dispatched a train loaded with snow removal equipment to the city of Lethbridge to assist the city in digging itself out of what was an almost impossible situation and far beyond the capacity of the city of Lethbridge to cope with the machinery that was there.

Mention has been made of livestock losses. One press report that I saw indicated that some 15,000 head of cattle in southern Alberta may have been lost. I have in front of me the Lethbridge Herald for May 12, some days later, in which it is estimated that there may be a total of as many as 40,000 baby calf losses. In addition there will be losses of growing cattle from starvation and for other reasons.

I was in this area for several days, and even the estimate of 40,000 new calves which died is far too low. I visited a number of ranches where the loss of baby calves was anywhere from 20 per cent to as high as 90 per cent of the total number of calves expected. This will far exceed the estimate of 40,000 when we realize that there are something like 200,000 head of female stock in the area that was affected.

This is a disaster of the highest level for some of the individuals involved. First of all, it means that for some there will be no income for 1967. Some people have lost anywhere from 25 to 30 per cent of their calf crop, which represents whatever profit they would have had after deduction of expenses for the year. Perhaps they can survive, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps they can get along with what other crops they may grow. But there are others who will be virtually put out of business because of this storm. They lost not only almost their entire calf crop for 1967 but also a large percentage of the breeding stock on the farms and ranches.

The Minister of Agriculture visited the area and suggested that the federal government stood ready to give short-term assistance in paying for the cost of moving feed. This involved the use of some of this high priced equipment such as helicopters and snow equipment. The minister also said there would be some long-term assistance for those who were hit hardest. By that I presume he means the ones who are virtually out of the livestock business because of their losses.

In this regard we should like to know fairly soon what the minister has in mind. Does he simply mean that some credit will be made available to enable these people to purchase new breeding stock? Is some compensation to be paid those who suffered the greatest loss? If so, what kind of program will be set up to make compensation available to those who qualify? We do not know. We know that the minister termed it a national disaster, and having witnessed the scene I know that this is true in the case of many individuals. But, Mr. Speaker, I am apprehensive about statements of this sort, and with good reason.

It is only two or three years ago that a very serious situation developed in the Peace River country of northern Alberta where a large group of farmers had been completely without income and without crops for a period of three years. That to them was also a disaster. Federal ministers and officials visited the scene, made a survey and then announced to the press that they stood ready to be of assistance. Following this the provincial government went ahead and instituted a program to offer some assistance to the farmers in this area who had had crop failures during this three-year period.

When it came to the federal government paying its share, which had been worked out on a 50-50 basis between the two levels of government, it did not come through with the money. I do not want to be difficult or unfair, but a letter was sent by the federal Minister of Agriculture at that time to the provincial minister of agriculture in connection with these farmers in the Peace River area to the effect that the federal government would share on a 50-50 basis in whatever kind of assistance program the province set up. After the program was set up and the farmers were given an indication of the type of assistance which would be given to them to purchase seed and make arrangements to meet the expense of sowing another crop, the federal government advised the province that it would not participate, that the farmers should have had crop insurance, that they should put the area under a crop insurance scheme so that they would not face this situation in future.

I see from the clock that you will shortly be interrupting the debate so we may vote, Mr. Speaker, so in closing I want to say that we hope the federal Minister of Agriculture was serious when he said that the government stood ready to offer all reasonable assistance, both short term and long term, to prevent the collapse of some of the farming and ranching units. We will be looking forward to his coming up with a program and we hope he will keep these commitments when it comes to the practical application of a reasonable assistance program.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 9.30 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendments now before the house. Is the house ready for the question on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. Ormiston: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Cameron). Had I voted I would have voted for the subamendment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF OFF-RESERVE PROGRAM TO ASSIST INDIANS

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with government policy to provide the Indian people with the greatest opportunity to choose their own way of life, provision has now been made to extend housing assistance to Indians who wish to live away from reserve communities.

Effective today, employed Indian people can obtain assistance under the off-reserve housing program which will enable them to live closer to their work, to broaden their opportunities for continued employment and to live in the community of their choice. It will assist them to take advantage of the home ownership finance facilities which Canadians generally have available to them.

Under this program the Indian Affairs branch will provide a conditional grant up to a maximum of $6,000 for a house and $1,000 for furnishings. The amount available to each Indian will relate to his income and his ability to meet mortgage payments on the cost of the home over and above the conditional grant.

An arrangement has been made with my colleagues the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Labour responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to assist in carrying out this program. The Department of Veterans Affairs will supervise the program. Their role will be to assist the Indian in his selection of a home suitable to his needs, and they will make certain that each home, either constructed or purchased conforms to the standards of the National Housing Act. Central mortgage and housing will be responsible for providing the mortgage funds required to cover the costs involved above the amount of the conditional grant.

The conditional grant will be secured by a second mortgage which will be forgiven if the applicant lives in the house for a ten year period. As hon. members know, Indians who live in reserve communities are now given grants up to $7,000 for houses built on the reserves. It is one of the purposes of this program to ensure that there are not only no obstacles in the way of Indians who wish to live away from reserves, but that there are no financial disadvantages. It is the government's policy to encourage the Indian people to choose their own role in the Canadian community, just as every other Canadian does. This program will assist in meeting this objective.

An initial amount of one million dollars has been provided by my department to initiate the program.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, this announcement has been anticipated with a great deal of interest, particularly by the members of the Indian communities across Canada and also by all the members of this house. I am sure I can say that, because in recent months and years there has been a growing interest in the welfare of those to whom we like to refer as our first Canadians. When the minister announced the housing program for Indians on reservations last year it was felt it would have a negative effect unless some provision was made to meet the even more critical housing demand among our Indian citizens, that is accommodation for the Indians moving off the reservations.

The policies which have been established in recent years for our Indian citizens, the improvements in educational opportunities, the job counselling service which has been set up within the framework of the old unemployment insurance commission and now the National Employment Service, and of course the extension of the vote to our Indian population, all have had the beneficial effect of encouraging Indians to move into the general economy of Canada.

I know that one of the recommendations which recently came out of the committee, whose members have been active in examining the growing problems of our Indian citizens, was that provision be made along the lines which have been announced here this morning. It was my privilege a few weeks ago to attend the conference on Indian affairs in Winnipeg which is sponsored every year by the greater welfare council of Winnipeg. This year it was handled entirely by the Indians themselves, and housing was one of the main problems discussed during that conference.

We hope the benefits of the program will become available immediately. One of the difficulties in recent policy announcements on Indian affairs has been that the announcement has been followed by a gap in activity at the local level. Naturally the Indians are tremendously interested in this program. They will be making inquiries and applications and I trust the program has developed to such an extent that it will be possible to implement it now at the local level.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, ever since parliament approved by a special vote the principle of broadening the housing program for the Indian people the members of this party have been anxiously awaiting the announcement of the details which the minister has given us this morning. We certainly subscribe to the statement in the minister's announcement that the Indian people themselves should have the broadest possible freedom of choice as to the area in which they live and the role they wish to play within the general framework of our society. We welcome the special provisions that are made within this program to assist them, although we recognize that the value of this program, particularly for those Indians who are in the higher income levels, will be subject to the same limitations of high cost financing which apply to our general housing programs in this country. So, when we approve of this proposal it should not be construed that we fail to recognize the limitations which it has.

I feel the suggestion the minister made in his announcement to the effect that supervision of the program should be in the hands of the Department of Veterans Affairs is excellent. I believe most of us recognize that over a period of years in the administration of the special program for veterans housing a great deal of expertise has been acquired by the personnel of that department. The only query in my mind in this connection concerns the availability of field personnel in the Department of Veterans Affairs to advise the Indians. I hope the agreement the minister has reached with this department has adequately covered that point.

I believe most of us agree that the Indian people have been subjected to very severe hardships in trying to find any kind of decent housing in communities outside of their own reserves. They will welcome and take advantage of this program in increasing numbers. Certainly I know I have been receiving a good many inquiries as to how and when they were going to be able to approach this question. I hope the detailed administration of this program in the field will be advanced more rapidly than some of the other programs the Indian affairs branch has been attempting to initiate. We sometimes become aware of the limitations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take the liberty of interrupting the hon. member to remind him of the provisions of the relevant standing order which enjoins members commenting on ministerial statements to make brief comments. I know the term "brief" is relative. The hon. member may like to bring his remarks to a close rather soon.

Mr. Barnett: I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I was just on the point of terminating my remarks. I do not want to get into competition with the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) or any other member.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, just a few words, for I shall be very brief, to congratulate the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) on having announced a housing program for the Indian reserves.

I believe the allotment of that amount, namely one million dollars, was anxiously awaited by the Indians and I trust those public funds will be spent in the direct implementation of the government's goal of handing over to the Indians the administration of their reserves, and not in such a way as to allow those now in authority on the reserves to go on exerting their influence. I think the hon. minister is aware of this and of the fact that Indian reserve councils as well as responsible Indians in my riding, are anxious to manage their own affairs without always having some white manager, or even five or six of them, to embroil matters.

I wish with all my heart that the program announced by the hon. minister to enable the Indians to administer their own affairs will be implemented as soon as possible and by so doing, I think that I am expressing the wish of the people mainly responsible for our Indian reserves. I am sure that once in possession of the necessary power to administer their reserves, they will find qualified people. In fact, I think that there are as many qualified people among the Indians as anywhere else. It is simply a matter of finding them and especially letting them do their job, instead of expatriating them or forcing them out of their reserves so that only the middle class remains there. It is imperative to leave on the reserves Indians who are able to do things, in order to give them the opportunity to work for their fellow-citizens.

DOMINION DAY

PROVISION FOR OBSERVANCE OF NATIONAL DAY

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-108, respecting the observance of Dominion day.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am once again placing this bill on the order paper to draw attention to the need for changes in our legislation to help ensure that Canada's national day can be observed in an appropriate manner throughout our country.

[Translation]

The object of this bill is to have our national day celebrated in an appropriate manner all over the country.

[English]

I should like to draw attention to the fact that the original version of this bill drew important non-partisan support in the last session. For example, a number of suggestions made by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) will be incorporated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. These remarks are not in order.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RAFFLES AND BINGOS FOR CHARITABLE PURPOSES

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-109, to amend the Criminal Code (raffles and bingo for charitable purposes).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I am again placing this bill on the order paper to draw attention to the continuing need to amend the Criminal Code so that service clubs and other non-profit community service groups that wish to do so can raise funds in the manner referred to in the bill, in the amount and in manner sufficient for the charitable and religious objects of these groups.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS TO FABRICS, DETERGENTS, PAINTS AND DYES

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-110, to amend the Food and Drugs Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, this bill is the same as the one I introduced in the last session but I forgot to include it in the draw. It provides that the Food and Drugs Act be amended to include fabrics, detergents, paints and dyes and to give the consumer the same protection for these products as the act does for food and drugs.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION, AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENT OF OTHER LEGISLATION

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-6 (from the Senate), to revise and consolidate the Interpretation Act and amendments thereto, and to effect certain consequential amendments to the Canada Evidence Act and the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—REQUEST FOR HOUSE DISCUSSION FOLLOWING SPEECHES BY MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the cabinet has shown marked division, amounting almost to discord, in its views regarding Viet Nam, and considering that the views expressed by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) and the Registrar General (Mr. Turner) are dissimilar to the views expressed by the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), will the Prime Minister now arrange to set aside a day or two so the House of Commons may deal with this matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as we are in the throne speech debate there is an opportunity to make statements on this matter. After the throne speech debate we hope to proceed to consideration of the estimates. The opposition parties, of course, will be consulted about the departments to be considered. If the Department of External Affairs is to be considered at an early date there will be ample opportunity then to discuss this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister not answer the question? Will he not lend his prestige to having a resolution brought before the house so the question of Viet Nam may be discussed by parliament, not by some committee but by the House of Commons in session?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are before the House of Commons this matter can be discussed in the House of Commons. No resolution is required for that. I do not think any special procedure is required at the moment to bring about this discussion, considering there has been no change in government policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister on this occasion will not be able to say that he did not read the remarks of the President of the Privy Council and is therefore unable to comment thereon. Will the Prime Minister say whether he approves of the views expressed by the President of the Privy Council which are in contradiction to everything that has been placed before the house by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Pearson: My right hon. friend is confusing views and policies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I repeat to my right hon. friend that there is no change in government policy as laid down by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on April 11 and by myself in a letter dated February 21, which was made public on May 10. I also referred to the question in the house the other day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister now suggesting that there is no such thing as cabinet solidarity? Are we witnessing, as a result of these statements, the absurd and ramshackle idea of cabinet solidarity practised by this government?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Considering the trenchant and clear statement made by the President of the Privy Council to the sixth arts of management conference at Toronto on Saturday, May 13, may we assume that what he said was government policy with respect to Viet Nam? Has that been endorsed by the cabinet as the policy which is to obtain for the Canadian government?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot prevent the hon. gentleman from making any assumptions he cares to make. I have already said this morning that government policy on this matter is that which has been laid down by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and that has not changed.

Mr. Douglas: Then may I ask the Prime Minister whether the policy of cabinet solidarity has changed?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The principles and obligations of cabinet solidarity are well understood.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But not followed by this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Later:]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): In the light of the questions which have already been asked with regard to cabinet solidarity, and bearing in mind the speeches made by the Registrar General and the President of the Privy Council on the Viet Nam situation, I should like specifically to ask the Prime Minister whether he supports the theory that responsible parliamentary government demands cabinet solidarity on major parliamentary issues.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is much too general in nature to be asked now.

Mr. Grafftey: The question is general in nature but I related it to the specific instance which is exercising the minds of Canadians right now. Does the government feel that cabinet solidarity is called for with regard to the subject of Viet Nam policy?

Mr. Pearson: I hope that in due course the hon. member will learn from experience what cabinet solidarity means.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): To put the question much more succinctly, can the Prime Minister tell us what is going to happen to the President of the Privy Council?

VIET NAM—PRESS REPORTS OF CONVERSATIONS WITH CZECHOSLOVAKIAN PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): My question is for the Prime Minister. Press reports of the right hon. gentleman's conversations with President Novotny of Czechoslovakia indicate a surprising extent of agreement, particularly on Viet Nam. Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether the statement in this morning's Globe and Mail, which in effect places the onus for dissolving the conflict on the "actions of the United States", was part of that agreement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The agreement which was reached between the president of Czechoslovakia and myself on this matter was that the war should be brought to an end as quickly as possible, and that to that end the bombing should end as soon as possible.

VIET NAM—PRESS REPORT ON MEETING OF U.S.-CANADA INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): My question relates to the sessions conducted in the last few days by the Canada-United States interparliamentary group over which you, Mr. Speaker, presided, and I should like to direct it to the Prime Minister.

In view of the very misleading statement which appeared in an Ottawa newspaper on Saturday that pressure was applied by the Canadian delegates on their United States counterparts in regard to certain topics under discussion in the defence and security committee, and in view of the fact that extremely important and enlightening information was freely conveyed to us concerning United States views on the most recent developments in Viet Nam, would the Prime Minister consider giving the Canadian people through a news release a correct report of the true nature of these valuable discussions?

Would he also inform the Canadian public that the majority of the members of the committee, while deeply deploring the conflict, emerged from the meetings assured and convinced—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McIntosh: —that the United States government is doing everything in its power—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will admit that this is a statement rather than a question.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and relates to another matter than that just dealt with.

The Prime Minister invited provincial premiers to attend a Canadian constitutional conference to take place early next July. Now, as the premier of the province of Quebec has stated that that sort of conference would take place between two cognacs, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has begun to increase his supply of cognac for that occasion.

[English]

GRAIN

INQUIRIES AS TO PROVISIONS OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the recently concluded international wheat agreement. Has any provision been made in that agreement for a minimum amount which the consuming or importing countries have agreed to take? If so, what is that amount?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, sir, there are no minimum amounts provided for in the agreement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question with reference to the cereal grain agreement and the GATT negotiations. What are the arrangements for the contribution of this 4.5 million tons of wheat for needy countries? The minister said Canada will contribute half a million tons. Will we be paid for that amount, and then make a financial contribution to whatever fund is set up?

Mr. Winters: No, sir. It is my understanding that the contribution will be made in kind, in wheat, flour or some equivalent foodstuff.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): In view of the minister's statement last night —some of us have had time to read it now —I wonder whether he could clarify this point. In view of the fact that the European common market is a protected market for the member countries, does the international wheat agreement entered into in Geneva between certain exporting and importing countries guarantee a price that Canada will get from Great Britain in reference to exports of wheat to that country?

Mr. Winters: I am not sure I understood that question.

Mr. Woolliams: I will put it this way. Does the agreement in question, if it is in question, guarantee a price for wheat exported to Great Britain from Canada after Great Britain joins the European common market?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING MANDATORY BREATH TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether a decision has yet been reached on the unanimous recommendation of the justice and legal affairs committee calling for mandatory breath tests for drinking drivers?

Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Minister of Justice): The Department of Justice has examined the report of the committee and has reached certain conclusions which will be incorporated in amendments to the Criminal Code. The introduction of these amendments is, of course, a matter which involves the parliamentary timetable and I cannot answer that part of the question.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR DETAILED STATEMENT ON NEW GATT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce following those which have already been addressed to him on the subject of wheat. In view of the interest felt in all parts of the country in the minister's statement yesterday, and the attempts to explain it which appeared in the press today, would the hon. gentleman consider giving us more information about the agreement, particularly as to its likely eflect on consumers in Canada both in the short term and in the long term? I am thinking now of the effect on such basic products as newsprint, aluminum and so on. Would the minister consider making a statement on motions?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will be glad to do that as soon as I can, but it will not be possible to make such a statement for some time. This was an agreement reached among the major trading nations. It must be considered by all the nations participating in GATT, and it will probably take until the end of June for them to work out all the details and announce them. But as soon as it can be done I will be glad to comply with the hon. gentleman's request.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Can the minister indicate what is the average reduction in tariffs to which Canada is committed in connection with manufactured articles entering this country from the United States? He does not need any information of the kind he has just mentioned in order to answer that question. With our tariffs so much lower than United States tariffs, if the cut goes too far the result cannot be beneficial to Canada. Would the minister say what will be, and I repeat "what will be", the average reduction on manufactured goods coming from the United States into Canada if the present negotiations as concluded are carried out?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, the level of tariffs is a matter for the Minister of Finance, and I would be glad if the question could be redirected to him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy for assistance from the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it has been announced a number of times in this house, both prior to and during the negotiations, that Canada would not agree to negotiate on the basis of across the board tariff cuts, and it would be quite impossible and quite meaningless to give any percentage figure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You simply don't know; that is all.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question either to the Minister of Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Finance. How soon will the government be in a position to issue a paper showing in detail what the various tariff changes will be, and thus put the house in a position to debate or discuss this matter?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to answer the part of the question that relates to the Canadian tariff which, of course, comes under the Department of Finance. It would be my intention to bring in resolutions to implement the reductions in tariffs that have been negotiated but it would be impossible to do this, as my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, for some time. I might say to the house now that for this reason I think it might be useful if in the debate on the budget the resolutions themselves were not entirely disposed of until I could bring in resolutions dealing with the tariff cuts.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister indicate how soon a paper can be issued showing what these changes will be, thus putting the house in the position of being able to come to some conclusion in regard to what their effects will be on the economic life of the country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said, I do not think this will be possible before the end of June.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): May I ask a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance has said these negotiations will take some time. When he says "some time" are we to assume it will take as long as it has taken the Secretary of State for External Affairs to negotiate the boundary lines for the 12 mile limit?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRAINING WORKSHOPS FOR MENTALLY RETARDED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the recent statement by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that training will continue to be accorded to the retarded under the Vocational and Technical Training Act, and in view of the fact that the House of Commons at the end of last session repealed this act, making it impossible to carry out the minister of manpower's wishes, will the Minister of National Health and Welfare give consideration to the setting up of so-called sheltered workshops in all parts of the country for training the mentally retarded in physical skills essential to their self sufficiency?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it is possible under the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan for the federal and provincial governments to co-operate in the development of work activity projects which could be applied to the mentally retarded in an effort to bring them into the active labour market. I am sure this is possible under the terms of the Canada Assistance Act. My hon. friend may be interested in knowing that recently the government took a decision to provide $2½ million over a period of time to develop needed research and demonstration projects into the whole complex field of mental retardation.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the minister mind informing the house whether there have been any consultations with the provinces on this subject, or any agreements to date?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, a number of agreements have been concluded between the provinces and this government giving effect to the Canada Assistance Plan. I would be happy to investigate whether any work activity projects under the plan have been put into motion in any of the provinces.

EXPO '67

PROVISION FOR ATTENDANCE OF PEOPLE ON LOW INCOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Since many needy Canadians, especially welfare recipients and pensioners, find it difficult to visit Expo '67, would the government consider making arrangements to provide these people with special admission passes, at least on certain days of the week or during certain months of the year?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, Expo is a corporation run under a tripartite agreement participated in by three levels of government. However, I shall be glad to take the question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—REQUEST THAT EGG IMPORTS BE REDUCED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence, I will address it to his parliamentary secretary.

In view of the massive importation of eggs into the province of Quebec, which penalizes intolerably our own producers, would the parliamentary secretary tell us what steps the minister will take to remedy this situation which is detrimental to our farmers?

[English]

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to bring this question to the attention of the minister. I am sure the hon. member will agree that any announcement with regard to the policy of the government should be made by the minister later.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Privy Council, who has had a very easy morning. In view of his espousal of the right of free speech in matters of conscience, will he now recommend the reinstatement of Mr. John Kroeker, whom he as minister of finance had fired for the same reason?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the government carefully study the idea of the abolition of the royal power of dissolution put forward by that anti-crown minded member for Carleton (Mr. Bell)?

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I rule the question out of order. I understand the hon. member for Carleton is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Twice the hon. member has made this statement, once yesterday in my absence. I did not raise a question of privilege earlier because I did not wish to advertise this stupid remark. There is no truth whatsoever in it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—ALLEGED ACTIVITIES OF CANADIANS ON CONTROL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct this question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the statements made by Mr. Gerald Clark, associate editor of the Montreal Star, and corroborated by Mr. Tim Ralfe of the C.B.C. Now that the Montreal Star has editorially stated that Mr. Clark's statements are true, that Canadians on the international control commission are passing, in their official capacity as members of the commission—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —information to the United States intelligence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the right hon. gentleman asking a question directly?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that this has been reported and confirmed, will the Prime Minister arrange to give an opportunity to these two people to establish what they say they can, namely that the government misled the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the confirmation by an editorial in a newspaper of its reporter's statements does not necessarily mean a confirmation of the facts. I have stated in the house that there was no spying or clandestine activity by the Canadian members of the commission, and I stand by that statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister not give these men the opportunity to establish what they know? Surely he is not going to deny them that, having said it was not correct and was not true?

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. While he has said there has been no spying, the statement to the effect that documents, tape recordings and photographs were transmitted to the United States authorities by military personnel attached to the Canadian delegation on the I.C.C. has not been denied. May I now ask the Prime Minister is he prepared, having made full investigation, to deny that statement which was made by both Mr. Clark and Mr. Ralfe?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have already dealt with that point in an answer to a question when I said, among other things, that the Canadian members of the commission reported only to the Canadian commissioner and the Canadian commissioner to the Canadian government.

Mr. Douglas: As a supplementary question, the Prime Minister also said at the time this matter arose that he would be quite prepared to have the two gentlemen in question appear before the external affairs committee. I asked him the other day would he be prepared to introduce a motion referring this matter to the external affairs committee, and the Prime Minister offered to take that as notice and look into it. Is he now in a position to say the government is prepared to initiate discussion and investigation of the matter?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think the external affairs committee is in a position to express its own interest in this matter if it so desires. However, my hon. friend knows it is not usually a very productive process to inquire of newspaper men the sources of their information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are a little afraid of the results, aren't you?

HOUSING

EXTENSION TO ESKIMOS OF OFF-RESERVE INDIAN PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. Orange (Norhwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I join with other hon. members in welcoming the minister's announcement today about the off-reserve Indian housing program which will have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows the rules do not permit him to comment on ministerial statements. He should ask his question.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Try the caucus tomorrow.

Mr. Orange: Will the minister indicate whether the off-reserve housing program announced today will also apply to the Eskimo people who move from their traditional settlements into areas where economic opportunities are available?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker, because we have a separate Indian-Eskimo housing program which is exceedingly generous but which is not designed to bring Eskimos to southern Canada.

Mr. Orange: I have a supplementary question. Is the minister now considering the establishment of a program similar to that announced today for the Métis population of Canada?

Mr. Laing: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that within the last few years a number of Indian people have become integrated in the industrial employment areas and enfranchised, will they qualify for the benefits under the housing program announced by the minister?

Mr. Laing: If they are currently on reserves, yes.

Mr. Simpson: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the fact that a number of Indian people have become integrated in the industrial employment areas in the last few years and are residing in areas where Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not grant housing loans unless they are guaranteed by the industry, will the minister assure the house that any Indian who qualifies for the $6,000 grant will also qualify for a C.M.H.C. loan in order that he may complete his house?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I think my statement clearly indicated the purpose we have in mind in respect of providing housing for Indians who elect to leave the reserves and move into settlements. I expect if this is carried out in the spirit in which I made the announcement my hon. friend will be satisfied.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROVISION OF EXPERT ASSISTANCE FOR MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Has that right hon. gentleman received representations from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture under date of May 10 to the effect that in view of the growing burden of responsibility on members of parliament, expert and specialized personnel should be made available to members of our Commons, similar to the assistance provided members of the United States House of Representatives and Senate; and will the Prime Minister give serious consideration to implementing such a proposal?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest this question be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AID

SUGGESTED CRASH PROGRAM FOR EARLY ACHIEVEMENT OF OBJECTIVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the very strong speech he made yesterday in Montreal urging the importance of aid to developing countries, will the government consider inaugurating a crash program so that Canada this year might achieve the goal the government has set for 1970?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have already increased our program very considerably, and it will be further increased next year. We expect and hope that by 1970 we will reach the figure of 1 per cent of our national income, in which case we will be the only major economic and industrial country in our position to have reached that figure. I think we are doing very well, and I doubt that any crash program is required.

Mr. Knowles: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister feel that a figure of 1 per cent will match the spirit of the speech he made yesterday in Montreal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—COMPLAINTS OF PROPERTY DAMAGE CAUSED BY AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Defence. Is he aware of the numerous complaints against the military manoeuvres being carried out at Bagotville during which the flyers break the sound barrier and cause real damage, in the country as well as in the cities?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be put on the order paper.

[Mr. Southam.]

FOREIGN TRADE

TEXTILES—EFFECT ON NEW AGREEMENT UNDER GATT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and concerns the overall agreement achieved yesterday in the Kennedy round of negotiations. Is the minister in a position to tell the house whether an agreement has been laid down as regards the exports of textile products to Canada and whether our country should expect an increase in the imports of such products?

[English]

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that question can be answered when a broader statement is made in respect of the context of the agreement reached. I hope that can be done as early as possible, but certainly not within the next few days.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: A supplementary to my first question, Mr. Speaker.

When the hon. minister makes his statement soon, as he just told the house, will he be able to tell the house whether there will remain, in this overall GATT agreement, the rule that enabled a country to protest whenever it was submerged or too heavily affected by foreign importations?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is not in order.

AIRPORTS

VAL D'OR, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): My question is directed to the hon. Minister of Transport. Has he anything new to tell this house as regards the building of an air terminal in Val d'Or, which has been referred to in this house for at least three years? Has the minister arrived at a decision concerning this matter?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this is moving a great deal faster than it has in previous years.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LOBSTER FISHING SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Bower (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that storms and the prolonged unseasonably cold weather have restricted the lobster catch to much below normal proportions in district 4, Nova Scotia, with only 15 days left in the season, will the minister give an assurance that the season in this district will be extended by at least 15 days in order to give the lobster fishermen there a chance to reap something at least approximating the normal harvest which will help several thousand people to avoid winding up in debt as a result of this activity on which they depend fundamentally for their annual income?

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot at this time give an assurance that the lobster season will be extended in district 4. As I said earlier in this house, an assessment of the catch will be made toward the end of the regular season, and if it is judged advisable to extend the season it will be extended at that time.

Mr. Bower: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister make up his mind earlier than just before the end of the season, because by then the people will have abandoned their efforts in this line of activity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

BLACKOUT OF PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY DURING CENTENNIAL SPECTACLE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think I should direct my question to the Minister of Public Works, and in his absence I will place it on record. Has an order been issued that the Library of Parliament be closed and blacked out every night from now until October while the son et lumière spectacle is taking place?

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that the price under the international wheat agreement has been raised is the minister in a position to indicate an increase in the initial payment for wheat to producers in western Canada?

Hon. Robert Winters (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question. When can we expect an announcement in this regard?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, this is a policy decision which can only be announced after it is made, and no decision has been made as yet.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the question I placed before the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding an early decision on an increase in the initial payment for wheat—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY AS TO SHIPMENTS THROUGH PORT OF CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister now in a position to say what may be the expected tonnages of grain shipments through the port of Churchill this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for statistical information which cannot be given at this time.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCLUSION OF ADDITIONAL SERVICES UNDER PROVINCIAL PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister of health and welfare regarding the statement by Dr. Ralph A. Connor, chief of the dental division of the Department of National Health and Welfare, who said:

> If a provincial government wanted to sponsor a comprehensive dental insurance scheme and it could exert sufficient pressure on the federal government, there is no legislative barrier blocking it.

I should like to ask the minister whether this means that the federal government now is prepared to accede to the request of any provincial government for either a dental insurance program or for an optometric care insurance program.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker; that conclusion would not be warranted from the statement read.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there not a provision in the medicare legislation to the effect that if a province wishes to include services other than those specified in the act the federal government under that act has the authority to make the additional provision?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker; the act provides that the governor in council, under conditions laid down by the governor in council, can act in concert with any province to add further services. That is the authority in the bill. The policy of the government at the present time is not to add further services except to recommend to the governor in council, as indicated during the debate, that certain surgical procedures would be shareable at the option of the provinces.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask whether any province has requested an extension of the health insurance field to cover services other than the medical and surgical services?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in the strict sense I think the answer is yes; certain provinces have requested the extension of particular services. The matter was discussed fully at the conference of ministers of health held earlier this year. There certainly was no consensus for the extension of any particular services among the provinces. Certain provinces, I believe, would like to have certain services extended at this time. Others were non-committal and others were opposed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the act requires a consensus before any of these services are added, or whether they can be added province by province.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question obviously is argumentative.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR EARLY ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in his capacity as government house leader. In view of the several references made this morning to matters which might be dealt with by committees, for example the external affairs question, can we be assured that the committee to strike the standing committees will make its report in a few days so the standing committees may be established?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is my expectation that the motion to set up the standing committees will be proposed immediately after the adoption of the address.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. L. M. Brand (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, in making a few comments on the speech from the throne I should like to refer directly to the document itself and to some of the plus factors, you might say, and many of the minus factors which are evident in the speech.

On hearing the speech from the throne I believe the first thing which came to one's mind was the fact that this government is unsure of itself. We find in the speech that the government wishes to have a great deal of room to manoeuvre. Then sadly we notice that the only conclusion to which we can come is that the government's priorities are not necessarily the nation's priorities. At page 2 of Hansard we find this in the throne speech:

> It is also conscious—

That is the government.

> —that the advantages and disadvantages of the present constitutional structure are deeply intertwined.

Then it goes on:

> Studies to obtain the best advice on this important matter are now under way with a view to subsequent consideration of the whole problem by parliament.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is an accepted fact that the reform of Canada's constitution is something that demands immediate and open discussion. It is now nearly three years since the party I represent proposed a national conference on confederation. In those three years numerous studies have been made, numerous books have been written and numerous speeches have been made. Surely no one will deny that this subject is one which requires a thoughtful, reasoned and even cautious approach. But neither can it be denied that there never has been a time more opportune or a moment more significant than this centennial year to bring into the open the question of reform of the constitution of our country.

It is all very well to say that the study is going on. But why has this study taken place in darkened rooms with the doors closed and shutters drawn, with not even a flicker of a candle flame to cast a little light on the goings on? Why can it not be brought into the open in an open forum of discussion and opinion? Are we not a country which is mature enough to sit down and reason what our course must be?

I do not think there is any doubt that we are such a country. No one asks that this discussion be concluded overnight. We ask only that the people who love this country be given the opportunity, whether they be scholars or anything else, to express the spirit of their nationhood on the 100th anniversary of this country. After all, a constitution is more than a set of laws; it is the embodiment of a nation's conscience.

I do not suggest for a moment that the government should cease the studies it has undertaken. Rather I suggest that men with piles of books in these darkened rooms cannot capture this conscience for our nation. Let us cast aside every partisan consideration on the part of this government and convene this great constitutional conference. We cannot harm ourselves, and surely we can aid our progress through this second century. Let us have debate and discussion from one coast to the other coast. Let us instil in our people a sense of pride, and future pride, in their country, a pride proceeding from their full participation in deciding the destiny of our country. I think we should write an exciting prologue to parliament's consideration of our constitution. Let us do it now, to have in our remembrance of the centennial year this vital contribution to our future.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Farther along on page 2 of Hansard of May 8, the speech from the throne goes on to read:

> Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

These are fine words indeed. Let us take social injustice first. Where in this document is there an indication of one piece of legislation to ease social injustice? Where is the promised war on poverty? Where is there concern about the disabled and the sick? Where is there concern about mental illness, the greatest single cause of illness in our country? Yet the division of mental health in the Department of National Health and Welfare has been repositioned to a lower level. Apparently it is not considered important enough to be given the type of attention that it should be given. Does the government think its job is done in this field, or does it think that the setting up of another bank or network of computers will solve it? Does the government care? I am sure the people wonder if it does.

The throne speech mentions cultural mediocrity. Who are the government accusing of cultural mediocrity? Is it Expo '67 perhaps, or our musicians, our writers, our artists and our poets? Is it accusing Maureen Forrester, Léopold Simoneau, Glenn Gould or Wilfrid Pelletier? Does it accuse Donald Lautrec, Gordon Lightfoot, Harold Town, Hugh MacLennan, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet or Les Feux Folets? Are those the people and the groups whom the government is accusing of cultural mediocrity? Someone says it did not accuse anyone. Perhaps this is a self accusation, because I think in Canada we have a very proud culture. I am quite sure that the people who are best known in this country are not the members of the government opposite but people like L. M. Montgomery, who wrote Anne of Green Gables in Prince Edward Island and Pauline Johnson in British Columbia. These names are well known in Canada, but how many know the Prime Minister? We know about the Group of Seven and W. O. Mitchell, but how many know the members of the government? I think it is indeed a strange thing to accuse anyone in this country of cultural mediocrity. This government seems to be blind to the enthusiasm, the excitement and the energy we have in our country.

The speech from the throne speaks about all forms of intolerance. I cannot agree more that we must fight against all forms of intolerance, but for whom is the government fighting? Is it fighting for our Indians and Eskimos? Perhaps the government have not yet seen the Indian pavilion at Expo. If they did they would see how the Indians speak with great eloquence in this pavilion. What indeed has the government done for these native peoples? We hear promises and platitudes; today we are told we will build a few more homes for the Indians off the reserves and this at a time when the Indians themselves are pointing out that not sufficient is being done on the reserves. It appears that this government is blind to the needs of the people of Canada.

Then there is mention of spiritual stagnation. The speech from the throne has certainly covered the field. Who is the government accusing of spiritual stagnation? Is it accusing itself again? Is it accusing the men and women of this country who seek a new kind of Christianity? Is it accusing people such as the author of The Comfortable Pew and the people who have been debating it ever since? Is it accusing those who are responsible for the Christian pavilion at Expo? Is the government accusing our late revered Governor General Vanier of spiritual stagnation, or perhaps Cardinal Léger? Does the government know whereof it speaks? Surely it is the government which increases bureaucracy that can be accused of mediocrity and stagnation. Let us not accuse the people of Canada just because the government has no faith in them. The people all across this nation are waking up. They are not going to stand much longer for this type of nonsense.

On page 2 of the throne speech we find the following statement:

> The government will also take special measures in particular designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized.

How long have we waited for this? How long has the government diddled and dawdled around letting the blind lead the blind before action is taken? The government goes on to say that it will take further measures for the retraining of adults, yet it seems to me that a few weeks ago in this house they were hurrying a bill through which had to do with the occupational retraining of adults. What was the matter with that bill? Did the government forget something? Is it adding something to it even before the legislation has had an opportunity to be carried out properly? This government is very strange; one end does not seem to know what the other end is doing. In the last few days we have had ample evidence of this strange polarity in the cabinet.

The throne speech refers to the involvement of the government in many matters; and so it should, because this government more than any other has continued the process of involvement and control. It takes money away and then gives it back with strings attached. Last year alone 11,000 new civil servants were hired by the government, making a total of nearly 250,000 in the public and related services. A short while ago I read somewhere that under this present administration bureaucracy has increased by almost a third. When this government is unable to act and unable to take initiative it puts another group on the top and pays its salaries. It answers problems with more bureaucracy.

[Mr. Brand.]

I am sure the hearts of the members of this house go out to the people of Canada who, petted, pampered and paid for from cradle to grave, are being protected from evil, shielded from thought, muzzled from expression by this government which admits in the speech from the throne that it is becoming increasingly involved.

No one wishes that there be people without food and shelter, without medical assistance or without the opportunity for advancement. In its half hearted attempt to protect the people of this nation the government has ordained that its task must be to stamp out spiritual stagnation and cultural mediocrity. It says to the people that it will take care of them, that it will raise their culture and spirit with bureaucracy and increased taxes. What a way to raise one's spirit. Thank God I have more faith in the people of this country than has this government. I am sure members on this side of the house would never be caught losing faith in the people who sent them here.

Undoubtedly there are some areas in this speech which are open to approbation. Even in a hash of analogies there is bound to be some truth. However, I will not go into them today. Many apologists from the other side will have already done this. I am sure their words are accurate in this regard, but I would rather spend a few minutes on what is lacking in the throne speech.

Somewhere in this throne speech, Mr. Speaker, amidst all these platitudes and hyperbolic overtures there is a program. Most of it is old, weather beaten and a little cracked here and there. Some of it reflects the fact that the government cannot make up its mind whether or not to be Canadian. Part of this program, if it were only more specific, could help the country, although the government appears to want to help this country for the wrong reasons. However, as I pointed out before, the priorities are reversed. There are problems and questions facing this country that require solution. Some of these the government says it will face, but some are not even mentioned.

Where, for example, is legislation for the control of air pollution? Where is there any mention of action on the recommendations of the committee on drug costs and prices? We spent a long time in that committee, had many meetings and made many recommendations in a lengthy and reasoned report. Where in the speech from the throne is there any mention of an attempt by this government to do something about the cost of drugs in this country? I have the report here, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to refer to page 51:

> Your committee has therefore come to the following conclusions:
> 1. That the price of drugs in Canada is at least higher than it need be;
> 2. That no significant change has taken place in the drug cost structure since the recommendations of the Hall commission which were primarily based on the recommendations of the restrictive trade practices commission;

I will skip a few recommendations, and then I find this:

> 7. That the implementation of the recommendations could alter in some respects the form of the drug industry as it exists today, removing inefficiencies in the industry and increasing competition;
> 8. That in anticipation of national and provincial welfare programs or the further development of other forms of health services, it is of paramount importance that legislation be introduced at the earliest practical date to implement the recommendations of this committee.

I will repeat that:

> —it is of paramount importance that legislation be introduced at the earliest practical date to implement the recommendations of this committee.

I could say a great deal about this problem. I have marked certain portions of the summary of recommendations contained in this report. Action could be taken by this government this session to lower the cost of drugs to the consumer. What has the government done? It has not even appointed a minister, though that is usually what they do, appoint another minister. I shall read recommendation No. 2:

> That the personnel and facilities of the food and drug directorate be expanded to make possible the implementation of the recommendations of the Boyd committee, the Hilliard committee and this committee.

I shall not read all the recommendations, but I should like to refer hon. members to recommendations Nos. 2, 4, 5, 6, 9, 13, 17, 18, 20 and 21. All these recommendations clearly show what this government could do to bring forward legislation to amend various acts and introduce other measures to help the food and drug directorate bring down the cost of drugs to the consumer. I should like to read recommendation No. 13:

> That the federal sales tax be removed from the sale of prescription drugs.

I remind hon. members that instead of removing the tax this government has raised it from 11 per cent to 12 per cent. Instead of helping the people who need help, the old folk with large drug bills, what have they done? They have added another 1 per cent to the tax, which in reality amounts to about a 9 per cent increase in the tax itself. This is what this government has done to help the people of Canada. It is no wonder we feel that government has its priorities backward.

Where is legislation to protect our dairy farmers from bankruptcy? Where is legislation to guard against inflation and stop the spiralling cost of living? Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, there are two things that are bothering the people of Canada today. The first is the increase in taxation and the second is the ever increasing cost of living. These are the two problems which are becoming an increasing burden to every Canadian. If something is not done about them soon I would not be the least bit surprised to see more than the farmers marching on parliament hill. I think it is about time some of the people who are going to visit Expo stopped at this place on their way to express some of their views on taxation and the cost of living.

There are many other matters with which I should like to deal, but time is of the essence in this debate. I should have liked to discuss parliamentary rules and procedures. Perhaps at some other time I can do so. I should have liked to go into this question in detail because it seems to me this government, although it is suggesting changes, once again has its priorities backward. I believe the government is suggesting changes in the wrong way. I just say that I do not agree with the priorities suggested.

It is not merely an allocation of time, not merely the shortening of debate or the rushing through of legislation that we need. What we need is an expanded opportunity to study legislation, to understand the implications of the legislation brought before the house. I believe we require a further change in the committee system, perhaps allowing the committees more freedom to frame legislation. Members should be given assistance beyond that rendered by the parliamentary library, the type of assistance which is so necessary to make a member a good parliamentarian. I must say I was very pleased to hear the Canadian Federation of Agriculture suggest today that research assistance be provided for members.

I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, that no legislation had been announced to protect our dairy farmers from bankruptcy. In this connection I should like to refer to two articles in Farm and Country, the first of which is dated March 28, 1967 and headed "Ontario Industrial Farmers Must Have $5 Milk". This article is by Charles Munro, president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. Let me just read one paragraph:

> The demand for $5 per hundredweight for milk used for industrial purposes is neither frivolous, greedy or unreasonable. As a recent resolution of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture says, even this price is still short of economic equality for producers.
> This should not surprise anybody.

The second article which appeared in the same paper is dated April 11, 1967 and was written by the same gentleman:

> Government policy is supposed to help the people, not drive them up the financial wall.
> This is a thoroughly bad, thoroughly unacceptable policy. Mr. Greene was able—

I presume the writer is referring to our disabled minister or whatever he should be called:

> Mr. Greene was able last summer to divert the wrath of dairy farmers toward Queen's Park and Quebec city, thanks to the unsophistication of those heading the protest movement. If he hopes this year to continue avoiding criticism by putting up another false front in the form of the Canadian Dairy Commission he is wrong. Farmers now have a little less Greene in their eyes than they did.

This seems to say a mouthful, as we used to say out west. I am not going to go into all the reasons this dairy policy is not acceptable. I believe the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State put the case very well yesterday, and I refer to what he said at page 230 of Hansard. This is one statement which I believe is rather good, if I can find it:

> I would agree that such an argument might be true, but for an area such as Bonaventure and other less advanced areas where the number of dairy producers is less than a thousand with about 40 per cent having to look elsewhere for a supplementary income, those claims are fair and legitimate.

• (12:30 p.m.)

That is a member of the government, a parliamentary secretary, speaking. I could not agree more. In view of this, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Moore):

> This house regrets that Her Majesty's advisers have failed to submit a program to give the dairy farmers of Canada a guaranteed return on their product of $5.10 per hundredweight for all manufacturing milk.

With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I wish in closing to say a few things about the speech from the throne. This speech makes pretty statements about confederation, but it ignores the meat of the matter. It ignores the fact of this nation and the strength of the nation. The strength of this or any other nation is in the strength of the individual and the collective strength of its peoples. Aside from these pretty statements, this government would have us even in this special year ignore the people. It would have us ignore their strength. It would even have us ignore their patriotism.

This is the government, Mr. Speaker, that takes away from our nation the heritage of our first one hundred years. This is the government that sneers at royalty, that would denigrate the fact that we are a constitutional monarchy, an example of the most stable form of government the world has ever seen. It is the same government that gives its people not leadership, not spirit or enthusiasm or even faith, but gives them commissions, studies, white papers, officials and ministers.

As we begin our second century as a nation, Mr. Speaker, let us recognize the needs of this great country. Let us recognize that there are two languages and two cultures. Let us allow our people to know one another, to understand one another. Let us give to our people no matter what language they speak the leadership they need in the cause of this unique country. In this centennial year let us rededicate ourselves as Canadians and as members of parliament to the principle that we are, above all, the representatives of the people who sent us here. Let us join with members of all parties to make this house more effective, with new rules, with television, if you want, with whatever is necessary. And let us never forget that this is the forum of the people; to use an old phrase, it is the wellspring of democracy.

We must protect and guide the interests of those we represent. We must encourage those who report our doings to them to be as objective and as factual as possible. But above all, Mr. Speaker, we must remember that if we are to have a new, proud Canada we must work to the limit of our abilities as individuals to preserve the freedom of purpose and choice that our people must have.

I conclude with one final quote from a former political science student at McGill University, Gerald Haslam; it is a very good one and I want to put it on the record:

> Let us go forth together, and work as we must. Let us hold high our heads and be proud. Let us make of this nation of ours, greatness.

Mr. Speaker: I assume that the hon. member wants to complete the form of his amendment and add at the beginning that the following amendment be added to the address. That is a technicality, but the motion will be amended accordingly.

Mr. Ed. Schreyer (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to extend congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Like other hon. members who have spoken I too was impressed with the style and the manner in which both the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) carried out their duty.

Although I do not mean this in any unkind personal way I must say that I was left greatly confused, particularly by the subject matter of the speech of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska. He would have us believe that the farmers of this country are quite satisfied with the current state of their industry and with the current price levels prevailing in agriculture. As has been said by the last speaker who just moved an amendment, this is certainly far from the case.

One reads in the throne speech paragraph after paragraph about the legislative intent of the government for the year 1967. A first reading of the speech would lead one to believe that this government has a lengthy list of legislative items with which it is very anxious to proceed in this special year. However, Mr. Speaker, it is the fact—I believe this has already been said—that of the entire throne speech only four items are new or original in this session. The others are items which have been carried over either from the preceding year or from the year before that. As my leader said on a previous occasion, this speech from the throne is a potpourri of leftovers.

I, like others here, should like to take the exhortation of the Prime Minister to heart, and would like to avoid making critical comment about this government's activities and the state of the nation. This after all is a special year, and the Prime Minister is no doubt right when he says we should not tear our hair as frequently as we have in past years but should do a little more tub thumping. Yet surely it is not unreasonable, Mr. Speaker, to suggest and suggest strongly that there are hard pressing problems in the country today, and that because they are hard pressing we must engage in hard hitting debate. We must engage in a thoroughgoing analysis of these problems.

It does not take any precision in research to determine what are some of these hard pressing problems. They affect certain income groups and certain occupational groups with particular severity. The first hard pressing problem—and I use every word with deliberate intent—which exists in 1967 and which has existed for a decade or more is that having to do with the level of income being received by the food producers of this country. The hon. member for Saskatoon has just moved an amendment that is sharply critical of this government for its indecision, its procrastination and apparent intention to do nothing to adjust its milk policy so as to enable those who are engaged in milk production to remain in it and continue producing this necessary and vital commodity, not just in the short run but to make their income prospects and therefore production prospects viable and healthy in the long run. That is not being done, and that is why the amendment was moved. I hope that independent minded members on the other side will join this party in supporting that amendment.

• (12:40 p.m.)

In recent weeks there have been new developments in agriculture. The Minister of Trade and Commerce told us something of the new wheat agreement which has been arrived at during the Kennedy round talks, and we gather from the minister's statement that the range of wheat prices under the new agreement will be increased by about 21 cents per bushel. That should be cause for neither joy nor gloom, and the government's optimism should be taken with a grain of salt. An increase of 21 cents means a 10 per cent increase, but in the last three or four years farm machinery has increased by more than 10 per cent, as anybody who has bought a combine in 1964, 1965 or 1966 is aware. A 12 foot self-propelled unit which then cost $9,000 now costs $12,000 to $14,000. The new unit may have a greater work capacity, but that is not enough to justify that degree of price increase. To be realistic, the new agreement does not cover the price increases of the last few years, so we farmers are in the same relative cost-price position we occupied in 1964. The president of the Manitoba's Farmers Union said to the press yesterday that a 40 cent to 50 cent per bushel increase was needed to ease the lot of the farmers he represents.

Farmers have been dissatisfied generally with this government's agricultural policies. When the Minister of Agriculture announced the new diary policy about a month and a half ago he tried to leave the impression that there would be substantially increased federal assistance, but had no satisfactory answer to the point that I raised, that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Moore) repeatedly raised and that other hon. members raised, which was that it was illogical to draw artificial distinctions between surplus fluid milk and manufacturing milk. The minister says fluid milk comes under provincial jurisdiction, and that the federal government therefore ought not to be involved with support payments on fluid surplus milk. The fact is that all surplus fluid milk can be regarded as manufacturing milk and, taking the minister's own words, support for the price of manufacturing milk is a federal responsibility.

The new policy, resting on the foundation of artificial distinctions, does not help dairy farmers but aggravates problems which have grown more serious during the past several years. The Minister of Agriculture, in some of his actions and attitudes, reminds me of a jackass in a rainstorm. The jackass turns his back on the storm, hunkers up his back and takes it without doing anything about it. When the Minister of Agriculture is faced with the legitimate and organized storm of complaints of dairy farmers and spokesmen for the agricultural industry, he stands in one spot, hunkers up and refuses to say whether he will reconsider his policies. In the past I have accused the minister of revealing an attitude of indolent nonchalance toward agriculture, and I repeat that description today. The attitude of the government on agricultural commodity prices is one of indolence and nonchalance. That attitude is evident in other fields also.

Because the government, according to the throne speech, will appoint a special task force to look into agricultural problems we are to infer that we may rest easy. Yet clearly, that task force is an indication that this government has no farm policy it may call its own. There is nothing wrong with the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture and federal and provincial departmental officials meeting and formulating policy at some sort of national farm policy conference. Spokesmen for the farmers unions and the federations have been urging for the last year or two that this be done, yet the minister has not said whether he will accommodate them. The task force mentioned in the throne speech may mean a royal commission, a special ad hoc interdepartmental committee of the federal government, or a similar committee composed of personnel from provincial and federal departments. Nobody knows. In the meantime we may be sure the government will use the task force as a pretext for obtaining the maximum delay, thus avoiding concrete action.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Why do I make this accusation? It is evident that the federal and provincial departments of agriculture have assembled most competent and professional staffs both in production and economic research and analysis. The cost-price squeeze has existed for so long that the term has become a cliché. Surely by now the high ranking officials have coordinated and marshalled all sorts of data about this cost-price squeeze, and possible approaches to ameliorate that condition. Do we, then, need some special task force to look into it?

I am suspicious that this government will use the task force to buy time as it did for example, regarding veterans pensions. I am not well versed in the functioning of that special committee on veterans pensions. I make reference to it for one specific purpose. Ever since I came here as a new federal member almost 18 months ago one of the things promised us almost from day to day, was that the Wood report was to be tabled very soon. It was to serve as a basis for the immediate adjustment of veterans pensions so as to reduce the disparity between those pensions and levels of income received by certain civil service classifications which were at parity decades ago. What has happened? Today, almost 18 months later, we are still waiting for that report. Veterans pensions remain far below parity and they lose more and more purchasing power each year.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Any reasonable man can assume that at times there will be delays in submitting reports that last for a day, a week, a month, even for six months. But for a whole year? When there is such a delay in the presentation of a report which was promised us about 16 months ago and which we were then told was due any time, there is a credibility gap which cannot be closed. To put it in everyday language, who are the authorities trying to kid? They are using this report as an excuse to buy time because they have not been able to co-ordinate their policy thinking with regard to veterans pensions.

The fact is that decades ago veterans pensions were on a par with the salaries of certain job classifications, for example. This is no longer the case and now veterans pensions are as low as 60 per cent of that wage level. Is this acceptable? Obviously these veterans are at a disadvantage today in terms of purchasing power compared with their situation 10 or 20 years ago. Such discrepancies will arise in any dynamic society, in any moving economy, and this presents a problem which governments exist to cope with. It is one of the raisons d'être of government but the administration opposite has not been acting effectively in this, their basic duty.

The cost of living has increased dramatically in the past two years. I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs and others who have made public comment on this subject in recent days would like Canadian citizens to believe that the rate of increase in the cost of living is lessening. Let us pause for a moment and examine the record of the government with regard to the rising cost of living syndrome. Last fall when the housewives were marching in chagrin and anger to protest the rising cost of living, the government was very accommodating and within a few days, not more than two weeks, it indicated that the whole serious subject would be referred to the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on consumer credit, a committee which then reconstituted itself somewhat into a committee on consumer prices.

There was nothing wrong with that move. It gave an opportunity to interested groups to make representations, file briefs and put forward submissions. It gave opportunities to members of parliament to probe with varying degrees of effectiveness into what appeared to be the major causes of these unacceptable increases in the cost of living. After deliberating for some time the committee handed in a number of interim reports.

I do not wish to be critical of that committee; in fact I am not. Nor do I wish to praise its efforts without reservation, because in my opinion in its work there was one serious omission. Adequate reference was not made to the very core of the subject which had been referred to it, namely the cause of the increase in prices. I know some of the chief accountants for the wholesalers and general stores appeared before the committee and were able to persuade certain members—not the majority, I hope—that the prices charged by wholesalers and chain store retailers were not unreasonable because after all, profits amounted to only 1 per cent of sales. The expert witnesses who use the profit to sales ratio are calculating to mislead.

I never could find any testimony in which specific reference was made to the level of profit in proportion to equity input or initial capital investment. Is it not disturbing to realize that there was no consistent pattern of questioning to invite these spokesmen to indicate their returns on equity input? I have here an Annual Report of a firm that is wholesaler to chain stores in the grocery business. I find that after seven years of operation—in the course of those seven years—the business enjoyed a profit of around 1½ per cent of sales, which is not much out of line with the figure mentioned by some of the other firms. This will not arouse much attention and some hon. members will say that is small profit. But here is the rub. In terms of return on equity input or investment the profit comes to a 29 per cent return on equity during each of the last four years of operation. I have it in mind to submit this particular report to the consumer affairs committee to find out, more than anything else, whether it is of a mind to ignore facts and figures of this kind.

Anyone who is at all involved in business and corporate affairs knows there is such a thing as a fair return, a reasonable return, an enticing return, a lucrative return, a return high enough to induce further investment. Similarly, however, any reasonable man should be ready to concede that there is such a thing as a unconscionable return. What will we do about it? Until such time as we have a price review board in this country certain sectors of the economy, certain wielders of economic power and influence, will be able to manipulate prices without much regard for public reaction.

The ladies were angry last year, and with cause. Their anger was diverted by the announcement that their whole area of complaint was being referred, that parliament was going to study it and presumably do something. Well, we are all members of parliament here, and I would like to arouse among my fellow members at least a trace of dissatisfaction with the work done so far and with the recommendations made by the committee on consumer affairs.

We welcome the recommendation that a department of consumer affairs be appointed. Quite candidly I must say I am less enthusiastic about that proposition than most of my colleagues, though I am still on the positive side in supporting it. But one point of dissatisfaction is that the new department of consumer affairs will be combined with the administration of corporate affairs. One can just imagine which will get the short shrift when the chips are down. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North says it will be the elephant and mouse relationship, and I certainly do not disagree with his analogy.

I feel very much inclined to put more figures on the record with respect to this particular wholesale grocery chain store enterprise which over the past five years has been earning a return on equity input of the order of 28 per cent to 32 per cent, but it would be awkward to do so. However, I might add that during this period of time the equity itself has been substantially increased, not by additional subscriptions of new shares but simply by retained earnings from profits and all the while rather lavish dividends have been paid out—certainly on a scale high enough to have encouraged additional investment. The rub, though, was that these shares were not available to the public. At least they have not been available up until recently.

Putting it as an hypothesis, if in 1960 someone had bought 100 shares in this wholesale chain store enterprise he would have had to put up $200, the price then being $2 per share. In each subsequent year he would have received dividends as follows: in 1961, $5; in 1962, $7.50; in 1963, $7.50; in 1964, $10; in 1965, $12.50; in 1966, $18 and in 1967, $26, a total of $86.50 in dividends over six years on a capital input of $200. But that is only a small part of this story. The balance sheet reads like a fairy tale.

In addition to the dividend aspect there is of course the increase in shareholder equity simply because of profits kept as retained earnings and then being incorporated into assets held to the account of the company. I might made a correction at this point to say that the shares were put on the stock market two years ago, and the value of those 100 shares, bought for $200 in 1960, has fluctuated last year between $1,700 and $3,000. This shows the net worth and capital gains aspect of the question.

The more one looks at this kind of story the more one becomes convinced in respect to capital gains taxes, etc., that the Carter commission may well turn out to be one of the greatest and most worth-while royal commissions ever established in this country. There may be some aspects of the Carter commission report that will be unacceptable to the majority of the members of the house, but certainly no one will disagree that there are many features of it which are praiseworthy almost to the extreme, so praiseworthy that even Liberal candidates are calling for its implementation without qualification. I have here a Liberal by-election pamphlet—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Schreyer: May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that it is after one o'clock, and also that his time has expired.

Mr. Schreyer: May I have the indulgence of the house for a minute in order to conclude?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for additional time now. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: One minute.

Mr. Speaker: The consensus of the house is that the hon. member should have another 60 seconds.

Mr. Schreyer: Unfortunately I will not be able to deal with the housing crisis, which is another pressing problem that I referred to earlier in the debate, and will not be able to deal with certain aspects of Indian affairs and the Indian Act. However, I would like to conclude by saying that with respect to these unrelenting problems the government is portraying an attitude of cynicism; that it is using all kinds of methods and pretexts to stall or delay. There is the danger that our festive mood may distract us from our real work. At this time, centennial year or no, people on fixed low incomes, wage earners, and in particular farmers have a reason to expect concrete action to ward off farm bankruptcy and to erase urban slum housing even though this be the year of our nation's one hundredth birthday celebrations.

Mr. Speaker: It being after one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the last speaker before the noon adjournment concluded his remarks by expressing regret that time did not permit him to cover a wider range of the subject matters raised in the speech from the throne. I find myself in somewhat the same predicament after reviewing the subjects in the speech from the throne which have been referred to during the past week of debate. Generally speaking, however, speeches have been related to two items, the need for further parliamentary reform, and reform of our constitution.

Speeches in the latter category regarding the constitution have ranged all the way from the very thoughtful presentation of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) through to what I thought was the firebrand oratory of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I was really pleased when the hon. member for Yukon spoke the other evening after his prolonged absence from the house. I noted that he had not lost his willingness to malign the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) or to distort historical facts. I prepared a rather lengthy rebuttal to the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon but since he spoke my attention has been focused rather on the turmoil which exists in the New Democratic party on this subject. I was not concerned the other evening when they presented a subamendment to the effect that there were two nations in Canada. They include this theory in their constitution which they have distributed in the province of Quebec for some years. They easily get around the question of the two-nation theory by emphasizing that of course they recognize the existence of two nations in Canada but only in the cultural sense and not in the political sense.

From the result of the vote the other evening it is obvious that no one took the subamendment too seriously because everyone knew full well that within the next day or so some socialist spokesman for the New Democratic party would tour the country explaining that they really did not mean there should be two nations in this country but that they were speaking of two nations in the cultural sense. I was more concerned when I read some of the remarks of the leader of that party when he spoke over the week end at a convention in Quebec and formally announced that his party now recognizes a special status for the province of Quebec. I intend to discuss that special status in the short time available to me. I might also review the speech which I had anticipated someone would make in the next day or two after that convention. In this case it was the speech of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who quickly and efficiently placed on the record the interpretation of the New Democratic party concerning specifically what Quebec's special status is, at least as they understand it.

Mr. Schreyer: Would the hon. member permit a question? In all fairness, would he admit that the word "nation" can have a sociological connotation and a different juridical or political connotation?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. member for Verdun is not very good at subtleties. The hon. member has just emphasized what I started to say. In that party its members find many opportunities to say one thing in Quebec and another thing in the rest of Canada. They go to Quebec and say they recognize two nations. Then they say they do not mean exactly that there are two nations but rather two nations in a cultural sense. The point is that the time has passed when the New Democratic party can go into Quebec and preach one doctrine and go to Vancouver and preach another.

Before I get too far into this subject I should like to say something about parliamentary reform. I hope no one interprets my remarks as an indication that I am against parliamentary reform. On the contrary. I think most of the rules and regulations which were introduced, particularly under the previous Speaker, have done much to speed up the deliberations of the House of Commons. This is necessary in order to get through the house the amount of legislation which is before us.

One thing, however, which has provoked me a little is that in our obsession to increase the efficiency of the committees we do so at the expense of the House of Commons. Not too long ago I was upset when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) made a very important statement on Viet Nam in the house when there were precisely 31 members present. Where were the other members? They were attending committees such as the food and drugs committee, the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and others.

Mr. Orlikow: Where was Walter Gordon?

Mr. Mackasey: Is there someone else over there who wishes to make a speech?

Mr. Orlikow: I was asking, where was the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was making that important statement?

An hon. Member: Obviously the hon. member was not there himself.

Mr. Mackasey: I have not met a thinner-skinned bunch in this house than the socialists. There must be some ways and means to protect the House of Commons. One problem which we must face in respect of the committee system is that all too frequently we grant permission for committees to sit while the house is sitting. In the final analysis this is a house of debate and unless we make certain there is a sufficient quorum in the house at all times, for matters to be debated efficiently then, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) said, one of the basic principles of democracy will disappear, the right to stand up in the House of Commons and debate the issues of the day.

The hon. member for Yukon mentioned the two-nation theory. While he appeared to attack the N.D.P. for the two-nation theory he laid the blame directly on the shoulders of the Prime Minister. I did a little searching in the meantime to find out what noted parliamentarian or politician first discussed two nations in a cultural sense. Not too long ago—100 years—Sir John A. Macdonald said this about our French speaking Canadians:

> Treat them as a nation and they will act as a free people do—generously. Call them a faction and they become factious.

Lord Durham stated in his writings that he found "two nations warring in the bosom of a single state." Eugene Forsey, writing in the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, said:

> Canada is both two nations and one: two nations in the ethnic, cultural, sociological sense: one nation in the political, legal, constitutional sense.

Perhaps the greatest authority of all is the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) who on July 2, 1963, as found on page 2442 of Hansard, said:

> When confederation took place a new nation was created in the partnership of two basic nationalities.

This is the reason I could not become too upset the other evening when the New Democratic party, in an attempt to infiltrate the province of Quebec, advanced the two-nations concept as a subamendment. I knew it would be only a matter of time before one of them would get up and say that they are emphasizing culture, as the hon. member for Springfield did a few moments ago.

I am more interested in the special status the leader the New Democratic party seeks for the province of Quebec. I am a resident of the province of Quebec. Contrary to public opinion there are more English speaking Quebeckers at the moment than there are people in some of the other provinces. There are over a million of us. Quebec does not need special status. If the leader of the N.D.P. had said that Quebec is different from the other provinces I would endorse such a statement. Certainly it is different. It is the homeland of one of the founding races of this country. It is populated by the great majority of French speaking Canadians. It is different culturally, linguistically and in many other ways. Its civil code is different.

But Quebec does not need special status in 1967 or in 1970 to attain its full maturity under confederation. What it needs is respect for the constitution by other governments and respect for the constitution could have very well been exercised by the New Democratic party during the 16 years that it formed the government in Saskatchewan. What did that party do in those years for the French speaking minority? It did nothing. It was a disgrace then and it is still a disgrace. When the leader of the New Democratic party comes to the province of Quebec, as he did last week end, and says that Quebec must have a special status in this country so as to survive, he is fooling no one. In this day of modern communications, to preach one message in Quebec and another in Vancouver will have its repercussions, as the socialists will find out.

Of course I was not invited to that particular gathering of would-be socialists, and I had to rely on the Montreal Star of Monday, May 15, to find out what happened there. According to this newspaper the leader of the New Democratic party said:

> —the position of the N.D.P. "is that the sensible and long-range solution lies in the constitutional recognition of the fact that Quebec is not a province like the other provinces and that its cultural needs and objectives cannot be fulfilled, except that they are met by special arrangements."

What are the special arrangements which the leader of the N.D.P. proposes for Quebec? He did not outline them. All he did was voice platitudes. So I waited, knowing full well that within a day or two a senior spokesman of the N.D.P. would get up in the House of Commons and attempt to put on the record a message diametrically opposed to that of his leader, so that out west the members of that party could quote Hansard and in Quebec they could quote the Montreal Star. Sure enough, the hon. member for Greenwood made just such a speech on May 15. Again I can only go by Hansard because I was not here to hear him. But I read his speech not once but two or three times. His words, as found on page 203 of Hansard, are very noble and are bound to please the most nationalistic of Canadians. He said:

> We ought to entrench in our constitution a constitutional bill of rights. We have at present a bill of rights which was passed by parliament, but its inadequacy is obvious. It does not apply to provincial legislatures, and may be repealed by parliament at any time—

This is precisely what the Prime Minister said earlier. I agree with it. It is also exactly the same message as was contained in brief of the different trade unions from the province of Quebec. However, farther on in the same column he went on to say:

> The other point to be borne in mind is whether it is wise, in our revised constitution, or necessary to allow Quebec a special status.

Note, he is beginning to doubt the wisdom of the very statement that his leader made over the week end. The headline in the newspaper to which I referred reads: "Special Status Avoids Turmoil". Then he said:

> The expression "special status" is very general, and it is necessary to be precise when dealing with it, and I propose later in my remarks to define more precisely what we in this party mean when we say we are in favour of a special status for Quebec.

I read this with anticipation. I said to myself, here is one member of the socialist party who is going to tell us what he means by a special status for the province of Quebec. Should Quebec become an associate state in a two-nation confederation? Will Quebec go one way and the rest of Canada another, meeting periodically to split the budget? I read on, anticipating the hon. member for Greenwood would explain to us what he means by special status.

Incidentally, one thing that intrigues me is that members of the New Democratic party, who never tire of quoting Sweden as an example and whose philosophy is based on a strong central government, now pretend to be the greatest exponents of decentralization. But here is what the hon. member for Greenwood had to say:

> To this end we believe that federal authority must be preserved in such fields as credit, banking, investment, monetary and fiscal policy, tariffs and transportation, to name a few only.

According to him these are the areas in which the federal authority must remain supreme. After removing all these fields from provincial jurisdiction, one assumed that he had reached the area of special status which, according to the leader of the New Democratic party, Quebec should have if Canada is to survive. Instead the hon. member for Greenwood said the following, and we hear this from a spokesman of a party which is advocating decentralization:

> We have been concerned about the gradual erosion of federal powers in the fields I mentioned which has become apparent in federal-provincial conferences over the past few years.

In other words, the hon. member for Greenwood, at the same time as his leader was making a speech in the province of Quebec advocating a special status for Quebec and increased provincial jurisdiction in these particular areas, was preparing a speech to be delivered in the House of Commons in which he bemoaned the fact that too much federal jurisdiction in the areas I have just mentioned had been transferred to the province of Quebec. Perhaps it was time that this authority be removed from Quebec and from other provinces and returned to the central government he suggested. I do not necessarily disagree with his principle. I am merely pointing out the hypocrisy of his message. He says one thing and his leader says another.

Since the hon. member for Greenwood has decided that jurisdiction in these particular fields should not be transferred to the provinces, and therefore to Quebec, I thought he perhaps meant that Quebec should assume a special status in other areas. This is what he said at page 204 of Hansard:

> It is desirable to have federal control in fields such as family alowances, non-contributory old age pensions and the like. There are some fields such as hospitalization and health services where the present system of provincial administration and partial federal financing works well—

So far he has not advocated one single, solitary change in the present constitution. He went on to say:

> —and where it should be retained with great advantage in transferability of benefits throughout Canada. Here also the federal contribution helps equalize the burden as between provinces.

In other words, the hon. member for Greenwood is advocating precisely what we are advocating, namely, that the have provinces help the have-not provinces. What is revolutionary about this? Realizing that he had not said anything endorsing a special status, he went on to support his argument by saying:

—it is merely a recognition of the facts of life, namely that people with a special culture of their own are entitled to retain complete control, if they so desire, over matters intimately connected with that culture such as education.

Who has ever denied the province of Quebec control over education? If for the past 30, 40 or 100 years, Quebec chose to put emphasis on a classical education, that was the province's prerogative and privilege and nobody has tried to interfere with it. One thing that needs to be done is for parliament to define education one of these days. But that is not what the hon. member for Greenwood said. He went on to say in his dramatic way that we should recognize the rights of the provinces in the field of education. This is one field where the provinces have been and should always be supreme, but since there were no tangible suggestions in the rest of his speech I suppose the hon. member had to say something.

• (3:00 p.m.)

The hon. member was not even willing to give this to Quebec without some restriction because he goes on to say:

On the other hand, it must be recognized that it is the people in the other nine provinces who ought to be most insistent that Quebec should have a special status and that federal intervention should not be restricted to the level desired by Quebec.

How are you going to tell Quebec that it has autonomy in the field of education and a special status at the same time, but that the federal government can intervene at a level not necessarily desired by Quebec?

It is contended by the member that in fiscal, tariff, transportation, banking and credit, and investment matters the federal government must remain supreme. This is what the hon. member for Greenwood contends. The federal government must remain supreme also in the field of vocational allowances, old age pensions and the like he says. In so far as hospitalization and health services are concerned, joint participation seems to work well according to the hon. member for Greenwood and should not be altered. The only area which he concedes to the province is the area of education which it has always had.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin), who is an expert in this field and has made many speeches throughout the country on federal-provincial relations and the constitution, intervened. I should like to refer to his question which is recorded on page 205 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to direct a question to the hon. member. Am I right in thinking that special status as he defines it implies no change in the present constitutional situation toward a further decentralization in favour of Quebec particularly?

Mr. Brewin: I do not think it implies any change.

Of course it does not. Knowing that his leader has come out with his two-nations concept in the province of Quebec and had advocated a special status in confederation for the province of Quebec, the hon. member for Greenwood rushes into parliament to correct what his leader has said. If the leader of the New Democratic party believes Quebec should have a special status, then let him tour the country and say so. He does not do so. I can understand the problem, and it is a serious one. He goes to Montreal on the week end and finds that the Quebec wing of the New Democratic party has adopted a resolution stating that the province of Quebec is supreme in international affairs. The province can make what agreements it wants on any level with foreign powers such as France, Belgium and perhaps even Ireland. The leader of the New Democratic party on Saturday had to rely on his troops to defeat this resolution which had been adopted by the Quebec wing.

I ask the 19 or 20 members of the gallant little band in the corner, whose philosophy do you follow, that preached by your leader in Quebec or that preached in the House of Commons by the hon. member for Greenwood? Do you accept the resolution of the Quebec wing to the effect that Quebec can make international treaties or do you accept the philosophy of your leader which denies this privilege? In other words, Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats are on the horns of a dilemma. They forget that this is 1967 and you cannot go into Quebec with one philosophy and to Vancouver with another. This practice is catching up with them and I am not sorry. They have been playing with both sides of the coin too long. Once upon a time the leader of the New Democratic party may have been able to get people to stand up in the House of Commons and refute what he said outside the House of Commons in the hope that these statements could assume equal validity across Canada. However, this cannot be done today.

There is nothing in the speech by the hon. member for Greenwood that defines what the special status for Quebec is to be. I suggest to the members of the New Democratic party that the unity of Canada is too sacred to be subjected to party politics. You have to be consistent. If you believe, and I do not, that Quebec needs a special status to remain in confederation, then say so in the house as well as outside the house. Let the leader of the New Democratic party take advantage of this debate or some other occasion to get up in the house and state what is to be the special status for the province of Quebec. French speaking Canadians do not want to be isolated from the mainstream of Canada. They do not have to be. They have something to offer and they have offered it. This is manifest to anyone who takes the trouble to observe. Their contribution to this country has been as great as that of the English speaking people of this country. They have supplied not only a prime minister and a governor general but the leader of the army and the head of the Supreme Court of Canada. Leaders in the fields of culture and science are found in great numbers amongst the French speaking people. They do not need a special status to contribute to this nation, only an opportunity and a climate devoid of intolerance and prejudice.

The province of Quebec has complete control of the field of education as well as other areas outlined in the constitution. All Quebec wants and deserves is respect for the constitution as it now exists. The only sensible suggestion which has come out of the House of Commons in relation to this whole problem has been the one made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the other evening and also on several occasions by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). What we need to do in this house is to thresh out a bill of rights for this country, without denying the one in existence. It was a milestone in the history of Canada when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) instituted a Bill of Rights for this country. It is one of which we should be proud and it is above partisanship. However, we want to know what provincial rights and municipal rights are, not merely the rights of individuals.

When the Prime Minister stated provincial leaders should meet later this year to define our objectives before we find a way to amend the constitution, or to add to it or remove the redundant sections, he was talking common sense. Newspapers close to the scene such as the Montreal Star know this. It is an English language newspaper in the heart of French Canada, one that knows the problems of the French Canadians and the English speaking minority.

The Montreal Star is a newspaper which has always been responsible when discussing the problems of the constitution and the need for changes in it. In an editorial dated Saturday, May 13, 1967, this newspaper states that the Prime Minister suggested a most sensible and pragmatic way to approach the very complex problem of confederation. The editorial continues:

> The Prime Minister is, to begin with at any rate, against the formal, committee type conference which leads only to a public display of individual political postures. He will resist any "constitutional leap in the dark."
> But he offered what seems to us a highly sensitive first step which could be taken by all without impinging on the particular positions of any. Mr. Pearson hoped the first move in the constitutional field could be an agreement by all the premiers on a common bill of rights. Such provincial bills would be based on the existing federal bill which will always be, as Mr. Pearson noted gracefully, associated with the name of Mr. Diefenbaker. Then he continued:
> "Surely before we can seriously hope to agree on structural changes, we should endeavour to agree, federally and provincially, on a statement of common values and on a declaration of our basic individual and collective rights as Canadians."

The first positive step that should come out of that conference, Mr. Speaker, is to make the district of Ottawa truly representative of the two founding races of this country. Politician after politician, in this house and outside, condemns the potholes in Ottawa. This is not what we should condemn. We should condemn the unilingual aspect of this area. We should make the Ottawa district truly representative of the two founding races of this country. If we cannot come to that conclusion as a result of one of these conferences, then how in God's holy name are we going to agree on changing the constitution or any part of it? This is a test of good will.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time allotted to the hon. gentleman has expired. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

Mr. Knowles: I only wanted to ask about Walter Gordon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Alcide Simard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I shall not sound a discordant note in this general harmony, and I shall maintain the tradition of this house in congratulating the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Jamieson) and the seconder (Mr. Côté).

If my information is correct, Mr. Speaker, I am told that the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne has made his maiden speech in this house. In this case, I can tell him that his first try proved to be a master stroke, and I hope that he will make many speeches like this one, so that I myself may benefit from this lesson in eloquence.

Now Mr. Speaker, if I may, I shall comment some of the items contained in the speech from the throne and I will quote word for word:

> Our country was not founded in 1867. It is far more deeply rooted in time than that. But, one hundred years ago, our predecessors—men of many races, creeds and tongues—embarked upon a great exercise in statecraft of which we, today, are the trustees. They laid the foundations. They anchored them in a fundamental sense of unity that generations of conflict had taught was vital to the common weal. With this realization they erected a structure of government for the freedom, welfare, and prosperity of all who might come in time to inhabit this land. They built according to a federal plan because they knew that unity, with cultural and regional diversity could be harnessed to a positive and enriching role in no other way.

And further on.

> The path of confederation has been beset with great difficulties—some natural, some inevitable and some of our own making.

I gather, Mr. Speaker, that it was those two items that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) wished to comment especially in his speech of May 11 last in this house. I will quote word for word the following, which appears on page 76 of the May 11 Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that I am a French-speaking Canadian and that I fight for the recognition of French Canadians throughout Canada. It is indeed a duty for me to say that I have had a friendly reception in all those provinces; I might even say that I have had a warmer welcome in the western universities than in the university of Montreal, in my own provinces of Quebec.

That is saying a good deal, Mr. Speaker.

> And these people out west, these young students, these farmers or whoever they are, are most hospitable. We are welcomed like kings in those provinces. Even if these young people do not speak our language, they are eager to welcome us, to hear our problems, to learn to know us, to know what we want and who we are. It was most interesting to meet these people, irrespective of political affiliations, as Canadians from a province other than theirs.

Mr. Speaker, although some of our opponents make unkind remarks about the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, it must be recognized that he does make allowances and gives everyone his due. In this connection, I take it upon myself to repeat a sentence spoken by our leader, and I quote:

• (3:20 p.m.)

> —and I would even say that I was made more welcome by the western universities than by the university of Montreal which is in my own province of Quebec.

Just to corroborate that statement and that tribute, I will relate an incident I witnessed, as did several of my colleagues, when the government invited us to visit Expo and Habitat on April 8 last.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, as a French-speaking Canadian, I was far from edified. If the house will allow me, I will describe the experience several members and senators, accompanied by their wives, went through.

We were greeted warmly at Expo, particularly by the commissioner general who, when we set foot on the grounds, shook hands with us and smiled broadly at us. But I guess it was only to make us accept meekly what was to come. In fact, when the time came for Expo's commissioner general to introduce the hon. members and senators to those present, he found nothing better than to make his whole speech in English from beginning to end. I am not holding it against my English friends who were made so welcome. But we, the French Canadians, were ignored to such an extent that, while the commissioner general was speaking, my wife who was with me on that occasion asked me: Does that man not speak French? I will not repeat the reflection I made to my wife, because I do want to respect this house of parliament, but let it be known that my words were not in praise of the commissioner general.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to my colleagues that this happened last April 8, in the very heart of the province of Quebec, in the second French city of the world, Montreal, which, this year, plays host to some 60 exhibiting countries on Terre des Hommes. That treatment we cannot be proud of. As a snub, as a rebuff, as a stinging slap in the face of this country's French Canadians, it could not have been better. For my part, I call that the unkindest cut of all. Fortunately there are contrasts which are a little more encouraging and comforting.

During the hockey finals between the Montreal Canadiens and the Toronto Maple Leafs—we noted this fact right here and, as I said, I am not criticizing anyone, even though several members stayed away from the house to watch television; I readily admit that I cheated myself—I noticed, along with several other members, I am sure, that before every game, both in Toronto and in Montreal, the national anthem "O Canada" was played.

Last Sunday, Mr. Speaker, I attended the two consecutive ceremonies on parliament hill in honour of the fathers of confederation.

And after each of those ceremonies, the national anthem "O Canada" was sung in English and in French.

I think that everything is completely changed. Those who were charged not so long ago with fanatical intolerance are now giving us a good lesson of patriotism and national pride. And some people will then talk of separatism, independentism; some will bellow to everyone that the last hundred years of Canadian confederation have been one hundred years of injustice for French Canadians, and all sorts of slogans like that. To these people who fish in troubled waters, I will suggest that respect is not commanded but imposed.

Mr. Speaker, I recollect the kind exhortations that the gracious Queen of England and of all commonwealth countries made to us on her last trip to Canada. After having suggested and urged that the two great nations making up this country, which have inherited the most refined of western civilizations whose influence has been felt by almost all the peoples in the world, work towards unity and mutual understanding, she summed up her thoughts as follows. Listen well, my dear colleagues; I hope this exhortation by the Queen of England will remain deeply imprinted in your minds:

Our patriotism must never lead us to forget the patriotism of others.

That is the challenge presented to us by the next hundred years of our Canadian confederation. This challenge we can and will meet.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Now, I shall quote another part of the speech from the throne, which I shall comment briefly:

In 1867—

That was a hundred years ago.

—it was possible to think of the public responsibility primarily in terms of state responsibility. The new challenges, which we must and will meet, require the involvement of the whole society and the effort of all our people. In this time of fast-changing dimensions, the central concern of Canadian society must be the well-being of each individual, so that, regardless of his place or station of birth, he will have an equal chance to realize his full potential in the economic, social, political and cultural sense. A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

Do you not think that is beautiful?

With our forefathers, the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent.

That is the heritage our forefathers have passed on to us so that we may live better.

Today, the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

Mr. Speaker, at this point of my remarks, I shall try mainly to emphasize the economic value of the individual, of the Canadian citizen. The first part of the Canadian Bill of Rights reads as follows:

—it is recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

(a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

(b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;

(c) freedom of religion;

(d) freedom of speech;

(e) freedom of assembly and association; and

(f) freedom of the press.

Mr. Speaker, in 1960, when the Conservative party was in power, two Liberal members at least asked for the addition of the economic rights and freedoms to those mentioned above. The intervention, at that time, of the hon. member who is now a minister in this cabinet, appears in Hansard of July 5, 1960. I quote:

Yes, political freedoms are referred to in this bill, but it is not as a result giving to the citizen a greater security of enjoyment than what is now provided for in the law. Our legal liberties are partly mentioned but not our economic liberties, except for section 2 (a) referring to property. There is no mention nor is there any declaration of the conviction that must stand behind even these newly conceived rights. It may be that it is difficult to put into a charter like this what we mean by economic rights; but at a time when society is evolving and when the poltical philosophy of every party in this house subscribes to the view of full employment, is it unfair or extravagant to suggest in this twentieth century that we have the right to place alongside our political freedoms, with no less effect, those rights that affect the economic well-being of the citizen?

Then further he goes on to say:

I say that a bill of rights is not complete that does not take into account these economic rights. Nor does this bill deal with liberty in what one might call its human rights or egalitarian sense; such things as fair employment practice laws, fair accommodation laws, equal pay for women laws—

He did not even forget the women.

—all laws which emancipate women, the right to election, the right to medical care, the right to disability pensions, and so on. Are we to say that these are not rights? Are we to say that in the objectives we have placed for ourselves we are not to regard these as legitimate aspirations?

Mr. Speaker, in 1960 another Liberal member corroborated the statement and the stand taken by his colleague. I quote:

Furthermore, the Criminal Code provides for arrest for failure to provide of any head of family who does not meet that obligation. If it is true that, for any obligation which is placed on the shoulders of a citizen, the state has a duty towards him, if it is true that the legislator imposed upon the Canadian citizen that obligation to feed and maintain his family, I think that it is only fair and legitimate that the same legislator should give to that man the means to fulfil that obligation. I submit that a bill of rights that does not take into account these economic rights is not complete at all.

The two Liberal members were then criticizing the introduction of the Canadian Bill of Rights by the Conservatives.

Those claims are based on section 22 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and can be summed up so:

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person, and enjoyment of property.

Those are rights the Social Credit party wants for every single Canadian citizen. Here is a declaration of principle as stated by the Canadian Social Credit Association:

Social Credit firmly believes that the individual is the most important factor in organized society. Because he is a divinely created being with spiritual, mental and physical needs and potentialities, he has inalienable rights which must be respected and preserved.

Mr. Speaker, if I may, I will now add a few comments.

What is Canada? Canada is a country which comprises mainly—let this be emphasized—20,400,000 human beings, 4,800,000 families and 400,000 corporations.

The 4,800,000 families of one or more persons live in the 4,800,000 housing units or castles; in addition, there are slums which one can see, when visiting our country, Canada.

Tremendous prosperity, inhuman distribution. Let us correct the situation right now, instead of losing time blaming the persons responsible, instead of looking for guilty parties, for wrong-doers. Let us suddenly become benefactors of our own humanity in Canada.

Each of the 265 Canadian members of parliament was elected by the people who live in each of Canada's ridings. The companies do not vote. Therefore, the companies do not elect the members of parliament. Why be afraid of the companies once we are elected?

The companies are only institutions made up of groups of human beings, but the companies themselves do not exist, are not alive, do not vote. They are the instruments of production or administration of the material, intellectual or spiritual goods and services which meet the needs of the people.

There are in Canada 265 members of parliament and 26 ministers, of whom only one is Minister of Finance. If Canada's prosperity depends on all the people and all the companies of Canada, the distribution of that prosperity rests mainly with the Minister of Finance, the 25 ministers and the 265 members of parliament.

If production is abundant in 1967, there is no reason why distribution in 1967 should be a failure and a disaster for the great majority of the population. What is produced in 1967 should be distributed that year.

Production takes place within our present monetary, economic and political systems. Distribution must therefore be properly done within the framework of the same monetary, economic and political systems.

There is no need for a new constitution, new political parties, another election, new departments or new instruments of production or administration.

What is lacking is a simple pressure adjustment in the money circulation, in the present capitalist system of Canada—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, taking part in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne on our hundredth anniversary imposes a requirement on every member to review the last 100 years of the history of this country and to try to project the lessons of those years into the future problems facing Canadians. As a result of my consideration of this matter I have decided to make my centennial remarks on the subject of three choices for Canada.

Before I embark on a discussion of these three alternative courses of economic policy for Canada I want to preface my remarks by saying that as one reads the debates of 100 years ago it is amazing to find the similarity to the discussion we hear in this debate today. Today I had the privilege of listening to a Liberal member from the great city of Montreal, representing the constituency of Verdun, who was taking issue with the remarks made by an N.D.P. member from Toronto in the house the other day. Just now we have listened to a member from rural Quebec outlining some of the problems he sees. The remarks made today by these distinguished members of the House of Commons can all be duplicated in the debates of 100 years ago. Instead of the term "special status for Quebec", in those days members used the term "co-ordinate sovereignty". It is the same thing, I suppose, as the phrase used by the members of the N.D.P., and I would expect that 100 years from now it is conceivable that the debate at that time will have a new phrase but the subject will be the same.

Having said that I want to move on to the question of what were some of the issues that forced our forebears 100 years ago to accept the concept of a federal system of government in this great sprawling country. Certainly the need for defence against the victorious armies of the northern states was paramount in their minds. Certainly the depression in what we now call the Atlantic provinces was a great spur to the delegates from that area to accept another form of government. Above all, I would think that the political stalemate in the two Canadas we now call Quebec and Ontario was a reason for men with widely divergent views to come to a common conclusion.

In our review of the debates of 100 years ago we are lucky now to have available to us a history written by Canadians. To me personally it was always almost an intolerable insult that Canadians never had an authentic source of their history to which they could refer. We have been forced over the last 60-odd years to use an English history, the Cambridge History of Canada, for the authentic documentation of our story, but as part of the centennial observations the government of which I was a member had, I believe, the foresight to ask our historians in Canada to prepare for the first time some form of authentic Canadian history written by Canadians. This centenary series is now being published. It will consist of 17 volumes and I expect they will all be published this year.

I am going to ask the permission of the house to include the list of these volumes in my speech as part of the written record of this second debate dealing with confederation. I would like to take the time to read just a few of the names, but suffice it to say that the Canadian centenary series is headed by Dr. Morton, the executive editor, who was professor of history at the University of Manitoba. Dr. Creighton from Toronto is the associate editor. These two men correlated the work of all the specialists on the various segments of our history.

The volume I hold in my hand is volume No. 12, written by Dr. Morton on the subject of confederation. It deals with the years 1857 to 1873, a 16-year period. It is not written in a light reading form. It is a straightforward account of what happened. I think that every member of parliament now and for many years to come should have this 17-volume history of his country in his library at home and possibly in his library in his office. Certainly every school teacher who has been given the responsibility of teaching the history of his country should have these volumes available for reference. I personally, and I hope on behalf of all Canadians, want to thank these distinguished historians for giving their time, almost for nothing, to provide us for the first time with an authentic history of our country written by Canadians.

Rather than read all their names and the subjects they dealt with I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether I could have the permission of the house to have a list of these authors and their subjects incorporated as part of my address at this point in my speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Has the hon. member permission to have this list included as part of his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

17. D. G. Creighton "Canada" 1939-1967.

Mr. Hamilton: Coming to my subject, three choices for Canada, I wish to say that Canada today is a far different country from what it was in 1867. We have learned a great deal in the last century not only about our own geography and our resources but about the technology of government. For instance, with our modern knowledge of monetary and fiscal policies it is thought that never again will the countries of the industrial world have to endure great depressions such as those that were characteristic of our economy in the last century. This knowledge must be utilized not only by the members of the federal parliament but by all legislatures in the world to make certain that the growth rate of our countries can be maintained at a pace that balances full employment with the best possible stabilized price structure. It is on this basis that one can, as a parliamentarian, now set oneself clearly defined targets and hope to achieve them.

If one examines the growth rate of our great neighbouring country to the south in the last 100 years and particularly notices the last few years one finds that it has tended to have an annual growth rate of about 4 per cent per year. Then if one examines our own growth rate since 1961 and even earlier and works out an average, it is very clear that economically at this moment in our history we should be setting ourselves a target which past experience shows we can achieve to get maximum employment and stabilized prices at the same time.

I want to suggest as this target, which I have arrived at with great timidity in trying to find something that is practical, that we as the Canadian legislative group responsible for the economic health of our country should this year on our one hundredth birthday set an average growth rate of 6 per cent per year. If we can maintain our growth rate between 5 per cent and 7 per cent over the next two or three decades then Canadians will know that in comparison with the United States growth rate, which I think will average about 4 per cent based on past experience, on a per capita basis we will be equal in wealth to our neighbours to the south. I think an average of 6 per cent is a reasonable, practical and possible rate to achieve. This is an objective we can very well set ourselves and we can have confidence in our ability to reach this target.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

If we have the confidence we have the resources. The inventory of our resources is much clearer now than it was ten years ago. We certainly have the energy, and the inventory of potential energy resources is much clearer than ten years ago. We also have some knowledge of our water resources and our basic resources both renewable and non-renewable. With this energy, water and resources there is no reason we cannot maintain a growth rate average of 6 per cent which will make us on a per capita basis the wealthiest nation in the world in the next quarter century. Surely that should be our target.

It is passing strange that with the Canadian characteristic of lack of confidence in ourselves we have to learn from the United States that all these things are possible. We have to learn this from reports such as the Paley report of 1952 and the Landsberg report of 1963. With our resources, energy and water and the targets I have mentioned we have the potential to become the most wealthy nation in the world. That is the key of my message for 1967. If my colleague from Queens, Prince Edward Island is correct, that no one today will pay any attention to what I say, I hope that 100 years from now those people who read the record of what has been said during this debate on the anniversary of our first century will realize that these remarks have been vindicated.

To achieve this growth rate we have to make one major decision. We must decide which of three economic courses to follow. Let me outline these courses in a succinct way. We may choose the course of continentalism, we can go back to the old traditional policies of restrictive nationalism, or we can choose the course of expansionist nationalism. Those are the three courses.

Continentalism is a phrase used to describe the conviction held by many Canadians over the last 100 years that it is the ultimate destiny of Canada to become part of an economic union with the United States and eventually part of a political union. Great Canadians have held this view and sincere Canadians hold this view today, with the same sincerity

I trust as those who held it in the past. One of the greatest Canadians ever to grace this Canadian assembly, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, all through his life as a young radical, as a growing power in the political world, and finally as a senior statesman held the view that the ultimate destiny of our country was some form of union with the United States. Only once or twice in his political career when he was angry with the United States about one or two things did he ever veer from this view.

This view is held by many people today in the Liberal party, as was demonstrated last September in Ottawa at the policy convention. At that great policy convention the majority of Liberal delegates indicated with full sincerity that they were in favour of a commercial union with the United States. This view is held sincerely by many people. I do not know that all people in Canada want to accept it, but I know there is no question about the feelings of those of us in this part of the house who call ourselves Progressive Conservatives.

The second choice, restrictive nationalism, has been the traditional policy of both Liberals and Conservatives for the last 80 years. This is the policy under which we try to build walls around our country to protect our workers and our business elements and to make sure that the level of living in this country is reasonably fair to all segments. It was in this traditional policy of restrictive nationalism that we built our industry, but we now know it has become obsolete and out of date over the last quarter of a century.

At the present time this type of policy is followed intensively by one of the Toronto members on the government side, whom I admire for his sincerity. I suppose there are many members in this place who support him. The use of the phrase "restrictive nationalism" may be argued, but generally the feeling is the same, that the people who hold to the choice of restrictive protection are accurately described as restrictive nationalists. They follow this course for good motives. They do not want to see Canada drifting because of a lack of action into an economic part of the United States and eventually a political part of that country. Those of us who are nationalists can admire those people in all parties who support restrictive nationalism because they do so for a good purpose.

There is a third choice, and that choice is expansionist nationalism. It does not depend just on flag waving or on drifting along and letting things happen. It depends on a government which believes there is a place on the north half on this continent for a country that is peculiarly our own. The word which describes that kind of a government is "dynamic". Such a government must meet the pressures of modern corporate capitalism. This is universal, not just peculiar to one country or one continent. It exists all over the world as a type of economic organization which sees no boundary lines and pays no attention to morals or national aspirations.

In a system which produces so much wealth what are we as Canadians to do? Some would turn back the clock and try to deny these benefits to our people. Others want to succumb to them and say that if we were all to become the same all over the world this would be an end in itself worthy to be desired. There are others who say, let us make use of the larger producing capacities of this system and yet, because we are the sovereign people in this parliament, live up to moral principles by developing in a moral way those things to satisfy all forms of basic need of life, and above all to serve the interests of the group.

The group to which I refer is made up of those who call themselves Canadians. There is a place in mankind's struggle for a better and better life for the group. This is not a world in which everything comes down to the individual benefit. There is a place for the family, for community values and for a group such as a nation. You do not necessarily have to be bilingual or eloquent; you just need a mere consciousness that you are a group slightly different from other groups. This is not bad; it is good. It inspires people to do many things that the theory of individualism cannot inspire a person to do.

I hold the view that no culture can survive based on the theory that as long as an individual gets the most for himself the sum total is a good society. I reject that theory of complete individualism. We use it, I know, to get economic development, but at the same time I know there must exist along with that the awareness that there is a value in group loyalty and group discipline. I am a Canadian. This may be a miserable culture on the northern half of this continent but, by Jove, it is our own and I think we should work to maintain it. I do not think we should build walls between the free parts of the world and the others. I do not think we will achieve this group consciousness by sitting here and doing nothing. I believe we can build this country only if we work dynamically, positively and constructively to do so.

Therefore there is a third choice, expansionism at home and abroad. We all know, however, that we have slipped a longways down the slippery slope of union with the United States. First of all, the natural economic structure of our two countries has tied us together so that we are like Siamese twins who cannot separate without mortal harm to one or both. We know that during the last war we joined our war efforts and this has pushed us once more into the arms of a continental economic system. It disturbs me to watch the development of my country and see a failure to realize opportunities to be positive, dynamic and expansionist in building up the country. I bleed a little for my fellow Canadians.

What are the techniques of this dynamic positive expansionism? I will not recite all of the things of the past but let me mention a few. In Canada we must have a consciousness of a development policy for our resources so that regions are deliberately built up when they fall behind. In Canada we must have a deliberate policy to help those segments of the population which do not share reasonably equally in the wealth of this nation.

As I said earlier, to achieve these ends we must use our monetary and fiscal know-how which we have accumulated over the last 15 or 20 years. That would be a speech by itself. We must realize that our trade techniques are tying us more and more to the industrial world and are making the gulf between the newly developed nations and the industrial wealthy nations greater. We deliberately, dynamically, positively and constructively must build those institutions to bridge that gulf.

I spoke on this matter on October 8, 1964, I believe. If anyone wishes to go back and read some of my proposals he will find them in that speech. We must think deliberately of how by positive means we can get more processing in Canada. I might mention an example. Last year a Canadian company wanted to bring more western gas into eastern Canada and reduce the price below the level of the United States price. This would have meant more industry, lower costs in Canada and more businesses without any artificial restriction. This is the reason I took the stand I did in this place at that time. I thank the government for changing its mind once the facts were made known.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

I deplore the situation when I see the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec left alone in respect of the great power resources of the Churchill river which formerly was called the Hamilton river. We should have helped those two provinces. The situation is the same as that in respect of the power on the Nelson river in British Columbia and the Yukon Territory. This government, as a positive dynamic undertaking, should have built a national power grid so that those provinces which own this power could have pumped it east and west before they put in a north and south extension in order to give Canadians first chance at this power on an economic basis and in order to provide greater availability of markets to these provinces or the private companies, whoever owns the power. I do not care whether the resources are owned by a province or by a private company. If it is Canadian, we should back it in a positive, constructive way to get our costs lowered.

As I go through all the various things I want to say here my enthusiasm for Canada rises. Last April Japan made a proposal that Australia, Japan, the United States and Canada join to set common growth rates so that we could meet problems in the same way the common market meets them. There has been no response from either the United States or Canadian governments. These are the failures which depress me. There is so much on the optimistic side, however, that I keep on fighting.

We must have devices in Canada to encourage Canadians on a voluntary basis to take an interest in equity investment. I am not thinking merely of investment at the stabilized stage of industry where we would get 5 per cent on our money. I have in mind the exploration and development stage. This is where the wealth is developed and where the ownership and control are. This is coming, but there is no help from the government. We started a trade promotion drive in 1960. Our exports were $4 billion then. They have risen to $11 billion just because the government gave the leadership. I need not go into the details of that operation, it is well known. I know Canadians have the resources and the know-how. If they have the will, they can do it. If you speak to me in this centennial year about uniting Canadians, I say we can unite Canadians through equality of opportunity and with the knowledge and confidence that we are going to be as wealthy a nation as any industrialized country.

Finally, we must make another decision separate from the economic decision involving the three courses I have outlined of continentalism, restrictive nationalism and expansionist nationalism. I think most of us know where I stand on the economic course. We have, however, another decision which is just as important. I see a trend toward a policy of handouts. I know that 25 per cent of Canadian people live at levels below that which we can tolerate. I know that one and a half billion people around the world live at levels below that which we can tolerate. But there is another way to take action than by handouts. There are programs of self-help. We introduced one when we were the government. It is called ARDA. In this program surveys could be made and knowledge furnished to any group of people who wished that knowledge. Not only would we drain the places which need draining and dam the waters which need damming but we also would get the local people—farmers, businessmen and professional people—working together to raise the income of marginal areas, not just to some miserable level of $3,500 but to a level equal to that of any other family group in the country.

As I travel around world and hear the phrases "ugly Russian" and "ugly American" I know I do not want to hear my country called "ugly Canada". We must promote these self-help programs to give respect to ourselves and those we help. I cannot speak for 100 years ahead, but I hope that in the next century Canadians will back the course of self-help rather than just try to appease their conscience by handouts.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I join other hon. members in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I thought both hon. members did an excellent job.

In my opinion the most crucial problem besetting parliament today is the need for reform. I know this is a most hackneyed subject and I am almost reluctant to bring it up again. However, I feel that if by repetition we emphasize the importance of this subject our remarks will be justified. We have a grandiose and imaginative program of legislation before us, but there is one point which should be made. We will not be able to enact this legislation quickly and efficiently unless we modernize our parliamentary machinery. What has amazed me since January, 1966 is the amount of legislation we have been able to enact. This simply means that we could have done more had our procedures been improved. What we have done has been at the expense of long hours and a great toll upon the members of the house.

We have had a spectacular record of achievement. I do not say this in a partisan manner. I believe that all members of the house, even though some may do so grudgingly, give the government credit for its achievements. I say this because if we can eliminate some of the antique procedures which now harass the house we will be able to be much more productive.

What about the future? In the throne speech we are faced with a veritable avalanche of legislation designed to cater to the interests of urban dwellers, interests in the field of domestic relations and in the field of criminal law. I believe this to be good. The veering away from social welfare programs is good. We are now directing our attention to social reform programs. But again there is a catch. If we wish to implement these programs, then not only do we have to tinker and tamper with the machinery of government but to take it apart and reassemble it.

My thesis is very simple. I believe that parliamentary reform should have priority. It should be the bedrock upon which our legislative house is constructed. We have taken a good step in setting up a committee on parliamentary procedure, and I earnestly hope that the committee will undertake its task most seriously. It will delve into the mechanics of parliamentary procedure and into the underlying concept of parliament itself. One might properly ask: If parliamentary procedure is so important then why do we rush so impetuously? The answer is fairly simple. Lurking in the background for years has been a desire for some reform. However, in the past few years, in view of government intervention, social reform and social welfare programs, and problems respecting management and labour relations which confront us, we have needed more legislation. In this very complex society we are besieged by requests for remedial legislation from all types of groups. We have more work, and we are not able to cope with it properly.

There is one very strong factor militating against parliamentary reform and that is the strong clash of opinion as to the role of parliament itself. Some people believe that this chamber should basically be a debating forum. They feel there should be an almost unbridled expression of opinion and that any step to curtail this will impair the very essence of democracy. This is understandable. I would certainly not want to see any procedures introduced which would in any way stop vigorous and fiery debate or which would make parliament subservient to the whims of the government. However, I believe there is a somewhat pernicious preoccupation with this role of parliament while insufficient attention is paid to the other role of parliament, its duty to transact the country's business. I think we must face the fact that we are running a multibillion dollar business and that we cannot run it with the same rules as we had a hundred years ago. If we are going to translate into action the hopes, aims and aspirations of our people and do it efficiently, we have to change the rules and change them fast.

I make no apology for making certain recommendations. I know they are not original. First of all may I say it is appalling to see new members coming into this chamber without having the slightest grasp of the rules and parliamentary procedure. Most members have no penchant for procedure and no flair for it. They become discouraged and frustrated and thus cannot play a useful role in parliament. On the other hand, there are certain hon. members who have a flair for the rules. In some cases they become very familiar with them but sometimes they use them to their own advantage and to the disadvantage of the house. Therefore I think it would make good sense to train new members. I feel that before any new member takes his seat he should be compelled to listen to lectures for at least one week in which parliamentary procedure, behaviour and ethnics would be explained. I believe this is essential. I also believe we should have a condensed handbook on parliamentary rules. At present we have a large volume but it is difficult to understand and very perplexing. I think such a handbook could be written in the form of questions and answers. It should be available to all members and should contain the highlights of parliamentary procedure.

I believe that sessions should start and end at a specified time. This is necessary for good organization. We will then be able to organize the work of the committees and our own free time, as well as our debates here. But most important of all, we will be able to organize our private lives. Many hon. members realize that our long-suffering wives are harassed by the uncertainties and vicissitudes of politics, and I think it is about time we paid some attention to this aspect of parliamentary life. If we could organize our leisure time we could make our wives happy. When our wives are happy we are happy and more productive and thus can serve our country better.

I should like to speak now about votes of confidence. I submit that the present situation, if not idiotic, is completely irrational. At present, if the government introduces a bill which is voted down the government falls and we are faced with an election. Such a situation could take place if, for example, 15 or 20 government members were caught in a snowdrift. This is ludicrous. I believe that if the government has to fall this should happen by way of a formal vote of non-confidence at a certain specified time.

If we change this procedure we will eliminate a lot of petty political interplay and petty manoeuvring for advantage. Naturally the opposition would wish to catch the government off guard. So would we if we were in the opposition. But this is something we could do without. No efficient company would allow its directors to be ousted because some shareholders, even a majority of them, disagreed with one facet of their policy. They would only be asked to resign if they lost the confidence of the majority of the shareholders.

Turning to the actual conduct of the house I suggest, in the first place, that there are many things we could improve. For example, we could improve our procedure in connection with ministerial statements. They could be tabled and printed in Hansard. After distribution to the leaders of the opposition parties the debate could then be restricted to five minutes.

I feel that the provision for emergency debates has been much abused. My understanding of the purpose of an emergency debate is to give the opposition an opportunity to bring to the attention of the government something of the utmost national importance which would affect the general welfare of this country. This is not what happens. A member rises in the house fresh from his constituency and presents a local problem. He addresses the house before the assembled press representatives. He makes his point and then he is called the guardian of his constituency. Actually he is wasting the time of the house. Most of these motions are disallowed. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you should have the privilege of disallowing these motions without debate or that debate be restricted to five minutes with one representative from each party participating.

I believe also that our question period should be completely revamped. I believe in the question period. I think it is essential that the government should be scrutinized and if there are any weaknesses or injustices it is the duty of the opposition to probe deeply. However, I believe this can be done and time saved. What happens now? We have between 20 and 25 well paid executives sitting for an hour a day listening to questions of all types from all sources and without notice. I submit that these gentlemen should be devoting more time to running this country. They should be devoting time to the formulation of policy and to the administration of their departments. This objective could be accomplished if we copied the British system and had certain ministers come into the house for a couple of days a week at scheduled times. They would have notice of the questions to be asked and we would receive better answers. We would have more efficiency.

I believe it is self-evident that we should limit the time spent on debate. All members in this house realize that in most debates we become repetitious and waste time. Most members realize that after a certain length of time a question has been completely aired. They know they are not going to convince anyone to change his mind. They know they are tired and nauseated by the repetition and they know that the country is. I feel that if we cannot allocate time for debates by agreement we should do so by a vote of the house.

I believe speeches should be limited to 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker. In certain cases this time could be extended. I also believe in the principle of filing speeches. This simply means that a person wants to get on the record,—

Mr. Churchill: You had better file this one right away.

Mr. Tolmie: —and he could do so by filing his speech. This is done in the Congress of the United States and there is no reason why it could not be done here.

I believe too that the throne speech debate and the budget debate could be restricted to five days. If members could file their speeches it should be restricted to three days. The mid-Victorian method of voting by standing up is ridiculous and time wasting. There is no reason why we cannot have some kind of electronic voting system installed such as the United Nations has. If we can put men on the moon and can develop I.B.M. machines, then certainly we can introduce a modern voting system.

The committee system has worked very well but it should be improved by better time allocations for sittings and more research staff. My thesis is very simple, Mr. Speaker. I believe that parliamentary reform should have priority over all other legislation. I believe that from it will flow good legislation and efficiency in our operations. Perhaps this should be our parliamentary centennial project.

Why do I say this? May I outline my three reasons for advocating parliamentary reform. Many new members come into this house and become disenchanted, discouraged and disillusioned. They are cast into this mood by the obvious, stupid waste of time. They become disgruntled and discouraged. If we are going to retain members and attract good new members, then we should streamline our procedures. Second, as I said before, if we are going to transact business we have to improve our procedures. At this particular time in our history when we are enacting social legislation to bring about social reforms, we need to be able to proceed quickly. Each day we delay is a day of suffering for those waiting for divorce reform, for those waiting for penal reform, for those waiting for reforms in connection with juvenile delinquency, for those waiting for protection against hate literature, for those desperately needing housing and for those who should be protected against the ravages of pollution. The totality of human suffering and economic waste caused by outdated ritualistic parliamentary procedures staggers the imagination and cries out for help.

Perhaps the most important of all the reasons for a drastic change in our parliamentary procedure is the need to uplift the image of parliament itself. Bluntly and starkly said, rightly or wrongly our parliament is held in low esteem. A vivid picture of endless, futile debates has seeped down to the grass roots of this nation and conjured up an image of bungling, inefficient parliament. We must raise the standards of excellence in parliament so the people of this land will respect this institution and we will thus impart strength and vitality to it. We must increase the prestige of parliament so that parents across this land will be proud tc see their sons adorn this chamber. We must increase the prestige of parliament so that well motivated, well qualified young men in our nation will seek a seat in this venerable house. We cannot do it by tinkering with the procedures of parliament. We must do it by a drastic and brutal assault on the rules of the house and the basic concepts underlying parliament.

In this our centennial year we are looking for projects, so let us make this our project. In this our centennial year Canadians are told, in flaming, emotional speeches, of the unlimited riches, individual dignity and security awaiting all of us as we enter the second century. Let us provide the means of achieving these most laudable and attainable goals.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member permit a question? Did I understand the hon. member to say that a centennial project for all of us should be a brutal attack on parliament?

Mr. Tolmie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman misconstrued my remarks. I said that what we should do in this centennial year is to bring about a realistic, brutal assault on the outdated parliamentary procedures but not on parliament itself.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Jack A. Irvine (London): It had been my intention in entering this debate to say a few words about our centennial year and the great celebrations we are having throughout the country, and also to say something about our constitution. All these things have been said so many times, and in such an effective way, that I feel perhaps anything I might add would be somewhat redundant. However, to those of others I should like to add my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure that this has been a wonderful opportunity for these two new members. Certainly they should be congratulated upon their sincerity of purpose. I do not go along with everything they said, but naturally I would not. At the same time I do want to pass along my congratulations to them.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne might be termed an exercise in futility. I think it conceals a great deal more than it actually reveals. There is an abundance of quantity and an almost complete famine of quality. There is nothing of a very constructive nature. It contains a rehashing of what the government has done, but very little is said about what it intends to do in the future, which I think is so important in this our centennial year. The speech was of extraordinary length and according to one of the editorials I read, had a looseness of composition. It was not a reliable forecast of legislation, but an inventory of the desires and dreams of a floundering government.

Some of the items mentioned in the speech are the following: the expansion of designated areas; a job finding program; mobility financing; again the Canada Development Corporation; aid to Indians and Eskimos—all very worthy objectives. There is to be additional foreign aid in the amount, I believe, of $300 million, again a worthy objective. However, perhaps we should think for a little while and ask ourselves whether true charity does not begin at home.

There was no mention of solutions for such things as the staggering national debt that we have at the present time, the terrific burden that is placed upon the taxpayer and the hundreds of thousands of people who are unemployed. The government contend that more people are employed, but this is only natural because there are more people in Canada today. The law of nature sees that we have an increase every year, and people also enter the country as immigrants. Naturally there are more people in Canada today and so more are working; but there are also more unemployed.

Nothing was said, to my knowledge, about what was going to be done to control the spiralling cost of living, or what was going to be done about protecting the man who carries a lunch bucket against the present inflationary economy of this country. What is going to be done about increased government spending year after year, as evidenced by the estimates? The dessert was mentioned, Mr. Speaker, but there was little or no thought given to the main course.

Another matter to which I would draw the attention of the house, and about which I have spoken to the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), a man for whom I have the greatest admiration, is that no mention was made in the speech of hate literature and the prohibition of the dissemination of such literature. Last session there were two private members bills on the order paper dealing with this subject. There was Bill No. C-45, to amend, I believe it was, the Post Office Act to forbid the distribution of this type of literature through the mails. Then there was Bill No. C-98, which I believe ws sponsored by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), having to do with group libel, the dissemination of group hatred. I should have liked to see some reference to this matter in the speech.

I have before me a copy of an item which was distributed in my home city of London, as well as in Windsor, Toronto and perhaps other cities. I am not going to give the name of the person involved because I am sure that what this individual wants is a little notoriety; but I do not think that this sort of thing is going to contribute very much to the success of this country in our next century. This material is published by a nazi group, so-called, and we surely had enough of them during the second world war and immediately preceding it. It bears the sign of the swastika, and beneath it, at the foot of the page appears the following:

> The symbol of the movement which alone can prevent the Star of David from being forced on to us as our flag.

This is hate literature in its worst form, Mr. Speaker. It goes on:

> The flag of a mixed racial society must not be forced on us!

Then it goes on to say we should keep our country white and our race pure. This literature is directed at the Jewish people, a people who have made such great contributions to our business, economic and cultural life.

There are those who say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in the interest of freedom of speech, one of the freedoms which we cherish, to pass legislation prohibiting this kind of thing. However, I contend that a failure to pass legislation forbidding it ignores freedom of religion. We would be picking out one group, then another, and which group would be the next one?

I understand from talking to the Solicitor General that the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons have been instructed to recommend some kind of legislation to this house in this regard, and that they should do this very soon. I hope that this type of legislation will be presented to us in the immediate future. We have to do something to protect this segment of our society, so let us not hedge or equivocate. These citizens are entitled, the same as any member of this house, to the dignity of the individual. They are also entitled to freedom of religion. I hope that this government does not consider them as second class citizens.

Another subject with which I should like to deal is the maltreatment of children. At the last session I introduced a private members bill, Bill No. C-219, dealing with this very subject, and it was still on the order paper at the end of the session. We have a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, but we have no society for the prevention of cruelty to children. How wrong can we be?

The province of Ontario brought in legislation to make it mandatory for people to report any knowledge they had of maltreatment of children, but there were no teeth in that legislation, Mr. Speaker. The bill I introduced last session, and which I intend to reintroduce at this session makes it a criminal offence to fail to report cases of cruelty. It imposes a fine and/or prison term on those working in the medical profession for failing to report cruelty cases and imposes a lesser fine on other individuals. I submit that in the interests of humanity cases of this kind should be reported. Many cases of this sort have come to the attention of hon. members, and many have come to my attention during the four years I have had the privilege of sitting in this chamber.

One of the most deplorable incidents that happened recently in my riding was where a young couple punished their three and a half year old child for misdemeanours by holding it in boiling water. The child died, and the couple was sentenced to two years imprisonment. That crime was despicable; it was terrible. People who let a child suffer like that ought not to be returned to society until they are psychiatrically sound. They are sick; and there are many like them throughout the country.

Next I want to speak about pension plans for retired civil servants. I wish to quote from a document printed by the public service superannuates. It contains interesting information which I have checked and find to be true, and I wish to put some of it on the record. Our civil servants have served their country well, but are receiving pitiful pensions, although the money is there to increase their pensions; it is their money. I now quote from the document:

> The superannuation plan for civil service employees of Canada has been in operation since 1924. The Public Service Superannuation Act contains the authority for its establishment and the provisions for its administration. Section 34 of the P.S.S. Act—

That is the Public Service Superannuation Act:

> —requires that the Minister of Finance "shall lay before parliament each year a report on the administration of this act during the preceding fiscal year..." Section 32 describes the "amounts to be credited to the account in each fiscal year", and section 35 of the P.S.S. regulations provides how much and when the interest earned on the balance of the account shall be calculated and credited.

According to these annual reports the Minister of Finance shows that the balance at the credit of this account as at March 31, 1965, was $2,161 million—

It has increased since then:

—and that this amount was $304 million higher than the balance at the previous fiscal year end...

Also, interest alone on the cumulative balance year after year is more than the total annual expenditure. In other words the receipts into the fund are more than three times the expenditures from the fund.

That needs to be looked into carefully. Continuing:

In January of 1966 in answer to questions asked in the House of Commons it was revealed that 5,330 retired civil servants and 6,775 widows of civil servants receive pensions of less than $50.00 a month. Those getting under $100 monthly include 13,109 civil servants and 11,923 widows. It has recently been said by welfare authorities that a couple getting less than $300 a month are living on the fringe of poverty...

Coupled with these figures the Dominion Bureau of Statistics tells us that in February the consumer price index rose to a record 142.1 based on the 1949 consumer prices equalling 100. In addition, from the beginning of the war years to the 1949 establishment of this consumer price index, the cost of living rose approximately 60 per cent.

In 25 years the cost of living has doubled, yet the pensions of our retired civil servants have remained the same. Continuing:

The reason why the P.S.S. fund is in the red is because section 3(2) of the P.S.S. Act places the superannuation account in the consolidated revenue fund and the money is thereby used for purposes other than superannuation. The Glassco Commission revealed a shortage in the superannuation account. Moneys collected as contributions toward a pension plan by the administrators or trustees from employer and employee cannot be classified as revenue in the sense that postal, customs, excise, income tax, etc., returns are considered as revenue. Contributions toward the Canada Pension Plan are not being included as revenue. These moneys are being made available for investment.

The provinces are clamouring to use this money at the present time. Continuing:

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have compared the P.S. superannuation plan with outside pension plans, and have said that by granting pension adjustments in favour of federal superannuates they would be discriminating against Canadian citizens. By the way are federal civil servants not Canadian citizens? These gentlemen have omitted to mention that this is a contributory plan...

In January 1965 employees of the Ford Motor Company of Canada obtained an adjustment in their pensions of $1.45 per month for each year of service. A pensioner with 30 years service thus got a pension increase of $43.50 per month...

Revision of the P.S.S. Act is long overdue. In any revision, consideration should be given to inserting a provision whereby pensions will be adjusted in line with the consumer cost of living index, as is now being done for the Canada Pension Plan, the Old Age Security, and in the case of salaries and wages paid throughout the civilized world. The British Pensions (Increase) Act has provided pension increases in 1920, 1924, 1944, 1947, 1952, 1954, 1956, 1959, 1962 and 1965 for retired public servants.

It is time that we acted on behalf of our civil servants, many of whom have given dedicated service to this country.

Next I refer to page 590 of Hansard for April 26, 1965 where the following information is found:

The balance of $2,161 million in this account at March 31, 1965 is $304 million higher than the balance at the previous fiscal year end.

This money belongs to our retired civil servants, and we ought to be fair with them. Let us bring their pensions to a decent level.

Next I want to say something about empire building, government by bureaucracy. The figures I shall mention I have researched thoroughly, some of them going back to 1963, when this government took over. It will be interesting to compare these figures with those of today. For instance, in 1963 the C.B.C. had 824 employees; today it has 1,308—almost twice as many. In 1963 the Department of Agriculture employed 10,410; today it employs 12,442. The B.B.G.—much younger and probably much wiser then—employed 40, and today employ 94. The figures for the Department of Fisheries show 2,668 for 1963, and 3,285 employed today. In the Department of Public Works there were 9,290 in 1963 and there are 9,815 today. In the Department of Defence Production—and this is an alarming increase—we had 1,647 in 1963, compared with 5,430 today. The Department of the Secretary of State employed 824 as compared with 1,497 today.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Let us look at the spending estimates of these various departments and see how they have increased since this government took office. Estimates of C.B.C. expenditure have increased by $56 million, which is 70 per cent higher than the 1963 figure. In the ministry of agriculture the increase is $78 million, amounting to 45 per cent. The increase for the Board of Broadcast Governors is $691,000 or 90 per cent. In the Department of Fisheries it is $24 million—a 100 per cent increase. In Public Works it is $98 million or an increase of 55 per cent—I am quoting the nearest round figure below the actual amount in each case.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford that kind of government. The estimated expenditure in the fiscal year just ended was $8,795 million. This year it is $9.5 billion—very nearly a billion dollars more. This is at a time when things are pretty good—we hope—and when we should perhaps be laying something aside for a day when it might be needed. Somebody has to pay the piper, and it is the taxpayer. It is the man in the income bracket between $5,000 and $10,000 who pays most of the income tax which is collected in Canada.

The present administration is spending money like a drunken sailor. This is an expensive government and the taxpayer just cannot afford it. If we consider this picture of taxation and expenditure together with the disunity which seems to be running through the cabinet at the present time it may be concluded that this is a good time for the government to resign. Let them resign now. Let us get ourselves a government which would protect the individual, the average person, so that he can live in at least a semblance of dignity.

Today the average person pays 34 cents out of every dollar he makes in taxes of one form or another. I contend that the burden of taxation has reached the point at which he can stand no more. Consider the increases which have taken place in the field of wages—increases which amount to about 10 per cent a year. Compare this rate of increase with the rate of increase of our productivity. Last year national productivity was supposed to have increased by 6 per cent but the influence of factors such as price indexes brought the net increase down to about 4½ per cent.

If wages are increasing at twice the rate of the increase in our productivity, something has to be done. If not, we shall price ourselves completely out of foreign markets—and when we do that we shall really be in trouble, because once we lose those markets we shall find ourselves facing mass unemployment, something we cannot afford with prices as high as they are at present.

I suggest to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), who I see in the house now, that the government should take a good look at this situation. I am seriously concerned as to the direction in which we are going, and I know he is, too. What is the answer? In my own minimal way I have a few thoughts on the subject:

1. We should bring about a gigantic cut in all expenditures. Let us cut and trim everything as closely as we can. Anyone who operates a business, whether big or small, public or corporate, knows that if the money going out is more than the money coming in, something has to be done about it. This is the position in which we find ourselves today.

2. We must increase our productivity by every means open to us.

3. We must get back to common sense business principles—we cannot pay out more than we receive.

4. We must return to the old fashioned, outmoded method of pay as you go, which is still, to my way of thinking, the ideal way. Why not a balanced budget for a change? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will shortly be presenting a budget to us. I hope that somehow he will be able to present us with at least a balanced budget; we would like to think that in this our centennial year we are heading in the right direction. We should be looking forward and upward—and when I say "upward" I do not mean that our expenditures should be going in this direction. It is time for each of us in all parties in this house to get together and put our country first, and petty party grievances second.

Mr. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I should like to begin by complimenting the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe all hon. members will agree with me when I say the house has two new found stars, one from Newfoundland and the other from Quebec. They are to be commended on the excellent manner in which they carried out their assignments.

As chairman of our Canadian NATO parliamentary association I feel I should take the opportunity afforded by this debate to speak for my allotted time with respect to certain aspects of foreign affairs which are dealt with in the speech from the throne. On the premise that our constant objective is to strengthen Canada's position in the councils of nations by the ardent pursuit of world peace, I believe we must, with strength, face up to current international problems.

We fear the proliferation of nuclear arms and are dismayed at the slow progress being made in the field of international disarmament. We recognize the urgent need for the reform of the NATO alliance and acknowledge that our NORAD arrangements require adjustment. The alternate periods of cold war and detente between east and west greatly complicate these problems.

As my time is limited, I intend to confine myself to speaking about the reform of NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly. I shall try to deal with these subjects as I see them, as chairman of our local NATO association and as your representative on the standing committee of the North Atlantic Assembly. With respect to the reform of NATO, I shall endeavour to give hon. members some background on the origin of NATO, some details of Canada's present contribution to NATO, and the original and current Canadian view of it as compared with the American view. Then I shall deal with current problems and the need for reform.

During the second world war, Russia annexed Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, certain parts of Finland, Poland, Rumania, northeast Germany and eastern Czechoslovakia. She took over 180,000 square miles of territory and more than 23 million inhabitants. After the war, by 1948, Moscow controlled and swallowed another 363 million square miles of territory and 95 million people. Her pressure extended menacingly into various other parts of the world, ranging from Greece in the Balkans to Korea in Asia. The west was scared into action.

Free Europe turned to the United States, the only power strong enough to withstand the might of the U.S.S.R. On March 12, 1947, President Truman enunciated the Truman doctrine. Congress responded with $400 million in aid and dispatched military and civilian missions to Greece and Turkey. The Marshall plan extended aid to all Europe, including Russia and her satellites behind the iron curtain, but no Soviet state or satellite was permitted to accept this aid, and the conditions between east and west became what is described as the cold war.

On March 17, 1948, Belgium, France, Luxemburg, The Netherlands and the United Kingdom signed the Brussels Treaty which pledged mutual co-operation in building up a common defence system and the strengthening of economic and cultural aids. Three months later the Russians countered with the blockade of Berlin. Canada welcomed the Brussels Treaty, and promised to support an effective system of collective security through regional pacts under the charter of the United Nations. The Canadian suggestion for a mutual defence alliance received support in Britain and in the United States. After a series of talks between representatives of Canada, the United States and those of the Brussels treaty powers, the text of the treaty was published on March 18, 1949. Denmark, Iceland, Italy, Norway and Portugal were officially invited to accede to the treaty, and on April 4, 1949, in spite of official protests from the Soviet union, the North Atlantic Treaty was signed in Washington by the foreign ministers of 12 countries, including Canada, and the parliaments of all countries ratified the treaty within five months thereafter. Greece and Turkey were invited to join and formally acceded on February 18, 1952. The Federal Republic of Germany officially became a member on May 9, 1955, to bring the membership of the alliance to 15 countries.

Canada's contribution to NATO defence is a combination of land, sea and air elements of its armed forces. In West Germany, in the Soest area, we have stationed the 4th Canadian Infantry Brigade, consisting of approximately 6,300 officers and men under Brigadier Amy. This force is kept at a high state of readiness, at a cost of about $54 million annually, excluding weapons. The Canadian government is in the process of re-equipping the brigade with new and modern vehicles and weapons.

Our delegation to the NATO Parliamentarians Conference held in Paris last November had the privilege, before the conference, of visiting the 4th brigade at Soest and can attest to its superlative condition and spirit. The delegation also inspected two of our four air bases in France and Germany. At Marville, France, we saw the highly efficient CF-104 reconnaissance operations that are carried out by No. 1 wing of the air division. Later the group proceeded with Air Vice Marshal Lane to No. 4 wing at Baden Soellingen in Germany where we toured the facilities and were briefed as far as possible on the state of readiness of our modern aircraft. The high degree of professionalism possessed by our military officers and men was quite apparent, and we were very proud of them.

In addition we have other troops that are committed to NATO but are maintained in Canada. Also maintained in Canada is a special force, a 3,176 man battalion group for the ACE Mobile Force. ACE is under the Supreme Allied Commander Europe, SACEUR, and is designed for quick action to meet any aggression on the NATO flanks, such as in Norway, Greece or Turkey, or to meet any other similar contingency. The present commander of ACE is a Canadian, General Turcot. Last summer Canada offered NATO two more battalions for ACE Mobile Force and recently the offer was accepted in principle.

One of the most important roles that Canada played in the founding of the North Atlantic Alliance was to bring the United States into the treaty. However, from the outset there have continued to be basic differences in the views, aims and attitudes of the Canadian and American governments. Even today, while they both generally consider NATO to be indispensable, yet in need of change from its present form, they have come to these conclusions by different ways and for different reasons. Thus they tend to different solutions of the basic problems that are facing NATO.

Canada has always, from the beginning looked on the alliance as the basis of a future Atlantic community. Beyond the military tasks Canadians saw the ultimately more important political, economic, social and agricultural roles. She tried to incorporate specific proposals along these lines in the treaty itself, but failed because the larger powers were not too enthusiastic. The best that was achieved was the insertion of Article II in the treaty, that is the article which contains the non-military provisions.

During the Truman-Eisenhower days the United States viewed NATO as a purely military association, with the one task of defending Europe, a policy with which Canada has never entirely agreed. The Canadian outlook has at no time considered NATO in its actual form as a solely military alliance for the defence of Europe. We have sought for greater unities, but despite disagreement as to the ultimate aims of the alliance Canada has supported moves toward the integration of the armed forces of NATO members, and opposed demands for exceptions.

Hopes were high at one time of NATO transforming itself into a close association of free countries on both sides of the Atlantic, but again the larger powers have not encouraged the extension of it into other fields. The United States Congress, for example, has continued to be opposed to any form of foreign control of United States policy.

As a defence alliance NATO has proven to be a tremendous success. Its existence has diminished the danger to western Europe, and that very fact has raised problems within the alliance. By 1958 the British were critical of the fact that NATO had failed to work out a common policy on a global basis, and France was not satisfied with preponderant American influence in NATO. President de Gaulle sought a permanent directorate composed of the representatives of the United States, Britain and France to co-operate their policies the world over. The American response to this was chilling, and apart from the big three it was already clear that the other members of the alliance, including Canada, sought more consultation and less domination under the guise of co-ordination.

In addition to the political and economic problems of the alliance, the late President Kennedy had to come to grips with the question of control over nuclear weapons. He evolved a formula in 1962 which indicated that the United States would be ready to share a nuclear weapon partnership with a United States of Europe, but with the diminishing danger to western Europe it proved impossible to take even a first step in the direction of a united Europe.

Many Canadians, of course, did not like the idea of a dualist NATO, or a two-pillar policy, one pillar being in Europe and the other being in North America. This type of partnership would be entirely counter to our traditional foreign policy. What has been important to Canada is that her association be on an equal footing with all NATO countries, as only this structure gives Canada a degree of independence from the United States, a degree of independence that we have considered in the past to be essential.

Another Canadian consideration is that a two-pillar partnership would put Canada in the agonizing position of having to make a choice between opposing American and European policies, on frequent occasions. But the natural trends on both sides of the Atlantic are toward continentalism. Continentalism is a process in operation today that is analogous to the process that brought about confederation in this country 100 years ago.

Canada does not seem to have changed her attitude with regard to President Kennedy's dualist NATO proposal, although circumstances in Europe may very well eventually dictate such a situation—at least with regard to the military aspect of the alliance. Britain's entry into the common market is an example. Will a United States of Europe follow? Will we be forced to change our attitude to remain in the alliance? We are going to need strong leadership and strong support in Canada to keep our independence in our second century.

The nuclear dilemma was not a problem during the early years of the alliance when the concept of the defence of Europe coincided with the concept of the defence of America, and when all the partners in the alliance felt that an assault upon any one of the members would immediately bring forward massive retaliation. By 1959 however the strategic situation had changed. There was talk of a missile gap in favour of the Soviet union, which made Europeans doubt that the American guarantee was unequivocal, and would be instantaneously operative as had been believed earlier.

Then President Kennedy evolved the new look in American strategic thinking, based on the correlated ideas of flexible or measured response and strict central control. The intent was to avoid the necessity to meet every one of the enemies choices with the massive retaliation of the earlier era. The United States now wanted a range of options and the right to discharge its commitments in NATO according to the circumstances, with conventional arms at first and as long as possible, and with nuclear arms if necessary, but in that case with the discretion assured by the tightest and most responsible central control.

This de facto change has had an unsettling effect upon the European side of the alliance, as it did not meet European security requirements or European aspirations. However, today most Europeans are less troubled, now that they have witnessed the American response to the Cuban crisis and have been shown the plans for flexible and measured response. However, a continuing trouble with the policy of flexible response under central control is that it is inconsistent with the political concept of a two-pillar partnership; the latter policy envisages a united Europe with which the United States would share the control of nuclear weapons, and also the west's responsibility for peace, stability and prosperity in the world.

The idea of central control, on the other hand, is based on the idea of integration under United States direction. This apparent contradiction strengthens the European suspicion that the United States really wants acceptance of its military program and only holds out the additional promise of a true partnership in front of the allies to get them to accept such an arrangement.

So today the problems of consultation and the proliferation of nuclear weapons in NATO are two that are still to be solved satisfactorily. Mutual control may well be deferred until Europe achieves political status equal to the United States. In the meantime, it appears that the furthest the United States is willing to go is to allow participation in the formulation of a plan of priorities that will come into operation in the event of an emergency. Mutual control continues to be, therefore, the major problem facing NATO today—although the West German desire for a greater role in the determination of alliance policy, and for a more tangible voice in nuclear weapon sharing has been met in part by the recent setting up of the nuclear planning committee.

Another key problem facing NATO today arises by virtue of the effects of French policies on alliance cohesion. Since 1962, the shape and purpose of NATO have come under increasing attack by France. Under the leadership of President de Gaulle, France makes three specific arguments.

The nuclear balance of power between the Soviet union and the United States has seriously impaired the credibility of the United States deterrent. France believes that it is unlikely the United States will risk its own survival in order to counter a Soviet attack in Europe, or that the Soviet union will doubt the will of the United States in a European showdown. In this respect France does not trust the United States; but other members of the alliance, including Canada, continue to do so.

Because of the strategic stalemate in Europe, the French believe that the real area of conflict between east and west has shifted from Europe to the former colonial territories. The French fear that unless they, and the other European states, remain aloof from these extra-European struggles, they may become involved in a war that is neither to their interest, nor of their own making.

Because a nuclear stalemate does exist, and because the main theatre of concentration is no longer in Europe, the French believe that there is no longer any need to maintain the NATO military structure. Indeed the French believe that this organization is merely a means of subordination. The organization, in President de Gaulle's view, is a method by which the United States maintains its domination of NATO.

By withdrawal from the military infrastructure of NATO, France has not broken the letter of the North Atlantic Treaty. This is apparent from a careful reading of the articles of the treaty. Whether it has, however, broken the spirit of the treaty, or any bilateral agreement in respect of the infrastructure, is another matter.

The French still want to be a partner in NATO politically, and in the event of an emergency, militarily, under French sovereignty. Furthermore they want partnership in NADGE—the electronic curtain that will identify all aircraft crossing NATO borders and automatically institute action previously decided upon. The French withdrawal has embarassed the remaining 14 members. Their withdrawal has created many problems for the alliance, many of which have now been solved as the remaining partners have stood steadfastly together, bearing in mind that there are still 300,000 Russian soldiers in East Germany, and that there are six or seven hundred nuclear armed missiles aimed at western Europe.

The German problem is a key problem, both within NATO and between NATO and the Soviet union. After 22 years, the scars of war are not healed and Germany is still a divided nation. Berlin, the capital of a once united Germany, is still in the middle of communist East Germany. There has been no peace settlement; barbed wire and walls separate the east and west Germans. These conditions are highly volatile, and Europe will not rest until they no longer exist. And within the alliance West Germany is seeking to strengthen its political voice through greater influence on military strategic affairs.

From all this it will be seen that Europe is no longer a downtrodden and helpless continent. The new Europe is now demanding political power commensurate with its potential military and actual economic strength. The United States having long striven toward exactly this situation of European strength, now finds itself somewhat uncomfortable. For the first time there is a challenge to Washington's leadership.

To the French, nuclear subordination seems to imply political subordination. It means that without an independent nuclear force there can be no independent European diplomacy. Even President de Gaulle admits that while his strategic force will have limited military effectiveness, there is every likelihood that it will carry diplomatic weight out of proportion to its size.

Another problem for NATO is the current globalization debate. The United States would like its NATO partners to recognize that it is in their international interests to take a more active role in conflicts and problems outside the Atlantic area, such as Viet Nam. Some other partners are interested in those areas, such as Africa, where they have special relations, but most of the NATO members are reluctant to have any part of globalization. The United States may be able to interest some of its partners on a bilateral basis but it is fairly apparent that it will not be able to do so on a NATO basis.

When the 12th NATO Parliamentarians Conference was held at NATO political headquarters in Paris last November, two main events occurred; first, the name of the organization was changed to North Atlantic Assembly and, second, a Canadian, our colleague Jean-Eudes Dubé, the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, was elected first president under its new name. Among the many reports, resolutions and recommendations of the conference was one dealing with institutionalization or, if you will, consultative assembly status for the conference, under its new name. This was the second resolution of the political committee and it was adopted by the plenary session of the conference.

It is the hope of the North Atlantic Assembly that it will attain the status of a consultative assembly such as the consultative assembly of the council of Europe, and the European parliament; that it will have more status and influence and be of more assistance to the North Atlantic Council.

The consultative assembly of the council of Europe meets for about a month each year, usually divided into three sessions. It is estimated that an Atlantic assembly would need to meet each year for at least a week. The seat of the assembly would be at the headquarters of NATO in Belgium. It is suggested that the number of its members be 172 of whom 12 would be from Canada. Each member, or substitute, would have one vote and would speak and vote on his own responsibility. The assembly would debate issues currently before the North Atlantic Council for resolution, and would submit new proposals or recommendations. It would submit questions to the Secretary General of the North Atlantic Council and receive either answers or formal refusals to answer. It would invite representatives of the Secretary General or the North Atlantic Council to appear before the assembly or its committees, to question them orally. Such functions are among those possessed by existing European assemblies.

There would appear to be general enthusiasm in favour of the resolution by all member nations, save that certain difficulties may arise when it comes to obtaining ratification for the new status from the parliaments of all countries.

Our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) has already indicated that the Canadian government favours increasing the importance of the NATO parliamentarians. He has qualified his approval of the proposal to change the NATO Parliamentarians Conference into a consultative assembly by saying, however, that it has not been decided whether the specific proposal adopted by the NATO Parliamentarians Conference represents the best means of giving effect to this objective.

The NATO Parliamentarians Conference now known as the North Atlantic Assembly, has its own secretariat and it is anticipated that this secretariat will be strengthened this year by the appointment of a new Secretary General and an assistant, in addition to the existing staff.

The debates and recommendations of the NATO parliamentarians have been quite influential in moving NATO from peace keeping to peace making, and from conduct of the cold war to a serious interest in the development of the current European détente. NATO parliamentarians are very much interested in exploring and exploiting a rapprochement between east and west, in the interests of a peaceful and lasting settlement in Europe. Increased stature granted by the award of consultative assembly status would likely improve east-west relations because it would be greatly concerned with them and may be the first basic step toward ultimate Atlantic union. Indeed it is possible that its establishment might lead in the future to a reduction in the number of international parliamentary bodies through a merging of the assembly and the assembly of Western European Union. Since the Western European Union is composed of seven NATO countries, such a merger could come about if it appeared to be in the interest of their governments. In this case the specialized functions of the Western European Union assembly could be performed within the framework of an Atlantic assembly, by the delegates from the seven Western European Union members.

In conclusion, I would ask that all hon. members of this house and the other place support the proposal to institutionalize the North Atlantic Assembly, in such fashion as you may be called upon to do so by our government.

Mr. Reg Cantelon (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I think I should like to ally myself with those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for the very able manner in which they have discharged their responsibilities. Many have said that seldom have more efficient and capable speeches been delivered. I agree, although my experience here has been rather limited in that regard.

I do not feel I would like to make any general comments on the speech from the throne, because were I to do so I would be compelled to do what many other members have done; that is, suggest that it is so diffuse and so indefinite that it is very difficult actually to make any concrete suggestions about it. I should like to say also that, as this is our centennial year, I am happy that the centennial commission has done such a good job. In particular I should like to mention the name of the commissioner, but perhaps I should not mention his name because everybody knows who he is. I believe he has done an excellent job, although there have been occasions when he seems to have been pushed somewhat into the background. Nevertheless I am sure the work he has done will be recognized by the Canadian people.

I am happy also that in this centennial year our Expo shows evidence of being a great success. I have been very fortunate in having been there on several occasions. I can say, I am sure without fear of contradiction, that all those who visit Expo will enjoy their visit very much. If they wish to receive an education, they can remain there for a couple of weeks and have a rather broad general education in respect of all that is going on in this world today. In particular I think this is noticeable in the pavilions of what I might call the main powers. I refer to the Russian pavilion, the United States pavilion, the British and French pavilions. Since I am a western Canadian I should not like to let this opportunity pass without mentioning that the western Canadian pavilion I visited was I believe the most imaginative and interesting that one could see.

In considering what I wanted to say today I thought I would like to deal with three topics. The first one is of course my own particular fetish. I suppose this is natural, since I am a schoolteacher. I should like to speak briefly about education and the place of the federal government in that field, because I am not one who believes that the federal government should play no part in education. In a modern and developed nation, such as we are, we should recognize the absolute necessity of a well educated population. We are lagging in this respect.

It has been said that in the 20 years after the first war we made very rapid strides, and this applies in particular to the province of Ontario. Since that time I do not think we have kept pace with the developments that have been going on in other countries. Certainly we have not kept pace in the numbers we are educating. The last figures I saw, and I will admit they are a couple of years out of date, showed that some 70 per cent of the Russian people go on to advanced education, that is university or its equivalent. In the United States some 33 per cent continue their education above the high school level, but in Canada only 17 per cent do so.

I know that some years ago we in Canada suffered under the delusion that we had one of the best educational systems in the world. I think it is one of the best for the people who get it, but the trouble is there are not enough people who get it and there will not be enough people getting it until the federal government gives substantial assistance to the provinces in a fund raising manner. One might say that this would be interfering with the prerogatives of the provinces. However, we manage to give educational assistance to the universities without interfering with the special educational prerogatives of the provinces. We manage to give vocational assistance and to pay the largest portion of the capital costs of vocational buildings. Unfortunately the present government has taken a very retrograde step in having removed this provision.

I think we could give that assistance to high schools in the same way. There is no earthly reason why the provinces cannot say to the federal government: we have a certain number of schools we wish to build, and we will require certain sums of money for that purpose. The federal government should be prepared to provide that money to the provinces. If to anyone here this seems too altruistic or too much in opposition to the B.N.A. Act then I do not think he is a modern Canadian and I do not think he really appreciates the difficulties which face education today. I do not think he realizes that unless we do this sort of thing this country in the future will not be able to maintain its position at the forefront of the world's industry, but will lag further and further back. I have some grandchildren in Canada. I hate to think that in the future they might find that this country has lost its place in the parade of nations because it has failed to do for education what obviously needs to be done.

The second subject about which I wanted to speak briefly is that of chemical tariffs. It can be only a few words because new developments are taking place in this particular field and I hesitate to comment on this topic in any depth until I have had an opportunity to review the recent work, in particular the publication that came out today. I want to speak about chemical tariffs and what needs to be done for the chemical industry in this country. This is a subject which I as a Saskatchewanite hold dear to my heart. I believe that Saskatchewan has the industrial base to become the centre of a great new chemical industry in this country. The largest known potash deposit in the world is to be found in Saskatchewan. There are huge deposits of low-grade lignite coal in the south. There will be an adequate supply of water, once we get the South Saskatchewan river dam properly working. There is much oil in my province, and there will be more, I am sure.

I think these three things alone are enough to provide a base for a tremendous development in industrial chemicals. However, there are difficulties here. Until the present time the chemical industry has had to be supported by tariffs, and these tariffs are in the process of revision. As I have said I hesitate to comment on this topic at the present time. Nevertheless I do think we should remember that if we are going to develop an industry in this country, we will have to continue to give it protection. We are a comparatively small country and our production will be small for many years. Therefore we cannot compete with the huge industries that are located in countries like the United States, which is so close to us and so easily able to ship to us the chemicals we want. I think this is probably all that I will say about that particular topic today, although I hope to say more about it some time in the future.

The third subject I want to discuss is that of pollution. So far it has not been too serious in western Canada, but I can foresee a future in which it will be a very serious problem. Generally speaking, there are of course two main classes of pollution with which we as a nation have to deal. The first is air pollution which is caused by two main sources, industrial plants and automobiles. In the west, automobiles do not cause much trouble because there are miles and miles of roads and not too many motorcars to run on them. To those members who like driving a car I would suggest a trip to the west because I can assure them they will enjoy it there, far more than driving on the streets of Ottawa.

I will dismiss rather unwillingly the latter form of pollution by saying that this government, in spite of the lead given it by the United States government and by the vigorous representations made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), has made it very clear that it intends to continue its standard policy of moving only when forced to do so. It would be so easy to start now, but of course it will not, as it has told us over and over again.

Fortunately for most of us, industrial air pollution is almost invariably accompanied by such a disagreeable smell that public outcries usually bring some measure of treatment. Nevertheless, both the municipal and provincial governments are very loath to act before the industrial pollution begins. They want the business to come into the province so will not propose the restraint before the industry locates there.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In Saskatchewan large quantities of salt waste produced as a by-product of the potash industry are almost certain to be blown over many square miles of good farmland. This is a new type of pollution, and there is of course no actual measure to control it at present. I hope that before this pollution becomes very harmful there will be steps taken to prevent the areas around these potash mines from being turned into agricultural deserts.

It is true, of course, that some research is being done. As James H. Gray put it in the Ottawa Citizen for January 23, 1967:

> Research is now being done on the effects of airborne salt dust on soils and agricultural crops.

The federal government, I think, would do well to assist in this research as it ought to do in all industrial airborne pollution. I would hope that it would not adopt the attitude of the manager of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation who was quoted as saying:

> Water is for use and if some of it gets polluted in the process, the people should try to live with it.

I cannot imagine a more iniquitous type of statement. I cannot imagine, either, the previous manager making that kind of statement. Since the present manager is an appointee of the Liberal government of Saskatchewan, he evidently mirrors the opinion of that government. I hope the premier of Saskatchewan does not feel that way. If he does, I hope he does not delay too long in calling an election so the people of Saskatchewan can get rid of him and put in a party with more concern for the welfare of the people of my province.

A great deal of attention has been focused on pollution of the Great Lakes watershed. The United States is fortunate in that some ten states are concerned. The federal government there has therefore seen pollution as a national question and has taken an active interest in the problem. As the Winnipeg Free Press put it in an article on April 18, 1966:

> The U.S. government appears to be moving in to grasp control firmly on its side of the border, using a combination of legislation, knuckle rapping, potential court actions and money.

It is just too bad our federal government has not the same sort of courage. In 1966 President Johnson proposed to spend $20 million on pollution control research and as much as $10 billion in the next ten years. He estimates it will take $30 billion to clean up water pollution in the United States. I hope we never get to the stage where it will take $30 billion to solve this problem; but if we go on doing nothing, as we have in the past, then we can expect it will cost that amount some day.

Is it that we do nothing because we are afraid to interfere with provincial rights? I believe that is the excuse the government uses today. This is the excuse the government uses to do nothing in spite of the great damages that failure to act has done and continues to do to the national heritage of the people. Dr. Vance of the Ontario Water Resources Commission says:

> They're Ontario waters but they're also national waters. As far as I know, it isn't a case of disputed jurisdiction, but clarification is needed.

The Canadian government has evaded its responsibilities long enough. I hope a bold enough step will be taken to do some good. I cite this situation to illustrate the fact that where pollution is worst the government has taken no steps. As the Ottawa Citizen of February 14, 1966 put it in reporting the words of George Burt, Canadian director of the united auto workers at a water conference:

> Mr. Pearson's office backs on the Ottawa river which is full of pollution . . . Just across from his office, the E. B. Eddy Company every day dumps tons of sulphur, which I understand is a fish killer, into the river.

Referring to the minister for external affairs he said:

> I don't think Paul Martin should be hesitant in making a statement either. He lives on an open sewer—the Detroit river.

So we have, as the headlines put it, "politicians living by open sewers", and doing nothing about it. The government certainly has done nothing concrete in the rest of Canada.

In the fall of 1966 there was a conference held on pollution which produced 15 pages of recommendations. I should like to review them briefly, and will condense the recommendations by lumping them under six headings.

First, they decided there was a great need for a federal organization or agency which would develop a pollution abatement code and co-ordinate and disseminate any available information. This organization, too, would conduct research and co-operate with other agencies that might be working in the field. It was also their considered opinion that there should be some form of national standard set up in the pollution field.

Third, they believed that anyone who pollutes should bear the cost of treatment of the pollution damage which is inflicted on other people by the failure to control the pollution. Fourth, the conference considered there ought to be financial incentives to industry so that industry would improve its anti-pollution measures.

Fifth, they noted that there was a shortage of trained experts in the field of pollution. Finally, they thought that the best way to attack pollution control was to do it on a regional or water-shed basis, and to attack it on a multifunctional basis. There were some 600 experts at this meeting and these recommendations were the consensus of their views. This being so, I hope this government, which has never been too willing to accept suggestions, and certainly not too prompt to carry them out, will move rapidly to implement the suggestions that have been made. It is now more than six months since this pollution control group met and brought out these recommendations. I hope it will not be six months before we hear of them again from the government.

Two Ottawa scientists recently presented a paper on the subject of pollution to the Canadian Operational Research Council which was meeting at the University of Ottawa. Dr. R. W. Durie and Dr. R. F. Fletcher of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources presented this paper last Wednesday, May 10. Dr. Durie offers this broad definition of pollution, that it is any effect resulting from the use of natural resources which is deleterious to man, to his use of natural resources or to his esthetic sense.

In his view, the tendency now is to concentrate on individual problems instead of finding out the best way of using all natural resources. He thinks that we must make an immediate attack on the pollution that exists. He would set up some demonstration projects to show the public what alternatives are available in any plans for pollution control. He believed that the matter of pollution control requires top to bottom planning, because the broad goals must first be set out. I am not too sure what he means by top to bottom planning, but if I were to interpret it I would say it means from the federal government down to the municipal government, as well as the industry or individual which does the polluting.

In the west, and particularly in my own province of Saskatchewan, a study of the industrial pollution of rivers has recently been undertaken. Recently in Saskatchewan an organization was set up by the provincial government to review the matter of pollution. In my own constituency of Kindersley, and also in The Battlefords, this matter of pollution is one that has aroused some interest in the past and is still arousing a good deal of interest because the Saskatchewan river goes through our constituencies.

The city of Saskatoon has been turning its sewage into the South Saskatchewan river for a great many years. The municipality of Cory which surrounds the city has obtained an injunction to prevent this; but in spite of this the city has gone on polluting the river. The main argument of the city of Saskatoon today is that it cannot afford present requirements for pollution control unless more aid is forthcoming from the senior levels of government.

This, in effect, was the basis of a brief which was presented to the Saskatchewan Water Resources Commission by the utilities manager for the city. I will not debate the arguments pro and con between this gentleman and the members of the committee. Suffice it to say that there was some conflict of interest between the two and the city was accused of not doing anything. I quote from the Saskatoon Star Phoenix of May 1, 1967:

> The brief said pollution programs can cost individuals and organizations large amounts of money with no direct benefit. However, this should not relieve them of the responsibility of protecting a natural resource.

Since many urban centres are encumbered to the limit with other heavy costs of rapid growth, further extensive costs for pollution control cannot be met from the present available sources of capital and revenue, it said.

Further on it says:

The city felt financial aid offered by the federal government to finance the cost of trunk collector sewers and sewage treatment facilities is inadequate.

The city of Saskatoon's main contention was that it needs more help and, in particular, needs help from the federal government. This is the common complaint of municipalities today.

The North Saskatchewan river runs through the cities of North Battleford and Prince Albert. The city of North Battleford presented a brief to this same committee of the Saskatchewan government in which it said that some provinces tend to claim sole rights to water flowing in any river within their boundaries, and that they claim the right to use and dispose of this resource as they see fit without regard to people who are living outside the provincial boundary. Of course, it is quite evident that this type of thinking is wrong, because a river does not stop at a boundary, either toward its mouth or toward its source. Therefore something should be done to change this sort of provincial attitude.

To my mind it is the sort of thing that demands legislation and action by the federal government in order to prevent those places that are down river from being bothered by pollution from cities that are in other jurisdictions than their own. Certainly it emphasizes the need for national control.

The city of North Battleford has had a good deal of trouble with pollution of the North Saskatchewan river, and has had very little satisfaction in its attempts to try to correct this pollution. Until measures are taken by the federal government in conjunction with the provincial governments to prevent pollution of this type, I doubt very much that anything satisfactory will come of the city's attempts.

The development of effective pollution controls in Saskatchewan cannot be successful unless there is agreement between the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Alberta. And of course, since Manitoba is down river, they have the same right to satisfactory agreements. Since this is so, it seems to me that there is very little possibility of any satisfactory arrangement unless the federal government can step in and arrange controls that will satisfy all provinces. I think it is particularly important that the federal government should assist, because as the Star Phoenix of May 4, 1967 points out:

Municipal governments across the land are feeling the strain of demands upon property taxes. The problem is particularly acute in cities like Saskatoon where services must be supplied for many residents whose employers pay taxes to other municipal governments.

Further on it says:

We believe that those primarily responsible for causing pollution should also be primarily responsible for the cost of reducing or eliminating that pollution. But some assistance in these matters from provincial and federal governments can be justified.

Then it goes on to say:

The province should have a clear policy on such assistance before it starts to enforce rigid pollution controls—as it hopes to do this summer.

But it is perfectly clear from this, to my mind, that the province cannot have a clear policy on assistance or on rigid pollution controls until it knows just where it stands with the federal government on these matters.

Before concluding this particular portion of my remarks I would like to say a few words about what is going to happen to the South Saskatchewan river dam if something is not done to control pollution in the South Saskatchewan river. Just last summer one of the residents of Saskatoon, Mr. Hugh Arscott, with his son made a trip down the South Saskatchewan river. He came to the conclusion that lake Saskatchewan behind the South Saskatchewan river dam would slowly fill up, without adequate protection from upstream pollution. In his words, "It could very easily become the cesspool of the prairies". He told of a situation near Estuary at the junction of the Red Deer and Saskatchewan rivers where there were brownish-orange suds forming on the river surface, and again, to use his own words, "I cannot tell you what it was, for my fear of disease was greater than my scientific curiosity and no samples were taken for analysis".

In the Red Deer river, which is a tributary to the South Saskatchewan, he noted a chemical factory spewing large quantities of industrial waste into the river. It resulted in a thick brown scum which formed on his boat cover and on the gravel of the river bed. In his own words again, "It doesn't take any talent to pollute a waterway; it's easy". This seems all too true.

It will be a shame if the large lake behind the South Saskatchewan river dam does become polluted, for the people of Saskatchewan hope that it will not only be an assistance to industrial development in their province through the power generated at the dam and through the irrigation water they can take from the lake, but that it will also provide a large summer resort area in which all types of water sports can take place. I am sure they hope that it does not become a second lake Erie.

I am not sure whether my time has nearly run out, Mr. Speaker. If not, I should like to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should advise the hon. member now that his time has expired.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time of the hon. gentleman has expired.

SUPPLY

Motion agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), federal-provincial relations—agreement between Canada and Belgium; the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), external affairs—Quebec—status of the Canadian ambassador to Belgium; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), water resources—reported agreement to establish national advisory council on pollution.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Brand.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon) whose time had just about expired when we adjourned at six o'clock, would like the consent of this house to pursue his remarks a little longer. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cantelon: I should like to thank hon. members and I assure them I will take only a minute or two.

I wish to close my remarks by making a few comments upon a situation which ought to concern all Canadians. It ought to concern them because we all want to take pride in our national capital. Across the river from our parliament buildings lies the plant of the E. B. Eddy Company. It is a modern plant and it is becoming more so as its operations are updated. No one will deny that the company has made laudable attempts to beautify its area, but it is certain that these efforts will result in only limited success. Piles of logs and industrial buildings cannot be turned into things of beauty.

There is only one solution as far as I can see, and that is to move the plant. This is not impossible though it would be expensive. I believe we ought to accept such an expense if we consider that this nation of ours has a future. The immediate question is: what will it cost? My inquiries have obtained the following answers. The plant is worth about $40 million and the 80 acres on which it is situated are assessed at approxiamtely $250 million.

Let us say, then, that the relocation of the plant might today cost the Canadian people about $300 million. If we leave the plant where it is until some time in the future when, I am certain, we shall decide that it must be moved, it would cost a great deal more to do so than it would cost today, besides leaving us for many years with what I was about to call an unsightly sight—perhaps that expression is a little too Irish, but I shall use it anyway—across the river from our beautiful parliament buildings.

We ought to move it, and we ought to do so before the area becomes so crowded and so valuable that to do so would cost the people of this country a great deal more than it would today. Here is a case where Dr. Durie's definition of pollution to which I have previously referred fits very well. This plant discharges waste into the Ottawa river. It discharges gases into the air which, fortunately for the Ontario side of the river, are generally swept away by the prevailing wind. Even more important, it occupies an area which should be beautified for the nation. Those of us who have any aesthetic sense at all are convinced, I am sure, that this building must be moved out of Hull.

Because I say this, I do not want anyone to consider for a moment that I do not realize the practical difficulties. There are thousands of people in Hull who work at this plant. Their rights must be protected, and they can be protected if this plant is moved a few miles down river and good roads are put in so that they can travel easily to work. They might even find it easier to get to work than they do now; so there need be no real hardship to workers.

Will the government do this? I am sorry to say that I doubt it. There may be some hope, however, for there seems to be talk of a National Capital Commission study of the project, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) had some things to say about the plans of the commission for beautifying this whole area. I hope we can begin with a study of the suitability of moving the plant. I am certain that if we can go that far, then in the not too distant future another government, if not this one, will take the final step and move the plant out of the environs of Hull and the immediate area of the capital of this nation. I hope it will be done sooner, not later, for the benefit of all our people.

Mr. Herridge: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Cantelon: I am sure the hon. member realizes that my time is used up.

Mr. Herridge: I think Mr. Speaker will be lenient. The hon. member has talked a great deal of common sense. With reference to the pollution of the Saskatchewan river, does he know that his leader, when in opposition, introduced a bill in the house to correct that situation, and did so repeatedly for a number of years? When he became prime minister I immediately adopted the bill and moved it for nine years thereafter. But no action was taken.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps you should not have adopted it.

• (8:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, I should like to offer to His Excellency the Governor General my respects and those of my electors who repeatedly asked me to do so at the first opportunity.

Like everyone else, I listened carefully to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson). He did not surprise me, since I have known him for several years through his association with radio, in which I am personally interested. He did not disappoint me either, because I noted that his thinking was full of good common sense, thorough experience, and a certain independence of mind that I find comforting when I see him in the ranks of a party which should be strictly disciplined and organized.

The seconder (Mr. Côté), who is from the constituency next to mine and was even at one time an organizer of mine, did not surprise me either, for I realize the tremendous amount of knowledge he has about agricultural problems. He even scandalized some members, Mr. Speaker, because he was accused of making somewhat partisan remarks. I say to those who blamed him for that: Let the one who never sinned throw the first stone. Surely it is not from the Conservative side that stones can be thrown. Besides, he spoke with some reservation, which is to his credit, and it is an edifying experience for me to see a young farmer leave the green pastures of his farm and the peaceful company of his cattle to come and find himself, all of a sudden, in this chamber discharging so brilliantly the responsibility his superiors entrusted to him when he was asked to second the motion on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. So, I congratulate him.

I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, of making two digressions. The first one is to congratulate the leaders of the two great parties on the tone of their speeches. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that it was the spirit of the centennial. Well, it is to his credit if he felt that in the spirit of the centennial he had to show a little less pugnacity, and I think that the Prime Minister followed suit in very edifiying manner.

The second one is to thank the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) for granting us, after months and months of representations which threatened to become brutal, and one night I practically lost my temper, for granting us, as I say, the simultaneous publication of the French version of the Labour Gazette which, for two months, has been published almost at the same time as the English version. And I thank him not only in my name but in the name of all labour movements which, for months and years, have been asking me to make certain interventions. I realized the problems in this direction, but he found a solution over which we are rejoicing without claiming a victory. This is simply another proof of co-operation which, I think, is to the credit of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson).

Mr. Speaker, my remarks, which I will keep as brief as possible, may seem to some of my colleagues as if I were blowing my own horn, because I will be dealing with something of concern to me. I hope it will be understood that if I do so, it is because it might be helpful in opening new vistas to those among us whose vision is necessarily limited by party discipline at a time when our viewpoints should be aired and when things change so rapidly.

A few days ago, I read in a magazine called the Canada Month a statement by a young Liberal member, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) who wrote something like this, and I quote him textually in English to avoid any misrepresentation:

[English]

I don't like labels; I don't want to be branded under a label. I would rather have people take my political beliefs and examine them on their own merit, rather than say "He's right" or "left" or "a Liberal" and then examine them under that light.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I find it edifying to see that a young Liberal, newly elected to the House of Commons, can express such "in" opinions, as one would say today, at a time when he will probably need all the condescension and support of his own party. This, in a way, reflects my own feelings. I want to speak of this tonight, Mr. Speaker, because in the sixteen months I have been sitting in this house, I have been reading in all sorts of newspapers in my province that the independent member for Trois-Rivières is about to join the Liberal party, that he always votes with the Liberals and that he has probably committed himself to the Liberals.

For some years now, newspapers have stopped publishing serial stories that were popular at one time. But certain journalists sometimes write their own serial stories and forget to consult the persons concerned, thus imputing to them motives of all sorts.

Therefore, I would like to throw some light on those matters, if only to explain certain interventions. It is generally believed in our country that someone who is unaffiliated to the party in power must necessarily be in the opposition and put grit in the bearings. If I was elected in my riding, it is because I declared myself an independent. And I want to say it loud and clear this evening, because several of my colleagues do not seem to understand that.

Among other things, I remember some sharp remarks made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition in my direction a few weeks ago, when he said: The independent member for Trois-Rivières is as independent as he wishes to claim, but that is all. Well, it is because I was elected at home, by Conservatives and Liberals to whom I said: I am going to Ottawa with my own experience, not to fight against the government in power, but to co-operate with it as much as possible; whether it is Conservative or Liberal, I will endeavour to co-operate, so that we may not be compelled for finicky and childish reasons to hold an election every six months or every year.

Therefore, I am fulfilling the promise which I made to my constituents. It happens that I am co-operating with the Liberal party. I frankly admit that it seems to me infinitely easier, for me at least, than if I had to co-operate with the Conservative party which is now experiencing a disintegration period. I am not glad about it, because it had a good record and I hope it will recover. However, I tell you quite simply that it is easier for me to fulfil that promise made to my constituents during the last election.

I then promised to co-operate with the party in power for the good of the country, because non-confidence motions as well as elections in my opinion, are three quarters of the time, if not nine times out of ten, a waste of time.

I am among those who would recommend that the length of a parliament be fixed at four or five years and that votes of confidence be limited to very rare occasions.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why I decided at one time to run as an independent. It is the present rather delicate period of adjustment between Quebec and the rest of Canada. I am a Canadian and proud of it. I am also a federalist, sometimes I say I am an eleventh hour federalist, but one nevertheless. I should like to be completely free to study the conflicts which may arise between the government of my province and that of my country, so that I may take a position which does not depend on my political affiliation.

Mr. Speaker, I will go even further and say why I decided one day to stand as an independent, when I had fought before under the Liberal banner. Those who, in this house, have been active in politics for some years, will remember that I travelled through all the cities of the province and that I have been active in the Liberal party with all the vigour and the means available to me. I had voluntarily offered my services at the time without being solicited or promised anything, and it is of my own free will and by principle that I decided one day that I would be once again what I had always been: an independent.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

I never swore that I would always remain independent, but I promised my constituents and myself that if ever I changed my allegiance, I would do so through convictions and principles, and you will understand better after a while, when I finish explaining what I mean.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I believe I was right in running as an Independent, because my electors seem to like it better; in fact, every time I ran as an official Liberal candidate, I was rejected, whereas when I ran as an Independent, I was elected with a substantial majority. This, I think, is a good argument, if it is true that vox populi is vox Dei.

I also have another more personal reason. In my province, we have a saying: "Once bitten twice shy". I am greatly disappointed by the old political parties, Mr. Speaker, and to be fair to the Liberal party, I should say that this disappointment occurred mostly with the provincial Liberal party which, at that time, was a siamese twin of the federal Liberal party.

Fortunately, a separation has been going on since that time, and I think it will be beneficial to the two parties, at least I hope so, but until it is completely achieved, I believe I am still under the influence of this disappointment arising out of my allegiance to the Liberal party. I would not wish the Conservatives to think that I would have been happier with them; I think this is a case of the lesser of two evils.

In the 16 months I have been sitting here, I have supported the government. I think I have supported them loyally every time I could do so; a few times, I voted against the government, but most of the time, I voted for them, and I still think it was my duty, because I do not believe it would have been beneficial to my province and my country if I had hindered or obstructed those who currently lead the government and who are trying, according to their conscience, to do their best in difficult circumstances.

Coming back to what I was saying, if I made the decision to become an Independent and to act as an intelligent Independent, it is because I was betrayed brutally by the Liberal party at a time when I was the official candidate of the Liberal party elected by regular conventions. I will not give the details to avoid taking too much of the time of this house, but I should simply mention the conventions which preceded the 1953 and, I think, the 1958 elections.

I realize that, at a time when it was claimed that the party was being democratized, certain powers behind the throne carried more weight than the duly elected representatives of the people. They seemed, thus, to poison the minds of the leaders of the party and mislead them into the defeats which we have suffered.

Mr. Speaker, I would still add that I have the distinct impression that the situation has improved in recent years. I have confidence, especially, in the leadership of the hon. Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) who strikes me as a realistic politician.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: I also decided to be an Independent because the former Liberal party —once again, this applies more to the provincial party—betrayed those whom it had asked to go and extol the Liberal gospel. It had promised them things which were not delivered once they were in power.

I apologize for merging the two parties, federal and provincial, into one, but at that time they were siamese twins. For instance, it was clamoured that the party would be democratized, and I find today that it was nothing but camouflage at the time.

This is evidenced by the fact that they talked about democratization in 1955, 1956; and, in 1967, they talk about beginning to democratize the Liberal party. Here I say that there remains progress to be accomplished in the federal Liberal party, because there are still too many candidates who are imposed directly or indirectly, and too many candidates who, after being democratically nominated, find themselves abandoned directly or indirectly. You will understand what I mean: they can abandon a candidate nominated at a convention by cutting out the funds, for instance, during the election campaign. And there are still too many Liberal associations which exist but on paper or which, if they do exist actually have no power whatsoever, nor anything to say. And that matter of election financing is still used too often to muzzle the people who would have something to say even in caucus.

Therefore, I feel that it is definitely one of the tasks, at least of the provincial leader of the Liberal party in my province, to try to complete that rejuvenation, that renewal within the Liberal party, if he wants to deserve the confidence of those who fought for it in the bad years when it was not always interesting or profitable to do so.

There is another reason which makes me hesitate to join the Liberal party. And I would like my Liberal friends who are listening to me to understand that whoever spares the rod spoils the child. I do not want their destruction but I want to use my status as an Independent to say openly things which are whispered.

The fact is that there seems to be a lack of confidence in the Liberal party, toward its own members. The federal Liberal members are left to be called weaklings, with $18,000 per year, and no one protests. The provincial minister of justice, in Quebec, may call federal justice authorities anything you can imagine. No one seems willing to defend those people.

Party leaders are recruited outside the structure of the party, as though it was believed that none of the members who were elected by the people in the province of Quebec were competent enough to assume responsibilities within the party. And backbenchers or young men, young in age or mentality, are condemned to a kind of idleness, of muteness which eventually bores them and prevents them from playing the part they could in society.

If the people in the Liberal party do not even trust their own members, those like me who tend to be independent will continue to hesitate before binding themselves to the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, I would have many more remarks to make on that subject, but I do not want to search the whole conscience of the Liberal party tonight. I want to leave some for the Conservatives and the third parties. However, I shall simply add this: beside that, it seems to me that the program of the Liberal party has been improvised. Those considerations in the field of federal administration seem to be a kind of trip to nowhere, where one goes and borrows from the third parties what seems to be good. And I should like some day a book to be published which would include a consistent, comprehensive and complete program about the objectives of the Liberal party, so that we might know those who are already registered in the party or those who, like others, consider taking an active part in the party, know exactly where they are going, so that they may not be forced to accept those things which seem a little too much like an improvisation.

There are certainly other questions which shock me like many others, or at least surprise me to avoid any exaggeration, because I do not want to resort to demagogy in what I say here—but for instance the stand taken by the Liberal party with regard to Viet Nam, is something that I do not quite understand. I realize that international diplomacy has its requirements which are not very clear to us, the laymen, but to me there seems to be an incomprehensible inconsistency in the fact that we allow the sale of arms to a belligerent country at the very time we are trying to act as peacemakers.

I think that our influence in Rhodesia would raise some doubts. I do not have the time to elaborate on those matters, but I simply want to complete my search into the conscience of the Liberal party by mentioning that it is not that story which I recall since 1952 and which turned the convinced and active Liberal I was into an Independent who is asking questions with regard to the philosophy and the executive of the Liberal party.

I would merely like to recall that during the last federal election, a Liberal minister came to my constituency to stand up for the two organizers of impersonation who, the morning after, pleaded guilty and were properly sentenced by the courts while I was appealing for honest elections.

If I mention this, it is not to upbraid my friends of the Liberal party but to tell them openly what many people think and to make them understand that if they are now winning in the province of Quebec, they are doing so by default, because the Conservative party is not ready for elections and the other parties lack the necessary framework, organisation and perhaps also a platform set out so as to be understood by the people.

Maybe the future is holding surprises in store for our Liberal friends if they are today without friends to remind them of the deficiencies of their party.

I now come to the Conservatives. Mr. Speaker, the Conservative candidates in my riding and the surrounding area made a terrible blunder, in my opinion. They were ashamed to show off their party leader.

However, experience teaches us that they should have produced him, because the former member for Nicolet-Yamaska did so in Sainte-Perpétue; besides, that is what is known as the miracle of Sainte-Perpétue. In the other ridings, the leader of the Conservative party was camouflaged; they were ashamed to show him off and they were defeated.

I think that is another weakness, and I mention that not in order to humiliate the Conservative party but to remind ourselves again that our two great parties have played a role in confederation for the past one hundred years. They have adopted progressive measures, and I think that they should be reorganized in the interest of the country. However, they will not serve Canada if they disintegrate through cases of flagrant misconduct such as I mentioned earlier.

In my opinion, the leader of the Conservative party is a politician who deserves respect, for he is brave, a man of energy and personal integrity and a keen worker. But his time is obviously past and he should retire today quietly without waiting for his supporters to stab him in the back, as some have already started doing.

In that connection, I merely wish to give them an example showing them that if they do not change their method, they will not survive in the province of Quebec. In the case concerning my riding, their candidate organized a convention, after a secret agreement with one of the organizers, in a matter of 24 hours. He tried to abuse the Conservatives' good faith, with the result that the Conservatives who usually got 15,000 or 16,000 votes, woke up with four thousand and a few hundred votes and a lost deposit.

Mr. Speaker, I urge our Conservative friends to lose no time in reorganizing themselves to continue being useful to the country. For that they will have to rely on what are commonly known as back-benchers, the younger members, not necessarily the youngest in age, but those who remained young in spirit, who understand the national problems as one should understand them in 1967 and consign to some areopagus a few of their old dodderers who have become some sort of fossils and prevent others from being useful within their party and in parliament.

I may appear cruel, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it is the only way to say such things. Otherwise, you will have third parties that will soon come to take the leading role and if they have not enough members to manage the affairs of the country, they will have enough anyway to control the government.

I must now say that I personally believe the party with the most complete, most comprehensive and most sincere program is probably the New Democratic Party. And do not think for a moment that I am necessarily becoming a member of that party. But I believe the truth must come out.

I have considered the various programs and I still do. Some say that the members of the New Democratic Party are socialists; it is possible. What does it mean, a socialist, in 1967? That is a question we should ask ourselves. My concern over our friends of the New Democratic Party is that they seem to suffer from excessive control by the big bosses of the labour movement. They do not seem to understand that there is a difference between the orders of the big labour unions and the needs of their members. Another concern I have is their relentless defence of spies, prisoners, unreliable people, unwarranted immigrants and I think they are wasting precious time which should be better spent, on normal preoccupations, that is to say the social welfare of the people.

I think that another of their weaknesses is that they should have a clear definition of their objectives in this socialization they promote, their purpose, the extent to which they will socialize and nationalize and also what they will nationalize. Further, I think they should mostly try to project in Quebec a clearer image than they are now projecting for it is quite unclear, and mostly prejudiced and misunderstood.

What about our friends the Créditistes? We are used to taking them lightly. As far as I am concerned, I believe they are sincere people who deserve to be heard and listened to. They are great workers. They may be excessively insistent on their aim of reorganizing the financial structure and they fail to explain adequately what they would do if they achieved a financial reorganization. They may also lack a complete program. This may be. Nevertheless, to my mind, and I am saying this most objectively, they are playing a useful role in this house and we should all go to the trouble of listening to them. I do it because I stay here as long as I possibly can, and I try to determine what is serious and what is not in what they bring up.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, it will be guessed that a newspaper made a remark when it claimed that I had decided to join the Liberal party again. I am still in the position of a citizen watching developments; I am still in the position of once bitten twice shy. My mind is open to the Liberals as well as to the other parties, but have been elected as an Independent and I intend to end my term as an Independent.

After having somewhat examined the old parties by auscultation—and this may seem pretentious to some of my colleagues who should understand that there are few in this house who can allow themselves to speak as freely, at least not my two Independant colleagues because they seem to be prejudiced, which I am not since I praised all parties, Mr. Speaker—I would say that what is urgently needed, because I believe it behoves the old parties to do so, is a speedy reorganization of their members in a democratic way, the delegation of more constructive business to those who are considered young, even though perhaps not in years, and who are called the back-benchers. The old parties perhaps could also refrain from childish play, such as those interminable debates on the flag, the unification, the Munsinger affair and the Spencer affair, and others.

They should also hurry up and publish a consistent program that does not change every six months or every year, a comprehensive program on the basis of which people can tell the difference between a Liberal and a Conservative, if there is one, and which would make it possible for those who want to vote, and those who want to militate, to know where the old parties are going. Otherwise, people will continue leering at third parties saying: We have nothing to lose, the situation is so bad that we will try something new.

Besides, my advice to both parties is free. I do not charge anything for the consultation, and this is something. In fact, they did not even contribute to my election fund—and that is already something.

I conclude by reminding the minister that I represent a riding which is located in the very heart of Quebec and which is one of the most French cities in North America. I conducted a survey recently on certain matters and the results will be known next week. The compilation will be made by a committee.

And I would remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) in particular that there are deplorable situations in my area which are yet to be solved, such as that night train between Montreal and Quebec that we asked for to promote Expo and which the Canadian Pacific will not give us. They are so extraordinarily unyielding on this that they do no longer reply to the letters sent to them because they find us too persistent.

I would also point out that the port of Trois-Rivières needs redevelopment in order to expand further, since the plans have been changed because of the bridge being built.

• (8:40 p.m.)

I should like also to remind the minister that I have another complaint, two rather, about that matter at Baie Jolie where the engineers of the Department of Public Works or the Department of Transport spoiled, near Trois-Rivières, a summer resort area in which millions of dollars had been invested because on a distance of approximately one mile across from the beach some kind of Sahara desert which is absolutely worthless and unfit for anything has been created. Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand that engineers with any intelligence, supervised by senior officials and deputy ministers, take the liberty of spoiling scenery to that extent, in short to destroy, eliminate and make useless everything that had been invested there in the last forty years at least. Once again I ask the minister to intervene so that this situation will be remedied as soon as possible because it is a scandal throughout the region.

Mr. Speaker, I shall close by apologizing to my friends if they found my remarks pretty blunt. I think they are true. I shall even add that I said openly what many Conservatives or Liberals are whispering and are afraid of saying openly in this house, namely that the leaders of the two old line parties would be well advised to heed that criticism if they do not want to see before long the old line parties completely discredited and to witness the rise of aggressive third parties which have somethng concrete to put before the people.

Mr. Prosper Boulanger (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, it is naturally a little difficult for me to speak in this house immediately after my colleague from Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain). He is well known for his eloquence and, although I do not agree with everything he said, it is nevertheless somewhat embarrassing for a newcomer like me to follow him.

In entering this debate, Mr. Speaker, I want as a member of the house to express our gratitude to His Excellency the Governor General for the way in which he has distinguished himself in the exercise of his duties since assuming his high office. May I express once again the great feeling of loss shared by all Canadians at the passing of our late Governor General, General Vanier. He was a truly great Canadian and his contribution to the unity of our country, which we are celebrating in this centennial year, cannot be too greatly praised.

[English]

I must congratulate my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) for his eloquent speech when moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Having visited his riding I know his electors are justly proud of their member of parliament. I note that he commented upon the fact that Newfoundland has been a part of Canada for only 18 years. However, in that short period of time it has sent many distinguished representatives to the house, and I think one of the highest tributes I can pay to my hon. friend is to tell him that his eloquence was such as to match that of our colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

[Translation]

To my colleague from Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) I add my congratulations to those he has already received. An expert in agriculture, I am sure that he will make a great contribution to the House of Commons especially at a time when agriculture is finally receiving the consideration it deserves from the government. In this connection I think of the many bills passed at the last session and of the results that will be forthcoming from the task force mentioned in the speech from the throne.

I congratulate also all my colleagues in this house who have taken part in this debate and who have done it in such a progessive way.

I join with my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska in congratulating our new Quebec leader, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand). As a Quebecker and a French Canadian I am proud to be associated with him. As a Liberal, I am proud to serve under him. As a Canadian, I am proud of his great contribution to my country.

I must also congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on his fine speech and I am looking forward to hearing another similar speech from him in the next throne speech debate or, rather, debates.

[English]

To the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) may I say that my delight in having heard another of his speeches is, however, tinged by sadness when I think of the centennial project of Mr. Camp.

[Translation]

A moment ago I mentioned the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I join with him when he says:

As a French Canadian, I am celebrating the centennial of confederation because there is something to celebrate.

I am going to talk for a few minutes on some of the achievements of the past and some of my hopes for the future.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo mentioned the poverty that faced his riding before Newfoundland joined confederation. This threat of poverty was widespread throughout the then colonies in 1867. We have since built a country whose standard of living is envied by nations around the world. Poverty has been almost entirely wiped out. This is something to celebrate.

Here I want to pause, because I just said that poverty has been almost entirely wiped out. Alas, it still exists in some parts of the country. As long as it does, as long as some of our fellow-citizens live in conditions of deprivation, we cannot take total pride in being Canadians. The fact that the country as a whole is growing richer, the fact that the number of poor is diminishing does not detract from the urgency of the problem. Indeed, it makes it even more urgent. The fact that we have not used our great wealth to abolish poverty in Canada is a disgrace. It is as simple as that.

This government has done much to fight poverty. I am thinking in particular of some of the programs of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Sauvé).

I must congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) for his proposal of a study on the possibility of a guaranteed income for every Canadian. But more remains to be done. We have the capacity. Everybody knows that. Let us use it. The elimination of poverty in Canada must be our first priority and perhaps it should also be our greatest Centennial project.

I turn now to the matter of the constitution. Of course, I am not an expert in such a field, but nevertheless my few years of experience with the constitution allow me to utter a few words about it. One must however admit that the constitution has, over 100 years, served us very well. We have progressed from a small colonial federation to a great independent nation, the senior member of the Commonwealth and a potential founder of "la francophonie". Despite many disagreements, we have become what we are by using our constitution. However, there is no doubt that constitutional revision is necessary. After all, it is only natural that a document written in 1867 might need some changes in 1967.

The question is how can these changes best be agreed upon. We are unanimous in this house, except for the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire)—and perhaps the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard), about whom I am not so sure—that we want changes that will strengthen Canada.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Before bringing about these changes, we must study carefully all the possibilities and then decide on which are best. Studies take time, it is true. I also feel that they are not dramatic, which is also true. But the fact remains that they produce concrete results.

Let us ask ourselves what would be gained by calling together some great conference. What would be its probable results?

I for one, Mr. Speaker, think that first of all, it would make headlines every day it met. Differences of opinion would be magnified to look like gulfs—this is what I fear—that could not be bridged. I doubt if such an initiative would strengthen national unity. You know that the Prime Minister has already likened such a conference to a National Estates General.

I do not need to tell you what the result was of the last Estates General that were called to draw up a constitution. And I ask every member in this house: Is there an hon. member who advocates revolution?

Mr. Speaker, if I may shift slightly from the constitution, I should like to speak for a moment on what I consider to be the greatest achievement of confederation: that is the harmonious relationships between the two founding races of this country. While the tensions of the last few years have been overemphasized—there have been tensions indeed—I say that the policies of the Prime Minister have been such as to ensure the future harmony between the two founding races. Our achievement makes me proud to be a Canadian.

But it also augurs well for the future on a much wider scale.

My colleague from Burin-Burgeo has spoken of the tremendous impact of what can be called the communications revolution. One of its results, as we all know, has been the growing interdependence of nations. National boundaries mean less than they used to and world federation has become a distinct possibility and not merely a pipe-dream. The successful relationship between the various groups in Canada may very well be used as a model for a future world community.

This is a year, Mr. Speaker, when there is much to look back on and also much to look forward to. I think immediately of the tremendous success of Expo '67 which is due to the close co-operation of the last two federal governments, the last two Quebec governments and, at the same time, to the tremendous municipal government headed by mayor Drapeau and Mr. Saulnier, that is the government of the city of Montreal.

It shows what Canadians can accomplish by mutual co-operation. But more important, Expo seems to be a model of the future. Its distinctive architecture, the technological exhibits, the beauty of its open spaces, of Habitat '67 show what tomorrow will be like. It shows a world where materially speaking life will be rich, and the standard of living very high indeed. After all did not Laurier say that the twentieth century belonged to Canada?

Because I am talking about the future, I think of the throne speech. Normally, a throne speech is criticized for being behind the times, for dealing with yesterday's problems and not today's, for not even anticipating those of tomorrow.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the throne speech we are now debating is being criticized for looking too far ahead.

I believe that this deserves praise rather than condemnation. The present government is not only facing the problems of today, but it is planning for the future. It was about time a government took the lead instead of following in someone else's footsteps.

I congratulate the present government. There are measures which deal with broadcasting and agriculture. I will not go into them because they were so well covered by the mover and the seconder.

The speech of the throne provides for programs dealing with the pressing social problems of today. The problem of housing is critical today. The Prime Minister mentioned that measures in this regard will be taken in co-operation with the provinces. For too long, the right of property has been interpreted in a very narrow sense, that is the right to maintain the property one already has. This right must be broadened to mean the right of every family to have a decent home. Much has been done in this respect in the past few years but much more remains to be done. I am looking forward to the measures that the Prime Minister has assured us will be taken as a great step towards this goal.

I welcome the steps that the speech from the throne mentions with regard to the gathering of scientific and technological information. We must not allow the communications revolution to pass us by. I shall say no more on this subject, for it has already been outlined. However, I would like to deal with a matter which concerns me deeply, that is the appointment of a department of corporate and consumer affairs? The consumer needs protection today, especially because of the new techniques adopted by advertisers. The new department will deal with the protection of the public in a most important way.

I am interested also in the division of the department regarding corporate affairs. The Prime Minister has talked of the need to eliminate the secrecy that prevails in corporations and I agree with him 100 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I do not like to see minor governments operating on the fringe of governments. I worry about the policies of large corporations which seem to reward the privileged few at the expense of those who have talent. I hope that the new department of consumer and corporate affairs will work to remove the obstacles to the progress of Canadian society.

The throne speech also mentioned the need for planning urban development. I sat during a number of years on the city council of Montreal. We heard about town planning for many years in Montreal.

I have read lately that experts can see one city stretching from Quebec city to Niagara Falls. If this is inevitable, we do not want to see that giant city develop in a haphazard manner as happened in the past.

The Prime Minister has described the type of city he would like to see. This requires planning and I am happy to see that it will be started soon in co-operation with the provinces which have prior but not exclusive jurisdiction in these matters, and this must not be forgotten.

Personally, I can see the effects of urban development in my own riding and my hope is that the development will be orderly. What is more important and it cannot be stressed too highly, is that priority must be given to enhancing the living standards. I repeat, Mr.

Speaker, priority must be given to the living standards.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the possibility of enshrining a Bill of Rights in our constitution. Mr. Speaker, I am far from being an expert in constitutional matters, but I can still talk about them and say that everyone in this house is I am sure in agreement with the proposal of the Prime Minister. However, I should like to say what type bill of rights I want to see embodied in the constitution. That Bill of Rights would protect more than just the fundamental rights of freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of religion and other such rights. The rights I should like to see protected also may not be able to be enforced immediately, but must be enforced as soon as possible. These rights belong to what my hon. friend the Registrar General of Canada (Mr. Turner) has called an economic bill of rights. That is the expression he used, his very words.

Every Canadian must be ensured the right to work, the right to leisure, the right to re-training if his job is made obsolete by automation, the right to a decent home, the right to a decent standard of living. It is a question of thinking about it, of facing reality.

These are rights which are as essential in our society as the basic human rights that I mentioned. As a matter of fact, the basic rights mean little without the new economic rights.

The right to starve, the right to live in conditions of deprivation, are not rights that Canadians should enjoy. That is why the government must protect economic rights as well as human rights.

I look forward to the day when such a Bill of Rights is part of our fundamental law and may I say that the social measures that this government has been responsible for have considerably advanced that day.

I talked earlier about the high standard of living Canadians as a whole have achieved. Looking back on that, I can only say that there is no reason why Canada cannot become the first country in the world where the rights that I have outlined are part of our everyday life.

• (9:00 p.m.)

[English]

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) has said there is nothing for youth in this speech from the throne. I do not like to disagree with my right hon. friend, and I hope he will pardon me for doing so in this case.

[Translation]

Everyone agrees that the youth of Canada is our greatest national resource. For these young people, the leaders and the workers of Canada tomorrow, what better move could be made than to solve problems that they would otherwise face tomorrow?

For example, automation continues to make some jobs obsolete. The throne speech previews measures that will be taken to improve existing re-training facilities and to help workers who have to move to different areas for new jobs.

This problem is a problem not only of today but also of tomorrow. Measures that are taken to solve it are measures that help the youth of our country.

The throne speech mentioned that there will be an increase in foreign aid this year. This is a welcome announcement and I hope that, this time, increased use will be made of the Company of Young Canadians as part of an expanded foreign aid program. This will give our youth an opportunity to serve, so to speak.

What else is in the throne speech for youth, Mr. Speaker? I mentioned a moment ago the emphasis laid on urban development planning. The youth of today will be living in the cities of tomorrow and if they can become what the Prime Minister has suggested, then surely youth today will have benefited from the measures outlined in the throne speech.

The criticism has been made that the university scholarship program to which the Liberal party is committed has been left out of the throne speech. Perhaps it has, but as the Prime Minister has said, all government legislation is not included in the throne speech.

The Liberal party remains firmly committed to the scholarship program and I hope to see it implemented at this session of parliament I have mentioned many programs for the future, all of which must be planned in some degree if not in entirety by government.

Everyone knows that government becomes more and more complex. The work of parliament becomes heavier and we also know it. This means that we must adapt our institutions to changing conditions or see the institutions destroyed. We must expedite the work of parliament without taking away the rights of the opposition. I fully agree and I am sure that we all think the same way.

There is no question of taking the rights of the opposition away. I hope that the all party rules committee which has been created will come up with proposals which will bring the rules of the House of Commons into line with the needs of the House of Commons.

Before concluding my observations, Mr. Speaker, I should like to echo the remarks of my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska about the pride he felt at the opening of Expo when the Canadian flag was raised.

I shared his pride at the time, Mr. Speaker, not only at being a Canadian but also at being fortunate enough to have the opportunity to serve under the right hon. Prime Minister.

I thought about how fortunate Canada has been in the leaders she has had in the past, regardless of their political affiliations. Hon. members, especially the Conservatives, will probably agree with me that no man other than Sir John A. Macdonald could have created confederation in the way he did.

It must also be recognized that only Mackenzie King could have led Canada in time of war without allowing a conscription crisis to tear us asunder. It should also be said—

[English]

The present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is the one man who was capable of keeping this country together in the last few years, the one man capable of creating the social revolutions that we have been going through since April 1963, the one man capable of leading us into the first phase of our second century as a nation.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I ask all members of the house to join together to make this centennial session of parliament the most productive in Canadian history, the one that will have done more to raise the level of Canadian life than any other, the one that will have done more for more citizens than any other, in short, the one that will celebrate the centennial of confederation by making every citizen of this country capable of holding his head high and saying: I am proud to be a Canadian; je suis fier d'être Canadien.

[Mr. Boulanger.]

[English]

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter this historical debate, having spent some months in preparation for such an occasion. However, the length of time occupied by my discourse this evening will not be long.

At the outset I would join with others in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté). The topics they chose were important ones, and their eloquence measured up to the responsibilities that they accepted.

I should like to discuss some features of the speech from the throne. It does not say much about the financial and monetary policies of the government, and we of the Social Credit party wish that it did say a little more. At the moment, Canada is in a somewhat brightened situation as far as credit and money supply are concerned, but I would warn the house that already the storm signals are out. This morning's Montreal Gazette carried a column headed: "Is the economy moving once more toward monetary restraint?" It seems, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot go very long without a tightening up of the money supply, and we have only to remember the severe tightening that took place during the winter months. The Bank Act was passed and the money supply seemed to ease somewhat. I trust this article means there is not an election in the immediate offing, though I submit that it does mean that there will be one some time in 1968 and that a tightening of the money supply toward the fall and winter of this year will allow for subsequent expansion to coincide with political demands. I am afraid that it will be a long, long time before our monetary policy functions separate and apart from the political demands of the moment.

I was happy to see in the speech from the throne that the government will move to broaden the scope of the area development incentive program. I trust that when these words were written into the speech from the throne one of the broadenings that the government had in mind was to allow for an extension of this program to allow for development in the tourist industry. Coming from the province of British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, where the tourist industry is the second most valuable industry at the present time, I believe the time is long past when it should receive more consideration than it has been receiving from so many federal statutes. I cite, for example, the Veterans Land Act and the area incentive program, which operate as if the tourist industry had never been heard of or, if it existed at all, was not worthy of either assistance or commendation. We in British Columbia know that this is now a long standing industry, a permanent one, and that it will shortly be the most important industry we have. It is time that this industry was recognized, and I hope that the section of the speech from the throne dealing with this subject is an indication that it will now be recognized.

I am also happy to see that a special study of the needs of urban development is going to be made. I hope that the study will be a rapid one and will be quickly translated into action. Certainly our present legislation dealing with urban redevelopment sorely needs rewriting. As the situation stands now, it is necessary for a section of a city to degenerate into an absolute slum before the machinery which provides federal assistance can swing into action.

At the present time it is probably more in the financial interest of a city to let an area that is degenerating go all the way to ruin than to move on their own, part way along the line, and attempt to rebuild. I trust that when legislation to deal with this subject is brought in it will enable the federal government to step in to prevent the degeneration of urban areas, and allow the hearts and cores of our cities and towns across the country to be reconstructed and rebuilt, as a better alternative to construction of new buildings on the outskirts, as happens at present. I know that the city of Vernon is interested in this proposed study. It hopes that the subsequent legislation will permit its most imaginative program to go ahead. The city of Revelstoke has also done work in urban redevelopment. Any change for the better in this area would be beneficial not only for my constituency, but also for the nation.

I was happy to see that the Farm Credit Act is to be revised to enable young farmers to benefit. Perhaps the government might also consider revisions to legislation dealing with death duties. It is useless to give a young farmer a good start if he is to be interrupted in his work by the death of his father. The Carter Commission recognized this problem and recommended that we go part way toward a system that will ameliorate the lot of those businesses and farm operations that are affected by death duties.

The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) wrote a book about the takeover of Canadian industries by United States capital. When he makes his further studies into the matter I suggest that he look carefully into the part played by federal taxation, which has forced this development on many industries in Canada.

I am not enthusiastic about the proposed legislation that would set up a consumer affairs department. The government has not recovered from its last massive reorganization; the Department of Industry and the Department of Manpower and Immigration are still disorganized by the changes that were made a year ago. Though a young and able minister might head the new department we are not ready for it. The government knows what is happening in its departments. Most are short of staff, and one department cannibalizes personnel from another. Creating a new department will not help the situation. It, too, may encroach on other departments such as agriculture and finance.

During the past week we have seen some lack of cabinet solidarity, but we can look forward to much more if the consumer affairs department is created. It may come into conflict with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. Co-operation between various departments may be difficult. I am convinced that it would be better to amend our taxation policies to allow people to retain more purchasing power, rather than pretending to defend them by creating special departments which will add to the tax bill and ultimately reduce available income.

I was pleased that the throne speech announced a balanced national broadcasting service. We have looked forward to that for a long time, and I trust that the government will keep its word and will bring in the long awaited legislation. I blanched, however, when I noticed that the service would be for Canadians of all ages, interests and tastes. I do not object to catering to all ages—and quite possibly broadcasting should cover a broad spectrum of interest—but I submit that in the realm of taste there are certain areas where the government ought not to be involved. It has no business providing a service for certain sections of the population—we have already gone too far in that regard. More important than any legislation will be to secure men and women of balanced judgment and courage who would have the fortitude to withstand the demands that some people would inflict on the Canadian public, who would resist programs that are unworthy of the broadcasting system or of the nation, and who would have the courage to provide balanced news reporting of Canadian and foreign news.

To bring up a small point, last evening when the national televised news at eleven o'clock mentioned the nomination day for the five by-elections to be held there was not a single reference to the Social Credit party or to the Ralliement Créditiste. That sort of thing makes those of us in this corner of the house lose confidence in the balanced judgment of the C.B.C.

I am worried though by the Prime Minister's announcement that this house and its committees are to be televised. I know that the justification for this is that, somehow, it will be more democratic, that somehow it will be more democratic for the public to see what goes on in this chamber. I warn the members of the house and the public of Canada that they will be seen and will see through the eyes of individuals, those who handle the cameras and audit the programs—who will not be members of this house. We shall turn over to others a vast source of political power over which we shall exercise no effective control—except by ending the broadcasts.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Johnston: May I remind the house of the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) who spoke of the power of television. We underestimate that power, and when we bring it to this institution we do not know what the effects will be. During the session we hope to legislate with respect to educational television. We move television into the classroom without knowing what we have done to that classroom or to the educational process. We know we have changed the process and changed it vastly.

We shall change this body by televising it, but we shall not necessarily make it a bit more democratic. I suspect that it will be somewhat less democratic, because the purposes of this chamber are debate and legislation, and not entertainment: And entertainment is the prime purpose of television. The throne speech with its inherent weaknesses was televised; its English has been criticized from end to end of the country; yet the one thing we do know is that the process of televising did not improve it.

Democracy is a tender plant and is disappearing from many countries of the world. It exists, in the main, in countries that are constitutional monarchies. That is why in Canada's one hundredth year I am glad that we are still a constitutional monarchy—that we have a Queen of Canada. I trust this situation will continue through the next hundred years and longer because although this may seem contradictory, it is one of the guarantees of the democratic process. When we have moved in all the features of modern technology and stripped away all the mystery and all the ritual from our parliamentary system we shall not have made it more democratic; we shall simply have made it duller in the eyes of the public and the public may decide to do without it.

If we waste time in this institution we do not waste it on the day the speech from the throne is delivered or on the days when we go for royal assent. We waste it in this chamber because we cannot amend our rules and procedures so that we may have the ritual, the dignity, the pageantry, the democracy and the legislation at the same time.

Democracy is, as I have said, a tender growth. We cannot be over-confident about its continued existence. We must be prepared to fight for it. It can suffer, as plants do, from too much kindness; it can suffer from overexposure. I suggest that all hon. members as we begin this second century should think carefully about the purpose of this representative institution of parliament, which until now has been our best guarantee of the continuance of the democratic process in a nation. Although we may feel sometimes that by going more directly to the people and by involving them somehow in the day to day activities of this house through television we are making this institution more democratic, I suspect that the opposite would be true. Only if we could televise every speaker in every section of the house every minute of our sittings might we make it more democratic. But we could not afford the bill, and I submit that the general public would not have the time to watch the proceedings.

I have found in my constituents and in others a measure of trust in the democratic process and in the people they send here to represent them. I think we should be happy to see ourselves in the capacities of debaters and legislators. We can be entertainers during the campaigns or when we go home to our constituencies. Our job here is quite different.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I wish to join others who have spoken in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They made very imaginative speeches —perhaps I should emphasize the word "imaginative" because it takes a lively imagination to see a comprehensive legislative program in the speech prepared by the government.

There were a lot of words in it, containing high-sounding sentiments such as the following:

> With our forefathers the fight was against the immense odds of nature on our half of this continent. Today the main struggle is against social injustice, against cultural mediocrity, against spiritual stagnation and against all forms of intolerance.

These are high-sounding words, but, as I say, there is little indication of legislation to put them into effect. There are many contradictions in the speech but I wish at this time to draw the attention of the house to two examples only. In the speech the government said it would take special measures in particularly designated areas where human resources are not adequately utilized. In this connection, so the speech says, parliament will be invited to broaden the scope of the area development incentive program.

This would appear to indicate that the government intends to see that all areas of Canada are assisted in reaching their full potential. However, further on in the speech we read that parliament will be asked to pass legislation to assist Canadians to move from their homes in certain areas in order to obtain employment in other areas. I fully support the area development incentive program, which can be of great help to the prairies. But I do not wish to see the government concentrating on moving people from certain areas to find work in other areas. I believe it would be much better to help establish industries and manufacturing plants in areas where there is under-employment.

In this regard I wish to refer to the latest press release issued by the Department of Transport—I take this as an example since I believe most of the departments work on similar lines. It refers to contracts issued during the month of April; it contains four pages listing contracts which have been awarded—$22,000, $26,000, $18,000, $76,000 and so on. Contracts are awarded to firms in British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Nothing at all to Saskatchewan. I have noticed this time after time in departmental releases; there are no contracts awarded to Saskatchewan.

This situation is causing considerable concern in my area. I have a letter here from the industrial commissioner at Moose Jaw and he says:

> I am writing at the request of the Moose Jaw Industrial Commission to ask you to help us in our efforts to divert to Moose Jaw some of the contracts that are going to Eastern Canada.

He enclosed a copy of a letter he had sent to the secretary of the Department of Defence Production and I think I am at liberty to mention briefly some of his observations in the course of that letter. He wrote:

> I have been instructed by the Moose Jaw Industrial Commission to write to you to explore the possibilities of increasing the volume of business that is being done or could be done by Moose Jaw suppliers and/or factories...
> Our Industrial Commission can appreciate the importance of your placing orders for goods and services with firms with which you have had long association and most of which probably are located in Eastern Canada. However, a careful review of your records might reveal certain areas of work that could be, but are not now, performed in Moose Jaw.

The city of Moose Jaw is mentioned but there are other cities in the prairie region which are in a similar position. The letter goes on:

> Our city is centrally located to serve the needs of your Western Canadian Bases and, in particular, we are thinking of the Canadian Forces Base that is located here.

Then the writer indicates just what goods and services could be supplied by Moose Jaw should the department wish to place orders there. It may not be the fault of the department that contracts are not awarded to Saskatchewan. It may be that bids are not received from prairie factories. I think more emphasis should be put on the fact that factories in the prairies could supply many of these goods and services. It says:

• (9:30 p.m.)

> Internal combustion engines of all makes and sizes are being rebuilt in Moose Jaw for the commercial trade. This is one area that probably should be examined closely by your department and we would welcome your comments.

I might add that there is a very modern garment factory in Moose Jaw and I would draw this to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. When it comes to making the new uniforms, the jolly green jumpers, for the unified services, the government will be spending millions of dollars providing these uniforms and I think it should take a look at the garments that can be produced by the Moose Jaw factory.

In the speech from the throne the government proposes changes in the rules of parliament, changes that will limit debate, in other words imposing closure. It is no less than that. The plan of the government is further indicated by the replacing of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith) as house leader by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen). The latter will also be chairman of the house rules committee. His desire to curtail opposition speeches has been very evident during the past few sessions.

There is a contradiction in the speech from the throne in regard to house procedure. It is stated that the rules and methods of parliamentary government must be revised, but it is also stated that parliament must be provided with every facility to ensure that efficiency and thoroughness of deliberations which, in the consideration of every item of public business, is alone the sure protection of the liberty and well-being of our people.

Members on the government side apparently must have short memories, or perhaps I should say convenient memories. Some of them were not in opposition when the Diefenbaker government was in office and I suggest they should read Hansard of 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961 and 1962. There are some members on the government side who will remember their opposition tactics. They will remember how they criticized and debated government policies. They will recall the day after day wrangling over estimates of the various government departments, particularly the Department of Agriculture. Perhaps I should put on record some of their remarks as they defended their rights as opposition critics. Their statements appear in earlier issues of Hansards.

The Secretary of State (Miss LaMarsh) when in opposition stated on October 4, 1962, as recorded in Hansard at page 227 for that date:

> All members of the opposition were elected for one purpose and that was in opposition to the government.
> [Mr. Pascoe.]

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), when in opposition, as recorded at page 398 of Hansard for October 11, 1962, said:

> Since it is the duty of members of the loyal opposition to oppose I cannot see how one can have effective opposition without constructive criticism . . . before we realize it, Mr. Speaker, political criticism may unfortunately be regarded as an un-Canadian activity instead of democracy's greatest safeguard . . . I believe that no reform can be achieved and no survival is possible without the freedom of honest and vigorous criticism.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he was in opposition had this to say, as recorded at page 349 of Hansard for February 4, 1963:

> So, Mr. Speaker, surely it is the duty of all members of the opposition in this house to give the people a chance to return what they would consider to be a better government. We can only do that by getting rid of this one and that can only be done by taking a united stand.

I might point out that in that united stand the Liberal members voted with Social Credit for debt free money.

Here is a small quotation from the March, 1967, issue of Canada Month. I think it is written with tongue in cheek but it indicates the attitude of the government:

> On January 18, for the first time since the fall of 1964, the ruling Pearson junta was defeated in a House of Commons vote. It was on an amendment to the transportation bill. The transport minister, J. W. Pickersgill, crystalized the good old Liberal attitude about governing with the classic comment that the defeat "humiliated" him. What makes these opposition fellows think this is a democracy, hmm? Where do they think they get off, voting against a government bill?

Parliament, admittedly, may not be perfect but it is far superior to any form of totalitarian rule or dictatorship. Parliament is not an assembly line process for the mass production of government measures. No democracy such as ours can ever streamline its political machinery to the point of curtailing free parliamentary debate—reasonable debate carried on for one definite purpose. In the nine years that I have been an M.P. I consider that house debates have been directed to the one purpose of improving legislation, or suggesting better legislation.

Opposition members not only help to amend legislation, they also inform Canadians of what is involved and how each measure affects national, provincial and individual interests. Sound legislation will come out of parliament only if there is constructive criticism and the presentation of alternative viewpoints. Despite government charges of delaying the business of parliament, and despite unfriendly press reports I am sure Canadians understand that the role of an opposition member is to criticize government measures and try to improve them. This is democratic government.

The throne speech refers to the appointment of a special task force to propose long-term national agricultural policies. According to a press report the aim is to lift Canada's farm industry to a level comparable to that enjoyed by other segments of the economy. This is an admission that farm income under present government policies is too low.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Brand) has submitted an amendment seeking price improvements for the dairy industry. I agree with his arguments in this regard, but I want to make a few references to wheat farming, particularly on the prairies. A brief reference to a recent address by Dr. J. C. Gilson, head of the department of agricultural economics of the University of Manitoba, will put the situation in clear focus:

> A truly national farm policy does not exist in Canada at the present time. Nor do we have a clearly definitive idea of what the philosophy and objectives of such a national policy ought to be. What we appear to have is a confusing collection of policies, many of which were created in times of emergency and which have been patched and perpetuated long after the original crises have disappeared.

The suggestions to the government contained in the report of the standing committee on agriculture should, I think, be used by this proposed task force when it meets, and I will deal with them just briefly. They suggest convening a national conference on farm policy under the auspices of the federal government. Perhaps this could start off the work of the proposed farm task force. They also mention the need for the production of a billion bushels of wheat per year in Canada by 1980, in order to meet world demand.

I suggest the government should not be too complacent about this. The latest D.B.S. review shows that exports from the United States and Australia were higher this year than last and that exports from Canada and the Argentine were lower. This report relates to the August to February period of the current crop year. The graph shows that exports of wheat and wheat flour from Canada were down.

The committee recommends a continuation of the Canadian food aid program, and I think we will all agree that there is a need for an expansion in this regard. The committee also recommended very definitely that the price of wheat be increased by 50 cents a bushel. The full implications of the recent increase in the price of wheat have not yet become apparent, but the 21 cent per bushel announced is far below the recommended 50 cent increase. The committee also recommended an increase in the initial price for wheat at the delivery point. Surely this is a logical move in view of the recently announced increased price.

It has been said that every effort should be made to ensure that tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway be either eliminated or kept to a minimum and that capital costs should be accepted as far as possible as a direct responsibility of the people of Canada under a national policy. I need not point out that not long ago the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) announced lockage fees for the Welland canal commencing April 1. This charge has been imposed, and I should like to read a few headings from the latest edition of the Ship-Shore news of April this year. These headings are: "Lockage charges will harm Quebec says Trois-Rivières"; "Fees hinder export, domestic trade says Maple Leaf Mills", and "Flood of protests greets announcement of lock fees".

A telegram from Charles W. Gibbings, president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, was sent to the Minister of Transport, and I should like to read part of it. It states:

> Prairie farmers greatly disturbed at federal government decision to reimpose a toll structure called a lockage fee on the Welland canal which Canada has long considered a domestic waterway and which now will become the only domestic waterway in North America to carry user tolls.

I think that pretty well explains the stand taken by the shippers and the prairie wheat pools regarding these lockage fees.

The committee also said that country elevators must not be considered as places for storage but should have storage facilities connected with them. In this connection let me point out the strategic location of the federal government elevator at Moose Jaw which has a capacity of 5,500,000 bushels. It is located on the main line of the C.P.R. and can also be served by the C.N.R. This elevator has a very important potential use in line with the committee's proposals. A number of members of the agriculture committee toured the southern part of our prairie provinces and visited this elevator. They were quite impressed with its facilities and I should like to urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) to give close consideration to the potential use of this elevator.

I might say that the elevator at Moose Jaw is nearly full of wheat. It is being used to a capacity of 5,250,000 bushels, with the rest of the space being utilized for wheat cleaning. It is in extremely good condition and can be put to good use, particularly in view of the reference to storage for emergencies. This elevator would be adaptable for that purpose. I intended to make a few other comments in this regard but I shall defer them until I have another opportunity to speak on the supply motion. In conclusion let we refer to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on May 10 regarding the extraordinary length of the speech from the throne and the looseness of its composition, which made it not a useful and reliable forecast of legislation but a kind of inventory of the desires and dreams of the government.

Dreams are not to be discouraged but there can be danger in too much dreaming. Government programs must give encouragement to initiative and hard work and there must be room for private enterprise. Care must be taken that Canada does not become a welfare state in which there is a concept that society owes every citizen a living, regardless of his willingness or ability to work. In this regard I draw attention to the front page of the May issue of Canada Month. The featured heading is "Allan J. MacEachen, minister of the workless future". Canadians do not want a workless future, they want an opportunity to earn their own living, and we in the opposition intend to see that these aspirations are fulfilled.

The throne speech has been aptly described as a "scatter gun" approach to pressing problems facing the government. It contains a long list of generalities, with little indication of a positive legislative program. We on this side intend to press for quick action on the agricultural cost-price squeeze and the housing crisis, as well as ever increasing consumer prices.

The government could delay tackling these pressing problems by stirring up early debate on emotional issues such as capital punishment, divorce laws and the national anthem. Vague references in the throne speech to regional, national and international issues make it possible for the government to have this session drag on as long as the last one. If this session is another year-long one, the blame will lie with the government in its priority list. Only the government can decide the order of legislation, and it is up to the government to have parliament tackle problems in the order of greatest need. We want this to be fully understood by the public. If there is a delay the fault must rest with the government.

[Mr. Pascoe.]

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commence my remarks on the occasion of this debate with words of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The subject on which I should like to touch might perhaps be headed under the title of the public interest and the individual and I will commence with the recognition that big government is with us to stay.

There is no point in the kind of wishful thinking so often indulged in by members of the financial community, that suddenly in some way the vast apparatus of government will be dismantled. The fact is it will not be, because I believe the majority of people are in support of the benefits and improvements which have been brought about by government intervention. However, because government has become so big and because its operations have extended into so many aspects of our lives, I am concerned with whether it is being fairly administered in the individual case. My concern therefore is as to the quality of administration. Is it humane; does it do equity, and can it adjust itself to the rich variety of individual personality which is represented in our society?

My feeling is that the answer to those three questions is a qualified negative, and I should like to cite a number of examples which indicate to me that our apparatus of government is concerned too much with being efficient and not enough with being humane. I prefer to do so under three headings: First, suggested changes in the criminal law, second, suggested changes in the civil legal system under federal jurisdiction and, third, by suggesting an administrative review procedure.

Having regard to the Criminal Code, my first comment is how old fashioned it is. Basically it dates from 1892, and it in turn was based on the Stephen draft of 1880, which in turn largely codified the accumulated practices of centuries.

• (9:50 p.m.)

We have had revisions, it is true, but they have been largely housekeeping changes in the nature of tidying up the effect of court decisions and occasionally recognizing technological innovations such as the airplane or that famous card game 3-card monte. I should like to pick out two things to illustrate my point of view. The first is the régime for bail in lieu of custody pending trial and, second, the right to counsel before trial.

With regard to bail, in the Criminal Code it is not mandatory that in every case a person suspected of an offence be arrested and held in custody pending trial. Under the Criminal Code the local authorities are given a discretion to issue a summons to require the accused to appear in answer to the accusation rather than to issue a warrant for his arrest and detention. In a very large number of cases, however, the local authorities insist on using the arrest rather than the summonsing procedure, and therefore a problem arises.

Once an accused is arrested he then must use the bail procedure to regain his liberty pending trial. While the bail procedure is intended to relieve against detention pending trial, in my opinion it is more oppressive than it is relieving. What this means in practice, at least in the metropolitan area from which I come, is that a man, who in law otherwise is presumed innocent until proven guilty, must be able to arrange two things on short notice. First, he must find someone to provide cash or proof of property and, second, he must be able to arrange the attendance of a provincial official, that is a justice of the peace. Failing that—and I can assure you that it fails quite easily late at night or on a holiday—the law treats the accused in the same way he would be treated had he already been convicted of a major offence. He is locked up under maximum security conditions.

I should like to make clear to members of the house that they do not need to rely on my opinion of the way the bail system works. It has been thoroughly documented in the very able study by Professor Martin Friedland of the University of Toronto law school in a book entitled "Detention Before Trial". Before referring to some of his detailed findings I should like to refer to the following at page 172:

> The period before trial is too important to be left to guesswork and caprice. At stake in the process is the value of individual liberty. Custody during the period before trial not only affects the mental, social and physical life of the accused and his family, but also may have a substantial impact on the result of the trial itself. The law should abhor any unnecessary deprivation of liberty and positive steps should be taken to ensure that detention before trial is kept to a minimum.

By way of illustration of the effect of the administration of the Criminal Code in Toronto I should like to read the following summary of the facts in Professor Friedland's study. I am quoting from page 174:

> Of those arrested by the police, which is over 90 per cent of those charged, approximately 85 per cent are kept in police custody until their first court appearance, many for substantial periods of time. Most persons arrested during the day are not brought into court that day, even though the court is sitting ... The study revealed, for example, that in one division station over 80 per cent of all those booked between 7.00 a.m. and midnight were kept in police custody for over 10 hours before their first court appearance. For all of metropolitan Toronto, 84 per cent of all persons arrested for criminal offences were kept in custody until their first court appearance. Approximately 40 per cent of those who appeared in court in custody for their first court appearance, 95 per cent of whom did not have a lawyer, pleaded guilty at that time. A thorough revision of the procedural aspects of release before the first court appearance is clearly necessary.

He goes on to point out that many persons whose cases are not disposed of at the first court appearance spend substantial periods of time in custody pending the disposition of their cases. The use of cash or property bail as the determinant for securing attendance at trial inevitably involves a discrimination between rich and poor in the administration of the criminal law. Let the comparison be made between the treatment accorded someone accused of white collar crime, like Mrs. Viola MacMillan, with that accorded the poor unfortunates disgorged from the Don jail after a week end. I think it is clear that there is different treatment. The goddess of justice in the traditional statue may be blind, but one wonders whether it is cash that she is weighing on the scales.

Let us go back to the fundamentals. What is the purpose of custody pending trial, or bail in lieu thereof? It is to secure the attendance of the accused at trial. But, how often and in what kinds of case, do accused persons flee from bail, or more fundamentally, what probability is there that an accused will flee? I suggest that in a very high percentage of cases there are external non-legal factors which will deter the accused from disappearance such as family, business interests, roots in the community and insufficient means to evade justice. The minister suggests also a sense of honesty. In those limited cases where moments of panic cause the accused to flee, the efficacy of detection will secure the ultimate apprehension of all but a few.

At this point I should like to say just a few words about the hard core of professional criminals who appear to be the standard by which some law enforcement officers regard the rest of society. The bail system need hold no terrors for organized crime in cases where the accused can expect to be eligible for bail. Bail money and counsel will be readily available for the professional criminal. I submit that a ready distinction can be drawn between those who are accused of major crimes against person and property, and the vast majority who run afoul of the law for offences such as impaired driving or a similar offence. My recommendation, therefore, is that the provisions of the Criminal Code requiring that an accused person be taken into custody for a broad spectrum of offences should be sharply curtailed and that many offences should be exempted from the necessity of custody and therefore of bail. I should like to spell out the changes I have in mind later.

Perhaps I might call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—CONSULTATION RESPECTING CULTURAL AGREEMENT WITH BELGIUM

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, on May 8 last, here in Ottawa, an agreement was signed by the governments of Canada and the kingdom of Belgium on the fields of culture, education, science and engineering.

Due to the nature of this international agreement, its implementation will affect fields of provincial jurisdiction, and the central government did not consult the provinces or the Quebec government before negotiating such educational and cultural relations.

This new procedure raises some doubts on the constitutional level, antagonizes Quebec, and departs from the procedure followed in the fall of 1965 when a cultural agreement was signed between Ottawa and Paris.

According to the letter and the spirit of section 93 of the Canadian constitution, education comes under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Culture must be related to education since it is its direct expression and since the fathers of Canadian confederation in 1867 did not dissociate education from culture in the distribution of government responsibilities.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

Furthermore, since the Statute of Westminster, that is since December 11, 1931, section 132 of our constitution became dead letter, and the central government can take its stand on no other section to assume the exclusive power to act in international relations, especially in matters exclusively provincial, as education, culture and natural resources.

• (10:00 p.m.)

The argument is sound: if Ottawa does not have the right of implementation in a given matter, it could not have the exclusive right of negotiation. Indeed, it was in that spirit that, in 1948, Canada subscribed to United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, making known some reservations about provincial responsibilities in such matters.

In the 11 articles of the recent Canada-Belgium agreement, Ottawa included no such reservation; it did not have previous consultations with the provinces in general and with Quebec in particular and did not officially provide for the role of the provinces and of Quebec on the permanent joint commission created by that agreement.

Hon. Daniel Johnson, premier of Quebec, and some of his colleagues were entirely right when they protested against the offhand, autocratic and centralizing way in which this Liberal federal government again proceeded in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that if the Pearson government had decided to humiliate Quebec in its authority and its responsibilities, if it were trying by all direct and indirect means to weaken the provincial fields of jurisdiction, it would have acted exactly as it did in the negotiations about the signing of that agreement between Canada and Belgium.

In the interest of Canada, I hope that the stubbornness of the present central government will stop and that at the meeting of the prime ministers, next July 5, a clear and definite understanding will be reached.

In the field of international jurisdiction, I wish to make a few suggestions about the responsibilities which are exclusively provincial. In fact, I once said:

> As far as I am concerned, I feel that the Quebec government can negotiate international treaties without the approval of the central government. But, in order to strike a proper medium in the implementation of true federalism and to enable Canada to put up a peaceful front before foreign countries, I would suggest that the Quebec government inform Ottawa of its initiatives so that Canadian policies do not appear incongruous and incoherent abroad.

In the field of shared responsibilities which are mentioned in section 95 of the constitution such as agriculture and immigration, the Quebec government should discuss these matters with Ottawa and come to an agreement beforehand concerning the division of responsibilities.

Finally, where responsibilities lie exclusively with the federal government, Quebec should submit its request to Ottawa and the matter should be decided jointly with the province.

[English]

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the arguments of the hon. member, for I suggest that he is confusing the negotiation of treaties, which is the exclusive right of the federal government and always has been, with the implementation of treaties which, depending on the subject matter, may be within provincial competence.

It has long been the practice of Canadian governments to consult the provinces before undertaking any commitment on their behalf, by entering into an international agreement which would require provincial legislation or other provincial action in order to be implemented. I can assure the house that there has been no departure from this practice in the case of the Belgian agreement. In signing a cultural agreement with Belgium the Canadian government has naturally committed only itself and federal agencies concerned with cultural matters. This was our constitutional right.

So far as the provinces are concerned, the agreement only provides a framework which could facilitate the participation of provincial authorities which might be interested in cultural exchanges with Belgium. The agreement clearly does not commit any province to do anything in connection with cultural exchanges with Belgium unless it wishes to develop such exchanges, in which case ample opportunity has been provided for full consultation. Thus the agreement will make it possible for Canadian efforts to strengthen our relations with Belgium through cultural exchanges at the federal and provincial level to be co-ordinated in a manner consistent with our constitutional requirements, and with the unity of purpose which must characterize our action in the international field.

The Prime Minister wrote each premier on May 3 to make it clear that there will be full consultation with the provinces as to any course of action they might wish to take in any matter arising out of this agreement which would involve provincial jurisdiction or require provincial implementation.

With respect to the right of the Canadian government to negotiate and conclude such agreements, both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have, on numerous occasions in the house, stated the constitutional position in Canada which clearly gives the federal government exclusive responsibility for the conduct of our country's external affairs and for the negotiation and conclusion of agreements with foreign governments in all fields.

WATER RESOURCES—REPORTED AGREEMENT TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON POLLUTION

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, over a period of five years I have placed the following resolution on the order paper:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of the creation of a water pollution control division, composed of representatives of the ten provinces, within the framework of the proposed national resources council, with powers and funds required to institute research programs, collect, collate and analyse water control data, and to co-ordinate the water pollution control objectives for the provinces; in addition, to further the study of water pollution control problems of a national character.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I was very interested to read in the Vancouver Sun of May 6 a statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin). The heading of the article is "Ministers Agree on Pollution Group; National Council Offered as Solution to Problem". The article reads:

Federal and provincial resource ministers and government officials agreed in principle Friday to set up a national advisory council on water pollution.

It will set goals and co-ordinate the work of various government agencies in Ottawa and the provinces, Energy Minister Jean Luc Pepin told a press conference.

With representation from the two senior levels of government and probably some universities, the body will have a secretariat provided by the federal government.

Pepin said his proposal was received favourably but no firm decision could be made at a two-day round of meetings of resource ministers because some provinces wanted to clear the decision with their cabinets.

In making that statement, the minister no doubt accepted in principle the resolution I had been moving in the house for five years. In that connection, I was very interested to read in the Toronto Daily Star of Monday, May 15, an article written by Walter Gray, who is very interested in the conservation of natural resources, entitled, "Will water pollution control sink in sea of provincialism?" The article reads, in part:

> Little wonder that W. H. Herridge (N.D.P.—Kootenay West), one of the most outspoken conservationists on parliament hill—

I have to read this, although I do not like this sort of thing because I am so modest at heart.

> —got up in the Commons the other day and cried plagiarism against the government.
> For the last 15 years he has made an annual plea for the establishment of a national advisory council on water pollution, but every time his private bill was sunk without a trace.
> Then, to his surprise, he received a press release from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, announcing that resources minister Jean Luc Pepin had proposed to the provinces the establishment of just such a council.
> Pepin, of course, did not credit Herridge with the idea; rather, he said it came from last fall's national pollution conference in Montreal, sponsored by the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers.

I asked my question as a result of a number of people on this side of the house saying to me: well, the government has actually adopted a policy you have advocated for some years. It was for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I asked this question of the minister:

> I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which is of urgent and prime national importance. Is it correct that the federal government has accepted in principle a resolution that has been placed on the order paper for over five years by the hon. member for Kootenay West, by an agreement in principle between the federal and provincial resource ministers to establish a national advisory council on water pollution? Can the minister inform the house of any such proposal or agreement?

However, Mr. Speaker, once again you nipped me in the bud when you rose and said:

> Order, please. I do not think the question and the hon. member's assertions are acceptable at this time.

As a matter of fact, I was a bit nettled by that. It was for that reason I suggested I would have an opportunity of dealing with the question a little more fully after ten o'clock, as I am doing now. I hope when the parliamentary secretary replies to my proposal he will at least give some credit to the members of this group for advancing a constructive suggestion to the government over a number of years. I must say also I was not very pleased that the government acted along the lines it did when making the minister's announcement.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West raises a very important subject, the pollution of water. He also makes what under other circumstances might be a very serious charge; that is, the charge of plagiarism.

His proposals of recent years have had to do with the setting up of a national board or council, with powers and certain administrative capabilities, as I understand it. This is not what is envisaged. This is not the subject which has been discussed by the Canadian council of resource ministers. Instead, what has been discussed is a purely advisory council, which perhaps would set up standards on an agreed basis which would be embodied in legislation, both federally and provincially, across the country. The council will advise as to areas of profitable research and as to successful methods of dealing with pollution. In other words, it would be an advisory body, not one with powers.

The hon. member made some reference to consistency. A few days ago his party moved a motion in this house to the effect that the government of the day—the present government—had not seen fit to give special status to one of our provinces, notably Quebec. I suggest that this was a recognition of the powers of the provinces, à la mode, so to speak. We have a division of powers as between provinces and the national government of this country. The advisory council, I submit, does recognize the fact that there is an area of divided jurisdiction in respect to pollution, and this can be covered adequately only by consultation at the federal-provincial level.

There was a meeting recently of the Canadian Council of Resource Ministers, and at that meeting the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources put forward the idea that an advisory committee be set up. This matter was discussed and the idea was received favourably by some representatives of provincial governments; others wished to consider the matter at some length. There were three main headings under which the council could study this matter. The council would study the possibility of setting up agreed lists of objectives and standards Second, it would conduct research into causes and ways of reducing pollution, federal and provincial. Third, it would advise the governments, federally and provincially, on water pollution problems and programs for their solution.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has proposed that an advisory council be set up. This is under consideration, and the establishment of this council will be discussed again when the ministers meet this fall.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 17, 1967

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING VOTING BY UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-111, to amend the Canada Elections Act (university students' franchise).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to avoid any repetition of an unfortunate occurrence during the last general election when a number of university students were disfranchised by virtue of a provision in the Canada Elections Act. This bill proposes to place students in the same position as members of the Canadian forces and veterans in an election.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—ALLEGED DISCLOSURE OF PROCEEDINGS IN CABINET MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the press correctly reported a most unusual occasion today, at which the Prime Minister advised the press as to what had taken place in cabinet. In particular, did he say that he had outlined in cabinet in very considerable detail the policy of the government by quoting from statements made by him as well as by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, so it would be clear to every member of the cabinet exactly what the policy was? Did he say "We all agreed that this was the right policy to follow—"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman knows that a question has to be asked directly and that it cannot be in the form of requesting confirmation or denial of press reports.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege, then. The Prime Minister is reporting what took place in cabinet, and this is so contrary to constitutional practice that I have to quote what was reported in the press.

Mr. Speaker: I must rule on the question of privilege that there are no exceptions provided in the precedents which would allow the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to put the question in the way he did.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This has never happened before, so there are no precedents. May I ask the Prime Minister this. Did the cabinet agree that the members of the government would follow the policy enunciated in cabinet this morning and say or do nothing which would make its implementation more difficult? I ask the Prime Minister upon what basis the statement was made, and whether there is a precedent for revealing what takes place in cabinet.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Oh, Mr. Speaker, there are lots of precedents for telling the press the subject matters discussed in cabinet. My right hon. friend will recall many occasions when he indicated what was discussed or not discussed in cabinet. There is no precedent for giving the details of cabinet discussions on any matter, nor was that done this morning. I merely said, and it was quite in order to say so, that the cabinet reaffirmed its adherence to the policy adopted by the government in regard to Viet Nam, in view of the questions that had been raised about that policy in the house and elsewhere. All members of the cabinet not only reaffirmed their confidence in the wisdom of that policy but they all reaffirmed that they would say nothing or do nothing to make more difficult its implementation. I am sure my right hon. friend will be the first to congratulate us on this reaffirmation of cabinet solidarity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having been asked whether I congratulate the government on cabinet solidarity, I may say that I do; because this is so abnormal that it deserves congratulation. Now I ask the Prime Minister, will he let the house and the country in on what the secret is, what the policy is? Is the Gordon version no longer agreeable to the cabinet?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be delighted to let my right hon. friend into that great secret. Cabinet policy in this matter was stated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on April 11 before the committee on external affairs; it was indicated in a letter of mine to certain university professors which was made public on March 10, and it was dealt with in this house in February of this year. We reaffirmed this morning the wisdom of that policy as enunciated in this house and outside. I know my right hon. friend is quite familiar with it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I ask the Prime Minister to table the letter of March 10 to the professors so we will have it clear and definite, and so Mr. Gordon will understand it as well as Mr. Turner.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I will be glad to do that. I may be wrong, but I am under the impression that letter has already been tabled. I think it was tabled some weeks ago. If I am wrong I apologize. If it has been tabled I am sure my hon. friend has read it by now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to see how consistent it is.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question, because this subject is one of great importance to the country. I should like to know whether the Prime Minister's statement means that the statement of the President of the Privy Council was repudiated by the cabinet.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I know how important this matter is to the New Democratic party, but my hon. friend will have to draw his own conclusions from what I have just said.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Was the President of the Pricy Council present at this cabinet meeting and did he subscribe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that question is out of order.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will table the contents of the press release issued after the cabinet meeting this morning, as well as the one issued after caucus.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Pearson: I shall be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker. I believe it has appeared verbatim in the press, but I would be very glad to table it.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I should like to know whether, as a result of the statement made by the President of the Privy Council on the situation in Viet Nam, the government or his department have received protests from Washington?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AID

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN WORLD BANK LOAN TO PAKISTAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that Canada is participating extensively in a two billion dollar project financed by the World Bank to assist Pakistan in the construction of an irrigation system, is the minister aware of the existence of slave labour camps in Pakistan, while financial assistance benefits but a few individuals? Has the government been informed of this situation and what measures are intended by the minister to have these people toe the line?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and reply tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

ALBERTA—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS FOLLOWING STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he now prepared to give some additional details about the kind of assistance the federal government is prepared to offer the ranchers and farmers of southern Alberta who were severely hurt by the recent storms, particularly in regard to long term credit assistance, which I think he mentioned in his press release in western Canada about a week ago?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I attended the area in southern Alberta where these very grave problems have arisen. We provided short term assistance by way of helping to get feed to the cattle by means of mobile equipment, etc. This can help in the short term.

I had a meeting with some 40 or 50 ranchers, and the situation is that when they have been able to determine the long term harm that has been suffered as a result of this storm the ranchers association will submit representations to the government as to the kind of aid, credit or otherwise, that they deem would be advantageous to help them overcome their very serious difficulties.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question. Does the minister intend to make some arrangements with the Farm Credit Corporation for deferment of the payments that are due in 1967?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the officials of the Farm Credit Corporation have already visited the scene on my instructions. In the event that a moratorium in regard to the 1967 payments is required or desired by the ranchers who have been seriously affected, and provided this is permissible under the act and the regulations as they now stand, I am sure this matter will be given every consideration.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has had any discussions with the premier or provincial government of Alberta with regard to any joint undertaking to provide assistance; and have any suggestions come from that government in this connection?

Mr. Greene: I did have discussions with one of the ministers about providing the emergency equipment and feed which was required, but there have been no discussions or suggestions as yet with regard to any long term help.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Minister of Agriculture initiated any discussion of this matter with the provincial premier?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, there is no way as yet of assessing the long term injury that has been suffered; the ranchers themselves have said this to me. It will probably be some weeks or months before they know the cost of this unfortunate occurrence, and I think it might be premature to suggest methods of aiding them at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF ANTI-DUMPING PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise the house whether Canada's anti-dumping regulations were dealt with in the Kennedy round negotiations? If so, has a decision been reached to amend these regulations and procedures?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the negotiations which have just been concluded Canada subscribed to a new international code of anti-dumping legislation; and if these agreements are confirmed, as I expect they will be, there will be legislation to implement that agreement.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say when he might expect to make a formal announcement in this regard?

Mr. Sharp: At the same time as the tariff schedules are revealed which, as I and the Minister of Trade and Commerce said yesterday will probably be after June 30.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether anti-dumping legislation with regard to fruit and vegetables will be changed? Will there be a change in the estimation of fair value for duty with regard to these two categories?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the question of valuation for duty is quite separate from that of anti-dumping legislation. I hesitate to give an unqualified answer but I think I can say that valuation as such, is not affected by the new rules.

FOOTWEAR—DISCUSSION RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Would the hon. minister tell the house whether he has had the opportunity lately to discuss with the president of Czechoslovakia or the minister of foreign affairs of that country the matter of massive importation of shoes, as complained of by Canadian manufacturers?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that matter was mentioned.

Mr. Ricard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. minister tell us whether the importations will be decreased or increased?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a matter for the consideration of the government of Czechoslovakia, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs assure the house that no steps will be taken that may injure Canadian-Japanese trade?

PORK—INQUIRY AS TO REOPENING OF BRITISH MARKET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Has the British market for pork and pork products been reopened to Canada? If so, what are the Departments of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce doing to break into this market and to make Canadian pork products available in large quantities to English buyers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the matter is of such national urgency that the question ought to be asked at this time.

REQUEST FOR DETAILED STATEMENT ON NEW GATT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): My question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the Japanese government has now released a list of considerable length showing tariff reductions arrived at as a result of the Kennedy round of negotiations, would the minister reconsider his reply to the request I made yesterday that he issue a list setting out these reductions as far as Canada is concerned in order that manufacturers and others interested may be better able to assess their position and determine what to do?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): I think if manufacturers and others in this country wish to assess the position adequately they should know both sides of the bargain. Therefore I think it would be better to release the information as to changes in our own tariff schedules and those of our principal markets at the same time.

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Harkness: In view of the fact that the Japanese government has already released this information what reason could there be for Canada not following the same course?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order. The hon. member is suggesting that an argument be entered into.

Mr. Harkness: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why the question is out of order. It is an urgent matter, and the minister is prepared to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asked the minister to explain why a particular decision had been reached, and I do not think that is a proper question.

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): May I ask the minister whether there will be any tariff changes in relation to fruits and vegetables. I ask this question because crops intended for sale later in the season have to be planted now, and a situation very harmful to some areas of Canada may develop unless the farmers are given this information at the present time.

Mr. Sharp: I can assure the hon. member that we have this question very much in mind, but I reiterate my statement that I believe it is better for all concerned to know both the advantages we are receiving in foreign markets as well as the concessions we have made in order to buy those advantages.

NATURAL GAS

DECISION BY U.S. COMMISSION ON PIPE LINE APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he inform the house whether he has further information as to the date on which we might expect a decision from the federal power commission in Washington on the Great Lakes application to build the pipe line for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines through the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Unfortunately I cannot, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister inform the house whether on behalf of Canada he made representations to the F.P.C. that it might expedite its processes, in view of the disadvantages to Canada of long delays?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, representations were made in the past. The federal power commission is quite aware, and it has stated it, of the urgency of this matter for Canada.

UNITED NATIONS

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN MEMBERS OF GAZA STRIP FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether Canadian troops are to be withdrawn from the Gaza strip.

Mr. Hellyer: May I refer this question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary General of the United Nations has called a meeting of those nations contributing to the United Nations force in the Gaza strip. I would prefer to wait until the conclusion of that meeting before replying.

Mr. Churchill: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. If hostilities break out in that area, will attempts be made at peace restoring in accordance with the policy the minister announced on December 7 last?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would appear that the question is hypothetical.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question with regard to the serious problem developing in the Near East. In order that Canada's policy may be clear and definite, will the minister hold prior consultations with the President of the Privy Council?

PUBLIC WORKS

POINTE-MICHEL, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO WHARF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Was his attention drawn to a May 8 resolution of the Rimouski Chamber of Commerce, which is supposed to have been sent to him in connection with the Compagnie de navigation Nord-Sud Limitée and the construction of a wharf at Pointe-Michel, between Baie-Comeau and Forestville? If so, is it his intention, in compliance with that resolution, to take immediate action to have the construction of a wharf at Pointe-Michel started as soon as possible?

Mr. Speaker: That question should be placed on the order paper.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE TO U.S. OF ARMS FOR USE IN VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a welcome back question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have not had an opportunity to send him notice, but I am sure he will give me a precise answer. In view of the fact that Canada has refused to sell arms to Israel, the Arab states, Pakistan, India, Greece, Turkey, Angola and Malaysia, how does the government justify the sale to the United States of arms, some of which are used in Viet Nam?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, I regret to say, is argumentative.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

INFORMATION FOR MEMBERS RESPECTING VISITING DIGNITARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Would he give consideration to circulating to hon. members a bulletin outlining the itineraries of visiting dignitaries? I believe this information is now available to him.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be very glad to inquire whether this can be done. I think it would be very helpful if it could be done.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST OF COUNCIL OF BLIND FOR ELIMINATION OF MEANS TEST

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister receive a communication from the Ontario division of the Canadian Council of the Blind pointing out the degrading and demoralizing effect of the means test and the difficulty of pensioners carrying on with their present pensions because of the spiralling increases in costs? If the government has received that telegram is it giving consideration to the removal of the means test, a step which on its face appears to be one that would be generally acceptable to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It is my impression that I did, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to confirm that a telegram to this effect came to my office yesterday and that I sent it to the office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and asked for his views on it. I will check that when I get back to my office.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—REFUSAL TO PROVIDE TRANSPORTATION TO OTTAWA FOR FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the minister received from the C.F.U. of the Saguenay region a telegram protesting aga nst the refusal of the C.N.R. to put at their disposal 17 passenger coaches to take 1,000 farmers to Ottawa for the farmers' march scheduled for May 24?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that it is a march that is supposed to take place on May 24, but in any case I will contact the C.N.R. management about that.

Mr. Gauthier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister convinced that this march will be profitable to the C.N.R.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister for an opinion and his question is out of order.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

QUEBEC DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING JURISDICTION IN EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the statements he made yesterday in Fredericton on government jurisdiction with regard to international matters.

Can the hon. minister tell the house whether he or officials of his department have held meetings recently conferred or exchanged correspondence as concerns the wish expressed by the province of Quebec to become a member of international organizations such as UNESCO? Has an agreement been reached between the two governments?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, what we want, especially in matters which concern the provinces from a constitutional point of view, is effective co-operation with them. That is why we are pursuing a program of co-operation and collaboration.

Mr. Allard: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the hon. minister tell the house whether he has received recently from the premier of the province of Quebec a letter making a request in this regard?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall find out, Mr. Speaker. I have received several letters from the Quebec premier; it may be that one of them concerns this matter, and I shall inquire about it.

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGES IN TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether changes in the present federal-provincial tax-sharing set up are planned for the current session of parliament.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. We have just approved legislation that applies in the immediate future, and I have no intention of bringing in further legislation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONSIDERATION OF REDUCTION IN VOTING AGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to ask the Prime Minister. Having in mind the presence on the order paper of a number of bills, put there by private members of the three main political parties, all calling for the same thing, namely a reduction in the voting age, is the government giving consideration to this important question?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be very glad, Mr. Speaker, to look into this very interesting proposal to see whether it could be implemented.

PARLIAMENT HILL

BAN ON TAXICABS DURING CENTENNIAL CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Yesterday between four and five o'clock I had the unpleasant experience of missing a train due to the fact that no taxicabs were allowed on parliament hill. I wonder if the minister could do something about this. I have heard several complaints, and I ask when the situation in this respect will be rectified.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to hear that the hon. member missed his train; I thought that was something that happened only to some of the rest of us. As to taxicabs not being allowed on the hill during certain ceremonial visits I shall look into the matter. I was not aware of it.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which closely relates to the business of the house and which I wish to direct to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Choquette: If I am not allowed to ask a question of the right hon. gentleman may I direct the question to the government house leader. Since erosion of the crown prerogatives is quite incompatible with Conservative philosophy, will the minister ask the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) to withdraw notice of motion No. 1 on the order paper, which deals with the abolition of the royal power of dissolution?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will again rule the question out of order. I assume the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I only wish to say that each court should have a jester and each parliament a clown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. Prime Minister rising on a question of privilege?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I was just going to speak on the question of privilege, to say I would be glad to discuss the matter with the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be wise if at this point I ruled there was no question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: On a question of personal privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are only 30 minutes for questions this afternoon, and I would ask for the co-operation of all hon. members including the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Choquette: It will be a very short question of privilege. I am glad to understand that the hon. member for Carleton is the clown of this house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Considering the widespread speculation that it will not be available until after May 29, could the minister tell us when he will be prepared to present the budget?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a final decision in this respect has not yet been made.

MR. JUSTICE LANDREVILLE

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION PROPOSED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think about ten days ago was the last occasion when I asked what the government's attitude is going to be regarding Mr. Justice Landreville. Has the government come to any conclusion in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of the best procedure to be followed in this very important, and I believe for our parliament unprecedented, matter was again discussed by the government this week, and I hope to be able to have an announcement to make next week.

AGRICULTURE

MEETING WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS TO DISCUSS MILK QUESTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister in a position to advise the house of the time and place of the meeting with the farmers' union, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and other farm organizations who are coming here to discuss the milk question with him; and will members of parliament be allowed to attend that meeting?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have been instructed by the proposed marchers that they will be here on May 24, I believe at ten o'clock in the morning. With respect to the question of the actual place where they will be, I think it is on parliament hill and I am very certain everyone will be welcome.

HOUSING

CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER RESPECTING OFF-RESERVE ASSISTANCE TO INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I announced a program on Indian housing the hon. member for Churchill asked me a question which I have since had the opportunity of reading in Hansard. I have discovered that the question he asked me involved enfranchised Indians, indicating to me that I misinformed the house; because I said, as recorded at page 247 of Hansard, "If they are currently on reserves, yes." If Indians are enfranchised they are no longer Indians under the Indian Act.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session and the amendment thereto of Mr. Brand.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the close of the debate last night I had made some remarks indicating that I felt the system of criminal justice in this country was heavily weighted against the individual, and particularly in connection with the provision for custody pending trial and bail. I also indicated that I should like to discuss this under a second heading, the question of availability of counsel before trial. As will be clear to hon. members from Professor Friedland's remarks which I read last night, the problem of custody before trial is directly related to the question of counsel before trial.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we please have more order. I am sure it is difficult for the members in the chamber to follow the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The question recently has been before the highest court in our country, the Supreme Court of Canada, in the case of Regina v. O'Connor. In that case, a motorist had been taken into custody on suspicion of impaired driving and was submitted to a number of tests by the police at the police station without being informed that he was under arrest, and that he had a right to refuse to submit to the tests, without having the opportunity to seek independent legal advice. Only after being tested was he advised that he was under arrest and only at that time was he given permission to seek legal assistance. He was permitted to make one telephone call. When his solicitor happened not to be there, he was denied a further right to seek assistance.

The Canadian Bill of Rights appears to be quite clear in this regard. It affirms the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law. It goes on to prohibit any law of Canada from being construed or applied so as to—> —deprive a person who has been arrested or detained

> (i) of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention, and
> (ii) of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay...

Prima facie it would appear that the Bill of Rights applies directly to the situation. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, has held that those provisions did not assist the accused under those circumstances. In my opinion the Supreme Court's judgment, which I do not deny was probably correct on the law as it stands, has indicated a very fundamental gap in our system of criminal justice.

We have adopted the English system of criminal justice, which is an adversary system; it assumes that the best means of arriving at the truth of the case is by contest between the prosecution and the accused in open trial. In fact, of course, many of these contests are notoriously unequal. But I may say that at least one of the long standing bases of inequality has been met in part in my own province at least by the new legal aid system. I am not referring specifically to that problem, but rather to the importance of ensuring that the accused, rich or poor, be not held in custody without the opportunity to secure the assistance of independent legal advice.

Curiously, we set great store by the common law canon that no man shall be compelled to testify against himself, and then ignore the fact that the fairness of the trial, in this adversary contest, may be irretrievably prejudiced before trial by the gap in the law which permits the police to hold the accused incommunicado and subject to a variety of pressures, not excluding the physical, designed to break down his will to resist the state.

My suggestion is that the criminal law should impose a positive obligation upon the police to advise an arrested person of his legal right to have counsel and to facilitate his early contact with counsel. I do not accept the adequacy of the traditional one telephone call referred to in the O'Connor case. It may indeed be a lot easier to secure convictions under the present system, but I would remind hon. members that the function of our criminal process is not to secure convictions but rather to do justice.

A word should be spoken here about organized crime. The hardened criminal is far less subject to the psychological pressure of arrest than is the person who is in conflict with the law for the first time. The professional knows he does not have to talk and that any inducements offered to him by the police are illusory. He may well have greater cause to fear physical violence, but then he may be more hardened to it. Not without reason, he may have cause to believe that his associates already have set in motion the process of habeas corpus or otherwise to secure his freedom. Once again, the very class against whom law enforcement officers cite the law as being required is frequently least subject to it.

It seems to me these are two aspects in which the power given the state unreasonably outweighs the rights of the individual. I have a deep suspicion that many more such anomalies exist in our Victorian criminal laws.

The second of the major areas in which I feel that our slowness in law reform has worked prejudice for the individual has been that of the civil law under federal jurisdiction. Here again I should like to pick two examples: The priority over other creditors which the crown claims for taxes; and, the heavy stick which crown expropriators swing against small property owners. In respect of the first, a brief review of the federal taxing statutes illustrates what an advantage the treasury claims over other creditors. With regard to income tax and sales tax, for example, the respective laws provide that all taxes, penalties and costs can be claimed by the crown as a debt due in either the exchequer court or other competent court.

In the case of income tax, what the Department of National Revenue commonly does is to issue a certificate that the tax has not been paid. That certificate simply is registered in the court as proof that there is a sum due. It is entirely equivalent to the situation of a businessman who has sued and obtained a judgment for a debt. The difference is that the crown is given the right to skip the ordinary court proceedings and has the amount of the debt set at what it claims, not at what a court has found. This situation works a particular hardship on other businesses in the case of the bankruptcy of a debtor business. Under the Bankruptcy Act the crown is given a priority over other creditors, so, with only a limited body of assets left, the crown can move in and claim payment in full before any of the suppliers of the bankrupt business can collect a nickel. This kind of bad debt which a business failure generates falls particularly heavily on the small supplier who has neither the leverage to compel earlier repayment nor the financial resources to sustain a loss. The inherent weakness of his position becomes a disaster when the agents of the government move in like a flock of gulls and eat up all the assets.

In another situation, the priority given for government taxes works a particular hardship in the case of the intrepid creditor pursuing the hidden assets of a chronic non-payer. The writ of extent, which is the authority issued by the exchequer court to collect the tax debt against property, can be used by the department to claim prior security in hidden assets smoked out by an energetic creditor. The creditor does all the work and the revenuers move in to reap the benefit, like a bunch of in-laws. But I hasten to say, quite unlike my in-laws.

As between the small businessman and the government, why should the government have all those advantages? Why should not the government be confined to the same rights as any other creditor? I suggest that the respective taxing statutes should be changed to take away the crown's priority for taxes and put it in the same position as other creditors. Surely the important principle here in connection with bankruptcy or non-payment of debts is who can best afford to bear the loss, the small businessman or the vast resources of the government? The answer is obvious.

It seems to me that the wide array of pre-emptive weapons which the tax collectors have been given has grown up not as a result of conscious policy, but through the draftsman's habit of sticking into the various taxing acts rights which were in the original precedent. I think the time has come to reverse that process.

Another example of unfair advantage between government and a citizen is in the case of expropriating small holdings. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) already has set out a critique of the expropriation procedures and has questioned some of the basic principles. I do not intend to cover the ground again. What I should like to refer to is the unfair position in which a person of limited means finds himself when faced with the land taking juggernaut.

As the hon. member for Bow River has stated, it is the policy of federal expropriation authorities to make a first offer which, on any objective standard, is absurdly below the real value of the property. In the case of larger holdings in the hands of people with financial resources, their bargaining position is better because they have recourse to legal proceedings in the exchequer court, and in the general perspective of reported expropriation cases the landholders seem to have done pretty well.

But in the cases of smaller properties of $3,000 or $5,000 value, the exchequer court is not an option because the very cost of the proceedings would eat up the award. I have a suspicion, for example, that the National Capital Commission in its expropriation for the Ottawa river driveway was in a position to force small cottage holders into settlements that on an objective basis would not be regarded as fair. The problem in this type of case is that there is no objective basis such as a court hearing in which the fairness of an offer can be tested. What is called for, it seems to me, is some sort of small claims tribunal for expropriations so that by an inexpensive and relatively rapid procedure values could be ascertained if no settlement is reached. Perhaps the Tax Appeal Board could serve as an example of the type of relatively informal tribunal in which these claims could be adjudicated.

In each of the instances which I have given the existing procedures are unduly rigid. The state has, it seems to me, armed itself with far heavier weapons than effective government requires, and the use of the weapons does needless damage.

The final aspect of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, would be with regard to an administrative review procedure, which was referred to in the speech from the throne of April, 1965, but I regret was not mentioned in the last speech from the throne. Certainly the critical nature of the problem has not diminished. We have heard discussions from time to time of a possible administrative procedure for Canada and three foreign examples have been cited, namely the Scandinavian institution of ombudsman, the American federal example of administrative review procedure, and the French system of the conseil d'état.

Looked at objectively I would say that the third is probably the best precedent and certainly the most successful, but perhaps we should in this regard invoke the caution that the institutions of other states should not be copied without a very profound appreciation of their historical evolution and of the society in which they were produced.

First with regard to the ombudsman, this has certainly been very much in vogue, but how much do some of its advocates really know about it? I would suggest that in view of the nature of the problems in Canada there are reasons why the ombudsman would not be desirable. In Canada the ombudsman must be bilingual, he must be able to deal with a broader range of problems, larger geography and larger population than in the case of some of those countries which already have an ombudsman. Countries like Denmark and New Zealand are homogeneous, unilingual, unitary states of relatively small size and geography. In countries such as these the system appears to work well, but in the case of a country the size of Canada the problem is one of sheer volume, which will therefore require more than one person; it will require, in essence, a panel. To this extent it begins to resemble the conseil d'état. There is the further problem that if you have more than one person acting in this role there is the difficulty of assuring uniformity of treatment and continued efficiency of the system.

The American administrative procedure act that has been put forward can, I think, be dismissed fairly rapidly because of its limited application. In essence it provides an entry into the general legal system, but these administrative proceedings in the United States have been notable for their complexity, length of time and amount of legal costs. The history of the conseil d'état has, in my opinion, been distinguished by a very high quality of performance, rapidity of dispatch and relatively low expense. The essentials in this type of administrative review are speed and low cost. This, if I may say so as a member of the profession, should at once rule the lawyers out. In this regard I would say that the Tax Appeal Board, for example, has not been a success when judged by this standard because it is too much like a court.

There must be consistency of judgment. This is why I make the choice of a conseil d'état over an ombudsman. If you want to assure equal treatment for all cases across the country, in my opinion the conseil d'état is the best system because cases are dealt with by a panel. There must be equality of treatment in this respect and there should be ease of access to the tribunal.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the cost of appearing before the tribunal should not only be inexpensive but I would suggest there should be a system instituted which would not prevent a person of limited means taking advantage of the system. I would suggest that in this regard there should be something perhaps in the nature of veterans advocates who are now available to deal with applications to the Canadian Pension Commission. This type of institution might be extended for the purpose of general administrative reviews.

The practical and essential characteristic of a good administrative review procedure is surely obtained through the production of documents. Surely in any case affecting the individual and the state there should be the production of documents. The individual should have the right to have produced to him the government's file about himself. In the long run the mere right to the production of documents is perhaps the individual's best opportunity for an administrative review. The exceptions, of course, will be in security cases and a limited number of other cases where the security of the state must be pre-eminent, such as cases concerning defence and negotiations between states and others in the field of external affairs, and private and personal information relating to other individuals. I am not satisfied that at the present time there is an effective means for protecting the individual in matters of Canadian administration.

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the points I should like the government to examine for the purpose of introducing legislation that will make the right of the individual pre-eminent over the great power of the state.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question on the matter of an ombudsman. Would he feel that there might be virtue in testing the ombudsman principle departmentally? I am thinking particularly of certain departments such as Veterans Affairs, which has had its problems respecting pension appeals, and National Defence in view of the unification program we are commencing and which will obviously present new problems. I would suggest also the penitentiary and parole services under the Department of the Solicitor General. Would the hon. member feel that there might be any virtue in an ombudsman being established within certain departments, to see how the ombudsman system would work out?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would adhere to the argument I made earlier. I think the more efficacious institution has been that of the conseil d'état. I would like to see an administrative tribunal made up of more than one individual; I would like to see it made up of a panel of individuals who could share the same, I hesitate to use the word "jurisprudence" but who would have the same philosophic approach to administration. In this way I think there would be consistency applied to cases across the country. The ombudsman system has received a great deal of popular support, but I am sure the conseil d'état could be made to work more effectively in a country of our size and population.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the speech from the throne I intend to deal to a great extent with the subjects of agriculture and transportation. In opening my remarks I would say that I agree with the previous speaker and have grave doubts that the ombudsman system would be a solution to all constitutional problems and problems of constituents, in view of the continuous build-up of bureaucracy by this government, provincial and municipal governments.

Having said that, I shall leave that subject and concern myself with the question of agriculture. We notice in the speech from the throne that some mention is made of agriculture. I am pleased to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) is going to set up a fact finding policy group which will be able to devise an agricultural policy for him, something which he has been unable to do in the 21 months he has been in office. If one were to study his background he would find that the minister was born and raised in Toronto and that he is a lawyer by profession. Later he moved to the small town of Arnprior. So one can readily see that he has had very little to do with agriculture, and therefore is at a loss to devise an agricultural policy for Canada. I as a western farmer have often wished that the former minister of agriculture had the silver tongue of the present minister. Perhaps the combination of the former minister's knowledge and the present minister's silver tongue might have produced a spokesman for the farmers of Canada. We in western Canada have recognized the grass roots knowledge of the agricultural industry possessed by the former minister of agriculture, who is now a senator. Unfortunately he was not able to provide us with leadership, partly owing to the fact that he was unfamiliar with parliamentary procedure and thus was unable to transmit his ideas to paper.

The present minister is given to the use of verbiage and very little else. So I take heart, with many other western farmers, in that part of the speech from the throne in which it is said that the Minister of Agriculture will be charged with the project of setting up a special task force which will be recommending policies to meet agricultural goals. I hope that after 21 months in office the minister will have found himself and placed his feet firmly on the ground. I sincerely hope he will be able to deal with the agricultural problems which are facing this nation.

There are grave and serious problems before us. Never before have we had a society so affluent and so able as the one in which we live today. Yet, never before have we seen so much unrest in the agricultural industry.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Milk prices have been low and subsidies have been paid. Nevertheless the farmers are prepared to march on Ottawa. We must try to analyse the problems which confront our farmers. Wheat marketings have been higher than was expected a few years ago; yet there is dissatisfaction among the wheat farmers. The recent international wheat agreement recommended an increase of 21 or 22 cents in the price of wheat. When the president of the Alberta wheat pool was informed of this by a newspaperman he said he could not believe it, that he did not think Canada would accept so small an increase. I point this out, Mr. Speaker, to convince you and the rest of the house that wheat farmers are not satisfied, nor are dairy farmers. I could go down the list and mention the vegetable growers, the beef producers and others who are dissatisfied. We find ourselves in an affluent society, at a time when our economy is booming, and yet every segment of the agricultural industry is dissatisfied. The minister is unable to devise a policy, and so our hopes lie in the speech from the throne in which we are told that a special task force will be set up to try to devise a policy. It is the first time in Canada that we have found it necessary to import butter, eggs and all kinds of vegetable crops. The prices of the staple commodities which can still be exported are going down, and there is dissatisfaction all across the board.

In recommending an increased price for wheat the international wheat agreement did not specifically state that the committed countries have to buy grain at that price. This is the crux of the problem. Why post the minimum price of over $2 a bushel if the committed countries do not have to purchase grain from the exporting nations at that price? It is nothing more than a guide, and it is a well known fact that in the long run farmers expect to receive half or less than half of the 21 or 22 cents which was negotiated not so long ago.

Recently we have heard rumours that wheat farmers all across Canada will be seeding more wheat this year than ever before. This is very doubtful, in view of the adverse weather conditions which we have suffered in western Canada this year. Nevertheless I am still hopeful that encouragement and leadership will be given by the government, and that farmers will make an all-out effort to seed more wheat because there continues to be a large market for wheat in the world today. We are not told about the goals which the special task force mentioned in the speech from the throne proposes to set for itself. The government is a little late in setting up this task force, to say the least.

Last fall the house dealt with a major transportation bill, and yet there was no mention of it in the speech from the throne. That measure has not been enacted in full. Only part V was enacted; but part I, which sets up the new Canadian Transport Commission and which contains clause 16 giving guarantees to the shipper, has not yet been enacted. Why is the government so reluctant to set up the commission and to get it going? Last fall we were told that this legislation had to be passed by January 1, 1967. I am sure every member of the house realized at that time that the debate was urgent and the bill had to be passed. It was passed on January 31 of this year but it has not been fully implemented by the government. What is the reason for this? Why has there been no enactment of the safeguards, which under clause 16 the bill purported to include for the shippers? Shippers all across Canada are being faced with freight increases. Nevertheless protection is not being accorded them. The new Canadian Transport Commission has not yet been fully appointed, and although the legislation enables the two railways to be competitive they are continuing to set equal freight rates. When I consulted the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and asked them whether or not this is in accordance with their position, I was informed that they were not sure, that they would like to look into it. If competition is to exist between the two railways—and transportation means a great deal to the agricultural industry—then the Director of Investigation and Research, under the authority of the Combines Investigation Act, should look into the pricing of freight rates by the two major railroads.

Both last year and this year there has been a great deal of concern about food prices. The cost of living index went up considerably last month. What does the speech from the throne say on this subject? It sets out clearly that we are going to have a department of corporate and consumer affairs, stating:

> Within this department there will be created an organization responsible for developing new policies and co-ordinating programs undertaken within the federal government to assist the consumer and protect the small investor.

What are we going to do? We are going to put the consumer in a position of being more rigidly opposed to the producer. Everywhere we go in today's society we find the producer on the short end of the stick. The corporate entity which is going to be set up by this government will mean the placing of one more government body against the primary producer. We will then have the government providing no leadership at all in the field of agriculture. Already we have the government providing weak leadership in the field of wheat production. We have the government providing no leadership at all in the field of transportation. They introduced a piece of legislation to cover the transportation industry in this country, yet they failed to provide safeguards for the shipper. The government has not fully organized the departments to police the transportation companies, yet they were in such a rush to pass this legislation.

So we find agriculture gravely concerned about its future. We find the farmers marching on Ottawa because of milk prices. All across the country the farmers are concerned about the prices they are receiving for their agricultural products in the marketplace. Basically we find the farmers asking for greater bargaining power in the marketplace. This is what they really want—more bargaining power in the marketplace. What is this government going to do about this situation? It would seem, according to the speech from the throne, they are going to do very little, other than establish this task force.

We are told in the speech from the throne that more money will be made available for long term loans under the Farm Credit Act. There is one sentence in the speech that gives one some little hope, and it is this one:

> During the present session you will be asked to approve legislation to provide long term loans to agricultural and fisheries associations—

What does that really mean? Are we going to allow the agricultural institutions or organizations to borrow huge amounts of money—and it will take huge amounts of money—to market their own products? If this is what this sentence means, then perhaps there is a ray of hope for the agricultural industry in the speech from the throne. Speaking generally, it is interesting to note how the subject of agriculture is dealt with in various speeches from the throne. One finds that it is dealt with in general terms; there is never anything specific for which the government can be held accountable in the following years.

Last year we saw consumer prices become a real problem. Meat prices were one of the things that consumers thought were too high.

I should like to put on the record the amount a family spent on food in 1949. In that year a family spent 24 per cent of its disposable income on food, and in 1965, 20.3 per cent of disposable income was spent on food. Of the amount spent on food in 1949, 22.4 per cent was spent for meat, while in 1965 the amount of the food budget spent on meat was 21.7 per cent. In other words, the percentage of the working man's income spent on food has decreased over the years; also the amount spent on meat has decreased over the years.

These figures would lead one to believe that the consumer is either buying less meat or poorer quality meat. However, this is not the case. In 1946, for example, the average consumption of meat in Canada was 60 pounds per person. In 1960 it was over 80 pounds per person. The consumer was therefore buying more meat with less money than he did back in 1949.

Then, you might ask yourself if the consumer is buying better quality meat. The answer to that is obviously yes. In 1949 about 6.4 per cent of the slaughtered cattle in Canada graded choice, the top grade. In 1965, 33 per cent of the cattle slaughtered graded choice. The farmer's product has increased tremendously in quality, while the consumer has increased the amount he uses. At the same time, the amount he spends on food in relation to the amount he is earning has decreased. Surely one would argue, therefore, that the farmer should have more bargaining power in the marketplace. One would have thought that would be obvious; but this is not the case. He finds he has less and less bargaining power in the marketplace and his product is selling for less and less.

We find monopolies developing in the transportation industry, monopolies developing in the cattle marketing industry, monopolies developing in the milk marketing industry. One has only to study the companies that bottle and pasteurize the milk the dairy farmers haul in, to realize the truth of this statement. We find that the monopolies developing are encouraged by this government. For example, in the meat industry one could cite Canada Packers and one could go into the set-up of Safeway stores and their purchases of many of the dairies throughout Canada. The transportation industry speaks for itself. No action has been taken by this government to watch over the competitive factors that must be the key to that industry.

Returning to the beef packing industry, last year Canada Packers told the consumer prices committee that they handle 28 per cent of the slaughtering of beef animals in Canada. They are prepared to maintain their control of that 28 per cent. In the United States one observes the packing plants moving into the feed lot business. Last year a Senate committee studied the whole problem of whether or not packing plants in the United States should be permitted into the beef feeding industry. Today in Canada we see the packing plants moving more and more into this feeding business.

The farm paper called Country Guide, which is published in Winnipeg, produced an article which clearly set out the fact that Canada Packers had attempted to control meat prices. They realized they could control meat prices if they had a source of supply to keep their packing plants busy. Today in Canada we see the packing plants purchasing more cattle and operating more feed lots than ever before. They have a fully integrated business. Perhaps this procedure is economically justifiable if one is the operator of a packing plant, but it puts the primary producer at a grave disadvantage. This is one more instance in which we find the primary producer on the short end of the stick. It is no wonder the farmers are demanding more bargaining power in the marketplace. We see the farmers in the United States and Canada coming out with a resolution that they will not buy farm machinery. They feel this is the only weapon they can exercise to try to convince the authorities.

Really, though, this is a negative approach. If they need new machinery to take the place of hired help or reduce the number of man hours needed to produce their commodities, then the most efficient thing for them to do is to buy new equipment. If one really wanted to analyse the situation, then ceasing to buy new machinery to reduce the cost of production is really a negative approach. It may be successful however, in convincing the authorities, in a sense, that this is a serious factor in the economy of this country.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The agricultural industry still employs more people in Canada than any other industry. Yet the government is paying less and less attention to this basic industry, the industry on which Canada was founded and which still has a major part to play in society. It is often said by the experts, by professors and by anyone who feels he can offer advice to another industry, that the agricultural industry must become more efficient and must modernize. Above all, it is said that there are too many farmers, that the small farms must disappear.

This, Mr. Speaker, is not necessarily so. The farmer is the most efficient producer in society today. It might interest the house to know that I have before me some figures produced by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics relating to the agricultural efficiency index, using the year 1949 as 100. To the question as to whether the efficiency of agriculture increased or decreased compared with other industries, I would answer that the agricultural efficiency index now stands at 276, compared with the general manufacturing index which stands at 176, and the commercial, non-agricultural industry index standing at 152.5. So that since 1949 the agricultural industry has increased in efficiency far more than any other single industry in Canada.

The agricultural industry has also in many cases increased both the quantity and the quality of its products. Yet these experts and professors are telling the farmers that some of the small farms will have to go. The only reason to justify such a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is if the industry is not increasing in efficiency and is lagging behind society. But this is not the case; the industry has increased its efficiency tremendously.

What the industry does lack, however, is power at the market place.

The agricultural industry was shortchanged by this new wheat agreement which provides a 22 cents a bushel increase, announced with great fanfare last week. The president of one of the biggest marketing agencies in Alberta exclaimed that surely this was not so, that Canada would not agree to the stated amount. He said that they know we need more. Yet Canada did agree, Mr. Speaker, and naturally the wheat farmers are disappointed, as they should be.

Last session this house enacted a transportation bill to aid the railways, but the primary producer was once again on the short end of the stick. We see the milk marketing situation going from bad to worse, with no real intervention being made by the government to police the operation, and monopolies are moving into this industry to a greater and greater extent.

The Minister of Agriculture announced in Winnipeg that there will be no further subsidies to the milk producers. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, that made them happy—happy in their efforts to rid Canada of the present government. That is really about all that could make them happy. What they need is more power at the marketplace. If they cannot market their milk and milk products under more suitable arrangements than at present, Mr. Speaker, then they should be given a subsidy. If they are to be asked to subsidize the consumers of Canada, then they in turn should be subsidized. They should not be required to produce the primary products of this country at a rate which will not give them an equitable return for their labours.

We also see agitation from time to time in the cattle marketing industry suggesting that what is required are marketing boards. Let us be quite frank, Mr. Speaker; marketing boards would not raise the price of cattle one little bit in Canada because the price of cattle in Canada bears a close relationship to the price of cattle in the United States.

Today, 10 per cent of the fat cattle sold in Toronto sets the market price for the other 90 per cent. The packing plants are buying cattle direct, either from the feed lots or the farmers. Ten per cent of the fat cattle that are sold set the price for the other 90 per cent that are sold to the packing plants. Calgary calls itself the cattle marketing king of Canada, the centre where more cattle are raised and marketed than anywhere else in Canada. But even in this free enterprise society the packing plants buy 66 per cent of the fat cattle direct from the feed lots or the farmers, and the other 33 per cent set the price. This cannot continue. I would say to this fact finding group, that is going to devise an agricultural policy for a minister who cannot devise one for himself, that we in Canada need a cattle marketing commission to aid the farmers and to give them more power in the marketplace.

A number of years ago we set up wheat pools for the marketing of wheat in western Canada. That was followed by the wheat board, which was designed to give more power to the farmers in the marketplace in marketing their wheat. It now appears that it is not the wheat board that negotiates wheat prices, but that in many instances it is the government of Canada that is the sole negotiator of those prices. Two years ago this government failed to argue its case with the United States government and as a result the price slipped something like 17 cents a bushel. This was due to the inactivity on the part of the minister of trade and commerce at that time.

I suggest that agriculture has really become a less important cabinet portfolio than it was. The government are setting up new departments, most of which are a hodgepodge of other departments. The government set up the Department of Industry, which is a hodgepodge of the former Department of Trade and Commerce. The Department of Manpower and Immigration has come into being, and this is a combination of the former departments of labour and immigration. We now see another department is to be created —for a department, in essence, is what it is—a consumer affairs department. We have also set up a Department of Forestry and Rural Development.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that in the building up of all these departments less and less importance is being attached to the Department of Agriculture. And above all, the government appoints a Minister of Agriculture who knows very little about the subject, and who after 20 months in office has to be given aid in developing a policy. I would urge this task force to give speedy aid to the Minister of Agriculture.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks, I must, like all my colleagues, congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do so with great pleasure, inasmuch as everyone is unanimous that the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo and Nicolet-Yamaska (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté) have fulfilled their task exceptionally well and have brought honour to the people of their respective constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, this session of the centennial of confederation, to my mind, is a very special one. It should, I think, be one of the outstanding events of 1967 and help enhance parliament in the eyes of the Canadian people, not so much by the quantity of legislation which will be enacted as by the atmosphere it will achieve across Canada namely an atmosphere of understanding, dialogue and confidence in our institutions and in public men, and finally a guarantee of a better future in the economic and social fields.

Perusal of the speech from the throne shows a noticeable intention of the government to create such an atmosphere. Realism was sought by the avoidance of over-simplification of the problems and a general review indicated the considerable task remaining to be done, if the lives of all Canadians are to be improved as they should be.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Obviously, some people have claimed as usual that the speech from the throne offered nothing extraordinary or exceptional. But, on the whole, the comments are favourable on the government's listing of its responsibilities in different areas and of its determination in finding final solutions.

Towards the end of the speech from the throne he was reading, His Excellency the Governor General, to whom I would pay homage for his appointment and for the way in which he fulfils his duties, quoted the remarks of the first Governor General of Canada. It is surprising to realize to what extent this 100 year old text is still applicable today, in this centennial year. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of quoting them again:

> Within our borders peace, security and prosperity prevail, and I fervently pray that your aspirations may be directed to such high and patriotic objects, and that you may be endowed with such a spirit of moderation and wisdom as will cause you to render the great work of union—

Those words were spoken 100 years ago.

> —which has been achieved, a blessing to yourselves and your posterity, and a fresh starting point in the moral, political and material advancement of the people of Canada.

As you can see, the centennial message refers to peace, security, prosperity, aspiration, moderation, wisdom and finally a fresh start.

That fresh start is just as real today as it was 100 years ago, but today we also have to face an overall change in our twentieth century world where everything is put to test and where only progressive and determined men will manage to get the confidence of the people.

The time of small electoral promises and great oratory is gone, because many of our problems have a world or North American background and the people expect us to face them in a serious and responsible manner. When looking back, we can easily appreciate and assess the progress made in the last 100 years. Our country has reached a standard of living which is coveted by other countries in the world. We are still developing rapidly and there is more in store for us in the future.

Such assertion is surely an actual fact which deserves a celebration in this centennial year, but we must not stop there, because the challenge of the years to come, especially in the economic field, goes far beyond what we can imagine today.

There is also, Mr. Speaker, the problem of our constitutional evolution, which many put in the forefront on account of its effects on the relationship between our various levels of government, and its consequences—which is of significance—on the formulation of future policies in the various fields of jurisdiction.

Yet, it seems easy for some to extol overall solutions, such as writing immediately a new constitution. But I wonder how we could achieve this in a short time, when we have yet to agree on a formula to amend the present constitution, precisely because the province of Quebec fears that it would lose, through future amendments, some of the rights it now holds.

In addition, so far as I know, promoters of a new constitution have not yet put forward definite proposals that might serve as a basis for an immediately study.

As far as I am concerned, I believe it is our duty, as members of this house, to work within the bounds of the present constitution and to continue, under the skilful leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), to make the country progress economically and socially, while doing our utmost to maintain a spirit of co-operation, of dialogue with the provinces.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this centennial session is the appropriate occasion to pay tribute to all the great Canadians, to all those who contributed to our country's development during the last hundred years and particularly to those who assumed successively the functions of prime minister of Canada.

We have here in this house the present Prime Minister and his predecessor, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), two Canadians who spent their whole life serving the nation, and I think it is our duty to thank them for it and to pay tribute to them.

To come back to the debate on the government policy stated in the speech from the throne, I find it impossible to deal with the 25 or so matters mentioned therein. That is why I will limit my remarks to some specific points.

First of all, I was very happy to see emphasized the need for a revision of the rules of the house, and I hope we may agree on certain changes which will make our proceedings more efficient.

The preface to the second edition of a book distributed by the Interparliamentary Union entitled "Parliament", which is a comparative study of the structure and mode of operation of representative institutions in 55 countries, says that:

> Parliamentary reform, greater control by parliament over the executive, new parliamentary procedures to meet greater needs—all these are being studied and greatly discussed.

A little further on, there is this passage:

> The institution which best represents a nation and serves its true interests is not necessarily one which has been laboriously developed during a determined period in history. On the contrary, it is one which has changed and developed through constant effort in the light of experience accumulated under changing conditions.

This means that the problem of parliamentary reform is universal and that we should examine this question in the best interest of our democratic system. Personally, I think that, in addition to the changes which should be made in the rules of the House of Commons concerning the elimination and restriction of certain traditional debates which lead nowhere, the elimination of certain stages in the passing of government legislation, and the consideration and adoption of estimates, it is of the utmost importance that we re-examine thoroughly the status of the standing committees of the House of Commons. Those committees provide us with an instrument which can be very useful to parliament, and I think that the house should modify their structure so as to grant them a greater degree of autonomy, greater freedom in organizing their work and the funds necessary to hire research personnel.

As chairman of the committee on veterans affairs this past session, I would have liked the committee to sit from last fall until the end of the session, a few days ago, in order to complete the comparative study of our veterans pension plan.

During our trip to Europe in July 1966, we gathered in various countries some very interesting information on the benefits enjoyed there by veterans. It would have been most useful for the committee to have had the opportunity, on returning to Canada, to study this matter more thoroughly and to ask the departmental officials to testify before it, so as to obtain more information and their views.

Since we had already referred the departmental estimates back to the house and submitted our report on Dr. Richardson's study on Hong Kong veterans, we had no authority to meet, and we lost four or five months during which we could have prepared more properly for the work still to be done on the Woods report to be submitted shortly.

Mr. Speaker, in that connection, I must say I was disappointed at not finding in the speech from the throne any reference to veterans, to those who went overseas to defend their country and democracy and who sacrificed part of their health to enable younger generations to live in peace and freedom. I fully agree that the government is concerned with economic development, manpower, scientific progress, trade, etc., but I feel that nowadays those who served their country as gloriously as our Canadian soldiers are easily forgotten.

It is true that we pay them a very moving tribute on Remembrance Day, but after all, those of our veterans who suffered the hardships of war and came back marked for life should not be considered as second class citizens. At times, I deplore this modern world in which everything seems to be discarded in favour of technology and electronic machines and everything is judged and appraised according to its effectiveness, output and future potential.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that our assistance program for veterans is better than in certain countries, if not in most. May I add that these benefits must relate to the North American context and bring about a measure of well-being equivalent to the average of the population.

People talk about retraining and increase of workers' income, but the fact remains that the veteran is the worse paid Canadian considering the services he rendered to the nation, to society and to the world. Retrained or not, he will never regain what war atrocities took away from him.

I recognize that the Woods commission was created to consider the functioning and administration of the Canadian Pension Commission, and that we could hardly expect in the speech from the throne proposals for important reform to existing legislation.

At this stage, I take the opportunity to inform all members and perhaps to correct certain remarks made yesterday, that the Woods commission enjoys the full confidence of the veterans' associations and especially the Canadian Legion. I know that these same associations readily accept that this report may be somewhat delayed, because they are convinced that the commission has carried out its work in an unbiased and responsible way, and that the recommendations will be more effective for it.

However, Mr. Speaker, I think that, in this centennial year, the speech from the throne should have included at least a statement of intent, and even certain projects concerning matters not provided for in the studies of the Woods commission.

Before passing to another matter, I shall simply mention a few, namely: the basic rate of pensions and allowances, which should have been changed long ago, a system allowing for automatic pension increases based on a definite standard, such as the cost of living, salaries, etc., and let us not forget the project of a memorial for the veterans of the two world wars in the national capital, and the eventual development of the Vimy park, that Canadian soil to the memory of veterans in France.

Therefore, I hope that before the end of the year the government will bring forward some concrete measures to show its concern for war veterans, through the good offices of the minister in charge of this department.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne refers to regional development, foreign investments, retraining of workers, for which the government should be congratulated, but I take the liberty of adding that, at the same time, we should not forget our responsibilities, especially as concerns existing industries, and our duty to maintain in our country an environment conducive to their development.

I refer especially to the textile industry which is now experiencing a very heavy competition from foreign imports, especially Japanese, which have increased by 72.7 per cent from 1964 to 1966 inclusive. It is a known fact that the industry which was going through a serious stagnation period in 1950 has succeeded in recovering and investing from 1961 to 1966 an amount of $635 million. However, the present situation shows that a major deterioration can be expected in 1967, unless the government takes some action to protect that industry which provides employment for 200,000 persons.

I know that the government is conscious of the problem and that it will succeed in taking a firm stand during negotiations which are under way with Japan, so as to avoid disastrous effects for the Canadian textile industry.

In the field of urban development, I am pleased to congratulate the government for the step taken last year, when it signed an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec among others, in order to undertake pilot surveys in certain municipalities which will lead us, I hope, to the establishment of a general program of urban development throughout the province. In the past, such an endeavour had generally been left to private enterprise or to individuals but it is advisable that the two levels of government should take some practical measures in that field which are bound to complete the services already offered under the National Housing Act through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

As the problem of water pollution, which seems to be on the priority list of the government, cannot be solved at the national level only, I hope that the central government, in addition to passing this new water legislation, as announced in the speech from the throne, and in addition to co-operating with the provinces, will not forget to amend the National Housing Act, which provides for municipal loans for building water purification plants and sewage systems. As many initiatives in this field can originate at the municipal level, I am of the opinion that the remission of part of the capital and interest during the construction period, which is now 25 per cent, should be raised to at least 50 per cent or more, for I am convinced that will mean concrete services and give immediate results.

With regard to agriculture, Mr. Speaker, at a time when Ontario and Quebec farmers talk of marching on the Canadian capital because of the dairy policy of the government, it is still comforting to see that a special team, headed by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) will be entrusted with defining our objectives in the field of agriculture and with recommending such programs as will be considered necessary to attain those goals. Poultices have been used far too long to solve agricultural problems and it is good to see that a solid foundation is being sought on which to develop, in conjunction with the provinces, a national farm policy. Still, that will not solve anything this year and, especially, not satisfy the dairy producers. I trust, however, that as a result of surveys now under way on the dairy policy for the current year, and representations from the majority of the members, certain anomalies will be corrected on which the present discontent is founded. One of my colleagues on this side of the house will go further into that matter this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are certainly not indifferent about what is going on in Canadian politics and in each capital throughout the country, as people everywhere, they expect from those various levels of government measures which will help them continue their efforts towards the progress and development of the country. I think, however, that they are worried about a problem which affects them perhaps more deeply than is imagined, namely that of the political context in which we have been living for the last few years, where overbidding, shattering statements and public conflicts make the headlines every day and give a false idea of our Canadian society.

It is true that we are now going through a period of political evolution, that many matters are being re-examined and that the aspirations of the various Canadian groups are becoming increasingly distinct. But I wonder nevertheless whether we might not succeed in solving our problems in a more discreet and perhaps more enlightened manner around a negotiation table, through open and constructive discussion.

Of course, it is sometimes necessary in political circles to arouse public opinion. But I wonder if it is really enlightened by some of our attitudes and our off-hand approach to certain problems, especially constitutional problems.

At this point, I am not speaking of those who do not believe in Canada and who would destroy it; I am thinking mostly of our public men who are in power and who all seem to want the same thing, namely to reinforce Canadian unity through a better understanding of each others' problems.

In this year of the centennial of confederation, during Expo '67 whose theme is "Man and his World", at a time when His Holiness Pope Paul VI is appealing for brotherhood throughout the world, should we not open up our minds to the world by starting to practice those great principles of brotherhood which were suggested, particularly by the Canadian bishops in their letter to all canadians on the occasion of the centennial of confederation?

I shall close by quoting a paragraph of that letter:

> It is not being brotherly to be content with abstract formulas, verbal statements or sterile hopes, be they as generous as the whole world is big. It is not being brotherly to love mankind in the abstract or to make noble dreams of solidarity with far-off brothers while taking an attitude of meanness or hostility towards those nearer to us. True brotherhood must create immediate and practical solidarity; it must be real and materialize in an actual interest for the welfare of a group, an area, a specific human family. But, on the other hand, to conform to the Gospel, concrete brotherhood must not be restrictive. No group has the right to feel it is the centre of everything to the point where the call of others is no longer heard nor their needs heeded.

The true drama of human history, is that man too often yields to the temptation of building self-centered brotherhood.

Mr. Speaker, I realize the time allotted to me has gone by faster than I expected. I would have liked to deal a bit with two or three other items, namely broadcasting and television as well as the arts, but I shall do so during some future debate.

[English]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, although wishing to join sincerely in the congratulations extended to the mover and seconder of the address in reply, and of course wholeheartedly in the cordial sentiments expressed to His Excellency, nevertheless no one participating in the debate on the throne speech itself can fail to feel and to express regret that the speech should be so bare of outline of any statement of objectives which might give some encouragement and leadership to the Canadian people as we enter upon the one hundredth year of our history.

Indeed one of the things the throne speech has done, and unfortunately about the only thing it has done, is to increase the sense of concern, the sense of frustration of the Canadian people who are looking, longing and waiting so anxiously to see some signs that their government is going to come to grips with the problems that concern the people and give some program to launch us on the direction that the country needs in the second century of our existence.

People are looking and waiting to see these signs, Mr. Speaker, I have been across Canada quite extensively during the past few weeks and I find that the Canadian people are deeply concerned about the attitudes of governments and the role and relationship that should prevail between government and people. They are deeply concerned about the weight of government, the weight of the different levels of government but primarily of the federal government on their backs. They are deeply concerned over the inefficiency of government. They are deeply concerned because they find that notwithstanding increasing expenditures and increasing taxes, the problems that require action by government do not seem to be receiving the attention of the government.

[Mr. Laniel.]

The people are concerned because the problems mount, and the lack of action mounts in direct relationship, it appears, to the cost of government. They are concerned over taxes. They are concerned over the fact that property taxes across Canada this year have gone up an average of 11 per cent in a single year as municipalities, especially with inadequate revenue bases, seek to discharge all the responsibilities saddled upon them and which should no longer be saddled upon them.

The people are concerned over government spending, and over the fact that federal estimates for all expenditure this year have gone up over 13 per cent in a single year, with no encouragement to hope that there will be any increase in efficiency or real action on the problems that concern the people.

They are concerned over the cost of living which mounts steadily, unheeded and unchecked by anything done by government, indeed with the increase stimulated by the kind of programs that this government in Ottawa has been following. The cost of living has gone up over one point in just this past month, probably a record increase in a single month, and the people are concerned because the government appears to be unconcerned about it, unhurried to do anything about it, concerned only to pass the buck. The best contribution the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) could make was to say that the main reason for the increase lay at the door of the increased sales tax put on in the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, of course one regrets any increase in sales taxes. But what a feeble and impertinent excuse it is for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp), who maintains a 12 per cent sales tax on building materials, construction machinery and equipment, to seek to lay the blame for this sort of thing on a sales tax applied by a province.

The nonsense of this position is demonstrated by the fact that the increase in the cost of living went up 1.7 points in Montreal. To be sure, perhaps the sales tax in Quebec had something to do with it, but did the sales tax in Quebec account for the fact that the cost of living in Vancouver rose by 1.3 points? Is the minister going to blame that on the province of Quebec, or will he accept his responsibility for the policies which has contributed to the inflationary pressures? When will he accept his responsibility to take action to establish the kind of program and tax policy—a kind of over-all governmental policy—which will give the Canadian people some relief from the crushing burden of government, and which will bring about some efficiency in the spending of the money which is collected from them in the way of taxes?

This is what the Canadian people are concerned about. Later in my remarks I should like to suggest some of the progressive things which should be done to give us a sense of direction and prosperity as we enter upon our centennial year in the second century of our history. First, I believe it is necessary to analyse the things that concern our people, in order to understand what the problems are in the sphere of governmental responsibility in respect of which it is essential that action be taken. I am satisfied that there is a growing feeling on the part of the Canadian people that they want a government with a basic philosophy, a basic understanding, and a declaration of what should be the role of the government and the relationship of that government to the people—a government which will set forth the principles it intends to follow and state its position as to whether it intends to do more and more things for more and more people at more and more cost, or whether in fact it is going to have confidence in the ability of the Canadian people to do things for themselves and be guided by the belief that the primary responsibility of the government is to establish the atmosphere and lay down the general policies under which the Canadian people in fact can do more and more things for themselves.

This is what concerns our people; they want more freedom to move. They feel the crushing weight of government on their backs. You, Mr. Speaker, I, and everybody in this house know that the people of this country have a tremendous talent and ability—a latent talent—for doing things. The Canadian people should be able to move; they should be given the freedom to move. They want to be free to move ahead in order to insure their own future. This is the instinct which is in the heart of every Canadian. He wishes to do this so that he will be better off at the end of the year than he was at the beginning. He wants freedom; he wants the government to get off his back, at least a little, so that he will be relieved of the weight which grinds him down and freezes him in his present position.

Primarily there is one way in which Canadians can be allowed to move and improve their own position; that is, if the government will follow a general policy, a basic philosophy, which leaves to the people a little more freedom at the end of the year, a little more to invest for themselves, and a little more to enable them to have a stake in and be part of this growing and developing nation, so that they will be able to insure their future. That is what the Canadian people want. The government should set forth and follow that basic policy. It should encourage the movement forward of Canadians and the investment by Canadians in a stake in Canada itself.

But, Mr. Speaker, instead what do we find? We are served up with this throne speech, this mealy mass of words. There is no sense of direction, no clarity of position and no indication of any real understanding of the very basic nature of the country and its people. The throne speech in fact can lay only one claim; that is, if the philosophy of the present government is to be followed, the government which already occupies so many fields which it should not occupy will occupy the few remaining fields in which it does not yet intrude. That is the whole policy in the speech from the throne—a further extension of government intrusion into the management of people's affairs.

Can't you just see the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet when they sat down to draft the speech from the throne. Perhaps this is the reason the Prime Minister called back the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon). Perhaps he wanted him to write it from the left wing point of view, along with the points of view of the other members of the government. You can just see them sitting there as they ponder it. One can picture the Prime Minister asking the President of the Privy Council what should be their basic theme, and the President of the Privy Council replying that perhaps it should be a further extension of the government's activities. I can just hear the Prime Minister replying, "I guess you are right. All right, we have made a first class mess of the others; let us see what kind of a mess we can make of these." This is precisely what will be done; they have started already. They certainly are making a first class mess of their own cabinet, and of the doctrine of cabinet solidarity and responsible government.

What a mockery it is when a Prime Minister excuses, apologizes, and walks around the fact that one of his senior ministers has come out with a statement on an important fundamental matter of policy which is radically different from the policy enunciated by that responsible spokesman the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), and himself. What a mockery this makes of the system of responsible government. If in fact—and I suggest that the Prime Minister's attitude comes very close to it—this government and this Prime Minister no longer believe in and have decided not to be bound by the doctrine of cabinet solidarity and responsible parliamentary government, why do they not be honest enough to say so, so that there can be frank discussion, instead of seeking to hide it away while they deliberately follow courses which are meaningless.

Mr. Speaker, responsible parliamentary government means that this parliament is able to hold the government responsible. The government is responsible to parliament, and in this parliament to the people; but how can you hold the government responsible when its policies and positions are like little quicksilver fragments, and when five or six ministers are able to state five or six different positions and then say that they are speaking as private citizens and not as cabinet ministers?

When a man is called upon, and agrees to assume the solemn duties and responsibilities of cabinet office then he must assume those responsibilities and be bound by them. If he does not care to assume them, then he should not join the cabinet. If he should find that the policies of the government are those which he cannot support, then, as a matter of conscience, he should resign. But he cannot, and the country cannot, afford the luxury which allows a cabinet minister the right to speak as a private citizen and continue to be a member of the government. Those two things are simply incompatible. They make a mockery of responsible government. And responsible government is not just a hollow form of words; it is what this parliament is here for, it is one of the chief things parliament is all about.

I address these remarks to hon. members on the other side of the chamber, who I am sure are as much concerned about this situation as we on this side. Hon. members opposite also have the responsibility to their constituents of holding this government to account. How can members of parliament hold accountable a government whose position is completely indiscernible and is fragmented into as many variations as there are members of the cabinet?

Mr. O'Keefe: Where do you stand?

Mr. Fulton: I stand here in the House of Commons endeavouring to bring to the minds of hon. members opposite, including the hon. member who just interrupted, some sense of their responsibilities and duties, and indeed rights, as members of parliament. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who interrupted that he has as much of a duty, right and responsibility—I refer to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. O'Keefe)—as I have to hold government accountable and responsible. But because of interjections of the kind he has just made, I fear—if I may suggest this to him kindly—that he is not showing a very great readiness to discharge that aspect of his responsibilities.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fulton: So, Mr. Speaker, we see the spectacle of a government and a Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) unable or unwilling even to resolve the difficulties in their own cabinet, a government frozen into inaction with respect to the things that really matter and the problems that concern the Canadian people. We see the situation as exemplified by the travesty enacted here by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon); we see it in the travesty represented by the lack of information on the Geneva agreements on tariffs and trade.

Heavens, Mr. Speaker, this government has been negotiating those agreements for about two years, and one would have thought that in that length of time the ministers would have become reasonably familiar with the effects of the tariff changes. If they have not become familiar with them, I am sure their advisers, those who conducted the negotiations in detail, are familiar with them. Yet we are told by the government that they are completely incapable at the present time of outlining for Canadian industry, Canadian agriculture, Canadian business and Canadians generally what will be the effect of the tariff changes which they have now agreed to and to which they have committed the country.

An hon. Member: They will not even list them.

Mr. Fulton: They will not even list them. They refuse to answer questions in this respect. They are frozen into inactivity when it comes to taking action and giving information on the problems concerning the people. I am very much concerned with the government's position on the Geneva agreements because I read in today's press that whereas the United States does not intend to implement the changes in detail except over a five year period, our government, although they will not inform the Canadian people of the effect of the changes, are committed to put the agreements into effect much more quickly. The indication is that these agreements will be put into effect this year.

This information should be given at once, so that we may have knowledge of what the effects and results of the agreements will be, so that parliament then, when the government's proposal is laid before it, will be informed and we will have an opportunity to discuss with those concerned the effects of the changes, and so that we may again, hold the government accountable and responsible. We want this information as quickly as possible. I see no reason on earth—and I see very grave dangers and disadvantages in Canada's actually implementng these changes in a hurry while the United States takes five years to implement theirs—why we should not be given this information now. Hon. members can be quite certain, can they not, that the last changes the United States will implement are those which give advantages to other countries? Yet Canada is going to implement the whole of the agreements straight off the bat, according to the best information we can get, making these concessions available to all other countries, including the United States; but that country will not make its concessions available to us except over a period of five years. I seriously urge upon the government that this is one case where Canada's actions need not be in advance of the actions of those with whom we have made these agreements.

I should like to express another hope, Mr. Speaker; that is, that the government has made sure that in the agreements and accords it has reached at Geneva adequate provision has been made for the inclusion of an enforceable and valid fair value for duty, an anti-dumping provision, in the interests of our fruit and vegetable industry. I know, as a result of my experience over the years, the difficulty of enforcing the present provisions because of the interpretation given to them and the position taken under the GATT agreements. I know also of the very real and continuing need of the fruit and vegetable industry in Canada, and particularly in British Columbia where it is so vulnerable to Californian imports. I know the need of that industry for continued concern on the part of the government that there should be available adequate and enforceable provisions to prevent dumping and to enable government officials to set fair values for duty.

These are just some of the matters that occurred to me as I was thinking about the ways in which this government is frozen into inaction and the rising concern on the part of the Canadian people. The people are demanding that we get on with these problems and take action to solve them. The people want action on the real problems which face us today. These are new problems. They are the problems of now and of the second century of confederation. The Canadian people want to see their government and parliament come to grips with these problems, instead of having dished up to them the issues of three or four years ago, because these issues could not matter less to the people today. They want us to concern ourselves with the problems of today and tomorrow.

As I said, they are new problems. They are the problems of an urban society. Seventy per cent of Canadians now live in the cities and it is estimated that within 10 years this figure will have risen to 80 per cent. This is a new development that is entirely different from the situation that existed even 25 years ago, let alone 100 years ago. We face the problems of urbanization and the age of automation, which bring with them a whole host of related problems. The problems of delinquency are greatly accented in an urban society. When I was minister of justice we had a clear, concise, succinct report from a committee which studied these problems. That committee made over 100 recommendations, but not one of its recommendations has yet been implemented. This report has been in the hands of the government since 1965. The problems of delinquency are of growing concern to the Canadian people.

Urbanization has brought with it new problems of housing and transportation. The problems of transportation today are entirely different from those of 100 or even 25 years ago. There is the problem of pollution, the conservation of an adequate supply of pure, clean water and air to meet the needs of the present and future generations. Our people have a right to these things. Who would have said 25 years ago, or 100 years ago when this country was established, that we would today have a real and urgent problem of conserving Canada's water and cleaning our air?

The problems of education are also entirely different, not only quantitatively but in kind, from the problems of education 100 years ago or even 25 years ago. These are the problems which concern the Canadian people. They are concerned because they can see no effect in the action to deal with them, while the cost of the government supposed to deal with them continues to mount. This is of concern especially to the average Canadian wage and salary earner. These things give rise to feelings amounting to frustration.

The problems today are new. They are new and different from what they were even 25, let alone 100 years ago. The problems have changed. The trouble is that this government is not applying to those problems any new answers which will enable us to deal with them. Because things change; Canada has moved forward and will continue to move forward at an ever accelerating pace. New problems will continue to arise. Problems change. It is true that principles do not change, but let us apply the principles to the new problems because, after all, what is policy but the application of a principle to a problem. Let us apply the principles to the new problems and come up with new and realistic policies which will solve these problems.

I suggest to you, sir, that in the area about which I have been speaking and in the general area of the responsibility of the government to take action on problems, the principle to apply is the basic concept of confederation. Let us apply that principle to the new problems and come up with a real policy which will give the real answers. To do that, of course, it is necessary to have some understanding of the basic concept of confederation upon which this country was established, and an intention and a declaration that we will preserve that concept and build on it.

What is the concept? It is the concept of the two founding nations, now joined by many others which have come to help us from elsewhere, joining together on terms of partnership and equality. The four original provinces have become ten provinces and have come together on the same basis and in equality. The concept of confederation was that they would come together in one political union, one whole, making a nation with a strong central government having the power and ability to bring the strength and the resources of the whole to the aid and assistance of the parts. Thus the parts would be greater and better off than they could possibly be without being part of the whole, and the growing strength of the parts would add greater strength to the whole, making the confederation, Canada, much greater than the mere sum of its separate parts.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Let us build on that concept. There can be no doubt that this concept is still valid and viable today. That is what must be preserved and built upon, because it is a splendid and uniquely Canadian concept.

When I hear people say that Canada does not have a distinctive character, I sometimes wonder why these people cannot see what is right before their eyes, namely that we have and have had a distinctive national character for 100 years. The very fact which makes us distinctive and different is this concept of partnership and equality, the very concept of confederation. On the basis of this concept our peoples have done great things together in the past. We have laid the foundations for a great nation, and in the first 25 years after confederation, in spite of enormous problems as compared to today, and very little in the way of technical machinery and equipment, we established within 15 short years a foundation for a nation extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. However, not only is it necessary to have the confidence that we have done great things together in the past, such as our participation in two world wars and all the other things which went into the building of a nation, but also to have the confidence that we will do greater things together in the future, because that is what brings people together—the consciousness of having done great things together in the past and the determination to do great things together in the future. It is the responsibility of the government to ensure that the machinery of the government is adequate to deal with the problems it is called upon to meet.

I go back to the fact that the problems have changed, and yet in so far as we attempt to deal with them we are attempting to deal with the detailed organization of a government of 100 years ago. Surely what is necessary is, first of all, a willingness to study and agree upon what are the problems requiring action and what is their order of priority. Should housing come first, or transportation or social welfare?

Let us get agreement upon what are the urgent problems for which people want answers, and then let us discuss the question of which level of government, the federal or the provincial, is responsible for action on these problems. Only then can we intelligently discuss the important question of dividing tax revenues to enable the government properly to fulfil the responsibilities which have been assigned or reassigned to them. This is the process which we are so anxious to see begun, the process of discussion, of facing up to problems and bringing about an organization of government based on the concept of confederation which will enable the government to deal with the problems on behalf of the people.

I urge the government, in spite of the Prime Minister's reluctance to call such a conference, to bring the different levels of government together and work out the reorganization of the structure of the government so as to lay the foundation for the grand design for the second century of the confederation.

Mr. O'Keefe: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of privilege? During the course of the hon. member's speech—and he is a member for whom I have a certain amount of respect —I believe he said, and I might have misunderstood him, that the hon. member for St. John's East was in some way not discharging his duties properly. I would appreciate hearing from the hon. member for Kamloops, whom we see here so seldom now, in what areas the member for St. John's East is not properly discharging his duties.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. gentleman's question. I was dealing with the question of the ability of the parliament to hold the government responsible and accountable, and therefore the importance of preserving the doctrine of cabinet solidarity so we would know what the policy of the government was for which we are seeking to hold it responsible. I am glad to explain it to the hon. gentleman again.

I suggest to the hon. member that that is a right and a duty devolving as much on members on his side of the house as on members on our side of the house. I also suggest to him that the kind of interruption which he made three times during the course of my speech indicates perhaps that he does not have a proper appreciation of his rights and duties in that regard.

Mr. J.-P. Racine (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, as the previous speakers, I should like to duly congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté). Our two colleagues did a good job and the congratulations they got from all corners of the house were well deserved.

I do not intend to take all time of the house, this afternoon, but since agriculture is the current topic, you understand that, as the representative of the riding of Beauce, I want to say a word on this matter, especially in view of the new sub-amendment and even the previous one.

Naturally, farmers—and I refer not only to those in Quebec but to those of eastern Canada—have started asserting their rights as all unionized workers. I do not think we should blame them for it. And if they come to Ottawa on May 24, they will only be following the example of certain other organizations.

They will not come, at least from what I know after having met them, to blame the government, but rather to explain their position and make representations, just as labour movements such as the C.L.C., the C.N.T.U. and others do.

So I do not think we would blame them. However, I must say here—and farmers are aware of it—that in 1965, for instance, the price of manufacturing milk was $3.25, in May 1966, $4, and now, in May 1967, $4.75.

Our farmers' unions know that the government is getting to understand them better but the unions themselves realize that they must be better represented here. That is one of the reasons why they will come again on May 24.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about quotas here in this house. The farmers themselves have talked about them. Are quotas beneficial or prejudicial to farmers? I will certainly not settle the question myself.

We have created, as we had promised, the Canadian Dairy Commission which, I hope will settle the question to the satisfaction of farmers.

Incidentally—this is information I got not long ago and which proves that there must be quotas—quite recently, and this relates to the price of milk, three Montreal physicians purchased a 500-acre farm in St. Thomas d'Aquin, in the riding of St. Hyacinthe, to breed a herd of 48 cows which they wished to increase to 125.

Since the price of milk was raised to $4.75, we have seen the recurrence of a problem familiar in the past, that is, every time the government helps the farmers in one way or another, outsiders step in to get something out of the increase.

I feel, and I believe the C.F.U. agrees with me on this, that those quotas, which apply strictly to the farmer and not to the farm, will certainly be able to protect agriculture in that regard.

I have every reason to believe that the C.F.U., through its representations, will not only criticize but also help the government maintain its quota policy in order to protect the farmers.

It is true that farmers have asked $5.10 per hundredweight of milk. I agree with them; I am for $5.10 per hundredweight. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) himself is for $5.10, as well as the Minister of Finance and Receiver General (Mr. Sharp). In fact, we all regret that we cannot grant that amount immediately, but nevertheless we have created, in recent months, a Canadian Dairy Commission and a Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

Now, what is important for farmers is not so much the price paid as the margin between what they get and their cost. It is the profit, that is the difference between the buying price and the selling price, or between the cost of producing and the selling price. It is the profit that counts.

I have the impression, Mr. Speaker, that thanks to the new Canadian Livestock Feed Board, the production cost will be lower and that the difference between the price of $5.10 and the cost of production will perhaps be spread out in such a way that a farmer will make a higher profit.

One often hears about the sale price, Mr. Speaker, but what matters to our farmers, ours at least, is what is left, and if the Canadian Livestock Feed Board can reduce the production cost, the farmers will certainly make a better profit.

Our farmers have often been blamed for asking. It is true that they have asked for things in the past, and at the present time, they are perhaps asking for several things because all together they have finally gathered a group of farmers and unionized them.

I do not think that the farmers should be blamed for getting unionized as the workers do. Our C.F.U. leaders, regardless of what may be said of them, are pursuing a very desirable objective. As in the other fields, they make requests. It is their right, and I think they are right to do so.

It has been said for instance in the past, that some members do not work extensively for the farmers and it is understandable. It is due to the fact that some members do not come from rural areas and they must defend either the workers or the consumers. But I think that we, from rural areas, must not only protect them but work towards the best possible standard of living for the people who live in our rural areas.

I think that the leaders of the farm unions do not make excessive demands at the present time with regard to agriculture, and the delegation which they will send to Ottawa on May 24 will not come here to blame the government but rather to uphold their rights. If they keep it up, I think they deserve our congratulations. Coming from an agricultural riding as I do, I commend them for their objective working methods.

Agriculture in our province, and probably in the other provinces, is facing certain problems, of course, and without the C.F.U., at least in our district, we, in Ottawa, would never have heard about those problems and probably never could have studied and solved them.

Referring once again to the speech from the throne, I hope that the officials of the Department of Labour will keep on making representations to the United States government with regard to our lumbermen who work in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, since you were here a few years ago, you remember no doubt that I have often raised that problem. However, I am glad that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson) continues to negotiate with the American government in order to obtain for Canadian lumbermen working in the United States the right to receive unemployment insurance benefits. The problem is important, for those who understand the lunber industry know that these people only work a few months of the year in the United States and that, since they normally work in another country, they have no right to unemployment insurance. Apparently, the American authorities are reconsidering the matter. I am glad to see that the minister and his officials continue to seek with them a solution to this most important problem, for it is a little difficult, in my opinion, to earn a salary during only four or five months of the year and, during the rest of the year, get an adequate revenue to meet the needs of one's family.

I shall say no more, Mr. Speaker. These were some comments I wished to make on this debate. Let me say, in concluding, that I just wanted to point out that the farmers belonging to the C.F.U. simply wish to discuss their problems with the government. In my opinion, that is very important. The farmers are not dissatisfied, but merely want to talk with the representatives of the Department of Agriculture, the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Canadian Livestock Feed Board.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say briefly, and I think hon. members will agree with me, that the march of the farmers on the 24th is like those organized by the other workers' movements and that we should welcome them, since they are coming to see us with good intentions and with very important problems to submit. We should give consideration to their claims, since they are part of the Canadian people whom we represent in this house.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, at the very beginning of my remarks, I should like to say that I have taken note of the statement made by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Racine) concerning the dairy policy of this government. I am happy to see that our friends in the Liberal party and, in particular, the hon. member for Beauce wholly support the claims made by our farmers in eastern Canada. I believe the hon. member understands the problem and I shall see later, when the vote is taken, if he will be consistent with himself and if he will vote for the amendment we are moving to improve the situation of the dairy industry among our farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Jamieson and Côté).

• (5:10 p.m.)

In my opinion, they have made to parliament an excellent contribution which deserves to be pointed out.

Mr. Speaker, the session which began on May 8, 1967, has an historic character since it is called the centennial session. And when we refer to the centennial, we recall the work of the fathers of confederation who, in 1867, succeeded in concentrating in he British North America Act, the aspirations, rights and privileges of the various ethnic groups which then made up the population of the country.

But in 1967, we should ask ourselves, in my opinion, if that constitutional act meets the objectives of a modern and industrialized Canada. Naturally, lengthy dissertations are unnecessary to prove that Canadians are dissatisfied with that constitutional act, a situation which refutes the arguments of those who would maintain the status quo in the constitutional field.

In the past few years, all Canadians have become conscious of the need for their elected representatives to stop, ponder, and study the means to revise this constitutional act which has become old-fashioned, obsolete and no longer adequate to meet the requirements and objectives of a modern community.

For the past four years, Mr. Speaker, our party has been advocating that a federal-provincial conference, grouping all the political elements of all parties, be called, and that it start studying the changes which would make our constitution more flexible in the context of our confederation. It seems—and I stress those words—that people are too often inclined to let the French Canadians bear the task of changing the terms of our Canadian constitution, but this need is also felt by our English-Canadian friends who have come to share this idea in the past few years, and I believe that unity has been achieved in that respect. I could state that the great majority of all Canadians demand these amendments to our constitution.

Quebec has established a parliamentary committee to study future participation of French Canadians in our confederation system and the Ontario government has decided to hold a constitutional conference next September to deal with the same problem. In Quebec, the parliamentary committee on the constitution has invited all intermediate organizations to file working papers so as to ascertain the opinion of all classes of the Quebec community on such an important problem. Ontario will invite the provincial premiers to set up an agenda on the subject and to lay down the basic principles which will guide the labours of those who believe in the future of our country but who, meanwhile, would amend our constitutional set up of 1967. It seems to me there is no point in shedding tears and going over the inequities this or that ethnic group has suffered in the past hundred years, but we should rather make use of our past to analyse this hundred-year-old coexistence in order to redefine the powers of each government in the light of the changes in our modern society.

But what is the attitude of the present government towards this question? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau)—we heard him several times in the house—seems to favour the status quo. He says that, in the course of time, we shall find solutions as to the changes to bring to our constitution.

It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that the government did not want to move for four years. It would rather let the technocrats establish a committee that was supposed to study our constitutional problems, and it denies the members elected by the people the right to sit at a round table, to form a parliamentary committee so as to discuss our constitutional problems very objectively.

And yet, this very difficult task cannot be entrusted to technocrats only; it must be committed to the elected representatives of the people who, alone, have a mandate to assert the aspirations of their social group.

In view of the government inertness, no wonder that there is among the young generation, in Quebec a feeling of dissatisfaction which is often expressed by separatist demonstrations. They want the quiet revolution, which is taking place in our Quebec society, to go beyond the limits of our province and tackle also the constitutional problems of our nation. I am convinced that the majority of French Canadians reject separatism, but, at the same time, they refuse to be active in antiquated and obsolete confederative frameworks which no longer meet the objectives of young Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I have often met young Quebeckers who do not accept separatist ideas, but who may do so some day if the federal government refuses to budge and continues to appear deaf to their claims. It is to this lack of leadership on the part of this government that is ascribed the present unrest, not only in Quebec, but also in English-speaking Canada.

According to the speech from the throne, in reply to Canadians who request an amendment of the constitution, the present government proposes to hold a conference of the premiers on July 1, 1967, at which time a statement of principle would be adopted and annexed to the existing constitution. That formula, Mr. Speaker, I say it again, is not bold enough, not imaginative enough, and cannot be accepted in the present circumstances. To paraphrase the now famous words of André Laurendeau, who wrote a few years ago when bilingual cheques were adopted that it was too little and too late I say that the formula suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) to have the provincial premiers meet in July simply to lay down a statement of principle to be annexed to our present constitution is coming too late. What we need at this time is to call our political leaders together, whatever their political allegiance for a discussion of the amendments to the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, now is the time to act, I think and to act quickly; this policy of nostrums must stop as far as our relations with the provinces are concerned. Up to now, we have succeeded in delaying the constitutional crisis by allowing the provinces to exert their exclusive jurisdiction in certain cases. As far as the various jurisdictions are concerned, we should have a planned and not an improvised policy. It is high time to amend the constitution in this area; it is high time that powers of taxation be defined. It is high time that each government be given freedom to exert its exclusive jurisdiction in its own fields; it is high time that the federal government stop intruding on provincial jurisdictions as it has been doing too often in the past four years in education, in public health and in civil rights.

All that to say, Mr. Speaker, that when we call for a constitutional conference to study all those problems, it is not a whim but a necessity.

In Canada, there are two major groups, the English and the French, and they must have an opportunity to coexist in a climate of mutual respect. This respect will be achieved, Mr. Speaker, when those two main groups are convinced that they can grow together, according to their respective ideals, with an equal status, as the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) said this afternoon. The coexistence of those two main groups in Canada will be perfect when they have the feeling and conviction that they are equal partners enjoying equal rights within confederation.

It seems to me that when we speak, in this house, of a special status for Quebec, many hon. members are scandalized. Quebec is not a province like the others, as it has too often been pointed out perhaps. It has a different culture and it must have the opportunity of demanding from the majority of Canadians the rights and privileges required for the development of the Quebec nation.

Section 133 of the constitution which guarantees the use of both official languages must be extended. In my opinion, that section no longer meets the urgent needs of the Quebec society. That authority must be extended to give French Canadians the opportunity to make an adequate cultural contribution to Canada.

It is that stubborn determination not to look squarely at all the problems related to the revision of our constitution which will increase in Quebec the number of separatist and independence movements. And that must be avoided at all costs. The greatness and prestige of Canada are great because our country is made up of two majority groups, the French and the English, and of various ethnic groups which live within it. Refusing to recognize that fact, Mr. Speaker, would be to deny Canada's destiny in America.

I therefore ask the government to show itself worthy of the task and to start studying right away that delicate and difficult matter: the revision of our constitution.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is five thirty. May I call it five thirty?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five thirty o'clock it is my duty pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Ormiston). Had I voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might have the indulgence of the house to rise for a moment on what I suppose I can describe only as a question of personal privilege. I made two terrible errors on the orders of the day this afternoon. I attempted to be funny and spoke in a language which is not my native tongue. I used the word "promenade" when I should have used the word "marche". I did not intend to suggest that the farmers were going on a hike; I intended to say I understood they were going to walk.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 18, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CONGRATULATIONS AND BEST WISHES FROM IDAHO STATE LEGISLATURE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform hon. members that I have received a joint memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the legislature of the state of Idaho conveying the best wishes of that legislature on the occasion of our centennial. I am sure hon. members will want me to reply on their behalf.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RAPP—NEWSPAPER ARTICLE RESPECTING APPOINTMENT AS CONSERVATIVE WHIP

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of personal privilege having to do with a newspaper article written by Peter Newman which attacks me as the Tory whip supposedly appointed by my leader to the dismay of the caucus at large. The article also refers to my having ordered buses to take Conservative M.P.'s to Expo and reserving most of the seats for Diefenbaker loyalists.

This article is a fabricated lie. It attacks my leader and myself, and every Conservative knows it is a lie and would back up my statement. Peter Newman and I both came from Europe, his name originally being Peter Neuman. We know there was in Europe another who always fabricated lies. His name was Dr. Goebbels. Peter Newman has now taken on the role of Goebbels here in Canada.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, also on a point of personal privilege in view of the fact that my name was mentioned in that article, I feel I should like to put on the record the fact that to the best of my knowledge there is no foundation whatever for certain inferences which have been drawn in regard to myself. It would appear to me from the wording of the article that there is an implication that I may not have been a supporter of the leader of our party. I should like to go on record at this time as saying that I doubt very much whether there is anyone in Canada who is a greater supporter of our leader. I feel this way, Mr. Speaker, because I believe he is one of the greatest Canadians of our first century.

I also do not agree with the inferences which have been drawn about the whip of our party. I for one am heartily in agreement with the choice of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale as whip of the Conservative party.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR DESTRUCTION OF CRIMINAL RECORDS

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-115, to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of criminal records).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Tolmie: Mr. Speaker, I introduced this bill in June of 1966, incorporating the principle of erasing criminal records. The purpose of this bill is to relieve many Canadians who have paid their debt to society and are now law abiding, but are still suffering from the continuing stigma and disadvantage of a criminal record.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VISITING FORCES ACT

REPLACEMENT OF EXISTING LEGISLATION RESPECTING VISITING FORCES

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-3 (from the Senate), respecting the armed forces of countries visiting Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—OPPORTUNITY FOR EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN VIEWPOINT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been directed to the views expressed in the United States Senate by a number of senators, including Senator Mansfield, a Democrat, and Senator Aiken, a Republican, both of whom visited Ottawa last week in connection with the meeting of the Canada-United States parliamentary group.

In view of the danger pointed out by them that further increases in military activity against North Viet Nam might foreclose the last possibility for a peaceful settlement and bring red China and the Soviet union into the war—warnings that are serious to Canadians and people all over the world—would the Prime Minister now agree that a resolution should be introduced in this house so the United States may understand the attitude of Canada, in view of the divisions which have been apparent in the cabinet until yesterday, which resolution would call upon the United States to discontinue bombing or, if not, to restrict it to those areas of ingress and egress, in other words to communication roads, so it never could be said that in this parliament we failed to act at a time of grave and international peril.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have seen press reports of the statement to which my right hon. friend refers. I should like to have the text of that statement before making any comment whatsoever on it. I am not at all sure that the procedure suggested by my right hon. friend would be the best way to accomplish the purpose which all of us have in mind. However, I will be glad to consider it.

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can a statement be made to the house concerning the information the government has regarding the situation in the Middle East? In particular can we be told in what way Canada is using her good offices to help resolve this serious situation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Secretary General met with the countries which are contributing to the United Nations emergency force in the Gaza strip. The government of the U.A.R. has served notice on the commander of that force that in the interests of its security the United Nations patrols should be withdrawn from the armistice line dividing the U.A.R. and Israel. The commander has taken the position that this course could not be followed unless he received instructions from the Secretary General.

The Secretary General now has asked for clarification as to whether the U.A.R. merely wants a withdrawal from the armistice line or the withdrawal of the force from the U.A.R. He has stated that if one of the host countries, in this case the U.A.R., should ask for withdrawal of the force from the U.A.R. itself he would have no alternative but to accede to that request. I must say that is not the position which was taken by Dag Hammarskjold, nor was it the position taken at that time by the present Prime Minister, who in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed the view that in giving its consent to the establishment of the force the Egyptian government accepted a limitation of its sovereignty, and that it is now the prerogative of the United Nations rather than of the U.A.R. government to determine when the United Nations force has completed its task of restoring peace and when it should be withdrawn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the date of that statement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): March, 1957.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I am wondering whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs or perhaps his colleague the Minister of National Defence could tell us whether arrangements are being made to remove Canadian forces should hostilities break out and, if so, what is the nature of the arrangements.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, because the forces are under the command of the Secretary General of the United Nations no steps have been taken in this direction. There does exist, however, a contingency plan which is available in the event a decision should be taken to withdraw the force.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question arising out of the answer given by the Minister of National Defence. In the latter portion of his answer he said a contingency plan had been determined upon for use in the event of the Canadian contingent in the United Nations force being withdrawn. Does this mean a decision will be made by the Canadian government as to whether the Canadian force should be withdrawn regardless of what the Secretary General of the United Nations might have to say in that regard? Second, are there any Canadians at all in the area in respect of which the present difficulties have arisen?

Mr. Hellyer: I would not want to give the impression that we would take unilateral action in this case. We would not. It would be in concert with a decision taken by the Secretary General of the United Nations. As to the second question, we have no troops patrolling the armistice line. Our troops are all in support of the forces committed to the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But are there any Canadian troops in the particular area between the U.A.R. and Israel? I thought there were none there. Am I wrong in this regard?

Mr. Hellyer: Not on the armistice line, if that was the question. They are in the Gaza strip and at El Arish, but they are not on the armistice line.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR DETAILED STATEMENT ON NEW GATT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister advise the house when the government expects to make public the specific reductions in tariffs on foreign manufactured goods entering Canada which will result from the recent Geneva agreement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am wondering whether this is not the same question that was asked yesterday.

Mr. Hees: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: If I am correct in thinking the hon. member is repeating a question which has already been asked, he may not ask a supplementary.

Mr. Hees: Then may I ask another question in a different form, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister advise the house whether the government has any plans for modifying the impact which these reductions in tariffs on goods entering Canada will have on sales of Canadian manufactured products in this country?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): This seems to be a question of a very general kind. It is my belief that the over-all effect of the Kennedy round upon sales of Canadian manufactured products will be very good.

SHIPPING

CHURCHILL—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house whether his department is currently working upon, or intends in the near future to work upon, the development of means to extend the shipping season at Churchill?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): This is a matter to which regular —"continuous" is perhaps too strong a word —attention is given and every possible avenue which might enable us to extend that shipping season is explored whenever any suggestions are made in that connection, because we regard this port as being very important and one which should be developed.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—STATEMENT BY B.C. PREMIER RESPECTING SIGNING OF TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question of which I have given him brief verbal notice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a statement by Premier Bennett that the federal government signed the Columbia river treaty too hurriedly, as a result of which costs on the Canadian side have increased and benefits which should have been received from the United States have not been forthcoming? Has the minister any comment to make on this unusual statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think this is an acceptable question. The comments the minister might make at the suggestion of the hon. member could not be considered as of sufficient urgency to allow them to be made at this time.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—CONSTRUCTION OF ACCESS ROAD UNDER ARDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

Could he tell the house whether discussions have been held with representatives of the Quebec government with regard to the construction of an access road from the Abitibi area up to James Bay, under ARDA?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be put on the order paper.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

CONSTRUCTION OF CANADIAN PROTOTYPE SAFETY AUTOMOBILE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question, directed to the Minister of Industry, is based on the proposals and allegations made here in Ottawa yesterday by Ralph Nader. So we may have public performance and safety standards financed by public dollars, will the government now seriously consider the building of a Canadian prototype safety car?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder again if this question is not so general in nature that it cannot be asked at this time. The answer to the question would not seem to be extremely urgent.

Mr. Grafftey: I would reword my question. In view of the great urgency, Mr. Speaker—and it is urgent because Mr. Nader yesterday told us—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: —that the automobile lobby had killed this proposal in the United States. In view of the urgency in proceeding, and in view of the fact that the automobile lobby has killed this proposal in the United States, will the government immediately get on with the consideration of this matter in order to get progress?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: I have been fighting for two or three years—

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the interest of the hon. member and of all hon. members in this matter, but perhaps the question could be put on the order paper.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have been fighting for this for three years and we have had no action.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, for three long years I have pleaded.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows this is not in order. If he believes the question is one of urgency—I am not referring to the subject matter, I am referring to the question he wants to ask—he can give notice to the Chair that he wants to debate it at the time of adjournment tonight, which is a few hours from now.

Mr. Grafftey: I believe the minister was going to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not relevant at all. Even if the minister was going to answer, the question is still not acceptable at this time.

Mr. Grafftey: After three years I think it is urgent—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the way I word this question will be satisfactory to you, and that it will come within the rules. Would the Prime Minister say whether the government has given or is now giving consideration to providing funds to construct a safety model automobile, so the number of deaths on the highways may be reduced in consequence of such action?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no decision has been taken in this matter, and indeed as far as I know no consideration has been given by the federal government to the construction of a particular automobile for this purpose.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to ask the Minister of Industry. Could the minister indicate whether a decision has been reached on the recommendation of the justice and legal affairs committee calling for the establishment of a federal board to concern itself with all matters of motor vehicle safety?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the recommendation of the committee has been studied. It is quite clear that the Canadian government specification board, which up to the present has taken the initiative in discharging federal government responsibility in the matter of motor vehicle safety, is not the appropriate body, and consideration is being given as to what would be the most appropriate body and how it should best be done.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DESTRUCTION CAUSED BY WATER POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries.

Has the minister recently received reports advising him that along lake St. Peter and down the shores of the St. Lawrence, vast quantities of dead fish are found allegedly due to excessive pollution of the water?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member believes that his question is urgent, he might want to give notice to the Chair, but I hardly believe that this is the type of question that may be put immediately.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that the urgency of the question arises from the fact that, in that area, a large number of people draw their livelihood from commercial fisheries; the season is approaching and their livelihood is destroyed.

Hon. H.-J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to this question, I wish to advise the hon. member that the situation has not yet been brought to my attention. I shall take this question as notice and ask the officials of my department to make immediate inquiries.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—INQUIRY AS TO CONTRACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the fact that we are already somewhat behind schedule on the next portion of the Northumberland strait crossing, can the minister tell the house when we might expect the awarding of this major contract so the next section can get under way as quickly as possible?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add at the present time to my earlier statement on this question.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): As a supplementary question, in view of the fact that each passing day reduces the amount of time available, will the minister assure the house that within the next two weeks he will have an announcement on this matter?

Mr. McIlraith: I expect we will have it within the next two weeks, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a most important question to the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask the minister whether he has been or contemplates being in communication with Premier Bennett of British Columbia, in view of the premier's recent statement that he could reduce federal expenditures by $300 million without affecting efficiency or the administration of the minister's department.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question is acceptable.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING NEW SERVICE BEING PROVIDED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Keays (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether the minister has received a wire from the mayors of various municipalities complaining about the timing and stopping schedule of the train "Chaleur" which is going into service at the end of this month. Therein lies the urgency of this question. I should also like to know whether the minister would look into the complaints about that service that have been heard in this house and in the many letters he has received.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps my memory is failing but I thought I had written a long explanatory letter to the hon. member about this matter. It may be that I am confusing him with someone else. It is quite a lengthy explanation, and I would be very glad to send the hon. member a letter.

Mr. Keays: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he would advise certain employees of Canadian National Railways that we expect the same service that is given to all other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation and not asking a question.

QUEBEC—REFUSAL TO PROVIDE TRANSPORTATION TO OTTAWA FOR FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and follows that put yesterday by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) concerning the request of the Catholic Farmers Union of the Saguenay-Lake St. John region to put at their disposal additional coaches for May 24.

Could the minister tell us whether he has contacted the C.N.R. in connection with that matter and whether the farmers of the Saguenay-Lake St. John area can count on special coaches for May 24?

[English]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Even before I was asked any questions about this matter I had received the same telegram and, as is usual in these cases, I got in touch with the Canadian National at once. Hon. members will of course realize how difficult it is to meet the ordinary demands for space this year, but I am sure the railways will do their very best.

REPORTED COMPLAINTS RESPECTING FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of complaints in recent days that Canadian National ferries are apparently carrying cattle and empty trucks in preference to carrying passengers, thereby sometimes leaving people stranded overnight at certain Northumberland pier points, would the minister investigate these complaints with Canadian National Railways?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a representation.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the unanswered questions about the C.N.R. service, can the minister say whether he has information that the C.N.R. officials would be ready to appear before the committee at the earliest possible time, which I understand would be next week?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite sure that the management of Canadian National Railways would come before the committee at any time the committee wished to receive them, allowing of course for the conveniences as between one day and another.

DOMINION DAY

INQUIRY AS TO OBSERVANCE OF JULY 1 HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the uncertainty and confusion that seems to be developing regarding the celebration of July 1 as a legal holiday this year, since July 1 comes on a Saturday, would the government see whether something can be done so we may have a uniform recognition of the following Monday as a legal holiday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to look into that matter, Mr. Speaker, but I am sure my hon. friend would not want us to make any arrangements this year by which we would lose a sitting of the House of Commons for one day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of the answer he has given me, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he understands that I was asking my question not with regard to the House of Commons but with regard to a general recognition of the day throughout Canada, since July 1 this year comes on Saturday. The Prime Minister realizes that if it came on Sunday, the holiday would be on Monday. Why not do the same thing in this instance?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. friend. We will certainly look into this matter. I think there is some reference to this possibility in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, but we will look into it.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

For the past several months hon. members have been asking the Prime Minister when they might expect the Laurendeau-Dunton report on bilingualism, and the Prime Minister has been putting off the tabling of this report from month to month.

Could he now tell the house whether we may expect the report before July 1?

[English]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I discussed this matter as recently as last evening with one of the co-chairmen of the commission. They are hard at work preparing the report. I certainly share their hope that it will be finished before the end of this year.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF GEOGRAPHICAL CO-ORDINATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My optimistic mood today leads me to ask the minister whether he can tell us about the establishment of the base line co-ordinates for our fishing zones.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It is coming along, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he is not a bit worried that if he does not make this announcement very soon—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED CHILDREN'S REHABILITATION CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the minister testified before the external affairs committee he said, in response to a question of mine, that a Canadian representative was then en route to Viet Nam to pursue our proposal to establish a children's rehabilitation centre there, and he expected to be able to report on that matter very shortly. Is the minister now able to tell the house the outcome of those discussions in Saigon?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Mr. McLaren of the external aid office was sent to Saigon to investigate the situation and we also called in Dr. Vennema, who has been in charge of our anti-tuberculosis centre. We are now discussing this matter in the light of reports which both these officials have made to us.

Mr. David MacDonald (Prince): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the same treatment be given these reports as was given earlier to the Gingras report, and the earlier expectation that under external aid certain people might be brought to Canada for rehabilitation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I might say, Mr. Speaker, that yesterday Dr. Gingras and Mr. Strong of the external aid office discussed this matter with me.

Mr. MacDonald (Prince): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are all impressed with these discussions, but when may we expect some answers?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted I should like to make a brief intervention in this debate, and my remarks will be very short. There are only four subjects I want to speak on, and I hope I will not be longer than an average of two minutes on each. The first subject is one of local concern and affects my constituency and neighbouring constituencies. The second refers to the province of Ontario, and the other subjects affect people living in all parts of Canada.

The first subject relates to the reception of C.B.C. television programs in Brantford and the surrounding area. There is a great need in my community for a relay station to be located between London and Toronto to facilitate the reception of these programs by the great number of people who live in my area.

The amount of money spent by the C.B.C. last year in respect of television was colossal, in fact something over $88 million. The people of Brantford pay plenty as their share of the cost of this venture, yet really cannot see the programs. If they can see them at all the reception is very poor. I live in the centre of Brantford, and I cannot see them at all. Some people may suggest that I move out, but that is something I will never do, particularly at this time of the year when the show of daffodils and tulips right in the centre of Brantford is such that I would not want to miss it.

Let me now refer for a minute or two to the operation of the general social welfare program adopted by this house and the Senate last year and made retroactive to April 1, 1966. I refer, of course, to the Canada Assistance Plan. More than a year later the Ontario legislature passed the family benefits act to make the Canada Assistance Plan operative in Ontario. What do we find in the province of Ontario more than a year after the Canada Assistance Plan came into effect? Nothing but chaos exists at local public welfare offices in this province since this legislation came into force. I do not wish to play politics in respect of the operation by the Ontario government of the family benefits act, but the people of this province will have something to say about this when the next provincial election is held.

This House of Commons did its best to make adequate provision for the blind, the disabled and the otherwise unemployed when this legislation was passed, and it was the wish of every member of this house that the people of Canada should benefit greatly from this legislation. These people are not receiving the results which each and every member who voted for the Canada Assistance Plan last year expected, at least not the people in the province of Ontario.

This week I inquired about a disabled citizen whom I reported to the officials at Brantford nearly a year ago as one who required assistance. The officials replied just the other day that they were still waiting for word from Toronto as to whether this gentleman could qualify for assistance under the Ontario act, and no reference at all was made by those officials to the Canada Assistance Plan which was passed in good faith by this house. As a matter of fact I do not think they have ever heard about it. It was my feeling that I should advise this house how this legislation is being operated in Ontario. I believe at most two or three extra individuals would be required in my own city for the proper operation of this legislation. In other words I believe the Canada Assistance Plan is not being operated properly in Ontario.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker. Is he aware that there has been a delay in the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan, and that provinces such as Manitoba have not yet received the necessary information from Ottawa?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why provinces cannot obtain this information from Ottawa, and this is a most interesting observation. However, this bill was passed by this house last June, and it was made retroactive to April, 1966.

Mr. Dinsdale: It was not implemented.

Mr. Knowles: When was it proclaimed?

Mr. Lambert: When was the plan proclaimed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Brown: Mr. Speaker, I now come to my third subject, which relates to the pensions of veterans. These pensions were increased last year so far as the veterans were concerned but were not extended to veterans' dependants. I know the minister and his department are considering a change in this regard, as the minister has advised the house, but there is a great need for consideration at the ministerial level so far as an extension to these dependants is concerned. I am sure the minister will do something in this regard after the committee which is studying the matter brings down its report.

There is another matter in respect of veterans which puzzles me, and that is the fact that veterans files are secret so far as the veterans are concerned. I think I know what I am talking about in this connection. When a veteran is admitted to a hospital everyone from the orderly to the physiotherapist can read the file, except the veteran himself. A file may contain secret information such as a report that the veteran has a personality problem, and everybody knows about this except the individual concerned. Surely these files should be made available to the veterans so they can read what the officials have said about them. I am sorry the Minister of Veterans Affairs is not in his seat at the moment, but I know he understands the problems of veterans and I urge him to act upon these matters to which I have referred in a way more favourable to the veterans, keeping in mind their personal rights as individuals.

I now come to my fourth subject. As a member of this house I wish to stress the seriousness of the housing situation. There is such a widespread need for housing that I think for at least the next two or three years we should have a special department to deal exclusively with this matter. I know the Minister of Labour who is vitally interested in the nation's business, himself feels there should be a minister dealing exclusively with the matter I have spoken about. As a matter of fact he said just the other day that a cabinet minister should be appointed who would devote his full time to Canada's housing problem, at least for the present.

In Brantford recently I attended a meeting of tenants of housing projects financed by the federal, provincial and municipal governments. I was very much impressed with the testimony of those tenants. They were all fine young men, some of them with many children to support. They stated that the monthly rentals they had to pay were too high, and I agreed with them. The rentals were fixed in accordance with the wages earned by the tenants and they went up sharply every time the tenants received a raise in wages, to such an extent that they were prevented from even attempting to purchase homes. In this way they were really discouraged from ever owning homes.

I believe this matter should be reviewed by the authorities. I attended this meeting as Brantford's member of parliament, and I am very glad I was present to meet and hear these tenants. Again I say housing should be the exclusive responsibility of one minister, and I intend to press for this from now on.

These are my points, Mr. Speaker. They may seem small and insignificant but they are all vital, and I intend to use what influence I have as a member of parliament to pursue them on behalf of my constituents.

In conclusion I should like to speak of the war in Viet Nam. I have little doubt that there is a strong feeling across Canada against the escalation of this war. I could become very much exercised over the prosecution and operation of this war by our good friend and neighbour the United States. There is only one thing which holds me back in this regard, and that is that in my opinion we can be thankful we happen to have as leader of the government a gentleman extremely skilful in the field of external affairs, a man of the highest moral calibre in whom the Canadian people can have the utmost confidence. I refer of course to the present Prime Minister of Canada, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

These are not idle remarks nor wishful thinking on my part. I say we can be thankful here in Canada that we have Mr. Pearson. He will never lead our nation astray among the nations of the world. We can have faith in him and in our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin). I know we will continue to have faith in them both until these disturbing times are over and peace becomes firm and real.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, last night, before the house adjourned, I sought to explain to hon. members that it was urgent, in this centennial year, to revise our Canadian constitution.

This morning, I would like to conclude my contribution to this debate by saying a few words about this country's policy on Viet Nam.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, the secretary general of the United Nations dismayed the whole world when he predicted that the Viet Nam war was putting us on the brink of a third world war. Such an important statement by the chief of international diplomacy cannot be taken lightly.

When the secretary general of the United Nations accepted the renewal of his mandate, members of the general assembly of the United Nations promised him that he could count on their co-operation to bring an end to the war in Viet Nam and to restore peace in south-east Asia.

It seems to me that up to now, the secretary general has not received from the members of the United Nations all the co-operation he was promised. For some months, the United States have been escalating the war in Viet Nam with such atrocities that world opinion is now disturbed. True, measures must be taken to stop communist expansion in south-east Asia, but, I have never heard that force of arms could check ideas or a philosophy.

We are faced, Mr. Speaker, with an undeniable fact: the United States have gone into South Viet Nam and Washington is quite determined to pursue this war to final victory.

It seems that any political solution to the Vietnamese conflict has been set aside and a military settlement is being sought instead.

Bombings have caused heavy casualties among civilians and I shall refrain from describing all the atrocities committed on both sides since the beginning of that conflict. I think that the literature received by my colleagues in this connection speaks by itself.

It is not for me to pass judgment on the presence of the United States in South Viet Nam, but the United Nations charter provides specifically that every country has a right to self-determination and also has the right to have the government of its own choice.

Some will claim that the United States are there under international agreements whereby a country may ask another for assistance in case of aggression. However, without probing too deeply into all those reasons, I think we should look for the most useful means to put an end to that war which could have very harmful repercussions on a third world war.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has no definite policy about Viet Nam. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) have already said that they endorse the American policy about the Vietnamese conflict.

The government has also stated on many occasions that it was against the escalation and extension of the Viet Nam war. Canada hs also tried to apply with regard to that conflict a certain policy of neutrality; it has tried to act as an intermediary between the belligerents; it has even proposed compromise solutions to put an end to that war.

But, Mr. Speaker, we must now ask ourselves the following question: Could Canadian foreign policy concerning Viet Nam help end hostilities today? As we know, under military agreements, Canada is providing the United States with armaments which apparently are used in the Viet Nam conflict.

[Mr. Asselin (Charlevoix).]

Recently, the Canadian members of the International Control Commission were publicly accused of supplying information concerning their mission to the American authorities. In this context, how can Canada be taken seriously by the government of North Viet Nam, when it proposes a political solution to end the conflict? How can North Viet Nam determine whether Canada makes its peace proposals in good faith when it knows that our country supplies arms to the United States which will be used in the fight against North Viet Nam?

It is obvious that our foreign policy is timid and uncertain, and Canadians certainly have the right to ask themselves questions, especially these last few days, knowing that the cabinet is divided on Canadian policy concerning Viet Nam.

• (12 noon)

I think all Canadians are interested in this Viet Nam question, Mr. Speaker. Last night a C.B.C. program called "Tirer au Clair" presented ten newspapermen who discussed Canada's position with respect to the conflict in Viet Nam. And, strange to say, these journalists who, in my opinion, were representing several thousands of Canadians, were almost unanimous to say that Canada should reconsider its policy concerning the Viet Nam war.

I think that the very fact that we witnessed recently, within the cabinet, divergence of opinions concerning our foreign policy should give the Prime Minister as well as the Secretary of State for External Affairs, cause for reflection and that both should consider revising their policy.

As I said earlier, regardless of cabinet solidarity, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon) claims that Canada should dissociate itself from the United States concerning Viet Nam. The Registrar General of Canada (Mr. Turner) did the same, in a speech made in Montreal recently and, yesterday, the Prime Minister reaffirmed the policy of Canada with regard to Viet Nam, stating that no attention must be paid to the statements made by those two ministers and that only the statements of policy issued by himself and his Secretary of State for External Affairs must be considered.

That statement made by the Prime Minister, cannot satisfy us. All the people in Canada ask this government for a definite, clear and unequivocal statement on its policy conerning Viet Nam. First of all, our foreign policy must be built upon that question so as to save the world from a third universal conflict and to ensure a lasting peace in south-east Asia.

For too long now, our foreign policy has only been a policy of mediation, without any originality. The time has come for Canada to show some maturity in that field and to make its views known without taking into consideration the opinions of Washington. Since our country was a member of the International Control Commission set up to supervise the implementation of the 1954 Geneva agreements, it had good reasons to assert its neutrality in the Viet Nam conflict, but it seems that this option was rejected and that Canada accepted Washington's invitation to provide a more or less symbolic contribution to military operations to fight aggression and infiltrations by North Viet Nam. Moreover, Mr. Paul Sauriol of Le Devoir used those words in his editorial of May 16, 1967, I believe.

In my view, given the present circumstances, it is hard to envisage a solution of the Viet Nam war if we cannot convince the parties concerned that they must accept the good offices of the United Nations and especially of the secretary general in bringing together to the table of negotiations all the parties involved in this conflict. In my opinion, it is to that effect that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should make his proposals and offers of mediation exclusively to the United States and North Viet Nam.

Under the present circumstances, Mr. Speaker, Canada has no other possible choice in that conflict. Therefore, I appeal to the Prime Minister whose qualities as mediator have won him the Nobel prize for peace. The Prime Minister should have enough prestige, I believe, to convince the United States and North Viet Nam that it is more than ever time to trust the United Nations and the secretary general in their efforts to restore peace in south-east Asia.

I wanted, Mr. Speaker, before concluding, to launch an urgent appeal to the Prime Minister of my country, in order that future generations may not accuse us of having failed to avoid a third world war.

[English]

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate because I feel this is a most important year. This is the year of our Lord 1967, which is the one hundredth year since the institution of the confederation of the great country called Canada of which we are all so proud. I feel, therefore, a special urge to have something to say in connection with the speech from the throne which has been delivered to us by His Excellency.

Before proceeding with any remarks I want to congratulate the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) upon the fine speech he delivered in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like to congratulate, too, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) upon the very fine speech he made. I have been here since 1960, and I do not believe I have ever heard any better speeches made in moving and seconding the address in reply. These speeches were most impressive. The mover especially, as I understood his remarks and his general attitude, indicated he was in complete control of the situation. He was very eloquent and very capable. He is a distinguished broadcaster by profession, and his broadcast to this house that afternoon enhanced his reputation.

I confess that I enjoyed his speech. At times when he expressed certain ideas in the course of his remarks I felt that he should have been speaking from this side of the house rather than from the other side, because he was advancing ideas which I consider are definitely Conservative doctrine. To give an illustration of what I mean I will paraphrase his remarks. He said Newfoundlanders had demonstrated that in order to gain the new it is not necessary to disregard or eliminate the old. New experiences can enrich an established and proud culture. He said Newfoundlanders continued to give loyalty to the land that made them but they were totally committed to the broader objectives to which we all aspire. He went on to suggest that the promise of confederation had been renewed and the wisdom of its founders vindicated.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I agree most enthusiastically with these words. I consider, however, that they could be condensed into two words if we wished to condense them. Those two words would be "One Canada". This would be the idea we could extract from the language of the mover, one Canada, and that is the national policy of the Conservative party. This is the policy that will stimulate and encourage the unity so important to us all. This is the policy that will make an already great Canada even much greater.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, located as we are in the northern part of the continent of North America, we should continue to make progress within the framework of this confederation called Canada. There should be no question about that at any time anywhere in this country. We should continue to be strong as one country, united as one people, diversified perhaps yet still united and speaking with one voice. Around the family conference table at meetings convened from time to time by the central government we should continue to advance our individual and provincial claims and aspirations; there is nothing wrong with that. At the same time we should be continuing to think at all times and in all places in the country of going ahead as one country and one Canada.

I believe I can safely say that in the year of our Lord 1867, 100 years ago, the province of New Brunswick was relatively well off. We were building wooden ships, and we built a lot of them. We had built the Marco Polo, the fastest ship in the world of that day. We were trading with the New England states of the United States, and were trading to our very great advantage. So we were not a weak colony at the time; we were a province which, considering our population, was comfortably well off.

After discussions and consultations with the representatives of the three other provinces New Brunswick was invited to become one of the founding provinces of the confederation called Canada. We decided we would join; we did join; we will continue to belong. It is our duty as a partner to continue an association which has now been enlarged from the four original partners in confederation to ten. The country has grown from colonial status to that of a nation. There is no such thing as turning back; no such idea exists in Canada today. We have put our hands to the plan and we should go ahead, and go ahead with great confidence in the future. We are committed to joint action with national objectives in mind.

The speeches made in connection with the motion presently before the house might very well be considered comments on the program the government has enunciated. As I said at the outset of my remarks I believe this year this debate is a little more than that. The fact that this is our centennial year is one reason to bring about a review of the past, an assessment of the present and a statement of objectives for the future. I think dealing with these three particular phases of our history, past, present and future, might properly illustrate the opinion of members.

In dealing with the past I think we must bear in mind the progress that has been made by Canada as a nation. To start at the beginning, everyone will recall that the four provinces that agreed to the terms of confederation and made confederation possible went through a period of gradual development. History records that these were difficult years.

Professor Creighton in his book "Sir John A. Macdonald, the Old Chieftain", records many more interesting happenings. For example, there was the building of the Intercolonial railway linking the central part of this country with the maritime provinces, the link of that day which bound together the central part of Canada with the east. Then the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway subsequent to the entry of British Columbia into confederation was carried out according to commitments made to British Columbia when it entered confederation. This was the most important link of that day which bound together the central part of the country with the west.

This was no small undertaking, Mr. Speaker. Even today people who make the trip on the Canadian Pacific Railway through the rockies cannot help but be impressed with the magnitude of the task which must have been presented in those days. At that time the equipment we have today did not exist. There were no bulldozers or carryalls to move large quantities of earth. All they had were picks and shovels, horses and carts and some dynamite. These were the essentials of construction equipment of that day, and I marvel that they were able to find a pass through the rockies and put the railway through. It must have brought to the government of that day a tremendous satisfaction and stimulation in the knowledge that they were able to accomplish that which they set out to do, namely the building of a new and great nation.

And so it is today, Mr. Speaker, that confederation comprises ten provinces. One hundred years ago there were but four. After the turn of the century Canada entered world war I. The men of Canada who participated in that conflict covered themselves with glory, and the fame of this country spread around the world. Much sacrifice was entailed at that time, but those who fought in that war brought credit, honour and glory to this country.

Then 21 years later again came the call to arms. Canada once more responded, and again great credit came to the country. Our fame and glory once more became known the world over. I have said before and I say again that it is the performance of our men and women in two world wars which has brought to Canada a great deal of the international prestige which as a country we have at this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, 22 years after the close of world war II we are celebrating our centennial. We live in the northern half of the continent of North America which in area constitutes the second largest country in the world. We have made tremendous strides and now have over 20 million people, whereas 100 years ago we had only three and a half million people. This is great progress indeed, and we are on the threshold of even greater progress.

I believe the speech from the throne can be divided into two parts. The first part is a preamble dealing with the past; the second part is a summary of the government's proposed program. There are certain parts of the speech from the throne that particularly appeal to me. I am impressed with the place that the following paragraph in the speech from the throne, as reported at page 2 of Hansard, gives to the individual and to the development of the individual:

> It was possible to think, in 1867, of the public responsibility primarily in terms of state responsibility. The new challenges, which we must and will meet, require the involvement of the whole society and the efforts of all our people. In this time of fast-changing dimensions, the central concern of Canadian society must be the well-being of each individual, so that, regardless of his place or station at birth, he will have an equal chance to realize his full potential in the economic, social, political and cultural sense.
> A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

• (12:20 p.m.)

With this part of the speech I agree completely. I believe all governments charged with the responsibility of presenting a program to parliament ought always to place the emphasis on those parts of the program that will contribute to the well-being of every Canadian. Nevertheless, as those of us who have had much experience in the past recall, what was done in the past by individuals was usually done with a desire to create conditions under which individuals could develop their talents and give full scope to their ambition, energy and desire for progress in an economic and social sense. By following that principle this country has progressed.

I say to the government that progress will not continue to be made if handouts are promised to people without regard being paid for the need to produce. A government cannot keep adding people to its payroll, cannot compete with private industry for skilled and executive talent, cannot keep wasting money needlessly and recklessly, without running into deficit financing and being obliged, to avoid disaster, to borrow money to pay for current expenditures. Disaster will overtake us because we shall not be able to sell our goods in the markets of the world if those conditions I have mentioned prevail.

I listened with great interest yesterday to the speech of my hon. friend and colleague the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), who confirmed what we all know—though some do not admit this—that today people are worried about the reckless waste and extravagance of this government. Everywhere they look they see evidence of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming: It is not difficult to see.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming: The people are worried because that expenditure is causing the cost of living to increase. Every time they buy groceries or other necessities of life they see that the buying power of their dollar has dwindled. And the reason for this decline, as I said a few moments ago, is that so much is being paid for so little.

The people are worrying because they see much evidence of the government competing with business; they see groups of people doing work that formerly was efficiently performed and at a fraction of the cost efficiently by private industry. Groups of people are now doing work that was formerly undertaken by private industry. Money would be available for many more good things in this country if certain government operations were performed in conjunction with private industry, if private industry were asked to undertake certain matters, rather than harnessing groups of people who have been collected together because somebody wanted to build an empire, to perform them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming: That is happening in this country, and I warn the government that unless that sort of thing ceases the country is heading for trouble and may be faced with disaster.

The people also are worried because they see money that is voted for crown corporations being disposed of by those corporations as they see fit, usually for useless or nonsensical purposes. Within the last hour we listened to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Brown) talk about television. He said that on television alone the C.B.C. was spending $88 million. I ask, Mr. Speaker, where does that money come from? The answer is perfectly obvious. It comes from taxation, because it could come from nowhere else.

When the people of this country see that sort of thing I think in the first place they become discouraged; they wonder where all this will end. Second, they say "Well, if this is the way the government is throwing it away I might as well get all I can out of it." I am afraid that is the sort of reaction brought about by the situation I have referred to. I should be glad to go into more detail, but time does not allow me to do so.

Again I wish to refer particularly to those portions of the speech from the throne which refer to our natural resources, and to pollution. I might say I am inspired to quote what I am about to quote by the excellent speech made the day before yesterday by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon). He went into the subject thoroughly. What he spoke of as being an interprovincial problem in Saskatchewan in my province is approaching the proportions of an international problem. The difficulty in my province is that much worse. I quote from the speech from the throne:

> The great natural resources that we take into our second century will be vital to us in meeting our needs and in maintaining our position as a major world trader.

That is what I said a few minutes ago:

> Measures will be introduced by the government at the present session arising out of the need to conserve and preserve the great wealth with which Canada has been so richly endowed. Water itself is becoming a more and more valuable resource. Efforts to combat pollution are taking on an economic as well as a social significance and the federal government intends to press forward in cooperation with the provinces. In keeping with this objective, you will be asked to approve a new Canada water act which will provide a framework for the improvement and implementation of Canadian water policy.

I draw the attention of the house to the sentence "Efforts to combat pollution are taking on an economic as well as a social significance and the federal government intends to press forward in co-operation with the provinces." I am pleased to see that sentence, and I shall remark about it.

[Mr. Flemming.]

One of our greatest worries arises from the pollution of our water; and in New Brunswick, which is my native province, the problem of water pollution is most serious. We have eight large pulp and paper mills now operating, and another has been announced for the reasonably near future. We have mineral developments which are operating, and more are to come; also we have industries based on farm products. We need federal action because some of our pulp and paper mills are on interprovincial waters, some are on international waters, and we have a disposal problem. We need a regulating agency in which the federal government, with the provincial government, shall have a part. In other words the agency must have authority to act. As matters stand now the question always arises "Who has jurisdiction? Under whose jurisdiction does this matter come?" The house is indebted to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) who has spoken about water pollution time and time again.

New Brunswick has six good salmon rivers which must be protected and, where needed, improved. Those rivers should be preserved, for they are tremendously important to all New Brunswickers and to our tourists. We make tourists a business, yet we allow our waters to be polluted. We take no care of that which appeals to the tourists. Why do tourists come to our province? Because they want to get out of the cities. Canada at present has wide open spaces which attract the tourists.

So I commend the government on this part of the speech from the throne, while urging them to do more than talk. It is not too late to effect an improvement, and it is not too late to clean up the mess. And there is a mess; I think this applies to nearly every province; I am not talking about New Brunswick alone, where I know there is a mess to be dealt with. The federal government must give leadership; it must co-operate with provincial and in some cases municipal authorities. The need is urgent, and action must be taken without delay. I hope no time will be lost before presenting something to this house which will set the machinery in motion for immediate action and subsequent improvement.

Having spoken in these general terms I wish to be more specific. At the present time we have a definite and pressing pollution problem affecting the Saint John river, one which is especially urgent on account of the large hydro-electric development 15 miles north of Fredericton in central New Brunswick, where the dam across the river will be in operation by late 1967.

This will transform the Saint John river at that point and for a long way upstream into a virtual lake 55 miles long and as much as a mile wide in places. This water will not be fast running; indeed it will be stagnant for a portion of the time. It is clearly evident that a great effort must be made to keep such a large body of water free from pollution. Incidentally, something similar to a lake will be created by the building of this dam and will lie roughly parallel to the trans-Canada highway.

Having said this, and having asked the house to keep the need for action very much in mind, I wish to give some information relative to the Saint John river which will indicate the extraordinary difficulties of the situation and the need for special and immediate attention by the federal authority. The Saint John river rises in the state of Maine and flows a distance of approximately 50 miles or more entirely in that state of the United States until it becomes the international boundary between New Brunswick and the state of Maine beginning at St. Francis, Maine, and Clair, New Brunswick. It then flows a distance of something like 100 miles as the international boundary between New Brunswick and Maine until it reaches the town of Grand Falls in Victoria county.

Below Grand Falls and its mouth the river is all in New Brunswick, and it flows roughly parallel with the boundary for about another 100 miles until it reaches a point at or near the town of Woodstock, after which it swings to the southeast, away from the state of Maine boundary, and finally empties into the bay of Fundy at Saint John, New Brunswick.

It is hard to imagine any body of water having more difficulties of jurisdiction than has the Saint John river. In rough terms the river runs about one third of its course in Maine, about one third as an international boundary and the remaining third in the province of New Brunswick. I doubt whether a more difficult stretch of water could be found as far as jurisdiction is concerned.

The upper portion of the river, particularly the international portion, has town and villages on each side all the way down to Edmunston. Edmundston is a city of over 10,000 people. On the opposite side of the river is Madawaska, Maine, another fair sized town. In Edmunston there is a very large pulp and paper mill which dumps its waste into the river; in Madawaska, Maine, a finishing mill.

After leaving Grand Falls the river flows in a southerly direction and practically parallels the Maine boundary from Grand Falls to Woodstock, New Brunswick, a distance of approximately 100 miles. Within this distance on the western side of the Saint John river there are many fair sized rivers which empty into it after rising in the state of Maine.

There is the Aroostook river on which are located the towns of Fort Fairfield, Presque Isle, Caribou and Washburn, small rivers by the names of Big Presque Isle and Little Presque Isle and, finally, the Meduxnekeg river, upon which the large town of Houlton is located, flowing into the Saint John at Woodstock. Raw sewage, industrial waste from starch factories and waste from sugar beet processing plants are among the pollutants which eventually find their way into the Saint John river across which, as I have said, a power dam is to be built 50 miles below Woodstock, creating a 55 mile lake into which all the up-river pollution will flow. Is it any wonder that I am standing here and pleading with the federal government to do something about this situation because of the international implications involved?

I think at this point I should mention with much appreciation the tremendous effort which has been made by the mayor of Woodstock, Mr. Gerald Gallop, and the council of that town to secure co-operation from the state of Maine in improving the situation, and in pressing the provincial government to take all possible measures to improve the condition of the river in the New Brunswick portion of its course. They have worked ceaselessly and effectively to correct the situation to the extent of their ability to do so. But their authority is limited. The prestige of the federal government is needed. We need agents of the federal government who will step in and say "We represent the government of Canada. We are here to co-operate with the town of Woodstock. We are here to help them and to work with them and the provincial government in solving this problem." Incidentally, the authorities of Woodstock have had good results so far following their contacts with Senator Muskie from the state of Maine, and the response from a number of the town authorities in that state has been quite satisfactory.

My main point concerns the importance of finding someone who can speak for this nation with prestige and authority.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house consent that the hon. member may continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Flemming: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thank members of the house for their consent and assure them that my remarks will not be lengthy from now on.

The Woodstock Bugle, a weekly newspaper published in the town of Woodstock, also deserves special mention and appreciation for the campaign it has waged to inform the public of the seriousness of the situation and the need to press for all possible measures to effect an improvement. There has been a favourable response. I urge the government to initiate action in co-operation with the United States authorities to co-operate with the town of Woodstock and other towns up river in Carleton and Victoria. It may be said we should invite the International Joint Commission to pass on this whole situation and make it the subject of a study.

Mr. Speaker, we need something which will be more prompt and more effective than a study. This has already been studied to death. The question of pollution in this particular part of Canada has been studied again and again. Yet everyone who wishes to pass the buck says "We can do a study". These studies last for years. It is time action was taken. It is time to apply remedies. I believe the government should immediately send a member of the staff of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to the town of Woodstock to consult with the mayor and the town council, to ascertain what has already been done, agree on a further course of action, and then pursue it.

Having agreed on a course of action, and ignoring jurisdictional difficulties, they should bring back a report, they should recommend something to be done about this. Then the appropriate federal department, I presume the Department of External Affairs, could get busy and the provincial government could likewise get busy, and the state of Maine and the federal government of the United States would co-operate. There has never been any lack of co-operation in that respect. I think we are in a little better situation than that referred to by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Cantelon) yesterday, who said they were getting no co-operation. We are getting lots of evidence of a desire to co-operate, but there is no overriding authority under which the various bodies can co-ordinate their efforts and effect an improvement.

I believe the situation should be brought under control before the Mactaquac dam goes in this fall and the river becomes a 50 mile lake at this point. Therefore I appeal to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to give this matter immediate attention and provide immediate action. I appeal to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to deal with the matter in the light of the information I hope he will receive in such a report and in co-operation with the federal government of the United States of America.

I must say in all seriousness that the usual procedure is just not good enough in this particular instance. We are now well along in May, and I understand that the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission expects to have power from the Mactaquac development project by Christmas of this year. This means that the river will probably be dammed up in September or October. Therefore there is no time to be lost. Action must be taken immediately, and I appeal to the minister to lose no time.

So, in summary, I urge the minister with all the force at my command, and all the force I am able to convey, to secure immediately a report relative to the pollution situation on the Saint John river in New Brunswick. There are other rivers in the same province which require attention, but I believe it is quite appropriate to say that the Saint John river is the most urgent problem at this particular time.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, in participating in this throne speech debate I wish to raise a problem which we have tried to raise with only relative success over the last four or five years. That, of course, is the problem which confronts our people in Canada because of the housing shortage that we face, which is daily growing more critical.

I know that every time we raise this question we are accused by the government of making political capital out of it, and perhaps to some extent that charge is justified; but in a way that is our job, to raise these issues and to attempt to pressure the government as much as possible in order to have it take action. I think the record should show that there is not a single solitary minister in the house at the present time when we want to discuss matters of this kind.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, when one examines the whole housing problem as it confronts us here in Canada, in a way one almost despairs of ever being able to move the government or to make any impression on it which will steer it on to greater action. Every session we go through the same charade, when we place all the dreary facts on the record and nothing ever happens. When I was coming down to the house today to speak I picked up a speech I delivered four years ago, and I could bring it in and read it into the record verbatim because nothing has happened since and nothing has changed. So we will go through it again and hope something will happen, and that the government will take some concrete action.

I read the speech delivered by the minister in this debate and I could not believe my eyes. It was one of the most pathetic, inadequate, incomprehensible attempts to deal with the housing crisis that one could possibly have imagined. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if you examine the record and look at the facts you will find that after 40 years the situation in Canada is that people in 1929 were actually able to buy better housing with a lower percentage of their income than they are in 1967.

That is the devastating comment that I make upon the history of North America's and Canada's attempts to house our people. We are actually further behind than we were 40 years ago. What are the dreary facts? Some of them should be placed on the record.

Fact: 100,000 Canadians are living in absolutely appalling conditions.

Fact: 20 per cent of all our dwellings have primitive bathing facilities and toilet facilities.

Fact: one out of every three Canadian homes is in bad condition.

Fact: we have a shortage of half a million houses just to catch up with the backlog of the last war.

Fact: half a million Canadians are living in substandard homes.

Fact: the economic council says we need a minimum of 170,000 homes every year from now until 1970, and 200,000 from that point on. We have never come close to achieving that target.

Fact: because of the housing shortage rents are going up 20 per cent each year and more and more of our people are being gouged.

Fact: Canadian consumers spend more of their income per annum on housing than consumers in any other industrialized country in North America or western Europe.

Fact: a world survey shows us sixteenth among the countries of the industrialized world in terms of what we have to spend for housing.

Mr. Speaker, one could go on and on and on. Those of us who are interested in this subject have files five feet high indicating and documenting the total inadequacy of the attempts of the various levels of government in Canada to solve the housing problem. In my own city of Toronto we are in need of a minimum of 40,000 new homes a year, and we are building 21,000.

The cost of homes in Toronto is up in the stratosphere with the astronauts. In 1964 the average cost of a home was $19,000. In 1966 it had risen to $27,000 and today, 1967, the average home being sold in metropolitan Toronto costs $30,000. That, Mr. Speaker, is totally beyond the capacity of the vast majority of our people. That is why we on this side of the house get so annoyed when the minister gets up and mouths statistics about the number of housing starts and the amounts of money he is putting into the mortgage market, because all he is really doing is permitting people to build homes that 85 per cent of our people cannot afford to buy anyway. There is no percentage in such a proposition.

It is futile to say we have a housing crisis in Canada. To make such a statement is trite. It is perfectly obvious. It is the solution that is much more difficult, and that is where we are having our major problem here in the House of Commons. If you review the activities of the government in this year I think the first thing you have to conclude is that the present minister has to be removed. He is a fine person individually and nobody has any quarrel with his personal qualifications, but it is perfectly clear from his public utterances that he understands nothing about housing and is not prepared to assume any responsibility whatsoever.

For example, on January 25 the Toronto Daily Star reported a speech he made as follows:

> Federal Minister J. R. Nicholson said last night said the housing crisis is a problem for provinces and municipalities to solve, not the federal government.

If the minister starts out with that type of attitude there is no hope at all of our ever solving the housing crisis. I know there are great constitutional difficulties in this field, but to me it is fantastic that the federal government takes the position that we do not have a responsibility in this field. Housing is something that affects every Canadian from coast to coast, and every Canadian in every age group. It affects our young people who are getting married. The tragedy today is that most young couples getting married will never be able to own homes as long as they live because the costs are too fantastic and are going up all the time. It affects out old people who, because of our crazy tax system, are losing their homes because they cannot afford to maintain them. It affects the man with a family who is paying so much to buy or rent a home that he is depriving his family of all the other social amenities that are required for their well-being.

Yet the government sits here in Ottawa and takes the position that this is not a responsibility of the federal government. To me this is incomprehensible and fantastic, particularly when the department is headed by a minister who takes the view that this is so and all we have to do is vote money for mortgages, which permits builders to build homes that people cannot afford to buy anyway. I think it is absolutely desirable now, unfortunately, that the present minister be removed and someone put in his place who is prepared to give leadership and assume responsibility.

I remember that four years ago when the minister took over this portfolio we were congratulating him and saying how much we admired the opportunity he had, that he had it within his grasp to sort of paint the broad sketch for Canada and to really build for himself political epitaph by initiating and inaugurating a great new, imaginative housing scheme for our country. And he has done nothing. Unfortunately he will be remembered as a minister who did not accomplish anything substantial in this whole field.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but because of the complexities involved—and no one denies this; we know there are constitutional difficulties, that it is hard to come to grips with our provinces and the prejudices of our municipalities—it seems to me we need, as we have been asking for years, at least a full time minister. We have a part time minister of housing in Canada now; most of his time is occupied by the problems of labour, which probably accounts for the fact that nothing very much has happened in the field of housing. We have been requesting for years that if we are to deal with this problem adequately we should at least have a full time minister.

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

It seems to me that even if we had a full time minister he could spend the next five years doing nothing but trying to come to grips with this tremendous crisis that we face.

We sit here and quote statistics and figures, forgetting that people are involved. Old people, young people, citizens from coast to coast are involved in this question. It makes one ashamed to tour one's constituency and see the conditions under which so many of our people are condemned to live. I wish the minister would get off the cloud that surrounds him at C.M.H.C., where they feed him all these cooked-up statistics that he brings to the house, and would get out and see the conditions under which Canadians are forced to live. If the minister did this I think we might then get some sort of action.

I believe also we have to admit to the Canadian public that there is a crisis. This government have never even admitted that fact. They stand up in this house and tell us there is no problem and everything is rolling along well. I think once in a while we ought to be honest with the public and admit that there is a tremendous problem in this area, and there is not any easy or quick solution to it. We should admit that it will take the ingenuity and talents of people in the House of Commons, in our provinces and our municipalities for as long as we can foresee in order to come to grips with this particular problem.

One of the difficulties we face is the traditional constitutional prejudice of our provinces, which feel that any activity in Ottawa is an intrusion into their fields of jurisdiction. Surely this is something we have to fight against. I remember that when I used to be a member of a provincial parliament at Queen's Park in Toronto, every time a problem was raised I was told it was up to the federal government to deal with it. Now I am here listening to the federal government, and they say it is up to the province. Each side seems to spend its time hiding behind the British North America Act and shoving off the responsibility to somebody else.

If we do not accept some leadership in this area future generations will curse this parliament, because the whole housing crisis epitomizes the great dilemma of our generation, which is the urbanization of Canada, the flow of people to the cities and the increasing trend away from rural communities. By 1970 probably 80 per cent or 85 per cent of our people will be living in the cities. This creates tremendous problems for legislators, not just in the field of housing, although that is more immediate and obvious, but in every conceivable area—education, culture, communications, transportation and revitalizing of the cities. This is the great problem with which North America will have to grapple over the next few decades. That is why it is frustrating to us in opposition to see a federal government that is not prepared to assume any responsibility at all, that takes the view that it can write off this whole problem, pass it over to the provinces and not give any real leadership or action.

Who is taking this attitude? It is the great Liberal party, the so-called party of progress, the new people, the young people, the ones who are going to lead Canada into the great new community. These are the ones who run around the country telling everybody that they are familiar with all the questions and know all the answers, yet when we raise a question of tremendous importance we are told it is not their responsibility and is not their sphere of activity. As I said earlier, if they continue in this way I believe future parliaments will curse us for having sat back and permitted this tremendous social problem to continue without attention, without leadership and without action.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, before the adjournment I was outlining the very critical housing crisis which faces Canada, and in the first part of my remarks I indicated that one of the major roadblocks was the minister himself. I know he will not take that comment in any personal way, but in view of his negative attitude and many responsibilities as Minister of Labour it is obvious to everyone that he cannot possibly attack this problem in any real way.

It is trite to suggest that we have a housing crisis in Canada. The solution to the problem is the difficult thing. We must find some way to come to grips with it and to make concrete suggestions as to what we ought to be doing. In the 15 minutes left at my disposal I should like to make an attempt in this regard, but hon. members will understand that in 15 minutes one could not possibly outline in any detail a complex attack upon a complex problem.

There are some things we can do in both the short and long range categories. In the short range we should start by tearing up the National Housing Act. I prefer to call it the national hoaxing act because it was designed over 20 years ago under conditions that no longer exist and in circumstances that no longer prevail. It was designed as the working man's housing act, but in these days one cannot qualify to buy a house unless one earns $8,000 to $8,500 or more per year. This is nothing but socialism for the rich and deprival for the poor, and it is totally out of touch with today's circumstances. We must begin again by rewriting the National Housing Act.

Second, we must try to do something about the prices of homes. This is not going to be a simple problem because so many complex ingredients go into our houses. However, there are many things that can be done. All kinds of new building techniques exist which are more economical and there are new concepts of holding land such as the idea of leasing it, which we do not accept. There are a multitude of new ideas that we could adopt in Canada if we were not operating, as the N.H.A. does, with a set of blinkers over our eyes. This is one area where we must start again under entirely new terms of reference.

In Canada we have never developed a sensible way of financing houses. It has been dealt with in the last 25 years by means of the method of pump priming. When unemployment becomes high we flood the market with mortgage money. This merely results in inflated land and house prices. We have never developed an orderly system for arranging for the financing of homes, and this must be the responsibility of the federal government because nobody else has the capacity. We need a national housing fund, if you want to call it that, which is financed by the government, and the government must be responsible for providing an orderly system of supplying money to builders and individuals for building and buying homes.

Next we must be concerned with the whole method of providing rental homes in Canada. Under the circumstances existing today it may well be that the great North American dream of every man having his castle has disappeared because the costs are becoming so great that most people will probably never be able during their lives to undertake the purchase of a home. As our cities become larger and our population grows we are simply going to have to think in terms of different ways of housing people in multiple dwellings or apartments, much as I dislike that idea.

Our national policy in respect of public housing is a disgrace. In the whole of Canada we are not doing the same amount of work or accomplishing as much as some of the cities in the United States. In the whole area of public housing our policy has been a total flop and a national fiasco. The responsibility in this regard rests upon the government here in Ottawa, because it is only here that there is the financial power to promote these types of schemes.

We are doing virtually nothing about the problems of urban development and urban renewal. No matter where you go in the cities in Canada you find they are rotting at the core because of the dilapidation and decay of houses as they get older. I know of no real urban development scheme anywhere in this country that is genuinely being put into effect. Again we must have some leadership in this area.

The seventh point is that we have to start simplifying the regulations. Under the National Housing Act we have tried to process applications. In some cases one must go through 52 different steps in order to process a building program. This takes years and before it is done everybody gives up in disgust and drops the project. This again has to be completely re-examined.

The next matter I wish to mention is the fact that we have done nothing really solid in the way of public housing in Canada. It is given a bad name. Our municipalities will not encourage it because they have an antiquated idea that public housing means a lot of undesirable people and therefore they have a built-in bias against it. We have not been successful either in Ottawa or in the provinces in overcoming this idea.

The eighth point on which I would like to say a few words is the necessity of dealing with the problem of the government's participation in land assembly and land development. Leaving it to private people simply has not worked in this country. This is not a criticism of them. They are in the business to make money. But the net result has been that land assembly and development have been undertaken by private individuals who have been constantly bidding the price up and up and charging what the market will bear.

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

Housing lots in metropolitan Toronto which were selling for $4,000 a few years ago are now selling at $12,000 because of the speculation that has gone on. The price of houses will never go down to where ordinary people can buy them unless the government is prepared to take over the land and assemble it.

My next point is that we have to do something about the tremendous responsiblity of the municipalities. Many municipal councils are driven out of their minds by the taxation problems facing them. We have loaded them with all kinds of responsibilities without giveing them a tax basis upon which to carry them out. For example, it is an anomaly on the North American continent that the cost of education should be borne by the people who are least able to bear it. Almost nowhere else in the world is this the case. We have to re-examine these matters in conjunction with the provinces.

I wish I had more time to discuss some of these problems and I will try to do so on supply motions. These are some of the immediate steps which we could be taking if we were prepared to do so. However, the main problem is that this government will not accept responsibility. It does not take the view that housing is a matter of national importance and national concern. It is, without exception, the greatest social problem facing this country and affecting every Canadian today. Yet the minister in charge of housing goes around the country telling everybody it is a provincial and municipal responsibility. This is a complete negation of the duty which we owe to the people of this country. Before we can hope to accomplish any of these things, and none of them is easy, the government must stand up and be prepared to say that it accepts full responsibility nationally in the field of housing.

Mr. Trudeau: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he not see a constitutional difficulty in the assumption of these responsibilities by the federal government?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Of course there is a constitutional problem. I was coming to that. I was going to say that so far as I am concerned I believe the constitution is being used as an excuse. Each level of government passes on the responsibility to another level. The municipalities say that the provinces should accept it, the provinces say the federal government should, and the federal government says it is not its responsibility.

Mr. Trudeau: Is the hon. member saying that public housing is under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): The minister must not put words in my mouth. I am not saying it is a matter of federal jurisdiction. I am saying this is a federal responsibility which the government is evading and refusing to discharge. This is the point, it seems to me.

Mr. Trudeau: May I ask another question? How can it be a federal responsibility if it is not a matter under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): This is just ridiculous. I hope these questions will not be counted in the 15 minutes left to me. Housing affects the life of every Canadian from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. Trudeau: So does education.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): What is the use of spending millions of dollars on educating our people if we let them live in substandard housing? We get sick and tired of seeing the government hide behind the B.N.A. Act every time we want it to do something. Of course housing is not solely a federal responsibility, but how will the government solve the problem of housing in this country? No level of government alone can possibly take care of it. It should not be the sole responsibility of the municipalities, the provinces or the federal government. What is required is a gigantic partnership of all levels of government, and even then we will be lucky if we solve it. We should start by appointing a minister who will devote all his time to dealing with the problem instead of having a minister who can only deal with it when he is not looking after all the labour problems in the country, which are numerous enough. What we need is a ministry of urban development and housing. Let us start by appointing a full-time minister who will devote his brains and intelligence to the whole problem of the urbanization of Canada. This will not be rejected by the provinces because they are desperate for aid in this area. Talk to any of the provincial ministers or municipal leaders. They are desperate for leadership, assistance and help.

Mr. Trudeau: Including Quebec?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Yes, including Quebec. Quebec is no different from any other province. Quebeckers are Canadians also.

Mr. Trudeau: Then why does the hon. member's party ask for a special status for Quebec?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): This is an entirely different area. Hon. members on the government side are getting excited, but I suggest to them that the people of Quebec are Canadians first and Quebeckers second. The government is afraid to test them on it. That is the problem. It would like to play Quebec off against the rest of Canada. That is how it has remained in office for 20 or 30 years. It is about time this finished.

Mr. Trudeau: Why did the hon. member's party ask for a special status for Quebec?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, there have been many interjections from across the way. I do not suppose they will appear in Hansard, but my experience has been that those members who are in the habit of interjecting are also those who sit on their brains trying to keep them warm. This may be an old cliché but it is true.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member insists that it appear in Hansard, may I ask him another question? If the hon. member feels Quebec is no different from the rest of the country, why did his party move an amendment a few days ago suggesting that the constitution be amended so as to give a special status to Quebec?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I know the Minister of Justice is very anxious to put me on the horns of an imaginary dilemma but I do not intend to permit him to do so. What he is really trying to do is to get himself off the hook. I am attempting to discuss the restricted field of housing but the minister is trying to divert me into discussing the whole problem of the province of Quebec with its particular difficulties. It is neither appropriate, reasonable nor fair to attempt to do that at this time. Speeches on the constitutional problem have been made by hon. members sitting on our side of the house.

Mr. Trudeau: It is nice to be consistent.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): A plea for consistency is a novelty from that side of the house. The other day we were told that a cabinet minister can take off his ministerial hat, put on his private hat and make any kind of statement he wishes without having any effect on the government. So consistency is not something about which hon. members on that side should be talking.

I see I am almost running out of time and I want to conclude on a friendly and constructive note, as we always do. We have suggested a full-time minister of housing, which I know many hon. members opposite support and have spoken in favour of in caucus. It is not a novel idea. We know there is good support for it. We hope we will be able to convince the government. They will never solve the housing problems otherwise. We need a minister who can spend all his time roaming around the country trying to co-ordinate all the great jurisdictional problems which we know exist.

Three years ago we asked for a royal commission because we really do not know the problems connected with urbanizing Canada. We need to know what types of housing we are going to require for the next 20 years. We need a blueprint for the next 20 years. We have not done that and we have not got the information. If the government desires, perhaps a special committee of the house, with an adequate staff and facilities to travel, could try to assess the type of program which would be satisfactory to the provinces and in which the provinces would feel we could help without infringing on their jealously guarded jurisdictions.

Everyone agrees that there is a crisis for which no one group can offer a solution. As I said earlier, it is going to require a great partnership, a great deal of co-operation, a great deal of giving on the part of these various jurisdictions. I suggest that even if we started with the best will in the world it would take 10 or 15 years to come to grips adequately with the housing problem. We cannot evade it any longer. We cannot just sit on the sidelines—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must advise the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I thank hon. members, and I will only be a couple of minutes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member wish to continue?

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give its consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Scott (Danforth).]

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I should like to thank my colleagues on both sides and I will not take very much more time. What I was trying to say, Mr. Speaker, was that this problem is so critical, so deep rooted, that we cannot sit here in Ottawa and say it is not our problem. Our provinces are desperate for help in this area. Our municipalities are desperate for help in this area, and our people are desperate. I am ashamed, as a Canadian, to go to see how our old age pensioners live. I am saddened to see how our low income people live. I am ashamed of the rotting, decaying centres of our cities. The federal government must assume some responsibility and some leadership. If it does not, the crisis will merely grow and grow. It will never be solved. It will be our shame that one of the most affluent and supposedly advanced nations in the western world did not have the ability or the ingenuity to ascertain how to house its citizens adequately. As I said ealier, if we do not solve this problem, then future parliaments and future Canadians will curse us.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join all those who spoke before me in congratulating the mover (Mr. Jamieson) and the seconder (Mr. Côté) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They discharged their duty with eloquence and great distinction.

Mr. Speaker, surely the centennial year will be an excellent occasion, for all Canadians, to strike the balance of achievements and failures having marked the last one hundred years of their history, to look at themselves, to look straight at the country and to consider the means of preparing a future capable of meeting their high aspirations. On this occasion, the question is to examine our past and scrutinize the future, as this will enable us to better understand what we are today and what we must do to become worthy of tomorrow.

Perhaps Canada has not accomplished everything it could have, but if we measure our progress, there is no reason to be pessimistic. There is no need to be ashamed of our past, on the contrary. If we look at what has been done by the 20 million people who succeeded to the 3,635,000 inhabitants of our country a hundred years ago, we see thousands of industries, skyscrapers, railroads, harbours, power plants, asphalt roads used by a great number of car drivers, airfields, thousands of homes and a lot of other things which are that many signs of material progress.

We can also see the sun shining on the roofs and spires of thousands of cathedrals, churches, colleges, universities, cultural institutions of all kinds which are a tangible proof of our respect for moral values.

The collective letter published by the Catholic bishops in Canada on the occasion of the centennial of the confederation—a very realistic letter which I should like everyone to read—takes an objective and impartial look at our problems today. The words justice, fraternity and understanding are used again and again in the document.

I shall now quote a passage from the letter:

> Canadians today are faced with many problems: incipient inflation, persistent pockets of poverty, economic or political instability. For some, however, the greatest and most difficult problem is to find a solution to the troubles arising in Canada from the coexistence of the two main linguistic and cultural groups which, strangely enough, constitute two opposing majority groups.

In some ways, this is a very basic human problem, for it involves important values and concerns people both materially and spiritually.

The bishops consider that the disquiet now prevalent in the Canadian community arises, on the one hand, from the dissatisfaction of an increasing number of French Canadians with the problems facing their ethnic group in their search for fulfilment and, on the other hand, from the concern entertained in other areas of Canada over their demands.

Consideration is also given the problems of minorities and I quote:

> The minorities living in Canada are not all in the same position. Care must be taken to guarantee fair treatment to each of them and the sacrifices such treatment involves in the cost of some services, education for instance, in the provinces, must be accepted.

The prelates give us a warning and I quote:

> Canadians will live through dark days, through fruitless and impoverishing strife, unless the various groups inhabiting their country, particularly the two main linguistic and cultural groups, cannot accept and recognize without reserve or misunderstanding the legitimacy of their differences and of their own destiny and if they fail to accept, in mutual respect of their rights, the compromises required by their special position.

Mr. Speaker, residents of Canada may have different traditions, cultures, religions, forbears and incomes, but they must feel they are essential parts of the Canadian community.

• (3:00 p.m.)

There is talk of separatism, of an associate state, but our whole history proves that breaking up Canada in small states would be like snuffing the candles in a castle, blowing them out one by one until the whole castle is in the dark.

I say and repeat that if as much had been done previously as the Pearson government has since achieved toward a better understanding of the French-Canadian people, of the aspirations of the French Canadians and of the province of Quebec, there would be no question today of separatism, associate state nor, for some people, of joining the United States.

The province of Quebec has no desire for a special status, although it is not a province like the others. It does not look for privileges but it wants its right to be respected 100 per cent; just as it respects the rights of others, it wants the rights of the French Canadians respected throughout Canada.

Doubtless, the constitution needs some changes, some explaining. Indeed, each new act adds something to it and even now we are having a closer look at the fundamental problem.

Mr. Speaker, to love one's country is, among other things, to know what it was, to know what it is and whit it can become, and then to reach for the indicated ideal. With some perspicacity, and the firm and generous resolution to do the utmost, Canada can achieve great things in its second century, achievements which Canadians can be proud of when the second century is celebrated.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks, I would like to say a few words about my constituency of Champlain. All our rural parishes, all our small communities want industries that will enable them to develop. They are ready to any sacrifices necessary, and they await with anxiety the industrialists and industries that our governments could send to them. We have a sound population, and it is unfortunate that the people in each parish cannot develop for themselves a future at home.

Many of them, mostly sons of farmers, have to migrate to larger centres, often increasing the number of unemployed.

I asked the Minister of Industry and Defence Production (Mr. Drury) to declare the whole new Champlain county a designated area. Part of it is already designated; the rest should also be designated, and this is urgent. I refer specifically to that part of the county of Portneuf that will fall in the county of Champlain. Several industries, one of which is one hundred years old, were shut down, leaving the population unemployed and in a disquieting economic situation.

In the past, I also talked about expanding the port of Trois-Rivières to the east, that is at Ste. Marthe, of Cap de la Madeleine, as a means of developing the northern economy. We are still waiting, and I think that the matter has been under consideration for quite a long time.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to repeat the speech I made the last day of the last session about agriculture. An amendment was moved by the opposition, but it was strictly for political and partisan purposes; that is why I voted against it, because this government has done more for agriculture in eastern Canada than any other government.

Our friends opposite are ready to do anything today and they criticize—which is an easy thing to do. However, what did they do for our eastern farmers when they were in power and even had an absolute power?

I recognize that the new dairy policy, although not complete, is a step forward, but it does not meet fully the requests which were made. The matter of quotas, especially, is a puzzle—for instance, the withdrawal of the subsidy on surplus liquid milk. But I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene) is doing and will continue to do everything in his power to give as much satisfaction as possible.

On May 24 next, that is next week, the farmers will march on parliament. We shall be very happy and very proud to receive them.

[English]

Mr. R. J. Orange (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join other members of the house in congratulating the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), and also the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) on the fine contribution they made to this debate. As one who is relatively new to this house, and having heard only one other debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I must say that I think the standard set by the mover and seconder will be held in high regard in the years to come.

In the course of this debate many members have made most appropriate references to the role of parliament as it exists in the twentieth century and as we move toward the twenty first century. The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) set out a 15-point program dealing with what he thought would speed up and possibly modernize the effectiveness of parliament. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) in his thoughtful presentation last week outlined his views on committee responsibility and on the role of the private member of parliament and his relationship to the executive.

We have also discussed the use of television both in the house and in committees. Yesterday, I believe, one hon. member suggested that the government might examine the kind of facilities that are available to members of parliament in Canada compared with those available to their counterparts in the United States.

As one who is attending his first parliament I must say that I was somewhat surprised and possibly a little disappointed with the kind of assistance and benefits—I am not talking of financial benefits—afforded to hon. members. Having been elected for the first time a member approaches his new role with a great deal of enthusiasm and, hopefully, energy. Suddenly he finds himself in the position at times of feeling frustrated by his inability not only to do the kind of job he hoped to do but just to carry out those responsibilities which the people who voted for him in his constituency asked him to undertake. There has been a great deal of discussion along this line. My only contribution at this stage is to say that I hope the discussion will continue and that as a result the facilities available, particularly to private members of parliament, the backbenchers, will improve in years to come so that we may do what we were sent here to do by the people who sent us.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I was greatly relieved, Mr. Speaker, as was the mineral industry of Canada, by the announcement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) made earlier in the session. The concern caused by certain recommendations of the Carter commission on taxation with respect to the mineral industry was such that some believed that this year's exploration program in some parts of the country would be seriously curtailed. I refer to the possibility of changes in the tax structure affecting that industry. The minister's announcement, made without prejudicing the government's final decision, helped to resolve some of the concern felt by the industry. In considering the recommendations to which I have alluded, particularly those dealing with the tax free period, I hope that the government and its advisers will consider carefully any changes to be made and will make only those changes that benefit the development of this major industry in our country.

Let us look for a moment at what the mineral industry means to Canada. In 1966 the value of mineral production, which amounted to 7.2 per cent of the gross national product, was approximately $4 billion, eight times the 1945 dollar value. This does not include moneys expended on exploration and development, nor goods and services associated with the industry. The industry has been of basic importance in the economic development of Canada, being the second leading industry in terms of dollar earnings. At the same time it is not without serious problems. It has a labour shortage partly because of the nature of the industry and also because of where some mining developments are located. The spectre of the Carter commission hangs over its head. Finally, certain sections of the industry such as gold mining are plagued with special problems of prices and costs. I hope the cost-aid program for the gold mining industry will be continued and possibly expanded. Otherwise a number of communities throughout Canada will be affected seriously.

I heard with a great deal of interest the announcement of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Laing) in the house regarding the off-reserve Indian housing program which, as has been openly acknowledged, is long overdue. It will assist the Indian residents of Canada to move to areas of economic opportunity away from the traditional reserves. Most important, I believe the program will aid young Indians who wish on completion of their education to work in metropolitan or other areas of Canada and find opportunities to make a decent start in life in the same way as many of us have been helped by our parents to get off the ground.

I asked the minister if a similar program could not apply to the Eskimos. In asking that question I was concerned about the Eskimo people who leave their homes and hunting communities to move to areas of economic opportunity. I think particularly of the Eskimo people working on the Great Slave Lake railway which is operated almost entirely by Eskimo employees. I think also of the Eskimo working in the mines at Yellowknife and Lynn Lake, Manitoba. All these people want to integrate into the community in which they live. Quite apart from the problems of language and culture are the problems of becoming established in a community, and I think that the government and all Canadians have a responsibility to help in the initial process of integration.

In 1963 a number of Eskimo families were moved to Yellowknife to work in the mines. In the four intervening years some have returned to their original homes at Rankin Inlet and Keewatin and others have persevered. Those who have are first class miners who earn bonuses larger than those earned by the majority of their fellow employees. Yet because they have large families they are expected to live in accommodation which, to my way of thinking, is inadequate. What does one say to a man who approaches and says, "I want to stay here in Yellowknife so that my children can go to school, so that they can have the same chance your children have, but I must have a decent place to live in"? If the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development were in the house I would appeal to him to extend his program to people such as I have just described. I also asked the minister if he had any plans regarding the Métis people and I did so recognizing that the government of Canada does not have responsibility for these people. Their education, welfare and economic development are the responsibility of the province in which they live and they are treated as other citizens of that province are treated. I regret that the Métis, who did so much to open up the west and north in early days, have become the forgotten people of our nation and I hope that in our centennial year the government of Canada, in co-operation with the provinces, will put aside political differences, will not ask who will pay for what, but will try to work out a viable, exciting and dynamic solution to help the Métis of Canada to enter the mainstream of the life of our nation in the same way as it will help the Indians and, I hope, the Eskimos in the years to come.

In the first session of this parliament we enacted legislation amending the Northwest Territories Act. Though, as was said, it was housekeeping legislation, it did something that was most important. It extended the franchise, the right to vote, throughout the Northwest Territories. Up to that time people who were living in Keewatin and the eastern Arctic could not vote in territorial elections although they could in federal elections. Since then there have been exciting developments. The franchise has indeed been extended and an election held. Three representatives from the Arctic region sat with the council at the last two sessions, one held at Resolute Bay and the other in Ottawa. Yellowknife was declared the capital of the Northwest Territories and the governor of the territories was moved from the south, from beneath the umbrella of the federal administration, to the north. At the same time an announcement was made that as a result of the recommendations of the Carrothers commission on government in the Northwest Territories a white paper would be produced setting out, in effect, the government's position with respect to the over-all development of government in the north.

I appeal to the cabinet to ensure that this white paper becomes a centennial project and thus a centennial present to the people of the north to assist them in getting their territorial government on the ground. I hope this white paper will be available not later than the coming fall. I also hope that when the white paper is available and open for discussion the views of northerners are taken into account. I expect they will be. Knowing the manner in which government sometimes tends to operate, however, I think it should be clear that if the views expressed in the white paper do not reflect the views of northerners there might be problems about approving the kind of legislation brought forward to bring government to the north.

In the course of the decision to declare Yellowknife the capital, the town of Fort Smith became concerned, not because it was not to be the capital but with respect to its future. Positive steps have been taken by the territorial government to ensure that this community will continue to grow as a northern settlement. I should like to think that the federal government, recognizing its responsibility because it made the decision, will continue to provide the impetus necessary to assist the town planners in that community to solve the problems they now face. I trust the federal government will make a decision regarding the future of Fort Smith.

I am happy to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) in the house because I wish to pay him a compliment which I hope will result in the continuation of the good work which has been done by the department in the last few months in the north. I refer to the decrease in parcel post rates and air freight rates which has taken place as a result of an evaluation of postal facilities and charges by the department. However, I suggest that the steps the minister has taken are not sufficient. We still suffer from an irregular service and a lack of proper post office facilities in many places. There are even inconsistencies in the new rate structure which has been established. The Postmaster General assured me that he is undertaking a further study of postal services in northern Canada the results of which will be available in the fall.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation began television service in Yellowknife on May 14. We now have one station in the north and the corporation is to be commended for its forward approach. We know there is another station planned for the Lynn Lake area and a third for the Seven Islands area. We hope the C.B.C.'s plans to provide television service for the larger communities in the isolated northern areas of our nation by means of a "frontier package" will move ahead quickly. When I realized the cost of setting up one of these small package units and maintaining it for a year I became concerned lest the corporation might not move ahead as quickly as we would like it to do.

In the course of the past month the Department of Manpower and Immigration has opened employment offices in the Northwest Territories. This development will go a long way toward resolving some of the problems connected with local hire with which we in the north are faced. All too often in the past, particularly in connection with construction programs, contractors from the south have brought complete labour forces into the area thus denying the opportunity of employment to our own people. Among the greatest offenders have been oil exploration companies—at great cost to themselves, I may add.

I should like for a moment to examine the government's external aid program in relation to the development program designed to help underdeveloped areas in this country. We know that this year the external aid program will contribute through grants, loans and direct aid approximately $300 million to the development of nations throughout the world. I think this is the least Canada can do. We like to think of ourselves as an affluent nation and if we wish to take our place in the community of nations we must also accept some responsibility. The only complaint with regard to aid being granted outside our borders is that perhaps it is too little.

There is, however, one aspect which bothers me, and I know it bothers many who live in the northern territories. With so many things needing to be done in terms of northern development in order to allow those who live there, particularly the Eskimos, the Indians and the Métis, to enjoy a reasonable standard of living, the northern development budget could surely be increased by more than 5 per cent a year, the total amount of the increase which took place last year, bearing in mind that the external aid budget has increased by some $50 million a year. Yet in the last four years the budget has doubled from about $16 million a year to $32 million in terms of real federal expenditures, not including provincial expenditures.

The throne speech made reference to a system of industrial incentives to encourage development of regional economic growth and to encourage further development in the north, and it was suggested that by regional economic planning some of these incentives might come into being. What I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, is whether this is to be merely an extension of the many federal programs such as aid to industry, rural development and designated areas, which do not apply north of the sixtieth parallel, or is this something new and exciting that the government is proposing? I sincerely hope it is a combination of both.

There is a tendency on the part of many people to suggest that because the population of the north is small, which we acknowledge, what we as a nation are doing for the north is adequate. Maybe this would be true if we were talking in terms of numbers of people, but I suggest that what we are seeking is not only growth in our population but greater investment in the growth and development of Canada as a whole. We hope that when the time comes that the vast mineral resources of the north are being fully exploited—we see one example in the Pine Point development where as a result of the opening up of this one mine the mineral production of the north tripled in the space of one short year—the north in turn will be able to repay not only the contribution made by the nation to its development but also assist in the growth of the country as a whole. It is on this basis that I draw the comparison between what we are doing in external aid and what I would like to see happen in the northern territories. The programs of government have been good but we have a long way to go.

Housing for our Indian people does not compare with the liberal program that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development introduced for the Eskimo people and yet, Mr. Speaker, I ask what is the advantage of building a home if water, supplies, garbage disposal and electricity are not available or are available only in a pretty primitive way? In the settlement of Inuvik, now the town of Inuvik, a number of local people, Indian, Eskimo, Métis and white, banded together in 1963 to launch a co-operative housing program. Inuvik is a town which was built by the government in the last decade to take account of the need of the government for an administrative centre in the Mackenzie delta. The town was built in two ways. Members of the northern affairs committee who visited it saw how this was done. I refer to the serviced area and the unserviced area. By this I mean that government employees live in modern standard housing serviced by water and sewers through a very practical although expensive utilidor system, which also includes heating arrangements, but the people who come from the Mackenzie delta by and large live in the west end where there are no services other than a primitive trucked water supply and a pretty basic garbage disposal system.

The members of this co-operative, all of whom are fully employed, have been pressing the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for three years in order that at their own expense they too might enjoy the very basic amenity of being able to turn on a tap in their kitchens and have running water. But this year again, and for reasons which I do not know except possibly the old chestnut that it might cost too much, the government has indicated to the local residents, according to an editorial in the Inuvik newspaper, the Drum, that possibly next year but not this year something will be made available to the people who live in the co-operative development.

These people want facilities, Mr. Speaker. They are prepared to pay for them. All I suggest is that somehow or other, in co-operation with the federal government in particular and with the territorial government where necessary, some system be worked out to provide basic services to the people who were born and brought up in the north, who are making their whole living in the north and who feel they should have the same opportunities as their white cousins or their cousins who come from the south and who live in modern fully serviced government housing while working for the government.

We can also look across the Arctic to a community called Eskimo Point in Keewatin. A new housing program is intended for that community this year, but when we ask about water, garbage and sewage services we get the answer that they really are not available. From Eskimo Point it is eight miles to the nearest lake where water is available. In wintertime ice is cut from a lake closer to the settlement. This might not be of much concern except for the fact that over the years this community has suffered a series of medical disasters to the point that in 1963 half of the population was moved to a hospital in the south because of an outbreak of meningitis and tuberculosis.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join all other members of the House of Commons who have offered congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I admire their worthy contributions.

The speech from the throne was only an exercise in words and it was very disappointing. People across this nation had expectations of a masterpiece on this special occasion that would overshadow any previous effort. During this centennial year, when Canada is receiving unprecedented world recognition, there is a rare opportunity for the government to spread its wings and introduce a program that would stir the heart and soul of every Canadian. Mr. Speaker, the government is negative in regard to that imagination which would visualize Canada's vast potential for her second century. The government's brain trust, with several years at their disposal to prepare another manifesto of action, have come up with another failure.

This is also a time for reflection, and at the beginning of our second century of confederation it is fitting that we pay tribute to those Canadians who have gone before, even to those who laid the foundations of this nation many years before confederation. Many of our forebears came to Canada to escape oppression and injustice, to a land where a new life could be lived in freedom. This was a way of life in which they took great pride and they sought to preserve it at any cost. The fathers of confederation, in their deliberations and when setting up their statutes, made freedom the first principle.

We have fought in two terrible wars involving the supreme sacrifice of thousands of our people in defence of freedom. Canadians are well aware of the price of this God-given right. Surely we cannot continue to stand by and watch it disappear piecemeal by regimentation and legislation. The philosophy of the government is progressively removing the challenge from our way of life. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how far can we continue on the course charted by this government and have any real freedom left?

I bring to the government's attention those wise and enduring words of Abraham Lincoln when he said:

> You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift: you cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong: you cannot help the wage-earner by pulling down the wagepayer: you cannot further the brotherhood of man by encouraging class hatred. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich: you cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you earn. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves.

There is at least one cabinet minister who has registered some anxiety about the course of events in this nation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters), when speaking to a Toronto Rotary Club a few days ago, said:

> I am a businessman at heart and I believe it is the responsibility of the government to bring revenues and expenditures into balance and provide a balanced budget.

He stated further that the government must encourage exports and in so doing could build a good surplus on its trading account which would help reduce our international account deficit. He contends that most governments spend more than they should. Canadians, he said, are enjoying the second or third highest standard of living in the world, although we are living on borrowed money. The minister insisted that Canada must maintain a climate that is favourable to foreign investment. If we do not, he said, we just do not balance our international books. However, with foreign investment Canada gets a large measure of foreign ownership, which raises questions as to whether she is in danger of losing economic and political sovereignty. The trade minister said his own view is that it is not the fact of foreign ownership that matters but what use is made of the ownership. He also said that more than 99 per cent of the foreign-owned firms in Canada are good corporate citizens from a Canadian point of view. This minister, Mr. Speaker, is a sound businessman and the treasury benches are in short supply of men of his calibre. It must also be evident to the minister that the spiralling tax burden must be brought under control. Our tax bill, compared with that of other democratic countries such as the United States, Japan and Australia, is already away out of line.

Another cabinet minister, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon), speaking in London last Friday said that there would be further government intervention in the economy and that a reasonably courageous government will not listen to complaints about high taxes from businessmen and the public at large. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) on one or more occasions has stated that a man should be guaranteed a livelihood whether or not he wants to work. No wonder we have many people who do not want to work. Such statements indicate that there is an urgent need for good businessmen on the front benches opposite. This government operates the biggest business in the nation; yet from all appearances it has phased out good business principles.

We have now arrived at the position where it takes one third of our gross national product to pay our taxes, and the trend can only continue upward. This fact was borne out on a recent television program when a commentator interviewed the Registrar General (Mr. Turner), a prominent, young minister of the crown. The give-away program he said he would support will make the socialists look like pikers.

This cradle to the grave security will certainly kill initiative and along with all the other lavish spending will eventually bring this nation to the point of no return. There is a faction in the government leaning far to the left. Their statements and actions leave no doubt as to their philosophy. Others are extreme socialists at heart but do not have the intestinal fortitude to be vocal at this time. However, their performance before being elevated to posts of influence leaves no doubt about their philosophy.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada last March expressed his concern over the fact that Canadian costs and prices rose faster last year than productivity and that demands placed on the economy outstripped the economy's ability to produce. Ironically enough, the governor's warning of economic stress and strain coincided with the government's disclosure of its spending program for 1967-68. This was an unprecedented government housekeeping bill for $11½ billion with a good possibility of $250 million to $300 million more to be tacked on before this year is over.

In 1963 the Glassco report called for major cuts in our large and often inefficient civil service. It has become a top-heavy bureaucracy. Instead the government has increased the civil service by 71,445 since October 1, 1964. New departments appear to be the order of the day and indications are that thousands more will join the civil service within the next few months. Mr. Glassco claimed that savings of $500 million could be effected annually if his recommendations to streamline government were implemented. The government has been slow to take action on these recommendations, and 150 of them have not been implemented.

There is a proverb that sums up in a few words this government's position.

> We do not what we ought,
> What we ought not we do,
> And lean upon the thought
> That chance will bring us through.

I am privileged to be a member of the public accounts committee and am deeply concerned and astonished, as the people across this nation must be, at the many items of careless and extravagant spending by the government. The Auditor General has made these revelations to the committee, which in turn submitted strong corrective recommendations. But the reaction of the government has been indifference. Repercussions to the government's actions are beginning to register right across the country. One day last week Premier Bennett of British Columbia said that federal waste, extravagance and patronage are costing the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

This government talks about a better way of life for Canadians. What is being done about it? Every part of the nation is in need of housing. This problem has reached emergency proportions; therefore every obstacle should be removed. Removal of the sales tax from housebuilding materials should take effect at once. Builders should be mobilized in areas where the need is most urgent.

We are worried about our talented young people migrating to the United States. This can be expected, and even more so if they cannot secure the first requirement here at home, namely, a roof over their heads. This raises the matter of immigration. How can we justify enticing more people to our land when housing accommodation is not available? If the government had really taken the welfare of the people of this nation to heart, this centennial year would have been the milestone in our history when all our people were provided with respectable housing. We have all the elements in human and material resources but the leadership is conspicuous by its absence.

I turn now to another serious problem that involves every citizen of this nation. I refer to safety on our highways. I believe I made the initial approach to the government on this matter by way of a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in 1963. I have continued to request action on the various aspects of the problem by way of questions in every session since that time. On February 2, 1966, I brought to the attention of the house viewpoints on highway safety as expressed by the provincial minister of highways, Chief Justice McRuer, the commissioner of the R.C.M.P., and the chief coroner of metro Toronto.

It has been proven that drunk drivers and air pollution from carbonmonoxide are creating the greatest hazards. My questioning has been concentrated on these two problems because statistics have shown that only one per cent of highway accidents can be attributed to defective automobiles. Other members of the house have joined in the crusade to reduce the tragic death toll on our highways, but the government has declined to take action on one particular matter that would have a telling effect. I refer to making the breathalizer test mandatory. I urged the government to take this action many months ago, and no reason has been given for the delay.

Surely the government does not fear the liquor and beer interests, or are they hesitating hoping that the provinces will take this responsibility? Such legislation has proven useful and successful in New York and other states, so I see no valid reason why it should not be given favourable consideration here.

Over 5,000 people were killed on our highways last year and in over 50 per cent of these fatalities alcohol was involved. There were also 160,000 or more injured, many permanently. Liquor would also account for more than half of these. The law will not tolerate such behaviour on trains, planes or in industry. It is beyond me why the government treats the matter so lightly. Rather, the government is showing great concern for the welfare of criminals when it proposes to bring up the matter of the abolition of capital punishment again. It has ignored the decision already made and wants to have the matter decided again.

[Mr. Noble.]

I am concerned about the problems of the farmers and the need for a constant supply of food to take care of our domestic needs with enough to continue to fulfil our obligations to our customers and other needy people. There is a tremendous migration from rural to urban life, partly due to uneconomic units but chiefly on account of better rewards for an hour of work. Governments cannot continue to ignore the just requests of agriculturalists without jeopardizing our food production.

Next week we will witness a march on parliament hill in protest against a poorly conceived dairy policy. It seems the minister was ill advised and the proposition he put forward brought scorn upon his head. On this occasion the minister might have been in a more favourable position if he had paid attention to the practical information made available to him. I believe it to be the urgent responsibility of the government, especially of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Greene), to be on hand to meet the farmers on May 24, a date they have designated well in advance and one that comes at a time when there is a lapse in their seeding activities. I make a strong appeal for favourable consideration of the request that will be made regarding the price of milk. If the farmers were paid on the same basis as industrial workers, even without giving any consideration for their large investment the price of milk would be higher than what they are proposing. These people are essential to the health and welfare of this nation.

This government is so neglectful on many occasions that a crisis develops before any attention is given to the problem. The militia had to be called out in Ireland a few days ago to restore order when the farmers' requests there were ignored. We would not like this to happen in Canada, especially in our centennial year.

Milk producers plan their operations for months in advance and it was folly for the Minister of Agriculture to expect our farmers to accept a drastic change in policy without a protest. The sudden announcement that quotas for manufacturing milk produced in 1967 and 1968 will be based on 1966-67 production means a substantial drop in their incomes and it was especially disappointing to those who had increased their herds. The fluid milk producers felt that a reasonable period of adjustment should have been provided in respect of terminating the federal subsidy. The government is now faced with a disagreeable incident created by their own procrastination and poor judgment.

In conclusion I want to say that I am proud to be a Canadian, as I am sure we all are, and I believe we would all agree we have the best country in the world. We have the potential for a future of fullness and plenty. We are richly endowed with vast renewable natural resources in our agriculture, our fisheries, our forests and our waters. It is our responsiblity to see that these riches are preserved and improved for posterity. We must also rally round those leaders who will preserve the freedom of the individual so that he may be privileged to develop his own life, his own talents and his own self-expression with special privileges to no one.

Mr. John R. Matheson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I pay heartfelt tributes to both the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I doubt that anyone reading Hansard will fully sense the command of this house obtained by both those able speakers, speaking as I recall without notes but with enthusiasm in developing their thoughts. It is my belief that the mover, with carefully chosen words, expressed what was very much in the hearts of us all.

In referring to the speech delivered by His Excellency on Monday, May 8, I find these words:

> A country is a home; it must be built and furnished for the good life of its people.

His Excellency concluded his memorable address with words of the first Governor General of our country uttered some 100 years ago. He said:

> —a blessing to yourselves and your posterity, and a fresh starting point in the moral, political and material advancement of the people of Canada.

The subject I should like to deal with briefly is penitentiaries and parole. As we start out on a new century I think we would do well to face seriously the problems relating to crime and punishment in Canada. I rejoice in the fact that on January 1, 1966, the government saw fit to make a full department of the office of the Solicitor General and that as a result penitentiaries and parole now fall under the jurisdiction of the new minister and deputy minister. I am also pleased that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who have been such an important element as anti-crime experts in maintaining the good life in Canada over the past 100 years and more, now balance the punishment side of the department engaged in incarcerating the offender and assisting him later by way of parole.

The minister who is responsible in this regard I know is determined to play an extremely important role. I have read several speeches delivered by the Solicitor General (Mr. Pennell), some of which have been published, and I find him to be a thoughtful, philosophical and idealistic man who is quietly and very successfully accomplishing reform in this long neglected field.

It is a fact that no one likes to oversee prisons. We all seek to avoid looking at the unpleasant. I happen to know that very few members of this parliament or the parliament which preceded it in the last few years have visited federal penitentiaries. There are some who have made a study of our institutions but by and large even members of parliament, who are their brothers' keepers in this regard, have taken little time out to visit the penitentiaries, save happily for the penitentiary committee. What can be said about members of parliament applies with even more force to society generally.

The Solicitor General is reported in the Optimist magazine of June, 1966, as having asked this important question: "What does Canada owe her criminals?" Then he reviews briefly something of the history of punishment in this country. He told us that in the ancient world the generally accepted idea was that a prison was regarded solely as a useful means of safe custody pending trial or punishment. It was not thought to suffice as a form of punishment in itself because in early days death was the penalty provided for most offences. There are records throughout Canada of the harsh penalties that were then imposed.

He writes that when England began at last to move away from the death penalty it moved toward the more humane concepts of banishment and transportation. Finally, imprisonment was accepted as punishment. Incarceration in prison changed, at last, quite naturally toward the present day advocacy that the prison should not function merely as a place of confinement for docile, well disciplined human beings but instead should be a dynamic place, a laboratory in which character disorders and anti-social attitudes are examined under the microscope of modern knowledge, a workshop in which twisted personalities are straightened and disoriented men and women are given some sense of direction.

I was intrigued by the article written by J. Alex Edmison, Q.C., of the national parole board on crime and its treatment in Canada. He writes about the various alternatives to imprisonment which have been fully tested in Canada. These penalties applied in Ontario, Quebec and other parts of our country long before confederation. There was the pillory in which a man was held firmly by the neck and wrists. People could assist in the punishment either by whip or by throwing something at the man. The pillory was abolished in Canada by statute in 1842. The stocks were used in upper Canada in 1804. William Lyon Mackenzie, carrying out his duties as first mayor of Toronto, presided over magistrate's court in 1834 and required a man to suffer this ignominious treatment. It was abandoned in England in 1872. Branding was a very common punishment. In 1798 the Chief Justice of Upper Canada had criminals branded in open court. The practice was abolished in 1802, except for manslaughter. Banishment, of course, was a common punishment, and so was transportation.

I mention these specific punishments because when we look back over the short period of a century it is clear that the penitentiary has been a rather late sociological device to punish and reform the prisoner. I think that by now we have had sufficient time to make certain deliberate estimates of the efficacy of this form of punishment. Inherent in everything I say must be the question: Why do we punish at all? What is the philosophic or moral reason for the punishment of a person who has breached a code which we call the Criminal Code? I suppose of the traditional explanations, one is based on retribution or revenge, another on deterrence and still another on the rehabilitation factor and together the protection of society at large.

But it would be well for us, as modern people with modern problems and a new sense of total responsibility for the ills of our society, to consider the total cost of the program, the penitentiary approach to punishment. It might surprise Canadians to know that the cost of a cell in a maximum security institution is now between $20,000 and $25,000. The cost per year for an inmate in a maximum security institution today is approximately $3,650, or $10 a day, which is not really an unusual price for a hotel room. In the case of an inmate with a wife and dependent children the total cost to Canada, to the province and to the municipality can often reach the annual figure of $10,000. The desirable size of a penitentiary does not exceed 450 inmates and any institution of that size now costs approximately $10 million. But by way of dramatic contrast I would invite Canadians to note the fact that the cost of a paroled prisoner is approximately $250 per year. Perhaps it is my highland background, but something in all these figures worries me a great deal. Imprisonment is costly.

A few days ago I spoke to the John Howard Society in Fredericton. My remarks were reported in the Daily Gleaner under the headline "Men Want to be Forgiven". This brought a few letters which I read with some interest. In one letter was an editorial from the Gleaner of April 24, 1967, titled "Kindness To Criminals", the final paragraph of which reads as follows:

> We believe that criminals should bear the stigma for their crimes, and that this is not only a part of their punishment but a part of the protection of the innocent.

I quite understand how it is that an editorial writer who is on the outside and knows something about the statistics of crime in North America, particularly in the United States, or the crime statistics in Great Britain, could come to the conclusion that harshness presents some sort of solution. But the real fact is that our prisons are not succeeding. The recidivist rate, that is, the rate at which persons go to penitentiary after having been in prison before, remains constant at approximately 80 per cent. On the other hand, the parole failure rate in Canada stands constant at the figure of 10 per cent.

I believe that through the efforts of the Solicitor General and the type of program that is at last being implemented we are seeking to close this gap. We hope to drop the parole success rate of 90 per cent and thereby substantially reduce the recidivist rate and thus sharply reduce the cost to the taxpayer. However, my argument is based not on vulgar economics, important as they may be, but on something which I think is very much more important than economy, namely, rehabilitation. After we have examined these figures carefully we must come to the conclusion that locking people up does not solve very much.

I was interested in the report appearing in the Ottawa Citizen today of the address John Braithwaite, our expert on corrections, gave to the annual meeting of the Elizabeth Fry Society of Ottawa last evening. He made the point that the basic danger is that the offender is psychologically cut off from society. He pointed out that throughout the world there is growing criticism of and inquiry into the traditional methods of reform. Exactly the same kind of inquiry is proceeding presently in the office of the Solicitor General. He speaks about the trend toward increasing community involvement. He mentions certain organizations, societies and groups that must become involved in rehabilitation. I could not agree more, Mr. Speaker.

Throughout Canada and the United States and particularly in northwestern Europe studies and experiments have been conducted on the subject of rehabilitation. You even find this same spirit of reform, the trend toward rehabilitation and the tendency to the people out of institutions just as rapidly as possible, in the far east. I think it was Winston Churchill who said more eloquently than I could, that you assess and judge a society by the manner in which that society cares for those people who are held in custody.

I was delighted by the scholarly and wise address given on civil liberties by my colleague the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). It seems to me that crime and punishment is closely related to the attitude we entertain toward civil liberties. I believe when we look at the special problems of the offender we would be wise to make comparisons with other exceptional or different people in the community.

I admire, sir, the work that is done in the town of Smiths Falls where there is a hospital carrying the considerable burden of the care of retarded children for the province of Ontario. The magazine, "Canada's Mental Health", had a special issue in November on mental retardation. In it I find an article by an old friend. Dr. H. F. Frank, a psychiatrist who has devoted himself to the care of the retarded. Speaking of the disability of mental retardation, Dr. Frank said:

> The idea that a child who cannot come up to average community requirements should be "put away" in an institution, dies very hard ... We are just beginning to learn that a large number of exceptional children must be integrated into every day community life and helped to achieve the best of their ability ... Working an ill adapted child into society cannot be achieved only through institutionalization ... the community has to realize that a large number of children should continue to live in the community where their educational, recreational and other needs must be met.

Anyone who goes to Smiths Falls and sees what has been done in that institution for thousands of unfortunate exceptional little people, some of whom stay there for many years and become exceptional older people, will appreciate that it is not possible for us to send all our troubles to one community and hope that that community, with all the medical skills it may possess, the devotion, the care and concern and loving attention, can right these wrongs. I would urge, with John Braithwaite, that the time has come in Canada when there must be a much larger element of total involvement in problems of problem people—both patients and prisoners. Years ago Eugene Debs said, "While there is a soul in prison I am not free."

The fact is that many of the best people in our Canadian society do not care about this prisoner problem, do not know anything about the problem and never have become involved. We have, therefore, the extraordinary situation of recidivism staying at the high figure of 80 per cent and parole staying at the low rate of 10 per cent. Society tries to protect itself against these evil and different people getting out and being rehabilitated simply because as a society we are not prepared to share the burdens, the risks and the responsibility of making rehabilitation work. We take a false pride in our low rate of parole failure. Someone has suggested the analogy of a baseball player with an exceptionally high batting average being kept out of the game and on the bench to maintain his high batting average.

We are proud of our parole service. We are proud of our penitentiary service. Of course, both of these could be better than they are just as anything we do could be better. I feel we have come to the point where collectively we must take the risk and share in the responsibility of a much higher parole failure rate in the hope that we substantially reduce the recidivist rate. Although it may not be obvious to everybody this is what the Solicitor General has begun to do. During the few months in which he has held this portfolio he has already managed to accomplish a great deal. It may not be known, but he has already caused a larger number of people to be paroled. Although it is difficult to obtain these highly qualified people, he has taken on more parole officers. These are specialized social workers.

The fact is that the increased number of paroles has not resulted in any marked increase in the failure rate. In spite of our sharply increased population and particularly juvenile population, the number of inmates in federal institutions has declined this year by approximately 500. I should like to see an even sharper decline. This has been accomplished by a process of segregation, determining whether a person must be cared for custodially or in some rehabilitation centre.

We must acknowledge there are some people who are not likely to be redeemed. However, I believe many more can be rehabilitated than has been achieved in the past. Last week I spent some hours with the warden of Joyceville. We had a long talk about the successes and failures of that institution. He speaks with a background of 25 years experience and a recollection of the various things that have been done during his service to improve vitally the facilities for effecting reform. He told me how much the penitentiary officers care about their work. Basically the thing that counts is personal involvement. He referred to his wife Stella. He said that Stella had no particular training in penology and had never taken a course in psychology. He mentioned the number of people in the institution whom Stella had befriended, in some cases elderly men committed to a life of crime, a life of failure. She had brought them into her home. She had trusted them and reached out to them. This made all the difference. The victories were personal victories.

There is only one way to redeem people, I believe, and that is by recognizing the person as an individual. One of the letters I received from Fredericton tells me what is really needed is hope. This person writes that the prisoner has lost hope, a lot of people have lost hope and find it hard, if not impossible, to get it back. According to the ancient legend, Mr. Speaker, Pandora was a woman whose curiosity caused her to slip off the cover of the jar containing a multitude of plagues for hapless man, namely, gout, rheumatism, colic, envy, spite and revenge and many other ills. Pandora hastened to replace the lid but all these evils had escaped and were scattered far and wide. Only one thing remained at the bottom of the jar—hope. So to this way, whatever mischief is abroad, while we have hope we are not entirely wretched. Some men in our institutions have lives which have been confounded by illness, hatred, mischief and malice. If we seek to build the good society we must build on individual lives and on the only foundation of character that remains —hope.

Our neighbour to the south has started to show the way. The United States federal department of justice was permitted as of 1965 to release incarcerated offenders to work in the community and return to custody at night. This many sound revolutionary to Canadians, Mr. Speaker, but other countries do likewise. As of now over 2,000 persons have been involved in this United States program. Their gross earnings are in excess of $2,147,-000. Of this sum, $203,000 went to pay their room and board at the penitentiary $303,000 was paid by way of various state and federal taxes, and what was left over went to support the inmates' families or to await and to hasten their day of release.

Not many weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, I was in a penitentiary at Taipei which housed over 2,000 men and women. Bear in mind that our institutions house approximately 450 inmates. This institution was built at very low cost in our terms, something like a quarter of a million dollars in American money. It had no armed guards. I was in a concert hall with over 500 prisoners present listening to a 15-piece orchestra with one custodial officer in attendance unarmed. There were many women prisoners. The social conditions of the country were such that these women prisoners, who were mainly narcotic addicts, were compelled to bring their children to the penitentiary to reside with them.

Does this sound shocking, Mr. Speaker? In fact it was not because that excellent penitentiary had gardens and play yards and attractive facilities. The inmates of the prison were working on embroidery, making rattan furniture, sculpting and doing many other things for gain. Everyone in the institution was being paid. Some of the prisoners were receiving psychiatric care. The time within which prisoners were released was dependent in part on the money that they had earned and their attitude of mind as they prepared to go out to meet society.

I believe that incarceration is sometimes good. I have before me a letter from a minimum security institution written by a once successful professional man who did an evil thing. In this letter to me he says:

> It is a strange thing to say, but I am happy that I have spent this time in prison. I have rediscovered myself, my family and life.

His wife, Grace, has written a very touching letter, much of which tells how this experience of humiliation and separation has redeemed their life together and given the family new hope. Although much has been destroyed, on the basis of this hope much can be rebuilt.

I think that as we desire and search as a people for a better country and the good society, we all must become deeply involved. Industry has not cared nearly enough about the penitentiary services of Canada. In some respects it has impeded progress. Organized labour has not cared nearly enough about our penitentiary services, and in some respects has impeded the rehabilitation and restoration to society of people who have offended. Our service clubs should be challenged to participate fully in this program, just as industry and labour should become a mighty industrial partnership to ensure that something better is provided.

I would leave with the house some of the thoughts of George Scott, a psychiatrist in the Kingston complex. He envisions a community which he calls "reward city" where people are moved progressively from maximum to medium to minimum security, until finally we have the open community where people work hard and live under free conditions and with good pay, developing their skills and attitudes of self-care and responsibility. Perhaps industries will compete one with another to establish plants in such rehabilitive communities.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): In taking part in the debate on the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, my first words, of course, must be of commendation of the high quality of debate in this chamber during the last few days. I would be remiss if I did not comment on the efforts of the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) who started the debate.

Many interesting subjects have been covered but probably more time has been devoted to a discussion of constitutional matters and the streamlining of the procedures of this house than to any other subject. For my part I do not feel qualified to discuss either of these subjects, though I am quite sure that lack of qualifications and knowledge of a subject does not always rule out participation.

Reference was made in the throne speech to housing. I listened with intense interest to the remarks of the minister who is in charge of housing when he spoke in this chamber last week. I was particularly concerned to see whether there was to be a change in government policy toward alleviating what has been referred to in the house as the crisis in housing. Apparently not, though the minister did state in reply to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Keays) on orders of the day on Friday that his remarks contained very interesting material.

While I have the greatest personal admiration and respect for the minister, I cannot agree that there was much in his remarks to lend hope to the many people who are alarmed at the housing situation. Really what the minister said in essence was: "Everything will be O.K., everything will work out, if we just let the money lenders get more out of mortgages."

An increase in the mortgage interest rate may be essential, Mr. Speaker, but it is not the whole answer to the housing crisis. I feel sure that the minister realizes this as well as the other members of the house. The minister referred to his meetings across Canada this winter and reported on some of his findings in these words, which are to be found on page 93 of Hansard for May 11:

> —the greater part of the criticisms was not directed toward what the federal government was attempting to do and was doing in this field.

The minister admits that criticism exists but he sidesteps responsibility, saying in effect that other levels of government are to blame. Nobody likes to take the blame, and it is very comforting to attempt to place blame somewhere else. However I suggest it is up to us all in the federal government to provide more leadership in the matter, and we should be more actively engaged in efforts to lower the price of houses and of mortgage money —both equally essential. There ought to be more money at lower rates.

Were the minister in the house I would suggest to him that merely to sidestep the responsibility, as he appears to be doing is not the answer. We ought to be conducting research into streamlining building procedures—and when I talk of building procedures I refer to all phases of the industry, ranging from financing into research into new materials.

The minister also said that we have maintained a good average of housing starts and completions over a period of years, and this I do not deny. It is easy for one to rise in his place and be critical, just for the sake of being critical, but that is not my intention. I hope to be constructively critical, and I hope to draw attention to the inadequacy of the housing starts. I want to make certain suggestions, which I think are important for lowering the cost of housing.

A review of what has recently taken place in the housing industry might be helpful to understanding the problem better. This, briefly, is what happened last year and the year before that. In 1966 there were 134,474 starts, while in 1965 there were 162,192. In April the minister suggested in parliament that with an increased flow of mortgage money 155,000 starts might be made this year. He revised that figure in May and suggested that 160,000 houses would probably be started. Even that figure is 10,000 units short of the requirements as submitted by the Economic Council, which asks for 170,000 new housing starts for each year of this decade, and up to 200,000 yearly starts in the next decade.

Many things happened in 1966 to depress the building business, and here I wish to quote further statistics. Private lenders reduced mortgage loans. For example the trust companies reduced their loans by 48 per cent, the insurance companies by 31 per cent. The loan companies were down by 32 per cent. All lending was reduced from $2.5 billion to $1.6 billion, a reduction of $.9 billion. In an effort to alleviate the situation C.M.H.C. advances, taken from the consolidated revenue fund, were increased from $3.25 billion to $4 billion. This increased lending did not inject as much into the housing industry as was necessary. C.M.H.C. gave direct loans on 35,567 units; the private sector of the house building industry must have accounted therefore for 98,807 out of the 134,474 units started.

The life companies, on a dollarwise basis, disbursed more money in 1966 than in 1965, despite a marked decline for these companies in mortgage payments. Dollarwise and volumewise their business was up, but on a per unit basis it was down, serving to show how costs have accelerated. For example, in 1962, we see that 3.4 per cent of National Housing Act homes cost over $20,000; in 1966, the figures show that 27.5 per cent of National Housing Act homes cost over $20,000. I shall say more about that later, but at the moment I am particularly interested—

Mr. Lind: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McCutcheon: If it is a reasonable question. If I can answer it; I shall try to.

Mr. Lind: How many homes were built in 1962?

[Mr. McCutcheon.]

Mr. McCutcheon: That is a very interesting question and I shall take it as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Also, it is irrelevant.

Mr. McCutcheon: Yes. It is also irrelevant, as my colleague says.

As I was saying—and I expect the hon. member for Middlesex East knows about as much about housing costs as I know—costs for housing in 1966 increased at a greater rate than incomes and wages increased—taking into account even the Pearson 30 per cent formula for wage settlements. Here we see history repeating itself. In 1956-57 when costs advanced more quickly than incomes, we had a similar situation. In the year 1956-57 as in 1966-67 a Liberal government was in power, and I doubt whether these similar situations occurred through coincidence. It seems to me that here emphasis has again been put on the wrong priorities and no regard has been paid to the pocketbook of the little fellow who desperately needs a house.

In 1966 construction costs per square foot for bungalows averaged $12.56. The increase over the year 1965 was from 8.1 per cent to 12.4 per cent, depending on location, and this compares—to answer my hon. friend's question indirectly—with an average annual increase of 1.4 per cent only for the ten years 1956 to 1966. Just think of it—costs rose in one year by as much as they had risen in the previous six years. In all fairness these increased costs cannot all be blamed on the government; nevertheless because of its lack of enlightened planning it has contributed toward this increase. Almost everything that has been done in housing has been done to take the easy way out.

I talked before of the increased C.M.H.C. ceiling, and I must mention in fairness that legislation was brought in last year providing for national housing money for older homes. The government also changed the ratio for calculating rental housing loans to 90 per cent of lending value from 85 per cent of lending value. This is not enough, certainly, "to excite the daring". A borrower needs 5 per cent less down payment, but the price of the house has increased by 8.1 per cent. That is not much of a gain, and the poor borrower is obligated for a bigger mortgage, and probably for a longer period.

I shall now speak of what the government did not do. It did not call more than just the organizational meeting of the committee of this house on housing. There was one meeting, after which the committee was promptly disbanded because the government had not sent it a single thing to do.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Now a few words on the subject of the cost of money. The extent to which money and the cost of money affect the cost of residential accommodation is not often realized. Virtually all single family dwellings and apartment buildings in our metropolitan area, and indeed in every area are mortgaged in value to an extent ranging from 70 to 85 per cent. For every $10,000 of mortgage amortized over 30 years at the National Housing Act rate of 7¼ per cent, the debtor pays back $24,300. In other words, he pays back almost two and a half times as much in total as the original debt. While there has been a great deal said in the past six months about how tight money is and how more money should be made available, there is not enough being said about the cost of this money and its effect on the cost of residential accommodation.

A loan of $10,000 amortized at 7¼ per cent over 30 years carries exactly the same debt service as $11,100 over the same period amortized at 6¼ per cent. In other words, the one per cent increase in interest costs has had the same effect as an increase in building costs of 11 per cent. We must bear in mind that buildings available be for rent or sale today were, for the most part, mortgaged prior to the time of these higher interest rates, enabling us to say that the present cost of housing accommodation does not yet reflect the higher cost of money which has occurred within the past year. This added cost must be borne by the renting or buying public in the months ahead, and must of course support the proposition that costs have not yet reached a peak but will continue to rise due to this pressure.

The federal government, I believe, can assist the mortgage market to a very marked degree. The present policy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is to tie the National Housing Act rate to the long term yield of Dominion of Canada bonds. To the extent that this policy, recently adopted, induces a greater flow of mortgage money to the residential mortgage market, it is a good policy. I cannot, however, accept the principle that a 1½ per cent differential between the National Housing Act rate and Dominion of Canada bonds is reasonable, bearing in mind that the security of both is identical. The major difference between a government-guaranteed National Housing Act mortgage and a Dominion of Canada bond lies in the liquidity of the investment and in its cost of administration. I believe that the federal government can, through C.M.H.C. or its subsidiary, incorporate and operate a mortgage bank for the trading of mortgages. While it may be too much to expect that the future will see a National Housing Act mortgage being traded over the counter with the same kind of movement and price that exists today with a Dominion of Canada bond, I believe that substantial narrowing of this differential can be obtained with reasonable market conditions.

If trading in mortgage money were to operate on almost an over-the-counter basis, as is the case with the bonds, the construction industry could plan for much longer periods at a time. This would mean a great improvement in efficiency as well as lower money costs and I firmly believe this is one way—indeed, it may be the only way—in which we can make the best of a bad situation. The construction industry admits to its own inefficiency of operation in many instances; but while admitting that improvements could be made, it quickly points out that the present method of financing each year's operation after a mad scramble each spring for funds is one of the main causes of present difficulties. Those directly concerned do not know whether they have enough money to operate for a year, so their employees are faced with lay-offs. And they do not know how much work will be available next year.

The government tried the $500 winter incentive plan, which obviously failed to work. I think the answer to improved efficiency in the construction industry, hopefully with lower costs, will be found by making a regular, planned flow of mortgage money available and allotting it over a longer period than is now the case, when only a season to season supply or forecast is available.

This may be the case—if the government does not decide in its wisdom on a tight money supply for next year or the latter part of the present year. There are many "ifs". I maintain that planning in all its phases, including financing, should be on a two to five year basis. Housing should not bear the brunt of any artificial tinkering with a supply of funds for the industry. House mortgage funds should not be used to dampen a business cycle or to accelerate one. There should be a steady flow based only on demand.

Regardless of any so-called lack of criticism of the federal government as reported by the minister, only the federal government has the facilities to be able to envision a nationwide situation. Provinces and municipalities just cannot have this type of over-all perception.

In my opinion we missed a golden opportunity to rationalize our house building requirements when in our haste to implement the Canada Pension Plan we let the funding of the plan slip through our fingers, as it were, and allowed the provinces first claim on the assets.

This fund, which we are aware is only short lived, could have provided the massive injection our housing industry required on a temporary basis, that is to say, until we got caught up. Then in an orderly fashion the mortgage bank concept could have taken over. What a tremendous incentive it would be. How in keeping with a security program, that the funds collected under the pension plan could be used to provide homes for the population—the same homes, in many cases, which would shelter pensioners in their old age.

Another area of great concern is the tremendous cost of legal fees in connection with almost every house or property transaction. Time is money, and too often there are almost interminable delays in conveyancing. Naturally, delays can be very expensive. I do not think we can afford this luxury much longer and unless some streamlining can be achieved the system of land titles will have to be overhauled.

I think the provision of title insurance should be examined to see whether reasonable reductions in cost could be obtained by this method. The lawyer members of this chamber may not agree.

It is my opinion that lot sizes can and should be reduced. Through arbitrarily fixing minimum standards for lot sizes, in Canada we have added miles and miles of sewers, pavements and other services, so much so that our municipalities cannot stand the costs of servicing land for development. It does not matter who was responsible for these things in the first place. It seems to me that now each government level says, "This is not our department. We cannot do anything about it." Surely it is time we quit passing the buck. We are all in this mess together, all levels of government, and the thing to do is to pull together to get us out of it.

I suggest that it is just as important, yes more important, to Canadians to have the price of housing lowered as it is to have the moneylenders back in the business at a very high rate of interest. With this in mind I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp)—and possibly since he is not in the chamber now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Trudeau) will convey the message to him —that he should have another look at the tax on building materials.

Much has been heard about removing this tax. I am not suggesting that. I am suggesting something else, a relocation of it. I presume that the government will find it necessary to continue collecting this tax. You do not forget $180 million just overnight, but I submit to the minister that this tax should apply at the retail level rather than at the manufacturer's level. Why should Canadians have to pay a percentage profit markup on a federal tax at every level of business—first the jobber, then the wholesaler, then the retailer? This tax by the time it hits the consumer has been marked up at least 50 per cent, and then in most of the provinces we add on a sales tax.

I would suggest that the Minister of Finance give some thought to relocating this tax. I think he could automatically reduce it by 50 per cent and the government would not be out anything, but it would be very helpful towards lowering the price of housing. In summary, Mr. Speaker, if the relocation and reduction of the tax were accomplished, if the construction industry could be encouraged to improve efficiency by a few percentage points through long range government planning, with a reduction in mortgage rates obtained—and believe me, Mr. Speaker, all these things are possible—then a 10 per cent reduction in housing costs would be quite possible and no better project could be envisaged for this the centennial parliament.

Mr. A. M. A. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, along with my colleagues, and other hon. members, I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their speeches were not only a credit to themselves but a credit to Canada.

As a backbencher I have many grievances and frustrations but I am not going to dwell on them today. I am going to speak on something that I think is very important not only to Canada but to the entire world. On reading the speech from the throne, which I was not privileged to hear, I was struck by this one paragraph that deals with natural resources:

The great natural resources that we take into our second century will be vital to us in meeting our needs and in maintaining our position as a major world trader. Measures will be introduced by the government at the present session arising out of the need to conserve and preserve the great wealth with which Canada has been so richly endowed.

Now Mr. Speaker, I thoroughly agree with the foregoing. Canada to my mind is not only one of the richest but the richest country in the world, richest in resources and in her people. But I notice one great natural resource with which Canada is endowed from coast to coast but which apparently is being neglected. As Canadians we are adopting an attitude toward this resource which not only will affect Canada greatly in the future but will affect the entire world. The resource to which I refer is gold.

Since before history was written gold has played a great part in the development of mankind, not only in the monetary field but in the fields of the arts and industry. We know that the people of Mesopotamia were working in gold more than 5,000 years ago. Their gold vases have been unearthed in Iraq, dating back to 3,500 B.C. Their workmanship showed that these goldsmiths knew the skills of working and shaping the precious metal.

At one time gold was Canada's foremost metal and brought in more money to Canada than any other metal. It is still greatly used as a commodity in the arts and in industry, and was the backbone of our monetary system up until a few years ago. I am not speaking of gold as one interested especially in gold mines but as one who has been in world trade for the last 45 years. The companies with which I have been associated were generally doing business with more countries than are at present exhibiting at Expo '67. I have found out that when tariffs were raised, when quotas were put into effect and other obstacles raised to world trade it was the lack of gold, or its equivalent, which was the cause.

Before the first world war Britain acted as the world's banker and all settlements of world trade were made in London. Britain was a free trade nation. She had currencies of all nations generally surplus to her own requirements, and it needed very little gold to resolve any balance of payments. The surpluses which Britain did not require were invested in other countries. No one at that time gave much thought to central banks or central bank reserves, as we did not seem to have any balance of payments problems. World trade kept moving along on an even keel, and increasing.

However, after the first world war Britain had lost at least $50 billion in her overseas investments and she could no longer act as banker to the world. As the United States was then the most financially powerful nation, she inherited the role that Britain had played for over 100 years. But the United States was a high tariff country and would not receive the products of other nations as payment for their debts. Consequently, the United States gradually stripped the world of gold and the nations of the world were forced off the gold standard. The various countries of the world had no common denominator on which to base their currencies, and so there was chaos in world trade. This caused a falling of prices and brought on world depression.

In 1934 the late President Roosevelt raised the price of gold from $20.63 per ounce to $35 per ounce, and in the legislation there was permission for a further raise to $50 per ounce, but this legislation was allowed to lapse in the United States as it had a time limit. The world then had in the American dollar a common denominator on which to base its currencies. There was an immediate increase in world trade, profitable prices were restored and we saw the lifting of the depression that had held the world in its grip for many years.

The rise in the price of gold not only revived Canada's gold mines but created many new ones, and gold became our foremost earning metal. It brought into circulation an enormous amount of gold which various peoples of the world had been holding because they distrusted the paper currencies of the world, thus making world reserves at that time adequate for the world trade that was carried on.

• (5:00 p.m.)

In 1945 the United States, along with the United Kingdom, was anxious to get a multilateral agreement with reference to monetary affairs. The result was the Bretton Woods agreement and the establishment of the international monetary fund, to which all nations joining contributed a definite amount of their currency backed by a 25 per cent gold deposit, and obtained certain drawing rights on the fund's balances. The United States agreed to buy and sell gold at $35 per ounce, and every nation signing the agreement agreed not to pay more than $35 per ounce for gold even if it was mined in their own countries.

Canada was the third largest gold producer in the world, and according to the Governor of the Bank of Canada and also the chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States, gold is a monetary measure. Then if we agreed to a fixed price, we sold our sovereignty; not internally, because gold does not affect the issue of currency in Canada, but it does radically affect the settlement of external balances.

If gold is a monetary measure, as the Governor of the Bank of Canada states, it should have the same purchasing power in 1967 as it had in 1945. But it is agreed by all economists that the purchasing power of the American dollar is down to 44 cents. Then the gold dollar should shrink to 44 cents in gold content. But I am also advised by no less an authority than the Governor of the Bank of Canada that gold is a commodity. If we are in a free enterprise country, the price of no commodity should be fixed in Canada by a foreign country.

The $35 per ounce for gold that is being paid by the United States today is not sacred. When the United States treasury pledged that the price of gold would not be raised by the United States, they were not speaking for the United States alone but for the entire world, and they were saying something that was just impossible. The price of gold is a world problem, not a United States problem. At the present time, with the American dollar depreciated to 44 cents, we are asking our gold mines to accept $15 or $16 per ounce for gold. This is an impossible situation.

If it was my voice alone that was raised you might ask: What does he know about the world financial situation? But I would repeat the words of Sir Roy Harrod, the economist who was consulted at the time the International Monetary Fund was formed, who advocates the doubling of the price of gold as a preliminary to the reorganization of the International Monetary Fund and the establishment of a new unit for world settlement—just as a preliminary. He states:

> I regard gold as a sheet anchor of liberty—so it has been for many hundreds of years of civilization.

This is not only the opinion of Sir Roy Harrod; it is also the opinion of another noted economist, Sir Ralph Hawtrey, who stated that "gold is an anonymous asset." It is also the opinion of Jacques Rueff, a French economist. Sir Roy Harrod states that the International Monetary Fund should be reorganized with greater flexibility. Under present conditions certain nations have their currencies designated as reserve currencies, that is, the pound and the dollar which are supposed to be on an equal basis with gold. These currencies are not sufficient for the reserves needed to keep world trade flowing smoothly and increasing. At the present time, although the United Kingdom quota to the International Monetary Fund is $2,450 million, the United Kingdom has borrowed through drawing rights $2,410.6 million. The United States gold quota to the fund is $1,290 million, and the United States has borrowed in gold from the fund $905.2 million. So it is quite apparent that the nations whose reserve currencies are supposed to finance world trade are the principal borrowers from the International Monetary Fund.

We certainly need a new international unit of settlement to help finance our world trade, for when the United Kingdom and the United States try to resolve their balance of payments problems by withdrawing pounds and dollars from circulation, they are simply drawing the sinews of world trade that are supposed to be financing it. All this is related to the position of gold, and gold is certainly one of our great natural resources in this country, which commodity the two eminent economists I have mentioned state should be doubled in price before creating a new international unit of settlement.

The First National Bank of New York, which is quite well known, especially to those of us who were members of the finance committee, states in its May magazine issue:

> Lifting the gold reserve requirement for domestic note circulation does not mean that the United States could dispense with gold internationally. Even with all its productive capacity to give real value to money, the United States, as an international banker, requires a strong gold reserve. Foreign governments and central banks holding large dollar deposits and other short term assets in the United States, are fully aware of the intrinsic strength of the U.S. economy as well as of the fact that the dollar has, throughout the years, lost less of its purchasing power than any other major currency. Nevertheless, they expect us to maintain a suitable gold stock to provide what in their eyes is an assurance that the dollar will remain at all times a reliable and freely usable currency.

Yet people all over the world are holding billions of dollars of gold which they consider to be worth more than what the United States is paying for gold at the present time. If the price of gold was raised to what it should be, the United States would have no balance of payments problems; there would be free movement of capital around the world and there would be no inflation because other currencies would be adjusted to the gold price, the same as in 1934. There would be plenty of liquidity, which is needed to finance world trade.

I am not interested in gold mines, as I stated before, but the very life of the companies with which I have been associated practically all my life depends on world trade. World trade in 1947 amounted to $48,549 million. In 1965—world trade amounted to $164,700 million. The reserves and liquidity that were adequate in 1947 are certainly not adequate today. Last year, with $2 billion worth of gold mined and put into circulation, not one dollar went into the central banks to finance world trade—it simply disappeared. The previous year, of the nearly $2 billion worth of gold that was mined, only $250 million got into the central banks. So no matter what the bankers think or say, the people of the world think that gold is the backbone of the financial system and a store of value. We have that opinion confirmed by the First National City Bank of New York.

Canada is one of the nations among the so-called Big Ten who are supposed to bring forth a realistic policy to solve the present monetary situation so that world trade can move smoothly, and increase. But I have watched the press in vain for the voice of Canada in relation to an increase in the price of gold, which to my mind and that of many world economists would be the first, preliminary step in solving our present international financial situation. I might say that the United States seems to have a closed mind on Viet Nam and a closed mind on the gold situation, for I addressed a letter to the Christian Science Monitor, which they refused to print, and I also addressed a letter to the New York Times which they refused to print, simply because they said their government would not agree with the policy.

Mr. Herridge: Democracy.

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Surely, Mr. Speaker, Canada's gold, as a great natural resource, should be given priority in any exploitation of our natural resources. The feeble excuse that a rise in the price of gold would benefit only Russia and South Africa is certainly not valid, for the western world produces three times as much gold as Russia, and if there were any benefit to accrue, three times as much benefit would accrue to the western world as would accrue to Russia.

• (5:10 p.m.)

If Russia were given increased purchasing power she would buy a great deal more of our products, and this fact is evidenced by the wheat purchase paid for in gold. Russia is not bound by the international monetary fund and she is allowed to put any value she wants on the gold produced in Russia. She can put a price of $35 an ounce or $75 an ounce and still put it into international currency. In this way Russia would have this extra purchasing power and this would be of great benefit to our industries in the western world.

South Africa in the same way could use her extra purchasing power to diversify her economy and would then be buying machinery of all kinds from the western world. Her Bantu population, which now has the highest standard of living in Africa, would certainly benefit through increased wages from a rise in the price of gold.

So, as one of the Big Ten let Canada's voice be raised loud and strong in the financial councils of the world for a doubling of the price of gold, not selfishly for the benefit of Canada, but for the benefit of all mankind.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): In entering this debate on the throne speech I must first of all say there is little in it to give Canadians the kind of confidence one would hope would be installed in their minds as we enter upon the second century of nationhood. I had hoped this speech would be inspirational, and one which historians could look back upon as an indication that Canada entered its second hundred years with inspiration for the continuing development of a better nation. I had hoped the speech would be one that would always be remembered by Canadians as the great turning point of this nation's history in the development of unity and purpose. Instead it reminded me of what a housewife might prepare for a light supper, much like what we in Nova Scotia have always called plain simple hash.

Everything in this speech has been talked about, dropped and then revived. It could almost be referred to as garbage except for those few things which will probably be of some benefit to someone. It certainly contains nothing inspirational. I am afraid that Canada will end up her first hundred years in the red, just as we have ended up consistently at the end of each year for the past ten years. The total sum of Canada's deficit from the fiscal year 1957-58 to 1966-67 amounted to $3,908 million. We are no longer spending our own money, we are spending our children's money. I have one little boy who will soon be 12 and a little girl who will soon be 10, and in my opinion we in this parliament are doing a mighty poor job as administrators and guardians on their behalf. By the look of the estimates for the coming year we will probably end up with another deficit for 1967-68, and will have to tax the people to a greater extent than ever before. This seems both alarming and ridiculous.

Our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) and Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Winters) keep telling us that things are great, that this country is moving forward, that investment is at an all time high and that the business community is confident. At the same time this government is allowing its cabinet ministers to spend more money than is being received in revenue. It is continually interfering in the affairs of the people of this country to a greater degree than ever before, by spending the taxpayer's money, when it should be allowing the taxpayers to spend it as they see fit. How much longer can we live in this fools paradise?

We were told that the fiscal year 1966-67 was one of the greatest years in Canada's history, that the economy was booming, and that there was more employment than ever before; yet this government committed the Canadian taxpayer to $230 million more than will be received in federal revenues. This was a time when the government should have been allowing the private sector of the economy to maintain the buoyancy, and a time when it should not have been meddling in the affairs of the public. I do not know how much longer Canadians are going to allow the government to press forward with legislation for the benefit to 10 per cent of the population, paid for by 90 per cent.

We must create a spirit of initiative on the part of the people and we are not going to do so by continually giving them everything they ask for without asking them to do any work. We should wake up to this fact, and wake up to it very quickly. I have no argument with deficit financing or with social justice, but I do suggest that neither is good if the result is national bankruptcy. Surely it must be becoming more evident to us that we are living far beyond our means.

Mr. Chrétien: Would the hon. member permit a question?

[Mr. Coates.]

Mr. Coates: I will answer all questions of hon. members after I have completed my speech.

• (5:20 p.m.)

For a period of time after 1957, we had to put more money into the economy because of a period of recession. According to some we came out of that recession in 1961, and according to others, in 1962. In any event we did come out of it. Surely to goodness we have to face the fact that if now, in a period of prosperity, we cannot pay our bills, then we will never be able to pay them. If that is the case, where are we going to end up? Surely we should expect enough responsibility from the government to at least balance our budget when times are good. Surely we should expect from the government enough responsibility to leave individual freedoms alone when there is no reason to be meddling around with them.

From time to time I am impressed by the concern which the Canadian people have voiced from time to time about the fact that parliament is debating certain subjects for long periods of time. These people ask: Why do you not get on with the work and be more businesslike? I often reply to them that they do not know how lucky they are, that parliament has long debates on some subjects, because when parliament is being efficient and passing legislation it is doing one of two things: it is either passing a piece of legislation which infringes on and limits a citizen's freedom, or it is passing a piece of legislation which will cost the taxpayer more money. So the more time parliament spends debating these subjects, the less time it spends dreaming up new plans, and the better off the taxpayers are.

However, what we can expect and what we get from the government are two different things, and this is very evident today, as it has been in recent years. But what we as members of parliament have to do is to realize the heavy burden we are placing on people who have to foot the bill for the legislation we are passing. If it were only the taxpayers of today whom we were asking to carry this very heavy burden it would not be so bad, but as long as we keep running up deficit after deficit we do not stop with the people who are paying taxes today but are saying to the taxpayers of tomorrow: You will have to pay for the things we thought the country should have, for the things that we want but cannot afford. I am tired of doing this, unless it is absolutely necessary or unless we are in a period of recession.

While I am not committed to any of the leadership aspirants who are putting their names forward at the present time, I think that Senator Wallace McCutcheon at least talked good common sense when he laid down what he thinks a political party should be doing in this day and age. I believe the first thing that any political party should do is to try to look after the financial affairs of its people in a proper and prudent manner, and I do not think this government is doing it today or giving any indication that it will do so in the days ahead.

The legislation on medicare is to be implemented in 1968. The sad thing is that as soon as we are through with medicare, the N.D.P., the socialists in this house, will probably be proposing that we take over car insurance, or something else.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Coates: Then the Liberal party will say: We cannot let the N.D.P. or the socialists get the kudos for this, so we will go ahead and do it. After car insurance it will probably be free haircuts for everybody in Canada: We will nationalize all the barbers. And then what next? This is a sad and ridiculous situation in which we find ourselves today. What we are doing is to make it more and more difficult for people to use their initiative, because if one makes a great amount of money, the government is going to take it away and the gap between what one can make and what the fellow who is on the dole will get will narrow down. This is the sad and stark reality of life in this nation today.We should wake up and forget about these socialists in the corner, because there is less and less support for them today, and this will continue in the days ahead.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member had better whistle a little louder.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I should now like to move to a different subject. Unfortunately I have to take the house on a tortuous trail along which the people in my constituency, and especially the people in the town of Springhill, have travelled since 1962. I will lay the facts before you, sir, because I feel they warrant and demand a government inquiry or investigation immediately. The facts that I have been able to secure from this government indicate a scandalous disregard for the taxpayer, and certainly for the people of Springhill. They are as follows: On February 7, 1962, Hon. E. D. Fulton, who was then minister of justice, announced that a young offenders penal institution would be build in the town of Springhill. The cost estimate on that penal institution at that time was set at $2.5 million. On September 12, 1962, Hon. Donald Fleming, who was then minister of justice, announced that the size of the institution to be built in Springhill would be doubled, and the estimated cost of the institution was listed at $4.5 million.

Mr. Fleming also stated in that announcement that in the fiscal year 1962-63 the department would spend $345,000—$45,000 for land, $50,000 in fees and $250,000 for site engineering. In the fiscal year 1963-64, Mr. Fleming said the main contract would be let at an estimated cost of $3,474,000, with a target date for completion of the institution to be in August 1964.

The Conservative government was defeated in the election of April 8, 1963. The people of Cumberland county in general and those in Springhill in particular waited and waited. The first thing that we discovered was that this government, upon taking office, fired the architects who had been appointed and in their place appointed friends of the government.

On April 13, 1964, as reported at page 2070 of Hansard, the then secretary of state who is now Senator Lamontagne, informed me that construction of the penitentiary would start in the summer of 1964 and that the contemplated date for completion would be the fall of 1965. I was also informed at that time that there would be 170 employees with an annual payroll of $800,000.

On page 10103 of Hansard of November 16, 1964, the then minister of public works, who is now Senator Deschatelets informed me that the contract for the penitentiary in Springhill had been awarded to the Foundation Maritime Limited on November 9, 1964. He further informed me that the completion date of the penitentiary would be May 9, 1966. In other words, because of the delays that were forced upon the construction of this institution by the present government, the people of Springhill had to wait more than a year and a half for completion. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the cost of the institution in the contract originally awarded to Foundation rose from the initial estimate of $3,474,000 to a contract price of $8,890,000.

As we went along, Mr. Speaker, we discovered still further delays in the completion of this institution. Although the date of completion was May 9, 1966, in early 1967 I was informed that it was now to be January 3, 1967, and that up until January 23, 1967 the government had spent $8,825,438. I was also informed that the government had spent $99,000 to erect a fence around the institution. One would have thought that for the protection of the public, and to make certain that the inmates stayed where they were supposed to stay, a very substantial fence would have been built around the institution; but the sad fact of the matter is that at the first good gust of wind the fence fell down. And it is still down, Mr. Speaker: I do not know when it will be re-erected.

Not only that, but I do not know when the penitentiary will be opened, Mr. Speaker, I am now informed that it will be opened in August, but according to the information I have I am indeed doubtful that it will open in 1967. As a matter of fact, I am informed that at the present time there is no water supply for this institution. This is an institution which to date has cost the Canadian taxpayer $11,502,000 but which has no water services. While I have no accurate information as to what it will cost to supply water, I do know that there is a good deal of talk that to supply water to the institution another $1 million will have to be spent. I am also informed that as the institution presently stands it has toilets which cannot be flushed, and the workmen there have to bring their own drinking water in their lunch cases. Surely to goodness, Mr. Speaker, one would have expected that a suitable water supply would have been assured before the institution was constructed.

The picture today is that $11.5 million has been spent on an institution which cannot be put into operation because no water supply is available and it is possible that it may cost another $1 million to supply that water before the institution can go into operation.

I am also told, Mr. Speaker, that the construction of the institution is of very poor quality; that there are walls dividing the cells that can be pushed back and forth. If this is the case it will not be very long before they are down. In view of the kind of criminals who are incarcerated in penitentiaries today, I do not think we can expect that these walls will receive the fatherly attention that one might give his own home. I trust that the government will not accept work such as this from the prime contractor, if that is the shape the institution is in at the present time.

I feel that this institution should have been opened a long time ago. A very substantial industry in a town that is very much in need of industry is waiting and waiting in the hope that the institution will be put into operation, so that the economy of the area can be buoyed up, as the people of the area anticipated it would be in 1964 when they were told the institution would be constructed.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if ever there was an example where a government investigation should be carried out, this is it. As far as I am concerned it would be to the benefit of everybody if the investigation were a private one. Let somebody who is independent marshal the facts and tell the taxpayers exactly what has happened, why it has happened and where the blame should be placed. The situation is a fiasco at the moment and is certainly damaging the economy of the town of Springhill.

I have another problem in my constituency of very serious proportion, Mr. Speaker, and it relates to the aircraft industry in the town of Amherst. This industry is one of the cornerstone industries in that town. The town of Amherst is very dependent on this industry if it is to move forward, as I am sure everyone hopes it will.

I wish to place some facts on the record in relation to this industry. It has been a progressive one, an industry that has not depended on government help as its only means of survival. In a country such as ours a company engaged in the aircraft industry must depend on the government for a certain proportion of its work, because there are not that many people who deal with aircraft. But the situation that exists today is that that aircraft industry is at its lowest level of employment since I first came into politics, which is over ten years ago.

I should like to put some facts and figures on the record to show the kind of attention it has received since 1961-62. In that year the federal government provided this industry with overhaul and repair work in the amount of $1,500,000. In the year 1962-63 a similar amount of business was given to the plant and it maintained a good level of employment. Then in 1963-64, when the present government was in office, this $1.5 million worth of business shrunk to $861,000. It shrunk even further in 1964-65, to $707,000, still further in 1965-66, to $695,000, and still further in 1966-67, to $40,000. What the figure will be for 1967-68, I do not know. But I do know if this government expects that industry to be able to secure contracts from private business or firms in the United States, then a sufficient workload must be placed in the plant in the form of overhaul and repair work so the company can compete on other contracts. They have to have a workload that will reduce their operating costs as much as possible. When we were in office we maintained a sufficient workload of overhaul and repair work to enable the company to secure substantial contracts from the United States firm under the defence production sharing agreement. They have not any of this work in their plant now, and I do not see how they are going to be able to get any in their plant in the future unless more overhaul and repair work is placed in the plant. I hope the government will endeavour to increase the amount of work it gives to the plant because it would be a disastrous blow to the economy of the town of Amherst if this plant were to cease operation. I hope that every possible consideration and assistance will be given them, not only through granting them overhaul and repair work but in assisting them in their negotiations with United States firms.

I wish to conclude by saying I am very disappointed in the throne speech. It provides no sense of direction to the Canadian people. It provides no goals through which we could hope to develop a national indentity. It does not increase the amount of money that will be put into the national capital to assist in producing the kind of capital that all Canadians want, and of which they would feel proud when they see it. It does not do a great many things. I hope that we can look forward to a more imaginative program in the days ahead.

Mr. Chrétien: May I ask a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. gentleman want to ask a question?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member that the time allotted to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) has expired.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to join with those who have already spoken and offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Being selected to move or second the motion for the address is a personal honour which also brings honour to the people whom they were elected to represent. This being Canada's centennial year, Canada's 100th birthday, one cannot help but take a brief look at our country's past history and achievements.

When Canada entered confederation there were roughly five million people in this land. In the intervening 100 years, Canada's population has quadrupled and the population is now roughly 20 million people. One hundred years ago the vote on the bill to establish confederation was taken at 4.15 in the morning. The confederation bill was carried, 91 votes to 33. When we concluded the first session of the twenty seventh parliament two weeks ago, it was 3.20 in the morning. It would appear therefore that the parliamentary system is still functioning in much the same manner.

I am sure no one will deny that Sir John A. Macdonald was the architect of this nation. The meetings that were held at Charlottetown laid the ground for confederation, and these have been recorded in the annals of history. The dreams of Macdonald, Cartier and the other fathers of confederation started to take shape after the passing of the confederation act. Sir John A. Macdonald became Canada's first prime minister and his vision of a great confederation, guided by a strong national government, started to take shape. Under his leadership and wise counselling Canada, as a nation, got off on the right track. His dream of building one nation, a united nation from sea to sea, became a reality. Macdonald's task was not an easy one, nor has the task of succeeding prime ministers been easy. The road was never perfect; potholes always develop that need care and attention.

During the past 100 years, Canada has matured and is today recognized as a country of peace and good will. Today, Canada is a nation built of a strong moral fibre, a nation highly respected around the globe. As I mentioned before, the road is not always smooth. Potholes have developed, and these need care and attention. Sometimes the reason for the development of these potholes is unknown, while in other cases the cause is very real.

I believe all of us need to rededicate ourselves to the concept of one nation and national unity. Personally, I felt that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) set up a royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, he made a mistake. This should never have been done. I have not changed my view in this regard. I firmly believe this is the cause of the development of some of the potholes. Most people were aware that some problems did exist, particularly between the two founding races. After the appointment of this commission, these problems became magnified and a divisiveness the like of which I have never seen before was created in this country.

This commission on biculturalism and bilingualism will not only be the most expensive commission in Canada's history, costing the people millions of dollars, but will bring about no solution to the problem. In fact I venture to guess that when this commission report that report will be put in a pigeonhole and left there. There were other ways of dealing with this problem. I feel that the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), that of convening a conference of government, of all political parties and representatives of all classes of society, to discuss the amendment and revision of the constitution, the bringing of the constitution back to Canada and the clarification and restating of our aims and objectives, was sensible and sound. This indeed would be a worth-while centennial project.

Canadians everywhere need to take stock of themselves and dedicate themselves to being Canadians first. There should not be any French Canadian, German Canadian, Ukrainian Canadian, Irish Canadian, Icelandic Canadian, and so on. I am not saying that one should forget one's racial and cultural background. I feel that everyone should be proud of his racial and cultural background, that one should use that background to become a better Canadian and a Canadian first. Then we would have Canadians of French descent, Canadians of German descent, Canadians of Ukrainian descent, Canadians of Irish descent and Canadians of Icelandic descent. In my opinion this type of attitude would help to make Canada a stronger and more united nation.

As a Canadian of Icelandic descent I suggest that each one of us, in this centennial year, dedicate ourselves to being a Canadian first, thereby helping to strengthen and unite our nation. This would be a good centennial project. I believe that people right across Canada are now in the mood to participate in the celebration of our country's one hundredth birthday. I think a lot of credit is due to our centennial commissioner, Mr. John Fisher, for radiating this centennial spirit among our people. I have heard Mr. Fisher on radio and television, and read his articles in the newspapers urging all Canadians to join in and participate in Canada's centennial celebrations. I believe that Mr. Fisher is going to achieve the goal which he set and he deserves the whole-hearted support of all public minded citizens in bringing this about.

Expo at Montreal will be the biggest centennial event in Canada. It was when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was prime minister that the world fair was awarded to Canada and the site of the fair chosen. The present government, when they took office, carried on with this project. All those who have been connected with this project deserve a lot of praise and credit, as there is no doubt that this will be the largest world fair ever. It will truly be a magnificent event, and something that should make all of us proud to be Canadians.

Another major event taking place this year is the Pan-American games scheduled for Winnipeg from July 23 to August 6. It was also when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was prime minister that the pan-American games were awarded to Canada, and the site chosen. All those who are connected with the planning and staging of those games deserve a lot of praise and credit. The indications are that the entries for the pan-American games will be the largest in history and that they will also be the most successful. This will be another event that all Canadians can be proud of. I should like to mention here that the pan-American yachting or sailing races will take place on lake Winnipeg, near my home town of Gimli, Manitoba. That I suggest would be a good time for anyone travelling west this year to visit Winnipeg and take a sidetrip to Gimli.

Throughout the Selkirk constituency many centennial projects have been undertaken, including the building of skating rinks, curling rinks, community centres, parks, libraries and others. From this list one can see that lasting structures will be erected in many communities. Committees in charge of annual events throughout the various communities in the Selkirk constituency are going all out to make them bigger and better than ever before. Centennial committees have been set up in most communities and these are staging a variety of events through the year. The people of the Interlake area have caught on to the centennial spirit. This is a good year for people to pay a visit to the various communities in that area.

I wish to mention that the town of Selkirk is holding a fair and regatta from July 1 to July 9, and that the guests of honour will be Lord and Lady Selkirk. Also, during the Icelandic celebrations to take place at Gimli on July 31, the committee will have His Excellency, Ásgeir Ásgeirsson, the president of the Republic of Iceland, as its guest. He will also visit Winnipeg and Selkirk.

The speech from the throne was one of the longest on record but it was lacking in specifics. It dealt in generalities and hope. This is not good enough, when our nation is embarking on our second century. Most of the editorials which I have read have expressed disappointment with the throne speech, which consists mostly of words without substance.

What has happened to the 10,000 annual university scholarships promised by the Liberals in 1962, 1963, 1965—and promised here, in the house, in 1966? Education should be high on the list of priorities. Even though education comes within the jurisdiction of provincial governments, it has become abundantly clear that provincial governments cannot foot the bill for secondary schools, universities, technical schools, and the like. It is therefore necessary that the federal government share in the cost in order that our young people will be adequately trained. There is no mention of education in the throne speech, except a brief reference to the need for strengthening the adult retraining program.

This government has seen fit to discard the vocational and technical school program which was brought in by the Conservative government and which proved so successful. The federal government should sit down with the provincial governments to work out a cost sharing arrangement for education which would assure all our people of the fullest opportunity to acquire the best education and training possible. After all, our human resources are the most important resources in our country.

There is reference in the throne speech to the further reform of parliamentary procedure. Several members have already dealt with this subject. The member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) delivered what I considered an excellent speech on this topic. Personally, I do not think there is anything seriously wrong with our system. Freedom of speech and the freedom of the individual are freedoms that have to be guarded and maintained. When a parliament lasts over a year, as the last one did, the chances are that there is mismanagement, or that the government is being unrealistic in the amount of legislation it proposes. I believe that both of these were contributing factors in making the last session the longest in our parliamentary history.

The only reason parliament has to meet every year is to pass supply; its second function is to deal with legislation. The government has to gauge the amount of legislation to bring forth that can be dealt with in the time available. It is a mistake to have a session of parliament go over a year. The last session should have ended just before Christmas and the new session should have started in January, instead of in May.

The Prime Minister must be very careful in the choice of a house leader. The government house leader has one of the most onerous and toughest jobs in the House of Commons. One must possess many skills and virtues to become successful in this post. The Prime Minister, for the success of his government and indeed for the success of parliament, has to produce such a man. I do not know whether the newly appointed house leader has these qualifications. On his past performance in the house, it is very doubtful if he has; however, the challenge is his, and he may alter his ways and rise to the occasion—and I hope he does.

Another important factor is for members to discipline themselves and at times to practise restraint. I think this is more important than any rule change. Some of the vociferous members of this house should take stock of themselves and ask themselves whether, if every member took up as much time as they do, a session could ever be concluded. Some of these vociferous members are advocating rule changes and limitation of debate. Their motto seems to be that it is all right to deny other members the opportunity or right to speak, so long as they have their say. Here again it is self discipline and self restraint that is required.

With a government house leader who has good understanding and is capable of good management, and with properly disciplined members there would be no need for rules to curtail debates. Much more could be achieved by co-operation and agreement among members than by any rigid rule changes.

May I call it six o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), air transport—request for ban on use of highly inflammable fuel; the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir), health and welfare—inclusion of additional services under provincial plans; the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), national defence —Bagotville, Quebec—protests against military manoeuvres.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Stefanson: When the house rose at six o'clock I had made a few brief comments about the work of parliament itself. The Montreal Gazette of May 10, 1967, carried an editorial the heading of which read: "Year-long Session Here To Stay". I think this is an assumption which is accepted by all parliamentarians. What we do object to are sessions extending beyond one year. The article outlines means by which the business of the house could be handled in a more orderly fashion. It states that the estimates should be brought down early in the session. I have always believed that parliament should deal first with estimates and then with legislation and that the work of parliament would be done in a more orderly and efficient way if this practice were followed.

The article goes on to advocate fixed adjournment periods for the Christmas, Easter and summer recesses. I do not think anyone would quarrel with that suggestion. I wish to quote briefly from this article which appeared in the Montreal Gazette:

> No government should overload parliament and then publicly complain that its measures are not being passed. One of the advantages of a well-programmed year-long format is that experience would show just about how much legislation may reasonably be presented for parliament's consideration. As one session would almost immediately follow another, there would be no serious need to press too much into any one session. The reality of year-long parliamentary session is being imposed on practices and customs that grew up when sessions lasted a few months only. Reality and practice have still a long way to go before they can be brought into alignment.

This government has complained a great deal about our failure to pass various measures, and then in the next breath it brags about the amount of legislation which has been dealt with. If the government did less complaining and concentrated upon better planning and management of our sessions it would help restore the image of parliament.

Perhaps I should say a word about the former leader of the house, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McIlraith). I feel he was a good house leader and that he had many good qualities. He understood the House of Commons, and this is essential. But he made one mistake; he allowed the session to run beyond 12 months. This is intolerable and must not happen again. I repeat, for the benefit of the new house leader, that no session in the future must ever run beyond 12 months; sessions should be so organized that they invariably end within the 12 month period.

I have always felt that my first duty as a member of parliament was to my constituency. I therefore intend to touch on some matters which are of direct concern to my constituents, though no doubt they are of importance to people in other parts of Canada as well.

First, I wish to make a brief comment about the sales tax on drugs. I am not so naïve as to say that the government's revenue can be cut. Therefore by cutting out a certain tax one would need to find other means of revenue. I believe that the sales tax on drugs is unjust, unfair and downright discriminatory and that it should be abolished forthwith. Chambers of commerce in my constituency have promoted resolutions to this effect, and a resolution of this kind was passed at the annual meeting of the Manitoba Chamber of Commerce.

The special committee on drugs has recommended that the sales tax on drugs be abolished. In reality this sales tax is a sales tax on sickness and on those who are sick. I sincerely hope that the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sharp) will see fit to act swiftly and remove this tax, because there must be a fairer and more just way for the government to raise the revenue it needs.

Now I want to deal briefly with water pollution. The throne speech makes reference to a Canada water act to combat pollution. At the present time one does not know what form this measure will take. It is abundantly clear that steps are needed to combat water pollution. Plans will be required to prevent further pollution of our rivers and lakes, and a definite plan has to be developed to clean up pollution in the rivers and lakes already polluted, and I think this includes most of the rivers in Canada.

To clean up the pollution in some of the rivers is going to be a massive job. The only government action to date is the amendment assented to on December 2, 1960, Part VI-B of the National Housing Act, which provides for loans for municipal sewage treatment projects. This section also provides for a 25 per cent forgiveness.

This act has been made use of by many towns, cities and villages, and a good start has been made to prevent further pollution, and also a start made to clean up existing pollution. However, much more needs to be done because the pollution problem is large. To make a thorough and successful job of combatting water pollution will require the co-operation and participation of all levels of government, of industry, of business, and the people themselves. I am happy to note that the government plans action to combat water pollution.

Next I wish to deal very briefly with national housing and the housing situation. In the throne speech there is reference to a special study of urban development. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Nicholson), who reports for Central Mortgage and Housing, has held symposia on housing and urban renewal in conjunction with provincial governments. These symposia have been held in every province of Canada. I have attended two of these symposia or conferences in Winnipeg, and one at Selkirk. I would think that from these conferences many of the problems facing urban communities are known to provincial and federal authorities and the time has come for action to be taken, and not just for further studies, as is indicated in the speech from the throne. No doubt one could hold continual studies and keep on learning, but in my humble opinion the need for action and for plans to be put into effect to attack these problems is greater than the need for further studies which will only delay action.

The government and the minister in charge know that there is a desperate need for houses in Canada. They also know that the cost of houses is getting too high. Therefore the sales tax on building materials should be removed. Land price is getting excessive, and municipal taxes are getting too high. Action needs to be taken on these problems. If action is forthcoming on these matters it would encourage our young people to become homeowners. I believe it is important in our social way of life that a large portion of our adult population become homeowners. In this centennial year further studies are not the answer; it is action that is needed.

In the speech from the throne there is also reference to new incentives to promote industry in the north. I welcome anything that the government proposes to do to assist industry in northern Canada, and I can think of no better way to help promote industry in the north than to provide the necessary services such as roads and communications. I therefore would like to see the government renew the roads to resources program, which was of such great benefit, to help open up new territories in every province of Canada. I urge the government to renew the roads to resources program without delay.

Some time ago the government made a very grandiose announcement about convening a conference of ministers of highways to discuss highway policy for Canada. However, this conference has not been held to date, and I do not know whether the government has any intention of implementing its plans for it. There is a definite need for the federal government to have a highway policy because there is a need for it to participate in a second trans-Canada highway.

There is also a need for a policy to provide services for pleasure craft. The marina policy announced in the fall of 1965 is not working. The federal government must not shirk its responsibility here. It certainly has responsibilities to provide services for pleasure craft, just the same as provincial governments supply highways and services for motorcars. The marina policy has been in operation long enough for the government to realize that it is not functioning properly, and I hope it will take another look at it and come up with a successful policy.

When the ADA program, the area development incentive measure, was first introduced and the boundaries established, I pointed out to the minister that the boundaries as they exist in the interlake area were not fair or just. The minister simply replied that they had to put the boundaries somewhere but they would review this matter later. From a press announcement made at Arborg on Tuesday, May 16, when they signed the ARDA-FRED agreement for the interlake area, it was indicated that they were extending the boundaries to include the towns of Selkirk, Stonewall and Teulon and the rural municipalities of Woodland, Lockport, St. Andrews and so on.

One group of people in my constituency comprises fishermen. Generally the income of fisherman is very low. In 1964 the federal government held a great conference here in Ottawa, and from the press release which came from that conference one felt that everything in the fishing industry would be corrected, and that in fact this was a sort of Magna Carta for the fishing industry. My understanding was that the premier of Newfoundland would not be satisfied with anything less.

I do not know how this affected Newfoundland or what has been done for them since the conference was held, but the situation for fishermen in the province of Manitoba has certainly not improved since that time. In fact it is in worse condition right now than three years ago. In this connection I wish to quote briefly from an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of May 6 last, headed "Fishermen Face Bleak Season." It reads:

> The Manitoba commercial fishing industry, which employs more than 5,000 men mostly on northern and central Manitoba waters, is slowly grinding to a standstill.
> The federal government's Prices Support Board has refused a request for help, leaving the whole problem squarely in the provincial government's lap.
>
> The 5,000-or-more fishermen face a lean summer season mainly because of a huge surplus of prepared fish which is sitting in Winnipeg cold-storage houses. Because of this surplus, dealers cannot meet their customary cash advances to allow fishermen to begin the summer season's work.
>
> Reason behind the surplus—there are an estimated 1.5 million pounds of pickerel fillets in cold storage in the city—is a general price increase in stores. This increase, and the general dispensation governing Friday fish-eating by Roman Catholics, has cut deeply into demand for fish.

[Mr. Stefanson.]

> Among other species, only whitefish and pike (jackfish) are moving at a steady rate on the local market.
> Industry spokesmen have told the provincial government that they cannot make the usual cash advances.

The request for assistance from the prices support board was turned down, and I further quote:

> However, the industry did ask the Prices Support Board to help move present surplus stocks to create a demand artificially for the summer crop. This request was refused.
> Officials in the industry believe the board turned down this suggestion because the P.S.B. thought if it helped the fresh water trade in this way, it would immediately receive requests for the same sort of help from east coast fisheries.

From this you can gather that the fishing industry in Manitoba is in a very serious situation. More research is needed, more hatcheries are needed on the lakes. The fishermen's indemnity plan is not available to fishermen in Manitoba or elsewhere in the prairies. The subsidy for fishing vessels is not available to fishermen in Manitoba.

These programs should be made available to fishermen on inland lakes just as much as fishermen on the east coast. What is needed most of all is a fresh fish marketing board as recommended by the McIvor Commisison. I hope that the government will not delay taking action on this report. As far as I can find on my travels, no one is against the setting up of a marketing board, and in fact everybody is in favour of it.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two about ARDA. All hon. members received this week a kit of ARDA information which deals with the agreement covering a rural development program for the interlake area of Manitoba. This plan involves the expenditure of $85 million; $49½ million will be put up by the federal government and $35 million by the provincial government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Sone hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to continue?

Mr. Stefanson: Just for a minute, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stefanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to conclude by saying that the agreement covering the interlake area shows very clearly what can be done when all levels of government and the people work together. The ARDA program was started in 1960. The interlake was declared a test area in 1962. Subsequently it was declared a designated area, and this comprehensive agreement involving an expenditure of $85 million for the area is being made possible through the ARDA and FRED programs. This comprehensive program will give a real lift to the people of the interlake area.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am happy first of all to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The mover, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) displayed a rare eloquence. As for the seconder, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté), the Quebec farmers rightly see in him a true farmer who, in a simple and sincere way, has ably expressed his views on rural life in eastern Canada.

During these few minutes when I will have the privilege of giving my impressions on the speech from the throne, I will endeavour to speak at some length of regional and inter-regional development, within the framework of our confederative system.

According to some of our usual critics, there were few surprises in the speech from the throne. Would it be that those critics have forgotten the tremendous legislation and numerous achievements of the government in the first session of the 27th parliament, the longest in the history of Canada and one of the most productive if not the most productive? In this second session, Canadians expect the government to continue and consolidate the task already begun.

On May 11 last, in this house, the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) asked what had happened to the war on poverty, whether an armistice had been signed. Still, the last speech from the throne proves that the government is still fighting against poverty.

Indeed, what about the measures it will take to create an increasingly favourable climate for industrial development and the multiplication of employment opportunities?

What about the other measures he proposes in order to promote regional development, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, to help Canadians who must travel to find a job, to make manpower centres more effective, to develop the adult retraining program?

What can be said about those measures except that they concretize a war strategy on poverty, so that every Canadian may enjoy life and be increasingly happy in his respective province, in Canada?

Is it not one of the reasons why the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was able to state, further on in his speech: "We can be proud of our country's achievements." In my opinion, he could have said just as well: We can be proud of our country's achievements under the leadership of our present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson).

In addition to the numerous proposals—I counted at least thirty—there is what the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) called a lot of fuzziness and nonsense. In my opinion, it was more than normal, after a hundred years of confederation, for the government to draw up a summary of the last hundred years and to outline a program for the hundred years to come. It did precisely that by making a historic review and stating the basic principles underlying Canada as it stands today at the beginning of the second century of confederation.

I think that most citizens of my riding share those few impressions on the speech from the throne, because they are in accordance with their hopes to achieve economic stability for their region and to progress at the same rate as the other regions of Canada.

> —the main considerations involved in achieving regionally balanced development in Canada, consistent with our other national economic goals,—

And here I quote the Economic Council of Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada, as well as several other government and private institutions, mentioned them on various occasions. The council and I quote:

> —noted, first, the importance of reducing the relative disparities in average levels of income as they presently exist among the regions; and second, the need to assure that each region contributes to total national output, and to the sustained, long-run growth of that output, on the basis of the fullest and most efficient use of the human and material resources available to the region.

The riding of Rimouski is part of the pilot area in which was applied the development program of the Eastern Quebec Development Board published on June 30, 1966. That plan is an ARDA project which cost $3,849,000, at least 50 per cent of which was paid by the federal government. It proposes long-term development objectives to 1982 and short-term objectives between 1966 and 1972.

At present, the problems to solve is that of the agency responsible for implementing the plan. According to E.Q.D.B., it is a matter of —identifying the agency responsible for the so-called implementation stage of the development logic which presided over the relationship established between the various programs and projects.

The organization of that agency is the problem that is of concern and particular interest to the people at the present time. In the meantime, other provinces receive through ARDA several millions of dollars to develop their territory.

• (8:30 p.m.)

For instance, the readers of a Rimouski weekly, L'Écho du Bas-St-Laurent, were informed last January 23 that $89,250,000, including $62,136,000 from the federal government, had been spent to implement the rural development program in the northeastern part of New Brunswick.

What we want is an efficient structure of consultation and pressure. As far as the implementation is concerned, we want the procedure to be determined in the spirit of our democratic traditions, in the respect of the freedom of each citizen. We are confident that the government of our province will assume its responsibilities in this field and co-operate with the federal government in the implementation of the plan.

According to an account of the visit of the Quebec minister of agriculture to Mont-Joli, published in the newspaper Le Soleil last January 13, the minister intends to set up this organization, appoint a committee of the legislature and name a regional co-ordinator.

In any event, we would like the federal government to maintain its present serious interest in this matter and appoint its own official, whatever his title, to co-ordinate the various services of the federal government with regard to the implementation of the program.

Therefore, the statement made by the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

(Mr. Sauvé) on April 24 last, was a little reassuring, when he said:

It will be our pleasure before the fall, to sign an agreement which will be a feather in the cap of both the provincial and the federal governments involved.

My constituents from Rimouski were right, I think, to be skeptical, apprehensive and to fear being involved in an unfortunate experience, doomed to failure. Some past experiences can illustrate the reason for that frame of mind.

About 40 years ago, large numbers of pioneers who intended to be farmers were led into the forest hinterland.

In the framework of a colonizing policy, they cleared the land and toiled hard. Today, their children leave them for the big cities, and they remain alone on land which has not fulfilled past promises.

Here is another example: At Pointe-au-Père, a municipality quite close to Rimouski, was located for many years the piloting station on the St. Lawrence river which kept, among other things, the economic activity of the municipality balanced.

At the time of the Conservative government after 1957, our friends in the opposition agreed to the removal of this piloting station without apparently thinking of the economy of the municipality.

Before 1957, the Liberal government of the time considered the possibility of improving the wharf at Pointe-au-Père which could have been the home port of a ferry capable of serving both shores the year round.

At that time, service was supplied almost ten months a year by an old and well-established company which had already taken steps to build a powerful ferry capable of year-round service.

In August 1961—

And I am quoting from the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1964:

—the Treasury Board gave approval in principle to the granting of a subsidy.

This subsidy was a capital subsidy which proved to be an amount of $2,363,650, that is the purchase price of the ship, including taxes and it was owned by a newly-formed company, other than the one whose plans were prepared under the direction of another company. I continue the quotation:

But in doing so, they emphasized that it considered a service of this nature to be primarily a provincial responsibility. The board was prepared to make an exception in this particular case however, because it was in hand and other active consideration before the board recommended to cabinet a report on federal assistance to a ferry and coastal services under the principles of which intra-provincial ferry services that are essentially highway links—chiefly services involving roll-on/roll-off ferries, are considered to be a matter of provincial responsibility.

Why did the Conservative government of the time arrange for the total capital subsidy to finally reach $2,363,650 so as to pay the full cost of a ferry without taking serious precautions for the future? Why did they agree with the company on a contract for only five years, terminating on December 31, 1966. Why did they not order a careful inquiry by their economists to make sure that the ship would be economic?

These are the questions my electors are asking now that they know the ferry was sold some days ago to British Columbia Ferries—according to the newspaper Le Soleil of May 6—for $1,850,000.

I think the present Liberal government would be sympathetic as concerns this ferry; but since then, the problem has become the exclusive responsibility of the provincial government. That is why the population will have to start from scratch and ask the Quebec government for help in reorganizing this service.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Another fact is connected with the maintenance of the port of Rimouski, that is the wharves of Rimouski-Est and Pointe-au-Père.

For many years the port of Rimouski was the most important port of the Lower St. Lawrence, east of Quebec even from the Bay of Chaleurs up to Dalhousie inclusive. Since, some ports of the north shore such as Baie Comeau and Sept-Iles have certainly surpassed it during those last years.

One has only to consider the net amount of wharfage dues collected during the past five financial years to realize it; Sept-Îles, $480,000; Rimouski, $337,000; Dalhousie, $122,000; Baie-Comeau, $113,000; Forestville, $109,000; Chandler, $101,000; Sandy Beach, $79,000; Rivière-du-Loup, $38,000; Mont-Louis, $30,000; Matane, $26,000; Havre-St-Pierre, $20,000; Ste-Anne-des-Monts, $17,000.

This can be explained if one considers that Mont-Joli, Rimouski, Price and the surrounding municipalities, with a total population of some 60,000 inhabitants, also constitute the largest group of the lower St. Lawrence and the gulf, and includes the greates number of public services.

Now, before the advent of the Conservative regime in 1957, there was, according to my information, a permanent staff in the field for the maintenance of these wharves.

Under the Conservative government, the system was changed and wharf maintenance people were dismissed and never replaced. Ever since, everything that should be checked yearly and regularly on these wharves is in a pitiful state.

Therefore the population is relying upon the co-operation of the civil service and of the present government to make the necessary improvements.

Facts of this nature spread some doubts in the people's minds. That is why they bank so much on the implementation of the recommendations of the development plan without which they may be doomed irrevocably.

Naturally, there are several other problems to be solved. For instance, what I said about the maintenance of the wharf at Rimouski could also apply to Trois-Pistoles.

There is also the organisation of the Canadian National Railways in our area. We hope to make, in the near future, to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) representations based on concrete facts and figures.

We also have a magnificent airport at Mont-Joli that was built during the last war for military purposes. It cost $3,059,491, which includes $1,735,019 spent on the construction of three runways. Improvements have since been made amounting to $695,030, which gives a total cost of $3,754,521.

Considering the difficulties of air transportation in the pilot territory, we are building great hopes on that airport in our efforts to develop the district.

In my area, as well as in the whole surrounding territory, agriculture has taken on the form of a familiar and current problem.

I think that our farmers, as well as those interested in agriculture, would like to make marginal lands fully economic, to gear production to ecological, climatic and economic conditions and to relate activities from one area to another, with regard to relations with the north shore of the St. Lawrence river and an industrialized agriculture. Our agriculture must remain a comparatively important activity.

In our area, positive action must be taken primarily at the very root of agriculture and we must not rely solely on price control. Such a rationalization will enable farmers to obtain better prices for their products.

Manufacturing milk would seem best suited for intensive production on our farms; that is why I am always among those members who try to understand requests from our manufacturing milk producers and to bring the necessary pressure to bear in order to improve price conditions in this field.

Yesterday's vote—as all hon. members know—was not on the merit of the amendment; it was a vote of confidence in the government which, for many years, carried out a progressive program, on the whole, and accomplished more, particularly in the field of agriculture, namely with regard to the dairy policy, considering that a farmer who received $2.90 per hundredweight for manufacturing milk in 1963 now gets $4.75. That is why I voted with the government. At the same time I was convinced that I was voting in the farmers' interests.

A better balance in the area economic development in Canada is a most urgent goal to achieve. To that end, as we enter the second century of our confederation, the consideration of the necessary amendments to our constitution is certainly important.

Quebec wants, and rightly so, to keep its distinctive character as do other provinces.

Confronted with our American neighbour, Quebec considers it in its interest to remain within confederation, not only from the material and economic point of view, but also for philosophical, political and cultural reasons.

Remembering Lafontaine and Cartier, we still have reasons to continue to build harmoniously, a happy and flourishing Canada.

Therefore, at the beginning of this session of our centennial, with the achievement of an ideal balance between the regional sectors and a spirit of understanding among the provinces, we want to build a greater Canada, but just as serious-minded, just as daring but still always true to itself, always peaceful, so that we may be proud to say: We are Canadians.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I had not originally intended to take part in this particular debate, but lately matters pertaining to the record of the government and its effect upon the people have accumulated in my files. Therefore I rise to bring these matters to the attention of the house, hoping the government will take heed.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

Before I do so, I also wish to commend the mover and seconder of the address in reply, the hon. members for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté). Both of these hon. members have brought a distinct honour to their constituencies. This brings to mind memories of the time in September 1962, almost five years ago, when I first came to this chamber, and the newly elected member for Nicolet-Yamaska, Hon. Clément Vincent, now minister of agriculture in the province of Quebec, had the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. At that time the hon. member and I were roommates. We shared an office on the third floor of the west block. In the ensuing parliaments we were seatmates. I visited the counties of Nicolet and Yamaska many times as his guest, and he visited me in Prince Edward-Lennox.

He taught me French and I helped him with his English. This was to our mutual benefit. We were a working example, proving that Canadians of different races can get along together in harmony. We believed, and still believe, that all Canadians who respect each other's origin, social needs and geographical circumstances can live together harmoniously. The days are past when a narrow, provincial outlook regarding Canadian citizenship sufficed.

The speech from the throne asks for Canadian unity. This is why I must bring up a matter which does not make for Canadian unity, and which will demonstrate to hon. members the ignorant and narrow outlook of the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal and the discourteous and un-Canadian treatment which they gave a 17 year old student from my constituency. The student's name is Mr. Jim Munro of Amherstview, Ontario. As a result of this, his father, Mr. R. J. Munro, has written to me and asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the house. I will read the application for employment which the son made to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, as well as the reply he received. I will also read his father's letter to me. The following is the letter written by young Munro to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce:

Dear Sir:

I am writing to you regarding summer employment (June 10-September 1, 1967).

The reasons I am interested in obtaining work in Quebec are:

(1) to broaden my speaking knowledge of French

(2) to earn money to pay for my stay in Quebec and to save some money.

I have taken four years of French in high school and have only a very basic knowledge of French. While I am unskilled and cannot speak fluent French, I realize extra hard work is an asset.

I am interested in finding out what your thoughts and recommendations would be in regard to:

(1) type of employment available and corresponding wages

(2) cost of living in the Montreal area.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Any information and/or assistance you may be able to supply me will be greatly appreciated.

Then, the Munro boy goes on to give his full name, address, his date of birth, his height, his weight, his education and his future plans. He says his future plans are to obtain high school graduation and enter university in a political science course. He closes his application with, "Yours truly, Jim Munro". The Montreal Chamber of Commerce did not even have the courtesy to write this young man a letter. They turned the letter over, put it in the typewriter and in capital letters with the red portion of the typewriter ribbon they typed across the back of Mr. Munro's application:

Sorry, no summer job available for non-Canadian.

La Chambre de Commerce du District de Montréal.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote the father's letter. You cannot blame Mr. Munro for being angry at such frustrating circumstances and the treatment of this ambitious young student. Mr. Munro writes to me from Box 167, Amherstview, Ontario, which is roughly ten miles west of Kingston. His letter reads:

Dear Mr. Alkenbrack:

We recently had something happen that upset and perturbed us very much.

Our oldest son, who will soon be eighteen, has been writing to the Chamber of Commerce of various cities requesting all pertinent information in regards to summer employment. In most cases, he has received a satisfactory answer.

In this group of cities was Montreal. The only acknowledgement received was his original letter back with these words typed in red on the back—

Sorry, no summer job available for non-Canadian. La Chambre de Commerce du District de Montreal.

The return address on their envelope is,

Chamber de Commerce,
Du District De Montreal,
31 Ouest Rue St. Jacques
Montreal,

How they have the audacity to classify him as a non-Canadian, we fail to understand.

To begin with, he was born in Ottawa while I was a member of the R.C.A.F. I served a total of over eight years during and after the war. I also had three brothers and one brother-in-law in the armed forces during the war. My father in law was a veteran of the first world war but couldn't go in the last one because of medical reasons.

To top this off, my mother—

I am still quoting Mr. Munro, the father of this wronged student.

To top this off, my mother is of French descent; also my father in law was born in the province of Quebec and moved to western Canada as a boy.

Since you are our federal representative, we feel that you should be the one to do something about this. Therefore, we would appreciate it if you would bring this ignorance to the attention of person or persons who will take action to straighten out such people.

Sincerely yours,
R. J. Munro

There is a notation that a copy was sent to Mayor Drapeau, Montreal. Now, Mr. Speaker, who is it in the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, "La Chambre de Commerce du District de Montreal" who is doing this? I am sure Mayor Drapeau does not condone it; I am positive of this. Whoever it is, they have been encouraged in their rudeness by this Pearson government because the Pearson policy of bilingualism and biculturalism has divided this country needlessly and nefariously, and to an alarming degree. This policy has encouraged just such cases of narrowness and ignorance as I have now brought to your attention. The Montreal Chamber of Commerce demonstrates, in this instance, that they discriminate against English speaking Canadians. They do not even recognize them to be Canadians because they answered Mr. Munro by saying he was not a Canadian. Of course, this case only illustrates the fact that when you discriminate against people because of their racial lines, such action quite often comes back to haunt you.

I say this because I have investigated this family. I find that Mr. Munro's grandmother, that is his father's mother, was Henrietta Bédard, a French Canadian girl from the province of Quebec. She bore a son who served his country in wartime in the R.C.A.F. for a total of over eight years. This noble French Canadian grandmother also bore three other sons who served in the armed forces during the war.

I have investigated the other side of the family tree and I find that the grandfather on the mother's side was a man named McGillvray of Thurso, Quebec. This family has been here since General Wolfe took Quebec in 1759; the family dates back to that time. I say to the government and to the Montreal Chamber of Commerce only this:

What a treacherous and despicable way to treat Jim Munroe, the grandson of this woman, just because he happens to live in Ernestown Township in the County of Lennox in Ontario.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, just think what an adverse and unco-operative attitude this action will tend to create in the minds of our youth when they have been treated in this manner. I say to the Prime Minister stop encouraging this two nations policy. This case which I have brought to your attention is the result of this policy. Someone in the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, and I aim to find out who, has taken the Prime Minister literally and deduced as follows: The Liberal government in Ottawa says Quebec and its people have a special status under this Liberal, two nations concept, and therefore this person answered Mr. Munro by saying that there were no jobs there for non-Canadians. As I said before I intend to get to the bottom of this and I demand an explanation and apology to the Munro family by the Montreal Chamber of Commerce. I want the assistance of the government in doing so.

Now I must turn to the speech from the throne. This long discourse seems to me to be merely a rehash of promises made in the last four years. The government, as usual, has been non-productive of any useful legislation. I thought, and everyone noticed this, that they imposed on His Excellency the Governor General because, in many instances, he was forced to use flowery adjectives to describe alleged government action in the past or in the future. In short, Mr. Speaker, the government was covering up its careless and profligate actions of the past with words, words and more words. At times, and in some sections, the speech sounded like a lecture, not to parliament alone but to the Canadian people.

Nowhere in the speech was there any mention of economy by the government or of the great need that is upon us right now to reduce taxation in order to give people a chance to build homes and raise their families without going bankrupt. The government admits that inflation is rampant. It is beyond their control or they would do something about it. The latest cost of living index, standing around 148 for the month of April, is the highest in history. Last May 27, almost a year ago now, Mr. Speaker, I brought this matter of national importance to the attention of the house. My speech is recorded on page 5607 of Hansard and in it I referred to consumer credit, the cost of living and expressed some opinions concerning the Bank Act.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

I am glad to see that some action has been taken in connection with the Bank Act along the lines I recommended. I commend the government for these new banking measures which are now in force and are of benefit across the country. These provisions give the chartered banks an opportunity to participate more fully and to compete for consumer credit. I notice that my words of last May 27 regarding money on deposit were prophetic because the chartered banks are now paying far more interest than formerly on savings accounts. This is a good thing, because it enables the little people who cannot afford to take a chance on the stock market or to buy bonds, to save money at a rate of interest which is at least as good as the yield on some bonds. What is more, Mr. Speaker, they save this money in their local bank.

• (9:00 p.m.)

I am sorry to see that nothing has been done about the plight of the consumer and the spiralling cost of living. True, the government is going to form another department and a minister has been named to head it. But this will only increase taxes, Mr. Speaker, which is part of the cost of living. This matter could have been dealt with without the formation of another department. I believe we now have 26 ministers of the crown. We must remember that the consumer has to pay for all of this extra expenditure. This will mean the building of another departmental empire in Ottawa. I suggest this matter could well have been handled by the present President of the Privy Council (Mr. Gordon). He is an economist and he is once again a member of the cabinet. He is also an authority on external affairs, though the Prime Minister no longer takes his advice.

No effort has been made, according to the speech from the throne, to take any measures to lower taxes or reduce the needless spending of millions of dollars. On the contrary, just as we started this new centennial session the government bought a $300,000 painting, the purchase of which has infuriated the majority of the people of this country. I would ask the members of the cabinet as well as my colleagues in the house to go and look at this thing in the art gallery, and then to take a journey around the country. In fact, one does not have to go very far from Ottawa into either Quebec or Ontario to see some of the poverty that exists.

We are now finding the ministers of this government apeing some of the sayings of our good neighbour to the south, when they talk of Canadianism in terms of "the affluent society". This is a myth; there is no truth in it. It is an insult to the intelligence of at least half the people of Canada.

I suggest that to move toward any form of affluence we must stop taxing the working man at the rate we are today. The working man is raising a family and trying to pay off the mortgage, as well as buying groceries, clothing and insurance. As a member of this chamber I think I can truthfully say I have always been one who tried to pay close attention to the fair and well founded opinions of the people. With regard to just one facet of this question of taxation I should like to quote a letter which I received from one of my constituents, a man who works in a plant and has to provide various accoutrements and tools to perform his job. He says:

Dear Sir:

A new safety ruling at my place of employment, effective 1st May, 1967, states that employees are required to wear safety footwear, or toe caps fitted over ordinary footwear. The toe caps are supplied by the company, but are very awkward to wear, so the only alternative is to buy, at our own expense, less a 25 per cent discount, paid by the company, our own safety shoes. This I did, at a cost to me of $12.98 plus 5 per cent sales tax. This set me to thinking and I have come up with the following suggestions that you, living in a working man's area, will probably agree with and may be able to bring to the attention of the authorities.

1. All safety equipment purchased by an employee, should have the sales tax eliminated or an allowance for different work categories be set, to be deductible from federal income tax return.

I appreciate that he is talking about the 5 per cent provincial tax, which has nothing to do with us; but he is making some very worthy suggestions regarding deductions from federal income tax for some of these personal expenses, which do pertain to Federal powers and I agree with him. He goes on:

2. All work clothes purchased by an employee should have the sales tax eliminated, or a clothing allowance be set, to be deductible from federal income tax return.

I would draw the attention of hon. members to the next suggestion because I know many of them have had it put to them:

3. An employee driving to and from his place of residence to his place of employment, whether the employee uses a chartered service or personal vehicle, to have a transportation allowance set, to be deductible from federal income tax return.

4. In the case of tradesmen having to purchase their own tools and equipment, an allowance be set, to be deductible from federal income tax return.

Do you think a signed petition would have any effect on the powers that be? Please advise.

Thank you.
Sincerely,
Donald A. Young

Mr. Young is from Amherstview, Ontario, and I totally agree with his suggestions. This account, put forward so ably, should be heeded by this government. The lack of exemption from tax on certain items is unfair to labourers of this category. Here is a place where the government could save some money for their taxpayers, at the same time creating better home conditions for their families by letting them use these tax exemptions to the benefit of their families. I would urge the government to give this matter their positive attention.

The speech from the throne also made reference to modern communication, and for this reason another matter that I wish to mention is mail service. Here I address my remarks to the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté). The mail service between Toronto and Picton and Toronto and Napanee is very poor and very slow. Many businessmen and professional people in both towns are being inconvenienced by the slowness of our so-called first class mail delivery. The other day in the Picton Gazette there was an article dealing with this poor service, and the headline which I thought quite amusing, suggested that the pony express might be faster. This is absolutely true, Mr. Speaker. We in Picton cannot receive a letter or mailed parcel from Toronto in less than two days. A letter or parcel also takes two days from Toronto to Napanee. Optometrists, dentists, doctors and businessmen who send small parcels back and forth to laboratories, government and business offices in Toronto cannot receive these mailed articles in less than two days, and sometimes it takes longer. Only the other day my secretary mailed my personal cheque to me at the end of the month to my home in Napanee, and it took four days for it to come from Ottawa.

I have had many complaints about this from both Napanee and Picton. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the pony express would be faster. I did some homework on this and discovered that in 1840 a man named William Weller, whose headquarters was in Prince Edward county and after whom Weller's Bay was named, an old-time stagecoach proprietor and driver, drove Governor General Lord Sydenham from Toronto to Montreal by stage and team of horses in 35 hours and 40 minutes.

The distance is almost 350 miles. I found, in the library of parliament this book "The Story of Canadian Roads" by Edwin C. Guillet, that in his record breaking trip of 1840 William Weller averaged 10 miles per hour including stops to change horses. Governor General Poulett Thomson, who later became Lord Sydenham had to reach Montreal by a certain time to reprieve a prisoner who had been sentenced to hang. William Weller bet $1,000 that he could cover the distance from Toronto to Montreal in 36 hours—and he did. He made the trip in 20 minutes under the time, completing it in 35 hours and 40 minutes. The prisoner was reprieved, William Weller got his fee, won his bet, and received an engraved watch from the governor general who later was to become Lord Sydenham.

The Picton Gazette was right; the pony express would be faster because we get 48 hours delivery from Toronto to Picton and Napanee, whereas William Weller 127 years ago could have brought down the mail by stage coach in 14 hours—and the government says we are living in an affluent age.

Today, in 1967, we cannot get mail from Toronto to go eastward 140 miles—and that is not half the distance Weller had to go by stagecoach—in less than 48 hours. And I point out that the mail comes over the finest roads in the world. The main track of the Grand Trunk Railway, now the Canadian National, running from Toronto or Montreal to Chicago today is the finest railway roadbed in the world. If the mail can come by rail, or over the Macdonald-Cartier freeway, which is about as fine a highway as there is in the world, what is the matter with our mail service? What is the matter with our affluent society?

I have a sample of some letters which I wish to put before the chamber. The one in my hand is written by Dr. A. E. Fyffe, who is a dentist practising in Napanee. He writes as follows:

> Please be informed we are very unhappy with mail service (Toronto) to Napanee.
>
> I hope with your help we can bring this to the attention of the federal authority involved.
>
> Yours truly,
> A. E. Fyffe D.D.S.

He encloses some stamped portions of parcels that have been mailed. One of them was sent out on May 2 and received on May 4, and another one is stamped May 1, and received May 4. It takes from two to three days for the mail to arrive, and we must have better service than that. I say to the Postmaster General: please look into this matter to correct the situation. I am sure the Postmaster General will do that. Both the towns I have mentioned must have one day's service from Toronto. We ought to get mail the day it is mailed in Toronto—that is, should it be mailed in the morning.

I wish to mention another matter pertaining to transport. I recently noted with interest that the Canadian National may curtail some of its transcontinental service and concentrate more on intercity services. This is contrary to the original purpose for which the railways were built. I realize that the transcontinental air service has taken a heavy toll of the transcontinental rail passenger business, but I maintain that the Canadian National must not forsake totally its transcontinental service, as many people in this country will not fly. At least one transcontinental train ought to go each way every day. The intercity passenger business certainly needs improving, and here is where the railway can give a better service than the air lines give.

When one travels from the heart of the city for 15 or 20 miles by taxi to an airport to board an airplane for a 300 mile flight to another city—the journey could be between Ottawa and Toronto, Montreal and Toronto, or even the shorter distance, Ottawa to Montreal—by the time he has taken taxis to and from the airport be might have arrived sooner by rail, going from the heart of one city to the centre of the other.

For that reason I want to talk about the rail service between Ottawa and Toronto, or, say, between Ottawa, Napanee and points west of Napanee on the main line of the Canadian National. For years our rail passenger service on the Canadian National between Toronto and Ottawa has been through Brockville and then northerly over Canadian Pacific tracks to Ottawa. A pool arrangement existed. I wish to tell the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and the Canadian National that the shortest distance by rail from Toronto to Ottawa is through Smiths Falls, through the Smiths Falls subdivision of the Canadian National by way of Harrowsmith, Yarker and Napanee, Napanee being the junction of the Smiths Falls subdivision and the main line of the Canadian National between Toronto and Montreal. The route via Napanee is 70 miles shorter, when travelling between Toronto and Montreal, than the route via Brockville. Now that the Canadian National is interested in intercity rail passenger revenue I urge it to make the necessary repairs and changes in the Smiths Falls-Napanee line that it may become, as it originally was, the main route from Ottawa to Toronto, and points beyond. Great savings can be made.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The time allotted to the hon. member has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I have only another paragraph, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): May the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Only for one paragraph.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I thank hon. members for their agreement. I had been saying that the shortest route between Ottawa and Toronto by rail is by way of Napanee. In this way—in the way I had spoken of—the railway could increase its intercity business, shorten travelling time, between Ottawa and Toronto, and increase its business at Napanee, which serves a large area for the railway. With the completion this summer of the Quinte skyway, seven miles west of Napanee—this is the new bridge across the bay of Quinte joining Hastings with Prince Edward county—the railway at Napanee ought to obtain additional business from Prince Edward county. Of course that depends on what service is available. I urge the railway to use this line, as it would bring the railway more revenue and provide the people with the service they need—and heaven only knows, dangerous highway traffic would be decreased as would be the death toll through accidents.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the privilege of bringing these matters to the attention of the house. Several other items ought to be brought up, but I shall reserve them for the debate on the budget.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I am rising to take part in this debate as one who has had a lifetime interest in the conservation and development of our human and national resources. However, first of all I must compliment the member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) on his eloquent and moving speech when he moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which I notice received repeated applause from all sides of the house.

As I listened to him speak with such knowledge, assurance and conviction, and heard his choice of words and phrases, do you know, Mr. Speaker, I had a vision that inclined me to believe he could have had some part in the composition of the throne speech. Furthermore I congratulate him on his courage to admit that he voted twice against becoming a Canadian, but now, after 18 years within confederation, that he would choose Canadian citizenship over that of any other country on earth. He is what might be termed a convert, as the result of his experience here.

I wish also to compliment the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on his well informed presentation of the problems of the rural community.

I was particularly interested in his plea to members of this house not to use the farmer as a political football. That is a very noble precept but I am afraid, after 22 years experience in this house, that the hon. member is underestimating the human frailty of members of parliament, who can be tempted on occasions to use any issue as a political issue. I have known this to happen on two or three occasions in 22 years.

The contents of the speech from the throne provide some hope that the government intends to introduce legislation which will be of advantage to Canadian people as a whole and particularly to the advantage of our older people who require an adequate standard of living, of those who require housing, of our farmers who seek parity of income, and of young people who require education, and others who need retraining. Without doubt, in my opinion, the speech from the throne offers a great opportunity for the exercise of imagination on the part of members of the opposition.

I must say I was very disappointed that there was no reference in the speech to veterans affairs and no mention of proposals for amendments to legislation which would be of benefit to veterans and their dependants. In this connection I have solid support. I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) who is the chairman of the standing committee on veterans affairs, a highly respected member of this house. I will not repeat what he said. I will merely say I endorse wholeheartedly what he said in this house on May 17 with respect to the omission of any reference to veterans affairs from the speech from the throne. He went on to deal with the need for amendments to legislation which would provide higher incomes for pensioners and improved allowances for recipients of war veterans allowances. I also wish to endorse what he had to say about the Wood committee. I know some members are impatient about the time taken by that committee in making its report, but it has been very thorough in its study.

I must say that the chairman of the Wood committee is highly respected by veterans in this country. He and his colleagues have heard a great deal of evidence, some of it in recent weeks, and I am glad to know that they are giving such careful consideration to the representations made to them. I do not mind this committee taking a little extra time, because the veterans and their organizations are confident that it will present an excellent report when the time comes to bring it forward.

I notice one curious omission from the throne speech—the total absence of any item announcing the government's intention to establish in Canada the office of ombudsman. This was mentioned in the speech from the throne of 1965 and I trust it will be brought forward later after we have disposed of some of the more urgent legislation. I know that members of this group as well as of other parties in the house are of the opinion that a measure to set up this office should be introduced as soon as possible, because of the changing nature of our society, to protect the individual and his civil rights.

I was delighted with the paragraph referring to natural resources and pleased to note that measures will be introduced to preserve and conserve them. We look forward to the introduction of that legislation. I was also pleased to note that we shall be asked to approve a new Canada water act which will provide a framework for the improvement and implementation of a Canada water policy. Having said this, I think that in fairness to the people of Canada and to the members of this house the government should announce its order of business in the immediate future so as to give priority to the more pressing needs which concern the people of this country today.

I intend to deal with the conservation and development of our natural resources, in the firm conviction that we can only maintain and improve our standard of living if governments direct their attention to this question now. There is no time for delay. I am not only expressing my personal views; I am speaking on behalf of large groups in this country which are deeply concerned about this subject—one which I have followed closely in this country, particularly during the last four or five years.

I also wish to deal with the present state of affairs as far as our natural resources are concerned and to indicate our failure to protect them in Canada to date. It may surprise you, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to direct your attention to the Columbia river treaty and to what has happened so far. In this connection political selfishness and public apathy at the time made this treaty the biggest give-away yet of Canada's natural resources, and the propaganda by which two governments tried to justify this action has turned a fiasco into an international blunder. The present treaty is a monumental blow to Canada's independence as far as the protection of our water resources is concerned. I trust we shall not forget this expensive lesson and that we shall take action in the immediate future to correct our former sins.

Before going further I wish to take the first opportunity I have had in a debate of this kind to pay a tribute to the late General McNaughton. In this connection I will simply quote one paragraph from a C.B.C. broadcast on September 11, 1966 in the course of which Mr. J. Frank Willis said:

> The editorial tribute of Mr. Michael Barkway to the memory of General McNaughton was one of many such tributes to appear in Canada's press in the days which followed his death. To the hundreds of Canadians who were privileged to know him, that death was a personal loss and they were aware of that loss in all its human dimensions. But they were also aware that every Canadian living—whether they only knew of him or had never heard of him at all—had suffered a kind of loss of which they were not aware. For in General McNaughton's passing Canada suffered the loss of one of her greatest sons and one of her greatest defenders.

I only wish that General McNaughton was with us now and able to realize that the arguments he so courageously put forward in opposition to the Columbia river treaty have been proven correct. They will prove even more justified as time goes by.

I am sure there are many in this house who knew General McNaughton personally. I enjoyed a close personal acquaintance with him over a long period of years. I wish he was with us at this time.

I wish to deal with a number of matters in this connection, first of all the greatly increased cost of Columbia river projects to date, and the anticipated further increase in the months ahead. I have not time to place on record the correspondence I have had from engineers—in some cases I would not be allowed to use their names—but it is obvious now that Columbia river treaty projects and flowage costs will exceed by some $200 million the amount the government of British Columbia received from the United States in payment for these projects, that is to say $343 millions for 30 years, including $64 million for flood control protection.

• (9:30 p.m.)

I have a quotation here from the Engineering and Contract Record of December, 1966, which reads:

> Two years ago, when B.C. Premier Bennett sold the Canadian half of the Columbia river to the U.S. for $343 million, the chairman of B.C. Hydro called it the greatest deal in Canadian history. He said that, even after building the storage dams required by the Americans under the treaty, there would be a profit to B.C. of $54 million.
> In two short years, the great deal has turned into a financial nightmare. After the September election, Bennett dropped the bombshell. Not only had the profit evaporated, but B.C. will need $200 million extra to finish the job. It's beginning to look as if Canada not only gave away the river, but will pay a quarter of a billion dollars for the privilege of doing so.

Then I come to the second matter which concerns us, the tremendous increase in power which is going to be produced at Grand Coulee dam in the United States as a result of new generators being put in the dam since the treaty was signed. Since learning of the increasing costs of these projects in Canada, we now have this additional shock.

We made a treaty which provided for Canada receiving advance payment for a million kilowatts of power for 30 years. Now we are advised that they are going to increase the output at Grand Coulee to 9.2 million kilowatts per annum, and in that connection I want to quote from a few newspaper articles which I have here. The first is a Washington dispatch of the Canadian Press headed, "Grand Coulee Dam Project Will Bring Back World Title." It reads:

> A massive expansion of the Grand Coulee dam in Washington state was announced Friday to take full advantage of the Columbia river agreement with Canada.
> Interior Secretary Stewart Udall said the estimated $390 million cost will return to Grand Coulee the title now held in the Soviet Union of the world's largest dam.

I have another one here from the Business and Finance Weekly of Saturday, January 14, 1967, an article by Mr. Bruce Macdonald, who writes:

> Largely as a result of water storage facilities provided by Canada under the Columbia river treaty, the power-generating capacity of Grand Coulee dam in Washington state will be increased from the present level of almost two million kilowatts to a proposed output in the nineteen ninties of 9.2 million kilowatts, making the Grand Coulee the largest power dam in the world.

Then he goes on to say how Secretary Udall is taking advantage of the Columbia river treaty signed with Canada.

I have another quotation here from the Nelson Daily News of January 28, 1966, which reads:

> A Columbia River water congress for the northwest United States will be held April 1 and 2 in Wenatchee, Washington, it has been announced.

It goes on:

> We can no longer sit idly by on the banks of the great Columbia river and allow the politicking and conniving in the southwest to continue without raising our voice ... A year ago a reclamation spokesman, who preferred to remain anonymous, said it is entirely possible that as much as 15 million acre-feet of water could be diverted annually from the Columbia to the Colorado, more than doubling the Colorado's flow.

That 15 million acre feet is just the amount of storage in Canada provided by the treaty at this time.

Later we go on to find out that we have not received a cent from the United States for the water used for irrigation. Just before General McNaughton died he wrote about this. I do not have the figures here but I have his letter in my office, and these figures show that as the result of the sale of Columbia river water for industrial and irrigation purposes, for instance as the result of transfer from one river to another at a minimum of $10 per acre foot, Canada at this time should have received $40 million a year from the United States under the treaty, but we have not received a cent.

To point out the situation further I have to review briefly the losses that have occurred. We have lost many thousands of acres of good land and timber in the Columbia river basin because of this flooding. I hope that the remaining land and foreshore which can be preserved after the flood has arrived, will be sold to Canadians and not to United States purchasers, but I have got copies of letters written by the B.C. Hydro Commission to intending purchasers in the United States stating that as soon as the land has first been bought from Canadians they will let them know what they have for sale to these people in the United States who want to purchase foreshore property.

I do not blame these people in the United States for writing, because this will be a tremendous recreational area; but I do make a plea that every effort be made on the part of this government, in so far as it has any influence on this question at the present time, to make certain Canadians have the first opportunity to purchase their own natural resources before they are sold to citizens of the United States.

We have lost 50 miles of beaches on the Arrow Lakes between Castlegar and Revelstoke, of a tremendous recreational value which we hope will be restored to some extent as the result of the expenditure of large amounts of money. In the immediate years ahead we will have lost opportunities for development of the tourist industry because in the past tourists were delighted to come to our area to use these magnificent beaches which are now being destroyed.

There is also tremendous damage to sport fishing in the area between Castlegar and Revelstoke. This is admitted in a report made by the wildlife branch of the government of the province of British Columbia.

Before going on I want to mention the attitude of some people in connection with this project. I am going to quote briefly from a broadcast on a C.B.C. television program made by William S. Foster, editor of "The American City", speaking on the implications of water export, on April 11, 1966. Mr. Foster had this to say:

> There's a great deal of risk.

He had been asked what would happen when we sold the water to the United States and decided at a later date that we did not want to continue the sale of the water over a period of time.

> Offhand at first glance, you would say that the risk is great for the southwest because the water belongs to Canada, and presumably if at Canada's wish, it could simply turn off the valve and the water would not be there any more. But there is a more subtle threat than that. I wonder just what would happen to the sovereignty of Canada if a nation like the United States and a nation like Mexico would suddenly say that "you no longer have the right to deny us the water even though you need it in your own industrial and agricultural development." I've often thought about that and wondered what the really long range risks are to Canada, and I think they're considerable.

I think Canadians should ponder that sort of language when it is used by a prominent official in the United States speaking in a C.B.C. broadcast on this issue.

Now I have a few comments to make with respect to some very interesting statements made in recent days by Premier Bennett. I want to quote what he is reported to have said in the Vancouver Sun of Thursday, May 11, 1967; but first I want to point out that on December 12, 1961, on a C.B.C. television program Premier Bennett stated that the Columbia river power would be "absolutely free." I want to be fair to Premier Bennett and point out that this article in the Sun is a report of an interview with him. It reads:

> Asked Wednesday for his opinion of the treaty, he said: "The treaty missed out. The thing that's at fault in the treaty is that it was signed too quickly."
> He blamed federal authorities.
>
> Bennett said the arrangement made with Kaiser Aluminum for a dam on the Arrow Lakes "was three times better than the treaty."
> The deal concerned the proposed construction in 1954 by Kaiser Aluminum of a $25 million dam on the Arrow Lakes. It was championed by former lands minister Robert Sommers.

This is what the premier now says after eulogizing the present treaty at the time it was before the committee and at the time of his signing of the protocol out west. It indicates shall I say, how inaccurate Premier Bennett is.

I now want to quote from the minutes of the standing committee on external affairs dealing with the Columbia river protocol, volume 6, page 316:

>
> Mr. Davis: In other words, at the time Canada signed the treaty, financial feasibility had not been determined. Are you confident now that the projects under the treaty are financially feasible?

Mr. Williston, who is minister of lands and forests of British Columbia, replied:

> Absolutely. As a matter of fact we think at the present time it is the most attractive series of projects available anywhere on the North American continent.

Then at page 319 of volume 6 I asked this question:

> I have another supplementary question on that. In view of the experience with the British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority which over a considerable period of years has exceeded its estimates by an average of 50 per cent, can you guarantee that these estimates are reasonably close?
>
> Mr. Williston: I can guarantee nothing except I guarantee that in latter years the statement you made concerning the hydro estimates is incorrect.
>
> Mr. Herridge: We can give the figures.
> Mr. Williston: I said that over the latter years the statement is wrong. I am a director of hydro now, and during the period in which I have been associated and responsible that has not happened yet on one occasion. I am dealing with the present, not the past.

We are now in the present day and are dealing with the past of the last two years. Then at page 328 of volume 6 I said:

First of all, I do want to credit the minister with what I would term a very smooth presentation yesterday. I remember during the hearings on the Kaiser dam in 1955 the minister's colleague, who is sitting beside him, made a very excellent presentation at that time and was complimented from all sides; it was a presentation in support of the Kaiser dam. I remember at the time Mr. Paget—

He is the water controller in British Columbia.

—gave evidence as being opposed to flooding High Arrow dam, and things of that sort. That was very convincing to some people.

Would the minister say in view of the experience the government has gained since that time, that the government's representatives were wrong on that occasion in promoting the Kaiser dam?

Mr. Williston replied:

No, I would not say they were wrong. I would say that in any given set of circumstances in which you make a decision, you take the circumstances which are before you at the time and make a decision accordingly; and that the circumstances which were before the committee, the group, and the government of the day, were such that I support the decision and I think they made the right decision at the time.

Mr. Herridge: They said it was the best way to develop the Columbia river at that time.

Mr. Williston: And that is right, at that time.

Mr. Herridge: What has caused you to change your opinion?

Mr. Williston: Ten years and a profoundly different attitude on the part of the United States as a whole in their willingness to commence negotiations on the jointly beneficial projects for the river.

The following appears at page 336 of volume 6:

Mr. Williston: I state most positively that the treaty we have succeeded in negotiating is the best possible treaty that could have been negotiated under the present circumstances. I will go further than that and say that it is a better treaty than I thought we were going to be able to negotiate as time passed.

Is not that a contradiction of Mr. Bennett's recent statement blaming the federal government in his matter because they signed the treaty too hurriedly? Of course, Mr. Bennett is referring to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) who we admit is not a well known engineer in Canada, although he is quite well known as a military man. He is honorary colonel of a regiment, but I do not think he would pretend to be an engineer and he had to take the advice of the engineers in Ottawa.

Later we were told we would have no opportunity to change the treaty in any way; we were simply there to hear witnesses, make a report to the house and could not change the treaty in any form whatsoever. Then further consideration was given to this matter in view of the excessive costs. After hearing Premier Bennett's statement with respect to the haste of the federal government, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Pepin) the following question as reported in Hansard of May 12, 1967, at page 132:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in very appropriate circumstances.

The appropriate circumstances were that United States senators were seated in the gallery and were, of course, very interested in this question. I know that Senator Aitken was interested in it. I asked:

In view of the definite reports that expenditures under the Columbia river treaty will exceed the amount received by the government of British Columbia by over $200 million, will the minister consider referring this treaty to the appropriate committee so it can be examined again and the committee can hear officials as well as persons who would like to make representations?

This is the reply of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources:

This matter has now become the exclusive responsibility of the government of British Columbia. Only last week I was assured that that government could take care of the situation without help from anybody. I would add that because of the fact that some of these dams will be completed earlier than the date foreseen in the agreement, there will be added benefits which will help compensate for some of the increased costs.

That was the minister's hope. I went on to ask a supplementary question as follows:

May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister realize that this treaty was strongly recommended to the committee by the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

I ask, Mr. Speaker: Can the minister say that the federal government has no further responsibility? First, what about the responsibility of the federal government, with the United States, to make certain that the treaty is implemented? The government has this solemn obligation as a result of its signature. What about the millions of dollars spent by the federal government because of the financial arrangements, the loss of exchange and things of that sort? What about the annual cost of the Canadian members on the Columbia joint engineering board?

I think it is completely absurd for the minister to suggest that the federal government has no further responsibility in respect to this treaty. After all the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs before the external affairs committee on this issue, and regardless of Canada's commitment in the treaty to make certain that its provisions are carried out by the government of British Columbia, the minister states that this matter has now become the exclusive responsibility of the government of British Columbia. I think the government has a definite responsibility in this regard and I am sure this can be proven to the satisfaction of anyone.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are perhaps becoming impatient. Before concluding I want to deal with the question of air and water pollution, which is of great concern to many organizations in this country, which I will not name at this time. This matter was raised at the resources for tomorrow conference held in Montreal in 1961, largely out of recognition of the fact that more needed to be done in the public development of national resources and that any bold steps would require a new approach to federal-provincial and interprovincial relations in this area.

As a result of the national conference on pollution and the environment held at the end of last year, certain guide lines were laid down. I have not time to deal with them now. But this is a matter of urgent concern when we consider the condition of the waters in eastern Canada, some of the waters in western Canada, and in a few cases in British Columbia.

The tone of the entire conference was that solutions must be sought within existing governmental frameworks. In my opinion the federal government should take a strong lead on this question of water and air pollution and the public must be sufficiently aroused about the chronic hazards that prevail to get participation and co-operation from all levels of government, farmers organizations, labour organizations, wildlife groups, women's organizations and all those interested.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few proposals: First of all, that the Columbia river treaty be brought before an appropriate committee for study and the hearing of witnesses who are competent to deal with all aspects of the treaty, and have expressed their willingness to attend. There are a good number of them. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs should work to obtain more compensation for British Columbia on account of the unexpected increase in power being produced at Grand Coulee, and any other increased costs.

We trust the government will soon introduce legislation with respect to natural resources and particularly the proposed new Canada water act. There is a widespread demand for this government to establish a national water policy. If we place any value on the needs of future generations, we must be prepared to provide the funds to undertake a well planned program, in co-operation with the provinces, to deal with water and air pollution in Canada.

How are we going to meet the increased expenditure on the conservation and development of our human and natural resources?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member as his time as expired.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I only require a minute or two to conclude my most cryptic remarks, and I realize that this is a vast topic to deal with in such a short time.

These costs are divided into two categories, those required to carry on the housekeeping expenses of protecting our human and natural resources in Canada—administrative costs from day to day—and those requiring investment of social capital in both instances.

We must be prepared, if we support these programs, to support any increase in taxation required to carry on the day to day administration of legislation related to the conservation and development of both our human and natural resources. In respect of current expenditures I suggest we could save possibly $500 million by withdrawing our troops from NATO and discontinuing our NORAD agreement.

So far as social capital investment is concerned, I suggest we use the Bank of Canada to a greater extent. This will give us a great opportunity also to use the Canada development fund. We could provide grants to municipalities for social investment to meet pollution problems, and tax incentives to industries which will co-operate with all levels of government in order to deal with water and air pollution. Let us learn from our mistakes by taking action now to protect Canada's natural resources from this time on.

[Translation]

Mr. René Émard (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, Canada is confronted with many economic problems; the methods of production are developing rapidly; our government must appropriate a greater share of its budget to the implementation of welfare measures. We live in a capitalistic system whose philosophy is outdated, and nobody seems to want to reconsider it. However, that study has already been made and I am a little surprised to see that it has not been a subject for study in this parliament.

It has appeared in two books entitled: Le Manifeste capitaliste and The New Capitalists of Louis-O. Kelso and Mortimer J. Adler. The New Capitalist has not yet been translated in French.

Several influential businessmen have popularized those theories and I think that their suggestions could be useful, to us also from the province of Quebec.

The Manifeste capitalist sets out the doctrinal and economic meaning of the basic principles of a just theory on capitalism, as conceived by the authors, Messrs. Kelso and Adler, and which leads to nothing less than a capitalist revolution.

Democracy in its political form cannot exist unless certain economic conditions are ideal for freedom and equality for all. Men cannot enjoy freedom in the political sphere if they are deprived of it in the economic sphere.

According to the authors, if the defenders of capitalism have shown that communism was the enemy of political freedom and equality, they have offered no practical program for a classless society based upon economic equality. They have not met the challenge of the communist revolution in suggesting a capitalist revolution which, by applying the true principles of capitalism, would establish the economic democracy we need as a basis for the political democracy.

According to Mr. Kelso's theory, capitalism, developing according to its very principles and without admixture of socialism, could create a free and classless society on which political democracy could be based and through which the institutions of a free society could be preserved.

This concept of capitalism is the only alternative to communism, for our partly socialist capitalism is an unstable mixture of principles. Provided one has some sense of justice or attachment to the democratic idea, one could not wish to revert to primitive socialism, according to Mr. Adler.

No mind with any sense of the scientific and industrial revolution which is hardly beginning and which will have transformed our society within one hundred years, could consider our partly capitalist and partly socialist economic system as a system capable of staying in balance between these two opposing forces.

One of these two forces is socialization and the reduction of rights of capital ownership. The other is the effort to preserve the traces of rights of capital ownership. If one gives in to the first of these forces, one is led to the socialist and the communist revolution. If the other force is accepted through the development of the full potential of the rights of private ownership of capital and through the establishment of a harmonious relationship between these rights and the principles of economic justice, one is led to the ideal situation which will be the result of the capitalist revolution.

The author believes that the capitalist revolution will bring to all men liberty as well as equality. It will make economic activity dependant upon political activity, and it will give the control of material riches to the government of man.

The capitalist manifesto does not proceed from a revolutionary party whose self-imposed duty is to overthrow the existing order. Quite to the contrary, its aim is to emphasize, in the present economic system, the reasons required to give it a new life and to find the basis of a better society wished by all.

Mr. Kelso wishes for a revolution within capitalism, because according to him, even though no baleful darkness is sweeping down upon America, all forms of socialism are coming in through the back door.

The author is wishing for a capitalist revolution and explains that unadulterated capitalism, that is, capitalism untinged with socialism, is the only economic system consistent with a democracy. Finally, he attempts to prove that we are very far from having such an economic system and that we do not have yet a clear concept of what that system should be. What is praised under the name of "capitalism of the people" is a mixture of capitalism and socialism. If the phenomenon of socialization continues to gain ground with the considerable technological improvements which have now become possible, we will move ever closer to socialism, that is state socialism. Nothing can stop that movement forward unless it is a capitalist revolution.

That revolution is justified by the author in these terms, and I quote:

> Industrial economy, that is capitalism, will always exist in one form or another. The industrial production of wealth is an established fact in our economy. The same goes for the disappearance of classes in our society. What we may chose is the form these events will take. For we have a choice.

The totalitarian state, with its population of puppets, writes Mr. Kelso, is not the unavoidable form which a classless society can take, not any more than state capitalism is the unavoidable form that the industrial economy must adopt.

Having stated that capitalism must exist, the author adds that we must choose between three, and only three, solutions. But the choice boils down, in fact, to two possibilities, since it is quite unlikely that the people of the free world would want to exchange their way of life for that of Soviet Russia.

We can decide to perpetuate the mixed capitalism we created in the last twenty-five years, hoping that it will last in spite of the dangers inherent in it, or else we can get rid of the contradictory elements of that socialized economic system which slowly push it towards state capitalism. The principles of justice which would contribute to the development of pure capitalism would take their place. In other words, we must choose between the status quo and the capitalist revolution.

The need for a capitalist revolution should be obvious to all those who understand the principle of a just economy and who see that the constitution of such capitalist economy is essential to economic freedom and political democracy.

According to Mr. Kelso, it is right and unquestionable to say that capitalism is our only alternative. Such affirmation would be purely academic if a practical scheme could not be applied to arrive at the expected results. The idea that capitalism is the only appropriate structure for an industrial economy and the economic counterpart of democracy, deserves the sustained attention of the public only to the extent that academic truth can be matched with a practical scheme.

In his book, Mr. Kelso emphasizes in particular the measures intended to encourage a greater participation of the individual in capital investments. To the profit-sharing method which is widespread, according to him, the various and most universal pension plans in effect today must be added.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR BAN ON USE OF HIGHLY INFLAMMABLE FUEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, April 21, and again on Wednesday, May 10, I put the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill):

> In view of the request of the International Transport Workers Federation that jet air lines be prohibited from using JP4 because of the high inflammability of this fuel, is the minister considering taking steps to ban the use of this fuel by Canadian air lines?

In reply to my question, when I asked it on May 10, the Minister of Transport said that consideration was not being given to my request because, as he said, the opinion contained in my question was not supported by such scientific evidence as was available. I put the question down for one of these late shows because of the considerable public interest that I find there is in it, and because I felt a more extensive statement would be desirable.

Everyone knows that the efficiency of our air lines is at a very high level, and yet there are times when accidents do take place. When they do occur, there are occasions when the most serious result is from the fire that follows a crash. As I understand it, those who are interested in this matter feel that the possibility of such fires could be reduced if the fuel used by jet airliners were of lower inflammability than is the case with JP4, which I understand is used in Canada and is certainly used by our own air line, Air Canada.

The International Transport Workers Federation, to which I have referred in my question, set up a special committee to study this matter. That committee reported that JP4, which is 8 per cent cheaper than the paraffin used by most air lines, is far more dangerous, due to its high inflammability. I understand that only four of the world's airlines use it at present, namely Air Canada, KLM, Sabena and Japan Airlines. I also understand that the use of JP4 has been banned in at least some countries.

The Minister of Transport referred the other day to scientific evidence. In other words I gather the matter has been given some study. But such evidence as I have indicates that the men who fly the planes, as represented by the study and the thinking of their organizations, are concerned.

I am sure that we all share with them the desire that the danger of fire following the crash of an airplane might be reduced to as low a point as possible. If the fuel that is being used by Air Canada today is less expensive than some other fuel, while one would hesitate to object to any attempt to economize, if by using a less expensive fuel we are running a greater risk, then it seems to me this is a poor policy. If there is any possibility at all of reducing this kind of risk, we should be all for it, and I hope that the parliamentary scretary who is going to answer for the minister tonight will indicate that this whole question will be given further study.

If there were any way to do so I should like to transfer the rest of my time to my colleague, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir), who has a very important question. But I know that I cannot do that. I trust I may now anticipate a hopeful answer from my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to express through you to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the regrets of the Minister of Transport on his inability to be here tonight to answer this important question.

The answer to the question as to whether the government is considering banning the use of JP4 fuel can be put very simply. The brief answer is no. JP4 fuel, however, is frequently under study. There were extensive studies made right after the war into the inflammability of this jet engine fuel and its vulnerability in terms of explosiveness during crashes and incidents of that kind. It was decided then, and it has been decided on subsequent occasions, when the explosive nature of these alternative fuels has been under study, that JP4 fuel is as safe as any alternative fuel that can be used for jet engine purposes.

I have personally made a few inquiries this evening about the use of JP4 fuel. I was told that a number of air lines, in fact the majority of world airlines, use JP4 fuel. Under certain conditions it is safer than parafin, basically kerosene, which is used by some of the other air lines. On other occasions it is less safe. However, it is the total range of conditions which must be considered, particularly conditions under which jet aircraft fly in this country. In other words this situation has been reviewed carefully. It is being reviewed from time to time and will be reviewed again as new fuels are developed and as circumstances change.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—INCLUSION OF ADDITIONAL SERVICES UNDER PROVINCIAL PLANS

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): On April 19, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen) gave an answer to an hon. member on orders of the day with regard to additional health services. I am very pleased that the minister has done me the honour this evening of staying here for the late show to give me a further answer. The question the hon. gentleman asked was, in effect, what procedure is going to be used in providing additional health services by the provinces to the national health plan. In his reply the minister said, in part:

> The method of adding further health services to the health plan has been set out in the bill. The attitude the government of Canada took at the conference—

That is the conference between provincial and federal authorities.

> —was that when a consensus developed amongst the provinces as to the importance of further services, the government would consider adding those services to the plan.

His answer is a little longer than that, but that is the relevant part of it. Now, I believe we should take a look at the relevant clause in the bill. The minister will find there is nothing in that clause relating to a consensus of the provinces before further services can be added to the health plan. As a matter of fact, the relevant clause in the bill reads in part as follows:

> In the application of this act to a plan established by an act of the legislature of a province, any health service of a kind prescribed by the minister to be required health services rendered by a person lawfully entitled to render such services . . . under such terms and conditions as may be specified by the governor in council—

As you will see, there is no reference there to a consensus and the reference is to the province, in the singular. It is evident that a single province may, under an act of its legislature and of course in agreement with the minister and the governor in council, add any additional service.

During committee study of this bill many opposition members asked the minister as to whether any single province could set up additional health services. There are too many questions of this sort to name this evening those who posed them, but as an example of the kind of question that was asked I would refer the minister to page 10765 of Hansard for December 6, 1966. An hon. member said:

> I take it this means that the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, can extend paramedical services in a plan in a particular province even though other provinces have not asked for a similar extension. In other words, the minister would be free, under this amendment, to accede to the request of a particular province that wanted to add to the services which are provided under this legislation, and it would not have to wait until a majority or a specified number of provinces, indicated their desire to have these paramedical services included.

He ends by saying:

> I hope the minister's interpretation is the same as my own, namely that any province will be able to go ahead with providing additional services, provided of course that the minister and the governor in council agree.

We in the opposition who supported an amendment on the strength of the minister's statement that any one of a number of provinces could make available additional health services are deeply concerned at the apparent reversal of government policy and the stand taken by the minister. We would expect the minister to reaffirm the undertaking that he gave to the committee at that time, that a general consensus of the provinces is not necessary to initiate additional health services.

I hope that the minister in his reply this evening will not repudiate the commitment that he made during the discussion of the bill, a commitment that was accepted in good faith by all members of the house. When the vote on an amendment to clause 4 (3), which is the relevant amendment, was taken it was supported by all members of the house, I think mainly because of the commitment that was made.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are really two aspects to the question raised by the hon. member. The first has to do with the amendment, which is a matter of law. It is a fact that the governor in council would have the authority under the amendment to make available additional services, and to make such services shareable under the medical care act, even if a single province added such a service to its provincial plan. That is a correct interpretation, and in my reply to the question that had been put in committee, which asked whether the government would be free under this amendment to accept additional services if provided by a single province only, I said it would, and that is the case. That is the question of law.

The policy has been unchanged from the beginning. It was set forth first by the Prime Minister, that any province on its own was free to add further services—and can still do so—but without any sharing feature. The Prime Minister went on to say that when a consensus developed among the provinces for the inclusion under the medical care program of any additional services, the government was prepared to consider any extensions. I made that clear in the course of the debate. I recall that I stated that the only recommendation that I expected to make and that I would make under the amendment that had been passed was with respect to certain surgical procedures performed in hospitals by dental surgeons.

My hon. friend's interpretation of the law is quite correct. I confirmed in committee that that capacity is conferred on the governor in council. The question of policy has to do with consensus. When a consensus develops among the provinces for the addition of further services, they will be considered by the government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—QUEBEC—COMPLAINTS OF PROPERTY DAMAGE CAUSED BY AIRCRAFT

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with the question I asked the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), namely whether the minister was aware of the many complaints made against the military manoeuvres going on at the Bagotville military base, during which airplanes break the sound barrier, thus causing real damage on farms and even in the cities. Everyone wonders why the Department of National Defence selected that part of the country to give free rein to the wild antics of certain pilots. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Lake St. John area, which is 80 per cent agricultural, was once very peaceful, and farmers lived there under a glorious sun.

Since the government established this notorious Bagotville base, the people, apart from living under a heap of clouds, are possessed with fear on account of the hedge-hopping supersonic aircraft. Those planes startle dairy cows to the point of causing losses to their owners. The flyers' madness is such that they break the sound barrier, shattering windows all around.

Mr. Speaker, I suffered myself from that since the window panes in my store were shattered to pieces, which caused a great deal of damage.

You may say that we can lodge complaints, but just wait and see. As a matter of fact, once we are through answering their questions, they always find some way or another to tell us that the air force is not to blame and that the flyers never broke the sound barrier at such an hour, such a minute and such a second.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we have numerous proofs of that and so as to give you an example I brought here a letter from a good farmer, it may not be written in perfect French, but I want to read it just the same, to show that what I am saying is true.

I hereby take the liberty of writing to you about something which aggrieves us in the Lake St. John area. There are thousands of us in the same boat. This is due to the fact that the jet planes from Bagotville fly over the region of Roberval making an infernal noise by flying at times at altitudes of 800 feet. When they exceed the speed of sound, there is such an explosion that the earth shakes, windows break, and livestock are so frightened that they pile up in corners, in pigsties, in hen-houses. We lose animals every day. Everybody is nervous and we are sick and tired of those infernal machines; we ask the hon. minister concerned to kindly do something about it.

Mr. Speaker, I see that the minister concerned is not here but we do have the honour of having with us the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacEachen), and I believe that this is also important from the point of view of health.

I wonder whether we will be forced to put up much longer with the actions of these lunatics who play with million-dollar toys paid with farmers' taxes.

There should be enough space in the uninhabited territories in northern Quebec to leave alone a farming area as the Lake St. John valley.

And what about the nuclear bombs and warheads which the government stored in Bagotville, despite the farmers' protests.

I, therefore, ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, since the Minister of National Defence is not here and does not want to bother about it, to try to do something for the public health and free us from this nightmare which is the bane of our farmers.

[English]

• (10:20 p.m.)

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I regret that the Minister of National Defence is unavoidably absent this evening, but I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval. I should like to reply to his question by saying that it is the practice of the Department of National Defence to conduct military manoeuvres away from the populated areas of Canada.

According to the information I have received, there has been no over-all increase in flying training exercises carried out from the Canadian Forces base at Bagotville. Both the authorities at Canadian Forces headquarters and the authorities at Canadian Forces base, Bagotville are unaware of any recent complaints from civilians in that area. Any complaints from the civilian population in the area receive the personal attention of the commanding officer of the base. Additionally, Canadian Forces headquarters is informed by a message and a letter outlining the complaint and the action that is proposed to be taken by base authorities.

I would suggest that the hon. member, who has given details with regard to incidents in the area, might pursue the matter by direct contact with the commanding officer. Undoubtedly the Minister of National Defence will be examining the reports made and undoubtedly he will take some action.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 19, 1967

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRADE

MEETING IN MONTREAL OF U.S.-CANADA MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the joint Canada-United States ministerial committee on trade and economic affairs which was established in November, 1953 normally meets every year, alternately in Canada and the United States. It has now been agreed that the committee, which held its last meeting in Washington on March 4, 1966, will meet again from June 20 to June 22 in Montreal. The United States representatives will be the guests of the Canadian government at Expo '67 on June 20.

The Canadian delegation is chaired by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) and normally includes the Ministers of Trade and Commerce, Finance, Industry, Energy, Mines and Resources, and Agriculture. The United States delegation is normally led by the Secretary of State and generally includes the Secretaries of the Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce and the Interior.

As in the past this meeting will provide a valuable opportunity for ministers of both countries to review economic and trade questions of common interest and concern. Canadian ministers look forward to welcoming their United States colleagues to Montreal at Expo '67 and to having useful discussions with them.

• (11:10 a.m.)

Mr. Pilon moved that the report be concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I believe that a 48 hour notice or the unanimous consent of the house is required to move for concurrence in this committee report.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member allow me to read the motion? Mr. Pilon, seconded by Mr. Choquette, moves:

That the first report received today from the special committee appointed May 8, 1967 to prepare and report lists of members to compose the standing committees of the house be concurred in now.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I think that in the circumstances, a 48 hour notice is required for concurrence in the motion. Now, we have not even seen the report. We are being presented the committee report with the list of committee members. I do not know who are the members of the committee, we have not been consulted and we know nothing about that report.

You will remember probably that, last year, two hon. members were discriminated against by the government, since they sat on no committee, while other hon. members were on five or six committees at the same time. Under the circumstances, I think that there should be a notice of 48 hours so that we may check those lists and know if, this year again, the government has decided to put the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Allard) and myself, as it did last year, on a black list. I think that unanimous consent is necessary but I am not prepared to give it. I shall request a 48-hour notice.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to be unable to agree with the hon. member for Lapointe. The motion of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) was moved under standing order No. 65 and it does not require a 48-hour notice, as referred to by the hon. member.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, would it be possible at least to know the content of the motion? The list of committee members has not even been read, and I suggest it would be well to read at least—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has the right to vote against the motion.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask at least that the motion be read in full, with the list of all committee members?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The motion put forward by the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville has been read in full. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Grégoire: No.

Mr. Speaker: On division.

[English]

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. Pilon moved:

That messages be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses with respect to the library of parliament, the parliamentary restaurant and the printing of parliament, and that the members to serve on each of the said committees on the part of this house will be as contained in the first report of the special committee presented this day.

Motion agreed to.

PRODUCTS WEIGHTS AND PRICES

PROVISION FOR INDICATION ON AFFIXED LABEL

Mr. Patrick-T. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-116, concerning the weight and price of products.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—OPPORTUNITY FOR EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN VIEWPOINT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister whether he would give consideration to providing an opportunity at once for the introduction in this house of a resolution regarding the Viet Nam situation, and in particular whether such a resolution would call upon the United States to discontinue bombing or, if not, to restrict it to communication roads.

Since yesterday the report is that for the first time in the demilitarized zone there has been warfare, or warfare is expected, because of the presence of both North Vietnamese and the Americans in that area. This adds a very sobering thought as to the possibilities which may arise through escalation of this type.

In view of the further serious developments in that area in the last 24 hours and the necessity of something being done by Canada to make clear the viewpoint held by the elected representatives in parliament, would the Prime Minister not now give an assurance that provision will be made for debate on such a resolution to bring clearly to the notice of the United States and the world our view on such matters before it may become too late?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Consideration of the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman yesterday is not yet completed. When it is, I shall be glad to make an announcement to the house at as early a date as possible.

As far as the reference to the demilitarized zone is concerned, it is well known, of course, that the neutrality of that zone has been violated more than once over the years. It has also been stated by this government and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, specifically I think on April 11, that we would consider it regrettable if that zone were used as a base for operations by troops of either side, and we would certainly regret any escalation either by the United States or by the other side in that direction.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In asking my supplementary question may I support as strongly as I can the request which has been made by the Leader of the Opposition. We hope the government will agree to it. In the meantime, while the government is considering this matter, may I ask whether any information has been received from the Canadian representatives on the international control commission with regard to the reported bombing in the demilitarized zone, and whether the Canadian government is re-stating its opposition to this course of action?

Mr. Pearson: I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a report yesterday on this matter. We have more than once expressed as a government our opposition to the violation of the demilitarized zone which has been going on now for a great many months, indeed I think for more than a year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But not to the present extent.

EXTERNAL AID

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN WORLD BANK LOAN TO PAKISTAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

A few days ago I put a question to him about the slave camps that apparently exist in Pakistan; I should like to know whether the minister is in a position today to tell us what role Canada is playing at this time in this matter?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to reply to the question asked two days ago by my friend the hon. member for Villeneuve, and I may say that the President of Pakistan and the Governor of Western Pakistan have both given the assurance that they are taking measures to settle this situation; Canada has given Pakistan assurances of our interest. We are convinced that the government, particularly the President, is taking all the necessary measures.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

RECOMMENDATION BY TAXATION COMMISSION RESPECTING DEPLETION ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the recommendation by the Carter commission that the depletion allowances in the oil and mining industries be terminated, and the uncertainty caused to these industries by this overhanging recommendation, does the minister intend to advise the house and the country in the near future of the government's intention in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making any statement about depletion allowances until the government brings forward its proposals, which I hope will be before the end of this year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the concern which I believe is felt by all members of the house, and I hope by all people throughout the world, regarding developments in the Middle East between the U.A.R. and Israel, I would ask the minister to bring the house up to date on this most important major matter, with respect to Canada and the United States wanting to retain the peace keeping forces and their withdrawing by U Thant, and the position respecting a council meeting. This is of such major importance that I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs can bring the house up to date as much as possible on this question and on his responsibilities.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. gentleman that developments as the result of a decision by the government of the United Arab Republic and the consequential action of the Secretary General do create a situation that should engage our serious attention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the understatement of the year.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The member nations of the peace keeping force yesterday met with the Secretary General of the United Nations for the second time. He informed them that as the result of a demand made on the commander of the force by the foreign minister of the U.A.R. he had no alternative but to accept the demand that the United Nations emergency force withdraw and that it vacate U.A.R. territory.

At this meeting the ambassador of Canada pointed out that it was the view of the Canadian government that such a decision could only be taken by the security council or the general assembly, and in this case by the general assembly since the force had been established by that body. However, all members contributing to the force did not and do not share this juridical interpretation of the assembly's authority.

It may be recalled that not only did the present Prime Minister, as secretary of state for external affairs in 1957, establish the government's position that the authority of the assembly was required before the force could be disbanded, but this position likewise was taken by the government of my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition in June of 1967, when the Canadian ambassador informed the then secretary general that there could be no withdrawal of the force except on the authority of the general assembly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In June of 1960, when Ambassador Ritchie went to the then secretary general, Dag Hammarskjold, and informed him that the Canadian government could not agree that there should be any withdrawal of the force without the authority of the general assembly.

The Canadian ambassador to the United Nations will be seeing the Secretary General today at noon. I would hope there would be a meeting of the security council as quickly as possible, when this body might take into account the serious situation which has developed. Yesterday I had a talk with the United Arab Republic ambassador, who informed me of the decision of his government. I in turn indicated what was our view as to the authority of the general assembly. Likewise I saw the ambassador of Israel. Before there was a formal indication by the Secretary General that the force had been disbanded I made the suggestion that Israel might give consideration to inviting the force to occupy its territory so the force might continue in being.

In any event, consultations are continuing among the governments concerned at the United Nations and in Ottawa as well as in other capitals. The situation I believe is one which must be scrutinized with the greatest care. The situation now is that the forces of the U.A.R. are occupying the posts along the armistice line formerly occupied by the United Nations patrol which carried on surveillance along the armistice line of 175 miles. So the U.A.R. and Israeli forces now are confronting one another.

In this situation I would hope that all countries concerned would exercise the greatest moderation, particularly in view of the fact that the Secretary General, supported by some countries members of the United Nations force, has taken the position that the force now is no longer in being. The Secretary General will report to the United Nations general assembly today on the action he has taken. There will be an opportunity, of course, for the Canadian government and others to state their position about the withdrawal of the force which, however now regrettably must be regarded as officially disbanded.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I appreciate the remarks of the minister in trying to give us information, but in view of the fact that everything now is somewhat indecisive and that we face certain eventualities, may I ask the minister whether plans have been laid down by the Department of National Defence, because it is governed by external affairs policy, for a means to withdraw our 800-man Canadian force from the Gaza strip.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the Minister of National Defence said yesterday, there are contingency plans and the Department of National Defence now is examining those plans. It must be noted, however, that the force still is physically intact, mainly in or near the Gaza strip. The force commander continues to exercise authority over the force. I can only say that we are taking note of this fact. In particular we will emphasize to the Secretary General today the fact that the force is physically intact and could be used if the parties were willing to give the kind of assurance which existed prior to the action taken yesterday, when it was announced that the force no longer was officially in being.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs might clarify one point. When he made his reply to the initial question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East he said, as I understood it, that the other members or most other members of the group of nations supplying troops to the emergency force agreed that the Secretary General and not the general assembly should make the decision concerning whether the force was still in being.

I am not sure whether the minister has said this, but did this group which felt the decision should be left to the Secretary General feel that the security council itself could override the decision of the Secretary General? In other words, is not this decision up to the security council? Second, would the Secretary General—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, particularly after the rather lengthy statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I suggest to hon. members that we return to the question period.

Mr. Nesbitt: Well, with great respect, Your Honour, this is a pretty important matter.

Mr. Speaker: My only suggestion to the hon. member was that he ask his question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Very well, Your Honour. Did those of the group of nations which supplies troops to UNEF who did not agree with the Canadian point of view, agree that the security council and not the Secretary General should be able to make the decision as to whether UNEF should remain in existence? Second, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs recommend that an emergency meeting of the general assembly be held, in view of the position taken by the Secretary General?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The general assembly is now in session, Mr. Speaker. Two countries took the position that they would support the U.A.R. demand for withdrawal of the forces and indicated that in their judgment the Secretary General had the necessary authority. They based this position on an agreement between President Nasser and Mr. Dag Hammarskjold.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which are the two countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They are India and Yugoslavia. The Canadian position was stated in the terms I indicated. I might say these are terms which are supported by a number of other countries contributing forces, as well as some that do not.

Let me say simply this. As the member for Vancouver East pointed out, this is a matter of the greatest concern, and it will be a matter of great regret, I am sure to everyone in this house and to Canada, to see the United Nations emergency force disbanded. This is a force that for over 12 years has maintained the peace in this particular area of the Middle East. This will be a matter of the greatest regret, because we recall with pride that this force was set up as a result of the initiative, action and imagination of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After that political speech surely some observations can be made about it. This suggestion was made by Right Hon. Anthony Eden in his speech. The day following the Prime Minister, who was then Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada, brought the matter before the assembly. That is the historical record, not the rewritten record of the Liberal party. The minister called forth that observation because of his gratuitous statement.

I should like to ask the minister, in view of his wide international experience and the strong feelings he has expressed about the necessity of maintaining the United Nations peace keeping force, does he not consider that his presence in New York would be of importance? Canada is a member of the security council, and the minister could be there with his wide knowledge and dedication to the principles of peace keeping to argue this case with all the emphasis he has shown today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, let me say to the right hon. gentleman that in making the observation which he said was gratuitous I was not seeking in any way to engage in any partisan observation. I hope my right hon. friend will believe me when I say this, because this matter is too serious for my intentions to be otherwise. I thought it was a matter of record that the initiative for this course had been taken by Canada. This does not mean other countries did not make a contribution. I mentioned the contribution made by the Prime Minister to indicate how very strongly Canadians feel about the consequences of yesterday's action and its implication regarding the whole concept of peace keeping by an organization to which this country dedicates so much of its foreign policy. I would have hoped, and I am not saying this by way of censure of my right hon. friend, that in a matter of this sort he would fully agree with what I said.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

As to my going to the United Nations, that possibility has been examined and it is still possible that I will do so today. We have an ambassador there with great experience in the person of Mr. Ignatieff. He served as deputy to General McNaughton when the latter was a member of the security council. We have the fullest confidence in the way Mr. Ignatieff is handling this matter. However, we will wait to see how events evolve during the course of the day. Let me assure my right hon. friend that a great deal can be done in respect of this matter here in Ottawa with representatives of other countries, and that is what we were engaged in doing yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But not very successfully.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My right hon. friend says not very successfully, and I regret that we were not successful. I am sure the right hon. gentleman would be the last to attribute any action on the part of Canada as causing the regrettable situation which has developed in the Middle East.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, let me say to the minister that no one could be a better representative in New York than he and that is why I suggested he go. Apparently he does not feel he is in that position. All I can say is that if I did offer him a eulogy he does not appreciate, I withdraw it.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the withdrawal of the Canadian troops now in the Gaza strip will be part of the general United Nations withdrawal there, or will it be a Canadian operation carried out with Canadian aircraft and equipment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the Canadian Department of National Defence has its own contingency plans, which I am sure will be synchronized with those of the whole force. Of course this does not apply to the United Nations truce supervisory organization, which will continue to carry out its obligations and may even play a part in this situation.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand from what the minister has said that the withdrawal of the Canadian troops will be essentially a Canadian operation carried out with Canadian planes and so forth, and that he hopes this will be co-ordinated with the withdrawal of other UN forces there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Despite the technical disbandment of UNEF, will the Canadian government consider keeping the Canadian troops who are part of this force in the Middle East in case the United Nations makes a decision which might require their presence there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I said a moment ago, the whole force is now in or near the Gaza strip except for a small group which is so far as I know still located at the point in the gulf of Aqaba used by Israel to enter the Red sea. The plans for the removal of this force at any particular moment are not known now. We shall have to wait to see what happens today before we can draw any final conclusions as to the ultimate disposal of the force.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister in respect of his suggestion that the locale of the UNEF be moved to Israel, whether he is yet in a position to indicate any response by the government of that state to that very interesting suggestion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not as yet, sir.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a supplementary question. In the event that the present negotiations regarding the Secretary General's decision do not work out satisfactorily, will the Canadian government make an attempt to refer the whole matter to the general assembly for decision?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, when the general assembly deals with this question the Canadian ambassador has been instructed to state the Canadian position, as he did yesterday at the meeting of the contributors. It may also be necessary to do that today if there is a meeting of the security council.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, because of the serious implications for Canada and peace keeping forces elsewhere in the world under United Nations auspices, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Secretary General of the United Nations has taken a similar position with respect to the Cyprus force. I ask whether the position he has taken is such that he would say he could order the disbanding of the Cyprus force. Have there been any discussions in this regard, and what is the position there?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There will be discussions on that very point. As I said, the Canadian ambassador has been instructed to see the Secretary General and an appointment has been arranged for noon today, when that and other questions will certainly be discussed. In fairness to the Secretary General, whose difficulties in this matter I appreciate, he has acted on the basis of the agreement with President Nasser and the then secretary general, Dag Hammarskjold, an agreement which in substance provided that the agreement by Egypt to the establishment of the force in no way violated its sovereignty. That agreement, which was circulated in the United Nations, must be read, however, with the resolution of the United Nations which set up the force.

Mr. Fulton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the situation with regard to Cyprus parallel to this situation? Was there a similar agreement by Turkey and Greece, or either of them, and could this be used in the same way as it has been attempted to use the Arab agreement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, certainly the consent of the government of Cyprus had to be obtained, and was obtained, before the force was established. I know of no agreement, however, along the lines of that which exists between the President of the United Arab Republic and the then secretary general.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. If the assumption that is put forward by nations other than Canada is correct, namely that the UN peace keeping role can be abandoned by any affected member, what will happen to this government's defence policy, which seems to be based strictly on a peace keeping role?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It would appear that this particular question is argumentative.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, it may be an argumentative question in that the minister may have difficulty answering it, but it is asked in a serious manner.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Queens.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, my question has already been asked, but perhaps I might be allowed to remark that I think it is a pity the answers of the Secretary of State for External Affairs could not have been run through a condenser instead of through an amplifier.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I had a question that I wanted to ask the Minister of Labour. Perhaps in his absence you would allow it to be taken as notice by the minister's parliamentary secretary. Having in mind the increase in the number of unemployed in Canada, which I believe is 67,000 more than it was last year at this time, would the minister consider making an early statement to the house on the situation?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be glad to take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

ALLEGED REMOVAL OF QUEEN'S PICTURE FROM CARAVAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, and ask whether he would kindly make inquiries as to why the Queen's picture has been removed from the centennial caravan.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would first have to find out whether it has in fact been removed.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Would he tell us whether he could set up a special inquiry to find out whether it is true that rainmaking machines are operating again in the Saguenay-Lake St. John area and that new machines have been installed in the Ottawa region? Could he tell us also whether he will use his influence to have those machines stopped, at least during Expo?

Mr. Speaker: The question could be put on the order paper.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Don Jamieson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

• (11:50 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Émard (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Mr. Speaker, I should like to continue my comments on the new capitalist doctrine set forth by Kelso and Adler in Le manifeste capitaliste and The New Capitalists.

In his work Kelso dwells particularly on measures to give the individual a greater share of the capital. According to him, to the widely applied profit-sharing system should be added the various pension plans most commonly in use today. He adds that the practice of deducting contributions to various plans, such as profit-sharing plans—and particularly bonuses in the form of shares—from the taxable income could be used to bring about a transition from our mixed economy to pure capitalism. This transition, continues the author, could take place without any change in income tax rates. According to Mr. Kelso's theory, if profit-sharing plans are well conceived, after a few years of work, the worker becomes the owner of a substantial portion of capital. Therefore, these plans will help change our economy into a capitalistic one. If joint stock companies established on a sound basis were obliged to pay to their shareholders all the income created by their capital, profit-sharing plans would become much more effective. In fact, the amounts of money paid to the workers could be used to buy shares in those joint stock companies. According to Mr. Kelso, the concept of profit sharing should not be tied to the idea of retirement as it is now in an economy which is concerned with the idea of full employment. A greater participation in capital ownership, therefore in the production of wealth, will provide the worker with an income which will not only provide him with a livelihood when he stops working, but also which will not make him totally dependent upon his work for his income but more and more dependent upon his income bearing capital.

Another theme developed by Mr. Kelso deals with estates taxes and gifts which in his contention, should be changed to encourage the adoption of capitalism. To that end the following considerations should be kept in mind: the object is for the individual to acquire a capital whose income would be sufficient to provide him with a livelihood. The amount of that capital would be determined by legislation. The rate of taxation should therefore vary according to the wealth of the legatee and not that of the owner. Taxes on estates and donations should be very high when they give the opposite result and increase the concentration of capital.

Half the revenue of the federal government in the United States comes from personal income tax. It would therefore be advisable to find out how tax exemptions could allow certain transfers of capital in such a way as to distribute it more widely among the population. It might be well for those capital transfers to be treated in the same way as charitable contributions are now, with regard to income tax. The distribution of wealth, based on work, in our mixed economy, made it necessary to levy a progressive personal income tax the importance of which has become dangerous. Until the achievement of the capitalist revolution, fiscal exemptions should be granted to bring about capital transfer which would facilitate the distribution of capital and which would be wiser than a reduction of tax rates.

Turning then to the role of the limited company in the transition leading to pure capitalism, Kelso points out that, in an entirely capitalist economy, the distribution of wealth produced would be made according to relative contributions to production made by capital owners and workers. Capital ownership would become real and no longer nominal. The essential truth recognizing that capital, and not work, is now the greatest producer of wealth, would be admitted by everyone.

A limited company is an association of workers whose capacities and various talents are added to the equipment and capital solely in order to create wealth. In a completely capitalist society, the limited companies would only be used to establish capitalism and make it prosper, whereas in mixed capitalism, they are used only to distribute in a charitable manner the created wealth and to destroy the private ownership of capital. To go from mixed capitalism to pure capitalism, limited companies should be reformed and reorganized to achieve the following results. I quote:

1. Re-establish the right of ownership of the shareholder by allowing him to receive all the wealth created by the capital invested in a limited company.

2. Use the present corporation taxes from limited companies to distribute largely the private ownership of capital among the people.

3. Reduce and eventually eliminate corporation taxes levied from limited companies as the economy reaches the balance which must accompany capitalism. The economy will reach that capitalist balance when it reaches the point where the distribution of private capital among all the people is so wide that the wealth produced can be distributed among all the owners of capital.

4. Regulations imposed on limited companies by the government according to the principles of capitalism. Such regulations would aim at encouraging the distribution of private capital ownership to prevent the government itself from owning the capital and to re-establish all the powers of private property.

5. Government regulations imposed on limited companies to enable them to develop to such an extent that they will be able to use the most modern production methods. On the other hand, those same regulations must prevent them from reaching a level hindering free competition on the markets where they operate. In each case, however, the government must make sure, through regulations, that the progressive development of a corporation is accompanied by an increased number of shareholders.

6. Use by the government of all reasonable means in its power to establish capitalism. During the transitory period, the government will have to resort to its regulating powers to balance the distribution of capital and the increased wealth which it has created. The basic principles of those regulations are as follows: protection of property, maintenance of free competition on all markets and responsibility of the government to provide every home with the possibility of sharing in the production, in order to earn a decent living.

The important and essential task which must be achieved by the capitalist revolution seems to be a hard one. Therefore, capital must be divided between all social levels to provide an opportunity for thousands of individuals to become capitalists.

As outlined by this short summary of the capitalist manifesto, Mr. Louis Kelso offered, in his book, a program to bring about the economic changes which are necessary to transform our present mixed economy into a truly capitalist one.

In another book, "The New Capitalist", the author took the theories described in the Second Revenue Plan, applying them to Canada this time.

According to Mr. Kelso, since capital equipment has obviously become the main factor in the production of wealth, the economic system must be revised to spread the ownership of capital equipment to the entire population. Too many of our political leaders, industrialists, economists say we lack the capital to build our country. Many of them add that even if we had the capital, we would not have the guts to use it. But Mr. Kelso feels that we not only have the capacity to produce the required capital, but that we also have the political obligation to do so if we are to remain a strong and independent country.

World capitalism rejects the socialist and classical (non-socialist) theory according to which prosperity can be achieved only by full employment. Such a theory erroneously assumes that the only way man can contribute to production is through his labour. It overlooks the non-human factor of production which is capital and it fails to recognize that capital produces wealth just as labour does, and that capital currently produces the greater part of the total goods and services and that, as technology develops, capital will produce an ever-increasing part in the future. The purpose of pure or universal capitalism is a maximum yield of goods and services with a minimum of labour but with universal participation in production. Participation may come through personal labour or through personal ownership of producing capital, or through both, according to the degree of development of technology or the standard of living being aimed at.

For the author, the word "universal" in the expression "universal capitalism" has the same meaning as in the expression "universal suffrage" and both are closely connected. The political system of universal suffrage has never had an economic equivalent in history. Defective economic institutions have weakened and eliminated the ideals of political democracy and constitutional government, according to Mr. Kelso's conclusions. Our western political heritage has no chance to survive in a nation or in a world where capital is the main source of wealth desired by all but where the majority owns no productive property. Private property, as applied to the factors of production, means that the owner of each factor is entitled to all the wealth or the net yield produced by the property owned.

The practical world in which we are living demands in addition to a theory, practical and efficient means to put theory in action. The second income plan is a practical plan to achieve a universal capitalist economy. An economy capable of producing whealth at the required rate would have to be at least ten times more productive than that now in existence in Canada, according to Mr. Kelso. The purpose of the plan for a second income is therefore to create that new economy.

Under that economy, newly created capital would be owned first of all by the 90 per cent of families which do not have a large income in the present economy. This new economy would be based on means to increase the integrity of the present right to private property in the existing economy. Mr. Kelso states further that such economy will have logic and symmetry, because it builds up the economic power of all families to consume goods, that is the buying power, thanks to two sources of income, at the same time as it builds up industrial capacity to produce goods.

• (12 noon)

The instruments of economic transformation suggested by the author fall under four categories: those relating to legacies and to donations inter vivos, in so far as they are affected by federal and provincial fiscal legislation; those respecting corporative policy; the instruments dealing with the financing of capital ownership for company workers and, finally, those relating to the financing of capital ownership for employees other than those of companies.

The purpose of changes in the fiscal policy affecting real estate and tax legislation on donations should be to encourage donations likely to extend private capital ownership by having it benefit a greater number of people. Those legislative measures should discourage blocking of accumulating the most efficient production factor, capital, in foundations the purpose of which is rather vague or obscure but which are tax exempt.

In such foundations, capital is socialized as efficiently as through state confiscation. With regard to corporations, Kelso makes the three following suggestions:

1. Gradual elimination of corporate income tax. The methods of financing individual capital ownership, through the income produced by capital, are some of the prime instruments for implementing the plan on the second income.

2. Compel gradually well established companies to pay their shareholders the full amount of their gains, after allowing for the cost of depreciation and operating reserves. To withhold income from capital is no more justifiable than to withhold income from work. If capital produces the greater part of our wealth, and if we want to streamline our economic system by allowing the mass to get a secondary income in the form of dividends, the private property of both present and new shareholders must be effective.

3. To provide companies with new sources of financial growth in order to replace internal funds now in use.

If existing capital is used as a warranty in the financing process, then, according to Kelso, there is a better way to achieve the same goal, a method which does not depend on the limits imposed by the savings available for financing the formation of new capital.

This idea is of major importance for the Canadian economy, for it breaks the necessary tie, in conventional finance, between the ownership of existing capital and the right to acquire the ownership of newly constituted capital.

Conventional finance is a method whose results are exactly the contrary of universal capitalism. It is a method of implacable concentration of ownership and of exclusion, from the ownership of capital, of those who do not already possess a substantial amount of money.

On the other hand, the secondary income plan is a method created to allow people, who were born without it, to buy capital, to pay for it with the wealth produced by this capital and, afterwards, to own it and to use it as a source of secondary income.

Finally, Mr. Kelso points out some political advantages of an economic program based upon a second income plan. He says that the tools of that plan are particularly useful at the federal level because their operation is first subject to the control of the monetary system and the credit system which come under the federal government.

That plan is in keeping with the national economic planning, the antitrust policy, the speeding up of economic growth through the simultaneous development of the economic power of the people to consume and their industrial capacity to produce and also with the promotion of industrial peace. At the same time, the purpose of this plan is to maintain among individual citizens a growing economic power resulting from an accelerated industrialization and to extend it throughout the nation. Eventually and ideally, that extension would be universal.

The plan is also intended to reduce drastically and perhaps to remove economic cycles. The Second Revenue Plan will unavoidably show to all Canadians the advantages of a strong Confederation of all provinces. The control of the financial policy by the central government will be strengthened by the opportunity given to all Canadians to hold various stocks from corporations of each province. In addition, by increasing industrial power, economic independence and prestige of the political and economic leadership of Canada, the plan can narrow down the difference between the power of the United States and Canada.

The plan also portends to show that Canada does not need any foreign financial capital, but that all Canadians must have an opportunity to quickly own as many capital goods as possible. It is through an income increase due to the ownership of capital, rather than an artificial wage increase, that Canada could compete favourably with any other nation, including European and Japanese manufacturers for the American market. Mr. Kelso goes on to say that, in fact, Canada could compete with most of United States industries, at least until this country feels compelled to follow the trend and reform its economy.

The second income plan provides Canadians with the tools which could place their economy among the most important in the world, within a few years. Such an economy, built upon simple principles workable and understandable, could be emulated by that of developing countries. Today, concludes Mr. Kelso, there is no similar model for emerging nations.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people lose a lot of time in academic discussions about reforms which never bring any results. The second income plan presents a practical program, and the least we can do would be to study its potentialities.

Mr. L. R. Sherman (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I should like first of all to offer my respects and pay a tribute to a distinguished former member of this assembly, who from 1963 to 1965 represented the seat I now represent of Winnipeg South, serving with great conscience, integrity and distinction. I refer to the late Mrs. Margaret Konantz.

I had the privilege of running against Margaret Konantz in the autumn of 1965, which resulted in the myth that I and those who contributed to my campaign defeated Mrs. Konantz. This is a myth, Mr. Speaker. We may have succeeded in polling a few more votes than Margaret Konantz did, but no member who served with her in this house or in any capacity in the community and in the nation during her lifetime would say that I or anybody else ever defeated Margaret Konantz. Nothing defeated her, sir. She was a public servant with a great sense of responsibility. She was a great Canadian lady and served her constituents in Winnipeg South, of whom I was one, with great distinction. On this occasion I extend my sympathy not only to her family but to the members of the Liberal party, whose colleague she was.

Second, I should like to extend my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté). Their eloquent words have lifted this debate and launched it on a high plane. I for one was distinctly impressed by the debut each of them made. I know what they had to say has had a profound effect on the direction and course this debate has taken, and I think throughout the life of this session and this parliament their remarks will contribute to the over-all calibre and standard of debate and our participation in the affairs of the nation.

I should now like to address myself to two or three areas of Canadian life that I think are worthy of attention as I avail myself of this opportunity to take part in what is in fact a truly historic debate, because this particular throne speech debate is taking place in our one hundredth birthday year which celebrates confederation.

One of the matters I want to talk about is our presence abroad in the world, particularly our presence across the Pacific ocean in Asia, where one and a half billion people or half the population of the world resides. I had the good fortune and opportunity to spend a brief time in Southeast Asia during February and March, 22 days in all, during which my travelling party visited seven countries. For many of us it was our first glimpse of a huge area of life, endeavour and enterprise, a huge area of human struggle, bordering the Pacific ocean which washes the shores of our own country. It is an area in which our country must take a deep and abiding interest from both a spiritual and economic point of view.

In our travels in that part of the world we found that though we are held in fairly high regard as a nation we have no presence to speak of in Asia. We are held in fairly high regard as a direct result, first, of the presence in Southeast Asia now and in past of certain individuals who have enhanced our country's name; and second, because of our wheat sales to China, the latter leaving the impression, fortunately for us, that as a country we are more concerned with keeping people from starving than with political divisions. The individuals who have enhanced our name worked chiefly in medical and missionary teams. Also some of our official and quasi-official diplomats in Asia are held in high regard.

Despite these small evidences that we are not completely unknown—it is true that we may be recognized as existing—we cannot claim that anyone understands us or that we have any political presence in the area. We may not be dismissed as puppets of the United States, but we are hardly considered to have an independent foreign policy. It appears difficult for Asians to understand why we do not recognize or have diplomatic relations with a country to which we sell hundreds of million of dollars worth of wheat every year. A general vacuum exists in feelings toward our country; we have not made ourselves interested or interesting, and as a result little notice is taken of us.

These facts may be directly related to our almost complete lack of representation in the area. In the 15 countries of Southeast Asia with which we have diplomatic relations we maintain five embassies and six trade commissions, some of the latter being accredited to other countries as well as those in which they are located. Nevertheless it is doubtful whether the personnel of those establishments are numerous enough to be of much use to more than one country at a time. In eight of the 15 countries I alluded to we are unrepresented.

The following is the table of our offices and officers, sir:

India: high commission, trade commission.
Pakistan: high commission, trade commission.
Japan: embassy, trade commission (also accredited to Korea).
Malaysia: high commission, trade commission (also accredited to Singapore).
Hong Kong: trade commission.
Philippines: trade commission.
Indonesia: consulate.
Viet Nam: ICC commissioner; Laos: ICC commissioner; Cambodia: ICC commissioner; no diplomatic representation.
Thailand: no representation.
Burma: no representation.
Singapore: no representation.
Korea: no representation.
Formosa: no representation.

Mainland China is not included, and by Korea I mean South Korea. Forgetting for a moment the whys and wherefores of recognizing or not recognizing communist China, the figures show that Canada has a total representation of some 25 foreign service officers in an area where 1½ billion people live. In our five embassies—one is a consulate—and six trade commissions which are accredited to eight countries we have two dozen persons of officer rank who, in effect, bring Canada to half the world's people. Considering that Canada's major market for wheat is in this area, and considering also the vastly increased political importance of Southeast Asia, we need much greater representation that we presently have.

The nature of our representation only makes the situation worse. This is not to say that our personnel are not doing an excellent job, for from all reports and under all the circumstances they are. But the fact remains that Canada has not one expert on Southeast Asia, not one. The external affairs department prefers not to have experts; it likes to move its people around to widen their knowledge and experience.

Surely such a modus operandi is sadly out of date in 1967, and will be even more out of date in the 1970's when all these nations to which we pay so little attention will be the scene of many struggles that will increasingly involve every nation of the world, our own included. How can we deal effectively with these cultures so different from our own without the modern equivalent of the old China hand? The Department of External Affairs does not offer its applicants any kind of choice in their overseas postings. Probably a person skilled in the ways of Southeast Asia will be sent to Southeast Asia, but not necessarily.

The recruitment of foreign service officers is undertaken at the postgraduate level simply by a series of examinations and interviews. No attempt is made to interest young Canadians in the foreign service of their country. There are no incentives for Canadian university students to undertake studies which will lead them to careers in any particular branch of the foreign service, or to careers in any government branch at all for that matter. There are no resident experts in Ottawa or abroad. Everyone is eligible for everything once he is accepted into the foreign service. Obviously a man who speaks Japanese will not be sent to the Netherlands. Generally, though, we conduct our foreign policy on the career level as we would a liberal arts college. No specialized knowledge is required and very little is gained.

Complete overhaul of our recruitment system is demanded to ensure a steady flow of interested young people into branches of the service that require expertise. Our ambassador to a country should be not only an excellent person, a good diplomat and a good ambassador; he should also be an expert on that country. In a modern, specialized world we must give direction to our foreign policy by placing in foreign capitals men who know and understand those to whom they are accredited. With a proper and informed flow back of material we may better be able to direct our country's activities abroad.

It is necessary to let young Canadians know about the foreign service as a career, before they choose a career. At the moment, foreign service personnel become so because their fathers did, or because they discover they are qualified after acquiring one or two college degrees. The opportunity is great. Excellent people have been attracted. But the needs have changed. If we think we can get by in Southeast Asia with 25 officers, we are sadly mistaken. If we send anybody but an expert out to increase the complement, we may as well spend the money and the talent elsewhere.

The figures on career officers show that applicants know very little about the jobs they are applying for. Of 800 applicants for career officer posts in 1966, only 170 qualified to write the entrance exams. Four hundred were not even sufficiently qualified or interested to be interviewed. Sixty were accepted. Undoubtedly the standards are high, but today the potential ambassador needs more specialized knowledge than he ever needed before. His specialization must begin at the graduate level, if not below. In short he must be recruited and trained. The potluck application system cannot much longer endure. This is especially true in Southeast Asia, where expertise must be learned or acquired through long experience. No Canadian grows up in an atmosphere which allows him even elementary understanding of the Asian national character.

• (12:20 a.m.)

My conclusions in this sphere are these:

1. Canada has six embassies and five trade commissions in Southeast Asia, in seven of the 15 nations in that region. In other words we are vastly under represented.

2. There is a great need for specialization in our foreign service, either through training or experience or both.

3. To permit and encourage specialization among foreign service officers the Department of External Affairs should provide incentives to persons who wish to devote themselves to Canada's service in foreign countries of a particular type, or to areas of diplomacy at home.

4. To provide for recruitment of specialized and expert personnel, the department should undertake an extensive program of public relations and recruitment in universities across Canada.

5. Canada must divorce itself from the notion that the diplomatic corps is a club. It must prepare itself fully for the kind of knowledge that is needed, and will be needed, in all areas of the world, particularly in Southeast Asia, where more than one half the world's people live.

Having said this, in the time which remains to me I should like to say something about the affairs of Canada at home, the feelings of Canadians and what it is to be a Canadian in this particular year. A House of Commons session of record length has ended and a new one, the second session of the twenty seventh Parliament, is well begun. With the great events of centennial summer now upon us, I feel honoured and privileged to take part in the work of this legislative chamber and to participate in this debate.

I am sure all members of this house, like myself, and all Canadians, will be feeling much satisfaction this spring and summer in their nationality and in their country. This is a great year in which to be a Canadian. With Expo '67, the armed forces tattoo, the pan-American games, the confederation train, the confederation caravans, the centennial canoe race and all the other pageants great and small which are being presented so successfully in honour of our 100th birthday, we are winning international recognition this summer as one of the most dynamic and exciting countries in the world.

I remember that when I was a schoolboy, far-away fields looked enticingly green. Today for young men and women of high school and university age there is no field so green and so full of promise as Canada. There is a feeling in our country today which was not present a quarter of a century ago. It is a feeling of new ground being broken, new horizons glimpsed, new opportunity at home and a new, assured Canadian personality emerging. It is my opinion that this new Canadian promise reflects itself clearly in our national politics, and if those politics appear tumultuous at times, it is because we are living a tumultuous chapter in Canadian history.

We have much to celebrate as Canadians in our centennial year. In the shadow of the most powerful and possibly the most persuasive nation the world has ever known we have clung to our Canadian identity, tended it, nurtured it and we are bringing it to bloom.

In the explosive climate generated by two founding races which have not always been charitable toward each other we have so far followed the voice and the path of the moderate man and avoided the temptation to anger. In an almost impossible geographical setting which would have dismayed many a less tenacious people we have scattered a comparative handful of men and women over a rugged, northern land mass of nearly four million square miles, covering half a continent, and we have held it together. We have built two transcontinental railroads, two transcontinental and international air lines, two transcontinental television and broadcasting networks, a transcontinental super highway, one of the world's greatest inland waterway systems and a coast to coast network of international airports that rank with any on the face of the earth.

We have built two of the world's greatest cities, and 20 others that are smaller but all of which are bursting with growth. We have built or are building 50 universities. We have plumbed the depths of our soil for petroleum and precious minerals; we have sown our vast prairies with wheat and fed half the world with the harvests. We have led the world in making many advances in the fields of medicine and science.

We have begun at last to address ourselves seriously to the arts, and there are hopeful signs that we are about to address ourselves seriously to scientific and industrial research. We have introduced social and humanitarian legislation which has brought security and freedom from worry to millions of our countrymen who without such measures would carry crushing burdens of financial care. Through depression we have persevered; out of trouble we have triumphed.

There is nothing we cannot make of Canada, you and I. As a country she is limited only by our human limitations. The glories and the triumphs of her first century in confederation may be as nothing in comparison with the triumphs of her second century yet to come. But there are areas of human labour and endeavour to which we must yet turn our attention, especially in the field of human relations. I have mentioned some of the tremendous physical tasks which have been achieved. Among those still remaining to be done are these:

It will be our task to solve the problem of urban sprawl with all its related crises. It will be our task to open up our north country, to harness our huge reserves of fresh water, to tap new reserves of mineral wealth and to eliminate as far as possible the differences and discrepancies in regional growth and development across the country. It will be our task to build new roads and new towns, new sattelite cities and industrial cities. We may have to subsidize people to encourage them to settle in the north and push back the Arctic frontier. It will be our task to solve the problem of air pollution, and to solve the problems of old age. We shall have to find a cure for cancer. There are a thousand challenges of this nature, many of them yet unimagined.

But these are physical assignments or challenges. And important as they are, I believe them less important than some of the challenges which face our country in the field of human relations. The field of human relations, in my opinion, is the indispensable ground in which the foundations of Canada's second century must be dug. We must search that field for solid ground. If we sink our shafts in dry, sterile soil, if we dig in the barren sands of the status quo, if we try to rest our supports on the swamp of special interest groups, our structure will fail and the second Canadian century will crumble. But if we search that field earnestly and conscientiously for the good earth of human dignity, and if we build there, then the dreams we have for Canada will last not just into a second century but for a thousand years.

For I believe, and I think most Canadians would agree with me, that it is just as important to find a cure for war as to find a cure for cancer. It is just as important to rid our hearts of prejudice as to rid our air of pollution. It is just as important to redevelop our Indians as to redevelop our downtown areas. It is just as important to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life as to strengthen our reserves. And it is infinitely more important to the future of this country that we build highways of understanding between English and French and all ethnic and racial groups than that we build highways of concrete into the Arctic. This really is the challenge which faces us in this house, as well as all Canadians outside, as we enter our second century.

Some three decades ago Franklin Roosevelt coined a phrase that became a challenge and a battle cry for a whole generation of his countrymen. He told them "This generation of Americans has a rendezvous with destiny." They responded to the call. Now, it seems tc me, sir, those words ring with far more significance for Canada than they ever did for the United States in Franklin Roosevelt's time.

One of the pre-eminent emotions in Canada today is social tension, tension between the whole of the country and its parts, tension among many of the parts themselves, tension so critical on some levels that possibly the very concept of Canada has been threatened. I believe this generation of Canadians has a rendezvous with destiny. As no other generation of Canadians before us, we and our children have the responsibility for deciding and determining whether there is going to be a Canada at all in the future, and what kind and type of Canada it is going to be. This is the substance of the Canadian experiment, and it is we who may determine whether that experiment finally succeeds or fails. In this context and in that connection, sir, I take this opportunity to wish all of us in this house, all of us in Canada, good luck in our careers as citizens and builders of this great country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I should not like to be too long, and I will only make a few observations.

The motion for voting an address presented by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) and seconded by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Côté) reads as follows:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada—

Most loyal and dutiful subjects. Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that I am opposed to the motion, because I do not consider myself as a subject but rather as a free citizen. In my opinion, the motion should not be written in those terms.

How can we, in 1967, in the middle of the twentieth century and in Canada, a country which calls itself free, begin by the formula "We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects" when, on the contrary, we are elected by Canadian citizens in our respective ridings; how could we renounce our allegiance to our electorate and recognize another authority than which delegated us here?

Mr. Speaker, one may smile at that, but nevertheless the idea is embodied in all aspects of Canadian life over the past 100 years. Those who were present at the opening of Expo remember several details of the ceremony of which we cannot be proud. For example, the official band played three times "God Save the Queen", the national anthem of England. Three times. And that, before playing "O Canada" even once. Three times, the national anthem of a foreign country. And those who were there, among Canadian citizens, and who were official delegates, diplomats from Africa, South America, Asia, Japan, Belgium, England, France, Germany, Italy, the United States—from 70 different countries—were surprised to find that the national anthem played here in Canada was "God Save the Queen", and that happened three times.

I also recall that, in 1965, the International Parliamentary Union held its meeting here in Ottawa. At that time, the representatives from 70 countries, members of parliament and senators, were meeting here to discuss problems relating to parliamentary government throughout the world. And there was a concert in the Capitol theatre, here in Ottawa, played by the symphonic orchestra of Toronto. It was a very beautiful concert and it was very successful. The symphony, directed by a Japanese, was excellent. There were two great Canadian stars, Richard Verreault and another one, a soprano, whose name I cannot recall.

An hon. Member: Maureen Forrester.

Mr. Grégoire: No, not Maureen Forrester who is also very well known. That was two years ago, and I have forgotten the name. At the beginning of the concert, what did one hear? Everybody got up for the national anthem, but "God Save the Queen", was what they heard. All the representatives, members of Parliament, senators from about 75 countries throughout the world were looking at each other and wondering if they were not in an English colony, in the seventeenth, eighteenth or nineteenth century.

As a Canadian citizen, I felt embarrassed at this point, in front of all those guests from all countries who were invited here in Ottawa, in Canada. And what was played for them: "God Save the Queen," the national anthem of England.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Speaker, about two days ago, last weekend, I was visiting a foreign pavilion at the Expo, when a foreign representative, I do not remember from what country, came and asked me: Tell me, are your Canadian dollars guaranteed by England? Is it England that guarantees your dollars? I said: No. And then I asked him: What made you say that? He showed me a dollar bill and said: The picture of the Queen of England is on your bills. Are they guaranteed by England and is that why you have to put the picture of a foreign queen on your currency? I said: No, it is a leftover from the colonialism of the last century or two.

And here we claim to be Canadian citizens. We would like to make the citizens of Quebec, Ontario, etc. believe that they are Canadian citizens, whereas everything in our life is permeated by colonialism, without end or logic, right in 1967 and when, throughout the world, the countries with the least pride and dignity have broken off those colonial ties. Here in Canada we keep them. Our national anthem is still "God Save the Queen", as evidenced by the fact that it is played first. If, at least, it were played second; no, it is played first and three times in a row, before "O Canada". And those who were there will recall how it was played in a macabre, funerary and funereal rhythm, in a way I have never heard it played before. Those in attendance remember very well, and can testify to that. And it was played last, as if with fear. England's national anthem first. On our money, the picture of the Queen of England. And it is always the same. We are hosts to foreign countries but we have nothing to show except symbols, choirs, national hymns and great themes of another country as if we were a colony. If it were only a symbol, Mr. Speaker, but we are too penetrated by that colonial style, not only in the political field but also in the economic field, by that feeling of dependence, as if we could not have, at home, sufficient dignity and pride to give ourselves a free country where we would no longer be considered as subjects but as free citizens.

Mr. Speaker, we have not achieved this Canadian pride. It is not surprising then that in Quebec, I, at least, and many others, are trying to give ourselves a homeland because one has not been secured for us elsewhere. We will do all that needs to be done to have a homeland instead of living as colonials.

Some people may like it. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) who still is a Quebec citizen, a Canadian. Does he approve? I would like to have his views. Does he approve of the playing of the national hymn of another country first, at international ceremonies in Canada? Is the Postmaster General proud of that?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member finished his speech and does he yield the floor to the Postmaster General?

Mr. Grégoire: I am wondering whether if he can put a question to me.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may not ask questions. He can make his speech and, if he so wishes, let other members to take part in the debate later.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): May I put a question to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker? Does he know the difference between the salute to the Governor General and the "God Save the Queen", because the hymn played at the opening of Expo was not the "God Save the Queen" but the salute to the Governor General which is only part of the "God Save the Queen".

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, that it is not a very strong argument, in my opinion. Whether the salute to the Governor General or the national hymn of Great Britain is played, I think, there is not the least difference between the two. It is exactly the same music and the same notes. Nothing is different between the two.

If the Postmaster General means that it is the salute to the Governor General, I ask him whether or not the Governor General is a Canadian? If so, let him have a general salute distinct from the national anthem of England. That is what the Postmaster General cannot understand. He is trying to justify an acceptance which must bother him, I am sure, but he is also trying to justify himself before his conscience, and that is what must be difficult. It must be difficult, I am quite sure, because the national anthem of England and what is now called the salute to the Governor General are exactly the same thing.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No.

Mr. Grégoire: Is it not the same thing?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, it is not the same thing, according to the Postmaster General. I would like very much to have him play both tunes, because he would realize that the music is exactly the same in both cases. There is no difference at all; and it is specious. In fact, the minister advances a specious argument since it is exactly the same music. People try to justify their attitude by saying: I listen to it; it is not England's national anthem, but the salute to the Governor General. We have a Canadian Governor General. Then, let us try at least to have for the governor general a Canadian salute and not a mere reproduction, indeed, a copy of England's national anthem! But there are still traces of colonialism, and I am disappointed to find some still in the Postmaster General.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am very proud that, this year, the Canadian parliament has adopted a national anthem and that, two years ago, it gave our country a Canadian flag. In fact, I am proud of the progress we are making in giving Canada a true national identity.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, anyone who has seen—as I have—how the national anthem was passed this year has no reason to be proud. It stayed on the order paper as a committee report for two months and, one fine day, the whole thing was passed in a hurry, without a word being uttered by anyone, in short as if everyone was ill at ease. Not a single member got up to say: I am happy to have an anthem. There was no mover and not even a speech by the Prime Minister, a minister or an hon. member. Nobody said a word. It was passed and nobody was any the wiser. There was no proclamation as if there was something humiliating, embarrassing in having a national anthem.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Perhaps you would have liked a debate on the national anthem.

Mr. Grégoire: Nobody said a word while the national anthem was passed on the sly, because at the same time, again on the sly, was also passed what was called the royal anthem. They were both concealed. The third and fourth reports of the committee on that subject were presented. There was another report which could never be passed. It deals with the reduction of the quorum. That report was skipped and another, one which had been lying around for two months, was passed again on the sly. The minister is extremely embarrassed, but he still says: I am proud of it. If the Postmaster General is so proud of his national anthem, why does he not protest when "God Save the Queen" is played three times before "O Canada?" Why do the three other members not protest too, indeed, the member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Berger) whom I saw applauding a while ago? Why do they not protest when the national anthem of another country is played three times before the one of which the Postmaster General is so proud? Is that pride? It is not, and I protest against it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to hon. members that they allow the hon. member for Lapointe to continue and complete his remarks?

Mr. Grégoire: I shall pursue. I quite understand their intervention and their shame. If I were in their shoes, I too would be ill at ease.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Grégoire: I too would be embarrassed. I see the Postmaster General leaving his seat. His hasty retreat is probably the most noble gesture he has ever made, because it enables me to make such remarks. I am proud of my national anthem. It took a long time before someone ventured to say that we no longer want to keep those colonial and colonialist vestiges. If only all the citizens of Quebec and the members from Quebec would take the lead in that field. I must congratulate the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). I do not always have the opportunity to do so but he at least is one who acts like a free citizen, who has understood that we are free citizens, that we must not remain colonials. The hon. member for Lotbinière has understood that.

Let us abolish monarchy, let us set up a republic. Why are the other members from Quebec not following, why are they not doing the same thing? It seems to me it would be quite normal for them to do so. Let us look at what has happened throughout the world during the past twenty years, Mr. Speaker. Countries, people less developed than we are, had at least more pride, more dignity than we have, much pride, much more dignity, and they realized what independence means, what it means to free ourselves from those who seek to exploit us and make colonials out of us.

Well, it has been too long since that idea was put forward here, in this house. It has not been sufficiently expressed, unfortunately.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

I think it should be voiced even more, so that never again motions will be introduced, beginning with such words as: We, loyal and faithful subjects. Subjects! What a word! It is one I cannot accept. She is the Queen of England, very well—

Mr. Habel: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since, contrary to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), I understand very well the oath of office I took in order to sit in this house, on behalf of those I represent, I am withdrawing from this house as a protest against the speech delivered at present by the hon. member.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I tell you that I am not much impressed by this withdrawal. I am disappointed to see that another Canadian citizen prefers to flee rather than face the music. What can you do, there are people who will always run away instead of fighting when confronted with this type of situation. The oath of allegiance to the Queen, Mr. Chairman—which still remains—is always a trace of colonialism which we should do away with. We should amend the constitution and suppress this, because we must always pledge our allegiance to those we represent, our constituents. That is democracy. We claim that we live in a democratic country. Democracy means government of the people, by the people and for the people. We are appointed by our constituents. That is implied in the word democracy. Therefore, to whom should we pledge our allegiance? To the people, to our constituents. Things have reached the point where the Queen is brought into anything. For parking offences, it is the Queen versus so and so. The Queen does not even know you own an automobile; she does not know what kind of automobile you have, she does not even know that you were on such and such a road, she does not even know that you exist. Yet, you are sued; the Queen versus so and so. Why not the people? In truly democratic countries, that is the way it is done. Those are further traces of colonialism; always in the name of the Queen. And when we are elected here, it is to represent the interests of the electors, the interests of the people. We should swear allegiance to the people; to the interests of the people, to the interests of our electors. But no; "We, loyal and faithful subjects", that is what we repeat—year in and year out, humbly, and very humbly at that. Yes, it is said that it is a symbol to give pride and dignity to our country, to our homeland. Aristotle, a great Greek philosopher, said that one's homeland is where one feels at home. Here, people come out with all kinds of foreign symbols! Can this really become a homeland?

• (12:50 p.m.)

Aristotle said: "The place where one feels at home." He does not say: The place where one lives. He says: "The place where one feels at home". Such is Aristotle's definition of the homeland, and there is yet to be found a better one. I repeat: "The place where one feels at home."

And some people bring in as many foreign symbols as possible, whether by means of our currency, our flag, our national anthem, or indeed our oath of office.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that there is room for considerable change in the constitution in that field, at least to the extent of shelving all those remnants of British colonialism of years past. Other countries gained independence. Let us take the United States, for instance. It had 3 million inhabitants when it decided that it had had enough; it has become a great country. We, its neighbours, remained a small country. Why? Because we have always been a colonized country, a country with a colonial mentality, a country with traces of colonialism, always the victim and the dependent of colonizers and exploiters. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that things will change in that field—

Mr. Berger: Oh no.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if instead of mumbling all the time the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Berger) would rise and say what he thinks, it would be much better. He is another one who still has the style of a colonial, Mr. Speaker. He is another one who likes to be taken for a loyal subject, a colonial. That is what the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is. But he mumbles, for instance—

[English]

Mr. Herridge: That is not true.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: —but he is unable to express himself.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), who is attacking me personally by speaking of the member for Montmagny-L'Islet and saying that I would rather be a loyal subject, that I feel wronged, that my rights have been encroached upon, and that I hope to have the opportunity to defend myself if I may not do so now. I will not remain silent after the remarks of the member for Lapointe, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member not feel that it would be preferable for him to make his remarks after the hon. member for Lapointe has finished his speech?

Mr. Berger: Gladly, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Winch: It is our approach that is right and your approach that is wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I really believe I have expressed my views strongly enough to provoke a reaction from the members of this house. I know that my views are not shared by everyone. I am not asking everybody to agree with me, because we are living in a democracy; only, I respect the views of others, I admit—

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. member for Lapointe who gave us earlier such an adequate definition of the word "fatherland" and has chosen to be a separatist. Can he explain why he is still here if his fatherland is not Canada, if he feels better in Quebec? Is there anything besides his annual indemnity of $18,000 to keep him here?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I could ask the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry whether he stays here because of his $18,000 indemnity, for I think he is sensitive on this subject. I answered his question on the first day I officially declared in this house, that I was a separatist when I said that I accepted and would observe all Canadian laws as long as Quebec remained a part of Canada, but that I would do all I could to help it become independent, since Canada has not succeeded in breaking its colonial ties. That is partly the fault of members like the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry, who recognize these ties implicitly and tacitly. As long as Quebec remains a part of the Canadian confederation, I shall observe Canadian laws but do all I can to help Quebec separate from the rest of the country, so that we may at last have a homeland where we can feel truly at home.

[English]

Mr. Winch: If what you are running down was not a democracy, that would be treason.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, this is a democracy. Obviously, a hundred years ago, some provinces agreed to a constitution and to a Canadian confederation. Now, if each province was free to join confederation, each province must be free to get out of it. That is not treason, it is terminating the first contract of 1867 which was freely and willingly entered into by each the participants and if one of the provinces who shared in it at that time now wants to get out, it should be able to do so freely and voluntarily. All it has to do is to put an end to that agreement and that is the end of it. That is not treason, that is democracy. I always felt that we would have independence in Quebec only when the majority of Quebec voters voted for independence. When the majority of the people of Quebec vote for Quebec independence, everyone will have to recognize its democratic choice, freely, voluntarily and peacefully made, by ballot on voting day.

That is democracy. And everyone in a democratic country is free to work to achieve this. I am not in favour of violent means or civil war, not at all, but of democratic means.

I hope this will happen as soon as possible but, in the meantime, I accept Canadian laws which control Canadian citizenship. I refuse, on the other hand to be considered as a subject of someone by whom I was not elected for it is the Quebec voters who elected me.

I have been elected by the people and not by a foreign sovereign. I submit that all members of this house would find it advantageous to change their positions and to break those colonial ties, to become free citizens, in order to speak not as the subjects of the Queen but as free servants of the Canadian people and then it would be much better for all of us.

I also submit, as I am now a Canadian citizen, that Canada would derive benefit from symbols and exterior signs representative of Canada and of no other country. And I believe that this is not a betrayal; on the contrary, I am advocating constitutional changes in order to attain full freedom and to express our national identity which does not exist at the present time. Why do we now have to play the national anthem of another country on every occasion.

Mr. Laniel: Could you suggest what system we should adopt.

Mr. Grégoire: We should become a republic. The hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Laniel) is asking me if I have some suggestions to make. Evidently, Mr. Chairman, we should now set up a Canadian republic free from all ties with any foreign country, so that when we receive visitors from abroad, when we entertain 70 to 75 countries of the world, we could tell them: You are now in Canada and not in Great Britain. When we are receiving you, we play our national anthem "O Canada" and not the national anthem of Great Britain. Our flag is the Canadian flag and not the British one.

[English]

Mr. Winch: Why do you think Premier Johnson of Quebec doesn't want any federal link with a foreign country such as France?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): He is a miniature de Gaulle.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, it is simple. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr.Winch) can talk all he wants, but in my opinion it applies to him also and he would have more reasons to be proud when Canada will really be a country in its own right and not another country. It seems to me that he would also have more reason to be proud to say that he is a Canadian citizen if he were not always confronted with foreign symbols.

[English]

Mr. Winch: I am darned proud of being a Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: It all depends on one's point of view. As for me, I consider myself as a free citizen; others consider themselves as citizens dependent upon a foreign country.

I shall end with those words. I know that my remarks may not have pleased everyone —but I think that the citizens—

[English]

Mr. Cowan: They have not pleased anyone.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It is a little silly.

Mr. Grégoire: My friend, the hon. member for York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) says that my remarks did not please him. But he must have realized that, at least in Quebec, and at least in Jonquière county, the young people of that county are proud and dignified enough to long for that complete and total freedom, that separation and breaking away from the ties with another country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

[English]

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I was under the impression that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) would be back and that he had time left in which to conclude his speech. In view of the fact that the hon. member is not here may I, on a question of privilege, take a moment to clarify something.

[Translation]

Since I was personally mentioned in the separatist ravings of the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) before the lunch hour, may I briefly though no less strongly protest against this sad and unfortunate example of extreme demagogy and personal attacks against members who are loyal to their mandate and respectful of the law of the land, of established order.

Only a few hours ago, the hon. member for Lapointe called me a subject, a colonial and so forth, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure you that, respectful of democracy and faithful to my oath of office, because I know what an oath is, I will continue to represent those who elected me according to the will of the majority, that is in compliance with the policies advocated by the present government and to which I participate as regularly and as loyally as possible, to the best of my ability.

In reply to the member for Lapointe, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I shall never hide behind pseudo-inquiries with my electors, to repudiate today what I advocated yesterday, for I have never been elected in my riding under false pretenses. I have no intention of becoming a sad separatist Don Quixote similar to the one who is now crusading in the Quebec desert.

I am sorry the member for Lapointe is not here: I would tell him that I feel perfectly at home everywhere in Canada. I am not a colonial or any type of a subject, far from it. On the other hand, I shall continue to respect the Queen of Canada according to the statutes, regardless of what the hon. member may say—if the term "honourable" is not pejorative when applied to the member for Lapointe whose egocentrism makes him exceed all bounds—I shall continue to respect her.

Reference was made to the national anthem, with which I had something to do, because I took part in the work of the committee. I am proud of "O Canada", our national anthem. I also respect the royal anthem, and when it is played I shall still respect it, by paying it all the attention it deserves.

I am proud of my national anthem, and I would be delighted if it did not give rise to any debate, Mr. Speaker, because it is with false discussions wrongly oriented, and useless wanderings, such as you have probably witnessed on the part of the hon. member for Lapointe this morning, that the orderly conduct of this parliament's business is too often delayed.

I am proud to be Canadian, Mr. Speaker, just Canadian. Of course, I am proud of the French fact which characterizes my origins, just as I admire and respect that which characterizes my wife, who is of English origin, and that of my children who, taking from both of us, will become even better Canadians.

To conclude my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the special committee of the house which is working to amend the laws and regulations governing us at the present time will, as soon as possible, reach the happy solution which will enable us to discuss our problems more seriously instead of going in for demagogy, enable especially those who are interested in Canadian problems to discuss them, and enable those who want to concern themselves exclusively with the problems of Quebec to get elected, the next time, to the provincial legislature to submit to the authorities concerned the problems they have to submit to them and thus stop trying to deceive us, to agitate us, to divide us and to spread dangerous ideas throughout the nation.

I apologize for my blunt and off-hand manner, Mr. Speaker, but since I am a true Canadian, respectful of the existing order, I feel compelled to rise and call your attention to this matter. I believe all my constituents will be happy to know that at least in the riding of Montmagny-L'Islet nobody needs a lesson from a member who has disowned his electors by switching parties, by preaching a lost cause and becoming an agitator. I think the people of Montmagny-L'Islet will keep on judging me as they have up to now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Berger: I thank hon. members for their applause which proves that I am not the only one to profess true Canadianism in this house.

[English]

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): Mr. Speaker, I am taking the opportunity of participating in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne in order to deal with two subjects in particular which could occupy the whole of the time allotted to a private member. I do so because in my mind and in the opinion of other hon. members of the house these two important matters have been brushed aside by the cabinet, in outlining the work of parliament and accomplishing the desires of the people, for other purposes which are not as vital.

I would draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the order paper of the house. On page 19 of today's order paper for Friday, May 19 you will find a resolution standing in my name which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the expediency of introducing legislation for the creation of a criminal injuries compensation board to hear the pleas of persons who have suffered permanent injury or disability as the victims of crime and award compensation to such persons or their dependants as would seem fair in the circumstances, and wherever possible to do so, to impose payment of compensation by criminals to those they have injured.

• (2:40 p.m.)

I first placed that resolution on the order paper in January, 1966. As everyone knows, under the rules of the house it was nothing but a private member's resolution. Being a private member's resolution and having been on the order paper since January, 1966, the first and only opportunity ever provided by the house leader to discuss the matter was on Wednesday, June 8, 1966. One hour was allotted to the discussion of the resolution. It was talked out by one of the exalted members of the party, a parliamentary secretary, and it died a natural death never to reappear again on the order paper. I was forced, therefore, to reintroduce it in this month of May in the new session of parliament.

The other day the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) rose in the house and asked this question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Justice and Attorney General. Since a number of honest citizens think that our society makes many efforts to improve the lot of criminals, I should like to ask the minister the following question.
>
> Is he giving consideration to setting up or interesting the provinces in setting up a program of compensation for crime victims or the families of crime victims?

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Trudeau) replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, this question has also been raised by certain correspondents. I am studying the problem at the present time. As the hon. member is aware, there is also here a question of constitutional law, for such compensation could come from the provinces instead of the central government. However, in that case, negotiations could be undertaken with the provinces.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when you do not intend to do anything in the parliament of Canada you simply stand up and say there is a constitutional question involved relating to the provinces. This is supposed to be the end of it for the rest of time. Here we have an answer on May 11 by the Minister of Justice, a man in whom I have the greatest confidence, which suggests there is a question of constitutional law involved. Let us take the Truscott case. I do not want to discuss it at this time because feelings are easily aroused. However, I will take the Truscott case as an illustration because it is before us at the present time.

Here is a man who has been convicted of murder and is undergoing a life sentence in Kingston penitentiary at Collins Bay or Portsmouth, wherever he may be. In any event, he is down in the Kingston area undergoing a life sentence because that was the sentence of the court. Who is paying the cost of giving him three meals a day, maintaining him in warm surroundings, giving him a bed at night, providing the necessary chaplaincy services, looking after his recreation and seeing that he does not become too obese or does not lose weight through lack of eating? The parliament of Canada is providing the wherewithal to keep criminals in luxury while the bodies of their victims lie in their graves.

When people like the hon. member for Lotbinière ask the cabinet if any consideration is being given to paying compensation to the victims of criminal acts, they are given the answer quite quickly that there is here a question of constitutional law. The government keeps right on feeding Truscott and making certain he does not miss a meal, all at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers. When they are asked, is there any compensation for the victims of these crimes, back comes the high-sounding answer that there is a question of constitutional law involved and the rights of the provinces must be maintained. If we can afford to pay the cost of keeping the criminal, surely we can afford to offer some compensation to the victims of crime when the victims are absolutely innocent of any complicity in the matter.

When this subject was discussed on June 8, 1966, almost a year ago, a large number of hon. members supported the principle of this resolution. One of the ablest members in the house, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Forest), in supporting the principle stated he felt that since compensation for injury was concerned it might be a provincial matter. I respect the hon. member's legal knowledge and I respect his judgment. Possibly there is an element of provincial jurisdiction involved. However, as long as this house is willing to pay for the upkeep of criminals out of federal funds I believe we should pay for the compensation of the victim of criminal acts on exactly the same ground.

I should like to refer to a murder case to which I have made frequent reference in this house involving a seven year old girl in my own church congregation in Toronto. The man who was accused of the murder of this little child entered a defence of insanity. His lawyer won the argument in that case and the moment he did so this man was immediately incarcerated in the asylum for the criminally insane maintained by the Ontario government at Penetanguishene, about eight miles from a summer home I have maintained since 1937. This institution is well known to me and it renders a magnificent service.

It does seem odd to me as a Canadian taxpayer, and I have been a taxpayer for a long number of years, that when a chap like Truscott is convicted of murdering a little girl he serves his life sentence in Kingston penitentiary and Ottawa looks after providing three meals, a warm bed and warm accommodation, but when this other man is accused of murdering a little seven year old girl from the congregation of Victoria Presbyterian Church and is judged insane he goes to an asylum and becomes the responsibility of the taxpayers of the province of Ontario. In my opinion, this is splitting hairs beyond reason. If you are going to argue that compensation for the victims of crime is a matter of provincial jursidiction and if you are going to have the Canadian taxpayer shoulder the cost of looking after the criminals, then the Canadian taxpayer will certainly jump at the opportunity of offering compensation to the victims of crime. If the government will bring forward legislation I have no doubt parliament will pass it in a day. I might point out that my interest in this matter has extended over a number of years because as a newspaper reporter many years ago I covered more than one murder trial. As I pointed out in the debate on capital punishment, I was the foreman of a jury when I was 19. This is illegal because one should be 21 but the judge appointed me because, as I emphasized when speaking, I was the only man in the room where the murder trial was being held who could write English. I just refer to that because I was working on a murder case when I was only 19 years of age. This goes back quite a few years and I covered a number of murder cases for newspapers over the years. I have come face to face with the victims of crimes and in police court work I have also come across the victims of crimes such as merciless beatings, hit and run drivers, and cases where gas was turned on in a room while a person slept and he was a physical wreck thereafter because of the effect on his lungs. There are many victims of crime other than the victims of murder. I suggest that parliament should provide compensation to the victims of criminal acts, no matter what the nature of the act may be.

As I mentioned, the resolution I introduced was discussed for one hour on June 8, 1966 when it was talked out. At that time a member of the house made this statement, and I quote from page 6168 of Hansard for June 8, 1966:

> • (2:50 p.m.)
> —I am doubtful about what the resolution means.

I do not think that we should hold up such legislation until the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Stewart) is able to comprehend the significance of the motion, because the people of Canada want legislation for the compensation of victims and they want it fast.

It is interesting to note that three provinces in Canada have begun to take some action with regard to introducing measures for the compensation of victims. I have a newspaper clipping of December 9 of last year from the Winnipeg Free Press indicating that the Manitoba government is making a bid to aid crime victims. I also have a clipping taken from the Toronto Globe and Mail for February 11 of this year which points out that the Saskatchewan government is bringing in a law to aid the victims of crime. I also read in the Vancouver Sun for February 28, 1967 that British Columbia crime casualties are to get aid. So there are three provinces in Canada that have taken steps to compensate victims of criminal acts, and I see signs that the province of Quebec is going to take similar action.

One might ask, since the provinces are moving why not let this matter go ahead? I maintain that we should have uniform legislation on this subject right across Canada, and since the federal government is paying for the upkeep of convicted criminals I think it should also pay compensation to victims of crime.

I would not criticize a single one of the bills that are now being brought forward by provinces because I am anxious to see them become law in the provinces concerned. I am also anxious to see one law for the whole of Canada but I will help these provinces in any way possible to get this legislation on their statute books. I have long believed that half a loaf is better than none.

It is quite interesting to compare terms of the three bills in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia to which I have referred. As I mentioned earlier, there are signs that Quebec will take some action, though I have no details as to what action Quebec is considering other than that I know there are men and women in the province of Quebec who believe that victims of crime should be compensated.

Let me outline some of the disparities in the legislation of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia. I point out that according to the Saskatchewan bill, which I think is the best of the three, the victim will not be required to pursue legal action before applying for compensation to the compensation board. That determination has been made by those in Saskatchewan who framed the legislation.

When one turns to the legislation that is suggested for Manitoba one sees it is necessary under that bill for a victim there to have exhausted legal action before he can apply for compensation. The Manitoba white paper on this subject states that it is proposed that the victim, before being eligible to receive compensation, must exhaust all legal remedies and all other forms of public assistance. That language is in almost direct opposition to that used in the Saskatchewan legislation. But I say to the members of this house through you, Mr. Speaker, that I sincerely hope both provinces put this legislation on their statute books because they will at least have started something which I hope the federal government will take up and bring to national fruition by passing a uniform act.

It is interesting to note that in British Columbia Attorney General Bonner told the British Columbia legislature that the responsibility for compensation will be placed squarely on the shoulders of the municipalities involved.

Mr. Herridge: That is typical.

Mr. Cowan: That is not my comment but that of a good friend from British Columbia. In the Vancouver Sun for February 28, 1967 we read:

> The legislation would be enabling, allowing municipalities to use their own funds for compensation of these victims of violent crimes.

Let us just consider for a moment, Mr. Speaker, the unfairness of such legislation. Nevertheless, let me say that I hope British Columbia does put this legislation on the statute books, because I do want to see some sort of legislation passed and from that basis we can proceed to consider improvements. Let us take the case of a person who might be the victim of a crime in wealthy, rich, sleepy Victoria, compared with somebody in the valley of the Skeena who might have had their feet cut off by a robber. If the municipalities are going to compensate the victims of crimes, then I think I would sooner be attacked in Victoria, British Columbia, than be the victim of a crime in the valley of the Skeena or the Stikine. I have been in all three places and I must say that if I am to be attacked I would prefer to be attacked in Victoria. The police are closer at hand, the hospitals are fine and the taxpayers are wealthier than in the two valleys mentioned. But I mention this only in passing.

I do not think that putting the responsibility on the municipalities is good legislation, Mr. Speaker. The legislation of Manitoba and Saskatchewan is far ahead of that of British Columbia in that it makes compensation a provincial responsibility. However, I believe that the federal government should show the way by taking over this responsibility on a national scale in the same way as they look after convicted criminals.

In talking this way about compensation for the victims of crime I do not want to refer to the previous discussion we had on June 8 or to the discussions we have had from time to time when there have been "kefuffles" over capital punishment. References have been made here to the fact that if you are run down by the driver of a motor car, in most provinces in Canada you do not even need to know the name of the driver who ran you down. If you do not know the name of the driver who ran you down, you can nevertheless institute an action for damages for having been injured by a motor car and can collect from what is known in the province of Ontario as the unsatisfied judgment fund. Other provinces have similar provisions for compensation under different names, but in Ontario if you are run down by a motor car, are badly injured, and you do not even know the name of the driver of the car you can collect compensation from the unsatisfied judgment fund which is administered by the department of highways.

In connection with the proposal to compensate victims of crime I should like to read a short editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail as recently as May 10. The heading is "Best Be Hit By A Car", and it reads as follows:

> Although Marshall McLuhan maintains that in this electronic age, we are becoming less oriented to our motor cars, the legal system in Ontario has yet to get the message. While we have various means of helping the victims of auto accidents, we still lag behind other provinces and other nations in compensating the victims of violent crimes.
> Last month, an East York resident was awarded $7,300 in the Ontario Supreme Court for damages incurred when he was struck by an unknown motorist and suffered a broken knee and leg injuries.
> But there was no such compensation for Beulah McArthur, the 65-year-old Toronto widow who had every bone in her face smashed in a vicious assault by a young hoodlum. Instead, after leaving hospital Mrs. McArthur never returned to her little grocery shop and sold it at a loss which she estimated at $4,000.
> When she was taken to hospital, Mrs. McArthur was soaked to the waist in blood and a nurse asked if she had been in a car accident. In a province which still refuses to accept responsibility for the victims of violent crime, it would have been better for her if she had.

We are willing to compensate the victims of other untoward events, Mr. Speaker. For instance, it has been mentioned in this house that if a farmer has a sheep killed by a dog in the province of Ontario he can collect the value of the sheep slain by a dog running at large. If his daughter is killed, as in the instance of Lynn Harper at Clinton or the farmer's daughter at Dublin, Ontario, ten miles away, there is no compensation at all for the parents for expenditures that have been made on behalf of their child. There is no compensation for the loss of happiness, satisfaction and the comfort and company of the child.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Scott (Danforth): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Cowan: Very well.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): I am curious, because the hon. member is developing an interesting theory. Can he elaborate what type of compensation, in the instance of a young child, would be appropriate?

Mr. Cowan: Compensation is paid in Great Britain on that basis. I am not a lawyer as is the hon. member for Danforth, but the language of the British legislation is to the effect that the compensation is for the pleasure, company and future happiness that the parents might get from having a child who would become an adult, and there is language to the effect that the child might become the parents' support in old age.

Mr. Scott (Danforth): How could you possibly be compensated for the loss of your own child?

Mr. Cowan: Mr. Speaker, to answer the question I would say that no one could compensate me for the loss of my child, but I simply say that in Great Britain that sort of thing is being done. I do not live in Great Britain. I just emphasize that over there they are compensating for the loss of a child.

Referring to the legislation proposed in Manitoba, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, for which I commend the three provinces, I point out that New Zealand was a pioneer in this field of endeavour three years ago and was followed by Great Britain in 1964 and by the state of California. Last July that lead was followed also by the state of New York.

There is a growing realization that society owes protection to its individuals, and where society fails to give that protection it should take a hand in giving compensation to the victims of crimes. To take an example, it should provide for the widow and children of the murdered breadwinner. Of course, there are many other instances where innocents suffer because of violent crimes of which some member of their family has been a victim.

The resolution to which I referred asks for the appointment of a criminal compensation board to adjudicate on all applications that may come forward. Precedents in New Zealand, Great Britain, California and New York state are building up all the time, and I understand that Saskatchewan—God bless her—will have her law in effect by July or August of this year. I maintain that the federal cabinet should be taking a hand in this matter and should be doing so fast, particularly since parliament voted 143 to 112 to maintain capital punishment and we are advised that a second effort is to be made to abolish it. But there is no mention of the victims of crime in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker.

I hope I have made myself clear. I believe I am stating the opinions of many members of the House of Commons who have spoken to me over the years on this important matter.

I should like to move on to the question of citizenship. Over the past several years I have referred more than once to an Italian-Canadian family. I dislike using the words "Italian-Canadian" because I do not like hyphenated descriptions of Canadians. To me we are all Canadians. I call these people Italian-Canadians because they were born in Italy and are naturalized Canadian citizens who have returned to their homeland and are living in Italy again.

In four consecutive speeches from the throne, those of May 16, 1963; February 18, 1964; April 5, 1965; and January 18, 1966, we have had beautiful clauses reading for example, this way:

> —a change in the Canadian Citizenship Act will be proposed to ensure full equality of rights for all Canadian citizens wherever they were born.

Or reading:

> My government will propose legislation to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, in order to ensure equality of rights for all citizens.

And here is another one:

> A measure will be placed before you to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act, particularly in order to ensure full equality of rights for all Canadian citizens wherever they were born.

We have had four promises and no action. I have in my hands the speech from the throne delivered on Monday, May 8, not two weeks ago. It runs to pages and pages of fine type. I have read it in full at least twice and partially two or three times, and not once in that speech from the throne, which is not yet two weeks old, is there a single, solitary reference to the Canadian Citizenship Act. We have been told in four speeches from the throne, that amendments to the act would be introduced. We are told that the amendments are ready, that they have been prepared and that the regulations also are drawn up.

The situation against which I protest is that a naturalized Canadian citizen who leaves the country for a period of years must have his passport validated at the nearest Canadian embassy every three years or it will expire. In the instance of this Italian family who lived in Weston in the riding of York-Humber, they had their passports validated at the end of the third year of their stay in Italy and at the end of their sixth year in Italy.

The Canadian and United States dollars go much farther in Italy than in Canada or the United States and many naturalized Canadians return to their homelands in their years of retirement because of the increased purchasing power their money has there. A brother of a cabinet minister spends several months of the year in Spain for that reason, and no one thinks any the worse of him. He is stretching his Canadian dollar as far as it will go.

Here I am talking of an Italian-Canadian family who have lived in Italy for over nine years. Because there was illness in the family at the end of the third three year period when their passports had to be validated they did not do so. When they decided to come back to York-Humber to visit daughters and sons they have in the riding the Canadian embassy told them that their passports had expired because they had not been validated within three years. This elderly couple was really upset about the matter. And why not? They have foresworn allegiance to Italy and have sworn allegiance to the Queen of Canada, the Queen of this country. But this country said: "We do not want you any more; you did not get your passport validated within three years at the nearest Canadian embassy."

I am a natural born Canadian. I do not have to get my passport validated at any time, should I be outside the country, because I can come back to Canada, my birthplace. I have not foresworn allegiance to it. But if a naturalized Canadian citizen living outside the country does not have his passport validated every three years he loses his citizenship.

I took the matter up with hon. Mr. Favreau who at that time was minister of immigration. I say with great pleasure, and I would be pleased to say it louder, that he straightened the whole matter out in one hour. He agreed that the Canadian Citizenship Act should be amended and that naturalized Canadians ought not to be in the position where, if they are outside the country for more than three years, they must get their passports validated or lose their citizenship. If that happens they are without a country.

I stated in the house on June 3, 1966, as reported on page 5951 of Hansard for that year, in discussing this question when the citizenship department estimates were being considered:

> I have been told that the amendments are ready; they have been prepared and the regulations are drawn up.

Why in the name of heaven cannot the cabinet bring the legislation forward amending the act, thus making all Canadians equal so that naturalized Canadians cannot be told at some embassy in Europe or elsewhere in the world: "Your validation has expired because you did not come round to see us every three years." That is not said to a native born Canadian citizen. Why should it be said to a naturalized Canadian citizen? I say that all Canadian citizens should be equal, and they should be treated equally. I wish the cabinet would bring such legislation in and bring it in now. We have had four years of promises; let us have one day of action.
