House of Commons Debates

THIRD SESSION—EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 22nd April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 122) to incorporate the Supreme Grand Lodge of the Sons of England Benefit Society.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

MANITOBA SCHOOL FUND.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that on Tuesday next the House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from the moneys invested under the provisions of subsection three of section twenty-five of chapter fifty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, forming the School Fund for the province of Manitoba, pay from time to time to the Government of Manitoba, on the request of the said Government, such sum or sums as the said Governor in Council thinks proper, not exceeding in the whole the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, the sum or sums so paid over to be expended by the said Government of Manitoba in the support and maintenance of the public schools in that province; provided always that not more than two hundred thousand dollars shall be so paid to the said Government for the purpose aforesaid during the present calendar year.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF ALIEN WORKMEN.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to an article which appeared in the Toronto "Evening Star" of Thursday, April 21. I may say that the "Star" gives an independent support to hon. gentlemen opposite. The article to which I desire to draw their attention is one having reference to a strike which unfortunately exists at the present time amongst the employees of the well-known firm of Messrs. J. D. King & Co. I do not propose to enter into the merits or demerits of the dispute beyond expressing the hope, which I believe is entertained by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, that this unfortunate strike may be speedily and satisfactorily adjusted.

I desire to draw attention to this article particularly because it conveys the intimation that in endeavouring to overcome the strikers, the employers are reported to have sent agents to the other side of the line for the purpose of obtaining alien and foreign labour to introduce into their factory. I contend that that is contrary to the spirit of the legislation enacted at the last session of this Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the practice, that unless he is going to move a substantive motion, he can only state such facts as are necessary to found a question upon; he cannot make comments.

Mr. CLARKE. If it is necessary, in order to keep myself in order, to move the adjournment of the House at this stage, I shall be very glad to do it; but I understood that the custom was for the person who made that motion, to propose it after having concluded his remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is customary to make the motion at the close of the remarks, but it is customary for the hon. member to intimate to the Speaker that he intends to do so, in order to put himself in order.

Mr. CLARKE. I would be sorry to put myself out of order, Mr. Speaker, and at the close of my remarks, I intend to propose the motion that the House do now adjourn. I draw attention to this article because it states that the employers of these men, members of the firm of Messrs. J. D. King & Co., have sent their agents and representatives to the other side of the line for the purpose of securing the aid and assistance of foreigners and aliens to help them to crush their employees; and, in view of the legislation that was passed at the last session of this House, I think that at least the attention of the Government ought to be drawn to the action of the employers. The article in the "Star" reads as follows:—

They want a DeBarry.—Strikers at King's object to United States Workmen being brought here.—Alien Labour now en route.—Mr. King's View of the Matter.—He wants Men and will take the First that Come.

The striking shoemakers received a telegram this morning from the president of the International Union at Lynn, Mass., saying that Mr. Brown, the foreman at J. D. King's, was there engaging men to come to Toronto, and that Mr. Brown and his men would probably reach Toronto to-day.

R

The strikers were early down at the Union Station, but the expected visitors have not yet arrived. The strikers' committee will to-day seek legal advice as to the alien labour law, and what action they can take, if any.

Mr. J. D. King, when asked this morning if it was correct that Mr. Brown was away seeking for men from the other side, replied that even if it were correct, he did not know that the public had anything to do with it.

"All I will say about it," said Mr. King, "is that we are looking for men. It does not matter to us where they come from. Our factory is open, and, of course, we want men to fill it. I think I am within my rights there, am I not? We are getting men. And we are teaching them, and so far we are getting along very comfortably," said Mr. King, who takes the matter coolly, and went on to speak rather sarcastically of the "sympathetic cutters," as he called them, who went out to stand in the rain "from sympathy."

"We are the best of friends, all of us. They are good boys. I think they were foolish for going out, but we shall fix it up again in time. It may take three months, perhaps, but we shall fix it up as we did before. As for bringing men here from the States, if they come I shall have to pay them, and not the public."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this dispute between Messrs. J. D. King & Co. and their employees, is a domestic dispute, not an international one; and that it can best be settled without the aid or intervention of these aliens and foreigners. My opinion is that their importation and their being placed at work in the factory from which these men have struck, will cause a great deal more friction than would otherwise arise, will delay rather than hasten an amicable and satisfactory readjustment of this dispute; and will create a more bitter feeling between the employee and the employer than would otherwise be the case. The first section of the Alien Labour Law, which was passed at the last session of this Parliament, provided:

From and after the passing of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership or corporation, in any way to prepay the transportation, or in any way to assist or encourage the importation of any alien or foreigner into Canada, under contract or agreement, parole or special, express or implied, made previous to the importation or immigration of such alien or foreigner, to perform labour or service of any kind in Canada.

This Act was placed on the Statute-book, I understand, to provide against the importation of foreigners or aliens into Canada under contract when conditions were normal or ordinary, but there is not a normal condition of things existing now in connection with the firm of J. D. King & Co., and their employees. There is an extraordinary and unfortunate condition of things existing there; and if this Parliament thought it wise and prudent and just to enact that, in ordinary conditions, if the Governor in Council so decided, a proclamation should issue prohibiting the importation of alien labourers into Canada to take the place of

Mr. CLARKE.

Canadians, surely it is all the more incumbent upon us that on such an occasion as I allude to, the aid or assistance of aliens and foreigners should not be tolerated in the settlement of this dispute. The eighth section of the Alien Labour Act of last session provides that:

No proceedings under this Act or prosecutions for violations thereof, shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada, or some person duly authorized by him.

I do not wish to go further than to draw the attention of the Government to this unfortunate condition of things which now exists, and to enter my protest against permission being given J. D. King & Co., or any person else, under such circumstances, to call to their aid foreigners and aliens in order to crush out their own men who have faithfully worked for them for years. Knowing the character of many of the employees of that firm as well as I do, and knowing also the high character of their employers, I am satisfied that a very wide divergence of opinion must exist between them, and I repeat that the bringing in of these aliens will intensify and embitter the relations that exist, not only between that firm and its employees, but between employers and employees generally. If this alien labour law is to be of any value, it should be put into operation on an occasion of this kind, and the employer and employees in this dispute at any rate, should be permitted to settle their grievances amongst themselves. Those who are out on strike, fighting for what they believe to be justice, should not be handicapped, as they undoubtedly will be, by our allowing the importation of men who probably cannot speak the language which is spoken here, in order that the employees may be able to crush out their operatives. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. Some time ago, during the present session, the question was asked of the Government whether any steps had been taken to bring this law into force, which requires, as the previous speaker has said, that no proceedings under this Act or prosecution for violation thereof shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada or some person duly authorized by him. The question was asked of the Government, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries told the House that steps had been taken in accordance with that provision. Now we are brought face to face with the facts as detailed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and which we find in all the papers. I read in the Toronto "Evening Telegram" of yesterday the following:—

The position of affairs between J. D. King & Co. and the locked-out shoemakers is becoming more serious. This morning the executive committee of the men received a telegram from their chief officers in Boston to the effect that Superintendent ent Brown had engaged a number of American workmen, who are leaving for Toronto to-day.

This is evidently in direct violation of this Act. We would like to know from the Government what steps they have taken to bring this Act into force, or whether proceedings will be taken. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), when making the statement he did to the House, gave us no particulars, but said that proceedings were being taken and that the Government were doing something. We want to know now what they have done or, in the circumstances as detailed in the press in the case of the lock-out or the strike against J. D. King & Co., what the Government propose to do. I think this importation of alien labour, under the circumstances, is an outrage. The condition has been accepted by the House, the Government and the country, that while the United States Government raises the highest barrier against Canadians going into the United States, even when no such circumstances such as those existing in Toronto, prevail, even when no strike is taking place, but it is the case simply of people passing backwards and forwards in search of employment—while such Canadians are met by the officers of the United States Government and not permitted to remain in the United States, we prohibit the employment of aliens here. In this instance, a flagrant violation of our Act occurs. Superintendent Brown of J. D. King & Co., goes to Boston, because there is a strike on in Toronto, and engages a lot of American workmen to take the place of Canadians. What is the result? Those Canadians are thrown out of employment, they cannot go to the United States, because the American laws prohibit them even to seek employment there, and yet despite the law upon our Statute-book, those things are allowed to take place. I am sorry to say that I think the Government have been negligent in their duty. I know that last year members of the Government expressed their hostility to this Act. I know that some of them said they would take good care it was not carried into effect, so far at least as some portions of the Dominion were concerned, perhaps their own provinces. But this is the law that Parliament placed upon the Statute-book, and the Government is bound to name those officers who are empowered to prosecute under this Act. I would like to know who the officer having such power is, whether he has been instructed to carry out this law, and whether the law is being enforced to-day, when all the circumstances demand its rigid and proper enforcement.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). My hon. friend seems to think that a proclamation is necessary or some action on the part of the Government in order to give vitality to the Act of last session, which seeks to prohibit the importation, under contract, of foreign labour. Permit me, then, to say that there is no such provision as that in the Act, but on the contrary, when the Act was passed on the 29th June, 1897, it then became in full force and spoke at that moment in every part of Canada. That Act is in force in Toronto to-day and it is quite competent for any citizen to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to any supposed violation of its principles, and thereupon it will be his duty, either to institute proceedings or give consent to proceedings being instituted by a private citizen. I am told that in all cases where any alleged violation of the Act has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice, steps have been taken to apply the Act.

An hon. MEMBER. Where?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. At Windsor and along the frontier. At all events, I am told that all cases brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice have been dealt with according to the spirit of this Act, and if my hon. friend finds that the charge in the "Star" newspaper and others are well founded, I assure him the department will, as in the past, be equal to the occasion and apply the Act according to its intent.

Mr. MacLAREN. I have had a great many communications from Stratford and different points complaining about the non-enforcement of the alien labour law. People of my riding have asked me frequently to urge upon the House the enforcement of that law. In Stratford, which is a very large railway centre, a great number of the railway men have been dismissed and their places filled by Americans, and they cannot say a word about it. There is no law to protect such men. These men, who have their homes and their wives and families there, and who have spent their lives in the employ of these large corporations, should have more protection. They urge upon me every time I go home to do something to have this law enforced. I agree with everything the hon. gentleman for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) has said, and I would like to see something done whereby Canadian workmen could be protected, and I shall be pleased to do everything in my power to assert in passing a law of this kind.

Mr. COWAN. As I was the party who introduced this Bill last session, I desire to say a word. Clause 8 of this Act reads:

No proceeding under this Act or prosecution for violation thereof shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General or of some person duly authorized by him.

Residing, as I do, in the city of Windsor, immediately on the American frontier I applied after the close of last session of Parliament to the Minister of Justice to authorize some person in that city who could give consent for prosecutions under the Act, and thus save the inconvenience, if inconvenience it might be, of applying to the Minister of Justice for a special permit, I must say that the Department of Justice immediately responded to that request, and Mr. Kenning, the collector of inland revenue at Windsor, was duly appointed. And, from the time the Act came into force, at all events since the close of last session, there has not been in the county of Essex one single Canadian citizen turned back from the city of Detroit. So far as the locality I represent and the locality I live in is concerned, the Act has been a decided success. And, no doubt, if the hon. member for Perth (Mr. MacLaren) and other hon. gentlemen opposite who are so anxious to find fault with the Bill, had made application to have a person appointed, I have no doubt they would have met with the same kind consideration at the hands of the Government as I have met with.

Mr. CLANCY. It is a well known fact that one member of the Government was hostile to this Bill when it was before the House. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) took very strong ground against it, and, in order that it should not apply generally he tied it up with so many restrictions so as to make it almost inoperative. Now, it seems to me that it was the duty of the Government to appoint officers to put the law in force in those localities, at least, where there was not a Minister opposing it. As it has not been done, however, it has been almost a dead letter on the Statute-books. Why should there be this restriction in regard to an Act which may need to be put in force every day, almost every hour, particularly on the frontier? The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan), it appears, succeeded in getting the consent of the Government to the enforcement of the law. I do not say that that consent would have been denied in any case, but I say it should not be placed under such restrictions as to require the assent of the Minister of Justice. If the Act is to have any force, let us not have all this machinery of applying to the Minister of Justice, and so on, but let officers be appointed to carry out the law. I say without hesitation that if this law is not to be a sham and mockery so far as it affects the working people of Canada, these restrictions upon its operation must be removed. I say that the Government are at fault and must stand convicted of having hampered the Act, so long as it stands in the present position.

Mr. MCGREGOR. In answer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), I will just say that, in my opinion, it is very well that the Government should keep their hands on this law, and that their appointments under it should be made with great care. The appointment made in our city has given satisfaction. It is not the desire of this country to trouble our neighbours across the border more than we can help. We want to deal with them much as they deal with us. Now, they happen to have a man acting for them at Buffalo who acts very meanly with some of our people crossing at that particular point, but, at Windsor, where we have the honour of living, our people go to Detroit and work all day, some 600 or 700 of them, and return at night. These people spend their money in our country. And we allow the American people to come over to our side. They have about 150 or 160 coming over daily to Windsor to work. And so, we have reciprocity in this matter. There is no trouble at our point. If our interests were entrusted to a person who would nag at the Americans there is no doubt the day would not be far distant when our people working in the States would be deprived of that privilege. Our young men cross to the United States and work in any portion of it and come back when they see fit. There are isolated cases concerning which some complaint could be made, but, as a general thing, we have reciprocity in reference to labour at the particular point where we live, and we should be the losers and not the gainers if the law were carried out to the very letter. The appointment made by the Government is well made, the gentleman who has been appointed is a prudent man, a careful man, and one holding a high position; and he would not do anything that is not fair and just to the other country.

Mr. McCLEARY. I do not think it can be pretended that the half-hearted manner in which this law was placed on the Statute-book, though with the consent of the Government last year, has met the expectations, much less gained the approbation, of the people who are directly interested in this matter. Yesterday I gave notice of some questions relative to this very subject, which questions, I presume, will come up on Monday or Tuesday. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) has told us that at the city of Buffalo the Americans have appointed a man who does not do the right thing by Canadians. We have very great complaint to make against the enforcement of the alien labour law against Canadians on the frontier in my riding. I have here a letter which I received yesterday, part of which I will read:

Ask the Government again what their intentions are in regard to the Alien Labour law. It is reported here that Mr. Spain, of Bridgeburgh, has been appointed as an officer to enforce the law, to take effect on the first of April, but nothing has been done up to the present. Men are coming here every day from Buffalo, and doing little jobs of work, while our men are left idle. Italians are coming over every day in squads to work in the stone quarries at Ridgeway, while hardly a Canadian can get work there. The American foreman informed Mr. Rathbun they can get plenty of their own men to look after without employing any Canadians.

This exists with us as a grievance, not only with reference to labour generally, but also in connection with the railway employees, as referred to by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. MacLaren). Our Canadians are sent back from Buffalo unless they move their families over and become citizens. They cannot go over there and work and still live in Canada, while men come over every day from Buffalo to get work that should be given to the Canadian people. Surely, if the law is worth putting on the Statute-book, it is worth carrying out. Take a little village like Fort Erie, where I do not believe they have a single lawyer—somebody should be there to look after the matter and see that the law is enforced. I have never asked the Minister of Justice to take action in this regard, because I never felt that there was any need of it—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCLEARY. I never felt there was any need of it, so far as I was concerned. I fully expected that the law would be enforced just as other laws are enforced by officials appointed for that purpose. It should not be incumbent upon the representatives of the people to see to the enforcement of such a law as this, it should be enforced in its entirety without the need of action on our part. I trust that the discussion brought on by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) will be productive of good, and that the Government will see that it is their duty to carry out the law properly and effectively.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the representative of the Attorney General, whom I am pleased to see in his place, to inform the House how many prosecutions have taken place under the Act that was placed on the Statute-book last year. It is well known we have read it in the papers, that Canadians have been daily deported from the United States, though it may not take place where the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) resides. Even Canadian nurses in the hospitals over in the United States, during the past year, have been deported from that country. We know also that many cases have happened in Canada where Americans were brought in to take the place of Canadians, concerning which complaints have been long and loud in the press, but no heed has been taken to them, so far as I know, by the Attorney General, or any other person for him. For some years I have had something to do with drawing the attention of the House and country to this matter, and two sessions ago I received a promise that at the ensuing session I would have an opportunity of introducing a Bill, and that such Bill would be passed word for word like the American Bill. We all know that when the session was called together, another Bill was put in ahead of mine on the Order paper; it was read and referred to a sub-committee of the House, which was controlled by the Government having a majority on that committee. They reported the Bill to the House, a Bill that I did not agree to, because I said then, as I say now, that it was practically unworkable. It was not what the Prime Minister promised this country, a copy of the American Bill. I have introduced this year, and I hope to reach it next Monday night, a copy of the American Bill, word for word, containing some eighteen clauses, a duplicate of all the American laws. The first Bill that was introduced was the American law then, which has, however, been amended by two or three Bills since. These amendments I have consolidated in the Bill which is now on the Order Paper. I have here a copy of the American Acts, which was sent to the manager of the Canada Carriage Company, at Brockville, who wrote to the Treasury Department at Washington to know whether, if they established a factory on the American side of the river and employed American labour to run it there, it would be lawful for them to send their superintendent over the river from Brockville one day in the week, or occasionally, to superintend the work there. This is the reply they received from the Treasury Department at Washington :

I am in receipt of your communication of the 23rd instant, addressed to the Honourable the Secretary of the Treasury, in which you state your firm is considering the matter of establishing a branch in Morristown, a small place directly opposite Brockville, in the United States, and requesting to be advised whether it would be in violation of our laws for the department to accord you the privilege of sending at certain times your superintendent and foreman, and occasionally some skilled workmen across the river daily to perform service in this country.

In reply, I call your attention to the Acts approved February 26, 1885, February 23, 1887, and March 3, 1891, inclosed herewith, from which it appears that this department cannot grant the privilege desired, and that the action as contemplated by you, if carried out, would be in violation of the law.

They inclosed copy of the Act of February 26th, 1885. The Act on the Statute-book in Canada is simply a copy of that Act, but it was amended so as to make it unworkable except by the action of the Attorney General. Then the Americans amended their Act in 1887, and again in 1891. The Act now on the Canadian statutes does not include the amendment of 1887, nor the amendments of 1891, copies of which I hold in my hand. Upon reading them it will be seen that a Canadian cannot possibly go over there to work, as the letter from the department says it would be a violation of the law; but there is nothing in the Canadian law to prevent an American from coming over here to work. The hon. member for Essex says that they do come, because they have reciprocity up there where he lives. Last year the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries took a very active part when the Bill was before the Committee, having it so modified as to make it practically unworkable. On that occasion, when the hon. member for Essex stated that 160 went over from Canada and about 600 came in from the United States to work here—

Some hon. MEMBERS. The other way.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, reverse that—600 Canadians went over to work in the United States, and 160 came from the United States to work in Canada, and that statement appeared to meet with the approval of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, because he asked my hon. friend to repeat it the second time so that the House and the galleries might hear it; and he winked at the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) as if to say: I made a point in bringing that out. However, I want the Prime Minister now to redeem his pledge that he gave to this House and to this country that he would place on our Statute-book a duplicate of the American law that I hold in my hand. Such a Bill is now before the House, and I hope that before the session is closed the Prime Minister will take it up and place it on the Government Orders, and see that it becomes law.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must not take advantage of this motion to discuss an order which he has himself on the paper.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I am through now. I only ask that that pledge be redeemed and that the Bill now before the House may become law, but not such a law as we have now, which has been complained of by my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke, a law that is being violated in his city, in the case of the strikes now taking place, by J. D. King & Co.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only to say to my hon. friend, in answer to the latter part of his remarks, although they were out of order, that I expect this Bill of his will come up for discussion on Monday, and then we will have an opportunity of discussing the subject.

Mr. BRITTON. According to the statements of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), it would seem clear that a violation of the law has been committed, apparently by one of our Canadians, who is perfectly responsible and able to pay the penalty that the statute imposes for such violation. Now, this is not a question of the Government's policy at all. Therefore, there seems hardly any reason why the hon. gentleman should have brought this question up on a motion to adjourn, when the Orders of the Day were called, unless, apparently, he desired to make a point against the Government, that they were in some way remiss in enforcing the legislation that is on the Statute-book. Now, if this firm has violated the law in question, a simple remedy seems open to the hon. member, or to any one else, to secure redress. All he had to do was to apply to the Attorney General to put the law in motion, and if he declined to take action, either the hon. member himself or any one else who is interested in having the law enforced, is entitled to start a prosecution. There is a plain law on the Statute-book that would cover what my hon. friend says has been done in Toronto, a heavy penalty is attached to the violation of that law. The Attorney General on his own motion might enforce the remedy, or he might authorize the hon. member for Toronto, or any other person interested in the enforcement of labour laws in Toronto or elsewhere, to take action and sue for a penalty. I submit, that the hon. gentleman has not any grievance, nor is there any grievance because of what has been done. If there is a violation, a plain remedy is provided, a remedy within the reach of any person. He may apply to the Attorney General to act in his own name, or if the Attorney General declines, then such person may institute proceedings on his own behalf.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Britton) thinks it is competent for any one to commence an action under this Act, but he evidently overlooks clause 8, which says:

No proceedings under this Act, or prosecutions for violation thereof, shall be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General or some person duly authorized by him.

If I am correctly informed, and I think I am, the labour unions protested against that clause of the Act, and claimed that in the event of its passing, it would make the Act inoperative. As evidence of that it need only be mentioned that the labour unions of Toronto have already consulted counsel as to how far they can proceed under the Act. If it was clear to them, they would not take the trouble to do so, but it is claimed they feel unable to take the action they think they should adopt in defence of their own interest on account of this obnoxious clause. If the Act was intended to be operative, why should not the position be the same as that under any other Act, and any citizen be able to avail himself of it and institute proceedings under it. In order to put the law in motion, why should it be necessary to obtain leave from the Attorney General? The Attorney General does not give his consent in advance to the law being applied in any part of the country, and so the hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) applied to have some person appointed to carry out the Act, but it turned out that it was merely to wink at violations of the law. I thought it was a very strange position for the representative of the Attorney General to occupy, to know the law was violated and not interfere. A similar position is occupied by the hon. member for Toronto, who justifies this law, if I understand him correctly. I take it that the aim is to appoint some few officers favourable to their views and who will wink at violations of the law. This law should be made applicable to every part of the country, and any citizen be able to take proceedings under it.

Mr. MCGREGOR. So they can.

Mr. SPROULE. They cannot without the permission of the Attorney General has been obtained.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

SUPPLIES FOR THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Yesterday my hon. friend from Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn), who is not in his seat, put a question with respect to a letter he had received from a friend with respect to a contract which had been given to a Chicago firm for supplies for the Mounted Police. The hon. gentleman read a newspaper extract to this effect: "A big contract for feeding the North-west Mounted Police has been awarded to Libbey, McNeill & Libbey, canners and packers." I asked the hon. gentleman to send me the extract so that I might be able to make inquiries, and I am now in position to tell him that there is not a word of foundation for this paragraph.

POSTAGE BILL.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the discussion that will ensue on the Bill to amend the Post Office Act, hon. members might be furnished, so that the question might be intelligently discussed, with the names of all publications enjoying free transmission throughout the country, their weights and the nature of such publications. I strongly favour the Bill re-imposing postage on these papers, and I think it would be well if the Postmaster General, prior to the discussion, would lay this information on the Table, so that we may thoroughly understand what we are doing in discussing the Bill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I will endeavour to meet the hon. gentleman's wishes at the earliest possible moment. I think it is proper that the information should be furnished in reasonable time before the Bill is discussed, and, therefore, I promise not to bring on the Bill for second reading until I have had an opportunity of meeting the hon. gentleman's wishes, or if I am not able to do so, of informing the House of that fact. I am not able to say whether all the information desired is procurable in the department, but all there is will be placed within the reach of hon. members.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The other day, when the hon. Postmaster General introduced the Bill, I suggested to him that it would be convenient if he submitted the financial scheme so far as he could obtain it from the department in order that we might be able to ascertain what his officials consider would be the gain to the department from the re-imposition of stamps on newspapers, and also in regard to the change with respect to stamps on foreign letters. The hon. Postmaster General will remember that we spoke about foreign letters, and it would be a very great convenience to members to know exactly the hon. gentleman's estimate of the amount that will have to be made up by charging 5 cents instead of 3 cents.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has asked for information on two points. One is strictly applicable to the Bill to which he alludes, and that information I will endeavour to furnish to him in ample time before the discussion of the Bill. The other refers to information, which I fail to see has any connection with the Bill itself. In case the hon. gentleman thinks it has any connection, I will endeavour to meet his view on that point.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

On section 5,

Mr. McDOUGALL. Before you left the Chair last evening, Mr. Chairman, I met the argument made by the hon. members from Nova Scotia on the other side of the House with respect to what they contended was the universal practice under the Act there with respect to the preparation of the lists, and in support of the explanation I made to the House. I will now take the liberty of quoting the Act. There were two sets of lists prepared by the revisors under the old Act before 1855, namely, for provincial and Dominion elections. In 1871 the local legislature passed a disqualifying Act. That Act was read to the committee by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) yesterday. In 1871, this Parliament passed what was called an interim election Act and clause 4 of that Act provides as follows:—

4. All persons nominated as revisors, under chapter 28 of the Acts of the legislature of Nova Scotia, passed in the year 1863, intituled: "An Act to regulate the Elections of Members to serve in the General Assembly," shall, in the present year, 1871, within three months after the passing of this Act, and in any future year at the time of their preparing the annual list of electors qualified to vote at elections of members of the General Assembly, prepare also and file with the clerk of the peace, a like alphabetical list of electors qualified to vote at elections of members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, by adding to the lists of voters for members of the General Assembly the names of all officials and employees of the Dominion Government qualified to vote at elections of members of the General Assembly under the laws in force in Nova Scotia on the 1st day of July, 1867, but who may have been disqualified by any Act of the legislature of the province passed after the said day. The lists first made shall form the register of electors of members of the House of Commons until the next year's lists shall be made and perfected and the provisions of sections 25, 26 and 27, respectively, of the said chapter shall be held applicable to such future lists. For any neglect or wilful breach of duty under this section the revisers shall be subject to the like penalties prescribed in section 24 of the said chapter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I spoke last night, it was from memory, because I had sent to the Library for the Act of 1871, but could not get in. The hon. member from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), and, if I mistake not, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) made the statement to the House last night, that there was only one set of lists made out, and that one set of lists made out by the revisers was used for Dominion elections and for provincial elections alike. My object is simply to call the attention of the House to the fact which I have mentioned, and to show that I was speaking from the authority of the Act. Before taking my seat, I wish to call the attention of the Solicitor General and the other lawyers in the House to section 41 of the British North America Act. It reads as follows:—

41. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely: the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution, shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

I am not a lawyer, and it is hardly necessary for me to say so, but I would like to get the opinion of the hon. the Solicitor General and other hon. members who are lawyers, on this point: As to whether this Parliament has the power now, after having in the year 1885 adopted a law of this Parliament for the purpose of governing all the federal elections throughout Canada, and which took the place of the then existing provincial laws; I ask now, whether this Parliament has the power to go back again to the provincial laws for the purpose of elections to this House? Can this Parliament now saddle on the provincial authorities the obligations to take any part in the preparation or the carrying out of the laws which appertain to the election of members to this House? Section 41 of the British North America Act, it will be remembered, distinctly says:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides.

I take it, from that section, that after the Parliament of Canada did provide, then the Parliament of Canada, if it complies with the provisions of section 41 of the British North America Act, cannot go back and exact from the provincial or municipal authorities the service in regard to Dominion elections which this Bill casts upon them.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). That is a question of very considerable importance, and I expected to hear it asked in the course of this debate. At the proper time, I will be prepared to discuss it at greater length; but for the time being I may say, that, after having considered that question, I believe that we can adopt the provincial franchises. Of course, under our view of the case, we are not giving the local legislatures the power to make our franchises; we are simply adopting for our purposes the franchise they use for theirs. In that view, we do not, in my judgment, come into contact with this section of the British North America Act. The position, as I view it, is absolutely the same as if we took the provincial franchises and incorporated them in our Bill.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) did that, then he would make the creation of this new part of our constitution fixed and permanent. The question put by my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) is this: That, inasmuch as the British North America Act, which is our written constitution, provided that we should, at a certain time, create a law in accordance with the 41st section of the British North America Act, and that, as we have created that law, then it is part of our written constitution, and cannot be changed. I understood the hon. Solicitor General to say, that he anticipated that question would arise in the debate. If you adopt the provincial franchises, as they are to-day, you make them a part of our constitution, so far as that section is concerned.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Solicitor General to another section of the Act which it might be important for him to consider in conjunction with the one I have already indicated. I refer to section 92, on exclusive powers of the provincial legislatures. These include: "direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes," "the establishment and tenure of provincial officers, and the appointment and payment of provincial officers." They are provincial officers who have the obligation now of preparing the local lists; and the question in my mind is, what right has this Parliament to direct the work of these provincial officers? There is no provision for their payment by this Parliament, and there is no provision for a separate and distinct appointment. They are only referred to as officers of the provincial legislature, whether appointed by the provincial legislature or by the municipalities acting under an Act of the provincial legislature. Then, there is: "the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section." The provincial Act provides for the punishment of any local official for refusing or neglecting to perform any of the duties this Parliament is placing upon him. I would like the hon. Solicitor General to consider this section of the Act in conjunction with the other one to which I referred.

Mr. KAULBACH. I feel it my duty as a Nova Scotian and representing a constituency in that province, to offer a remark or two. I have no hesitation in stating that this Franchise Bill is most unpopular, as it does not meet the wishes of the honest, unbiased, and intelligent electorate of this country, inasmuch as it does not grant to every elector of the Dominion, at least so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, that freedom of thought and action, that right of citizenship, that freedom of loyalty and devotion to national sentiment and feeling that should possess an independent spirit, when it rejects, restricts, or rather deprives a voter of his right of franchise so dear to him, because, forsooth, he is the incumbent of a certain office under the Crown,

The most disgraceful part is that appended to this Bill as a memorandum to provincial laws, in which Nova Scotia is coupled under the heading of "Disqualification of Voters," which reads as follows:—

Revised Statutes chap. 4, sec. 67.

Any one who within fifteen days before the election was an employee, or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind as such employee, in the post office, the customs-house, the Inland Revenue Department, the lighthouse service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown lands office or the local public works and mines, but nothing in section to extend to contractors to furnish materials for Government railroads, or to perform any other specific contract in respect of the same or to any person who may have been employed by the day temporarily to repair railroads, or to any postmaster, post office keeper, way office keeper or mail courier.

Is it fair or just to discriminate in this way, and thereby deprive a class of voters of their just franchise, of their right of citizenship, and their freedom to exercise their views as they consider in the best interests of the country? It certainly is not, and the intelligent electorate will decide against it. This class of men as a rule are more intelligent and better capable of discriminating between right and wrong than most others. I say to allow this clause 67 of chap. 4 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia to remain on the statute-books, is an insult to the intelligent electorate, a menace upon the civil rights of the people of the country, more particularly upon Nova Scotia, an exhibition of cowardice, a legacy of lasting disgrace to the legislature of Nova Scotia, and a stain on the pages of history. The hon. Minister of Finance will surely not say that this section as referred to does not disfranchise this class of people who should be voters. They have been disfranchised since 1871, and this Act has operated against them in Nova Scotia ever since, so far as the provincial elections are concerned, and to repeal the present Franchise Act of 1885 and adopt the present provincial Act will be infamous, and an outrage upon this class of people, numbering about one thousand.

Now, I ask, is it fair to still continue this clause in the Nova Scotia Act and make it operative against this class of intelligent and valuable citizens, depriving white men of their rights of citizenship and giving it to Indians? Whilst I do not object to the latter, I certainly do consider the white men should be placed on an equal footing. The hon. Minister of Finance says these officers as named in the clause of the Act referred to will appear in the revised list as voters as well as others, which may be true, or it may not, but so long as this clause which I have referred to should remain unrepealed, their names if on the voters' list can be expunged, and will be before the list passes into the returning officer's hands, and if not then, they certainly will be when the elector appears at the polls, as the agent or inspector of a candidate will require each person so registered to take the oath. I do urge and am most sincere in my request that the Government adopt manhood suffrage, and the infliction of a heavy penalty upon any person offering or receiving a bribe to vote, and I particularly ask that the Government will see proper to inflict a heavier penalty on officials found mutilating or manipulating ballots, or caught at any other infringement of the election law. Dismissal from office would be too trivial. I would say they be disfranchised, and imprisoned for a period not exceeding five years.

Amendment (Mr. Heyd) re Indians, negatived.

Mr. RUSSELL. I wish to move an amendment for the purpose of removing any doubt that may exist regarding the qualification of Dominion officials in the province of Nova Scotia or any of the other provinces. There is no doubt that persons who may not be qualified to vote in provincial elections, for reasons which do not and ought not to apply to their qualification to vote in a Dominion election, should not, on account of their provincial disqualification, be deprived from voting in the Dominion elections. I wish to move an amendment that will remove any doubts that may exist in this respect. I am not at all sure that, as regards the province of Nova Scotia such an amendment is necessary at all. It certainly was not supposed that such an amendment would be required. It was certainly explained by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the other night, in the course of the debate on the main question, that it was not the intention—and nobody assumed that it was—of this Bill that officials of the Dominion Government should not be qualified to vote at an election for members of the Dominion Parliament. But, at the same time, it is quite possible that, in the terms in which the Bill is drafted, it might have the effect of throwing a doubt, at all events, upon the qualification of that class of persons to vote. I do not for a moment think that the general principle upon which this Bill is founded will be at all affected by the amendment I intend to move. The general principle of the Bill is that it is desirable that we should adopt, in a general way and for general purposes, the same kinds of franchise as exist in the various provinces. The general principle is that the various provinces are better qualified to pass general judgments in respect of the classes of persons who should exercise the franchise than this Parliament is. For instance, in some of the provinces a woman-rights movement might have acquired a momentum which it had not in the others. In some particular province, the general feeling might be that it was an injustice that women should not have the right to vote, whereas in the other provinces an entirely opposite opinion might prevail, and it might be very repulsive to the general sentiment of those other provinces that women should be enfranchised. The principle of the Bill is that if there should exist those large divergences of opinion amongst the different provinces, we should respect them and adopt the general doctrines and principles which underlie the provisions of the franchise Acts in those various provinces. But if you find exceptional cases, like this which has existed in Nova Scotia since 1871, if you find that for certain reasons it has seemed good to the people of that province that certain particular classes of voters, who would be perfectly competent and ought to vote in Dominion elections, were, for some special reasons, not qualified and could not safely be trusted with the franchise in the provincial elections, it is not at all against the general principle of this Bill that we should provide for those exceptions and not disfranchise for Dominion purposes those who for good reasons might be disfranchised for local purposes. A similar condition might exist in the provinces of Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba or elsewhere. The sole purpose of the amendment is to provide for those exceptional cases, which can be consistently provided for, even assuming the general principle to remain intact in the large, namely, that we are adopting for the purpose of our Dominion franchise the general principles and sentiments with reference to the right to vote which are entertained in the various provinces. This is not time to expatiate on that general principle. We are supposed to have got past it, and therefore I think it was entirely out of place, at this stage of the Bill, in committee, to make orations on constitutional questions such as we were entertained with by members on the other side of the House. I thought we had discussed all that before we got into committee. We are now discussing simply the dull prosaic but necessary questions of detail for the working out of the general principle which this House resolved upon when we went into committee on this Bill.

Mr. McINERNEY. Whom does the hon. gentleman blame for the constitutional disquisitions that took place? His hon. leader began the discussion.

Mr. RUSSELL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He simply made a reply to the hon. gentleman's disquisition and paid much more attention to it than I thought it was worthy of.

Mr. McINERNEY. He spoke before I did.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes, in reply to other disquisitions we previously had from an hon. gentleman on that side, and which, I think, were entirely inopportune, and which we ought to have been favoured with when the principle of the measure was under discussion. It was the misfortune of the promoters and advocates, of the Bill on this side that they were obliged to answer to the same objections in committee which they had answered on the second reading.

Mr. McINERNEY. The property qualification of the voter was under discussion, and that was what we spoke on.

Mr. RUSSELL. We could have discussed that without bringing in the Federalist, and the letters of Plubius and the Brazilian constitution and the South American republics, and the Swiss constitution, and the distinctions of Staatenbund and the Bundesstaat, and all that sort of thing. I do not think it was necessary to bring in the Encyclopedia Britannica on the question whether or not it was advisable to change this provision in its details as to the qualifications of voters.

I do not wish to dwell upon this amendment at any length, as I may have occasion to revert to it later, but I wish to say that whatever may be the reasons which did and do exist for the disfranchisement of Dominion officials in any province, or whatever may be the reasons which any province may conceive, at all events, to exist why Dominion officials of certain classes should be disfranchised for provincial purposes, we do not want that disfranchisement to continue for the purposes of the Dominion elections. I do not think anybody has asked for it. On the contrary the hon. Minister of Finance, when the principle of the Bill was under discussion, clearly intimated that there was no such intention on the part of the Government. That clearly was not their intention; and if this Bill, as it stands, without any amendment, should have the effect of disqualifying any Dominion officials from voting in Dominion elections, that is a pure accident and is not of the essence of the Bill and never was its intention. That was made so abundantly clear in the remarks of the Minister of Finance, when the principle of the measure was under discussion, that it is not necessary for me to enlarge on it now. At the same time I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the committee to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance on this branch of the question. They will be found on page 2869 of "Hansard." He said:

The disqualification which was created by that provincial franchise law of Nova Scotia does not touch the voters' lists at all.

Of course in that he was absolutely correct, and I do not think we ought to be compelled to argue that point for the fourth or fifth time. I was rather complained of by the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) last night for having referred to it as frequently as I did, but I never did refer to it except when the argument was repeated. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) interrupted the hon. Minister of Finance and agreed with him. He said:

I never heard any one say to the contrary in this House.

The hon. member for Annapolis agreed that he had never heard anybody say that it was intended that the disqualification created by the provincial franchise touched the voters' lists. The hon. Minister of Finance then said:

Then, if the names of the Dominion officials have always been on the lists used in the Dominion elections, what is all this fuss about?

Mr. MILLS. Because there was an Act passed disfranchising them from voting and that is engrafted in this Bill.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What right has this House to say to any independent legislature of any province how it shall deal with its own provincial franchise, so long as it does not touch the franchise of this House?

Mr. MILLS. It is going to do that.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is not, and never did.

Mr. MILLS. But that is the intention now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, there never was any intention of doing that; it did not do it, and will not do it. I want it clearly understood, that, while there were good reasons—which I do not wish to enter into now, because that is a provincial question—for disqualifying the Dominion officials for provincial purposes, that disqualification never touched the voters' lists at all.

Now, that is the position we are in—that this qualification does not touch the voters' lists, and has not touched the voters' lists since 1885—if it did before—when the Act which instructed the revisers to strike off the lists the names of Dominion officials, was explicitly and absolutely repealed. It was discovered, as any one could see—and I wonder that the contention opposed to this has been so often repeated—that you could not strike the names off the lists because it was impossible to tell that these parties would not be properly qualified to vote when an election came on. This shows that they were not disqualified as Dominion officials, but only as being Dominion officials up to within a short time of the election. Ever since that Act was repealed, these names have been on the lists, and all I seek by this amendment is to remove any doubt as to the right of these people to vote. I beg to move an amendment to subsection "a" of section 5. Subsection "a" which reads as follows:—

The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

I move that to this subsection the following words be added:—

Provided that any person whose name appears as a voter on any voters' list, and who would be qualified to vote at a provincial election, but from the fact of his being or having been an employee or in receipt of wages or emolument as an employee of any department of the Dominion or provincial government, shall be qualified to vote at an election of a member of the House of Commons, notwithstanding the provisions of any Act disqualifying him from voting at a provincial election.

Mr. McDOUGALL. With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would like to ask him a question. When was that Act repealed?

Mr. RUSSELL. In 1885, when the revised statutes of Nova Scotia were proclaimed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Act of 1871 was then repealed?

Mr. RUSSELL. The clause which directed the revisers to strike off the lists all those that were disqualified as officials, was repealed, I say, by the Act of 1885.

Mr. MONK. I do not think that the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Russell) goes quite far enough, and I intend to propose an amendment covering the employees, both Dominion and provincial, whether they be on the list or not. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that we on this side entered upon long disquisitions on constitutional law. I do not agree with him as to the scope of the discussion on this section. We have, by the second reading of this Bill, adopted the principle of the repeal of the Franchise Act, but we are now discussing who shall be qualified to vote, and upon that point, it seems to me, the discussion has not wandered in any way beyond legitimate bounds. There is this also to be remembered—and it may be an excuse for any disquisitions, as the hon. member calls them, that they may be entered upon—we find the members of the Government themselves differing as to the scope of the question. Before we had sacrificed the rights of the poor Indian, I understood the Solicitor General to say that he intended to provide for the maintenance of the Indian franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, I positively deny that I said anything of the kind, but I said I would provide for the case of public employees.

Mr. MONK. At any rate, after the House took recess, and we met again at eight o'clock, the Prime Minister laid down, as I understood it, as an absolute principle, that we must keep the local lists and not vary them, that we were not going into the details of the local lists to save some voters of a particular class, but we are going to adopt a principle, and would not vary from it in any way. The scope of the amendment which I now propose is to preserve the right of officials, Dominion or provincial, whether their names be on the list or not, whereas the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) covers only those officials whose names may be on the list :

Notwithstanding anything in the law of any province, no official of the Federal Government of the provincial government, regular soldiers or persons enrolled in military schools, shall be disqualified to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons.

It seems to me that we cannot be taxed, as I deem it unfairly, with undue zeal to maintain the rights of the voters. It is a well-known principle of the political institutions under which we live, that the franchise, once given, shall not be taken away from the voter, and it is also well known that the greatest ignominy that can be inflicted on any class of men who have enjoyed the franchise is, for some fault they have committed, to withdraw that franchise.

Sir, I approach the discussion of this clause in as judicial a temper as possible. That was insisted upon last night by the leader of the House, and I do not find it a difficult task, because I think we have all agreed as to the necessity of the repeal of the Franchise Act. But what I would draw the attention of the committee to is this : Not once, in the discussion which has taken place, and which has been somewhat protracted already, has any fault been found with the substance of the Franchise Act, as it exists. The fault found with that Act is, that it is too costly and burdensome. What we claim, on this side of the House, is, that it would have been possible to have removed these deficiencies in the previous legislation—deficiencies which are of an accidental nature, if I may use that expression—without making such a drastic change as is proposed by the present Bill. Two or three times already, we have been solicited by the Prime Minister to look for an example to the condition of things that exists in the United States, where the franchise for the election of the members of Congress is the franchise of the different states. But it seems to me, that the United States is the last country to which we should look for an example with regard to our franchise. As we all know, the political conditions there are totally different from our own. They have a presidential government, while we have a parliamentary government, and members of the committee know how very different these two forms of government are. They have, as has been pointed out, a central power which derives its existence from the states forming the confederacy, whereas here we have a power existing in our central body which power owes its existence, not to the provinces that form the Dominion, but to a higher and independent power. And whereas, in the United States, any attempt on the part of the federal power to control the franchise would be resented by the states, here it has always been contemplated that we, in this Parliament, should control our electoral franchise.

Even the 15th amendment to the American constitution, passed after the war of secession, which provided that no person's right to vote should be impaired by reason of colour or any previous condition of servitude, is an amendment which met with much opposition in the states. Even at the present time, in some of those states where that disposition of the constitution has been directly frustrated, attempts are already on foot to have that disposition changed, and the right of the state to control the franchise remains intact as it was before. It seems to me that the conditions here are entirely different. When the neighbouring states formed themselves into a federated power they merely coalesced in order to protect themselves from what they deemed a common enemy; whereas here the reason of our confederation was the prospect of welding together the different parts then divided, of British North America, and of forming one homogeneous community, one great dependency of the British Empire. In our case, the major part of the power was reserved for the Federal Government, whereas in the United States the contrary rule exists, as we all know, and there it is only the enumerated and stated powers which belong to the central government. Therefore, I consider that this measure, as has already been stated, of returning to the provincial franchise, is a retrograde step, if my conception of what was intended at the time of confederation is correct. Now, in regard to the remarks of the right hon.

the Prime Minister concerning universal suffrage in certain provinces, there is much to be said. We all know that in the province of Quebec the words "universal suffrage" brought to our minds for a long time, and they do to-day, the tendencies of revolutionary France, for which tendencies a very large part of our population had no sympathy, indeed I may say the whole of our population, with very few exceptions. But when it comes to extending the suffrage in other provinces, which will take place as an effect of this Bill, then we claim for the province of Quebec the same privileges as those which are enjoyed in the other provinces. It is well known that universal suffrage as it exists in France is removed in a very small degree indeed from what we have here, under the Franchise Act which we are about to repeal. It is well known that the suffrage as it exists in England is removed in an imperceptible degree from the suffrage as it exists in France. If my right hon. friend will consult with those French authors who have written, and some of them have written admirable works, upon the suffrage as it exists in England, he will find that they all agree that it differs very slightly from the universal suffrage of France. Franqueville, for instance, who has devoted a great deal of time to the study of the British constitution, and who has made a careful examination of the electoral franchise in England, declares in his work on the British constitution that the difference is imperceptible. As a matter of fact, it is a more difficult matter to be inscribed on the lists in France and to secure the right to vote, than it is in England. Now, if the result of this legislation is going to be the admission to the suffrage in the other provinces of persons who will be unrepresented in our province, I, for my part, think that the province of Quebec will be unjustly treated. We will have this anomaly, for instance, as regards the province of Quebec, that there will be in this House a set of men who, when a certain class of legislation would come up, will have the right to claim that they represent an electorate far more extensive than we do, and that in regard to certain laws they have a right to speak with more authority than we have. In other words, we will find here representatives elected by a different set of 'mandataires' in every province of the Dominion, which I think would be a step backwards, as was stated here yesterday. But when we come to the details of this legislation, the anomaly comes out still more strongly. Now, with regard to the province of Quebec, what did the right hon. the Prime Minister say? He argued that the provinces formed distinct and separate communities, and to those communities should be left the right to fix the way in which they should choose representatives to this Parliament. Proceeding upon that principle, what do we find as regards the province of Quebec? In 1892, the franchise law of that province excluded the following persons from the right to vote: Judges of superior courts, judges of sessions, district magistrates and recorders, all customs officers, clerks of the Crown and clerks of the peace, registrars, sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, deputy clerks of the Crown, officers of the provincial and municipal police, all agents for the sale of Crown lands, all officials employed to collect dues belonging to Her Majesty, all excise officers, and all collectors of revenue, whether provincial or federal. That was the condition of the provincial law in 1892, it excluded a number of officers, both federal and provincial. In 1897 that law was altered, a change evidently had come over public opinion in the province of Quebec, and by a statute passed in 1897, it was decided that disability as regards public officers should be confined to public officers of the province only. Now, what was the proposition laid down in this extension of the franchise which obtained in 1897? It was the principle that the province considered that federal officials, not being in any way dependent upon the local power, should be admitted to the franchise. Therefore, there was an extension of the franchise. What is the effect of this section as we find it now? It is to establish an absolutely different principle. If this section were passed in its present form, we would disfranchise the officials of the local government; contrary to the principle laid down by the province in 1897, these officials would not be admitted to vote. In this respect, therefore, the Bill in its present shape militates against parts of our population in the province of Quebec who were enfranchised by the enactment of 1897. There is, therefore, in this Bill a violation of the principle which obtained in our province by the law of 1897. Here is another anomaly. Under the laws of our province the official who prepares the electoral lists is obliged to omit from those lists two classes of voters who would be otherwise qualified, that is to say, those who have been found guilty of corrupt practices under the Quebec election law, and also candidates who, in the conduct of an election, have been found guilty of violation of the electoral law.

The law as we have it before us would have for an effect to give those parties found guilty and deemed incompetent and unworthy to vote under the provincial laws the right to vote under the federal statute, they would be admitted to vote for representatives in this House; whereas, as the committee will readily perceive, those found guilty of a breach of one of our own privileges, of the privileges of this House, if found guilty of corrupt practices under our own legislative enactment as to the conduct of elections, would be admitted to vote freely. There is nothing under the law to prevent their names being placed on the electoral list, because the legislation of our province has said we will omit from the list any person found guilty of violating the local election law, but it does not go the length of saying that those who have violated the electoral law of the Dominion, which the province has not enacted, shall not be admitted to exercise the franchise. This is another anomaly which I think it is our duty to correct by the legislation under discussion.

There is also a class of persons against whom a disability has been provided by our provincial law, and it is an extensive class. I want to call the attention of the Solicitor General to this matter. Section 14 of the Provincial Act of 1897 provides that all those who agree and contract with the Government of Canada or the Government of the province of Quebec, shall not be entitled to vote and have no right to be placed on the electoral list. There is a special provision further by which it is provided that those names must be omitted from the electoral lists by the officers in charge. All those employed during the election are prohibited, under subsection 2 of section 14, from voting during the local election, and they will be prohibited from voting at federal elections. Also those who have been found guilty of offences against the electoral law. So, although the sub-amendment, which I have submitted, does not cover the cases of those which have been found guilty of infractions of the election law, still the fact exists there that if this law is passed without providing against that anomaly, we shall have the prospect of parties who have infringed the provincial electoral law being prevented from voting at our own elections, whereas those who have been found guilty of a breach of our own privileges will be placed on the electoral lists, and, being on those lists, will have the right to vote. I think that at all events we should meet the views expressed by the legislature of Quebec in 1897 and not deny the right to vote to provincial employees. My own idea, and I express it with all due deference, is that this law will be found unworkable and before very long will have to be changed. The right hon. Prime Minister wishes hon. members on this side of the House to suggest some expedient by which, while repealing the Franchise Act of 1885, some different provisions might be found from those which are submitted in this Bill. I think it would have been possible to frame a law by which we would not have been dependent upon the provincial franchises entirely for the elections of members of this House. It must not be forgotten that their revising barrister under the old Franchise Act was a very expensive official, and it would be quite possible to reduce those expenses without making such a drastic change as is proposed. For instance, I can easily imagine that an official entirely and all the time under the control of this Government might proceed to prepare an election list, which would be a Dominion list based on the provincial lists, and thereby two-thirds or three-fourths of the original work would be taken off his shoulders, and he might add to that basis or skeleton of a list such names as he might consider entitled to be placed on a Dominion list, and we would in that manner provide a uniform franchise throughout the Dominion. But there is, it seems to me, a difficulty that we shall always meet in connection with a scheme of this kind. The provincial legislature, when it comes to define a provincial franchise, must always have before its eyes the matters on which the legislature is called to legislate, the subjects which are within the provincial sphere. When the provincial legislature prepares a Franchise Act it must take as its guiding star, if I might use that expression, section 92 of the Consolidated Act, wherein are enumerated the classes of matters which come within the jurisdiction of the provinces; whereas, when we come to frame a Franchise Act for the Dominion we must have before us such a class of subjects as are enumerated in section 91, and we must see that all those members of the community who are interested in the matter within the power of the province under those fixed in section 92, enumerated in section 91, shall be amply represented here. I will give an example. Education is a subject exclusively relegated to the provinces, and it was within the power of the province under those circumstances to give representation, as was done in England, to the teaching body, the University. But when we come to the subject of coast and inland fisheries in section 91 of British North America Act of 1867, that is a matter relegated to the Dominion Parliament exclusively, and it is our duty to see that all interested classes are represented here. In consequence of this division of the sphere of action, of the powers conferred we will always find the provincial franchise defective to some extent, that it does not give the people of the Dominion the representation to which the people are entitled in view of the class of subjects over which we possess jurisdiction here. That is one of the reasons why before many years we shall be obliged to revert to the system, which I consider is the proper one, under which we control our own franchise, and that was the principle laid down by our constitutional Act. I do not go the length of saying, as my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) did, that under the terms of section 41 of the British North America Act we cannot now revert to the provincial franchises. I believe that is certainly the spirit of section 41, and there is a good deal to be said in defence of that proposition of my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall). But this much I do contend: that it was intended by the framers of our constitution that as soon as possible after confederation, with a view of welding the people together, with a view of making one people of all those who inhabited British North America, we should control our own franchise, establish exactly how it should be exercised, and not relinquish that franchise to the provinces, thus producing conditions of inequality, as we are now doing by this Bill. I, therefore, Sir, beg to move my amendment.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not clearly understand the answer given by the hon. the Solicitor General in answer to the hon. member from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall). Clause "a" of section 5 of this Bill says:

(a) The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Now, my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) drew the attention of the Solicitor General to clause 41 of the British North America Act which provides for the using of the provincial franchises for a certain period, and then the establishment of a Dominion franchise. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) answered that we were adopting a Dominion franchise by this Bill. I could understand that contention if he were adopting the existing provincial franchises for the Dominion Parliament, but he goes a great deal further than that, and I want to know his authority for it. He does not make the existing provincial franchises permanent for this Dominion, but he delegates the power to the provincial legislatures to alter our Dominion franchise from time to time. I want to know if the law officers of the Crown are of opinion that this can be done.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but simply to call the attention of the committee to what I consider a very recent and a very striking endorsement of the principles for which members on this side of the House are contending. I find that in the draft Bill of the constitution for the federation of the Australian colonies, the very principle which was propounded yesterday by the right hon. the Prime Minister, has been approved of. In the report of the proceedings of the conference held for the purpose of determining a constitution for the federated Australian colonies, there is the consecration of the principle for which members on this side of the House are contending. Section 25 of the draft Bill of this constitution reads as follows:—

The qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed by the law of the state as the qualification for electors of the more numerous house of parliament of the state.

From that we see that it has been left entirely to the various colonies to determine the nature, quality, and extent of the franchise upon which the members of the House of Representatives of the new federation shall be elected. The enactment goes even further than that, because the effect of it is that for all time to come, the determination of the federal franchise in Australia shall be left entirely to the different colonies. It seems to me that this is a very strong example of the soundness of the theory for which we are contending. Here are a number of colonies enjoying British institutions and which have advanced as much as we have in the way of progress and constitutional government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no.

Mr. BELCOURT. Here are colonies which are known the world over for their advanced ideas, both in political and social matters; people who are known for their disdain for the customs and traditions of the old world, and they adopt a franchise provision similar to that which we on this side of the House are contending for. The Australians are a people with whom we have great similarity in our public life, and it seems to me that if the various statesmen of these colonies in conference assembled, after mature deliberation thought proper to accept a franchise principle such as that, it ought to commend itself strongly in support of the point we on this side are contending for.

Mr. MONK. Is that the law, or is it a proposed law?

Mr. BELCOURT. It is a draft Bill adopted by the representatives of all the Australian colonies at a conference held in 1891.

Mr. MONK. It was merely submitted to the conference.

Mr. BELCOURT. It was adopted by the conference as the draft Bill for the new federation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) that the Australian colonies have at all reached the position that the Dominion of Canada has reached. They are endeavouring to move in that direction now, and one of the strongest inducements that has operated upon the Australian colonies has been the advanced position that Canada has attained in consequence of her federation. I may say further, that I regret extremely that the Australian colonies have decided to adopt the form of constitution indicated by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt.) I regret it for the reason that, in my judgment, had the Australian colonies occupied the same position as Canada; had they had the great republic of the United States of America alongside of them, where they could see plainly not only the advantages and the benefits of the constitution of the United States, but also the defects of that constitution, I believe the result in the Australian colonies would be the same as it was in the confederation of Canada. The constitution which the Australian colonies propose to adopt in that regard, is of the same character as that which was adopted in the United States of America. I believe that if the United States of America were to-day forming their constitution, in the light of a century of experience, they would adopt the Canadian constitution, and not that which they now possess. Every person knows that an internecine struggle, which cost an enormous sacrifice of human life and an untold amount of public money, arose precisely from that feature of their constitution which, unfortunately, our friends in the Australian colonies are now copying. The federal constitution of the United States was formed under the most tremendous stress of absolute necessity in connection with their foreign relations. That constitution was adopted by the sovereign states, retaining the power and position of sovereign states; but, being compelled to surrender a certain portion of their power for the purpose of having a federal government, they formed it on the basis of surrendering as little as possible and keeping in the hands of the sovereign states as much as possible. I am very sorry to find the Australian confederation pursuing the same policy, and I feel that the time is not remote when it will find that the adoption of the Canadian constitution would have been infinitely preferable. When the representative of the various Canadian governments met at Quebec in 1864 to lay the foundation of the federation of Canada, they had before them the example of what had occurred in the United States, and they adopted precisely the opposite principle to that which the United States had adopted. Instead of treating the various provinces of the Dominion as sovereign states, and surrendering a small portion of the power they possessed for the purpose of forming a confederated government, we took the opposite course of giving to the federal power everything that was not specifically defined by a written constitution as appertaining to the local legislatures, and I have no hesitation in saying that, after more than thirty years' experience, the policy that commended itself to the founders of the confederation of Canada, is endorsed to-day by the public sentiment and intelligence of Canada from end to end. Therefore, I do not attach much importance to what the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to. But, Sir, while I am on my feet, I may as well say that I am extremely glad to find that my hon. friend the Solicitor General stated to the House yesterday that, while he could not entertain the proposal to extend the franchise to the Indians, he was prepared to consider the question of restoring the franchise for this House to a large number of officials throughout the Dominion who, under the local Acts, are disfranchised. My hon. friend saw the impropriety of adopting without qualification the franchise of the various provinces; because, having very considerably supplied the members of the

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

House with a rescript of those franchises, and also a statement of the persons who are disqualified from voting in the various provinces, he saw that, if this Act were not amended as proposed by the hon. member for Halifax, many persons would be disqualified from voting at a federal election. Therefore, the hon. gentleman has consented—I think, most wisely, and in conformity with the pledge given by the leader of the House last night—to give full consideration to any important modifications of this Act that may be shown to be necessary for its improvement or for its more effective working. Now, Sir, I was astonished that a learned professor of law, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) should still go over the story of the Nova Scotian law. I will not appeal to him, because his mind seems to be closed, and absolutely incapable of appreciating anything which, to my mind, the plainest principles of law show. I am not a lawyer; but they say that common law is common sense; and if so, I will appeal to my hon. friend the Solicitor General on this point, which is a very important one. I will give my hon. friend the position of the question as exactly and as concisely as possible. The Bill now before us provides that the qualification of voters shall be the qualifications that entitle persons to vote for members of the local legislatures in the different provinces. Well, Sir, what is the position in Nova Scotia? The hon. gentleman has only to turn to the papers put in the hands of the members of this House, to find that it is here stated that, by the law of Nova Scotia, persons entitled to vote in that province are those whose names are on the voters' lists; and the statutes of Nova Scotia contain this clause, which has been read again and again, disqualifying a large number of persons, specifically named, from voting at an election for the legislature of the province. Now, I ask the Solicitor General's attention to this clause, which is to be found on the Statute-book of Nova Scotia to-day:

The following persons, being of the full age of twenty-one years and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of the Act,—

And I have directed your attention to the section of the Act that disqualifies a large number of persons:

—or otherwise by law prevented from voting, shall be entitled to have their names entered on the list.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him one question: Whether there is anything in that Act saying that a person shall not have his name placed on the list, simply because at the time the list is made up he is a Dominion official?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I told my hon. friend I had given him up, and I do not intend to appeal to him again, but I shall appeal to the Solicitor General, and I am prepared—I do not hesitate to say—to accept the Solicitor General's ruling. If he says that I am wrong and that the hon. member for Halifax is right, I shall begin to doubt the strength of the position I occupy. But what are the facts? Those revisers are sworn to put only the names on the voters' lists of those entitled to vote, and they perjure themselves if they do what the hon. gentleman says they ought to do and what they have done.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not surprised that my hon. friend is so very restive because I have appealed from Pilate to Cæsar, and therefore he has grown a little restless. If that very election law declares that A, B and C shall not be entitled to have their names on the list, then the revisers, who are sworn to put only the names on the list of those who are not disqualified by any clause of this Act, will have perjured themselves if they put those names on.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But if the Act does not say so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Act does.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The legal gentlemen say it does not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wonder that the hon. Minister of Finance is glad to crawl under the cloak of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in a question of this kind. If common law is common sense, and the Act declares that a certain number of persons shall be disqualified and instructs the revisers not to put their names on the list, there is an end to the question, and it is waste of time discussing it further. I might tell my hon. friend who has moved this amendment that evidently the Government have become awake to the fact that this measure which they have proposed would, in its present form, be most improper, and that the adoption, pure and simple, of the voters' list prepared for the local elections, would disfranchise thousands of men throughout this Dominion, and the very best men qualified to exercise the franchise. I therefore am glad to find that my hon. friend the Solicitor General is willing to meet the difficulty by some such amendment as is proposed by the hon. member for Halifax, but I shall tell him wherein that amendment fails entirely to accomplish its object. It contains the same vice that is contained in the provincial law. Under that law, we cannot get these names on the voters' lists, and therefore this amendment fails entirely to meet the case. This amendment provides that any person whose name appears as a voter on any voters' list, and because he is disqualified to vote at the provincial election, from the fact of his being an employee of the Dominion or provincial government, shall be qualified to vote at a Dominion election. But that will not enable us to get the names of these persons put on the list. As the law stands, it is impossible to get their names on, and therefore, even with this amendment, they will be disfranchised all the same. I draw the attention of the hon. Solicitor General to this, and ask him that this amendment should be amended as is proposed by the amendment of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk):

Provided that notwithstanding anything in any law of any province no official or employee of the Federal Government or of the provincial or local governments, regular soldiers, or persons enrolled in the military schools or in receipt of wages from either of the governments, shall be disqualified from voting as an elector at any future election for the House of Commons. That will cover the case.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am obliged to say that neither amendment will meet the case. The amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax would, in my judgment, meet the case of Nova Scotia, but these amendments are not sufficient, because they do not provide the machinery. I have an amendment which, I think, will go further than either.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then perhaps it would be as well if my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) would withdraw his amendment to the amendment so that we might hear the amendment of the Solicitor General.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The motion has not been put to it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not wish to weary the House with the contention that has been raised between the hon. leader of the Opposition and myself, but I do feel that, in justice to myself, I should explain the reason why I think he did not do full justice to even my very poor and humble merits as an expositor of the construction of a statute. I pointed out to the House that there was an Act passed in Nova Scotia in the year 1871 or 1872, which continued to exist for some years, under which it was improperly made the duty of the revisers to leave off from the lists the names of persons whom they supposed to be disqualified by virtue of their holding Dominion offices up to with fifteen or thirty days, as the case might be, of the holding of a Dominion election. I pointed out further that very soon it was discovered that the Act required the revisers to have some process of divination by which, months or years before an election, they could discover what Dominion officials would and would not be disqualified at the time an election happened to be pending. My hon. friend has entirely overlooked the fact that it is not Dominion officials, as such, who are disqualified from voting in Nova Scotia, but only those who have been in receipt of wages or emoluments within fifteen or thirty days of a Dominion election. If the hon. gentleman will do me the justice to apply his strong, vigorous intellect to this question, he will see in a moment that I am right, and there is no need for an appeal from Pilate to Cæsar. In fact, I did not suppose there was any appeal from Pilate to Cæsar, but there was an appeal from another functionary to Cæsar. However, I am not going to discuss Scripture with my hon. friend, because on that subject he would be the better authority. But I wish to point out again that it was impossible for the revisers, in making up their lists in February, March or April, to decide that any given official of the Dominion Government would be disqualified or not at the next provincial election in which those lists would be used.

For he would not be disqualified unless he continued to be a Dominion official up to 15 days before the time when the election was held. Therefore, it was discovered that it was an absurd thing to have that statute striking the names off the lists or preventing them going on the lists, and the clause of the statute which contained that enactment was, therefore, very properly repealed, and ever since 1885, if not before, the names of these Dominion officials who possessed the qualifications for voting have always been placed upon the lists. They are placed upon the list at this day, and very properly so, and the revisers, so far from perjuring themselves by putting them on the lists, would perjure themselves if they did not do so—they are bound to put them on the lists, it is their legal duty, and they know their duty so well that they always put them on the lists. I think that is a fair and square statement of the case under the statute and under the existing state of affairs in Nova Scotia.

Now, seeing that a discursive debate is to be held, that hon. gentlemen opposite insist that we shall not be confined to the matters immediately under the attention of the committee, I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend, and of other gentlemen on the other side who are so passionately devoted to the rights of the independent electors of the Dominion, to the way in which the supposed evil inflicted on the country by the Nova Scotia statute of 1871 was remedied by the Dominion Act passed in 1882. They were very anxious about the rights of voters about that time. They discovered that if they adopted the franchise law of the province of Nova Scotia, a number of Dominion officials of various kinds would be disfranchised, officials in the post office, in the custom-house, in the inland revenue department, in the lighthouse service, on Government railroads, in the Crown lands office and in the local public works and mines. These men are entitled to their votes. We say they are entitled to their votes as electors of members for the Dominion Parliament, and we intend to see that their votes shall be preserved them by an Act of this Parliament. Well, what did these hon. gentlemen do to give these men the franchise and remove that mischief? So far as I can understand, and unless something can be pointed out to me to justify a different conclusion, I say that what they did was to take one favoured class out of these proscribed classes and give the vote to that class and to no other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is that the subject before the Chair?

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) is very sensitive now about wandering from the subject before the Chair. We are discussing the law of Nova Scotia and it is necessary for us to go into the history of the enactments in that connection. I propose to read an amendment put upon the Statute-book of the Dominion on a similar line to the one which we propose to-day, to show how much more restricted it is. Here is the amendment:

Notwithstanding anything in the law of the province of Nova Scotia or of the Dominion of Canada, no employee of the Intercolonial Railway in that province shall be disqualified to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, if he shall have the necessary property and other qualifications therefor required by law. In the event of the name of any such elector being an employee of the Intercolonial Railway, having been omitted by the revisers from the lists of qualified voters for a member of the General Assembly of Nova Scotia under the laws in force in that province, or to be returned to the county clerks or clerks of the peace, or omitted from the lists of voters deposited by the sheriff with the county clerks or clerks of the peace or obtained by the returning officer, or furnished to the deputy returning officer, it shall be lawful for such employee to vote as an elector at any future election of a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, on his taking or offering to take before the sheriff or returning officer the following oath:—

Now, were there no other persons than employees of the Intercolonial Railway disfranchised by the Act which the hon. gentleman characterized as so iniquitous and unjust? What about those in the post office, in the custom-house, in the Inland Revenue Department, in the lighthouse, on Government railroads, and in the Crown lands office, and in the local public works and mines? If I am right—and I am ready to receive light on the subject, and will be glad to receive it at this moment, if the hon. gentleman can show me that I am mistaken—if I am right, they left out all these disfranchised people except those on the Intercolonial Railway. Those they could take. I suppose, on trolleys and vote them where they wanted to, and those who would not vote for them they could conveniently arrange to have trolled away on railway service somewhere else. They could do as has been explained by the Minister of Railways, who gave us an exposition on the subject of shingles a year ago.—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All of which was false.

Mr. RUSSELL. But this was not false, because it remains on the permanent records of Parliament. These gentlemen enfranchised those officials whom they could control and make use of in elections, and left out the others. They remind one of the humour of Artemus Ward who used to amuse us years ago with the recital of an effort to arouse indignation on the subject of the wrongs and agonies of the slave. Doesn't your blood bile when you hear their chains clank?" he asks, and the answer is "Nary a bile; let 'em clank." Their blood did not bile for these men in the post office, the lighthouse service, the Crown Law Office, the Public Works and Mines. The fine dramatic frenzy of the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who sits beside him was restricted exclusively to the case of the Intercolonial Railway officials. There is another hon. gentleman here who grows very fervent, he has extreme passionate fervors of moral indignation about things that are improper and unjust. I refer to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill). I am always glad to hear him, for I believe his fervors are genuine, every thrill and every tremor is genuine and sincere. I listen to him always with the greatest interest. I regard him almost as a means of grace, it is the next thing to going to church to listen to him. I want to know if he is aware of what a vast field there is here for the exercise of these holy emotions that kindle and warm the heart and illumine the conscience. I present this case to him, because I know that when he has looked into it and sees the wrong done to so many people under the guise of a remedy for a wrong inflicted by a provincial statute, he will one day indulge us with an exhibition of this fervor of moral enthusiasm with which he so often moves and thrills the House.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, we who desire to go on with the discussion of the matter before the Chair must protest—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I have listened with pleasure to the hon. member for Halifax telling us of the Act which restored the votes of these Dominion officials in Nova Scotia. But the hon. gentleman should have gone a little further. He should have told this House how it was that that clause came to be upon the Statute-book. It was not on a general discussion of the Franchise Act or of the franchise of Nova Scotia or of the different provinces, but it came up exceptionally in connection with another Act that was being put through this House, which Act was called the Representation Act—"An Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, and for other purposes." When that Act was put through this House, there was nothing at all said with reference to restoring the franchise to these disfranchised people in Nova Scotia. But when it came to the Senate, the senators, who were more thoroughly imbued than any other representatives of Nova Scotia, with the iniquity of this disfranchisement of the people employed in the Intercolonial Railway, introduced an amendment, and when the Bill came back to this House, the amended Bill was put through in the form in which it stands at the present time. So, it was not upon a general discussion of the franchise as worked in Nova Scotia that that clause was put upon the Statute-book, it was put there incidentally.

If you were to look at the discussion which took place, you will see that even that was opposed by the Hon. Edward Blake, and by other members on the Liberal side of the House. There was not any motion made by the Liberals of that day that the lighthouse keepers or other Dominion officials in Nova Scotia should be restored to the list. But this Act was put there incidentally to the general Act which I have recited. Now I want to speak with reference to the amendment that is now before the House. I congratulate the promoter of the Bill upon the attempt that he has made to restore the franchise to those officials in Nova Scotia and throughout Canada, for that is the object of the amendment which he is about to propose, I believe. But I desire emphatically to point this out to him, and I point it out with a good deal of modesty, not that I am entirely certain, but simply because I have a desire that there should be no misunderstanding in these matters. If this Act is to be placed upon the Statute-book we will find, in Nova Scotia particularly, that the lists will be prepared by men who can be confused by every lawyer that might come up, on one side or the other; and we want the law made so plain that they will not be confused, that they will know what they are doing. What is the law now with reference to this matter in Nova Scotia? With the permission of the House I will read it:

The following persons, if of the full age of twenty-one years and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of this Act, or otherwise by law prevented from voting, should be entitled to have their names entered upon the list of electors provided for by the sections of this Act, and if so entered, shall be entitled to vote at elections of members to serve in the House of Assembly.

Then it goes on to give us the different clauses of the enfranchisement Act. Now how are "they otherwise prevented from voting?" That is the point to which I wish to draw particular attention. I do it in all modesty, not being absolutely sure of my contention, but I think I am right. How are they otherwise prevented from voting? I say they are otherwise prevented from voting by an affidavit presented to them as they enter the polls, and by which they will have to swear before they can vote, that they have not been for the last 15 days—I think it is 15—in receipt of pay or emolument as a Dominion official. If that is not "otherwise preventing them from voting," I should like to know what is. If that is so, then they are not entitled to go on the list. At all events, if that is not so, I take this ground, that it is very easy to convince a reviser who is not a lawyer, a partisan reviser, who wants to give all the doubts in favour of his own party, it is easy to make him believe it is so. When a Dominion official, who happens to be a Tory voter, comes up, they will say: This man is otherwise prevented from voting, he cannot get on this reviser's list. Therefore his name is dropped, and not being on the list, he cannot vote for a member of this House. Now, I put that before the Solicitor General. It may not be the law, but I say the effect is precisely the same as if it were the law, the effect is the same upon the revisers, who are not learned in the law, and who, if they have any doubt, and being partisans, will always give the benefit of the doubt to their own side, and they will do what partisan lawyers or partisan heelers will attempt and coerce them to do. Therefore, I ask the Solicitor General to make it absolutely sure that there can be no mistake with reference to this matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Solicitor General stated that he did not approve either of the amendment of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), nor of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell). I think it would be a great convenience to the committee if the hon. gentleman would move his amendment now, or else let us know what its terms are to be.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not prepared to move an amendment at the present time, but I will draft an amendment and submit it to the Government, and bring it down at a future day. But I am prepared now to state the lines upon which we intend to go. I am of the opinion that the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax does not go quite far enough, because there are some provinces, particularly Manitoba and British Columbia, in which a public official would not be on the list at all; therefore his amendment would not apply to cases arising in those provinces. In my amendment I propose to provide for two different cases, the case of a province, for instance, in which a Dominion official would be on the list, but who would not have the right to vote; then I also endeavour to provide for those cases which may arise in provinces where the Dominion official would not be on the list at all. I do not think I could accept the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, because it does not provide for any machinery. In the case of a man not being on the list of voters for a Dominion election, something must be done to enable him to exercise the right to vote. I think we would have some difficulty in passing a law here which would oblige local officials to put upon their lists Dominion Government officials who would not have a right to vote in local elections. We have to protect ourselves against that also.

Mr. MONK. I merely wanted the House to sanction the principle, and leave it to the Solicitor General to provide the machinery.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to call attention to the fact that in the province of Ontario it is an utter impossibility for Dominion officials who are proscribed by the Act from voting, to appear on a local list at all. The list is first prepared and printed, and after it is exhibited, appeals may be made against it. Upon showing to the county court judge that these parties are prevented by the Act from voting, he strikes them off that list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think he has any right to do that. I take it that there is a vast distinction between the voters' lists and an election Act. In Ontario a man who is a Dominion official has a right to be on the list, but when he goes to exercise his right to vote, then he is met with the disqualification of section 4, the disqualification of the Election Act, but up to that time he cannot be dealt with. He must remain on the list, and being on the list, for instance, on the eve of an election, surely he cannot be cut out of his right to vote.

Mr. BENNETT. I submit according to the Act, which clearly says he shall not vote, that on appeal being made to the county court judge, who is the official that presides at these trials, he would have a perfect right to say that the party being then such Government official, had not a right to vote. Let me point out this fact, that there is nothing in the Election Act—and I am distinguishing that now from the voters' list—which prevents a man from voting if he presents himself to vote, if he is able to take the oath, upon being objected to.

But there is nothing in that Act which has reference to the fact that a custom-house officer, or excise officer, or any of the class is proscribed. So it must necessarily follow that, as regards Ontario, some clause must be framed to meet the class of voters which will be struck from the voters' lists.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My intention is to meet that point.

Mr. McINERNEY. When do you propose to submit the amendment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. On Monday.

Mr. BENNETT. When the debate commenced, the right hon. First Minister denounced the last Franchise Act, but last night he changed the tune of his remarks and apologized for the difficulties that confronted the House. The hon. gentleman stated that, if amendments were submitted from this side of the House he was prepared to discuss them, with a view to arriving at a mutual understanding and concurrence in the measure. It must be plain, from the discussion on what is only a slight defect, as compared with other defects that will be pointed out, that the Act cannot by any possibility go into effect. I would suggest that, as Saturday intervenes, a committee might be appointed from both sides of the House to see if it is not possible to arrive at a basis with respect to this Bill. It is obvious at the present time that the discussion may go on indefinitely on this line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can quite understand the desire of the hon. Solicitor General to have time to consider this question, in regard to which we have had a most interesting discussion, and he can obtain that time between now and Monday. But I might suggest, that it is impossible to proceed, in the absence of the clause or amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes to submit. I ask the leader of the House and the Solicitor General, whether it would not be the wisest course to adjourn the debate until Monday, because I am afraid, otherwise, we shall lose the entire evening. We are, in fact, beating the wind, when we are discussing a clause in the Bill in regard to which the Solicitor General proposes to submit an amendment, especially in view of the fact that it deals with a vital question. I think we would really promote the business of the House by adjourning the debate until Tuesday.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not my intention to move an amendment to the section under discussion, but to introduce a substantive clause to relieve the particular condition pointed out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It amounts to the same thing. We cannot continue the discussion in the face of the communication made by the Solicitor General. We have now two amendments before the committee. I suggested to my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) to withdraw his amendment—the amendment was not submitted, but the hon. gentleman stated what he proposed to move—and to deal with the matter at a later period of the debate. The leader of the House must see the necessity, under the circumstances, of adjourning the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think the answer given by the Solicitor General is conclusive. I understand, from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that he only wanted to affirm a certain principle and to leave the Solicitor General to provide the machinery, and he would not press his amendment. I understand, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) will not press his amendment. The section can, therefore, be carried, the Solicitor General having promised to introduce an amendment at the next sitting. I suggest to proceed with the consideration of the Bill, which will not go through committee until the Solicitor General has brought in his amendment. There is no reason, at all events, why we should not consider other sections, leaving this clause, with the understanding that it will be supplemented by another one, which will be drafted in the direction suggested by the amendments submitted by the hon. members for Jacques Cartier and Halifax.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It would be a matter of great convenience to myself to have certain other clauses discussed. I will require the assistance of the members of the committee as regards section "c," which provides the date within which the election lists cannot be attacked by any action of a local legislature, and the committee could very well spend an hour in discussing that point.

Mr. TAYLOR. Have a conference.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend the Solicitor General will see, on a little reflection, that what he proposes is absolutely impracticable. We have reached a cardinal point in the Bill. Not only the Opposition, but a large number of prominent members on the other side of the House supporting the Government, do not agree with this clause, as proposed. Two amendments have been moved by hon. members supporting the Government. No progress can be made under the circumstances, and the evening sitting will be entirely wasted, if the clause as suggested is not adopted and the debate adjourned. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Bennett) also moved an amendment, but it cannot be discussed until the Solicitor General has submitted his proposition to the committee. If the Solicitor General had been prepared to submit his amendment at once, it could have been considered during the recess and discussed at the evening sitting, but he was not prepared to do so, and, no doubt, he acted wisely in taking further time to prepare it. I cannot understand why the Government should hesitate, anxious as we all are to deal in a business-like way with this measure and pass it as promptly as possible, to adopt my suggestion and adjourn the debate.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must confess, that I cannot understand why my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition insists so strongly upon having the debate adjourned, for difficulties arise on every Bill, and sometimes, when amendments are proposed, a clause is allowed to stand, and the committee proceeds to consider the other sections. That happens on nearly every occasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you allow this clause to stand, then we may take up other portions of the Bill; I do not object to that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am quite willing to do either one or the other, but not to adjourn the debate. The amendments do not propose to vary the texts, but they propose to make an addition to the Bill. My hon. friend the Solicitor General proposes to have the section carried, and he pledged himself that he would bring in an amendment. If it be more acceptable to my hon. friend, the clause can stand and we could proceed with the Bill this evening.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Paragraph "a" of this clause can stand and we can discuss the other clauses.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

NICKEL STEEL COMPANY OF CANADA.

On the Order,

House in Committee on Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Nickel Steel Company of Canada.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I would ask the House, if possible, to allow this Bill to go through to-night, as I am not well, and would like to get away to catch the train to go home. It has been through two committees, and I would feel obliged if the House would grant me this indulgence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think any person will be disposed to object to that. This Bill, which was referred to the Railway Committee, has received careful consideration of that committee and has met with its approval, and I should imagine that there can be no objection to the measure being passed under the circumstances.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It may be done, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Bill considered in committee, reported and read the third time and passed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Canada Atlantic Transit Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 50) to incorporate the Ottawa, Montreal and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Montreal and Province Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Tamagougue Railway Company.—(Mr. McHugh.)

Bill (No. 78) respecting the St. John Bridge and Railway Extension Company.—(Mr. Ellis.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Brockville and St. Lawrence Bridge Company.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

LONDON AND LAKE HURON RAILWAY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the London and Lake Huron Railway.—(Mr. Lister.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LISTER. I want to re-insert section 14 which was struck out by the Railway Committee, and I move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BERGERON. Has notice been given of it?

Mr. LISTER. No.

Mr. BERGERON. You cannot do it.

Mr. LISTER. Then I ask that the Bill stand over.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman read the section he proposes to insert?

Mr. LISTER. It is as follows:—

Provided that, with the assent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over highways, the company may go on putting up telegraph and electric poles.

The chairman of the Railway Committee said that this was provided for in the general Railway Act, and, therefore, this section, which was in the Bill, was entirely unnecessary; but I find, on looking over the Railway Act, that it does authorize the erection of telegraph and electric poles for the purpose of carrying electricity and so on, but not for the purpose of motive power, and that was the purpose of this section.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under those circumstances, I think that notice is not required.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the clause in the general Bill cover the case? These poles are for carrying electricity.

Mr. LISTER. It covers the case of electric poles for lighting purposes, and to make the Act perfectly clear I propose to insert this section.

Mr. BERGERON. The objection I have is this. This Bill was before the Railway Committee and there thoroughly discussed, and now the House is asked to revise what was done by the Railway Committee and make an amendment without notice having been given of it. I do not want my hon. friend to imagine that I desire to prevent him putting the clause, but the reason a notice is required is that every hon. member should have an opportunity of seeing what the amendment is like. When anything is passed upon by the Railway Committee, it is a serious matter to change it.

Mr. LISTER. If the committee knew that we had not this power in the general Railway Act, they would have passed section 14, because there was no objection whatever to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman states that there was no objection to this clause, but that it was merely stricken out in consequence of the belief that the power asked for is authorized by the general Railway Act. After careful examination, the hon. gentleman finds that, at all events, there is a doubt, and I may say that what he has stated is my recollection of what took place in the committee. I think, therefore, this is a case in which we need not insist on a notice.

Mr. LARIVIERE. The only objection is that you will thereby establish a precedent which may be a dangerous one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does not establish any precedent.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No doubt my hon. friend has correctly stated the circumstances under which the section was stricken out. The chairman of the Railway Committee stated quite positively that it was not necessary to incorporate this 14th clause in the Bill, because it would be found in the general Act. I was aware myself that the Railway Act did provide for the use of electricity as a motive power in the propulsion of railway cars, and I thought, therefore, that the chairman might be correct in the statement he made. But in strictness I think that perhaps he was in error, and as there is a doubt, I hope there will be no objection to this amendment, any more than there usually is to our agreeing to a good many things which are clearly right and undisputed.

Mr. BERGERON. With these explanations, I withdraw my objection.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Clause 5 will stand. Clause 6.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was agreed that we should allow the clause we were discussing to stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Clause 5 is to stand.

Mr. McINERNEY. The whole clause, or only subsection "a."?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why should we not take up subsection "b" of clause 5?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And merely allow subsection "a" to stand over? Yes, I think that would answer the purpose.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Then, we go on with subsection "b."

(b) The polling divisions shall be those established or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections within the territory comprised in the electoral district for which such election is held.

Mr. McINERNEY. I wish to move an amendment to that clause, in line with the remarks that I made yesterday evening. The hon. Solicitor General will remember that I brought up a few cases in which it would be perfectly impossible to apply the Dominion Procedure Act in elections to the local districts. I named some cases in which in the local subdivisions for local elections there were from 800 to 1,000 names on the local list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be in New Brunswick?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes. It is very easy to poll these votes in the local elections, because the ballot is entirely different. In our local election, the canvassers have the ballots outside the polling booth, the names of the candidates being written or printed on the ballot. A man may leave home with the name of the candidate he wishes to vote for written on a ballot, and this he hands to the returning officer, and, if he has the right to vote, the ballot is put in the box. Our elections are held sometimes in the summer time, and very often an open window in some public building, a schoolhouse or something of that kind is taken; the ballot-box is in the window, and the returning officer sitting immediately behind it, with the representatives of the different candidates. The voter comes up to the window and gives his name; the returning officer takes the ballot and puts it in the box. And so it is easy to poll from 800 to 1,000 votes a day. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr.

Blair) will bear me out in saying that in some parishes in the county of Kent in the elections in which he took part, we poll as high as 600 and 700, and even 800 votes, but that cannot be done with the Dominion Elections Act, the Dominion ballot or the Procedure Act with regard to the federal election. Therefore, I submit, this clause cannot apply. The clause taking the local subdivisions and applying the Dominion Act to them would bring about a deadlock, it seems to me, on the day of election. I, therefore, move in amendment :

Provided there shall not be more than 300 voters in any subdivision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Perhaps, my hon. and learned friend would permit me to make an observation which may get over the difficulty. Under the election law of the province of New Brunswick, I find that the whole province is divided up into subdistricts, and the statute fixes the polling places in such subdistricts. It is provided, by amendment to the statute, that :

When the number of voters on the list in any one polling subdistrict exceeds four hundred, it shall be lawful for the returning officer to provide two boxes for such subdistrict, dividing the registered list of the voters alphabetically, so as to allow as nearly as may be an equal number of voters to deposit their ballots in each box, and for that purpose the returning officer may employ such additional clerks or deputies as may be required, and a separate check list, statement and return shall be kept and made for and in respect of each division of any such polling subdistrict.

I apprehend that what my hon. friend would like is some such provision for the Dominion elections, in order to avoid the difficulty he points out. In view of what has been said in the course of the debate, and seeing the force of the objections raised by the hon. gentleman and others on the other side of the House, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals prepared an amendment which, I think, will meet the difficulty.

Where a polling division has more than 250 qualified voters, according to the voters' list, the returning officer shall provide separate and additional polling stations or rooms, according to the total number of qualified voters on the voters' list, near to one another for the polling of the votes in such polling division, and so that no more than 250, nor when practicable not less than 200, qualified voters' names shall be on the list for each polling station or room.

(2) The returning officer in such cases shall prepare, or cause to be prepared from the voters' list for the polling division a separate list for each polling station or room, made up in alphabetical order according to the initial letter of the surname of each voter. Each separate polling station or room shall be designated with the initial letters of the voters on the lists who are to vote in such station or room in the following manner, that is to say : from A to K, and from L to R, and from S to Z, or as the case may be.

(3) Every voter, the initial of whose name shall be included within the letters of the alphabet designating a polling station or room, and contained in such list shall vote in the station or room so designated. The returning officer shall appoint a deputy returning officer for each station or room, and shall deliver to such deputy in due time a list certified by him to be a correct list of all voters on the voters' list whose surnames commence with the letters of the alphabet included within the letters by which such polling stations or rooms are designated.

That will provide for each congested district, such as that referred to by my learned and hon. friend, so that each polling station shall not have more than 250 qualified voters.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would propose an amendment that there shall not be more than 400 voters on any list for any polling subdivision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Let me point out that the polling subdivisions are under the control of the local legislature in New Brunswick, and when that legislature says that they shall extend over a certain territorial area, we must make some provision for polling the votes in that area. Then we want to adopt the very same system they have in New Brunswick for local elections.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think it is absolutely necessary to cut down the number to 250, or 200. My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) shows me a subdivision in his county in which there are 398 names on the list under the old Franchise Act we have repealed. In many subdivisions there are over 300 votes. It does not necessarily follow that because there are 300 votes on the list, we are going to poll 300 on election day. If you poll 240, you poll a very large average. It is easy to poll close on 300 votes, even under the Dominion Election Procedure Act. Therefore, I think that 250 is rather a low figure. But the amendment which is to be proposed by the Solicitor General is one that must meet with considerable opposition, I think, because it gives such tremendous powers, immediately preceding an election, into the hands of a man who is a political nominee. A returning officer is a political nominee, he is a man named by the party in power for the purpose of conducting the election, and he is named from the ranks of the party in power. He is always a man who sides with them in politics. It would be foolish, according to the prevailing ideas, for any administration to put into the hands of the returning officer these tremendous powers unless he was a man belonging to their side of politics, because in certain cases he might have a casting vote. Besides, you give the returning officer the power to subdivide a large district into subdivisions, and to subdivide the lists alphabetically, for instance, one from A to K, one from K to N, and so on. Then you give him in addition the power of saying who shall preside over the subdivisions as deputy returning officers, which is also clothing him with great power. It is one of the difficulties of the Act, I admit, it is one of the difficulties of applying a federal law to a local Franchise Act, it is one of the difficulties that must stare hon. gentlemen opposite in the face. This is a tremendous power to put into the hands of a political nominee. Then, again, I do not think it would meet the case entirely. I will again appeal for corroboration to the Minister of Railways and Canals. He knows the constituency I represent almost as well as I do myself. Take, for instance, the parishes of Dundas and Wellington, large French parishes in the county of Kent. In those parishes a large number of the electors are of one name. Take, for instance, the Leblancs in the parish of Wellington. I do not say that half the electorate of that large parish are of that name, but a very large proportion of them are of that name. And so it is with a number of other family names in those parishes. I, therefore, think that this plan, even of subdividing the names alphabetically from A to E, from E to K, and so on, would not meet the case in such circumstances. I admit the difficulty in a case of this kind, but I must protest putting in the hands of the returning officer, nominated in the heat of an election strife from the ranks of the ruling political party, such tremendous powers as are here given him, and opening up the door to fraud on his part, as such machinery as this would necessarily do. It would be an extremely dangerous thing.

Mr. ELLIS. In the city of St. John we vote precisely in that way under the present law.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does the returning officer on the day of election appoint the deputy returning officers?

Mr. ELLIS. Take, for instance, Prince or Queen's Ward in the city of St. John, in which there are a large number of electors. The returning officer, not on the day of election but some days before, selects his deputies for all the various divisions of that ward. Then he provides them with all the necessary paraphernalia for carrying on the elections on the different lists. I vote in one particular place in my ward on the list of which I find my name. Another elector whose name appears alphabetically below mine, goes to another poll.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman does not see the difficulty we are now dealing with. That is all right, because a ward is divided into subdivisions, but it is not divided into subdivisions alphabetically, the alphabet is not divided up among wards.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, it is.

Mr. McINERNEY. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman, that the whole list for each subdivision is not an alphabetical list beginning with A and ending with Z. The hon. gentleman will not tell me that the alphabet from A to Z is divided into different parts or subdivisions. Take King's Ward, for instance. The elector whose name might begin with A would go to one poll, and in the same ward an elector whose name would begin with B, would necessarily have to go to another poll.

Mr. ELLIS. That is just what I told my hon. friend.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think that is the law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The mode of overcoming the difficulty which would necessarily arise where there is a larger number of names on the list than could possibly vote within the hours of polling at one poll, is a matter with which we in New Brunswick are very familiar. We have made provision for it exactly in the way in which this proposed amendment will make such provision. We are familiar with it, not only in our municipal and provincial elections, but also in our Dominion elections. I remember that in the city of St. John I voted at one polling booth because the initial letter of my name was such as it is; and another gentleman who lived alongside of me, whose name comes a little lower down in the alphabet, has a vote at another polling booth within the same polling division. I am speaking at this moment of Dominion elections.

With respect to local elections I do not recollect the particular circumstances. It is a very common practice in the county the hon. gentleman represents. We have found it necessary in one or two of the parishes, probably in two or three parishes more populous than others, to divide up the list exactly in the same way as is proposed in this Bill. I am quite at a loss to understand why the hon. gentleman thinks an opportunity will be afforded for fraud or wrong-doing. No one has suggested fraud or wrong-doing under the operation of our provincial Act. When this plan was devised in connection with the provincial election law, as it was under the provincial Act of 1891, no one suggested any possibility of wrong-doing occurring, and from that year down to the present day I have never heard of any returning officer of any of the districts doing wrong, either in omitting names or placing names on the lists that should not appear there. I think there is no foundation for the fears the hon. gentleman entertains. The amendment which he has prepared, but which he has not moved, would be found very faulty when it came to be worked out. He has not gone far enough to provide for conditions which will certainly arise and which are fundamental, which would, however, be fully dealt with in the clause submitted by the Solicitor General. This matter has not been entirely overlooked, because when the Franchise Act was introduced last session it contained a similar clause to the amendment framed with a view to meeting the conditions which arise in New Brunswick at least. I do not think they are likely to arise elsewhere. In other provinces, except perhaps Prince Edward Island, they have been using practically the Australian ballot, whereas in New Brunswick our elections have been conducted under the old system, under which a man writes his name on the ballot and deposits it, and under which system more persons can register their votes than under the more complicated methods provided under the Dominion Elections Act. But I cannot see where the trouble will arise in the working out of the clause as proposed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as my recollection goes, there is no such thing done in Dominion elections as writing out the lists alphabetically. My recollection is that they are arranged territorially. When the voters are so numerous as to require a division of the list, the division is made territorially and the voters go to the most convenient place to vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman is not correct. Section 23 of the Electoral Franchise Act is framed on the same principle and mode suggested by the Minister of Railways, with this one exception, that it is done by the revising officer instead of by the returning officer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Notice is given by the revising officer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Subsection 5 provides that immediately after such revision the revising officer shall prepare a list for each polling district, containing alphabetically the names of all voters residing in such polling district. The same principle of alphabetical order is prescribed by the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885 as is suggested here.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We provided in this amendment against the possibility of a person being deprived of his vote by having to go to another place different from where he supposed he was entitled to vote, and in case of subdivision of the list providing two polling booths close together. If a man found that he could not vote in section "a," he would find the polling booth for section "b" only a short distance away.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have here a copy of the polling list for a number of the districts in my county, and the voters' lists for two or three incorporated towns as arranged under the Dominion Franchise Act. The subdivisions are made territorially and the list alphabetically. I will read a description of a polling district :

Mr. BLAIR.

Beginning at a point on the Cow Bay road where the same is intersected by the eastern boundary of the town of Sydney ; thence northerly, following the boundary of the said town of Sydney, to the junction of the Low Point Road with a road leading to the shore near the International pier ; thence following said road to the shore ; thence west into the harbour to the centre thereof ; thence following up the centre of the harbour to a point opposite the street known as Prince William Henry Street ; thence easterly to and along Prince William Henry Street and the old Cow Bay Road, to the place of commencement.

That is a territorial description of the district. The voters' names are put down in alphabetical order within those boundaries. It does not require, as the Minister of Railways stated, a man to go out of his territorial subdivision to vote in another territorial subdivision.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is so in all provincial elections.

Mr. McDUGALL. But we are dealing with Dominion elections and Dominion voters' lists.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. Minister made a statement with respect to the Dominion election law in which he was quite wrong. Both Ministers were mistaken as to what the law is, and yet he endeavoured to put me down because I stated the opposite view. One of those hon. gentlemen stated that at St. John he voted at a poll because the initial letter of his was "b," while another gentleman voted at another subdivision because his name began with another letter. The hon. gentleman must be mistaken, because there is no Dominion law that enables him to do so, or to authorize a returning officer to divide a list in two parts and proceed alphabetically. He must divide it territorially and then proceed with the names from "a" to "z." When the hon. Minister of Railway tells me that at the local elections in Kent we have done so, he is wrong, and the hon. gentleman will admit I know something about those elections. The only instance in which there was a subdivision was when the hon. gentleman himself divided Dundas, as the delimiting line was so indefinite that it was easily overlooked. The delimiting line made by the legislature of New Brunswick, in the parish of Dundas in that election, was so indefinite that the sheriff, who was returning officer, did not know how to make up the list at that time, but it never happened in the county of Kent, or in the province of New Brunswick, as far as I know, that the list was divided by cutting the alphabet into pieces. In the Dominion law there cannot be any mistake about it, because the law has never given any such power, and therefore the two hon. gentlemen were absolutely mistaken.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I was proceeding to show that under the present franchise law the practice has been to put on the list for each subdivision a much larger number of voters' names than is proposed by the amendment now submitted to the House. I have here the list for nine subdivisions within the county I have the honour to represent, and if I had all the lists, I think I would have three or four more which show the names of over 300 voters and up to nearly 400 in a polling subdivision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Two hundred is the limit.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot understand how that can be. I am going by what has been done by the revising barrister, who is a lawyer, and no fault was found with his action, either by the voters or by anybody connected with the exercise of the franchise in respect to the number of votes on each list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Under the local law the limit is 400, but in the federal law the limit varies from 200 to 300.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Be that as it may, I have here one polling subdivision with 348 names, another with 357, another with 391 names, another with 358 names, another with 346 names, another with 359 names, another with 386 names, another with 344 names.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then the revising barrister was not doing his duty.

The PRIME MINISTER. All that is illegal.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There must be something in the Act which permits it being done, or otherwise I imagine this revising officer would not do it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is nothing in the Act to permit it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have here another list with 333 names, and among those I find 153 of the same name—McNeills. I would like to know how a returning officer appointed by the Government, a man who may live twenty or thirty miles away and who does not know half a dozen men in the district, could go to work at short notice and subdivide that district and select the names that are going into each subdivision of that district, which may be some seven or eight miles in extent. It is not going to add to the convenience of the people to subdivide that district into two subdivisions for polling purposes, and especially so if it is done under the plan proposed by the Minister of Railways. If the subdivision of the district takes place, I am satisfied that the people of the district will insist that the polling booth would be put at a convenient part of the district, say one booth in the centre of each subdivision. Now for a returning officer to go to work and be able to make up a proper intelligent and practical list at short notice and he a perfect stranger, would be an utter impossibility, and would lead to confusion and dissatisfaction. In my experience in running elections since the Act came into operation, and before the present Act came into operation under our local Acts, people voted in a subdivision to the number of 300 and over 300. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries shakes his head.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not dispute what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) says, but I say the law does not provide for it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I never saw any difficulty arising because of the number of names on the list. I know that in my own particular subdivision it never took us more than one-half the time allotted for voting to vote the 300 names. There is another objection which will arise in multiplying the number of subdivisions. The Government must see that by this Act they do not provide for the expenses of any work connected with the making of the list or the arrangement of subdivisions, and if they increase the number of subdivisions they increase the expenses proportionately. They not only increase the expenses for returning officers, but they put an increased expense upon the municipalities by creating these subdivisions.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, you do.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not listened to the suggestions made in the proposed amendment. It is not that the municipality should subdivide the list, but that the returning officer should do it. He is an officer of the Dominion Government, and any expense he incurs must be paid by the Dominion Government. It would not throw the expense upon the municipality.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Minister will find that in a subsequent clause of this Bill the officer of the municipality is obliged to furnish copies of the lists and of the subdivisions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The proposal made by the Solicitor General was that in cases where the returning officer found the names on the list exceeded a certain number, the returning officer should himself divide them into subdivisions and provide different polls in these subdivisions. The expense of that would fall upon the Dominion.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Then this work would have to be done within a few days of the election, and my experience is that even at present it frequently occurs that up to perhaps a day or two before the election we cannot get the necessary information from the officers in regard to where the voters shall vote. Under this provision the returning officer will subdivide the district within a few days of polling day, and one-half the people of that district will not know where to vote. In a sparsely settled district, perhaps ten miles in length and seven or eight miles in depth, the people will not know where to vote, and it will cause great inconvenience.

Mr. BENNETT. Should not this proviso be added: That in this alphabetical distribution of the lists, it should be provided that there shall be under each of the subdivisions at least 350 names on the list. It is quite possible to poll 300 votes in a division, and I know it is done in our riding. The reason of that is quite plain. If it were left to the discretion of every returning officer to allot the polling divisions as he pleases, there would be no end of expense, because one returning officer might have the idea that there should be only 100 names in a polling division, and another might think there should be 400.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like to point out to my hon. friend, that, by this Act, we are adopting the polling subdivisions fixed by the local legislature. The difficulty suggested here arises from the law of the province of New Brunswick. There, the whole province is divided into subdistricts by the statute, not by the returning officer. The result is, that there may be as many as 500, 600 or 700 voters in one district. By the local law it is provided that, when the number of voters on the list in one polling subdistrict exceeds 400, it shall be lawful for the returning officer to provide two polling boxes in such subdistrict; so that, though all the electors may come to one central spot to vote, the returning officer shall have two boxes where the number of votes exceeds 400.

Mr. GILLIES. In fact, two separate booths at the one place.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, or both boxes may be in one booth. The intention is, that under the federal law, where a polling subdivision is created by the provincial law in which the number of voters exceeds 250, there shall be a separate polling booth or a separate box for each 250 voters.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the point I was calling attention to—that 250 names in one polling division is too small a number, because it is possible to poll 300 votes in one division; and I suggest that the number of names should not be less than 350.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As I know nothing of the local conditions in New Brunswick, I cannot say whether there would be any objection to fixing the number at 350 or not. At first sight, I do not see that there would be any objection. In the Dominion Franchise Act the number is put at 300.

Mr. FOSTER. For subdivision territorially.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, but in the way that I read the Act, there would not be more than 200 votes.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. This may be all right for the provinces where the density of the population will permit such an arrangement, and in the cities and towns, where the alphabetical lists can be used. But in the western provinces, where the population is sparse, it would not work at all. In fact, in such cases, I believe there should be a proviso for a poll to be held in certain places where the number of voters would not reach 300 or 250. We have in Manitoba and the North-west small settlements at great distances from the towns, and it would be unfair to expect those people to travel 50, 60 or 80 miles, as the case might be, sometimes where there are no roads at all, to reach the polling place to record their votes. I hope the Solicitor General will see his way to insert a proviso, that, where a settlement would be so small and so far from the polling place, a poll might be held at a more central point. The Minister of the Interior knows that there are settlements along our northern lakes in Manitoba—Lake Winnipeg, Lake Dauphin, Lake Manitoba and Shoal Lake—where there are not more than 50, 60 or perhaps 100 votes. These people would be compelled to go to the more thickly settled portions of the province to record their votes, because they are not sufficiently numerous to have a polling division by themselves. I would, therefore, ask that in Manitoba, and perhaps the Territories as well, the subdivisions be made, not alphabetically, but according to the territory, and that in special cases distance should be taken into consideration, in order to facilitate the voters in small settlements recording their votes.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Has my hon. friend had his attention called to subsection "e" of section 5?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to ask the hon. Solicitor General's opinion with respect to districts that are less than 200 or less than 150. What would he propose to do under this Act? Suppose there were two districts sparsely settled, in which there are only perhaps 100 or 150 voters, what are we to do in that case?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is only in the case of such an emergency as that which the hon. member for Kent has pointed out, that this section will be put into operation.

Mr. McINERNEY. What I protest against is, not so much the proposed meeting of the difficulty, because about the only way in which it can be met is that which my hon.

friend proposes, namely, the subdivision of the districts alphabetically, but against the tremendous power you are putting into the hands of a nominee, just before an election, to divide the lists and make three or four subdivisions in a general division. Before whom is this to be done? There is no date fixed on which it is to be done. It may be done the night before the election or the morning of the election. It may be done in the dark. It is a dangerous power to give to any man who is a political nominee, just on the eve of an election, and in the heat of an election. I protest against it on that ground, and I would call the Solicitor General's attention to this fact. I may be mistaken in regard to this, but I think there was an amendment to the Electoral Franchise Act previous to the last revision which gave the revising officer power to do just what was done in the county of Cape Breton. If my hon. friend will turn to the Franchise Act of 1885, he will find that section 41 does restrict the number of voters in each polling district to 200, but, if he will turn to the amending Act of 1886, he will find that the words "two hundred" in that section are changed to three hundred. It says:

Section 41 is hereby amended by striking out the words "two hundred" in the second line thereof and inserting the words "three hundred."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If my hon. friend will look at the Consolidated Statutes, he will see that the limit is two hundred.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) says is correct, but it applies only to the first paragraph of the section.

Mr. McINERNEY. What I was calling attention to was, that section 41 of the Act of 1885 limited the revising officer to putting 200 names on the list, but that that section 41 was repealed by section 11 of the Act of 1886—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Forty-one Victoria, chapter 3.

Mr. McINERNEY—which gave him the power of putting three hundred, instead of two—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. McINERNEY—By striking out the words "two hundred," in the third line thereof, and inserting "three hundred."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is the first part of the section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In order to avoid difficulty, I think I can give a history of the legislation. The first law is 48-49 Vic., chapter 40, section 41, which fixed the number at two hundred, in the third line of the section. Then, by 48-49 Vic., chapter 3, section 11, "two hundred," in the third line is changed to "three hundred," but the words "two hundred," in the concluding portion of the first paragraph of that section are not touched.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is perfectly true, and that is the right history of the law, as far as the hon. gentleman has gone. But section 41 provides that, whenever the number of voters in any polling district, as constituted under section 21, shall increase so as to exceed two hundred, they shall be divided. That was amended so as to provide that whenever the voters shall increase so as to exceed three hundred, then the returning officer shall have the power to divide.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is right.

Mr. McINERNEY. But if my hon. friend will turn to section 18 of the amending Act of 1886, he will find it provides:

In the present year, 1886, it shall not be necessary, in any case in which the preliminary list of voters has been made for a polling district constituted under the laws enforced at the time of the passing of the said Act, and which does not contain the names of more than 300 voters.

That provides that in that year, in case it does not exceed three hundred, there shall be no division.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is right.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am of the opinion, that in that way, and previous to the revision of 1894—the last revision, I think—there was an Act passed by this Parliament, giving revising officers the power of extending the list even beyond three hundred for subdivisions, and that, in accordance with that, the revising officer in the county of Cape Breton acted, and put this large number upon the list. I believe that to be the law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You will find it is not the law.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does my hon. friend think that these legal gentlemen in the different provinces, county court judges and others who make a study of these things, do not know the law?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am perfectly satisfied that, if the hon. gentleman will look at it, he will see what the law is.

Mr. McINERNEY. The point I make is, that shortly before 1894, there was an amending Act, authorizing the revising officers to put a larger number on the list than three hundred without subdividing. That appears to have been done under the amending Act of 1886. They were not bound to be divided when they found not more than three hundred on the list, and I believe it was done again, previous to 1894, by an Act of this Parliament giving the revising officers power, where the number did exceed three hundred, to put that number or more on the list without dividing the district, and that was done in accordance with that amending Act, which the revising officer of Cape Breton and other counties acted upon. I have been attending closely to the revision of the lists, and I do not think it would have escaped me, if such had not been the law. I believe that the Solicitor General will find there was an Act passed giving that power to the revising officer. What I protest against is, giving power to a political appointee, such as a returning officer, to divide a large district into divisions and say that from A to B shall vote here, and from B to L somewhere else, and so on, and not state on what day it shall be done or before whom it shall be done, but allow it to be done by himself, perhaps the night before the election. You are opening wide the door to fraud.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What kind of fraud?

Mr. McINERNEY. I shall tell the hon. gentleman. The returning officer might, the night before, or two or three days before, an election, in his own office, take the lists of the district No. 1 and cut up that district, and leave off the lists a certain number of names, either intentionally or unintentionally. He may make a mistake, if he will, or leave them off maliciously. In any case, you are putting tremendous power into his hands. There is no revision over that power which he exercises. It is done before nobody; it is done in no court; no one need be present to see what he does and you give him the power to wipe off the list names of men who may be opposed to him in politics. That is what it means. This man is not a judicial officer, he need not have any great standing in the community. He is appointed by a political party sometimes to do their party work, and you say you are going to give such an individual the power to divide up the votes of the district and cut the alphabet into pieces in the way I have mentioned, and leave off hundreds of men who are entitled to vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. What is going to stop him?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is not to be assumed that we are all blackguards.

Mr. McINERNEY. In making laws, you are not supposed to make any such assumption, but you are not estopped from making it. You are supposed to make laws that will not permit any actions of this kind. You are to guard the public interest. This is not an ordinary law; you are dealing with the rights and privileges of men—you are dealing with the franchise.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please address the Chair.

Mr. McINERNEY.

Mr. McINERNEY. I mean, of course, the House is dealing with the franchise. The sense in which I used the word, I think, was quite parliamentary. You are dealing with the rights and privileges of men, and yet you allow a third party named for political purposes, to take away—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. McINERNEY. This law permits him.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, it does not.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, it gives him the chance.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, not at all.

Mr. McINERNEY. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) tell me how this law prevents it?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Here is a polling subdivision in which a certain number of men are entitled to vote. These men know that they have a right to go to a certain locality and there they will find a polling booth and all the paraphernalia for the exercise of that right. When they reach there, instead of having to deal with one ballot box and one returning officer, they will find they are to deal with two, three or four, and they record their vote in one box or the other, according to the subdivision of the list.

Mr. McINERNEY. But that is not the point.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the very point.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have certainly not made myself plain to the hon. gentleman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) must remember that we are dealing with a serious matter.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am serious. I do not think that the Solicitor General should cast such an insinuation across the floor. I am speaking seriously and I sincerely believe that what I say is true.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The returning officer has not discretion except to subdivide the existing list.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does that prevent him from leaving off half the names?

The PRIME MINISTER. Why should we make separate lists?

Mr. McINERNEY. That is what is proposed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all, he subdivided the existing list.

Mr. McINERNEY. But the existing list cannot be in four places at once.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But it is only one place.

Mr. McINERNEY. It is at four places.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At four booths.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If I understand the matter the local law provides that the polling shall take place at or near a certain place in the subdivision. This does not interfere with that, but, instead of having one polling booth in the place you will have two, three or four, as the number of voters on the lists may require. Therefore, the power of the returning officer, to which the hon. gentleman takes exception, is so limited that it is not possible to carry on the fraud that the hon. gentleman suggests.

Mr. McINERNEY. There has never been an election held under this law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What law? Why, surely the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This law was passed in 1891.

Mr. McINERNEY. I say there never was an election held in the province of New Brunswick under that Act.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not mistaken. I know what I am talking about—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Have you never had an election since 1891?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was going to say that I have run two or three elections under it myself.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does the hon. Minister mean to tell me that in the local by-election in 1892 in which he came into Kent County, and in which his candidate alone received in the one parish of Wellington over 400 votes, and there were 900 votes on the list—

The PRIME MINISTER. What would the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) have to do with that?

Mr. McINERNEY. He was the Attorney General of the province, and it was his business to see that the election was run according to the law.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This became law in April, 1891.

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes, but when was it put in force, and what general election was ever run under it?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It was passed, and the elections must have been run under it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Not necessarily.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, necessarily.

Mr. McINERNEY. The law need not come into operation as soon as it is passed.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It came into operation at once.

Mr. McINERNEY. In many cases laws do not come into operation as soon as they are passed. I have stated the case with regard to the election of 1892, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) cannot deny it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I certainly have no knowledge of the circumstances—

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman ought to know when he was there in Kent County and knew that 400 votes were cast for his one candidate in the parish of Wellington.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not remember whether anyone got that particular number of votes.

Mr. McINERNEY. You ought to remember it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps you may remember.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do remember it perfectly well; it was a matter of very considerable importance, and I do not know how it can have escaped the memory of the hon. gentleman. But I am not concerned with outrages in the province of New Brunswick against what ought to be the law. What I want is to try to make a law for the Dominion that will be in the interests of the people. If I were in the local legislature of New Brunswick, I would protest against such a law, and so far as I know it never was brought into force in the carrying on of any election.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is absolutely in error.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not in error. I was not in error a few moments ago when I stated a thing in contradiction to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), and I am not in error now. He told me that he voted in the Dominion elections at a poll in the city of St. John because his name began with B and a gentleman whose name began with another letter voted in the same subdivision, and I have shown him that it could not be done under the Dominion law, and the Solicitor General substantiates what I say. Now, the hon. gentleman may contradict the statement that I make, and I say that my recollection on the subject is as clear as his and I am as likely to be right as he is. What I protest against in this provision is the tremendous power you are seeking to give to a political nominee just before an election, unrestricted by any person, to cut the list in pieces and leave hundreds of names off the list, intentionally or unintentionally.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must say that I am very much surprised at the mode in which the hon. gentleman is discussing this question. It does not appear to me that whether his recollection as to how many votes were polled and whether one candidate got 400 or more or less at one polling booth is correct or not ought to finally determine a question of this description. I tell the hon. gentleman that the law which was passed in 1891 went into effect when it was assented on the 16th April, 1891, and it declared :

When the number of voters on the list in any one polling subdistrict exceeds 400 it shall be lawful for the returning officer to provide two boxes for such subdistricts, dividing the registered list of voters alphabetically, so as to allow as nearly as may be an equal number of voters to deposit their ballots in each box, and for that purpose the returning officer may employ such additional clerks or deputies as may be required, and a separate check list, statement and return shall be kept and made for and in respect of each division of any such polling subdistrict.

That is the law passed in 1891. The hon. member may remember just what took place on some one or more of the polling subdivisions in his county, I cannot do so.

I was taking an active part in the contest on the occasion which he refers to, but I cannot possibly recollect what votes were polled for the respective candidates at the various polling subdivisions. I much regret that the hon. gentleman thinks I ought to have remembered those important particulars, and that I am not entitled to speak as to whether this Act was in operation, because I cannot at once call to mind the number of votes that were polled. It may have occurred to the hon. gentleman as a remarkable fact worthy of recollection, but I must confess my inability to carry matters of that importance in my mind. The hon. gentleman is not only in error as a matter of recollection, but I should think he would be a little reluctant to make so positive a statement as he has made in face of the existing law. It may be possible that the returning officer did not feel compelled under the statute to make the division in any particular district, because the statute says that when the number of votes exceeds a certain figure it shall be lawful for the returning officer to provide two boxes. There may have been 300, or 450, or 500 in a district, and it may be that the returning officer felt he had the right to exercise a discretion in providing for a subdivision of the poll in the district he refers to. But it nevertheless remains a fact that two elections have been held in the province of New Brunswick since this law passed, and in my own county I know polling districts where there were, side by side, two different polling booths, divided because of the number of votes which were on the list in that polling district. Take, for instance, the city of Fredericton where I myself ordinarily vote. In that city the number of electors is some 1,300 or 1,400, there are no less than four different polling boxes in the town. I may almost say they are within a stone's throw of one another, two in one building and two in another building, two in the court-house—the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) knows where it is—and the other two in the city hall. Those were divided according to the alphabet. That occurred all over the province of New Brunswick, I am sure, though I cannot speak from personal knowledge and say it occurred here or occurred there. I know it must have occurred in Westmoreland, and I think if the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) were here, he would admit at once that in every large parish and polling division in that county there must have been a number of polling divisions in which this alphabetical break-up of the electoral lists took place. It is not open to question that this was the law, and it has been working without any complaint from any quarter, nor until the present moment have I ever heard suggested that there was any possibility of any wrong being done by the operation of that law. The Act I am now reading from was passed at my own instance. I think this very section of the statute which I have read was introduced into the provincial legislature by myself, and no one ever suggested that it would open the door to fraud of any kind. During these two elections I have yet to hear any person suggest that any fraud had taken place under it. Here a list is made up under the provincial law covering a whole polling district, according to the territorial limits laid down in the Act. The returning officer has that list before him, and he knows that every person can have access to that list who desires. For the convenience of the voters, and in compliance with such a provision as this, if it should become law, he divides that list up. If it should happen that a name is left off, it could only occur by accident, I am not willing to suppose the possibility of a man entrusted with a duty of that kind, who had taken his oath to perform his duty faithfully, would willingly omit a name. But should it occur by accident that a name was left off, there would be no difficulty in the voter getting his name put on again. If his name had been left off in the splitting up of that list, he would go to the place where, according to the initial of his name, he would expect to find his name, and if he did not find it there, he would call the attention of the returning officer at the poll to the fact that his name had been dropped, and it could be and would be put on. It would be put on because it is the original list which is the governing list, and which is only divided up for the convenience of the voters alphabetically. This list would be there, open for reference, and accessible to anybody who desired to see it. I cannot understand why my hon. friend should think it necessary to raise such a purely fanciful objection to a reasonable proposition such as is contained in this amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. If my recollection serves me right, the polling places are all stated in the printed proclamation which announces the polling day. But to my mind it seems clear that if a polling division is divided in that way, it would be announced in the proclamation that the voters' named from A to M, for instance, would vote at John Smith's shop, and those from M to Z would vote at Tom Brown's shop. In that way no trouble could arise, such as the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) anticipates. That is on the assumption that the polling places are named before the polling day, in the Dominion Act, and that they are also stated publicly in the proclamation issued by the returning officer prior to the election day. But I submit for the consideration of the Solicitor General that the number of voters in each division should at least be 300. I have been referring to the voters' lists in my own riding, and I find that in one polling division there are 514 names on the list, there were 302 votes polled in that division. If this law goes into effect, as at present anticipated, there being 514 names on the list, there would be three polling divisions in that one district. Now, let it be fixed at the number of 300, then there will be two in that division. I notice in the lists of that riding that there are a number of polling divisions having over 250 names, but not 300. Now, if you restrict it to 250, the result will be that in rural districts you will have to split the division, so to speak, and as two houses may not be close together for the purpose of polling, then a man, not finding his name at one polling place, and not knowing the proclamation and the change, he would be forced perhaps to go a mile or half a mile further to the other place. I trust the Government will see their way clear to allowing 300 names to be on one list, because if there are 300 names on the list, I am sure there will not be over 260 polled.

The PRIME MINISTER. I find by looking at the local Acts that the average number is 200, the limit under the provincial law in Ontario is 200, in Quebec it is 200, in Manitoba 200, in Prince Edward Island 200. But I recognize there is some force in the argument of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). For my part I would have no objection to making the number 300 instead of 200.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The objection I raised a little while ago would still stand, so far as Manitoba is concerned, where the population is not so dense as it is in the eastern provinces. The Solicitor General, when I called his attention to that fact, referred me to subsection "e," which says:

It shall be the duty of the returning officer appointed by the Governor in Council to constitute polling divisions, and to appoint and fix polling places and polling stations in all cases where, under the laws of the province, it is the duty of the returning officer at provincial elections to do so, and he shall to that end have the same powers as are vested by such laws in such returning officer.

On turning to the election law of Manitoba, sections 86, 87 and 88, I fail to find that the returning officer in that province has any such power. In regard to the establishment of polls, the returning officer, upon the receipt of the writ of the election, shall "forthwith thereafter fix a poll in and for each of the polling divisions provided by the list of electors in a central and convenient place therein."

The next section provides that the building in which the poll is held shall not be a tavern or place of public entertainment, and there shall be access to the poll for every elector. Section 88 provides that the polls shall be established "in central and commodious localities, in such manner as to be at distances not less than 100 yards apart from each other in any city, town or village, or one mile apart in any rural municipality or unorganized territory." These are all the powers the returning officer possesses with respect to the establishment of the polls, and, therefore, subsection "e" in this Bill does not confer any power on the returning officer, who will be appointed by the Governor in Council. In some parts of our province, where the population is very sparse, it would be unfair and unjust to compel people to travel a long distance in order to record their votes. I hope the Solicitor General will allow the returning officer—and I will trust the returning officer in this case—to make a special polling division under such circumstances.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. From what is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. From subsection "e" of the present Bill, and sections 86, 87 and 88 of the Revised Statutes of Manitoba.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Chapter 49 has been supplemented by the Act of 1892, chapter 12, and also by the Act of 1894, chapter 9.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I stuck to that Act, because it was my own Act, and I did not think it could be improved.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Chapter 25 provides that the registration clerk shall divide the district for which he is acting into polling divisions containing not more than 250 voters. That, no doubt, meets the difficulty.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is the old provision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is the new law.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman will notice, that in subsection "e" he refers to the powers of the returning officer appointed under the local Act, not to a registration clerk. The Bill speaks of the returning officer appointed under the local Act, while in the clause from which the hon. gentleman has quoted, the officer is spoken of as the registration clerk.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman will notice, that, under subsection "d":

Where, for any part of a province, polling divisions are not established by or under the laws of the province, but by or under such laws places are fixed where polls shall be opened and held at provincial elections and lists of the voters entitled to vote at such places at such elections have been prepared and are or have been in force polls shall be opened.

Therefore, under section "e," the registration clerk shall make the subdivision by polling divisions.

Mr. BRITTON. This is not a wholly untried experiment. The law in respect to polling subdivisions has been in force in Ontario for the last ten years. I know that the power has not been exercised many times, because it was not necessary, but it has been exercised on several occasions, and never yet has there been any complaint, either on the part of the returning officer or on the part of the voter, in regard to the convenient means provided for registering their votes. In Ontario, the municipality has to divide the wards into polling divisions, and the returning officer has not to register more than 200 votes for each subdivision; but sometimes there are more than 200 voters in one subdivision, and in such case, where there 200, but not more than 300, they are allowed to go to the polling booth. If there are more than 300, he is bound to subdivide the district, and he must do it before nomination day, so as to ensure its announcement at that time, and also at the time notice of election is given. There are cases in which no subdivision has been made, and then the returning officer has not to poll more than 200 voters in any one polling place. That has been the practice, and no fault has been found with it by the returning officer, and no complaint has been made in regard to names being put on or taken off, any more than at an ordinary subdivision. I know that the people of Ontario are pretty good people, and those in New Brunswick are not any worse than in Ontario, and the returning officer, although the nominee of the head of the Liberal party, is there to do his duty, and generally does it. The Liberals have not great reason to complain of returning officers, and I am still more satisfied that the Conservatives have no reason to complain of the Liberal returning officers. The experiment has been tried, and has been found not open to the objection which has been urged against it to-night.

Mr. BENNETT. I call the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that the polling division shall be established by and under the laws of the province. Ontario polling divisions are not established by the province, but by each municipality. So it might happen that the returning officer, after the writ was placed in his hands, with this Act in front of him, might argue that under the present law of Ontario there are no arrangements for polling divisions, and not having the power to carry out this provision, he might arrange to have all the polling divisions in one place. It should be amended by inserting the word "municipality."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The same condition which prevails in Ontario is likewise found in Quebec, that the polling subdivisions are established by the municipality. We find the words are, "shall be established by or under the laws of the province." The municipal authorities appoint the polling division under the provincial law in both provinces. Therefore, the subdivision is created by the municipality, under the law of the province, and it will come under section "d." That was the object, at all events, of putting in the words "by or under the law." My object was to make that section so as to apply to the polling subdivisions established under the municipal by-law, which by-law might be passed by the municipality under the authority of an Act of the local legislature.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman said "by and under," it would make it clearer. The word "or" is alternative, either under the law of the province or under a municipal Act by the authority of the province.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like to hear from my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) on that. As I understand it, the polling subdivisions would be those established by the law of the province, or the polling subdivisions would be those established under the law of the province; that is to say, by the municipality acting under the authority of a statute of the local legislature. It seems to me that meets the difficulty exactly.

Mr. BENNETT. How would it be to insert the word "municipal" and make it read "by or under the municipal law of the province." If some one were to so advise the returning officer he might say there is no arrangement of the divisions by any law of the province.

Mr. LISTER. There is.

Mr. BENNETT. True, there is in the sense pointed out by the Solicitor General, but the returning officer might not take that view.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In Ontario and Quebec the polling divisions are established by the municipalities; in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they are established by the statute, and in British Columbia by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, under the authority of the law. If I inserted the word "municipal" it would not meet the case of British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT. It would conflict there.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no doubt whatever that the suggestion of the Solicitor General would meet the case exactly, because the municipal councils make the divisions and they do it under the municipal law.

Mr. McINERNEY. Before the subsection passes, I wish to say that when the Minister of Railways read the New Brunswick Act of 1891, he must have seen that it is only an enabling Act, and it does not compel the returning officer to divide the district into two parts. The Act says it shall be lawful for him to do it, but he need not do it unless he likes. Therefore, I still maintain that in the elections held in that province subsequent to the Act of 1891, which came under my notice, there were no such divisions made by the returning officer. Notwithstanding all that has been said by the hon. Solicitor General, the difficulty which first occurred to my mind in regard to this clause still remains, and nothing which has been urged removes that difficulty. I refer to the danger of giving the power to divide up the districts, under this section, to a political appointee in the heat of an election. There is no date fixed for him; he does it before nobody but himself, and what is to prevent him in that case from leaving the names of many of the electors off the list?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We had better leave that until we come to an amendment which I propose to section 6.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been trying to listen to the discussion, but not being a lawyer, of course it is difficult for me to get all the points in my mind, and it is still more difficult because of the differences between lawyers themselves. I have studied the Bill as put before me, but my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has now moved a long and involved amendment, and I have not had an opportunity of studying it. I should think the same difficulty occurs to nine-tenths of the members of this House who are trying to follow this legislation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not intend to move that amendment at the present time, but in view of the discussion I thought it fair to state that I would move it.

Mr. FOSTER. That meets my difficulty. I do not want to vote on that amendment until it is printed, and I presume my hon. friend intends to print it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. the Solicitor General has, I think, shown a very strong desire to meet the views of those taking an interest in this measure, and I would ask him if it is not practicable to devise some means to meet the objection urged by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney). It occurs to me that my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) might be able to meet the difficulty by providing that some responsible officer should do the work of arranging the polling districts. It will be known long before the election takes place what the numbers of the voters are in the various districts, and therefore it would be perfectly competent for a responsible party who would be entrusted with that duty, to know what districts will require to be subdivided.

My hon. friend has already conceded to the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that there shall be not less than 300 names on the list in each subdivision. That meets that point. I want to see if he cannot go a little further and provide two things to meet the objections of my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney): first, that the limits of the subdivision shall be fixed, not by the returning officer, but by some one more directly responsible to the Government, whether by the revising officer or some one else; and, secondly, that it shall not be done on the spur of the moment, with every person left in doubt where he is to vote until he actually goes to the polls, but that it shall be done in the mode provided in the present Franchise Act, by which voters shall all know from the proclamation where they are to go to vote. It appears to me that the hon. Solicitor General, with the ingenuity he has shown in overcoming other difficulties, might find a means of meeting the objections of my hon. friend from Kent, if he would turn his attention to them.

The PRIME MINISTER. It has seemed to me all along that my hon. friends are really suggesting difficulties where no difficulties exist. There must be some officer to fix the places for polling. Under the existing law, which we are repealing, this duty is performed by the revising officer. Before we had the revising officer it was performed by the returning officer, and now when we are going back to the old system we propose that that duty shall again be performed by the returning officer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What do you say as to the publication without due notice?

The PRIME MINISTER. At the present time, if the returning officer finds that there is a polling station which has more than 200 names, he divides it at once, and publishes it, in his proclamation, before the election day.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is not in the amendment.

The PRIME MINISTER. That will be provided for. With regard to the names, the amendment that has been prepared by my colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, provides that the list shall be made up in such a way that the voters whose names are, for example, from A to K or from M to R would vote at such or such a place, so that there is no necessity of subdividing the list to avoid possible errors. What is done—I have seen it in my own province—is to give the returning officer as many copies of the whole list as there are polling stations, and it can be seen exactly where a man is to vote. My hon. friend the Solicitor General will, I am sure, see that these points are provided for.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I want to say to the leader of the Opposition that by subsection "b" it is provided that "the polling subdivisions shall be those established by or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections." In the province of Ontario, for instance, the polling subdivisions are fixed long in advance by the municipal authorities, not by the returning officer at all. In the province of Quebec the polling subdivisions are also established by the municipal authorities. In Nova Scotia and New Brunswick they are fixed by statute, of course long in advance of any election. In Manitoba and British Columbia they are fixed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The only case in which the returning officer can be called upon the scene at all is such a case as may occur in the province of New Brunswick. In all the other provinces I venture to say that the limit of voters in any subdivision is 200; but in the province of New Brunswick it may happen, because of the polling subdivisions being fixed by statute, that there may be 400 or 500 or 600 voters in a polling subdivision.

Mr. McINERNEY. Or 900.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Or 900; and in that case we provide that the returning officer shall subdivide the list alphabetically, so that there will be three polling booths at the same place, 300 voters being assigned to each polling booth. The function of the returning officer does not consist in subdividing the polling subdivisions, but in arranging the list alphabetically; and that would apply exclusively to the case pointed out by the hon. member for Kent as possible to occur in New Brunswick, and nowhere else. The returning officer has absolutely nothing to do with fixing the limits of the polling subdivision.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it provided for in the unorganized districts of the province of Ontario?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have provided for them also.

Mr. CLANCY. The returning officer has power to fix the polling subdivisions there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He will find that in the unorganized territory there are no polling subdivisions under the provincial statute, but polling places; and the only duty of the revising officer is to fix the territorial area within which the voters will be found to come to each polling place.

Mr. CLANCY. That is equivalent after all to the power of fixing the limits of the divisions. It is true, the polling divisions are not fixed by statute, but they may be fixed by the will of the returning officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I ask my hon. friend to look at section 61 of the Ontario Election Act, where he will find it provided that in the unorganized territory a poll shall be opened and held at certain places specified. These places are fixed by the statute, not by the returning officer.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think that the remark that fell from the Prime Minister will at all do away with the difficulty in this case. The right hon. gentleman dealt with a number of things which it would be more satisfactory to find in the amendment which the Solicitor General read; but they are not there. He meets some objections if the amendment he spoke of were proposed, but the amendment prepared by the hon. Minister of Railways and put in the hands of the Solicitor General, to meet the case of New Brunswick, does not meet it. Does the amendment which the Solicitor General read to the House and which we may have proposed here—but we have no declaration that it is to be proposed at all—state that all these polling booths shall be in the one place in the district. It states nothing of the kind; and in so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, we have many instances of how the law worked in the late election in the city of Ottawa. Why, at that election some of the leading citizens of this city came to me and said they had travelled from one poll to another looking for their names until they got tired and disgusted, and did not believe they would vote at all. The ex-Minister of Marine (Mr. Costigan) told me that he had been to several polls on that day without success, and did not know that he was bound to go round the city in order to find where his name was entered. If there is such difficulty in a city, how great must be the difficulty in a country place?

Mr. LANDERKIN. The list is hung up in specified central public places. Any gentleman can look at that list and find where he has to vote.

Mr. McINERNEY. I understand that in the local election in Ontario there is no proclamation of the voting places. The deputy returning officer in the city of Ottawa divided up his district the night before the election. How, then, could any elector in Ottawa know early in the morning where he was to vote?

Mr. LANDERKIN. At the nominations in Ontario, every polling place is announced in the hustings. Every place is to be put in the proclamation, and every elector can see exactly where he has to vote.

Mr. McINERNEY. All I know is that a gentleman belonging to this city has put in my hand a note contradicting that statement, and stating that the division was made by the returning officer the night before the election.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am satisfied that this is a fact. I know that several gentlemen came to the Russel House, and said that they could not find the poll where they had to vote, and I have mentioned the case of the ex-Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who told me that he travelled round several polls trying to find where his name was entered.

The PRIME MINISTER. He was not anxious to vote.

Mr. McINERNEY. The fact that he went to several places showed his anxiety to vote, and the fact that he appeared here in public meetings, showed his anxiety.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Perhaps he was not twenty-one years of age.

Mr. McINERNEY. Why, he has been in this House longer than that. If there is this difficulty in a city, how much greater difficulty must there be in a country district twenty or thirty miles in length. To tell a man that he shall go to the end of a parish to see if his name is on the list, and if it is not there, send him to the other end of the district, perhaps twenty miles distant, is an absurdity. The amendment proposed does not state that all the polls shall be in the one place, and even if it did, it proposes that an official nominee, the returning officer may, on the eve of an election, in the heat of a contest, divide the list. And that need not be printed, but be a written list. There is no obligation to have the list printed, and as a matter of fact they are not printed, unless at the expense of the candidate. This officer may divide the list to suit himself, and intentionally or unintentionally, leave a number of voters off in any one or more sections. How are you going to get the names he leaves off put on? The hon. gentleman will see what a dangerous power he is placing in the hands of these men. If the dividing of the list were left to the revisers in the province of New Brunswick, to be done by them in the month of October, when they make the lists up, and then be sent by them to the county clerk before the month of November, the work would be done more fairly. Their lists are posted subject to correction, and you can ask to have names put on or struck off. But I protest against a political nominee, such as a revising officer, being given the power of dividing the list in the heat of election, and leaving off names, intentionally or unintentionally, so that on the day of the election, when an elector finds his name has been left off, he has no means of having it put on and is deprived of his vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that the polling subdivisions are fixed by statute. The subdivided lists are not the authentic list, but the authentic list is that which is made by the reviser, and it is that which is subdivided. A man whose name is on the authentic list would have the right to vote, whether his name is on the subdivided list or not. The hon. gentleman knows that under a law in New Brunswick, the authentic list must be in the hands of the returning officer.

Mr. McINERNEY. How can four returning officers have the one list?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You can have four authentic copies of the one list.

Mr. McINERNEY. I know more about the law in New Brunswick than does the hon. gentleman. It provides that there shall be only one list handed to the returning officer, and not several. He makes his copy of that list and puts it in the ballot box and gives it to the deputy returning officer.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Can he not make three copies just as well as one?

Mr. McINERNEY. No, because he must divide the list up.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He need not divide it at all, but give three full copies.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, I cannot understand how you can have four polling booths and have the list in every polling booth. Suppose these polls were ten miles apart.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. But they cannot be. What is the use of talking such nonsense?

Mr. McINERNEY. Does that amendment say so?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman has never read it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, I heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) read it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) did not understand it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then I protest against it being proceeded with in that way. It should be printed so that we may have it before us.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think perhaps that I said what I ought not to have said, and I apologize to my hon. friend.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman cannot expect me to remember every word merely from his reading of it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Then the hon. member for Kent should accept my statement of it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not to be proceeded with now; it will come up on the discussion of a subsequent part of the Bill.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then what is the use of discussing it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who is discussing it?

Mr. McINERNEY. We are all discussing it. If it is not to be proceeded with now what is the use of discussing it at the present time? This amendment was read by the Solicitor General after it had been put in his hands by the Minister of Railways. I want him to understand that I do not want to blame him for the absurdities of it which are apparent to me. But I do blame the Minister of Railways who, with his local knowledge of the province of New Brunswick ought to know better, for proposing any such amendment as this. I cannot understand him, if you are going to have three or four polling booths and you are going to allow your returning officer to put up your lists in three or four different parts, how you are going to have the same list in every polling booth. It has not been made plain to me yet. And, in allowing the returning officer to revise the list, I say you give him a power which is very dangerous, you give him the power, intentionally or unintentionally to leave names of electors off the lists. Hon. gentlemen may claim that I am not discussing this seriously, and they may say I do not want to make this Act as perfect as possible, but I say it is my desire to do so, and to help the Solicitor General to the best of my poor ability. But I see grave difficulties and tremendous danger in this section as proposed, therefore I protest against it, and if I cannot make this committee see that I have good reason to do so, it is because I have not the power to make them understand me.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is no qualification provided in the Act for the returning officer, there is no qualification provided now that the revisers shall be competent to revise the list. We have officers among whom are included farmers, blacksmiths, carpenters and all kinds of tradesmen to constitute our board of revisers who make up these lists, none of these men, possibly, with the necessary qualifications to understand the law and make up a proper list. In the next place, we run great risk of having people go to the Government and recommend the appointment of men as returning officers who are not competent to carry out an election under the statute. What may the returning officer do? He may take the list, leave as many names off as he likes, substitute one for another, take down a name in a wrong way or in such a way that it cannot be read, and there is no way by which a man can examine the list except on polling day in the polling booth. A candidate or his agent may not be able to see the list before election day. The First Minister said there was no difficulty in dividing a list and subdividing a polling district and getting a proper and suitable list for the voters to poll their votes. I have been connected with elections and voters' lists in my own constituency for thirty years and I am pretty familiar with the boundaries of the subdivisions in my district. And yet I would not, as returning officer, undertake to subdivide the polling districts in my county without the aid of some local people from these districts. I could not do it properly otherwise. But we are going to provide by this Act, that a man living, perhaps twenty or thirty miles away from the polling subdivisions, is to subdivide it into one or more subdivisions. It may be that this will be done by a man who has never set foot in the district. Why, it is utterly impossible. That being so, I will make a suggestion to the hon. Solicitor General, and it is this: In order to enable the returning officer to do it intelligently and without mistakes, when he happens to be unfamiliar with the district, I would suggest that provision should be made that the local revisers who made up the former lists or are, in the meantime, in authority to provide lists for the coming year, be called to the aid of the returning officer, to assist him in the subdivision of the district. It is asked by hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House, if, in making the subdivision, the two polling booths cannot be placed closely together, and in that way there will be no serious misunderstanding as to where the people are to pull their votes. I feel positive that when the attempt is made to subdivide the polling district, and especially when the polling district is perhaps ten miles in length—we have many that are fifteen miles in length and proportionately broad—when the people find that the district is divided, they will be absolutely opposed to coming from the distant parts of the division to poll their votes at two polls held at one place. From the time of passing this Act they will press to have a polling booth for each subdivision at a central point within the subdivision. So, it is well for the House to understand the trouble they will have to face and that the returning officer will have to face in the unpopularity of such a provision. Of course such a question does not make much difference to people in cities, towns or villages, but it will make a great difference to people who have to travel seven or eight miles, when they find the polling division is divided and that the polling places are not more convenient places than before it was divided. It is an utter impossibility to have this Act properly carried out unless means are taken to satisfy the people who have every reason to complain in this respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What does the hon. gentleman propose to carry, the section to which he proposes to make an amendment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I want to carry subsection "b" of section 5.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Incomplete.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendment will come in after section 5.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment is not to be an amendment of subsection "b."

Mr. McINERNEY. Would not the amendment completely contradict this subsection "b"?

Mr. MONK. Would the hon. gentleman please read that amendment once more?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I tried to be civil once, and it cost me so much time that I think I won't try it again. The best thing I can do is to read that section when I intend to move it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does not my hon. friend think it is just as well to let this clause stand? I do not think we can make any progress until we have that amendment. It appears to me a very irrational mode to pass a clause that requires to be amended, and then deal with the amendment afterwards.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not intend to amend section "b" at all. I intend to introduce a clause which will have for its effect, to remedy the difficulty pointed out by the hon. member for Kent in so far as certain polling subdivisions in New Brunswick are concerned, an additional section. We have discussed this amendment over and over again to-night, when it was simply put by me before the House for the information of the committee so they might know what would be done when we reached section 6.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the leader of the House to say a little while ago that in addition to the amendment which the hon. gentleman has suggested, there would be due notice that these things would not be sprung in a night upon the electors who would be in the morning unable to find where they would have to go to vote.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understand all this is provided for by my hon. friend's amendment. The hon. gentleman knows that under the law the returning officer is bound, before the election, to give notice to the public of the polling day. He issues his proclamation that there will be a nomination at such a place, and polling at various places mentioned. He has to give the notice, therefore all this is provided for already, but it will be supplemented by the amendment of my hon. friend. I have no objection at all to reserving one of these subsections upon which we can discuss the amendment when it is introduced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is for that reason that subsection "a" has been reserved, we reserved it because the Solicitor General informed us that he had an amendment that would affect it. We are now discussing section "b," and the Solicitor General informs us he has an important amendment that will bear upon that section. Why should we pass section "b" any more than section "a" until we get that amendment before us? My hon. friend the right hon. gentleman says the amendment will be there, but it is not there now. If my right hon. friend will read the amendment of the Solicitor General, who I am sorry to see, has had his temper a little ruffled—though I am not very much surprised at that—if he would read that amendment he will find that what he has assured this committee was there, is not there at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a question which we will determine when we discuss the amendment. At present it is quite sufficient to reserve section "b," which the Solicitor General does not propose to alter. If we reserve section "b" as a peg on which to hang the amendment, we have carried everything that ought to be necessary for the proper understanding of this section.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the suggestion of my right hon. friend at first is the one that had better be carried out now. Let this whole section 5 stand until we have the amendment.

The PRIME MINISTER. After having lost the whole of this sitting.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment which is proposed, together with the addition that my right hon. friend has promised, and with what might be contributed by some hon. gentlemen on this side, once the amendment is printed and is before us, so that we can see how far it does go, generically affects this whole clause. How can you go to work and pass one subsection and another subsection which are to be affected by an amendment which is not yet before us? The Solicitor General did not do himself justice when an hon. gentleman having asked him courteously to read that the second time, he remarked that he had been civil once and he would not read it again.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If I had not read the proposed new section, we would not have had the idle discussion we have had to-night. In answer to the remark of the leader of the Opposition a moment ago, I may say that subsection "b" provides for the adoption, for the purposes of an election to the Dominion House of Commons, of the provincial polling divisions. That is the whole purpose and object of this section. Now, it has been pointed out to us that the polling divisions as they exist in the province of New Brunswick, created by the statute of New Brunswick, would have the effect of preventing a large proportion of the electors in the polling subdivisions, from exercising their franchise, that is to say, that under the laws of the province of New Brunswick there may be in a polling subdivision of 700, 800 or 900 electors. Under the provincial law of New Brunswick, if in any polling subdivision there are more than 400 electors, there are two booths or two ballot boxes at the one place, so as to enable all to vote. Now, we want to provide to meet the difficulty that has been suggested, and we propose to do so by this amendment, that if in any polling subdivision—and this can only apply to New Brunswick—there are more than 300 votes, there shall be for each additional 300 an additional ballot box or polling booth. I hope I have not been discourteous, it was not my intention to be so.

Mr. FOSTER. The privilege of an Irishman.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The privilege of any nationality. I would like to remind the leader of the Opposition that it is not open to the returning officer to make any subdivision on the eve of an election or to do anything of that sort under our Election Act, which we do not hand over to the control of the local legislature, which they cannot deal with, and which we are not amending in any particular. For instance, section 16 provides that in the proclamation the polling subdivisions must be mentioned. After the nomination, the returning officer must post up a notice containing the polling subdivisions. I am always trying to make clear the difference between a voters' list and the Dominion Election Act. That is a matter that comes under the Dominion Election Act, and we do not touch that in this Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Solicitor General has made it exceedingly clear to me that he ought not to ask the committee to carry this clause, and I will tell the committee why. The clause says:

(b) The polling divisions shall be those established by or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections within the territory comprised in the electoral district for which such election is held.

He has explained that he has an amendment prepared, to do something which the clause does not do. How is it possible to ask the committee to pass a clause, when the Solicitor General tells us he does not intend the clause to become law? He is going to qualify it. He finds that, owing to the condition of the election law of New Brunswick, it would involve inconvenience, and, therefore, he explains to the committee—and I entirely agree with him—that it is necessary to provide some means for not doing what the law says should be done, by adopting the laws of the province in respect to polling subdivisions. The hon. gentleman is going to qualify the clause; he is going to offer an important and substantial qualification of it, and he is asking the committee to stultify itself by passing a clause which he proposes on Tuesday to amend.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We do not intend to amend a word or syllable in this subsection "b," but that it shall go through in its present form. As certain inconveniences have been pointed out as likely to result in New Brunswick from the adoption of this clause, I frankly told the committee that those inconveniences would be remedied at a future stage by an amendment. What is the reason for asking that this clause be held over, when I say that, under no condition, do I intend to change it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is going to change it by the amendment which he will propose.

The PRIME MINISTER. Evidently, the leader of the Opposition has not caught the meaning of the Solicitor General. My hon. friend explained that—

The polling subdivisions shall be those established by or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections within the territory comprised in the electoral districts over which such election is held.

My hon. friend, in answer to an objection, pointed out that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) said he was prepared to amend the clause by providing that, in a polling division where there are more than a certain number of voters, provision shall be made to have two or three polling booths instead of one. That amendment is quite consistent with the section, as now drawn. There is no object in opposing the section, and no reason why we should not make some progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman intend to amend the clause?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the hon. gentleman has said he will do so. It appears to be a perfect contradiction of terms. The hon. gentleman has already proposed to amend the clause.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can put the matter in a nutshell. Suppose we pass all the clauses in section 5, and harsh Providence removes the Solicitor General from this House or the Government, or the Government changes its mind, which it is pretty apt to do, and does not bring in an amendment, we have made the law such as have all agreed should not be the law.

The PRIME MINISTER. It seems to me a very fair proposal to keep the last section open for discussion, and I shall have no objection that the discussion upon the section shall be general; but let us make some progress.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the way to make progress is for the Government to be in a position to submit to this committee what they propose we should pass. Why was clause "a" left over? It was left over because, upon consideration and discussion, the Solicitor General concluded to amend it. Why was objection taken to clause "b"? It was because, on discussion and examination, the Solicitor General decided to amend it.

Mr. LISTER. To supplement it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I want to know whether the clause will be the law, taken in connection with the supplementary clause to be provided by the Solicitor General? It would be infinitely better to modify this clause by embodying the principles of the supplementary amendment which the Solicitor General has prepared, and offer that to the committee; and then the committee would not be asked to pass a clause which the Solicitor General does not intend to remain, but which he proposes to change on Tuesday next.

Mr. McINERNEY. Before dinner, when the leader of the Opposition proposed that the debate should be adjourned, the Solicitor General distinctly stated that he would like the discussion to go on as to the different subsections of clause 5 for the purpose of getting the views of the House on those subsections, not for the purpose of passing the clause. The hon. gentleman wanted to get the views of the House on those subsections, not for the purpose of passing them, but in order to prepare amendments that would meet with the general view of the House. This was what the Solicitor General stated. The section was not to be rushed through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman stated that there was a blank in subsection "c," and he desired to invite the views of hon. gentlemen from the different provinces. On subsection "b," which had been proposed to the House, he explained it was his intention to move an amendment. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that the election law must be read in connection with this law, and that law expressly meets the case. In section 16 it is provided that the revising officer, within eight days after receiving the writ, shall issue his proclamation, and shall declare the polling divisions and subdivisions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will those subdivisions be made and embodied in that proclamation?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They must be. The law says, "the several polling divisions fixed by him." That is the election law, which we are not departing from. All the Solicitor General informs the committee is, that, in order to meet an objection in the case of New Brunswick, when there are more than 200 or 300 voters in one division, it is intended to provide two or three polling subdivisions. The election law comes in and says, that, when you do that, you shall give notice in your proclamation eight days after you receive the writ, where these polling stations are to be held. There is no discrepancy between the amendment and the clause, but provision is made for an exceptional state of affairs in New Brunswick.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Two hours ago the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) urged upon the Government not to entrust the returning officer with power to subdivide the polling districts the night before the election, and leave the electors without information as to where they were to vote, and two hours afterwards we are told that the election law provides for all that.

The PRIME MINISTER. That was told two hours ago also.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It was told by the Prime Minister, and I also told it myself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the contrary, when this objection was urged recently by myself, the Prime Minister said that care would be taken to provide for that.

The PRIME MINISTER. Pardon me, I said that by the existing law and the amendment, the objection would be met.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before six o'clock, the leader of the Opposition made a proposition to allow this matter to stand over until Tuesday, and in the meantime to try and come to some arrangement. In my opinion that proposition should have been accepted. This Bill is simply following out the policy of the late Conservative Government under Sir John Thompson, who undertook to repeal the old franchise law, which was said to be so obnoxious. Before Sir John Thompson introduced that Bill, he had conferences with the Hon. David Mills, now Minister of Justice, and that Bill practically met the views of both sides of the House. Sir John Thompson conferred with the Hon. David Mills about his Bill, but the Government to-day want to force this Bill through without consulting the Opposition. If this Bill stands over until Tuesday, there could be conferences between the leader of the Government and his friends and some hon. members of the Opposition from each of the provinces, and the Bill could be whipped into shape to pass in a night or two, whereas otherwise it will take a month if we are to haggle over one clause as we have been for two days. The present Government say they were pledged to repeal the franchise law; but Sir John Thompson adopted that policy before them and undertook to provide a cheaper and a more workable Bill than that of 1885. Sir John Thompson and the Hon. David Mills practically agreed upon all the points, and when that Bill would come before the House there would have been but little opposition to it.

The PRIME MINISTER. Sir John Thompson introduced the Bill but his party would not let him pass it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Nothing of the kind. Sir John Thompson was called away, and the Bill was allowed to stand over, but it was printed and would have become the law in the next session. If you are to adopt the provincial franchises, adopt them; have a revision previous to every general election, and if a by-election is to take place, revise the lists in that constituency only. Have a revision of the provincial lists only previous to every general election; have registration in every constituency; have the registration plain and simple before the clerk of the municipality, by issuing a proclamation that every person twenty-one years of age and over entitled to a vote may simply file a declaration and his name will be added to the list that is being made up by the court of revision of the municipality. Have the new list printed and then you have a list ready to vote on. Adopt the provincial lists as the basis, but let this Government work out the machinery for having the registration take place before a proper officer, and then you will have a fair and inexpensive franchise law. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that the old franchise law worked injuriously to their party, but none of them can say truthfully that the franchise law was more injurious to them than to the Conservative party. It was expensive to the members representing a constituency, but that expense fell on both parties alike.

Mr. BENNETT. The local lists will be more expensive.

Mr. TAYLOR. Too honest, indeed. That probably will be the case. Why not have a conference between the two parties on this Bill, and that will simplify the whole matter. If hon. gentlemen opposite believe that the old franchise law was favourable to the Government in power, why do they not keep it in force?

An hon. MEMBER. Too honest.

Mr. BRITTON. Too honest.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. Too honest, indeed. The loudest denunciation of the Liberals was that the old law enfranchised the Indians, and that the Indians were wards of the Government in power and would support them. Well, the Indians are wards of the Government to-day, as they were then. These hon. gentlemen all are now disfranchising the Indians, but I believe if the Minister of Customs spoke his mind, he would agree with the hon. gentleman from Brantford (Mr. Heyd) and the hon. gentleman from Lambton (Mr. Lister), that the Indians ought to have the right to vote. I trust that the leader of the Government will follow the example of Sir John Thompson and have a conference on this Bill, but if not, clause after clause has to be threshed out in the House, it is going to be some weeks before the Bill will be put through.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen opposite need not think that they can bring in a Franchise Bill which takes up matters of such great importance, and put it through in a day or two. That is perfectly impossible, because legitimate discussion will carry the matter very much longer than that. The action of the Solicitor General to-night shows that the Government acknowledge that their Bill is not at all perfect, and they are going to make important amendments to it. If the Government had drawn up these amendments and had them printed so that they would be before the House, then the members would be advertised of the whole question which would be before them, and the discussion would be much more limited and progress more rapid.

Mr. LISTER. Is that ever done?

Mr. FOSTER. In the case of every important measure, if the Government propose to make important amendments, they certainly should have them printed in the records of the House, so that we may know what we are going to be asked to legislate upon; and I should think that would be a procedure of prudence in a matter of this importance. I thought I caught a note of defiance in my hon. friend's remark when he spoke of sticking to it. I hope he will not allow the atmosphere of war which is enveloping us to-day to affect his mind on this franchise business? The history of 1885 ought to show him that nothing is gained by an attempt to rush through a Franchise Bill. So far as this side of the House is concerned, there is no disposition to do more than to perfect this Bill as far as we can. The Government have by superior force gained their point so far as they have repealed the old Act; but they make a great mistake if they think that because of that we are going to let every part of the Bill go through as the Government framed it. Every section of the Bill shall be carefully reviewed in order that we may make it as good an Act as we possibly can. We want to do that in good part; but it will necessarily take some time, and I should hope the Solicitor General would not let the prevalent war feeling obtrude itself into the discussion of this Bill, because it will not advance things; on the contrary, it may retard them.

The PRIME MINISTER. I quite recognize that the Opposition have very serious interests to protect, from their point of view, and that this Bill shall require some days of discussion. But I think we have some reason for complaint that after two days of discussion on this section, we have not been able to carry a single paragraph of it.

Mr. FOSTER. The most important, in some respect, in the Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be. But all we can do is to read the Bill, paragraph by paragraph, and settle on the language of each paragraph. There may be two ways of doing that. You may find that the language is not sufficient, and has to be altered; or you may find that it is right as far as it goes, but has to be supplemented. Now, the Solicitor General, who has given every attention to this Bill, and who, I am sure, in the opinion of the House, has been most considerate of every suggestion made by him and has endeavoured to meet every objection—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend, in regard to this very paragraph "b," says: "I am willing to meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Kent. This must be done, not by altering the language of the paragraph at all; it will remain as it is; but by supplementing it by a further subsection that will be submitted afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. But it is not decided.

The PRIME MINISTER. The paragraph is all right as far as it goes, and therefore he proposes that it be adopted. We cannot make progress otherwise. Under such circumstances I ask my hon. friend to have this paragraph carried, and have the further subsection discussed, and leave one subsection open for discussion when the amendment is proposed. It seems to me that would be reasonable. Of course, if we have to meet obstruction, we cannot avoid it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sorry my hon. friend used that word before sitting down, because I can assure him, speaking for myself, and so far as I am aware, there is not the slightest desire to obstruct this Bill. I do not know any member on either side of the House who wants to stay here one hour longer than is necessary to do the public business. My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian, and I would ask him if he has ever seen a committee asked to pass a clause which those who offered it declared was to be modified. Now, my hon. friend says that this clause is to remain as it is. He objects even to the word "modify." I ask him what the meaning of the English language is. Will there be no modification in the clause when the Solicitor General has said, again and again, that in order to meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Kent, he finds that it is necessary to modify the law of New Brunswick? If that is not to modify this clause, then I certainly have no conception of the construction of the English language. There is no other part of this Bill to which the modification proposed by the Solicitor General can apply. Then why should we be asked to pass this clause until we have the modification to be proposed by the Solicitor General put before us? Is anything gained by it? Would there be one moment's more discussion? I say there would be a good deal less. If the modification had been presented in the form which it is to take, this clause would probably have been passed long ago. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show a single case, certainly in the history of this Parliament since confederation, of a clause being pressed upon a committee when those who proposed the clause had given notice of a proposition to modify it. I regard it as an absolute waste of time to press the adoption of a clause with the announcement put before the committee that an important modification is to be made to it. It does not touch the admitted principle of the clause, but it is an admission that the clause itself is not perfect for the purpose, for which it was intended, and that if the Bill remains with that clause as it is, it will be open to the objection which has been pressed by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) and admitted by the Solicitor General. Why should we waste words, when nothing is gained, when we have not advanced this Bill one jot or tittle, and, when if we were to pass the clause as it is, a modification is to be presented for our consideration. It would not take half the time, if we had that before us now.

The PRIME MINISTER. I shall try once more to appeal to my hon. friend's reason. He will admit that in a Bill of this kind, it is absolutely indispensable that we should, at the outset, determine what is to be a polling division. Here is the section which defines what a polling division shall be:

The polling divisions shall be those established by or under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections within the territory comprised in the electoral district for which such election is held.

This will suit convenience, so far as Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia, and so on, are concerned, but my hon. friend from Kent says that in New Brunswick there are polling divisions in which you have 900 electors. The Solicitor General very well says that these shall continue to be polling divisions. But as in them a condition of things exists which does not exist in the other provinces, he proposes to make a subsequent supplementary provision to meet that condition of things. He proposes to introduce a new clause which shall not in any way modify the definition here given, but will meet the objection raised. What must be settled at once is that the polling divisions shall be those determined by each province. Why not agree to this at once?

Mr. CLANCY. There are cases that are not met which exist in Ontario and require to be provided for.

The PRIME MINISTER. I make to the hon. gentleman the same reply. The polling divisions in each province are those recognized in the Bill, but if there are conditions such as have been mentioned by the hon. member for Kent, it is evident that you must provide for more than one polling station, and the clause which the hon. Solicitor General proposes to introduce will provide for this very contingency, namely, for the three or four polling stations in each such polling division. Therefore the language of this section cannot be modified by any subsequent clause intended to meet the particular condition of things I have alluded to.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In Manitoba, the local electoral divisions are not coterminous with the federal divisions. In fact, they are laid down regardless of the limits of the municipalities and it will so happen that one of these polling divisions will be partly in one federal district and partly in another, and I believe that, under such circumstances, this section will have to be modified or another subsection inserted in the Bill, in order to cover those cases.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not say yes or no. We have to consider each case by itself. We are now dealing with a special feature of the Bill, and if my hon. friend thinks that another section may be necessary to meet his own case, he will have to show a cause for it. Of course every hon. gentleman here from the different provinces speaks from the view of his own province. We have been dealing with the case of New Brunswick alone up to the present, but I repeat this is simply to determine what is a polling division, and nothing that can be done afterwards can modify it. How can we go on unless we study out, section by section, what is to be the language of the Bill, but this section must be accepted as the basis of every other provision to be made afterwards.

Mr. McINERNEY. We stand here in perfect ignorance now as to what amendment will be submitted on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then propose your amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. McINERNEY. Therefore I cannot consent to allowing this clause to go as it is, and I propose to add therefore to section 5 subsection "b," a clause providing that there shall not be more than three hundred voters for any polling subdivision.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman cannot move that now, because we have not reached the end of section 5.

Mr. TAYLOR. Add it to subsection "b."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That does not meet the difficulty.

The PRIME MINISTER. At all events, my hon. friend has moved an amendment which shows that the language of the section is all right as it is.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Kent, to add to subsection "b" of section 5 the following words:—

Provided that there shall not be more than 300 voters on any list for any polling subdivision.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The amendment is not germane to the subsection before the committee.

Mr. CLANCY. The right hon. First Minister urged very strongly that there was no necessity for changing the wording of subsection "b" of section 5, because there are no cases which it does not cover, but there are cases in Ontario that are not already provided for by law, either by statute or under the municipal law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Name one.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. Solicitor General pointed out that where they were not named by statute or fixed under the authority of a statute by the municipalities, they were named in the other cases, and he pointed me to section 2 of the Ontario election law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, section 61 of the Ontario Election Act.

Mr. CLANCY. That is quite right. Now, the hon. gentleman will find that that covers the electoral district of West Algoma; but, if he follows it to the electoral district of East Algoma, he will see there how the subdivisions are named, and let him read subsection 3, and he will find the following:—

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may from time to time add other polling divisions.

And there is this, further:

The returning officer shall establish as many polling places at the places before mentioned as he may consider requisite, and may appoint other places in addition to those in this section.

Then, we will take the electoral district of Nipissing. We find there that, in the unorganized district, the Lieutenant-Governor may from time to time also appoint places.

Now, the hon. gentleman, I understand, in subsection "d" makes provision for that. I call his attention to that, because I think the intention there was, to make provision to meet these cases. If I am not right, I hope the hon. gentleman will set me right. Now, that only provides for cases where there are not polling subdivisions fixed by law, but by law there are polling places that may be opened for provincial elections, and in such cases, where the provincial lists have been prepared and in force, the Dominion elections are to take place on these lists. I think that is the provision of the section he is drafting. I desire to point out that there are places not named, as fixed by statute or by the municipality, and, therefore, this section does not apply in such cases.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would suggest—I do not move, but I will send the memo. I have to the Solicitor General—that subsection "b" be amended by adding these words :

Except in case there are polling subdivisions which contain over 300 voters' names on the lists and in that case a polling station shall be fixed for each 300 voters or fraction thereof.

I do not insist upon these words, but this will cover the idea.

The PRIME MINISTER. I understood my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) wanted to make a suggestion to the Solicitor General. I would suggest to my hon. friend, that the Solicitor General has an amendment which, I think, proceeds on these lines.

Mr. TAYLOR. His amendment is a subsection.

The PRIME MINISTER. Does the hon. gentleman object that it should be done in that way ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot quite understand the voting down of the amendment by hon. gentlemen opposite, because I thought they had agreed to it, in so many words. I thought the Solicitor General stated that he was quite prepared to conform to exactly what this amendment states.

The PRIME MINISTER. The idea was accepted ; but surely my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will not pretend that the amendment, as it was written, carried out the idea. There was no machinery in it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no machinery in this clause.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is to be machinery in the amendment to be moved by the Solicitor General.

Mr. MILLS. Why do we not have a Bill we can understand ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Because you will not apply your minds to it.

Mr. SPROULE. Looking over the Ontario Act, it seems plain that this does not cover the cases of Algoma and Nipissing. It says:

The returning officer shall establish as many polling places at the places before mentioned—
That is, named places.

—as he shall consider requisite, and may appoint other places in addition to those named in this section.

The returning officer, in the provincial election, sometimes establishes polling places sometimes 50 or even 100 miles away from places where polls were held before, because of the opening of some new section or the establishment of mining camps. There is no provision of the law for establishing these, except the power given to the returning officer, and I do not think that this subsection covers such cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think, if my hon. friend will consider subsection "d," he will find that it meets the difficulty. You will notice that in Ontario the polling subdivisions are fixed by the municipal councils—that is the general rule. The exception is created under section 60 and section 61 and section 62, referring to the electoral districts of West Algoma and the unorganized territory of Algoma East and Nipissing. Under subsection 3, it is provided that the Lieutenant-Governor may, from time to time, add other polling places, or the returning officer shall establish them where it is found necessary. Now, under subsection "d," it is provided :

Where, for any part of the province, polling divisions are not established by or under the laws of the province—

That is the case here.

—but by or under such laws places are fixed where polls shall be opened.

That is the case under section 62.

Mr. CLANCY. Not at all.

Mr. SPROULE. Some are fixed, but some are not fixed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In Algoma West, in the unorganized territory of Algoma East, and in Nipissing, the places are fixed. Here is what section 62 says :

Polls shall be opened and held for an election in the electoral district of Nipissing, in each of the unorganized municipalities in accordance with the provisions of this Act and in such municipalities one such poll shall be opened at or near the place where the last municipal election was held.

There the polling places are fixed. Then it proceeds to say that where no such places are fixed, polls shall be opened and held where the lists of voters entitled to vote at such an election have been prepared. Now all the machinery which the provincial law of Ontario provides for the local elections, is incorporated under this section into our law; that is to say that the Ontario Act provides that in the case of a provincial election, polling places shall be fixed in these particular localities at certain places.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the Minister proceeds on the assumption that these places are fixed; but there are a number of places that are not fixed, new places established in every election.

The PRIME MINISTER. In all these places in which there is no provision made for the election, what takes place in the provincial election will prevail.

Mr. SPROULE. The returning officer is instructed to fix the polling stations himself.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then subsection "e" provides for that.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the following words be added to subsection "b" of section 5:

Except in case there are in any province polling subdivisions which contain over 300 voters' names on the list, then in that case a polling station shall be fixed for each 300 voters or fraction thereof.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BENNETT. Perhaps the difficulty could be got over by the Solicitor General taking clause "b" as it stands and adding the very words of his amendment providing for places where there are over 300 names.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The object my hon. friend suggests will be reached by the amendment which we are pledged to introduce. It is because of the objection of my hon. friend that I have changed the terms of the suggested section I intend to introduce. We had it fixed at 250, we have increased it to 300. But I cannot see why we should not introduce that as a substantive section immediately after this.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I have ascertained that in my own electoral district there are polling divisions established under the local Act which are running into the next district, that is to say, they are covering ground in both districts. I want to know from the Solicitor General whether this should not be provided for in that subsection, when he says that the polling divisions:

Shall be those established by and under the laws of that province for the purpose of a provincial election within the territory comprising the electoral district for which such election is held.

I would suggest "partly or wholly within."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand my hon. friend to mean that the territorial limits of an electoral division for the federal may not agree with the territorial limits for the local.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They do not.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I foresaw that difficulty, which will occur in the province of Quebec in a good many counties; therefore, I put section 7 into the Act, to which I refer my hon. friend, and which I think meets what he suggests.

Subsection "b" agreed to.

On subsection "c,"

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I call attention to this, because I think it meets a real difficulty that we ought to guard against. It has been suggested in the course of this debate that in view of the fact that the provincial franchise is adopted for our federal elections, it might be possible for an evil intentioned local legislature so to alter the provincial franchise as to make it practically impossible for us to carry on our federal election, or so to alter the basis of the franchise that if it were known to us, we would not have an election on such a franchise. Now, I want to guard against that, and for that purpose I want to provide so far as possible that we should take the election lists which have been in force a sufficient length of time previous to the Dominion elections as to ensure a reasonable probability that the local legislature would not have been able to foresee a Dominion election and alter the law for the purpose of defeating our purpose. That is the object. I have left a blank that I would like my hon. friends to help me in filling up. Under Sir John Thompson's Bill of 1894, it was provided that we should have as the basis of the franchise, just as in this case, the provincial franchise, and to meet the difficulty that I now see, he provided that the provincial franchise should be that in force in the province on the 1st day of June of the year in which the election took place. That is the way he guarded against the possible difficulty. But to my mind that is not sufficient, because it might be possible that we would have an election very close to the 1st of June. I would, therefore, ask whether we should take the electoral lists sixty days before the proclamation of the election, whether that would be sufficient to protect us against any change in the local franchise.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have heard a good deal of objection to the Bill which has been brought in by the Solicitor General, but we have heard no speech showing so clearly the monstrous character of the legislation proposed.

Mr. LISTER. It is Sir John Thompson's Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It does not require a word from me to emphasize the emphatic condemnation of the whole of this legislation, because the Solicitor General has put the whole matter in a nutshell, and showed that we are exposed to such a monstrous Act on the part of the local legislature as to absolutely compel him to ask this Parliament to take effective means to protect us from the conduct to which we are exposed. I do not rise, however, for the purpose of adding anything to the hon. gentleman's remarks; in fact, they could hardly be added to. But we have now reached the cardinal point of the Bill, which, in my judgment, is of graver importance than anything else connected with it, namely, the voters' lists. This demands the most careful consideration of the committee, and I propose to offer an amendment which embodies in a few words the grave objection entertained on this side of the House to this measure, and the principal objection.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then we have not yet heard what the principal objection is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hon. gentlemen have heard a good deal about it, but it has not been presented in a concentrated form. Dealing with such an important feature of the Bill as is covered by my amendment, I may say that when disposed of it will, to a very large extent, decide the controversy between the two sides of the House. I move in amendment to subsection "e" of section 5, as follows:—

Provided that if in any electoral district a dispute shall arise as to the qualification to entitle any person to vote therein, an appeal shall lie to the county court judge having jurisdiction in that electoral district, and in provinces where there are no county court judges, then to the superior court of the district having jurisdiction in that electoral district.

I move this amendment now because we are dealing with the voters' lists, and as to how they shall be prepared. I ask my hon. friend the First Minister not to oblige me to go on with the debate on this amendment until the next sitting of the committee.

The PRIME MINISTER. If I properly apprehend the tenor of the amendment of my hon. friend it is to reserve to an individual voter the right of appeal against the decision of the party who prepares the list. Is that the object?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the object.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is not germane to subsection "c." Moreover, in all the provinces, I believe, at all events in the province of Quebec, there is such an appeal already, and I believe such an appeal also exists in Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot dispute as to Nova Scotia, but I am informed by those who are competent to speak that in Ontario and Nova Scotia there may be an appeal to the judicial authority by any voter whose name is not on the list. I do not know the state of the law in New Brunswick. But I submit that the amendment is not germane to the section now under consideration. The section is to determine what class of lists is prepared and what they are to be. The polling lists,

Shall be those prepared for the several polling divisions so established and which on the..... day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion election were in force or were last in force under the laws of that province for the purposes of provincial elections.

My hon. friend says that the list here intended to apply are the lists of the provinces of Quebec or Ontario. But my hon. friend wants this list, as a whole, to hinge an amendment which shall apply, not to the list as a whole, but to independent electors whose names may figure on the list. When the lists upon which we are to vote are prepared, whether federal or provincial lists, the right of the elector to question his status has been determined by the courts. I therefore submit that this is not the proper time for the hon. gentleman to move his amendment.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It appears to me from the form of the amendment that the hon. gentleman cannot have carefully considered the clause, and I am afraid he has not very much appreciated what it means. The amendment was typewritten and, therefore, I presume, was got up with a little care; but really it is meaningless, utterly unworkable, can scarcely be said to be sensible, and if incorporated in the Bill would have about the same effect as chips in porridge. Does the hon. gentleman mean that a couple of gentlemen passing on the street some day, having a controversy as to whether a certain property qualification would entitle a man to vote or not, would have the right to proceed to the county court judge, knock at his door and ask him to determine the question? Or does it mean that on the morning of the election, a question arising upon a person having presented himself and claimed the right to vote, and being refused, a dispute occurred, the election must be postponed until some later date, and the parties must drive to the county court judge and ascertain what he thinks? Or what is really the meaning of this amendment? I must confess I think it would be impossible to put a reasonable interpretation on it. If the hon. gentleman's suggestion that the committee rise and the debate be adjourned be agreed to, perhaps on consideration, he may find it would be possible to frame something that, at all events, if put in the Bill, would not be a reproach to everybody who has anything to do with it, as I fear would be the effect of this amendment, if it were seriously considered.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very grateful to my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) for the very flattering and complimentary terms in which he has referred to this resolution, and I should feel very seriously injured and very much hurt if that had come from an authority for which I had a higher respect. I may say to him (Mr. Blair), that I have had an opinion upon this amendment from gentlemen whose legal standing and ability entitle them to very much greater respect than I entertain for the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) himself. All I wish to do by this amendment is to guard against the frightful fraud that underlies this Bill, by means of which the electors of this country are to be cheated, deliberately cheated, by Act of Parliament, out of the right to exercise an independent franchise. I can quite understand that is not exactly the kind of thing that will commend itself to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair); that is not the kind of view that he feels disposed to take in these matters. Sir, the law put upon the Statute-books by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) in the province of New Brunswick is a law calculated to defraud the electors of the right of their independent franchise.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Nobody has discovered that yet.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In many instances where there is a close election, to whom does the law of New Brunswick confide the power of returning the candidate he wishes to return. A partisan officer, the sheriff, who is appointed by the Government of the day is the person who, in the province of New Brunswick, has the power of nullifying the sacred trust of the franchise. If in a polling district there are half a dozen persons of the same name, the sheriff has the power to strike them all off but one, and if there are five of the same name Conservatives and one a Liberal, the law of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) enables the sheriff to strike off the five Conservatives and to leave the Liberal on. That is the kind of law which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) manufactures for his own purpose in his own province. I can quite understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) would feel the utmost indignation at any attempt to protect the honest and independent voter. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) not know, that under the law in New Brunswick the sheriff, and the sheriff alone, is in a position to go to the reviser and put names on the list or strike names off the list at his own sweet will. Under the law in New Brunswick, passed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), the most monstrous frauds are invited and encouraged and made possible. He is the last man in this House to whom I would look for any aid in appointing a judicial officer to protect the right of the voter. It would not suit him, and I do not look for his assistance in any honest effort to protect the honest elector of this country. In view of the hon. gentleman's record in his own province, he is the last man in this House I would look to for anything except an attempt to deprive the electorate of the protection that this amendment will give them. Does the hon. gentleman not know what we are contending against? The Manitoba "Free Press," which I read last night told him that the franchise law of Manitoba was a law to enable the Government of the day to elect whom they please, and a law under which the most frightful frauds may be permitted. Under this amendment which I have proposed, a judicial officer could stand between the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) and his minions and protect the honest voter. The hon. the mover of this Bill (Mr. Fitzpatrick), has borne testimony here as to his opinion of what the local legislatures may do. He tells us that having studied this subject he proposes to introduce an important amendment in order to prevent the legislature of any province from creating a franchise for the purpose of serving their party in this House, when they themselves have no intention of using that franchise. That proposal of the Solicitor General shows something of what we have to guard against and therefore am I not warranted in asking support for this amendment from every honest man in this House, every man who wants to see justice and fair-play shown to the electorate. I will tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) that the organ of his own party, the Manitoba "Free Press," has shown that under the law in Manitoba the Government appoint a man of no standing, a man of no character, a man who has nothing to lose; they appoint him as revising officer, and when the parties go before him, they get just such justice as you would expect from the New Brunswick sheriff appointed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) to carry out the law he has put on the Statute-books of that province.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. KAULBACH. Or the county of Lunenburg.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Lunenburg is all right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Lunenburg is all right, so long as it obeys the behest of the Finance Minister, but it is all wrong when it does anything else. I drew the attention of the House, last night, to what took place in the province of Manitoba. In a close constituency, where some fifteen votes would turn the election, what did the Government do? They sent a characterless, miserable creature to act as revising officer.

The PRIME MINISTER. And subsequently a returning officer of the same character.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am speaking of the action of the Government of Manitoba.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am speaking of the action of the late Federal Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has endorsed and intensified the charge I make against them. He says that, not satisfied with sending a miserable, characterless revising officer, they sent a miserable, characterless returning officer there to do their work. That makes the matter very much worse. In that constituency, where there was a majority of about fifteen Conservatives, as has been established by the affidavit of the most respectable people in the country, fifteen names were put upon the list of persons who had no existence, who could not be found in the district or in the province, although the country was searched far and wide. Respectable people gave him the proof that they had searched the country far and wide, and that there were no such men in the district, and they asked him to strike these names off the list. Did this miserable, characterless creature, sent to do the infamous work by the Government of Manitoba do it? No. He said, "I cannot strike their names off the list, unless you can prove to me that you have served them with a notice." Does not even the sense of justice of the Minister of Railways and Canals revolt against such a frightful act of injustice as that? I hope he is not so far gone as to be incapable of appreciating such a condition of things; and it is for the purpose of interposing a judge, such as is enjoyed by the province of Ontario, the province of Quebec, and every other province of this Dominion should enjoy, that is not intended to be used to prostitute everything like honesty, and fair-play, and justice between the political parties of this country that I propose this amendment. Is there a man in this House who will say, in the face of such transactions as this, and in the face of the law of New Brunswick to-day, that it is not a just and proper demand I make, that in this law some means shall be provided whereby the names of honest, intelligent electors that have been left off the list, shall be put on, without going to such characterless creatures as the one I have referred to, who disgraced himself and the country and the Government under whom he served, by his conduct? Is that the purpose of adopting the local franchises and shifting on the local legislatures the responsibilities that would otherwise rest on the Government themselves? Under the law, as it stood, you had the recourse that the Government of the day were held responsible on the floor of this House for the character of the men they employed to carry out the legislation of the country; and every honest, independent elector throughout this wide Dominion, if he was entitled to go on the list, and was kept off by wrong-doing, had the right and opportunity of appealing to a judge; and that is what this amendment, which is so spurned and despised by the Minister of Railways and Canals, proposes. It is not the want of legal phraseology in the amendment that troubles the hon. gentleman. It is because it is proposed to defeat the nefarious attempt that underlies this legislation that is being forced through this House and upon the people of this country. That is what troubles the brilliant intelligence and acumen of the Minister of Railways and Canals. It is not the verbiage of the amendment; it is the principle; and I appeal to the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government, whether he does not owe it to his own character and to the reputation of the Government to give the honest, independent electorate of this country the protection this amendment provides against such nefarious, such disreputable trampling of all law and justice under their feet as the Government of Manitoba practiced in regard to the most sacred right which any free man can be called upon to exercise, that is, the franchise. I did not intend at this late hour of the night, to go into a discussion of this cardinal feature of the Bill, on which every friend of justice and fair-play ought to take his stand; but I felt it right to place in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee, and on the Table of the House, the mode I proposed, with the great aid and wonderful legal acumen of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, to put into such legal phraseology as would come up to the high standard of that hon. gentleman's legal standing and position.

Mr. ELLIS. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has given the committee such a poor impression of the electoral law of New Brunswick. I would like to point out to the House, in the first place, that in our provincial politics, the question of Liberal and Conservative has not been an element at all in the framing of laws of that character. Then, it is only fair to the Minister of Railways to say, that for a great many years, I think, nearly forty years, there was no change whatever made in the electoral law, until 1889, when the hon. gentleman gave legislation to the country which enlarged the franchise very considerably indeed, and gave entire satisfaction, I think, to the great bulk of the people. With reference to the sheriffs of New Brunswick, I do not know much of their politics—some are Liberal and some Conservative—but they are all men of high character, any one of whom could be trusted to perform any duty fairly and justly. With regard to the lists, every provincial list is first prepared by the assessors, and then revised by the revising officers, chosen by the municipal authorities, and chosen generally without the slightest regard to their political standing. The question of Liberal and Conservative does not enter into municipal discussion, and I know that in the city of St. John these revisers are chosen by the city government without regard to their politics. Further than that, it would not be in the interests of the municipal councillors that the lists should be managed in such a way as to dissatisfy either political party, because these councillors have to stand before the people for election on their own merits and acts as aldermen. All that the sheriff has to do is to not, as my hon. friend intimates, to reject five Conservatives and leave one Liberal on the list, but in preparing the lists to see that the same name does not appear in five or six different places. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything further than that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), so far as New Brunswick is concerned, stands high in the estimation of the people for the electoral law he has placed on the Statute-book.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I do not think that the hon. leader of the Opposition need apologize for the warmth of his address, because the committee will perfectly understand that the hon. gentleman's righteous indignation at anything in the shape of fraud in connection with an election would naturally lead him to a very strong expression of opinion. As the hon. gentleman, however, has more than once repeated a fairy tale which he heard somewhere with regard to some proceedings in Manitoba, I wish to say that I have lived in that province for a good many years, and have sat in its legislature for many years—in fact during all the time in which the Act complained of was in operation—and I have never heard of any proceedings such as those he has mentioned. I shall not enter at this late hour into a discussion of the matter, as I may possibly have an opportunity of doing so before the Bill becomes law, but I wish to say that this is the first time I have heard the statement which he has made with regard to fraudulent actions on the part of revising officers. The people of Manitoba never heard anything of the kind while I was there. And I have this to say further, that the Act which came into force in 1891, under which revising officers are appointed, as they are appointed under the Dominion Franchise Act—and who are sometimes judges and sometimes not—has worked satisfactorily. There has not been to my knowledge, and there never was while I sat in the legislature, any complaint made against the conduct of these revising officers. Not a single complaint was made during the five years that I was a member of the Government of Manitoba, during which that Act was in force, against the conduct of any revising officer. Not only was no complaint ever proven, but none was ever made. I do not believe that the Opposition press, which has often violently attacked the conduct of the registration clerks and the officers who made up the lists in the first instance, ever attacked the conduct or character of the revising officers. I think it is generally admitted that every revising officer appointed under that Act has acted fairly, and I do not believe now that anybody can prove that on any possible occasion, when the question of the revision of the lists under the Manitoba Franchise Act was under consideration, the revising officers acted otherwise than properly. I make this statement because I am perfectly satisfied that no such charge was ever made or could be proven. I believe it was alleged last session in the discussion which took place on the Act introduced then, that there was some misconduct, but I do not believe that such charge was ever established or can be proven. I might further refer to my hon. friends remark that the Manitoba "Free Press," from which he quoted an article the other day, is one of the papers supporting the Government. I have not had heretofore any knowledge of that fact. On the contrary, the most virulent opposition which the Government of Manitoba received for many years came from the Manitoba "Free Press," and I would almost as soon accept a citation from one of the hon. gentleman's own speeches as evidence of a matter of fact as a citation from that newspaper.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I must confess if I had anticipated that the very mild criticism which I ventured to pass on the proposed amendment of the hon. gentleman would have, at this late hour, exercised his wrath to such an extent and lead to his losing his temper and worked him up to that condition of impotent rage and fury into which he fell, I should have hesitated before making any comments on that proposed amendment at all. I feel bound to respect that hon. gentleman's years. I am not going to say that there is very much else in connection with him that I feel bound to respect, but I do feel that he is entitled to consideration at the hands of hon. gentlemen here on that account, and I am filled with regret that we should have had so many exhibitions lately of fury and indignation to which the hon. gentleman has treated us during the present session. I can assure the hon. gentleman that in the statement which he has made to-night with regard to the electoral legislation for which I was, perhaps, in a large measure, responsible in the province of New Brunswick, he has made a discovery which I will venture to say has not been made by any other individual resident in that province. I venture to say that if there is one thing which cannot be said with regard to any legislation that I promoted in that province, it is that I discriminated or sought to discriminate, in any shape or form, between the two political parties in that province. I had the pleasure during fourteen years of my term in that province of enjoying the support of a very large number of Conservatives there, and sitting behind the hon. gentleman now, there are three of these gentlemen, two of whom were my supporters during the whole of that period; and I am willing to submit the legislation for which I admit I am responsible to be passed upon by either of those, confident that whatever else may be said with regard to it they will not confirm the statement which the hon. gentleman, with that extravagance of language which characterises him, has so recklessly made to-night. I say that I forgive the hon. gentleman. He has some title to forgiveness. I make all allowance for the weakness he has displayed here, and I acquit him of any deliberate intentions, and I believe that when he comes to his sober moments—I mean when he comes to a more sedate and calm frame of mind—he will himself admit that he has entirely misrepresented the legislation of the province of New Brunswick and my conduct in connection with it in every way. Let me tell my hon. friend that the statutes of New Brunswick with regard to elections, if he will only read them, will satisfy him that there is no such power conferred upon the sheriffs as he says is conferred upon them. There is no section of that law from beginning to end which can justify his censure. The hon. gentleman will accept, I am sure, my humble acknowledgment for having spoken in such terms of his amendment and made him feel so heartily ashamed of it as to have led him to indulge in the wild and furious declamation he has taken us through to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not surprised to see the hon. gentlemen sitting cheek by jowl. They are 'arcades ambo.' But I am a little surprised that they have both attempted to deal with the statements I have made here, when neither of them was able to controvert a single word I have said in reference to the legislation of New Brunswick and the legislation of Manitoba. I will deal with that paragon of purity and honesty, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), first. And when he repudiates the Manitoba "Free Press" as the organ of the Liberal party in that country, I can only say that I have regarded the Manitoba "Free Press" as one of the ablest exponents of the Liberal policy, not only in the province of Manitoba, but in this country, and it has been invariably found giving the heartiest support, whenever it could give it with any kind of regard for self-respect, to gentlemen who sit opposite. Now, what does the "Free Press" say? It says that the Government intends to wipe out the electoral law and "substitute the provincial lists, without any federal interference." That is correct, I suppose, that states the policy of the Government. It is to leave the provinces to work their own sweet will, which is the policy of all except the Solicitor General, who has come to the rescue, and has intimated that there is such a danger of their attempting one of the most frightful acts of fraud and dishonesty that it is possible to conceive that he proposes to provide for it. The "Free Press" says :

In one province, Manitoba, the principle of government control of the lists is the very foundation of the law—

Whose law? The law of the Minister of the Interior. And what do they say about it after their experience. It says that in its operation an election is assured in every doubtful constituency by the dishonest practices of registration clerks. What does the hon. gentleman say?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I say it is not so. The hon. gentleman might just as well quote one of his own speeches as quote the Manitoba "Free Press."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well, I am quoting one of the ablest journals in support of the Liberal party in Canada, published where they know the hon. gentleman better than he is yet known here. The "Free Press" says :

The law could not contribute more effectively to the stuffing of the lists in the interest of the ruling party if it had been specially and avowedly designed for that purpose. * * * We need not inquire whether the Liberals have forgotten or swallowed their scruples of 1885; it is sufficient to know that by the Bill now before the House a federal election law will be imposed on this province and other provinces that will be infinitely worse than the existing Dominion law was ever claimed to be. Our only hope of escape from a measure in which the electorate will be left at the mercy of Government agents, and the free expression of the popular will need not be permitted, lies in the Senate.

I tell the hon. gentleman further that the newspapers of to-day report that the leader of the Opposition in the legislature of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin, has just been invited to become a member of Mr. Greenway's Government.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Is that the hon. gentleman's proof that the Manitoba Franchise Act of the Manitoba Government is a bad Act? Does he prove it by citing a telegraph report that Mr. Roblin is going into the government?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I intend to prove the hon. gentleman will find it difficult to disprove. He challenged the statements I have made, and I reply that a gentleman who, we are informed, is about to become a member of the government, Mr. Roblin, on the floor of the legislature of Manitoba, made the same statements in regard to this matter that I have made here to-night. Therefore, when he pretends that he has half a dozen times heard this apocryphal story—

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman has it right now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then the hon. gentleman pretends that this story is not well-founded; he forgets that on the floor of this Parliament affidavits were read from some of the most respectable men in the province to prove the statements I have made, and they are confirmed by the paper I have quoted, and which, as I have said, is one of the ablest papers supporting the Liberal party in this country.

And the hon. gentleman is aware—he cannot be ignorant of the fact—that a gentleman whom we have all learned to respect for his independent and able conduct in regard to public business, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche), has made, in a most clear and emphatic terms, the very statements that the hon. gentleman takes exception and pretends he has never heard before. Did he not know that these statements were made in the House that they had been extended in “Hansard” and down to this hour the hon. gentleman has never ventured to rise and, in the presence of the House, contradict a single word. I leave the hon. gentleman’s statement that he has never heard it except from myself, with the fact that these statements have been made on the floor of the legislature, where they have been proved by the most indisputable evidence, and they have been made on the floor of this Parliament, supported by men of the highest character. It is too late in the day for the hon. gentleman to seek to disclaim them. I am not surprised he should do so. What does this legislation prove? The hon. gentleman is a member of the Government which is pressing forward this Bill to subvert the franchise of the electorate of this country by handing us over to the tender mercies of such infamous frauds and transactions as have been practiced under the Bill of the Manitoba legislature, and under the action of the miserable, characterless creatures he, as a member of the Manitoba Government, appointed to carry that law into effect. The facts are sufficient to destroy the reputation and character of any man in this House or elsewhere.

Now, with reference to the apologetic tone adopted by the Minister of Railways and Canals. I think he concluded that he had been a little too hasty with his sneer at this amendment. But I tell him that in every statement I have made with reference to the province of New Brunswick, I have simply repeated what was declared to me by one of the most independent members of this House, the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). He told me that under the law as it stands in New Brunswick to-day, the sheriffs have extraordinary powers. I am not saying one word touching the character or standing of the sheriffs of New Brunswick.

I say it is an infamous law to give to any man the power to seat or unseat men that have a right to be elected as members of this House, to give him power to put names on the voters’ list and take them off. Does the Minister of Railways and Canals venture to say that any man with any sense of fairness should be clothed with such power as the legislation of New Brunswick clothes the sheriff, enabling him to take off names from electoral lists at pleasure and put names on at pleasure, and preventing any other person from dealing with it in the same way? If half a dozen persons of the same name are on the list, he is able to run his pen through the franchise, and leave only one of them remaining. The hon. gentleman has failed to meet a single point of my charge; and I am not surprised to see these two gentlemen sitting there united in forcing this obnoxious measure through the Parliament of this country, which will strike down everything like independent action on the part of the great electorate of Canada.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question. I presume that before he would make so grave a statement, or such a series of statements, he would have informed himself pretty thoroughly as to the accuracy of his facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have the highest authority I could possibly have.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman, of course, always deals in superlatives. I am not going to say that the authority which he quotes, so far as matter of law is concerned, may not be fairly respectable; but did the hon. gentleman take the trouble to ascertain, or did he inquire of this highest authority, how many years before I ever had a seat in the provincial legislature, the same authority which is now possessed by the sheriffs of counties, was possessed by them under provincial legislation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was sufficient for me to know that the hon. gentleman, as Attorney General, maintained and carried out that legislation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then I think the hon. gentleman is scarcely capable of acting in a judicial way, or of forming a reliable opinion upon a question where a political opponent is concerned, because if he had taken the trouble to assure himself that he had some shadow of foundation for the charges he has made, and if he had looked at the electoral legislation in New Brunswick, he would have found that, as I have said, before I came into power, before I had a seat in the provincial legislature, before I was responsible for provincial legislation.

An hon. MEMBER. Before you were born.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, perhaps even before I was born, as an hon. gentleman says, the sheriffs had conferred upon them exactly the same power. I appeal to hon. gentlemen who are sitting behind the leader of the Opposition to say whether they ever heard in all their lives such a suggestion made, or such a charge preferred, as that which has been preferred by the leader of the Opposition tonight that the law was so framed as to permit the sheriffs to do these things, or that the sheriffs had ever done these things. I say without fear of contradiction that such a statement has never been made in the province of New Brunswick, that no such view has ever been entertained in the province of New Brunswick. When the hon. member quotes the authority of Mr. Powell, I want to say that, if my memory serves me, Mr. Powell was a member of the legislature when the electoral law was revised in 1889, and Mr. Powell never thought that the law which had been on the Statute-book previously and gave the sheriff these powers, had been wrongly used or had been abused by the sheriffs, or that it was a proper thing to amend it. Mr. Powell himself has never stated in any public way, never in the legislature, that there was any call for any change in that regard. I am perfectly astounded to hear the hon. gentleman. I can scarcely give him credit for seriousness. I can scarcely conceive that the hon. gentleman would have hazarded such utterly foundationless statements in a deliberate way before this legislature, with the view of having them put upon record, as they will be, and without having taken some little pains to ascertain for himself that there was any warrant for these statements.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The Minister of Interior stated to-night that to his knowledge there never were any complaints about the working of the present law in the province of Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. About the revisers.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The revisers, and especially the clerks that are appointed to prepare the lists.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, I did not say that. I said there had been no complaints against the registration clerks; I said there never had been to my knowledge a complaint made against a reviser.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman appointed registration clerks, and if they have not performed their duty to the satisfaction of the public, it is because they were appointed by the Government to prepare the lists. The moment he admits that he made bad appointments, I shall be satisfied.

Mr. McINERNEY. While I do not wish to interfere in the discussion that has taken place between the leader of the Opposition and the Minister of Railways and Canals, I think it is nothing but right that I should call the Minister's attention to the fact that there is a law on the Statute-book of New Brunswick giving the sheriff very large and dangerous powers with regard to striking off and putting names upon the list.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How long has this law been upon the Statute-book?

Mr. McINERNEY. I will show the hon. gentleman the law to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. How long do you say it has been on the Statute-book?

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not believe the hon. gentleman knows the existence of the law himself. I have proved to-night twice that the hon. gentleman has been ignorant of the laws of this country. I have shown distinctly the ignorance of the hon. gentleman when he stated in this House that he voted at a Dominion election at a poll in the city of St. John, where, because his name began with B, and another man's name began with some other letter, in the same subdivision, they went to different poll boxes to poll their votes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, that is a fact.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does the hon. gentleman still persist in that statement, in face of the statement made by the Solicitor General that such could not be done under the Dominion Franchise Act, in face of the fact known to every lawyer in this House, that it is perfectly absurd for the hon. gentleman to say so? He must be entirely mistaken, putting it on the best possible ground, when he says that such a thing ever took place. It must have been at some civic election in the city, or some local election. It could not have been under the Dominion Franchise laws, and it could not have taken place at a Dominion election.

The hon. gentleman is mistaken again with respect to the law of New Brunswick, because there is a very dangerous law on the Statute-book with respect to the power of the sheriff in putting on and taking off names from the lists. I am not prepared to state, and I am not here to state, that the hon. Minister of Railways placed a law on the Statute-book for the benefit of the Liberal or the Conservative party, because the hon. gentleman was not supported either by the Liberals or the Conservatives, as a party. The hon. gentleman's government was a composite government, and it was not to his interest to put a law on the Statute-book, either for the purposes of the Liberal or the Conservative party, or to do anything against the interests of one party or the other.

The PRIME MINISTER. You are destroying the speech of your leader.

Mr. McINERNEY. I maintain that the law on the Statute-book of New Brunswick is dangerous to the rights and liberties of the citizens, and that under it the sheriff has great powers, which he may use for the benefit of the Government that appointed him, not of the Liberal or the Conservative party, but of the government in power for the time being.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Can the hon. gentleman remember the time when the sheriff did not have the power to prepare the lists to the extent to which he has the power referred to?

Mr. McINERNEY. He has different powers to-day to what he had then.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does not the hon. gentleman know, so far his memory will carry him back, that the sheriff exercised the power of making the lists just preparatory to the final preparation of the lists, as he would receive them from the county clerk, and when the name of the same party appeared in several places, he struck off the name in all except one parish?

Mr. McINERNEY. I cannot answer that question, yes or no.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Can the hon. gentleman remember a time when that was not the law?

Mr. McINERNEY. In New Brunswick, for many years, the sheriff has had certain powers in that regard, but later the sheriff has been given additional and far more dangerous powers, and the hon. gentleman should know it. I should be glad to show the hon. gentleman the statute to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The charge made by the leader of the Opposition was, that the sheriff, under the provincial law, had the power of striking off names.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And of keeping names on.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I ask the hon. member for Kent, if he can remember the time when the sheriff had not the power of striking off names, so that the name of an elector appeared only once on the electoral list?

Mr. McINERNEY. I am here to state that far greater power is possessed by the sheriff than was formerly possessed by him, and much more dangerous power. The hon. gentleman also stated that the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) was in the local House in 1889, and did not object when the Act was placed on the Statute-book. The hon. member for Westmoreland was first elected to the New Brunswick legislature in 1890.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said that was my recollection. If the hon. gentleman was not in the legislature when the original Act of 1889 was discussed, he was there in 1891, when the amending Act was passed. That was a very important law, and it was passed by that hon. gentleman, as a member of the legislature, though I safeguarded my statement by saying that I thought he was there in 1889.

Mr. McINERNEY.

Mr. McINERNEY. All I desire to do is, to corroborate the statement made that the sheriffs of New Brunswick have very dangerous powers given to them by the government of the province, whose officers they are, and which powers can be exercised for the benefit of the party that maintains them in office.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope it is not the intention of the leader of the House to press hon. members to do any further work. The question brought up in the amendment submitted by the leader of the Opposition is one that will be thoroughly discussed, and we should not be asked to enter upon the discussion to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER. It would be perfectly fair to carry all the subsections except "e."

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is doing something that he is apt to do in considering the Estimates, where an hon. member wants to say something on a particular item, but does not wish the whole block of items appearing under the vote to stand. He treats the subclauses in that way. We, however, want to make some amendments to these subclauses. An amendment has been proposed by the leader of the Opposition, which involves the vital principle, as hon. gentlemen must admit. We stand here to say, that, if these provincial lists are to be taken, with all their mutations and all the existing powers of the local legislature over them, and which we cannot curb, then between the electors of the Dominion and those partisan officers we want the interposition of the courts of law. That is a reasonable proposition to be made, and it is not one to be sneered at by the Minister of Railways; neither is it a proposition which the leader of the Government can afford to negative or put an affirmative in at this time of night, and after the weary work of the week. If the hon. gentleman proposes that we shall go on with the Bill, we shall proceed, but we shall not go on without discussing the matter and discussing it at length.

Mr. BRITTON. What does the hon. gentleman mean by partisan officers?

Mr. FOSTER. I will tell the hon. gentleman exactly, and it is no use chopping words about it. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the Government of Manitoba is in deadly opposition to the Liberal-Conservative party, and that they are cheek by jowl with the leader of the Government? And are we not justified, believing that, as we do believe it, in asking that the judges shall at least intervene between us and partisan opponents? You may talk about the "Free Press" of Manitoba being Liberal or Conservative, but it is an organ that every man who reads it and tells the truth, will say has been supporting the Liberal party, and this grave statement was made by that representative paper in the very centre of the province where this state of things is going on. No sneer that it is a Tory sheet, will alter the facts of the case. That is what I mean by a partisan officer and a partisan government, and that is my answer to the hon. gentleman. Is it not a fact that the Manitoba Government has carried partisanship so far that it has practically dismissed every Liberal-Conservative magistrate in Manitoba and replaced them by Grit magistrates?

Is that a fact or is it not? Is that a partisan Government which would do a thing like that, or is it not? The Minister of the Interior has not ventured to-night to defend the partisan registration of Manitoba, and when he was pinned to it by my hon. friend (Mr. LaRivière) he was very quick to rise and say that the persons he was defending were the revising officers, and that he did not put in a defence for the registering clerks. Well, Sir, it is the registering clerks that do the work, and are hon. gentlemen—well, I really cannot bring myself to think that there is any necessity for argument. What the Solicitor General has advertised this House that he proposes to do is argument enough. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) starts out by saying that the franchise should be in the power of the local legislatures, because they are the people who know best, but the Solicitor General says: I do not subscribe to that doctrine; it is true that my leader has laid down that doctrine, but I have so little faith in it that I am going to forge a chain which will restrain these legislatures from possibilities which they may perform. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) declares that the right of the franchise should belong to the local community and that in this case the local legislatures are the community, and he says that they should not be interfered with. There is no logical ground for him saying that the franchise can be best carried out by the local community, if he is going to interfere with that local community. I voice the protest of the Liberal-Conservatives against a list made by a Government like that in Manitoba at the present time partisan as we have shown it to be—even if there is no other partisan Government. We have the right as Liberal-Conservatives to ask, not that another partisan should be put in to help us, but that in the last resort we should have the courts of the country to prove our claim, whether it is right or not, that we have been kept off the voters' list and should be put on. Nobody should object to that. It is that important principle (which I suppose will not be taken objection to by my hon. friend) which we want to discuss, and we do not want to discuss it at this hour in the morning.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I rather admire the assurance of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) and of the leader of the Opposition, when with that supreme confidence with which they make their statements in this House, they see fit to declare that the Government of Manitoba have been guilty of a large number of sins of omission and sins of commission. I admire their assurance when they assume, that because they have said a thing, therefore they have proven it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) would do better, in making a statement of that kind, to confine himself to subjects upon which he at least has an elementary knowledge, and so far as the affairs of the province of Manitoba are concerned, I am satisfied from the manner in which the hon. gentleman strayed from the facts, that he has not even an elementary knowledge. Let me first say in regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), that I did not admit, that I had no intention of admitting, and that I do not now admit, that the appointments which were made by the Government of Manitoba of registration clerks to record the names of voters in that province, were bad appointments. I am a little careful, very careful, I may say, in regard to statements which I make in this House or elsewhere, and when I said in my former few remarks that no complaints had been made against revising officers, I said that because I thought it was rather a remarkable thing. I thought it was a rather remarkable thing that officers discharging a duty in which they would necessarily come in adverse contact with the political parties, should have so acted for years in that province without a complaint ever having been made. I repeat now, that until the time I left Manitoba, and during the five years I sat in the legislature as a member of the Government, no complaint was ever made against any revising officer appointed by the Government of the province of Manitoba. When my hon. friend (Mr. LaRivière) addressed the committee, he said that I stated that no complaint was made against a registration clerk, and as I had not said that I corrected him. Complaints have been made against registration clerks, not all of them, not many of them, but some of them, and it therefore would not have been correct for me to have said that no complaint had ever been made against a registration clerk. But, Sir, because a complaint has been made against a registration clerk, does it prove that therefore the appointment is a bad one? There have been complaints made against revising officers appointed by the Conservative Government of this Dominion, but do these gentlemen opposite admit that the appointments were bad. They have appointed county judges in some places to act as revising officers; the conduct of these judges has been complained of, and do these hon. gentlemen therefore admit that the appointments were bad because complaints were made. I hardly think they do. It takes more than a complaint to prove that an appointment was bad ; it takes proof that the complaint was a good complaint, and no such complaint as far as I have been aware has been made and proven in the province of Manitoba, even against a registration clerk.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) says that some of the judges appointed in Manitoba have been complained of ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I never said anything of the kind. I said nothing that any one could possibly imagine sounded like that. My hon. friends opposite seem to take a great deal of pleasure in the attacks which they make upon the Franchise Act of Manitoba, and the hon. the leader of the Opposition seems to have taken a considerable amount of comfort out of the fact that I have allowed them to go on making ridiculous statements about things they knew nothing of, owing to the fact that I did not wish to interfere and to inflict further useless discussion upon this House. It seemed to me that the discussion was pointless, and it seemed to me further to be perfectly evident from the manner in which these hon. gentlemen spoke, that they knew they were making charges that were groundless. I shall not place myself outside the rules of Parliament by saying that they did know it, but I say it had that appearance to me, and consequently it did not seem to me to be necessary to rise in my place at every stage of the discussion, and to say that the statements they were making were utterly and entirely untrue. I apprehend that the purpose of a franchise Act is to provide a voters' list upon which the electors will have the opportunity of registering their votes ; such a list as will give the people an opportunity of exercising their franchise. Now, I happen to have here the figures in regard to the registration of the electors in the province of Manitoba, both under the Provincial Franchise Act and under the Dominion Franchise Act. The figures are rather suggestive. In 1891, under the franchise provided by the Dominion Parliament, there were 18,352 persons voted in the election in the province of Manitoba, and one year later, in 1892, under the provincial Act there were 31,101 people who voted. I would like to know which Act disfranchised them. There were 12,000 men, all of whom, within a hundred or two, were qualified and entitled to vote, out of 31,000, that were not on the voters' list at all. This is the kind of Act these hon. gentlemen want to keep in force in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Does the hon. gentleman take into account the fact that there was no vote at all in Provencher at that time—that I was elected by acclamation ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am speaking of votes that were cast, not Mr. SIFTON.

of votes that were not cast. I venture to say the proportion of elections by acclamation was about the same in both cases. That was in 1891. In the Dominion elections of 1896, there were 32,884 votes cast, while in the provincial election held a few months before there were 38,073 votes cast. Now, let me give you an idea of the kind of franchise we have had for the Dominion, which hon. gentlemen forced us to hold our elections under for some years past. At the last election in my own constituency, where the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was the successful candidate, 10,666 people were on the list, and only 6,913 voted. In the electoral district of Lisgar there were 14,842 on the list, and only 5,260 votes. In Macdonald there were 9,352 on the list, and 5,733 actual voters. So that my hon. friends will see that under the operation of the Dominion Franchise Act in the province of Manitoba, in addition to the possible voters who could be got to the polls, there were thousands of men on the list not within reach. Take the last revision that took place. In the city of Winnipeg the list was brought to the county judge for revision. He looked into it, and he said, "This is such a monstrous list that it is utterly impossible for me to revise it." That was not the list prepared under the provincial law ; that was the list prepared under this Dominion law we are trying to repeal.

Mr. GILLIES. When was the Dominion list prepared ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Dominion list was revised in 1894.

Mr. GILLIES. When was the local list revised ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In the fall of 1895.

Mr. GILLIES. There was over a year of time between the two.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. And so under the provincial list the vote is enormously larger than it is under the other, while the list under the Dominion law is enormously larger than that under the provincial law. There seems to be no consideration for the voter. I will give some other figures. In 1896, while there were only 32,884 actual voters in the Dominion election, there were 68,685 on the list. The actual vote that was polled was only about 50 per cent of those on the list. On the provincial list there were 49,305 names and 38,073 votes were polled, or 77 per cent. That is the positive proof of which is the more accurate list. The proportion of the voters who go to the poll is in every case the best index of the correctness of the list.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman will admit that the basis of the franchise is not the same in both cases. In one case, it is one man one vote, while in the other every one who owns property, whether he lives there or in England or anywhere else, is on the list.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is quite correct, and therefore as under the Franchise Act men may vote in different places, that makes my argument all the stronger. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition last night, I see by the report of his remarks, took a great deal of comfort out of this fact. He said that in 1896 the present Government of Manitoba swept the country—that there were only four or five men returned in favour of the Opposition; that was under their own voters' list. Then, he said, a few months later, the Dominion Government went to the country, and the Liberals of Manitoba elected only one man. This, he said, proved that the electoral list of the province was an outrageous list. I might put the argument the other way and say that because in 1896 we were hardly able to elect anybody, while a few months before we elected nearly all the members from that province, that proved that the hon. gentleman's list was an outrageous list. Does not my hon. friend see that that argument proves nothing at all? But I will tell the hon. gentleman why it was that in the election of 1896 the Liberals of the province of Manitoba did not succeed in electing the members to whom they were entitled, and whom the public opinion of the province, being strongly in favour of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, would have justified them in expecting. My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Rutherford) was the candidate in that election, and he had against him a Conservative and a Patron. The Patron and my hon. friend were both running as candidates opposed to the hon. gentleman. The Patrons got a large number of votes of persons who were opposed to the Government, but notwithstanding that, my hon. friend was properly elected as member for that constituency over both the others, if it had not been for the most nefarious system of ballot frauds and ballot stuffing that ever was known to be perpetrated in any civilized country.

Mr. BENNETT. There have been worse in Ontario.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend is getting restless now and I am not surprised.

Mr. BENNETT. I can tell the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. GENTLEMEN. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. Now let my open faced watch keep quiet.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman who has the floor give way to the hon. member?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no objection to his putting a question.

Mr. BENNETT. I have this to say, that there have been equally as nefarious cases in the province of Ontario in support of the Mowat administration, and not only one but a great many more.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is just doing what all the rest of his friends are doing. He is making a statement which cannot be proved. But the statement I make has been proved in a court of justice by a large number of witnesses under oath, and the ballots which were stolen by these returning officers, appointees of hon. gentlemen opposite, and secretly put into the ballot boxes, were produced in court. That is the reason why my hon. friend was able to say so boastfully last night that he, the leader of the Conservative party, had carried the province of Manitoba. He would have equally carried the whole Dominion by similar means. I fancy that the hon. gentleman's memory must have been failing him a little when he referred to a subject, which is so fraught with discredit to the party he represents. In the other constituencies, what happened? In Brandon, my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was elected by a large majority, and alongside of him another gentleman, running as a patron, in opposition to the hon. gentleman, polled 1,200 votes, or 1,600 votes of a majority over the hon. gentleman were polled in that constituency. In Winnipeg, where Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald was a candidate, it was notorious that Mr. Martin, the Liberal candidate, had a large majority of the electors in his favour, and it was only by a most outrageous and unblushing system of bribery bringing in voters from all over creation and voting them on these stuffed voters' lists, on which there were thousands of names of people whom nobody knew, kept there from year to year, in spite of all the efforts of the Liberal party to purge these lists—it was only by bringing in a large number of these voters, whose names had been kept from year to year on the list, although not entitled to vote, that Mr. Martin was defeated. What is the proof? It is that when a petition was filed against Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, he did not allow it to go to trial. What is the position of the Conservative party in that constituency which they had carried a few months before? It was such that when the present member for Winnipeg (Mr. Jameson) presented himself as a candidate, the hon. gentleman did not venture to offer any opposition. The same thing occurred in my own constituency. I say that by the nefarious system practiced in Manitoba with regard to the voters' lists, prepared under the Dominion Franchise Act, the people of the province have never yet had a fair opportunity to express their opinion. I marvel at any man having the assurance to talk about the position of Manitoba in connection with the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act. What are the provisions, so far as the province is concerned. I will tell my hon. friend from Minnedosa (Mr. Roche), who has embalmed on the "Hansard" complaints against the Manitoba Franchise Act, that I will take the list under which he was elected, and the local list for the same territory, and will show him five mistakes in the Dominion lists for every one that occurred in the provincial lists. I will make the same comparison between the Dominion and local lists for any electoral division in Manitoba, and I will show five mistakes in the Dominion for every one mistake in the provincial lists. I have full knowledge of all the circumstances and I say that the statement made with regard to frauds in connection with the Manitoba Act are absolutely destitute of foundation; and to-day I venture to say that there can be no means devised whereby more accurate, complete and proper lists in every respect can be prepared for electoral purposes than are prepared at present under the Manitoba Act. There can be no further proof required than the figures I have given and which show that thousands of men at present are disfranchised under the nefarious Dominion Act, which now governs us.

Just one other point I wish to refer to. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think that there is some enormous difference between a revising officer appointed by the Dominion Government and a revising officer appointed by the local Government. I would like to know wherein that difference consists.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The federal Government always appointed county court judges.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Wherever there were county court judges.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They appointed political heelers in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In Manitoba they appointed county court judges in every electoral division where county court judges were to be had.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I would recommend the hon. gentleman to sit down, because he has put his foot into it and is talking about a subject he has not even an elementary knowledge of. I would take the division of Marquette, the lists upon which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) was elected, were not prepared by the county court judge, but by the revising officer, who was a young barrister of the town of Carberry—a very decent fellow, I believe—but who occupies no position at the bar, and who never would have been thought of as a county court judge or for any other judicial position. What did this gentleman do? He prepared the lists in the first place, and then he revised and certified them. He made the lists just as he saw fit, and I would like some body to explain how it is that when this young gentleman was appointed as revising officer by the Dominion Government, he became so superior in every moral quality and every other quality that goes to make a perfect revising officer, over gentlemen appointed by the provincial Government. I do not accuse the gentleman who prepared the lists of any fraudulent or improper conduct in my hon. friend's constituency. I do not know anything about the preparation of the lists there, but I know that if a member of the legal profession were asked to compare the gentleman who prepared the lists, professionally, with the gentlemen who acted as revising officers under the local Act, they would simply smile and say he was not in the same class professionally. Under the Dominion Act, the revising officer prepares the lists and then revises the list which he has prepared. When you come to a revision, and ask to have names taken off or put on, you have to make your appeal to the officer who made up the lists in the first instance, and are appealing to him against his own judgment, if he exercised it. But under the Manitoba Act complained of, you have merely a ministerial officer, in the first place, who makes up the list, then you have the revising officer who hears complaint and acts in a judicial capacity to correct any mistakes made by the registration clerk. Therefore if there is to be a fatal objection to the operation of the Manitoba Act, it must be in the conduct of the revising officer, because he is the officer who is there for the purpose of correcting the mistakes made by the registration clerk. And if no complaint has been made against the revising officer—and none ever was—then the complaint about frauds perpetrated under the Manitoba Act falls at once to the ground. I do not know that there is anything further that I desire to say in connection with the subject. It just occurred to me that my hon. friends who have been letting themselves loose on the Manitoba franchise Act, about which they know very little, said sufficient to justify me in offering these few words of explanation to the committee.

Mr. ROCHE. If I did not know any more about the election Act than the hon. Minister of the Interior, I would not attempt to get on my feet to make any accusation against it to-night. That hon. gentleman, in his remarks, has either displayed a lamentable amount of ignorance in regard to it, or what is equally as bad, an utter recklessness in his statements. So much recklessness that it puts me in mind of the speech he delivered upon a notable occasion in the earlier part of this session and which made very little impression, evidently, upon the country, by the reports we have been hearing since the defeat of his famous Bill. Now, the hon. gentleman has touched upon several questions and touched upon them in the most reckless manner. He has claimed, in the first place, that the lists prepared in Manitoba for the provincial elections are very much better than those prepared for the Dominion. He knows that the local lists are prepared on an entirely different franchise—manhood suffrage.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) knows that almost every man who is qualified to vote under the Manitoba Act can qualify under the Dominion Franchise Act. The different franchise under the Dominion Act permits almost every man to qualify who can qualify as a resident under the Manitoba Act. I have compared them time and again in different parts of the province, and what I say can be shown almost without any exception.

Mr. ROCHE. I will let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) settle that with his leader, who spoke of the disfranchisement of manhood suffrage voters in British Columbia. As one of the best evidences I can give in support of my contention, I would refer to the "Free Press." The hon. gentleman would not have the "Free Press" quoted as a Liberal organ. I do not know that he accused the "Free Press" of being a Tory paper. I am sure he will not go so far as that. The editors of the independent press accuse the "Free Press" of being exactly what they accuse the hon. Minister of the Interior of being—a tool of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The "Free Press" calls itself an independent paper but its independence is much of the same stripe as that of the Montreal "Witness"—it can generally be relied upon to support the Ministry. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with that authority, I will give him a better. When the Manitoba Election Act was being placed on the Statute-books, it was condemned by the Toronto "Globe." The hon. gentleman will not take exception to my statement when I refer to that as an organ of the Liberal party. The "Globe" warned the Liberals of Manitoba that they were planting a stumbling block in the way of the Liberals in this House in adopting the present Franchise Act in that province. If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the "Globe" as an authority I can give him another, one that I have already quoted in this House, and that is Mr. Fisher of the provincial legislature, representative of the province of Manitoba on the late Hudson Bay expedition. Mr. Fisher is an old-time Liberal and ex-president of the Provincial Liberal Association, and he has called and still calls the Act a monstrosity of monstrosities. I am sure that the hon. gentleman will give some weight to what Mr. Fisher says. The hon. gentleman claims that nothing has been said against the revising officers in Manitoba. Surely, he does not mean that. I can give him not hearsay-evidence, but something within my own experience on that subject. The constituency in which I reside is 48 miles in length, and we formerly had three courts of revision, one in the western extremity, one in the eastern extremity and one in the central part of the riding, the work being thus divided so as to accommodate the electors. But the Liberal party of Manitoba are growing more reckless with each election, and, at the last election, they gave us only one court of revision, and that at the extreme eastern end of the riding, where the Liberal candidate himself resided. It was held to suit his convenience and not the convenience of the electors. As the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has pointed out when a wrong name was put on the lists it was almost impossible for us to get it off. The party might be living many miles away, or the name might be merely fictitious. This was a direct incentive to personation where the party was not found and was in direct contravention of the principle of the Manhood Suffrage Act. The names put on in this way it was almost impossible for us to have struck off. And it was equally hard for us to get names on that had been left off. I am well acquainted with the electorate of my riding, owing to my profession as a physician and I gave evidence in a number of cases, and found it exceedingly difficult to satisfy the revising officer. Men who had voted in municipal, Dominion and provincial elections for years, and who were forty or fifty years of age were challenged. The Liberal candidate took exception on the ground of every legal technicality. He wanted to know if I could swear to the age of the party. He asked me how I knew the man's age. I might answer: I am morally certain, or some one told me so, but it was almost impossible to satisfy the revising officer. A brother-in-law giving evidence for his brother-in-law beside whom he had lived for fifteen years had his evidence thrown out. Unless one was in a position to swear that he was present at a man's birth, it was almost impossible for him to satisfy the revising officer. The travelling to the court of revision entailed a good deal of hardship. In the constituency of Dauphin the revising officer was supplied with 165 names, and he refused to say to the Conservatives whether he would or would not put these names on the voters' lists. In the constituency of Emerson, to which the hon. leader of the Opposition referred some thirteen or fourteen names were put upon the lists, and the revising barrister refused to strike the names off because it could not be proved that the parties had been subpoenaed. Some of them were known to be non-existent perhaps, and none of them within reach. Again with reference to the registration clerks. The great plea of the Liberal party against the Dominion Franchise Act was the system of revising barristers. The leader of the Government himself said: We are going to legislate out of existence these revising officers. As has been pointed out, we are to have the revising barristers in their worst form under this Bill if it becomes law. The revising barrister of the Dominion both made and revised the list, but in the province of Manitoba the revising barristers are lawyers, barristers of three years standing, sent out from the city of Winnipeg to do duty at the several courts of revision. So we are merely exchanging Conservative revising barristers for Liberal ones.

We have a double set of officials in Manitoba. These revisers are not permitted to compile the list, they are compiled by laymen who have no standing in the community, men who are not selected because they were thought worthy of the positions, but because they were likely to be the tools of the Liberal candidate. It is undeniable that in every constituency of that province the lists are prepared under the direct supervision of the Liberal candidate. I am personally aware of this, I am not talking from hearsay. I have myself sent in affidavits to get parties on the list, and they have been ignored, the parties were left off the list at the instigation of the Liberal candidate. The conduct of some of those officials were so bad that in one constituency where Judge Ryan, of Portage la Prairie, a very fair officer, was revising barrister, he condemned the action of the registration clerk, and declared that if he had known he was going to have so much trouble, he would not have accepted the position of reviser. The hon. gentleman has also remarked that the by-elections in Manitoba have shown how unfair the lists were; he says that were they free from all those undue influences that were exercised by the Conservative party they would have swept the province as they did at the by-elections. But the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that no matter what Government is in power the by-elections nearly always go with the Government of the day. That occurred in 1891, after Conservatives were returned to power.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman misses the point I made. I was answering the statement made by the leader of the Opposition, that they had swept the country in 1896, and I was pointing out that the reason why we lost Macdonald was that the ballot-boxes were stuffed by the friends of the hon. gentleman and by his candidate in the next constituency.

Mr. ROCHE. The hon. Minister of the Interior tries to leave the impression upon this House that it was owing to ballot stuffing. Well, in the provincial House the other day the government was asked for a return of all the expenses in connection with this prosecution, and the Attorney General of Manitoba did not give a detailed expenditure, but referred his questioner to the Dominion Government. Over $10,000 were expended on this line, and here is what the "Nor'-Wester" says in a leader of the 4th of April:

Had there been really any election frauds, or had there been any reasonable probability of such having been committed, the expenditure, assuming to have been properly applied, would, perhaps, have been justifiable. But the results of the trials of the large number of deputy returning officers arrested established the fact that all, except one were innocent of any such fraud. In connection with the Macdonald election, for instance, eighteen men were placed under arrest.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That statement is entirely untrue. The trial did not establish anything of the kind. The result of the trial proved conclusively that in a considerable number of the polling subdivisions the polls were stolen, the ballots were fraudulently marked, and were fraudulently put in the ballot-boxes.

Mr. ROCHE. Well, I will give the details of that prosecution as stated by this newspaper:

In connection with the Macdonald election, for instance, eighteen men were placed under arrest, viz.: Messrs. Parker, Mawhinney, McDonald, Dennison, Orr, Roberts, Saunders, Hamilton, Brown, James Waller, Brooks, Finklestine, H. E. Waller, Clark, Herriman, McFadden, Renwick and Anderson. Of these Parker, Dennison, Roberts, Brown, James Waller, Herriman and McFadden were acquitted on the preliminary investigation before the magistrates. The Crown had not even a prima facie case against them to warrant them being put on trial. The case of H. E. Waller was thrown out by the grand jury. The Crown ultimately dropped proceedings against McDonald, Orr, Hamilton, Brooks, Finklestine and Renwick, thus admitting it had no case against them. Mawhinney, when put on trial, was triumphantly acquitted. The jury refused to convict Anderson and Clark. Upon a new trial, fresh juries in each case again refused to convict them. The only conviction the Crown secured was in the case of Saunders, who was a tool of its own. He is the man for whom Dr. Rutherford, the Liberal candidate, went surety. He it was who confessed that he had been a party to violating the law, not for the benefit of the Conservative party, but to help the Crown's wretched informer, Freeborn, to extort money from the Conservative party for their joint profit. And this man Saunders, it may be remarked, has just been honoured by the Attorney General who prosecuted him by being given Her Majesty's commission to take affidavits in the courts of this province. The arrest of these men, innocent of the charge laid against them, was made the pretext for treating them with singular harshness. For instance, Brown, who was acquitted even on the preliminary investigation before the magistrate, was put in jail for thirty-six hours, and before he was let out had to provide the enormous bail of $6,000. Mawhinney was likewise in jail for thirty-six hours, and was fed on bread and water, besides being subjected to other indignities. These men also were each put to enormous expense in order to establish their innocence. The prosecutions, in short were the most disgraceful prostitution of the forms of justice in the service of political rancour which has ever occurred in a free country. The cases were trumped up upon the evidence of the wretch, Freeborn—a creature known by the Attorney General to be an informer of the stamp of Titus Oates and Dangerfield, who only went to the Attorney General with his lying tale after trying to bleed the Conservative party on the strength of it, and who, before the trials were over, had involved himself in innumerable perjuries. What this man's share of the $10,964.41 was, the public is particularly anxious to know. It is, perhaps, no wonder, in view of all the circumstances connected with these prosecutions that both governments are ashamed of them and are taking such extraordinary measures to keep the details of their expenditure on them from the knowledge of the public.

Now, the hon. gentleman may have heard each case I have read in detail as these men were tried. They were acquitted in each instance, except Saunders, who was convicted on his own testimony, as he admitted that he had taken certain ballots that were marked and given them to this man Freeborn, who was to go snooks with him in levying blackmail on the Conservative party. Failing that, he took the ballots to the Liberal committee, and they took them, and hence this prosecution. The hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves as to the reliability of the statement of the Minister of the Interior, after hearing these facts I have read. Now, there is another phase of that Macdonald election case which I might refer to. It had reference more particularly to the by-election that took place since, but I do not mean to touch upon that feature of the case at all. But I will just say this to the Solicitor General, that in enacting such a law as this Franchise Act, he should at least make some provision to meet the very peculiar state of affairs that exists in the province of Manitoba. There we have those officers who are appointed as registration clerks, men of no weight in the community, men who do exactly as the Liberal candidate instructs them to do. These men stuff the lists in the interest of their own party, they ignore affidavits being sent in by Conservatives. At the last debate the member for Macdonald declared that he knew a certain case where false affidavits were sent in, and known to be so to the registration clerk; and I have cited a particular instance where I myself sent in those affidavits, and they were ignored. I do not think in the district where I reside, that I have the reputation of making false affidavits. I have, on more than one occasion, sent in affidavits that have been ignored, and at the Court of Revision, the Liberal candidate has admitted that they were left off at his instigation. I do not know what further proof is required to show the character of the provincial Election Act of Manitoba. We are not doing away by this Act with the revising barristers, we still have them, and we have these laymen besides to stuff the lists. So I think it is only right that the Solicitor General should make some provision that we would have an opportunity of having a revision, before each Dominion election, by a judge of the province. We have in that province six county court judges, and four judges of the Queen's Bench. There are seven electoral divisions, so we have plenty of judges to do this duty. In view of the facts I have laid before the House on more than one occasion, I think Manitoba deserves special recognition at the hands of this Government until we have a better and fairer Election Act on the statutes of that province. I see that some mention has been made in the local legislature this year of the fact, that Mr. Roblin brought in some amendments, and Mr. Geenway asked him to leave them aside until the Federal Government had brought in their Franchise Bill, after which he promised to pass some legislation. But we cannot place much reliance in Mr. Greenway fulfilling his promises, in view of his record in that respect in the past. Before this Bill is allowed to become law the Solicitor General should introduce a clause that will mitigate the evil effects of the Provincial Franchise Act to a considerable extent by allowing us to have a revision before one of the judges of the province.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would remind the hon. gentleman that under the law of Manitoba, as it stands, there is provision for establishing a court of revision by one of the county court judges of the province, or by a barrister of at least three years standing in that province. The hon. gentleman referred a moment ago to a revision that took place before Judge Ryan.

Mr. ROCHE. At that time we only had five county court judges in the province, and the excuse was made by the provincial Government that they had not enough judges. We have forty constituencies in Manitoba, and where the judges act we have no fault to find.

Mr. RUTHERFORD. If there were so many judges in Manitoba, why was it that in the hon. gentleman's constituency, under the Dominion Act, a judge was not employed?

Mr. ROCHE. Revising barristers both prepared and revised the lists. Mr. Barrett is a lawyer of more than five years' standing. He occupies a high standing in the community, and also in his profession. As regards professional attainments, he will compare favourably with the Minister of the Interior.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I desire to draw attention to the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In looking back, I see my amendment will be equally applicable to clause "a," and I propose not to move it to the present clause, but to bring it up when clause "a" is adopted.

Subsection agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the hon. gentleman, if he will now agree to adjourn?

The PRIME MINISTER. Let us take down to clause "d."

Mr. MONK. I am not disposed to allow clause "c" to pass without moving an amendment. I am sorry to move it at this late hour, but the Minister of the Interior occupied nearly three-quarters of an hour in speaking on totally irrelevant matters, and, as a member of the Government, whatever error we may commit on this side of the House, he and his colleagues should set a good example. We are not so much interested in filling up this blank; the important point is to guard against the danger of interference with the franchise by the local authorities in time to affect a general Dominion election. I, therefore, move to add these words to clause "c":

Provided, however, in the case of a general federal election the provincial authorities shall not have altered the law relating to the provincial franchise within the year next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of the candidates. In case such alteration shall have been made within said year, then the list in force before such alteration of the law relating to the provincial franchise, shall be employed.

We guard against the danger of interference by the local legislature by filling the time as one year, and during the interval it is possible for this House to interfere and remedy the grievance. This is a late hour for hon. members to express their opinions on this amendment, without feeling, as I do, that they are trespassing on the good will of members.

The PRIME MINISTER. We should pass the clauses down to "d."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Clause "c" has not received any consideration.

The PRIME MINISTER. The question has been well considered by the Solicitor General, and he suggested a different period. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) suggested a delay of twelve months.

Mr. MONK. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman says we should not take a list unless twelve months old.

Mr. MONK. I do not interfere with the sixty days mentioned, but I am providing for a special case, when, shortly before the general elections, the local legislature may change the franchise law.

The PRIME MINISTER. The Solicitor General provided sixty days, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier wishes to provide twelve months.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a special case.

The PRIME MINISTER. The suggestion of the Solicitor General was, that the list should not be altered by the province later than two months before the elections. The member for Jacques Cartier seeks to provide that it should not be altered for twelve months. We have already provided that the voters' lists shall be those prepared for the several polling divisions so established, and which, on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for such Dominion elections, were in force. The amendment provides that no alteration shall take place in the lists for twelve months. And now the hon. member for Jacques Cartier proposes that, in order to be effective, the time must be extended to twelve months.

Mr. ROCHE.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. That is, the franchise.

The PRIME MINISTER. What is the difference?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, I understand the Prime Minister declines to allow the committee to rise at 2 o'clock in the morning, and is determined to force the most important part of the Bill through the House, when hon. gentlemen wish to discuss it fully. I think my right hon. friend is making a great mistake, so far as the progress of this Bill is concerned. I do not intend to remain here any longer to-night, but I will say to the right hon. gentleman that he is making a serious mistake from his own standpoint, in pressing anything so unreasonable on this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the committee do rise.

Mr. BENNETT. This Bill demands from gentlemen on this side of the House a great degree of attention, not only on account of the duty they owe to themselves as representatives of the different constituencies, but more particularly by reason of the fact that we, the Conservative members, represent a large section of the community, and a section of the community which has at least done equally as much as the section represented by hon. gentlemen opposite to build up what to-day is the Dominion of Canada. The Government brought down this Bill to the House some time ago, and to-day they have to admit it is full of defects, and at the very outset they have been compelled to amend it. I believe that had the First Minister been present when the matter was originally suggested, he would have agreed to a conference between the two parties so that some respectable franchise law might be arrived at. Speaking for myself, I am prepared to wait here until the snow comes next fall before I will see this infamous Bill as it stands to-day passed through Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT. Let me tell the hon. member for Bellechasse, who interrupts, that he always proves the truth of the saying, that the loud laugh bespeaks the vacant mind.

Had I the amount of vacancy his mind possesses, I fancy I could roam to the uttermost ends of the world. I certainly shall not attempt the task of enlightening him, and especially not at this hour of 2 o'clock in the morning. I admire that hon. gentleman's convivial temperament, and when I recall that about this time a week ago he was even a little more convivial than he is at the present time. I can assure the right hon. leader of the House that brilliant as his follower is to-night, he was perfectly refulgent a week ago. Coming back to the Bill, what do we find? We find that the further we go the more objectionable are its provisions. I will deal with clause 6 now for a little while and point out some of its defects.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. I am speaking on the motion to adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is aware that he cannot discuss a different clause than that before the House, on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BENNETT. With all due deference to the First Minister there is a motion to adjourn.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is a motion to adjourn, but the hon. gentleman must confine himself to the subject.

Mr. BENNETT. Very well. There are some wonderful propositions in this Bill, and the proposition with reference to the voters' lists is one that must strike the right hon. gentleman as one very unfair and wholly improper. The Solicitor General has been handicapped in the preparation of this Bill owing to the fact that he cannot be expected to know the law of all the different provinces, and while I congratulate the Solicitor General on having mastered the law to a considerable extent, it is very true that one cannot learn all by simply reading; a great deal more is to be learned by actual experience in the working out of the law, and so there are a great many defects in this Bill which probably did not occur to the mind of the Solicitor General. When this Bill was first placed before the House, the right hon. the Premier told us that we were to have a voters' list which would not cost a cent to the provincial treasury. The right hon. gentleman was misinformed when he said that the preparation of the lists in the province of Ontario would not occasion any cost to the province. Last year when an election was approaching in Ontario, the cost was forced upon the province of about $7,700, which is a very considerable amount, and which will be increased in a year before the Dominion election. Then the right hon. the Prime Minister promised us that the preparation of the lists under this Bill would be absolutely without the cost of a single cent to members of this House. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman that instead of that being the case, we in Ontario know to our cost that the revision under the local Franchise Act occasions a great deal more worry and expenditure to the candidate than it does under the existing Dominion franchise. In the province of Ontario, after the assessor makes his return to the clerk, the clerk's duty is to prepare from the assessment roll the names of all those who are entitled to vote. After the list has been printed and posted up for thirty days, appeals are entered with the clerk and then comes the work of the court of revision, and that is where the heavy work is done. We were told on the introduction of this Bill that it was the duty of the assessor to go around the country and hunt up the names of persons to be placed on the voters' lists, but that is not so. The duty of the assessor is simply to value the properties so that municipal rates may be imposed. True, if he chances to find a man who is 21 years of age and a British subject he can place him on what is called the manhood suffrage list. But there is no duty imposed on the assessor to go about the riding, and chase up and down the concession lines, to find every person who is entitled to go on the list. What follows? After the assessor has completed his list, and after it has been printed and displayed, then comes the season of appeals. In the riding of East Simcoe, which is much smaller for local purposes than it is for federal purposes, there were no less than 1,500 appeals. Surely the First Minister does not imagine that candidates can prosecute 1,500 appeals without the cost of a single dollar. In the other two ridings of Simcoe, there were also a great number of appeals. According to the public accounts of Ontario, the county judge of Simcoe was paid $214 for hearing appeals in the three ridings of that county; in two of those ridings there must have been upwards of 2,500 appeals. In the county of Ontario, $200 was paid, and in the county of Huron $204 was paid for the same purpose; and so on through the list. It is quite plain from these payments that there must have been in the different ridings a very large number of appeals. So that it is altogether a delusion and a snare to say that the candidate finds in the provincial list a list already made to his hand. Under the local act the revision of the list is a most expensive proceeding to the candidate, for this reason, that if he objects to a person's name appearing on the list, he is driven to the necessity of finding witnesses to give oral evidence, while under the Dominion law all he is required to do to secure the attendance of the party at court is simply to mail him a notice. It turns out, then, that while you are going to accept the local lists, the first thing you are going to do is to impose on the provincial treasury a large expenditure whenever a revision takes place; and in the next place you are going to force on the candidate a larger expense than he is now subject to under the Dominion Act. At the same time you are imposing a very heavy expenditure on the municipalities. The revision in East Simcoe last year cost the different municipalities $50, $60, $80 or $100 each. The law provides that certain fees are payable to the municipal officers, and the Government is simply transferring the cost of the revision from the Government to the municipalities. The revision held before the last local elections cost the municipalities in East Simcoe $700 or $800. If in anticipation of a Dominion election, we had another revision this year, you would be forcing on these municipalities a repetition of that expenditure. The First Minister stated that all the municipalities got off scot-free, with the exception of the cities. Let me tell him that he was altogether in error in that, because, as I showed the other night, it entailed a cost of perhaps $50 or $75 upon each of the townships. In one township, Medonte, I showed that the revision of the local list had cost $80. Although the Government are not any too popular in the country, they are going to fling a taunt of defiance at these municipalities. They are going to say to them, "We do not care whether you object to high taxes or not; one thing we are going to do is to cut down the expense for the Dominion voters' list, but we are going to make you pay through the nose for it." The revision of the local lists to-day is most unpopular in the province of Ontario, because the municipalities say, and properly say, "We are not interested in the elections for the legislature; what we are interested in is the proper conduct of our municipal affairs; but it is owing to these politicians that so much cost for these revisions is imposed upon us." What does it mean? It means that upon an average riding of about eight municipalities, you are going to impose a cost municipally of about $800 for the revision of the local franchise list. The whole trouble with the old franchise law was that the burden of expense was too great; and if the Government would consent to a conference on this Bill, between half a dozen men on either side of the House, I believe it would not take them over two hours to come to an understanding with regard to it. This Bill could then be brought down and passed in its entirety and hundreds of dollars would be saved to the country. Why should we not do that. The question of expense is a great question with hon. gentlemen opposite, and with us it is a question of principal which is at stake. We are fairly entitled to ask that there should be fair elections throughout the country, and surely no man will contend that in the province of Ontario there is a shadow of a chance for fair and honest elections, on the voters' lists as they are now made up. I have one of the voters' lists here which we used in the last local elections in the province of Ontario.

Mr. McMULLEN. Give us a rest.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. BENNETT. I hear a plaintive wail from my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). I envy that hon. gentleman because I have seen him safe in the arms of Morpheus, under the gallery over there for at least the last two hours; and if he is now awake, he should not object at all to giving me his attention for a little while. I have had the pleasure of being in this House the past five years, and have heard no voice oftener than that of the hon. gentleman, and I cannot say it is a musical one. The hon. gentleman was always ready to speak, in season and out of season. If some question of constitutional law were at issue, if great lawyers on either side were endeavouring to give the country the benefit of their opinion on constitutional questions, no decision could be arrived at until we had the conclusive opinion—conclusive in his own mind—of the hon. gentleman. I do not care what question is raised, significant or insignificant, the hon. gentleman always gave us the benefit of his oracular utterances; and he who flourished so often before us the Auditor General's report, which was a much more formidable looking document than the one I have in my hand, should not object to my displaying a provincial voters' list. I was about to say that in Ontario we are not afforded, in the preparation of the voters' lists any guarantee of honesty or straightforwardness. When hon. gentlemen contemplate the list which I hold in my hand they cannot fail to admit that it is not such a list on which any man desiring a fair and honest election would care to go to the country. The deputy returning officer may have been an honest man, but in order to do the party a service, he may have permitted that list to lie around loose for a few hours or for a day, and some obliging friend may have struck out some of the names and added others. Here is page after page with names written in which were probably inserted in the way I mention. It was amusing to hear the Minister of the Interior wax so indignant over the idea of anything wrong being done under the local Acts. I am sorry he is not present, because I know that if I were to appeal to him, he would protest, in the name of everything honest, against the adopting of voters' lists fashioned after the style of this one. What are we to have? We are to have these voters' lists as they are prepared in the province of Ontario. So the Solicitor General told us the other night, but I think he could not have understood the law as it stands in Ontario. In Ontario, after the lists have been printed, and a court has been held, the judge makes the corrections, and the corrected list is then placed in the hands of the Clerk of the Peace for the county. I am very sorry that the right hon. First Minister has gone away, because I hoped to make him a convert to a plan by which we could have very cheap voters' lists in the Dominion and which would give us a most creditable Act. But as he is absent, I assume I have to ask the hon. Solicitor General to lend his ear to my prayer, and I know he will do it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Why, I would prefer doing it on Tuesday.

Mr. BENNETT. I can assure the hon. gentleman that it is not a matter of choice on my part.

Mr. TAYLOR. Move that the committee rise.

Mr. BENNETT. I would do so only the Chairman is asleep and I hate to disturb him; I think it most unkind that hon. gentlemen should laugh, because I am sure we should not find fault with the Deputy Speaker for taking a snooze, under the circumstances. The list which is placed in the hands of the clerk of the peace in the printed list with the corrections made by the judge, and then the returning officer has the right to apply for copies, and is furnished, not with printed lists already corrected, but with a written list, and the result is that whole pages may be left out. There may be dozens of names left out and others wrongfully added. If it is proven that some other person did that, the clerk of the peace for the county is not to blame, and it was a matter of comment that in the late provincial elections in Ontario a large number of names were dropped from the voters' lists. In fact, in one of the ridings I referred to, the riding of Monck, one of the complaints was that a large number of names had been left off the list.

Now contrast the preparation of that voters' list with the voters' list we have in the Dominion election. I have both a Dominion and a provincial list here, and I ask hon. gentlemen to contrast them. Suppose that a local election is going on. A man comes to vote. Probably he has driven 12 or 15 miles to record his vote. He may be the owner of a farm and a valuable farm and may have voted for years in this municipality. But when he gets to the poll, by reason of the fact that some persons have conspired against his right to vote, a line has been drawn through his name on the voters' list, and he is not entitled to vote. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite would be loath to see placed on the Statute-book—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. I have to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) for trying to quell the insurrection at the back of this Chamber. With the influence he has in this House he will surely be able to quell it, and I feel certain that he will strive to maintain the most perfect order. I am sorry that I do not secure the closer attention of some of these hon. gentlemen that they may learn how the voters' lists in Ontario are made.

Mr. GILLIES. How are they prepared?

Mr. BENNETT. They are so iniquitous-looking that one would almost believe that His Satanic Majesty had had a hand in preparing them. But as a matter of fact, they are simply the outcome of the pernicious system that prevails in the province of Ontario. I am more anxious to impress the iniquity of these voters' lists upon hon. gentlemen opposite because among them are gentlemen who expect to adorn the judicial bench. It may be that they will be called upon to discharge their judicial functions in the far-off province of British Columbia. If they will give me their attention they will learn many facts with regard to the voters' list of Ontario that will be interesting to them now and valuable when they undertake the discharge of their duties upon the Bench. They will be able to say: When I was in the House of Commons on one occasion I saw a voters' list of Ontario. It was prepared under a vicious system and was a very bad list, we in this favoured province have a much better list, a much purer list than they had in the province of Ontario. I believe that some hon. gentlemen are asking me questions, but as they all speak at once, I cannot understand what is said.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. It seems that I misunderstood. I thought these hon. gentlemen were thirsting for information. And, Mr. Chairman, I am appealed to by a gentleman from the gallery. At least, he is addressing somebody; I do not know whether he is addressing me or some other hon. gentleman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask hon. gentlemen to keep order. And there are strangers in the House who must maintain the most perfect order.

Mr. BENNETT. I have pointed out how these voters' lists, being in the hands of the deputy returning officers for three or four days prior to the election, no care can be thrown about them, and names may be struck out or names inserted. Well, Mr. Chairman, I fear that these hon. gentlemen on the back benches are incurable, I fear that they do not wish to be convinced.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order, order.

Mr. BENNETT. A number of these hon. gentlemen are from Ontario, and I can easily understand that they feel they are sufficiently informed on this subject. But there are hon. gentlemen from other provinces also, and I think that if these hon. gentlemen would pay closer attention to my humble remarks they would be considerably benefited, and I can assure them that I should consider it an honour to have the attention of such distinguished, honoured and highly-respected members of the House. I did not catch the remarks of my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser).

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I made no remark at all.

Mr. BENNETT. I regret that the hon. gentleman did not make a remark? Because I know if he had made a remark it would have been a most sagacious one. I do not say that in the spirit of jest, but in the most sober and serious sense. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say that under the old Dominion Franchise Act the lists were displayed in every part of the riding, and the voter knew exactly what the list was.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must ask hon. gentlemen to keep order.

Mr. BENNETT. I think, Mr. Chairman, you should rather say disorder. It is running rampant.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must appeal to hon. members of the committee to keep order. We remember the disgraceful scenes which occurred, I am told, last week, and I hope they will not be repeated to-night.

Mr. BENNETT. You know, Mr. Chairman, that order is heaven's first law. It is confessed that some must be mightier than the rest. I do not know which of those hon. gentlemen is endeavouring to be more mightier than the rest in their unrest.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the question which is now before the Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. Very well, Sir, I was going on say that under the old Dominion Franchise Act the voters had perfect confidence in the voters' lists. But when an election comes on for the local legislature, such is not the case. When an elector presents himself to vote he finds that by some means unknown to himself, a pen has been run through his name and he has the humiliation of being told that he has no right to the franchise. The result is that we have to-day in the province of Ontario a feeling among the public that the voters' lists are not what they should be, and that they should be remedied. Let me show where we have made mistakes in the old voters' lists and in the revision under the franchise laws. In the first place, there was altogether too much money expended, I have always contended, by way of payment of fees to the judges. In the riding of East Simcoe, I think the judge was paid an amount aggregating $1,100 or $1,200 for the revision of the voters' list of one single riding. In North Simcoe the cost, I think, was about $1,000, while in South Simcoe, a much smaller riding, it only amounted to about $800. There was about $3,000 paid to judges in those three ridings. Under the local franchise the judge of the County Court revises the local list for $300, and much money might be saved in judges' fees. Large sums are expended in printing and a saving could be made in that direction. My proposition to the Government is chiefly as follows: First, let us adopt in its entirety, the voters' lists in each province. Take the voters' list of 1897, which by reason of the large expenditure last year is in fairly good condition in Ontario. Let that be taken as a basis. Let the County Court judge be appointed as revising barrister and be furnished with copies of the lists. Let him announce by notice, published in the newspapers during one month, that he will receive appeals to add or remove names. When the month is up let the judge make copies of all names asked to be added or removed. When those two lists are prepared let the judge have copies made. In each municipality let the names be sent to the clerk. Let a copy of the appeals be sent to the defeated candidate, and another to the member for the riding. Up to this point no expenditure has been imposed either on the Dominion or the candidates. Then let the judge proceed with the revision of the lists and hold court. The result will be that in every riding a voters' list will be prepared and revised at an expense of about $150. Surely that sum is not too much for a revised list. But you say who will prepare the list? In any event, the candidates have to bear the expense of bringing appeals before the courts. This reduced expenditure should catch the ear of the Minister of Finance, and it is sufficient to send the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) into a state of ecstasy. The judge will be amply paid at $150 for each riding. It will be asked how the expenditure can be so little for the judge when he was formerly paid $1,000 a year? Under the old Franchise Act, however, the judge not only acted in the courts, but he also collected the names. He had placed in his hands the assessment rolls, all applications were sent to him and the lists were prepared by him. We have now, however, reached a point when the work can be done for a trifling expenditure of $150 for each riding. At the printing bureau the type of the last Dominion lists is still standing. Proofs could be struck off and these sent to the judges and corrections made. I would like to ask the Government how the voters' lists were formerly obtained? I ask the Minister of the Interior. As I receive no reply from the hon. gentleman I now put the question to the Minister of Agriculture. As a last resort may I ask the Minister of Finance, how it is proposed under this Act to furnish members with voters' lists in the event of elections coming off? Then, if the Minister of Finance does not answer, I will have to trespass upon the good nature of the hon. gentleman from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell), who is in the Cabinet without portfolio. I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dobell), who has just come into the House that every candidate at the next general election would be delighted to know how the Government expect to provide candidates for these voters' lists. Well, I had almost despaired of getting an answer, but I see the Solicitor General has come back to the Chamber, and I am sure that hon. gentleman will agree with me that I have grave cause of complaint.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Your time is up, I think.

Mr. BENNETT. The Solicitor General intimates that my hour has come. Not at all. I only trust that we may have many hours together here. I have asked all the Ministers, with and without portfolio, how candidates are to get these voters' lists, but they have all turned a deaf ear to me, and so I am glad the Solicitor General has come back to answer. Where is the man who, most unfortunately for himself, and fortunately for the country, is a candidate, where is he to get these voters' lists in Ontario? If the Solicitor General will not answer, I will have to inform my unfortunate fellow-members myself, even at the risk of hon. gentlemen opposite being let into the secret. First and foremost, if they are millionaires they can get the lists printed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Who; millionaires?

Mr. BENNETT. If the candidates are millionaires they can get the lists printed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. And if they are not?

Mr. BENNETT. Then they can toil through the long hours of the night and the long hours of the day copying out these lists and distributing them around among their friends. The Solicitor General must feel that it would be an outrage on my Gaelic friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) and my Scotch friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. McDonald) if they were forced to copy out the names of some of the voters I have in my riding. Instead of having a long list of Macdonalds, McTavishes and McNeills, names dear to his heart, the hon. gentleman would have a long list of names of very respectable French voters, which would be extremely difficult for him to copy. How he would curse the evil spirit that ever tempted him in an insane moment to become a Parliamentary candidate, and how he would feel chagrined at being driven to that work by a relentless Government.

Mr. GILLIES. A taskmaster.

Mr. BENNETT. Why, Sir, the taskmaster in the old days of bondage that are recorded in scripture, never would impose upon a parliamentary candidate the task that this Government imposes upon him. And suppose the unfortunate candidate may not be able to write, because I know one hon. gentleman in this House who, they say, always signs his name "Bill Somebody, his mark,"; what is that hon. gentleman to do when he comes to write out the list? How will that unfortunate candidate get along? Why should this Government handicap a candidate in that respect because he cannot write? This Government proposes that because a man has not the advantage of being a wealthy man, or of having the early education which fits him to write; they propose to tell that candidate that he cannot have the voters' lists. Are we going to frown down laudable ambition in Canada in that manner? The times and the methods have changed. We know that it is the guiding star—to use an expression I have heard nine thousand and nine-hundred times in this House—we know it is the guiding star of every male child born in the States, that sooner or later he is going to be President.

Fancy how many young Canadians to-day, burning with enthusiasm to bleed for their country on their country's altar, are fitting themselves to be members of Parliament, while this hard-hearted Government, because they have among them millionaires, and are the friends of millionaires, say, "We care not, we have the wealth of the Yukon, with Mann & Mackenzie thrown in; we have our voters' lists printed; but you poor people, if you cannot afford that, can write them out for yourselves." As for Bill Blank, that unfortunate member who cannot write and makes his mark, he has a task imposed upon him that Lord Macaulay, in his palmiest days could not hope to emulate. We are told that Lord Macaulay could pick up a book, and on reading a page could immediately repeat it. But we are not all Lord Macaulays; if we were, we would not be here; we would be employed perhaps in a more pleasant and profitable occupation. You ask the Canadian youth who cannot write to write out his own voters' list. You select a candidate by reason of his great personal popularity, and after he has been selected by the party caucus, they find that he is not a man of means. They ask him for the voters' list. He says, "I have no money and I cannot furnish you with a voters' list." Filled with the bright inspiration of hope, a kind friend suggests to him that he can copy the voters' list. During this time he should be addressing public meetings and conducting his campaign, but they say, "we must have voters' lists; and, as you are able to write, you had better sit down and make out copies of it." But, horror of horrors, the unfortunate candidate has to make the confession that he is not able to write. What is the result? The committee meet and take the situation into their serious consideration. Then, in his desperation the bright idea strikes the candidate that if the worst comes to the worst, he can commit the voters' list to memory. Fancy the feelings of a candidate, at the time he attempts to address an audience, and to fill himself and his audience with indignation at all the iniquities perpetrated by some bad government, he finds himself prevented from doing that by reason of the fact that the names on the voters' lists are continually revolving in his head, the Smiths, the Browns and the Robinsons following each other in rapid succession. But if he were a candidate in Cape Breton, imagine the dilemma he would be placed in. I have here a list of about 70 names of McNeils. I notice there are about 15 John McNeils. In the first place, he would have to recall to his recollection that there was plain John McNeil. With that as a starting point, he could recall that there was a red John McNeil, a black John McNeil, a gray John McNeil; then he could recall that there was a lame John McNeil, and so he could go on all through the list. Surely the Minister of Railways and Canals, with that unlimited fund of good nature that he possesses, is not going to ask an unfortunate candidate to pay for these voters' lists out of his own pocket. I for one am prepared to see the duty increased on some of my favourite beverages—on tea, for instance—in order that we may have free voters' lists. I wish the Government to make the duties on whisky and ale, and other excise duties as high as they like, in order that we may have free voters' lists for the unfortunate candidates. I do not care if they increase the customs duties for the same purpose. If any hon. gentleman opposite can suggest any better way of getting them, I shall be delighted to listen to him, because I regard with horror the thought of writing out these voters' lists or learning them by heart. Certainly I do object to paying a large sum for voters' lists, more particularly when we have been educated to the custom of having these lists furnished by the country. But there are other matters of objection in connection with the local lists. If we knew that the local legislatures would not commit any iniquities, but would give us the voters' lists, as they stand to-day in the different provinces, and would not change or tamper with them, we might have some little feeling of security. But we can have no certainty of that, and hon. gentlemen opposite should bear in mind that this Bill may prove a boomerang. There is nothing certain about elections any more than about a horse race, and the whirligig of time brings its revenges. True, it took a long time for the whirligig to come around to hon. gentlemen opposite, but they did at last find themselves in power, and we may be in their place in a couple of years. I do not say it in a spirit of defiance, but we are very sorry that they did not go to the country on the Yukon Bill. While we are not ourselves treading on the tails of their coats so to speak, I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that we are not afraid of a general election, and should the next general election result in our return to power, it is just possible that we might also have the local legislatures on our side. There have been signs in the mulberry tree. There has been rather an earthquake in the province of Ontario, and the battle is not over there yet. There are signs of a speedy dissolution of the Liberal party in that province, and if the Conservative party should be restored to the Treasury benches of Toronto, they might prepare for hon. gentlemen opposite most iniquitous lists, if they were to be led away by the example set them. I can, however, promise these hon. gentlemen that we shall not subject them to the indignity of copying out the voters' lists themselves or to such a tax on their memory as to memorize these lists. I know what a tax that would be. I have seen hon. gentlemen opposite, with most beautifully prepared perorations, which they endeavoured to commit to memory, fail ignobly in the attempt, and they can realize therefore how much more difficult it would be to commit to memory a voters' list.

I am sorry that the hon. Solicitor General is not present, because I intended to revise all these strong points in my argument for his benefit. I find that he is open to reason. He does not stand up in the House and say, Look at this beautiful handiwork. He has not stated that this Franchise Act is something perfect in all its parts. On the contrary, he has been one of the first to, Cassius-like, stab it here and there, and I think if he has his way, by the time it gets out of Committee, we will have a very presentable Bill.

The cheapness of revision, under the Dominion Act, as against revision under the local Act, appeals to us very strongly. These are times when we have to practise economy and retrenchment, when the wolf is at the door, when we see a great deal of poverty stalking around, and for that reason we want to practise all the retrenchment possible. The course of the Government in depriving us of the interest that we were wont to draw on our deposits in the savings bank has struck a most vital blow, and I can see the eyes of so many hon. gentlemen dim with tears, as they think of the decreased rate of interest on their savings. Let me draw attention to this very strong point in favour of the Dominion Act as against the local laws. If, perchance, there are names on the voters' lists in the province of Ontario which are objected to, you have to employ a bailiff to serve these persons, whose names are open to objection, and bring them before the court, and bailiffs, like most other people, prefer ready money to promises. The result is you have to pay your bailiff, and then have to incur additional expense to bring forward your witnesses. But under the Dominion Act, you have simply to mail a registered notice. I was going to suggest that we should dispense with the registered notice, and simply be put to the expense of a three cent stamp, but I know that that would cause the Postmaster General to enter into an elaborate calculation to ascertain how much loss there would be to the public exchequer by this remission of the five cents registration stamp, and he would never consent to it. I might, however, appeal to the Finance Minister to come to our aid and succour on this occasion, because he has deprived us, in the most ruthless way, of the interest on our hard earned dollars, which we have in the savings bank, and can, therefore, appreciate how utterly unable we are to pay this extra five cents for a registered notice.

Let me tell the hon. gentleman that there is no finality in the local voters' lists. Then the judge goes on and revises the voters' list and everybody goes home assured, in the innocence of his heart, that there is nothing more to do. Let me call this to the particular attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries—and he will be thankful that such iniquities are not possible in Prince Edward Island. And now I am delighted with the presence of the Solicitor General once more. I had reserved this argument for him particularly. Let me point out now to the joint attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Solicitor General that there is a power in the local legislature in Toronto that perverts the ends of justice. In the constituency of North Renfrew there was, as expected to be, a close contest. The candidates on either side had been named, and had stripped for the fray, and it was supposed that the voters' list which had been revised would be used. But what do you think, Mr. Chairman, happened? I know you will be shocked at this iniquity. Why, the local legislature passed an Act that permitted a new revision of the voters' list.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Cut it short.

Mr. BENNETT. Do I understand that it is because the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is so disgusted with the unfairness of the thing that he looks so fierce.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am very sleepy.

Mr. BENNETT. I knew the hon. gentleman would be disgusted and shocked. I know he thanks God that in the island of Prince Edward they do not have such shocking iniquities.

Mr. TAYLOR. Perhaps the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) who has just come in, could give you some information about that.

Mr. BENNETT. I am afraid if I were to ask the Minister of Customs he would charge me duty on the article. I do not think he would even give me the preference. And when I think that this cold-hearted, this relentless Government is not only going to deprive me of the half of one per cent on my hard-earned savings in the Post Office Savings Bank—I regret they are not more—but drive me to pay for voters' lists, how can I be expected to pay duty on anything I get from the Minister of Customs? Therefore, I refrain from asking him. And yet I know that the hon. Minister of Customs, if he had it in his power would give us a Franchise Act that would provide us with a good voters' list. When we have a Ministry who are so anxious to do what is right—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. To go home.

Mr. BENNETT. I can tell the hon. gentleman that if they wish to go home, I will not detain them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Give us the section and keep the other, and let us go.

Mr. BENNETT. I can tell the hon. gentlemen that if they would permit me to emulate their example, that is, if they set the example of going home, I should be very glad to do so. Now, I have to thank the House for listening to my few imperfect remarks on this occasion. I do ask in all fairness, seeing the spirit of friendliness that is being manifested here this evening, or I should say this morning, that there should be a conference of the representatives of the two sides. And I will say that, so far as I am concerned, I am honestly of the opinion that, if four or five of the hon. gentlemen opposite and four or five on this side were to sit down and discuss this matter, the result would be a Bill that could be passed in the House in three or four hours at the outside.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not feel very much like speaking for an hour or two on this most important question. But I wish to say, before we go any further in the debate, that this side of the House makes its protest as strongly as it possibly can, in opposition to the word flung out by the leader of the Government, in an unguarded moment, I think, that we were determined to obstruct or desirous of obstructing. Now, I say for the Opposition that we have not proceeded on that basis; we have not done it; we do not now have any intention of doing it. But we do claim for ourselves the right to discuss and discuss fully the principal sections of this Bill, of which there are two or three of great importance. We were proceeding in that line, we worked earnestly and hard all day to-day and all day yesterday, and when at one o'clock this morning we asked that the committee should rise and report progress, we thought we were not asking anything that should not fairly be given. We were met by the assertion by the leader of the Government that we must pass clause (c) and clause (d) and it was simply because of our own feeling that we had not unduly prolonged the discussion that we could not bring ourselves at that time to submit to what we thought was a harsh demand upon us. Now, it is an extremely foolish thing for the two sides of the House to sit opposite each other and waste their physical and mental strength in combat like this to see which shall be the gainers. We of the Opposition knew exactly what the outcome would be. The Opposition always has staying powers that the Government cannot have. The members of the Government have their own day work as well as night work to take into account, and they are not fitted for their responsibilities by being kept up to all hours. The hon. gentlemen have suggested that we ought, as sensible people, to come to an arrangement. I am willing, and I think our friends are willing to allow section (c) to be taken, but not to pass section (d), and after section (c) is passed to rise.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am perfectly willing that that arrangement should be carried out; I think it is in the interest of both parties.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.45 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 25th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RESIGNATION OF THE MAJOR GENERAL COMMANDING.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Government whether or not the rumour which has been published in the press at the capital and elsewhere, in reference to the resignation of the Major General Commanding the Canadian forces, is true; and, if the resignation has been presented, whether or not it has been accepted? I think it would be unfortunate at this particular moment if the Major General Commanding the forces should leave his post, or if we should be left for any time without one to replace him.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry that the Minister of Militia is not in his seat to-day; but I can tell my hon. friend that General Gascoigne has offered his resignation, and it has been accepted; but he remains in command until his successor is appointed.

Mr. FOSTER.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my right hon. friend if he has been able to come to any determination as to whether he can allow me a day for the discussion of the motion on preferential trade which I have placed on the paper, and which I spoke to my right hon. friend about?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am not in a position to give an answer to my hon. friend to-day. His motion may be called up at this very sitting.

Mr. McNEILL. I may say to my right hon. friend that from what passed between us, I was not thinking of taking up the motion to-day; I have not my notes in shape to do so. Then, we have only until six o'clock to-day for notices of motion.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will ask that the motion of my hon. friend be allowed to stand, if my hon. friend is not ready.

THE KLONDIKE AND PEACE RIVER GOLD MINING, LAND AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY (LIMITED).

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 91) to incorporate the Klondike and Peace River Gold Mining, Land and Transportation Company (Limited).—(Mr. Davis.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I do not rise to make any remark with reference to this Bill, as far as it individually is concerned, but not being a member of the Private Bills Committee, I wish to ask if any investigation is made or any information obtained in that committee, before a company like this is incorporated, as to the bona fides of the company and the actual capital it has in sight or anything of that kind. This is a Bill, like others we have had, of wide extent. If a set of men wish to become a mining company and apply for a British Columbia charter, it will cost them to obtain powers like these somewhere between $500 and $800, yet simply, by an Act of incorporation in this Parliament, this company obtains power as wide, and wider in some respects, than it could get from the province; and such Bills are oftentimes put through the House, I am afraid, although I do not say that it is the case with this Bill, without any assurance that there is a dollar of capital in sight or that the applicants are not simply getting a valuable franchise to dispose of in the market. What I wish to know is whether or not the Private Bills Committee take any steps to inform themselves as to whether the company is a bona fide company, with capital behind it proportionate to the undertaking, or whether these incorporators simply get their charter as a matter of course.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The Private Bills Committee this session give exceptional time and care to the scrutiny and examination of the various Bills before them. This particular Bill was before it two or three times. In its first shape, it called for various very extreme and extensive powers. Many objections were taken to the powers asked for and also to the manner in which they were sought to be exercised, and after we discussed in the committee the lines on which we thought these powers might be granted, the promoter was asked to withdraw the Bill and to consult with the officers of the Finance Department, Mr. Courtney and Mr. Fitzgerald, so as to have the Bill recast in the shape in which the committee desired it should be. The Bill was recast and sent to the committee, and is now entirely altered from what it was in the first instance. $250,000 stock must be subscribed, and 20 per cent of that must be paid up and deposited in a chartered bank before the company can exercise any of the special powers granted to them. We cannot, of course, make particular inquiry as to the standing of the parties. Hon. members must judge for themselves whether Smith, Brown or Robinson are responsible men or not. But the powers these companies ask for are not to be exercised until there is some public guarantee of the bona fides of the company in the subscription of stock and the percentage of capital stock paid in before it can exercise any of its powers. In the Bill as it is, a great many of the powers the company sought to get are eliminated, and the Bill has been reduced to a shape which will meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen, and is certainly in conformity with the practice of the Private Bills Committee. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), who was present, and a number of other gentlemen, know that that section received a very thorough threshing out.

Mr. FOSTER. The Bill is now free from the very apparent objections that there were to it as introduced, and everything is more satisfactory, so far as the limitation of those two wide powers is concerned, and I admit that when you compel the company to have $250,000 of the million capital stock subscribed and a certain amount paid up and deposited in banks before the company can exercise its power, you provide some safeguard. Still, that does not prevent the franchise being a most valuable one, which people who have no capital might get through Parliament and sell at a very great advantage. I am not making any objection to this Bill particularly. My hon. friend knows that I talked with him about the matter on previous occasions, and I do not think Parliament can err on the side of strictness in giving these wide franchises in a new country like this with such great possibilities. If men with capital want to invest in this country, Parliament should give them all the facilities possible, but Parliament should not go out of its way to facilitate the operation of that class of men who are traders in franchises.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should like to add to what the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has said, that no committee is more particular in looking into the matters submitted to its consideration than the Committee on Private Bills. I say so from a knowledge of the fact, having been one of its members for years. The present Bill, it must be remembered, could not come before any other Parliament than that of Canada, because no provincial Parliament could grant what its promoters ask. In so far as the standing of the incorporators is concerned, the only means we have of ascertaining that is from the gentlemen who took charge of the Bill before the committee. That is the case with every Bill which comes before any committee. These gentlemen are supposed to know the people seeking incorporation. This Bill came, on several different occasions, before the committee, and was almost completely recast, and in its present condition I do not think there can be any possible objection to it.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know the exact changes made in section 2, paragraphs "a" and "b." But that section contains objections which have been raised before and are very serious. We are giving one company power over several lines. The section provides, first, to operate mines in the Klondike district and other districts in the North-west Territories and British Columbia; also, acquire lands in the Peace River and other districts in the said territories and province, and improve and dispose of the same, and operate farms and ranches, and buy, sell, own and raise cattle, horses and sheep.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was entirely recast.

Mr. SPROULE. The company may locate, buy, sell, develop and operate mines in the Klondike and other districts in the North-west Territories and British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The next three lines are struck out.

Mr. SPROULE. And operate farms and ranches and buy and sell, own and raise cattle, horses and sheep, and acquire, operate and dispose of steam and other vessels, and carry on transportation and trading business.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me to have this objection still—it includes several distinct and separate lines of business under one charter, lines of business that have no natural connection. If a Bill is wanted to incorporate a company for one line, it is all right to pass it, but this, in my opinion, involves a bad principle.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true, and the committee tried to bear it in mind. The official advisers, if I may say so, of the committee, the Deputy Finance Minister and the Inspector of Insurance, carefully go over these Bills with their officers, and where there are different powers asked by one company, these Bills are all the more closely scrutinized. In this case the powers asked—to mine and ship—are cognate powers. The hon. gentleman knows that in the Nickel Company Bill, for instance, similar powers were given, because the promoters said it was no use to give the power to mine unless we gave the power to transport also. I do not suppose that there would be any objection, that, beyond this, they should be given power to buy and sell horses and cattle.

Mr. SPROULE. They have power, under this, to run ranches.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) knows very well the Companies' Act under which we grant powers to companies to do business. I know that in the administration of that Act, the Finance Department, when I was in control of it, and the Government afterward, were very careful not to join different businesses under one incorporation. A company comes and, on the face of it, wants to be incorporated as a certain kind of company; but when you look at the powers it asks which are not well set forth by the company, you find that they are complex, covering two or more lines of business. In granting powers under the Companies' Act it is always the rule to confine the company to one main business, but to give whatever other powers might be necessary to carry on that business. If, for instance, a company is carrying on a mining business, it may be necessary for it to be able to own and manage vessels to carry its ore, and, under the Companies' Act, you would give them powers in this respect sufficient for the purposes of the company, that is to bring in supplies, take out ore, and do whatever else of that kind may be necessary to the work of the company itself. But this is an entirely different case.

Mr. SPROULE.

Under this charter, the company can mine anywhere throughout a wide area—they are a mining company. They can do a transportation business entirely apart from their mines—they are a transportation company. They can trade throughout the district—they are a trading company. And outside of all that, they can buy and own ranches and become a ranching company. Thus there are four actually different businesses, not necessarily connected, and not all appearing in the title of this Bill. The question arises: Why do these gentlemen come here for an Act of Parliament? Why do they not seek for powers under the Companies' Act? There can be but one reason, I fancy, and that is that the Companies' Act will not give them as wide powers as they desire. I will not say dogmatically—the Minister of Finance would know better if he were here—but I do not think they would be given such powers under the Companies' Act. The gentleman who brings the Bill to the committee vouches for the promoters, and the committee does not go behind that. Nobody is saying anything against the respectability of the gentlemen who are seeking this incorporation. But there ought to be some machinery by which the committee could satisfy itself, before it gives the franchise, that the promoters are men of responsibility and have control of capital to put into the company, so that, before they get their franchise, it may have all the elements of a going concern. This question of the bona fides and money power of the parties should be one of the primary elements considered in the question of incorporation. I do not say that this Bill is worse than others that have gone through, but it is a Bill of tremendously wide powers, although it is greatly improved—it could not help being improved in that committee, because it asked for so much that no committee would pass it as it first appeared, I imagine. That does not say that it was not well scrutinized by the committee. But the powers proposed to be granted here are wide and there is not a scintilla of evidence that the gentlemen who are promoting the company intend to put a dollar bill into it.

Mr. SPROULE. I take it that the Deputy Minister of Finance, who went over the Bill, went over it with a view to giving the company the wide corporate powers that they desired, and tried to make the Act passable while still taking from it as little as possible. Only one of the powers asked for has been cut off, I believe. But it seems to me that we should go much further than that, and compel those who want incorporation to confine themselves to one line, granting them powers in other lines only so far as may be necessary as to enable them to carry on their main business. There is no connection necessarily between trading, transportation and ranching and no connection necessarily between any of these and mining. And yet these are all included. Where parties come before us seeking an Act of incorporation, the sooner we adopt the principle of confining them as much as possible to one line of business the better it will be.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am well satisfied that this conversation has come up in the House, because there is a constantly recurring struggle in the committee between promoters and those who attend the committee, on the one hand to get increased powers, and, on the other hand, to keep them down to the limits that the committee think advisable. There are in this Bill controlling words in the clause granting the powers which have the effect of limiting the exercise of those powers to the purposes for which the company is incorporated. So, when they are authorized to go into ranching and also into transportation, they are limited to the transportation of the products of the ranch—they cannot go into general transportation. This was the way that this was amended in the committee. I am glad this has come up, because it will strengthen the hands of the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In view of the remarks of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and as silence might be said to give consent, I rise to say that, so far as I am concerned, and I think that so far as the majority of the members are concerned, there is no sympathy with the criticisms that have been offered. It appears to me that what we want above all in this country is capital to carry on just such enterprises as this. The hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) raises the question whether the bona fides of the capitalists can be vouched for, just as if the people who are in this, even if they were millionaires, could not be changed.

Mr. FOSTER. But, in the first place, you have the millionaires.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not see that that would make any practical difference. I think that the majority in this House is not in sympathy with the line of criticism that has been followed, except so far as shows a desire to protect the public interest. As there are no special privileges or monopolies given to the company, and as any other company might come and get the same privileges, I do not think that the public interest could suffer. I do not think that any legislation could be passed to make money for people or protect people from losing money without giving special privileges, any more than you can make people moral by legislation. What we want is to pursue the contrary course to that suggested by the ex-Finance Minister and give every encouragement for the investment of capital in the country and every encouragement to people to engage in the lines of business proposed by this company, mining, trading, transportation, &c. How it can injure the public interest, is beyond my conception; on the contrary, I cannot understand why it is not in the public interest that large companies, with large capital, should be encouraged to do business in this country.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman may not understand it so far as he is concerned himself, but I think those who are giving attention to legislation have some understanding of it, and they have never recognized in this House, nor in the committee, the wisdom of tacking together three or four or five lines that are naturally separated from each other when incorporating a company, and giving them more lines than are necessary to carry on a distinct business. You take ranching, you take mining, you take trading and transportation, you take buying lands, or cultivating and improving lands, and all those lines that have no natural connection with each other. I respectfully submit, and I think I am safe in saying, that a large number of members in this House hold the same views, that it is a bad principle to incorporate any company and give them the power of controlling half a dozen lines, when in reality they ought to be confined to one.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

MONTMORENCY COTTON MILLS.

The House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Montmorency Cotton Mills Company.—(Mr. Penny.)

On section 3.

Mr. FOSTER. This is an apt illustration of what we were discussing a moment ago. Here is a company which is incorporated to do one particular business, and it is practically given whatever it wants for the proper conduct of that business, and that is what they would get under the Companies' Act. This company does not come, in the first place, wanting to do a woollen business with all the powers necessary and subsidiary to that, then wanting to do a mining business, with all the powers necessary and subsidiary to that, then wanting to do a transportation business all over the habitable globe. Why one company should get but one business and the other powers for equipping itself to do it, whilst another gets powers to carry on three separate and distinct lines of business, outside of the line of the Companies' Act, is what no fellow can understand.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

RELIEF OF EDWIN HEYWARD.

Bill (No. 112) for the relief of Edwin Heyward (from the Senate)—(Mr. Belcourt)—was considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed, on a division.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 122) to incorporate the Supreme Grand Lodge of the Sons of England Benefit Society.—(Mr. Bertram.)

THE RECIPROCAL CLAUSE OF THE TARIFF OF 1897.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

What was the amount paid in refunds of customs distributed as to nationality of goods in respect of these imports affected by the so-called reciprocal clause of the tariff of 1897?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is practically impossible to give the required information for the reason that the certificates of origin which accompany shipments of goods imported from England, which are the growth, produce or manufacture of other countries entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff, do not give specific information as to the country of origin of each particular item of goods mentioned in the shipment, it being merely set forth in such certificate that the goods in the shipment are the growth, produce or manufacture of certain countries which are entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. gentleman give me the total amount of the refund?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I think I shall be able to do so.

GOVERNMENT LANDS IN TROIS PISTOLES, P.Q.

Mr. GAUVREAU asked,

Whether the Department of Railways and Canals possesses in the parish of Trois Pistoles, in the county of Temiscouata, a piece of land of irregular dimensions near the station and restaurant of the Intercolonial Railway?

If so, to whom is it rented, and what is the yearly rent paid by the tenant?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the Railway Department owns a piece of land of irregular dimensions in the parish of Trois Pistoles, next the station and restaurant of the Intercolonial Railway. About one-quarter of this piece of land, comprising a little over an acre was leased to Madame Lavigne in January, 1886, at a nominal rental of $1 per year. The rent was paid up to 1st January, 1898.

Mr. FOSTER.

SOULANGES CANAL—ADVERTISING FOR TENDERS.

Mr. BERGERON asked,

In what newspapers did the Department of Public Works publish the last call for tenders for furnishing the cement required for the works on the Soulanges Canal?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The Department of Railways and Canals advertised for tenders for the cement required for the works on the Soulanges Canal in the following papers in the province of Quebec:—Montreal, the "Herald," "La Patrie," the "Shareholder," Quebec, "Le Soleil," the "Telegraph," St. Hyacinthe, "L'Union," Sherbrooke, "Le Progrès de l'Est."

IMMIGRATION DEPARTMENT—LIVERY HIRE.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

What amount has been paid to S. J. Donaldson, of Prince Albert, for livery hire in connection with immigrants and delegates from 1st January, 1888, to August, 1894?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). From April, 1892, when the Department of the Interior took charge of immigration, to August, 1894, $715.50 was paid to J. S. Donaldson, of Prince Albert, for livery hire in connection with immigrants and delegates. There is no record here of any payments which may have been previously made to him.

TIMBER DUES IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIS asked,

What amount is due by Thomas McKay, of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, on account of timber dues?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The amount due by Thomas McKay, of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, on account of timber dues, is: principal, $486.13; interest to 21st April, 1898, $278.97; total, $765.10.

MR. THOMAS COTE.

Mr. ROCHE asked,

1. Is Mr. Thomas Coté, correspondent of "La Patrie" during the present session, in the employ of the House or of the Department of Public Works, either directly or indirectly?

2. If so employed, what remuneration has Mr. Coté received or is he to receive?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Coté is not in the employment of the House or of the Department of Public Works, either directly or indirectly.

INSPECTOR AT ARNPRIOR POST OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Sproule) asked,

1. Who is the inspector of the post office building now being erected at Arnprior, Ont. ?
2. When was he appointed ?
3. Is he a practical mechanic ?
4. What salary is he being paid per day ?
5. How many days has he been paid for services since his appointment to the 1st April, 1897 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. J. W. Tierney. 2. 15th October, 1896. 3. The inspector has proved to be a capable officer and has given satisfaction. 4. $2 per day. 5. He has been paid for each day.

LOAN OF 1897.

Mr. CLARKE asked,

1. What was the total amount of the Dominion of Canada loan of 1897 applied for by the banks of Canada ?
2. What was the amount applied by each such bank, the rate offered and the amount allotted ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The information necessary to answer these questions has not been furnished to the Government.

DEER ISLAND TELEGRAPH CABLE.

Mr. GANONG asked,

1. Have the Government engineers made a survey between Deer Island, Charlotte county, New Brunswick, and a point on the mainland near Eastport, in the United States, with a view to ascertain the cost of establishing communication by telegraphic cable between the island and the mainland
2. When was this survey made ?
3. What was the estimated cost of establishing such communication ?
4. Was any estimate made by the engineers as to the cost of telephonic connection between the several fishing villages on the island and the landing place of such cable ? If so, what was the estimated cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes ; a cursory survey was made with the steamer "Newfield," when she was on the ground engaged on cable repairs. 2. June, 1897. 3. The approximate cost was placed at $3,500. 4. The sum of $3,500 above given covers the cost of the work mentioned.

CAMPOBELLO ISLAND—TELEPHONE CONNECTION.

Mr. GANONG asked,

1. Have the Government engineers made any estimate of the cost of telephone connection between Head Harbour light and Welshpool, on the island of Campobello, in New Brunswick ?

2. If so, what was the estimated cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2. $880.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. McCLEARY (by Mr. Sproule) asked,

1. Has there been any request made upon the Government for the appointment of a special officer to enforce the Alien Labour Law along the frontier at Fort Erie ?
2. Has the Government made such appointment ?
3. If so, who is the person so appointed, and what is the remuneration for such services ?
4. What instructions were given such officer ?
5. If such officer has been appointed, is he enforcing the law satisfactorily to the Government ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. Yes. 2. Yes. 3. James Lawson, collector of customs at Fort Erie ; no extra remuneration. 4. He was instructed to enforce the Canadian Act wherever the Americans on their side of the adjoining frontier were enforcing the United States Act against Canadians. 5. The officer has carried out his instructions, so far as the Government is aware.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN T. JOHNSON.

Mr. McCLEARY asked,

1. Why was John T. Johnson dismissed from his position of customs officer at Fort Erie ?
2. Were any charges made against him ?
3. If so, were they investigated ?
4. Was Mr. Johnson furnished with a copy of any charges which may have been made against him ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Mr. John T. Johnson was dismissed from his position of customs officer at Fort Erie for the following reasons:—1st. For having caused vexatious trouble and expease to the department. He entered suit against Mr. Brookfield, ex-collector of customs at Fort Erie, for the recovery of certain sums which he alleged to be due him as extra pay received from railway companies for extra services rendered. The collector received the moneys for extra service from the railways, and distributed the same ratably among the officers to the best of his judgment, according to the amount of work performed by each officer. His distribution had the approval of the department, and gave satisfaction to all the officers at the port with the exception of Johnson. The dispute was considered one for determination by the department, not by the courts. The department defended the suit. Judgment was given against Mr. Johnson, the action being dismissed with costs. The costs have not been paid by Johnson, as ordered by the judgment, and the department has had to pay the same, including the costs of the solicitors for Mr. Brookfield. 2nd. For having been unwilling to perform the duties required of him under the same conditions as performed by other officers of the same rank at Fort Erie. This has reference to extra service required to be rendered to railway companies, &c. As a result of Johnson's conduct, he could not be assigned to the performance of any extra duties at the port, and the staff, consequently, was in a state of disorganization, it not being possible to distribute the work of the port evenly under the circumstances. In view of all the circumstances, the department felt that to continue Johnson in office would be inconsistent with a proper regard for discipline in the service.

BREAKWATER AT GABAROUSE.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates this session a grant for the building of a pier or breakwater at Gabarouse, in the county of Cape Breton?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The information will be supplied when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

BREAKWATER AT PORT MORIEN.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates this session for further repairs to the breakwater at Port Morien (Cow Bay), Cape Breton?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I suppose, the same answer will satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is very doubtful.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The information will be supplied when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

CHAMBORD JUNCTION CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

1. Whether there is a custom-house at Chambord, Lake St. John?
2. When was it established by the Government?
3. By what contractor was it constructed?
4. How much did it cost?
5. What amount of money have the Government received for duties at that point since the establishment of the warehouse?
6. Who is the customs officer at that place?
7. How much has the said officer received for his salary since the establishment of the warehouse?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. There is a customs office at Chambord Junction, Lake St. John, Que. 2. 1st May, 1897. 3 and 4. The Government has not erected a customs building there. 5.

Mr. PATERSON.

From the time of the establishment of the office up to the 31st March, 1898, $756.05 were received for duties there. 6. Auguste Gagné. 7. $235 up to the 31st March, 1898.

WHARF AT CHICOUTIMI.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

1. What amount has been expended on the wharf at Chicoutimi since 23rd June, 1896?
2. What amount has been spent on the wharf at Ste. Anne, county of Chicoutimi, since the said date?
3. Who has had charge of the public works in the county of Chicoutimi since the said date?
4. What travelling expenses and living expenses have been paid to the engineers in charge of the said works since 23rd June, 1896?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. $6,605.61. 2. $7,571.80. 3. J. C. Blais, engineer. 4. The amount paid to the engineer for travelling expenses has been $664.05 and for living expenses, $663.85, but it must not be forgotten that, in addition to the works at Chicoutimi and Ste. Anne, the engineer has also had charge of, and has superintended the works at the following places:—Tadoussac, Anse St. Jean, St. Alphonse, Roberval, Ticouabé, Mistassini, Rivière à la Pipe, St. Fulgence, &c.

CONTRACTOR FOR PLACING BUOYS.

Mr. MARCOTTE asked,

1. What is the name of the contractor for the placing of the buoys in the St. Lawrence, between Montreal and Quebec?
2. What price is he to get?
3. For how many years?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). 1. John C. Kaine, of Quebec. 2. Ten thousand dollars per annum. 3. Five years.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT CHETICAMP.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. Who is sub-collector of customs at the present time at the port of Cheticamp, Inverness county, Cape Breton?
2. When was the present incumbent appointed?
3. Why and when was his predecessor, Sévérin Aucoin, removed from office?
4. Were any complaints lodged against Mr. Aucoin, and if so, what were they, and by whom were they lodged?
5. Were these complaints investigated, and if so, where, when and before whom?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. Charles E. Aucoin. 2. 1st January, 1897. 3. Sévérin Aucoin, the former incumbent of the position, was removed from office on the 1st January, 1897, for inefficiency and neglect of duty. 4 and 5. No complaints were lodged against Mr. Sévérin Aucoin. Action was taken on the report of Mr. Inspector Bremner.

SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT MARGAREE.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. When was Miles Dunn appointed sub-collector of customs at Margaree, Inverness county?
2. Was Mr. Dunn dismissed from his position? If so, when, why and at whose request was he dismissed?
3. Were complaints laid against him? If so, of what character, by or through whom were they lodged? Was an investigation held in this matter, and if so, by whom, and what report was made by him to the department?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. November 1st, 1883. 2 and 3. Mr. Dunn was dismissed from his position by Order in Council, dated the 16th December, 1897, for having taken an active political partisan part at the last Dominion general election. The charges against Mr. Dunn were preferred by Dr. A. McLennan, M.P., on his personal knowledge and on his responsibility as a member of Parliament. The charges were coupled with a request for Mr. Dunn's dismissal. No investigation was held.

COUNTY OF LEEDS—POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TAYLOR (by Mr. Sproule) asked,

1. Has a petition been presented to the Government from some of the residents of rear of Leeds and Lansdowne, praying that a daily mail service be given to the post offices of Ellesville, Long Point and Sweet's Corners, in the county of Leeds, Ont.?
2. Is it the intention of the Government to comply with the prayer of said petition?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The answer to the first question is, yes. The answer to the second question is, that the matter is under consideration.

DISMISSAL OF MR. M. G. McLEOD.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports of the inspector or other officers of the Post Office Department, and correspondence respecting the dismissal of Mr. M. G. McLeod from the postal mail service in Nova Scotia.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). I think my hon. friend has been misinformed as to there having been any such dismissal. My recollection is that, in going over these motions with the various officers, when I came to this motion the officer told me that no such dismissal had taken place. I may be in error on that point, however, and I have no objection to the order being made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may be right, but I understand that he will not take the technical objection in complying with the order, if the withdrawal from the service was in some other way. What is wanted is the correspondence in connection with the withdrawal of Mr. McLeod from the service.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no objection to the form of the motion, and will make the return cover anything in connection with the officer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would ask that the motion be made to read "dismissal or retirement."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF JOHN F. TENNANT.

Mr. QUINN moved for:

Copies of all papers in connection with the dismissal of John F. Tennant, late collector of customs at Gretna, Manitoba.

He said: When I had the pleasure, last Monday, of speaking on this motion, it was my misfortune that neither the right hon. First Minister or the hon. Minister of Public Works was in the House. I welcome, however, their presence here to-day, and I hope that they will remain until I have had the opportunity of pointing out some matters which I think will interest and reward them for the time they may spend in the House. In order that they may understand the motion which I have made, even at the cost of repetition, I will go over some of the facts. Mr. Tennant is the son of a British soldier, and in 1870 went to the North-west on what is known as the Wolseley expedition. He was engaged for some time afterwards on the boundary survey, and occupied some minor positions in the Government service until he was appointed collector of customs at Gretna, Man. This position he held for nine years. He is the father of eight children, enjoys a splendid reputation, is beloved by the people of his district, and looked upon as a model citizen. Great then was his astonishment when, in May, 1897, he received a notice informing him that His Excellency the Governor General in Council had been pleased to dispense with his services as collector at Gretna. When Mr. Tennant received this notice, he naturally complained and asked for reasons. Different reasons were given. It will be remembered that there is no cause mentioned in the notice of dismissal. Correspondence took place between him and the Minister, and then, not one, but two or three causes were given, each one of which was properly answered by Mr. Tennant, either in the form of proof of the inaccuracy of the charges, or by his own statutory declaration. Before going into the merits of this matter, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the statement which the right hon. First Minister made on September 1st, 1896, concerning the dismissal of Government officials. On page 506 of "Hansard," second session, the right hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

No Minister would pretend to dismiss any official unless he had an opportunity to defend himself but when the case is in the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, under such circumstances, there is no case for inquiry. When the Minister is not cognizant of the facts himself, whenever the case is brought to him by extraneous evidence, those statements must be substantiated, and every man must be given an opportunity to defend himself. I do not want, for my part, and I am sure the Government does not desire—and I can speak for the Government in this matter—to act arbitrarily on this or any other subject; every one must be given a fair opportunity to be heard before he is dealt with; but when the facts are substantiated against him, and are of the character I have indicated, he must be given every opportunity to become a politician in the full sense of the term.

That is the language of the right hon. First Minister on the question. Now I turn to page 523, and I find a statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) on the very same day. He said:

I do not desire that any man should be condemned without a hearing. On that point we are all in accord. Unless the case is one absolutely and perfectly evident to the Minister's own senses, as in the case referred to by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is our duty to see that men have an opportunity to repel the charge, or confess the charge, as the case may be.

I think that both these hon. gentlemen laid down, on that occasion, a very wholesome and fair rule for the guidance of Ministers as regards their employees. Was this rule followed in the case of Mr. Tennant? No, Mr. Speaker, it was not. Instead of any opportunity having been given Mr. Tennant to defend himself, instead of his having been made aware that there existed any charge whatever against him, he was ruthlessly dismissed, on the mere letter which I read to the House last Monday evening. Mr. Tennant, of course, would not let the matter rest there but petitioned the department to give him some reason for his dismissal. The first answer which he received was in the form of a letter. His own letter to the Minister of Customs, I think, is sufficiently interesting, and I shall trouble the House to listen while I read. It is as follows:—

In reply to your letter dated from Ottawa, 17th instant, re charges laid against me, that one Patrick Harrigan, of the staff of the United States customs office at Neche, North Dakota, was in charge of my office for some time during the 23rd of June, 1896, I herewith forward to you a statutory declaration in rebuttal of said charges, of Mr. Patrick Horgan, whom I presume to be the official brought in question. If you consider it necessary I should more fully exonerate myself from active and offensive partisanship during the late general election, I can do so on my own declaration, and would respectfully ask the fullest investigation as to my conduct and the work of this office at any time during the late campaign. With full confidence that you will see justice done me in this most important matter to myself, I remain, dear sir,

Yours obediently,
(Sgd.) J. F. TENNANT,
Sub-Collector.

The declaration which he sent to the Department of Customs, with this letter, is in the following terms:—

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Manitoba.

In the matter of J. F. Tennant, and his dismissal from the service of the Canadian Department of Customs:

I, Patrick Horgan, of Neche, North Dakota, in the United States, do solemnly declare that I am an officer of the United States customs at Neche, in North Dakota, and I am well acquainted with J. F. Tennant, ex-sub-collector of customs at Gretna, Man. In the performance of my duties I visit Gretna almost daily. I was in the office of Mr. Tennant on the 23rd June, 1896, as I usually wait there when meeting the train going south on the Great Northern Railway. I was no longer there on that date than on other occasions. I was not in charge of said customs office at Gretna on the occasion nor at any other time. I was never requested by Mr. Tennant or any other Canadian customs official to look after said office on the 23rd June, 1896, or any other date whatever. I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sgd.) P. J. HORGAN.

Declared before me at Gretna, Man., in the county of Manchester, this 28th day of December, A.D. 1897.

M. LONG,
A Commissioner in B. R.

Now this affidavit Mr. Tennant forwarded to the Department of Customs in answer to the charge which was made against him by the letter of the Minister, dated February 17th, 1897, which letter is in the following terms:—

Ottawa, 17th February, 1897.

Jos. Tennant, Esq.,
Customs Officer, Gretna, Man.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that I have received a statutory declaration in which the charge is made that one Patrick Harrigan, a member of the staff of the United States customs at Neche, in the state of North Dakota, was in charge of your office for some time during the 23rd of June, 1896. Please let me have your reply to this charge at your earliest convenience.

Yours truly,
WM. PATERSON.

It was in answer to this that Mr. Tennant sent the declaration I have read. Now, other charges were made against Mr. Tennant and answered by him, but in every case in which he asked for an investigation, an investigation was absolutely refused him, or at any rate, no offer was made on the part of the Minister to give Mr. Tennant an investigation of any kind. He was dismissed, and that was the end of it. Not only was he dismissed, and dismissed at very short notice, but he was dismissed losing all the benefits he might have had from the payments made by him under the rules of the civil service. I understand that since that time, a paltry sum of money has been sent to him, in order, I suppose, in some way, to try and square the department with Mr. Tennant for the amount of money he has contributed to the Civil Service Superannuation Fund. But that is not only very tardy payment, but it is a very insignificant amount and not at all equal to the amount that he would be entitled to claim, if he had resigned his position, or if in any way, he had been given the benefit of the Superannuation Act. Now, the first charge that was made against him was that he interfered in the election of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). I may say that that charge was entirely disproven by Mr. Tennant, although he was never given the benefit of an investigation into the matter. It was not pretended that the Minister was present during that election. It was not pretended and cannot be advanced as an argument that he knew personally anything connected with Mr. Tennant's conduct on that occasion. It would be utterly impossible for him, therefore, if he coupled the opinion given and the rule laid down by the hon. leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), to dismiss this public officer from his position. It was then said that he had neglected his duty on the 23rd June, 1896. I have read the affidavit which Mr. Tennant forwarded to the Department of Customs, and not only did he forward this affidavit, but he sent two others. One of these is the affidavit of J. Franklin Irving, which reads as follows:—

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Manitoba,
Town of Gretna.

In the matter of the dismissal of J. F. Tennant from the sub-collectorship of customs for the outport of Gretna, Man.

I, J. Franklin Irving, medical student, of the town of Gretna, in the province of Manitoba, do solemnly declare that:

1. I was the poll clerk for Gretna polling booth for the general Dominion elections held on the 23rd day of June, 1896, for the electoral division of Lisgar, being sworn in as such by the deputy returning officer, H. G. Bean, and was present at the opening and holding of the poll to its close on the said election day.

2. The other officials present in the polling booth on the said election day were: H. G. Bean, deputy returning officer; R. B. Fisher, agent and scrutineer on behalf of the Liberal candidate, Mr. L. R. Richardson; and J. Pearson, agent and scrutineer for the Conservative candidate, Mr. R. Rogers.

3. The said R. B. Fisher and J. Pearson presented properly executed agents' papers on behalf of their respective candidates, which were received by the deputy returning officer, who authorized them to act in the said polling booth as scrutineers or agents for their respective candidates in the said poll.

4. J. F. Tennant first entered Gretna poll in the afternoon. He recorded his vote and was requested to act as scrutineer or agent for R. Rogers. J. Pearson, scrutineer for R. Rogers, left the polling booth. J. F. Tennant refused to act in any official capacity in connection with the said election, and rejected the papers presented to him by the deputy returning officer appointing him agent and scrutineer for R. Rogers, but consented to remain as an ordinary elector if there was no question raised, and to this R. B. Fisher, scrutineer for R. L. Richardson, made no objection.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting Extra-judicial Oaths.
(Sgd.) J. FRANKLIN IRVING.

Declared before me at Gretna, in the town of Gretna, this 28th day of September, 1897.

M. LONG,
A Commissioner in B. R.

The second is the affidavit of Henry G. Bean, and is as follows:—

Dominion of Canada,
Province of Manitoba,
County of Manchester.

To wit:

In the matter of the dismissal of J. F. Tennant from the sub-collectorship of customs for the outport of Gretna, Man.

I, Henry G. Bean, machine agent, of the town of Gretna, in the province of Manitoba, do solemnly declare that:

1st. I was deputy returning officer in charge of Gretna polling booth at the late general elections for the Dominion of Canada holding, held on the 23rd of June, 1896, for the electoral division of Lisgar, in the province of Manitoba.

2nd. Mr. R. L. Richardson, Liberal, and Mr. R. Rogers, Conservative, were the only candidates to contest the said election for the said electoral division of Lisgar.

3rd. Two scrutineers were appointed to act officially at the said polling booth, one on behalf of each of the said candidates. R. B. Fisher was scrutineer or agent on behalf of R. L. Richardson, and J. Pearson was scrutineer or agent on behalf of R. Rogers. The said scrutineers received and presented agents' papers, properly signed, and were authorized to act and did so act, as scrutineers and agents for their respective candidates, in the said polling booth on the said election day. The said papers authorizing them, the said R. B. Fisher and J. Pearson to act as scrutineers and agents were deposited by me in the ballot-box at the close of the poll, together with all other papers concerning the election, in the said polling booth, and the said ballot-box sealed by me for delivery to the returning officer, and said ballot-box was so delivered.

4th. No other scrutineer or agent than Mr. Pearson was appointed to act for or on behalf of Mr. R. Rogers at the said poll on the said election day. In the afternoon of the said election day, the said J. R. Pearson left the said polling booth, and Mr. J. F. Tennant, who was in the said polling booth recording his vote, was requested to act as scrutineer for Mr. Rogers. Scrutineer's papers were offered to Mr. J. F. Tennant: he refused them, and declined to act, but consented to remain under the clause in the Dominion Election Act permitting an elector to be present in the absence of agent or scrutineer, provided there was no objection raised to his presence by any person. R. B. Fisher, the agent and scrutineer for R. L. Richardson, stated there was no objection, and J. F. Tennant remained, but refused to act in an official capacity or receive an appointment of any kind in connection with the said election.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting Extra-judicial Oaths.

(Sgd.) H. G. BEAN.

Declared before me at Gretna, in the town of Gretna, this 28th day of September, 1897.

M. LONG,

A Commissioner in B. R.

So that we have, so far as the desertion of his office is concerned, ample proof that the statement made in the letter of the 17th of February, by the Minister, was absolutely unfounded. We have the statement of the man who is supposed to have been in the office, and we have the statements of the deputy returning officer and his clerk, that Mr. Tennant did not act in any official capacity whatever on the 23rd day of June, but that he merely acted as any other elector had a right to act. Then came the charge that he had grossly insulted the Attorney General of Manitoba. I had the honour to refer to this question the other day, and I think I proved to the satisfaction of any honourable man, not only of any hon. member of the House, but of any honourable man either in public or private life, that under the circumstances no other act would have been becoming a man than that of Mr. Tennant on the occasion spoken of, when, insulted grossly, personally, not only in his own person but in a manner reflecting upon his nationality and religion, he stood upon the platform to defend his civil rights, his rights as a Canadian, and to defend the rights of his fellow-Canadians who were Catholics. I say that he was not only perfectly justified, but he would have been less than a man if he had not taken the stand he did on that occasion. Now, I do not wish to introduce into this debate, or into any other debate, any question of religion or nationality; but I expect that certain members on the other side, possibly the Minister who was guilty of this act of injustice—because I say it is an act of injustice, and I charge the Minister with having been guilty of it—possibly the Minister who was guilty of this act of injustice will repudiate the statements that are made concerning it, repudiate what has appeared in the public press, and will say that there was no question of religion or nationality in the matter at all. I do not know Mr. Tennant. I am not acquainted with him, I have never seen him in my life, to my knowledge; but I take the records of his case which are put before me. I take the expressions of public opinion in the province in which he resides, I take the expressions of public opinion in the Liberal newspapers of the province of Manitoba, and I say that all these disclose one of the greatest outrages that could be perpetrated upon a public officer. I wish now to read an article taken from a Liberal newspaper called the Qu'Appelle "Progress," and headed, "Surprise and Sorrow":

Mr. QUINN.

"To the victor belongs the spoil" may doubtless have been deemed a very excellent sentiment in the days of heathen Rome, and the lex talionis have commended itself to the dominant party in that ancient empire; but we of the nineteenth century look for Christianity in our mottoes, and an enlightened policy in our rulers. Even in those stern old times, when chivalry was yet unborn, the laurel was ever ready for the soldier and high places for the grave. It is with feelings of surprise and sorrow that we hear of the dismissal by the Customs Department of an efficient and courteous officer, a brave soldier and an esteemed citizen, in the person of Sub-Collector Tennant, of Gretna, Manitoba. When the first expedition was started to Manitoba, Mr. Tennant was one of the earliest to join the party, and when the mounted police was in its infancy he was an upholder of peace within our boundaries and a maintainer of law and order upon our frontiers. At great personal risk he saved a whole boat's crew from destruction, and was the recipient of the most marked approval of Lord Wolseley for the promptness of his actions and the gallantry of his conduct. Can, we ask, the Liberal or any other Government afford to lose the services of such a man for the mere fact that he was a little too outspoken in his political sentiments—a little too open and candid in his expression of his feelings? Had he been less of a man and more of a trimmer, would he still not have been in the enjoyment of his office? We know that we voice the feelings of the business men of Winnipeg and Manitoba in saying that it would be a graceful action on the part of the Government to reinstate this gentleman in this or some similar position. A large-hearted, whole-souled policy of this kind begets confidence in our leaders and adds lustre to our administration.

This was the first article written by the Qu'Appelle "Progress." But when they found that it was all too true that Mr. Tennant had been dismissed, and that no other office was to be given him, that there was nothing for him but utter neglect, inattention to his demands, even a refusal of a fair, open and honest investigation, the Qu'Appelle "Progress" again writes, under the title of "British Justice":

For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that we can do.

In again referring to the dismissal of Mr. J. F. Tennant, late sub-collector of customs at Gretna, Man. we wish it to be distinctly understood that "The Progress" is perfectly independent, not being beholden to either the Conservative or Liberal parties in the smallest degree, expecting no favours from either party, but endeavouring to see that simple justice, and British justice at that, is done to all; and we think that the case of Mr. Tennant is certainly a case in point, as in this instance, judging from our information, which we believe to be reliable, a most flagrant injustice has been done Mr. Tennant. Believing such to be the case, we would indeed prove false to our mission did we not endeavour to the best of our ability to see the wrong righted, and we call upon Mr. Laurier to see that justice be done. What are the facts of the case? On the 11th inst., Mr. Tennant received through the collector of customs, Winnipeg, a letter from Mr. J. McDougall, commissioner of customs, Ottawa, stating that an Order in Council had been passed on the 9th of April, 1897, dispensing with his services as sub-collector at Grenna. The cause assigned for such Order in Council was that Mr. Tennant had been absent from his post, spending the whole of his time canvassing for votes during the late Dominion election, and framing voters' lists, and being an agent and scrutineer. All this, Mr. Tennant states, is false, saying that he has never been absent from a train during his whole stay at Grenna, now nine years; that he cannot speak a word of German and is foreign to the community he lives among in religion and nationality. Here we have the case of a charge being laid and a straight denial thereto. Which is correct? How can the question be answered without an investigation? which Mr. Tennant has asked for and been refused.

British law holds a man innocent until proven guilty. British law and honour demands that an investigation held in this case as do the Canadian public. The methods adopted by our politicians at Ottawa, be they Liberal or Conservative, are not so clean as to be entirely above suspicion. Ministers are after all but the servants of the people, and their actions should all be able to withstand the light of day. If an investigation is to be still refused it will be to the everlasting disgrace of our fair Dominion that Mr. Tennant, the father of a large family, who has served his country faithfully for twenty years in both a military and civil capacity, on the Lake of the Woods road, Boundary Commission, Dominion land guide service, as well as the customs, should lose his means of livelihood for himself and family on such questionable grounds. We feel quite certain that the true facts of the case have never been brought to Mr. Laurier's notice, otherwise justice would be done. The shame of it that such mean, petty tricks should be resorted to to suit political exigencies. We call upon Mr. Laurier, as head of the executive of our fair Dominion, to see that justice be done.

I regret exceedingly that the right hon. Premier has not thought fit to remain in the Chamber until I read the letter, which I would have taken the liberty of reading, which was sent to him, in accordance with the expression of opinion of Liberal newspapers, asking that an investigation be given Mr. Tennant. The only answer he received was a note from the right hon. gentleman's secretary, stating that the hon. gentleman had gone to Europe, but, on his return, he would take the matter up, since which time nothing more has been done.

I do not wish to introduce either religion, politics or nationality into this matter, but it seems to me, where such statements of innocence are made, where there is not one charge substantiated against the man accused, where he has repeatedly demanded an investigation, not only from his own Minister, but from the right hon. Prime Minister, there must be something more than neglect of office, which could have been proven at once, or interference in elections.

And to show that I am not alone in this opinion, but that it is an opinion entertained by a large portion of the community, that the conduct of the Government in a matter of this kind may not totally cause a great deal of injustice to individuals, but raise strife between one class of the community and another, I will now refer to criticisms made by other papers on Mr. Tennant's dismissal. First, I should like to read an article from the Winnipeg "Free Press," headed "Civil Service Dismissals," as follows:—

The removal of the office of Commissioner of Dominion Lands to Ottawa involves the dismissal of a number of officers, the reason for which is only to be found in their places being rendered unnecessary in the new arrangement. No question of irregularity against any of them has arisen, and it is not a case of turning out in order to replace them by others. It is a state of affairs brought about in the course of the reorganization of his department by the Hon. Mr. Sifton, for which we cannot find fault with him. It may be a mistaken policy for him to remove this office to Ottawa; and we think it is, but we are bound to allow time to determine that.

But it does appear that there is a little more hardship involved to the individuals than there need be. They have been years in the service, have performed their duties faithfully and abstained from active participation in politics. The business methods of the office have not trained prepared them easily to adapt themselves to ordinary commercial situations; and a little time should be given to enable them to do so. Three or six months' notice would not be unreasonable under the circumstances, or its equivalent in salary. Mr. Sifton's advisers in this city would do an act of justice, to say nothing of good-will, by recommending that those officials receive upon their retirement a gratuity of at least three months' pay. One of them is a man who lost an arm in the rebellion of 1835; and it would be an act of patriotism to stretch a point by keeping him in the service, as a recognition of what the country owes him.

The dismissal of Collector Tennant, of Grenna, is a case of a different kind. The action taken in this case was for active interference in politics. It may or may not have been justifiable. There was a charge made but it was not investigated, and the accused had no opportunity to put in a defence. This will seem to most people rather high-handed; but the principal hardship is involved in the fact that he has paid and would be entitled to nine years' superannuation allowance, except for his dismissal. It would be only fair, seeing that he was deprived of any chance of answering his accuser, that this superannuation allowance should be paid to him. A government cannot afford, any more than a private individual, to do an injustice. From a party standpoint the advisers of the Government may serve their party by preventing unnecessarily harsh measures.

When newspapers of the province on both sides of politics attack the action of the Government in this way, and when we have before us the positive proof of non-interference in politics, in fact, when we have a refutation of every charge that has been made against a man, it is natural we should look somewhere else for the cause of his dismissal. I shall read from the "Catholic Register," of Toronto, of date 2nd September, 1897, and I shall read it for the purpose of bearing out what I said a few moments ago, that in an action of this kind it is not only an injustice to the individual who is dismissed, but it may result in much more serious consequences than could be foreseen by the Minister who was guilty of the act of injustice. While on this subject I wish to refer to other dismissals to show that if the "Catholic Register" takes the view that it does in this particular case, it is not because it has gone off at a tangent, as the saying is, on one particular case, but because its opinion is based upon numerous dismissals from the public service, and it seems as if some of the Ministers had determined to make a dead set upon the Roman Catholic population of the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba. I do not wish to say that such is the case: I would not like to believe it possible that such a motive could actuate any hon. Minister or any man worthy of a seat in a legislature of the Dominion, but these dismissals have occurred in so many instances and with such even regularity that it is not to be wondered at that people should remark it. Sir, not only have they occurred in numerous instances and with great regularity, but they have occurred in such a way as to nullify the tacit understanding arrived at between the different peoples who go to make up the Dominion: that where a person belonging to one particular religion or nationality was dismissed or has left the public service, he should be replaced by one belonging to the same nationality. I say that these dismissals have infringed this tacit understanding to such an extraordinary degree, that the newspapers representing the Roman Catholic people, or speaking on behalf of that minority in this country, entertain the belief to a very great extent, that there is a dead set by the present Government upon officials of that religion. That is not to be wondered at, particularly in the case of Irish Catholics, when we see the newspaper of the Minister of Public Works speaking in the manner it did a short time ago about Irish Catholics in this Dominion. Now, Sir, I do not know if I have defined this paper properly when I speak of it as the organ of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte). I know that there is some difference of opinion between the hon. Minister and members of this House as to the manner in which this paper came into existence under its present management. I know there is a certain cloud about the history of its origin. I know there is a certain difference of opinion—to put it in the mildest form—between the statement made by the Minister of Public Works as to the purchase of that paper, and the statement made by the gentleman who actually furnished the cash for its purchase. Probably it would be better for me to amend my statement, by not qualifying it altogether as the newspaper of the Minister of Public Works, but rather as the newspaper which was bought with money furnished by Mr. Greenshields, at the request of the Minister of Public Works, on the understanding that the money would be returned at some time or other by somebody else; with the idea in the mind of the Minister of Public Works, that the funds of the Liberal party should be used for the purpose of purchasing the paper, and that Mr. Greenshields was acting as treasurer for that fund. I know this statement is a little clouded, but as you know, it is very difficult to make the statements of the interested parties agree. Whatever may be the paper, it is generally credited as the newspaper of the Minister of Public Works. If I am mistaken in so characterizing it, I only fall into the same error as most of the newspapers in this Dominion do. Translated into English the statement which "La Patrie" made, was:

The Irish, in their clergy as well as in their politics, are the worst enemies of our beautiful French language and our national influence in the American Republic, and it is probably the same elsewhere.

Commenting on this article, one of the Irish Catholic papers of this Dominion, on 31st March, 1898, gave expression to the following, under the heading "'La Patrie' on Irish priests and people":

The Dominion Minister of Public Works would be entirely unworthy of notice if he did not occupy a Cabinet position, and "La Patrie," of Montreal, would be less entitled to attention if it did not speak through him as a Ministerial organ. Through that sheet the spray of his bile is constantly directed against all who come within range of attack, whether individuals or classes in the community. It is a most extraordinary thing that Sir Wilfrid Laurier should have chosen him as a personal pet and thrown the mantle of his protection around him when the Liberal party was prepared to squelch him as an insufferable nuisance. He besmirched the French Canadian people of Manitoba over his own name when he had reason to fear them; and since the Irish Catholics are said to have turned away from the strange habits which Liberals have contracted since coming into office, it is perhaps but natural that they also should get an evil dose through the columns of "La Patrie." That malodorous organ finds an opportunity for treating them to its peculiar style of attack in connection with some mention of the name of Mr. William Redmond, an irresponsible young member of his brother's entirely irresponsible band. We have not seen the whole of the article, but the Montreal "Star" copies an extract from it, which has likewise been telegraphed to all the newspapers of the country. This is what "La Patrie" says:

"The Irish, in their clergy, as well as in their politics, are the worst enemies of our beautiful French language, and our national influence in the American Republic, and it is probably the same elsewhere."

When the French or Irish people in Canada find it necessary to discuss the position they stand in, one to the other, "La Patrie," its publishers and editors are not likely to be the authorities they will refer to. It is only a week ago since the brilliant Archbishop of Montreal spoke upon this subject with an eloquence not soon to be forgotten. The venom of "La Patrie" smells vilely; but that is all the harm it can do.

Again, this matter was referred to by the "True Witness," of Montreal, an organ of the Irish Catholic people of this Dominion, on 2nd April, 1898, in the following terms:—

"LA PATRIE'S" INSULTS.

The historical associations which bind Ireland with her stronger Celtic sister, France, in sincerest affection, are well known to students of history of both. With many an Irish family it is a proud recollection that one of their sons died under the French flag fighting against "la perfide Albion." At Fontenoy the Irish brigade turned the tide of battle and routed the English invaders of France. As the orator of the evening at St. Patrick's annual concert, held in St. Mary's Hall, Bleury street, on the evening of the 17th of March, pointed out, the last struggle of the Bourbons was led by an Irish Count, and the last great battle of France against the Prussians was led by an Irish General. That great soldier—of "J'y suis j'y reste" fame—was afterwards elected President of the present French Republic. And on the other side we like to recall that Napoleon the Great sent both ships and men to help the Irish heroes of '98 in their struggle to free themselves from the galling yoke of their English oppressors.

Mr. Tarte, the Minister of Public Works, is evidently innocent of any knowledge of these events, else he would not have allowed to be published in "La Patrie," on Saturday last, the wanton insult to Irishmen which appeared in it on that day. It was a comment on a speech recently delivered by Mr. William Redmond, M.P., from which it reproduced the following extract:—"The ardent desire of Irishmen at home and in the United States is to see France and America, those two great Republics which we love so much march hand in hand towards their glorious destinies. If the French people take an interest in the Irish question they will be glad to know that the Irish nation, while struggling for independence, earnestly desires the prosperity of France, her great Celtic sister, who has always borne aloft the torch of liberty. Between France and Ireland there are bonds stronger than British intrigues. The tri-coloured flag and the green flag may yet float over civilization and freedom, when the Union Jack will be trodden under foot by indignant peoples." "La Patrie's" comment on this is as follows:—"Now, we deem it our duty to put the newspapers of France on their guard against the Irish element and its tendencies, especially in the United States. For the Irish, both priests and politicians, are the worst enemies of our beautiful French language, and of our national influence in the American Republic. And the same thing must occur elsewhere."

We do not, of course, attach as much importance to the editorial utterances of "La Patrie" as we should if it were the recognized organ of the Liberal party instead of being, as it is, merely the personal organ of Mr. Tarte. "La Patrie's" opinions on religious questions have been repudiated by both Premier Laurier and Premier Marchand. Its political opinions, as expressed by Mr. Tarte and his sons, have recently been repudiated by Mr. Préfontaine, M.P., and a score of other Liberal members of Parliament from this province, who actually went so far as to request Premier Laurier asking for Mr. Tarte's expulsion from the Cabinet. A recreant to the party which he deserted. Mr. Tarte is denounced by the leading members of the other party which he joined after his desertion. The opinions of his journalistic organ, then, have little weight, as they do not reflect those of the Liberal party.

We should not, however, have been surprised at the gratuitous attack upon Irishmen even if "La Patrie" were a recognized official mouth-piece; for the degree of ingratitude with which Irish Liberals—men who have worked hard and loyally for the party through long years of defeat and discouragement—have been treated in regard to vacant positions in the civil service, by the Laurier Government is such as to merit denunciation in no unmeasured terms. We say this with all the more frankness since we are, as our readers are now well aware, absolutely neutral in politics. Nor are our remarks in this connection confined to Irishmen in the civil service. For our part, we should prefer not to see them in there. We should like to see them in less subordinate walks of life, where they could forge ahead with the exceptional abilities which they undoubtedly possess.

Mr. Tarte is a born mischief-maker. He is never happy unless he is sowing dissension and strife somewhere. He has been remarkably quiet for the past few months—since the Liberal members from the Montreal and Quebec districts demanded his expulsion from the Cabinet. Afraid to meddle with Liberal politics, he has broken his long silence by an attempt to stir up ill feeling between French Canadians and the Irish. But his reprehensible effort will fail. Irishmen and French Canadians have too much in common—there is no reason why they should not have everything in common—to allow Mr. Tarte to antagonize them. When Mr. Dalton McCarthy tried to abolish the French language in the Northwest, the Irish Catholic members of Parliament gave practical proof of their friendship for their French Canadian fellow-citizens by voting against his motion. The presence of Mayor Préfontaine, M.P., the leading Liberal member of the Montreal district, in the Irish procession on St. Patrick's Day and at the concert given under the auspices of St. Patrick's Society of the evening of that day, is a far truer index to the fraternal relations existing between Irishmen and French Canadians than the spiteful article in Mr. Tarte's personal organ.

If I have referred to this incident at all, Mr. Speaker, it is with regret at either the ignorance or the malignity of the writer of that article in "La Patrie." If he be a Frenchman, is he altogether ignorant of the history of France? Must he not be so if he forgets the many bloody fields upon which Irish soldiers and Irish officers shed their blood for the protection of France? Can he have forgotten the names of Sheldon's, Galway's, Clare's and Kilmallock's Irish cavalry regiments? Can he have forgotten the regiments of Dublin, Charlemont, Limerick and Athlone? Has he forgotten the battles of Fontenoy, Namur, Engblien and Landon? Is it possible that he has forgotten the names of such men as Sarsfield, Count Dillon, MacMahon and the O'Briens? Either he must have been guilty of the greatest ignorance of the history of France or he must have been guilty of the greatest malignity to have written such a scurrilous article concerning the Irish people of this country and the French people of this country. What I am saying indicates something of the opinion of the Government as regards Irish Catholics. I would hate to charge the Minister of Public Works with being the instigator of this crusade against the Irish Catholics of this country; but it seems to me, from the expression of his newspaper, that I would not be far wrong, and the Irish Catholic newspapers of this country are not far wrong when they charge him with being the principal offender in this particular, and the leader in the onslaught on their people. I say I would hate to charge either the Minister of Public Works or any other member of the Government, much less the Government itself, with having made such a distinction between the races, the nationalities and the religions of the people of this country. But when I see respectable journalists, men of education and experience, in the public newspapers of this country, boldly charging that in such cases as the one of which I am speaking, the dismissal was made, not because the man was guilty of any infraction of the law, or of neglecting his duties, but solely because he was an Irish Catholic, I must confess that it raises a doubt in my mind as to the sincerity or the honesty of the gentleman who operated for his dismissal. There is another peculiarity about this matter, Sir. In all Governments that have existed in the Dominion of Canada since 1867, the English-speaking Catholic people of this country have been represented, at least by one member, very often two, sometimes by as many as four. The reason of that is not far to seek. It has been debated in this House before. It has been spoken of by such men as McGee, Devlin, Curran and Ryan, my predecessors in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. But what do we see in this Government? It is true, there is an English-speaking Catholic there, a very respectable octogenarian; but I do not think he would be called a man possessing the vigour necessary to defend the rights of his people, or to stand up for their cause when attacked. We have not anybody except the Secretary of State (Mr. Scott) in this Government. We have had two hon. gentlemen sitting on the door-mat, outside the Cabinet, for some time, in company with the Solicitor General, but the door was opened for these two hon. gentlemen, and they were let in, while the Irish Catholic representative is still standing on the mat outside and very likely to stand there so long as this Liberal Government continues in office. Is it to be wondered at that wholesale dismissals of Irish Catholics should take place, when the door of the Cabinet is closed in the face of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who would be able to defend his compatriots and co-religionists if he were in the Cabinet. I wish to read for the benefit of the House an article from the "Catholic Register," dated 2nd of September, 1897. It is headed:

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST CATHOLIC OFFICE HOLDERS.

Last week we gave a long list of the names of Catholics in the Kingston district who have been driven out of Government employment by the Liberals. The "Globe" had been denying only a few days before that Catholics have any grievance against the new Administration; but the chief Government organ prudently abstains from offering any defence of the dismissals enumerated. We had hoped to induce the organ to descend from virtuous and patriotic generalities and come down to plain facts and particular instances. But we may have been at fault ourselves in not offering direct proof that religious opinion was the evident "crime" of the Catholic office-holder in any stated case of dismissal.

The circumstances surrounding the removal of Mr. McAllister, of Cobourg, by Hon. Mr. Pateron leave no room for supposing anything else than politico-religious persecution. This week we propose to take up another case in Mr. Pateron's department, in which we are prepared to demonstrate a religious persecution beyond aye or nay.

The Government campaign against Catholics is not confined to one district or province. It is so widespread and intense that we fully anticipate all the time from now to the opening of Parliament will be required to give an outline in "The Register" of the entire bill of particulars, to which we earnestly invite the attention of the Catholic electors of the Dominion, and particularly the Irish Catholic members of the House of Commons and Senate, to whom our people must look for a vigorous protest at the earliest possible opportunity.

The case of Mr. J. F. Tennant, of Gretna, Manitoba, is one of the worst instances of religious persecutions that has ever come to light under a supposed civilized government. The facts are plainly set forth in the following communication from a correspondent, whose name we suppress, believing that to divulge it would quickly be followed by the infliction of injury upon him by partisans holding positions of influence:—

"To the Editor of the 'Catholic Register':

"Dear Sir,—As you have always shown a disposition to defend the rights of Roman Catholics, I wish to give you the facts relative to a very coarse piece of persecution in the Dominion civil service of Manitoba.

"Joseph Tennant, an Irish Catholic, has been for many years collector of customs at the port of Gretna. During the last provincial campaign, when the Catholic religion and Catholics were maligned and slandered off every platform by the henchmen of the Greenway Government, Tennant attended a public meeting held in Gretna. One of the speakers, the Hon. J. D. Cameron, a member of the Greenway Government, was most bitter in his language towards the church and people of our creed. One of his remarks was to the effect that any man who was a separate school supporter must necessarily be a disloyal man.

"Tennant, who has been a British soldier, as well as his father before him, hotly resented this slander, and consequently incurred the enmity not only of Cameron but of the whole Greenway Government.

"Tennant came to this country on the Woiseley expedition in 1870. He has been mayor of West Lynne, councillor in the town of Emerson, and a temperate and capable man in every respect. In April of this year he was dismissed, not allowed one dollar of superannuation, although he had paid nine years into the fund, and his last month's wages were withheld.

"The inspector of customs of this district always considered Mr. Tennant one of the most able men in his department, and he, Captain Young, has given Tennant letters to that effect.

"Mr. Tennant has a family of eight children, and is very conscientious on the matter of giving his children a Catholic education. He has carried this principle to the extent of sending all his children to Winnipeg, where they could get the education desired.

"No one who has not lived in this province can be cognizant of the spirit of persecution that has been engendered towards men of the Roman Catholic creed; and Tennant lost his position and is penniless because he would not permit a vile slander to go unanswered.

"The Hon. Mr. Laurier, as well as the Hon. Mr. Paterson, were made aware of all the facts concerning this case, but the Greenway Government and R. L. Richardson, M.P., publisher of a rabid anti-Catholic sheet in this city, demanded Tennant's head.

"Signed,

_____"

The article then goes on:

Mr. Tennant, by publicly refuting the slanderous assertion of Cameron, did nothing more than any honest man is bound to do in honour and conscience. He defended his personal loyalty, a thing which his career in the military service of Canada, and the career of his father as a British soldier, demanded of him. He defended his religion and the religion of his children, which was an obligation laid upon him by his conscience. For doing these things so becoming in an honest and an honourable man, a partisan agent was set upon his track, and to-day the man is at the mercy of the world. He has not only been unjustly treated, but he has been defrauded and robbed. Had he paid into an insurance company the proportion of his wages that went into the Civil Service Superannuation Fund, the common law would have protected those savings, and the insurance company would be compelled to refund. Can a government legally do that which in a business corporation is pronounced dishonest and illegal? Furthermore, a month's salary was withheld from Mr. Tennant; and very likely if he prosecuted by law to recover the money his poverty would defeat his legal right when pitted against the wealth of the state.

Our readers may reasonably ask themselves when reading these facts: Is partisanship essentially so blind and heartless as to isolate a man like Mr. Tennant from the sympathy of his neighbours, no matter what their politics may be? It is not. It is not partisanship in itself that has crushed Mr. Tennant. The "offence" which he committed was not against the Dominion Government, but against the Government of Manitoba. The malice of Greenway's confrere, Cameron, would have been powerless in itself, and if publicly displayed would have injured Cameron alone. But Cameron could avoid public criticism and carry his influence into the Dominion Government by hiring the politician Richardson to use the knife. We are inclined to think that a very little "knifing" indeed was needed when the victim was a Catholic, and Mr. Paterson, the politician, who must pronounce the sentence of capital punishment.

The quick success of Richardson after he had been set on the trail by Cameron, of course, shocked every one who had known Mr. Tennant, or was aware of the circumstances of his dismissal. A Liberal newspaper, "The Qu'Appelle Progress," voiced the better partisan sentiment when it said:

This is the article which I read on Monday last. The article then continues:

Newspaper protests against Bossism of this sort carry little weight. The better way is to protest on the floor of Parliament, the protest being made in the name of religious conscience by all the Catholics in the House of Commons and Senate, without distinction of party. "The Register" does not wish to promote political feeling among Catholics or to advocate a politico-religious combination without cause. We shall look to our representatives until their influence has been proved powerless. These articles will be continued. There is a great deal yet to come.

Now, I do not wish to excite any religious feeling in this House. Rather do I wish to prevent any such feeling either entering this House or spreading throughout the country. But I deem it my duty, as an independent member of this House, I deem it my duty, as a citizen of Canada, as one loving his country and wishing to see that cordial feeling existing between the different races which will one day make up a glorious nationality, to protest in the strongest terms against this act—this act which has no other excuse than such as can be given for a politico-religious dismissal. There is no single item of proof against Mr. Tennant in connection with this matter; there is not a tittle of evidence against him that he was either guilty of active or inactive partisanship. There is nothing to prove that he did more than any man of honour would do, his religion and nationality being attacked by the Attorney General of Manitoba on that occasion referred to in these newspapers. There is not a particle of proof against this man in any way. Are we not, then, forced to the conclusion that it was not because he had neglected his office, it was not because he had been guilty of partisanship, it was not because he had used intemperate language that he was dismissed, but it was because he was an Irish Catholic and his place was wanted by some political heeler in that particular constituency. In entering the protest I do upon this question—and I do not limit this appeal, thank God, to the Irish Catholics of this House; I do not limit it to the Catholics of this House—I call upon every man who has the true interest of his country at heart, whatever his nationality, whatever his religion, to join with me and to protest by his vote, which I shall ask later, against this dismissal of a man because he was an Irish Catholic.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Inasmuch as this dismissal occurred in my constituency, Mr.

Speaker, I claim the right to be heard on this question. I shall endeavour to make my remarks as brief as possible. I would begin by deprecating the example the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) has set in this House, in arrogating to himself the special right to defend any particular nationality when the rights of that nationality seem to him to be assailed. Now, it seems to me, that, if the hon. gentleman desires to make a success in the line he has taken up, and to become the Daniel O'Connell of the Canadian Parliament, he had better select cases more heroic than those in which he has appeared so far. He pleaded the case of Mrs. McManus here last session, although it was proved that she delivered mail through the wicket at the point of a shot-gun. He has now taken up the case of Mr. Tennant. Now, let me tell the House briefly the facts in connection with this dismissal. I may say that, though I recommended the dismissal of this gentleman, I did not know at the time that he was Irish and a Roman Catholic. I may say, that, though I had known, it would not have made the slightest difference, as I do not believe that because a man is an Irishman and a Roman Catholic, he is entitled to any special treatment at the hands of this House because of that fact. Nor do I think that he should be singled out for attack because he happens to be an Irishman and a Roman Catholic. Mr. Tennant was sub-collector of customs at the port of Gretna, in my constituency. He took an active part in organizing for the election in question, and has always been known in that constituency as one of the most active organizers in that province, so far as I could learn. In the case in question, Mr. Tennant came to the Gretna poll and acted for a time as scrutineer on behalf of Mr. Rogers, my opponent. In a letter, which is on file in the Department of Customs, Mr. Tennant himself practically admits that, but seeks to excuse himself on the ground that it was a job put up on him by the Liberals. I do not think there exists any doubt in the minds of the people of Gretna that Mr. Tennant acted as scrutineer for my opponent on that day, at least for a portion of the time. I may say that, to my own knowledge, Mr. Tennant came to a meeting held at the town hall of Gretna, held in my interest, and addressed by the Hon. Mr. Greenway, Premier of Manitoba, and myself, as well as by some representatives of the Conservative party. Mr. Tennant appeared in the body of the hall, in the midst of a gang, and was most offensive in his interruptions; in fact, because of his interruptions, we had a very difficult time conducting the meeting. We felt at the time, by reason of his conduct, that if any civil servant deserved dismissal, Mr. Tennant was the man. His assistant in the custom-house at Gretna, Mr. James Bryans, devoted his entire time, I think, for a month or six weeks, to the work of organization on behalf of the Conservative party. But Mr. Bryans had the grace, the moment the elections were over, and he found the Liberals were successful, to send in his resignation, and many of us thought that if Mr. Tennant had imitated his example, his conduct would have been, in that respect, commendable, for there is no doubt in that part of the country that Mr. Tennant had been most officious in organizing on behalf of the Conservatives, and richly deserved dismissal. Now, I was at the Department of Customs, and I failed to learn that Mr. Tennant had reported his assistant as going about the country and spending week after week organizing for the elections, instead of attending to his duty. I am sure that members will agree with me, that if Mr. Tennant had been a man who did his duty as he should, he would have reported the conduct of this man Bryans for leaving his office and devoting his entire time to the contest. In addition to that, a statutory declaration was forwarded to the department from one R. Bryans, of Morden, in which he charged that on the day of the election, the 23rd June, 1896, he found the Canadian customs office at Gretna in charge of one Patrick Horrigan, an American customs official. Now, about that time, Mr. Tennant was attending to the duties of scrutineer at the Gretna polling booth, and for this purpose he seems to have left his office in charge of an officer of an alien country.

I may say that, so far as my own personal opinion is concerned, I did not think that any investigation was needed in this case. The man's conduct had been so open and flagrant that I thought he richly deserved to be dismissed under the circumstances. So far as concerns the charge that a campaign is being organized against the Irish Roman Catholics, I may say that because I recommended the dismissal of an Orangeman who was postmaster in another part of the constituency, the charge was made that a campaign had been organized against the Orangemen, and the "Orange Sentinel" contained a number of articles on the question, and, in fact, it was intimated that the Orangemen would make it very hot for us because of this campaign against the members of their order. To demonstrate the entire absence of prejudice against Irishmen and Catholics on my part, I may say that in one case, where, after investigation, an Orangeman was dismissed, I recommended and succeeded in having an Irish Catholic appointed.

I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, that when charges are made on one side that a campaign existed against Roman Catholics, on the other hand that a campaign existed against Orangemen, I think if you take a middle course you will arrive at a proper conclusion; neither side has much to complain of. Now, my hon. and distinguished-looking friend, the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) rings the changes on the statement that this man was a British soldier and bled for his country, but I notice that he forgot to mention the name of the battle in which he participated. I would like to know if because a man may happen to have been a soldier or may happen to have been a volunteer in his early days, he is entitled to any special treatment on that account. Then the hon. member goes on to dwell on the fact that he had eight children. Sir, many men have had infinitely more than eight children and yet have lost their jobs into the bargain. I fail entirely to see the force of that kind of logic on the part of my hon. and distinguished-looking friend. Now, I doubt very much whether this officer ever bled for his country, or even that he was ever wounded; and I fancy that if he was, it would be in the same locality that my hon. friend is sure to be wounded in, if ever he changes his plan of campaign and fights with his arms instead of with his tongue. If Mr. Tennant was so averse to acting as a scrutineer on that occasion as represented by the numerous affidavits that the hon. gentleman read to this House, why did he remain in the polling booth? What kept him there? It is shown that the scrutineer of my opponent, the moment Mr. Tennant went in there to vote, asked him to look after the duties of scrutineer and then left the booth. Then, if this great soldier who has fought and bled for his country, desired to act in such a way as to avoid the suspicion of being a partisan official, why did he remain in that booth for the balance of the afternoon? If he had wished to imitate Cæsar's wife, he should have avoided the appearance of evil, and fled from the polling booth, as it was his duty to do under the circumstances. Now, Sir, in this matter there is no question of religion or nationality so far as I am concerned. I am sure that the House will bear me out in these statements that in any dismissals that have occurred, there has been no indication whatever of a desire to discriminate against Roman Catholics or against the Irish. On the contrary, I can mention to my hon. friend a number of cases that have occurred in Manitoba and in the city of Winnipeg, pointing in the opposite direction. I would refer to the case of Mr. J. K. Barrett, Inspector of Inland Revenue for Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, with headquarters in Winnipeg. For years that gentleman edited a newspaper and attacked most violently almost every Liberal politician who happened to differ from his views. He is the Barrett whose name appears as the plaintiff in the celebrated school case. It was felt, and very strongly felt, that if there was a man in that entire country who deserved to be dismissed, it was this Mr. J. K. Barrett; and I am led to believe that the Government did not like to take that extreme step in his case for the reason that their action might be attributed to a desire to punish him for the part he took in that school case.

Mr. QUINN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the hon. gentleman pretend to say that a man, an officer of this Government who acted as editor of a violently partisan newspaper, attacking Liberals indiscriminately throughout the entire fight, doubtless to the neglect of his official duties, should be allowed to remain in office.

Mr. QUINN. If my hon. friend will permit me—a Government actuated by motives such as I have shown, would not select a man so dangerous as Mr. Barrett was, because their object would be too easily seen through.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, let us take the case of Mr. Costigan, the late Collector of Inland Revenue at Winnipeg. He was a political opponent, and he might easily have been retired, but he was permitted to remain in office. I am sure I have heard very kindly expressions in regard to the action of the Government towards Mr. Costigan. I could mention many other cases, but I do not care to bring them before the attention of the House, because of unpleasant feelings a discussion of their cases might give rise to.

Mr. QUINN. I never said the Government had dismissed every Irish Catholic; I said they had shown partiality in the dismissals, while they have been in power.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has my hon. friend ever looked into the percentage of Irishmen or of Catholics that have been dismissed, and has he compared it with the percentage of other nationalities dismissed? In my constituency, I think some fifteen or sixteen were dismissed, and among them there was only one Irish Catholic; and I have been attacked most strongly because one of the men dismissed happened to be an Orangeman. Would my hon. friend say that because a man happens to be an Irishman or a Roman Catholic he should be protected no matter what his conduct may be?

Mr. QUINN. Do not argue such a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The position the hon. gentleman took this afternoon would certainly lead to that belief. It seems to me under the circumstances—I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether the word would be parliamentary—but it seems to me that an enormous amount of gall has been exhibited by the hon. gentleman in bringing a case like this before the House at all. I think if he had known the facts, if he had been wise enough to have gone to the department and looked up the papers for himself, I am sure he never would have brought this case before the House at all.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). I desire to say a few words in reference to the motion of the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) for papers in connection with the dismissal of Mr. Tennant, of Gretna, Man. In this connection he has seen fit to make certain regrettable remarks and statements. I may say at the commencement, that there can be no objection on my part to bringing down the papers as speedily as possible. The only possible regret I have is that they will show to the House that it contains a member who has not hesitated to rise in his place and to place upon the "Hansard" statements that are absolutely and wholly without foundation. Having been nearly twenty-four years in this House, I think I cannot remember a case where a gentleman has so evidently been the means of proving his own humiliation and shame. The papers will come down. The hon. gentleman says there was no charge against Mr. Tennant, that no chance was given him to defend himself, that he was dismissed because he was an Irishman and a Roman Catholic, and for no other reason. In the same breath he asserts that he is the last man in the world who would raise such an issue, or mention such a thing. His whole speech seems to have no other object, and could have had no other object; and I think when the papers come down and he sees that the charges he has made are wholly disproved, he will then realize that he has placed himself in a position which it will take him some little time to regain in this House.

The hon. gentleman has read from a newspaper, from the "Catholic Register," an article respecting the dismissal of Mr. Tennant from the Customs Department. The hon. gentleman has charged myself and the right hon. Prime Minister with having acted with prejudice against the Irish Roman Catholics on this occasion, and yet the hon. gentleman is well aware that I have no desire in the least to raise such a question, and that I am the last man likely to do so. Will the hon. gentleman move for the papers in connection with Mr. McAllister? I should like him to do so in this case also. I promise the papers will be brought down, and I trust that, if the hon. gentleman will not do so, some other hon. gentleman will. The hon. gentleman found that those gentlemen belonged to a certain nationality, but their nationality I did not even know at the time, and if I had done so, it would have made no difference, for I deem it would not be right to be so influenced in the discharge of my public duties. When the hon. gentleman says that I am actuated by prejudice in dismissing two members of that nationality, and when he makes this charge against us, and, at the same time, against the whole Government, he should endeavour to ascertain the facts before attributing motives so unworthy. How I could possibly be prejudiced against two officers because of their nationality, when, in the discharge of my public duties, I endeavoured to act as a judge and discharge my duties faithfully, I am at loss to know, especially in view of the fact that I have nominated ten times the number of men of the same nationality and faith as officers of my department, and some to very high positions. In nominating those officers, I did not do so because they belonged to that nationality or that faith, but I nominated them because I believed they would prove good officers to Her Majesty, and they obtained their offices by virtue of that consideration. When those officers in question had to be dismissed—and it is not a pleasant duty for me to dismiss any man in the public service—it was only done because I believed I would not have been performing my duty, if I had failed to do so. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) stated that Mr. Tennant had no opportunity to defend himself. When charges were preferred, they were sent him, and he was asked to reply to them, and in his reply he practically confessed that he was guilty of the very offence—political partisanship. The very affidavit the hon. gentleman read showed that Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth, taking the place of the Tory scrutineer; that, while he was in the polling booth taking the place of the Tory scrutineer, the American customs officer was sitting in the Canadian customs office.

Mr. QUINN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, because I know he would not wish to make a misstatement. I read no such affidavit as he has mentioned. The affidavit of Mr. Ford denies in toto that he was in the office of the customs office that day any longer than on any other day, or that he was in charge of the office other than at any other time. The affidavit of the deputy returning officer is to the effect that Mr. Tennant was not in the polling booth otherwise than as an elector.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The affidavit of the American customs officer denies that he was given charge of the office, but he admits that he was in the office. I have a statutory declaration from another gentleman, who found the American officer in the Canadian office, and he was alone; and we have the statement that Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth and had taken the place of the Tory scrutineer, although he had declined to make himself responsible in any way by the taking the papers. He might have been asked why he came in the polling booth as an elector, what right he had to be there as an elector, except he was remaining there as a scrutineer. I do not want to press the matter unduly. I want to let hon. members peruse the papers and decide for themselves; but I could not allow the statement of the hon. member for Montreal to pass uncontradicted, especially in the face of his statement made at a previous sitting of the House, that the Minister had been driven to his last ditch and was compelled to fall back upon what had transpired in the provincial election of 1896, when, as the hon. gentleman alleges, Mr. Cameron, Attorney General of Manitoba, in the provincial elections had used terms that were derogatory to Irish Roman Catholics; and if language was used at that time that might have been considered offensive, it does not concern me, and I would approve Mr. Tennant making a denial. But no such facts are before me. It is true, Attorney General Cameron has filed a letter with me, a charge that he was grossly insulted by this officer during the provincial elections, when he stigmatized Mr. Greenway as a liar; but this letter does not enter into the consideration of the case, because it has to do with the provincial elections, and no charge is dealt with by me against officers except in regard to the last general Dominion elections. And, as I have said, it does not come into consideration. But there are declarations made over the signatures of two responsible men. The hon. member has said no responsible men have made complaints. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), on his own responsibility, makes that statement; Mr. Greenway also makes that statement, and against those statements there is the letter of Mr. Tennant, which admits he was at the meeting in question—at the meeting where he was described as acting in a most offensive and partisan manner. There is also his statement that there is a shadow of truth in the charge in regard to acting as a scrutineer, that he simply happened to be in the polling booth, but did not accept the papers in connection with the position of scrutineer. I should be very glad, as I have said, to bring down the papers. The animus of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) was very evident; he based his charges on newspaper statements; he occupied a long time in endeavouring to prove that this Government were actuated with a feeling of hostility to a certain portion of the community, and all I wish to say, so far as regards the hon. gentleman's reference to myself, is, that those statements cannot be established. I do not desire to enter into those questions at all, or to recognize any preference, but to treat all as Canadians, and I believe my action will justify the course I have followed to all honourable and fair-minded members of this House. It is a pity, as regards the hon. gentleman himself, that he has adopted the present course. He has placed himself in a very humiliating position; he has made absolute statements, not inferences, not assertions which he would be willing to change, if the papers showed the facts to be different, but statements based on newspaper reports, in fact, on the reports of Tory newspapers, and the hon. gentleman has, no doubt, had sufficient experience of Tory reports to know they are not always accurate. He should never have committed himself to such a statement, for example, as that this officer was not dismissed for any reason except for a political-religious reason, simply on account of his trouble with Attorney General Cameron. That matter did not enter into the question. Charges were made against him in writing, charges of violent partisanship. He did not deny that he attended the meetings; he acknowledged he was in the polling booth, and the statutory declaration received proved he was there, and proved that he was there for a period of time, and in the place of the Tory scrutineer, who had gone out; and another affidavit proved that the American customs officer was in the Canadian customs office at that time. He may have been there on other days, but probably on such occasions Mr. Tennant was there also; but Mr. Tennant was in the polling booth while the American officer was in the Canadian customs office.

I trust that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn), in view of what has been said, in view of his placing upon the "Hansard" that extract from a Tory paper in reference to Mr. McAllister, I wish now that he would move for the papers in connection with that case that they may come down, and that he may have a correct answer from the official documents. I venture to say the papers will show that when I recommended the superannuation of Mr. McAllister, I might be liable to censure by members of this House, for not having dismissed him, liable to censure because in view of his being an efficient officer for many years, I recommended that he should be superannuated, and he is superannuated. The charge that Mr. Tennant was robbed, which charge the hon. gentleman read from a Tory newspaper, and was deprived by the Minister of what he paid into the superannuation fund—

Mr. DAVIN. The Qu'Appelle "Progress" is a Liberal paper.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He was not reading from the Qu'Appelle "Progress."

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) read from the "Progress," and he said it was a Liberal paper, but he immediately proceeded to read an article from that paper in which the editor or the writer declared, that it was neither a Liberal nor a Conservative paper, but an independent paper. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) read an article from the "Catholic Register," I think, which charged that Mr. Tennant was robbed. As a matter of fact Mr. Tennant, I believe, has received the full amount of the moneys he paid into the superannuation fund with 5 per cent interest added to the amount.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I speak from memory and subject to correction; but at all events that is the manner in which we are dealing with the cases of these men.

Mr. ROCHE. That letter was written before the Minister sent the cheque to Mr. Tennant for $221.60.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Which letter?

Mr. ROCHE. The article quoted from the newspaper by the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Quinn).

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) knew that Tennant had got his money back, and yet the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) wants to embalm on "Hansard"—

Mr. QUINN. Will the hon. Minister allow me.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. QUINN. I want to correct the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Quinn) cannot speak except with the permission of the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. QUINN. But the hon. Minister does not say that he will not permit me to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. QUINN. The back benches seem to refuse me permission to make a correction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. QUINN. I would like the hon. Minister to say, whether he did not hear that I admitted that this money had been paid. Does he wish now to embalm on "Hansard" what he knows to be not true by saying that I did not mention that?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; chair.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then, what was the object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) reading from the "Catholic Register" the statement that Tennant had been robbed—

Mr. QUINN. I read it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. QUINN. The Minister is asking me a question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that the hon. Minister gives away to the hon. member (Mr. Quinn).

Mr. QUINN. The hon. Minister asked me a question, and I am going to answer it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; chair.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. Minister is asking me—

Mr. PATERSON.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. Let the hon. member (Mr. Quinn) take his seat.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. member (Mr. Quinn) has had his full time to address the House. If I said anything that is not correct "Hansard" will reveal it, and "Hansard" will remove all doubts in reference to it. I speak subject to correction when I say that I believe Mr. Tennant has had his superannuation moneys returned.

Mr. ROCHE. In February of this year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, and in April of this year an article in a newspaper is read in this House to be embalmed in "Hansard," in which the statement is made that Tennant has been robbed and cheated out of his superannuation money. That is what I object to.

Mr. QUINN. He received the money after the notice of motion was given.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There was no necessity for reading that article from the "Catholic Register" when it was known that the superannuation moneys had been returned. I have but a few words more that I would like to say in reference to this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In order that the motion to bring down the papers may carry, I will now desist from speaking—

Mr. ROCHE. Mr. Speaker—

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. If the hon. member (Mr. Roche) wants to continue the debate I wish, Mr. Speaker, to retain my own right to the floor.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 61) in further amendment of the Trade Marks and Design Act.—(Mr. Bertram.)

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 4) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers.—(Mr. Casey.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 6,

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you make the Minister of Railways and Canals the special prosecutor?

Mr. CASEY. I thought my hon. friend was present the other night when I gave the reason for this—that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and that it was thought advisable by myself and by the committee who considered this Bill last year to place upon somebody the responsibility of instituting these proceedings. It was suggested this night week that the Solicitor General would be the proper person to take charge of this duty. I have no objection to inserting the name of the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General is, I think, capable of discharging this duty in addition to the others which rest upon his shoulders; or, if the Government have any objection to placing any further duties upon the members of the Government, I am willing to leave it so that any one can institute proceedings to recover penalties under this Act.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it would be better to do that—make it the same as any ordinary Act.

Mr. DAVIN. Would it not be the fit thing to put in the name of the Attorney General of Canada, and then the Solicitor General would act as a matter of course under him. I move that this clause be amended by striking out in the first line the words "Minister of Railways and Canals," and replacing them by the words "Attorney General of Canada."

Mr. SPROULE. I think it would be better to leave it without any such name, so that the Act would be enforced the same as any other Act.

Mr. CASEY. I am quite willing to do that. I beg leave to move that all the words in the section up to the words "any other person," and that also the word "other" be struck out, leaving the clause as follows:

Any person may institute any proceedings for the recovery of any penalties provided by this Act.

Mr. DAVIN. Then I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. Why say "any proceedings." It seems to me that "proceedings" alone will be quite sufficient.

Mr. ELLIS. I would like to know positively whether this Bill applies to railways that are not prepared to be railways for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. That, I suppose, would give rise to a question of law. This is not intended to apply to any railways not Dominion lines, and I do not think it should be held to apply to them because they are the only ones over which we have authority to legislate.

Mr. LISTER. If you create an offence, no doubt you have a perfect right to legislate concerning it, and the legislation can only be made here. You do not state in your Bill the form in which the prosecution is to be commenced. Is it to be by civil actions or summary proceedings before a justice of the peace or by indictment before any court of session or assizes? It seems to me the Bill is defectively drawn. Is the penalty to be recovered in the civil courts or by criminal proceedings? If by criminal proceedings, the Bill should state that it can be enforced on information before any justice of the peace. If there is to be a civil remedy, then that should be stated. I do not think the civil courts would have any jurisdiction unless it was conferred upon them. There would be no way of collecting the penalty and enforcing the Act, and it would be nugatory. The hon. Minister of Railways says we might bring a quitam action, but that would be a very expensive proceeding to recover a penalty of $5.

Mr. ELLIS. I am safe in saying that it was distinctly understood in the committee that this Bill was not to apply to small railways which scarcely earn enough to pay their employees, and that these small railways were not to be required in two years to adopt these appliances, desirable as their adoption might be in the interest of the public. If the Bill is intended to apply to small lines of railway, it would be a burden on them, and there ought to be some provision exempting them or extending the time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I promised my hon. friend who is promoting the Bill that I would, by the time the Bill came up again before the committee, have an amendment prepared touching those sections, and I have done so. I may say to my hon. friend that I did not adopt the idea of imposing upon the Minister of Railways the duty of inciting or taking charge of these prosecutions. I think it would be proper to leave the enforcement of the remedy and the recovery of penalties to the ordinary tribunal, to be moved in the ordinary way. The amendment I am prepared to suggest to the committee in substitution for clauses 3, 4, 5 and 6 would read in this way:

- Clauses substituted for clauses 3, 4, 5 and 6.
3. Every person who
 - (a) after the expiration of the period of two years mentioned in section one of this Act builds any car fitted with air brakes which is not provided with an automatic device, such as is required by that section, or
 - (b) who, after the passing of this Act builds for use on a Canadian railway a box freight car which does not comply in all respects with the requirements of section two of this Act is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of (not more than) twenty-five dollars for each car so built.
 4. Every railway company or person who
 - (a) after the expiration of the said period of two years uses any car fitted with air brakes and not provided with an automatic device such as is required by section one of this Act, or

(b) after the passing of this Act uses any box freight car which does not comply in all respects with the requirements of section two of this Act is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a penalty of (not more than) five dollars a day for every day, or five dollars for every trip lasting less than a day, during which such car is so used.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) how that would leave the procedure for enforcing the law?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. This provides that the summary Conviction Act shall apply, and that provides the machinery and renders all other unnecessary.

Mr. CASEY. I do not know how we are to proceed to amend sections 4 and 5. I think they were passed.

Mr. LISTER. Go back to them.

Mr. CASEY. We could go back to these sections by motion, I suppose, if my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) would move—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I move reconsideration of sections 3, 4 and 5.

Mr. CASEY. Not 3.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, this covers section 3 also.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) to withdraw his amendment to clause 6?

Mr. CASEY. Yes, I move for leave to withdraw that amendment.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I move that the sections I have just read be substituted for sections 3, 4, 5 and 6 of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS. Before you proceed further, I would like to propose that the foregoing provisions of this Act shall apply only to railways which have been declared to be works for the general benefit of Canada. The other sections of the Act are of an entirely different character, and the proposal to limit the operations of the first six sections of the Bill should come in now.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that that would make the Bill very anomalous for cars on these different railways will be mixed in with others in the trains, and how are you going to distinguish a car belonging to one railway from a car belonging to another when you commence an action? The Act would be worthless if this proposition were accepted. The small railways are continually running cars over the great lines, and if an accident occurs, how is it to be known whether it occurred on one car or on another?

Mr. CASEY. It seems to me my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) is unduly anxious about the little railways.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order; there is no motion before the Chair.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. member for St. John to move an amendment.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If it is a new section, it will have to be put at the end of the Bill.

On section 7,

Mr. LISTER. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) whether he has considered the question whether this legislature has power to legislate in the direction covered by these provisions. It seems to me that the right to legislate in this direction belongs entirely to the local legislatures and not to this Parliament. We could create an offence as we have done by this Bill, we could declare that it shall be the duty of a railway company to do certain things for the better protection of life, but I doubt if we can create a civil liability upon the company for neglect. My hon. friend knows, of course, that there is in Ontario an Act called the Workmen's Compensation Act, which provides for the compensation of employees injured through neglect on the part of a railway company, giving them the right to recover an amount equal to three years' arrears of wages. It seems to me that that covers all that my hon. friend wants to cover by this Act. The Ontario legislature has legislated in that direction, and the legislation has been upheld by the courts. I think this gives the employee quite as much as he would be entitled to recover here.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Grand Trunk Railway case to which my hon. and learned friend refers, was a case where a question arose as to the compensation to be given a railway employee, and it was there held by Chancellor Spragge that the statute was ultra vires in so far as it was made to apply to railways under the control of the Dominion of Canada, but his opinion was not concurred in by the other judges. I think that on the whole, in view of the divergence that exists, and in view of the seriousness of this matter, we ought carefully to consider the legislation before we pass it. If we pass legislation that is ultra vires of the power of this Parliament, it will be a reflection upon the whole of us. For my part I am not prepared to express any opinion on this legislation at the present time; but at all events, I would be disposed to think that this legislation would be effective only in so far as Dominion railways are concerned, but would not apply to railways not under the control of the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. LISTER. I would make this suggestion to my hon. friend. The Act creates an offence for the protection of the servant, and I suppose that he would have a civil remedy without any statute at all.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not think we can at present come to any very sound conclusion as to whether section 7 would be within our legislative competency. When this question was before the committee I expressed doubt as to whether we could properly legislate in this direction, and I am not sufficiently clear about it to be willing to take any responsibility for the legislation at the present moment. I was obliged to leave before the committee rose, but I gathered that the hon. gentleman intended, if possible, to ascertain the opinion of the Minister of Justice upon the subject, so that when the committee met again we might know what his view upon it was. I think the Solicitor General has not by any means overstated the undesirable consequences which would flow from our passing this section if we have not power to do so. It is quite true, as he said, that it would reflect unfavourably upon Parliament if we were to legislate in this direction and it should ultimately be decided that we had no power to legislate. But I think an even more serious reason which should influence us, is that if we pass this Bill without having power to do so we would be setting in motion litigation of all kinds and proceedings on the part of those people who are in the employ of the railway companies and they would be led to incur a good deal of expense in obtaining what they supposed to be their rights, when it might possibly be adjudicated that we had not power to pass the legislation. I think the hon. gentleman would do well not to press this 7th clause until we have some authoritative expression of opinion as to whether it would be within our competency.

Mr. CASEY. I would rather take the other end of the argument. It seems to me I am doing quite right to press these clauses until we have an authoritative expression of opinion against them.

Mr. LISTER. Don't you think we should have that first?

Mr. CASEY. The Bill has been under discussion for three years, and we have had no authoritative expression of opinion against it in all that time. It has three times received a second reading in this House, it has been before a Select Committee on which there were lawyers, and this point has never been raised. I think I am justified in pressing these clauses in the absence of any authoritative opinion against their constitutionality brought by those who are opposed to them. I suggested on the last occasion, that the Minister of Railways and Canals should secure the opinion of the Minister of Justice, or should have some official opinion from him, before he objected to the clauses on that ground. I have since seen the Minister of Justice casually, and asked him to look into it, and he said he was going to look into it, but it does not seem he has given the Minister of Railways and Canals any opinion yet as to his views on that point. My ground for urging these clauses is simply this: they have been demanded by the organized railway men of Canada. The clauses have been endorsed by successive meetings of large bodies of railway men in which all organizations were represented. These clauses are in accordance with the legislation of the mother country, and I think I have shown grounds of fairness which cannot be objected to. The hon. member for Lambton seems to think that there is sufficient remedy already as between the railway employer and the railway employee. It does not seem to the employee to be so, and it does not seem to me to be so. It did not seem to the Imperial Parliament that existing laws in that country which were of the same nature as the Employers' Liability Act in the province of Ontario is now, were sufficient. The Act which was passed in England at the last session referred only to certain specified occupations amongst which were railways and other dangerous occupations, such as those of builders, engineers and others. It was concluded by the Imperial legislators that the employee in peculiarly dangerous trades did require greater protection than was given him by the ordinary Employers' Liability Act. It has been my endeavour to try to secure that same sort of protection for the employees in Canada. The Employers' Liability Act, of course, turns upon the question of negligence on the part of the employer. But it has been admitted in England and here, that the whole question turns upon the fact, that in especially risky trades the man who is employed is entitled to compensation even where his employer has not been negligent, the compensation arising out of the peculiarly risky nature of the employment itself in which he is engaged. That is what has led to the passing of this Act in England, and what I think should lead to the passing of a similar Act here. I am sure that my hon. friend from Lambton has heard me in this House before, and has heard other members, refer many times to a case where a certain Canadian railway objected to paying damages to one of its employees, or rather to his representatives, because he had met his death through the negligence of a fellow employee; therefore they claimed they were not liable for the injury.

Mr. LISTER. That has all been got rid of.

Mr. CASEY. Where?

Mr. LISTER. By legislation.

Mr. CASEY. In what province ?

Mr. LISTER. In Ontario.

Mr. CASEY. The legislation of Ontario may be very good, but it does not apply to the other provinces. It turned out, however, that under the laws of Quebec the railway was liable for this man's death, but the suit had to be taken to the Supreme Court of the province, then to the Supreme Court of Canada, and thence to the Privy Council, before justice could be obtained, and before that man's widow obtained the damages to which she was entitled, and which were adjudged to her by the first court that tried the case. The point is that an employee cannot stand such litigation as a railway company can, and unless there is some law plain and clear under which an injured man or his representatives can get compensation quite apart from the question of negligence altogether, there are many cases where justice will not be done, and cannot be had. I urge strongly upon the Government and the House that this is most important. It is a matter on which the railway men have informed themselves as to legislation elsewhere, and in regard to which they will demand their rights, and their demands will have to be listened to. If therefore the Minister of Railways has not even now any authoritative opinion to lay before the House from the Minister of Justice or any other legal authority to impeach the constitutionality of these clauses, I feel it to be the duty of those whom I may consider as my clients in this matter, to press these clauses to a vote in the committee, or possibly in the House afterwards. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals thinks it would be doing discredit to the House if we passed legislation that is ultra vires. I cannot see it in that light. If any proposition is glaringly ultra vires it is a discredit to pass it, but where there is no authoritative decision—for an opinion does not count—it is open to each hon. member to form an opinion as to whether a Bill is ultra vires or not, and vote according to his personal opinion. A great many Acts have been passed that have been declared ultra vires by the courts, and that is the only way in which their constitutionality can be raised and finally decided. A case must arise with respect to an Act before the question can be finally determined. All the railway men ask is to have an opportunity, if necessary, at a subsequent period of settling the question whether the law is constitutional or not.

In regard to the constitutionality of it, I have merely to say that it is analogous to our dealing with real estate in connection with railway matters. Real estate is one of the subjects given particularly to the provincial legislatures by the British North America Act, as no doubt is the subject of the relations of employer and employees. But everybody knows that it has been held to be a necessary incident to our power over railways, which have been declared to be for the benefit of Canada, that we should be able to deal with the question of real estate. It has been held even by the courts that the provincial legislatures cannot authorize a man to cut a drain across part of a railway company's property, if it is a Dominion railway. In regard to real estate in connection with railways, there is concurrent jurisdiction. The provincial legislature can grant power to cross railways chartered by themselves, and this House has power over railways under its control. I claim that in the relationship of employer and employee, when the railway is a Dominion railway, an analogy exists, and this House has a concurrent right with the provincial legislatures, as we possess a concurrent right in dealing with the real estate of those companies. I think a prima facie case has been made out, and unless some decision to the contrary is advanced, I must press these clauses on the House. The case quoted by the hon. Solicitor General appeared to strengthen my contention. One of the Ontario judges decided, as regards an employee's liability, that it did not apply to railways under the control of the Dominion. He was, however, only one of the judges, and the court gave an opinion contrary to my contention. It is only because I believe our jurisdiction over the relation of employer and employee is incident to our jurisdiction over Dominion railways that I have not suggested the extension of the provision to all men in hazardous employment as well as those on the railways.

Mr. ELLIS. No doubt the propositions involved in the Bill are of a most unusual character. I do not say there should not be such legislation but the legal members of the House should thoroughly understand what is proposed. The English compensation Act, passed last year, will come into effect on 1st of July of the present year, and it is one of the most radical measures passed since the Reform Bill, but it is not quite so radical as the proposal of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). The English Act was thoroughly discussed in Great Britain. It met with a great deal of opposition, but it became the law eventually, and will go into operation on 1st July. It provides that a man may obtain compensation from his employer whether he suffered injury through the employer's negligence or not, the liability being due to the mere fact that the employee was in the employer's service. The English law, however, is very much guarded. In England there is a regular system of friendly societies and organizations of one kind or another for the protection of workmen, and they are looked after both by the law and by these organizations. I call attention to this provision of the English Act :

If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to liability to pay compensation under this Act (including any question as to whether the employment is one to which this Act applies) or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement shall subject to the provisions of the first schedule of this Act, be settled by arbitration, in accordance with the second schedule of this Act.

So hon. members will see that the plan of settlement is entirely different from that proposed in the Bill now before the committee. There could be no doubt as to the general sentiment of the workmen who came before the committee.

Mr. CASEY. The point to be settled by arbitration was one as to the scope of the Act and not as to the amount of compensation. I will read from the Act.

Mr. ELLIS. I have the English Act here and I read the clause from it. The section seemed to cover both points.

Mr. CASEY. The whole question is whether the liability will arise under that Act or under the general law of England.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire that hon. members interested in legal questions shall understand that this Act will make employers liable to pay compensation whether they have in any way contributed to the injuries received by the employee or not. The English Act is very full and complete. It provides a whole system of machinery by which the Act will be carried into force, and any one reading the newspapers will have observed telegraphic despatches published in the public press within the last fortnight announcing that there has been a great deal of agitation in England, especially among the officers of the friendly societies as to the principle on which the Act will be applied. I am, on the whole, rather friendly to the proposition itself, but, at the same time, it is of such great importance that it ought to be thoroughly understood. The English Act should be examined by the gentlemen who are interested in law-making, and it should be thoroughly understood by the legislators of this country. It is a question to consider whether, under the conditions existing in Canada and in view of the difficulty we have in carrying on many operations, we all ought not to take a certain amount of risk. In other words, whether this country is in a condition to apply to its legislation an Act of such a radical character.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) has no reason to complain of the spirit with which the Bill has been approached in this House.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am satisfied there is only one feeling, and that is, to meet the wishes, so far as possible, of the people who are employed upon railways.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I believe we are anxious to meet those people as far as we can without injuring the others interested, and without making a grave mistake in the legislation which we are placing upon the Statute-book. Outside of the question as to whether or not we are competent to legislate in this form, it appears to me to be quite clear that the subject is approached in a different spirit in the English legislation from that in which it is approached by my hon. friend (Mr. Casey). These different sections of my hon. friend's Bill rather place upon the railway company the obligation of proving, and of relieving itself of the onus of the presumption that the person suffering injury is entitled to recover.

Mr. CASEY. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In the English Act, the question is left absolutely open, and neither party approaches it with any presumption for or against him. It is necessary that it shall be established before this tribunal which is set up in the English Act, first: as to whether the question arises properly under the Act, and then as to whether or not—

The employment is one to which the Act applies, and as to the amount of duration of compensation under the Act.

And, as I take it, also, as to whether the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think the hon. Minister will find any clause in the English Act which exempts the employer on the mere ground that the injury was not caused by any act of his.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will read the first section.

Mr. CASEY. Has the hon. Minister read the Act?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I have read it. I cannot say that I have studied it; I cannot say that I have read the Act before this moment, but from a hasty reading of the Act I rather draw the conclusion which I have stated. I will read the Act to the House:

Sec. 1. If, in any employment to which this Act applies, personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as is hereafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act; provided that the employer shall not be liable under this Act in respect to an injury which does not disable the workman for a period of at least two weeks.

(b) When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employers, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either name compensation under this Act or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act.

Mr. CASEY. It imposes a liability under this Act, whether the workman has another remedy or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That I am not discussing. I am discussing whether or not the English Act places the railway companies in the position of having to disburden itself of the responsibility and accept the onus of proof, that they are not culpable, and that this injury was attributable to the personal negligence of the individual making the claim. The Act provides, as I understand it, that this remedy can only be enforced when the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer.

Mr. CASEY. No. The hon. Minister has not carefully read the Act, or he would not say that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Perhaps I have not read it sufficiently carefully, but at all events that is the way it strikes me. It all goes to show that we ought not to be over hasty in the legislation in regard to this, and the discussions which are taking place are all calculated to throw additional light on the subject, and probably at the time we are in committee again the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) will have an opinion with regard to the question I raised a while ago.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister will permit me to say that, as he has only read this Act now for the first time, he has evidently misconceived the drift of this English Act. The whole drift of that Act is to impose a statutory liability on the employer. No matter whether he is guilty of culpable neglect or not. Whenever a man or employee is injured, the English law provides that the man so injured, if he thinks he is entitled to a larger verdict at law, can forego the compensation given him by this Bill and enter a suit at law. That is the meaning of the English Act. At the same time the English Act and my Bill provide that, if the injury can be put down to the wilful neglect of the man injured, then the company shall be free. But the English Act does place the onus of proof distinctly upon the employer, and he can only get himself out of the responsibility by proving that the employee was the cause of his own injury. I have several times this session urged my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to look into this English Act and to make himself familiar with it, but we have had so many other railway matters that were very engrossing, that I cannot blame him for not having had the time. As the hon. Minister requests further time to consider it, I will agree, if he asks, to postpone it until this night week. On that occasion, I give notice now that I will take the sense of the committee on this measure, and, if necessary, take a vote of the House with the names taken down. What I urge is that before the hon. Minister raises any more objections to the constitutionality of this clause, he would secure some decision which shows that we are ultra vires in this legislation or some thoroughly competent opinion as to the effect of the law. Might I ask the hon. Minister if he will be ready to bring the matter to a close when the House next goes into committee on the Bill?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I trust the hon. member (Mr. Casey) will not impose any serious obligation on me in that direction. I certainly will place no obstacles in the way of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. Minister of Railways is as ready now as he expects to be a week from now, I may as well take the vote on the question now.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am getting a little readier all the time.

Mr. BERGERON. He will be more ready next year.

Mr. BRITTON. If the hon. Minister of Railways is as ready now as he will be at any other time, there are some members of the House who are not yet ready. There are some who were expecting that the report of the Special Committee to whom this Bill and another Bill were referred, would have been distributed by this time.

Mr. BERGERON. It was distributed about three weeks ago.

Mr. BRITTON. I have not seen it.

Mr. CASEY. The report in question was distributed some months ago, before the House met. But if hon. members want to study this question for another week, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BERGERON. Killed again.

Mr. LISTER. Oh, no; it is not killed.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the committee rise, I want to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways for a moment to a matter which, I think, is of very great public importance. It is to some extent connected with the matter now under discussion. I understand—and I make the statement upon very reliable authority—that at the present time employees on the two great systems of railway which we have, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific Railway, are working a number of hours in the day which is almost incredible. If so, this is something deserving of the closest attention, not only on account of the employees themselves, but on account of the very great peril to the public safety which it involves. I was told upon what I believe is good authority that engineers are working such long hours that it is with the very greatest difficulty that they are able to keep awake. I was told that one engineer was actually seen asleep on his engine recently. It is a matter which I think is deserving of the very closest attention, and is, as I have said, perilous to the public safety.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

On the order,

Resuming adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Charlton for the second reading of Bill (No. 3) an Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, so as to make effectual provision for the punishment of Seduction and Abduction.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman has spoken in this debate.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have, Mr. Speaker.

The question being put, Mr. Speaker said: "I think the noes have it."

Mr. CHARLTON. Yeas and nays.

Mr. SPEAKER. There are not five members. I declare the motion lost.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. I declared the motion for the second reading lost.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before you declared it lost, I had risen.

Mr. SPEAKER. No, I declared it lost before I sat down.

Order for second reading negatived.

THE CIVIL SERVICE OF CANADA.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 17) to amend the Act respecting the civil service of Canada. He said: Mr. Speaker, for several sessions I have brought the question of a board of civil service supervisors before this House. My reason for doing so is that, after careful investigation for many years, I have come to the conclusion that we have in this country more civil servants than we require, and that the work in the service is not equally distributed. This is largely due, no doubt, to the fact that Ministers have not time to thoroughly look into the work performed, both in the inside and in the outside service. Any person who takes up the report which sets out the salaries paid at the different ports and outports of this country, both customs and inland revenue, must come to the conclusion that a recasting of the entire service would be a decided advantage. I have given considerable attention to this question for years, and it will be in the recollection of many members of this House that no fewer than three civil service commissions have investigated the condition of our civil service: one, in 1870 or 1871, another some years later, and the last in 1885 or 1886. All these commissions, in their reports, made several recommendations, the adoption of which they considered would be of decided advantage in the handling of the civil service. In some cases changes were made, but nine-tenths of the recommendations contained in the different reports have never been carried out. The last commission recommended the appointment of a civil service board, and on a previous occasion I drew attention to this question, and I now would ask the attention of the House while I present some reasons which are sufficiently important, in my opinion, to require that some change should be made. I have made a list showing the receipts from customs at the various ports and how much it cost to collect these receipts.

It cost $90,847.01 in New Brunswick to collect $968,836.46 or 9 37 per cent.

That is the condition in New Brunswick. Now we come to British Columbia, as follows:—

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Ports.	Folio in Auditor General's Report.	Amount Collected.	Folio in Auditor General's Report.	Salaries Paid and Contingencies.	No. of Hands employed.	Cost per cent.

It cost $66,770.31 in British Columbia to collect $1,561,210.82, or 4.27 p.c.

These figures show, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the entire collection of customs revenue for the whole Dominion, and I contend any one going over the list must come to the conclusion that the cost is considerably more in proportion at some ports than at others. At some ports we are paying double, and in one or two cases four times the amount by way of salaries and contingencies than is collected. It is utterly impossible for the Minister and the deputy in Ottawa to give time and attention to such an extent to the outside service as to be able to remodel and recast the system so as to bring it within proper, frugal limits, so that the people of the country will get fair value for the money paid in salaries and contingencies. What I say in regard to the Department of Customs, I repeat in regard to the other departments. So long as civil servants are entirely dependent on the Minister and Deputy Minister at Ottawa, it will be found impossible to dispense with their services, and those who are inefficient and incompetent, or are not required cannot be got rid of, because influences are brought to bear in favour of those who now hold positions. So soon as it is proposed to remove an official, immediately united action is taken by Conservatives and Reformers, application is made to the Minister and the Deputy Minister for the officer's retention on the ground that his removal would be inflicting a hardship and cruelty, in view of the number of children the officer has and that he is poor, all these are mentioned, and every effort is made to keep the man in his position. His religious views are also used for that purpose. We know this from the short experience we have had on this side of the House. I contend that in order to place the outside service on a proper, efficient and economical basis, it is absolutely necessary that some change should be made, and I know no better way of proceeding than by appointing a civil service board of supervisors. Hon. members who have given some attention to the question may possibly want to know what power could be conferred on such a board. Their power would be this: they would have the right to enter every office in the outside service in Canada, inspect the work performed there, recast and remodel the work of the office, and if there are useless, incompetent or unnecessary men, dispense with their services. In doing so the board would have to give notice within fifteen days of the fact that they had to dispense with an officer's services, stating the reasons. If hon. members will glance over the figures connected with the different ports and make comparisons, they will find great disparity existing, and will see that it is absolutely necessary that something should be done. Take the following figures:—

CUSTOMS BRANCH.

Port.	Amount Collected.	No. of Ports.	No. of Hands.	Salaries and Contingencies.	Percentage of cost for Collection.
	$ cts.			$ cts.
Cobourg.....	6,879 02	4	8	4,029 27	58.6
Port Hope.....	12,970 07	1	2	2,545 76	19.63
Peterborough.....	52,245 40	1	2	1,892 44	3.62
Guelph.....	65,674 21	2	6	3,402 91	5.18
Simcoe.....	86,707 63	4	6	3,219 77	3.71
Stratford.....	47,619 25	5	7	4,836 03	10.57

In Cobourg there are three subports; in Port Hope none. The salaries in Peterborough are $1,800 and the contingencies $92.44, while in Guelph the salaries amounted to $2,583.81 and the contingencies to $819.10, while the amount collected in Guelph over Peterborough would apparently not justify any such difference in the cost.

I contend there is ample room for bringing the entire civil service down to proper proportions, and the only possible way you can do it is by constituting this Board of Civil Service Supervisors. They will carefully go to every port, investigate the work performed by the civil servants there, and be able to report whether the number of officials are absolutely necessary or not. If by doing this they reduce the cost to the country, as I believe they will, it will be a step in the right direction. I have under my hand a compiled statement with regard to the Inland Revenue Department, but I will not detain the House by reading it now. I have taken only the Customs Department as an example, and I frankly admit that, in my opinion, the Customs Department is not worse, and perhaps not quite so bad as some of the others. This Bill provides that this Board of Civil Service Supervisors will inspect closely the work done in every office and report within fifteen days to the head of the department. In my opinion, it will require at least three commissioners, and their appointment will entail some expense, but the benefits they can confer in the interests of the country and the reductions they can make in the civil service will, I believe, far more than compensate for the cost. This Act is permissive, not compulsory. It provides that the Government shall have the right, if they deem prudent, to appoint this Board of Civil Service Supervisors. It will enable the Ministers to get out of the difficulties which now surround them when they try to make reductions in the staff. We have seen in this House that when absolutely unnecessary officials were removed, the Ministers have been persistently and viciously assailed, it being declared that the services of these men were dispensed with for political purposes. The Ministers have been openly and determinedly and discourteously assailed for making honest efforts to reduce the public expenditure. If this Bill becomes law, the responsibility will be removed from the Ministers, and we would look to the Civil Service Board for a proper and efficient civil service. Of course, the Government would retain the power to appoint the civil servants, and if this board reported that a man was inefficient, that man would be removed, and on report to the Minister he would appoint another man. The supervisors would afterwards see how the new man was doing his work, and if he was not earning his salary, they could report that he be dismissed. We know that whether Conservatives or Reformers are in office, the services of certain men are pressed upon the consideration of Ministers and they are urged to appoint them. I know men now in the civil service who have tried their hands at a great many undertakings. I know some who have been commission merchants, wholesale merchants, retail merchants, insurance agents, and who at last secured enough influence to get a place in the service. These men in all the callings they adopted previously had never been able to succeed at any of them, but strange to say, when they get into the service, they seem to merit high salaries. I hold that a man with ten or fifteen years' record in the struggles of life, who has become a burden on his relatives, and is eventually driven to the necessity of urging upon his political friends to get him into office, that man is in a great many cases not fit for his position, and very often he renders but little return for the money he draws.

The people of this country should not be called upon to keep a lot of inefficient men in the service. We build poor-houses in this country, and if these men are too indolent to earn an honest living or to make their lives a success, they have no right to be put in the civil service and to be kept there at the country's expense; and the sooner the Government get rid of these men the better, and that cannot be done without a board of supervisors. Then, considerable expense will be saved by getting rid of some of the inspectors. There are inspectors in every department. I do not know that you could part with them all, but you could dispense with some of them, and in this way you would make up for the money that the country would have to expend in paying the salaries of the supervisors. I know myself that there are some men working in the service to-day for very much less than they ought to get. I believe there are men in the service working for a mere scanty pittance, which is hardly enough to live on; and I would be glad to see these men, if they are doing valuable work, getting a fair return for their work. But, on the other hand, there are a great many men in the service, I have reason to believe, who are not paying the country ten cents in work for every dollar they draw. I believe there should be a readjustment of the service by a board such as I propose, and I am quite willing that the Government should take the matter into their consideration. As I said before, the Bill is not compulsory; it is only permissive; it gives the Government the power to do it or not, as they please. That is a question they can decide for themselves. I could not introduce the measure in any other way. If put in another shape, it would have to originate with the Cabinet. It is a measure which the Government can take advantage of if they think it would improve the service, but if they think it would not, they may decline to take advantage of it, and it may remain on the Statute-book a dead letter. With these remarks, I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of attention to the argument which has been adduced by my hon. friend in favour of the measure which he has placed before the House. As usual, he has given to the subject a great deal of minute attention and careful research. I am not prepared, however, to say, that at this moment I would be disposed, for my part, to accept the Bill as it is framed. Though it is a permissive Bill, if it were adopted by the House, the House would expect the Government to act upon it. My hon. friend has given us a good many grave considerations; but I have not noticed that he has brought to our attention any precedent in favour of such a measure. If there are any precedents in parliamentary countries for a measure of this kind, for my part I am not aware of it. I do not say that in the way of disparagement of this Bill. It may be effective in many ways; but my hon. friend will agree with me that in a House so thin as this House is at present, it might perhaps be advisable not to carry this discussion any further, but to postpone it to another day, when we may expect to have the benefit of the views of some of the leading members of the House on both sides. I do not say that the Government will not be prepared to give its consideration to this measure at a future day; but I would simply advise my hon. friend not to press his measure to a second reading to-night, but to allow the House to have the benefit of digesting for some days the views he has given the House, before they come to a conclusion on the measure. Therefore I move that the debate be now adjourned.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Just a word or two, Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has brought an important subject before the House, a subject to which he has given a good deal of attention, and in illustration of his views, he has mentioned the Department of Customs over which I have the honour for the time being to preside. The table he has given is one that will be scanned with a good deal of interest. I was not able to follow all his figures. I thought as he proceeded that in some of them he was hardly correct, though, in the main, I dare say he was correct. My only object in rising now is to point out to the House, when considering these figures, as they will not doubt do, that in the various departments, especially in the Department of Customs—and I presume the remark will also apply to the Department of Inland Revenue, though, perhaps, not to so great an extent—you cannot be guided by percentages. For instance, in the maritime provinces, where there are small receipts comparatively, compared with the number of men employed, there is an absolute necessity, if you guard the revenue, of having officers at the different stations where they are at present. I am not contending that all the economy that may be found practicable has been exercised; but I think my predecessors as well as myself have found by actual experience that if you guard the revenue, the expenses at some of the ports must necessarily be very large in proportion to the income derived from them. I may mention to my hon. friend and to the members of the House generally, what is well known to those who preceded me in the office, that there are places where we have officers employed who collect no revenue at all; yet, they are absolutely necessary if we are to guard the revenue. Of course, if the hon. gentleman were prepared to say that all those officers in which the percentage of cost of collection is so very large should be abolished, you would effect a saving in that direction; but the question is whether your revenue would be benefited thereby. Then, there are ports which can hardly be compared with each other without a full knowledge of their circumstances and conditions. Take the two ports which my hon. friend said were inland ports in Ontario—Simcoe and Stratford—the cost of collection at the former being about five per cent and at the latter about ten per cent. I may say that there is one officer at Simcoe; but Port Dover is an outport of Simcoe, and to this outport the Grand Trunk Railway brings very large cargoes of coal, and a very large revenue is collected there, with scarcely any entries or clerical work; yet these swell the receipts of Simcoe, while the receipts of Simcoe itself would be small. I just give this as an illustration of the fact that you cannot be guided wholly by comparisons of cost for collecting in the different ports. I do not wish to minimize the value of the criticisms of my hon. friend in the least, but I think it is well, as his speech will go out to the country, that I should just point out one or two matters of that kind, in order that we might have some explanation of what, on the face of it, would seem almost inexplicable to one not conversant with the subject. My hon. friend does not recognize the work that would devolve on his board of civil service supervisors. That board is to be composed of three men, capable of course, and no doubt in the receipt of good salaries. One of the duties he would impose upon them is the inspection of the books in all the different ports. I venture to say that even if they divided the work and each member of that board went on a tour of inspection separately, the work would be considerably more than they could perform, even limiting their inspection to the books of the Customs Department alone. My hon. friend does not realize the amount of work to be done. When I came into office and took charge of it, I found that my predecessor, no doubt actuated by a desire for economy, had not appointed sufficient inspectors, and the consequence was that some ports had not been inspected for years. When they were inspected, irregularities were discovered, and many of them to such an extent that I felt it incumbent on me, in the public interest, much as I disliked to increase the staff, to appoint more inspectors. I have named in Ontario two inspectors, termed assistants, in addition to what we had before. These gentlemen are engaged all the time in the work assigned to them. In the province of Quebec, I thought it desirable also, where we had one inspector, to appoint an assistant, a gentleman long in the department, who is promoted, as was one of the gentlemen I appointed in Ontario. I do not believe that it would be possible for a board of three inspectors to make a thorough supervision of the customs ports of this Dominion alone, leaving aside the Inland Revenue and the Post Office Department and all the others. When one has charge of a department, he feels the responsibility of it and gets to know its working and requirements, and his views with reference to the duties devolving upon the different officers become enlarged. He sees what he did not see before he had intimate knowledge of it. I am sure my hon. friend will not construe my remarks, as showing a desire to find the slightest fault with the criticisms he has made. He has given much labour and attention to the subject, and his motives are the best, and he will not misinterpret my remarks when I point out to him these facts.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt whatever that the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) aims at doing good work, when attempting to provide some other machinery for controlling the civil service, but a cursory examination of this proposed law will convince almost any one that it is so crude and so brief as to be practically worthless. There are only three things proposed in it. First, the appointment of a board of supervisors. Second, the duty of that board to inspect the books of the various departments. And third, its power to suspend and dismiss employees. I need not repeat what the hon. Minister of Customs has said, but I may add, there are about 1,300 employees in the inside service and perhaps as many more in the outside, and one sees at a glance how utterly impossible it would be for any board to go around once a year and inspect the books in all these departments. It would take three boards to do it with any intelligence or satisfaction. Then what insight would this board have by each inquiry into the conduct of the civil service by inspection of the books? There are many duties which these civil servants are required to perform which could not be determined from an inspection of the books. If the board went no further than the inspection of the books, it would know very little about the work of the civil service. The hon. member seemed to give his attention particularly to the outside service of the Customs Department, and proceeded to show that there was a great difference in the cost of collections in the different ports. To any one who knows anything about the duties of a collector of customs, it must be apparent at a glance that there would be great diversity, and that if we were to collect, on a basis of percentage, the collections would not be done as well as they are to-day. Take a small port, the collector is obliged to keep his office open all through the summer and winter as well. Though there is not much brought in there, vessels come in every day or two and have to be attended to. The collections there are very small, but the collector has to keep an office, and supply wood and light and pay rent and spend his whole time looking after the business. If he were paid by a percentage, the percentage which would be required to pay for his time would have to be very large indeed, much larger than it would be, on an average, all over the country. The hon. member's criticisms were directed to the Customs Department alone and the outside service in that department, and he does not seem to have dealt with the inside service at all. What standard does he provide for testing the efficiency or ability of these men in the service? He has laid down no rule. There is no examination. I presume, he contemplates, in the event of this board of supervisors being appointed, that no doubt the civil service examination will be taken as a standard. But after that examination is done, there must be promotions from time to time, and what test does this board require to decide what promotions should be made. It would be utterly impossible to expect this board to acquire any information which would enable them to determine the wisdom or otherwise of promotion in the service or of appointments to it. Then, again, I thought that one of the virtues of this board would be that it would take the civil service out of politics, making it independent of political parties. But it does not do anything of the kind, for it is as much under the control of the politician as ever, because the appointments are to be made, as heretofore, by the heads of the departments, that is to say, through political influence. As long as that continues, I do not care what supervision you have of the civil service, it will be found very imperfect, and very unlikely to accomplish what the hon. gentleman aims at accomplishing by this Bill. And, as I said before, if it is intended to apply both to the inside and outside service, I think the Bill, if passed in its present shape, and with the few provisions it possesses, would be practically useless. To make it of any value, you would have to go a great deal further than this Bill proposes to go.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Mc-Mullen) has begun to feel that this is a very cold and heartless world, that the sympathy of the human race, and of his colleagues particularly, is vanishing. I remember some years ago, when the hon. member for North Wellington spoke in the strain he spoke in to-night, his remarks were received with the most enthusiastic applause by the gentlemen who surrounded him. But to-night, as he read these interesting figures and recited these important facts and made his comments upon them, dead silence greeted him from every part of that side of the House. And then, Sir, as if to add to his misery, and to make clearer the base ingratitude of his leaders, the leader of the Government gets up and moves that the debate be adjourned before it had commenced. There was no debate, the hon. member had made his remarks upon the motion and that was all. And the Prime Minister immediately moves the adjournment of the debate, so that we may consider the interesting facts that the hon. member for North Wellington has presented. I know that the Prime Minister is a very busy man, and so are all the Ministers during the session. If they have not given attention to the subject the hon. member for North Wellington has brought up, it is impossible for them to do so now, with all the business of the session heaping up, as it were. I am sure that, notwithstanding their disposition to give careful and close study to the facts presented by the hon. member, they will all be dismissed from the minds not only of the Prime Minister himself, but of his colleagues in the Government. I say it was a cruel and heartless act of the Prime Minister to propose the adjournment of the debate. It was something that the hon. member for North Wellington, I am sure, had not expected. No doubt, he thought that this subject, which has engrossed his attention both when he was on this side and since he has taken his seat on the ministerial benches, would have received the careful and immediate attention of the leaders and members of the Government.

Now, there is another feature of it, it looked to me just like this: The hon. member for North Wellington is informing this House that the present Government, having been nearly two years in power, have not been doing their duty, that if the hon. member for North Wellington had been on the Treasury benches, if he had been Minister of Customs or had occupied one of these other positions that he has criticised, there would not have been these incongruities and discrepancies that appear by the statement he has made to-night, and that one of the losses to the country and to the Government is the fact that the hon. member for North Wellington has not been entrusted with one of those portfolios. He tells us, Mr. Speaker, about these percentages. And the Minister of Customs tells us that we must not give attention to them, because, he said, percentages in customs matters are very misleading. That is what we thought the other night when we heard the Minister of Customs making some remarks on percentages. But, though he finds fault with the course of the hon. member for North Wellington, he formerly, yes, no later than last year, brought up the same argument himself to show that the Customs Department in the past had not been conducted with the close economy that should characterize that department. And he quoted certain ports, which I can recall from memory, just as the hon. member for North Wellington quoted certain ports, to prove his contention. Again the Minister of Customs tells us that if this Bill were carried, this board of supervisors would not be able to do nearly the work of going over the Department of Customs alone, not to speak of the other departments of the Government. For, he tells us, there are numerous inspectors, and he has largely increased the number, and the officers are not able to overtake the work, or, at all events, they are all required. But, if he had read the Bill, knowing the duties of the inspectors, he would have seen that the duties of these supervisors are not the duties of the inspectors, and that these duties would not conflict, but would be quite independent. As I understand from the Bill and the explanation of the hon. member for North Wellington, this Bill is not for the auditing of accounts of collectors of different ports, which is the principal duty of the inspectors, but the duty of those supervisors would be to make a general inspection, for the purpose of finding out what are the necessities of the public service in every town in the customs, post office, inland revenue and other departments. I think that the idea of the hon. member for North Wellington is a good one. Whether his Bill would carry out the provision that I see ought to be carried out, I cannot say; but a Bill in the direction I have indicated would be very desirable. The hon. member for North Wellington should present it to the House, and the House should give it its serious consideration, for this matter is not a new one in this regard, and with the hon. member's suggestion before us we can make a Bill out of it with what ever amendment may be found necessary, which, I am sure, the hon. member for North Wellington would be willing to have made to improve its efficiency.

The principle upon which the Bill starts out, I think, is a very good one. As has been pointed out in this House and in committee the other day, but to which I will not refer, a Minister is a very busy man in his department, particularly the head of the Customs Department, and before a Minister can economically administer the affairs of his department throughout this broad Dominion, he will require assistance. Now, in the Post Office Department I presume the business is largely regulated by the population of the place. In the customs there are so many other considerations, there are so many other things to be considered, that the expense may or may not bear a ratio to the population of the place or to the general business of the place; so that the same rule that would apply in one would not apply in the other. In this case I think the hon. member for North Wellington has struck a good idea. I think it is the duty of Parliament to give it prompt and careful consideration so as to assist the Government by some such method in regulating the expenses of the Government, in economizing where economy is necessary, and in recommending increased expenditure where such would promote the efficiency of the public service.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to say only a few words in reply. I think the definition of the Bill given by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Wallace) is the correct one, so far as I intended. A civil service commission that sat in the year 1885 made a very exhaustive investigation into the civil service system of this country, and they reported recommending a board of civil service inspectors. Of course, the recommendation they made did not go the length that my Bill would propose to go; they simply proposed that a civil service board of inspectors, with a chief executive as chairman, and deputy heads as members of that board, should make a kind of inspection of the civil service and report to the different heads the changes that they thought should be made in the interests of economy and of the efficiency of the civil service. They did not go the length of recommending that the board should have the power to remove those that were considered inefficient or those whose services were not necessary. In consulting with some of the most experienced civil servants in the city of Ottawa, men that have served for twenty-five years in this city, I can honestly say that I had their ideas with regard to this Bill before I introduced it last year, and their opinion was that the appointment of a board of inspectors without the power to remove unnecessary or incompetent servants would not accomplish what would be accomplished if you appointed a civil service board of supervisors, giving them the power I propose in this Bill, because, they said, they would only recommend to the department the changes which should be made. As soon as they did that, the servant to be removed in all probability would get to know that the board had made the inspection and had reported that his services should be dispensed with at the end of the month. Immediately a united effort would be made, petitions would be got up, representations to the head and to the deputy head would be made, setting forth that he was perhaps the son of a widow or that many relatives were depending upon him for existence and that it would be the worst kind of inhumanity to turn him out of office into the street. They said that unless these men were clothed with power to make the changes that they felt to be necessary, they did not think it would be any use to appoint a civil service board of inspection. Therefore, in preparing this Bill and bringing it forward in its present shape, my only object is to secure a better and more efficient civil service than we have got. As I said before, I believe the records clearly show that we have more servants than are absolutely necessary. Now, with regard to the remarks of the Minister of Customs as to the percentages. I quite admit that in some places it might be necessary to retain men that were not perhaps in receipt of very large amounts in the way of customs, but I think that where the offices have got to the point that it takes over 50 per cent, in some places more than 100 per cent of the entire receipts to pay those men, it would be better to dispense with the services of a collector of customs and appoint some men to act as preventive officers, men that would look after the interests of the country and see that smuggling was prevented, if there are places where smuggling might possibly take place. Then again, we know that the trade of this country is changing considerably; we know very well that we are not taking the amount of dutiable goods in some lines from the United States that we did a year ago. We know that there are ports in this country where there were very numerous entries made, and these have dwindled down considerably. Now, has the staff been reduced in those ports? I contend that the staff is kept there at just the same number, with the same salaries as before. I contend that there should be a recast of the service, even from that standpoint, and in view of the anticipated increase of imports from Great Britain as compared with those from the United States under the preferential clause in the new tariff, as I believe and hope that an increased proportion of our goods will come from the mother country. Well, if that be the case, the receipts at our ports along the American border will be still further reduced. The hon. gentleman may say that it is necessary to prevent waste along that border. No doubt it is; I admit that willingly. But I contend that in place of establishing outports and custom-houses where men sit and virtually do nothing, we should establish a board of preventive officers, which could be conducted for very much less with fewer numbers. Now, with regard to postponing further consideration of this question, I have no desire at all to press the Bill upon the House with unreasonable haste. I am desirous that it should get the consideration of the House and that the Government should take notice of it. It is not because I wish in any way to force its consideration that I moved the second reading, but simply because I believe that improvements can be made, and that is my sole motive in bringing the Bill before the House. I am quite willing that every opportunity should be given to the Government to give it their serious consideration. I dare say the leader of the Government has been overburdened with the enormous amount of work that he has had to do, and if he cannot devote the time that is necessary to consider this Bill during the present session, I earnestly hope that during the recess the Government will consider it and bring in an amendment to our Civil Service Act. I believe it requires amendments, and I am satisfied that in its crude and unacceptable state at the present moment, it can be very much improved by amendments. I could suggest amendments myself, and I hope that some amendments will be made, amongst others that we should adopt the principle that I have outlined in this Bill. My object is to serve the best interests of my country, my object is to serve the constituency that I represent to the best of my ability, and I do it conscientiously. I have given a good deal of consideration to the whole question of civil service expenditure, while I sat on the other side of the House. It was my privilege for twelve or fifteen years to investigate this expenditure, and I have come to the conscientious conviction that in the hands of no Government, whether Conservative or Reform, will the civil service of this country ever be brought to a satisfactory basis in the matter of expenditure, unless some system of this kind is adopted. That is my view, and believing that, I have asked the consideration of the House to this Bill. I am quite willing that the Government should have all reasonable time in coming to a conclusion on the whole question.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you not think it would have been more likely to be carried if it had provided to take the service out of political control?

Motion to adjourn debate, agreed to.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS.

Mr. DAVIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 15) further to amend the Mounted Police Pensions Act, 1889. He said: This Bill I put on the paper the first day of the session, and the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), a few days afterwards put a notice on the paper of a similar Bill, and when my Bill was called, being busy with other matters, I did not move for leave to introduce it, and so my hon. friend got precedence. I need hardly say that, provided the end is gained, I do not care who passes the Bill, and the only reason I move the second reading now is not only to carry out my own intention but the intention of the hon. member for Saskatchewan and the intention of the hon. Prime Minister, who in the absence of the hon. member for Saskatchewan, I think—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the House or not—took charge of the Bill and pushed it through. We have, therefore, adopted a principle. Not only has the Bill passed the second reading, gone through committee and passed its third reading, but if I am right it has gone to the Senate and been passed. This is the Bill that has been passed:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889, is hereby amended by striking out the words "twenty-five" wherever they occur in sections three, seven and eight thereof, and inserting instead the words "twenty."

In drafting that Bill, if one thing more had been done it would have in great part fulfilled the object I had in view in placing my Bill on the paper, that is to say if it had been moved to repeal section 4 and substitute a section carrying out an amendment that had been made in sections 3, 7 and 8. But I need hardly inform the right hon. leader of the House that the Bill as passed is not worth the paper on which it is written. There should have been, in order to carry out the object—and my Bill was on the paper and of course was perfectly at the service of the hon. member for Saskatchewan—the insertion of the second clause. My main object is to carry out the aim of the Prime Minister and the member for Saskatchewan. In my Bill the first section provides:

1. Section three of The Mounted Police Pension Act, 1898, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"3 Subject to the provisions of this Act, every constable who became a member of the force on or after the twenty-third day of May, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, or who becomes a member of the force after the passing of this Act,—

"(a) If he has completed not less than twenty years' service, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life; and—

"(b) If he has completed not less than ten years' service, and is incapacitated for the performance of his duty by infirmity of mind or body, shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension.

Section 2 provides as follows:—

2. Section four of the said Act is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"4. The pension to a constable on retirement shall be according to the following scale, that is to say:—

"(a) If he has completed ten but less than sixteen years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service;

"(b) If he has completed sixteen but less than twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of service above sixteen years;

"(c) If he has completed twenty years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years, so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement."

Let me point out to the leader of the House the present position of the law. You have sections 3, 7 and 8 changed from 25 to 20 years, and yet section 4 reads as follows:—

The pension to a constable on retirement shall be according to the following scale, that is to say.

(a) If he has completed fifteen but less than twenty-one years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service;

(b) If he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of two-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty years; if he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay with an addition of one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service above twenty-five years, so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement.

So here you have clauses—sections 3, 7 and 8 amended, and still you have clause 4, which is the operative clause, providing for the old term of service. The Bill which was passed with the best intentions, is therefore not worth the paper on which it is written. I know the member for Saskatchewan has no desire other than that we should be able to get pensions for these men that we believe entitled to them, and I am sure the right hon. Prime Minister would not, when they ask from him bread, give them in the most formal manner a stone.

Mr. FLINT. Before the debate proceeds I should like to raise what I consider a rather important question of order, as to whether this Bill can be properly moved or not. It appears on the surface at any rate to contravene one of the rules of the House. I do not know whether my hon. friend has considered the matter in that light or not, but it might be important not only in regard to this Bill but possibly in regard to other Bills. The well known clause of the British North America Act says:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or Bill is proposed.

The effect of this Bill is to impose increased liability upon the treasury of the country, and, if passed, one of the first duties of Parliament would be to provide funds for the increase that must necessarily arise from the putting into effect of this law. That is a matter of considerable importance, which ought to be decided before we proceed to the consideration of the merits of the question itself. The Northwest Mounted Police Act, of 1889, provides certain pensions for the police under certain circumstances. The first clause of the amending proposal of the hon. member for Assiniboia reduces the number of years necessary for obtaining this pension from 25 years. Consequently all those who are in a position to obtain the pension after 25 years' service would have the right to obtain it after 20 years' service, and with a force of 700 or 800 men that would impose a large additional cost to the country.

Mr. DAVIN. That clause has been passed already by the other Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. But you say it is not worth the paper on which it is written.

Mr. FLINT. The first three clauses of the Bill reduce the years by five, necessary to entitle him to a pension, and the next three clauses of the Bill reduce the number of years for each of these classes by six years. There can be no doubt that the passage of this will immediately affect the treasury of the country, because provision must immediately be made for carrying it out. Therefore, I contend that under the customary interpretation of the rule of Parliament under the British North America Act, the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) would be out of order. I raise the point, Mr. Speaker, in order that it may be settled here.

Mr. SPEAKER (Mr. Brodeur). The point of order raised by the hon. member (Mr. Flint) is very important, and before being decided, I think it should be well considered. I have not had occasion to consider the Bill before this, and so I would suggest to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he should allow the order to stand so that Mr. Speaker may consider his decision upon the Bill.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I am very thankful for the kind manner in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has referred to me. He paid me the compliment of telling me that I had taken the wind out of his sails, or in other words, that I had got my Bill in ahead of him. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) must remember that I had a somewhat similar Bill before the House last session, and as I was unable to get it through then, I took the first opportunity on my arriving in Ottawa this session to introduce this Bill. I did not do it with an intention of interfering with the hon. member (Mr. Davin).

Mr. DAVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) says that the Bill I have had passed through the House is useless, but I can tell him that if he had considered that Bill carefully he would have come to an entirely contrary opinion. At all events, the Bill fulfils the want that I desired it should. It does not in any manner interfere with the scale of pensions under the North-west Mounted Police Pension Act, but it does confer a very great boon on the men of the force and one to which they are justly entitled. Under the Pension Act a constable or non-commissioned officer would have to serve twenty-five years to entitle him to draw a pension for life, and my Bill reduces the time of service from twenty-five to twenty years. At the present time, therefore, a constable or non-commissioned officer when he has served twenty years can retire and receive a pension for life. There is a provision in the present Pension Act whereby a constable, if he has served fifteen years in the force and becomes incapacitated may be retired on pension, but the moment the medical officer in charge considers that he is sufficiently recovered to return to his duties, he is compelled to return and to serve the unexpired term of twenty-five years. The Bill which I had passed through the House merely reduces the term from twenty-five to twenty years, and it does not interfere with the money question one way or the other. It was not necessary to introduce a long Bill like that introduced by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin); the mere changing of the words "twenty-five years" to "twenty years" accomplished the end in view. The Bill of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is merely a rehash of the North-west Mounted Police Pension Act; it is almost word for word with that Act, with the exception that in section 4, subsection "a," he says:

If he has completed ten but less than sixteen years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has reduced the scale from fifteen years to ten years, and in doing so his Bill doubtless comes under the point of order raised by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint).

Mr. DAVIN. I understand from what my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) has just stated, that he is opposed to enabling members of the North-west Mounted Police force who have completed ten, but less than sixteen years' service—because it is on that he is supporting the point of order against me—he is opposed to these gentlemen getting a pension.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I am not opposed to that, but I did not wish to undertake to do something which I know I could not do. I am a new member of this House, and I am not supposed to know as much of these matters as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but I am under the impression that when the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill he must have known it was out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. If the Bill I have before the House is out of order, so was the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Davis), and that was no doubt the reason why the Prime Minister took charge of it in the kindly way he did, and I was glad to see him do it. Now, as the Prime Minister did take charge of that Bill and gave it his sanction, he must have meant it to do something for the mounted police. However, I will show my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) that he is quite mistaken in supposing that this Bill of his accomplishes anything, or if it is to be construed as worth anything, then it does something that those who will be affected will certainly not welcome. Here is the position: Under his Bill wherever the words "twenty-five years" occur, "twenty years" are read in, and the third clause of the Act of 1889 says:

If he has completed not less than twenty-five years' service he shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life.

Or according to the amended Act:

If he has completed not less than twenty years' service he shall be entitled to retire and receive a pension for life.

Then, when you come to section 7, it would read:

When any constable who became a member of the force on or after the 23rd day of May, 1873, or who becomes a member of the force after the passing of this Act, has completed a service of twenty years, the commissioner may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, require him to retire upon the terms as to pensions prescribed in this Act.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I find it twenty-five years in this Act.

Mr. DAVIN. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) forgets that he has amended it.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). You are reading it as amended?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. I want to show how the Act of 1889 is amended by the hon. gentleman's own Act. Section 8 says:

Before a pension is granted to a constable, who, after having served for less than twenty-five years, retires on the ground of his being incapacitated by infirmity of mind or body for the discharge of his duty, a medical board composed of the senior surgeon of the force and two other legally qualified medical practitioners shall certify that such constable is so incapacitated, and that the incapacity is likely to be permanent,—

And so on. The only clause in section 4 that can be read with that is this:

The pension to a constable on retirement shall be according to the following scale, that is to say:—

(a) If he has completed fifteen but less than twenty-one years' service, an annual sum equal to one-fiftieth of his annual pay for every completed year of service.

So that, whereas under the old Act, if he has completed twenty-five years service, he gets a pension equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay, now he can only come under "a" and get one-fiftieth of his annual pay. I do not think those constables who will be affected by the amendment made by my hon. friend will thank him for giving them only one-fiftieth, whereas they should have got thirty-fiftieths. I do not care to pin on primal grounds or from the purview of personal credit whether the Government take the matter up or not; I do not care a pin, so far as any honour or glory is concerned. I am only interested in the police. I am only interested that this Act which was passed shall not be a mere mockery to them. And if my argument is a sound one, I think my right hon. friend is bound to amend the Act, so that it will be consistent and will accomplish the purpose which I have no doubt he had in view. As I have shown, it cannot possibly in its present form do any good; in fact, it can only do harm at present. As to the point of order, I think it is worth considering whether a private member can introduce and carry through the House a Bill like this; but when one Bill has already been passed by the House, and has also received the constructive sanction of the Government, with the direct and spoken approval of the Prime Minister himself, I think the Government and the Prime Minister are bound to see that the other amendment does not fall through.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has brought forward this Bill upon considerations which have not been at all anticipated, and, therefore, I must say to him candidly that I am not prepared at this moment to deal with it. The point of order which has been taken may or may not be well taken. At first blush it seems to me to be well taken; and I must say, to my regret, that my conclusion is that if the point is well taken with regard to this Bill, it would have been just as well taken with regard to the Bill of my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis); but the point had escaped my attention at the moment. But, as the Speaker has suggested that the matter be deferred for investigation, I will move the adjournment of the debate, with the view of having the point of order investigated, and with the view, moreover, of having the views advanced by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) referred to the officers of my department for a report, for I am not prepared to deal with them at this moment.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return of all papers, receipts and documents in possession of the Government relating in any way to a claim presented to the Government by Hugh Richardson, Esq., the justice of the Supreme Court, North-west Territories, for losses sustained at Battleford during the North-west rebellion of 1885.—(Mr. Davis, Saskatchewan.)

Return giving: (a.) The names and offices or employment of all persons employed temporarily or permanently in the various departments in and about the Parliamentary and all Governmental buildings at the city of Ottawa, relieved from duty by the Government, by dismissal or otherwise, from the 17th day of October, 1878, to the 1st day of November, 1879; (b.) The cause of dismissal, if any; (c.) The names of all new employees appointed, whether permanently or temporarily, between the same dates.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

1. Copies of all tenders in 1897 for the supply of drugs to the North-west Mounted Police at Prince Albert and Battleford, and the name of the successful tenderer, and a copy of the contract.

2. Copies of all tenders for the supply of drugs to the Mounted Police at Prince Albert and Battleford, for the year 1898; the name of the successful tenderer, and a copy of the contract.—(Mr. Davin.)

Return showing: 1. The names of all persons who, having been in the employ of the Government in the North-west Territories, have ceased to be in that employ since June, 1896.

2. The date at which their services were dispensed with, and the reasons for their dismissals in each case.—(Mr. Davin.)

Copies of all complaints or charges made against Mr. J. T. Dagneau, postmaster of Robitaille, in the county of Bonaventure, Quebec; also, papers concerning the investigation into the charges and his dismissal from his office, including the report of the commissioner, Mr. Bolduc; also, any communications protesting against the manner in which the investigation was conducted.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Copies of all correspondence, papers, telegrams, &c., in possession of the Government, or any member or official of the Government, in reference to closing the post office at St. Mary's Road East, in Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Martin.)

Copies of all reports, papers and correspondence relating to the removal of postal mail clerks from their former places of residence in the province of Nova Scotia in 1897 and 1898.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the second report of the committee appointed to super-wise the official report of the debates be now concurred in. He said: In presenting this motion, I merely wish to call special attention to a recommendation contained in the report. Last session, Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of waiting on you, as a member of the sub-committee on debates, composed, I think, of Messrs. LaRivière and Somerville, and of pointing out the inadequacy of the accommodation furnished the "Hansard" reporters. I think that you, yourself, Mr. Speaker, went to see the place where they have to work, and agreed with us that they ought to have better quarters, and my impression is that at the time you promised to do your very best to obtain for them better accommodation, so that they might be in a better position to do their duties than they are at present. I do not know the reason why, but nothing was done, and we had a special meeting of the committee this session in order to press the matter once more upon you, Mr. Speaker, and the House. We recognize the inadequacy of the present accommodation. The whole staff, English and French, are in one small room, and consequently their work is done under extremely unsanitary and unsatisfactory conditions. This, of course, tends to interfere considerably with the accuracy of the work done. I beg, therefore, to call your special attention, Mr. Speaker, once more to this matter and to this report which deals with it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. While I had the honour of being chairman of the Debates Committee in the past, this question came before us, and we did the best we could to secure better quarters for our official reporters. There are twenty-one men working in that room, set apart for them, which is a very small room indeed. It would be very small for half that number, and it is certainly extraordinary that, packed together as they are, they can give the correct reports they do. I had occasion to speak to your predecessor, Sir, with regard to this matter, and it was then proposed to give them the room above the present one, but that, I understand, has been since secured for other purposes. I hope, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that other quarters will be provided for our reporters, so that they may be in a better position to do their work and perhaps do it still better to the satisfaction of the House. Because if, on certain occasions, we have to regret mistakes or inaccuracies, we cannot charge our reporters with being mainly at fault, for it is an impossibility for them to do their work properly in the quarters we have provided for them. I hope, with the authority you have, Mr. Speaker, you will see that better quarters are provided for these officials.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of the Civil Service Examiners for the year ended 31st December, 1897.—(The Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier.)

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works when we may expect a return in regard to the Edmonton Bridge.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It was sent to the Department of State, and may be here in a minute or two. It was sent yesterday, I may explain.

QU'APPELLE, LONG LAKE AND SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I have something of great importance to the constituency I represent to bring before the House. To place myself in order I intend to conclude with a motion to adjourn the House. The subject I refer to is the manner in which the Prince Albert and Saskatchewan Railway Company are operating the road running between Regina and the town of Prince Albert, in the constituency I represent. I may say that within the last two months we have had only about three trains from Regina into the town of Prince Albert, and people are beginning to think that it is a rather serious matter if we cannot get more than that. Let me read one clause of the agreement between this company and the Government:

That the company hereby bind and oblige themselves to complete the said railway to a point on the Saskatchewan River near Saskatoon by the first day of November, 1890, and to Prince Albert within two years after the completion of the railway to South Saskatchewan, as aforesaid, and carry by their regular trains for the Government for a period of twenty years, all mails, men, supplies and materials of every description and kind required for the public service from any point on the said projected railway to any other point thereon without delay, such carriage to be upon such requisition or instruction from the Government or from any officer thereof as shall hereafter from time to time be designated by the Government.

Now, under that contract they are supposed to run regular trains at least twice a week, and, for that, they receive $80,000 a year. I applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway on this subject and the vice-president told me they are operating the road, but they are getting nothing out of it but the actual railway expenses, and were not responsible. Now, about ten days ago a portion of the bridge at Saskatoon was washed away. They tell me by telegram that the Canadian Pacific Railway people say that it will take two or three weeks, perhaps a month, to repair that bridge.

I ask if there is any other portion of the Dominion where such a thing would be tolerated? If it were on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway or on any road here in the east, the line would be open in forty-eight hours. I wish to read a telegram I have received from a prominent citizen of Prince Albert. It is dated 22nd April, 1898, and is as follows:—

Last report Saskatoon says train with workmen to repair bridge arrived Saskatoon, but workmen can do nothing until arrival of material, these to be brought from British Columbia. Now I ask for what company gets so much land for? I think to keep railroad in running order. It is proved bridge was rotten for years. No repairs made. If bridge kept in good state each year ice could not take it off. All people for the Klondike go over Edmonton and Vancouver routes.

(Sgd.) WITTEMAN.

Now, I have another telegram signed by the mayor and the president of the board of trade on behalf of that body. It is as follows:—

Railway company positively refuses to deliver freight and passengers to Prince Albert for six or eight weeks.

That is, they refuse for two months to deliver any passengers or freight.

Such delay altogether unnecessary. Would any other part of Dominion stand similar treatment? On main line traffic would be running within forty-eight hours. Immediate action will alone save money already expended in advertising district. Government urged to intervene and compel company to carry through all passengers and freight offering. Government must come to relief of people. Wire answer.

(Sgd.) D. C. McLENNAN,
Pres., Board of Trade.

(Sgd.) F. C. BAKER,
Mayor.

Now, as I said, I applied to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they claimed that they were not responsible. But some one is responsible, and I should like to know who it is. This company receives 6,200 acres of land a mile for the construction of this road between Regina and Prince Albert. They also receive $80,000 for operating the road. And besides all this, they were given about the half the town site of Prince Albert for coming into the town, and this they insisted upon before they would come in. When we apply to them, they send us to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and when we apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway they send us to this company. I think it is time something was done to find out who is responsible. Now this company got 6,280 acres a mile for constructing this road. The road is 252 miles long, it cost about two millions and a half to build it, and it is bonded for $3,800,000. We find, therefore, after figuring the thing up, that after paying for the construction of the road, and taking out the amount of the bonds and the cost of the road, $2,539,600, the balance left to the contractors is $1,269,540, which evidently went into the pockets of the contractors. Now, it is very evident that if a man was to build a house costing him $1,000, and if he were to mortgage that house for $2,000, he would not be likely to keep it in repair. That is just the case with this road. They have built this road, and they have mortgaged it for double what it is worth, and now they fail to keep it in repair. I should like to find out whether the Government have not some means in their power by which they can, after giving away all these public lands, compel this company to keep the road in repair. The road is a disgrace, the track is suuk into the mud. They have only got enough section men on it to look after about 50 miles. The stations are going to rack, the bridge is rotten, and has not been repaired since it was built, six or seven years ago. I believe the statement I have made here before about the bonded indebtedness by this road, and the amount it cost, was contradicted by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) in reply to a question I put to him when he was making a speech in this House. He said the road was not bonded for that amount; he also said this matter had been brought up several times and he was now going to contradict it. He said also that Mr. Willison, editor of the Toronto "Globe," had published a pamphlet on the railways of Canada, in which he had mentioned something about the manner in which this company had been formed, and this road had been built. He stated that when he saw Mr. Willison about his statement in this pamphlet, Mr. Willison took it back, and apologized for it. Well, if Mr. Willison took that back and apologized for it, I have failed ever to see the apology in print. I think if Mr. Willison ever made such an apology, he would have published it in the "Globe." But, Mr. Speaker, there was another gentleman who published something in connection with this company, and although it was scattered broadcast over Canada, I do not know that up to this date the hon. member for West Toronto ever did anything to contradict it. The letter I refer to, I now have in my hand, it was written to the "Globe" three years ago by Mr. Hugh Sutherland, of Winnipeg, a gentleman who is connected with the Hudson Bay Railway Company. This letter was written in answer to a letter of the hon. member for West Toronto in the "Globe," about Mr. Sutherland. It appears Mr. Sutherland was trying to float some bonds in connection with the Hudson's Bay Railway, and the member for West Toronto came out with a letter in the "Globe," trying to throw cold water on it. That brought out this letter from Mr. Sutherland which, up to the present time, has never been contradicted. The letter is somewhat long, but still I am going to read it:

In the first place, the company was conceived in deception.

He is speaking now of the Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan and Long Lake Railway—

It professed to be an independent company, whereas in truth it was a mere Canadian Pacific snare to catch the guileless investor. Look at the names of the directors: H. C. Hammond, partner of Mr. Osler, president; E. B. Osler, director of the C.P.R.; Senator McInnis, director of the C.P.R.; R. B. Angus, director of the C.P.R.; J. G. Ogden, comptroller of the C.P.R.; W. Sutherland Taylor, treasurer of the C.P.R.; and Charles Drinkwater, secretary of the C.P.R. This company issued a prospectus through Morton, Rose & Co., of London, on July 18, 1889, asking the public to subscribe for $3,809,140 of its bonds at 6 per cent. The following misleading paragraph appears in the prospectus:—

"On February 1, 1896, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will, on giving six months' notice, have the power of calling in and paying off the above bonds at 110."

The "Canadian Gazette," edited by Mr. Thomas Skinner, a London director of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a supposed authority on Canadian investments, published the prospectus, with the following editorial note (see page 376): "It is taken for granted that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will, at the end of six years, exercise its power to absorb the road, and in that case the payment of the bonds at 110 would, as a matter of course, follow."

Mark you, 6 per cent at par, redeemable by the C. P. R. in six years at 110, took the investing public by storm. The bonds were readily sold, and were soon quoted on the London market at an advanced price. The prospectus also stated that the company had obtained from the Government a cash subsidy of $30,000 a year for twenty years, and a land grant of 1,400,000 acres, to show that, independent of the railway, the company possessed large substantial assets.

It leaked out some time afterwards that the C. P. R. did not intend to redeem the bonds at 110, and therefore "would not exercise its power to absorb the road"; that the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Company had disposed of its land grant to another company, represented by Mr. Osler, under another corporate name; that, in fact, the bondholders had nothing to fall back upon for their investment of $15,000 a mile but the road itself, without rolling stock or terminals; that the actual cost of constructing the road was about $1,500,000 less than the bondholders had advanced upon it, and down went the bonds on the London market from 110 to 30.

The C. P. R.'s Intention.

Does the Canadian Pacific Railway now intend, or did it ever intend, to "exercise its power to absorb the bonds at 110"? It has a lease of the road from this generous Qu'Appelle Railway Company for six years without rental. If it never intended to redeem at 110, it could afford to run the road in such a manner, for that period, that net earnings would be nil. As a matter of fact, the service was so bad and rates so high that in some cases the people of Prince Albert have had to resort to the old-time "ox cart" method of transportation. The settlement of the Prince Albert district has been seriously retarded in consequence, and the present settlers disheartened. The fact is, this roundabout road should never have been built, but instead thereof sufficient aid should have been given the Manitoba North-western Railway to extend its line to Prince Albert. This, however, would not have suited the "stock-jobbing" propensities of Mr. Osler and his associates. No, the idea appears to be to wreck the Qu'Appelle Railway at the end of the six years' lease by ceasing operation, followed, in all probability, by default in payment of interest on the bonds, and the difference between "exercising its power to absorb the road at 110" and what the road might bring under the hammer, which would probably be 10 minus the 100. For fear it may be said that there is no authority for the assumption that it is proposed to cease operation of the road next year, I may say that I am credibly informed that the Government has already received such an intimation, and I believe it is the first case of the kind on record in Canada. In view of the foregoing, is it not refreshing to listen to the virtuous indignation of Mr. Osler, when he says:—"I say without hesitation that I consider the result of the operation of this road for the last five or six years should of itself be a sufficient reason why the Government should make no such grant to the Hudson's Bay Railway Company."

Conception of the Company.

I have said that the company was conceived in deception. I say further, that it was born in sin, and has successfully carried out the object of its being. I ask any business man to read from the company's prospectus the clause I have quoted, accompanied by the editorial note of Mr. Skinner, the financial director of the C. P. R. in London, and say if it is not a deception and a snare to catch the unwary investor. If read in the light of subsequent events there can be no doubt about it. All the directors were ear-marked by the C. P. R. Everything was made to appear that the scheme was part and parcel of the C. P. R., because the credit of the C. P. R. stood high in London at that time.

A correct statement of accounts between Mr. Osler and his associates on the one side, and the Government and the bondholders on the other side, showing net profits on the whole transaction, including "construction account" and other expert methods of book-keeping so well known to these gentlemen, would be interesting to the public, but as this would be impossible at the present time, I will venture an approximate statement, which I think will be found to be fairly within the mark.

I have little doubt but Mr. Osler can manipulate the land account so as to apparently disprove any statement regarding it I may make. Nothing but a rigorous inquiry would reveal the true inwardness of the whole transaction. One thing is certain, however, all land grants, as well as subsidies, are given by Parliament "to aid in the construction of the railway," and, if they are diverted for private speculation, it is a fraud upon the country. But with or without the land grant, I have shown that out of the sale of the bonds alone $1,314,683 or thereabouts has been "knocked down" by somebody, and, if so, it is a fraud upon the British investor. No wonder certain individuals went to the "front rank of provincial capitalists" with a bound. This is not all.

HUGH SUTHERLAND.

Winnipeg, August 10.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that letter was published in the Toronto "Globe," that paper is circulated all over the Dominion of Canada, and it was impossible for that letter to appear without the hon. member for West Toronto having noticed it; and if he took the pains to go to Mr. Willison and get an apology from Mr. Willison, which never appeared in the "Globe," I do not understand why he did not take some action to compel the writer of this letter to take his statement back. Strong statements are made in this letter that, up to the present time, have never been contradicted by the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. CLARKE Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he gave any information to my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Osler) that he intended to bring this matter up in the House this afternoon, so that he might be present and hear what the hon. gentleman had to say?

Mr. DAVIS. I did not give him any intimation at all. I have received telegrams from the mayor and other parties of the town in which I live, asking me to bring this matter before the House, and I am going to do so. The hon. member for West Toronto should be in his place in this House. When he brought this matter up before the House, he did not consult me or notify me. Now, I say here are some strong statements directed against the member for West Toronto in this letter, and if they are not true, he should have taken some means of contradicting them. If a letter of that kind was published about myself or any other hon. gentleman, we would have taken steps to contradict it. I may say that Mr. Sutherland, towards the end of his letter says: This is not all, you will hear from me again. Evidently the hon. member for West Toronto is afraid of hearing from Mr. Sutherland again. Now, Mr. Speaker, the people in my district have come to the conclusion there is a lot of truth in this letter. We hoped that this road when it was incorporated would be operated in the interest of the district. But we were mistaken. We have the fact that the railway has not been operated in the manner in which it should have been operated. The freight rates are so high that produce and stock can scarcely be sent over it. The passenger rate, 5 cents per mile, a prohibitory rate, has the effect of preventing people coming into the town. Everything goes to show that the road has been operated in such a way that the bonds would be down to about the lowest possible point within a year or two, especially unless they repair the bridges. I wish especially to point out that we have coming into the district of Saskatchewan at the present time between 900 and 1,000 immigrants; but they will have to go by some other routes and to some other district. We are losing to our district this large amount of producers on account of the way in which the railway is operated, and it is time some action was taken by the Government to make them do what is right in the matter. If the Government has power to force the road to adopt proper measures, they should do so. The Opposition has spoken a lot about the large land grant given by this Government for the construction of a tramway or of a narrow-gauge road. But one million and a half acres of the best and most fertile lands in the district of Saskatchewan were given to this company as a bonus for the purpose of building this railway, which is at the present time nothing but a mud road, mud in places being over the rails. Apparently measures were not taken by the late Dominion Government to compel the company to properly operate the road in return for the lands and money they had. Under present conditions there should not be given Government aid to the extent of $80,000 a year, and if possible their land grant should be cancelled. I call the attention of the Minister of Railways to these facts, and I hope he will take the necessary action.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). If the hon. member will furnish me with the papers and telegrams and correspondence he has received, I shall be very glad to look into the matter and give it my best attention.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. CLARKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Solicitor General if any officer has been appointed for the city or district of Toronto to enforce the Alien Labour Law there?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It is impossible to answer that question off-hand, but I shall be prepared to answer it to-morrow afternoon.

THE FRANCHISE BILL.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

On subsection "a" of paragraph 8,

Mr. BENNETT. This clause was to be amended so as to prevent the possibility of officials prescribed by Act of the local legislature voting at Dominion elections.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Perhaps the hon. member will allow the clause to pass in its present condition, and immediately afterwards I will insert a section on the line that I will communicate to the House.

Mr. McINERNEY. It was to this subsection the leader of the Opposition spoke the other evening in proposing an amendment, and in his absence I propose the amendment. He moved it as an amendment to subsection "c." but afterwards he thought it would apply more directly to subsection "a." I therefore, move as follows :—

Provided if in any electoral district a dispute shall arise as to the qualification of any person to vote therein, an appeal shall lie to the county court judge having jurisdiction in that electoral district, and in provinces where there is no county court judges, then to the superior court having jurisdiction in that electoral district.

I do not intend to offer any remarks on this amendment, because it was very fully dealt with by the leader of the Opposition the other evening.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think we can adopt the amendment in its present form. The object of this amendment, as I take it, is to have a revision by a county court judge or a superior court judge, as the case may be, for the electoral district. Hon. members from Quebec and Ontario will realize how illogical it would be to adopt this amendment, because in Ontario the electoral list is revised by the county court judge and in the province of Quebec by a superior court judge. The object of the appeal therefore is to give the same judges on a dispute arising the right to give a further decision. I do not think we can adopt any such amendment as that proposed. In the province of Ontario the lists are made out by the revisers, and then they are revised by the county court judge who finally settles the list. It would be illogical in the extreme to have an appeal over to the same judge who finally revises the list, in the case of a dispute under this subsection.

Mr. MILLS. Why not have the amendment apply to these provinces that have not that appeal to the county court judges?

Mr. FOSTER. I was about to make that suggestion. Will the Solicitor General say whether or not the Government will provide for an appeal in cases where the lists are not revised by a county court judge or superior court judge?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, the technical objection raised by the Solicitor General having been removed, it does not follow apparently that he will admit the principle.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is another objection, and that is that there is no machinery provided for the appeal. Take the case of the maritime provinces, where the final appeal is to the sheriff. There, I do not see why we should substitute new machinery for the machinery which in New Brunswick, I am informed, has been in existence since 1854, and to which there never has been any objection made. In Manitoba the revising officers are county court judges as far as it is possible to get them, but there being only five county court judges revising barristers have to be appointed in some instances. So far as Quebec and Ontario are concerned, this amendment is inapplicable.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Solicitor General says that even if the amendment were limited to the provinces where no appeal exists to a county court judge, still the amendment is inoperative because the Bill does not provide the necessary machinery for an appeal. That is an objection which can be very readily got over later on in the Bill. Am I right in supposing that even if this objection were removed, the Solicitor General would still insist that in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick we must have the machinery as it exists, and leave it with the decision of the sheriff, who is a creature of the local government?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has rightly understood the position I take. This appeal can only be effective in so far as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are concerned, and in my opinion no reason has been given to justify us in interfering with the machinery existing in these two provinces. I have not heard of any serious grievance being explained to the committee which would justify us in adopting this innovation. I may be inaccurate, but my information is that the procedure now adopted in the maritime provinces, especially in New Brunswick, so far as the electoral lists are concerned, is the same procedure which has been in force without objection since 1854.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I cannot speak with any confidence as to the other maritime provinces, but in the case of New Brunswick I must say that I am quite surprised to hear the views which have been expressed this afternoon, as well as the other evening, with regard to the unsatisfactory condition of the law in that province. I stated the other night, and I repeat it, that I have yet to hear any complaint whatever with regard to the operation of the New Brunswick law. As my hon. friend the Solicitor General has very correctly said, the present system operating in New Brunswick was first introduced in 1855, and when that Act was passed it made no provision for the revision of the lists as made up by the revisers in the different parishes of the province. From that time down to the present there never has been a proposal in the legislature that we should constitute any tribunal to revise the work done by the revisers, except in this one particular: that after the lists are made up by the revisers in the various parishes they are sent in to the county secretary, and before the 1st of January in each year the law imposes upon the sheriff the duty of going over the lists which have been filed by the various revisers; not for the purpose of striking off or adding names, but for the purpose of ascertaining simply who are the non-resident electors. The sheriff is then authorized to select these names and to put them on an independent non-resident list, upon which the non-resident electors vote. These are required by law to vote at the shire town ordinarily, but in one or two counties there are exceptional provisions. The duty of the sheriff is to prepare the list of non-resident electors, and where the name of a non-resident appears in more than one of the parish lists, he leaves off the name from the other parish lists. He leaves the name off except as to the list he is making up for election purposes, the one general non-resident list. The sheriff's other duty is to ascertain if there are any persons whose names are on more than one list, as it very often happens that persons are qualified by property to have their names on the list of different parishes in the county. He strikes off the name of any such elector except from the list of the parish where that elector is a resident. The sheriff has no jurisdiction—as has been suggested by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper)—to make a general revision of the list. No general revision of the reviser's list is made and there never has been any such general revision made, and I am glad to be able to say, more than that, I am proud to be able to say, that in the province of New Brunswick the duties which have been placed upon the revisers in the various parishes have been so well discharged, and the duties devolving upon the sheriffs in this matter of selecting the non-resident names have been so well discharged, that I have never yet heard one syllable of complaint against the way in which these duties have been performed. Of course, it will happen that now and then, through mistake, a name has been left off by the parish reviser, but it has never been attributed to any malicious or wilful purpose, or through any political prejudice, and it has always been acknowledged to be the result of accident. Therefore, it is a matter of congratulation to us in New Brunswick that we have never needed all this machinery of revision; and if we had needed it, there is no doubt that long ago, on the various occasions since 1855, when the electoral law came up for amendment, there would have been a movement in the legislature for something of the kind. But no such suggestion was ever made; and I take this opportunity of again expressing my surprise that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), who must have known how satisfactory the law in these particulars has worked, and how free from complaint it has been, should have imagined that there was something open to question in the amendment which my hon. friend the Solicitor General has moved. I want to say further that we have in New Brunswick the best guarantee that you can have that the lists will be well revised. They are revised as a general rule by the councillors of the various parishes. The name of a person outside of the council board may be added; but ordinarily the councillors of the different parishes are the revisers, and their disposition naturally is to put on the list all the names that are entitled to go on. They are not elected upon any political basis; they are not elected because they belong to this political party or that; but as a general rule they are chosen quite irrespective of their political leanings. So that they have no impulse to make other than a full and proper revision of the lists for elections for the provincial House. On the whole, I do not see that we could better the conditions that exist in the province of New Brunswick by making any provision for a further revision of the lists.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I hope I did not understand the Solicitor General to say that this Government is supported by its followers in the House upon a proposition not to allow a revision of the lists by the county judges on appeal from the revisers, as he has termed them. I confess that I never expected to hear such a proposition from a Liberal Government, more especially after having become acquainted with all the strong epithets and all the tirade of attack that was made upon revising barristers in the old days of the present Franchise Act. If I may be allowed freely to express my opinion as to the course of the Government, I may say that I do not believe that the Solicitor General and his colleagues are supported by hon. gentlemen opposite who usually support them, in making such an extraordinary proposition as this. We have in Canada a genuine respect for the members of the bench, whether in the county court or in the superior court. It is an unwritten part of the Canadian constitution, strongly ingrained in the feelings of every Canadian elector, whether of one party or another, that in this matter of the creation of the electoral lists there should be an appeal to a man who in every county is held to be above party. I must express my surprise again that such a proposition comes from a Liberal Government, and that it is supported by hon. gentlemen who in other days made a very vigorous fight upon this very question of the franchise. What has been the admission made by the Solicitor General this afternoon? The admission that there was no machinery under the provincial Acts in some cases for an appeal to the county court or district court judge, is to my mind an admission that this whole Bill is weak from beginning to end; and it only shows the difficulties into which these hon. gentlemen have got by adopting this strange medley of the various provincial franchises, instead of one uniform franchise under one uniform system for the whole Dominion. Suppose there is no machinery ; surely it is extremely easy, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), to make this machinery in future clauses of the Bill. For my part, I cannot see on what principle hon. gentlemen opposite are acting in refusing the suggestion for an appeal to the county judge, or for some sort of judicial revision. Is it because they fear unfairness on the part of the county judge ? There is not an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who says he fears any such thing. Is it because of the great expense connected with any such revision ? The cost would be exceedingly small. Then, a very large portion of the people of this country have not that abundant and self-satisfied faith in the sheriffs of New Brunswick or of any other province, who happen to be appointed by a partisan Administration for partisan acts ; and, if only to satisfy pretty nearly half—we think a good deal more than half just now—of the people of Canada, the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill should accede to the request of gentlemen on this side of the House, to have an appeal to a county court judge or a high court judge, as the case may be. So far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that party workers should be rewarded—that they should be given those plums which are in the hands of their party to bestow. I have no objection to that whatever ; I like to see them get their reward. In the province of Ontario this does not affect us so much as it does the people in other provinces. But in the province of Ontario we have an illustration of what I fear may also exist in other provinces. The Liberal Government of Ontario rewards its friends with offices. I have no objection to that. Among the offices they usually bestow are the shrievalties of the various counties of Ontario, and I feel that I can appeal to the hon. gentlemen who come from the province of Ontario when I say that the sheriffs of that province, outside of the duties which they perform in connection with the law courts, are among the strongest partisans in the province ; and if that is the case in the province of Ontario, I see no reason why it should not also be the case in the province of New Brunswick. And, Sir, has it come to this in this Parliament, that a Liberal Government, who have always pretended when in Opposition to fight for the rights and liberties of the people on every occasion, shall deny that fundamental right of Canadians, of an appeal in this matter to the courts of the country, in the very first Franchise Act which they have submitted to the House of Commons of Canada ? I hope that the Solicitor General will see that a change is made. Knowing as he does, how these things are conducted in the various provinces, he must believe that he is asking Parliament to adopt an Act which is not in accordance with the true sentiment of the people ; upon either side of politics, in the various constituencies of this country. I have discussed this measure with many Liberals and Conservatives in the various parts of Ontario, and I say to the honour of the Liberals in the country that I have not yet heard one outside of this Parliament who did not say that it was the duty of the Government to grant, in every case, an appeal to a county court judge, in order that, as far as possible, every class of citizens might be satisfied as regards the fairness and justice of the lists.

Mr. MILLS. I think, with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Montague), that we should have an appeal to some judicial authority other than a man of political extraction. The arguments adduced against such an appeal are simply that the procedure in the maritime provinces has been of long standing and has worked well. In the province of New Brunswick, the procedure may have been of long standing—since 1854, some hon. gentlemen have said—but in Nova Scotia it has only existed since 1889, and has been the cause of a great many complaints. The appeal in Nova Scotia is to the sheriffs. When those sheriffs were appointed, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia spoke of them in a very significant manner, as eighteen good men and true. So significant was his manner, that it became a scandal and has been considered such from the day he uttered those words. Eighteen good men and true—what does that expression mean, spoken in the significant manner in which it was, by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia when making the appointments. The appeals are to those eighteen good men and true. The revisions, in the majority of cases, in Nova Scotia, under the Dominion Franchise Act, were made by the county court judges, and no complaints have been heard with regard to those gentlemen. There is not a man in this House or out of it who will dare say that there has been any complaint regarding the decisions of the county court judges under the Dominion Franchise Act.

In order to show the House that I spoke from the book, I did refer to some of the complaints concerning the appeals to the sheriffs, the other day, and I have here some more of these complaints. I have here the solemn declarations of respectable gentlemen in the county of Annapolis, which I shall read to the House :

Canada,
Province of Nova Scotia,
County of Annapolis.

I, Arthur T. Morse, of West Paradise, in the county of Annapolis and province of Nova Scotia, farmer, do solemnly declare as follows :—

1. I am an elector of the county of Annapolis and reside in the said county.

2. I say that T. Troop Messenger is a reviser for revision section No. 6 in the county of Annapolis, which includes ward No. 11, appointed by the municipal council of the county of Annapolis.

3. By the assessment made up in pursuance of the statute in that behalf in the autumn of the year A. D. 1897, a number of persons were assessed for more than enough to entitle them to be on the list of voters qualified to vote at a local election for the province of Nova Scotia, and their names appeared on the assessment roll. All of these persons were well known to be supporters of the Liberal-Conservative party. The said T. Troop Messenger, in making up the revisal list to be posted pursuant to the statute, left the names of all said persons off the said list. I prepared a notice of application to add the names of said persons and the names of certain other persons duly qualified to vote, though their names did not appear in the assessment roll; the number of names in my said notice was fourteen. On the 18th day of February, 1898, I handed the said notice of application to one Wilfrid Hopkins to hand to the said T. Troop Messenger, and he did so hand it to him on the morning of the 19th of February, A. D. 1898, as I verily believe. The said Hopkins at the revisers' court, holden on the 5th day of March, A. D. 1898, swore that he handed the said notice of application to the said T. Troop Messenger on the morning of the said 19th day of February, A. D. 1898. At the said revisers' court the fact that the persons handed in said application were qualified to vote was not disputed. The revisal board for said revisal section, which included said board No. 11, consists of two other members besides the said T. Troop Messenger, to wit: John Hoyt and Thomas Devaney. The court holden on the said 5th day of March, A. D. 1898 was adjourned to the 12th day of March, A. D. 1898. On said 12th day of March, the revisers' court was again opened pursuant to the said adjournment, when only two of said revisers, to wit, the said Hoyt and Devaney, attended, who then upon the sworn evidence of Hopkins, decided that the said notice of application to add the said names had been handed to the said T. Troop Messenger pursuant to the statute, and that the said names should be added, and gave me the said list of names so to be added, with instructions to hand the same to the said T. Troop Messenger, to be by him put on the said original voters' list, which was in his possession. I took the list containing the names so to be added to the said T. Troop Messenger, and told him that the two revisers had decided to add these names, and asked me to hand them in to him so that he might put them on the voters' list. He replied that he would not do it, and that the said Hoyt and Devaney might go to hell. Application was made by me to the sheriff at his court, holden on the 21st day of March, A. D. 1898, to add the said names, and the said sheriff refused to do so on the ground that they had not been posted by the revisers.

4. The names of Albert McCormick and Edward Bauchman were on the electoral list for ward No. 11 for the previous year, and they had not in any way since become disqualified, but were not posted by the said revisers. They were and are electors of said ward No. 11. The said Messenger resides in said ward No. 11, and the other revisers reside in other wards of the said revisal section. For a number of years it has been the custom for the reviser who resides in a ward to post the list for that ward, and in accordance with this custom the duty of posting the list for ward No. 11 was left to the said Messenger. The said Bauchman and McCormick are both well known to be supporters of the Liberal-Conservative party. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the Act respecting Extra-judicial Oaths.

(Sgd.) ARTHUR T. MORSE.

Signed and declared to before me by the said Arthur T. Morse at Bridgetown, in the county of Annapolis, this 20th day of April, A. D. 1898.

JAMES J. RITCHIE,

A Notary Public

in and for the province of Nova Scotia.

Canada,

Province of Nova Scotia,

County of Annapolis.

I, Frank L. Milner, of Bridgetown, in the county of Annapolis, barrister-at-law, do solemnly declare as follows:—

1. I am an elector of the county of Annapolis and reside in the said county.

2. Wallace Young, of Upper Granville, in the said county of Annapolis, was a reviser of the local electoral lists for ward No. 4 in the said county of Annapolis during the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and was duly appointed as such reviser by the municipal council of the municipality of the said county of Annapolis.

3. The names of Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham, all of Bridgetown aforesaid, appeared on the list of qualified electors of said ward No. 4 that was posted as a preliminary list in accordance with the requirements of section 22 of chapter 1 of the Acts of the legislature of Nova Scotia passed in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine, known as the Nova Scotia Franchise Act of 1889.

I am advised and verily believe that no notice in writing or at all was ever given to have either of the aforesaid names struck off the said list, and when the revisers posted a list of names to be struck off the list in said ward No. 4, in accordance with section 23 of the said Act, the said names of the said Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham were not on the said list of names to be struck off.

When the said revisers met to correct the said list for ward No. 4 aforesaid, in accordance with section 25 of the said Act, the said names of Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham were not before the said revisers to be adjudicated upon respecting their right to be struck off the said list, nor was any evidence offered in relation to the qualification or disqualification of the said Wallace Fowler, William Howse or J. P. Cunningham, or either of them, and their names were not struck off the said list in court, but afterwards the said Wallace Young prepared a copy, or pretended copy, of the said list for said ward No. 4, to be handed to the clerk of the said municipality, as required by section 25 of the said Act, and on the day that the said list was handed to the said clerk I attended at the office of the said clerk and inspected the said pretended copy of the said list as corrected by the revisers, and discovered that the names of the said Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham were omitted from the said list. I at once requested that the said names should be restored to the said list, but the said Wallace Young refused to add them, and said: "There are a lot more of them damned Tories that have got to come off."

I caused an appeal to be taken to the sheriff's court, to have the said names restored, and attended before the court to have the said names restored but the sheriff refused to restore the said names, because the said names had not been adjudicated upon by the revisers in open court, and, therefore, were not the subject of appeal. And the said Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham were not on the list of electors for the year 1897 in any part of the county of Annapolis. I complained to the municipal councillor for said ward No. 4 concerning the aforesaid conduct of the said Wallace Young, but the said Wallace Young was again appointed reviser of the said ward No. 4 by said municipal council for the present year.

The said Wallace Young is a well-known supporter of the Liberals, and the said Wallace Fowler, William Howse and J. P. Cunningham are well-known supporters of the Liberal-Conservatives.

The said Wallace Young is, as I am informed, and verily believe, a man of no property of any considerable value. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893.

(Sgd.) F. L. MILNER.

Declared before me at Bridgetown, in the said county of Annapolis, this 22nd day of April, A. D. 1898.

(Sgd.) HARRY RUGGLES,

in and for the province of Nova Scotia.

Now, it seems to be a merit in the eyes of some people to have these transactions performed. There was the case of Daniel J. Riordan, which I cited to the House the other day, a notorious matter that occurred in the county of Annapolis. Mr. Riordan was not only reappointed reviser of that ward, but he has been honoured by the Postmaster General with the appointment of postmaster in the county of Annapolis, and appointed although in order to appoint him it was necessary to dismiss two very respectable men. One of these is a well known gentleman, an ex-warden of the county, Mr. J. H. Thorne, and the other a very worthy sea captain, Capt. Covert. They found that they had no charges to bring against these men, but to get this man Riordan appointed, they abolished two offices and made a new one and appointed him postmaster of that. So they reward these men instead of punishing them. And these men are nothing more or less than political partisans, regular ward heelers who will do almost anything that their political party will ask them to do, and they are kept in office for that purpose and for that purpose alone. Now, the Nova Scotia Franchise Act is not an Act that can be decided upon by a layman. It requires the adjudication of a judge, more even than the old Dominion Franchise Act of 1885. There is no more intricate law of the kind in the Dominion of Canada than the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia, a great many law points arising under it. These sheriffs are not capable of performing these duties, they are not men learned in the law, they are eighteen good men and true who will do what they think is right, and they can be made to think a good many things are right, particularly if a partisan lawyer shows them some excuse for viewing it in that way. Now, the appointment of a judge or a legal man to hear these appeals—let him be a Liberal if you like, of course he will be a Liberal—will give us at least the satisfaction of knowing that we have a man of knowledge, a man of responsibility who will decide these matters. I have recited three very flagrant cases. There is not a ward in Annapolis county from which I could not give other just such cases as I have cited, because they make it a point to act in this way. There are twenty-eight wards, polling districts, in Annapolis county. If the Liberals can get the names of five or six good solid Conservatives off the list in each—and here we have fourteen in one case and five in another—why, there is a victory at once. And this is done by whom? Not by the electorate, not by the free and independent votes of the electors. But by these eighteen good men and true, and by these partisan revisers. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite wish this thing to go on, why, let them have it so. We shall do our best to fight these revisers; we will see that every court is attended properly, there is not the slightest doubt about that, and we will see that, so far as we can do it, the sheriffs shall do their duty. But the Liberals of this House are not putting up the safeguards that they might against fraud. I have often heard it said that the proud boast of the Liberals is that they will guard against fraud and corruption as much as they can. But, if they go on with this Bill as it is, they are throwing down the guards against fraud and opening the gates and inviting fraud to enter. Now, they say that there is no complaint. Why, it has been a scandal in Nova Scotia for years that the revisers' lists have to be legalized year after year. I have looked into this matter thoroughly, and will give you the years in which a special Act of this kind has had to be passed. That Act, as a rule, is entitled as follows:—

Mr. MILLS.

An Act to legalize jury lists and panels, assessment rolls and revisers' lists for the present year.

This goes on the Statute-book year after year, so many times in the province of Nova Scotia that it has become a burning scandal, and it is simply because these revisers do not do their duty properly and place a proper list before the people. The Act usually declares that, notwithstanding any omission, errors or irregularities in any such rolls or lists or in any proceedings in connection therewith, these shall be legal lists, and so on. So, in order to get legal lists in the province of Nova Scotia they have to enact a special law in a great many cases. These special Acts were passed in the years 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887.

We had to have these special Acts passed in order to make legal the electoral lists in the province of Nova Scotia. Now, if this House is going to take such a retrograde step as to adopt machinery like that, I think the Liberals will thereby place another nail in their coffin.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not rise to controvert anything said by the last two speakers, but in this discussion I am sorry to have noticed that reference is made to the sheriffs of New Brunswick, not of a complimentary character. They have been charged with being partial, with being partisans. Now, I will not give my own testimony to controvert that, because I can give stronger testimony on that point. I will only say that the charge of partisanship against the sheriffs of New Brunswick is utterly unfounded; and I think it my duty to rise here and say so as a matter of justice to that class of gentlemen.

Mr. McINERNEY. Nobody ever made a charge against the sheriffs. The hon. gentleman was not here, and therefore I think it is right that I should correct him in that respect. What we charged was that dangerous powers were being placed in the hands of the sheriffs of New Brunswick.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Well, I do not rise to answer anything that was said when I was not here; I rise to answer something that was said when I was in my place, not by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The Minister of Railways and Canals undertook to explain, and did explain very satisfactorily and clearly, the jurisdiction of the sheriff in connection with these lists, showing that he has no power to add to or strike from these lists; he simply has to classify the list and to say who are and who are not resident voters. Then an hon. gentleman near me wanted to know whether this House was going to give this power to the sheriffs of New Brunswick, who were as strongly partisan as any class of men in the Dominion?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may be allowed to explain. I am sure that my hon. friend misunderstood my statement altogether. What I did say was this: That my knowledge of the gentlemen who were appointed in the province of Ontario to shrievalties, led me to believe that in most cases they were appointed for their partisan services. I said, and I think hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will bear me out in the statement. What I said was that if partisans were appointed in the province of Ontario, I supposed the sheriffs were appointed for their partisan services in other constituencies, and in other provinces of the Dominion. But as for New Brunswick, I do not know a single sheriff in that province, and consequently could not have made any such statement.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I stated in the outset that I had no objections personally to the remarks made by either of the speakers with regard to their own provinces. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat did not mean to make a personal reflection perhaps, but the reflection was made, and the explanation given by the hon. gentleman shows how easily he might have fallen into error. I want to say there is a difference, at any rate, by which this charge cannot apply to the province of New Brunswick, for many reasons. As I said before, I do not ask the House to accept my authority, but I ask the House to consider this fact: That during the whole time the late Conservative Government was in power, its policy was to send the writs for election to the Dominion Parliament, to the sheriffs all through our province. The Government was not compelled by law to send the writs to these gentlemen, and if they had been partisans or looked upon as such, I think we would not have done that. Now, with very few exceptions, during the regime of the Conservative Government, the writs were sent to the sheriffs as a matter of policy, on the ground that they were considered capable of conducting the elections honourably and fairly, and in every case, to my knowledge, they have done so. I rise simply to say this, in justice to those gentlemen.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not intend just now to discuss the question with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) as to the fairness or impartiality of the sheriffs. As to the hon. gentleman's argument that the late Government considered all the sheriffs of New Brunswick strictly straight and honest, why did the late Government not send the writs to all of them? If the Conservative Government thought the sheriffs of New Brunswick were not partisans, why did they not send the writ for the federal election to Sheriff McQueen of Westmoreland, if they considered him strictly impartial and non-partisan? I could name other instances also. I am glad the hon. gentleman did not refer to me when he said that a charge had been made against the sheriffs of New Brunswick on account of their partiality. I am sure I never made any such charge, and up to this date I have heard no man in this House make any such charge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They were described as the minions of the Minister of Railways and Canals by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall).

Mr. McINERNEY. I never heard that expression used. They are the nominees of the Government of New Brunswick, but that they are the minions of the Government of New Brunswick, I am not prepared to say. But what I wished particularly to protest against the other evening was the dangerous power that was being lodged in the hands of the sheriffs of the province of New Brunswick. It is perfectly beside the point for the Minister of Railways and Canals to say that up to this date the sheriffs of New Brunswick have been strictly non-partisan. Let me point out that their duties in regard to the elections, have been in reference to the local elections alone, and in the local elections of New Brunswick there have been no party politics. But this Bill now proposes to make the sheriffs and their officers in the province of New Brunswick, partisans; it proposes to throw into the political arena of the Dominion the sheriffs of New Brunswick; it proposes to make these officials partisans in the strictest sense of the word. It would be all right enough to say that the sheriffs of New Brunswick were kept out of the arena of Dominion politics, but this Act proposes to make them partisans by throwing them into that arena; and it will not only make partisans of the sheriffs, but it will make partisans of the revisers in the different districts of the province. Hitherto they have not been partisans because their duties have not referred to the federal elections. But when hon. gentlemen tell me that the sheriffs in the province of New Brunswick have not very much power in making up the electoral lists, I simply quote the law against them. The sheriff in New Brunswick makes the electoral lists. That statement will not be controverted.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Certainly it will.

Mr. McINERNEY. Let me read the law to the hon. gentleman, section 37 of his own Act, 1889:

The secretary shall, under his direction, make copy of each poll.

Make up the whole list, he makes up the electoral lists under the direction of the sheriff of the county. There is no doubt about that. The sheriff directs the secretary as to how the list should be made up, therefore the sheriff in that province is the final authority.

An hon. MEMBER. Is not that the list of the residents and non-residents? As you read it seems so to me.

Mr. McINERNEY. The sheriff makes up the list, and there is no appeal from the list so prepared.

He shall also make an alphabetical list of the electors of the district. If it appears that a registered elector of any division is returned as qualified to vote in any other polling subdivision his name shall only be inserted in the list of poll where he resides.

This is the law in New Brunswick. There are more dangerous provisions in the New Brunswick law, because section 40 of the Act of 1889, the very Act of which the hon. Minister of Railways is proud, provides:

If from any cause voters' lists for any polling subdivision is not made up and sent to the county secretary within the time mentioned in this Act, the county secretary makes up lists for each such polling subdivision, using the assessment list, putting on such lists names, &c. (if in doubt put on name rather than leave it off), and shall notify sheriff after list is completed, and the sheriff shall act as above.

This is the proceeding followed in case the lists are not sent in by the reviser to the county secretary's office in time, and that often happens. We have had in New Brunswick elections held under lists which, not being sent in time by the revisers, were prepared by the county secretary, who was able to put on the names he pleased and omit such names as he pleased, and there was no appeal. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to a late Act passed in New Brunswick.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Read section 29.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have not brought the Acts into the House, and I have simply excerpta from them. The hon. gentleman can read the section to which he refers. The power given to the county secretaries is a very dangerous one, especially to a man with political leanings, and I do not know any of those secretaries who has not very strong political leanings. I desire to call attention to the Act passed in New Brunswick in 1897.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I was not there then.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am aware of the fact, but the hon. gentleman's successors thought fit to give under that Act an appeal to county court judges in certain cases. It is provided:

1. The sheriff, if satisfied that names are omitted through a mistake in copying, or any other error or oversight, shall make application to county court judge for order authorizing him to add such names, whereupon the judge shall, after notice to assessors and revisers, and the judge may order such names added and sheriff shall thereupon add them.

Does not the hon. gentleman see that in the province of New Brunswick power has been given in some instances to appeal to a county court judge? But if the sheriff is satisfied that names have been omitted through oversight or omission in copying, he will make the application. No other person in a constituency in New Brunswick has the right to make the application but the sheriff: the candidate or an elector has no such right, but the sheriff possesses that power. The citation I have made, however, shows that progress has been made in that province, and that the opinion prevails that it is not right to have the final lists prepared by a county secretary. The Government in the Bill now under consideration propose to leave in the hands of these hitherto non-partisan officers certain powers—these officers who have not been engaged in federal affairs, but who are now to be called upon to enter federal politics and be clothed with the powers of federal officials and it is proposed to make partisans of them, and not only of them but of the different revisers in the parishes of New Brunswick. In the past, when there were not any federal politics in our New Brunswick affairs, the charge could not be made that the sheriffs were actuated by partisan opinions, and their action in the past is the basis of the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite. Their position was due to the fact that up to this day it has not been deemed desirable that they should enter into federal politics. Now, however, it is proposed to give them partisan powers, and no doubt they will exercise them. It has been stated by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) that the preparation of the lists should be hedged around with all possible safeguards. The other evening I called the attention of the Solicitor General to the fact that this Bill would be unworkable in New Brunswick when 900 or 1,000 names were on the list for one subdivision, and it was only after that the Solicitor General stated that he had received an amendment from the hon. Minister of Railways dealing with that objection. After the amendment had been read I criticised it on the line of its giving such tremendous power to the sheriff. I did not say that the sheriffs in New Brunswick had hitherto acted in an improper manner. I had not charged them with any wrong-doing against the electors of New Brunswick, nor up to the present have I done so: but to make them final authorities in making up the lists, or to designate, as was done in the New Brunswick Act of 1889, the county secretary as final authority to make up the list is to place in the hands of these officials dangerous powers which may be exercised against the rights, liberties and franchises of the electors, and, therefore, I object to this clause on the strongest ground. With respect to my amendment, I admit there is considerable point in the objection raised by the Solicitor General, and I would ask to have this safeguard included only in the case of provinces where there is no judicial revision of the electoral lists provided for.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Minister of Railways stated a moment ago that the member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) had referred several times to the sheriffs of New Brunswick as minions, and to show that is not a true representation of the line that was adopted in the debate by that hon. member, who is not in his seat, I should like to call the attention of the committee to what he said. He said:

A partisan officer, the sheriff, who is appointed by the Government of the day, is the person who in the province of New Brunswick has the power of nullifying the sacred trust of the franchise.

And again:

I am not saying one word touching the character or standing of the sheriffs of New Brunswick.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Except they were partisans.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Those sentences are not inconsistent. Only once did the hon. gentleman apply the term minion to them, but it was not in an offensive sense. In column 4236 of the Debates, he is reported to have said:

Under this amendment which I have proposed, a judicial officer should stand between the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) and his minions and protect the honest voter.

That is one reference, and is the only reference I can find to account for the statement of the hon. Minister that the hon. gentleman referred over and over again to the sheriffs of New Brunswick as minions. But the hon. gentleman has not charged any particular sheriff with any wrong, nor did he say a word against the character of any one of them.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Now that everything said by way of reflection on the sheriffs of New Brunswick, and in regard to their action, has been withdrawn, not as gracefully as we would have wished, it seems to me now that all that remains to restore harmony and serenity is—

Mr. McDOUGALL. There was nothing taken back of what has been said; nothing has been taken back of what is on record in "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, perhaps, I do not understand the ordinary meaning of the English language, but I have taken it that hon. gentlemen opposite, both this afternoon and throughout this debate, have been contending that we should not take the lists of the province of New Brunswick, because they were prepared in an outrageous manner by partisan officers.

Mr. McDOUGALL. No; no such charge was made.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If that is not what these hon. gentlemen meant, then what is their ground of objection to the New Brunswick Act? My hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) is mistaken in saying that that charge has not been taken back. I have done those hon. gentleman the justice of saying that they have taken back that wrongful charge, and in the light of the remarks of the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. Costigan) I am justified in saying that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Whoever made any such statement, or is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) building up a beautiful little man of straw, that even he can knock down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Montague) has not been as regular in his attendance on the House as would enable him to vouch for all that has been said, but I am in the hearing of hon. gentlemen on both sides when I say—

Mr. MONTAGUE. You stated the charge was made this afternoon.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say it was undoubtedly continued this afternoon. The general drift of the whole discussion by gentlemen opposite has been that in the maritime provinces, and especially in New Brunswick, the voters' lists should not be taken for the Dominion elections, because they have been made out by partisans, particularly the sheriffs, who did not do their duty faithfully. If that is not what hon. gentlemen opposite have been arguing for some days, then we on this side do not understand what they mean. I am doing them the justice of saying that they have undoubtedly, although ungraciously, taken all that back, and now, if my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) would take back all the discreditable things he said about his province of Nova Scotia, we will be able to get along very harmoniously. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) shakes his head. Then he is not willing to do as much justice to Nova Scotia as his friend from New Brunswick (Mr. Costigan) did to his province. I hope, Sir, that the members of this House will not fall into the mistake of supposing that the county of Annapolis is as disreputable a place as has been described by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) who represents it in this House.

Mr. MILLS. One of the finest counties in the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If we were to assume that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) is correct in his description of the manner in which the public affairs of the county of Annapolis are conducted, we would believe that there is a wild lawlessness prevailing there which is not even found in the wild and woolly west. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has repeatedly attacked the administrators of municipal affairs in his county, for their conduct in connection with the revision. Now the revisers in Annapolis are appointed by the municipal councils; the local government has nothing to do with them, and I venture to believe that the municipal councillors are not all Conservatives, nor all Liberals. I think that sometimes there may be found a majority of Conservatives in the municipal councils of Annapolis, but if my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) wishes to imply that there is always a majority of Liberals in that county, some of us would be very anxious to know how in the world the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) found his way up in this Parliament. I am afraid we would have to come to the conclusion that he did not come here by fair and proper means. But, if the hon. gentleman comes here properly as the representative of Annapolis, then I presume that occasionally there will be found a majority of Conservatives in the municipal councils. I am bound to say in favour of Annapolis, which is so unfairly misrepresented by its member here, that it is a very intelligent and a very beautiful county, and I have no reason to believe that its municipal affairs are conducted in any worse manner than they are in the excellent counties of Queen's and Shelburne, which I have the honour to represent. My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague), who was so sensitive about being misrepresented, wasted some tears in defence of what he called the fundamental right of the people of the maritime provinces to have an appeal to the courts in this matter. He need not squander sympathy in this direction, because I am bound to tell him that there never was in Nova Scotia, within the memory of the present generation, such a right. The system of revising the lists in Nova Scotia is in all material points the same to-day that it has been for thirty or forty years, and it has never been called seriously in question. If changes have been made they have in every case been changes for the better, but in all essential particulars the method of revising the electoral lists is about the same to-day as it was thirty years ago when a Conservative government was in power in that province. I think I am correct in saying that the Act which enlarged the franchise was passed in 1885 and re-enacted and revised in 1889, and in one of these years, I forget which just now, the clause was inserted giving the right of appeal to the sheriff. Up to that time there was no appeal at all and these revisers—partisan revisers, we are led to believe they are—were the final court of appeal; and even then I must say there was not very much complaint. Of course, with a large number of revisers, subject to all the weaknesses of humanity, now and then in the keenness of a party fight it would be said that the revisers had not done right, but in the main it was accepted as the best system available. However, when the law was revised in one of the years to which I have referred, a clause was inserted giving the right of appeal to the sheriff. I am willing to father that particular baby, because I put that clause in myself, just to meet such few difficulties—and they were very few—as were occasionally mentioned. That right of appeal to the sheriff has been used in a very limited degree. I am strongly of the opinion that it is a check upon the revisers, and the very knowledge that the right of appeal exists leads them, I believe, to proceed more cautiously. If the public documents are examined it will be found that the number of appeals to the sheriff is not very great. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that the sheriff is a partisan.

Mr. KAULBACH. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) says "hear, hear," but let us see. The sheriffs of Nova Scotia are described by hon. gentlemen opposite as the creatures of the local government. Will some one tell me wherein that is a more justifiable description of them, than if I were to say that the county court judges are the creatures of the Conservative Government that appointed them? They are appointed by the local government in the one case and by the Dominion Government in the other case, and unless some evidence can be shown that the sheriffs are in the habit of violating their oath of office, I do not see that we should describe them in an offensive sense as the creatures of the local government. These sheriffs are not all Liberals, although they might well be, considering that the Liberal party has been in power for so long a time in that province, and judging from the signs of the times, is apparently likely to continue in power for a very long time to come. As a matter of fact these sheriffs are not all Liberals. The sheriffs in Nova Scotia were appointed in a peculiar old-fashioned manner down to the year 1883, when there was a revision of the law respecting sheriffs, and they were taken directly under the control of the government, but, if my memory serves me, they were appointed during good behaviour. They could only be removed for a specific cause, and I believe I am correct in stating that no sheriff was ever removed under that Act, and consequently good behaviour gave the sheriff almost the tenure of office that is possessed by a judge. That has been the practical effect of the law. When these sheriffs were appointed at that time, a very considerable number of them were Conservatives and they remained in office to the day of their death. Very few changes were made and at this moment, after the lapse of all these years, there are several sheriffs in Nova Scotia who are Conservatives. When this Bill has passed, as I have no doubt it will pass this House, and when it becomes law; if at the next Dominion election I shall have the honour of being a candidate in the county of Shelburne, which is a part of my constituency, I shall have the lists in their final stage made up by a Conservative sheriff, who has been continued in office by the Liberal Government, who is sheriff to-day, and who I hope may long continue, for he is a faithful and good official. There are other Conservative sheriffs in the province of Nova Scotia and the idea that these sheriffs are partisans and that the system is bad is all a delusion of hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) says that there is a perfect scandal in these matters, and that the Nova Scotia legislature has occasionally to pass Acts to legalize the lists. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) need not have selected these particular years, for if he goes back still further he will find that it has been the practice to bring in an Act of Parliament almost every session to legalize jury panels and revisers' lists. So much depends on the legality of your jury panels and revisers' lists, that it was thought well year after year to introduce an Act legalizing them, not that it was necessary on account of any exceptional conditions, but as an extra precaution. I venture to say that while in some years the thing may have been overlooked, yet the hon. gentleman will find a great many of these Acts on the statute-books of Nova Scotia. The idea that they were passed to cure any serious defect is a mistake, but it was found that where a reviser was called upon to hold his court on a certain day, and from some exceptional cause, it might not be held on the particular day, or at the particular hour appointed, or some other technical difficulty might arise, it was thought well to adopt the practice which has prevailed in Nova Scotia for many years, of legalizing the jury panels and revisers' lists. But it will be news to the people of Nova Scotia to hear that that was done in order to legalize partisanship in any way. I venture to say that the system of revising the lists which exists in Nova Scotia to-day is as good as the system of any other province of the Dominion; and in Halifax an extra precaution was taken by the municipal council appointing one of its own officers to do the work. I believe that there and throughout the province generally, subject to the possibility of getting a reviser here and there not as intelligent as he might be, or one who imparts a little partisanship into his work, still I say the system is a sound system, and the people recognize it as a sound system; and the objections raised against it in this House will be a surprise to the people of Nova Scotia, who are not aware that there is any difficulty in working out that system satisfactorily.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Undoubtedly, it may be said that the sheriffs of the province of Nova Scotia never have been, that I know of, accused of wrong-doing; still, when my hon. friend says that the people of Nova Scotia are quite satisfied with our revising system, he must be aware that there was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the law passed in 1883, by which the sheriffs were made the appointees of the local government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was no sheriff then who acted as reviser. The revision of the lists did not enter into the question at all.

Mr. BELL (Pictou.) That is true; but the law changed the appointment of the sheriff from one of a judicial character under the judges, and made him an appointee of the local government; and, more than that, he was appointed by the local government practically at pleasure.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. During good behaviour.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It would not be exceedingly difficult for the local government of Nova Scotia to dismiss a sheriff. In fact, they have dismissed a sheriff within a comparatively short time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Where?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I think there was one dismissed in Cape Breton within a year or so. While the sheriffs did not, as the hon. gentleman says, have anything to do with the revision of the electoral lists when the change was made in the law of 1883, the hon. gentleman subsequently, in 1889, provided for an appeal to the sheriffs while they were the appointees of the local government. While I am anxious to say everything I can for the honour of my province, and while I do not wish to anticipate any wrong-doing in that province, still I must say that in the province of Nova Scotia the making up of the electoral lists for this House, will, if this Bill passes, be practically under the control of the local government. In the first place, the revisers are selected by the county councils; and, in the case of a county having a majority of Liberals, it will be possible that they will appoint all the revisers of that county of that party stripe. I do not say that they have done it or that they will do it, but it is within their power to do it. In that case, you would have nothing but partisan revisers throughout the county, and the only appeal for the people, if they were dissatisfied with the making up of the list, would be to the sheriff of the county, the appointee of the local government. To show how easily the local government of Nova Scotia might control the majority in a municipal council, let me recall to my hon. friend some Acts which were passed in the legislature of that province when he was the leader of the government there. For instance, a polling district was created in the county of Annapolis without any good reason being assigned, the result of which was to affect the balance of parties in that county. The same thing has been done, if I am not mistaken, in the session just passed. The districts for the election of municipal councillors in the various counties have been gerrymandered, and they may be again. Therefore, it must be evident that while we may, and I hope can, expect nothing but good conduct on the part of the sheriffs and municipal councils of Nova Scotia, still the whole control of the preparation of the electoral lists for the election of members of this House is in the hands of a legislature which is, of course, quite as partisan a body as any that you can find anywhere else in Canada; and it seems to me that it would be a very satisfactory thing if we could have substituted for the sheriff, or have an appeal from the sheriff, to a judicial officer. So far as we know, the judges of our country have never been guilty of any partisan conduct. They are removed from party politics. I am very happy, in my place in this House, to state that, so far as my own county of Pictou is concerned, we have a sheriff who, I believe, is quite incapable of doing anything wrong. We have never had any reason to doubt the fairness of Sheriff Harris, in the county of Pictou, and, so far as I am concerned, I would be quite willing to accept him as referee in these matters. But I am only speaking for myself; and some other counties may not be so favourably situated. I see no reason why, in this matter, we should not refer what are somewhat difficult questions, such as questions of interpretation, which could not be readily solved by a sheriff, to some gentleman learned in the law, like a county judge or a Supreme Court judge. While there may be in small electoral divisions and small counties, in a bitter fight, an intensity of party feeling which you would not expect to find in this House. I am assuming that in the Parliament of Canada the Government are putting such a franchise Act on the Statute-book as will enable the country to ascertain, when the votes are polled, what is the will and the decision of the great mass of the people. I cannot believe that the Government, or the great party by which they are supported, would lend themselves to any small dishonesty in politics or in manipulating the electoral lists. I am not assuming anything of the kind. I think I am warranted in assuming the opposite; and therefore I maintain that the Government, when it is asked to make such amendments to this Bill as will make it satisfactory to those on this side of the House, who represent that other great portion of the people, the Conservative party, should endeavour to meet that demand. In a great many of the provinces, as has been pointed out, there exists already this judicial appeal. In the province of Nova Scotia we do not have it; and there, as I have explained, it would be quite possible to have lists prepared with a partisan purpose if the local legislature should choose to lend themselves to any such purpose. It would be within the range of possibility that a large portion of the municipal councils of Nova Scotia could be elected in a few years of a certain political stripe. If those municipal councils were prepared to go to the last limit and devote themselves entirely to the purpose of securing an electorate of their own, it would certainly be very easy for them to appoint such revisers for the county that it would be almost impossible for their opponents to get lists that would fairly represent the electorate. It is not necessary that the reviser should be actually dishonest or put names on the list wantonly, but they could throw such difficulties in the way of their opponents getting names on or striking names off and make it so easy for their friends to do so, that the result would be a great advantage to the party controlling the appointments of the revisers. The municipal councils might devote themselves to this evil work, and the Government ought to be glad to accept any suggestion from this side which would prevent the possibility of such a thing being done.

Mr. CHARLTON. It seems to me that in discussing the character of the Bill before the House, we are losing sight of the fact that the platform of the Liberal party calls for the enactment of a law which would divest the Dominion Government, if not exactly of all right, divest it practically of the function of interfering in the making of the voters' lists. From 1867 to 1885, the elections of this Dominion were conducted on the principle that it is now proposed we should revert to—the principle of provincial control of the lists. If during those years there had existed any reason for a change, such reason has certainly never been apparent to me, and I am not aware that any serious objection to the principle of the law, as it existed or the practice as it existed, from 1867 to 1885 was ever made. I believe that the practical operation of that system was satisfactory to the country, and that it actually did secure elections that expressed the will of the people to a much greater extent than did the succeeding franchise law. During the three months discussion, when the Dominion franchise law was under consideration in this House in 1885, the Liberal party took the ground squarely against interference by the Dominion Government in the formation of the voters' list at all, and asserted that the system under which we had been working was satisfactory and ought not to be meddled with. It was well known to those who participated in that debate and to those who were connected with public affairs in Canada at that time, and previous to and subsequent to that time, that the Bill was not introduced in answer to any popular demand for a change. It was not even introduced because Parliament believed that a change was necessary, but as a sequel to the Gerrymander Act of 1882, one of the most outrageous acts of political dishonesty that ever disgraced the annals of a political party in any commonwealth of the world. That Gerrymander Act, of 1882, was intended to give unjust and unfair advantages to the Government in power, and it admirably carried out the purpose for which it was intended. Following the Gerrymander Act of 1882, came the provincial Franchise Act of 1885, conceived in the same spirit and passed with the same purpose, and put into operation, not because a change was asked for or was necessary, but for the purpose of conferring additional and unjust political advantages on the party in power. The Liberals fought that Franchise Act for three months. They made a death struggle upon it. They realized perfectly its purpose and character, and never hesitated to denounce it as a political infamy. The operation of that Act has warranted that denunciation. The Government never dared to inflict upon the country the expense of the annual revision which it called for. They never gave to this country yearly voters' lists. They gave to us only four revisions in the long period during which that Act was in force. They went to the country, in the last two elections, on lists two years old. They debarred from participation in the franchise every man under the age of twenty-three, and this huge political infamy is now brought to the door of justice, and this Government, in pursuance of its pledges to the people in accord with its policy and principles, propose to remove this Act and revert to the provincial franchises. As I said briefly, a day or two ago, there is no middle ground between the opponents of the policy to revert to the provincial franchises pure and simple, and ourselves. What is the language of the declaration of principles by this party?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. It was given by that great convention of 3,000 delegates from all parts of the Dominion, that met in this city in June, 1893. Here is the enunciation of the principles by which this party is bound to be governed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I shall read to you the resolution dealing with the Dominion Franchise Act:

Resolved,—That the Franchise Act, since its introduction, has cost the Dominion treasury over a million dollars, besides entailing a heavy expenditure to both political parties. That each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million dollars. That this expenditure has prevented an annual revision, as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural rights. That it has failed to secure uniformity, which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction. That it has produced gross abuses by partisan revising barristers appointed by the Government of the day. That its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion, and that, in the opinion of this convention, the Act should be repealed and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

There is no qualification. There is no provision to revert to the provincial franchises, only partially. No, we are to revert to them pure and simple, and we are bound, as a party, by this enunciation of principles made by the great Liberal convention in 1883.

Mr. DAVIN. Are you bound by that?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am, and I think the Government intends to be. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite who were engaged in discussing this Bill and who are asking the Government to put on Indians and to keep off Indians, to put on Dominion officials and to keep them off, to make this and that provision for curtailing or guiding the provinces in the exercise of their rights—the object of these gentlemen, in my opinion, is to get as many things as possible done to complicate and embarrass the Act and render it a kind of hermaphrodite nondescript, and I would advise my hon. friend, the Solicitor General, to adhere strictly to the original declaration of the party and to the plain, simple and straight line of duty of adopting the provincial franchises, pure and simple.

When the United States constitutional convention was deliberating as to the character of the institutions of that country, after the experiment of a confederation which had lasted ten years, naturally the character of the franchise secured a very large amount of attention from that body. The result of its deliberations was alluded to a few days ago by the right hon. First Minister in his remarks on this matter. I remember having read up very carefully, during the discussion in 1885, "Elliot's Debates," which give a full account of the deliberations of the convention. And that portion of these debates relating to the various schemes proposed for the franchise which should be used for the election for President and Vice-President of the United States and members of Congress is one of the most interesting portions. It was proposed by one party that the States should be permitted, each for itself, to fix the franchise. It was proposed by another party that Congress should fix the franchise. After full discussion upon this matter, it was finally decided that the voters' list in each state used for the purpose of electing the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, which would be the most popular form of franchise, should be the franchise used in elections of members of Congress, and of the President and Vice-President of the United States. Now, this left the matter in a position where Congress was not called upon to interfere, and Congress never did interfere; and that provision, made in 1787, has continued down to the present day without question, without any party ever having even mooted the necessity of making a change.

Mr. DAVIN. Without amendment.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was the case, after the rebellion when Congress did interfere to secure to the freedmen the right of suffrage, an interference which proved in its results to have been a mischievous one and one that Congress would better have refrained from making. It was made under peculiar and exceptional circumstances, under the impression that it was necessary to invest the black men with a franchise in order to secure them the continuance of their liberty. But this did not interfere with the principle laid down as to the franchise controlled by the state.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. WILSON. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Are you opposed to the coloured men having a vote?

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. That is what I understood.

Mr. CHARLTON. On the contrary, I am in favour of the coloured men having votes.

Mr. BENNETT. What about the red man?

Mr. CHARLTON. If he is a citizen or chooses to become a citizen, I believe he should have a vote. But if he chooses to remain in the tribal relationship and refuses citizenship with us, let him have all the rights and advantages of tribal relationship and not the privileges of the citizen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I adverted to this case of the United States for the purpose of showing that we have an example lasting now for 111 years in the case of a great nation, which has worked uniformly to the satisfaction of all the states of the nation, and of all classes of people, insomuch that nobody in that country would think for a moment of changing to a system which would lead to the anomalous condition of affairs we had here, where we required two sets of machinery, two voters' lists, and all the complications that followed it from 1885. We should seek to simplify this matter and for that reason, should return to the condition of affairs that worked so satisfactorily for the first 18 years of our life as a Dominion, to the condition of affairs which we know, as a matter of experience, is a proper and good one. We should revert to that condition of affairs and throw overboard the condition that has existed since 1885, which has taught the people by the natural results of that system, that it is a bad one and not desirable in the interests of the country.

With regard to this question of the preparation of voters' lists and appeals, and this thing and that thing and the other—what interest have we to meddle with these matters? The various provinces have the franchise by which their representatives in their own local legislatures are elected. These franchises are satisfactory to these provinces. Why should we feel called upon to interfere with these franchises in relation to representatives from the several provinces to sit in this House. The franchises are satisfactory to the provinces that enacted them, or, if not, they can change them, making such modifications as they please. But we are not called upon to interfere or make modifications, and we cannot attempt it without mischievous consequences. We cannot exercise our power in this matter without overriding the rights of the provinces or rather without interfering with their domestic affairs in a way that is entirely unnecessary and prejudicial. In the province of Ontario, for instance, the voters' lists are prepared by municipal officers, elected by the people, the township councils. These voters' lists are revised by the township councils, and the final revision is made by the county judge of the county. This is almost identical with the system adopted in England. If the province of Ontario chooses to adopt some other method, that is the business of the province and not ours. If we allow the province of Ontario or any other province to have elections for its representatives in the Dominion House of Commons upon the lists prepared by its own officers under its own direction and supervision, why should anything more be required. Talk about partisan revising officers, about partisan sheriffs, about partisan influences in an election—why, I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, if we did not see party influences in the elections held under the Dominion franchise law? I would like to know what was the character of the revising officers, what was the character of the returning officers? And who were they appointed by? They were appointed by the Government in power. They were creatures of the Government; they were partisan officers as much as they would be if appointed by the province. I believe that we can leave this matter safely to the provinces. They understand their peculiar wants better than we do, and we cannot interfere without mischievous results, and for that reason, I am in favour of seeing this House proceed to the enactment of a Bill which will repeal the Franchise Act of 1885 and substitute the provincial franchises, and abstain, for our part, from all interference with them, as it will only complicate matters and make matters worse. If we interfere, we shall be dealing with matters the circumstances governing which we do not understand as well as do the people directly interested. I deprecate, Mr. Chairman, the line of attack that has been followed in this matter. It is irrelevant and foreign to the plain principle laid down. Do we want a Dominion franchise law? If we do, let us consider what is the best method by which to secure it. If we do not want a Dominion franchise law, but want the provincial lists, we have only to turn to the provinces and say: You form the lists and we will hold the elections upon them. And, just as surely as we interfere with these lists to a greater or less extent, we are going outside the line that should govern our conduct in this matter, outside the line that we have laid down in the platform of the party by which we pledged ourselves to be guided. I think we had better proceed to decide whether we will take the provincial franchise or whether we will not. That is the question. This proposal is a good proposal, or it is a bad one. If we are in favour of the provincial franchises, let us take them, if we do not want them, let us so decide. But if we accept the principle of provincial lists, let us refrain from a discussion which would be proper only if we decided that we must have a Dominion franchise.

Mr. DAVIN. I have listened with great interest to the backhanded attack of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) upon the Government. The emphatic way in which the hon. gentleman, in the close of his speech, laid down his principles is most admirable, and I admire him for it. He says: Let us have the provincial lists or, let us have Dominion lists, if we take the former let us not attempt to interfere or regulate in any way or assume to regulate the franchises as arranged by the local legislatures. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman is a very able man, and he could not be ignorant of the fact that he was planting his clenched fist right between the eyes of the Solicitor General. The suggestion is made here about me, but I will not believe it—that it is because the Solicitor General knocked out the Bill of my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) last night that the hon. gentleman has made this speech to-day. But I will not accept that, for this reason, that I know the hon. member for North Norfolk to be a Christian politician who could not possibly harbour a revengeful thought. I know him to be an Israelite indeed in whom there is no guile, or anger, nor retaliation. Now here is what the Solicitor General said on the 21st:

But if at any time the provinces should do anything that we considered detrimental to the interests of the Dominion, we are entirely free—we do not tie our hands for all time—to make any change that we think proper.

But the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, at an earlier period on that same day, said:

This Bill merely proposes to abdicate the exercise of a power to the provincial government.

So that he laid down the same principle then as he lays down now. But it is quite contrary to the principle laid down by the Prime Minister and to that laid down by the Solicitor General. Now in view of the Solicitor General's statement regarding a state of things detrimental and undesirable, surely the Governor will accept amendments that will get rid of those detrimental conditions. One of the positions taken by hon. gentlemen from the lower provinces, is that in the hands of sheriffs, who certainly are appointed, as a rule, because of their political proclivities, and whose office does not entail on them the duty of assuming a position of judicial impartiality they are not safe.

Mr. McINERNEY. They are appointed every year.

Mr. DAVIN. Then surely that is not a desirable tribunal in the last resort to decide one of the most important questions that can be decided, namely, a man's right to vote. But, Sir, let me take my hon. friend to Manitoba, about which I know a little more than I know about New Brunswick.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that the sheriffs are appointed every year in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes, the Act simply says so, in the month of April. I do not speak for Nova Scotia.

Mr. DAVIN. Now if you go to Manitoba you have the registration clerks appointed under conditions that enable them to act in a partisan manner. As I understand the Act, there is no provision that the registration clerk shall have any defined place where the public may go and find him. He may compile the list secretly under the Act as it is at present, and of course if secretly, under the influence of a Government candidate or agent. Under this Act he could run in men upon that list five minutes before 12 o'clock on the last day before the day of polling.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That state of things does not exist in fact, as the hon. gentleman will find on referring to section 22. He will find that section 22 requires the registration clerk to forthwith insert in a newspaper published in the electoral division, or if there is none such, in a newspaper which circulates in the electoral division in every issue prior to the date of closing the list, a notice calling upon persons wishing to be registered to put in their application. The notice gives the date when the lists will be closed; states where the office of the registration clerk is, and that he or a substitute can be found there every day except holidays, between 9 and 12 a.m., and 1 and 4 p.m.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand that clause was amended?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Manitoba Election Act, Revised Statutes, 1891, is the first. The amending Acts are 55 Vic., Chap. 12, 57 Vict., Chap. 9, 55 Vict., Chap. 11. The section to which I refer my hon. friend is section 22. It fixes a place, and everything you can possibly expect to have.

Mr. DAVIN. That may provide for the locality, but as I understand, there is no amendment providing for closing the lists. The section the hon. gentleman read does not prevent the registration clerk from stating that the day on which the list was closed, would be the very last before the day of polling.

Mr DAVIN.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The preceding section on the other page will show in reference to that.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, the grossest abuses have undoubtedly taken place in Manitoba because of the very thing that the amendment before us seeks to provide against, namely, because of having no appeals before an impartial tribunal. The amendment before us provides for an appeal to a county court judge, or where there is no county court judge, then to a judge of the Superior Court. Why should the hon. gentleman object to that amendment?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The appeal in Manitoba is before a county court judge, but in default of a county court judge, then before the revising barrister. That is the case under the Franchise Act.

Mr. DAVIN. The way the amendment would come would be this, that where, as is usually the case in Manitoba, a young barrister was appointed as returning officer, then if an elector or any friend of an elector felt aggrieved as to anything which the revising officer, not a judge, had done, there would be an appeal to a judge. Why should the hon. gentleman who sees the importance, as he emphasized it a moment ago, of having a county court judge as revising officer, object to make provision that where a county court judge has not been revising officer, there should be an appeal to an impartial man occupying a position removed from the passions of party. The correction made by my hon. friend who moved the amendment qualifies it so that it should only apply to provinces where there is not a provision that a county court judge shall be the revising officer, as is the case in Manitoba. In that province you may have a judge as revising officer, but it is usual to have a person who is not a judge. Under the circumstances, bearing in mind what the hon. member himself has laid down, that if we found there is a state of things in a province detrimental to the public interest, we should deal with it in the future, under that argument why should we, having found a state of things not desirable, not deal with it? I hope the hon. Minister will accept the amendment.

Mr. McNEILL. I would venture to say to the Solicitor General that I hope he will take seriously into consideration the arguments from this side of the House in favour of this amendment. I gather from what my hon. friend said earlier in the afternoon that the reason why he objected to a judge being appointed as reviser in the maritime provinces was that really there had been no evidence of any complaint as to the fairness with which the work had been done up to the present time. Surely the affidavits read by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) were a crushing reply as regards the province of Nova Scotia. I listened to what the hon. Finance Minister said in answer, but no one knows better than the Solicitor General that the Finance Minister did not attempt to reply to what the hon. member for Annapolis had advanced. He simply in a good-natured way made a joke as to the condition of the hon. member's county; but that was not a reply to a serious argument with respect to a serious subject. If no better reply can be made than that to the very reasonable proposition, that such important and valuable rights should be safeguarded in this manner, the Government, if they want to do what is right, and I am inclined to think they wish to do so, should accept a proposition of this kind. The only argument advanced with respect to New Brunswick was the argument that heretofore there had been no complaints. But, as has been pointed out, that is no argument with regard to the future, because the conditions then would be quite different. Now a political consideration of a much more important nature is to be introduced than any political consideration that had existed in the local election. Why should we run the risk, why should we leave everything wide open to any abuse that unscrupulous people may choose to be guilty of, or errors that people may unintentionally commit? I have listened very carefully to the discussion, and I have heard no argument to meet that which I thought was very reasonable pressure brought to bear from this side of the House on the Government in this matter, and unless they can adduce some arguments better than those already submitted, I think the country will hold them responsible for introducing a measure and forcing it through this House which cannot be defended on its merits. I am open to conviction, but I have heard nothing to convince me, no argument, so far as my mind is capable of weighing matters, in answer to the fair statement that the electors should be protected by an impartial tribunal in the last resort. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) is deriving benefit—I hope he is deriving benefit from this discussion. I listened with some attention to the friendly and good-humoured criticism he made as to my remarks the other day, and I have not much to complain of except in one respect, and I was sorry when I heard the remark. He said that when he listened to me he sometimes felt as if he were in church. I say I was sorry to hear him make that remark, because I can only accept it as evidence that the hon. gentleman is not in church as often as he ought to be.

Mr. RUSSELL. I would be obliged to go more frequently if I had not these occasional opportunities of listening to lectures from my hon. friend.

Mr. McNEILL. I should be very glad if my remarks in this House had a beneficial effect on the hon. gentleman. I may say to him in that context that while I am glad to learn that what I say in this House has a beneficial effect upon him, his speeches have also a beneficial effect on me, because when I listen to my hon. friend, as I always do, and endeavour to follow the very clever, ingenious and subtle threads of his finely spun arguments, my dull brain endures torment which bring up before me a vision not of a church, but of a very different place. If, as is sometimes said, our sins here are used as whips to scourge us in another world, I ask myself if it is possible that in the hereafter my hon. friend, as a punishment for what he has done here amiss, will be condemned to continue to strain his intellect in endeavours to make the worse appear the better cause throughout the ages; and that I for my offences (which I fear are much more grievous than those of my hon. friend) shall be condemned, still for ever and ever, to strive to follow his arguments.

Mr. Chairman, that would be a terrible eternity. The thought is altogether too painful, but it has this in it that is good: it has a fine deterrent effect upon me. And when I see my hon. friend rise, as I do see him rise often in this House, and with that splendid chivalrous spirit he evinces, fling himself into the breach in defence of his party—and always when his party needs his help most; that is, when their cause is worst—when I see him do that, I think of this fearful future that may be in store for us, and I determine upon a less heroic course; I determine to do as I have done in the past, and sometimes—only sometimes—to allow my conscience to make a coward of me.

Mr. QUINN. Without wishing to draw the attention of the House away from the amendment, I would ask the Solicitor General if he has made any provision for overcoming the difficulties which present themselves under sections 13 and 14 of the Quebec Election Act. While these disabilities may not come under section 5 of the present Bill, there seems to be great doubt about it at any rate. I would ask the Solicitor General if he has given these two sections consideration, and to explain the manner in which he intends to get over the difficulty there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I may say at once that the provisions for disqualifications shall be amended in such a way as to cover the sections which my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) refers to. Now, it seems to me that a great deal of evil has been spoken of the New Brunswick law—I will not say because those who spoke it were unfamiliar with the law—but because probably they have overlooked some of its dispositions. Let me show the safeguards which surround the making of the lists in New Brunswick. The first thing that is done, is that the assessor of the municipality in each year makes a list of the names of all male persons, and enters them upon the assessors' list for the parish, stating opposite each name the amount of real estate, personal property, income, and so forth. The assessors then deliver these lists to the revisers. Now, these revisers are the county councillors selected by the municipal electors to conduct their municipal affairs. You have in the first instance the list prepared by the assessor under the sanction of his oath, and his obligation to the municipality. He takes that list to the revisers or to the municipal councillors, and they revise it a second time, and these men after all are not political partisans. They are men who are selected by the ratepayers to conduct their municipal affairs, and they are supposed to represent both political parties. Speaking from my knowledge of my own province, it is very rare that politics enter into the choice of municipal councillors in the rural municipalities. They are selected to a large extent because of their position in the community, and because of their capacity to render good and faithful service to the ratepayers. You have therefore in New Brunswick the draft of the lists prepared by the assessors, and after these lists have passed from their hands—

Mr. McINERNEY. The assessors do not make the electoral lists at all; they simply make the assessment list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 28 of the New Brunswick Act concludes by saying that the persons on the list shall be those who are entitled to register their vote. Of course I have only the law to guide me, but that appears to be the law. When these municipal revisers revise the list, then it goes to the sheriff of the county, who makes the distribution pointed out by the Minister of Railways. But that is not all. If the attention of the sheriff is drawn to the fact that the name of a person entitled to be on that list has been omitted, then it is the duty of the sheriff to apply to the county court judge and have the name put on the list. Now, after you have all these precautions, what more guarantee do you want.

Mr. McALISTER. You cannot take any name off after it has been put on.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Quite true, but that list has been already revised by the assessors and by the revisers, and the defect likely to occur in any list is that a name may be omitted, not that one is put wrongfully on. I would like to point out to my hon. friend that it seems to me that this procedure under the New Brunswick Act compares very favourably with the procedure adopted under the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under the Dominion Franchise Act there is a right of appeal to both parties.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, where the revising officer is not a judge.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend surely does not mean to say that under the Dominion Act the list would then be complete?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say that under the Act the list is complete without appeal. The revising barrister is the complete master of the situation, except where he is not a county court judge, in which case there is an appeal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The revising officer makes his list up from the assessment roll—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Or from any other memorandum he can put his hands on.

Mr. MONTAGUE—Or from any other memorandum he can put his hands on, as the hon. gentleman says. That list is then posted up in a public place where all parties can see it, and then all parties have a right to appeal as to names that have been improperly left off, in their opinion, and as to names that have been improperly added, in their opinion. Even when the revising officer is a judge, there is the same appeal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My statement is based on section 33, which provides that in any case in which the revising officer is not also a judge, there shall be the right of appeal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is from the final list, but there is always the right of appeal in the case of the list as prepared by the revising barrister, to have names taken off or put on, and there is a court held in every district or municipality where the parties have an opportunity to bring their evidence.

Mr. HUGHES. And I may add that there is a final court, in which the reviser is not a judge, where appeals may be taken.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am talking of appeals and my hon. friend is talking of revisions; that is the difference between us.

Mr. McDUGALL. Suppose the attention of the sheriff is called to the fact that certain names are left off the list that should be on, or certain names have been put on the list that should not be on, and the sheriff is not inclined to lay the matter before a judge, is any means being now provided for forcing the sheriff to bring the matter before a judge? Suppose it happens that the sheriff himself is charged with having put names on the list that should not be there, and the man aggrieved goes to the sheriff and asks that the matter be referred to the county court judge, is there any provision to compel the sheriff to lay the matter before the county court judge?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I assume that in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, as elsewhere, public officers will do their duty; I do not want to make any exception with regard to these provinces, or to assume that public officers there will not do what they do elsewhere.

Mr. HAGGART. The other evening I put a question to my hon. friend the Solicitor General, but I have not seen it answered yet, and I would like, if possible, to get an answer from him. In subsection "a" it is provided:

The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Now, I think there is no doubt that that is a power delegated by the Dominion Parliament to the provincial legislature, to determine the qualifications of a voter from time to time. One of my hon. friends the other evening quoted section 41 of the British North America Act with reference to the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada on the subject of the franchise, as follows:—

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely: the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers,—

And so on—

—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

To my mind, that gives to the Dominion Parliament, after a certain event, the exclusive jurisdiction over legislation in reference to the qualifications of voters for the election of members of this House. There is no dispute about that. But under this Bill you propose to delegate that power to the provincial legislatures, and I ask the Solicitor General whether, in his opinion, the Parliament of Canada can delegate to a provincial parliament a power which is conferred upon it in express terms, to alter the qualifications of voters from time to time. I am aware of the powers of delegation. I am aware that a provincial legislature can delegate to a municipality the power of making by-laws for certain purposes, with pains and penalties attached. But my contention is that a power so explicitly given to the Dominion Parliament as this is cannot be delegated to a provincial legislature. The contention of the hon. gentleman, as I heard him the other evening, was that we were fixing the franchise. We are doing no such thing. If we adopt the franchise of a provincial legislature, whatever that franchise is at the time, there is no doubt about our power to do so. But that is not what the hon. gentleman does in this Bill. The logical inference from the clause I have read is that the Bill gives the provincial authority power from time to time to fix what shall be the qualifications of an elector for the Dominion House of Commons. If you can delegate that, why can you not go further and let the provincial legislature fix the oath to be taken by the voter, appoint the returning officers, fix their powers and duties, and fix the proceedings at the elections?

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. HAGGART. At six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was addressing a few words on the question of jurisdiction, as to whether the Dominion Parliament could legally delegate its powers to the provincial legislatures. I was about to quote from Todd on Dominion control in matters of legislation, Vol. 2, in which, speaking on the subject of the delegation of federal powers, he says:

In any case where, in the distribution of powers in the British North America Act, certain matters are assigned to the legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament, it is not competent for that body to delegate its functions to the local legislature, so as by an absolute grant of discretionary powers to enable the local authority to deal with the matter itself. It is otherwise, however, if the Dominion Parliament merely accepts and ratifies arrangements made or to be made in accordance with its own legislation on the subject. Where plenary powers of legislation exist as to particular subjects, whether in an Imperial or in a provincial legislature, they may be well exercised, either absolutely or conditionally.

I notice that the question has never been decided by the Imperial Privy Council. It arose in several cases which were argued before that council, but they avoid that point altogether and decided on other issues. They carefully avoid giving any special opinion as to whether the powers of the Dominion Government could be delegated to a local legislature. There can be no doubt as to the delegation of certain powers. I would just draw the attention of the hon. Solicitor General again to what the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction over, as regards matters of election and franchise:

The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected, or sit, or vote as members of the House of Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections and proceedings.

If you can delegate this power to provincial legislatures, you could also delegate the power of regulating proceedings at elections, the period during which elections may continue, the trial of controverted elections, &c. I cannot find any express decisions upon the matter as I have already stated. There are a few cases in which some of the judges of the provincial courts have held one way and some the other. Some have gone so far as to say—although their decision has been overruled—that we could not delegate the power of trying controverted elections to the provincial courts. I think it has been firmly established that we can. I can understand the delegation of a power like that because it is a conditional power, but an absolute power such as we propose to delegate under this Bill—the power to fix from time to time the franchise of a province—I doubt whether we have the authority under the constitution to do it. It is a question of course on which the courts may hold a different opinion, and I think we are entitled to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. I suppose my hon. friend the Solicitor General has entered into the question thoroughly. There is another reason why I do not think this power can be delegated. The confederation of the provinces was the result of a compromise, to which every province was a party as well as the Dominion and the Imperial authorities. If we can delegate powers to the different provinces why can we not delegate them to a separate province? Why could we not divest ourselves of all the powers we are possessed of and give them to one particular province? That would be entirely contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, because that Act was a contract entered into by the different provinces, the Dominion Government and the Imperial Government, and you could not divest yourself of your powers and delegate them to one or two provinces without consulting the others. That never was intended by the British North America Act. I may be entirely mistaken, but I think that this delegating by one legislature of its powers to another or others is not correct in principle. I am aware that in India the question arose, in the celebrated case of the Queen vs. Burah, of the delegation of power, but it has no application to this case. That was a case in which the authority in England, as constituted by the Act, delegated power to a Governor General, I think it was.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. To the Lieutenant-governor of a province.

Mr. HAGGART. I can understand a legislature delegating some of its powers to one of its own executive for the purpose of carrying out a particular object, but a power which is vested so peremptorily in ourselves as that of fixing our own franchise and the regulation of the machinery of elections, I doubt whether that can be delegated to a provincial authority.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am sure that I have no fault to find with my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) for raising this question, because it is really the important question in the whole of this matter; and I am prepared to admit now that if this were a case in which we were attempting to delegate to the provincial legislatures powers that we are called upon to exercise, there would be a very serious question as to our right to do so. My argument has been—I think I have stated it before—that we are not delegating our powers. I may say in this connection that I do not wish to make any cheap display of knowledge on the question, nor to affect to know more than the majority of other hon. gentlemen. My argument is, in substance, that we are adopting the provincial franchises, and there is the difference between my position and that of my hon. friend. He says that we are delegating to the local legislatures the power to regulate our franchise. I say we are adopting the franchises that the local legislatures have adopted for themselves.

Mr. HAGGART. They may change it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, but the hon. gentleman must remember that an Act of Parliament speaks at the time it is brought into application. This Act of Parliament, for instance, will speak when the election is held, and it will say that the election is held on the provincial list, and these are the lists we now adopt. There is nothing new about this. The leading case on this subject—and it is a great pleasure to me, if I may be permitted to say so, that a layman is willing to discuss the matter from the standpoint of a lawyer—is that of the Queen vs. Burah, L. R. 3 Ap. Cas., which arose under an Act passed by the Governor General of India, but that is not our case. And I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to this, that in the Franchise Act of 1894, prepared by Sir John Thompson, he will find that the same principle that I seek to apply in this Act is adopted. Section 4 of that Act reads in this way:

Except as herein afterwards otherwise provided, the qualification of voters at a Dominion election shall, in any province of Canada, be that established by the laws in force in such province—

Exactly the words I have adopted here. Sir John Thompson's Act goes on to say:

—that shall be that established by the laws in force in such province on the first day of June in the year during which the lists for use in such election were prepared for qualification of voters at a provincial election.

That is to say, the principle adopted is that we make our own Act the Act of the provincial legislature absolutely, as if we were to provide that a man who had the qualification necessary to enable him to vote in the provincial election would have the right to vote at a Dominion election. That is not delegating power to make our franchise, but it is a declaration, on the part of this Parliament, that the qualification of a voter in an election to this Parliament shall be the same as for a provincial election. Whether my contention is right or wrong, I trust, at least, I have made it clear. It is just as though we were to say that a man possessed of so much property or of such an income should have the right to vote. We say that if the provincial legislature selects a man as qualified to vote at a provincial election, that man shall have the right to vote at a Dominion election. I must confess that I can see but little comfort to be drawn from the constitution of the United States. Under that constitution the power to fix the franchise of electors for the House of Representatives was delegated at the outset, or rather it was given to the states. There is no recalling that, any more than there is a right in our Parliament, as long as the Confederation Act remains as it is, to give to the local legislature the right to make the federal franchise. The principles to be applied in interpreting the United States constitution are entirely different, in my opinion, from those to be applied in reading our own constitution. I may say, without taking up unnecessary time, if those interested in this question will look up the case of the Queen vs. Rorke, 32 Upper Canada Common Pleas, they will find there that the local laws as to the making of jury lists in criminal trials were declared to be constitutional. Allow me to proceed further and draw your attention to 35 Vic., chap 14. You will see that it is there enacted that voters' lists in Ontario for the Dominion election shall be the same as for election in the Ontario legislature. So far back as 35 Vic., we adopted for Ontario the lists in force for the general election. And the point has never been raised that this was ultra vires.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman this question: Suppose that this law is passed now, in the province of Nova Scotia the qualification for a voter is $300 of real estate and personal property, or $150 of real estate alone. Suppose that a year hence the legislature of Nova Scotia changes that law and makes the qualification $100 or $50, or even adopts universal suffrage, would not that change the franchise which we are now adopting? If the election for the Dominion Parliament is held subsequent to that change by the local legislature, should we not then be adopting a franchise that does not now exist, and would not that change in the franchise be brought about by the interference of a local legislature?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The theory of the legislation is that the statute speaks at the time it is put into operation, and if such a change takes place, this would speak after the change had taken place, and the intention of this legislature would be to accept the franchise as arranged at the time the statute was brought into operation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It seems to me that all the danger of delegating our power in that regard exists notwithstanding the fine distinction which has been drawn by my hon. friend the Solicitor General. Supposing this Parliament to-day adopts this measure, and suppose that between now and the time the next Dominion election takes place, one of the provinces of the Dominion places the qualification so high that three-fourths of the former electorate would be disqualified in that province, if I understand correctly the argument of the Solicitor General, it would be quite outside the function of this Parliament, I mean, so far as the disfranchisement of electors is concerned, and the disfranchisement would be operative in our elections also. That is to say, the intention of this Parliament would not be carried out by reason of the fact that the powers we undoubtedly have under the constitution were, in practice, delegated to the provincial legislatures and exercised by them.

It appears to me that it opens the door to great abuse. All the argument this afternoon has been as regards what has been done in the provinces and what has not been done in the provinces. I take it that what this Parliament ought to do is to safeguard the future, and not to place in the hands of a provincial authority a power which may be exercised in such a way as to do the very opposite thing to that which this Parliament intends now to do as regards the franchise upon which voters shall be qualified to vote for elections to the House of Commons. As I understand the Solicitor General, he says that no matter what change is made in the franchise law of the provinces between now and an election for the House of Commons, no matter how radical the change may be, in the way in which he puts it, this Act is for that legislation as well as for what exists at the present time. Therefore this Parliament is in the strange position of being asked to express its opinion favourably as regards legislation which does not exist now, perhaps not even in the imagination of the provincial authorities, but which may be called into existence and may be injurious to the very existence of this Parliament. We are ratifying in advance legislation of which we know nothing, and of which we will not know anything perhaps until just on the eve of a general election in this country. That undoubtedly seems to me the trend of the argument of the Solicitor General, it is an absurd position, he is asking this Parliament to pass an Act which is extraordinary in its nature, and which may work very great injury to the Parliament of Canada.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If any such absurd change were to be made by a local legislature, necessarily, if we did not intend to be accomplices in it, we would require to change our legislation accordingly. But if a change ever takes place, and we allow it to go into operation without interfering with it, then we will have to be responsible for it, by saying that we adopt that provision of the local legislature. But any such change as my hon. friend points out, must be made with our knowledge and with our approval, if we do not interfere with it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But my hon. friend sees that the change may be made at a date when it is impossible for us to remedy it, but we will have to go to the country on it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is one of the disadvantages of not being here all the time. We tried to remedy that by the amending clause "c" so as to take the list in force six days before the election.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. My hon. friend the Solicitor General has given us to-night his views about this Bill. He thinks we are not delegating our powers to the local legislature to determine upon what franchise we should sit in this House. I may say that while I am inclined to agree with him, I cannot understand how his opinion on this question should be so diametrically opposed to that expressed by the leader of this House when discussing this very same question the other evening. Now, here is what the right hon. gentleman said, in answer to a remark of Sir Charles Tupper:—

The question is whether this franchise is to be regulated by this Parliament or by the local legislatures, and upon that question we differ. The hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the ground that this Parliament should regulate the franchise, while we have taken the ground that the best method of dealing with it, in view of our complicated government under a federated system, is to have one uniform franchise for each province and for the Dominion, that is to say, that the same authority which regulates the franchise for the local legislature should also regulate it for the Dominion Parliament. Now this is the principle upon which this Bill is based, and I claim that it is the correct one.

This is the principle upon which the right hon. gentleman states that this Bill is based in establishing the franchise upon which we are to sit in this House. I say that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) who has just spoken states that we have not the power to delegate our authority to any local legislature, his objection is well taken. Still, the opinion of the Solicitor General to the contrary notwithstanding, we have it from the lips of the right hon. Premier that the very principle we are fighting against is the principle upon which the Bill we are now discussing is based. I hope that the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will find a way to agree amongst themselves before they attempt to enlighten us.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to ask the Solicitor General a question as to the names of electors who are omitted from the list, even the list finally revised by the judge or other authority. Is there to be any mode by which these electors are to have an opportunity of getting on?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not on the list upon which they vote.

Mr. HUGHES. By tendered ballot?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not by tendered ballot as you have it in Ontario. If I may be permitted to criticise anything that is done in Ontario, I would not say that is a good system. I intend that a man should be able to vote on tendering his affidavit, and I have a form of affidavit here that will come up immediately after this section. I have communicated it to some of my friends on the other side of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. I cannot at all agree with the argument of the Solicitor General in answer to the position I took. I have no doubt we have the power to enact a law of the Ontario Government, or of any other provincial government, without specifying what is in the Act, we can adopt the Act in extenso. The Solicitor General says that we are not delegating powers here, that we are only adopting an Act which may be, as he says, changed from time to time by the provincial authorities. Surely that is delegating power. I admit that we can adopt an Act of the provincial authorities in extenso and say that that shall be the law of the country. But when we say whatever law you pass from time to time shall be the law of the country, although we have power and jurisdiction over the matter, we delegate that power to the provincial legislature. I cannot understand it in any other light than that. It is clear as can be under the clause which he proposes under the Act, that whatever the franchise may be, and however it may be changed from time to time by the provincial authorities, it becomes the law of this Dominion. If that is not delegating power to the provincial authorities to fix our franchise from time to time as they think proper, then I do not understand the meaning of words.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened in vain for any attempt by any hon. gentleman opposite to answer the question which has been pointedly and repeatedly put as to what earthly objection there can be to allowing a voter recourse to the courts of law if, in any instance, he considers that he is aggrieved by not being placed upon the voters' list. The Solicitor General and other speakers have argued all around that question. In the first place it is said that most of the revising officers are county court judges. That argument evidently does not meet the case. It does not meet the case in Manitoba, about which the argument has been grouped mainly with respect to that matter, because in Manitoba numbers of the revising officers are not county court judges. We have been met by another argument that in making a demand for this we are raising imaginary difficulties, and that has been supported by reference to New Brunswick, where the sheriffs are said to have performed their duties in a non-partisan way and where, as some members have expressed it, no difficulty has been met and no complaint has been heard. That, however, does not meet the argument at all. What has been is not a good guide as to what will be, especially as to what will be under changed conditions. And in all legislation, and more especially legislation that touches the rights of voters and the franchise, you are not simply to take things as they exist, but to frame your legislation in view of what is possible, not even as to what is probable, in the way of any successful attempt to either defraud a bona fide voter of his right to vote or place a voter on the list who has not right to vote, and in so far trench on the right of the franchise and the results of the franchise. So having listened to all the speakers, I think there has not been a single member, even the Solicitor General, who is evidently disposed to meet the matter fairly, who has made a reply to that question, viz., what objection there is to interpose the courts between the elector and any invasion of his rights in any way. Who is to be injured by having that safeguard? That is a plain question, then if there is any possibility—and legislation provides for possibilities, if there are 99 revising officers who do right and one in whom there is a possibility of doing wrong, the legislature provides for the one-hundredth individual and does not take account of the 99. All legislation proceeds on that basis, and the pertinent question that is put and to which an answer should be given in regard to such a possibility is, what is the objection to legislating for that case? That a question like that should be put to hon. gentlemen opposite and there should be a single moment's hesitancy for an answer in the affirmative is, as has been expressed on this side of the House, more than surprising. Sir, in 1885, in that long franchise debate that took place here, what was the burden of the then Opposition, the present Government party? It was that we were invading the rights of the electors. How? By putting their destiny in the hands of the revising barrister. But that revising barrister must be a barrister of five years' standing, was the reply. That did not satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. They were contending for a principle; this was an arbitrary revision. It was placed in the hands of an officer appointed by whom? By the Dominion Government. That statement was too narrow on which to base a principle. The principle was the burden of the argument advanced; it should not be within the power of the appointer, at that time being the Government, no matter what Government it was, to deliver over the preparation and revision of the lists to any appointee of its own. That was the broad ground on which the principle was based. Then came an answer which was thought to be a complete one: Your liberties and rights are not left to the sole will and arbitrary whim of the revising officer. He has to hold open court, he is subject to the criticism of the press, subject to public opinion, he must come out before the constituency and at this place and the other place, after having posted up his lists, he must face public opinion, the legal light that may be brought to bear, and he must put on and take off names according to the arguments presented. That did not satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. Then there was to be a final court of revision held by the revising barrister, and there was a second guarantee provided. That did not satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. Then as a final and conclusive answer, it was pointed out that there were the courts of law, that an appeal can be had to an impartial tribunal, that the courts are open to the electors, and after the revising officer has done everything within his power, he not being a county court judge, an appeal can be taken to a county court judge or a superior court judge. That was not even satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite. But the Act of 1885 embodied that provision and embodied that principle, and the Liberal-Conservatives held that everything had been done to satisfy any reasonable demand, that every voter had an opportunity in every case as the final court of appeal to take his case before the county court judge, who was the revising barrister, or if the revising barrister was not a judge, then at all events to a county court judge. No less than the sanction and the legal tradition embodied in a bona fide judge were to constitute in any case the final tribunal that stood between the individual elector and any invasion of his rights. Even with all those safeguards and all those provisions in the Act of 1885, every succeeding year the Liberals, calling themselves so, and priding themselves upon the name and the traditions which mingled with that name and the principles upon which that party rested, have not ceased to decry the Act, both on that ground and on the other ground of expense. But let me call your attention, Mr. Chairman, and the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite have never ceased from 1885 to the present time to decry the Act on the ground of revision of the lists. Now the tables are turned, and a change has taken place; those hon. gentlemen are enacting legislation and Liberal-Conservatives are on the Opposition benches. Now, when an attempt is made to put a franchise Bill in the shape of law, who is it that declares it to be dangerous to give the right of appeal to the electors to go before a judge and the courts of the land? Those same Liberals who in 1885, and from that year up, have declared that that was a cardinal principle and they stood by it, that the appointee of any partisan Government should never have the power of revising the lists. Where are we to-day? We are relegating to the tender mercies of the appointees of seven local partisan governments, this power. They are partisans one way or the other. On principle it makes not a bit of difference to which party they belong, and I suppose it was on principle the declarations from 1885 up were made by the Liberal party of this country. Now the electors are relegated to the tender mercies of a partisan Government in Manitoba and in every other province. Statements have been made, and I take them up here for the sake of the argument, that matters are not so bad, that we must not lose faith in human nature, and that we must believe that gentlemen when they are appointed to office, remain gentlemen still with the instincts of fair-play even towards party opponents. And so it is declared that the sheriffs in the province of New Brunswick, to wit, have always performed their duties in a fair and gentlemanly way.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They are not revisers.

Mr. FOSTER. Who said they were? If my hon. friend would interrupt pertinently he might put his interruptions into shape. I was not talking about revisers, I was talking about the sheriffs of the province of New Brunswick, and I was going on to state that it had been said in this House that the sheriffs of the province of New Brunswick had always performed their duties well, and that there had been no complaint against them. I am here to say that is true; I am not here to declare want of confidence in the sheriffs that have been, or even in the sheriffs that are now in the province of New Brunswick. In my political fortunes, so far as franchise lists are concerned, I have in the province of New Brunswick trusted my fate to the sheriffs of the different counties, one a Conservative and the other a Liberal, and I have never had any cause of complaint against them, neither have I had any favours from either. But I want to say this to the Solicitor General: That he cannot argue as to the sheriffs of New Brunswick of the future, from the action of the sheriffs of New Brunswick in the past, nor from the revisers of the past to the revisers of the future, because he is now importing different conditions. What has been the state of things in the province of New Brunswick? So far as municipal contests are concerned, we have been practically free from anything like partisan strife. I make that statement advisedly. I say that in the province of New Brunswick up to the present time, so far as municipal affairs are concerned, they have been practically free from partisan strife on the lines of either the local government or the Dominion Government.

Mr. FOSTER.

There have been good causes for that. Partisanship has not taken the immense strides in the province of New Brunswick that it has in the province of Ontario or in the province of Manitoba for instance. And why? Because in Ontario and Manitoba gradually the line of differences between the public men, and between the electors from the very top down to the very bottom, has taken cleavage on Dominion lines, and in Ontario to-day it is a departure from the rule when you find anywhere in municipal contests the line not practically set as between Liberals and Conservatives. From the very commencement of the process which afterwards results in the completed franchise lists, you have the dividing line of Liberal and Conservative, of Grit and of Tory. That is why in the province of Ontario, partisanship—and I am not speaking of partisanship in an offensive sense—rules right down to the very beginnings of the municipal revision; down to the very list which was made by the assessors. It has not been so in the province of New Brunswick; and why? It is because of the fact that for a number of years the Government of New Brunswick has been called a coalition government where Liberals and Conservatives, where Grits and Tories, if you call them so, have made up the elements of a government that has worked in common, if not always in harmony; and with a coalition government of that kind, it has been practically impossible to draw the lines on Dominion issues. Now, you are going to change all that in New Brunswick, and the first step in that change will be irrevocably taken when the Solicitor General's Bill becomes law. You will then have the highest contest of all, the contest for the Dominion representative, the contest for Dominion patronage, the contest for Dominion policies. You will have that laid upon the shoulders of the assessors, from that to the revisers, and from that to the sheriffs, who put the lists in their completed shape. You are importing the idea by this very legislation which will find its way into the province of New Brunswick, and which will change in my opinion the trend of New Brunswick politics as regards the lines that separate the electors on the great public issues. Then you will have the sheriffs the appointees of a partisan government, after the coalition government has passed away, and a partisan government takes its place at Fredericton. You will then have Dominion patronage hanging from the top and Dominion issues impending, and you will have the line of cleavage with advance in greater degree from year to year. I submit to the Solicitor General that you will then have in New Brunswick a very different state of things from that which you have now. The process may be gradual, but the process will be certain, and the ultimate result will some day or other be reached. Therefore the argument you can make from past conditions in New Brunswick is not an argument that will apply to the future. The sheriff is the appointee of the Government, an appointee from year to year. At the present time a sheriff feels that if his behaviour is good he will be continued in office from year to year, no matter though he be a Liberal or a Conservative. That is because the appointing power is a coalition government, and no matter what stripe of politics the sheriff belongs to, he has political friends in the appointing power, and so the rule has been that the sheriffs have not been arbitrarily disturbed. Change this condition of things; make a partisan government there; and does any one doubt for a single moment whether a Liberal Government in the province of New Brunswick would appoint Liberal or Conservative sheriffs? Not at all. Does any one believe that a Liberal-Conservative Government in New Brunswick, under these conditions would appoint a Liberal as a sheriff? Not at all. The appointment will go to what are considered the best men in the party which rules in the appointing power. Then what will you have? You will have in the province of New Brunswick a partisan government appointing a partisan sheriff, and giving into that sheriff's hands large powers with reference to the final revision of the lists. You give no authority or power by which a partisan on the other side who is aggrieved, whether he is rightly or wrongly aggrieved, and wishes to test his right, can get it before the courts of the country. I ask whether that is fair or not. I have gone thus lengthily into the New Brunswick matter to show you what has been the state of things, to show you what will probably be the state of things when you inject an altogether new element in the province of New Brunswick. Now let us go upon the general principle, and I come back to the point I was at when I made the divergence with reference to New Brunswick. I ask again, if it is not surprising that we, as Liberal-Conservatives, have to wait a single moment for an answer from a Liberal Government and a Liberal party when we simply ask that the courts of law be open to us if we are aggrieved in the matter of our franchise? What good reason is there that this should not be granted to us? We on this side might say: Now, you have taken away the Dominion Franchise Act, to which your great objection was that the lists were made by appointees of a partisan government. That is your cause of grievance, your cause of complaint against the old franchise law; are we better under the new? That is the question. If you had any principle in the matter, and you were protesting on the ground of principle against a partisan appointee making up the list for you, does not the same grievance exist to-day? Who are the registration clerks in the province of Manitoba? The appointees of a partisan government. Who are the revisers in the province of Manitoba? The appointees of a partisan government. Who are the revisers in the province of Ontario? The appointees of a partisan government.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The county court judges.

Mr. FOSTER. Always?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Invariably, in Ontario.

Mr. FOSTER. Granted, then, that they are in Ontario. Ontario is not the only province of the Dominion. My hon. friend stands on a very slim footing if, when I am arguing for a general principle, and I carry it out in concrete instances, in one province after another, and I name one province in seven, he feels justified in saying that there are county court judges there.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We ought to deal with facts.

Mr. FOSTER. Am I not dealing in facts?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You just made the statement that Ontario had partisan revisers.

Mr. McINERNEY. I wish to say that they are partisan. The county court judges only act on appeal.

Mr. FOSTER. And the county court judge and the reviser are the same man?

Mr. McINERNEY. Not the same man.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The county court judge revises finally.

Mr. FOSTER. When the charge of dishonesty in argument is bandied from one side of the House to the other by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, we had better take a little time and find out where we are at.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Better read the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is making an impertinent interruption again.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I deny the charge.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, after we have disposed of this weightier matter, my hon. friend and myself will take up that little matter and try it out. My hon. friend is pretty well tired out.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think you are dried out more than I am.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a possibility that, not taking as much to keep myself moist as my hon. friend, I may be.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I think you take more in proportion to your avoirdupois.

Mr. FOSTER. I will also state that it is my deliberate conviction that I am not so often dry as my hon. friend.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, but you don't listen to so many dry speeches.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has no recollection of the inimitable speeches he made three nights ago, when he three times repeated the same identical speech, in which he demanded from his friend the Minister of Inland Revenue that he would immediately take the tax off tobacco, because he, an ardent supporter, asked him. A little while afterwards he changed, because some one whispered that it was the Minister of Finance and not the Minister of Inland Revenue; so he made three identical speeches with reference to the tax on tobacco; and, when some good friend handed him the cigars, he stopped all the talk about taking the duty off tobacco, and left the room with the cigars in his pocket, and enjoyed them better than we did the speeches.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When I am wrong, I admit it, but you will go on and stick to it, wrong or right.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is in such good nature, that I will not discuss that question any longer. What I want to get at is this. It is said that I was dishonest in making my argument. I want to know from the Solicitor General, who is my guide in this respect—

The PRIME MINISTER. Follow him, then.

Mr. FOSTER. I will follow him as far as he is right, and I will tell my right hon. friend that I would follow him and could follow him with a great deal more equanimity and good-will if my right hon. friend would just allow the Solicitor General to do what in his heart he is minded to do. But the trouble is that when the Solicitor General is warped from his straightforward view of what he wants to do by the pedantic theories of my right hon. friend who leads the Government, then I find it impossible to follow exactly in the footsteps of the Solicitor General. In the province of Ontario, I want to ask the Solicitor General who it is that appoints the revising officer?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Here is what the statute says:

The list shall be subject to revision by the county judge.

Mr. CLANCY. That is on appeal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Call it what you like.

Mr. FOSTER. Practically, may I ask my hon. friend, who are the revising officers?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The county judge in the last instance.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are the revising officers up to the point of appeal?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CHARLTON. The municipal councils.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The county judge is the last to touch the list.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I have got enough to make the argument plain.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You have got the rudiments.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and I have a rude reminder of the rudiments over there.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You will understand anything rude.

Mr. FOSTER. I was going on to say that if the Liberals made their plea on anything, they made it on the principle of being freed from the activity of a partisan government in making up their lists, and I began to quote instances of where under this Bill, if it became law, we would be landed in exactly the same predicament. The appointing power, under this Bill, will be different. It will no longer be the Dominion Government but the appointing power in each case will be the local governments. The point I drove home to the hon. gentlemen opposite was this, that whereas they cried out against this thing for years, to-day, when they come into office and have the enacting power in their own hands, they are throwing the electoral lists back into the management of persons who are appointed by governments equally partisan as the Government of the Dominion, and consequently there is no betterment in that particular. I cited the instances of certain provinces in which this is undoubtedly true. I had begun to speak of the province of Ontario. In Ontario the revision of the lists is conducted by or under the supervision of the municipal councils, and municipal matters being run upon the same partisan lines as Dominion matters in that province, in a large degree, if not wholly, you are brought face to face with the same thing, namely, that a partisan body is conducting the revision of the lists, and that partisan body controls the lists up to the time of final appeal, when the list goes to a county court judge. That brings me to the very principle I am contending for, namely, that we should provide in this Bill, that in all the provinces as well as in the province of Ontario, before any list is perfect, it must go through the hands of a county court judge.

Now, I want to put this question to my hon. friend the Solicitor General. If he appeals to that as a right thing, if he cites, almost as destructive of my whole argument, the fact that in Ontario things are all right because a county court judge ultimately has the power of revision, what ground has he for refusing to make the same state of affairs the law in the other provinces of the Dominion which do not have it now. If he cites that as a protection against wrongdoing, and as something that ought to satisfy us, then we say to him: be so kind as to put the same protection and guarantee into your Bill to take effect in those provinces where the voters' list are not subject to the final revision of a county court judge. What reason in the world is there that our request should not be granted except the one the right hon. leader of the Government gives and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), namely, that we ought to give this whole thing over to the provincial authorities and not meddle with the methods or basis of the provincial franchises? Am I stating too much when I make that statement? I listened very attentively to the speech of the right hon. gentleman the other night, when he came into this House and suddenly extinguished two such bright and shining lights as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), both of whom had been vociferating, at the top of their voices, a determined protest against the iniquity of taking off from the present franchise list any class of people who had a franchise hitherto conferred upon them, and, in the individual case, against taking the Indian from the voters' list. My right hon. friend came in at that juncture, when things seemed to be going along very well for that idea, when the Solicitor General had risen in his place, and in answer to repeated protests from this side that Dominion officials would be disfranchised under this proposed law, who enjoyed the franchise under the Dominion Act, declared that he appreciated the difficulty and was going to propose an amendment to meet it. When the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) had made his plea that the Indians should be kept on, when the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) had recanted all his former opinions and declared for the continuance of the Indian vote, and when things appeared to be swimming along in the direction of having these bald and glaring evils in the Bill remedied my right hon. friend came in and laid down the law. Since then we have not heard a squeak from the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) or a word from the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd). Both of them had the courage of their convictions to such an extent that they were conveniently absent, if I mistake not, when the vote was taken on the very amendment which the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) put before the House. What was the cap which the right hon. gentleman placed over these bright and shining lights. He took the ground, squarely and distinctly, that you could not have any half way measures, that you must either have a Dominion franchise framed by this House on independent lines, or leave altogether in the hands of the provinces. Let me quote what he said:

The question is whether this franchise is to be regulated by this Parliament or by the local legislatures, and upon that question we differ.

That puts the question fairly. Shall the franchise be made by this Parliament, or shall it be made by the local authorities? No half way ground. We differ on this, he said. Your side is in favour of the franchise being made by the Dominion Parliament; I am in favour of its being made by the local legislature:

Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the ground that this Parliament should regulate the franchise, while we have taken the ground that the best method of dealing with it, in view of our complicated government under a federative system, is to have one uniform franchise for each province and for the Dominion, that is to say, that the same authority which regulates the franchise for the local legislature should also regulate it for the Dominion Parliament. Now this is the principle upon which this Bill is based, and I claim that it is the correct one.

There could be no clearer statement than that. There is to be no interference of the federal power with the local power. Reasoning down, the hon. gentleman came to the conclusion that the local legislature was the best judge, and, therefore, should fix the franchise. Reasoning logically upon that, he must deny the right of the federal power to interfere in the least with the acts upon this subject of the local legislature. There can be no half way ground here; it must be the one thing or the other. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) spoke to-day and took the same ground. And he brought forward a tremendous authority. He read from a pamphlet which he held in his hands, which he declared, was the declaration of principles of the Liberal party issued and promulgated in 1893. And he turned to those recreant members, as some of them are, and declared that he was bound and the Liberal party should be bound by the party declaration. He went further and said that those hon. gentlemen who proposed to graft upon the local legislation little twigs of amendment by this Parliament were interfering with the principle which was laid down by the party in 1893, and with the principle on which the leader of the Government had declared that this Bill was based. He declared that if they persisted in this, instead of having a well defined and soundly based Bill, they would create some sort of a political hermaphrodite, so to speak. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) was exactly at one with the leader of the Government. Where does the leader of the Government stand now with regard to this matter? Just a few moments ago we heard from the Solicitor General that he proposed to add to what the provincial legislatures had done. The local legislatures, being the proper authority to fix the franchise in the mind of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) have fixed the franchise. The Solicitor General proposes to enlarge the franchise fixed by the provincial legislature. Is my right hon. friend going to allow that? Where, then, is the consistency with what he lays down as the basic principle of this Bill, that it is the local legislatures that should do this thing? My right hon. friend is inconsistent and he is weak. He is inconsistent in that he allows a principle which he declares to be the principle of the Bill to be violated by the Solicitor General in the amendments he has given notice of, and he is weak because, having asserted a principle in this House, he is not strong enough to have it carried out but must give way to the Solicitor General and to opposing opinions on that side of the House with reference to this matter. On both these points my hon. friend has not solid ground to stand upon. If he takes the ground held from 1885 up, that you should not allow these lists to be made under the influence of partisan appointees, then I reply that he is running us into the hands of partisan appointees in almost every province. If he says that the legislatures and they alone should fix the franchises, he is inconsistent in allowing this body that he says is not the proper body to amend, to amplify and extend the lists which the local legislatures in their plenitude of knowledge and power in this matter have declared to be proper lists and lists that should be used. My right hon. friend cannot get out of that dilemma. Now, Sir, if he allows this God-given principle that the local legislatures and they alone should fix the franchise for this Dominion Parliament, to be extended in one instance, how can he object in another direction which simply gives to the individual voter the right of appealing to the courts of law to have his grievance heard and his franchise rights respected if they have been violated by a partisan appointee of a partisan Government in some one of the seven provinces of the Dominion? I want that view to go as strongly as possible before this committee and I believe it will go strongly before the country, and I believe that the good, sound, fair-play-loving common sense of this country will be with the Liberal-Conservatives in their demand—a demand that is not extreme in any way—that if in any province of Canada the courts are not open to the aggrieved elector, they shall be opened by the general enactment of this law so as to prevent, as far as possible, the invasion of the rights of a citizen to his vote.

Now, Sir, you may talk about the political millenium and as long and as earnestly as you please, but there is no political millenium in the province of Manitoba so far as the freedom from partisan spirit is concerned, and if that is true in the province of Manitoba I think I may say that it is true in most, if not all the provinces of the Dominion. There is just a possibility that partisan spirit, with its whole long line of spoils and patronage which depend upon it may influence the partisan registry clerk or revising officer, if not to put names on the list that should not be there, at least to avoid putting names on the lists which should be there. If there is the slightest possibility of this taking place in any one single province of the Dominion, it is the right of the prudent and careful legislature to see that these rights are guarded and that restraining enactments are passed to prevent the denial of right and the abuse of power.

Now, Sir, I have confined my argument to these points entirely. I do not go further. I might go further and ask why this Parliament should delegate the basis of its existence to other and lesser and various legislatures with powers that are generically different from those that we exercise. I have heard it stated this afternoon in the course of debate that the local legislature should make the franchise, that it was the best judge, that we in this Dominion House had nothing to say as to what they have made the franchise. The Solicitor General will not go so far as that, the Solicitor General could not so abnegate the functions of this high court of Parliament of Canada, and he is safeguarding the people against certain gross abuses, perhaps not actual but possible abuses, because he feels it possible that the local legislatures might go so far as to frame the franchise list in such a way as would make this Parliament a spectacle of contempt to the civilized world. And so he keeps his hand on the power that, in case of grave wrongs of that kind, Parliament may be able to defend itself and abolish the abuse.

But the very fact that he does that, is an incontestable argument to the deep-seated conviction in my hon. friend's mind that after all this is a sovereign legislature, and that it comports with its dignity and with its rights that it should have the unrestricted formation of the franchise upon which it exists, and to which it must go back for the vindication of its acts after its four or five years of existence. It is my deliberate conviction that if this enactment is made, and this is delegated to the local authorities, history will point out that it was an act not conceived in prudent statesmanship, an act from which evils have arisen in the course of the history of Canada; and I make the prophecy, although prophecy is dangerous, that the time will come when a Government and a Parliament sitting in these halls will go back to the principle that every great self-respecting Parliament must be the master of its own franchise, and must be able to say that the vital sources from which it draws its life shall be under its own protection, and not at the will or whim of a body which in its powers is different, and in its aims may be to a certain extent alien from the aims and aspirations of this Parliament.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend, in the course of his long and diffuse speech, has not scrupled to say that he had confined himself simply to the one proposition with which he set out. I will not controvert that assertion, because it would lead to no good end. I will simply endeavour to address myself to the one proposition which my hon. friend has endeavoured to establish before this House, namely, that in all the provinces where it is not provided by a local law that there shall be an appeal open to the elector after the formation of the lists, then this Parliament should provide for such an appeal. This is the proposition which my hon. friend has endeavoured to establish in a long and discursive speech of more than an hour's duration. Now, before I proceed any further, having, as I think, fairly stated my hon. friend's proposition, let us see where we stand. We are now upon subsection "a" of section 5 of this Act, which reads as follows:—

The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such persons to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

We have reached this point after many long and weary debates, that at last the principle of a provincial franchise is admitted. But whilst it is admitted by hon. gentlemen on the other side, admitted, I may say, not willingly but by force of circumstances, my hon. friend wants to have that principle supplemented by this other proposition contained in this amendment:

Provided that if any electoral district in provinces where there is no judicial revision of the electoral lists provided for, a dispute should arise as to the qualification to entitle any person to vote thereon, an appeal thereon shall lie to a county court judge having jurisdiction in that electoral district, but in any province where there are no county court judges, then to a judge of the superior court of the district having jurisdiction in said electoral district.

This amendment means, disentangled from the verbiage in which it is stated, that in any province where the lists are prepared by an authority which is not judicial, there shall lie an appeal to the judicial authority upon the preparation of the lists. This seems to be reasonable enough at first sight, and I would be disposed to adopt as abstract principles many of the reasons which were adduced by the hon. gentleman. I would to a large extent adopt also the many eloquent periods which he devoted to a vindication of Liberal principles. But, Sir, my hon. friend has confirmed once more the truth, that when a dyed in the wool Tory attempts to speak of Liberal principles, he is always apt to make very sad mistakes. Now, let us see the foundation on which we stand. It is that in every province we shall have the provincial franchise as the basis of the franchise upon which the members of this House are to be elected.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us understand each other. Is it my hon. friend's contention that we shall have the lists as they are provided for by the local legislature as the basis of our franchise, or as our franchise? There is a great distinction.

The PRIME MINISTER. I say that the principle laid down in this section does not admit of any discussion:

The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote thereat shall be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

Now, my hon. friend wants me to supplement that language in the manner which I have already indicated. Well, it is a matter of record that there are no two provinces in which the franchises are absolutely alike. They are alike in all provinces, in principle, they are alike mostly in the nature of the qualification of the electors, but they are not absolutely identical in their respective provisions. What does this prove? It proves the principle which my hon. friend has refused to admit up to this moment that the local franchise is necessarily, from its very nature, a local question to be determined by the local circumstances of the community in each province. My hon. friend will at least have to recognize this. The amendment which we have now before us has been considerably changed from what it was the other day when it was first presented. When it was first presented it did not contain a provision that this should apply only to certain provinces; it was to apply to all the provinces in which there exists an appeal as well as to provinces in which an appeal does not exist. Since that time the amendment has been restricted only to apply to those provinces in which there is no judicial appeal. Take the case of each province. Take the case of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. They are provinces where an appeal lies to the judicial authority. In those provinces the lists are prepared by the municipal authorities. In the province of Ontario the lists are prepared by the municipal bodies, and in the province of Quebec the lists are prepared by the municipal bodies. If any elector is not satisfied with the lists so prepared, if he feels aggrieved, he has an appeal to the judicial authority. In the province of New Brunswick there is nothing of the kind, there is no appeal to a judicial authority. In the province of Nova Scotia there is no appeal, either, to the judicial authority. My hon. friend says: Why should there not be an appeal to the judicial authority? The reason is very obvious, it is that in those provinces no want is felt for such an appeal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The PRIME MINISTER. Why, Sir, do not hon. gentlemen admit that statement?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, I have only to say this to my hon. friends on the other side of the House, that the people of New Brunswick are no greater fools than they are, and if they are satisfied with their franchise, it is because it has worked satisfactorily. So we have it in evidence, after this discussion which has taken place for two or three days, that for almost forty years the system which now prevails of preparing the lists in the province of New Brunswick, has not been altered. It is practically prepared by the municipal authorities themselves. There is an appeal, not as we understand an appeal, but a final revision by the sheriff. Will any man tell me that in the great province of New Brunswick, governed as it is by a system of representative government, governed as it is by party, by a ministry one side, whether it be a party ministry or a coalition ministry, and an opposition on the other side, if the people of that province had not been satisfied with their franchise there would not have been a member of the opposition so recreant to his duty as not to have introduced a Bill to reform it. But it has not been reformed. My hon. friend stated that the municipal authority which prepares the list is not biased by party politics, is not influenced by party spirit. In Ontario, though the lists are prepared by the municipal authority, in Quebec, though the lists are prepared by the municipal authority likewise, the people are not satisfied to allow the matter to rest there, and so it has been thought advisable to give an appeal to judicial authority.

Mr. FOSTER. Why?

The PRIME MINISTER. Because the people of those provinces were not satisfied with the system; and it has not been done in New Brunswick because the people of that province were satisfied with a different system. When I say that we have given the right of appeal to a judicial authority, what do I mean by that? That an appeal has been given to this Parliament. Certainly not. But that in the province of Ontario an appeal has been given to a judicial authority by the people themselves; and in respect to the province of Quebec an appeal likewise has been given by the people themselves. The people of Quebec, represented in their legislature, and the people of Ontario represented in their legislature, were not satisfied to leave the preparation of the lists to the municipal bodies alone. They preferred an appeal to the judicial authority. Here are the people of New Brunswick, represented in the very same manner, living under the same system of government, not providing for the same appeal because they are up to this moment satisfied with their present system. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) says the time may come when the municipal bodies which prepare the lists may be in-influenced by party politics and by party spirit. Certainly the time may come. But if the time ever comes when the people of New Brunswick feel that the system which has worked satisfactorily for forty years is no longer satisfactory, then they will do as the people of Ontario and Quebec have done, provide for a judicial appeal. But so long as the people of New Brunswick are satisfied with the system, why should not my hon. friend, who is a New Brunswicker himself, be satisfied? Does he claim more wisdom than all the men of the province, has he more wisdom than the whole electoral body of the province?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He thinks so.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not believe he thinks so. The hon. gentleman has undoubtedly been more theoretical than practical. We are legislating for practical men. I must say at once, with a great deal of humility, that when we prepared this measure it was with the idea that it would be in all respects perfect, not that it would be absolutely perfect. We knew that on the other side of the House there were angels, who were far and above all human imperfections, and we could not expect to satisfy them; but we will be able to satisfy every reasonable man in the House or out of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Are you going to violate the great principle for which you have been contending, the right of the people to be protected by judicial authority? My answer to that statement is that this might be a good argument perhaps in the legislature of New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, but so far as this Parliament is concerned it is no argument, because it is not in our province to look after that part of the case.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes. I say that if the people of New Brunswick, who understand their business and have representatives under their free parliamentary institutions, are satisfied to have elections carried on under a certain system, I am satisfied to adopt that same system for elections to this House, and to carry it out under the same principle and under the same franchise and by the same mode as that by which the people are satisfied to be represented in their own legislature. Who are the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia? They are only part and parcel of the great Canadian body, and it is idle to suppose that those men will be recreant to their duty and fail to understand their business. The whole argument advanced by the hon. gentleman is beside the question. The hon. gentleman has said that we would have under the present system, if this appeal was not granted, lists prepared by the appointees of a partisan government. I want to discuss the matter for a moment. I shall be glad to learn of any system under which lists are not prepared by appointees of a partisan government, whether federal, provincial or municipal; and I defy the hon. gentleman to give me such a system. It is natural for governments to have lists prepared by appointees of their own. It would be natural, since we are now undertaking to reform the present system, which is so bad that even hon. gentlemen opposite who have maintained it for twelve years, do not now defend it, to have the lists prepared by appointees of our own. We do not submit such a proposition; we do not want the lists prepared by our appointees. We are satisfied to have them prepared by either the provincial or municipal authorities. I am quite aware that hon. gentlemen opposite may say that the appointees of a provincial government are appointees of a partisan government. I want to put this question to my hon. friend: would he be more satisfied to have the lists prepared by the appointees of this Government? No, he would not. But whether the lists are prepared by appointees of this Government or appointees of the provincial government or the municipal authorities, in each case the appointees are more or less those of a partisan government. What we want is a system that has in it least of the partisan spirit, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I submit that there is no system we can devise that will possess less of a partisan spirit as regards the preparation of the lists than the system which prevails in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, where the lists are prepared by the municipal authorities. This is the answer I give to the question asked by my hon. friend. Let him get away from those high-sounding principles and phrases in which he has indulged, and if he will return to practical and common sense notions he will come to this view, that the amendment moved is not tenable in any way.

Mr. MILLS. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the right hon. the leader of the House, but when he tells us that the franchise laws of the different provinces are the least open to fraud I beg leave to take exception to his statement. I assert that no franchise law ever placed on the Statute-book has its gates thrown so wide open to fraud, as has the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia, notwithstanding that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us this afternoon that it was his little child and that he was proud of it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that.

Mr. MILLS. You said it was your own little child:

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On the contrary, I said that the substance of the Act had been the law of Nova Scotia for thirty-five years and that the particular feature as to the appeal to the sheriff was my my own child.

Mr. MILLS. The sheriff's appeal was put into the Act in 1889, and consequently part of the child was his.

The PRIME MINISTER. A promising boy.

Mr. MILLS. The Nova Scotia Franchise Act virtually amounts to universal suffrage. Any male voter who has attained the age of 21 years can have a vote under that Act, provided that the partisans allow him to get the full benefit of the law. But at the same time the Act is so framed that the revisers can have objections thrown in the way to such an extent that voters can be kept off, and particularly Liberal-Conservative voters. I will read some portions of that Act to show that it amounts to universal suffrage:

The following persons, of the full age of twenty-one years, and subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified by any section of this Act, or otherwise by law prevented from voting, shall be entitled to have their names entered upon the list of electors provided for by the section of this Act, and if so entered shall be entitled to vote at the election of members to serve in the House of Assembly. That is to say.

The Act recites the persons, namely: Those assessed for real property to the value of $150; of personal and real property to the value of $300, those persons exempted from taxation, yearly tenants of real property to the value of $150, the sons of persons in possession, the sons of widows, persons having a yearly income of $250, fishermen who at the time of the last assessment—not that they were assessed, but who at the time of the last assessment—were owners of boats, nets, fishing gear, tackle; or of boats, nets, fishing gear, tackle and real estate of the value of $150, if such property was within the county of which the polling district in which he claims a vote forms a part; workmen, tenants of companies and partners and joint tenants of certain real estate.

Those who have experience of the different franchise Acts of this country know well that in order to decide whom it is proper to place on the list, the reviser must have a legal training and a legal knowledge. Under the Nova Scotia law, courts are provided for, and revisers are provided to preside over these courts, but to a large extent these revisers are partisan heelers. As proof of their partisanship, their fraudulent partisanship, I have given instances to this House on more than one occasion. The Nova Scotia Act was passed after the Dominion Franchise Act, and to a certain extent it follows some of the qualifications of the Dominion law, but extended the franchise so far as income voters are concerned. It is more difficult to understand than the Dominion law, and consequently more difficult, particularly for laymen, to administer and interpret it. The sheriff was introduced into this Nova Scotia Act of 1889. Before 1883 the sheriffs were largely under the control of the judiciary of the province, but in that year, which was about the time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) came upon the political arena, the Government thought they desired an extension of their patronage and so they passed the Act making eighteen sheriffs, "good men and true," appointees of the local Government. It has been stated here that some of these sheriffs are Conservatives. There is, I believe, one who has been a Conservative in the province of Nova Scotia, namely, Sheriff McLean, of Shelburne, but I do not think there is another.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). What about the sheriff of Inverness?

Mr. MILLS. The people of Inverness change so much, sometimes they are Tory one year and Grit the next according to circumstances, and as I know little about them, I can only judge of whether they are Tory or Grit from the people whom I meet belonging to that county.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What about the sheriff of King's county?

Mr. MILLS. Sheriff Belcher—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I rather think Sheriff Belcher supported the Minister of Militia last election; at least I am so informed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS. At all events if he did not support him he was a very quiet opponent, and whether or not, the sheriffs know perfectly well that they are in the hands of the local Government of Nova Scotia, and they dare not do anything else than the bidding of that Government. They are appointed during good behaviour, and their good behaviour amounts to their doing the bidding of the local Government or else get out. As regards the county of Annapolis, I have nothing to say against Sheriff Gates. Sheriff Gates in business is a good, thorough, honest and consistent man, but Sheriff Gates is a partisan. He is not a trained lawyer, and I defy him to take the Franchise Act of 1889, and interpret it correctly from beginning to end with the different cases that may arise. It takes a lawyer to do it and a very good lawyer at that. It is impossible for Sheriff Gates to do it. He is frequently in doubt with reference to the cases that come before him, and being in doubt his partisan proclivities step in and he always gives his party the benefit of the doubt. The Liberals consequently get the benefit of it in that way. Now, the county of Annapolis is something like sixty miles in one direction and forty or fifty miles in another direction, and there is only one court, so that if there is an appeal from Springfield or from Margaretsville, or from Bear River, or from Victoria Beach, or from any of these remoter districts in the county, to the sheriff's court the parties must travel thirty, forty, or fifty miles to the sheriff's court, and bring their witnesses; entailing great expense on the electorate in order to get their rights; whereas, if a judge was appointed, as under the old Dominion Franchise Act, there would be six or seven courts held in a county. Under that Act the courts sought the people, instead of the people seeking the courts, and thereby greater justice was done. The sheriff's court is a farce, a complete farce. It rests in the hands of these partisan laymen, the revisers, and I have given you a sample of what they will do. One reviser consigns a person to a hot climate when he goes to him for justice; another says, "I am going to take these fourteen Tories off, and there are a lot more of the damned Tories that ought to come off." I have that stated in a solemn declaration which I have read to the House. This is a sample of the partisan revisers.

Mr. MILLS.

Now, the hon. Finance Minister has jokingly said—jokingly, I presume, for surely he does not mean this for argument—that I am here to run down the county of Annapolis and the province of Nova Scotia. Let me tell the hon. gentleman and this House that the county of Annapolis and the province of Nova Scotia know me too well for that. I have never yet run down my country; I have never yet been a traitor to my country; I have never yet stood on the stump or anywhere else in Nova Scotia and advocated the repeal of Nova Scotia from the Union. I have never yet told the people of Nova Scotia that now was the time to strike for their liberties, that now was the time to break away from Canada, that now was the time to come out and be a nation of ourselves, a little Nova Scotia. I have not done that sort of thing, and that is one of the reasons why I have been returned to this House from the county of Annapolis which ever since I have represented it, has returned a municipal council largely Liberal. The people of that county know perfectly well that what I tell them I believe in. I know of persons who have gone to that county and preached repeal. I have met those persons, and they are not very far from this Chamber. One of those persons is the hon. Finance Minister, who is now before me in this House. I have told the people of Annapolis to regard the sayings of those persons as sayings of political demagogues, of charlatans, who wanted to befool the people, who wanted to trade on their prejudices and their passions; and the people of Annapolis county, knowing that I have been honest in these things—honest to the county, to the province and to Canada—have returned me three times to this Parliament—in 1887, in 1891, and 1896. Notwithstanding that, the hon. Finance Minister coquetted with that county. He was down there in 1896; and, if rumour is right, he sent a telegram to the clerk of the county saying that he would accept a nomination to contest the county in the election of 1896. But he dare not come into that county. You have heard of the little story of the 'cute man who wanted to pull some nuts out of the fire, and who sent a monkey to get the nuts. The Finance Minister was that 'cute man, and the monkey was the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. The monkey sought to get the nuts, but he got his fingers burnt. The hon. Finance Minister sought a reason this afternoon why I have been returned by Annapolis county. He thought it very strange that the municipality of Annapolis, being largely Liberal, should return me. Let me tell the hon. Minister that I was born and brought up in the county of Annapolis. The people of that county know me, and when I go to them, they believe what I say. They believe that I do not go there to fool them with catch cries to capture their votes for the time being. Now, the people of Annapolis county are very much interested in the hon. Finance Minister at the present time. As was stated here some time ago, he not only came down to that country and preached repeal in 1886 and 1887, but he also came down in 1896 and preached free trade—told the people about the duties on flour and cotton and other things that were being foisted on the country by the obnoxious Liberal-Conservative Government and its National Policy. The people of Annapolis county are very anxious that the hon. gentleman shall do something for them, now that he is in a position to do so; that is, some of them are. The Liberal-Conservatives and the people who believe in protection are not very anxious about it. I do not care a snap of my finger about the duty on flour. I had the temerity in 1887 to tell the people that if I were sent to Parliament I would advocate a duty of $2.50 a barrel on flour, which would not raise the price in Nova Scotia one cent. I had the temerity to do the same thing in 1891 and also in 1896. It is one thing to talk to the people and another thing to do something for them, as the hon. Finance Minister now thinks.

With reference to the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia, which is sought to be incorporated in the Bill before the House, it is as I have said before, the worst Franchise Act in the Dominion, in which the gates are opened for the perpetration of fraud. I listened with some amusement this afternoon to the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with reference to this matter. He was advocating the leaving of these matters entirely to the provinces, claiming that we had nothing to do with them. I was thinking of other speeches which the hon. member for North Norfolk had made in this House not very long ago, when he was advocating exactly the opposite—when he was advocating that this House should take cognizance of matters on which the provinces had already passed laws, such as Sunday Observance. But what is law with the hon. member for North Norfolk in the forenoon is not law in the afternoon. He is not consistent, by any means, in his views regarding the franchise. For party purposes, I dare say the hon. member for North Norfolk desires that the franchise for this Dominion should be made up of those of the different provinces. For his own purposes, he believes that this Dominion should take charge of certain other matters which the provinces have already taken charge of. What we ask must commend itself to the mind of every well advised man as being nothing more nor less than what is right, namely, that the courts should intervene. Why are hon. gentlemen opposite so afraid of the judges? Why are they so afraid to have the revision go on before the judges? Judges may be partisans if you like, appointed by the different Governments. I know of partisans who are to be appointed judges, and who now have their seats on the Government benches. They are ardent partisans, they would do anything for this Government at present, but I believe that being relatively trained men, they will, when appointed judges, rise above partisan feeling. Some judges, perhaps, may allow their partisan feelings to warp their judgment, but the nearest approach to perfection in that regard that we can possibly have is to have trained men put in such positions. Does it appeal to the sense of right of any hon. member to have such men as Daniel J. Rioridan or T. Troop Messenger, whose deeds I have detailed here in solemn declarations, made judges in these matters? Are these men to decide who shall and who shall not go upon those electoral lists. In the one case, no less than fourteen men were left off in a batch, and in the other some three or four, and these men hold courts for twenty-eight different districts in the county. If they leave off three or four men in each district, that would give a majority in a close county at once. You are simply giving universal suffrage to the Liberals and not even a franchise to the Conservatives, if this is adopted. In all candour, I think it is only proper that these appeals should be allowed to the judges and not to partisan sheriffs. I have all my life, as a lawyer, done business with the sheriffs all over Nova Scotia, and we have always had a Liberal sheriff in Annapolis, and I have always found them in the main honest in their business, but when they become interpreters of the law, about which they know nothing, they are influenced by party men who can twist and turn them just as their own party inclinations dictate.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the question is put, I desire to make a few remarks on this most important measure, by which we are to decide who shall have the right to vote in the Dominion elections. A matter so important calls for the most serious consideration, and all the time that is spent in discussing it is exceedingly well spent.

I listened to the very violent language this afternoon of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). That hon. gentleman indulged in his old time vigour of language, and I was reminded by the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) that the hon. gentleman was very angry yesterday because a certain Bill of his did not pass the House, or because certain of his old time friends did not stand up to give him the opportunity of dividing the House upon it. I was told the story about a certain distinguished Canadian, or a Canadian of prominence, at any rate, who went over to the States during the past year, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) reminded me of him very much by the vigorous way in which he used his vocabulary this afternoon. It was stated that a citizen of Canada who has made frequent trips across the line, and is sometimes known as a Canadian and sometimes as a party working in the interest of the United States, went over accompanied by one of our Canadians, as quasi ambassadors, and tried to have certain reciprocal arrangements made for the extension of trade between the two countries. But it seems they did not get a very warm reception on the other side. In fact, their reception was decidedly cool, and the Canadian legislator who accompanied this person got very angry, as they went from one office to another and saw the distinguished American citizens and members of the Cabinet and received very cold comfort from them, and finally were practically shoved out upon the sidewalk or very nearly shoved out. This Canadian got very angry and he said: There will be hell to pay in Israel for this. I thought that his language very much resembled that of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon when he indulged in a violent attack on the franchise law of the Dominion. He said that that law was put into operation to gain political advantage. Now, I do not think that that is a correct representation of it, because there was no political advantage to gain. Under that Bill, the voters' lists were those prepared by the revising officers. Who were those revising officers? In almost every instance, they were county court judges. There were some exceptions, in cases where the county court judges were old men and could not undertake additional duties, but throughout the province of Ontario, at any rate, the revising officers were, in almost every instance, county court judges or junior judges. In the county of York and in the city of Toronto, we had two judges—the county court judges who took two constituencies and a junior judge who took two more, and a retired judge, Judge Boyd, a man of the highest and most estimable character, a man who enjoyed high reputation as a county court judge and as junior county court judge for many years.

These were the three gentlemen who were the revising officers for the three ridings of the city of Toronto and the three ridings for the county of York. And they did their work, as acknowledged by both sides of politics, with fairness and honesty. They started, as the law directs them, from the assessment rolls of the municipalities. They hung up these lists and invited inspection of them so that names might be left off or put on and every opportunity was given to have the lists perfected, being in striking contrast, in this respect, with the provincial voters' lists. From the very outset these lists seemed to be made up with a different principle in view from those of the province. In the Dominion list there was every facility for one entitled to vote and have his name entered, but in the case of the provincial list there are many difficulties put in the way, so that some are disfranchised in every locality. We have never pretended that this Dominion franchise law is perfect. A great deal is made of the contention that it is expensive. Well, I have had a good deal of experience in revising the provincial list, and revising the Dominion list, and I have no hesitation in saying that there is more expense in the revision of the provincial than of the Dominion list. And one great disadvantage in the case of the provincial list is that, with all the expense, you cannot make a perfect list. For various causes, a number of men are disfranchised. When I was Controller of Customs in 1894, I was disfranchised. I do not know what wrong I had done or what crime I had committed that I should be disfranchised as a voter of the province of Ontario. We are told that some remedy will be found for that and that the present Minister of Customs (Mr. Pater-son) will be entitled to vote. I hope so. He will not be entitled to vote under this Act as submitted, but I understood from some one that the Bill would be changed and the hon. Minister would be entitled to vote. If not, then, the Minister of Customs is assisting to pass a law that will disfranchise himself. Why should he not have a vote. I pause for a reply, but I suppose I may pause for a long time, because the hon. Minister could not give a reason. Another defect of this Bill and one that affects thousands, and I might say tens of thousands of the voters of Ontario, is that when a man gets his name on the list as living in one electoral district, and before the election moves to another electoral district, he is no longer entitled to vote in the locality on the list for which his name appears, on the ground that he does not reside there, and, of course, he cannot vote in the locality in which he lives because his name is not on the list.

Now, how do hon. gentlemen opposite justify this disfranchisement of tens of thousands of citizens. I have known hundreds of people disfranchised in provincial elections in this way. And how can they justify adopting provincial lists when they are defective in this regard. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tells us that we must make our choice and either have a Dominion list and control the Dominion franchise, or leave the power in this matter with the provincial authorities. For my part, I decidedly object to give it to the provincial authorities, for, so far as Ontario is concerned, the provincial law is full of anomalies and imperfections. And when we ask hon. gentlemen what they intend to do about such cases as that I have mentioned of men who remove from the district to another, we get no satisfactory answer. I do not see the Solicitor General here—

An hon. MEMBER. He is here.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has arrived. I have asked a number of questions, but none of the hon. gentlemen on that side seem to know how to answer me. No Minister was able to give us any opinion on the point we raised. Now we have the Solicitor General here who has charge of the Bill, and I will repeat the question I asked. I was stating that many people change their residence, and if they change their residence in certain portions of the year they cannot have their names put on the electoral list in the district to which they have removed, at any rate until after a certain time; they cannot at all in certain cases, if the revision of the lists is finished. Now does the Solicitor General propose to make a remedy for those cases? Let me take the case of Mr. John Abell, who removed from the electoral constituency of West York to another part. But it happened that the local Government had gerrymandered that other part out of West York for the local legislature. When the election came on, Mr. Abell, who is the owner of hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property, who had resided for more than 40 years in Canada, found himself disfranchised. He had no vote in West York that he had left, and he had no vote in the district to which he had removed because his name was not on that list in class 1 or class 3. What remedy does the Solicitor General propose for that unjustifiable state of affairs?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If he has resided in the municipality for three months previous to making the lists, he is entitled to vote.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister does not understand the distinction between a municipality and an electoral district. An electoral district is made up of several municipalities. If he moves out of an electoral district he loses his vote, if he moves out of a municipality he also loses his vote, even though he still remains in the electoral district.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The case that the hon. gentleman states is not founded in law. No such case exists.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman is referring to the Registration Act, I fear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, I am referring to those who are entitled to be entered in the revised voters' list of the municipality.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the hon. gentleman knows exactly what he is talking about. I will state the case again. If a citizen having a vote in an electoral district moves away from that electoral district after the revision has taken place, and goes into another electoral district, he has no vote in the new electoral district because his name is not there, and there is no means by which his name can be put there, because the revision is over. How does the Solicitor General propose to remedy that wrong? Then I stated the case of Mr. John Abell, who resided in Woodbridge, and who removed to Parkdale. He had large properties in both places, but his name was not on the Parkdale list. His name was on part 2, as we call it in Ontario, which gives a man a right of municipal vote, but does not give him a vote for the local legislature. Another instance is that of Dr. Orr, who was our candidate for the local legislature. He removed from the township of Vaughan into Parkdale. He had property in Vaughan. When the next election came on he found himself disfranchised because he had no vote in Vaughan. He could not go back and take the oath of residence, therefore he was disfranchised. These are only specimens out of thousands in the province of Ontario. Now, what answer does the Solicitor General give to this question when I ask him what he proposes to do?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The law proposes to take the local list.

Mr. WALLACE. So this injustice will be perpetuated. Well, Sir, I am opposed to the Bill for that reason. No supporter of the Government can say that a citizen of Canada ought to be disfranchised because he removes from one place to another. It is no crime to remove from one constituency to another.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). How many are disfranchised under the Act this is repealing? Hundreds of thousands in the last election. How many were there in your own county who could not vote last time?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know one entitled to vote who was deprived of his right of voting, except myself. I went to the polling division and the returning officer pretended that he did not know me. I think we had a very good list.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How about all those that come of age after the revision of the list?

Mr. WALLACE. The list was revised up to about the 1st of January, 1895, and the election was held in June, 1896. Of course those who had come of age after the revision of the list could not vote.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How many lived in the riding all their lives and could not vote?

Mr. WALLACE. That was not due to any fault of the Franchise Bill. It was due to the fact that the Parliament of Canada by a unanimous vote decided not to have a revision of the lists in 1895. I am quite satisfied that the Minister was in favour of that proposal, indeed an Act was necessary and it received the approval of the Minister, and I challenge him to disprove it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did that Act permit all Canadians over 21 years to vote, irrespective of their wage earnings or anything else?

Mr. WALLACE. The qualification mentioned in the Franchise Act of the Dominion prevailed everywhere.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How about residence?

Mr. WALLACE. If a man's name was on the list there was nothing to prevent him voting.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He could not be on the list unless he resided here.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He must be on the list and a resident of Canada. He must also have a certain income, as an income voter.

Mr. WALLACE. He can vote if he lived in Canada.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Not unless he earned a sufficient income.

Mr. WALLACE. There are very few people, under the various franchises, who cannot have their names placed on the lists. I have had great experience before judges, and I am rather in favour of universal suffrage, and adopting a Dominion universal suffrage. I suppose the Solicitor General would do the same.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not a bit of it.

Mr. WALLACE. Then the hon. gentleman is more restrictive in his views than I am.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. The Solicitor General and the Minister of Customs are evidently quite apart in their views, because, judging from the Minister's remarks, it might be thought he was in favour of universal suffrage.

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I simply wanted to point out the classes of people that were enfranchised under the Ontario Act, and compare them with those under the Dominion Act.

Mr. WALLACE. There were more votes polled under the Dominion Act than under the Provincial Act of Ontario, showing that the former is the more liberal measure. Under the Dominion Act facilities are provided for voters placing their names on the lists, while the Ontario Act presented obstacles in the way. When the names were on the provincial lists it did not follow that the people were entitled to votes. There were half a dozen oaths to be taken, and they were so complicated and misleading that the ordinary elector found it difficult to understand them, and consequently he often refused to take the oath. The Minister of Customs seems to wish to taunt us with the fact that under the Dominion Franchise we did not provide universal suffrage. Is the hon. Minister in favour of universal suffrage?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am telling the hon. gentleman that I prefer the Ontario lists to the Dominion voters' lists.

Mr. WALLACE. The Minister of Customs evidently will not reply to my question, and of course he has a right not to do so unless he chooses. I ask him whether he is in favour of universal suffrage, because his colleague, the Solicitor General, who is in charge of the Bill, has been very emphatic in his opposition to universal suffrage. That is no doubt one of the reasons why we have this nondescript Bill presented, containing half a dozen different franchises, a system which might be appropriate for the provinces, but is not such a system as should be used in the election of members to the Dominion Parliament. I doubt the constitutionality of the present Bill. The Confederation Act says that "until otherwise provided" the franchises of the provinces shall be used. We did provide otherwise in 1885, and I do not think we can go back to the franchises of the different provinces. The provisions of that Franchise Act were vigorously opposed in 1885, and the section which evoked most discussion and opposition was the one providing for the enfranchisement of the Indians. The Indians have been entitled to vote since that time, and I am not aware that a violent wrench has been given to the constitution. I was amazed to see gentlemen opposite, who were most vigorous in denouncing the proposal to give Indians votes propose to the Government that they should permit the people now enfranchised to retain their franchise. There is some force in the argument that because a man has received a privilege he should not be deprived of it without cause, but hon. gentlemen opposite have strongly urged that the Indians should have the right to vote, and that was a complete answer to all statements made by them in 1885. They predicted all sorts of calamities, and I think the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) said at that time that if the Indians abandoned their tribal relations he would not object to their having a vote. What had that to do with it? They and their ancestors were in Canada long before we or our ancestors were, and their adopting or abandoning tribal relations had nothing to do with their right to vote. They were not the wards of the nation. They received a sum of money from the Government of Canada, but that money was not given as a charity, but as a compensation to them for their property. They were the original owners of the soil, and the Canadian Government, in a spirit of fair-play, differing from that practiced by the Government of the United States towards their Indians, gave them the right to retain their homesteads, but purchased their other land, and instead of giving them a lump sum for it, gave them an annual payment. I am glad to see to-day that these gentlemen who so violently opposed this part of the Dominion Franchise Act thirteen years ago, have seen the error of their ways, and have endorsed the course taken by the Government in allowing the Indians to vote. All the predictions made about the injustice of the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885 by these gentlemen opposite have been falsified by experience. They said they would not get fair-play, but to-day they are in power under the Dominion Franchise Act. It has done so well for them that they should continue it for ever.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We got there in spite of it.

Mr. WALLACE. No, Sir, you got there in consequence of it; you got there because the voters' lists under the Dominion Franchise Act were fair.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. You got there because a man who had the right to vote was retained on the list, and he could come from Manitoba or Quebec or elsewhere and vote in his home in Ontario.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. That is one of the bad features of it.

Mr. WALLACE. That is one of the good features of it, for I do not think that election day is the right time to hold an election court.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. One man one vote.

Mr. WALLACE. If that principle is to prevail, the principle should accompany it that one vote should have one value.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I do not know what you pay for your votes.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the hon. gentleman has intelligence enough to understand my statement, but he appears to be going backwards. One vote one value means what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) many years ago stoutly contended for, namely, representation by population. Is it fair that in the West Riding of York, as constituted for the local legislature, there should be 20,000 people, and that in West Toronto, alongside of it, there should be more than three times 20,000 people. I believe that the principle of representation by population should be largely adhered to, but the practice of the local government, under this iniquitous Franchise Act of theirs, has been the very opposite.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Under whose administration was that evil brought about?

Mr. WALLACE. Oliver Mowat's.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. And the former Conservative Government here.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman ought to know by this time that the Dominion Government has nothing to do with the limits of the constituencies in the local legislature.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Are you not aware that your riding has 60,000 or 70,000 population, and the gentleman who sits next to you (Mr. Wood, Brockville) has a riding of about 15,000. That is under the Dominion law.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not aware of it, and it is not so.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You ought to be.

Mr. WALLACE. My constituency is a large one, but it has not 60,000 or 70,000 population. You may take 30,000 off.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Well, say 40,000, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wood, Brockville) beside you has 15,000.

Mr. WALLACE. I think we ought to have a more even distribution. If the hon. gentleman with 15,000 constituents thinks they are more intelligent than mine, I can tell him they are not by a good deal. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that we did not dare to have an annual revision of the lists. Well, I presume that we did not want to be put to the trouble, as candidates, of an annual revision. There is no use in having an annual revision of the lists. The revision of the lists should take place only before an election. If we have an election every five years, in my opinion, we should have a revision of the lists every five years.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What about a by-election?

Mr. WALLACE. Before a by-election I would give enough time to have a revision or a registration, so as to have an expression of the views of the people of the constituency up to date. Some maintain that those who elected the members at the general election should be the only ones to have a voice in the election of a member to succeed him; but I am in favour of having a revision for a by-election; and there are going to be half a dozen by-elections, or perhaps more, if all the members who are going to be made judges, lieutenant-governors, postmasters, and so forth, are going to vacate their seats. I have a long list here, but I will not make the members on the other side blush by a recital of their names.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Give us the names.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) is not there. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) is to be made a judge, according to report.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He would make a good one, too.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Carroll) is also to be made a judge.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Another good one.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is to be made a Senator.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Now you are talking.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is, I am told, looking for a senatorship too, but he cannot get it just now; he will have to wait till his turn comes later on. That will be better than $2.50 for lecturing throughout the country. Then, there is our friend the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) with the governorship looming up before him; and we look with a great deal of interest to see how economically affairs will be managed at that magnificent government house away out at Regina when the hon. gentleman goes there. With these vacancies looming up, almost like a general election, it might be justifiable to have a general revision of the voters' lists. The next session will be just like this—it will take us two or three months to get acquainted with the new members. Every year, with a lot of new members on that side of the House—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. None on the other side.

Mr. WALLACE. They are not promoted to any positions; they are elected, and they have to stay here for their term.

Mr. LANDERKIN. For ever.

Mr. WALLACE. Some of us would like to stay, not for ever, but for a good number of years; but our constituents have to be consulted about that every four or five years. I say we ought to have a revision, not every year, because an annual revision is unnecessary expense, both to the candidate and to the country. Preparing a perfect or a nearly perfect list requires a great deal of labour, and governmental and municipal machinery.

Mr. WALLACE.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Your Franchise Act provides that that must be done every year.

Mr. WALLACE. The law is that it must be done every year; but Parliament has passed an Act every year suspending the operation of that law, because it is an unnecessary work, and costs so much time, trouble and expense. It is said that the list in the last general election was a little old. It was, but that can be provided for very easily by having a revision before an election. If the Government should decide to dissolve the House before their term of five years has expired, there should be sufficient time allowed for a revision or registration, so that all those entitled to vote should be able to get their names put on the list. That would not be expensive, and it would be very easily done, because when an election is looming up within a few weeks, the political spirit of the people is aroused, and there is no difficulty in getting their names put on the list. But under the provincial franchise of Ontario there is a difficulty.

An election seems a long way off, you do not know that an election will take place on that list, and yet you ask a man to lose his day by travelling eight or ten miles to a court of revision and spending the whole day there waiting for his turn to have his name put on the list, when you do not know that an election will take place on that list at all. That is very unsatisfactory, yet that is the character of the procedure you propose to impose on the people of Ontario. You should instead provide something like what we have in the Dominion Franchise Act, namely, that a man need not lose his day by going before the judge, but simply makes an affidavit, which is read to the judge, and on the strength of which the judge puts his name on the list. That list is hung up, and if any fraud is perpetrated, there is the further opportunity of having the name struck off at a later period. In many cases, the court has the last revision, because the sifting process has been going on, the parties agreed that certain names should remain, and when they came to disputed names, they went before the judge, and in that way a satisfactory list was made out. The cost is but a secondary consideration, and it would be greatly diminished if the proposal I made were adopted, namely, to have a revision only as often as there is an election. There would then be very little expense, although I think it is perfectly justifiable to spend money in order to obtain a nearly perfect list. Beyond general vituperation and condemnation of the Dominion list, I have heard very few particulars from hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North Norfolk said that the last two elections were held on lists over two years old. That was not true or anything near the truth. The House by unanimous consent passed an Act of Parliament to suspend the operation of the law providing for an annual revision.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Why did you do that ?

Mr. WALLACE. Why did the hon. Minister of Customs vote for it? It was to save money and trouble to the candidates, but I think we made a mistake. However, the mistake was made by every member of the House.

Another objection which has been called attention to by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is that you have a list that is not satisfactory. It is partly written and partly printed. A reputable citizen told me yesterday that in our last election, a very large number of persons whose names were on the printed lists were not allowed to vote because their names were not on the lists in the hands of the deputy returning officer. These were men who had property, who had resided there all their lives in the locality, whose names were on the printed list of voters as published by the municipal council but were not on the list furnished to the deputy returning officer. This was under the local Act. Under the Dominion Act, however, the list is hung up, and every man whose name is on it is entitled to vote if he takes the oath that he is a British subject and 21 years of age and has not bribed anybody or received a bribe from anybody. That is all that is required. His name being on the list hung up all over the riding, no one can deprive him of his vote. But in the provincial lists, the opposite is the case. Many reputable citizens, who have property and have resided in the locality all their lives, were deprived of their votes at the last election and had no remedy. Yet the Parliament of Canada is handing over all its powers to these provincial legislatures. That is utterly unjustifiable. We should retain the power in our own hands, we should be able to say: here is a grievance which we have the power to remedy and which we will remedy. But the Solicitor General says: No; I have no answer to make, we have handed everything over to the local legislatures. Well, if you do that and permit them to work their own sweet will, we know that the ballot will no longer be a guarantee of secrecy, because in the province of Ontario the ballot used is such that, when examined, you can find out how every man has voted. By this Bill, therefore, a door is at once open to the worst kind of intimidation, and we can easily understand how these local legislatures will exercise the power that is given them, in the use of hotelkeepers and others, who are completely within their control. I hope that the Parliament of Canada will resist the imposition of such an unjust franchise law as this on the country, and not stultify itself by admitting that we are incompetent to make a law which will do justice to all parties and keep the control of the franchise in our own hands. It is a serious reflection on a Government, which claims to be a Government of business men and to be a progressive Government, and to have an active interest in the welfare of the people, that it should abdicate its functions and hand over the powers that properly belong to it, to the local legislatures. We are in that respect making a very great mistake. I am quite sure that if the Conservative party comes into power—and it is probable that one political party will not remain in power for ever—they will be pretty sure to repeal any Act, if one has been passed handing back to the provinces the power to fix the franchise for Dominion elections. I think it would be a mistake to have any Government pass such a law and the next repeal it, and thus make these successive changes. But I do not apprehend that this would in practice occur, because, the experience we have had with the Dominion Franchise Act would disabuse the minds of hon. members and of the people generally of many false impressions and would show the practical necessity for such a law. Some of the hon. gentlemen opposite who were loudest in their opposition to the Franchise Bill of 1885 now rise and practically confess that they have made a mistake.

Mr. LISTER. What has been said on the subject so far does not prove what you say.

Mr. WALLACE. I have the debates of 1885 here, and I think I could quote eloquent speeches of the member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) opposing the granting of franchise to Canadians; and yet he has risen here within the last few days and asked that the votes be not taken away from the Indians.

Mr. LISTER. Those speeches referred to Big Bear, Sitting Bull, Slap-him-on-the back and others of that kind.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the hon. member for West Lambton confined his objection to the constituents of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) but included those who are now his own constituents. Now, the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) said that he was in favour of one man one vote. If that is a good principle, let it be applied all round. But one man in Quebec has six votes, and the same is true in other provinces. I suppose we shall have the hon. member for North Brant proposing here to apply this principle that he says he believes in and I think he does believe in.

Mr. LISTER. We could have ten votes to one man in Ontario if we chose to make the law that way.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) want the law that way?

Mr. LISTER. No, I am not asking for it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You said it was a good law.

Mr. WALLACE. No, I did not say that.

Mr. LISTER. The Toronto votes are a good thing for you.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to say that citizens of Toronto who have votes in West York have been cordial in their support of me, and the same is true of the citizens of West York also.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Give us a rest.

Mr. WALLACE. Whenever the hon. member from North Brant or any one on that side gets into a little dilemma he says "Give us a rest." I ask the hon. member about this principle of one man one vote, and he says "Give us a rest." That is not an answer to the question. Now, I think we are entitled to an answer from the hon. member for North Brant. Will he favour one man one vote in Ontario and one man six votes in Quebec.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Yes, it is in the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. Now we know the principle on which the hon. gentleman goes. Whatever is in the Bill, he supports.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I am willing to leave it to the provinces.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) is something like the Government. They find they have here a rather difficult task and they say: We will hand it over to the provinces. They have the Yukon Railway to build, the Drummond County business is not quite settled, then there is the Kettle River Valley Railway and the division in the Cabinet about it—

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What clause of the Bill is the hon. gentleman discussing?

Mr. WALLACE. I am discussing the preamble. As I was saying, it is evident the Government have difficult matters before them for consideration. We know that the hon. the Prime Minister himself has his difficulties.

Mr. LISTER. Not of the kind you have.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He has not a nest of traitors.

Mr. WALLACE. I had not anything to do with any of them. We know that the Prime Minister went down to Quebec on one occasion when Mr. Langelier, then a member of this House was kicking up a little bit of a row. There was a question of the Lieutenant-Governorship, and a member of the Prime Minister's Government, it is said, was bound that Mr. Chapleau should be continued as Lieutenant-Governor. It was rumoured that the Prime Minister himself was not adverse—

Mr. WALLACE.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. WALLACE. I am giving reasons why the Government cannot undertake to put this Bill through this session but hands the difficulties over to the provinces. I have been attacking them so far, and I am trying now to see if I cannot find some justification for them. I was going to say—

The PRIME MINISTER. Are you in favour of the Bill?

Mr. WALLACE. I have expressed my hostility to the Bill.

Mr. LISTER. Not yet.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Mr. Chairman, I was pointing out that there were some difficulties in the province of Quebec. A member of this House produced a document signed by the Prime Minister himself, in which a certain gentleman was promised to be made Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. That promise was long unfulfilled.

Mr. BELCOURT. Was it anonymous?

Mr. WALLACE. It was signed by Mr. Langelier.

Mr. MILLS. Was he a member sitting in this House?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, in violation of the laws of Parliament and of the independence of Parliament. But the Prime Minister was in a dilemma. What was he to do? Here was Mr. Chapleau. If he were permitted to go out of the Governorship he might want to get into the Government. Well, there was no room perhaps in the Government just at that time, because the province of Quebec, I think, has about seven members in the Government, while the province of Ontario has five. If the province of Ontario had her share, in proportion to her population and representation in Parliament, she would have ten members in the Government. Supposing that she had ten members in the Government, you see what the possibilities are. We could then give a seat in the Government to the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister); we could give a seat in the Government to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen); we could give a seat in the Government to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Somerville), who would do his duty faithfully and well, I have no doubt. Now, it is evident that the reason of the Government in wishing to hand this franchise over to the provinces is because they have encountered difficulties in governing the country. There are franchise Bills to pass, and there are promises made which the Government find it difficult to fulfil. One of their promises was that Mr. Langelier, a member of the House of Commons, should be made Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. But the Minister of Public Works said that Mr. Chapleau should remain Governor, because if he came back to this House he would be a thorn in the side of the Prime Minister, if he were made a member of the Government, and he would be still worse if he came to this side of the House. In the province of Quebec, to give him a free rein, might be disastrous to the Prime Minister; and for all these reasons they decided it was better to keep him in his place. But the row got so large that the promissory note had to be met, and the result was that a shuffle of the cards was made. The Lieutenant-Governor published what was considered quite an injudicious letter, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to discuss the question before the House. While I am willing to give him any amount of latitude to discuss incidental questions, I think the committee will agree with me that he has gone far enough.

Mr. WALLACE. I shall with great pleasure bow to your decision. But when members on the opposite side ask me questions, am I to be refused the privilege of answering them? I say that this Bill contains so many unjust provisions that the Government should not attempt to force it through the House.

Mr. BERGERON. Who did the Governor write the letter to?

Mr. WALLACE. To the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. BERGERON. Was the letter lost?

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to see the whole letter. We have only been given snatches of it. But I think the whole letter would be a very interesting document, and I would ask the Minister of Public Works to lay it on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. Question.

Mr. WALLACE. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this Bill should not become law, when it is pointed out that there are injustices and anomalies in it, and that it does not give a fair representation of the opinions of the people. I, therefore, am opposed to the enactment of the proposed legislation.

Mr. McDUGALL. There is one feature of this Bill that is sure to be very objectionable and very unpopular. The system under which our voters' lists are made up in the province of Nova Scotia has been referred to on several occasions. The revisers meet in some four or five different places within a county. At the sitting of the revisers it will be necessary for people who are interested in getting their names on the voters' list, and also for the candidates who are interested in seeing a proper list made, to attend a meeting of those revisers. Under the present Dominion law the court held by the revising barrister is held at several particular places at different dates. That affords an opportunity to have a man look after the revision of the lists on behalf of either party and be able to meet with the revising barrister at each of his meetings within the county. Under this law, if it goes into operation, it will be impossible for any one particular person to attend the meeting of the revisers with the same object. At present the cost of the revision of the lists in the provinces is borne by the municipalities, and is a tax upon the people of the municipalities direct, and I take it that when the interest in the preparation of the voters' lists for Dominion elections is added to the interest now involved in the preparation of the municipal and provincial voters' lists a much longer time will be necessarily occupied by the revisers in their preparation of the lists, and it will necessitate also the attendance of a great many more people at the sittings of the revisers while preparing those lists. In my county I know that under the present system the cost of the preparation of the municipal and provincial voters' lists is between $300 and $400 a year, and I feel satisfied that if we add the cost of the reviser hearing Dominion appeals, for adding names and keeping them off the lists, a heavy additional cost, probably double the present amount, will be placed on the taxpayers of each constituency. What the result will be in my own particular constituency will follow in most of the other constituencies of the Dominion, and as a probable result of the adoption of such a measure as is now before the House, which requires the same expense on the basis to be made annually, if we figure the expense on the basis of the cost in my constituency, there will be a charge to the taxpayers direct of not less than $200,000 or $300,000 in the five years. I cannot see the necessity of providing for a revision of the voters' lists annually, because as was explained by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), the necessity of holding an election only arises once every five years, except in the case of by-elections. I think the argument made by that hon. gentleman, which was to the effect that in the case of a by-election it would be quite proper to use the lists used at the general election preceding the by-election, and in that way avoid the cost of annual revisions of the voters' lists for the purpose of Dominion elections, was sound. There are other causes that would lead to a heavy expenditure on the part of the different parties who may be interested in the preparation of a good list.

The better the voters' list is made under the law the more costly it will be, and I cannot allow a measure of this kind to pass without uttering my strongest protest against its adoption. I cannot agree to the passage of a measure which will add, as I feel confident the effect of the Bill will be, to the burdens of the already overburdened taxpayers of the country, because this additional taxation will be placed not on our people who are in most comfortable circumstances, but on the poor man, the man with one hundred acres of land, with small buildings, whose property will be assessed at its full value, because there are circumstances which lead an assessor to place a higher valuation on the property of a poor man than as a rule is placed on the property of a man more wealthy. For example, in the country a poor man with 100 acres of land and a small personal property, with the land perhaps not in good condition, and two or three sons living on the farm with him, will aim to secure votes for himself and his sons. The result will be that the valuation of the property will be placed probably at more than the property would bring in the market. The more wealthy man, with thousands of dollars in the banks, and one or two hundred acres of land in good condition, with other property, will be assessed at a lower valuation in proportion by the assessor than he finds himself compelled to make on the property of the poor man. For this reason when the tax-collector comes around and collects the taxes, it will be found that the poor man pays the larger sum in proportion to his means to the cost of the preparation of the voters' lists. That is one of the reasons why I protest in the strongest terms at my command against the imposition of this tax on the people of the country directly. The taxation involved in the preparation of the voters' lists under the law now in force comes more largely out of the pockets of the people who consume the articles that pay the higher rates of duty, and in that way the poorer classes are not to the same extent the taxpayers in that particular instance. If this Parliament is going to impose the cost of the revision of the list on the municipal treasuries, they will impose that cost on a class more heavily that do not bear a fraction of the expense under the present law. That is the difference in my opinion between the law proposed and that which is now in existence. That is a difference of great importance to the people, and especially to those who feel they cannot bear increased burdens. I cannot understand that any good reason has been advanced for the introduction of this measure under such circumstances. By this Bill, it is alleged that a change is to be made which is greatly to the advantage of the country. We are not giving any relief by the proposed Act as regards the causes of the complaint that exists with respect to the present law.

Mr. McDUGALL.

The chief complaint against the present law, as I understand it, is the expense; but by this Bill we are unloading that expense from the Dominion treasury and putting it upon the poor taxpayers of the country, to be taken out of their pockets by the direct tax collector who goes once a year to their doors to collect from them sums sufficient for the maintenance of the local institutions within their respective counties. That is one reason why I feel in duty bound to add my protest against this measure. Neither will this Bill lessen the cost to those who are interested in looking after the lists; not by any means. It will on the contrary increase the cost, because we have to get more people within the counties interested in looking after these lists, and as in most cases the revisers appointed are not competent to interpret the law, we cannot have a list that can be used. In many of these districts the revisers are at the mercy of anybody who chooses to press them for a decision in one direction or another, and those interested in having a good list made will in consequence be put to great expense. The candidates cannot get people to look after their lists, day after day and week after week, without paying them for it. I cannot understand the reason for this change. The Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) has in the past given us evidence of a strong regard for repealing measures. We were accustomed in Nova Scotia to hearing the expression "Liberalism and Repeal," and now we are getting it. We have Liberalism, and Liberalism is going to be followed by repeal. I would like to know what is going to be repealed next. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) referred to the question of repeal, and I have here a statement made by the Finance Minister on that subject, and I will take the trouble of reading it in order to see whether it does not bear upon the measure before the House, and the necessity of repealing the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, to compel the hon. member (Mr. McDougall) to confine himself to the question. What has repeal to do with this?

Mr. McDUGALL. We are dealing with the repeal of the Franchise Act, and I am about to give the House an illustration of the means used by the Finance Minister in past years for bringing about repeal in respect to another important measure.

Mr. POWELL. That is quite in order.

An hon. MEMBER. It is as near as the hon. member can come to it, I suppose.

Mr. McDUGALL. Here is what the Finance Minister said:

The interests of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia are alike in this matter. I trust this question of separation from Canada will be brought up by independent members in both provinces (New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island) and fairly discussed. Bad as is the position of the two provinces in this union, it will become worse if Nova Scotia secedes. Maritime interests will become weaker than ever at Ottawa, and there will be little chance for the New Brunswickers and the Islanders to obtain justice. They have everything to gain by joining Nova Scotia, and I am satisfied that if the movement be taken up with vigour in our sister provinces the demand for separation from Canada will be made, not from Nova Scotia alone, but by the three maritime provinces. But if New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are content to occupy their present position, or the weaker one which they would occupy after the withdrawal of Nova Scotia, they must be permitted, of course, to take their own way. We shall take our way, and demand for Nova Scotia alone separation from the Dominion, though we would much prefer joint action, because we have always felt that the provinces down by the sea have a unity of interest, and that in co-operation we might bring about results which would go far to make the people of our country prosperous and happy. The people are in earnest in this matter, and the politician who fails to keep faith with them will have reason to regret that he ever came forward to take part in the agitation. I believe the people of Nova Scotia, and from sea to sea, will, at the approaching elections, throw off the yoke of Toryism, and that, in our own province particularly, we shall have a grand victory for Liberalism and repeal.

I would like to know if the measure now before the House is a back door dodge for the purpose of bringing about that repeal. Can the Minister of Finance assure me that it is not?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think I could assure my hon. friend of anything at this hour of the night.

Mr. McDougall. It is the duty of the Finance Minister to assure us of any definite result that will follow from the passage of the measure now before the House. It occurs to me that in the preparation of the voters' lists it will confuse matters very much between the Dominion and the local authorities. It appears to me that it will be quite impossible to get the local officials to provide the lists and all the other information necessary to the returning officers appointed under authority of this Parliament unless provision is made in the Bill to pay the local officers for their work. It will be necessary, in my opinion, to insert a clause providing that the local officers engaged in the preparation of the voters' lists should be considered as if appointed as officers of the Dominion Government some such section as this: "All officers of the province to whom duties are assigned by this Act are considered officers of the Government of Canada, notwithstanding anything in the British North America Act. I tried to explain to the House a few evenings ago my opinion with regard to the difficulty in the way of compelling these officers to perform work under the direction of the Government of Canada; and I am still strongly of the opinion that that will lead to great difficulty, especially unless the Government provide in this Bill for paying for any service they require these officers to render. As hon. members know, there is a provision in the local Act for imposing penalties on sheriffs, revisers and other officers who have to do with the lists; and this Bill provides penalties likewise. I cannot see how these people will be liable to penalties under two Acts, an Act of the provincial legislature and an Act of this Parliament, in connection with the same service. I would like very much to know the opinion of the hon. Solicitor General in regard to that, and how he proposes that these two sets of penalties can be imposed upon one official, particularly an official who is not an official of the Government or Parliament of Canada.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not feel disposed to weary the House, and I desire to be entirely serious in discussing this question, because it does not seem to me that there are wide and important differences between the two political parties with regard to it. Hon. gentlemen cannot conceal from themselves that they cut a very strange figure before the country in dealing with this franchise Bill. We know that during the twelve or fourteen years of the existence of the Franchise Act which was introduced and carried through by the Conservative party, hon. gentlemen opposite contended that it disfranchised Liberals from one end of Canada to the other, and that the Liberal party were put at a disadvantage at the hands of a set of partisan officers who were the mere creatures and tools of the Conservative party. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say if that in substance was not what was stated on every public platform in Canada. Now, the principal reason advanced for this Bill is that by introducing it the Liberal party are redeeming one of their pledges. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) this afternoon read the platform of the Liberal party on this subject, as adopted in 1893, to show that they were pledged to certain measures, among others the repeal of the Dominion Franchise Act. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen intend to redeem all their pledges by the mere repeal of that Act, because they have not redeemed their other pledges, although they have made some sham attempts to do so. But, in no honest sense have they redeemed a single pledge which they made before the elections. With regard to their pledge to repeal the Franchise Act, I do not believe the people care a whit for that pledge. It does not involve anything; it is based on a mere false cry. Hon. gentlemen know that when they are telling the people that that Act disfranchised the Liberal party, that statement did not contain a single element of truth. But suppose it had some element of truth in it, what have hon. gentlemen done? I challenge any hon. gentleman from the province of Ontario to show that the Bill now proposed is one particle less partisan in its character than the Act which is to be repealed. No one will pretend to say that in the province of Ontario the assessors have not their political leanings and do not to some extent act on those political leanings. No one will pretend to say that the same thing is not true of the municipal clerks and all other municipal officers. No person will so far take leave of his senses as to say that the municipal officers are not partisans. There is not an hon. gentleman from the province of Ontario who has had any experience of municipal elections but will say that there is a strife to-day to elect municipal councillors favourable to one party or the other—why? Because the municipal council will constitute a court of revision, at which those lists will largely take the political colour, first, of the assessors, next to the clerk, and next of the court of revision. We are told that the lists are prepared by a set of revisers appointed by the municipal council. I think the hon. gentleman who said that had in his mind the machinery employed in some of the other provinces. He knows that the council itself constitutes the revising body, and that the appeal is made to the county judge only in case there are complaints with regard to the action of the court of revision. To whom does the list go on appeal? To the very set of persons whom hon. gentlemen opposite blackened in this country as tools of the Conservative party—the same tribunal and the same men in many instances who revised the Dominion lists under the old Act. Therefore, so far as partisanship is concerned, hon. gentlemen opposite stand exactly where we did. But let us come to the list in the province of Ontario. I give the hon. Solicitor General credit for showing a great deal of good temper in dealing with a difficult question; but I am still convinced that he fails to realize the consequences of the change he is making in this Act with regard to disfranchising voters in the province of Ontario. Let hon. members remember that under this Bill the revision does not take place under the control of the Dominion; it takes place under the control of the province. Now, I will take an instance of three townships adjoining each other, but in three separate electoral districts. If a man moves from one township to another, which is in a different constituency, and a court of revision sits there the next day, he cannot get his name put on the list. Has the hon. Solicitor General considered the fact that he will disfranchise a number of voters from one end of Ontario to another under our system of one man one vote. The hon. gentleman says that if a man resides three months in a municipality he can get on the list, but the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. He is speaking of the qualification under what is known as the Ontario Elections Act, which requires registration and no more. Let me read the affidavit that a man will have to take, who moves from one municipality to another, and from one provincial electoral district to another. I am not referring to the oath under the registration system:

That I am a British subject by birth or naturalization; that I have resided in the province nine months next preceding the 15th February;—

That is the date fixed by statute for commencing to make the assessment rolls.

—that I was at the said date in good faith a resident of and domiciled in the municipality in the list of which I was entered; that I have resided therein continuously from the said date;—

That is, the 15th February, although this might be away on in June or July.

—that I am actually residing and domiciled therein.

Nothing can be clearer than that if a voter goes from one municipality into another and from one electoral district into another, he cannot get upon the list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How does my hon. friend make that affidavit agree with this? Section 9 of the Election Act of Ontario of 1897, provides:

Subject to the provision of this Act, every male person of the full age of twenty-one years, a subject of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization, and not disqualified under this Act, and not otherwise by law prohibited from voting, shall, if duly entered in the list of voters prepared under the Manhood Suffrage Registration Act proper to be used, also be entitled to vote at such elections;

Provided that such person has resided within the province for the twelve months next preceding the day on which the first sitting of the registrars of manhood suffrage voters was held for the preparation of the lists of voters under the Manhood Suffrage Registration Act;

And provided that such person was in good faith, on the said last mentioned day, and for the three calendar months next preceding the same, a resident of and domiciled in the city on the list of which he is entered; and was in good faith on the said day and for the next preceding thirty days a resident of and domiciled within the territory comprising the electoral district on the list of which he is entered.

Mr. CLANCY. That refers entirely to voters placed upon the list under the manhood Suffrage Registration Act and not by virtue of the Voters' List Act, which is an entirely different matter. The hon. gentleman will know that manhood suffrage voters are placed on the voters' lists under two circumstances—one on the Ontario Election Act, and the other on the provincial voters' lists. The case I am referring to is the latter.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. They are all the same.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. We have had some experience in matters of that kind, and if the hon. gentleman will turn up the Voters' List Act he will find he is mistaken. What is the oath, under the Voters' List Act, which a voter would have to take when he went up to give his vote. It is as follows:—

You are the person named in the list of voters now shown you in the poll-book; that you are a British subject by birth or naturalization; that you have resided within this province for nine months before.....day of.....being the day fixed by statute or by law for beginning to make the assessment roll in which you were entitled to be entered as a person qualified to vote; that you were at the date aforesaid in good faith a resident of and domiciled in the municipality in the list of which you were entered; that you have resided in this electoral district continuously from the said date (February 15) and are now actually residing and domiciled therein.

That is the oath that must be taken under the Voters' List Act, and the other is the oath that a voter must take in order to be placed on the list, as manhood suffrage voter, under the Ontario Voters' List Act. The hon. gentleman has referred entirely to the names of voters placed upon the list under the Ontario Elections Act, by virtue of the system of registration, and not the case to which I will now call his attention. That applies, as my hon. friend sees, to cities, towns and county towns, and how far it may be extended is a question hereafter to be decided by the provinces, and one that is entirely handed over to the provinces by hon. gentlemen opposite. If I am right—and I am sure the hon. gentleman will see that I am—what will follow? First, the voter must have resided within the municipality on the 15th February preceding the time when he makes application to have his name placed on the list, unless that is varied by by-law—and if it is, it is only shifting the dates because the same length of residence will be required in both cases. The manhood suffrage voter in the rural municipality where there is no system or registration, if a man left township A and went into another township which was not in the electoral district for provincial purposes, there is no possibility of his getting upon that list during that whole year. Then, under the system of one man one vote in the province of Ontario, residence in the province is considered necessary. Now, why do not hon. gentlemen opposite enlarge that to Dominion residence and not allow a man to be disfranchised simply because he happens to live across the border in another province? Will the hon. Prime Minister think it a fair thing that a man living in Quebec, just across the river from Ottawa, could not be placed upon the list for a whole year? Why, if the whole city of Hull were to be transferred from that side to this, and if they owned half the city of Ottawa it would be impossible to place a man of them on the voters' list unless he had been a resident of the province of Ontario twelve months. I believe that hon. gentlemen opposite have not considered the effects of the system in force in the province of Ontario. We heard the Prime Minister make a very eloquent speech declaring that the old system of franchise in the several provinces had been in use for Dominion purposes from 1867 to 1885, and there has been no complaints. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite cannot have forgotten that there have been vast changes since then. Hon. members must remember, and those who live in the province of Ontario must know, that the franchise of 1885 in that province was quite as liberal as the Dominion franchise passed in the same year. The fact that this franchise was satisfactory from 1867 to 1885, does not prove that it is satisfactory to-day. We had not the one man one vote system then, and if we had had it, some Dominion franchise law would have been necessary to avoid confusion, which confusion will arise under the Bill that hon. gentlemen propose. These are grave reasons against the Bill and such as cannot be passed over hurriedly.

Another important point besides those I have already pointed out is suggested by the Prime Minister's statement that the franchise is a matter of a domestic character and that the people in the different localities are the best judges of the local circumstances. In the first place, this is not always true. Take, for instance, the voting on the plebiscite. There can be no doubt at all that this vote will be taken on a question that is within the scope of Dominion politics. Does that not prove the soundness of the contention that we should have a Dominion franchise? I am not arguing now that it should or should not be based upon the principle of adopting the franchises of the provinces. That may be a very good thing to do. Hon. gentlemen may argue with some force that the franchises in the different provinces have the sanction of experience and should be accepted. I am quite prepared to say that there is something in the contention that the people of a province are peculiarly well fitted to fix their own franchise. It may be well to adopt the existing franchises of the different provinces; but let us not give up the right of this House to make its own franchise or commit it to the acceptance of what the provincial legislatures may do in the future. I have no hesitation in saying that I am prepared to adopt the franchise that obtains in the province of Ontario if it is made a Dominion franchise. I have no hesitation in saying that time has shown us that it is probably the cheaper system, and I have no objection to the length we go in the direction of universal suffrage. But we should not be asked to accept blindly what the changes that may be made in the future by bodies over which we have no control. What do hon. gentlemen tell us? They say that if there is any enactment that we do not approve, we can recall our action and establish a franchise of our own. Is not that a childish argument to put forth? I do not wish to be offensive, but I would ask if that puts forward any sound principle of legislation for this House. I challenge the hon. gentleman to select any other question in regard to which they would be prepared to say: We will hand over to some person, to some company, to some great corporation, to some province, certain powers, and if they abuse those powers, we will take them back. Is that a sound principle of legislation? We have heard a very extraordinary declaration from the Solicitor General that the presumption should be that public officials would not do any wrong. Why, Sir, you might as well go into the streets of Ottawa and pick out the honest men and, upon their declaration that it was a sound principle to have no law against wrong-doing, to repeal all your laws against wrong-doing, because these gentlemen were satisfied they would not steal themselves, and no body else would. It seems to me that we should not proceed upon similar lines in regard to this Bill. The Government are asking us to depart from sound principles of legislation in order that they may make a compromise in fulfilling some of the pledges that they have made to the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen have not hitherto been such sticklers about their pledges. If the First Minister intends to fulfil all the pledges that he has made, he will require to be a long time in power.

The PRIME MINISTER. We are bound to stick to one until it is finished.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid they have singled out this one as a sacrifice to the others.

The PRIME MINISTER. Do I understand that the pile of papers I see on the desk of the hon. gentleman is his brief for this speech?

Mr. CLANCY. I may say to the hon. gentleman that it is a small portion.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then I would suggest that he move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. CLANCY. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I suggest to the Solicitor General that he would in some way put this amendment so that it can be printed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will have several copies struck off to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m. (Wednesday).

Mr. CLANCY.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 27th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MR. H. A. ROBERTS.

Mr. MacLAREN asked,

Why was the care of the post office clock at Stratford, Ont., taken from H. A. Roberts? Who asked for his dismissal? Who received the appointment in place of Roberts? What salary does the present caretaker receive?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that the care of the post office clock at Stratford was taken from Mr. Roberts partly because he was not quite up to the times, and because his time was up. The care of the clock was given to Mr. John Welsh. Mr. Welsh has been appointed to the place at the same salary as Mr. Roberts—$50 per annum.

POSTMASTER AT PEAKE'S STATION, P.E.I.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) asked,

Has Allan Macdonald, postmaster at Peake Station, Prince Edward Island, been removed from office? What are the grounds of removal? Who is appointed his successor? By whom was he recommended?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In answer to the hon. gentleman's question I beg to state that, Mr. Allan Macdonald, formerly postmaster at Peake Station, P.E.I., was removed from office because of his having taken an active part in the last general Dominion election. An investigation was held and Mr. Macdonald, the then postmaster, under oath, admitted that during that election he went around canvassing with Mr. A. Macdonald, the Conservative candidate; that he drove around with his own horse calling upon some thirty people, speaking to them on politics; that he attended public meetings; that he was appointed to call a meeting to select delegates for a convention; that he acted as chairman at this meeting; that he was also selected as delegate to the convention; that he attended the convention and voted for a candidate; that his political friends were accustomed to meet at his residence in regard to politics; that about a dozen attended there the night before the election; that he attended the court of revision and took part in the revision of the list on behalf of the Conservative candidate; that he may have allowed his name to be attached to notices to be given to parties to have their names struck off. Beyond these exceptions he does not admit having acted as an offensive political partisan. Mr. Benjamin Hayden was appointed to Mr. Macdonald's place on the recommendation of Mr. Robertson.

DEAF AND DUMB MUTES.

Mr. DOUGLAS asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates sufficient to erect a building to be used for the education of the deaf and dumb mutes of the North-west Territories? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I am not able at the present time to give the hon. gentleman the information he asks for.

WILFRID MERCIER, COMMISSIONER.

Mr. MONK asked,

1. What claim was made by Wilfrid Mercier, of Montreal, for his services and expenses as a commissioner to investigate the conduct of employees at St. Ann Lock, in Jacques Cartier county?

2. What amount has been paid on account of such claim?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The account of Mr. Wilfrid Mercier, for his services and expenses as a commissioner to investigate the conduct of employees at Ste Anne's Lock in Jacques Cartier County amounted to $136.65. 2. He was paid the full amount, viz., $136.65.

DEPARTMENTAL NOTICE.

Mr. GILLIES (by Mr. McDougall) asked,

1. By virtue of what authority did the Postmaster General issue the following notice and publish the same in the "Canada Gazette" :—

NOTICE.

"Whereas the Post Office Act provides that the Postmaster General may, subject to the provisions of the Act, establish the rates of postage on all mailable matter not being letters, newspapers or other things therein specially provided for: And whereas, the rates of postage upon letters from Canada to the United Kingdom or to any British possession is not specially provided for by the Post Office Act or any amendments thereof, now therefore, I, William Mulock, Postmaster General of Canada, under and by virtue of authority vested in me, do hereby establish the rate of postage upon all letters aforesaid transmitted by post from any point in Canada to the United Kingdom or to any of the British possessions as follows:—There shall be charged and paid one uniform rate of three cents per ounce weight, a fraction of an ounce being chargeable as an ounce, upon all letters as aforesaid transmitted from any point in Canada to any point in the United Kingdom or British possessions. That this regulation shall come into force and take effect on, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight-hundred and ninety-eight. Dated at Ottawa this twenty-third day of November, 1897.

"W. MULOCK,
"Postmaster General."

2. At the time the Postmaster General issued the notice and reduced the postage upon letters between Canada and the United Kingdom from five cents to three cents for every ounce, was he aware that Canada had been since 1st July, 1878, a member of the Universal Postal Union?

3. Was it competent for Canada, as a member of the Universal Postal Union, to make the reduction mentioned in the manner proposed in the notice given by the Postmaster General?

4. If not so competent, why was this notice given by the Postmaster General?

5. If it was so competent for Canada, as a member of the Universal Postal Union, to give the notice mentioned, why were not the terms of the reduction mentioned in the Postmaster General's notice adhered to and carried into effect?

6. For what length of time after the first day of January, 1898, did the following paragraph of the Postmaster General's notice continue operative :—

"There shall be charged and paid one uniform rate of three cents per ounce weight, a fraction of an ounce being chargeable as an ounce, upon all letters as aforesaid transmitted from any point in Canada to any point in the United Kingdom or British possessions."

7. Was the postage reduced to three cents per ounce in consequence of this notice? If so, why was not this rate continued, and why and when was a return to the old rate ordered?

8. What amount was lost to the postal revenue of Canada during the currency of the period that letters were being carried under the reduced rate in consequence of the order issued by the Postmaster General and dated 23rd November, 1897?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. Notice was issued on the authority stated in the notice. 2. Yes. 3. This is a question of law. 4. The answer is covered by the previous answer. 5. The proposed reduction was suspended at the request of the Imperial authorities in order that an opportunity might be afforded for representatives of all parts of the Empire to meet and discuss the question of Inter-Imperial Postage. 6, 7, 8. The proposed reduction never went into operation, it having been withdrawn prior to the date fixed for its going into effect, but lest any of the public, not knowing of its withdrawal, might have insufficiently prepaid their letters, authority was given to the Exchange Post Offices to add any shortage. This was done and the total amount of stamps so added was $91.95, but payment of this sum will not embarrass the finances of the department, as, owing to the cancellation of a certain contract, which had been kept on foot unnecessarily for several years at the urgent instance of the member for Richmond, N.S., for mail service between McIntyre's Lake and Sidney, and the service being re-arranged and let to the lowest tenderers, there was effected for the four years of the contract, commencing with the first of July last, a saving of $20,728.

BREAKWATER, CHAPEL COVE.

Mr. GILLIES (by Mr. McDougall) asked,

Is it the intention of the Government to provide a sum in the Supplementary Estimates during the present session for the construction of a breakwater at Chapel Cove, county of Richmond, Cape Breton, a survey plan and report of which were made in 1895, and are now in the Department of Public Works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The information will be given to the hon. gentleman when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

OLIVER EQUIPMENT.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON asked,

Has the Government adopted the Oliver equipment, and if it has does it comprise the valise and other articles as originally designed ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). 1. It has adopted the Oliver equipment. 2. It is difficult to know exactly what is meant by the expression "as originally designed." Surgeon General Oliver gives in his Handbook of his Equipment several "orders" or varieties of that equipment. Of these we have adopted one in its entirety, which conforms, except for difference in pattern, very closely to the British equipment, known as "Light Service Order," which is the recognized equipment for the British army for home defence. There is no article known as the "valise" in Surgeon General Oliver's Handbook of his Equipment. If the "Magazine Bag" is what is meant, this does not form a portion of the Light Service Order, referred to. But a certain number of these have been ordered for use on barrack duty in time of peace.

REPORTED DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

Mr. GIBSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he is in receipt of any information as to the reported death of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government has no information whatever with regard to this report. A cable despatch has been sent to the press to the effect that Mr. Gladstone is dead, but it is impossible to verify the sad news.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Barnard D. McLellan, Esq., for the electoral district of Prince West, P.E.I.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Barnard D. McLellan, Esq., member for the electoral district of Prince West, Prince Edward Island; introduced by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) and Mr. Yeo.

Mr. GILLIES.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to call the attention of the Treasury benches to some returns that have been ordered and that are found on page 158 of the Votes and Proceedings. There is one relating to the Railway Department, the case of D. Bain, Esq., concerning whom an order of the House was adopted. On the same day, and relating to the same department, an order was adopted respecting the appointment of R. S. Thompson. In connection with the Customs Department, an order of the House was adopted for a return in connection with the United States steamship "Yantic." Again in regard to the Railway Department, a return was ordered in the case of Chas. Hoar. An Address was also carried for correspondence respecting the enforcement of the coasting laws on the Pacific and Atlantic coast. I draw the attention of the Minister of Customs to this matter. I also desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to an order passed for correspondence respecting the dismissal of Wm. Sutherland, car inspector, Stellarton, N.S. Also to another order in connection with the same department for correspondence regarding the letting of a contract for farm gates on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. BERGERON. I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to an Order of the House passed on the 30th March asking for papers and correspondence respecting the dismissal of François Corbeil, wharfinger on Lachine Canal. Also an order for correspondence between the Public Works Department and L. H. Masson. I do not see the Minister in his place, but I hope my inquiry will be mentioned to him.

FIRST READING.

Mr. CASEY. I ask permission to make a formal motion. I move the first reading of Bill (No. 124) (from the Senate) to incorporate the Alberta and Yukon Navigation and Mining Company.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the motion is not in order.

Mr. CASEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to this motion. Of course, if any objection is taken, it will have to stand.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a statement. On the 13th of this month while the hon. Minister of Customs was speaking, he referred to my speech, saying that I had not given any evidence that promises had been made in the North-west Territories respecting duties on agricultural implements. I thereupon expressed my surprise, and the hon. Minister very courteously gave way while I asked permission to read what I had already brought before the House, and I read a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture at Moosomin. The correspondent of the Manitoba "Free Press" gives this account of it :

He, Mr. Paterson, has based the Government policy on the tariff platform of the convention of 1893, and declared that no Minister ever gave a pledge to place agricultural implements on the free list. Mr. Davin interrupted that he had Hon. Sydney Fisher's words before him, but Mr. Paterson said he did not apprehend that Mr. Davin contradicted his assertion.

Mr. Davin said, "Oh, but I do."

Mr. Paterson—Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he can quote utterances of the Minister who pledged to place agricultural implements on the free list?

Mr. Davin—I certainly do.

Mr. Paterson then sat down to allow Mr. Davin to read a speech made by Hon. Sydney Fisher at Moosomin in 1894, but the extract contained not a single word of any such pledge, and when Mr. Davin sat down, Mr. Paterson said, "I declare, Mr. Speaker, if it is not a piece of impertinence on the part of the member for West Assiniboia to contradict me, and when I gave him an opportunity to read what he says he has before him, he utterly fails to do so."

I do not think it is necessary that I should read again what the Minister of Agriculture said. It is enough for me to brand that account as untrue. Another writer said a western member had a conversation with the hon. member for West Durham :

An hon. member for the North-west told me that he did not want free binding twine, because, as he said, he believed the farmers should pay their fair proportion of the taxation and expenses of the country.

Thereupon the writer goes on for half a column to say that I am the person. I never had a word of conversation with the hon. member for Durham on the subject of binding twine, therefore I could not have said this. I need hardly say that my opinions are well known on that question, and therefore if any members from the North-west had any conversation with the member for Durham it was not I, and it will be in order if any hon. member from the North-west, whether Liberal or Conservative, had such a conversation now to rise and make a statement.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. CLARKE. I desire to repeat a question which I understood the hon. Solicitor General promised to reply to this afternoon, namely, whether the Government have appointed an inspector or officer to enforce the provisions of the Alien Labour Law.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The Attorney General of Canada has not authorized any one in Toronto to enforce the Alien Labour Law.

THE REPRESENTATION OF BAGOT.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to ask the Prime Minister if the writ for the election of a member to represent the electoral district of Bagot has been issued and the returning officer appointed.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The writ has not been issued or the returning officer appointed.

PASSAGE OF UNITED STATES WAR VESSELS THROUGH CANADIAN CANALS.

Mr. WALLACE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Government if they are aware that the United States warship "Gresham" has passed through the Welland Canal, and whether the United States Government received permission from this Government to pass a vessel of that kind through the canal.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Government are aware that the "Gresham" has passed through the canal. The United States Government received authority on 6th April.

THE YUKON DISTRICT.

Mr. WALLACE. The House passed a resolution some days ago asking that the accounts of the Yukon district be sent to the Public Accounts Committee. That resolution was, in fact, passed nearly a week ago, and the accounts have not yet been produced, and the Order of the House has not been obeyed. I ask the Minister of the Interior why those accounts have not been produced in compliance with the Order of the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The matter has not been brought to my attention. Now that it has been brought to my attention, and in view of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, these accounts will be brought down.

Mr. WALLACE. Under a resolution moved by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) last week, those accounts were ordered to be produced, but to-day the Minister says he knows nothing about the matter. This is a most extraordinary state of affairs.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I should say, Mr. Speaker, that the matter has not been brought to my attention before. I will immediately attend to it now that it has been brought to my attention.

Mr. WALLACE. These are not papers to be copied; they are the original documents that are to be presented, and ten minutes should be sufficient to do that. They have not to be copied and there is no excuse for the delay.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not say that they had to be copied. I said the matter was not brought to my attention until now. I did not say there was any difficulty about producing them, and I should think there is no difficulty.

Mr. WALLACE. The Public Accounts Committee ought to have these documents right now; to-day.

TOLLS ON GOVERNMENT WHARFS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) to a matter of the utmost importance and as to which I have previously communicated with him. I presume this is a favourable opportunity for appealing to the hon. gentleman and pressing upon him the consideration of our claims, in the interest of the country, seeing that he has just shown, by introducing to the House the newly selected member for West Prince (Mr. McLellan) that the Government still enjoys the confidence of the province of Prince Edward Island. In bringing up this matter before the House, I wish to know whether it is the intention to amend the Act respecting the collection of tolls and dues on Government wharfs? As everybody knows, and more particularly the hon. gentlemen who represent here the constituencies in which are found those Government wharfs, the farmers are subjected to a great deal of vexation and annoyance, when they use those wharfs, as tolls have to be paid for every bag of potatoes or of oats landed or shipped on or from off those wharfs. I have for a long time endeavoured to induce the Government to do away with all those vexatious proceedings by making free the use of those public wharfs, chiefly where the dues collected amount only to a few dollars every year. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries told me with good reason that he was bound, by the law, to have those tolls levied and collected and that, unless the Act were amended, he could not make free the use of the Government wharfs nor enter into any arrangement with the municipalities concerned, by which they would pay every year a certain amount, respecting the value of the tolls collected by the Government. As a matter of fact, if you refer to the Revised Statutes of Canada, you will find that in virtue of chapter 84, section 2 of the Act concerning the Government harbours and wharfs, &c., those tolls and dues, however small they may be are to be collected by the Government officers, under the control and management of the Minister.

As the shipping season is about to open, I would beg the hon. gentleman to have the Act amended as I have just mentioned. In order to show him that there is a very substantial ground of complaint, let me take the case of the wharf in the parish of Berthier, in the county of Montmagny. From a report issued by the department of the hon. gentleman, I find that, for the last decade, a yearly revenue of $22 has been collected on that wharf. Now, I know that the farmers of my constituency would by far prefer paying that sum every year, provided they were given the free use of the wharf. With a view to remedying those grievances, I laid before the Minister a proposal of the municipal council of Berthier, by which they declare themselves ready to pay every year a sum of $35, on condition that the Government make the use of the wharf free, such sum being sufficient to indemnify the Government, leaving even a small surplus every year. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries informed me, however, that, as the Act stood, he could not see his way to accept that offer. Well, I appeal to him now to have the Act so amended as to be authorized in the case of all wharfs yielding not more than one hundred dollars every year to enter into arrangements with the municipalities concerned and to accept a fixed sum, should he find himself unable to make the use of those wharfs free. I could point out here the case of the Post Office Department where the Minister is allowed to give a contract without tender for the conveyance of mails whenever the cost involved is not more than two hundred dollars. I think the Minister of Marine should also be empowered to make certain arrangements in the interest of the people. In the present case, if the Minister could accept the offer made by the Berthier municipality, the Government would receive thirteen dollars more every year. But, as the Minister stated that he could not accede to that request, I appeal to him again to have the Act so amended as to be enabled to make those arrangements, and thus the municipal council of Berthier, although they may have to pay a little more, will willingly pay the sum mentioned in their resolution, because it is calculated to bring about an improvement in the local trade. I hope the hon. Minister will take the matter into his serious consideration, as it is of the utmost importance to those counties where there are Government wharfs, and should he still be of opinion that he cannot enter into any such arrangements, I ask him to have the law so amended as to be given the necessary power to do so.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). I may state to the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) that the matter which he has brought to the attention of the House has been under the consideration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for some time past. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) brought the matter to my notice and pressed very strongly upon the department, that if we had the power to hand over to the municipalities certain of the small public wharfs from which very small sums of money are yearly received; the municipality would undertake to pay in advance to the department an amount equal to the average of the receipts received from these wharfs for say the past few years. The municipality would then manage the wharf in the best interests of the locality. The idea is that in cases where the public treasury is only receiving $25 or $30 or $40 a year from a wharf, it would be preferable to hand that wharf over to the municipality which would manage it and charge such fees as they thought proper. The treasury would lose nothing by this, because we would receive an amount equivalent to the average receipts in the past.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That has been done in some instances already.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, but on looking at the statute I found that it was necessary to ask power from Parliament to do that. I propose to introduce a short amendment to the Act, and if the House approves it will give me the necessary power to carry out what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Choquette) wishes.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Hear, hear.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY AND CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—CONNECTION AT NORTH BAY.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Railways whether he can tell the people of Ontario and especially of Toronto, if he has succeeded in making any progress in settling the difficulties between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway in connection with the service to North Bay?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have been in communication with both the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and perhaps I may even go so far as to say frequent communication with them. They have come together and I think there is a disposition on the part of each of the companies to arrive at a common understanding which will be satisfactory to the public. I doubt whether they have yet reached that point, but I am not without hopes that they will succeed ultimately in reaching it and perhaps at no very distant date. I can make no definite announcement further on the subject.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPEAKER. With reference to the question asked by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) as to the papers in reference to the Yukon which were recommended to be sent to the Committee on Public Accounts, I have made inquiries since the question of the hon. member (Mr. Foster) was put, and I find that the clerk of the Committee on Public Accounts promptly communicated that recommendation to the Department of the Interior. I have no doubt it is being complied with.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

On section 5,

And the amendment thereto moved by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney).

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman, last night on this subject we heard from the right hon. gentleman who leads the House an argument against the one that had been addressed to the committee by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). The right hon. gentleman said, in the first place: "There is no want felt for such an appeal;" that is to say, an appeal to the county court judge. He then laid down the proposition that "it is not our province to look after that part of the case." Further, he stated that "the Franchise Act passed by this Parliament is so bad that no one will defend it;" and "the reason this Bill was being pressed through the House was that it was believed that it was the least partisan way of getting lists." As regards the statement that no want is felt for such an appeal, I have here a triumphant answer. A short time ago, in the legislature of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin, the leader of the Opposition, introduced a Bill to amend the electoral law of Manitoba; and, as bearing on the very point now before the House, the following clause is full of interest. Section 40 it was proposed to amend thus:

The decision of the revising officer under this Act in regard to the right of any person to be an elector shall be subject to appeal as provided by the following subsection:—

"Any person dissatisfied with the decision of the revising officer may have the same reviewed before the judge of the county court having jurisdiction over such electoral district, or part of the same (or, in the event of the county court judge being the revising officer, then to a judge of the superior court of the province of Manitoba), by giving to the registration clerk and revising officer a notice of appeal, which may be in form No. 9 to schedule 'B' of this Act, within six days after such decision shall have been rendered. Such notice shall also be sent by mail, prepaid and registered, to the elector objecting, or the person whose claim to vote shall have been allowed, as the case may be, and addressed to the post office set opposite his name on the voters' list.

"And such notice shall state the day, hour, place where such review shall be heard, and shall also be served upon the registration clerk and mailed as aforesaid at least ten days before the hearing of such appeal. The judge shall have power to dispose of said review in chambers, and have power to take evidence either viva voce or by affidavit concerning such appeal, and shall either affirm or dismiss the same, and make such order as to costs thereof and generally as to the premises as he shall deem just, and may enforce the same in the same way as a judgment of the court is usually enforced; and the revising officer on any appeal shall regard and be governed, as to placing, retaining or removing any name on or from the voters' list, by the decision of such appeal, and for that purpose shall alter and vary his statement and certificates in order to make the same conform with the decision or decisions of such judge."

That is a conclusive answer to the universal allegation of the Premier that no want was felt for such an appeal; for here we have the leader of a party in the Chamber of the province bringing in a Bill for the purpose of providing amongst other things for such an appeal. And what more happened? Why, the Prime Minister, Mr. Greenway, rose and promised that next session he would introduce a Bill somewhat in the same line, and therefore it was not necessary for Mr. Roblin to go on. Here we find, in one of the provinces most affected by this legislation, the expression of the want taking the most formal shape it could. The next allegation of the Prime Minister to which I wish to direct attention is that it is not our province to look after that part of the case. That, of course, is utterly inconsistent with much that fell at an early stage from the Prime Minister himself, and entirely inconsistent with some of the propositions which have been laid down by the Solicitor General. The only proposition with which that statement is consistent is the proposition laid down by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that this Parliament has nothing whatever to do with fixing its lists. But what do we find the Solicitor General doing? I merely refer to it now for the purpose of the argument, not to discuss it. He has given notice that he will move an amendment providing that certain Dominion office-holders and provincial office-holders, who may have been disfranchised by provincial legislation, shall be enabled to vote. So that we have not merely the statement of the Solicitor General in some of his speeches that we were not surrendering the control of our franchise, but we have, in the most formal way, namely, by a notice of a motion, and by his ultimately moving it, as he will of course do, the proposition to take this power out of the hands of the local legislature, wherein, according to the hon. member for North

Mr. DAVIN.

Norfolk and according to the proposition of the Prime Minister, it should be left undisturbed. What is to be thought of a piece of legislation like this? Here you have an utter inconsistency, not merely in the arguments that were put forward in support of the legislation, but in the legislation itself. The hon. Prime Minister went further, and said that the Dominion Franchise Act was so bad that no one would defend it. What has been done on this side of the House ever since this question came before it? Not an argument has been put forward by a member on this side of the House that was not an implied or direct defence of the Dominion Franchise Act. Only one blot has been admitted to exist in regard to that Act, that is its expensiveness. But prominent Liberals have admitted to me in private conversation that if the costliness of that Act could be got rid of, it would be unassailable. What argument have we heard against it other than the assertion that it is expensive? We have heard from my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the wild statement that it was unfair and led to untold corruption, but he did not point out how that corruption was practiced, he did not give a single fact, but confined himself to the bare statement, and he added that simply because the men who were in Opposition when our Dominion franchise law was passed are now in power, we should abolish the present law and revert to the provincial franchises. The bare fact that the only argument against the present law is its expense is the best proof we could have that it does not conduce to corruption. I admit that it is costly, but the proposal of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to reduce the expenditure attaching to the revision of the lists, by providing that the judges shall not be paid fees but be given a small salary, sweeps away the only argument against the Dominion franchise law. When you find the right hon. leader of the House laying down propositions that will not bear examination in support of a Bill which takes away from this House one of its rights and functions, given to it under the British North America Act, it is evident that the Bill before us is one which cannot be defended, and that the only thing which can operate to convert it into law is the fact, not that it carries with it the conviction and conscience of the country or the conviction and conscience of this House, but that there is a cast iron majority, or, if you prefer it, an obedient majority, on that side determined to railroad it through. But when you find the statements made by the right hon. First Minister in support of the Bill contradicted, in the most emphatic way, by the action, first, of the leader of the Government in that province, agreeing to bring in an amending Bill, can it be supposed, for one minute, that we, or this side, can sit tamely by and allow legislation like this to go through?

Let me refer to what was said last year by a leading organ of the Liberal party in that province—then, and still more a leading organ of the Liberal party to-day—for I think it, and has come almost flat-footed as a supporter of the present Administration. The Manitoba "Free Press" last year, when we were sitting in this House, and when the hon. Solicitor General presented a Bill more or less on the same lines as the one we are now discussing—the "Free Press" which knows well the condition of things in Manitoba—came out and said that such a machine as the Manitoba Act never before existed for enabling the lists to be stuffed, and it added that the Dominion Parliament was about to pass legislation which would make that machine, not merely a corrupt agent for stuffing the lists of that province, but a corrupt agent for stuffing the lists for the Dominion Parliament. And that very paper the Winnipeg "Free Press," which differed from the Senate in its action recently with regard to the Klondike deal, ended its article by saying that the people of Manitoba would look to the Senate of Canada to prevent such a monstrous piece of legislation going into effect as that which the Solicitor General then placed before this House and which is similar to the Bill we have now before us.

I want to call attention to the words used by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) with regard to this measure a few evenings ago; and these words are still more applicable to the measure now, in the face of the fact that I have brought before the House that the right hon. leader of the Government has been contradicted by the Prime Minister of one of the provinces. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), speaking of this proposed legislation, said: "It is an arbitrary measure." But, Sir, if it is an arbitrary measure, is it one that we should be asked to pass? What is an arbitrary measure? It is one that does not consider justice, that does not consider equity, but simply the irresponsible will of some person or body, pressed upon unwilling recipients, so that, Mr. Speaker, I consider that I have overturned the main proposition laid down by my hon. friend, and I do not think that we ought to be asked to go further with this Bill. What I would suggest is that the Bill be dropped, and that next session the right hon. gentleman should bring in a Bill amending the Dominion franchise law. In the face of the fact that we have an undoubted right, sanctioned by reason as well as by law—a right which is not only ours, constitutionally, but which is obviously the right of every assembly, that of fixing its own franchise—I ask him to drop this Bill, and next session bring in a measure to amend the Dominion Franchise Act in the way I have suggested. There is no necessity for haste, and if we only are given such plans as have been advanced in favour of this measure, how can we be expected to be satisfied with it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am very sorry that the hon. Solicitor General yesterday intimated that, no matter how the proposed amendment was drafted, the Government could not entertain any suggestion looking to the adoption of the principle of a judicial revision of these lists or a judicial revision on appeal. I was led to believe by some hints that the hon. Solicitor General threw out at an earlier stage, that amendments, which on their face were reasonable and devoid of party interest, would be very gladly received by him. It seems to me that there could be no more reasonable proposition submitted than that of providing safeguards in all the provinces for the securing of a fair and proper list, such as are provided by the laws of Ontario and Quebec. The hon. gentleman, in pointing out that the particular phraseology of this amendment was faulty and would have to be improved in any event, stated the great advantages that obtained in the legislation of these two provinces over, as I believe nearly every province in Canada, and certainly over the province of Nova Scotia, where the most slipshod system has prevailed for some time—a system so abominable that there is not the counterpart of it in any part of the world. It is the handiwork of the Finance Minister largely, as that hon. gentleman himself explained yesterday; and any one who examines its features will, I think, accept the statement that he is, to a large extent, the parent of it. He endeavoured to shelter himself from a part of the responsibility by using an argument—a strange one in the mouth of a professed Liberal—that one of the features to which we have objected was evolved as far back as 1856; and he denied that the fundamental principle for which my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) contended had ever been enjoyed in the province of Nova Scotia, overlooking entirely, in his zeal for this provincial Act the fact that the Dominion franchise law of 1885 had come into force in Nova Scotia, as in the rest of the Dominion, and had brought out in strong contrast, in strong relief, at any rate, the very unsatisfactory system existing under the local law. These local laws, as the hon. Finance Minister will admit, are strangely amended from time to time, and, as I shall show, for rather extraordinary purposes, and to gain extraordinary objects. I think that the Solicitor General would do well to revert to the spirit which seemed to move him at the earlier stage of this discussion. He could shorten the debate a great deal by agreeing to such improvements as will give the rest of the provinces the advantages that he, I am sure—differing from the Finance Minister in this—agrees do exist in this judicial revision that obtains under the legislation of Ontario and Quebec. Speaking on that point, I feel satisfied that I and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), who went into this subject so fully, will have the sympathy of representatives of these provinces in claiming that we should, at least, enjoy the advantages their people enjoy in connection with the preparation of these electoral lists.

Mr. Chairman, to come more to details, let me call your attention to several unsatisfactory conditions that exist in the province of Nova Scotia. Without reflecting upon the sheriffs of the province, who are the revisers, that is, constitute the appellants in the different counties, without taking up the time of the committee with any question of improper conduct or saying a single word on that score, it is known that these gentlemen, who, in respect of the electoral lists, occupy the positions that the county court judges occupy in Ontario and the judges of the superior court occupy in the province of Quebec, are laymen. Thus these lists, the preparation of which involves questions of law and the interpretation of many Acts of Parliament, involves questions regarding the right of voters, are all decided by revisers who are laymen, and ultimately, in the case of appeal, by the sheriffs appointed by the Government of the day, who are also laymen. There are other grave dangers in connection with the system, which, as I have said, is slipshod throughout. It is cheap, indeed, and it is nasty. The municipal councils appoint three revisers for each district. Three polling districts comprise a revising district. The appeal from the three laymen is, as I have said, to the sheriff, who is appointed by the provincial Government. In passing, I may note the fact that one of the great objections raised to the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885 was that the revising officers under that Act were appointed by the Government of the day. But there was this difference, that in the case of the appointments under the Dominion Act the majority were county court judges, and those who were not judges were lawyers of a certain number of years' standing, and were, therefore, qualified to deal with these questions that come up far better than laymen would be. Now, the sheriff holding these great powers in the province of Nova Scotia and without even that responsibility that would attach to a man who was of the legal profession (the pride of his profession and his position restraining him, even where nothing of that kind would check the sheriff) has opportunities to do wrong and to permit gross irregularities. Under the Nova Scotia system, that publicity that obtains in the present system under the Dominion Franchise Act, is wanting. Time and place for hearing applications are publicly advertised in the one case, while in the other the difficulty is great to ascertain either the time or place when this appellate court is to work. Under the Dominion Franchise Act, all the work must be done in public. In the case of the sheriff's appeal court, in the first place, there is a most extraordinary arrangement limiting the period, the limit being, I think, ten days. They are often embarrassed with a host of names, and names can be added and have been added, without the opportunity for examination and discussion and consideration which was necessary and required in the case of the Dominion law. To give an example, for instance, I would mention what has happened in the county of Guysborough, as I am informed. The Minister of Finance asked for information or challenged the statement of any irregularity occurring under the Nova Scotia Act. I believe that if the consideration of this Bill were suspended and an opportunity given to collect testimony, we could take up a month or two months with the examination of witnesses from the province of Nova Scotia that would answer the challenge of the Minister of Finance completely.

Mr. MILLS. I could occupy a month with my county alone.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for Annapolis has already, I think, given some evidence that he could take up a good deal of time giving valuable information on that score. I desire to state the case of one district in the county of Guysborough, not from my own knowledge, but from information that I considered reliable. In this case, the names were crowded on in a most extraordinary fashion. Out of the 204 names that appear on the local list in a certain section of Guysborough only seven appear on the assessment roll as possessing property to entitle the parties to vote. How are such things brought about? I am informed that, in the year 1890 and 1891, the Liberal party in Nova Scotia were most active and energetic. Without warning being given to either side, they went to work and put on any number of names all through the province of Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What does my hon. friend mean by "without warning"? Does not the law give warning to everybody?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said without warning. For instance, the Liberals were more active, and in that no one would blame them.

The FINANCE MINISTER. That would be because there are more of them, like the white sheep and the black ones.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entitled to make his boast for the time being in connection with one or two elections. But for eighteen years the hon. gentleman was not able to make that boast, and it is only right that he should enjoy the present moment to boast as much as he pleases over the subject. But that does not affect my argument. Whether there are more of them or not, I will show the manner by which, in the local elections at any rate, they have been able to make such boasts, and throw such taunts to their political enemies as the Minister of Finance now indulges in. It is not merely because of their activity, but because of their activity supported and aided by their political friends who held power in the province of Nova Scotia, and by such means as these have continued for a long time to enjoy power by cooking the lists and then confirming the lists by their partisan majority in the local legislature, having by great activity secured the lists and heaped on name after name of men that were not qualified to vote under the laws of Nova Scotia—as I am informed, and I speak entirely on information. These lists were of such a character as to give great satisfaction to the Liberal party; and in 1891 legislation was adopted which made those lists the basis for revisions and for the electoral lists in future, putting on the Conservative party, so to speak in this connection, very heavy and awkward burdens if they wished to make the lists proper before the tribunals as they existed in Nova Scotia. They were under the burden of proving a negative, and showing in each case the reason for the want of qualification of men whose names were on the list. Behind this Act these names were enabled to remain on the list until evidence was given under which a reviser, appointed as I have mentioned, or an appellant court consisting of the sheriff appointed by the local Government, felt warranted in throwing them off. There has been given information from other provinces. It has not borne much fruit, and I am afraid if we take the trouble now to put in definite shape the evidence of the irregularities existing under the local Act in Nova Scotia, we would not be rewarded much by the Government in their future treatment of this Bill. Take, for instance, information put before this House last year in connection with the province of Manitoba, and Manitoba is one of the provinces not enjoying the system that obtains in these two larger provinces. Take, for instance, the statement made by Mr. Roblin in the legislature of Manitoba in connection with the working of the local Act. He says:

By it at the last provincial election above 100,000 men have been robbed of their franchise, and now Mr. Laurier, seeing how much it has helped his friends in this province, now proposes to give it wider scope and adopt it for the Dominion.

And again, speaking of the right hon. leader of the Government, he says in this connection:

He intends, if he can, to have the provincial and infamous law imposed upon the whole Dominion. This Act was introduced in 1890 or 1892. He had fought this Bill at every stage, because he knew that the Government intended by it to legislate away the rights of a large number of voters. As it was first introduced, it would give power to an agent to prepare the voters' list without any one knowing who was on it. He had, however, succeeded in having this clause struck out. As it now reads, the Lieutenant-Governor can appoint a registration clerk, who is not bound by time, so that a court of revision can, and often is, appointed and sitting before the list is completed. It can be easily seen what an opportunity this affords to a man who is blinded by party ties and interests.

There is a case which is well known, where a clerk so appointed admitted that he had prepared his list from that of a Liberal scrutineer, used in previous elections, and this is the Act which Mr. Laurier intends foisting upon the Dominion. Another thing that has been done is to place bogus names on the list after it was declared completed. This was done to his friend from Emerson, who, when he heard of it, had subpoenas issued and given to the constable to serve, but the constable made a return that he could not find these men, for the very good reason that they never existed. Yet some of these names were retained on the list. * * * The Act says the clerk shall post up, thirty days before the court of revision is held, the list of voters. Is this ever done? No, it is not. The speaker then read a correspondence between Mr. McDonald, president of the Conservative Association, and the registrar of Brandon, Mr. Maclean, to show that in the case of the election held at Brandon, the court of revision was held before the list was completed. Mr. Macdonald asked that the court should adjourn until the list was completed, but this Mr. Maclean refused. It is to avoid a repetition of such infamous conduct that he is now addressing the House. His friends opposite are opposed to the Dominion Act on account of its cost, but more particularly because it works out against them. Under the provincial Act there is no appeal from the revising barrister, while under the Dominion Act there is an appeal to a judge.

He had in his possession the names of 200 voters which were given to Albert Monkman to place on the voters' list for Dauphin, yet this Monkman refused to say whether he would or would not place them on the list. From this it can be seen that all that was required were seven Albert Monkman's, and where would be the votes opposed to the present Government? This was no hearsay story, for he had in his hand a sworn statement to this effect. In the little town of Morris, in 1892, there were 108 names of French Canadians kept off the list, but, fortunately, they were righted by the court of revision; yet it was through no fault of Dr. McTavish that these Frenchmen were not disfranchised. Again this McTavish, in a small settlement, left off the list 55 names of men well known to him. Later on, however, thanks to the returning officer, Mr. Dawson, these names were added. The same state of affairs obtained in many other districts, such as Hamiota. It is only in constituencies where it is known the Conservative vote will not affect the result that this is not tampered with.

Right here, in Winnipeg, in 1896, 800 names were omitted from the voters' lists so as to ensure the election of a supporter of the Government. The Greenway Government owes its return to power more to revising officers than to the votes of the people. In North Winnipeg

Then without reading further from that speech, I would venture to put again before the House in this connection an important statement. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) I think was right in producing these solemn declarations in answer to a challenge so often thrown across the House for information as to gross irregularities or improper working under these local systems. Here is a declaration from Emerson, Manitoba, of D. H. McFadden who, in his solemn declaration, says:

1. I was first elected to the provincial legislature of Manitoba in the year 1892, by a majority of fourteen votes, as representative of the electoral division of Emerson.

2. The aforesaid constituency of Emerson was represented by one Jas. Thompson from 1888 to 1892, and who, in 1888, was elected by a majority of fourteen.

3. The aforesaid Thompson was my opponent in 1892.

4. Donald Forrester, barrister, of Winnipeg, was appointed registration clerk, and W. E. Perdue, barrister, Winnipeg, revising barrister, for the Emerson division, to revise the voters' list previous to the last provincial election.

5. The said registration clerk opened an office at Emerson, according to the terms of the Election Act of this province. Every night I had a clerk go to this office and make an exact copy of the list as it was from day to day altered or added to, and continued this rule up to the last day for receiving applications to be put on the list. Late in the evening of that day, I had the said list completed as it was made out by the said registration clerk. When the list was printed and distributed, according to the provisions of the said Act, I found thirteen names on the printed list which were not on my copy of the list, the names being as follows, as appears by the revised list of electors of said electoral division of Emerson, now produced and shown to me, and marked as Exhibit "A."

7. I at once made diligent inquiries as to these particular voters, and as to their right to be placed upon the said electoral lists, but could find no evidence that the said voters, or any of them, ever resided within the electoral division of Emerson. I then made application to the registration clerk to have these names struck off the said list of voters

8. As to the description of residence of these individual voters, it was limited to townships, no section or other particulars being given in the list as to where these parties, or any of them, resided. I had summonses issued by the revising officer and placed them in the hands of responsible parties, actual residents and familiar with all other actual residents in the several townships quoted in the lists, with instructions to make every endeavour to serve these individual voters.

9. At the court of revision the parties whom I had so instructed to serve said summonses appeared and stated that they could not find any of the said voters to effect service of said orders; and further stated that they could get no information that the said parties, or any of them, resided in the township set opposite their respective names in the said list of voters. None of the parties sought for attended the court of revision, and, when application was made to strike their names off the said list, the revising barrister, the said W. E. Perdue, ruled that he would not strike them off the list until it was shown they had been individually served with a summons to attend the said court, and he allowed all the said names to remain on the list as finally revised, and the said names still remain on the said list as bona fide electors of said division, although they are not now, and never have resided in said electoral division.

So that if under those different systems, the systems in Nova Scotia and Manitoba, there are bogus names put on the list for the purpose afterwards of committing personation and all kinds of frauds, they must remain on the lists until service has been made on the parties who do not exist, and therefore their names have to remain on the list.

10. Amongst the names struck off the said list of electors was the name of Donald Forrester, the registration clerk. As he resided and practised his profession of barrister in the city of Winnipeg, application was made to strike his name off. When challenged, he admitted his ineligibility, and the revising barrister had, therefore no alternative but to strike his name off, which was done.

Then follows the formal part of the declaration. At this point I wish to correct a statement which arose owing to a printer's error, as to the number mentioned when Mr. Roblin made the statement of the names of parties robbed of their franchise. I stated the number at 100,000 instead of 10,000. The mistake, I say, is a printer's error, and the hon. member for Marquette has been kind enough to call my attention to it. I observe a very interesting discussion now going on in Manitoba looking to the amendment of the law, and certain criticisms are offered to which I may shortly draw the attention of the committee as showing the state of things in that province, for that law will remain as it is now until next session. An article in a provincial paper says:

It is only reasonable that a registration clerk should be required to place on his list all those who, by being on the municipal, legislative and Dominion lists he is required to consult in its compilation, have the prima facie right to be so included; and, also, that he shall not include therein any names not on the existing lists except upon personal and sworn application. The absence of such provisions has in the past led to great abuses. The registration clerks in many instances, have left off the names of large numbers of Conservatives who were on existing lists; and they have included the names of large numbers of Liberals who were not on existing lists, without any personal application, many of whom were disqualified, and could not possibly have got on the list had they been required to make oath that they possessed the necessary qualifications. The result has been that, in districts where the Conservative party has not had thorough organization, large numbers of Conservatives have been, unknowingly, disfranchised, and Liberals who have been improperly placed on the lists have been allowed to remain there, owing to the trouble and expense of proving them to be disqualified. It is, also, only reasonable that a registration clerk should be prevented from manipulating the lists by striking off names that have been once placed there. In the past it has frequently happened that Conservatives, who have taken considerable trouble during the compilation of the lists to see that their names were thereon, have discovered after the lists have been published, that their names did not appear there. There ought to be no objection at all to the provisions of Mr. Roblin's Bill requiring due publicity to be given to the list after its completion by the registration clerk and prior to the holding of the court of revision; nor should there be any objection to requiring an adjournment of the court of revision in the event of any informality on the part of the registration clerk in so posting the lists.

This statement is made :

It will be remembered that, owing to the lack of such a provision, the South Brandon lists were not revised at all prior to the last general election. The right of appeal from decisions of the court of revision is another provision which must strike every one as fair to all parties. There ought to be some recourse against the arbitrary decisions of partisan revising barristers. Another very necessary provision is that which provides a course of procedure in the event of its being impossible to discover the whereabouts of persons whose right to be upon the voters' lists is challenged. It will be remembered that, at the time of the last compilation of the lists, a number of bogus names were placed on the Emerson lists. The Conservatives desired these to be struck off; but they could not serve the necessary subpoenas to compel the attendance of the bogus parties at the court of revision, for the very good reason that these persons were non-existent. Because the objectors could not prove that they had served subpoenas upon these bogus voters, the bogus names had to be allowed to stay on the lists.

This is a disgraceful condition of affairs and is absolutely indefensible, and yet that would be the system established if Parliament adopted the present Bill as submitted.

It is also only fair that if by any chance a person unqualified to vote does get his name upon the list, there shall be the right to challenge him when he presents himself for the purpose of recording his vote.

The article goes on to mention the weak points in the present system of Manitoba, and I am all the more inclined to refer to them because to a large extent a similar state of affairs exists in the province of Nova Scotia. It is clear that in pressing this amendment members of the Opposition are not by any means unreasonable. They have the example of the two great provinces to point to. Those two great provinces, whatever other defects exist with respect to them, are to enjoy advantages which will be denied to nearly all the other provinces, and I speak more particularly of Nova Scotia. Without doubt there will be no comparison the systems in connection with which this Bill has to do in regard to the election of members to sit in this Parliament. Conscious, no doubt, of those differences as regards the advantages of the voters in securing their right to exercise the franchise at Dominion elections, the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) gave the House some time ago an enactment drawn from the negotiations that have been going on in the Australian colonies to endeavour to show that after all those inequalities were not so indefensible as members on this side of the House seem to think. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) endeavoured to show that these inequalities in the present Bill were not so indefensible after all, and he cited as authority for his contention that our Australian brethren had adopted the United States system, and had provided that the different colonies should settle the qualifications of the voters for the Federal Parliament of Australia. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Belcourt) did not cite the most recent history of the Australian colonies in this regard, and if he had done so I admit that it would have had considerable weight with me. He dealt with the Australian draft Bill of 1891, but I shall call to the attention of the House the fact, that after more mature consideration the Australian colonies have completely changed their views on this matter, and have fallen into line with the franchise principle which is undoubtedly embodied in our British North America Act. You will remember that in 1867 when the Imperial Parliament was distributing the powers between the local legislatures and the Federal Parliament of Canada, there was what amounted to a pact between the different provinces, confirmed and ratified by Imperial legislation, and in the distribution of these powers there were involved some interesting phases of constitutional law which deal directly with this Bill. Even in making the temporary provision for the franchise and system of voting in connection with representation in the Federal House of Commons of Canada, the Imperial Parliament took care to provide that it should not be as from time to time made by the local legislatures; but they took the conditions as existing in 1867, only until they were changed by the Federal Parliament after the coming elections. The Solicitor General shakes his head as if he dissents from this view. Of course I am only speaking from memory, but I have the British North America Act here and I shall read the clause. Section 41 says :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several provinces at the union—

There, a definite time is stated and that is what I had in my memory.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that no provincial franchise could be used by us except that in force at the time of the union.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No. My point was that the Imperial legislature by fixing definitely the franchise, did not say that the local legislatures should settle the franchise for this House, but they simply said that there were conditions existing in those different provinces, certain fixed conditions; that they should not be subject to caprice or change but just as they are when these provinces enter the union, the qualification of voters for the Federal House shall exist. Instead of re-enacting all the different franchises and regulations, the Imperial Parliament, for convenience referred to them as they stood certain and distinct, and adopted them as the qualifications and franchises for this House until this Parliament should be convened and should have the opportunity to enact any franchise it thought proper.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Now I understand the hon. gentleman. He says we had to take the franchise as it existed at the time of the union, and that any subsequent change made by the province cannot affect us here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not arguing that for the present.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It means that, if it means anything at all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My point just now is, that there is nothing in the British North America Act which would sanction the legislation we are now attempting, by which we are to adopt something indefinite and undetermined, and simply delegate our authority to the caprice and will of the different legislatures, and say: that whatever they may from year to year legislate in regard to their franchise, shall be the franchise for the Federal Parliament. I find on reading the section of the British North America Act that it confirms my view in this respect. I wish now to deal with this Australian reference made by the hon. member (Mr. Belcourt).

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would like my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to say definitely if he considers this clause of the Bill unconstitutional and ultra vires of our power in this Parliament?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a very broad question. I had not the pleasure of hearing the argument of the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), but I have looked sufficiently into the question to say that a great deal can be said in favour of that view. I am rather inclined in favour of it myself, but I am not sufficiently armed with authorities to say that I have come to that absolute determination in my own mind. As at present advised I incline to the view that this is an attempted delegation of such powers of this Parliament to the provincial legislatures, as involves a violation of the pact under which the provinces came together, and which pact was confirmed by the British North America Act. It does not seem to me any more reasonable or constitutional to say that the franchise in Nova Scotia shall be such as the Nova Scotia legislature determines, than to say that it should be such as the Quebec legislature determines; and that of course would be a very bold proposition. It seems to me that if you can say that the franchise for this House shall be that which that legislature determines, you could in the same way say that it would be such as any other province determined, and that the same would bind you, though the subject would not be discussed or confirmed in this House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him if he has any doubts about the constitutionality of this clause in the Bill that was introduced by Sir John Thompson:

Except as hereinafter provided, the qualification of voters at a Dominion election shall, in any province of Canada, be that established by the laws in force in such province on the first day of June in the year during which the lists for such election were prepared as the qualification of voters at a provincial election.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As the hon. gentleman reads that, I think there is considerable difference. It seems to me that there is something definite there. It says that there is an Act existing, and that its provisions shall be the provisions governing an election to this House. The hon. gentleman will see the difference between delegating a power to a legislature, at any time, to determine what shall be the law for this Parliament, and saying that what a certain legislature in England, in Nova Scotia or anywhere else did, in a certain Act passed at a certain time, shall be the law here.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not did, but it may do it at any time on the first of June of each succeeding year—exactly our case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If that is right, I certainly would be consistent in saying that the argument I am making would apply to that clause of Sir John Thompson's Bill as well. Of course, I need not call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that while Sir John Thompson introduced that Bill, he took good care in his speech to free himself from being bound to any clause in it. It was a draft, introduced by Sir John Thompson in the spirit, which I hope is the spirit of the Solicitor General on this occasion, of obtaining and taking advantage of suggestions from any part of the House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This is the most serious point in the whole Bill, and we want to hear as much as possible upon it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Of course, and I would have every possible reason to be anxious not to speak hastily or finally. I have frankly told the hon. gentleman my view; and now that he has read that clause of the Bill of 1894, it applies as much to that clause as to the present Bill. But that was not my purpose in referring to the Australian case. I wanted to follow up a very interesting reference of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) to that case, which seemed to be a discovery on his part, and, being in line with the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, I have no doubt that the Prime Minister's attention was given to the subject, and that he was glad to know that the Australians were following in the same line as he argued we should now do in Canada. The clause which the hon. gentleman read from the draft of the constitution of the proposed Australian federation is the following:—

The qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed by the law of the state as the qualification for electors of the more numerous house of the parliament of the state.

The hon. gentleman then went on to point out that the Australian Conference left to the various local bodies to determine the franchise for the federation, and had gone so far even as to declare that for all time to come the Australian federal franchise should be left to local control. Then, he went on to argue that the Australian colonies—and we all agree with him—were known the world over for their advanced ideas, and that their acceptance of this principle made strongly in its favour. They do not apparently agree with the Minister of Finance that a system that was in existence in 1856 was good enough for 1897. I do not think the hon. gentleman mentioned what was said at the time of the convention. I need not remind hon. gentlemen in this House of the tremendous difficulties that have stood in the way of a union of the Australian colonies, and the compromises and very great concessions that some statesmen representing different colonies there have been almost forced into by the preponderating desire for a union. Sir Henry Parkes took a prominent part in the discussion on that occasion. He was a federalist, and he argued that it was necessary to provide for the present for a system which would be most acceptable. He said that the federal Parliament could take control afterwards, if necessary. That was rather inconsistent with the view of the hon. member for Ottawa, adopted from the draft itself, that that was to be for all time to come. The argument of Sir Henry Parkes was that they could adopt that, if the delegates preferred, and that afterwards Parliament itself, when constituted could regulate its own franchise. Then, Mr. Wrixon, of Victoria, also spoke on that occasion. He said:

It seems to me that we are losing sight of the object in view. We are not forming a unified nation. We are only forming an arrangement by which a number of states can come together for the accomplishment of certain objects which are common to all.

And it is not necessary for me, after the Prime Minister's utterances in the Jubilee year, to remind this House of the difference that exists between that collection of states and a country like Canada which already has become a nation. The language of Sir Henry Parkes on that occasion—I quote a brief extract—was as follows:—

The course I take is to bring the Federal Parliament into existence with the least possible disturbance of the social status, and then leave that parliament to shape its own course as to what its electoral system should be.

Sir Henry Parkes was a very prominent man in that conference, and it is easy to see what his view is—something like the view that is to be found in our own British North America Act.

These local arrangements were to prevail in the beginning, and afterwards, when the union was complete and the country was one, then the country could arrange a uniform system and provide its own franchise. The discussion on that draft took place in 1891, but last year,—the jubilee year—the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) will find a later discussion and a complete repeal of that system, and the substitution for it of the system for which the Conservative party in the country are now contending and which they did bring into force in Canada. Among the changes was the basis of the federal franchise in 1897, as compared with that agreed to by the conference of 1891. The clause, as it now stands, departed altogether from the provincial basis. Let me read it. I have read the one which the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) dwelt upon, and I again remind the committee of the strength of the hon. gentleman's argument in connection with his illustration from that year and his reference to the advanced ideas of Australia. If their ideas were advanced in 1891, he will agree with me that they were more likely to have advanced further in 1897. In 1897, this clause was substituted:

Until the Parliament provides otherwise, the qualifications of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed by the law of the state as the qualification for electors of the more numerous house of parliament of the state; but in choosing such members each elector shall vote only once, and no member who has, at the establishment of the commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires the right for the more numerous house, shall, while such qualification continues, be deprived of it.

So that the hon. gentleman will see there was a very considerable change in the principle made by the draft constitution. The Adelaide constitution also provides that the manner of conducting elections shall be the same as in the States until Parliament otherwise provides, almost, in fact, adopting the system that obtain in our own Dominion Act, at any rate to this extent. The hon. gentleman shakes his head.

Mr. BELCOURT. There is a very material difference.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So far as the argument I am making is concerned, it strikes me that there is no difference whatever in principle, in this respect, that the local regulations and the local control of such things as the franchise is to exist only for temporary purposes until the federal Parliament otherwise provides, just as in section 41 of our British North America Act, it is provided that until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the provinces on that subject are to prevail. I am inclined to press my view further, now that the hon. gentleman has suggested a difference. I concede that there is a difference. The difference, however, is this, that the Australians propose to being earlier in controlling these matters than the Canadian delegates did. In the British North America Act we adopted everything provincial with regard to the franchise and the right of voting, but the Australians imposed a limit. They provided, for instance, that :

Until the Parliament provides otherwise, the qualification of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed by the law of the state as the qualification for electors of the more numerous house of parliament of the state.

That is, I submit, similar to our own Act, but they go further than we do, and impose a limitation. They say :

But in choosing such members each elector shall vote only once.

Thus making a change in whatever systems might obtain in the different colonies.

There is a very interesting article, the reference to which can be made briefly and which bears on the hon. gentleman's argument and the views I have expressed. In the "National Review," Prof. Moore, of Melbourne University discussed "constitution making in Australia," and he states that the convention of 1897 was much more federal in its ideas than the earlier one. This is the extract :

Being elected by the people, it naturally entrusted powers to the people, which in 1891 were confided to the parliaments of the several states.

He goes on to say :

In this respect the most important provision by which a change in the character of the Senate is made corresponding exactly with a change in the constitution itself. Its members are to be elected by the people of the states instead of being nominated by the Parliament (that is, by the Parliament of the local states), and the principle of election was as much a matter of course in 1897 as nomination was in 1891. Demoralization may mean centralization; and in their determination that both houses of Parliament shall be elected on a democratic basis, the framers of the Bill of 1897 provide that the qualification of electors shall be the same for both houses, and that no electors shall vote more than once. With these limitations the commonwealth (federal) Parliament is to determine the qualification of electors, and while the commonwealth is thus secured against aristocratic influences in any state, the democracy of the states is protected against the like influences in the commonwealth Parliament, partly by the provision against plural voting already mentioned, and partly by a section which enacts that present electors for the lower house in any state are not to be deprived of their vote by any legislation of Parliament. In the Bill of 1891, there was no provision for a uniform franchise for the commonwealth or for the restrictions now imposed, and the matter was left to the state, as it is in the constitution of the United States.

So that whatever argument can be made, by way of analogy, in the case of the Australian colonies, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that argument is wholly in favour of the principle upon which the Opposition in this House have attempted to resist the Bill altogether. Any connection with this particular clause that involves so much of the principle of the Bill, I say it is with great regret that it does not seem to be in the power of the Solicitor General to make a fair concession to those who are accepting, or perforce must accept, the general principle of the Bill, and who see in it, not merely a want of uniformity but such a contrast between some of the provinces and others as to make the conditions in the smaller provinces almost unbearable. Why should the Government resist so strongly the proposition for a judicial revision in the smaller that obtains in those larger provinces? What reason is there for this resistance? Is it the pressure of their supporters from those provinces? I do not believe that they could be actuated by so small a spirit. If we were asking for some provision to be made generally that involved extraordinary expense or was entirely too radical and novel, or which from experience in other places was shown not to possess merit, I could understand hon. gentlemen opposite resisting our appeal.

But no one has pretended that the system that obtains in Ontario and Quebec is objected to. That has not been argued in the House. The Solicitor General does not attack these features of the laws of these two provinces. Therefore, when we ask that we shall have the benefit of that judicial revision, on appeal, that safeguard against the possibility of fraud or of even irregularities, it does seem to me the Government would do well to concede that to the Opposition. If this were done, the time occupied with the consideration of this Bill would be very materially shortened. The Solicitor General, if I understood him correctly—and I regret that I have not been able to be present during the whole discussion—has already intimated that he proposes to introduce a limit, that he proposes to make the lists to be used in the Dominion elections those lists in the several provinces that are in existence, say sixty days before a Dominion general election. I see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) assents to that. That is very proper, so far as it goes. But the hon. gentleman will see in that the confirmation of the argument that is now being pressed upon the Government. If the hon. gentleman was satisfied that there was no danger to be feared at the hands of the local legislature of an improper interference or an improper action in connection with these lists, so far as the federal House is concerned, would he dream of suggesting such an amendment, or would such an amendment be required? The hon. gentleman was frank enough, if I am correctly informed, to tell the committee that this amendment was intended to prevent any capricious or unfair action or improper interference on the part of the local legislature in the elections to this House. So, if the hon. gentleman admits that there is such a possibility—and he has the evidence (ex parte, if you like) from counties in Nova Scotia and from counties in Manitoba showing the possibility of most unfair and improper manipulation or preparation of these lists under the system for which we contend—he should exercise control and give us at least this right of appeal to a judicial officer. I do not despair of the Solicitor General coming to what I believe was his first view when he approached this matter, and that was that suggestions that had in them any element of reason or fairness and that did not interfere with the main principle of the Bill, should be favourably considered by him.

Mr. BELCOURT. I have listened with attention and interest to the argument adduced by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) in answer to the one which I endeavoured to make the other day, when I cited the case of the Australian colonies. With all deference to the hon. gentleman, I do not think he has answered the point I made. The principle for which we on this side of the House contend, or rather the policy, for perhaps principle is not an apt expression—the policy for which we contend and which was propounded by the right hon. the Premier on one or two occasions during this debate, the policy in support of which I rose the other day to cite the precedent I have referred to, is that the provincial legislature should determine the extent and quality of the franchise. Now, I submit that the case which I have cited, the case of the Australian colonies, is a strong precedent in support of that contention. And when one considers section 41 of the British North America Act, he will see there also the consecration of that policy. That section provides that until the Dominion Parliament shall establish a franchise different from that which prevails in the different provinces, the franchise of the different provinces shall be the franchise on which members of this House shall be elected.

It is evident from this that the framers of the British North America Act believed that the best policy was, in fact, the policy which we advocate, that is, the policy of leaving it to the provincial legislatures to determine the franchise upon which members of this House shall be elected. That is the principle consecrated by section 41, and that that policy or principle was the proper one is proved by the fact that, from 1867, the time of confederation until 1885, when the franchise was changed, that principle and that policy were the principle and policy acted upon.

Mr. McINERNEY. With the hon. gentleman's permission, I would ask him a question. Does not section 41 say that the laws in force in the several provinces at the time of confederation shall fix the franchise for the Dominion? In that case, it did not allow the provinces to change it at their own sweet will.

Mr. BELCOURT. I am not arguing that. The framers of the British North America Act evidently thought that the legislatures of the different provinces which were being formed into a confederation were the best tribunals to determine the nature and quality of the franchise, for it stipulated that until the Dominion Parliament changed it, these provincial legislatures should continue to determine the nature of the franchise.

Mr. McINERNEY. No, not that they should continue to do so, but that the laws in force at confederation should continue to be in force.

Mr. BELCOURT. That is the principle and theory and policy followed until 1885. The provincial legislatures, from the time of confederation to 1885, were the tribunals that determined the quality and nature and extent of the franchise upon which members of this House were elected.

Mr. McINERNEY. No.

Mr. BELCOURT. There is no use in saying "no." That is what was done.

Mr. McINERNEY. It was to be the franchise in force at confederation. The provincial legislatures have no power to change it.

Mr. BELCOURT. They took the laws in force in the different provinces and enacted that, until the Dominion Parliament established a franchise, the franchise under which the members of this House should be elected should remain in the hands of the different provinces.

Mr. McINERNEY. No.

Mr. BELCOURT. There is no use in saying "no." That is the only—

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. BELCOURT. I am answering the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney).

When I get through with him, I shall try to answer other hon. members.

Mr. McINERNEY. Please read section 41.

Mr. BELCOURT. There is no need of my reading it, I know what section 41 says. It says that the laws in force in the different provinces relative to the franchise shall continue to be the laws in force until this Parliament otherwise enacts.

Mr. McINERNEY. At the time of confederation.

Mr. BELCOURT. Certainly, at the time of confederation: and the franchise continued to be determined by those tribunals until 1885. Therefore, I say that the principle for which we contend, that in a confederation such as ours the provinces are after all the best tribunals to determine the nature of the franchise, has been consecrated by the Act of British North America.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the hon. gentleman think that that provision was put in to enable the country to elect a Parliament, because there was no provision for it otherwise? Don't you think that was the reason it was put in?

Mr. BELCOURT. No, I do not think that was the reason at all.

Mr. SPROULE. How could Parliament have been elected without it?

Mr. BELCOURT. The best proof that that was not the reason, is the fact that not only the first Parliament was elected under that franchise but also every Parliament afterwards until 1886.

Mr. SPROULE. But is not that suggested by the words "until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides"? Before that there was no Parliament to provide and could not be, and some provision had to be made to elect a Parliament so that it could provide.

Mr. BELCOURT. The words do not suggest that at all, because the framers of this Act were the men who were charged with the administration of public affairs in Canada, and who were engaged in the elections following the passage of the British North America Act, and who continued to be the leaders of the two parties which, year after year, conducted the elections afterwards. Nobody ever thought or dreamt of changing the constitution, nobody thought or dreamt of making a law in this House to change that order of things until 1885. There is no need of my going into the reasons why that was done in 1885. The reason is well known, at all events, we strongly suspect, although we cannot actually know, that the reason was simply a party reason which prompted that change in 1885. It was not done for a principle.

Mr. McNEILL. Might I interrupt my hon. friend for a moment? He says there was no change made till 1885.

Mr BELCOURT.

Mr. BELCOURT. No change of the principle or policy enacted by section 41.

Mr. McNEILL. This House, in 1882, passed an Act to defend its own privileges against the provinces.

Mr. BELCOURT. I understand the hon. gentleman now refers to the Act of 1882 which was passed for the purpose of enabling Dominion Government officials to vote. But nobody would contend that that Act was passed for the purpose of determining in a general manner the franchise upon which the members of this House should be elected. Surely the hon. gentleman does not claim that.

Mr. McNEILL. I claim it showed that this Parliament was determined to protect its own franchise when it thought necessary.

Mr. BELCOURT. It was to meet an exceptional case. It was not a law passed to determine in a general manner the qualifications upon which electors should vote for members of this House; it was in order to enable a certain number of electors to vote who had been deprived of their votes. That was the sole object.

Mr. McNEILL. If my hon. friend will forgive me—I would just say that this House allowed the local legislatures to exercise that power until it found that they had abused the power; then it took it out of their hands.

Mr. BELCOURT. I do not propose to go into that question. I am merely trying to make this point, that the framers of the British North America Act were evidently strongly impressed with the principle or policy which is actuating this Government in submitting the present Bill to this House. They evidently were under the impression that after all the best way was to leave to the several provincial legislatures the power to determine the nature and quality of the franchise, and that is the point I am making. I think it is quite clear from the enactment that this was the idea which predominated in their minds at that time, that the time might come, sooner or later; when that state of things should be changed, that they contemplated such a thing is quite possible, I am not denying that. But I go further, and I say that for 20 years after confederation that policy was found to work successfully, it was found to work in the best interests of Canada, and nobody ever dreamed of changing it. Now, referring more particularly to the case of the Australian colonies—and that is the only reason I rose, and I would not have taken up so much time had I not been interrupted—my object in rising was to say that in my judgment the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has not answered the argument I made, he has not destroyed the effect of the precedent which I cited the other evening. Now I freely admit that at the time I cited section 25 of the Bill of 1891 for the confederation of the Australian colonies, I was not aware that that particular section had been amended. But I have since seen the amendment, and I have read the article to which the hon. gentleman referred in the "National Review," by Mr. Moore. I have read both, and I still think, with all deference to my hon. and learned friend, that he has not answered and he has not destroyed the effect of my citation. Now what is the amendment of 1897? The only change that was made was this: By the draft Bill of 1891 it was enacted that the franchise as existing in the various Australian colonies should for ever continue to exist, that no change should ever be made by the Parliament of the commonwealth. That is the object. But that is restricted by saying in the amendment of 1897, that the present electors of the various colonies shall not be deprived of their qualification, that is to say, that those who are qualified at the present time shall continue to be qualified to elect members to the Parliament under the commonwealth. Well, there again I say is a consecration of the principle that these Australian colonies were after all the best judges of who should vote for members to a Parliament of the commonwealth, and that the laws which have been enacted by these various colonies giving qualifications to certain voters, shall continue to be in force, and that no subsequent Parliament of the confederation shall in any way interfere with them. That is the principle for which we contend here, or rather the object for which we contend—simply that in a federation such as ours and such as the Australian federation, the provincial parliaments after all is said and done, are the best judges of who shall be entitled to vote for the election of members to sit in this House. I repeat that not only does the draft Bill of the constitution of the Australian federation, but our own British North America Act, our own constitution by section 41, recognize that principle. That principle or policy has been found to work harmoniously and to the satisfaction of everybody, not only to meet the emergency of a coming election, as suggested by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), but for 20 years after confederation. It seems to me that both these cases are strongly in line, and strongly support the arguments adduced from this side of the House.

Mr. McINERNEY. The contention put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) is in support of a similar contention put forward the other evening by the Prime Minister. The hon. member for Ottawa says that to the provinces should belong the right of making the franchise, and that that principle was in the minds of the framers of the British North America Act. He claims that the provinces should have the right to determine from time to time the franchise upon which the members of this House should be elected, and in support of that contention he calls to his aid the British North America Act. Now, the British North America Act does not aid the contention of the hon. gentleman, the British North America Act is "in direct contradiction to the contention put forward by him and by the Prime Minister. The best way to find out what the Act is, is to read it. Section 41 says:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—

And after mentioning voters' lists it says:

—shall respectively apply to the election of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

Does the hon. gentleman seek to convince this House that that section, which strictly confines and limits the power of the provinces to the laws in force at the time of the union as regards the franchise, allows the provinces to determine from time to time what the franchise shall be? Not at all. Section 41 limits the powers of the provinces to Acts in force at the time of the union, and it is not for them to determine from time to time what the law respecting the franchise shall be.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is limiting the franchise law and the electoral lists to those in force at the time of the union?

Mr. McINERNEY. No, I never said anything so absurd. I made my statement twice, and I will state the point once again. The member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) cited section 41 in support of his contention that the fathers of confederation had in their minds the giving of power to the provinces to determine from time to time as to what should be the franchise. That section contradicts any such position, and it says that only such laws as were in force at the time of union shall be in force to determine the franchise. I therefore say that it does not enable the provinces to determine from time to time as to the franchise, but it limits them to the franchise which this Parliament was perfectly cognizant of, and which was in force and operation at the time of confederation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Do I understand that the franchise in force at the time of the union in 1867 could not have been modified by the provinces subsequently, as applying to the Dominion elections?

Mr. McINERNEY. Not unless this Parliament or the Imperial Parliament gave the local legislatures power to do so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. What are we doing now?

Mr. McINERNEY. This is a different matter altogether. I will tell the hon. gentleman what the question now is. In order to avoid the very strong doubt existing as to his power to avail himself of the local franchises, the hon. gentleman is not taking the Acts of the local legislatures, he is not availing himself even of the local franchise, but he is getting away from the doubt that exists in his mind as regards the adoption of the local franchise, and is giving officials the right to vote, which the local Act does not do. He is thus protecting himself against the very strong doubt existing as to this section. What I rose particularly to do, and what I have done, which was a very simple task, was to convince the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) that he erred in selecting section 41 to support his contention that the Confederation Act did give the local legislatures power to determine from time to time what the franchise should be for election of members of Parliament. It limits the power to the time of union, not giving a continuing power, not a power from time to time, but it limits the power to the laws in force at the time of the union. We have offered a very simple amendment based on the principle in force in Ontario, and we ask that this principle be applied to other provinces where it is not in force today. We ask for provinces where there is no appeal provided to a county court judge or a superior court judge that such an appeal should be given, and we wonder why the Government are not prepared to accept this amendment, which simply embodies the principle I have named. Why? Is it because in the game of politics hon. gentlemen opposite want to play against us with loaded dice? Are they saying what Macbeth said after the death of Duncan: "To be thus is nothing; but to be safely thus."

Do they want not only to be placed so as to keep themselves safely in that position by substituting in place of an appeal to a judicial tribunal, an appeal to a partisan officer? It strikes one as most surprising that hon. gentlemen opposite who for years in this House and the country contended for what they considered to be a clean revision of the lists should now oppose a provision which makes for a clean and proper revision of the lists. The country will support the Opposition in demanding the adoption of the principle for which we now stand, and hon. members on the Government side of the House will lose by the foolish opposition made to the adoption of a simple and straightforward principle.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say a few words in order to present to the House the opinion expressed by Sir John Macdonald.

Mr. BELCOURT. It would be more interesting to know what he did.

Mr. DAVIN. That is also very important.

Mr. BELCOURT. He made no change until 1885.

Mr. McINERNEY.

Mr. DAVIN. I will read to the committee not only what Sir John Macdonald said, but what Hon. Alexander Mackenzie stated. Sir John Macdonald:

Moved for leave to introduce a Bill respecting the election of members to the House of Commons. He said that by the Union Act the election law in force in each province at the time of union applied to elections in each province until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provided. It was important that the election laws of all the provinces should be uniform. In Ontario and Quebec the voters' list was used on the assessment roll; but the question of assessment was one in the hands of the provincial governments. It was, therefore, obvious that assessment must cease to be the basis of qualification of voters for members of this House. So long as the assessment roll was under the control of the local authorities, it might be changed at any time, and thus the qualifications of elections would be changed, and this House would be deprived of the right of fixing the qualifications of those who shall vote for its members. In fact, the assessment of Ontario had already been changed by the Ontario Parliament since the union, and he believed the Government of Quebec was pledged to a change in their assessment law. And had there been a contest in Centre Wellington, and had he been asked as Minister of Justice to decide what voters' lists should be used, he would, according to his interpretation of the law, have had to decide that the only list that could be used would be the last assessment roll existing at the time of the union, although it was quite evident that that list would not fairly represent the real voters, and every year it would be a less correct representation of the voters.

That agrees with the argument advanced by the hon. member for Picton. It was stated, again and again, that for a number of years the provincial franchises had been used and no suggestion had been made that any change was necessary. Hon. gentlemen will see that in 1869 Sir John Macdonald introduced a Bill on the subject, and not a single member of the Opposition at that time objected to it.

I wish to show what occurred when the Reform party came into power and Alexander Mackenzie went to the country in 1874. He issued his address to the people of Lambton, and it will be found in the "Globe" of January 9th, 1874. This is what he said:

We shall endeavour to frame laws for such a liberal adjustment of the franchise as may best suit the varying circumstances of the different sections of the Dominion.

So that Alexander Mackenzie intended to bring in an election Bill dealing with this very question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentlemen laugh, but what other meaning can be attached to his words?

Mr. BELCOURT. Does the hon. gentleman ask me the question?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes.

Mr. BELCOURT. In this Bill we are taking exactly the course that Mr. Mackenzie suggested there. We are trying to make a franchise as uniform as possible, consistent with the regulations of the different sections of the country.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall read the quotation again.

We shall endeavour to frame laws for such a liberal adjustment of the franchise—

Do you mean to say we are making an adjustment of the franchise when we pass a law declaring that the local legislatures shall adjust the franchise for us?

Mr. BELCOURT. Read the rest of it.

Mr. DAVIN. I will.

—as may best suit the varying circumstances of the different sections of the Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentlemen laugh, but their laughter is meaningless and senseless. I have read the speeches and addresses of the late Alexander Mackenzie, and he was a man accustomed to use precise language; and you cannot fit on to this language any such idea as gentlemen opposite suggest.

We shall endeavour to frame laws for such a liberal adjustment of the franchise as may best suit the varying circumstances of the different sections of the Dominion.

Now, Sir, I have looked at the franchise that would at that time have returned members to this Parliament, but the hon. gentlemen opposite know that if the idea was in Alexander Mackenzie's mind that the local legislature should frame the franchise for returning members to this House of Commons, all Mr. Mackenzie would have to say was: Although the British North America Act provides that until action shall be taken by the Dominion Parliament; the existing local franchise shall be that for returning members to Parliament; we do not intend to take any steps in accordance with the British North America Act, and we are satisfied with the various provinces returning members in accordance with their franchise. But Alexander Mackenzie used language which clearly indicates that he intended following in the wake of the Hon. Sir John Macdonald, to introduce a Bill similar to that introduced in 1869. I have shown, Sir, that the positions taken by the right hon. the Prime Minister and the statements made again and again from that side of the House, that this system had gone on until 1885, without any action being taken and without a murmur; I have shown that such contentions have been swept clean away by the facts brought forward on this side of the House.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was rather pained to hear the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) doubt the spirit of conciliation which I have attempted to show all through this debate. In order to reassure him, I think I may safely say that although this Bill was introduced after having been very carefully considered and prepared—not by myself, I am free to admit, but by a gentleman much more competent and of greater skill in these matters—we felt it was far from being perfect, and that much would be gained by a free and full discussion in this House. To show that I went as far as it was possible for me to go, to improve the measure that I brought down, I can point now to what I have already promised to do, and to what will be done. We have already undertaken to amend the law, so as to provide that those who are disfranchised under provincial legislation should have the right to vote, except in the case of felons, &c. We have also provided that in so far as the congested polling districts of New Brunswick are concerned, they shall be subdivided in such a way as to remedy the difficulties which have been pointed out. We have gone further. In consequence of the suggestions made to me yesterday by my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) another amendment has been made so as to provide for the non-resident voters in the province of New Brunswick? After having gone that far, it seems to me that it is scarcely fair that I should be taunted with an unwillingness to accept reasonable suggestions from gentlemen on that side of the House. I have been willing to accept these suggestions in the past, and I will be willing in the future when it is possible for me to do so without destroying completely the ground-work of the fabric of the Act. Here is a question that goes to the root of the whole Act, namely, the constitutional question. I have heard it alluded to by hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have not heard it discussed except by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), and that is a question that I think my legal friends on the other side of the House might fairly give their attention to, so that we may have it properly threshed out. It is idle for us to spend our time beating the air upon questions that are not before this committee; the difficulties we are called upon to meet are of such gravity and importance as to require our whole time, and they should debar us from discussing theoretical questions, as to whether we are delegating to the local legislatures, and whether if we did attempt to do so, we could do so legally. Now we are dealing with a sub-clause (a) of this section.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does not that bring the whole question up?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not in the manner in which it has been discussed here. This section means that, as a qualification for the electorate of this Parliament, the franchise we adopt is the franchise in force in the different provinces. We make our franchise the franchise of the provinces.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon. gentleman understand the word "established" to mean "established from time to time."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). At any time?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At any time, yes. I am trying to get rid of the question which has been raised and which really does not bear on this point. I say that we have the right to adopt the franchise of a province and to make that franchise ours. That is what we are doing. That cannot be disputed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. An exact and determined franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I say we adopt the franchise of the province.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As it stands?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not as it stands, but as it may stand at any time after our Act is in force. It was argued a moment ago that Sir John Macdonald declared that we could not do anything of that sort. I am not going to argue as to what Sir John Macdonald said. I am going to point out what he did. In 1872 Sir John Macdonald introduced a Bill and put an Act on the Statute-book, 35 Vic., chapter 14, in which he provided for franchise and voters' lists, with reference to the province of Ontario, and he made similar enactments for all the other provinces:

In the province of Ontario, subject to the special provisions hereinafter made, the qualification of voters at elections for members of the House of Commons shall be that established by the laws in force in that province on the 23rd day of January, 1869,—

Not at the time of the union, but on that specific date.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I wanted to hear that "hear, hear," and I will go on to show how it applies:

—as the qualification of voters at elections for members of the Legislative Assembly, and the voters' lists to be used at elections of members of the House of Commons shall be the same as if such elections were of members of the Legislative Assembly, on the basis of the qualification aforesaid, and the polling subdivisions or wards shall be the same as if such elections were for members of the Legislative Assembly; and the returning officer shall provide a polling place for each subdivision or ward in the most central and convenient place for such elections.

That is Sir John Macdonald's opinion; and on that point I am willing to put my opinion against that of hon. gentlemen opposite. That statute was a subject of judicial discussion, and here is what Chief Justice Wilson, speaking in the case of Regina vs. O'Rourke, said in discussing that very statute:

In not one of these cases is there the least grant of power. Nor do I think the Dominion has granted any such power to this province. It is an enactment that while such law exists in the province the Dominion enactment shall have a certain operation in that province; or it is a declaration that the provincial law shall, while in force, be, and shall be, accepted by the Dominion as its own law throughout the province for its own purposes; and such an enactment is valid and unobjectionable.

Now, I will draw the attention of the legal gentlemen on the other side, on the subject of delegation, to section 662 of the Criminal Code, which says:

Every person qualified and summoned as a grand or petit juror, according to the laws in force for the time being in any province of Canada, shall be duly qualified to serve as such juror in criminal cases in that province.

This refers to our giving the local legislatures power to deal with a matter peculiarly and entirely under our control.

Mr. McINERNEY. That section is differently worded from section 41. That says "for the time being," whereas section 41 says, "at the union."

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The trouble with section 41 is that my learned friend contends that the law at confederation is the only one that can apply. In the same case, Regina vs. O'Rourke, a discussion arose on the validity of 35 Vic., from which this section is taken; and, speaking of this section, Chief Justice Wilson says:

There is no delegation by the Dominion Parliament of the power to enact jury laws for the criminal courts in Ontario. What is done is by a positive enactment of the Dominion, that a certain law in force in Ontario shall for the Dominion purposes be the law of the Dominion. It is a Dominion law enacted not in extenso, but by relation and reference to a law of Ontario.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Now, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is getting away from the argument for delegation as fast as he can, and he says that we can only refer to a law in force at the time the Dominion law is passed.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman must know that I quoted those very words. My argument was that we could enact a law in extenso without specially going over it. I virtually quoted those very words. In other words, instead of repeating the whole statute, we could in a few short words enact it, and make it the law of the Dominion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I find here that "it is a Dominion law enacted not in extenso."

Mr. HAGGART. Exactly.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Well, it is in extenso or not in extenso?

Mr. HAGGART. What I stated was that we could enact the law by simply referring to the statute, or we could enact it in the very words the hon. gentleman has quoted. We do not need to enact it in extenso at all. We can say that clause 6, or the law in force at a particular time in reference to particular subjects shall be the law of the Dominion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think I understand the hon. gentleman. It is only good when the law is already in existence in the provinces and we enact it in the Dominion. Let me read the law relating to provinces.

Mr. McNEILL. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does my hon. friend draw no distinction between accepting a law which is in existence and giving power to frame laws which are not in existence. Will the one be not a delagation and the other a delegation?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Let me first reply to the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart). He says we can only adopt the law already in existence. Let me read again the law relating to jurors:

Every person qualified as a grand or petty juror, according to the law in force for the time being in any province of the Dominion at any time, shall be duly qualified to serve as a juror.

That says any provincial law that may be in force at any time in a province shall apply to the Dominion, and it does not presume the law in force at the time the Act was passed. But that is not all. Not only have we got Sir John Macdonald making the Act I spoke of a moment ago, but we have got this Bill of 1894, and I am quite satisfied no hon. gentleman will declare that that was ultra vires. In my opinion, it is very much intra vires, and I think my hon. friend will have trouble convincing this House that an Act introduced by the late Sir John Thompson, having for its object the enactment of these provincial laws, would have been introduced by him without very serious consideration. Here is what it provides:

Except as may be hereafter provided, the qualification of voters at a Dominion election shall in any province of the Dominion, be that established by the laws in force in such province on the first day of June in the year during which the lists for such election were prepared, fixing the qualification of voters at a provincial election.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a draft Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I thought it was the Bill introduced.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On that occasion, Sir John Thompson took pains to tell the House that he did not take the responsibility of every clause of that Bill. It was a draft for consideration, and he disclaimed responsibility.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I refer to this as evidence of the fact that there has been no lawyer of importance in this House who took the responsibility of declaring that it was ultra vires. Many have expressed doubts, and I think the matter was not absolutely free of doubt in the way in which it was first put; but in view of the form in which section A is drafted, there can be no doubt, in my judgment, that the clause is constitutional, and that that is the construction which has been put upon our law, under section 41 of the British North America Act, ever since confederation. It is a question purely and simply of our declaring that we adopt the provincial franchises as we find them now; and, as I said last night, an Act of Parliament speaks for the present. It always speaks for the time when it is put into operation, and this measure, if it passes, will mean that at the time an election takes place, the provincial lists then existing shall be the lists applicable to a Dominion election. We incorporate, for the purpose of this Act, the provisions of the provincial laws in so far as the franchise is concerned.

Mr. POWELL. It is undoubtedly the principle of statutory construction that a law always speaks for the present, but does the hon. gentleman think that that rule would operate so as to delegate to a local legislature the power of enacting our franchise?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I contend that there is no delegation. That is the point in dispute. If this were a case in which we said, for instance, that a provincial Parliament will make our franchise, the question of delegation would arise, and I would be debarred from arguing as I have done. But I say that we do not confer any power on the local legislatures. We merely say that we adopt as our franchise the franchise in force in each province. As the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has said, we adopt whatever change may take place in the provincial legislatures, so long as the measure we now propose remains in force. There I agree with my hon. friend from Westmoreland.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You draw a distinction between delegation and ratification in advance. For instance, this clause means that we ratify any change which a provincial legislature may make.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We neither delegate nor ratify—we adopt.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a nice distinction.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is a distinction that will appeal to all lawyers in the House, I am sure.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 64) respecting the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montfort Colonization Railway Company, and to change its name to the Montfort and Gatineau Colonization Railway Company.—(Mr. Bourassa, by Mr. McMullen.)

Bill (No. 93) respecting the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Belcourt, by Mr. McIsaac.)

DAWSON CITY ELECTRIC COMPANY.

Bill (No. 123) respecting the Dawson City Electric Company was read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. This Bill is one which contains powers for the construction of a tramway or railway running a good many miles outside the city, and also asks for powers of expropriation under the Railway Act. For that reason, I think the House would desire that it should be referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. FLINT moved that the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

THE ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the opinion which he expressed when the Franchise Act of 1885 was introduced. The hon. gentleman, I am sure spoke then his conscientious sentiments when the Bill of 1885 was introduced, and when he was discussing the very feature of the Bill which is now being discussed as regards this Bill. I mean the right of appeal. When that Bill was introduced the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will remember that there was no clause in it providing for an appeal from a revising barrister when that revising barrister or revising officer happened not to be the county judge. The hon. gentleman was then, as he always claims to be, ever alert as to the right of the subject in this country to have his rights protected by an appeal to the courts of the realm in any case where he is likely to be defrauded of them.

The Minister of Marine and Fisheries on page 1156 of the "Hansard" of 1885 expressed an opinion as to the necessity of an appeal, and I can scarcely understand, in view of the strong and robust language of the statement, that the hon. Minister can now sit as a member of the Administration and refuse the request of hon. members on this side of the House that there should be in this Bill an appeal not from the decision of a lawyer of five years' standing but from the decisions of men who have no knowledge of the law and who have been appointed, at least in Ontario, for their political services. Speaking on that point, the Minister of Marine declared as follows:—

They (the revising officers) can put on the lists whom they please, and they keep off whom they please; and so careful has the hon. gentleman been to prevent the possibility of any one complaining, even of arbitrary conduct on their part, that he allows no appeal, no matter how arbitrary, unjust or villainous their decisions may be.

That was a dangerous, arbitrary and villainous conduct which the hon. gentleman expected from the members of his own profession who had been five years practicing law. Does the hon. gentleman wonder that we ask now an appeal from the decision of an officer who does not understand law, and who occupies a position under the Government of the province and who is called upon to decide as to names to be struck off and names to be added. I appeal to the Minister of Marine to stand by his declaration of 1885 and ask him to use his best offices with other members of the Administration to see that we secure this appeal to a county judge.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman entirely misconceives the situation. The circumstances before the House then and now are entirely different. The hon. leader of the House was then introducing a Bill providing for a federal scheme of revision and providing in certain cases for an appeal to a county court judge. The right of appeal was being granted in a way that was absolutely unfair and unjust. The hon. gentleman was creating an appeal in one case and refusing it in another. I simply rose in my place at that time to show how unjustly such a system would work. But the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) knows that now we are not adopting a Dominion franchise system, that we are not creating a voters' list or establishing machinery for the preparation of a list, but we are simply adopting the lists of the different provinces, which system long experience has shown to have worked admirably and with which the people of the several provinces are satisfied. In Ontario and Quebec the people desired an appeal, and they obtained it; in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia they did not desire an appeal and they did not have it, and we simply adopt the systems which has received the approval of the provinces. That is the answer I have to give to my hon. friend (Mr. Montague). I now desire to say a word in regard to the discussion so far as it has progressed, a discussion which I think has been somewhat unduly prolonged, although I do not believe hon. members desired to continue it improperly. The question has been pointedly raised that the Parliament of Canada has delegated its powers to the local legislatures. That statement was made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), without perhaps sufficient consideration and without having consulted the legal members on his side of the House. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that having the power to legislate on the franchise question by the British North America Act, we could not delegate that power to other parties. He seemed to imagine that this Parliament was limited in its power of legislation with respect to those powers that had been conferred on it by the British North America Act. I need not say to hon. members who have studied the constitutional aspect of the Act, that while that old idea prevailed at one time, it has been exploded. Every lawyer, as I have said, knows that in Hodge vs. the Queen, decided years ago, this very question as to whether on those subjects which had been relegated to the Dominion Parliament on the one hand or to the provincial legislatures on the other, this Parliament or legislature exercised delegated or plenary power, was argued before the Privy Council and once for all finally decided. Within the subject matter of our powers we do not exercise any delegated power. We have the plenary power within those limits of the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain. The matter is not open to discussion. If some hon. members, whose opinions I highly respect, had not risen, I think somewhat hastily and without consideration, and backed up the opinion of the hon. member for Lanark, I would not have considered it necessary to intervene. But I call the hon. gentleman's attention for one moment to the judgment in re Hodge, which is well known to every Canadian lawyer, which has been published, commented on and acted upon all through the Dominion since it was given, a decision which is to the effect that so far as the powers which have been prescribed in the British North America Act to be exercised by the legislatures on the one hand or by the Dominion Parliament on the other, these powers are plenary powers as fully as the Imperial Parliament can exercise, and being so, there can be no question raised about delegated powers. In this case the question came up whether the legislature of Ontario had power to delegate to municipalities the right to make by-laws on subjects which they had power to legislate upon, and it was contended they had not that power because it was delegating a power and trust which the British North America Act gives. I cannot explain the point to the committee so well as by reading brief extracts from the language used by the Privy Council, and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No one has made that contention.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) in his second speech on this subject, reported at page 4296 of the "Hansard," declared that while in his opinion an existing statute could be made the law of the land, we had no power to declare that laws passed by the provincial legislatures from time to time should be the law of the land. The words used by the hon. gentleman were these :

I admit that we can adopt an Act of the provincial authorities in extenso and say that that shall be the law of the country. But when we say whatever law you pass from time to time shall be the law of the country, although we have power and jurisdiction over the matter, we delegate that power to the provincial legislature. I cannot understand it in any other light than that. It is clear as can be under the clause which he proposes under the Act, that whatever the franchise may be, and however it may be changed from time to time by the provincial authorities, it becomes the law of this Dominion. If that is not delegating power to the provincial authorities to fix our franchise from time to time as they think proper, then I do not understand the meaning of words.

The hon. gentleman contended you cannot do that. I am arguing for a moment on the assumption that his construction of the section is correct. What did the Privy Council lay down in this opinion? I am quoting now from the decision in Hodge vs. the Queen, 9 Appeal Cases, page 131 :

Assuming that the local legislature had power to legislate to full extent of the resolutions passed by the license commissioners, and to have enforced the observance of their enactment by penalties and imprisonment with or without hard labour, it was further contended that the Imperial Parliament had conferred no authority on the local legislature to delegate those powers to the license commissioners, or any other persons. In other words, that the power conferred by the Imperial Parliament on the local legislature should be exercised in full by that body, and by that body alone. The maxim "delegatus non potest delegare" was relied on.

That is the argument here.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I fail to understand the English language if that is not the argument

I have been listening to. This is what the Privy Council says:

It appears to their Lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the appellants is founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the provincial legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in section 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by section 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion would have under like circumstances to confide to the municipal institutions, or body of its own creation, authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect.

It is obvious that such an authority is ancillary to legislation, and without it an attempt to provide for varying details and machinery to carry them out might become oppressive, or absolutely fail. The very full and very elaborate judgment of the court of appeal contains abundance of precedents for this legislation, entrusting a limited discretionary authority to others, and have many illustrations of its necessity and convenience. It was argued at the bar that a legislature committing important regulations to agents or delegates effaces itself.

Exactly the argument made here in so many words.

That is not so. It retains its powers intact, and can, whenever it pleases, destroy the agency it has created and set up another, or take the matter directly into its own hands.

Now, how I could express the matter more strongly, more definitely or more conclusively than by quoting this judgment, I do not know.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the Minister (Sir Louis Davies) argue that this Parliament has the power to delegate its powers as regards the making of the franchise to the provinces?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then the Minister (Sir Louis Davies) states positively that it is his opinion as a lawyer—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say the Privy Council has so decided.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Though I am not a lawyer, I think I will be able to show that the Privy Council has not decided any such thing. The Minister tells us that he believes this Parliament has the power to delegate its power as regards the making of the franchise law to the various provinces. I would now ask what the opinion of the Solicitor General is upon that point?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not called upon to express any opinion in this connection. There are gentlemen in this House whose legal opinions have very great weight with me, and some of them on the other side of the House, and their opinion is that we have the power to delegate.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This is a strange position indeed. The Minister of Marine says we have the power to delegate that power to the provinces.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I say the Privy Council have so decided.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You say that under that decision this Parliament has the power to delegate that authority?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If we choose to do it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Solicitor General has no opinion to offer, but he tells us that there are other opinions in the House to which he bows with all due deference. Well, Sir, I have forgotten the debate of yesterday, if I did not hear an opinion expressed by the Solicitor General from which the inference was that if it came to a question as to whether this House had the power to delegate that duty to the provinces he would hesitate as regards that point.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is a question of policy.

Mr. FOSTER. No, it is a question of law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have got this far in understanding as to how these gentlemen stand. Yesterday the Solicitor General doubted as to whether we had the right to delegate that power, and now the Minister of Marine declares that the Solicitor General's doubts are of no avail, and that under the judgment of the Privy Council this Parliament undoubtedly has that right. The contention which the Minister of Marine set out for the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was not the contention which the hon. member for Lanark made. The hon. member for Lanark never went back to the old maxim which declared that because we had delegated powers, we could not delegate these powers to another parliament. The hon. member for Lanark knew perfectly well, as does the Minister of Marine, that that idea was exploded, and we all must admit now that within the confines of the British North America Act but always bounded and confined by the provisions of that Act, this Parliament has as large powers as the Imperial Parliament has. Surely the Minister of Marine does not contend for a moment that the Acts of that Parliament are not compelled to be within the provisions of the British North America Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Certainly not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That being so, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) contended that the British North America Act declares in its 41st section :

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several provinces at the union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely : the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces.

These shall be the lists upon which the elections of this Parliament shall be held. But the hon. member for Lanark contended that these powers had been taken out of the hands of the local legislatures when the Dominion Parliament had "otherwise provided" ; and that consequently, once and for ever, the power of delegating that power to the provinces had disappeared from this Parliament.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will surely understand. My contention was simply that whatever and just to the extent that the Imperial Parliament had given us power to legislate upon the subject, to that extent we had plenary powers. We had not a delegated power, which was at once exhausted by its exercise ; but we had plenary powers in the same way that the Imperial Parliament has power to legislate upon any such matter. The argument, that because we have once exercised the power we have exhausted it, is, I say with very great respect, simply absurd.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I take it as a great many members of this House take it, that this having been once acted upon by this Parliament, we have no right now to give that power to the provinces. Suppose the hon. gentleman (Sir Louis Davies) is correct and that we can give the right to make a franchise to the various provinces, why cannot we give it to one province ? If we have the power of delegating the right to make the franchise for this Parliament to the several provinces—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not a delegation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now we have another position.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This section is not a delegation in the popular sense of the word. It is a declaration by us that the franchises prescribed by the provincial parliaments shall be our franchise.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Now, my hon. friend is getting away from the position from which he started.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not a bit.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He said that we had a perfect right to delegate these powers. He quoted the decision of the Privy Council, and stated that we must be dull if we did not see that we had a right to give the making of the franchise to the various provinces. I was going on to ask my hon. friend, if we have the right to say that the franchise of the Dominion shall be the franchise established by the various provinces, why have we not the right to say that the franchise adopted by this Dominion shall be the franchise, say, of Prince Edward Island ? If we can say that the various provinces shall make the franchise of this Dominion, we can equally say that the franchise of the province of Prince Edward Island shall be the franchise of the whole Dominion of Canada ; and that is reducing the matter, as the hon. gentleman knows, to an absurdity. Next, the hon. gentleman says that we are not delegating the power, and that was the contention of the hon. Solicitor General last night. I quite agree that if the hon. gentlemen were coming down here with an Act declaring that the franchises of the various provinces now existing should be the franchise of the Dominion, that would not be delegating power. It would be simply adopting the franchises of the various provinces. But the hon. Solicitor General is going further than that, and if he is not delegating powers, I, for one, cannot possibly understand what he is doing. He is saying to this Parliament : I want you to pass an Act adopting the franchises as they exist at the present time ; but I want still further that you should pass an Act which will not only adopt the franchises as they exist at the present time, but will adopt the provincial franchises, no matter what change, however absurd, may be made in them. I am not a lawyer, and I am not able to see the fine distinctions which are drawn by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as regards delegating our powers, and as regards binding this Parliament by statute to adopt whatever changes the provincial legislatures may make in the future. But I leave it to the intelligence of the House that the distinction is a very fine one indeed, and if we are not delegating our powers, I do not know what we are doing.

Leaving that subject, I want to come back to the other point on which I touched, and which brought the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to his feet. He brushes aside in the most perfunctory manner the contention he made for an appeal to the county court judge when the Bill of 1885 was under discussion. What he said was that those officers who made the lists were autocrats and therefore he demanded the right of an appeal from their decision. At that time the promise was given by the Government that judges should be appointed wherever practicable. At the present time what is the fact? In the province of Nova Scotia and in the province of New Brunswick the persons who make the lists are not judges. They are sheriffs appointed by the local administration, removable, as has been clearly shown, by the will of that administration; and what is the position of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to-day? He has gone back on his contention of 1885, and he refuses the right in those provinces of an appeal to a fair and just tribunal in regard to any inaccuracies in the list. If the hon. gentleman will turn up the debates of 1885, he will find that the present Minister of Justice, then the member for Bothwell, also argued for an appeal to the county judge, in every case where the revising officer was not a county judge, in order that there should be equal justice done between the parties in this Dominion. I take it that if the present Minister of Justice were expressing his opinion to-day, untrammelled and unbiased by the influence of those around him, he would express the same opinion that he expressed in 1885. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) fought and re-fought for the same contention. I believe that if I had time to-night, I should be able to show that every member of the present Administration who was in Parliament at that time fought for the same principle for which we are fighting on this side of the House to-night. And if it was a good principle then, I ask hon. gentlemen who are members of the Government, and I ask hon. gentlemen who are their supporters and by whose voice they are in power, to stand up here and say that the principle for which they fought in 1885 was not a correct and just principle. I further ask any hon. member on that side of the House to stand up and say what objection there can possibly be against an appeal to a fair-minded, unbiased, impartial, non-partisan tribunal. I have listened to the Prime Minister. I have listened to the Solicitor General. I have listened to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I have listened to each one of them; and, while they went away on various side roads, and discussed various little points, not one of them denied the correctness of the proposal which had been made by themselves in 1885. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the fight they made in the past, and in view of the undisputed correctness of the views which we have advanced on this side of the House, to grant the appeal for which we are contending.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman makes an appeal across the House, but I think it is hardly fair to make it now. The Prime Minister last night argued the question thoroughly, and he said that the position which the hon. gentlemen asked us to accept, amounted to this, that we should withdraw our Bill. The Government cannot do that; it is perfectly absurd to ask them.

Mr MONTAGUE. Better withdraw the Bill than do an injustice.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Government do not think it is an injustice. The Government, not hastily, but after years of consideration, both in Opposition and since they attained power, came to the conclusion that the proper course was to adopt the franchises of the various provinces. Where the provinces grant an appeal, the Government grant it; where the people of a province do not think an appeal necessary, the Government do not introduce an appeal; and the Government do not intend to alter their Bill in that cardinal respect. If they are defeated by the House, they will be prepared to accept their defeat; otherwise they must proceed on the main principle contained in the Bill, that the provincial franchises shall be the franchise of the Dominion.

Mr. McNEILL. I ask my hon. friend to permit me to say a word just now, because his remark has brought up what I wanted to direct the attention of the committee to; that is, what seemed to me to be the most grave and ominous statement made by the Prime Minister last night. When this measure was at its second reading, we pointed out that just as soon as a local legislature was empowered to assail the seats of hon. members of this House by adding to the lists men who were opposed to them, or by striking from the lists their friends, the independence of this Parliament was gone. To that this reply was made: "You need not be afraid of anything of the kind; the local legislatures are incapable of such conduct." To that we replied by pointing out that it had already been done, and the Finance Minister himself called attention to the fact that this House in 1882, for the protection of its privileges, was obliged to guard itself against such action of the local legislature of one of the provinces.

When that could not be controverted, this reply was made in effect: Oh, well, they will not do it again, and if they should do it again, we have the power to intervene and protect ourselves. When the Prime Minister was making that statement, I, perhaps, somewhat improperly, interjected the remark: But it may be too late; and in reply to that he said: It cannot be too late, for this Parliament will always have the opportunity and the time to guard itself against an injustice of that kind. Let me reply that while it is possible that the majority may have the opportunity of protecting itself, there is certainly no opportunity offered to the minority of protecting itself. The discussion proceeded, and then, attention having been called to this injustice, it was proposed from this side that there should be an appeal, in every case, to a county court judge, or, if that were impossible, to a judge of a superior court. We pointed out that in Ontario and Quebec this appeal was allowed. My hon. friend the Solicitor General—and I hope he will correct me if I misrepresent him, and I will say, in passing, that I think the hon. gentleman has shown, in the course of this discussion, most exemplary patience and fairness and ability—said, in reply, that if there were any good grounds shown why a judge should be appointed, he would be willing to admit that the appointment should be made. In other words, he said, that if it were shown that real injustice was being inflicted upon the electors in any part of the Dominion, especially in the maritime provinces which, I think, he mentioned at the time, he would consider that a fair ground for the contention we were making, but that no proof of such injustice has been given. In reply to that, my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) read several affidavits, showing that the grossest injustice had taken place in his own constituency. Well, I think that after that my hon. friend practically threw up the sponge, because the only argument he was able to adduce was this, that he must assume that these officials discharge their duties properly. I do not think my hon. friend could expect that argument to be taken seriously. It amounted to this, that officials always discharged their duty as they ought to do. That was the position of affairs when the right hon. Prime Minister rose last night, and what did he tell us? He did not attempt, for one moment, to deny that there were injustices. No, but he said that this was a matter which rested entirely in the hands of the provinces, that it was for the legislatures to say what was best for their own people in this regard, that within the limits of the provinces the provincial legislatures ought to be supreme in this matter. What did that amount to? It amounted to this, that if there were judges appointed by the provincial legislatures, well and good; but if there were not judges appointed by the provincial legislatures to revise the lists, still, well and good—that this Parliament had no right whatever to intervene. That was the position taken by the Prime Minister. What does that amount to? Why, Mr. Chairman, it amounts to this, that although this Parliament is satisfied that injustice is being done in reference to its own franchise, that although there is no dispute as to the fact that injustice is being done, and although this Parliament has the power to remedy this injustice, yet this Parliament shall not intervene. And it amounts to this further statement, that, so far as this Government is concerned it will not intervene, let the injustice be as it may. Let the injustice be ever so great, this Government will not intervene, because that would be contrary to the principle upon which this Bill is founded. In other words, the partisans of hon.

gentlemen opposite, from this date until the date of the next general election, shall have a free hand to work their own sweet will in the provinces, in assailing the seats of hon. members on this side. I do not mean to say that this legislation is being passed through this House in this way for this purpose, but I say that that will be the result of it; and I say that there is no hon. gentleman opposite who has a fair and open mind, who will deny that there are persons in the provinces, on both sides of politics, who will be glad to seize the opportunity of improperly dealing with the voters' lists. Then, I ask, what has become of the statement which was made to us, when this measure was brought down, that if injustice was being done, this Parliament has the remedy in its own hands. Why, that remedy has all gone up in smoke; there is nothing in it. The right hon. gentleman says that the local legislatures cannot do wrong in this sense, that so long as they have the majority of the people of the province behind them, whatever they do is right. Whatever is right in the provinces, under these circumstances, and it is useless for the right hon. gentleman or any member of the Government to tell us, under those circumstances, that we may rest content. It is useless for them to say that if the local legislatures abuse their powers, we have the remedy in our hands, because they say that if we interfere with the provinces, we will violate the principle of this Bill. The principle of this Bill, forsooth, is this, that the local legislatures cannot do wrong, so long as they have a majority of the people in the provinces at their back for the time being. That is the principle we are asked to accept here to-night. I say that no hon. member of this House, who has the good of our country at heart—and I am quite sure that some at least of those who have charge of this measure have—ought to ask us to place such a statute as this on the Statute-book.

Mr. McCLURE. I would be quite willing to vote for the amendment proposed if I could see from my standpoint, that there is any necessity for it. So far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, I am saying what I think will be borne out by men of both political parties in the province of Nova Scotia when I say that, so far as the people there are concerned, no necessity is felt for such an appeal as this. I have been surprised to hear during the course of this debate several very violent attacks made upon the system of preparing the lists in the province of Nova Scotia. I have been especially surprised because I had thought that I had a somewhat intimate knowledge of the politics of that province during the last fifteen years. I have had practical experience for that length of time, and for a longer period I have studied the history of that province. I am sure I will be supported by hon. gentlemen in this House when I say we had to come a thousand miles away from home to hear that system denounced in the strong language in which it has been denounced here. What is that system? Why, Sir, long before the Confederation Act was passed the system which prevails in the province of Nova Scotia in the preparation of the lists prevailed in that province. In those days the destinies of the province were guided by men whose memories are respected by gentlemen in this House on both sides, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me when I say that gentlemen of the Conservative party in those days were largely responsible for the adoption of the system of preparing the voters' lists. Of course, that does not necessarily make it a good system. We had that system when we went into confederation. We have had several governments in the province of Nova Scotia since that time, and not one of them has attempted to change that system. From confederation to 1873, we had a Liberal government, and that Liberal government allowed the system of preparing the lists to remain in force. They had strong opposition. Prominent members of the Conservative party opposed them in the legislature of the province, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to cite the name of one man, who, on the floor of the Assembly of the province ever proposed to change this system. In 1878 a Conservative Government came into power in that province. It was controlled by a gentleman whose memory will be respected by every member in this House, Sir John Thompson. For four years he controlled the destinies of the province, and during that whole time he made no effort and showed no desire to change the system that prevails in that province in the direction proposed in this House. Not only that, but, during the years that preceded his administration, the control of the lists was largely in the hands of the old courts of sessions. Sir John Thompson abolished that and substituted for it the municipal council, and, in doing so endorsed this very system which is denounced as so iniquitous by hon. gentlemen opposite. Then the Conservative Government went out of power and the Liberals came in again, and the system remained in force. I say I have heard with amazement gentlemen attack this system on the floor of this House. I have had the pleasure of being more or less intimately connected with the politics of my province as long as I can remember, not only in my own county but in other counties, and in no election campaign, in no public discussion, on no party platform has the statement been made that the system is bad and rotten. I know something of the press of that province, having been connected with it. I know something of the discussions that have taken place through the press. And I venture to say that these hon. gentlemen cannot quote from any paper, Conservative or Liberal, any attack upon the system of preparing the lists that prevails in the province of Nova Scotia. I have been a member of the legislature of that province, and in that legislature the Government was opposed by men who are as responsible and intelligent and able to represent the Conservative party as hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and never once did they attack that system or attempt to have it changed. And now, at this late day, gentlemen attack the system. And on what grounds? That is what amazes me. Hon. gentlemen will rise and produce affidavits and statements made about petty disputes that took place in various localities about the preparation of the lists, and make these the ground of attack upon the system. There is no law upon the Statute-book in Canada that could not be assailed upon grounds of that kind. Will hon. gentlemen tell me that the customs laws of Canada are a fraud and a snare because frauds are committed under them? Will they tell me that the Dominion Franchise Act is an iniquitous, vile law because under it frauds have been committed. They will not attempt to say that, and so it is absurd and ridiculous to try to get the House to believe that the franchise system of Nova Scotia is bad because the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) is able to quote some petty ward dispute in his county about the way the lists are prepared. I do not deny that partisans have attempted to stuff the lists in some cases. They have tried to do that under every system that ever was established, and they will continue to do so. But that does not say that a system which has been endorsed and upheld and declared to be good and wise by every public man and every administration in the province of Nova Scotia ever since it was a province is a bad system.

Now, with regard to the right of appeal, the only thing I hear hon. gentlemen urge is this—they say it is very inconsistent and very improper for the Liberal party to refuse this right of appeal because they advocated such a right of appeal under the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885. But do not these hon. gentlemen see that there is a vast difference between the cases. In those days we were seeking to establish a new system, to take the power of controlling the lists out of the hands of the people and place it in the hands of appointees of the Government. These hon. gentlemen are anxious to have safeguards for the proper preparation of the lists. Under the system that prevails in Nova Scotia they have the best safeguard they could possibly have, the safeguard that a Liberal Government should give them, that of having the preparation of the lists in the hands of the people themselves. What better safeguards do you want? Who prepares the list in the province of Nova Scotia? Men chosen by the people in the various localities, not appointees of the Government, but appointees of the municipal council which are elected by the free vote of the people. And if these men have lost the confidence of the people of Nova Scotia, it is time to ask for an appeal to the judges. For my part, much as I respect the judges of my province, I would prefer to have the preparation of the voters' lists left where it is now, the people selecting those who are to prepare the lists on which members are to be elected to this Parliament. That is the broad principle under this Bill. The Franchise Act of 1885 was a declaration that the people of the localities could not be trusted to prepare the lists, and for that reason, it should be taken out of their hands and men appointed to prepare the lists. This takes us back to the first principle and is a declaration that we will trust the people by leaving it with the people to select men to prepare the lists. The whole argument of these hon. gentlemen on the other side is based on the supposition that the people will necessarily act dishonestly. Parliament should not act upon such a supposition as that. I am surprised that the hon. member for Annapolis and others should rise, and, in the face of this Parliament do what I know they do not intend to do, but what they must appear to do to those who do not know the circumstances of Nova Scotia—circulate the slander upon the people that they have tolerated a system which not only permitted fraud, but, as these hon. gentlemen say, opened the flood-gates of frauds in that province. That is not true, and everybody in the province knows it is not true. I will not speak for other provinces, but, so far as the people of Nova Scotia are concerned, and in their own hearts these hon. gentlemen know that what I say is the truth, there is not a body or party of men who but will rejoice that once more they have restored to them the rights they possessed up to 1885 of preparing the lists upon which members shall be elected to this Parliament.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. McClure) has made a statement to the House which I do not propose to allow to go uncontradicted. He stated that the franchise and the machinery by which that franchise is put into operation in the province of Nova Scotia to-day, had existed for many years, and had existed before confederation. Now I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is not a fact that before 1879 our system of municipal government in the province of Nova Scotia was under the management and control of a board of grand jurors and magistrates?

Mr. McCLURE. Yes, and I said so, that previous to that it was controlled by a court of sessions, and Sir John Thompson passed an Act taking the power out of the hands of the court of sessions, and giving it to the municipal council, incorporating this very system.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I was a member of the Government of Sir John Thompson when that measure was passed, that measure was passed in 1879, and what did it provide for? It provided that the people of the municipalities had power to elect the councillors, and those councillors were given, as a municipal body, power and authority to distribute the road moneys of the province. The Government divided the general road grants between the counties of the province, and gave power by that Act to the municipal councils to expend that money. Then what happened? After the Holmes-Thompson Government went out of power, the Government that succeeded them went to work and changed that provision. I have under my hand the Act that was passed by that Government providing for the granting of $300,000 of money for the roads and bridges. But was that money distributed to the municipal councils? No, Sir, they did not make any such provision, but the records of the province show how that money was expended. The Government first apportioned that money, not to the municipal authorities, but to men who were running as Liberal candidates within the municipalities. They gave the expenditure of that money to Liberal councillors within the municipalities, but they did not give it to councillors who were not Liberals. In that way they put the machinery under the control of the Liberal councillors within the municipalities by which they could secure their election. But that was not all. Afterwards the Government of Nova Scotia undertook to amend the Franchise Act by providing that the officers who were appointed formerly by the grand jury and magistrates, known as the county sessions, and who had absolute power to provide the voters' lists, should no longer have that power exclusively, but that they should have associated with them in the preparation of the lists, the sheriff. Subsequently they changed the law with regard to the appointment of sheriffs. The law previously provided that the sheriff should be selected by the judges of the Supreme Court at their regular sittings, nominating three fit and qualified men within the county, and submitting them to the Government, and giving the Government the option of selecting from those three men. That law was repealed, and a law was put on the statutes which provided that the Government had power to select their own men regardless of any recommendation from the judges. These sheriffs were given power to make the final revision of the list. And what is that power? When the reviser has completed his list, any man who wants to strike a name off or to put a name on, can go to that sheriff and make his appeal either to put a name on or to take a name off the list. The sheriff can do as he pleases with regard to that name, he has power to refuse the application or to accept it, just as it suits the party who places him in his position. What we want now is power to appeal from that sheriff's decision, because the sheriff is appointed by a partisan government and must necessarily be a partisan himself. He holds his position at the will of the Government, and if he does not serve that Government, he does not expect to retain his position. That is why we consider it necessary to-day—and we are not asking anything that is not enjoyed by the other provinces of the Dominion—for the right of appeal from the decision of the sheriff to a county court judge. We have county court judges in whom we have every confidence, we have them of different shades of politics, we feel, however, that we are safer in the hands of county court judges in respect of getting a man's name on the list which ought to be there, or of getting a name off the list who has no right to be there. We have every confidence in the fairness of those gentlemen who are to-day county judges within the province. Now, I cannot understand the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) making the statement in the strong terms in which he made it, to the effect that the franchise law of Nova Scotia is to-day the same as it was before confederation. I need not detain the committee by reading the changes which were made from time to time in respect of this law; I would refer any hon. gentleman to the statutes of Nova Scotia for 1879 and 1885, and subsequent amendments made by the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot bring myself to vote on this question so long as matters stand in the inconsistent and unjust position that they are placed in by hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Let me ask the attention of this committee to one of the latest developments of that inconsistent position. Here is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who, within the hearing of this committee within an hour, has been arguing that this Dominion Parliament has a perfect right to delegate its powers to the local legislatures, and supporting that by an opinion of the Privy Council of Great Britain on a case which has been cited, and ending up by declaring that it is, although he hated to say so, simply absurd for any one to argue that this Dominion Parliament has not a perfect right to delegate its powers. On the other hand we have the Solicitor General, as able a man as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and a much more conservative man than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. When the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gets up in that airy way and says there is no chance of discussion, that anybody could understand, that there is no ground for argument, I am reminded of the fact that last year on the question of the preferential tariff, on the question of the German and Belgian treaties, the hon. gentleman rose in just the same airy way and laid down his dictum, and declared that not even a fledgeling lawyer in the Opposition could successfully contradict him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is grievously and grossly unjust. When I stated my opinion I stated it with very great diffidence indeed. If the hon. gentleman will read my remarks he will find that I stated that I took that position with very great diffidence, that I might be wrong, but I had reached that conclusion after a conscientious study of the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman in that language and in those tones and with that manner showed extreme diffidence, it surpasses me to think what he would be under other conditions. I call the attention of hon. members to the words of the hon. gentleman's speech, which have been called to mind in this House over and over again, and have been placed on "Hansard" over and over again, in which he allowed no ifs and buts in his dictum as he laid it down. I could not help but recall that manner and those words of absolute certainty last year, and the result which came in due course of time when his contention fell utterly before the decision of the law lords of the Crown.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is wrong again. The law lords never decided it.

Mr. FOSTER. The law officers of the Crown.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are a very different body of men.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says they are a very different body of men. They seem to be a sufficiently solid body of men to make it possible for the British Government to modulate its action on their advice, which they did, and did in direct opposition to the dictum which the hon. gentleman laid down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. One is a judicial body and the other is not.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot help that. The body is legal enough and strong enough for the British Government to base its course of action on sacred treaties on the advice the law officers of the Crown gave them. I say that after the hon. gentleman's statement here and his argument across the water, where he ran foul of the law officers of the Crown, the British Government simply said to him that his opinion was wrong. We have had the airy and exclusive way in which he cut off the possibility of doubt as to whether this Dominion Parliament had the right to delegate freely and fully its powers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman again has misrepresented me—I will not say wilfully. The hon. gentleman was present when I read the case on which I based my remarks, and I can hardly excuse him now. I simply quoted the decision in re Hodge. I read the language of the decision, whether it was right or wrong. If the hon. gentleman chooses to say it was wrong, with him must rest the responsibility. To say that I gave an ex cathedra judgment is absurd. I merely gave the judgment of the Privy Council, and I read it to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I am quite within the judgment of the House and within the judgment of the report of the hon. gentleman's speech when it is brought before the House. The hon. gentleman rose for a purpose, not simply to read an extract from a decision of the Imperial Privy Council.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was my purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. He rose to make a contention—I do not care what statement he made—and he put forward his contention, and he read an extract as a stand-by to his contention, and as proof of the justice of his contention. There was no reason for the hon. gentleman reading it if it was not to base a contention on.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was my authority.

Mr. FOSTER. His contention being that we have the right to delegate our powers. The Solicitor General, who is absent at the present, but is generally present during these discussions, the other evening when speaking on this point took diametrically opposite ground.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. FOSTER. He fought entirely wide of the contention that by this Bill he was delegating the power of this Parliament to the legislatures.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. So did I.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot go further than to leave the matter to the judgment of the House and to the arbitrament of the "Hansard," when it comes down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has misstated me the third time. Does he say I did not contend in the same sense? Did I not contend that this was not a delegation of the powers? Did I not say so in answer to my hon. friend?

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman say now that he did not state to-night, in the course of his argument, at the time he was reading an extract from the decision, that this Parliament had the right and that any legislature which had plenary power had the right to delegate that power, to take back that power and delegate it again?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did so explicitly; but I stated what were the powers of Parliament, and that I did not conceive that we were doing it in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall again have to leave it to the judgment of the House, when "Hansard" comes down. I am not deceived and I am not wrong. What is the position the hon. Solicitor General took? He took exactly the opposite ground. He took the ground that we had not the right—his statement was not made by inference but was an explicit statement—to delegate such powers as these.

Mr. McMULLEN. No. Read his remarks.

Mr. FOSTER. The Solicitor General in reply said:

I am sure that I have no fault to find with my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) for raising this question, because it is really the important question in the whole of this matter.

I again leave it to the judgment of the House if the Minister of Marine did not put it aside as a question of no moment, as utterly trivial in connection with this question. Again, he said:

And I am prepared to admit now that if this were a case in which we were attempting to delegate to the provincial legislatures powers that we are called upon to exercise, there would be a very serious question as to our right to do so. My argument has been—I think I have stated it before—that we are not delegating our powers.

The contention of the Solicitor General is that that class of powers we have we cannot delegate. That is the inference.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the right hon. Prime Minister contend that we have a right to delegate our powers?

The PRIME MINISTER. I was not here when my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) made his speech; but I understand he quoted judicial authority that we had the right to delegate our powers and at the same time stated that while we had that naked and abstract right, he considered we were not using it in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. The right hon. gentleman is adding more complications to this already complicated question. Is there anything these hon. gentlemen can agree upon? On any legal question these three lawyers cannot agree. On a question of policy these three members of the Cabinet again cannot agree with each other. The leader of the Government came down upon the Solicitor General, who had outlined a mode of action in respect to this Bill in which he proposed to put around the powers of the provincial legislatures restrictive clauses to prevent possibilities and contingencies. He came down on the hon. member for East Lambton and the hon. member for Brantford, who contended that as the Indians had been enfranchised to a certain extent, it would be unjust and wrongful to take away the franchise from them. He came down on them, on what ground? That the local legislatures are the natural conservators of the rights of the franchise not only for themselves but for this Dominion Parliament, that there was no middle ground, and that we had, perforce, either to give the whole matter into the hands of the local legislatures or to keep it ourselves.

To-night the Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us: You make a plea to have the courts open to you if you have a grievance, but if we attempted to yield you that it would be tantamount to withdrawing our Bill and so we cannot do it. Justice or no justice, grievance or no grievance, wrong or no wrong, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries declares that his party must put this Bill through on a certain principle, and grievances and wrongs may go to the wall. He tells us that he and his friends must follow out the principle laid down by the right hon. the Premier, whether it be just or unjust. And when my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) was confronted with his strong and vehement utterances of 1885, I admired the deftness with which he endeavoured to explain away the inconsistency between his position then and now. Every member of the Cabinet who at that time was a member of the Liberal party in this House, inveighed in the strongest possible manner against the iniquity of having voters' lists at the mercy of a partisan appointee with or without a court of appeal; but without a court of appeal they said it was monstrous, and they fought it for months in this House. Was the principle that was wrong then of such an evanescent nature that a few years afterwards it comes to be right. That principle hon. gentlemen opposite contended for with great strength and persistence in 1885, and now when they are placed in the position of legislators is it not arrant cowardice for them to slip out of the obligation which their former utterances imposes upon them, by saying: We wash our skirts of the whole matter; it is the fault of the local legislatures, and all we are doing is simply to throw the matter into the hands of the local legislatures. The local legislature gives the revision of the voters' lists to a partisan appointee, without any appeal at all, and yet these hon. gentlemen who opposed that as being outrageous and monstrous in 1885, now throw us upon the naked point of the sword, and when we cry out with our wounds, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says: that is not my fault, the local legislature will have it so, and we must remit you to the tender mercies of the local legislature. And in the same breath the Minister of Marine and Fisheries declares: we have the power to withhold if we like. Then, Sir, if he has the power to withhold he must take the responsibility for throwing us upon the point of the naked sword. The hon. gentleman is guilty of cowardice when he refuses to protect the right, and when he absolutely betrays the right of the would-be elector in this country, out of deference to a mere theory. And the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, and every member of that Government who inveighed with all their strength against such an outrage as that in 1885, forget all; or if we bring it to their minds try to get out of it by saying: You know we are just letting the local legislatures do as they like; if they choose to do it, it is right. How inconsistent was the right hon. gentleman last night when he said: You have got all you contend for in the province of Ontario; there you have judges as revising barristers. We have, and so far we are satisfied. You have got all you want in the province of Quebec; there you have the judges as revising barristers. So we have, but when he comes to the province of Manitoba and the province of Nova Scotia, he has to admit that there is no such condition as that, and that in the province of Nova Scotia there is no appeal to a court of law at all. How does the right hon. gentleman get out of that inconsistent position? He says: It is right to have a court of appeal, or a county court judge as a reviser in the two great provinces; true, in Nova Scotia they do not give it to you but still it is right there not to grant an appeal because the people of Nova Scotia want it so, and the people of the province ought to rule. Yes, they ought to rule in connection with their own affairs, but they have no business to rule in connection with our affairs unless they rule according to our ideas of what is right. I challenge the right hon. gentleman; I challenge every man upon the Treasury benches to rise to-night and say, it is not a correct principle, that in the formation of this charter of the citizen's liberty, the voting list; he should not have an appeal to a court of law in last resort to get him the privilege which he feels he ought to have and of which he may be deprived. Will the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government say, that is not a correct principle? He has said so often that it is a correct principle that he must admit it now. He says that he has it in his power to give this right, but he does not give it, and the reason he does not give it is because, as he tells us, it would break his Act. And so, Sir, for the sake of a fantastic theory, he will perpetrate this injustice on the electorate. Now, Sir, we have put our plea, and we have asked for an answer. We have received no answer to our plea that we should be protected—not we alone; not Liberal-Conservatives alone, but the great body of the electorate of this country. What is protection for one is protection for all. That is the principle of the amendment which has been moved, and not a fair-minded man on that side of the House can get up and say that we are asking too much, or asking anything more than we ought to have. Why do not we get that justice then? I have asked for an answer to that over and over again, and I have got none, except the answer of the Prime Minister: Well, it would destroy our Bill. Justice then must not be done because it would break the Bill. Better that ten thousand theory-built Bills in process of becoming law should go to the wall, than that an injustice should be perpetrated, or that a chance should be given for the perpetration of an injustice. We have put our plea and we have contended for it two days and two nights. For it we are contending still. Let this House judge whether it is an extravagant plea or not, and let the country judge the men, who, if they have nothing to answer for to their own consciences will certainly have something to answer for before the tribunal of the people when the people come to pass on their conduct. We make our plea to the House, we make our plea to the country; after we have in vain made our plea to the old time principles and the sense of justice that should sway the members on the Treasury benches.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging the debate but for the purpose of putting myself right on two points with reference to which I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) has misrepresented me. I had the temerity to assert to-night that I thought the objection taken by the hon. member from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) was based upon an entire misconception of the functions and powers of Parliament. In support of that assertion I quoted a paragraph from the judgment of the Privy Council, the highest judicial body in the realm, so far as we are concerned, in the case of Hodge vs. the Queen. In that judgment their lordships said:

When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in section 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by section 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow.

I thought the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council closed that argument. It appears that I was entirely mistaken; for my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster), who is not a lawyer, and who does not profess to have studied constitutional law, attempts to assail and controvert the judgment of the Privy Council, without citing one authority of any kind to show that that high judicial authority is wrong.

Mr. FOSTER. I neither assailed nor controverted it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman then tried to turn the weight of the argument to one side by saying that I was accustomed to assert very dogmatically certain points of law, and that afterwards it turned out that I was not correct. As a matter of fact, I had made no dogmatic assertion. I had simply done as all lawyers do in arguing a case—quoted the judgment of the highest judicial body in the realm, and said that I assumed that until that judgment was modified it would be accepted as the law of the land. "Oh," said the hon. gentleman, "is it not within the recollection of everybody how dogmatically he asserted last session, without any reservation or equivocation—he knew all about it, and anybody was a fool who did not agree with him—that we had the power to pass the preferential clause in the tariff Act notwithstanding the German and Belgian treaties." I rose humbly to say that I had not dogmatically asserted anything of the kind, but that I had expressed my views to the House with a good deal of diffidence. The hon. gentleman again controverted me, and I had to submit in silence, and have had to do, not once, but a dozen times this session, to hear that libel repeated. I stated my views on that subject as quietly as I could, and I wound up by saying:

I am aware that the opposite conclusion has been for the time tacitly assumed; we have gone on assuming that treaties apply as a matter of course. It may be that my argument is all wrong. I do not profess to be able to speak ex cathedra on a great constitutional point of this kind; but I do profess that my argument is sufficient to say that we have exceedingly good ground for coming to the conclusion.

Now, I do not think that is very dogmatic.

Mr. FOSTER. Was that all the hon. gentleman said?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was all the hon. gentleman said at the close of his argument. Does my hon. friend want me to read my entire speech?

Mr. FOSTER. I would like you to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not attempt to speak ex cathedra or dogmatically; but I submitted my opinion on that matter to the House with all diffidence and deference. I do not think I can fairly be charged with forcing my views on the House on any question, much less on constitutional questions. I have practiced too long in the courts not to know how difficult it is to speak positively on these questions. What opinions I expressed I expressed honestly and with diffidence; and if I am not as able a constitutional lawyer as my hon. friend, that is my misfortune—for which I am very sorry.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish my hon. friend would take the time to look up some other portions of his statement on that subject which are very much stronger.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman can do that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is one on page 2867:

Can he produce the opinion of a prominent lawyer, or even of a fledgeling lawyer, endorsing the absurd and ridiculous statement made by him that the resolution was unconstitutional and illegal?

Mr. MILLS. I did not intend to speak any further upon this amendment; but after hearing of the great surprise manifested by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) I thought that something more should be said by me with reference to this matter. The great point we are now contending for is to have the same rights accorded to us in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia as are accorded to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, that is, to have the lists made up to a certain extent under some judicial officer. The hon. member for Colchester has expressed a great deal of surprise that he should have to travel a thousand miles from his own province in order to hear of any complaints against the system of revising the voters' lists in the province of Nova Scotia. He has told this House and the country that the system of revision in the province of Nova Scotia had obtained ever since before confederation. He has also tried to impress this House and the country with the idea that he is a man of large experience having been in politics for fifteen years, and having studied the history of the country for a longer period than that; thereby giving a great deal of force and weight to what he may say. Well, if he has not had more profit from his experience, if he has not studied better the laws of his country than he has manifested here to-night I should advise him to have that experience and that study over again; for he is entirely wrong in his assertions respecting the revising of the voters' lists in the province of Nova Scotia. The present system did not obtain ever since before confederation. It has obtained since 1889, and there has not been a Liberal-Conservative Government in power in Nova Scotia to do anything with that system since that time. The Liberal Government has been in power in Nova Scotia since 1882. Now, there is no Franchise Act in this Dominion that throws open the gates to fraud and corruption as does the Franchise Act of the province of Nova Scotia. In the first place, it is an intricate Act. It is an Act that cannot be rightly interpreted even by lawyers. It is an Act that allows almost any man of twenty-one years of age to have his name on the voters' list, provided he is not hindered from doing so by a partisan reviser. If there were no complaints in the province of Nova Scotia, if everything was lovely in reference to the revisers, why was it that this little child that the Finance Minister is so proud of should be placed on the Statute-book, making the sheriff the reviser of that court?

Why were the sheriffs placed there if there were not some wrongs to right? Is it not a fact that the appointing of sheriffs to hold courts, as it were, of appeal, shows that these revisers do not do everything that is right and proper, and that there are wrongs to right. If there are wrongs to right, is the sheriff the proper man to right them? The sheriff, a partisan, who may do business properly in his ordinary sphere, the right person to be appointed to interpret an intricate law that often puzzles the lawyers, and adjudicate upon the questions raised under that law. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec say he is not; and notwithstanding what the right hon. Prime Minister has said, I, a representative of the province of Nova Scotia, have just as much right to have a voice in what is done in the province of British Columbia, in the North-west Territories, in Ontario and Quebec, as I have to say what should be done in the province of Nova Scotia. I do not represent the province of Nova Scotia alone, but I am a representative for the whole Dominion. We have had too much petty politics in Nova Scotia. We have had too much provincial politics there altogether. Provincial Ministers, when they have left their little sphere in Nova Scotia and come into a broader sphere, should have their minds broadened by that fact and should understand that they represent, not only Nova Scotia, but the whole Dominion. Notwithstanding the fact that the local government in Nova Scotia is a Liberal Government and that these Ministers come up here and endorse everything that local government has done, even this obnoxious Act which it has placed upon the statutes, I say that we in the province of Ontario—for I am as much a representative of that province as I am of Nova Scotia—and we in the province of Quebec and in the province of British Columbia and in the North-west Territories will say to the people of Nova Scotia: You did not do right in putting that obnoxious Act upon the Statute-book, and you should give the right to appeal to a proper judicial authority and not to a partisan sheriff. The right hon. First Minister comes up with his specious argument and tells us: Oh, you must do this thing because the people wills it. Shall we do a wrong thing in this Parliament because the people of Nova Scotia support the local government of that province in doing it? I say that that is not a proper argument ; it is not an argument worthy of the ability and the broad mind of the Prime Minister of this country. I do not wish to prolong this debate. I have no desire to stop here any longer than any other man, but I say this, that if it is necessary to stay here to fight this thing, I shall make great sacrifices in order to do so, because I believe it is the grossest injustice to allow a privilege to the province of Ontario and Quebec and refuse it to the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I could not at first understand the vehemence with which my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) denounced the franchise of Nova Scotia, and more especially the angry reference he made to the people of Inverness, the county I have the honour to represent here, but I have, since he has spoken, considered the matter over, and I find that the Franchise Act of that province is the one which has enabled his law partner—by the way, an Inverness man—to turn the hon. gentleman down, so to speak, in the town of Annapolis, in the contest for the mayoralty of that town.

Mr. MILLS. He is from Judique, your town, and is another traitor, and we have one or two more there of the same kind.

Mr. McLENNAN. He is from Judique, in the county of Inverness, and he ran for the mayoralty against the hon. gentleman, whose law partner he was until the hon. gentleman disappointed him in some manner or other. Then that young gentleman turned around and ran for the mayoralty of Annapolis, where both these gentlemen resided and practised law for several years together, against the hon. gentleman ; and my fellow-countrymen properly turned the hon. member for Annapolis down, and is now mayor for Annapolis. If my hon. friend feels aggrieved at the people of Inverness because this young man defeated him, no wonder that he should feel so much aggrieved at the existence of a franchise Act under which this young gentleman was able to defeat him in his own town.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It was a good Act.

Mr. McLENNAN. I consider that no greater compliment could be paid to the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia than the fact that it has permitted the hon. gentleman to come here and represent the county of Annapolis since 1885 or 1886, in opposition to such a man as the Attorney General of Nova Scotia—one of the most accomplished public men of the Dominion. The fact that the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia permitted the hon. gentleman to come here speaks volumes for its liberality, especially in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman himself acknowledges that the people of Annapolis are liberal at heart. He has admitted that fact, and it must be taken for granted, therefore, that from what has recently transpired, it was not the towns and villages of Annapolis which sent him here, but the back woods districts, and that the Franchise Act must have been more liberal than he admits it to be since he was enabled to secure his election under these circumstances. In view of the hon. gentleman's admission and of his defeat in the election for the mayoralty, it is no wonder that he should have declared the other evening that he did not care much about the people of Inverness. The hon. gentleman talks about partisan sheriffs, ignoring the fact that the sheriff of Inverness, among many others, is a Tory, appointed by the Liberal government of which the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton prided himself a few days ago on having been a member. This sheriff, who is a worthy man, although a Tory, is the gentleman whom the hon. member declares should not be allowed to hear the appeals from the voters' lists in the county of Inverness. Because there is an Act in the province of Nova Scotia enabling the provincial government to appoint sheriffs, he concluded that the sheriffs there are untrustworthy and not fit to be entrusted with the administration of the franchise in the slightest degree ; and this he contends despite the fact that the sheriffs in many counties in Nova Scotia are Conservatives. There is another feature with regard to this appeal. Not only is the appeal made to the sheriffs of various shades of politics, but the legislature of Nova Scotia deemed it necessary to give ten days to those sheriffs to hear appeals from the various parts of the various constituencies ; and I ask the hon. gentleman from Annapolis or any other hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia or elsewhere whether they would consider it reasonable that a judge of the county court, such as, for instance, the Hon. Mr. McIssac, of Antigonish, who is judge of the county courts of Inverness, Guysborough and Antigonish, could be expected to attend to the revision of the lists of these large counties. How would that gentleman be able to attend to this revision supposing a Dominion election were called at three weeks' notice ? It is all very well in such provinces as Quebec and Ontario, where, I understand, there is a county judge for every county but in Nova Scotia, where there is but one county judge, as they are called, wrongfully I think—to three counties, in many instances, the case is vastly different.

The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) declared that the Act in Nova Scotia was changed in 1889. I bring as evidence against that the statement of the hon. member from Richmond (Mr. Gillies), who declared that this so-called iniquitous Act was on the Statute-books of the province since 1871. I can quote repetitions of that statement over and over again from the speeches of the hon. member. The Act that came into force in 1889 was a mere amendment giving an appeal to the sheriff. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) has convinced the House, I am sure, that the statements of the member for Colchester (Mr. McClure) were absolutely correct. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McDougall) stated that for four years a Conservative Government ruled the political destinies of Nova Scotia, of which the hon. gentleman himself was a distinguished member, and yet although this Franchise Act existed in the province, he, as a member of the government, never moved a finger to remove this Act from the Statute-books. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Gillies) would have it that this law had been like the laws of the Medes and Persians, that it had been passed in 1871 and was in force still. But the hon. member for Annapolis met this statement a few minutes ago by declaring that it was a new law enacted in 1889. I think that the hon. member for Richmond is, in the main, correct and his statement tallies with that of the hon. member for Colchester, who has stated that the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia to-day is what it was thirty or forty years ago, so far as conferring the franchise upon the people is concerned. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. member for Cape Breton, therefore, who has made a dozen speeches, to attempt to find fault with this law, when he, as a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, made no attempt to alter it. The same applies to the hon. member for Annapolis. That non-gentleman as a leading member of the Conservative party at that time should have warned the people against the alleged iniquities of this Act.

I contend that there is no better evidence of popular self-government on the Statute-books to-day than is the franchise law of Nova Scotia; it is indeed a law of the people for the people and by the people. The hon. member for Colchester has well and accurately stated the case, showing how the making of these lists is in the hands of men appointed by the municipal councils. If the people feel that the municipal councillors are abusing the trust reposed in them, then every three years, they have the right to dismiss these and choose others in their places. But, according to the hon. members from Annapolis, Cape Breton and Richmond, it would seem that the people were helpless in the hands of the municipal councillors, as though these councillors were appointed for life and there was no remedy for what they did. I am surprised that the hon. member for Richmond did not pay more attention to these points, but the explanation may be in the fact that he has been so busy asking questions with regard to matters in his own and neighbouring counties that he had not time to fully consider this matter. His course in this House for the last couple of weeks reminds me of the story of the school boy, who, when asked what a point of interrogation was, replied that it was a little crooked thing that asked questions.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan, Inverness) who has just taken his seat charged that when the Holmes-Thompson Government was in power in Nova Scotia they did not make any attempt to change the law which then existed with regard to the franchise. There was one very strong objection to the law that existed at that time, and the Holmes-Thompson Government undertook to change the law. The objectionable feature was that government officials employed on the government railways, in the post offices and so on were not allowed to vote in provincial elections. The government undertook to change that and to give these people the franchise. And what happened? They passed through the assembly branch of the legislature an Act to give back the franchise to these people—

Mr. MILLS. By a majority of 28 to 7.

Mr. McDOUGALL. But when that Bill went before the legislative council, that branch of the legislature threw out the Bill and would not pass it. What was the use of the Holmes-Thompson Government during the four years they held power, attempting to perfect the law with such a legislative council in existence?

When I was speaking a few minutes ago I referred to the change that was made by the Liberal Administration in Nova Scotia in the mode by which the sheriffs were appointed. Previous to that change the sheriffs were appointed in this way:

The chief justice and a judge of the Supreme Court selected by him, or in the absence of the chief justice any two judges selected by the senior judge present, together, in either case, with two members of the Executive Council, shall meet in Halifax during Michaelmas term in each year, and select three persons for each county, each of whom shall be believed to be qualified to fill the office of sheriff, and not unlikely to act if appointed. In case of disagreement a majority shall decide the nomination; and if a majority cannot be obtained, the chief justice and judges, or a majority of those present shall make the nomination. Out of the three persons so nominated the Governor in Council shall select one to serve for the ensuing year, who shall reside in the county and who, upon giving security by bond as hereinafter mentioned, shall receive his commission and be invested with the powers of office.

That is the section of the Act under which the sheriffs were formerly appointed in the province of Nova Scotia. That Act was changed by the Government of which the hon. the present Finance Minister, if I am not mistaken, was Premier at the time. The appointment of sheriffs takes place under that new Act as follows:

The Governor in Council shall from time to time, as occasion may require, by commission under the Great Seal of the province, appoint and commission a fit and proper person to the office of sheriff of each county, and shall in like manner fill up any vacancies as they occur, and every sheriff so appointed shall hold office during good behaviour.

So that under the new Act the Government have sole power to appoint sheriffs, the Government appoint those sheriffs, the high tribunal, or court of last resort, who decide as to who should go on the list or remain off. The sheriff in that case is the servant of the Government of the province of Nova Scotia for the time being, is there under the influence of that Government, and is therefore a partisan, and a man in whom the people cannot have the same confidence that they would have in a judge of the Supreme Court or a judge of the County Court before whom to carry appeals in reference to putting on or taking names off the voters' list.

Mr. INGRAM. I am sure my hon. friends opposite cannot complain of my taking up the time of the House in the discussion of this question. But there are some things in this Franchise Act as introduced by the Government to which I take very serious objection. The amendment moved to subsection "a" of section 5, is, I think, an amendment in the right direction. Speaking from the standpoint of one representing an Ontario constituency, I should like to see some uniformity in the preparation of our voters' lists and some uniformity in the method of making appeals to the authority we should finally decide as to whether a man has a right to be placed on the list. Now, in reference to our Voters' List Act, I am sorry to see that the Solicitor General does not seem to have a correct understanding of the method by which those lists are compiled in the province of Ontario. Last evening he quoted a section of the law which applies to the registration of voters' and which does not apply to the preparation of those voters' lists. Under the law, if we find a name on the list, part 1 or part 3, which should not be there, we may appeal to a county judge who has power to decide whether a man is entitled to be placed on the list, or if he is there, whether he should be removed. We have therefore in the province of Ontario two systems of making appeals: One is to the county judge, and the other to a court of appeal under the Registration Act. That is as to cities and towns, provided this measure carries, we will then be placed in this position in cities and towns, that instead of making our appeal to a board of registrators, we make our final appeal to a county court judge. In doing that I claim that we would have our appeal decided on its merits, and not largely decided by the political complexion of the voter in question. For that reason I strongly object to having this section 5 go through in its present shape. It may be said that the different boards of registration or boards of appeal as we have them under this registration Act may be composed largely of judges, and for that reason they will be free from partisan proclivities. I find that board of appeal is composed of different persons, in Toronto of one class of persons, in Hamilton of another, in Ottawa of another, in London of another. The various towns have a variety of classes of gentlemen occupying seats on this board of appeal; and for that reason I object to this section.

Mr. KAULBACH. I certainly do object and that most emphatically to clause 5, subsection "a" of this Franchise Bill being passed without an amendment, or a safeguard attached to the clause as respects sheriff's powers. We may control assessors and revisers, but I fail to see how we can control the sheriffs unless there is an appeal, as he has delegated powers under the Nova Scotia Act, and can do just what his sweet will may dictate, and by the Act we have no recourse. All Nova Scotia asks is for a like privilege as that of Ontario and Quebec where the grievance is redressed by a court of review on appeal and we will be satisfied, but to limit the privileges of Nova Scotia in this manner, is unjust, and we cannot feel satisfied that we are fairly treated. Experience in the past as respects the sheriff of the county I have the honour to represent, is sufficient warning for me to consider the position of that county, and carefully guard the future against similar, if not worse practices than we have yet had in the past. If art is to accomplish anything more than nature has given this official, I fear the future of that county politically, at the time of an election, is a sad one, if left in his hands without an appeal. Does the Government intend our hands shall be tied and we asked to fight? It would really appear so. Say for example an elector applies to the sheriff to have a name or names added to the voters' list which, name or names unintentionally or perhaps improperly had been left off, or that some names were improperly placed on the voters' list, that should not have been there, and a request is made for their removal, and he, the sheriff refused to obey the request, is it fair or just that we should be forced to submit to this ruling and have no appeal, have no recourse to an impartial tribunal, at a final court of review. I say it is an outrage on civil rights, and decidedly unjust to the honest electors of that province.

This injustice we are liable to suffer from at any time, at least it is my opinion, for if a sheriff was capable of committing a fraud in the late Nova Scotia provincial election in the county I have the honour to represent as is alleged, and thereby returns a candidate of his own political caste, no less a person than a member of the Nova Scotia cabinet, the Commissioner of Mines, Charles E. Church, he having the smallest number of votes cast, consequently at the foot of the poll, and who now occupies that post against the wishes of the people, and, as I believe, illegally placed there by the act of the sheriff, the appointee of that government I am compelled to look upon him, the sheriff, with suspicion, and feel that the only safeguard we can resort to to avoid difficulties like I have referred to, or a something worse, is in granting us this reasonable request, an appeal to an impartial tribunal as a final resort.

I cannot agree with the hon. Solicitor General in the idea he advanced, that "we must assume all sheriffs will do their duty." Sad experience has taught us differently, or that such is not the case, notably the sheriff of Lunenburg. At least it is my opinion, and I have numbers, nay, a legion, to support my views on this point, and unless retributory justice is meted out to this official, by way of a check, which I hope, will be the case, other sheriffs may practice the same, and the Lunenburg sheriff may probably go next time one better.

I claim Nova Scotia has a right to be placed on an equal footing with Ontario and Quebec, as to the civil rights of our people, and that the amendment to clause 5 of the Bill for the reasons advanced, and which are not unreasonable, should be granted, or treat all the provinces alike, and give Canada manhood suffrage, which is practically that now, and thereby avoid all the complications referred to, and better still, greatly simplify election procedures, relieving us of the enormous expense of assessors, revisers and courts of appeals.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). With reference to the question as to whether or not there should be an appeal in the province of Nova Scotia to the county court judge I, for one, have been unable to appreciate any argument advanced on the other side of the House which would militate against that concession by the Government. I have a pretty fair knowledge of the sheriffs of the province of Nova Scotia. With respect to the sheriff of the county of Halifax I am bound to say that in my opinion he is a thoroughly honourable and upright man. He is a Liberal and was appointed by a Liberal Government, but I have as much confidence in him as I would have in any hon. member in this House, on either side of it, and I believe he would do what was right. But if the sheriff for Halifax were here, he would be the first to admit that he has no such technical knowledge as would enable him to deal with a matter of this kind in the same way as a judge who has devoted all his life to such subjects. That is a point I make in favour of this concession. It is a matter in which, as a last resort, we should have the advantage of legal training and a sense of judicial responsibility, and that no sheriff in Nova Scotia would claim for himself. I do not for a moment intend to cast any reflections on the sheriffs of the province when I say that as a court of last resort the county court judges would be far safer and better tribunals than the sheriffs. I do not see any reason why a concession of this kind should not be granted by the Government, or why the principle which already prevails in Ontario and Quebec should not be applied also in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. There is another reason I would suggest, and I do it in no partisan spirit, to the Solicitor General with respect to this matter. In Nova Scotia at the present time, and I suppose the same is true of New Brunswick, the fact that the revisers are appointed by the municipal councils has a tendency to introduce political issues into municipal affairs. I do not say that in every county in Nova Scotia, federal or provincial politics are introduced as a general rule; but I do say this, that in some sections of every county in that province, provincial politics are to some extent at least introduced. In most counties in the province the position is this: in certain districts, federal or provincial politics are introduced and candidates are elected on those lines. If you place in the hands of the revisers elected by the councils the power to arrange lists for Dominion elections the tendency will be to increase that tendency to have municipal elections run on the lines of Dominion politics or provincial politics as the case may be; and whether the result would be good or bad to the Conservative party, I say that so far as the country is concerned the result would be bad. It is not to the advantage of the country that provincial or Dominion politics should be introduced into municipal matters. We have too much politics already to the square inch, in the province of Nova Scotia at least, and to introduce politics further in matters of this kind is a result that should be deprecated by both parties, and the effect of making so much depend on the selection of revisers would be to introduce political issues into municipal affairs in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, whatever may be the result in other provinces. If that is the case, it affords a further argument for the adoption in a matter of this kind of a judicial tribunal as the court of last resort, and, therefore, I submit to the Solicitor General that we are only asking what is reasonable and fair when we request that in Nova Scotia this appeal should be granted as it now exists in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

The hon. Solicitor General has mentioned a question of constitutional law in connection with this matter. I understand the question which he has submitted as a serious one is this. We may assume that the Parliament of Canada has the right to adopt any legislation now existing in any of the provinces, that is to say, it has the right, instead of copying that legislation out in extenso to say, that that legislation being already embodied on the Statute-book of the province should be operative as an Act of this Parliament. The question is whether in addition to that, this Parliament has the right to say that future legislative enactments by the various provinces shall have the force of law, so far as this particular subject is concerned—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman does not state the position exactly. The proposition I stated I find in Todd.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I was going to refer to that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Todd says :

The Parliament of Canada has no power to delegate its functions to the local legislature, so as by an absolute grant of discretionary power to enable the local authority to deal with the matter itself.

Now, here is my point :

It is otherwise, however, if the Dominion Parliament merely extends and ratifies arrangements made or to be made—

Past, present or future—

—in accordance with its own legislation upon the subject.

Could anything be clearer than that ?

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Minister of Marine does not agree with Todd.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I was just reading from Todd.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was just saying the Minister of Marine does not agree with Todd.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh, yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, no ; he toddled away from him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may say frankly that I have not had the opportunity of giving this matter the attention which I think it deserves, and which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) evidently thinks it deserves ; but it seems to me that there are some considerations in connection with it which would well deserve the attention of the hon. gentleman. The quotation from Todd may or may not bear the meaning which he evidently puts upon it. It is this :

In any case where, in the distribution of powers by the British North America Act, certain matters are assigned to the legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament, it is not competent for that body to delegate its functions to the local legislature, so as by any absolute grant of discretionary power to enable the local authority to deal with the matter itself.

It is otherwise, however, if the Dominion Parliament merely accepts and ratifies arrangements made, or to be made, in accordance with its own legislation upon the subject.

As I understand the hon. Solicitor General, he suggests that any future legislation of the local legislature would come within the meaning of the words in the last sentence, but if he gives it that interpretation I do not know exactly what meaning he would attach to the previous sentence. For example, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman would contend or not that it would be competent for this Parliament to say, as to every matter confided to this Parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act, that each provincial legislature within its own province, should have the right to make laws notwithstanding the provisions of the British North America Act. Does my hon. friend follow me ? It does not seem to me that going thus far would be really extending the principle for which my hon. and learned friend is arguing in this case ; but my hon. friend will understand that I do not profess to have given the matter the study which it deserves, and I am merely throwing this out to him as a suggestion. Would it not be a logical consequence of what my hon. and learned friend argues to say this : that the Dominion Parliament could entrust to the legislature of each province, within that province, every right, every power, which is confided to this Parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act. I confess at once that I see the hon. gentleman might make this answer : as to matters of that kind the avoidance of such an extraordinary and anomalous result must always be made to depend on the common sense of the legislators, and that technically this Parliament has the right to so deal with its own powers, and having the right to lay it down it yet retains the right to take it up. Still it seems to me that this would be an extreme position for my hon. and learned friend to take. However extreme that position would be, so far as I comprehend the matter, it would be the logical outcome of what the hon. gentleman has been arguing in favour of this provision of the Bill. Now, whether there be anything or not in what I have ventured to suggest, I think the hon. gentleman will certainly agree with me, that it is a matter that requires careful consideration before this Parliament ventures to put upon the Statute-book legislation of this character. It is true that the Solicitor General, and I think the Minister of Marine, have argued that this is not "delegation." In one sense it may not be delegation ; in another sense it certainly is delegation. A person who delegates his authority to an agent has the right to revoke that authority at any time unless it is an authority coupled with an interest. This Parliament confers upon the local legislature the power—

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend finds fault with that ; I will put it in another way. The local legislature has power to deal with its own franchise, and this Parliament says in advance that whatever enactment the local legislature sees fit to make with regard to the franchise in that province shall be the law with regard to the franchise for the election of members of this Parliament, until this Parliament sees fit to interfere. My hon. and learned friend will not find fault with that proposition, I think. Now, I venture to submit to the Solicitor General that there is a very thin distinction, if any, between that and between delegating to the local legislature; and if my hon. friend has no better argument on which to rely for the validity of this legislation, then the difference between "delegation" and what I have just stated, I think he is skating on very thin ice. However that may be, it is a matter which perhaps can be more appropriately dealt with at a later stage of this Bill. My hon. and learned friend will understand that I am making this suggestion, not with the idea in any sense whatever of being factious, but merely of endeavouring to assist him, because upon him is the responsibility of this Bill, and I conceive it is the duty of every man in this House who professes to have any technical knowledge on the subject to give my hon. friend assistance on that point.

The further remarks which I have now to make on this subject are simply in support of that with which I first started out. I submit to the Solicitor General, who is a lawyer, and who knows the sense of responsibility under which a judge acts, and knows how different that sense of responsibility is from the feeling which a sheriff—even a sheriff of the highest character and intelligence—would possess; I submit to him whether it is not fair that in the province of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick we should have the same right of appeal to a judicial tribunal which is enjoyed in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. My hon. and learned friend as a lawyer cannot deny that there is a very great difference between the right conferred upon a party by an appeal to a sheriff having no technical knowledge, and the right conferred upon a person by an appeal to a judge having that technical knowledge and the sense of responsibility to which I have referred. It seems to me that no harm can possibly be done, by conceding that right either to the interests of the county or to either political party; while, on the other hand, if that right is not conceded, it is conceivable, to say the very least, that injustice may be done and wrong may occur which it will not be possible to redress. I put the matter in all sincerity to the hon. Solicitor General. I desire to make a personal appeal to him on this point. I do not say that the omission of this will necessarily result in any disadvantage to the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia, because in some of the counties our friends will have a majority, and I suppose they will be as apt to exercise the right as the Liberals. I am not making any partisan plea on this point. I am simply putting it on the ground of fair-play and of the best interest of the country, and because it is right in a matter of this kind that there should be an appeal to some person having judicial responsibility and technical knowledge; and I feel that to the hon. Solicitor General, who belongs to my own profession, I can make this appeal with a great deal of force and earnestness. Whatever the outcome may be, I feel sure that the Solicitor General, at any rate, does not remain unconvinced by the arguments which have been addressed to him from this side of the House.

Mr. POWELL. In dealing with this matter, I desire, in the first place, to acknowledge the very courteous treatment which this side of the House has received from the hon. Solicitor General. I feel that he at least is disposed to give us fair-play. In saying that, I do not mean to insinuate in any way that hon. gentlemen opposite do not generally give us fair-play. In these matters we are inclined to suspect that our opponents are not taking a fair view, but are emphasizing certain things that may appear to us to be trivial, their fears are to us the outcome of their political feeling. I, for one, take exactly the position that has been taken by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden), that there are men, many of them in the Liberal ranks, in the province of New Brunswick, and in the county I represent, whom I would trust as implicitly as I would myself or any of my friends; and in the remarks I am going to make, I do not wish in the slightest degree to be taken as reflecting on any officer of the law whose duty it will be to work out the principles of this Franchise Act. I will direct a few words to the state of the law in the province of New Brunswick. This matter, I understand, came up for discussion the other evening, during my absence. In the objections I am going to take to the present Bill, so far as it refers to the province of New Brunswick, I do not wish to be taken as reflecting upon the motives of the men who framed the New Brunswick Acts. Into the question of who were the authors of those Acts or what their motives were, I am not going to inquire. I take the Acts as they are, and I leave to hon. gentlemen themselves to say if the plea I make to their sense of fair-play and justice is not a good plea. I have not spoken on this subject before; I have not delayed the House, and I do not intend to do so tonight. I shall be as succinct as possible, consistent with putting before the House the points I wish to make.

The franchise in the province of New Brunswick is determined by three Acts; first, the Act of 1869, secondly, the Act of 1891, and thirdly, the Act of 1897. The Act of 1891 I can dismiss from the consideration of the House, and reduce the question down to that of 1889 as amended by the Act of 1897. The hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) will pardon a reference to what he said the other evening when I was not in the House. If I had been in the House, I would have taken no objection to the motives of the hon. Minister, for this reason, that the Government of New Brunswick was a coalition government, and it might strike against Liberals in one section of the province and against Conservatives in another section. In the county I represent the sheriff is a Liberal. In counties adjoining, the sheriffs are Conservatives. So that while the law may strike me in the county of Westmoreland, it will strike some of the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in Kent, Northumberland, or Restigouche. Therefore, I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, apart from party considerations, and entirely on the merits of the case I present. Under the Act of 1889, which is the leading Act, to a municipal body is assigned by the legislature of the province the duty of framing the lists in accordance with the requirements of the franchises prescribed in the Act. Afterwards, in 1897, this Act was amended. What I quarrel with is this, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite whether the objections I take are not founded in reason, in justice, and in common-sense.

Under the Act of 1889, after the lists are prepared by this board of revisers, constituted by the municipal council, and filed as matters of record in the office of the secretary-treasurer, the power is given to the sheriff to change the lists. In the first place, he has the power to change the list by striking off the name of any dead person. That may appear a very harmless and wise provision, but that being interpreted means a great deal more than appears in the surface. He has no power to hold a court to inquire who is dead. The county I represent is a county that stretches 120 miles in length, with a population of nearly 50,000 to-day, and on the sheriff, with no power to hold a court is conferred the power of striking off the name of any man who, as he thinks he is credibly informed, is dead. That is what it amounts to. How is he to know whether the man is dead or not? He has not the time to go through the county and make personal inquiry, and if he had, he would be simply relying on hearsay evidence and not on sworn testimony.

There is another objection, and it is this. He has in addition the power—and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways said that that power was in the old Act. I do not care what Act it was in, I am dealing with facts as they exist, but I admit that virtually the same power was in the Act, which existed before 1889.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Identically word for word.

Mr. POWELL. Almost but not quite, because it is there as respects parish and parish, and not as respects polling subdivision and polling subdivision. The point I seek to make is this, that after this official list is filed as a matter of record, the sheriff has the power to go over it, and on merely looking at it—not by taking any evidence but on simply looking at the list itself, without any extraneous evidence—he can strike off names. Here is the language of the law:

If it appear by the list itself—not by extraneous evidence—that a resident voter of any polling subdivision is returned as qualified to vote in any other polling subdivision, his name shall only be inserted on the list of the polling subdivision in which he resides.

Frequently in those counties, particularly that represented by my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney), which is my native county and with which I am very familiar, there is any number of men of the same name. Take the name of Gaudet, there must be 150 men of that name, who vote in the parish of Dundas, and the Christian names of many are the same. And so with other family names, under which are enrolled a number of people, particularly in the parish of Bosford, in the county of Westmoreland. The sheriff, with the only evidence before him of the lists itself and with no power to call in outside evidence, has the power to strike off every man with the same name, except the one he happens to know. Is it fair after these lists have been made up by the board of revisers, who have the power to administer the oath and to call in evidence to settle any dispute, that this extraordinary power should be given the sheriff to revise their action without having any information.

There is another way in which the sheriff has power to change the lists. It is given by the Act of the New Brunswick legislature passed in 1897. That particular Act was passed after the Minister of Railways came to this Parliament, and it is worse than the others. After these revisers have made out their lists, the sheriff has power to apply to a county court judge and have placed upon the lists any names that he sees fit to have put upon them. Hence arises a particular point of hardship, and I ask any hon. gentleman opposite to consider it. If the sheriff is a Liberal or Conservative, he will lend a great deal keener ear to his friends than to his enemies. His friends come to him and say: Here are a lot of people whom we wish you to put on the list. He is a partisan, and there is no disgrace in that, because who in this country is not a partisan? Who in this country has not strong political feelings, from the judges of the Supreme Court down to the lowest man in the land almost? And what would be a man who has not strong political feelings? He would be a perfect nobody. This gentleman—let us assume he is a Conservative—hearkens to his friends more than to his enemies, and takes the names they offer him to a county court judge, and the judge places them upon the list. A Liberal goes to the same sheriff and applies to have other names put on the list, but the sheriff is conveniently busy, he does not know what the qualifications of these men are, and he tells the applicant so, and there are a dozen ways, consistent with the law, by which he can crawl out of the duty the statute places upon him of submitting the names to a county court judge. If a wrong has been done by leaving a name off the list, either through inadvertence or by mistake or other cause, why should the right not be given to the man himself and let him apply? Why give it to the sheriff and not give it to the man himself? If a man desires to get on the list, let him go to the judge, either by attorney or in person, and make his application. Why give that right to a sheriff, who is always a partisan and the appointee of one of the political parties? That of itself is not the full measure of the evil. What does the law provide—I am referring to the law of 1897?

If at any time after the voters' lists have been deposited with the county secretary, as provided in section 36 of the said Act of 1889, the sheriff shall be satisfied that there was a mistake in copying or any other error or oversight, by which names have been omitted from any voters' lists, it shall be the duty of the sheriff to make application to the judge of the county court for an order authorizing him to add the names.

The sheriff has to be satisfied that there was an error or oversight. He can be satisfied very easily by a man whom he knows well and is desirous to aid, but it may be very difficult to satisfy him, when the application is made by a gentleman of the opposite political stripe. Therefore I ask the hon. Solicitor General, so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned, to insert some such provision as this, that the application to put on the list may be made by the party himself and not by the sheriff. You may say that that will change the list, but hon. gentlemen opposite will find that we will have to make very serious changes, and that leads me to another matter, a defect in the Bill as it stands, showing how complicated this matter is and how very desirable it is to have one uniform franchise for the Dominion.

Under our law, the non-residents are grouped together in a polling list and have to vote at a particular place, and there is no provision made in the Act for that. There are some words in one of the sub-clauses which might, at first sight, cover the case, but they do not, because the lists on which voters are required to vote are the lists for the polling division and not the list of non-residents. We will have to change the Act in that respect, or otherwise we will cut off every non-resident from the privilage of voting at an election in the province of New Brunswick.

Coming back to the question of constitutional law, I must say this. I myself, speaking as a lawyer, would have no doubt at all as to the power of this Parliament to delegate its powers, but for the authority of Todd and the expressions of some hon. gentlemen in this House. I could cite numerous cases in which Parliament has delegated very large powers. Take, for instance, the British Parliament—and, as it is a constitutional principle I think that in considering this matter, we have to be guided by the parliamentary principles of Great Britain—in the Judicature Act enacted very few sections and they conferred upon the judges most extraordinary powers. In effect they said: What the judges do under these sections shall have the force of a statute and shall be considered as incorporated in the Act itself. Now, take the case of this Canadian Parliament—and I must say on this point, that I think my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) has misconstrued the arguments of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart). Take the Fishery Act. Power has been given by this Parliament under that Act to the Governor in Council to make most extraordinary regulations covering the fisheries of the whole Dominion of Canada which are to have the force of law. The hon. Minister of Marine will be kind enough to correct me if I am wrong, as I am not familiar with the details of that Act. But I am aware that these regulations govern the whole lobster fishery of the country. In passing the Controverted Elections Act, the Parliament of Canada conferred upon the judges of the different provinces power to make whatever rules are necessary to supplement the Act and carry it out, and has declared that every one of these shall have the force of law as if incorporated in the statute. The province of New Brunswick affords another illustration. Under our Controverted Elections Act, which was passed by eminent jurists under the supervision of the present Judge King of the Supreme Court of Canada, the same power is given to the judges, that rules that they make are to have the same effect as though enacted in the statute. But a more extraordinary case still is the case of our Consolidated Statutes passed under the direction of the present Justice King, who at the time was Attorney General and leader of the government of New Brunswick. He and some eminent jurists who were associated with him, Judge Fraser and others, did the work of consolidating the statutes. In this case they actually delegated to this board of revisers of the statutes full and complete powers to modify the Acts passed during the session and to incorporate these Acts into the Consolidated Statutes, and, being so incorporated, they were to have the same force as if part and parcel of the statutes as originally enacted. This matter came up before our Supreme Court and the decision was given by that body unanimously that this was a delegation of the power of Parliament and was perfectly constitutional. Another illustration is that in every province of the Dominion of Canada, in England, in the United States, in every country in which British principles of government obtain, it is a very common thing indeed for the fullest legislative powers within certain limits upon certain subjects to be delegated to the municipal councils, and within the limits of these delegated powers these councils have the power to make by-laws which will have the force of law. I have already expressed the opinion I held on this subject, and I confess that I felt so satisfied that I would have almost ridiculed the idea had any hon. gentleman advanced the opinion that such power could not be delegated by us. But here we have the opinion of Todd that a different principle is introduced the moment we have to deal with local legislatures. Why that is so, I do not know. I confess that I cannot see any principle in what Todd lays down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. His text was written before the case of Hodge was decided by the Privy Council.

Mr. POWELL. That is true, and there may be some light thrown on the case by that. At the same time, I may say, that I scarcely think the case of Hodge would strengthen the opinion I held. Todd is a very eminent jurist, and, in face of his opinion I would hesitate to give expression to my own.

Now, the question arises whether this is a delegation of power. The principle laid down by Todd, as I understand it, is that anything in furtherance of legislation, such as the regulation of details, is perfectly competent is not, as he says, a delegation of legislative power. But, Sir, in the case of the Queen vs. Burah, the decision of the House of Lords in the law reports 3rd appeal cases, I find their Lordships delivered a very strong judgment. Let me state the facts of the case. The Governor General in Council of India had certain legislative powers conferred upon them by the Imperial statute. The Governor in Council undertook to do what the High Court of India held to be a delegation of the powers of the Governor General in Council, and it was argued, and the court held, that the Governor General in Council had no power to make that delegation. This matter came up by way of appeal from that judgment before the Privy Council and the Judicial Committee decided that the only point to be considered was whether or not the delegation was of power conferred upon them by the Imperial statute, and, if these powers that were delegated were a matter of grant under the Imperial statute, then it was held that the decision of the court was wrong, and that the delegated power was constitutional. The sentence that crystallized the law in this is on page 905, L.R., 3 App. cases.

So, it was held that this was a case within the limits of the Imperial Act and that the Governor in Council had a perfect right to delegate their powers. Now, my hon. friend the Solicitor General says that under this Bill there is no delegation of power. I agree with him, but, a little further on I will also differ from him. I agree that it is not a delegation of power. Why? because the Act does not go far enough to make it a delegation of power. As it stands, this is an incorporation of the local Franchise Acts into this Act and no more. Under the principles of interpretation, if there was to be a delegation of power to local legislatures, it must be given expressly or by necessary implication. It would be a delegation of power only if we had adopted not only the franchise already in existence but any that may from time to time be in existence. Therefore, this is not a delegation of authority to the local legislatures, but it is an incorporation into the Act of legislation already passed. My contention is that this Act adopts the local franchise, and the local legislatures cannot change them, so far as this Parliament is concerned. If they make changes, this Act is stultified by the lack of administrative machinery.

The cases in Ontario cited by my hon. friend are the same as would arise on the statute under consideration. I would call his attention to the fact that there was no attempted exercise of a supposed power of delegation. It was a power of incorporation and the court held that that would stand and, if the local legislatures changed it and a change of circumstances rendered the Act a nullity having no subject-matter to which it could attach itself, of course that virtually repealed the Act; but, as a matter of law, they only decided that the case was one of incorporation, and if any remarks go further they are "obiter dicta."

To my mind, it is the veriest play on words to say that this is not a delegated power to the local legislatures if this Act will incorporate Acts hereafter passed by them. True, we give them no power to change their own franchise, they have that power already, we do not expressly give them any power to change our franchise, but we tack on to the power they have as a consequence the power indirectly to change our franchise, and therefore you may call it what you please, it is tantamount to a delegation of power. I do not care, so far as I am personally concerned, which franchise we have. I had serious objections to the late Franchise Act on account of its expense. There is no man, I think, in the province of New Brunswick who had to incur more expense under that Act. In the large county I represent nearly the whole labour of working out that Act devolved on myself and on those who were in my office with me. It was expensive, it was not only expensive, but it involved a great loss of time. But I say that the principle of that Act is a good one, and the principle of this Act is a bad one. I will go further, and I will say this is retrogressive legislation, we are moving the sun back on the dial, we are not in line with the most advanced legislation of the most advanced countries. I blamed the occupants of the Treasury benches in the late Government for not having simplified that Act when they could easily have done so, and I will point out how they could have simplified, and how this Government can simplify it. The great evil of that Act was that every time there was a revision made, the people of this country were called upon to make an entirely new list. They had to go to the trouble of hunting all through the country to see who was qualified to be a voter and who was not. What should have been done was to have had a permanent franchise roll, so that when a man had his name once on the roll it was there for all time, unless he was disqualified; then he would not have had to hunt round on the eve of every election to see that his name was on the roll. That having been done, then the judges' duty should simply been that of amending that list every year, either by adding names to it or by taking names off that should not be on it. If that were done, the expense of printing would be trifling. The present Superintendent of the Printing Bureau has all the type set up, and the revision of the lists could be on common sense principles. That would be the cheapest possible way that you could have the franchise rolls of this country attended to. The superintendent's scheme was this: He never broke up the type, he allowed it to stand, and in each revision he simply incorporated into that the new names that were added, and subtracted the names that were thrown off. If this had been done by the revising officer in the revision of the lists we would not have heard anything about the cost of preparing the lists. I object to the present system as incorporating largely the evils of the old system, and, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, of intensifying them. One of the great evils under the old Franchise Act was this: that people who took an interest in the elections had to go to an enormous outlay of labour and expense in order to complete the list. That will apply to this Act. I do not care whether the local revisers in New Brunswick undertake to do their duty well or not. They are not omniscient, they do not know every person in each parish. The men who take an interest had to do the work, and precisely the same labour is to be thrown on them in the future as in the past. I say also that this measure intensifies the evil. There may not be the same expense thrown upon the treasury of this country, but there will be a larger expense thrown upon private individuals and the people who run the elections. For instance, in New Brunswick we have no printed list. If you want a printed list you have got to employ men to go and copy 10,000 names; that will cost $30 or $40. Then you have to go to work and get some printers to print that list for your friends, or you have to pay writers to make copies of it. You see what an enormous cost that is, and it is thrown altogether upon the candidate, or upon the parties who contribute to the legitimate expenses of running an election. For these reasons, I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, if they do not wish to have a permanent franchise roll and to procure to themselves the credit which could easily have belonged to their predecessors, at least I think they should give us a Bill that is free from the objections I have pointed out in the province of New Brunswick. If we are to have an appeal, give us one under which the greatest right of a citizen shall not be contingent upon the whim of any sheriff, but which permits him whose right it is to assert that right in a court of law the same as any other right under our constitution.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to say a word in connection with an observation of the Solicitor General, showing, as I think, that he misunderstood the position that I desired to take before this committee. It was not my intention, if any language of mine conveyed that idea, to suggest that he had shown individually any disposition to resist reasonable suggestions from this side of the House. On the contrary, the disposition with which the Solicitor General set out in handling this Bill, and which he evinced on more than one occasion, notwithstanding the overpowering pressure from his colleagues, was to hear very patiently any suggestions and arguments that may have come from this side. On the other hand, several members of the Government have not evinced that same disposition, but have endeavoured to drive this Bill through 'coute que coute.' Let me give some proof of the spirit of the Solicitor General as contrasted with the actions which he has latterly been forced to take. Take, for instance, the very ingenious and serious argument with which he dealt with the points, some of which I touched upon, but which were elaborated more fully by other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He approached those in a thoroughly professional spirit, but he did not grapple with, nor did he deny the reasons that we urged, out side of those technical questions, when we pressed for a concession under this clause in order to have in the provinces that are now denied it, the privilege of judicial revision in certain contingencies. On the contrary, he confined himself exclusively to these technical questions, and gave us reasonable argument in support of a contrary view from that we had expressed. But I think it is significant that the Solicitor General did not deal with the arguments that we addressed to the Treasury benches outside of the technical aspect of the question. We appealed to the fairness of hon. gentlemen opposite to make concessions that would not impair the general principle of this Bill, that would not interfere with any argument that the Solicitor General used in introducing this Bill. It has been admitted that the Bill is faulty, and we have presented an amendment which would extend to the other provinces the benefits which are now enjoyed by Ontario and Quebec.

I have no desire to reiterate any of the arguments made in support of that appeal, for it was an appeal to the Treasury benches. But one or two observations occur to me that I should like to put before the committee in connection with some statements that have been made since, and to support, too, that appeal. The Solicitor General has associated with him as a law officer of the Crown a gentleman who once represented the electoral district of Bothwell in this House, I refer to the present Minister of Justice, and I appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to the leader of the Government and to members of the profession who sat with him when in Opposition to recollect his strong objection to a condition of things to which the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) for a while adverted this evening, his objection to the great power delegated by this Parliament to the Governor General in Council. Hon. gentlemen, particularly those hon. members to whom I have referred, will remember the elaborate arguments advanced, I do not know whether on constitutional grounds, but at all events on the ground of public policy against the Governor in Council being clothed with such extensive powers. And those arguments could be used with greater force on this occasion in connection with the policy, not in regard to the constitutionality, of handling so much, if not everything, in connection with the regulation of elections to this House to the provinces, especially outside of Ontario and Quebec. I should hope that it is not even too late now to receive some information from the Treasury benches that either now or at a later period and before this Bill is fully decided upon, the question will be broadly considered by the Government. I submit it could be dealt with so as to meet every argument put forward on this side without departing from the main principle or incurring a large bill of expense, which seems to have frightened many members on both sides of the House. I desire to make an observation in regard to the case referred to by the Solicitor General, Regina vs. O'Rourke, and Judge Wilson's decision in that case. Reading this part of the decision in regard to the statute of this Parliament touching procedure in criminal cases there is this to be said before I read the observations of that judge, in order to show to the committee that it is by no means clear on the question raised here, that the opinion of Judge Wilson could be considered adverse to the views expressed on this side of the House, even if cases of criminal procedure were on all fours with the case under discussion. This was an Act expressly to remove doubt. I am astonished to observe that the Solicitor General shakes his head. I happen to have read the Act a moment ago; I am quite positive that it begins by stating that doubts had arisen. I have it here, and it commences: "And for avoiding doubt." The section in question raises another very important point, as to whether the legislation was necessary at the time, but at all events it was an enactment simply for avoiding doubt. Let us see what Judge Wilson said. He said:

The Dominion Act, 35 Vic., chap. 14, sec. 2, enacts that the voters' lists in Ontario for Dominion elections shall be the same as in elections for the Ontario legislature; and by the Revised Statutes of Ontario, chap. 49, sec. 48, it is provided that rules of court made under the Act shall be "of the same force and effect as if the provisions contained therein had been expressly enacted by the legislature." That is a case more of delegation, but the enactment in question is not of that nature.

The Solicitor General would say that was ultra vires, being in the nature of a delegation.

There is no delegation by the Dominion Parliament of the power to enact jury laws for the criminal courts in Ontario. What is done is by a positive enactment of the Dominion, that a certain law in force in Ontario shall for the Dominion purposes be the law of the Dominion. It is a Dominion law enacted not in extenso, but by relation and reference to a law of Ontario.

To show the issue between us and which that reference brings out, I may say that what we complain of so far as the legal question is concerned is, that there may not be an adoption in extenso or by reference in the case of a local Act of an Act that may be plain and certain; but the Bill as introduced by the Solicitor General is not by any means certain and is subject to the caprice and will of a local legislature. Is any hon. member reading it able to tell under what franchise law or conditions an election in any particular province is to be held, because it depends on action that either may be taken or not by the Parliament of Canada. I will now listen to any question which the hon. member for Halifax may desire to ask.

Mr. RUSSELL. My learned friend read the following passage:—

There is no delegation by the Dominion Parliament of the power to enact jury laws for the criminal courts in Ontario. What is done is by a positive enactment of the Dominion, that a certain law in force in Ontario shall for the Dominion purposes be the law of the Dominion.

What I want to call the attention of the learned gentleman to is this: That it seems he has not fully stated the effect of that statute unless Chief Justice Hagarty was entirely mistaken in his view of it. Chief Justice Hagarty says:

It seems to me to be very clear that the Dominion Parliament, by this Act of 1869, adopted and as it were confirmed the existing provincial jury laws, and also declared that future provincial laws on that subject should be equally adopted and confirmed, subject, however, to their own right of control by any existing or future Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Whatever the obiter dictum might have been in that case, I think speaking from recollection, that the decision was on the existing law, and not a law that made any reference to laws that might in future be enacted by the local Parliament.

Mr. RUSSELL. I listened to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) in the hope that he would distinguish the case which the Solicitor General cited from what we are proposing to do in this Franchise Act before the House. I followed the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) very carefully, especially when he was completely overturning everything argued by my hon. colleague (Mr. Borden) who is generally right on legal questions, but who undoubtedly was shown to be completely wrong on this question, by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). I listened to that hon. gentleman (Mr. Powell) with very great attention, and I listened to him understandingly, until he came to the point at which he sought to distinguish the case of the Queen vs. O'Rourke from the principle contained in the Solicitor General's Bill before the House. I could not follow him there, and if he will favour us with an explanation of that distinction he will do a great service to myself and to many hon. members of this House.

Mr. POWELL. For the information of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) I may say that he is perfectly correct. I did not pretend to draw any distinction between the Act as it now stands and the Act on the case that was judicially passed upon. The judgment there was on the incorporation of a local Act into a Dominion Act and as I read this Bill, it is the incorporation of an Act and does not do what is tantamount to delegating powers. And wherein I differed from the Solicitor General is in this—

Mr. RUSSELL. Does my learned friend say that this clause under consideration is within the competency of Parliament to pass? Will my learned friend give us the assurance—because I rest very much on his assurance —that this clause of the Franchise Bill is within the legislative authority of this Parliament; if the case of the Queen vs. O'Rourke is properly decided.

Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. POWELL. What I understand this Act to mean is this: That it incorporates an existing law and does not go to the extent of incorporating any further changes in that law made by the local legislatures. The Solicitor General claims that it does go further, and that it incorporates changes which may hereafter be made in the franchise law by the local legislatures. In my view, because of the Ontario decision, it would be perfectly constitutional for us to pass it. If the Solicitor General in his view of the case is right and I am wrong, then I have very grave doubts, in view of Todd's opinion, whether or not it would be competent for us to pass it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am satisfied with the hon. gentleman's statement that as he reads the Bill it is within the competence of this House to pass it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The best answer I can give to the question that was put to me, from a cursory reason of Judge Hagarty's judgment, is this: I believe that if time permitted I would have the assistance of the Solicitor General in dealing with Chief Justice Hagarty's argument, and I am very glad to be able to say that, because not only Chief Justice Hagarty but Judge Cameron was against these later authorities that have been referred to. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) strikes his head, but I think I will be able to convince even that hon. gentleman, that I am right in saying I will have the assistance of the Solicitor General, and the assistance of later English decisions, in showing that even so eminent men as Chief Justice Hagarty and Judge Cameron were on weak ground in dealing with the phase of the case to which he refers. Judge Cameron goes the whole length of saying that the power of delegation exists. It opens up a vast field, and the answer is sufficient, that at present the Solicitor General agrees with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have contended against this power of delegation.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I want to say a word to the Solicitor General because it is possible that my position is misunderstood in view of what my hon. friend (Mr. Powell) said afterwards. I have no doubt, and my hon. friend has no doubt, that the English Parliament could confer upon a municipal council in England power to regulate the franchise. But the doubt I have is one which might be illustrated this way. Can the Parliament of Canada validly pass an Act saying that the criminal law should be dealt with entirely by the legislatures of each province. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) seems to think that is not a parallel case. Under what particular portion of the British North America Act does my learned friend say, that this Bill is being passed? Does he say it is being passed under the authority of section 91? That is a fair question, and will my learned friend the Solicitor General answer it. I see that my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Russell) is anxious to answer, but I am asking the Solicitor General. If my learned friend from Halifax desires to answer in his stead, he can do so.

Mr. RUSSELL. I presume it is free for any one to interject a remark. I say this is a law for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not often differ from my hon. friend on a question of law, but on that point I do. I say it is not anything of the kind, although what my learned friend (Mr. Russell) suggests would assist me in my argument. I think it is under section 41.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I may be wrong, but I have the right to suggest what my point is, and I say it is under section 41 and section 41 alone that this Bill can be passed. The implied authority is in section 41 which says: "Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides"; it is under that alone that this law can be passed. It would suit my argument better if my learned friend (Mr. Russell) were right, because if he were right, then it is exactly in line with what I have been suggesting to the hon. Solicitor General.

My hon. and learned friend from Halifax tells me that this is under the peace, order and good government of Canada. In what way, will he tell me, does any question respecting the peace, order and good government of Canada differ in principle from any question affecting the criminal law? That is the question I was putting to my hon. friend the Solicitor General. In no respect whatever, I say. The Solicitor General shook his head, but my learned friend from Halifax apparently bows his head to that.

I want to come back to the point with which I was dealing when my learned friend from Halifax interrupted me. I have no doubt the Parliament of Great Britain would have power to confer upon a municipal council in Great Britain authority to deal with the franchise; but what I suggest to the Solicitor General is this, that where the Parliament of Great Britain says that the Parliament of Canada shall deal with certain things, and that the legislatures of the provinces shall deal with certain things, it is not competent for one legislature to transfer its powers to the other—because that is in effect what it is doing.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is where we differ.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My learned friend agrees with me this far, that it is not competent for one legislature to transfer to the other any powers vested in it by section 91 or section 92. There is no difference between my learned friend and myself on that point. I will therefore proceed upon that premise. Then the hon. Solicitor General says that this is not transferring a power. I venture to submit to him that this is transferring a power for the time being, with the power, if you like, to take it up again at any time; because this Parliament has the right to repeal any Act passed by this Parliament. Has my learned friend ever considered whether it would be competent for this Parliament, after declaring a work to be for the general advantage of Canada, to repeal such an Act?—because that is analogous to the question we are dealing with now. When this Parliament says that future Acts which may be placed on the Statute-books of the provinces shall be the law so far as elections to this Parliament are concerned then, during the time between the passing of this Act and its repeal, you are transferring to the local legislature the power of dealing with the qualification of voters, and the preparation of voters' lists for elections to this Parliament. I understand distinctly the point at which the Solicitor General disagrees with me, but I do not understand how he meets the particular difficulty which I have suggested—that during the period this Act is in force and until it is repealed this Parliament is bound by anything the local legislatures may enact, and that, it seems to me, constitutes a transfer of power for the time being from the Parliament of Canada to the legislatures of the different provinces. If that is within the powers of this Parliament, then the Parliament of Canada can transfer the criminal law or any other subject dealt with by section 91 of the British North America Act to the legislatures of the different provinces. That is the difficulty I have in my mind. I do not say that I am right, but I venture to submit that any reason which the hon. Solicitor General has advanced against it is not a very forcible or powerful reason.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to be able to bear willing testimony to the fact that the hon. Solicitor General has handled this Bill with great ability, and has treated us on this side of the House with every fairness, and has evinced every disposition to make the Bill as workable as possible on the basis on which it is framed. Now, I do not want to occupy the time of the committee at any great length, and I simply rise for the purpose of drawing the attention of hon. gentlemen to the anomaly which it strikes me exists in this Bill. I refer to the power of revision dealt with by the section we are now considering. The court of revision presupposes a more learned body than the body from which the appeal is made. In the province of Nova Scotia the courts of revision are made up by the different electoral districts in the counties being grouped together in numbers from two to five. Take my own county of Cape Breton, in which I live, the second largest county in the province. We have six revision courts and eighteen revisers. Then we have three incorporated towns, each of which has three revisers. In the county of Cape Breton we have no less than nine revision courts, composed of twenty-seven members, for the purpose of revising the electoral lists. Now, it will at once strike hon. gentlemen as a very anomalous position of affairs that when an appeal is required, it is had from a court composed of three intelligent men, such as the revisers generally are, to one layman. I cannot see why the Solicitor General or the House can object to having an appeal from a lay court to the county court judge. Under section 5 of the Franchise Act of Nova Scotia, the sheriff has immense powers. He can gerrymander the different districts in the different municipalities when an election is coming on; that is, he can make up the polls in such a way that he can tack part of one district on to another. So that the sheriff is not only the returning officer and the appellant court, but he is also the distributing court. The revisers meet. They get the assessment rolls as made up by the different assessors. They compile the electoral list from these rolls, and then they file that list with the municipal clerk. After this is done, the list is posted in several places in the district, and the sheriff on a certain day opens his court for the purpose of hearing appeals from the doings of the revisers.

What I consider the greatest hardship is this. How can we expect to have a revision properly heard and thoroughly threshed out when the appeal is to a layman, very often an old man, who does not know the most elementary rudiments in the rules of evidence, and is ignorant of procedure, from a court of three intelligent gentlemen, perhaps three of the very best men of the whole district. Section 35 prescribes how the lists shall be made up. After they are filled in and signed by the sheriff, they are filed with the municipal clerk. They are made up in writing, not printed at all, and hon. gentlemen will at once see the door that is thus opened for fraud. Section 40 then prescribes that the sheriff shall furnish certified copies of these lists to the different officers. The lists are made up in writing and filed, and copies of them are made out in writing by the sheriff and handed to the different returning officers. What is there to prevent an unscrupulous or careless and irresponsible man, as the sheriff may be—an ignorant person if you like—filling in any number of names on that list in writing which he has to hand over to the returning officer. This may be done by some person after the list has left the sheriff's hands and during its transmission to the deputy returning officer. I would ask, therefore, to hedge this particular part of the Bill with some safeguard. Let us insist that the lists should be printed at all events; and if they are printed, there will be no danger of having any names added by the sheriff or any one else, whereas as they are, made out in writing and deposited with the clerk of the municipality, and copies being made out afterwards in writing by the sheriff, there is grave danger of their being tampered with. Therefore, I ask that the Solicitor General should see that they are printed before being finally completed. My hon. friend from Colchester (Mr. McClure) was under a wrong impression when he said that the law as it now exists is precisely as it was when under the control of the old sessions of the peace. Such is not the case. I have considerable experience in municipal matters, and am familiar with the manner in which the lists are made out by the general sessions of the peace and also under the municipal council—an institution that was inaugurated in our province in 1879. I believe that the court of session still obtains in the province of Prince Edward Island. The practice that prevailed under the old session was as follows:—A grand jury were selected, and with the magistrate of the county conducted the business of the whole county. The magistrates and justices of the county and the jury selected a certain number of officers to act as revisers. These revisers then revised the lists in the way then prescribed by law, which was pretty much the same method as now obtains. But my hon. friend will see the difference between that practice under the general sessions of the peace and the practice now followed. The municipal councillors are now elected in the different districts, and I assure the hon. gentleman that politics prevails in these smaller bodies just as briskly and violently as in the larger bodies, and the complexion of the county councils is either Conservative or Liberal according as the majority is Conservative or Liberal. Therefore, the officers they select are either Liberals or Conservatives, because these bodies are just as particular in appointing their friends to office as larger bodies are. It follows that the revisers are of a political stripe and are very anxious to fill up the lists in the interests of the political party they support. When that is done, if any one wishes to appeal to have names added to the list, the only court he can go to is that of the sheriff of the county. The sheriff is a layman, an old man in many instances, a man who has been given the shrievalty as a reward for political service, or perhaps meritorious service of one kind or another. He may be a very worthy man but in nearly every case he is ignorant of the elementary rudiments of the rules of evidence, and therefore incompetent to act as a court of appeal. Hon. gentlemen must agree that it is really conspicuously absurd that an appeal should be made from three intelligent laymen to one layman of less intelligence. Why, then, not let the appeal go to a court of a judicial character. Our county court judges are not overworked. Take the district in which I reside, comprising three counties—Cape Breton, Victoria and Richmond, in which Mr. Justice Dodd is the county court judge. I am sure there is not a Liberal or a Conservative within the confines of these counties who would not go before Judge Dodd with every confidence that justice will be done. The same statement applies to Mr. Justice McIsaac, who presides over Guysborough and Antigonish. I am quite sure that there is not a Liberal or Conservative of that district who would not willingly submit to his rulings, and no one would think of inquiring whether Judge Dodd or Judge McIsaac are Conservative or Liberal. I would therefore ask that the Government would accede to our request and give us an independent authority for this revision, and a competent authority who would be irremovable except by a vote of this Parliament.

I appeal to the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), who I know is of a fair mind and desires to see fair-play, why will he not give me the same rights in my province as he claims for himself in his? In Ontario they have their judges as revision courts to whom they can appeal to have the voters' lists perfected. I put the same question to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is certainly a gentleman of wide range of knowledge. And my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) in whose province in certain cases the same right of appeal to the judge exists. Why will not he give me the same privileges that he has in his province? If it is right for him to have this privilege, surely it is right for me. This, I contend, is a step in advance; it is a step that was taken by this Parliament when they enacted a Franchise Act in 1885, and I desire that there should be no retrogression. And I would appeal to the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) himself, who has the benefit of an appeal to the judges in his own province, why will he not give me the same privilege? Is there any answer that can be given?

Mr. TAYLOR. No answer can be given.

Mr. GILLIES. Then, why not agree to this amendment? Hon. gentlemen opposite say that if they do that they will destroy the Bill. But that is not the case. I am willing to go this far with the hon. gentlemen—I am willing that the qualification of a voter in federal elections shall be the same as in provincial elections. That is a point that I consider to be not worth quarreling over. Why, then, do they not meet me in the same manner and agree that the county court judges, of whom there are seven in our province shall be the appellant court which shall have final supervision over these lists? We are not asking more than is already granted in Ontario and Quebec, and what is provided, in a certain degree, I understand, in the province of Manitoba and also in the province of British Columbia. I discussed this matter with my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), and he tells me that they have the judges there as the final court of appeal in matters of the revision. If that be the case in these provinces, why not allow us to have it in Nova Scotia? The judges are already appointed there, and it will not cause expense to allow this appeal. You will then have a competent tribunal, you will have the Act carried out properly and you will have justice done. I am not going to refer to the wild and incoherent utterances of the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan). There are some things in this life that are better left untouched, and certainly he and his utterances come within that category.

Mr. INGRAM. I rise to protest against gentlemen on both sides of this House stating that appeals are allowed to the county judges in the province of Ontario and Quebec. Speaking for the province of Ontario, I agree, that so far as the Part 1 of the voters' list is concerned, an appeal does lie to the county judge. But this is not the case under the Act respecting the registration of manhood suffrage in cities and county towns. In the town of Niagara Falls, under the statute, the board of registrars consists of three members, and there is not a judge on that board. Under subsection 2 of section 28, it is provided that when a board of manhood suffrage registrars consists of more than three members, the board shall appoint three of its members to be a board of appeal, and where the board consists of three members only, those three members shall constitute a board of appeal. Now, in the case of Niagara Falls we have three gentlemen constituting the board of registrars, and these same three men constitute the board of appeal. I should like to know from any gentleman how we can expect to get justice under these circumstances. How can appeals be settled satisfactorily? According to our experience in the rural municipalities there are few appeals to the county judge who is the final tribunal. But, in the cities and towns there are a large number of young men who are not otherwise qualified to vote but who have resided long enough in the municipality and long enough in the polling subdivision to be entitled to have their names entered on the list on applying to the board of registrars. There are representatives of the political parties at that meeting, and if there are objections to any name being entered on the list, that objection is stated, and the objection comes up before the board of appeal. We have had some experience in my constituency, and I want to tell the hon. Solicitor General that, this Registration Act in the province of Ontario is a crude Act, and does not give satisfaction to those who are affected by it.

I will give him some examples. The city of St. Thomas and the city of Toronto were the two first cities in the province of Ontario where the Registration Act applied. When a provincial election came on in St. Thomas, we found the city divided up into several divisions. John Brown did not know any more where he voted than the man in the moon. How do you think John Brown found means of voting? His name was not on the roll, he could not find it. He was entitled to vote in division No. 1, but he made a great search to find his name in division 13, half a mile from where he was entitled to vote. Then the gentleman who had this list in charge, finding that names were omitted, gave him a small slip of paper with his name on it with instructions to go to a certain division and present this to the deputy returning officer, and by that means he secured his vote. That is the way this Registration Act works in the city of St. Thomas. There is another thing. Seven days after the dissolution of the legislature of the province of Ontario, these registrars are called together for the purpose of carrying out this Act. By the time the appeals are decided there is not sufficient time for the clerk of the peace to prepare a proper list of the voters in order that each deputy returning officer may have a proper list. So I say this Act does not give time between the dissolution of Parliament and election day, that it may be worked out properly.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who constitute the board of appeal at Niagara?

Mr. INGRAM. There are three good solid partisans. At Niagara Falls the ex-officio members of the board are: the police magistrate, appointed by the local Government, a partisan; the division court clerk is another, and the clerk of the municipal council is another. These are the three gentlemen who compose the board of registration in the town of Niagara Falls, and is it any wonder that gentlemen on this side of the House protest against having to submit to a court of appeal of that kind? There are many other things. I was not present when the polling subdivisions were discussed in this House, but I protest strongly against the number of polling subdivisions that are created by this Act, compelling the people to pay $4 for polling booths, $4 to a deputy returning officer, $2 for constables, and $2 for poll clerks, making some $12 at least, not counting the stationery that is used, and various other expenses. I will give you a reason why I protest against the number of polling subdivisions. Take the provincial election of 1894. There were 59 divisions in the district of Toronto East, in not one of which were there 200 votes polled.

Mr. INGRAM.

The 59 divisions would average 88 voters for each one. I say that instead of allowing 200 to each one, as the provincial Act does, if you say 300, and take the last election as the basis, you will reduce the number in Toronto East to 18 subdivisions, in each of which there would be 300 votes, or less, polled. Take the difference between 18 and 59, and you will see the large saving the people of Toronto would effect in the matter of polling subdivisions. In Toronto south, there are 105 polling subdivisions, with an average of 98 voters to a poll. Besides creating enormous expense in this way, you are confusing the electors. I hold that our cities and towns should be divided for Dominion purposes, precisely the same as they are divided for municipal purposes. Surely, if the people in our cities and towns can elect a mayor, aldermen, school trustees, and occasionally vote on a by-law, it is reasonable to suppose that they can have ample time to vote for two candidates for Parliament. Besides you are creating polling subdivisions and establishing polling booths in cities and towns just the same as you would in municipal elections; and every person knowing where he has a right to vote municipally, would not be confused when an election came round to know where he should vote. I went into this matter carefully, and I find that in the city of Brantford, the city of St. Thomas, the two electoral districts of Hamilton, Chatham, in the county of Kent, Kingston, London, Ottawa, Woodstock, Peterborough, Toronto east, south, north and west, Guelph, the south riding of Wellington—in the cities and county towns, in fifteen electoral districts, where I find there are 614 polling subdivisions. I have figured out what this result would be if there were 300 voters in each one. It would reduce that number from 614 to 231, saving in those cities 383 polling subdivisions. Multiply that number by $12 each, and the people would effect a saving of $4,596.

The PRIME MINISTER. I rise to a point of order. It is nearly half past twelve o'clock, and I would not interrupt my hon. friend, but he is discussing a question which has already been passed upon by this committee. I do not think the hon. gentleman was in the House the other day, but the section he is discussing has been passed, and is no longer before the committee.

Mr. INGRAM. I am aware that this was discussed before, but the point I am trying to make here—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The point of order has been well taken, because the question has already been decided. It is a well known rule that we have no right to discuss a question which has already been decided. I invite the hon. member to confine his remarks to subsection "a" of clause 5.

Mr. INGRAM. I am trying to show that you are compelling us to adopt a provincial list in the province of Ontario, and by the adoption of this list you are saddling the people of this country with a great cost in the shape of polling divisions. I am showing what these polling subdivisions cost in order to bear out my argument.

The PRIME MINISTER. Too late.

Mr. INGRAM. If it is too late now, I will take some other time. On the third reading I will discuss it at much greater length. I find that the amendment provides for some of those things proposed by the Solicitor General. A clause is to be proposed to the effect that the revising officer shall prepare a separate list for each polling station, and that it shall be compiled alphabetically.

The PRIME MINISTER. The amendment has not been moved.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand notice of it has been given.

The PRIME MINISTER. Of course, the hon. gentleman can discuss it when it has been moved.

Mr. INGRAM. Up to this time of the discussion I have not occupied thirty minutes of the time of the committee. Both the leader of the House and hon. members on this side have occupied hours, and I should be glad to finish my remarks now; but if the right hon. gentleman refuses to allow me to proceed, I will guarantee to occupy an hour or two at a future time.

Mr. TAYLOR. I draw the attention of the hon. Prime Minister to the discussion that took place the other day. The right hon. gentleman said:

The only question which we have to deal with at this moment is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) regarding the franchise to Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend allow me—is that the correct rule? We have a substantive motion which we are discussing, an hon. gentleman has moved an amendment to that motion. Does the right hon. gentleman contend that we have no right to discuss the substantive motion on the amendment which has been proposed, and that we must confine ourselves entirely to the amendment.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is my opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I will ask the ruling of the Chairman with reference to it.

The PRIME MINISTER. If my hon. friend will refer to the debates of 1895, which I have reason to remember, because at that time I sat on the other side of the House, he will agree with me that we were rigidly confined to the amendment which was under discussion before the Chair.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Cameron). I think the Chairman read the whole of section 5, and this is an amendment to that whole section. Therefore I think that the whole section as well as the amendment are under consideration.

We have therefore section 5 before us.

The PRIME MINISTER. Subsection "b" of section 5 has been carried.

Mr. TAYLOR. We are now on subsection "a."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The understanding of the committee the other night was that the section would be put to the committee by subsections. Subsection "b," which the hon. member was discussing a moment ago, has been disposed of. Subsection "c" is disposed of. So we are at subsection "a," which has reference to the provincial franchises. The discussion, therefore, should be confined to the question of the provincial franchises pure and simple.

Mr. TAYLOR. The whole clause is before us, according to the ruling the other night.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is not different from this one; it is the same ruling.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I rise for the purpose of asking the Solicitor General a question as regards the difficulty which presents itself in connection with the adoption of the franchise of the province of Ontario, and I ask it now because it comes very naturally after the remarks made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) as regards the registration boards. The Solicitor General knows, because he has given consideration to the laws of the various provinces, that in Ontario as regards all the wards and municipalities, with the exception of cities and county towns, the list is revised each year. It is made up by the municipal authorities, and is then revised by the judges, and any appeal as regards the municipal or provincial elections are then heard. So far as regards the great majority of the electors in that province we would have no difficulty in securing a list, supposing a dissolution were declared and an election called on. But the hon. gentleman is aware that in cities such as London, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Chatham and St. Thomas, and all county towns which happen to be incorporated as towns, the system of registration applies, and no list will be commenced to be made there for the purpose of provincial elections until such time as a dissolution of the legislature is declared, and when that dissolution is declared, certain steps will be taken for making a list that is used in the elections then pending.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The amendment to section 8 is to meet that difficulty.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I must say that is one of the most extraordinary sections ever proposed, although I do not propose to discuss it at the present moment. I was simply leading up to the condition of affairs. If the dissolution of this Parliament were declared, lists would have been revised in all the constituencies of Ontario except those which are cities or contain county towns, and in those constituencies there are absolutely no lists. There is no list in Toronto, Hamilton or London, and the other cities and towns to which I have referred. If this Government declared a dissolution of Parliament, it would have no right to say to the legislature or Government of Ontario: You are now to call into effect and operation your registration boards in those cities. Then how will a list be obtained? The Solicitor General says under section 8 of this Bill. While I do not desire to anticipate the discussion of that clause, I am bound to say that it would be placing in the hands of this Government power to appoint every officer de novo in those cities, officers who would be appointed by this Government and under its control. Then, we have, on the admission of the Solicitor General, a fact which should prevent us, if possible, passing this Act, which adopts a part only of the machinery of Ontario and supplies, under the control and at the beck and nod of the party in power in the Dominion, the means of obtaining lists in those constituencies, for which there are no lists at the present time. We have had the point argued that if we depart from the provincial machinery we had better drop this Bill entirely. That was the statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. This Bill is such a mixture that the Solicitor General and the other members of the Government find they have to depart from the provincial machinery. That machinery is not available for their purpose, and they are compelled to manufacture machinery for all the cities and county towns in the province in order to get lists to meet the cases of a general election or a by-election. In the face of this admission on the part of the Solicitor General, the Government should pause before pressing this Bill on the attention of the committee. The hon. gentleman admits that the Government have to make new lists by means of new machinery, which power they propose to take under section 8, which is a very objectionable clause.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to move that the committee rise.

The PRIME MINISTER. I sincerely hope the committee will pass this subsection. I very willingly yielded yesterday to an adjournment at half past twelve and did not press the sitting. We have been discussing this question two days, and if we cannot come to an agreement in regard to it we ought to dispose of it in some way. I do not know that even my hon. friends opposite can have more light on the question than they have already had, and therefore I think it should be disposed of.

Mr. BENNETT. When I addressed the House the other evening—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Pass subsection (a) and adjourn on that.

The PRIME MINISTER. Very well.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to ask whether we shall have perfect liberty on section 8 to discuss the point to which I refer.

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly; undoubtedly.

Amendment negatived.

Subsection (a) of section 5 agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Might I ask the right hon. gentleman to say what business we will have for to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. The same bill of fare for to-morrow as for to-day.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 28th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 125) to amend the Act to incorporate the Interprovincial Bridge Company.—(Mr. Hutchison, by Mr. Campbell.)

CARRIAGE OF COAL OVER THE INTER-COLONIAL.

Mr. McINERNEY (by Mr. Davin) asked:

1. How many tons of coal did the Intercolonial Railway carry from Maccan and Spring Hill respectively to Moncton during the last fiscal year, and at what rate per ton?

2. What is the rate per ton for such carriage under the new Intercolonial Railway tariff?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. During the last fiscal year the following quantities of coal were carried by the Intercolonial Railway from Maccan to Moncton:—543½ tons at rate of 95 cts. per ton of 2,000 lbs.; 327 tons, at rate of 60 cts. per ton of 2,000 lbs.; 1,519 tons, at rate of 50 cts. per ton of 2,000 lbs. From Springhill Junction to Moncton: 3,050½ tons, at rate of $1 per ton of 2,000 lbs.; 2,940 tons, at rate of 66 cts. per ton of 2,000 lbs.; 4,276½ tons, at rate of 50 cts. per ton of 2,000 lbs. 2. The present rates under the new Intercolonial Railway for coal from Maccan to Moncton and from Springhill Junction to Moncton are as follows:—To the public, 80 cts. per ton of 2,240 lbs.; to manufacturers, 75 cts. per ton of 2,240 lbs.

VACANCY FOR BAGOT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the First Minister if he can tell the House when he proposes to issue the writ and name the returning officer for Bagot.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend asks me if I will inform the House when we propose to do so. I cannot tell him to-day; I hope to be able to tell him within a few days.

LONG LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. OSLER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to refer to a speech made the other evening when I was not here by the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis). He refers to the Long Lake Railway Company, and repeats statements which I thought I had refuted in this House as to the financing of that road. He repeats those statements in my absence. I do not think it is necessary for me to take up the time of the House in going over the figures and facts as I stated them here on the 17th of February last. The statements which the hon. member for Saskatchewan made are all of them not based upon facts; the figures that he gives are all of them entirely wrong and misleading. So far as the financial operations of the Saskatchewan road are concerned, the whole of the money raised from the sale of lands—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will allow me—I am afraid he is going beyond a mere personal explanation, because the lines he is taking would possibly call for a reply. The hon. member must make a motion in order to put himself in order.

Mr. OSLER. I will conclude with a motion. I do not wish to weary the House by going into long details, but the cost of that road was $10,000 a mile. The land was sold for $998,000, which money was deposited in the trustees' hands to pay interest for six years on the bonds. By the end of six years that money had all been paid out, and during the whole of the six years the Canadian Pacific Railway operated the road, the earnings practically met the operating expenses, and no more. The Canadian Pacific Railway naturally did not exercise their right to take over the road at the end of that time. The bondholders, unfortunately, were the people who suffered. They went into the transaction fully believing that the country would develop to such an extent that at the end of six years the road would be a paying

one. At the expiration of these six years a new arrangement was made with the Canadian Pacific Railway to operate the road on most favourable terms. The gross earnings of the road for the last year ending 31st December were $65,300; the operating expenses were about $62,000. There was no margin of profit, and the difficulty existing in connection with the road is that there is no money available, and I do not see who is going to raise money to repair the bridges. The bonds are of the value of 30 cents or 40 cents on the dollar, and the earnings of the road, as I have stated, are not sufficient to carry out this work. This is a matter that is causing very serious anxiety to the parties who are looking after the road. It has been operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the full extent that the business warrants. The road is one which was very much desired by the late Government for military purposes particularly. They gave a subsidy of $80,000 a year for twenty years, an amount equal to the sum we were then paying out for various services in that country. I state here without any hesitation that no railway transaction has ever been carried out in Canada where there was such absolute honesty in connection with it from one end to the other. There was no money made by those connected with it, the promoters made no money, the only persons who made anything were the contractors, who no doubt obtained fair profits. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company has nothing to do with the road. When the subsidy was given they were approached and asked to build the road. They first thought of doing so, but after making an investigation declined, and the gentlemen whose names are on the charter immediately withdrew and have never had to do with it since. Practically the road is owned to-day by the bondholders, and they are only receiving on their bonds the $80,000 given by this Government for the twenty years. In the Department of the Interior and the Department of Railways all the agreements and papers in connection with this road are on file; if not, I shall be very glad to furnish every document connected with the building and financing of the undertaking. I am very sorry the hon. member for Saskatchewan, in my absence, should have repeated the attacks, which I think were very fully answered by me on 17th February. As regards the statement I made that Mr. Willison had told me he had written the pamphlet with respect to the Long Lake Railway, and would be glad to withdraw it, I made the statement then, and I repeat it. I went to Mr. Willison with Mr. Jameson, the member for Winnipeg, and Mr. Willison said to him in my presence that he had made that statement and he told the member for Winnipeg in my presence that he would be glad to withdraw it at any time. I do not think it is necessary for me to again go over the ground, which I think I covered fully on 17th February last, and if gentlemen will refer to "Hansard" of that date, they will see my reply in connection with this railway and the statement I made. The figures I quoted and the statements I made then are absolutely true; and there is no concealment, nothing behind and beyond the statement I made then in connection with the road. I wish to contradict in the most positive terms that I can the statements that were made regarding that line by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) the other evening. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion to adjourn negatived.

COLLISION BETWEEN "YANTIC" AND "LA CANADIENNE."

Mr. LEMIEUX asked,

1. Is the Government aware that on the 29th of October, 1897, the steamship "Yantic," of the United States navy, came into collision with the steamship "La Canadienne," the property of the Dominion Government, in the St. Lawrence River?

2. Was there an investigation held by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal over said collision?

3. Has the report been sent to the Government, and what is the verdict?

4. What is the amount of damages suffered by "La Canadienne" as a result of said collision?

5. Has the Government taken any steps to recover said damages from the United States Government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Yes, the Government was notified by the agent of the department at Quebec. At the time of the collision the "La Canadienne" was chartered to one Lindsay. Yes, there was an investigation held by the Harbour Commissioners to determine whether the pilot on board the "Yantic" was at fault. The Harbour Commissioners form the pilotage authority. The decision of the pilotage authority was that the "Yantic" caused the collision by changing her course, while in charge of Sévère Perron, pilot. The accounts have not been received for repairs to the steamer. No, we do not yet know what the damages amount to.

CANADIAN CUSTOMS OFFICIALS IN THE KLONDIKE.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the Government to a statement made in a letter signed by Stuart Cameron, which appears in to-day's "Citizen," under the heading, "To Klondike by the Teslin Route." The writer says:

After eight days' doubling on our provisions we arrived at the boundary line, thirty miles from the coast, and here we had another unique experience. The Canadian customs official, Mr. Turner, informed us if we wanted to leave early in the morning he would have to charge us a small fee for the policeman being put on night duty, which fee, he told us later, would be $1.50.

Mr. OSLER.

We inquired of several other parties who had to pay the same, and figured out Mr. Turner's daily income to be between $30 and $40 from this source, besides the salary the Government already allows him. No need of Mr. Turner going to the Klondike at that rate.

It would be well to know whether a customs official had a right to make such a charge or not.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My hon. friend will understand that the Government have no means of knowing whether that statement is true or not. The Government are bound to assume that the officers in charge in that part of the country are doing their duty. All I have to say is, that if Mr. Cameron had undergone any such treatment, the better course to pursue is to lay a complaint before the department, and it will be investigated at once with a view to have redress made.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to ask the right hon. gentleman leading the House if he has yet determined whether he can allow me a day for the discussion of a motion on preferential trade.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have not yet determined on a day, indeed I must tell my hon. friend that I have not thought over the matter since he brought it forward the other day. I may tell him, however, that as soon as the deck is clear from the present encumbrances we will be able possibly to give him some day, or at all events to discuss the question.

Mr. McNEILL. That is scarcely treating me very generously, I think.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has asked a question and he must not go further.

LANDS IN THE RAILWAY BELT, VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. McINNES. Yesterday there was laid on the Table of the House the report of an investigation made by Mr. Rothwell respecting complaints made by certain settlers residing within the railway belt on Vancouver Island. In view of the nature of the report, I desire to ask the Government what line of action they intend to follow?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The question dealt with in the report is a somewhat difficult and complicated one. I cannot say that I have arrived at a positive conclusion as to what should be done, and I will not do so without asking the consideration of my colleagues in regard to it. I have gone through the evidence accompanying the return, which is very voluminous. My present intention is to give the matter further consideration, and to communicate with the provincial government with a view to arrive at a settlement, whereby the settlers on the island, who no doubt have very serious grievances, may be in some way compensated in regard to those grievances.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE-- INSPECTOR MOODY'S YUKON DETACHMENT.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the Government if they have received any information with regard to the police party which left Edmonton for the Yukon sometime in September last?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am very glad that this question has been asked, because I see by the newspapers that there is a certain amount of misapprehension or uncertainty as to the whereabouts of that force. The detachment to which my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) refers was commanded by Inspector Moody and left Edmonton sometime last fall, in September or October. We have received two communications from that force, the first one in December last and the second one late last night. Inspector Moody had with him a party of seven men, he had ten sleds drawn by horses, eight train of dogs running loose, and an abundant supply of provisions. His intention was to use the horses until the snow got too deep when the dogs would be brought into service, and the horses killed and fed to the dogs. On the 2nd of December Inspector Moody reported from Fort St. John, on the Peace River, as follows:—

All are in good health and spirits, and the dogs are looking well. Our outfit is good, but I have difficulty in feeding the dogs. With a good effort I look for a prosperous trip to Sylvester Post, at least. Many things may delay us, but with patience and determination we hope to get through some way or other, and I believe we shall turn up at the other side safely.

Last night we received another communication from Inspector Moody. He now reports from Fort Graham, on the Findlay River. He had to winter at that port as the snow was five feet deep and dog feed was not obtainable and travelling difficult. He now reports that the party is in good condition.

Mr. BERGERON. How are the dogs?

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

On section 5, subsection "d,"

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the Solicitor General what emergency is contemplated by this clause?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). It refers to the unorganized territory in Ontario and also to Algoma West. It would be better for the appearance of the Bill that we should change the word "a province" to "the province," and I move that the change be made.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Has the Solicitor General made any provision to offer where in the case of accident or otherwise the list is not in existence in the county or municipality? Suppose the local official fails to prepare the list of voters, or suppose that when the list is demanded by the returning officer appointed under the authority of this Parliament, the list does not exist, what provision is there for providing a list?

Mr. MILLS. Or supposing, as did actually happen in the county of Annapolis, that the sheriff loses the list. One of these eighteen good men and true, before the election of 1890 did actually lose the entire list of 26 pages. An Act was about to be introduced by the Nova Scotia Government of the day, and I think was introduced, to enable the sheriff to go over the county and make up a list at his own sweet will. Sheriff Morse actually lost the list and he went to Halifax and reported to the Government, and Attorney General Longley, who was then the colleague of the Minister of Finance, proposed to enact a law enabling the sheriff to go into the county of Annapolis and prepare a list just as he wished. The whole discussion is upon the debates of the Nova Scotia assembly in 1890.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) will be more appropriate when we come to paragraph 6, and I suggest that we would make more progress if we proceed in order.

Mr. MILLS. I made my remarks as supplementary to what was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall).

Mr. McDOUGALL. It seems to me we are at the point where we have a right to discuss this. If it happens that a list is missing or is not in existence, how are we to provide for that? We provide for no authority from this Parliament to see that there is a list in existence, until after the returning officer has received his appointment from the Government, and that may be within ten or fourteen days of the holding of the nomination, when it will be impossible to get the list prepared.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot imagine any such possible case arising as that pointed out by my hon. friend. The only case in any province where no list is in existence is in Prince Edward Island; and it may happen in certain parts of the unorganized territories of Ontario, where a list is made for the purpose of an election, or under the Manhood Suffrage Act in cities and towns, where lists are only in force for an election. But there is no possible case such as is suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. Suppose a building occupied by the provincial officer who has possession of the lists becomes destroyed by fire or by any other cause.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 6 provides for that.

Subsection "d" agreed to.

On section 5, subsection "e,"

Mr. BENNETT. During the discussion on the former clauses of the Bill, a great deal of complaint was made that in the cities and towns in the province of Ontario where registration prevailed, no due notice was given in ample time where voters were to poll their votes, and as a result of the powers conferred upon the returning officer, he could at the very last moment designate where the polling places would be, while his party friends might be placed in possession of that knowledge beforehand. I know it may be argued that under the Dominion election law the duty is incumbent on the returning officer on the day of nomination to announce in the proclamation where the polling places would be.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be my answer.

Mr. BENNETT. But I would ask the committee to add to this subsection the following words, which at least will do no harm:—

And the returning officer shall in all cases designate such polling places and polling stations in the election proclamation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not see at first sight that the addition of these words can affect the clause; but I have another amendment to make which may cause some discussion, and I will ask that the clause be allowed to stand, till I can consider it, and see how the hon. gentleman's amendment will fit in with the amendment which I have to propose.

Mr. SPROULE. During a previous discussion on this subsection, it appeared to me to be plain, but on looking over it since, I find that there is no such provision in it as the hon. Minister at that time intimated that it contained. There are three classes of persons who can designate where the polling stations shall be. First, the returning officer may establish them; second, there are a number designated in the Act; and, third, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may designate polling stations. This section of the Bill does not, in my judgment, provide for the establishment of polling places in the three different ways contemplated by the provincial Act. It only gives the returning officer the power to appoint the polling stations where the law provides he shall appoint them. The provision giving the Lieutenant-Governor in Council power to appoint them is not mentioned in this Bill, and I do not think there is any provision made for that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, there is no provision made for it. Section 3 of the Ontario Act, chap. 9, provides that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may from time to time add polling places to those named. We would require to amend the law so as to give the returning officer the power to do it. I will take a note of the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and will consider it when considering the section.

Mr. INGRAM. Under the Ontario Municipal Act, the municipal councils have the right to pass a resolution defining the polling subdivisions. In the cities of St. Thomas and Ottawa the municipal councils passed such a resolution, but the returning officers declined to recognize the polling subdivisions thus defined, although the people were compelled to pay for them. I would like to know whether the hon. Solicitor General confirms that power, and if we are to be as regards Dominion elections, in the same position in this respect as we are under the provincial laws.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand my hon. friend to say that in the province of Ontario it is necessary that the returning officers should accept the polling subdivisions made by the municipal authorities, and they decline to do so. Does he expect us to make a law here to provide that the returning officer shall comply with the law? I do not see how we can do that.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman recognize the authority or power of municipal councils to pass such a resolution?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, because we provide that the polling subdivisions shall be those established under the law of Ontario, and that law confers upon the municipal councils the power of defining the polling subdivisions.

Mr. INGRAM. Then, I wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that while the city councils of London and St. Thomas passed such a resolution, the boards of revisers in these cities declined to recognize it. I would like to know how it was, if the city councils have the power to fix the polling subdivisions the returning officers decline to recognize it?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We shall see that the returning officers carry out the law.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You can easily provide for that in section "a," where you take the power of providing your own board.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Subsection "a" will stand.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Before you reach section 6, I wish to move amendments, copies of which, I think, are in the possession of my hon. friends. But there is one amendment I propose first to move, which I have not had printed, but which has been prepared on the suggestion of my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). In New Brunswick, it is provided that certain non-resident voters, non-resident in an electoral district on the lists of which their names appear, shall have the right to vote at the shire town. No provision was made for that under our law, and therefore I introduce an amendment which will give effect to that provision of the New Brunswick law, and I make it general, so that if the same thing should happen in any other province, it will apply to that province as well.

The provision of the law in any province as to the places where non-resident electors shall vote, shall apply, "mutatis mutandis," in the county to such Dominion election, and the returning officer at such election shall have and be charged with the powers and duties of the sheriff or returning officer under these provisions.

Mr. HAGGART. Do I understand the hon. Solicitor General rightly that this only applies where non-residents have a right to vote under a provincial law?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I renew the question I have made, and ask the hon. Solicitor General what provision has been made to meet the case of the loss of these lists?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. As I said a moment ago, I do not see how we can deal with that until we reach section 6. When we do, I think I can point out a remedy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that the provision in the Ontario Act requiring residence, works very severely sometimes against voters. Is he prepared to offer any amendment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am afraid I cannot make a new list for the province of Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. I would suggest to the hon. Solicitor General the advisability of using plain English in drafting provisions of the law, because he does not know the class of returning officers he may have to deal with.

Mr. WALLACE. I called attention the other night to the fact that when a voter in Ontario changes residence from one electoral district to another, he loses his right to vote. Will the hon. gentleman tell us that he is going to continue that injustice? He should provide either that the voter shall remain on the list of his former residence or be put on the list where he becomes a resident. At present every elector who changes his residence from one electoral district to another is, during a large portion of the year, disfranchised.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend will see that it is out of the question for us to pretend to accept the local provincial franchises as the basis of our Act if we are going to interfere with them. The franchise of Ontario is substantially residential manhood suffrage. It therefore would be out of the question for us to attempt to interfere with that law by eliminating the element of residence.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend will see that there is a difference between the making of a law and remedying a lapsus in a law which we accept. He need not interfere with the law of Ontario as regards the question of residence. But the point I refer to is with regard to a man who has been put on the voters' list in one municipality and afterwards moves into an adjoining municipality, which happens to be in another riding. I have in my mind an instance of a man in the section of country from which I come, who is the owner of 600 or 700 acres of land, and in every way qualified, but who happened to move to a neighbouring municipality and a different riding. Consequently, although his name was on the list of the county of Haldimand, and he had fulfilled all the conditions as regards that constituency, when he moved into a neighbouring constituency he became disfranchised altogether. That was the point to which I wished to refer, and it would not be very difficult for the Solicitor General to make a provision which would enable a man to vote in a constituency from which he had moved.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a matter of such considerable importance that I could not, off-hand, accept the suggestion. I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Montague) to say that in Ontario, to have one's name put on the list residence is necessary, and a man may have qualified by way of residence so as to get on the list, but when he comes to vote he is met with an oath under which he is disqualified.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He must swear that he is a resident of the electoral division.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a point I cannot deal with now. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should allow this section to pass, as it does not affect his case, but it is designed exclusively to meet the case in New Brunswick that I spoke of. But I think the matter is of such importance that I am prepared to do this: Let my hon. friend give notice of his intention to move this amendment at a later stage—and I would draw his attention to the fact that this proposal of his applies simply to the oath, which need not be considered for a time—and that will give me time to consult with those I have to consult with before I can accept amendments of such importance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that the suggestion of the hon. Solicitor General is a good one, and I am glad to say that he has evidenced a fair spirit in regard to the matter. I have no doubt that what he desires is what we desire—that those who are on the list shall have an opportunity to vote. I will bring the matter up at a future time.

Mr. INGRAM. Hon. gentlemen lay great stress on the fact that a man may own five or six hundred acres of land, and because he moves from one constituency to another, he loses the right to vote. That would be important if we had a property qualification. But in Ontario we have abandoned that principle, and have in effect declared that because a man has five or six hundred acres of land that is no reason why he should be given a vote. Under our Manhood Franchise Act a man is given a vote because he has been a resident for a certain length of time, is 21 years of age, and a British subject. Whether right or wrong, that is the rule, and it will apply to a man who has no property just the same as a man who has.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So it will.

Mr. INGRAM. But it is proposed to introduce a clause which would entitle a man, even though he has moved away from the constituency, to vote in where his name is on the list. Now, there is no law on the statute-books but there are some hardships in connection with it. And if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) is speaking from a party standpoint, I can only say that the rule affects equally Conservatives and Reformers. So far as I am concerned, I say quite frankly that I am glad that non-residents have not the opportunity to vote under the provincial law. I think that this feature of the provincial law is a step in the right direction. We have been accused in days gone by, of bringing voters from the United States to Canada. That fact has been a bar to many a man becoming a candidate in the Dominion elections. I am ready to support the proposal to do away with a non-resident vote, as it will do away with difficulties with regard to protests, and so on, and make it easier to bring out the best men as candidates.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) misconstrues what I say with regard to the non-resident vote. I was not contending that property qualification gave a man any advantage under the law of Ontario, or that a non-resident of the riding should be put upon the list. I take it that the design of the present law of Ontario is to provide that every man in the province who fulfils the requirements of the law shall have a vote, but my contention was that where he has fulfilled these requirements and secured a place on the list he should not be disqualified, after the list has been perfected, by reason of the fact that he has moved to another part of the province. Under the present law of the province of Ontario, a man who thus removes would have no right to exercise any influence by vote in the affairs of the province.

Mr. INGRAM. It becomes a question of distance, then. If a man moved from one township to the next, that neighbouring township being in a different constituency, I can understand that there would be little disadvantage in allowing him to vote. But suppose a man living in one of the constituencies of Essex, after his name had been placed on the list, removes to the county of Prescott—would not the giving to him of the right to vote introduce the very system that has been so much complained of, that of bringing outside voters into the district? In order to clear ourselves of that altogether, I am in favour of the resident vote.

Mr. WALLACE. Why not have that man vote in the county of Prescott?

Mr. INGRAM. I am satisfied with that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The suggestion of my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) would be acceptable to me—that a man should have a vote in the county in which he lives.

Mr. McHUGH. I think that the provincial law of Ontario provides for the case that has been brought before the committee. If a man moves from one municipality into another at any time before the final court of revision is held by the judge—he can apply there and have his name put on the list. His name would thus appear on the list in two ridings, but he would vote in the one in which he resided.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If my hon. friend (Mr. McHugh) will permit me, he misconstrues the question I have suggested. He is dealing with the question of getting the name upon the list, but I dealt with the question of the citizen's right to vote after his name was put on the list, when he has removed to another constituency.

Mr. McHUGH. But if he has moved into another riding before the close of a final revision court, he can get his name on the list and he has the right to vote, and under the statute of Ontario, he can select the oath he is to take.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. McHugh) assumes that a man changes his place of residence before the list is finally revised and says he can then appeal to have his name put on the list. That is quite true. But that list is revised in the month of September, and notice will have to be given in the month of August. The list thus revised is the only list that can be used in an election until the next October or November, or, probably December. If a man changes his residence after the list is revised and an election comes on any time within about a year, he is not allowed to vote. That is the very difficulty we complain of, and it is not met by the suggestion of the hon. member for South Victoria.

Subsection "f" agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I wish to say now to my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that I accept his amendment, except that instead of using the word "designate," I would use the word "indicate," which is the word used in the Election Act. It would then read :

And the returning officer shall in all cases indicate such polling places and polling stations in the election proclamation.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I want to substitute 6 for 12, I do not think 6 is well placed in the Bill. I want to introduce here my clause providing for the disqualified voters. I think my hon. friends will have copies of the amendment that I now intend to introduce, and which provides for the qualification of all disqualified voters under the provincial election law. It reads in this way :

6. No person possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying from having his name on the list or from voting—

(i) the holder of any office, or

(ii) any person employed or having been employed or in receipt of wages or emolument in any capacity in the public service of Canada, or of the province, or

(iii) any person belonging to or engaged in any profession, calling, employment or occupation, or

(iv) any one belonging to any other class of persons who, although possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law, are by such law declared to be disqualified by reason of their belonging to such class. (Bill of 1894, cl. 4, sub-cl. 3.)

We must provide in some way for those persons not on the election list, because they are disqualified as above stated, should be able to vote, and here is the way I provide for them :

2. Any person possessed of the qualifications so generally required except that his name has been omitted from the list of voters, may, nevertheless, if not otherwise disqualified, vote at a Dominion election at the place where, but for such omission, he would have been entitled to vote under the first subsection of section 5, on his taking, or offering to take, before the deputy returning officer, or other officer or person in charge of the polling place, the following oath :—

"I, (A. B.), do swear that I am legally qualified to vote at this election (giving then the reasons), and that I verily believe that my name was omitted from the list of voters by reason of my being at the time such list was prepared.... and for no other reason." (45 Vic., chap. 3, sec. 5, subsec. 2.)

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The statement that he is "legally qualified," is that absolute? Does he state that he is legally qualified, or that he is qualified as a matter of fact?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He states that he is legally qualified. We are making a very exceptional provision here, and we have to be careful to provide against fraud. I have taken this affidavit from the statute of 1882. I do not think it is likely to lead to fraud, but there is a possibility of it, and I have endeavoured as far as possible to protect ourselves against that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Who are disqualified now?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would have to read over the franchises of all the provinces.

Mr. MONTAGUE. After this goes into effect?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is provided for in the next paragraph :

3. Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to repeal, or to affect otherwise than is provided by section 16 of this Act, the provisions of section 42 of the Dominion Elections Act as that section has been heretofore amended,—

That is to say, we are allowing the old Dominion law as to disqualifications to remain. I have to add something, however :

—or to repeal or affect the provisions of sections 96, 98 or 99 of said last mentioned Act, or of section 15 of chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1894, intituled "An Act to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes."

Now, here is my provision :

And provided that any person who at the time of an election is a prisoner in a jail or prison undergoing punishment for a criminal offence, or is a patient in a lunatic asylum, or is maintained in whole or in part as an inmate receiving charitable support or care in a municipal poor-house or house of industry, or is an inmate receiving charitable support or care in a charitable institution receiving aid from the government of the province under any statute in that behalf, shall be disqualified and incompetent to vote at an election.

Mr. QUINN. I would ask my hon. friend the Solicitor General if subsections 3 and 4 of the amendment are intended to cover the cases mentioned in section fourteen of the Quebec Election Act?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, I did that on the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. QUINN. Section 14 is very broad, and as subsections 3 and 4 do not go into particulars, I think it would be well to have an expression of opinion from the Solicitor General that the intention of the legislature is that they should cover all these cases.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I quite agree with the Solicitor General that we should hedge around the privilege which he has given of getting on to those who are left off the list, with every possible safeguard. But it appears to me that that oath as read by the Solicitor General, "I do swear that I am legally qualified to vote at this election," will be a very difficult oath for those to take who are not thoroughly acquainted with the law. You will find many persons who are very conscientious on the question, and who, while believing thoroughly that they have a right to be placed on the list, will not go up and take that straight, bald oath that they are qualified. There may be a doubt in their minds, they believe they have a right, and still the doubt might overbalance the belief. I think the Solicitor General will agree with me that there are many who will hesitate, notwithstanding their strong belief that they have a right to be on, to go and make that oath that they are qualified.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I admit that there is something in the criticism of the hon. gentleman, but bear in mind that this oath is to be administered to a special class of persons, to a class of persons, if I may be permitted to say so, of a rather high order of intellect, a class of persons above the ordinary level. This is intended to apply to persons who are disqualified under the provincial laws, therefore it is intended to be used by men who are able to appreciate the oath that they are going to take, who know something of their qualifications, or who are presumed to know something of the qualifications that they must possess to enable them to vote. I think there is some justification for the use of the word, for the reason I have just stated.

Mr. McDOUGALL. In regard to the class of men referred to by the Solicitor General, I might tell the hon. gentleman that some people would come under the disqualification clause in the Nova Scotia Act who were unable to read the Act or write their own names. How are they to know whether they are legally entitled to vote or not? They may believe they have the right to be qualified to vote, but they cannot swear they are legally entitled.

Mr. MONK. It seems to me this clause may lead to a great deal of abuse, at all events in the province of Quebec. I notice that the amendment of my hon. friend does not seem to bind the voter to take the oath which he is bound to take under the provincial law. We have under that law a very severe oath. The applicant is asked eight or ten questions, if necessary, before he is permitted to vote. Will this class of voters have a right to vote without being asked those questions; will they be submitted only to the form of this oath; or will they in addition have to answer the questions under the oath which every other voter may have to answer? That is not provided for by this amendment. It was stated that this oath is an addition to the other oath which they would be bound to take under the provincial law. There is something more. The section says, after designating the persons:

Any person possessed of the qualifications, as generally required, except that his name has been omitted from the list of voters, may, nevertheless, if not otherwise disqualified, vote at Dominion elections.

Is not that section so worded broad enough to give any person whose name has been omitted from the lists the right to vote on taking this oath by merely stating that his name has been omitted from the lists; and if that is the case, and it is the only interpretation I can give to the section, it leaves the door open to the greatest abuses; and, speaking for the province of Quebec, I can sympathize with hon. gentlemen from other provinces where there is no appeal to a judge, because in Quebec after the municipal officer has prepared the list and it has been examined with some formality by the municipal council, there is the right of appeal to a judge, and that is a safeguard which, under no circumstances, we would be prepared to dispense with. Here is a class of men who will claim, because of the mere fact that their names are not on the lists, the right to come into the polling booth and vote. I think the special class for whom by this enactment we are legislating, should claim the right to vote before polling day. There should be some machinery provided by which, on nomination day, they could claim the right to vote, and that claim might be investigated, because otherwise a large number of people will claim the right to vote without any opportunity being afforded to ascertain whether that right really exists. The other day when the Solicitor General had read the proposed section I asked him very politely to read it again. At that time he declined to do so. I understand now why he did not read it again, because it seems to me he will have to get a little nearer the blarney stone before he will be able to pass it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I thought I would do better than read it again, and I put in type.

Mr. MONK. I refer to the hon. gentleman's statement yesterday.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I quite appreciate the second reference to that matter.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thought this section referred only to people who were disqualified.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. When once qualified by tendering the oath, a man is in the same position as a voter on the list, and is subject to all oaths.

Mr. QUINN. I would suggest the insertion of the words "any such person." This would make the subsection refer particularly to those qualified by section 1. I think the intention of the Solicitor General is that subsection 2 should only apply to those qualified under subsections 1, 2, 3 and 4.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Quite so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would not the purpose intended be met by filling up the blanks left by the draughtsman?

Mr. MILLS. I refer the Solicitor General to the oath which he has followed in framing his amendment, and I wish to point out that it goes further than the oath embodied in the amendment. The oath in the Act of 1872 sets out the qualifications, and reads as follows:—

I. (A. B.). do swear that I am legally qualified to vote at this election, and I verily believe that my name was omitted from the list of electors by reason of my being an employee of the Dominion Government on the Intercolonial Railway at the time such list was last perfected, and for no other reason.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am unable to understand the necessity for all these different clauses. Why could we not simply say that every person who was not disqualified is entitled to vote. There is no connection between this sub-clause and the main section. What struck me was that if we are simply allowing the qualification to stand, we might provide in one section that every person qualified under the provincial law and not disqualified by our own law shall be entitled to vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Solicitor General wants to remove some of the provincial disqualifications.

Mr. McCARTHY. My proposition would remove all the disqualifications.

Mr. RUSSELL. The suggestion made by the learned gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) will, so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, still leave the disqualification of the Dominion officials.

Mr. McCARTHY. Why?

Mr. RUSSELL. Because they are disqualified by the provincial law.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman did not understand me. My point is that every person who has the necessary qualification under the provincial law and is not disqualified under our law shall be entitled to vote.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then, these persons are disqualified by the provincial law.

Mr. McCARTHY. We remove that disqualification by putting it in the negative.

Mr. RUSSELL. The amendment of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) would not remove it.

Mr. QUINN. I quite agree with the section as it is proposed by the Solicitor General. There must be one clause removing the disqualification under the provincial statute, and then there must be machinery for the purpose of affording to the person whose disqualification has been removed the right to vote. Under sections 13 and 14 of the Quebec statute, certain persons are disqualified, and I do not think the suggestion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would carry out our idea as fully as the amendment proposed by the Solicitor General. I, however, object to that portion of the amendment which provides machinery to permit these people to vote, because we are opening the door to the admission of a large number of persons who do not come under section 1, and who are disqualified for other reasons. We have machinery provided in the province of Quebec whereby an appeal lies to a judge under section 46 of the Quebec Act. That compels a person whose name has been stricken off by the authorities to appeal within fifteen days. But under this section of our Bill, after his appeal had been dismissed he would have the right to come to the polling booth and under section 6, he would simply be obliged to swear that he was legally qualified to entitle him to vote. Under this form of affidavit, he is not bound to swear to any particular reason why his name was not on the list, and so the amendment would not apply.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am afraid there has been some omission in those printed amendments which have been sent around, as is evident from the discussion. I would ask hon. gentlemen to follow the amendment, as I have it here, and see if it agrees with theirs. It says:

Any person possessed of the qualifications so generally required,—

That is the qualification on the provincial list.

—except that his name has been omitted on the list of voters by reason or on account of some such disqualifying provisions,—

Mr. QUINN. Those words are not in the amendment before us.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is where the whole trouble comes in.

—may nevertheless, if not otherwise disqualified, vote at a Dominion election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. That covers it.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the object of that long section 6? Why not make it this way:

Any person not disqualified under the provisions hereinafter contained, possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law, except that his name has been omitted from the list of voters, may nevertheless vote, &c.

Mr. MILLS. But some persons who are qualified to vote are left off the list by law.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is what I am providing for. If he is on the list there is no necessity for any provision and he may come up and vote. As the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) pointed out the other night, his name may be struck from the list because he is an officer. If you take section 5 and this together, you get the whole thing complete.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We reach the same conclusion as my hon. friend by adopting the words I suggest. But I am willing, if this clause goes through, that the matter should be considered on the third reading. It may be considered that I am a little slavish in following the Bill of 1894; but this provision, which is taken from it, I think meets the case:

No person possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying from having his name on the list or from voting, the holding of any office—

I think you will find that this is sufficiently ample to cover all the provincial disqualifications.

Mr. HAGGART. The Solicitor General the other evening spoke of making a provision for tendered ballots in the province of Ontario.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think I said that. I did not mean to say it. I do not think the system of tendered ballots is ideal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under this clause one of these disqualified persons may ask to take the oath, and insist upon voting simply by having taken this oath. Of course, it is the intention of the Solicitor General to compel him, if required, to take the ordinary oath required of any person; but you will find that the scrutineers at the polling booth will contend that under this Act it is sufficient if he takes this oath.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will undertake to make that clear.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In the second paragraph of subsection 3, I read that "any inmate receiving charitable support or care in a charitable institution receiving aid from the government of the province" shall be disqualified. I think that the words "other than a hospital" should be added, because hospitals are charitable institutions which receive aid from the local authorities. We have hospitals in our province which are considered charitable institutions and receive aid from the local authorities, and I think that the words "other than hospitals" might be inserted very properly.

Mr. McCARTHY.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The remedy or the difficulty suggested by my hon. friend would be to eliminate the words "or care." I am willing to accept this suggestion and strike out these words.

Mr. McCARTHY. Why not make it read "or as an inmate receiving charitable support in an institution receiving aid from the Government?"

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the suggestion a good one, and I move that the clause be amended so as to make that particular phrase in the section read "receiving charitable support in an institution receiving aid from the government of the province." The clause will then read:

And provided that any person who, at the time of an election, is a prisoner in a jail or prison, undergoing punishment for a criminal offence, or is a patient in a lunatic asylum, or is maintained in whole or in part as an inmate receiving charitable support or care in a municipal poor-house or house of industry, or is an inmate receiving charitable support in an institution receiving aid from the government of the province under any statute in that behalf, shall be disqualified and incompetent to vote at an election.

Mr. POWELL. How does the hon. gentleman propose to work this out? Will it not require an additional oath? An elector who is disqualified appears before a deputy returning officer or poll clerk and objection is taken to his vote, what particular form of oath will be put to him to cover this?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The first thing the clerk has to do is to tender the oath mentioned in this amendment.

Mr. POWELL. I am not referring to the first part, but to subsection 3, dealing with the poor-house man and the man whom a favourable change brings out of jail.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend will find that before we get through with this Act, we shall have to deal with a series of oaths of a most complicated character.

Mr. POWELL. Suppose a man is an inmate of an asylum, an objection is taken to his vote, you must have it made known in some way or other to the deputy returning officer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is an oath in the Ontario Act which meets the case exactly.

Mr. POWELL. There is no oath in the maritime provinces which meets any such case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the total number of votes?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will deal with that when we come to section 18.

Mr. BENNETT. I would point out to the Solicitor General that he does not provide for certain cases to be found in Ontario. There is not a poor-house in every county, but there are usually a number of people supported by the municipalities. If he is going to deprive a man of a vote because he is an inmate of a poor-house, why not do the same in the case of a man who is dependent upon the corporation?

Mr. POWELL. The point raised by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is well taken as far as the maritime provinces are concerned. I may say to the Solicitor General that in the maritime provinces a poor-house or house of industry is a very rare thing indeed. I do not think that, outside of the cities of St. John, Moncton and Fredericton, there is one in the whole province of New Brunswick. I would suggest that the word "pauper" should be used.

Section 6, as amended, agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Now I wish to introduce the New Brunswick amendment for congested districts. It is as follows:

Where a polling subdivision has more than 300 qualified voters, according to the voters' list, the returning officer shall provide separate and additional polling stations or rooms, according to the total number of qualified voters on the voters' list, near to one another for the polling of the votes in such polling division, and so that no more than 300, nor when practicable not less than 200, qualified voters' names shall be on the list for each polling station or room.

(2) The returning officer in such cases shall prepare, or cause to be prepared from the voters' list for the polling division a separate list for each polling station or room, made up in alphabetical order according to the initial letter of the surname of each voter. Each separate polling station or room shall be designated with the initial letters of the voters on the lists who are to vote in such station or room in the following manner, that is to say: from A to K, and from L to R, and from S to Z, or as the case may be.

(3) Every voter, the initial letter of whose name shall be included within the letters of the alphabet designating a polling station or room, and contained in such list shall vote in the station or room so designated. The returning officer shall appoint a deputy returning officer for each such station or room, and shall deliver to such deputy in due time a list certified by him to be a correct list of all voters on the voters' list whose surnames commence with the letters of the alphabet included within the letters by which such polling stations or rooms are designated.

Mr. POWELL. Did I understand correctly that there must be in a section not more than 350, and that a division must be made if there are more than 250?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The first proposal was that it should be 250, but at the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, I made it 300. According to the provincial law the maximum number of voters allowed for one ballot box, so to say, is 400.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Do I understand that for every 300 voters there will be a polling division?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We are adopting, I may explain, the polling subdivisions as they are in the provinces. Now, under the law of New Brunswick, it might happen that a polling division would contain 700 or 800 or even 900 voters. It would be, naturally, impossible for any such number of voters to poll their votes in one day. Therefore, we provide that where, in any polling subdivision, there are more than 300 voters, the returning officer shall divide the list of voters and shall provide a different polling station. That is as I have said, different ballot boxes, say in the same house or in houses close to one another. For each ballot box there will be not more than 300 voters, and the voters in the polling division will be divided into groups according to an alphabetical division of the list.

Mr. FOSTER. But the rooms or stations must be close together?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, that is provided.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The object in placing the polling rooms or stations close together is that a voter may not be misled as to where to go in order to poll his vote. In a country district, a man might drive a long distance, only to find that his name was, in point of fact, upon the list of another, and possibly distant station. If the stations are close together, it will be immaterial even though he goes to the wrong station, as he can reach the right one with very little inconvenience. Now, I wish to say a word or two with regard to a little matter of difference that arose between my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) and myself the other day. The hon. gentleman recurred to the subject two or three times, and did so with a good deal of zest, and a good deal of satisfaction because he thought I had fallen into error. I was much, I may say disappointed, surprised, that my hon. friend should have felt as he evidently did—so much pleased to think that he had caught me in an error. He referred to it, I think, if my memory serves me, no less than two or three times, and he drew the inference that because I was in error in one particular, as he assumed, I must necessarily be in error in another. I am sorry to have a matter of personal difference with my hon. friend; I would have been better pleased if he had followed the ordinary method of treating matters of this kind. I should not have thought it necessary to bring it up again if he had not seemed to attach such an immense amount of importance to the error which he attributed to me. The committee may remember my statement that I had a very clear recollection of having on one occasion accompanied a friend to a polling booth in a Dominion fight, I thought it was in St. John, and this friend, though living close neighbour to me, had found that he could not vote in that polling booth but he had to vote in another, the next polling station. In stating that, I was speaking from my own recollection at the moment, and I made the statement because it seemed to confirm an observation which was made by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to what the law was then with regard to elections. I am free to confess that so far as my statement of the particular place where the incident occurred, is concerned, I was in error. In thinking it over afterwards I recollected that it could not have been in St. John, because the only Dominion election at which I ever voted in St. John was the last Dominion election. But I did recollect that it was in the city of Fredericton, and for the purpose of satisfying my own mind on the subject, I telegraphed the sheriff of York county to ascertain whether there had been an alphabetical division of the voters' list in Fredericton in a Dominion contest, and I have his reply in my hands. It will be remembered that my hon. friend, at the same time, was particularly confident that the law which was passed in the provincial legislature in 1891 providing for an alphabetical subdivision of the voters' list, had never been in operation in that province; so at the same time I inquired of the sheriff as to whether it was a fact that the Act of 1891 had been acted upon, and whether an alphabetical subdivision of the voters' list had occurred anywhere in his county. The sheriff of York county replied to me in these terms:

The only alphabetical divisions in local elections, ninety-two and ninety-five, were in the two Fredericton districts,—

So that there was, according to his statement, an alphabetical division of the voters' list in the two elections of 1882 and 1895 for the local.

—each of which were divided into two lists in Dominion election, ninety-one.

Now that is the statement of the returning officer who had in his charge, and under his direction, the elections, both federal and provincial, for the years which I stated, 1892, 1895 and 1891 respectively. I presume that his knowledge upon the subject would be of some value, and I give it to the committee. I am sure my hon. friend will see at once that he was wrong in assuming that I was in error because he thought that the law did not authorize such an alphabetical subdivision of the list in Dominion elections. He will find that even though the law might not have authorized it, as a matter of fact,—and that is the only statement that I was positive about—there was such an alphabetical subdivision of the list in the Dominion election for 1891, as I thought, according to my recollection, there really was. Now in the same connection I telegraphed to the sheriff of the county of Westmoreland to know whether there had been any alphabetical subdivision of the local lists in that county, and I received the following reply from the sheriff of Westmoreland.

Mr. BLAIR.

Mr. POWELL. I told the hon. gentleman about that two or three weeks ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I said the hon. gentleman for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell) was not present in the committee at the time, or I should have appealed to him, and I so stated. I was quite sure that my hon. friend from Westmoreland would corroborate what I said if he had been present, because there must have been an alphabetical subdivision of the local lists in the year subsequent to 1891. My hon. friend from Kent will understand that I do not wish to attribute to him any intention of stating what he really did not believe. But he was in error, and I think my hon. friend will be hereafter a little less positive and confident in statements which he makes in direct contradiction to statements made by other members of the House who are positive in regard to them. Sheriff McQueen telegraphs me:

1892, districts number 8 and 9, Moncton, subdivided alphabetically.

I do not know that I quite understand what he says next in his despatch:

There was an additional polling district constituted by legislature 1895, Sackville number 16 should be subdivided.

The hon. member for Westmoreland will know whether that was subdivided or not. Now, so far as the question of law is concerned, I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) to an Act which passed this Parliament in 1891, and he will find on reading the sixth section of that Act, these words:

In cities and incorporated towns it shall not be necessary to subdivide polling districts or sections thereof by reason of the number of names of voters in such districts or sections exceeding 300, but in every such case the returning officer for the electoral district including such cities or towns shall make an alphabetical division of such names of voters, so that the number in each division may be as nearly as practicable the same, and may establish two polling booths in such districts or sections, and where the number exceeds 600, three polling booths, and so on in the same proportion.

That Act passed in 1891, on the 31st of July. I am not speaking from personal knowledge or from any recollection of the matter, and I may say that I had no particular interest or duty in making myself familiar with the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, as I had with the local Act, and therefore I am not speaking from any careful examination of the Act, or knowledge of its general provisions. But I do remember the circumstances which I stated to my hon. friend, and I have no doubt that the law, the sheriffs have interpreted the law as the sheriff of York county interpreted it, as entitling them to subdivide the districts alphabetically. At all events, as I have shown, the sheriff of York did so in this particular instance.

Mr. McINERNEY. If the Minister of Railways and Canals had simply risen for the purpose of setting himself right, I am sure nobody would be more inclined than myself to forgive him for taking the floor this afternoon. I always like to see an hon. gentleman endeavour to set himself right. But when the Minister of Railways and Canals departed from the endeavour to set himself right, to read me a lecture on my duties in this House and on my conduct in the future, I think he adopted a role that does not sit at all agreeably upon the hon. gentleman. I decline to take from the hon. gentleman any lesson as to what my conduct shall be in this House. I have called the attention of this House to the fact that the hon. gentleman is liable to forget. It was said of Charles I., the martyred King of England, when on the scaffold at Whitehall, that the one word he wished the people to recall after his death was "Remember." It may be said of the Minister of Railways that the one word which he will wish recalled after his death will be "Forget." The hon. gentleman has done very much that it would be convenient for the people to forget, and therefore I think he may be considered as occupying in this matter a position in contradiction to the martyred King of England. I have stated that the hon. gentleman has forgotten several things, and the hon. gentleman himself has admitted that he has forgotten several things. The hon. gentleman rose in this House, hon. members will remember the occasion perfectly, to corroborate a statement made by the Minister of Marine and a statement made by the member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). The hon. member for St. John is manly enough to admit that he himself was mistaken when he made that statement, but the Minister of Railways tries to get out by stating that the voting which he said took place in St. John did not take place there at all, but it happened in the city of Fredericton. The House will remember that hon. gentleman did not state that he voted at Fredericton under the action of the sheriff.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS. I might have stated so.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman did not state it. He may now endeavour to fill up the syncopy. I stated that under the law in the Statute-book in New Brunswick no sheriff or returning officer or revising officer has the power of cutting up the lists of voters in an electoral division or subdivision, and I adhere to that statement as strongly as I ever adhered to any statement in my life, because it is true and is the law. The hon. gentleman does not dispose of that statement by reading the Act of 1891. I knew the Act of 1891 was passed as well as the Act of 1897 in New Brunswick, but the hon. gentleman had no knowledge of the latter Act until it was pointed out to him the other day. The Solicitor General had no knowledge of its existence, and the Minister of Railways had no knowledge of it until it was pointed out the other evening. I could have entrapped the Minister of Railways on that occasion. I knew perfectly well from what he said in reply to the leader of the Opposition that he had no knowledge of the Act. I could have entrapped him by asking him regarding it, and afterwards producing the Act. I did not do so, for I do not believe in any such Cheap Jack trickery. I simply wished to call attention to the Act of 1897, I read the Act, and I did not take it for granted that the hon. Minister did not know it was on the Statute-book. But the Act of 1891, which gives power to the revising officer to divide the list, does not give him power to cut it alphabetically into three or four pieces. What is an alphabetical division? An alphabetical division is one according to the alphabet, from the first to its last letter. The local Act in New Brunswick in 1891 gave no sheriff the power to cut up the alphabet into pieces as regards the local elections. What does it say?

When the number of voters on the lists in any one subdistrict exceeds 400, it shall be lawful—
It is not absolutely necessary.

—to provide two booths for such subdistrict, dividing the registered lists alphabetically.

I claim under this clause the division is made in this way. The sheriff takes a certain number of names from A to Z and puts them at one poll and the balance at another poll. You can divide the list in that way but you cannot cut the alphabet in pieces so that A to M may be at one poll and M to Z at another poll.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not say that such was never done in New Brunswick, but, if done there, it was done against the law. The Act does not permit, when it speaks of an alphabetical division, that there should be a division, taking certain names from A to M, that is not dividing the list up alphabetically. An alphabetical division is not a division of the alphabet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS. Do you think you can get any other lawyer in the House to take your view?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes, and I think the hon. gentleman is the only member who would be prepared to maintain the proposition he put forward. I stated, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that in the county of Kent and in other counties there was no such division made by the officer under the local Act of 1891. I claim that is true. The hon. gentleman's Act of 1891 does not force the returning officer to divide up his district ; it only makes him able to do so. The Act is not mandatory but is simply enabling ; it leaves the power to have all the votes in one district polled at one place, or divide the list into several districts. The Solicitor General in his amendment makes it perfectly clear what his meaning is, because he states distinctly that the names shall be divided from A to K, and so on. But if he had stopped, as did the Minister of Railways when Attorney General of New Brunswick in the Act of 1891, and said there should be an alphabetical division, he would have left it in doubt as to what was intended by an alphabetical division ; and to my mind an alphabetical division is a division of the whole alphabet from A to Z.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman can see that would have no value, because under that system a man with the name of B would have to find out at which of the two booths he could poll his vote, whereas there would be no such necessity if the list was arranged from A to K.

Mr. McINERNEY. The two polls would be side by side ; they would probably be in the same building. A gentleman whose name began with M would come up to poll and it would be very easy to find out where he could vote. A division could be made in that way as well as in the other way ; so my hon. friend's question of fact falls to the ground. This is really a question of the construction of language, as to what an alphabetical division means. An alphabetical division means a division from A to Z in the alphabet, and a division of the alphabet means something else. An alphabetical division means the whole division of the alphabet from A to Z. I think that contention will be supported by the lawyers of the House, and therefore I maintain that any local officer in New Brunswick under the Act of 1891 who divided up the polls in the manner stated as a fact by the Minister of Railways divided it up contrary to the law. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything more. I had no great pleasure, and I state this sincerely, in seeing the Minister from my own province make mistakes. It is not a pleasurable sight to see the Minister from my own province make mistakes and be ignorant of the laws of the province whence he comes. It is rather a sad sight to me, and I suppose that in the future my conduct is to be determined by the lessons and lectures I am to receive from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), and that while that would indeed be a sad ordeal for me to undergo, I will be subjected in the future as I have been in the past, to the still sadder ordeal of seeing the great and mighty Minister from my own province fall into these errors which he is only too anxious that the House should forget.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to be sure from the Solicitor General that under this amendment the polling booths or stations shall be all near together. The amendment seems to be that the additional stations shall be together, but it does not say that the additional stations shall be close to the original ones. Perhaps the Minister of Railways could answer that, as he drafted the provision.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They must be all together. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) seems to get his doubt by carrying in his mind the idea that there was an original poll booth. There is not.

Mr. FOSTER. That makes it all right.

Mr. McINERNEY. It is necessary, I think, that the returning officer should state in his proclamation where these particular polls are at which the alphabetical names are to vote. Some such amendment as that moved by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to a previous clause might be introduced here, or that amendment might cover both cases.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will see if we cannot adopt some scheme to carry out the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney).

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman inform me what office this particular amendment has to perform in view of the Dominion Act of 1891 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The Dominion Act of 1891 would not be applicable under the existing circumstances. Under the local Act there may be as many as 400 voters on the list in a poll.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Under chapter 18 of the Dominion Act of 1891, which has been acted on in the city of Halifax, there is a provision for subdivision of polling districts where the number of voters exceed 300.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is limited to cities and towns.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Yes, but if you are going to deal with it here, why not strike it out of the Act of 1891, or deal with it altogether by an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act. Why should we have two sections, both of which cover to some extent the same ground ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to say that the Act of 1891 was acted on in Halifax, and that the lists were subdivided alphabetically ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is my recollection.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is to say, that the lists were made up from A to Z.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not know about that. I do not know as to the point in issue between my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) and my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney). I do say that this statute makes provision for the subdivision of polling districts in cities and corporated towns where the number of names of voters in such districts exceeds 300.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What Act does the hon. gentleman refer to?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Federal Franchise Act of 1891.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. But that Act is repealed or will be repealed when this Bill becomes law.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). In that case, of course, it is all right.

Mr. INGRAM. I understood the Solicitor General to say that he calculated that under this Bill the municipal divisions as passed by the municipal councils would be adhered to. Now, this Bill provides that where polling divisions have more than 300 votes they shall be subdivided alphabetically and I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) how he is going to determine the number of votes in these subdivisions that are divided by the municipal councils and which he intends to adhere to. I understand that the hon. gentleman is so framing this law that the returning officer will state in his proclamation what the polling subdivisions will be and where the polling booths would be located.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The polling divisions are arranged to be stated in the proclamation. I am asked to amend this section so that the amendment of my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) will apply to the subdivision. The intention is to put all the polling stations in a subdivision together. This does not refer to a polling division or subdivision at all.

Mr. INGRAM. In the administration of the provincial Act the returning officer and the board of registrars in cities and towns declare shortly after they are appointed how the city is divided into polling subdivisions. The returning officer declines to give information as to where the polling booths will be situated, until the day of nomination. I desire to avoid that state of affairs, for the reason that we Conservatives believe that our opponents, who are in power and have the inside information, will give their friends the tip beforehand as to where the polling booths will be situated.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are all in the proclamation. The election law provides that.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman has not considered the law of the province of Ontario, or he would not give that answer. In the cities and towns of Ontario the board of registrars meet, those who wish to have their names put on the registered list make their application, and after the appeals are settled, the registrars are in a position to complete the list. This list is not complete until a few days before election day, and how are you going to state, in a proclamation issued a month before, where the polling stations will be?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The proclamation refers to the polling division or subdivision, whichever may be the term used in the different provinces. There is but one polling place in any division, but there may be three or four polling stations, but they must be all together. That is the intention of this amendment. For instance, in New Brunswick there may be 900 votes in a polling subdivision, and all the returning officer is to do is to take the electoral list of that polling subdivision, and subdivide it alphabetically.

Mr. INGRAM. When?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. At any time up to the day of election. All the voters come to the same place to vote. They may vote in different boxes, in the same room, or in the same house, or in adjoining houses; but all the polling stations must be together.

Mr. INGRAM. I approve of having them all together, but the hon. gentleman does not see my point.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is right; I made a mistake. So far as Ontario is concerned, the election law of that province has nothing to do with us. The proclamation for the election is a proclamation issued under our election law, and it must state where the polling subdivisions are.

Mr. INGRAM. That is an impossibility, in the province of Ontario, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. You do not know how many voters there will be until the registration is complete, and the registration is not complete until a day or two before election day. So far as the polling booths are concerned, I am glad to know that the Government intend to have them together. Our cities and towns are divided into wards, and the people are accustomed to voting in those wards, but a great deal of confusion will be avoided by having several polling booths at one place. I would like the proclamation to state the boundary lines of each polling subdivision or ward, the number of stations in it, and at what station each voter is to poll his vote. If that is accomplished, I have no objection to offer; but so far as I can see, it is not accomplished by the present amendment.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The present amendment is to provide exclusively for a difficulty in New Brunswick.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The point taken by the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) is well taken. In the cities and towns, where registration takes place, that begins after the proclamation is issued, and it has the effect in many cases of adding thousands of names to the list. The point taken by my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Ingram) is this: How can you determine what shall be the boundaries of your polling subdivisions of a city, which cannot comprise more than a certain number of votes, when you are unable by thousands to know what is the total vote of the city, and the difficulty is that the revision of the lists by these boards of registration takes all the time almost up to the day of polling and men run up to the very verge of polling without knowing where they vote in the city unless some private information is given as regards the intention of the board to make a revision, which private information my hon. friend suggested might be given to the friends of the gentleman who appointed the board and not to the friends of the gentlemen who did not appoint it. It does not refer to this amendment which is suggested by the Solicitor General as to the subdivision of polling subdivision alphabetically, but does refer, and that is a serious matter, as regards Ontario, to those cities where registration is the order of the day, and is not completed in sufficient time to include in the proclamation any information as to the total number of voters, and consequently as to the polling divisions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). After all is said and done, the Election Act settles the point satisfactorily in the way my hon. friend wants. The proclamation is to be issued by the sheriff within eight days after the reception of the writ by him, and that proclamation shall fix four different things. First, the place and time fixed for the nomination of candidates; second, the day in which the poll for taking the votes of electors is to be held; third, the several polling stations fixed by him in the territorial limits to which they respectively apply.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is inconsistent with the amendment we are making as to the total vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all. He fixes the polling stations in a certain territorial division defined in his proclamation. In New Brunswick the thing works all right. In Ontario, as my hon. friend describes the method, when election day draws near, he finds that within the territorial limit which he has defined in his proclamation, instead of there being 250 there are 500 voters. Then he at once says, now at this polling station which I have fixed, I will have four ballot boxes in four rooms.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And he has to reprint the proclamation in order to give information to the electors.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not at all. The people are instructed by the proclamation to go to the several places fixed as polling stations. At any polling station, if there are more than 250 voters, the returning officer will place three ballot boxes, and the men vote at separate boxes.

Mr. HAGGART. Is there any provision for that?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is provided by the very section we are discussing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Solicitor General says no.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not hear him make any such statement.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no provision in the law to have three ballot boxes in the one poll.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is just what there is. It says that where there are more than a certain number of electors, it shall be the duty of the returning officer to give one or more polling stations or ballot boxes to enable them to vote.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman is wrong in this respect. He has not exactly caught the point I made in reply to the hon. Minister of Railways a few weeks ago, and in pursuance of which the Minister of Railways prepared this amendment, for it has come from him. It is not provided that there shall be two or more ballot boxes in the one polling station, but there is a provision for two or more polling stations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. At or near the place designated in the proclamation—the polling stations may be different rooms in the same house.

Mr. POWELL. The hon. gentleman is not going to get out of the hole quite so easily as that. The Act says:

When a polling division has more than 300 qualified voters according to the voters' list, the revising officer shall provide separate and additional polling stations.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Each room with a ballot box will be a polling station.

Mr. POWELL. No. Under the Election Act, each polling station must be defined in the proclamation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Call them polling booths.

Mr. POWELL. Where a statute uses a word it is stereotyped with that meaning, and you cannot go outside of it. The stations have to be named in the proclamation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If this were to read polling booth, would it meet your suggestion?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why did you not suggest that amendment?

Mr. POWELL. Whether there is little in the particular point made or not, there is certainly nothing in the explanation by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand the difficulty suggested by my hon. friend from Ontario. He says that in the cities and towns the electoral lists are not finally closed till within a day or two of the election.

Mr. INGRAM. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, seven days after the dissolution of the provincial government of Ontario, the registrars are called together for the purpose of registering the voters. There are four days allowed in the city of St. Thomas, four days and two days in other places in which those who wish to register can do so. There is a certain number of days afterwards allowed for bringing their appeals to the Court of Appeal, and on the 17th day of February, in St. Thomas, at all events, the court met to decide those appeals. After the appeals were decided, the election took place on the 1st of March. The hon. gentleman must remember that it takes a great many days to copy these names, and the difficulty the officers find is that the time is too short between the appeal and the election to have the names placed on the list and properly put in the divisions in which they vote. That is the difficulty we complain of under the Registration Act. There is no man in Toronto who understands the divisions in that city sufficiently well to locate those who are registered in their proper subdivision. There is no man who has that knowledge even in a small city say of 10,000 inhabitants. It is for that reason that I object to the Registration Act of Ontario being taken as part of the Dominion franchise. The Act is a crude one, and we have not had sufficient experience of it to so perfect it that this Government can make it a part of our franchise. I call the attention of the Solicitor General to this, because I believe he is just as eager to have a good franchise law that will satisfy all parties as any man in this House, and any suggestion I make is purely with the object of making the Act as simple and workable as possible for all parties concerned. Unless you can have your returning officer, when the proclamation is issued, in a position to tell exactly where the polling subdivisions are, where the polling booths or stations are, you are going to have confusion among the electorate of Ontario at least, and for that reason I want to see the thing properly cleared up now.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If I understand my hon. friend aright, the polling subdivisions in the city are not defined for a sufficient length of time in advance of the election to enable the voters to know where they should vote?

Mr. INGRAM. Under the Registration Act, they specify the polling subdivision. That is all right; but they do not specify where the polling booths or polling stations are to be.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) put the suggested amendment as he would like to have it in writing, so that I can see it?

Mr. INGRAM. I should be happy to do so, but I may explain now what I think will meet the case. I am sorry that I have not the returns of the last provincial election, as with them I could explain the matter better, being able to compare them with the returns for 1894 to show what the increase of the electorate of the province had been. But as a basis take the number of polling booths in the last provincial election, for instance, in the city of Ottawa. In this city in 1894, there were 53 polling subdivisions. The vote polled on that occasion numbered 6,841. Of these polling subdivisions there was only one at which as many as 200 votes were polled, the average being 129 votes. Now, if the city of Ottawa had been divided up in this way—take the vote cast in 1894, divide that by 300, you would get 23 divisions in the city of Ottawa. Then you would be in a position to say how many polling booths or stations there should be in Ottawa, and you would be able to issue your proclamation stating exactly where the polling stations are. That is the suggestion I have to make to the hon. gentleman.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee).

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The New Brunswick congested districts clause.

Mr. McDOUGALL. As I understand this amendment relating to the congested districts, it applies only to the province of New Brunswick. I explained a few nights ago in the House here that there is a large number of polling divisions in the different constituencies in Nova Scotia in which there are over 300 votes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It will apply to those.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understood the hon. Solicitor General to say that it would apply only to New Brunswick.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is in New Brunswick that the emergency arises, but this clause will apply anywhere.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that subsections 2, 3 and 4 are passed?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Of the old clause—yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose we will have the privilege of discussing this on the third reading, it will be printed by that time?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes. I may explain that there are a couple of amendments that it will be absolutely necessary to make in order to perfect the Bill. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) will have to present his amendment himself.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, with the hope of the House passing it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think I made my position perfectly clear to my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) before we rose at six o'clock.

On section 6 of the old Bill,

Mr. DAVIN. I have an amendment to propose to this clause, in the 4th line, that "forthwith" be changed to "within four days." "Forthwith" leaves it entirely at the option of the officer as to what time he will discharge the duties imposed upon him by this clause. I call the attention of the Solicitor General to the latter part of this clause, which seems to me to be ultra vires:

Every such officer who omits or refuses to furnish within a reasonable time any such voters' list or copy thereof, or extract therefrom, or any such copy of a by-law, or order, or proclamation or other document or proceeding demanded by the returning officer, shall incur a penalty of not exceeding $2,000 and not less than $200.

It seems to me this House has no power to impose a penalty on the officer of a province for not taking the course suggested here. Take an extreme case. Suppose that the head of the department in which the officer was, were to say to him: You tell these people politely to get out; what right have they to come here and ask you for our lists. What could be done? To the first part of the clause there could be no objection, I suppose there is no harm in any Parliament passing a clause providing that somebody may go to somebody else and ask him to give him certain documents he may have in his possession. But how we can enforce on the officers of a province a clause like this, I do not see. It is clear to me that the closing sentence is certainly ultra vires. These officers are servants of a province, and we have no authority to say to them that if they don't give up documents that belong to that province into the hands of one of our officers, they shall be fined. However, I only rose to propose that instead of "forthwith" we say "within four days," which makes it necessary that the officer shall act, at all events, within that time.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it would be better to keep the word "forthwith." Besides, I draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that this is simply a reproduction of section 13 of our Election Act now in force; you will find it in the Revised Statutes, which say:

The returning officer of each electoral district shall forthwith on receipt of the writ of election.

I think that the word forthwith is more elastic, and after giving it some consideration, I think my hon. friend will agree, perhaps, that it would be more prudent to use that word.

Mr. MONK. That is dealing with the returning officer under the old law, whereas we are dealing with federal laws. The lists are already printed, whereas here we are dealing with a provincial officer who has to prepare copies of the list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The person who applies "forthwith" is our officer.

Mr. MONK. He has to deal with a provincial officer. It strikes me it would be better to limit the time on that ground, because a provincial officer would have more work to do than a federal officer would have to do under the old Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend will see that the use of the word "forthwith" imposes an additional duty on the revising officer. He will have to act immediately, the very day he receives the proclamation.

Mr. MONK. He may take five or six days.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He may, but we assume that in the performance of his duty he will do it at once. I think it is more prudent, under all the circumstances, to use the word "forthwith," which may mean instantaneously, under certain conditions. The other subject my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) brought up, is one that has necessarily attracted the attention of those who were engaged in the preparation of this measure, that is to say, when we assume here to impose certain duties upon local officers, whether we have under the constitution the right to do that. It is a serious question, and I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to an extract from Clements on the Constitution, page 437:

It is, of course, open to the Dominion Parliament to utilize existing provincial machinery or to confer upon boards or bodies of provincial creation powers and authorities in relation to the enforcement of Dominion laws, but quoad the duties imposed by Dominion legislation the members of the municipal bodies or boards are not provincial officers.

Now I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to the existing electoral law. We have already, under somewhat similar conditions, utilized the provincial machinery under the Electoral Franchise Act. I refer to 48 Vic., chap. 40, section 15, of the Franchise Act. There it is provided :

The revising officer shall, as soon as possible after taking the oath of office, obtain a certified copy or copies of the list revised or final assessment roll or rolls, and also a certified copy or copies of the last revised list revised under the statutes of the province, relating to assessment and voters' list respectively, for elections to the provincial legislature, and it is provided that the registrar shall proceed as speedily as possible, with the aid thereof and of such other information as he can obtain, to ascertain and prepare a separate list.

Then section 16 provides :

The revising officer shall then forthwith cause to be printed a sufficient number of copies of the said lists, and post up in each municipal territorial division a copy of every such list, which shall be open to the inspection of any person in the office where it is deposited.

Then section 17 provides :

Every sheriff, warden, clerk of the peace and treasurer, parish court commissioner or other officer to whom two copies each of the said lists are to be mailed under this Act, shall forthwith, after receiving them, post up one of them in a conspicuous place in his office, where the said list shall remain until the day fixed, as hereinafter provided, for the preliminary revision thereof, and shall be open to inspection by any one.

Then section 62 provides :

Every officer or person who is by law the custodian of any assessment roll or list of voters, or of any other list or document, which, under the foregoing provisions of this Act, the revising officer is required to obtain and use for the purpose of preparing any list of voters or of any duplicate or duly certified copy thereof, shall furnish the same or a certified copy or copies thereof to the revising officer as by him required; and any such officer or person refusing or omitting to furnish the same to the revising officer within a reasonable time, upon being paid or tendered the cost of preparing the same according to the law in force in the province, shall, for each such refusal or omission, be held to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall be punishable accordingly.

You see that goes as far, and probably even further, than we do. It deals with municipal officials. It says that in the event of their refusing to supply documents called for by our own Electoral Franchise Act, they shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. Here we impose a penalty. I admit it does appear somewhat strange at first sight that we should have a right to impose duties, and penalties for their non-performance upon a body which is of purely local creation. But it appears to have been the system adopted up to the present time, though I have not been able to find any authority to bear out what would appear at first sight to be a somewhat serious contention.

Mr. CLANCY. Does this section contemplate any remuneration being paid to the municipal officers ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is another omission, but I intend to add the following words to section 26 that will give authority to refund the returning officer the necessary disbursements required under the provincial Act to obtain the lists.

Mr. CLANCY. Does that mean that the fees provided by the provincial statutes for similar work will be paid in this case ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. An amendment will be made to the second schedule of the Dominion Elections Act to the following effect : That the necessary disbursements shall be paid to the returning officers for copying documents and performing similar services as are rendered under the provincial law, and if there be no provision to cover the case, 10 cents per 100 words shall be allowed for copying and a fee of 50 cents to the custodian.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman made any provision for the delivery of copies to the candidates ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It would be very much easier for the officers of the Government to have copies made and delivered to the candidates than in the candidates having to apply to the officers.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. A suggestion has been made within the last few days by the Queen's Printer, and I think we may be able to utilize it in connection with these lists. It is one worthy of serious consideration, and I intend to consider it carefully, so that on the third reading I may perhaps be able to propose some measure which will enable us to have these lists, after their revision, sent to the Queen's Printer. He would keep the type for the lists standing. It would be possible in that way—I am supposing a hypothetical case—to have the list printed and sent to the members and candidates; and on each subsequent revision, after the lists have again been revised, they would be sent to the Queen's Printer. These additions and changes would be made to the lists standing, and thus they would be kept up to date. This suggestion will receive from the Government careful consideration, and I desire it to be clearly understood that these amendments and conception were made by the Government and not by me individually.

Mr. McALISTER. In that case I suppose the candidates, by applying to the Queen's Printer, would be able to get a copy of the lists ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be the idea. If we carry out that suggestion we will prepare a scheme some time ahead of the third reading, and submit it to hon. gentlemen opposite in order that they may consider it and suggest any necessary changes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Unless some scheme such as that suggested is adopted, I think measures should be taken to furnish candidates with copies of the lists. If we adopt the printing scheme, that will be so much the better.

Mr. McDUGALL. May I call the attention of the hon. Solicitor General to section 130 of the British North America Act. I should like to ask whether, under that section, Parliament had the power in 1885, when it passed the Franchise Act, from which the hon. gentleman quoted a few moments ago, to exact from the provincial officers information with a view to the preparation of the Dominion election lists; and whether with the adoption of that Act, the power to impose additional duties on the provincial authorities in this respect ceased, because this section reads:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all the officers of the different provinces having duties to discharge in relation to matters other than those committed exclusively to the provinces, shall be officers of Canada, and continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices under the same liability, responsibility and penalties as if the union had not been made.

I take it that this section gave the Dominion Parliament, in 1885, the power to exact the work, that is, to deliver copies of the lists and furnish information to officers appointed by the authority of this Parliament, from provincial officers; and that having been done, and the power and obligation of preparing lists for Dominion elections having been once taken out of the authority of the provincial legislatures, then the power of the Dominion Government or Parliament to exact those obligations on the part of the provincial officials does not rest with us now.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I appreciate what my hon. friend (Mr. McDougall) says. His contention is that this power given to the Parliament of Canada, when once exercised exhausts itself. I cannot agree with that proposition. I think that the power vested in the Parliament of Canada is one that can be exercised at any time. In a case decided before the Privy Council, as to how far the Dominion Parliament can impose duties on provincial courts, it was held that we had the right to impose upon them the duty of trying Dominion elections. That is the law.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) refers to Part 1 of the province of Ontario list being printed in the Bureau, but what about the other parts up to the days before the election?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That, of course, would be a difficulty. However, that list is made for the provincial elections and the Dominion elections are not as a rule run exactly at the same time. That list would be good for one year, and if at the expiration of that year a Dominion election was held we would of course have to make a new list for ourselves.

Mr. INGRAM. The Solicitor General will remember that the registration list is furnished by the clerk of the peace on the payment of certain fees. We had a provincial election on the 28th December, 1886, and a Dominion election on the 22nd February, 1887, and you will find the practice has been that when a local election takes place, almost all the lists that can be found are used for that election. After the general election is over and a by-election occurs, it is a very difficult thing to obtain a copy of these lists. The clerk of the peace having only a written copy of all the names registered, candidates would have to pay so much per name to get the list. When you propose to print Parts 1 and 3 in the Bureau, why not get the lists from the clerks of the peace, of those registered voters and have them printed also in the Bureau, and if a Dominion election takes place we could be furnished with them.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Quite so.

Mr. GILLIES. Has it positively been decided upon that the lists shall be printed in future?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No. I said that the Queen's Printer has made a suggestion to the Government that there is a way known to him by which we might at a very trifling cost have these lists made and accessible to the members. That suggestion is being considered.

Mr. GILLIES. Last evening I drew attention to the great facility offered for the perpetration of grave frauds under the franchise law of the province of Nova Scotia. When the local elections come on, the sheriffs who are the returning officers furnish the copies of the lists to the deputy returning officers; and my hon. friend will readily see the opportunities there are for committing frauds in the several copyings of the names. Since I spoke last evening information of a very complete character has been placed in my hands, as to the actual perpetration of such frauds. I will not trouble the committee by reading that statement here, but I will call on the Solicitor General at his office to-morrow and place the information in his possession. He occupies the high position of one of the chief legal advisers of the Crown, and I will leave it to him to judge if it is not time that this Parliament should prevent the possibility of frauds in this direction. The information I have is in the handwriting of a very responsible man, an ex-sheriff of the province of Nova Scotia.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is a penalty of $50 against a sheriff for any case in which he fails to have the names correctly copied.

Mr. GILLIES. I know that, but the law is practically inoperative

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Anybody can bring it into operation.

Mr. GILLIES. What is a penalty of $50 in a case of this kind ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is $50 for each name.

Mr. GILLIES. I know, but is it not better to prevent the possibility of a fraud being perpetrated ? Look at the difficulty of setting the machinery in motion. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) is big enough and broad enough to understand that what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and as there is no official in Nova Scotia to carry out the law it is practically a dead letter. An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure, and it is wise that in legislating here we should legislate to prevent the possibility of such a fraud occurring.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. You can make no law that does not require some one to carry it out, and any officer you put in the place of the sheriff is just as likely to commit fraud as he is.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is no machinery provided in this Bill by which any other person than the returning officer appointed by the Government can get the voters' list from the sheriff. Suppose I, as a candidate, go to the sheriff in my constituency and ask him for a copy of the list—

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Do not all candidates get the list ?

Mr. McDOUGALL. All candidates get the list in connection with the provincial elections. But I see nothing in this Bill to compel the sheriff to give us a copy of the list for the purposes of a Dominion election. If I understood the hon. Finance Minister aright, he said that the sheriff was liable to a penalty of $50 for every name left off the list.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My recollection is that the sheriff, in his capacity as an appeal court, is liable to a penalty of $200 for any case. But there is a second stage. In the mere copying of the list, from the time the sheriff undertakes to make a list and give it to the deputy returning officer there is a further penalty of $50 for each name he omits.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot see that the penalty is $50 for each name.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think that has anything to do with it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. However, my complaint is that we are entirely in the hands of the sheriff. An election may be sprung on us at any moment, and we are powerless to get a list on which to run an election or to canvass an elector until election day comes on ; and then there is no provision by which we can compel any officer appointed under the authority of this Parliament to give us a copy. We might perhaps secure a list by some indirect means ; but that would not be a list on which we could place any reliance. The more I study this matter, the more strongly I feel that we should oppose a measure that does not give us any better protection than we have in this Bill. At previous sittings of the House reference was made to the machinery by which sheriffs are appointed in the province of Nova Scotia. Now, I will give the House an authority with regard to the sheriffs and what confidence should be placed in them, which, I am sure, hon. members on the Treasury benches ought to accept. This authority was given at the time this measure for changing the law with regard to sheriffs was before the legislature of Nova Scotia. Last night I quoted the old law under which the judges had practically the appointment of sheriffs in that province. When that law was repealed, the law which was passed to take its place gave the power entirely to the Government. Now, anybody must admit that the judges of the Supreme Court were more competent to decide who was fit to be the sheriff of a county than the Government, who would necessarily have to act upon a nomination made by some party heeler. We had a gentleman in the local legislature at that time, who spoke thus :

When I first saw the reference to this Bill in the Governor's speech, the idea struck me that it simply consisted of some amendments to the law with respect to the duties of sheriffs. I, therefore, made up my mind that I would not the first time I addressed the House do so on a subject so unimportant. But when I now see a measure coming before the House involving the sweeping away the practice which the law and usage of the province have for generations sustained, I would be doing violence to the interests of that constituency which I have the honour to represent, and to my own feelings, were I not to address to the House a few observations with reference to this measure. One great point of objection which I observed in this measure is the insecurity of tenure of office which it must necessarily entail upon the position of sheriff in this province. It is all very well to say that those sheriffs will hold their office for life or during good behaviour. The trouble is that when an office depends for its bestowal upon political parties the question comes in what those political parties will call good behaviour. From what we heard yesterday it is evident that what one party would call excellent conduct the other would call very bad behaviour. The present Act, therefore, tends to remove that cool, unprejudiced judgment which should come in between those contesting parties and determine what was and what was not good conduct. In the existing statute, I must say, this was provided for, where the statute provided that the judges of the Supreme Court are to come in and determine what is and what is not good behaviour on the part of our sheriffs. It may be argued that the judges of our Supreme Court are appointed by the Dominion Government during good behaviour, but in their case it will be remembered that their tenure of office does not depend upon the whims of a political party at all. There is an appeal in their case to the House of Commons, and not only that, but to the Senate also. They must be dismissed by impeachment before the House of Commons, and this circumstance alone serves as their safeguard when their conduct is criticised by either party for political purposes. I will just cite a case which occurred in the House of Commons not long ago—the case of Vice-Chancellor Blake, a brother of the leader of the Opposition in the Dominion Parliament. It might be supposed that the leader of the Government would not have the greatest friendship for that gentleman, but when opposition was shown on account of political prejudice against Vice-Chancellor Blake, the leader of the Government declared that nothing could be done without an appeal to the House of Commons and also to the Senate of Canada. The upshot was that the learned judge retained his position until the Government of the country saw fit to elevate him to a higher sphere on account of the noble manner in which he discharged the duties of his office. Yet without the safeguard referred to, Vice-Chancellor Blake would have been removed from his office. This Bill, however, will place the sheriffs of Nova Scotia in such a position that one party will call it excellent behaviour for a sheriff to go all over his county canvassing for his favourite political candidate, while another party will call it very bad conduct. Hence there must be an unsafe tenure of the office of sheriff under the Bill now before the House. A certain hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr Longley), I believe, argued that this measure was akin to the granting of responsible government. When I heard this statement, I looked at the inanimate figure above his head and thought it would leap into life, and in those thunder tones with which these walls were once wont to resound, declare that there was no comparison whatever. Responsible government, Mr. Speaker, made all Her Majesty's subjects in Nova Scotia free to govern themselves. Instead of this freedom we shall have under this Bill eighteen absolute political slaves in this province. With regard to what hon. gentlemen around these benches have said as to the safety of a sheriff's tenure of office under this Bill, in the hands of the executive, I may say that we have in the county I represent one of the most honest and painstaking officers in the province, yet, though I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, I venture to predict that before a year passes over his head he will be superseded by a rank political partisan. So much for the Bill before the House and its results. I need scarcely add that I intend for these reasons to vote against this Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Who is that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Hon. gentlemen ask who it is. It is the present hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, that can't be possible.

Mr. McDOUGALL. That is the speech which the hon. gentleman made when the measure providing for the appointment of sheriffs in the province of Nova Scotia was under discussion.

Mr. McDOUGALL.

Mr. MILLS. Was he a Tory then?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Yes, and I am sure that both as Tory and a member of the provincial legislature, he spoke in his sober senses, because the temptations, I am sure, were very much less for him to be otherwise than they have been since he came to this Parliament.

Mr. McLENNAN. I am very glad I gave the hon. member for Cape Breton a chance to make a speech. I now desire to say that while this measure to which he refers was passing through the Nova Scotia legislature that impression did strike me and many other members, but when I found afterwards that the Government of Nova Scotia left these sheriffs in office, and did not, as I supposed they would, dismiss them and replace them by others, I changed my mind with regard to the policy of that Government. My predictions on that head were not verified. The Nova Scotia Government allowed these men to continue in office, the sheriff of Inverness among others is still in office to-day, as the hon. member for Cape Breton knows, and again I say that I am very glad that I furnished the hon. gentleman the opportunity to recite a passable speech.

Mr. DAVIN. I must recall the committee to the question I raised as to ultra vires. I suppose the Solicitor General contends that this Bill makes those provincial officers officials of the Dominion. He has not convinced me that it is best to leave the clause as it stands. I am quite satisfied that it would have been better to make the 13th section of chapter 8 read "the returning officer of each electoral division shall, within four days"—because that will prevent his allowing an unaccountable time to elapse. Suppose we had a corrupt returning officer, he might think that he could gain a party advantage by delaying the doing of what this clause requires him to do "forthwith," for seven or ten days. The amendment I suggest has been considered by several members of the Opposition, and we came to the conclusion that it would be better to fix a limit of four days than use the elastic word "forthwith."

Mr. BENNETT. I am sure that we on this side will be very much gratified by the assurance given by the Solicitor General that what we have contended for, and what I, in my humble way, contended for in the early hours of the other morning has at last reached his heart. I felt that when I pointed out to him the difficulties that would beset the unfortunate candidate, he would certainly relent. We are glad to know that he personally has relented; and no doubt his persuasive eloquence with the Government will result in our getting the final lists printed at the Printing Bureau here. According to the Auditor General's Report of 1895, it appears that when the lists were being corrected at the Printing Bureau the cost was very little. In some counties it was below $100, and in others it ran down as low as $40 and $50. As has been often stated here, the fact that the type is set up in galleys in the Printing Bureau makes the cost of the changes very slight. Hon. gentlemen on this side will heartily thank the Solicitor General for intervening with his colleagues and getting what we so much desire.

Mr. GILLIES. I suggested the other night that the lists might be tampered with after they were completed, and the hon. Minister of Finance pointed out that if the lists were tampered with while in the hands of the sheriff, the law made him liable to a penalty of $50. But the lists may be changed very materially after they have left his hands and are in the hands of any clerk or returning officer, and in such case there is no penalty provided. Supposing John Jones is a deputy returning officer in a certain district, and a certified copy of the list is handed to him by the sheriff, while it is in his hands fifty or one hundred names may be added to it, unknown to him, by a clerk or some person interested.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Did my hon. friend ever hear of such a case?

Mr. GILLIES. I am putting a possible case to show how easily the lists can be tampered with when they have left the sheriff, in which case the penalty imposed on the sheriff does not apply. If, however, the lists were printed, it would be practically impossible to tamper with them, because any names added would have to be added in writing, and the fraud would be at once apparent and no names could be struck out, I point this out to the Minister of Finance who, I am sure, is just as desirous as I am of having every gate through which fraud may creep in closed.

Mr. McDOUGALL. My attention was called a few days ago to the fact that in my own constituency, after the revisers had completed their work, and before the sheriff saw the list, a number of names were added. That was done after the revisers had separated and closed their list.

Section agreed to.

On subsection 9,

Where any provincial polling division, as constituted at the time of the receipt by the returning officer of the writ for an election, lies only partly within the electoral district for which such election is held, the part thereof within such electoral district shall, for the purpose of that election, form a separate polling division, or it may be attached by the returning officer to an adjoining polling division; and the returning officer shall as soon as possible after the receipt of the writ prepare a separate voters' list containing the names of the persons entitled to have their names placed on the list for such part of such polling division.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. On reading this clause, it strikes me that a false interpretation might be given as to the power we give a returning officer to prepare a separate voters' list containing the names of persons entitled to have their names placed on the lists for such separate polling divisions. After the word "prepare" I would insert the following:—"Prepare from the existing voters' lists separate voters' list containing." It is a pretty broad power, if he is authorized to prepare a new list altogether.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I accept that. I understand that my hon. friend (Mr. LaRivière) moves to amend the clause by adding after the word "prepare" in the 49th line, the words "from the existing voters' list."

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to ask the Solicitor General to inform us what is the meaning of this clause?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. For instance, the boundaries of the provincial—

Mr. MONTAGUE. I quite understand the boundaries of the provincial division do not conform with the boundaries of the Dominion division.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is not this giving pretty large powers into the hands of the returning officer? He has to select the names from the list, as I understand.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He takes the voters' lists as he finds them. He has a constituency, let us say, made up of portions of two provincial constituencies, and he must take the list of each constituency so far as they cover his own territory.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He has no right to select names?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No.

Amendment (Mr. LaRivière) agreed to.

Mr. McINERNEY. I had an amendment to this section prepared which I would mention to the Solicitor General, so that he may consider it. I would strike out the words "or it may be attached by the returning officer to the adjoining polling division." This would limit the power of the returning officer, but I do not think there would be any grievance resulting from it. In allowing the returning officer to add a part of a subdivision to another subdivision, you give him a power he might perhaps misuse. If these words were struck out, he would make this portion referred into a separate subdivision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. One containing, perhaps, half a dozen names.

Mr. McINERNEY. That may be. There are a number of subdivisions already in the Dominion where there are only ten or fifteen men. Even though such a case should arise here and there of sections of twenty or thirty names through striking out these words, it would restrain the returning officer from the use of powers which he might use to the detriment of one party or the other. Do not allow him to have any option, but tell him in the law what he shall do.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would allow the clause to go through. The amendment he proposes is one I should like to consider more carefully than I can think of doing just now. When we come to the third reading we can have the thing discussed very fully and, as far as I am concerned, with a clearer idea of what should be done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like thoroughly to understand just exactly what the returning officer is permitted or authorized to do in this case. Speaking, subject to correction, the returning officer finds that the boundaries of the divisions for the local are not the same as for the Dominion, and he has to take part of the list of two provincial divisions to make the list for his election. Part of the territory of two provincial polling divisions may be within one Dominion division.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In that case the returning officer must select the names for the second polling division on the provincial list—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would suggest that he use the word "take" instead of the word "select."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, but he must be affected by his own judgment in taking.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. He has no discretion to exercise. For instance, you may have a Dominion electoral division which would include a municipality from an adjoining provincial electoral division. In that case he would take the whole list of the municipality. Or it might include only a portion of the municipality containing perhaps one hundred or perhaps two hundred voters. Then in the exercise of his discretion, he would take that portion of the municipality and make a separate polling division within the limits of the polling constituency. Or it might happen that, instead of taking a portion of the municipality inhabited by one hundred or two hundred voters, he would have a portion inhabited by ten or twelve or half a dozen voters. In that case, instead of making that a separate polling division, he would add it to another polling division. As to the voters, he has no discretion to exercise at all. He takes the area and he takes the voters on the list for that area.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then the position is as I expected. The returning officer finds a portion of another polling subdivision the electors of which must be brought into one subdivision under the Dominion law, and added to that, or a new subdivision made.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The question is how is he to select these persons who are entitled to be taken from that municipality into this new division. I want to give my hon. friend an instance. In one constituency in Ontario during the last general election, a mistake was made as regards copying the list sent to the returning officer, and one whole page was left off. The proper custodian of that voters' list was applied to in order that the omission might be supplied, and, strange to say, when the missing sheet came, most of the names beginning with one letter were supplied, and those beginning with another letter, which names, I regret to say, were mainly the names of Tories, were not supplied.

That is what I fear here, that if the returning officer desired to be a partisan, he might select the names of those voters whom he desired to vote, from that portion of territory which goes into the new division, and he might leave off the names of those whom he did not desire to vote. That is a supposititious case, but I think it is worth providing against. I want to point out that the man who knows best about the place of residence of voters in that section of country, is the municipal clerk. He knows every man in the whole municipality. Instead of calling upon the returning officer to make up the list, as regards a piece of territory and as regards the residents, of whom he may know nothing at all personally, I think the Solicitor General ought to provide that the returning officer shall secure from the clerk of the municipality a list containing the names of persons entitled to have their names placed on the list for the part of such municipality in which they reside, and such list shall be the voters' list for that polling subdivision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would apply where the clerk of the municipality would be the custodian of the list.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The municipal clerk in our province has the voters' list and the assessment roll. How is the returning officer going to find out who belongs to that piece of territory and who does not? He finds the voters' list beginning at A and ending with Z, but he does not know whether a man named in A or Z belongs to that particular division of territory.

Mr. MONK. The latter part of section 7 has been altered. It says that the returning officer, after the receipt of the writ, shall prepare a separate voters' list containing the names of persons entitled to have their names placed on the list in such part of such polling division. Now, who are the parties so entitled? Take the case of two federal districts, a polling division being half in one and half in the other. Such returning officer will constitute himself a judge who is to say where the parties who are to vote in this mutilated polling division.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The law provides that the returning officer shall take from the list for that portion of both subdivisions or the new subdivisions, those voters who are qualified to vote in that division.

On section 8,

Where under the laws of a province the voters' lists for any provincial electoral district or division are prepared not at regular intervals, but at such times as are fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council or some other provincial local authority, or only from time to time for the purpose of a general or other election in immediate contemplation, the last preceding voters' lists so prepared shall be used for the purpose of any Dominion election in the territory comprised in such provincial electoral district or division, or any part thereof, if such lists have been prepared not more than one year before the date of the writ for such Dominion election; otherwise, new voters' lists shall be prepared, and for the purpose of preparing and giving effect to such voters' lists the Governor in Council may appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers, and in the preparation and revision and bringing into force of such new voters' lists the provisions of the laws of the province regulating the preparation and revision and bringing into force of the provincial voters' lists in such cases shall, as far as possible, be observed and followed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I intend to move that after the words "the voters' list for any provincial electoral district" the words "or any of them," be inserted; also after the word "thereof" the following words be added: "for use in the district in which they were prepared."

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Under the existing provisions of the law in Manitoba we are to have a voters' list prepared and revised only on the eve of a general election, that is every four years. I find in a summary of the law which appears at the end of the Bill, the following:—

By the Manitoba Election Act, R.S., chap. 49, it is provided (section 19) that lists of electors shall only be made and revised at such times as may be fixed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and for the purposes of general elections, and the provisions with respect to their preparation and revision are contained in the Election Act, sections 21 to 66, as amended by the Acts, chap. 12 of 1892 and chap. 9 of 1894.

By one of the sections of our law it is provided that in the preparation of the voters' list every elector to be entitled to be put on the list shall be a resident of and domiciled within the electoral division for at least three months before the date of the list, and he shall be domiciled within the limits of the province for at least a year. It will, therefore, strike hon. members that a revision made only a year after the date of a voters' list would deprive a large number of electors in our province of their right to vote, while under the provincial law a residence of three months within the limits of any electoral division entitles them to be put on the list. In our province where a large floating population exists, where the people before settling down are moving from one place to another, it would deprive quite a number of duly qualified electors from voting at a federal election if this revision was made only after the expiration of one year subsequent to the time when the voters' lists should have been prepared. I would, therefore, ask my hon. friend to shorten this period for Manitoba especially, and to make it coincide with the requirements of the local Act, that whenever a list shall be over three months old, then a revision shall be held, should an election take place. By doing that, we would have our Act conform with the local Act, and every elector who has been a resident during three months of any of our electoral districts, would be entitled, as in the case of a local election, to vote at our Dominion elections.

Mr. BENNETT. The clause now under the consideration of the committee from an Ontario point of view deserves a great deal of attention. Under the law of Ontario and under the revision of the voters' lists under the law of Ontario, it is hard to contemplate a case where a list more than a year old would exist, except in cities and towns where registration takes place only prior to a general election. I assume that is the case here contemplated by the Solicitor General.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, and in the unorganized districts.

Mr. BENNETT. The clause should be amended somewhat after this fashion. It has been stated that these revisions can only be referrible to cities, and country towns. It must of necessity follow that if the local legislatures change their system of registration so as to include every town and village, then we would have no guarantee that the municipal lists on which the voters' lists were prepared would not be compiled by gentlemen appointed by the Government, and who are friendly to them. Take, for example, the instance quoted to-day, the town of Niagara, a majority of the board in which was composed of appointees of the local government, namely, the license commissioners and the division court clerks. What would be the upshot? If the Act goes into force with this clause in it, the local legislature would have the power next session to say that the provision respecting registration should be extended not only to cities and county towns but also to villages and municipalities, or townships, as we term them. The result would be that while to-day we have the safeguard of municipal officers furnishing the voters' lists, it would be swept away when the compilation of the lists was left exclusively to partisan officers appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sure the Solicitor General will see that if we are to accept the voters' lists as they stand to-day in Ontario, this clause should be amended so as to read that this principle of revision shall only be referable to cities and county towns.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to chapter 9 of the Ontario Election Act, section 83, which provides as follows:—

In any municipality in the electoral districts of Algoma East, Algoma West, East Victoria, North Hastings, North Renfrew, South Renfrew, Muskoka, Nipissing and Parry Sound, where there is an assessment roll, but for which no voters' lists containing the names of the voters in the municipality have been filed with the clerk of the peace, or certified by the county judge, the returning officer shall, upon receipt of the writ, deliver to the clerk of the municipality a blank poll-book.

I want to meet that case, and I do not think it would come within the scope of the hon. gentleman's amendment. I do not wish to promise in every case that amendments will be made before the third reading; but I shall have to deal with that difficulty, and I do not think the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman will meet it.

Mr. BENNETT. It is in the power of the local government, as has been demonstrated, to have the revision made in cities and county towns, and that is the principle prevailing to-day. It has been a matter of complaint with the party in our province, we being in Opposition, that the board has been drawn by the Government from its own friends, and thus we have always been placed at a disadvantage. The local government by their legislation made these boards, and there is no power to prevent the local government saying: We find that the system of registration in cities and county towns has worked so well that we will extend it to all towns and all incorporated villages? If that were done there would be no yearly revision in these places, and there would be only the registration prior to the general elections. The Solicitor General and the Government here cannot insure that the local legislature will not amend the law in this respect. Then, all over the province of Ontario we will find ourselves confronted with partisan or friendly boards of revisers, and consequently this is a most objectionable provision of the Bill.

Mr. BENNETT.

Mr. MONK. There is another danger which might materialize in the province of Quebec, and that is that the legislature might completely repeal the electoral law, so that in the province of Quebec we would find ourselves under the operation of the latter part of this section. When I first read the section it occurred to me that as the lists were revised every year in our province, we were sufficiently protected, but suppose the province of Quebec, without taking any measures detrimental to any political party, were simply to repeal the electoral law, then it would happen that on the eve of a general election officers would be named by the Federal Government, and without their being any control on their operations, they would prepare the lists for the whole province. That is the reason why at an earlier stage of the Bill I suggested the advisability of fixing the period considerably before any general election when a change in the provincial law would not affect us; I suggested a year. I submit to the Solicitor General the propriety of taking that view into consideration before the third reading of the Bill. The danger I have pointed out is one that we should guard against.

Mr. McINERNEY. I apprehend that the Solicitor General holds the view that in any province where the law says there shall be a yearly revision, this clause will not operate at all.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Where there is a yearly revision it could not operate.

Mr. McINERNEY. I expected that would be the view of the Solicitor General. It would not operate in such a case?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think so.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then, even though the officer neglected his duty and did not prepare a list, this clause would not operate.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the Solicitor General as to the effect of the adoption of this clause in municipalities like Toronto, where there are several electoral divisions for the election of members to the legislative assembly. We have registration in the city of Toronto immediately before the provincial election is held, and as I read the clause it provides that if that list is not more than twelve months old it shall be used. If a list twelve months old is used, there will be hundreds, if not thousands, of manhood voters disqualified in municipalities like Toronto, unless provision is made that when their names appear on the provincial list they shall be entitled to vote in the division in which they lived at the time of registration. Under the Bill as it stands, if they move from one division of the city of Toronto to another, even though it may be only across the street, they will be disqualified. That would prevent hundreds, if not thousands, of those who are entitled to vote under the provincial law from voting at a federal election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a matter of very considerable importance. Of course, all this would place very considerable expense on the country, but I would be prepared to accept a suggestion that we make it six months instead of one year.

Mr. CLARKE. That is a very valuable concession. Now, under the provincial law when one of these manhood franchise voters appears at the poll he may be challenged, and he must take the oath that he has resided for three months in the division, and so if he has moved out of the division in which he was registered, he will be disqualified after three months.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not think I can provide for every case, but if I make it six months I will be going very far in meeting the wishes of my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke).

Mr. BENNETT. As a rule, the voters' lists are finally revised in the Ontario municipalities by about the 15th of November, and if a general election happens to come on seven months after that, then the whole Dominion would be plunged into the cost of a revision.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot see it otherwise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This clause applies exclusively to the case of the manhood suffrage voters and to the unorganized districts in Ontario. It applies exclusively to these cases in Ontario and Manitoba as well, where they have got no revision at fixed intervals. The ordinary revision in Ontario is every twelve months with the exception of the manhood suffrage voters and in the unorganized districts.

Mr. QUINN. How does the Solicitor General think this clause will operate in connection with 60 Vic., chap. 21, section 1 of the statutes of Quebec, which makes special provision for the city of Montreal, and which says:

At the same time as they make the list of municipal electors in the city of Montreal, in 1898, and thereafter every second year, at the same time the assessors, appointed in accordance with the charter of the said city, shall make in duplicate an alphabetical list of the persons in that city qualified to vote at an election of a member of the legislative assembly in the terms of articles 9 and following of the Quebec Election Act, 1895.

This is a special amendment of the Quebec Election Act having reference to the city of Montreal. I would like to ask the Solicitor General if under this we do not run one chance in four of taking the provincial lists, because there are only two lists prepared in four years.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There is no reason why in Montreal you should vote on lists two years old any more than anywhere else.

Mr. QUINN. If that is the case, I object to this provision, inasmuch as it provides for the appointment of officers who would no doubt be partisan officers. That is where the evil of it is. If my hon. friend will frame it in such a way as to provide that the lists shall be prepared by the same officers who prepared the original lists, it will be all right.

Mr. McINERNEY. If the hon. Solicitor General accedes to the request which some of my hon. friends have made to him, a very dangerous element will be imported into this section. It now provides that where a list is not more than a year old, it shall be used. Some of my hon. friends have asked that the time be shortened; but if that were done it would give power to the Governor in Council to appoint their own officers to make a list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am perfectly satisfied with the section as it is, but I thought it would be fair to meet the difficulty suggested by the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. CLARKE. With all due deference to what the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) has said, I can state that a great outrage will be committed upon hundreds of manhood franchise voters in the city of Toronto and in other cities of Ontario if the time is not shortened, for they would be disfranchised.

Mr. McINERNEY. I admit the difficulty which my hon. friend from Toronto has pointed out. I admit that it is a defect in the law: but there are two evils here, and you have to choose between the evil of a list a year old and the evil of allowing the Governor in Council to appoint all necessary officers and confer upon them all necessary powers to prepare and revise and bring into force an electoral list. Which is the greater evil, and which of the two evils would you choose? If I were making a choice, I would sooner take a fixed list which I knew than allow officials whom I did not know to make up a list for me.

Mr. INGRAM. A very important question has been raised with reference to registration in the city of Toronto. The provincial election was held on the 1st of March. In Ontario we have a revision of the voters' list once every year, with the exception of the registration list. That applies to the city of Toronto. There will not be another registration under the local Act until the next dissolution of the local legislature, and I would like to know if the hon. member for West Toronto would like to go through the registration every year in the city of Toronto? If he would, I am sure he desires more than people in other cities of the province. But he wants it every six months.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. All that this provides is that if you have a federal election more than six months after the local election, you will have a new list so as to enable manhood suffrage voters to get on the list. We do not provide for an annual revision; we only provide for a revision in the case of an election.

Mr. BENNETT. Do I understand the Solicitor General to say that he is willing, when the Bill comes up for the third reading, to amend this clause so that this principle of registration shall be applicable only as at present to cities and incorporated towns.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot make such an important concession as that without consulting the members of the Government. I quite understand the force of the hon. gentleman's objection. I understand that in Ontario there are a certain number of electoral districts in which the lists are prepared by officials appointed specially for that purpose by the provincial government, and what my hon. friend desires is that the federal Government shall restrict its right to name its own officials to make the lists, to the cases now in existence under the law of Ontario, and not extend it to future cases that may arise.

Mr. BENNETT. That is, if the local government should intervene and undertake to make the principle of registration applicable to villages and all towns, this would not apply.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. To carry out that idea, I would suggest that my hon. friend move on the third reading, that after the words "division are" in the second line, we insert the word "now," so that it will read, "where under the laws of a province the voters' lists for any provincial electoral district or division are now prepared." I only ask time to submit that to the Government.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. member for West Toronto pointed out the difficulty of having a list a year old. My hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) pointed out the other difficulty of the Government taking power to appoint their own officers and entirely new machinery. I would suggest that that clause should be changed, and the machinery now in force in the cities adopted, namely, county court judges and such officers as now exist in the province of Ontario, rather than place the power in the hands of the Government to appoint their own officers.

Mr. INGRAM.

Mr. CLARKE. I understood the Solicitor General to say that he would agree to six months being substituted for one year.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman moves that, I will accept it.

Mr. SPROULE. Am I correct in understanding that this shall apply to the unorganized districts as well as towns and villages?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 83 of the Ontario Act settles that.

Mr. CLARKE moved that the words in the 9th line "one year" be struck out, and the words "six months" be inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. MONTAGUE. As there seems to be some doubt, I would ask my hon. friend if he intended this to apply only to those unorganized districts and the cities and towns where the registration system is in force?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There cannot be any question about that.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then in every case in Ontario, where registration could possibly apply, if the list is over six months old, the Government can put this new machinery into effect and appoint new officers?

Mr. BRITTON. It applies to every place where registration is in force, but registration is in force only in cities and towns. We have got besides the regular list that is revised every year and is not altered at all. This only applies to voters who come under the Registration Act.

Mr. McINERNEY. Registration only takes place before an election, and, therefore, in a province in which there is registration, the law does not call for an annual revision of the lists under the Registration Act. In that case, if a list is six months old, the Government could appoint officers to make a revision of the lists in these districts to which the Registration Act applies. This section will apply to every place in Ontario where there is registration.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The Ontario people are satisfied with it.

Mr. INGRAM. The Ontario leader of the Government and the Ontario leader of the Opposition, have it in their power to say that they shall go on with a revision of the lists even if it is a year or more than a year old.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. BENNETT. Why not add those words "not annually but at regular intervals"?

Mr. McINERNEY. I want to try and emphasize the view I take, and it is this. Suppose that in a district in Ontario in which registration is in force, the last registration should be six months and one day old, when a Dominion election is held, then this Government, immediately before the election, sets its own officers at work, appointed by the Governor in Council, to make up a list for that district. Are the members from the province of Ontario, where registration is in force, willing to adopt that system?

Mr. CLARKE. Speaking for myself, I frankly say that I believe that before every Dominion election we should have a general registration of all those who are entitled to vote. We have in many of the provinces manhood franchise. It might be a hardship in some case for persons to have to register thirty or sixty days before a Dominion election, but what the House desires is some solution that will enable every elector who has the right to vote to exercise that right in an election. The difficulty in Ontario has been that those who have resided in their respective electoral divisions for years, when they went to the polls, found that their names, for some reason they could not understand, were not on the list. It would be an inconvenience to many to register their names in order that they might vote at a Dominion election, but they would be only subject to that inconvenience every four or five years, and no one who has the interests of his country at heart will object to that. So far as this amendment is concerned, my only object is to have as late and as clean and as full a list as possible, and having a knowledge of what I am speaking about, I must say that if we are compelled to vote upon manhood suffrage in Toronto—and the same argument applies to other cities—on a list that is twelve months old, hundreds, if not thousands, of men just as well qualified to form an opinion as their seniors will be unjustly discriminated against. That is not the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite, as I understand it, and is certainly not the wish of this House. I repeat that if the list is twelve months old, in view of the position of affairs in Toronto, thousands will be disqualified. The amendment is in the right direction, and I am prepared to accept what the hon. Solicitor General has agreed to, namely, that where a list is more than six months old, a new registration will take place.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand that.

Mr. CLARKE. I am perfectly satisfied if the opportunity is fairly and honestly given to those who are entitled to vote as manhood franchise voters, within thirty or sixty days of the Dominion election. But it will be an injustice to the manhood suffrage voters of Toronto if the amendment I have suggested is not agreed to. If all those who are on the manhood franchise list are entitled to vote in the division in which they are registered, I will be prepared to accept that. But, even then, in a growing city like Toronto, where many changes are made from week to week and from month to month in the residence of manhood suffrage voters, many will be disfranchised. If we want a clean list and a late list, a list containing the name of every man who is entitled to vote, we should get a registration by this Act otherwise provided for as near the election as it is possible to have it.

Mr. INGRAM. I am opposed to the reduction of the time from twelve to six months. I do not believe in giving manhood suffrage voters under the Registration Act any unfair advantage over those whose names appear on Part 1 and Part 3 of the voters' list. Suppose this Government dissolves in October and the election takes place about the first or the middle of November. What kind of list have you? So far as Part 1 and Part 3 of the list under the law of the province of Ontario is concerned, it is the list that was revised one year previous, and you cannot secure a list which has been revised less than a year previous. Imagine the registration list being completed six months and a day before the election. We should then be compelled to have a new registration in our cities and our county towns. It would put the country and us to an enormous expense in order to prepare the registration, while the list of those which would qualify as owners, as tenants, and income voters is one prepared a year previous. That would be an undue advantage given to the registration voters, and I think they should not have any advantage over these others in the regular voters' list.

Mr. SPROULE. If an amendment could be drafted to have those within the city limits vote where their names appear on the old lists, I think it would be desirable.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am going to make an appeal to my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) to ask him, in order to avoid discussion, to move this amendment on the third reading, so that we may have full time to discuss it.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. In that case, I suppose I am put off to the third reading also. I was asking for three months for Manitoba.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he has thought of making any provision in the case of manhood suffrage voters put upon the voters' lists through the medium of the Assessment Act. They require, of course, to have the qualification of a year's residence and also to be a resident of the locality from the time of making the roll up to the time of their being put upon the list. That, as I endeavoured to point out on a former occasion, does not come under the Ontario Election Act applying to registration voters.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The question the hon. gentleman suggests is one of residence. It comes to that, so far as the manhood suffrage is concerned. That is the difficulty, I do not think that it is a matter that we can consider in connection with the present clause. I am pleased to say to my hon. friend that I have considered the matter as carefully as I could, and I do not see any scheme that would meet the difficulty he suggests. I admit that it is a difficulty, and if my hon. friend would suggest some way or propose some amendment which he thinks would meet the difficulty, I should be glad to consider it. But I can hold out no hope that, with the consideration I have given it, it is possible for me to meet the difficulty he has pointed out.

Amendment (Mr. Clarke) withdrawn.

Section 10, as amended, agreed to.

On section 11,

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is only to adapt the election law to the franchise law?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, this and the other clauses are only for that purpose.

Section 11 agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13,

Mr. MONTAGUE. That removes the disqualification from revising barristers?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 14,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would ask here that section 6—that is, section 6 of the original Bill—should be inserted here in amendment of section 12 of the original Bill. I think that for the appearance of the Bill it would read better.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the section we considered before?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. That will be instead of section 14?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Section 14 is carried.

Section 15 agreed to.

On section 16,

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he cannot provide for giving the returning officer and candidates in elections printed lists.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is a point that we discussed in the earlier part of the sitting, it was discussed in connection with the suggestion made by the Queen's Printer that the list should be sent to him after each annual revision, and be printed by him. That suggestion has not been considered by the Government, and

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

I have not authority to say that we will be able to accept it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understand that is the rule that the hon. member wants to carry out after the first list is prepared. But we want that to apply in the first instance to the first list that is prepared by the province, and that is in possession of the sheriff.

Mr. McINERNEY. Would you put in the word "certified" before copy.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Section 30 says:

The right of appeal being granted, the returning officer shall furnish to each deputy returning officer copies of the list of voters.

Mr. McINERNEY. He can certify the copy of the list that is in his hands, that he has obtained himself from the county clerk or secretary. In the old Act it was a printed copy, and therefore it was all right. But here you have a printed list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You will notice it is exactly the same as in the old Act. In the Dominion Elections Act the returning officer furnishes each deputy with a copy.

Mr. McINERNEY. But in that case the list was a printed list and therefore there could not be any trouble about it. But in this case there is a written list, and therefore there is a necessity for its being certified.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would suggest to the Solicitor General the propriety of adding to this section, at the third reading of the Bill, the following words:—

In any province where voters' lists are not now printed under the authority of the provincial legislature, the officer having possession of such voters' lists shall be required to deliver to the returning officer and to the candidates in an election under this Act, a printed copy of the voters' lists.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We are getting along very well without that now.

On section 17, now 19,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will have to make an amendment to meet the conditions in New Brunswick. In the 48th line insert after the word "if" the following:—

In any polling division where, by the provincial law, no such list of voters is required, and if in any polling division where by the provincial law no list of voters is required or provided the same are found—

Then, on the next page, first line, instead of the word "he," insert:

Or if there be no voters' list, such elector is found entitled to vote.

Mr. McALISTER. This section is not applicable to the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. POWELL. It prevents every man in the whole province of New Brunswick from voting. Nothing could show clearer the utter absurdity of this Franchise Act and of the principle that is adopted, than that an able man like the Solicitor General, with the whole Department of Justice at his back, has actually disfranchised the whole province of New Brunswick. I make that assertion as a lawyer, there is no man in the whole province of New Brunswick can vote.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. My hon. friend must remember that in New Brunswick the Dominion Ballot Act applies.

Mr. POWELL. The ballot does not apply :

Not more than one elector for each compartment shall at any one time enter the room where the poll is held, and each elector, upon so entering, shall declare his name and surname and condition, which shall be entered or recorded by the poll clerk in the poll-book provided for that purpose.

That is the condition on which he can vote. First, his surname; second, his Christian name, and, thirdly, his condition. That only applies to those officials who, under the laws of certain provinces, are disqualified and are rehabilitated with the Dominion franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Surely they will be entitled to vote when they give their names and surnames.

Mr. POWELL. I am showing what the difficulties are before us.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps you can suggest an amendment.

Mr. INGRAM. In the old Act respecting elections to the House of Commons, section 45, I find the same language as is used in this section. Is there any difference as regards New Brunswick?

Mr. POWELL. The old Act, based on the Franchise Act, requires the man's condition to be stated on the voters' list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I understand the hon. gentleman to contend that if a man's name and surname appear on the roll, but his condition is not stated, he would not be able to vote.

Mr. POWELL. Not under that section.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I do not agree with the hon. member.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like an explanation in regard to the last section passed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The first part of the section provides if an elector's name is on the list he may get a ballot. The amendment goes on to provide that if by any provincial law his name does not appear on the list, he may still be entitled to vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then this is not a clause operative throughout the Dominion?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The first part is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under it the voter is entitled to get a ballot under certain conditions. The first condition is that his name is on the list.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, the alternative condition is that in provinces where no list is required, he may still be entitled to vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then how is a person disqualified under a provincial statute going to get his ballot? Under the clause as amended we desire to remove the disqualification imposed by a provincial statute by giving him an opportunity of taking an oath, but the revising officer has no power under this section as amended to give him a ballot.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Such an elector comes in under the clause which enables him to vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This conflicts with the following:—

Each elector on entering shall declare his name and surname, and if for some reason his name does not appear on the list of voters for the polling district of such polling station, he shall receive from the deputy returning officer a ballot.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The difficulty has arisen in regard to Prince Edward Island, and some words will have to be inserted to meet it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We shall have to prepare a clause in regard to Prince Edward Island. I will undertake to prepare one.

Mr. BENNETT. If it is not shown that section 20 will only be applicable to Prince Edward Island what may happen is that a deputy returning officer may catechise a man presenting himself to vote. If he answers the question satisfactorily, there can be no reason why he should not give the man a ballot, although his name may not be on the list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I draw my hon. friend's attention to this, that the elector may be entitled to vote if there is no voters' list. I want to amend this so as to make it absolutely clear that the disfranchised voter will not have any trouble.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is right.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think, perhaps, that otherwise there might be a difficulty which would defeat the object we have in view.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There surely would. We clearly understand that the Solicitor General later on will make provision for this.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

On section 20,

Mr. CLANCY. The part of this clause which gives power for catechising the voter is most objectionable, and any person who has experience in an election will see that it may amount to intimidation. Men are sometimes timid when they go to vote, and under this clause the voter may be subject to such catechising as to drive him from the polls.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Under the present federal law that is the case.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend is altogether wrong; I have the section here.

Mr. CLANCY. Whether it is in the law or not it is a bad law. This clause says that the voter shall—

Answer such questions or produce such evidence as to his qualification to vote,—

I would like to know what the limit is to that.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We have to provide here for oaths to be administered to those who are on the voters' lists and also to those who are not on the voters' lists. The case of Prince Edward Island has got to be provided for, and these questions my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) speaks of would be the questions put to a voter in Prince Edward Island. If my hon. friend continued to read he would see:

—or take such oath or qualification as by the law of the province he may in the like case at a provincial election be required to answer.

Mr. CLANCY. It seems to me that even that does not relieve the voter from being catechised when he is on the list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Oh, yes it does.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What are the meaning of these words "produce such evidence as to his qualification to vote?"

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. In Prince Edward Island when the voter comes to the poll, they have no voters' lists, and they have to question him to find out if he has the right to vote.

Mr. BENNETT. Then confine it to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not done by an oath?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Not necessarily by oath, because he has to perform statute labour or pay the commutation money, and he must produce his certificate that he has performed that statute labour.

Mr. CLANCY. These qualifications are required in other provinces as well as in Prince Edward Island. Take the case of a man who is disqualified by receiving aid from some charitable institution. In Ontario that is not alluded to in the oath, because it does not affect his vote if his name is on the list.

Mr. McNEILL. Why not remove the ambiguity by inserting Prince Edward Island?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. This section is clearly intended, so far as the questions are concerned, to apply to Prince Edward Island exclusively.

Mr. CLANCY. But there is the alternative of asking the questions or answering the questions or taking the oath.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. These are only qualifying words.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That might be very well if we had the Solicitor General at every polling booth to explain to the scrutineer and the returning officer what these words mean; but I tell him that under that clause there will be constant badgering of voters by returning officers and scrutineers.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Are questions not allowed to be asked at all, whether there is a list or not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No, there is always a list.

Mr. SPROULE. There is no list in the unorganized territory—in Nipissing and Algoma.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am told that in some parts of Ontario there is no list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I find that section 83 of the Ontario Election Act provides for a list in the unorganized territories. I think it will be found that this applies exclusively to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. HENDERSON. Although the intention is to apply this only to Prince Edward Island, there is danger that it will be applied in every province. I am sure 95 per cent of the returning officers of Ontario would feel that under this they would be entitled to ask the voter any question they thought fit. For instance, a voter might be asked if he was a British subject, whether he was naturalized or not, and if so to produce his papers. If he were not able to do so, he would be obliged to withdraw. I know that under present circumstances voters are badgered and bothered until they retire from the polling booth. In my own county a man who had been compelled to retire had to drive back to the polling booth a second time and peremptorily demand his ballot before he could get it. I think the words are dangerous indeed, and if they are intended to apply to Prince Edward Island alone, words should be inserted to that effect.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The only safe way is to strike out the words, "answer such questions or produce such evidence as to his qualifications to vote." That leaves the clause for the other provinces. Then add a sub-clause for Prince Edward Island.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will accept that suggestion. I move that the words in the 14th line, "answer such questions or produce such evidence as to his qualifications to vote or" and in line 17 the words "answer, produce or" be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT. What form of oath is provided—the form that will be appended to this Act or the local form?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I may have to make some provision about the oath, because it occurs to me there will be a difficulty about the disqualified voter under the oath.

Amendment agreed to, and section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 21,

Section 50 of the said Act is hereby repealed.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have appeals in Ontario under the Manhood Franchise Act. Supposing they should not be decided, does the hon. gentleman intend that those who are appealed against shall not be entitled to vote?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I would consider that in Ontario where there is an appeal, under the Act my hon. friend refers to, and it is not disposed of, that list is not in force.

Mr. HAGGART. All you would have to do to disqualify a whole list would be to appeal against it.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You have to do it within a certain day. They are not quite so bad in Ontario as they are represented here.

Mr. INGRAM. In 1886 the voters' lists in the city of St. Thomas were appealed against by a Liberal candidate, and the appeal was brought before the courts and not decided before the election.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did those on the lists vote?

Mr. BENNETT. They were illegally placed on the lists and the court decided in favour of this illegal course.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are often appeals undecided before an election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In such case the lists cannot be used, and the former lists would have to be used.

Mr. HAGGART. Suppose half a list were appealed against.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. You cannot appeal from one name on it without appealing from the whole list.

Mr. INGRAM. Then you are really disfranchising that municipality.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, we are not.

Mr. INGRAM. We must have a better explanation.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot give a better explanation. My hon. friends from Ontario will have to help me out. It seems to me the only common sense explanation I can give. You can get their cases disposed of. If a list is more than twelve months old, the Dominion Government must make a list itself in those places where the Manhood Suffrage Act applies. In the other, the municipalities must provide for an annual revision, and if an annual revision has not taken place, then the previous list is used.

Mr. INGRAM. In the province of Ontario—and I am speaking for the province of Ontario—as a matter of fact and as a matter of practice the list is completely revised only when there is a provincial election, that is to say, once in four years. It is true that the law provides for a revision yearly, as a matter of fact, hundreds of men are placed on part 3 of the list every fourth year who would not appear there but for the expectation of a provincial election.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, thousands.

Mr. INGRAM. As my hon. friend from Toronto says, thousands of them. You are going to run the risk of driving us back to an old list on which all these names will not appear. Some provision should be made in case of an appeal against the voters' list.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We are only beating the air and fighting with windmills on this point. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) says that part 3 is revised only once in four years, in a practical way. Then you have got into bad habits in Ontario, and we are not responsible for that. Section 6 of the Voters' List Act says:

The clerk of each municipality shall, immediately after the final revision and correction of the assessment roll in every year, make a correct alphabetical list in three parts of all persons——and so on. It is a yearly revision.

Mr. BENNETT. But the contention is that in local politics no man who intends to be a candidate goes to the expense of preparing the list for the mere contingency of an election. He does it in the year immediately preceding the election.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How can we provide against the neglect of those interested in the voters' list?

Mr. CLANCY. Let me point out what we find to be the fact as regards the revision in the county of Bothwell. There are nine municipalities. Out of a vote of 8,000 on part 3 of the list, there are on the present list only 289 names.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is simply pointing out that there are practical difficulties because there is neglect.

Mr. CLANCY. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is imposing new duties.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. How can you remedy the difficulty?

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that it would be no worse than it is at the present time, because the elections for the Commons will come around periodically the same as those for the province, and the list intended to be used for the Dominion election would be revised the same as we revise that for the provincial election.

Mr. INGRAM. It is all very well to talk about theory. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick), who is a lawyer, and other lawyers, may split hairs—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There are others.

Mr. INGRAM. Now, I would suggest that the hon. gentleman allow this to stand over, and then perhaps we can suggest a way out of the difficulty. It is very well to theorize, but when you come to work out the election law in a practical way, you will find where these difficulties come in. I think it should be our duty to place as few barriers in the way as possible, and try to save expense. Why is it proposed to abolish the Franchise Act of 1885 and the whole system of Dominion lists? It is because they involve too much expense. Now, let me give a piece of the history of some appeals that have taken place. In 1886 the Liberal party in my county engaged six men to figure up by the yard hundreds and hundreds of names to appeal against, in order to prevent the revision being brought up before the election could take place. The Conservatives, feeling that the law was not designed to disfranchise men, but rather to give them the franchise, assisted the city clerk in preparing the appeals. Had we waited for the time provided by the law for issuing these appeals in the usual way, these young men would have been disfranchised. Our friends on the other side objected to this way of doing business and appealed to the court. The judges, taking the view that the law was intended to enfranchise men instead of disfranchising them, allowed the Conservative party, or those who were trying to get these men on the lists to proceed, even though they had acted in a somewhat irregular way. In this way the names of these young men were put upon the lists. But the point I want to make is that if the method adopted by these people in St. Thomas had prevailed, hundreds and hundreds of young men in the city would have been disfranchised. Why? Because the Liberal party appealed to the courts to prevent them from voting. I have a city and an incorporated town and incorporated villages in my riding. Suppose that in the town they desired to prevent the young men voting, they would enter an objection and make an appeal to Toronto. If they could not carry out the law they could not use the voters' lists and so they would disfranchise a large number of men. We should be obliged to fall back on the other voters' list. I tell you that we do not revise the lists to the fullest extent three years out of four. Why? Because it is too expensive. The municipal clerks do not even put the names on the list, not because it is not the law but because it is not the practice. If the hon. gentleman will allow this to stand, we may be able to find a way out.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid that the professions of the hon. gentleman about cheapening the lists have vanished. There is not a gentleman from the province of Ontario but will say the revising of the lists under this section, as we are required to do, taking the view of the Solicitor General, every year, would be greater than we would have been compelled to bear under the Dominion Act. I say advisedly that so far as dollars and cents are concerned, we are infinitely worse off than we were under the Dominion Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think I may say advisedly that we do not intend to have Dominion elections every year.

Mr. BRITTON. I differ entirely from the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), because the expenses of a revision under the Ontario Act in reference to manhood franchise, is not at all to be compared with the expense under the old system of revising officers. The difficulties that have been suggested will not arise in one case out of a hundred in practical dealing with these voters' lists. Suppose the list appealed against is not used, then the Dominion officers will provide new lists, so far as manhood franchise is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT. Judging from the remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton), it is certain that he never had any practical experience in preparing voters' lists for revision under the local. The hon. gentleman having been an official of the Ontario Government, was consequently not interested in politics. I know that in the East Riding of Simcoe, there were over 1,500 appeals under the local Act; in Centre Simcoe there were over 800 appeals, and in the three ridings of Centre, West and East Simcoe, there were upwards of 2,500 appeals. Surely the hon. member for Kingston does not contend that 2,500 appeals could be carried on at no expense. In every case where we wished to have the man's name struck off the list, we were compelled to bring a witness there and pay him his fees. Had it been under the Dominion Act, it would have been sufficient simply to mail him a notice, and then we could have dealt with his case. It is absurd to say that it does not cost anything to prepare these municipal lists. The First Minister, in opening the debate, stated there was no cost to the province at all. As a matter of fact, there was a cost of nearly $8,000 last year when there was a revision for the province. The First Minister stated also that there was no cost to the municipalities except in towns and cities. But in East Simcoe it cost the municipality for the local revision last year, $700 or $800. I can name one single township where it cost $80 to the municipality to revise the list. I know that in those township municipalities there is great complaint at present that they are driven to this large expense simply to revise the lists of the politicians, as they say. Now, when the lists will be fought out more desperately for the Dominion, as I know they will be—because I know that if I am a candidate I shall make a much more thorough revision of the lists than did the local members—the result will be that the cost in that township alone will be $150, and we will have the satisfaction of pointing out to the municipalities that this cost has all been imposed upon them by the Bill now before the House. There will not be a riding in the province of Ontario which will not have foisted upon it an expense of from $800 to $1,000, exclusive of the towns, by reason of shifting the responsibility of the preparation of the lists from the federal power to the municipal powers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Touching the question of expense, I want to ask the Solicitor General a question as regards clause 8. Under the Registration Act of the province of Ontario, all the expense of engaging rooms for the sitting of the boards of registrars, all the expense of providing blanks, and forms, and everything of that kind, is charged up to the municipalities. Under this Act the government do all the buying, and the bill is sent into the municipalities. I sincerely hope that the hon. gentleman is much too generous to load this additional expense on the municipalities as regards the registration which may be necessary under this Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We will be careful not to put it on the municipalities. We will bear all the expense.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to another point, and that is the need of making these appeals as economically as possible. Under the Dominion Act I cannot understand why the candidates should be compelled to register a notice to the elector whom they propose to strike off the list, I cannot understand why they are compelled to pay five cents for a registration stamp and three cents postage on a letter to that elector. The Post Office Department has power to send mail matter through the post office free of postage, and I think it should issue an envelope, which might be called a franchise envelope, that would pass as a registered letter without any cost to the candidate, and by that means saving him a large expense. Under our Ontario Act where appeals are made, they are served to the persons whose names are either objected to or to be added to the list. Now, instead of going to the expense of $100, or $200 in some cases, for serving these notices, let the Dominion Government furnish a franchise envelope free which would be considered like a registered letter.

Mr. SPROULE. That could be used for ordinary correspondence.

Mr. INGRAM. For births, marriages and deaths, in the province of Ontario, there is an envelope which passes through the mails free. Could there not be a penalty attached to any man using one of these franchise envelopes for any other purpose than that intended by the law?

On section 20,

Mr. MONTAGUE. This clause requires amendments similar to those which were made to clause 18

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman sees that we inserted a clause between 19 and 21 having reference to Prince Edward Island. We will have to let 21 stand. There would be no use in having two clauses. You will have to put in one to meet the case of Prince Edward Island. This clause 21 cannot do any harm as it stands, because it will refer to two sections generally, one referring to the rest of the Dominion, and one specially referring to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You still have the shadow.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Not the substance.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Sometimes the shadow is made use of. It is inserted opposite the name of the man who has refused to swear, "refused to answer questions put to him." I want to put it beyond the power of a returning officer in my province to question any man or demand anything from him except that he should take the oath when required to do so.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It is perfectly clear that if the authorities put questions and put the oath that their action must be found within the four corners of section 20. This is only recording what has been authorized under the previous section. If an officer had no power given to him, then if a man tendered his vote he could not record anything opposite his name except "refused to swear." But in the case of Prince Edward Island, if certain questions are put and the elector refuses to answer, then he cannot vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There should be a distinct mark in the poll book for cases where men have been qualified by taking the oath, and the entry "sworn" should be made. If a man comes in who is disqualified under the provincial Act and has to take the oath and be sworn as to his qualification under the Dominion Act, will that case be met?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am going to consider that matter.

21. Section 52 of the said Act is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted that no voter who has refused to take the oath or affirmation, or to answer questions or produce evidence as to qualification as aforesaid, when requested to do so, shall receive a ballot paper or be admitted to vote.

Section agreed to.

22. Section 54 of the said Act shall be applicable also to electors entitled to vote otherwise than by being named on the list of voters.

Section agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I understand that we have the promise of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the clause regarding Prince Edward Island, which is to be framed, shall only refer to that province?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Precisely.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it the intention of the Government to pay the cost of the revision of the lists in the unorganized districts? That expense is at the present time borne by the province of Ontario.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. If they are made by our officials.

Mr. CLANCY. If the lists are not a year old, then they are under the machinery of this Act.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. We must take them as they are.

Mr. CLANCY. In such a case will the Government pay the cost of the revision?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. There will be no cost, for we will take the lists as they were at the time the elections were held during the twelve months preceding.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

Section agreed to.

23. Subsection 3 of section 56 of the said Act is hereby repealed.

24. Subsection 1 of section 64 of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out all the words from "or" in line fourteen to "be" in line twenty-eight.

(2.) Subsection 2 of the said section 64 is hereby repealed.

(3.) Subsection 4 of the said section 64 is hereby amended by striking out all the words from "including" in line eight to "appeals" in line twenty-four.

25. Form S in the first schedule to the said Act, as amended by section 11 of chapter 11 of the statutes of 1888, by section 16 of chapter 19 of the statutes of 1891, and by section 22 of chapter 14 of the statutes of 1894, is hereby repealed.

26. Form X in the said schedule is hereby repealed.

Section agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I move that the following be inserted as section 27:—

The second section of the said Act is hereby amended by adding the following as 7a:—"The necessary disbursements under section 13 for fees for copies of documents furnished by the revising officers shall be as under the provincial law, and where there is no provincial law there shall be paid for copying 10 cents per 100 words and a custodian fee of 50 cents.

Section agreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. If it is in order, I move the following to amendment to apply to the Nipissing district:—

It shall be the duty and shall be within the power of the returning officer appointed by the Governor in Council to constitute polling divisions and to appoint and fix polling places and polling stations in all cases where necessary under the laws of the province, irrespective of the duty or power of the returning officer or any other officer or person at provincial elections so to do.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I accept that amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose in going into committee to-morrow some latitude will be allowed as to debate on that point.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have been so generously treated that I ought to allow any latitude that my hon. friends can reasonably take.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We let you off easily.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am very thankful for it. I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MILLS. Before the committee rises I wish to make a personal explanation. In reading the "Hansard" to-night, I was astonished to find that the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) had stated with reference to me that which was entirely untrue. As I see it has been recorded on "Hansard." I wish to correct his statement. I say here emphatically that I never ran for mayor of the town of Annapolis in my life, and not having run for the mayoralty of that town, I could not have been defeated.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I certainly indicated the hon. gentleman's nominee. He had his nominee in the field and backed him for all he was worth.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) is entirely wrong. I had no nominee, and never ran for mayor of Annapolis.

The CHAIRMAN. Order.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We propose to go into committee and pass some amendments which have been reserved, and some clauses which are under consideration by the Solicitor General in reference to suggestions made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. After that is through, if my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. Fisher) is here, it is probable he will move the second reading of the Plebiscite Bill. If we have time afterwards we will go into Supply.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 29th April, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 126) respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company, and to change its name to the Saskatchewan and Pacific Railway and Mining Company.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Bill (No. 128) further to amend the General Inspection Act.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

THE FISHERIES ACT.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to further amend the Fisheries Act. He said: The changes are not very important or material. The present law provides that where there are violations of the provisions of the Act or regulations, prosecutions may be instituted and certain fines imposed for the first, second and third offences. It has been found practically impossible to carry out the section in that way. There are many difficulties in the direction of reciting that a man has been convicted for a first and convicted for a second offence, and it has been found practically impossible to carry out the provisions of the Act. The penalty for the first offence, $20, is useless, being too small. I propose to introduce a provision by which an offender shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding a certain amount, the sum to vary according as the offence is trifling or serious.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do you establish as the fine the maximum for the third offence?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I propose $100 instead of $60. The other change I propose is this: Where under-sized lobsters are taken, perhaps one hundred or two hundred are put into a crate with two hundred or perhaps one thousand full-sized lobsters, and the inspector would be occupied almost a day in selecting those under size, for he can only confiscate such lobsters. I propose to provide that if a number of under-sized lobsters are contained in a crate containing lobsters of a regular size, the crate and full-sized lobsters shall be confiscated as well as the under-sized lobsters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

OFFICER COMMANDING THE MILITIA.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In the absence of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Tuesday next, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that the Officer commanding the Militia shall be paid a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum, and in addition thereto, in lieu of allowances, such sum, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, as the Governor in Council determines.

Motion agreed to.

ALIEN LABOUR LAW.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Solicitor General, if under the provisions of the Alien Labour Law the duty has been assigned to any person to look after the carrying out of that law in the district of Muskoka and at points on the north shore of the Georgian Bay, where I am informed a large number of workmen from the United States are now employed by American lumber firms? If there is no such official yet appointed, and now that the attention of the Government has been called to the matter, I ask the Solicitor General if the Government will be pleased to appoint an official to carry out the law?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I am unable to say now if an agent has been appointed by the Attorney General for that purpose. I will make inquiry and I expect to be able to answer my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) before six o'clock.

IMPERIAL ARMY SOLDIERS IN TORONTO.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to ask the Government if they have any information as to the intention of the British Government to send a British regiment to Toronto, and make it a recruiting station?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). I have no information on that point.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

The House again resolved itself into committee on the Bill (No. 16) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act and to further amend the Dominion Elections Act.

(In the Committee.)

On section 19a,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I now submit the amendment I promised yesterday with reference to Prince Edward Island. This will be a new section, and will be marked section 19a:

In the province of Prince Edward Island an elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates, or the agent of a candidate, or by any elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper, answer such questions and produce such certificates or receipts, or in case such certificates or receipts cannot be produced, take the oath in such case as prescribed, and take such other oath of qualification as by the law of the province he may in the like case at a provincial election be required to answer, produce or take, such changes being made in the form of oaths as are necessary to make them applicable to the election being held, which oaths the deputy returning officer and poll clerk and each of them are authorized to administer.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a separate clause.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, a separate clause provided exclusively for Prince Edward Island.

Section agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I wish in section 18, to make an amendment so as to add after the word "addition" in line 45, the words "and in the province of Prince Edward Island, disqualification also."

Amendment agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The subject with reference to the disfranchised voter would come in under section 17, now 18, as printed. I wish to amend by inserting after the word "both" at the end of line 1, the following words:—

Or if the name of such elector is not on the list of voters, but he claims the right to vote under subsection 1 of section 6 of the Franchise Act, and takes the oath prescribed by that subsection.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 20,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. To meet another difficulty suggested by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in connection with section 20, as printed, but section 21, as it will be in the Act, I move that the following be added as a subsection:

The poll clerk shall also enter in the poll book the words, "provincial disqualifications oath taken," opposite the name of each elector to whom the oath prescribed by subsection 2 of section 6 of this Act has been administered, and the words, "refused to take provincial disqualifications oath" opposite the name of each elector who has refused to take that oath."

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think it is proper for me to state now that there exists in the public mind an erroneous impression as to the right to vote on affidavit or oath. I received two or three telegrams this morning which indicate that an impression exists that any man can vote on affidavit if his name is on the list. The intention is to limit that to disqualified persons. No person whose name is not on the list, other than a disqualified person, can have the right to vote by taking the oath.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that misunderstanding arose from the way in which the clause was printed.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That may be. There are some other points to be considered between now and the third reading of the Bill. I understand that the intention is to have the Bill reprinted and distributed, and then we will consider the other matters —as to the subdivisions under the local Act, as to the printing of the voters' lists, and as to the question of an appeal.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And also the question of disqualification by removal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, we will consider that also.

Mr. McINERNEY. There is also the question of striking out in section 9 the words "or it may be attached by the returning officer to the adjoining polling division." The hon. Solicitor General, when I proposed an amendment to this effect last night, said it would be considered on the third reading.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, that will also be considered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I suppose we are to have on the third reading a little more latitude in speaking than is usual.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think you will find that I will reciprocate.

Bill reported with amendments.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS AND LICENSING OF ENGINEERS.

Amendment by the Senate to Bill (No. 39) respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed on them—(The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Louis Davies)—read the first time.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES moved that the said amendment be now read the second time and agreed to. He said: The amendment is a very trivial one, and I agree to it, and I am sure the House will, too. It is in section 48, and provides that where a steamboat is seized on a conviction against the owner for a penalty, and ordered to be sold, it shall be sold only after such reasonable notice as the Minister in each case shall prescribe.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The only point that occurs to me in reference to that is that it is rather vague.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The objection raised was that if the Minister did not have some such authority as that, an officer might sell the vessel without proper notice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is this notice to the owner or the public?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). To the public.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is quite clear from the language used that the notice may be to the owner or to the public. No doubt the intention is that it shall be a public notice in order that the boat shall not be sacrificed, but it is not so stated in the Act.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No Minister would ever sanction any notice that is not public, and we may fairly leave the clause as it is. No other notice would be thought of.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is the danger of assuming that everything will be done properly. This clause is so vague that any notice might do. The hon. gentleman says, Oh, yes, but the Minister of the day will be governed by common sense and make it a public notice, but he need not under this Bill, and might consider a notice to the owner or the captain as reasonable. I do not think that is the intention, and think we should make it read "reasonable public notice."

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman need put that in because there would be no possibility of any Minister allowing any vessel to be sold at private notice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If it is to be a public notice, why not make it so beyond doubt.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think it means anything else. I do not think any Minister ever could be found who would tolerate any but a public notice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Legally he could. He might consider notice to the owner sufficient.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is a very extreme and violent presumption to make that any Minister would sanction the sale without public notice. I think the hon. gentleman may be perfectly satisfied on that point.

Amendment read the second time, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of the Secretary of State.. $36,500

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There are two increases of $50 each, in the cases of a second and third class clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. How many clerks in that department are eligible for statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not got any memo. of that, and if the hon. gentleman attaches importance to it, the item will have to stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I attach great importance to it. I am going to ask the question of every department, for a purpose.

Item allowed to stand.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery $27,800

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The only change in that is the retirement of one official, making a reduction of $1,300.

Mr. FOSTER. Any statutory increases ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not in that branch, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. How many are eligible for statutory increases ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not that information, and will have to ask to let that stand.

Item allowed to stand.

Department of the Interior..... $104,824

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The changes are as follows :—There is one more chief clerk and one less first-class clerk, making no difference in the salary. There is one additional second-class clerk by reason of the promotion of C. J. Steers from the third class to the second class. Among the third-class clerks there is a net increase of $1,200, made up as follows :—Promotion of C. J. Steers to the second class, salary not required, therefore clerkship abolished. There are statutory increments asked for this year by S. J. Eagleson, C. W. Badgeley, Miss B. Barber, R. A. Lewis and Miss May, making in all $250. There are statutory increases for two messengers, H. Ackland and B. H. Wright. I am not able to say at this moment how many clerks in the department are eligible for statutory increases, but I will get that information later.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for York asks the question as to how many were eligible in the Secretary of State's Department. I find there were fifteen clerks eligible under the rule that previously prevailed with respect to statutory increases ; two have been granted, to Messrs. Steele and Dubé.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What superannuations have taken place during the year in that department ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My recollection is that there are none, but the returns will be brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. Was any report received from the department as to why Messrs. Steele and Dubé should be singled out of the fifteen who were eligible in that department for statutory increases ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. A report was received recommending these two gentlemen who have been named. No report was received discriminating against the others, but they were not recommended. The Deputy Minister, knowing the policy of the Government in that respect, recommended those names ; my impression is that he did not make any report on the others. The information furnished to me does not include any report respecting the others.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Were there any special points ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Steele entered the service as an extra clerk in 1875, and regard was had to his long service, extending over twenty years. He is a good clerk, possessing a knowledge of both short-hand and typewriting, and is entitled to this increase on account of his services.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It seems to me the Act would require that all those who are eligible for the increase should be recommended. Now, if there is a discrimination made, the reason why these two gentlemen should be selected ought to appear in the report of the Deputy. I think it is important to know if any reasons were given why these two gentlemen were selected for an increase, while the others were left out.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House the other night when we had a discussion on that question.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I was here, and took part in the discussion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, I shall have to repeat the reason that was given before, and as my hon. friend was present then, he will hardly regard it with more satisfaction now. The view of the Government was that where a clerk was recommended as being specially meritorious, they might give him an increase. But that did not necessarily imply anything to the disadvantage of the other clerks, they might be very worthy officials, but not specially entitled to promotion or advancement as the others who were selected.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Have any of the members of the Government instructed the deputies not to make that report regarding statutory increases ? The practice is well known. Before the change was made by the Government the principle was that the deputies, as a matter of course, and without instruction, were to bring forward these reports where they saw fit, where, in their opinion, a report should be made under this clause 26 of the Act. In connection with that, I would ask the Government whether any departmental or political heads instructed or intimated to the deputies to change that practice, and to make the reports only when the matter was called to their attention by the political head ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not think any special instructions of that nature were given; but the deputies certainly did understand that the former practice was not to be followed out, and I have no doubt that a number of the deputies, on that understanding, only made such recommendations as they thought were likely to be accepted. While no special instruction was given, the knowledge that that was the policy of the Government, I have no doubt, influenced some of the deputies in making their reports.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I know of no objection to these two men getting their statutory increases, but I know some of the staff in that department, and if I were to-morrow to make a selection for statutory increases, I do not know that I would exclude these two young men. But this much I would say, that unless things have changed very greatly under the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite, I know of absolutely no reason whatever why these two should be selected and the others left out.

Mr. McNEILL. Certainly the statement made by the Minister of Finance is a very startling one for the committee to consider. My hon. friend is aware of the fact that the attention of the Government has been called by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to the view taken of this legislation by probably the greatest lawyer we ever had in this House, certainly on their own side of the House (Mr. Blake) at the time the measure was passing through the House, also to the view taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, also a lawyer of high standing in the House; also to the view taken by the Postmaster General, a lawyer on their own side of the House, all of whom declared emphatically that there was no doubt whatever as to the meaning of the clause, that it meant that these men were to have their statutory increases if they were deserving clerks and were fairly discharging their duties. These things having been brought to the memory of the Government, I would ask whether they have changed the view that they took in regard to this question, or whether they are still determined to adhere to the course they announced to the House the other day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We have certainly found no reason to change the view which we entertained when this matter was last before the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask what the policy of the Government is with regard to these statutory increases? May I ask if the increase is granted because the deputy reports that a certain clerk is specially qualified, or is it granted according to the will of the Government?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I may say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that in no case is the increase granted without the recommendation of the Deputy Minister.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not the question.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If I attempted to give the hon. gentleman further light on the matter, I should only be repeating what has already been stated. Some few may be selected as specially worthy, and, upon the recommendation of the Minister, these obtain the increase. Where the Minister does not recommend it, they do not get the increase.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, Mr. Chairman, Parliament votes this money, and Parliament ought to know why certain men are selected for special favours, there can be no question about that. Under this Act the Government have the power—whether it is compulsory upon them or not is another question, but they certainly have the power—to give these officers their annual increase. Now, I think it is treating Parliament with very scant courtesy if we are to be told that one officer is selected over another for his statutory increase, but Parliament shall not be given the reason why one is chosen and the other is not chosen.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It seems to me that the Government, without really amending the legislation or taking regular steps are making a very serious departure from the policy that Parliament has sanctioned by the clause which has been so often discussed providing for the statutory increases. I take it that the difference between the granting of the statutory increase and this request for the increment of salary in a particular case is that in one case there was a departmental policy, and in the other, so to speak, a policy of the political head. To illustrate: When we observed the general Act, and the statutory increase was granted as a matter of course, subject to the character that the officer had earned at the hands, not of the political head of the department, but at the hands of the Deputy Minister, it was the practice for the Minister to come and ask Parliament, wholly regardless of that, some special reward for a special officer, and for that, the report of the deputy was not required in any sense. But there was a distinct policy, for which a good deal could be said, that it clothed the deputy head rather than the Minister with the authority and control over the officers, enabling the deputy head to secure a more earnest and zealous obedience and discipline in the department for which he was responsible to the political head. And, without mentioning any particular names, there was made available by Parliament every year a fund out of which every deserving officer could be rewarded with an increase of $50 when he had won the good opinion of the deputy head and the political head concurred in giving it. Now, it seems to me that, against the spirit of that legislation, if not against the letter of it, there has been a complete reversal of policy. The Deputy Minister now has none of that assistance, none of that authority, but the grant is made purely and simply a political matter. I do not think that that is in the interest of civil service reform or in the line of the argument of some hon. gentlemen who made themselves very prominent in the matter and who now sit behind the Treasury benches. At any rate, if that is to be the rule, as the Minister of Finance says it is, if the Government has adopted a policy about it, it seems to me that, instead of adopting this system of leaving the clause on the statute-books and ignoring the practice which has obtained without a break since it was enacted, the Government ought to repeal this clause, instead of discussing its construction, and completely inaugurate the policy they seem to be following—that the deputy head is to count for nothing in these matters of discipline, but all that is to be taken upon the shoulders of the political head.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I desire to take exception to what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says, though he did not mean it, perhaps, that these recommendations are made on political grounds. I cannot say that there is nothing of the kind, and that all that is necessary in order to establish it is to consult the names of those to whom the increases have been granted. This will show that the grant rests, not upon political claims, but solely upon considerations of meritorious service. I desire to say, and that with the fullest confidence, that hon. gentlemen opposite will be wrong if they assume that rewards are made upon political grounds.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept what the hon. Minister of Finance says. If anything that I said seemed to have a different meaning, I did not intend it. Still, the course that the Government are taking opens up the suspicion that these things are given according to political favour and not as the Act contemplated according to the work in the department as known to the deputy head—and necessarily, particularly in the larger departments, the work of the officer is better known to the deputy head than it can be to the political head.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I accept, with regard to the Secretary of State's department, what the Minister has said as to the political significance of these increases. But I desire to ask a question, as I was out for a time and did not hear the Minister of Finance if he stated the facts. How many were recommended for statutory increase by the Deputy Minister?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I cannot say what may have passed between the Minister and the deputy, but I received recommendations in two cases. I believe that the Deputy Minister did not follow the practice of recommending all.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is an extraordinary statement. It is tantamount to admitting that the Deputy Minister recommends only those he is told to recommend.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Or, put it the other way, that the Deputy Minister would not do anything that he knew was not in accordance with the policy of the head of the department. If he knew that it was the policy of his chief not to make these recommendations generally, I think he would make recommendations of those who were specially meritorious.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is this duty not a statutory duty on the part of the Deputy Minister?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Even that is debatable.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If so, the will of the Minister, it would seem, overrules the statute.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement of the Minister of Finance raises a very important question, so important that I think we should have some conversation about it. I think that the whole theory of the stated officers of the department—for instance, the deputy heads—is that they shall be departmental and not political officers. The deputy head, who is a permanent officer of the department, should be there not for the sake of assisting the party which may be in power at the time or the party to which he may be affiliated, so far as his politics go; but he should be there to carry on the business of the department on certain lines of departmental policy. He should be there to give his Minister the departmental view of every question that comes up. It is the Minister's place to shape the policy. But the Minister has nothing secure in the department, it seems to me, unless he has a faithful departmental officer, to wit, the deputy head, who, without considering whether his Minister is Grit or Tory, shall, in all his recommendations and reports, put before his Minister purely, simply and absolutely the departmental view. The Minister may agree with that or not. The Minister may adopt it absolutely or may reject it absolutely for reasons of policy of which he is the exponent. He may moderate the recommendations of the Deputy Minister with an eye to political or party policy. But a Minister is in a most dangerous position if he educates or seeks to educate the deputy head of the department to first think what his Minister's wish is, what the party view is with reference to a matter before he makes any recommendations. And, Sir, the public service of this country would be in a most deplorable position if that is to be the training and tendency of the deputy heads or permanent officers of the departments. Now, what did the Minister of Finance say? He said practically this: That the deputy did not simply consider the clerks under him and their duties and how they performed those duties, and so report to the head of the department entirely outside of what the Government's view or what the Minister's view might be as a matter of policy, who were the deserving clerks, and which of them, on the line of deserving conduct and good work ought to have the increase.

But swayed by the opinion of his Minister or the policy enunciated by the Government, a party policy, even though it was administrative, he simply recommended two clerks for increases. If that was done in that department, and if all the deputies in so far as they take that view are so going to conduct their departments, they will not be doing their duty to the department or the best duty of which they are capable of performing to the Minister himself. The clerks are under the eye of the deputy, they perform a year's work, the deputy's sole duty in any report is to give them their due as clerks; if they have been negligent to say so, if their conduct has been good to say so, if they have shown specially meritorious conduct to say so and let the facts go before the Minister. Otherwise, in what position do the clerks stand? They have no friends at court, and they have not any impartial head over them to give the Minister and the Government a fair report of what they have done during the year. It is unfortunate if that state of affairs is to be brought about, as is intimated by the Finance Minister. Again, what does the Minister do—and I mention it again to reinforce what the hon. member for Pictou has said in this respect. The Government are simply doing this. They reprobate a general policy, a law under which that general policy was carried out for years in this country, they declare the principle wrong and that they will not be bound by it, but they accept the policy in order to have an opportunity, under shelter of it, to advance by whim or caprice or on their own judgment members of the service just as they please. That is not shouldering their fair responsibility, and they ought, if they believe the principle wrong, to get it off the Statute-book and take simply and solely the responsibility of coming down here with special recommendations and asking Parliament to vote certain increases to certain officers. Again, it seems to be very unfair in this respect. Parliament is asked to give $100 in this case to two gentlemen out of fifteen, who have done their work well, and who under the law we believe are entitled to increases, certainly under the rules which have existed for many years. But only two have been recommended and given increases. The others are stigmatized by not getting increases. So long as the Government keep the general rule on the Statute-book reports should be made and clerks deserving should receive increases. But out of the fifteen clerks thirteen have been discriminated against, as is known to their fellow-clerks, and any one acquainted with the facts. The Minister says the Government take the responsibility of bringing down two recommendations and ask $50 each increase from Parliament. Should not the Government tell Parliament the facts of the case? If the Ministers adopt that rule they give the deputy head the power to judge between the clerks. The Minister practically says: I think two clerks are capable and should have increases; I do not think the other thirteen should have increases, and we have made up our minds from what the deputy has reported; but we will not give Parliament the means of judging as regards the other thirteen clerks who have not received increases. The Minister is not without the possibility of failing in a matter of judgment, and Parliament must always be the judge as to the Minister's action, and how can he judge unless equipped with the facts of the case. So in the case of every department the deputy, in justice to the clerks, must give a fair and unvarnished statement to his Minister, and that statement should be at the call of the House when the Estimates are being passed. Then we can judge whether or not there has been unfair discrimination. It must also be remembered that the deputies are mortal and human as well as the Ministers, and hon. members want to know the grounds on which the decisions were arrived at. As it is, the Minister gives no ground, and I may be more skeptical than I should be, but I believe there is not one Minister out of the six before me who has had a report from his deputy this year with respect to his clerks and how they are doing their work.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I beg your pardon.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I beg your pardon.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). And so have I.

Mr. FOSTER. I know the Minister of Finance has had a recommendation, but from whom I do not know. The Minister of each department has submitted his Estimates to Council and has urged that two, four, six or eight clerks be given increases. This recommendation has been submitted to Council; but have the Ministers in the different departments actually had a report from the deputy, and if so, why should not Parliament know the reason why discriminations have been made? I say also that to a certain extent this House is the arbiter as to these clerks in the event of any injustice being done them. When it is announced that thirteen clerks have been left off and two have been selected, it is clear that action is unjust to the thirteen, for it is unjust if they have done their work efficiently, and if they are unworthy clerks they should not be retained in the service. If a clerk is worthy, what is the cardinal point of difference between the thirteen and the two clerks who have received increases? But the main point to which I wish to ask the attention of the Ministers and the House is, that if we are going to drill up the deputies to report just what they think the Ministers and the Government may wish, we are not treating the public service fairly. The Deputy Minister is a departmental officer, and he should prepare his report without any thought as to what policy or politics of the Minister or Government may be. In no other way can the Minister get the true facts of the case, and the Minister is the only political head that is necessary; and a deputy should be dismissed if he shows in his report that he is studying what his Minister would like to have there, or what the policy of the party in power for the time being is in connection with the work of the departments.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I should like to ask my hon. friend two or three questions. In the first place, I cannot conceive that any reflection can be passed on the deputy heads if, knowing the policy of the Government is to reward the most deserving clerks, he reports those who in his judgment are the most deserving. He is simply performing his obvious and clear duty. Clerks may be divided into three classes, the deserving, more deserving, and most deserving, and if the Minister tells the deputy to report the clerks who are most deserving he simply does his duty in so doing. I am perfectly aware that in a very considerable number of cases there are a large number of these gentleman in the service who would have been recommended by us had it not been for the fact that for a great number of years preceding 1897, the Act was wholly disregarded by hon. gentlemen opposite, and wholly disregarded by the deputy heads. I know, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows well, that it is absolutely and physically impossible that out of several hundred members of the civil service, legally or nominally—supposed to be legally entitled to the increase—every man is deserving. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will not rise in his place and say on his word of honour as a member of Parliament, that he believes that every clerk in the departments deserves an increase of $50 a year whom the law permitted to receive it.

Mr. FOSTER. I tell you what I will say.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What will you say?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that my view of the law, reinforced by the practice of very many years, is, that every clerk in every department who has conscientiously and well fulfilled his duties for the year, has a right to his $50 increase as a matter of quasi contract between himself and the Government when he went into the service.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not accept that as a correct statement of the case, but we will take it for the moment. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) on his honour believe, that the four or five hundred young or middle-aged gentlemen in our several departments, who were entitled to receive this increase according to the apparent letter of the law; does he believe that they all, each and every year from 1878 down to 1896 deserved that increase and that there was no exception?

Mr. FOSTER. I will not say that there was no exception and I never did say it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Now I would like the hon. gentleman to point out to me when any exceptions were made.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I doubt if during that eighteen years any of these men were refused an increase.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I recollect one case in the Marine Department.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is possible that perhaps in one case the ex-Minister of Marine may have exercised his right. The fact of the matter is the law was rendered a dead letter. I frankly admit it was a dead letter during a large part of the time I administered the Finance Department. I objected to it, but it was a dead letter. Our people did as hon. gentlemen did; they gave these increases and the deputy heads recommended right and left during that period of years. The hon. gentleman recommended the increases without exercising the slightest discrimination between the very best men and the very worst men in their departments, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) knows it. It is owing to that neglect of duty that this—I grant in some cases apparent hardship—has taken place. Owing to that neglect of duty the civil service estimate has grown to a very large percentage of the actual expenditure of the Government. We are asking for $1,418,000, and I am bound to say that having regard to the work done in the several departments, that is a large sum to be paid. I pointed out to the ex-Minister of Finance that there are three parties to concur before this $50 increase can be given. The deputy head is bound to certify to the Minister that the person is deserving; the Minister having examined into the case is bound to certify to Council that the person is deserving, and the Council having taken the whole question into consideration—and in that consideration the sum total to be paid for the civil service is an essential factor—the Council finally decides whether or not this increase shall be granted. Any one of the three can block it, and any one of the three under certain conditions is bound to block it. Now, an essential portion of the question whether this $50 increase should be added bears on this point: is the party at the time receiving a just wage for the work he does.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No member of the Government desires that men should work for the people of Canada for less than a just wage, but all of us who have experience in business or public matters know right well, that the salaries which are being given at this date to the great majority of the civil servants are as large, and probably larger, than they could earn in any other walk of life. That is not invariably the case. I have always pointed out that there are a good many men in the service who are probably underpaid, particularly in the higher offices; but I do say that if you take these several estimates you will see on the average that the men at this moment are probably as well paid as they could hope to be in any bank, in any railway company's employment, in any private man's employment, in, as I have said, any other walk of life. Under these circumstances the policy which the Government have announced is a plain and reasonable policy. They say, for the present, at any rate, that the sum total applied for the service is enough. We will not tie our hands absolutely when we find special cases, but as a matter of public policy we say that the bulk of the civil servants are getting a just wage for the work they do. That is our position, and I think it is a reasonable and fairly tenable position, and I think a position that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) in his heart would hardly dispute. I pointed out the other day, and I now repeat that unless we do something of this kind we will automatically increase the vote for the civil service at the rate of forty or fifty thousand dollars a year. It was open to us, and it is open to us, but we were reluctant to do a thing of that kind, to have dismissed a great many of these gentlemen giving them a reasonable gratuity or superannuation.

Mr. FOSTER. You have gradually conquered some of that reluctance.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). For cause.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will be able to point to any dismissals, particularly from the inside service.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not talking so much of that.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, we are discussing the inside service at this moment. I fail to remember—although, perhaps, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) can recall to my mind—I fail to remember a case in the inside service where a man has been dismissed for offensive partisanship, or indeed for any cause except absolute malversation in office. I do not think that out of the many hundred who form the inside service we have dismissed one. Of course some may have been superannuated in the ordinary course. We are face to face with this position. For many years back, largely under the operation of the $50 a year increase, the expenditure on the civil service has been growing and growing, until it has come to a point where it is absolutely necessary to apply the brakes. We are applying the brakes, but it would be injurious to the service if we were absolutely to deprive ourselves of any power to recommend a single man in any of our departments. We are exercising that right very sparingly, and the division we are making is not a division into incompetents and those who deserve to be rewarded, but a division into deserving and more deserving, and we are giving the increase to a few of those whom we find most deserving. Of course that is a matter which we must ask the House to consider on our responsibility, and if the majority of the House disapproves we cannot carry it. If the majority of the House have confidence in the heads of the department they will sustain the recommendation.

Mr. FOSTER. They will vote confidence.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I hope they will. There may be grounds, but that is a matter for future consideration, for considering whether some of these clauses might or might not be differently worded. We took pains to obtain an opinion on this from the best legal authority, and if hon. gentlemen will take that into consideration with the first proposition I have made, that when a man is in receipt of a fairly just wage that must be considered before he is recommended for an increase, I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will be able to establish any unjust act on our part.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say one word with reference to this matter. I may say that I am fully convinced that the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in so far as his action in this matter is concerned, is thoroughly sincere and is desirous of promoting the best interests of the civil service and of the country. But I must take exception altogether to the ground he has taken before this committee as being sufficient to maintain his contention. In the first place, my hon. friend started out with the statement that for some years past the Act had been abused, and undeserving clerks have been recommended. Possibly that is true. Possibly the Act may have been violated. I think it is very likely that clerks have been recommended who ought not to have been recommended—undeserving clerks, clerks who were negligent of their duty; but is that any reason why the Act should be violated by hon. gentlemen opposite? Because the Act was not complied with by the preceding Government, because men were recommended who ought not to have been recommended, is that any reason why the statutory increase should be withheld now from men who deserve the increase? That is the argument my hon. friend addressed to the committee in the first instance. I ask my hon. friend himself whether that is a fair argument?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It may be, under certain circumstances.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot follow my hon. friend in that. If it has been the course to recommend men who were not deserving of the increase, who were negligent of their duties, is that any reason why we should refuse to recommend the men who were deserving, and who properly attend to their duties? If it be the law that a man who properly and fairly discharges his duties is entitled to the statutory increase—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That we do not admit.

Mr. McNEILL. That may be a reason. But suppose for a moment that that be the law, where is the need for the hon. gentleman's contention with regard to those who have not been discharging their duties properly having been recommended? That appears to me to be beside the question altogether. It is perfectly right, if that has been done in the past, that the Government should step in now and say, we will tolerate that practice no longer. If they did that, they would have the country and every right-thinking man in this House with them. But that is no reason whatever why they should violate the law. My hon. friend the Finance Minister said that no reason had been presented to the Government which affected their view in reference to this matter. I must say it requires a very strong reason to affect the view of hon. gentlemen opposite. When it is brought to their minds that Mr. Blake and two of their own colleagues declared that that was the law when this measure was passing through the House, if that has no effect on their minds, it is very difficult to imagine what can have any effect. The hon. gentleman says that an opinion was obtained; but he does not venture to say—because I asked him the question the other night—that that opinion stated that under this Act only the specially deserving clerks were to have the statutory increase. Then, what is the good of quoting the opinion? It is of no value whatever, so far as the hon. gentleman's contention is concerned, if it does not go the length of supporting his contention, and it does not. The hon. gentleman does not venture to say that it does. Then my hon. friend says that there are some clerks who are getting quite as much as they deserve without having the statutory increase. Does my hon. friend say that he has got a legal opinion to support him in stating that under this Act a man who is getting what the hon. gentleman thinks is enough, should not get his statutory increase?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will not answer for a legal opinion, but I will say that I will act on it. This Parliament makes the law.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman undertakes to put himself above the law in this respect, and that is what we complain of.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We are not putting ourselves above the law. What this Parliament approves is the law.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says that he is going to do it, and get Parliament to sanction his action afterwards.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If Parliament agrees to it, it is the law.

Mr. McNEILL. He says he is going to do it irrespective of the law.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, I could not do it irrespective of the law. I will do it with the approbation of Parliament.

Mr. McNEILL. In other words, he is going to get those behind him, whether it be the law or not, to put this thing through.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We make the law.

Mr. McNEILL. You are not making the law at the present moment. The law is there, and you are violating the law. If you choose to make a law, as I said before, bring down a law; if you choose to say that this is a bad law, bring in a good law, and let it apply to those who come into the service after it is enacted; but do not violate the law that applies to those now in the service. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) told us what the law was when this measure was passing through the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What measure?

Mr. McNEILL. This very measure we are now discussing. He objected to it because it gave this very statutory increase which he now endeavours to say that this opinion which he has obtained warrants him in not allowing the clerks to have.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think my hon. friend has shown that.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Davin) read the words of my hon. friend when the Act was going through the House. He produced "Hansard," and read from my hon. friend's own speech, in which he said that the clerks were all entitled to the statutory increase, i.e., all deserving clerks. My hon. friend cannot go behind that now. He said that was the law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I told my hon. friend that the Minister of Justice advised that that was not the law.

Mr. McNEILL. But my hon. friend does not venture to say that the Minister of Justice declared that it was his opinion that only the specially deserving clerks should have the increase under the law. There is no use going behind that. We know that a man cannot have the increase unless the deputy reports, and so forth, but that is not what we are talking about. My hon. friend knows the law perfectly well, and he expressed himself most emphatically and unambiguously as to what the law was when this measure was before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think so.

Mr. McNEILL. Then the hon. gentleman had better look up the "Hansard." We say that he was correct in his interpretation of the law, and he was supported by Mr. Blake and his colleague, Mr. Mulock, at the time. We say that if hon. gentlemen think that the law is not a good law, let them bring in a Bill and alter the law. But if they do so, I for one will protest against men who entered the service under the existing law being made subject to the conditions of the new law. You must maintain your obligations with men who entered your service in good faith. It is an astonishing thing to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that although this law declares that the salary of a clerk shall be so much, with an annual increase of $50, if he thinks that any man is getting as much as he is worth, he will not give him that $50 increase. He does not venture to say that he has a legal opinion endorsing that course, but he says: I will do this, whether it be the law or not, and the majority behind me will vote it through. I think that is a very harsh way to treat deserving men, because it is not undeserving men we are talking about, but the men admitted by my hon. friend to be deserving. To treat men of that kind in that manner is, I think, absolutely unprecedented in any British Parliament.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Has it ever occurred to my hon. friend to read section 26?

Mr. McNEILL. We have read section 26 over and over again; and I am quite sure that my hon. friend will not stake his reputation as a lawyer on the opinion that the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is borne out by section 26 or the spirit of the Act. Of course we understand perfectly well that a certain formality must be gone through, that the Deputy Ministers must report, but we are led to understand that they have been told not to report. I would ask my hon. friend the Solicitor General what is the good of pointing to section 26, which requires the report of a Deputy Minister, when the Minister of Finance tells us that the Deputy Ministers have practically been told not to report. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the spirit of the Act is violated if deserving men are not recommended by the Deputy Minister, and he will not venture to say that it is not. As he has appealed to me, I now appeal to him. I am sure he will not venture to say that the spirit of the Act is not violated if the Deputy Minister does not report in favour of deserving men. My hon. friend will not reply. He is the law officer of the Government in this House, and he does not for a moment venture to make the contention that has been made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I do say, on behalf of these men, who are admittedly deserving, that I hope the Government will reconsider this matter and allow them the increase which the Act provides for.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to raise one point. I am not going to traverse the argument because I would simply repeat what we said on this side the other night and my hon. friend would repeat what was said on his side. So I would refer him to the "Hansard" and thus save time. But there is one point I want to impress on him, he says that the Government cannot go beyond a certain amount, and, therefore, cannot give the increase to all. He divides the service into deserving, and more deserving, and most deserving, and says he will give the increases to a few. Does not my hon. friend see, on looking over these Estimates, that there is no consistency at all observed as between departments. Take, for instance, the Department of Justice, which has fifteen clerks. Six of these are eligible for the statutory increase, and four out of the six get it. But when you go to the Privy Council, you find twenty-four clerks, of whom fourteen are eligible, and of whom not one gets the increase. Why should there be that discrimination between these two departments? Take the Department of the Secretary of State. Out of twenty-eight clerks, fifteen are eligible but only two get the increase.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend must see that that of necessity must largely depend on two or three considerations, that are not perhaps immediately apparent. First of all, we must, each of us, rest largely on the judgment of the gentlemen in charge of the departments. The hon. gentleman has selected two extreme cases.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, for the purpose of illustrating the argument.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It may happen that in one particular department there may be an unusually large number who appear to deserve some increase or recognition, and that in another department the average rate of pay for the work done may be quite equal to what the men really and fairly deserve. The weight of the argument I made is this, and the hon. gentleman did not deny it, that taking the service as a whole, the largest proportion of our clerks are very well paid. I have had occasion more than once to compare the salaries they receive with those received by men of equal attainments and position, in every respect, in other walks of life, and I am bound to say that a very great number of our civil servants are receiving fully as large a salary as men in analogous positions receive elsewhere. When a man receives as much as he is fairly worth, the terms of section 26 do not apply to him. We are told that we should give the $50 increase to those clerks who deserve it. I do not think that any hon. gentleman will seriously contend that the salary a man is receiving for the work he is doing should be left out of consideration. If you leave those two points out, and look merely at the bald, naked language of the statute, you make out a case, but looking at the kind of work done, which in many cases is of a purely routine character, not involving any special exertion, even of attention, but simply what is called clerical work, these clerks are very well paid. That became apparent to the hon. gentleman himself that he introduced a Bill providing for the employment of temporary writers or employees corresponding to those employed in England. I cannot pretend to say what particular reasons may have influenced my hon. friend or the Minister of Justice in the particular case referred to, but I may remind the hon. gentleman that it does not follow that we should take the amount at our disposal and distribute it every year equally among the number. If one department gets a little more than its share one year, next year that will be ratified, and so on. It would be very injudicious to take the amount, and say we will divide this pro rata according to the number of employees in the several departments. That would simply reduce us to pretty much the same conditions which we have found so objectionable and which the hon. gentleman found so objectionable himself that he changed the law.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think that any person who will read section 26 of the Civil Service Act will come to the conclusion already stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It sets out the terms on which these increases must be given. The increase must first be recommended by the deputy head of the department, and second, recommended by the head, and then authorized by Order in Council. Now, any one who has given attention to the cost of the civil service at Ottawa must know that this inside service are paid salaries in excess of any other class of the Dominion. Bankers, wholesale clerks, retail clerks—there is no class, taken all in all, paid as good salaries as the inside civil service at Ottawa. The average salary of the inside service is over $100 a month, about $1,220 a year. I admit that some clerks, perhaps, are working for very small remuneration. I have no doubt, also, that some entered the service thinking that they would be granted this increase. They had no right to count upon it as a certainty, as they must have known, if they read the Act under which they were engaged. But I hold that when a man's salary goes above the ordinary salary paid to the civil servants in Ottawa, the Government have a perfect right to refuse to increase the salary further. And where they are receiving already a good, round substantial sum for the work they do, a sum amply sufficient to remunerate them for their work, the Government have a perfect right to refuse to give them more. Hon. gentlemen opposite have charged us on this side with not carrying out the pledges we gave to the country with regard to reduction. In the Budget debate they said that the Government had promised to reduce the expenditure by one, two or three millions. Now the Government are making an honest effort to reduce the cost of the civil service.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Certainly they are, and hon. gentlemen opposite find fault with them because they do not grant increases. In Committee of Supply to-day they find fault because there are not increases, and next year on the Budget they will quote the whole expenditure and find fault because they do not make reductions. I do not know what the Government can do to meet the wishes of the hon. gentlemen opposite. As I have said, the inside civil service are paid a good round sum for the service they render, all that they could earn in any other line of life. Many of them are in the civil service because they could not succeed in any other line of life. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot deny that they are the best paid class of people in this Dominion, and yet these gentlemen insist upon increases. Is it because these civil servants are largely their own political chickens that most of them have been appointed by themselves. There must be some reason for it. I hope that the Government will hold firmly to the principle laid down with regard to these increases and will refuse in every case to consent to an increase, except where the salary paid is so low that, in justice to the individual, some advance should be granted. I know very well that it is not popular to make reductions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Nor pleasant.

Mr. McMULLEN. Nor pleasant. I can well remember the former leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, now in the Senate, stating here—by the way, I think he stated that the present leader of the Opposition had declared that it was more popular, and he would rather defend an increase of $100 than to attempt to justify a reduction of $5. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, increased the salaries of civil servants whether they merited it or not. But I hold that, under present circumstances, the Government are justified in the course they have adopted, and that salaries should not be increased except where men are getting too low salaries for the service they render.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery $27,800

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. With regard to the Queen's Printer. I find that ten were eligible to increase, but no increases were recommended.

Mr. FOSTER. Can my hon. friend tell whether there was any report of the deputy head on the clerks of the department to his Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am not aware of any. I would not be positive, but I think there was not.

Office of the Comptroller of the Northwest Mounted Police..... $10,350

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any explanations with regard to this?

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no alteration, the figures are the same as last year.

Mr. FOSTER. How many are eligible for the statutory increase?

The PRIME MINISTER. Without being positive, I would say there are three. If I am wrong, I will have the figure rectified at the next sitting.

Office of the Auditor General..... $26,750

Mr. FOSTER. We would like some explanation with regard to this.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think all the facts of the case have been placed in the possession of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster).

Mr. FOSTER. The number eligible for the statutory increase has not been stated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was 18, I think.

Mr. FOSTER. What number received it?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Three.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I need not ask my hon. friend as a matter of information for my own part whether he has received any recommendations from the head of this department as to statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Auditor General recommended eighteen.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it true that the Auditor General recommended eighteen statutory increases, and explained that he could so arrange the clerks in his department that if the increases had been granted, expenses of his department would not have been any more, or if anything, would have been a little less, than under the preceding arrangement?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He had made a re-arrangement in that direction; I am not quite sure he went so far as my hon. friend, but substantially that is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. For what reason was it that the Minister of Finance refused the statutory increases in these cases?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Auditor General wanted eighteen statutory increases, and it was the opinion of the Government that that was too large a number. They told the Auditor General that if he would make a selection of a few of those who were most deserving, they would be endorsed, and thereupon he sent in the names of three gentlemen, and his recommendation was concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. But I understood from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the cardinal difficulty in this case of statutory increases was that they only had a certain amount of money to devote to making them.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I spoke rather of the whole sum.

Mr. FOSTER. They must be kept down, because you wanted to keep down the whole appropriation. Now, the Auditor General is the officer responsible to Parliament for the audit of the accounts. He has in his department what he thinks are very excellent, and what I know are most hard-working clerks. They are not four o'clock gentlemen, they are there to work whenever they are called upon to work. They are as often there after hours, possibly, as they are during hours. What I mean to say is that the exigencies of his department, during a large part of the year, call for consecutive work, and those clerks do the work when they are told to, and they are worked very hard. Now, his argument would be that these men are all deserving and hard-working clerks. A large number of them are clerks on small salaries. I happen to know that most of them have families, and with a small salary and with a family, it is pretty difficult living in this city with comfort. A man who has to have a home and support a family, even though it be small, on $600 or $700 a year, has a pretty difficult task in this town. Any person who will inquire into it will know that. Therefore, a large number of his men are of those who do not fall under the class spoken of by the member for North Wellington as being paid generous salaries. The Auditor General proposes to encourage these men, to keep their ambition up, and to give them the increase that they expected from year to year, but so to arrange his department that it would not cost the Government any more. Therefore, the whole argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in that respect falls to the ground. Where an independent officer with the work to do, and his clerks to do it, will arrange his department in such a way that, though giving statutory increases, he still will get out of the clerks a sufficient amount of work to enable him to overcome the duties of his department, and where that would cost the Government no more, the reason falls to the ground that it could not be granted because it would take more money. It seems to me in that case the Minister of Finance was somewhat harsh in refusing the increases to the Auditor General. He cannot refuse them on the ground that they were not highly recommended, they were. He cannot refuse them on the ground that it would take more money; the Auditor General would have arranged his department so that it would not have taken more. He himself is estopped from using the argument that if you give it to one one year, you must give it to them the next year, because the Government holds that it is simply discretionary. Now, what was the reason the increases were not given, more especially as I understand my hon. friend was not so severe with his own department?

Mr. HAGGART. I entirely differ from the view of my hon. friend who has just spoken in reference to this particular department. I think the officers of this department are as well paid, or perhaps better paid, than the officers of any other department of the Government. I think they require no more intelligence or no more technical education than the officers of any other department. I think if you will look into the term of service of the officers of this department, you will find they are far better paid than the officers in any other department. For these reasons, although differing from the Minister of Finance as to his reason for withholding the statutory increases, still, if he is going to stick to that rule, I think he has applied it as well in this department as he has in others. The reason for the passage of the Civil Service Act, by which these gentlemen claim that they are entitled to statutory increases, is well known. It was on the report of a committee consisting of several deputy heads, and there was a moral understanding, if not a legal understanding, that every party who entered the service at that time was to get a statutory increase until he arrived at the maximum of his class, that is, if he was any way efficient or fit to be retained in the service of the Government. After that, his statutory increase ended. There is no doubt about the law in the matter. The law upon the matter is, as stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that it is not at all obligatory upon the Government to grant these statutory increases each year. The law is merely an empowering Act which enables the Government, upon the report of the deputy head of a department, and upon the certificate of the head of the department, to grant the statutory increase. We have had opinions again and again that the Act is only an empowering one. I differ entirely from my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) in reference to the matter; it is not obligatory at all. I had an opportunity when I was at the head of a department, of getting the opinion of the Minister of Justice and others in reference to this matter, and I must say in justice to the present Government that the opinion then obtained was precisely the same as that stated by the leader of the House. For this reason, knowing the favours that the Auditor General's Department has received in the past, in proportion to the abilities and technical knowledge of the men employed in that office, for which they are well qualified, I think they receive, and have been receiving pay for their services in excess of the average in any other department of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not debate the question with my hon. friend who has just sat down. He has his opinion and I have mine, and they are both good. But if he will look at the clerks in the Auditor General's department, the third-class clerks especially, he will find that a large proportion of them are only paid from $450 to $750. One goes up to $850. I am speaking of the salary they received last year. Now, I happen to know these gentlemen. They may be friends of mine, or they may not, I am not arguing it on that score. But I know them to be thoroughly qualified and good men, conscientious in the performance of their duties. Besides I know them to be superior men. It cannot be urged that the salary that they are receiving is at all inordinate. The Government cannot argue that. Besides it is simply at their own will, they can give the increase this year, and another year they are not bound by precedent. If the Auditor General has reported them as worthy and recommended the increases, and if, as I said before, it would not take more from the public treasury, then it would do no harm to the treasury to give the statutory increases.

Mr. McNEILL. We would have liked very much to have had some explanation respecting the statutory increases, especially in view of the fact that in this case they are not going directly to cost the country anything. The argument of the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems to be utterly demolished so far as this department is concerned as regards increases to clerks, who are all deserving and who have been recommended by the gentleman standing in the position of a Deputy Minister. As to what the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has said, I do not think there is much difference between his view and mine. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman means to say that Mr. Blake's view of the law was incorrect, and I do not suppose he would venture to set up his authority in a matter of this kind against that of Mr. Blake; I would not dream of doing it, for I do not profess to be a lawyer but merely a layman. I never suggested that it was obligatory to grant increases; and I think my hon. friend must have misapprehended what I said. All I said was that the spirit of the Act required that deserving clerks should receive increases.

Mr. DAVIN. We had better know what the law is. I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Let us have your opinion.

Mr. DAVIN. I have given my opinion, but I thought the opinion of Mr. Blake, quoted the other evening, would have had more weight with the hon. gentlemen opposite. With all deference to the hon. member for Lanark, I do not agree with the way in which he stated the law. This is what Mr. Blake said:

But, Sir, the practical operation of the law, which was passed in conformity with the recommendations of the commission, and which has not worked in conformity with those recommendations, is that there are these increases and these promotions going on steadily.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Blake was not construing the law, but he was complaining of its practical operation.

Mr. DAVIN. As the hon. gentleman thinks Mr. Blake's remarks refer to the practice,

I will show him that Mr. Blake was not dealing with that matter. He further said:

That the mischiefs to which I refer still prevail, and they prevail to this extent, as the Finance Minister sums up the case, that 420 out of the civil servants of the country have, within the last six years, received increases which make them now in receipt of $300 a year by virtue of these $50 increases apart from the promotion increases, or a total of $126,000 a year, which would be equal to the average wages of 420 mechanics with families.

Then there is a break in Mr. Blake's speech, and he subsequently proceeds to say:

I maintain that it ought to be changed; I maintain that the system is a bad one. In those cases in which you give increases, the increases ought not, in my opinion, to be given as this law gives them.

I maintain there ought to be no right to an increase, even in those cases in which increases may be given.

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertion; whereas, by this law, it is given as a matter of course.

That does not mean "given as a matter of course" in consequence of any practice carried on after the law was passed. Surely the hon. gentleman must take this view, that if the law provides for certain things to be done in regard to any person in the community, it should be done. If you have the opinion of a great lawyer as to the interpretation of that statute and it coincides with the opinions of other men, who are not probably such high authorities, surely what we should do if we wanted to depart from the course hitherto followed, was to change the law. I am not discussing the policy; but in view of the interpretation given by the hon. member for Lanark, it is only right that we should really know how the law stands. Mr. Blake further goes on to say:

I maintain that the increase should only be given as a stimulus to extra exertions; whereas, by this law, it is given as a matter of course, for unless a man's conduct is disgracefully bad, the rule is to give the increase. If the rule is not without exceptions, let us hear the exceptions. But I need not argue this point, because the Finance Minister himself describes the increase as an increase inevitable under the provisions of the Civil Service Act.

Again, Mr. Blake says:

Then we descend in the grade, and we find a second-class clerk commencing with $1,000, increasable at the same arbitrary rate, as time rolls on, to $1,400 a year. The same fixed sum of $50 a year is added to the salary of each clerk, whether he is of the lowest class or the highest class. The Secretary of State must know that increases in salaries should be in proportion to the value of the services, having due regard to the then salary; whereas, in this case, there is an arbitrary sum of $50 a year, without rhyme or reason, added to the salary of each officer, from the lowest class up to the highest.

Mr. Blake was arguing against the Act, not against the practice. Then the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) followed, and he made a statement, obiter dictum. He did not follow in the same debate, but he moved an amendment on the same night. He said :

Yet, in the face of this fact, Parliament is asked to increase the salaries of these mechanical clerks, and give them $50 annual increase.

Let us repeal the Act, if you will, but let us not retain an Act on the Statute-book under which a contract is made with a man who enters the service, that he shall enter it at a certain salary with a certain statutory increase of $50 a year up to a certain maximum. I am not discussing whether the terms of the Act are wise or not ; but I say that a few thousand dollars are but dust in the balance compared with the honour of Canada ; and I say the honour of Canada is involved and that hon. gentlemen are endeavouring to sneak out of the contract for the sake of effecting a few dollars saving, in the face of reckless extravagance in other directions. Let us do right and do justice in this matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite can make their savings if they please ; they need not add to the expenditure or to the public debt, and they can avoid doing so by preventing expenditures of a round quarter of a million dollars ; but here with a proposed increase of $50 to one poor clerk and $50 to another, the Government are trying to sneak a miserable saving for the purpose of trying to counterbalance their extravagance in other directions.

Department of the Interior..... $104,824

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I can now give my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) the information he desires. There are thirty-six clerks and two messengers who are eligible for statutory increases.

Mr. FOSTER. How many have been given ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Five clerks and two messengers are to receive the increase under these Estimates.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are these ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. J. S. Eagleson, C. W. Badgeley, Miss Maud May, Miss Barber and Mr. R. A. Lewis are the clerks ; the messengers are H. Ackland and B. H. Wright.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Badgeley has a salary of $900.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. Badgeley was getting $900 and he will now get $950. Mr. Eagleson is in the same category.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is James Shore Eagleson and C. W. Badgeley, who are getting $900, and will now get $950, which is pretty well up to the respectable salary my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) talks about. But in that same class we find men are getting $700, $650 and $500, comparatively small salaries, and they are not getting any increase. Of course, they have not been in so long a time as Eagleson and Badgeley, but if the increase is to be given as the hon. member (Mr. McMullen) argued, on the ground of getting a fair salary for the work done, it would seem that those who are least paid should have the increase if they are deserving. Perhaps they are not deserving, and the Minister might tell us why he gave the increase to these four and kept it from the others.

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Because the Deputy Minister reported, in pursuance of the Act, that these clerks were deserving of an increase, and I concurred in it.

Mr. FOSTER. And he did not report to the Minister that any others were deserving.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt he journeyed in the line the Minister of Finance suggested. The deputy very likely knows what the political desire of his head is. I believe he was put into that department because of that ; that there might be the strictest concordance between the Minister and his deputy in the way of party work and partisan zeal.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Can the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) find any evidence of partisanship in the increases which have been given ?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I could, as a matter of antecedent history.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am not aware of it.

Mr. FOSTER. And I am not sure that I could not in the less ancient, but equally interesting history of what his procedure has been since the Minister installed his deputy in office, after the great battle, the very great battle, I believe, that the opposing forces waged. I am not sure that the big policeman from Ontario would not relish this if he were present, but I am told that the opposing forces were drawn up in battle array and that the Minister of the Interior had to journey back to his native heath and reinforce the confidence of his friends there, and reinforce himself against the attacks of his friends.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. member allow me to make a suggestion ?

Mr. FOSTER. The young Napoleon from the North-west vanquished them by superior strategy or superior obstinacy, I am not sure which ; but he did it at the expense of one of the best officers that the Dominion of Canada has ever had, and one of the most faithful ; a man who, if he did not get the reward that his services entitled him to here, has, I hope, got his reward now. Who is the chief clerk that has been made by promotion?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
Mr. Ryley.

Mr. FOSTER. Again I call the attention of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to this. Here is a division which contains seven chief clerks, and now puts on another. A man who was getting $1,800 might be supposed to be getting what the hon. gentleman from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) would call a substantially good salary, and I think the Minister has rather offended against the rule laid down by the hon. member (Mr. McMullen).

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR.
The salary of this gentleman is not increased.

Mr. FOSTER. But he is given his promotion, which is tantamount to an increase, and which may be given under this capricious rule laid down by the Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER. Wait until the increase is asked for.

Mr. FOSTER. But we can see the beginning long before the end and my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) is laying the train for giving an increase to a high-salaried man.

The PRIME MINISTER. Fifty dollars is not much for Napoleon.

Mr. FOSTER. Ah, the Napoleon would not be satisfied with $50. Nothing less than the Yukon satisfied the Napoleon, but the Napoleon has a very apt way of providing his men with small increases, while his mind grasps millions.

Department of Indian Affairs..... $45,070

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In this department there are two promotions from third-class clerks to second-class clerks; one statutory increase for a clerk, and one statutory increase for a messenger. There are twenty-four clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is something that ought to be explained. We have been taunted on this side of the House that we are trying to increase the Estimates, while the Government is labouring with all its heart to keep them down. Now, so far as we have gone in the Estimates, you have under one Minister the addition of a chief clerk in one department. You have the addition of a chief clerk in the Department of Indian Affairs? What is the reason of this?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is so printed in the Estimates, but it is not so in fact. I fancy that it arises from the fact that the law clerk is put in this year as a chief clerk. But there is no change in the Estimates from last year.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has two more second-class clerks than last year. What is the reason for that increase in high-class clerkships?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. As I stated in the case of the Department of the Interior, H. J. Brock and E. A. Kemp were favourably reported upon by the Secretary of the department and the deputy as being entitled to promotion, from the length of their services; and after consideration, I decided to recommend it. There can be no special reason for it, except that they were considered very good officers, and the nature of their work and their attention to it seemed to deserve the recognition of promotion.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a direct instance in which the aim of the Government has been defeated. These men, when third-class clerks, were doing a certain kind of work for which they were given $1,000 a year; I imagine that they are doing the same kind of work as second-class clerks; but so long as they were in the third-class list, they could not receive any advance in salary, because they had reached the maximum. But they are promoted to be second-class clerks, with $100 a year more, and are put in a position where the hon. gentleman can give them the statutory increases. There is a direct instance where, instead of economy, there is the opposite.

Mr. DAVIN. Does my hon. friend anticipate that there will be any addition to this expenditure in the Indian Department, in the Supplementary Estimates?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have no information to give on that point.

Mr. DAVIN. Will he explain why it is not less than it is now, because he has dispensed with a Deputy Minister?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Deputy Minister was not estimated for last year.

Department of Finance..... $50,840

Mr. FOSTER. Can the hon. Minister give us the information on this?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). There are seven statutory increases—that is the entire number of those eligible for the increase. The Department of Finance, not to the credit of myself, but largely to the credit of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, has been, I think, admitted to be one of the most economically managed departments of the Government. While the tendency in the other departments has been to increase the number of their officials—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some of the others.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I was speaking of former years. The Finance Department has notably kept down the number of its officials. The result is that we have a very limited number of excellent officials. My deputy has recommended them all for the increase, and, after considering the matter, I think it wise policy to confirm the recommendation.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman please give me the names of those who are recommended?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. C. W. Treadwell, A. B. Foster, W. H. Hayes, E. L. Brittain, J. C. Saunders, N. S. Garland, S. J. Jenkins, and a messenger, Ostrom.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt these are all good men; I am saying nothing against their increases. I am bound not to say anything against the hon. gentleman's compliment to the department as it has been managed in the past, and I have no doubt that it will be managed with full efficiency in the future, so long as my hon. friend is there, if he will, as I did, stick pretty closely to the traditions which have been the traditions of that department for a good many years. But the question is this. The hon. gentleman has seven who were eligible for the increase, and he has given the increase to all of them, on the ground that his deputy reported that they were deserving of it. But the Auditor General, for instance, equally strongly recommended all of his clerks for the increase. We will not introduce any discrimination by saying that the clerks in one department are not just as faithful as those in another. But the hon. gentleman reduced the number of eighteen in the Auditor General's department to three, even though no greater expense to the country would have been incurred by carrying out the Auditor General's recommendation, while the Finance Department will cost a little more to the country than it did before. Does not my hon. friend think, under these circumstances, that he has been guilty of an inconsistency? I am not finding fault with the giving of the increase to the seven in the Department of Finance; but why should it not be given to equally good men, so far as doing their work is concerned, in the department over which the Auditor General presides, especially when it would not have cost the country any more? Has not my hon. friend any reply to that?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have already discussed the case of the Auditor General, and I am afraid I could not add anything to what I have already said.

Department of Customs..... $38,750

Mr. FOSTER. How many are eligible for statutory increases?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Twenty-three are eligible and seven are receiving it.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. FOSTER. What are the names of the seven?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Farrow, who is the accountant and whose present salary is $1,650, gets $50 more; Mr. Morin, chief of the seizure department, has $1,400 and gets $50 more; Mr. Breadner, chief clerk, at $1,150, gets $50 more. These are the heads of the different departments, and their work is heavy.

Mr. FOSTER. They are good men.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Watson has $650, Mr. Rorke $650, and Mr. Lafontaine $650 per year. They all came in about the same time in 1891, and I am giving each of them $50 increase. Mr. Moir appointed two or three years later, is getting $450, and gets $50 increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Why does my hon. friend not give the increase to the other sixteen? Were they not recommended by his deputy?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. He recommended these.

Mr. FOSTER. And the others?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No; we talked together.

Mr. FOSTER. And after the big talk, the recommendations came in. My hon. friend shows very well the surroundings of his early political life. He comes from the land of pow-wows and big talks.

Department of Inland Revenue..... $37,340

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the number of clerks eligible for the statutory increase, and the number who received it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). Ten gentlemen were eligible, but I did not recommend any for the increase.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Were there any reported by the Deputy Minister as worthy?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You did not talk together.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No; I understood that there were to be no increases, and that, under the circumstances, there was no use in my recommending them.

Mr. FOSTER. Now we see how this worked out. My hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, heard the general talk of the Ministers that there were to be no statutory increases, thinking that they were saying what they meant, and that there would not be any. He, therefore, going on that ground, although in his department there were men recommended for the increase, did not ask for any. Then his colleagues went to work and asked for increases in their departments.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I wish to explain that I am not quite so guiltless as my hon. friend thinks. There are two branches in my department—the inside and the outside—and when the question of increase came up, and I had to meet the same difficulty as my colleagues, I preferred to recommend the officers in the outside branch who had just passed successfully the technical examinations, by which they could obtain promotion from one rank to another; and when we come to the outside service my hon. friend will see that I recommended every one who passed a successful examination. I thought that since I had to choose between the two, it was certainly my duty to encourage, by every possible means, those officers in our outside service who had passed these examinations.

Mr. FOSTER. But my hon. friend has not explained away his first statement that he understood no increases were to be granted.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I did not say I understood that they were not to be granted in the inside service, but that they would not all be granted. That was the first idea. Then when I had to choose between the two, when I knew I could not obtain the increase for all the officers of my department, I preferred those who had qualified themselves by hard labour in passing these technical examinations.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not the first one who has found that professions are not always carried out in practice. No doubt he thought the Government were not going to grant the increase, and so he made his reservation. I will take back what I said just now. I will not say that my hon. friend is guilty of anything for he is not, but he is more wily and astute than I gave him credit for at first. That little trip he took with Li Hung Chang resulted in his acquiring a good deal of astuteness. And even though the employees in the inside service are not going to be very much solaced by that, I am glad that he is going to give some increases to the men in the outside service who passed those technical examinations. Were the increases given last year?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I recommended them last year. I would like to be clearly understood as I do not want for a moment to be considered in a position more favourable than my colleagues. When I knew that every one of those who were entitled by law, or what I understood to be the law and what hon. gentlemen understand to be the law—when I knew it was impossible for all of them to get the increase, I thought it was my duty to choose among them, and my colleagues appeared to appreciate the choice I made in recommending the outside service.

Department of Marine and Fisheries.... $55,830

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Twenty-two are eligible, and one was granted the increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Who was the fortunate one?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Miss Doyle, acting as assistant private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not say a word against that. Are there any changes in the department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. None.

Department of Railways and Canals.... $39,680

Mr. FOSTER. I would like similar information with regard to this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There are fifteen, I think, eligible for the statutory increase, and five receive it.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman please give the names of these five?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Mr. Gleason, Mr. Loftus and Mr. Wright, of the third class; and Mr. Payne and Mr. Ross, of the second class.

Mr. FOSTER. There are no other changes?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. One other. One gentleman was transferred to my department from the Militia and Defence Department—Mr. Payne.

Mr. FOSTER. Was there a transfer to the Militia Department—was it a mutual transfer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes; Mr. Payne, when in the Militia Department, was in receipt of $200 a year—I think that was the figure—more than Mr. Beard, who was transferred from the Railway Department. So, I brought Mr. Payne's salary up to the same amount in my department as he had received in the other.

Department of Public Works..... $45,550

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have similar explanations from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte).

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. Minister of Public Works has committed the offence of saving about $3,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). There are ten employees in my department who are eligible for the statutory increase. After discussing the whole case with my Deputy Minister, we came to the conclusion that two men were especially deserving of the increase. One of these was Mr. J. C. Blais, who was receiving $1,350, and who will now receive $1,400. The other was Mr. Theriault, who was receiving $1,300 and who will now receive $1,350. Mr. Blais, I thought, was not sufficiently paid. He has charge of the public works in the district of Chicoutimi. He has pretty hard work to do and does a good deal of travelling, and I thought it was good policy to pay him what he earned. Mr. Theriault is a faithful officer. He served as a soldier in the rebellion of 1870. Both of his legs have been amputated. As I say, he is a faithful employee and I think deserving of the increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there among these clerks one named Charleson ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not under this item.

Department of Geological Survey..... $51,950

Mr. FOSTER. What are the changes here ? I see there is one extra man.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, Mr. J. M. Macoun has been appointed as naturalist of the department, at a salary of $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. How was he paid before ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I believe he was doing special service in connection with the Behring Sea arbitration. There is a reduction in the salary of the lithologist from $1,550 to $1,450.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is that ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The gentleman who occupied that position has left the service, and we appropriate $1,450 to start the new man.

Mr. FOSTER. Was the new man formerly in the employ of the department or was he an outside man ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. We have not made the appointment. We are asking the appropriation, and we expect to make the appointment as soon as we find a suitable man. Then, there is a change in the vote of the salary of the assistant geologist, Mr. R. N. Brock. The assistant geologist formerly in the employ of the department went out. His salary was $1,100. We start the new man at $1,050.

Mr. FOSTER. In both cases where you put in a new man you put him at a less salary ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is the rule.

Mr. TARTE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Were the older technical officers increased ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, they remain the same.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, the officers of the Geological Survey do not come under the civil service law with reference to the $50 increase.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They do now.

Mr. FOSTER. How many were eligible for the increase ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Twenty-two.

Mr. FOSTER. How many received it ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. None.

Department of Trade and Commerce, including $1,550 for the salary of J. P. Nutting, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act. $8,780

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We dispensed with one of the staff. There are five persons eligible for the increases, and two receive it. To the first-class clerk, Mr. Nutting, who acts practically as head of the department under Mr. Parmalee, I propose an increase of $100. He has been in the service for a quarter of a century, and is a specially good officer. The other is Miss Shaw, who was receiving $450, and I propose to give her $500, to put her on an equality with the other lady clerk. There is an increase of $30 to the messenger, who received $300 and is now to receive $330.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, you are giving three increases.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Two increases among the clerks, and one to a messenger. Six would have been eligible, including the messenger.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend now, with his added years of experience, recanted the opinion that he at one time held in this House with reference to this Department of Trade and Commerce, and as to its being so unnecessary ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The Department of Trade and Commerce may be made a useful department.

The Office of the High Commissioner for Canada in England, including $1,700 to C. F. Just, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act $9,300

Mr. FOSTER. What is the number of eligible men here for the increase ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think four are eligible. The increase to C. F. Just is from $1,550 to $1,700.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is there anything in the estimates for Mr. Colmer? My hon. friend knows he is a very valuable officer.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is nothing.

Contingencies, rent and insurance on office, income tax, fuel, light, stationery, &c., and the amount ($2,000) required towards the contingent expenses (water, light, fuel, carriage hire and railway fare) of the High Commissioner, and $1,200 for contingencies (rates, taxes, insurance, ground rent, &c.) of the official residence, including the income tax on the High Commissioner's salary $11,700

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is an increase of $500 for clerical assistance, but not an increase in the general vote for the High Commissioner. The increase would probably be for temporary clerks or possibly the employment of one additional clerk.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was any recommendation made for an increase to Mr. Colmer? I have no desire to press increases upon the Government, but when increases are being made, I suppose it is the desire of the Government to increase the salaries of those who are best fitted to perform their duties, and who perform the most valuable services. I think any hon. gentleman who knows Mr. Colmer's services in London, is aware that they have been exceedingly valuable to the country.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the High Commissioner has a very high appreciation of the services of Mr. Colmer and of the staff generally, and I think he would like to increase the remuneration of the staff to a larger extent than we would be willing. For the present we have not been able to go further than the increase I have intimated.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is this to be said about Mr. Colmer, that he has to sustain a position in London which an officer here receiving the same salary would not have to sustain. I am sure the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government must know something of Mr. Colmer's work, and will be able to bear me out in saying that $3,000 is not a large salary.

Mr. FOSTER. Under the item of contingencies, are such things as tumblers, glasses and decanters provided for? I ask that question because at this particular time I do not hear any voice raised in denunciation of the iniquity of having tumblers, glasses and decanters paid for by the people's hard-earned taxes, in the High Commissioner's office.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I can assure the hon. gentleman that Lord Strathcona is not putting in a bill for either glasses, tumblers and decanters, or the contents thereof, in any form or shape. I may just remark that I am rather inclined to believe that the sum which Lord Strathcona pays for the residence that he at present occupies in Cadogan Place, is exactly equivalent to the salary he receives as High Commissioner. I think he is paying about £2,000 sterling for his present residence in London.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the least doubt that Lord Strathcona is not ungenerous in his expenditures in any way, but that does not give an answer to the question I asked.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I can assure the hon. gentleman that he is not charging us for tumblers or glasses or anything else.

Mr. FOSTER. And that under this item not a tumbler or a glass will be paid for?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think not.

Mr. FOSTER. We will see next year.

Mr. WALLACE. I think there should be a thorough reorganization of the High Commissioner's office. I think they have drifted away from their duties.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill (No. 109) to incorporate the British American Light and Power Company.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

Bill (No. 116) to incorporate the Canadian Mining Institute.—(Mr. Haley.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Atlas Loan Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

Bill (No. 88)—from the Senate—incorporating the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company.—(Mr. Casey.)

TORONTO AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CLARK moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I wish to make some observations on this Bill, because I think it is one of very considerable importance. It is a Bill to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company and the incorporators are, as I understand it, trustees who are working in the interests of the people of Toronto. The names to this Bill are, George Gooderham, John Herbert Mason, Robert Davis, W. R. Brock, the Hon. Lyman Melvin Jones and John Shaw, all of the city of Toronto, and the latter being the mayor of that city. In asking Parliament to grant the incorporation of this company, the plea put forward is that the city of Toronto is being injured on account of the imperfect facilities afforded for carrying on their trade between Toronto and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the west, owing to the disagreement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in respect to that portion of the line between Toronto and North Bay. I have always contended that there was another means of accomplishing this connection at a much earlier date, and with less trouble than by asking for the incorporation of a new company and the building of another railway through that section of country. Foreseeing the great need of a direct connecting link between Toronto and south-western Ontario and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as long ago as 1881 a company was incorporated for the purpose of building a connecting link between what was then the Hamilton and North-western road, from Gravenhurst to Callander station—which afterwards reached North Bay—for the purpose of making a connection between the south-western system of railways in Ontario and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At that time, as the older members of the House will remember, the Canadian Pacific Railway was being built, and we in south-western Ontario thought that it would side track the city of Toronto, and that district. Several deputations waited on the Government to induce them to build a connecting link of railway that would be open to all companies in Canada for the future to run freight and passenger trains, so that we might have an independent connecting link between the then existing Northern Railway and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Callander or North Bay. I have here the names of the incorporators of that Act, and I will read them to show that that was the object which they had in view. I remember the passing of this Act very distinctly and the reason why the numerous names appear as incorporators, was, that they might represent every portion of that section of Ontario. They are as follows:—The Hon. Frank Smith, of the city of Toronto, merchant, senator of the Dominion of Canada; Adam Brown, of the city of Hamilton, merchant; Noah Barnhart, merchant; the Hon. Alexander Morris, M.P.P.; Dalton McCarthy, M.P. and Frederick W. Cumberland, Esquire, all of the city of Toronto; John Stuart, merchant; John Proctor, railway contractor; A. T. Wood, merchant (now member for Hamilton); Alexander Turner, merchant; E. Gurney, manufacturer; William Hendrie, railway contractor; M. Leggatt, merchant; P. D. Dayfort, merchant; Thomas Robertson, M.P., Q.C.; Francis Edwin Kilvert, M.P. (both of these gentlemen then members for Hamilton);

Mr. SPROULE.

Britton B. Osler, Q.C.; James Turner, merchant, and Alexander McInnes, merchant, all of the city of Hamilton; C. W. Bunting, M.P., newspaper publisher; Samuel Platt, M.P., Esquire; James Beatty, jr., M.P., Q.C.; G. D'Arcy Boulton, barrister at law; Frederick W. Strange, M.P., physician; John Fiskien, merchant; William B. Hamilton, President of the Board of Trade of the city of Toronto, merchant; William F. McMaster, merchant; William Thompson, merchant; A. M. Smith, merchant; William Ince, merchant; Alderman David Walker, Wm. B. Scarth, broker; Eugene O'Keefe, brewer; the Hon. John McMurrich, merchant; R. W. Elliott, merchant; Alfred Boulton, M.P.; Alderman A. R. Boswell, and Robert Hay, M.P., furniture manufacturer, all of the city of Toronto; Thomas Arkell, M.P., of the town of St. Thomas; Timothy Coughlin, M.P., of Offa; D. MacMillan, M.P., of the city of London, barrister at law; S. R. Hesson, M.P., of the town of Stratford, in the county of Perth; William O'Brien, of the township of Oro, in the county of Simcoe, farmer; William Carruthers Little, M.P., of the township of Innisfil, Esquire; Thomas Long, M.P.P., of the town of Collingwood, merchant; Charles Cameron, of the same place, steamboat owner; George Moberley, of the same place, barrister at law; Nathaniel C. Wallace, M.P., of Woodbridge; John White, M.P., of Roslin; Alexander Robertson, M.P.P., of Belleville; and Arthur Rankin, of the town of Windsor, Esquire.

Mr. FOSTER. It would take a railway to carry all those.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes. I merely read these names to show that they were residents not only of the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, London and Stratford, but that the incorporators came from different localities in south-western Ontario, because it was conceived that the whole of south-western Ontario was directly interested in the building of this independent line. That company was incorporated and certain provisions were put in the charter, one of the provisions being:

The company shall make running arrangements with, and give running powers to any railway company or companies in the Dominion of Canada (whether incorporated by the Dominion or any of the provincial legislatures) which are now or may hereafter be situate on the line or lines hereby authorized, or which touch or cross the same, or any line or lines which connect with any of such lines, upon terms to be agreed upon; and such running powers shall include all proper and necessary facilities in sidings for obtaining fuel and water, and generally for the passing and working of the trains of the company or companies exercising the same; and the facilities so to be given shall be equal to all companies exercising such powers, so that no unfair advantage shall be given to any one company over another in the use of the said lines.

Then there was a provision inserted in regard to any possible amalgamation of this railway with any other :

Provided the arrangements therefor shall be approved of by two-thirds of the shareholders. * * * Provided further that the company who may become lessees thereof and the railway leased shall be subject to all the obligations hereby imposed on the company hereby incorporated.

The conditions imposed were that it would be a free and independent line, and that it would give running powers equally to all railways in Canada. With these conditions and obligations it was found difficult to finance the railway, and Parliament was asked to grant it a special subsidy so that it might be kept an independent line. At that time the usual grant given in aid of railways by the Dominion Parliament was $3,200 per mile ; but it was considered that if this company were granted only that much they would be obliged to arrange with some other company to build the road. Therefore, we applied to the Government for a larger subsidy. In the first year after the company was incorporated, this Parliament, by 45 Victoria, chap. 14, granted for a railway from Gravenhurst to Callander, both in the province of Ontario, a subsidy not exceeding $6,000 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $660,000. In the succeeding year the incorporators of the company came back to Parliament and asked for a larger bonus, because they were unable to finance the scheme and keep the railway independent of all other roads ; and in 46 Vic., Parliament granted an additional subsidy for a railway from Gravenhurst to Callander, a distance of 110 miles, a subsidy not exceeding $6,000 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $660,000. The two subsidies amounted to a million and a quarter of dollars for 110 miles of railway, although the distance afterwards turned out to be a little greater. But I draw attention to the fact that that large subsidy of $12,000 per mile, four times as much as the usual subsidy, was given for the purpose of keeping this an independent line, open to all railways that might wish to take their traffic over it. By that means the road was financed and built. It was afterwards turned over to the Hamilton and North-western, and finally got into the hands of the Grand Trunk. But the agreement which was entered into and ratified by Parliament, contained the same provision, that this road should be open to all other railways to carry their traffic over it on equal terms, and that has been continued down to the present time. There was also a provision inserted in the Act, that in the event of this road not being operated in the interest of the general public, with all railways having the same right to pass over it, Parliament could step in and take over the road by paying its actual cost, after deducting the $12,000 a mile which Parliament gave and $8,000 per mile of bonds which Parliament was to guarantee. That road has been operated for some years, and, so far as we know, satisfactorily to both the Canadian Pacific and Grand Trunk. I think I can appeal to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) because he took a lively interest in this railway, in the interest of south-western Ontario with the view of securing it as an independent line that would be available for all railways in the country. If I remember correctly, the hon. member was afterwards the president of the road. At any rate, I give you this history to show you the aim of Parliament in granting such a large subsidy to that road ; how it was built, and how it was leased to two other companies ; how all the original obligations imposed on the original company were transferred to these companies ; how in the event of the companies disagreeing in regard to the traffic arrangements the dispute would be submitted to arbitration, each company appointing an arbitrator, and the third being appointed by a judge of the Superior Court ; how in the event of the railway failing to serve the public as was originally intended, Parliament should step in and take over the road. We have reached the stage when the country is not getting its rights over that road, which the country hoped to receive, in return for the large subsidies it had given. These two railway companies have disagreed, they have not attempted by arbitration to settle their dispute, and Parliament has not attempted either to enforce the agreement or to take over the road. Now, what are we asked to do as a remedy for this state of things ? We are asked by the people of Toronto to incorporate another company to build a line over the same route. I have always held that if the Toronto people were sincere, they would bring influence to bear on the Government to induce them to compel these two companies to come to terms, or take over that road. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), when offering himself for election, said that one of his first efforts would be to secure better terms for carrying the trade between Toronto and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because Toronto was handicapped by the present state of things between the two companies. But when the hon. member comes here, the only thing the hon. member has done since coming here, so far as I know, has been to make one short speech lasting about two minutes, after we had a great deal of trouble to draw him out of his cage, in which he said, "The Toronto people are used badly, and the Government ought to do something"—that was about all. Now, the people of Toronto are asking us to incorporate another company for the purpose of building a railway practically over the same route. If we do that, we shall be practically admitting that the provision which Parliament made in the interest of the people cannot be carried out; we shall be practically admitting our inability as a Parliament to exercise the powers that were given to Parliament by that Act, and that the railway corporations can defy Parliament. That will be establishing a bad precedent; because that law is surrounded with all the safeguards that could possibly be contained in any Act of Parliament. If we incorporate another company to build a railway between these two points, in answer to the request of the city of Toronto, then I say Parliament will be admitting that it has no power or authority in the matter. I think we should not do that. We are practically ignoring entirely our own rights and powers in this case.

There is another interesting feature about this. I see by the papers the day before yesterday there was an interesting conference here over this matter. I have here a short account of that conference. I do not know that it is absolutely correct, but I presume it is and will read it for the benefit of the House. It is from the Ottawa correspondence of the Toronto "World":

Ottawa, April 27.—(Special.)—An important conference respecting the proposed Toronto and Hudson's Bay Railway was held to-day. There were present: Mayor John Shaw and two of the Hudson's Bay Railway commissioners, George Gooderham and W. R. Brock, with W. T. Jennings, engineer of the company, and Messrs. Wallace Nesbitt, Q.C., Clarke, Osler Bertram, Robertson, Maclean and Wallace.

For the old Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company—

There are two other charters in existence to-day to build railways through the same territory, and we might force these people to either build the railways or give up their charters.

—there were present: Messrs. W. B. McMurrich and Col. Tisdale, M.P., while Messrs. William Mackenzie and D. D. Mann and Col. Hughes, M.P., were there in the interests of the charter, which they got last session for a railway from Toronto to James Bay by way of Parry Sound, known as the James Bay Railway Company.

The two companies that have charters over the same ground combined to fight the present company seeking incorporation, and it is rather interesting to find the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram), in spite of his declaration that he was so anxious to get railway connection for Toronto, associated with parties fighting against this incorporation which he had promised to help on as much as possible.

The two existing companies, Torontonians are well aware, have practically pooled their interests,—

That is the Toronto and James Bay Railway and the Nipissing and James Bay Railway Company.

—or rather Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have secured a controlling interest in the N. & J. B. Railway, hence their interests in the two charters being identical, they have, so far, opposed the move which the citizens of Toronto are making.

A Regular Pitched Battle.

There was a regular pitched battle this afternoon, but finally matters began to shape themselves, and it was eventually decided to refer the matter to a small committee to see if an agreement could be reached. On the one side were Mayor Shaw, Messrs. Gooderham, Brock, Wallace Nesbitt and A. M. Grier; on the other, were Messrs. William Mackenzie, John Laidlaw, Q.C., Col. Tisdale, Hon. George A. Cox and Mr. Bertram, M.P.

These were the parties fighting against Toronto getting the new incorporation, and among them was the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). He wanted the men holding charters that cover the same ground and who are not going on, to build the road.

They were in session for three hours to-night, with the result that an agreement was reached which must be satisfactory to both sides.

That is, to the incorporators of the new company and the incorporators of the two old companies, but nothing at all about the public and the city of Toronto except in so far as the city of Toronto was represented by Mayor Shaw and his colleague.

All opposition to the proposed Toronto charter is to be withdrawn, but it is understood that after it has passed Parliament operations will be suspended for two years in order to give the Mackenzie-McMurrich syndicate an opportunity of putting their road through from North Bay to James Bay. Should they be successful in doing this, it is an understanding that a guarantee is given to Toronto in the matter of rates.

A guarantee is given to Toronto in the matter of rates, but all the rest of south-western Canada is left out, though when Parliament gave the last subsidy, it gave it for the whole of Ontario as represented by the large number of incorporators in the original company. So long as the interests of Toronto are satisfied it is all right.

Failing positive action by existing companies within the period named, then the Toronto commissioners will go to work actively under the charter now being asked from Parliament.

Mayor Shaw is well satisfied with the outlook. He has worked hard to secure an agreement, and appreciates the friendly spirit in which Mr. Mackenzie and his associates met the Toronto delegation.

Here is the interesting part of it. First, Toronto says there is urgent need for some immediate arrangements to give us connection with the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, because we have not the right we ought to have. They come forward to charter another company for the purpose of building a road where there is a road already and where Parliament has the right to take over that road, if it is not run in the interests of the country. But if there is urgent need, how do they show it? By entering into a private arrangement with these two other railway companies who own these other charters. They first say they want an Act so as to build the road immediately, but they agree to suspend their own charter for two years. Then if Mackenzie & Mann do not go on and build, they take two more years to commence, which makes four years, and then they have five years to finish. During nine years, therefore, the city of Toronto and western Canada may be locked up, as far as the charter goes, and it is not a bit better off to-day. Does it show wisdom on the part of the city of Toronto to enter into any such agreement. Should Parliament sanction this thing? I think not. It seems to me it is practically a quarrel between two corporations, each of which holds a charter, and another which wants one.

Mr. WALLACE. What are these two charters?

Mr. SPROULE. The Nipissing and James Bay Railway charter and the Toronto and James Bay Railway charter.

Mr. WALLACE. The Nipissing and James Bay only runs from Lake Nipissing.

Mr. SPROULE. But it got power last year to build to Parry Sound from there. The holders of these charters are quarreling among themselves. Two weeks ago in Simcoe I saw the engineers on the road, and was told that they were put on by the Canadian Pacific Railway, that Mackenzie & Mann and McMurrich & Cox were manipulating the charter, and they put on the engineer for the purpose of burking this charter by showing that they were actively engaged in building the railway at present.

I would not be surprised that after this session, in spite of the fact that the surveyors are on now, we will hear no more about it until another session.

The other feature is this, that while these rival corporations are disagreeing among themselves—whether they are trying to sell out their charters to each other or get money from each other—the public has to suffer, and the remedy proposed by the trustees of Toronto is not such a remedy as will give relief in the time required by the public. Parliament has the right to take over that road.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS (Mr. Blair). It has not any right to take that road over, I think, on the ground alleged. The Act is defective in that respect.

Mr. SPROULE. The Act says that when in the interest of the public the road is not being run, Parliament can take it over, and it is for Parliament to say if it is run in the interest of the public to-day. Have all railway companies equal rights to run over that road as was contemplated in the original Act? Why do I say so? Because the Canadian Pacific Railway is not availing itself of this road, is not exercising the rights it is entitled to exercise under the provision of the original charter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is only one condition on which the Government could resume possession, control and ownership of that road, and that condition is not present.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the Minister (Mr. Blair) be good enough to specify that condition according to his view of it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There are two or three stipulations contained in this agreement, as I recollect them. One is with reference to the exercise of running rights. The other is as to discriminating tolls. So far as the violation of the contract in respect of the first of these features is concerned, the Government would have a clear unquestioned right to enforce it against this particular company and in respect of this particular road. But it would only be in respect of the violation of the contract in the other particular that the Government would have the right to resume the control of the road upon the payment of a certain amount of money. Now, that has not occurred. The hon. gentleman has not been able to show that there has been any discriminations in rates.

Mr. SPROULE. I am trying to show that the object that Parliament had in view when the road was subsidized was that all roads should have running powers over it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does not the hon. gentleman overlook the fact that the road was only from Gravenhurst to North Bay?

Mr. SPROULE. I intended to refer to that.

Mr. McCARTHY. The difficulty is that the road from Toronto to Gravenhurst is not affected by the stipulation. The object at the time, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will recollect, was to secure to the Grand Trunk Railway, which, at the time, did not own the road to Gravenhurst—it was the property of the Northern Railway—running rights over the road. The Grand Trunk were seeking the right to build to North Bay, and Parliament compromised the matter, so to speak, between the Northern and the Grand Trunk Railway by granting a charter to the Pacific Junction and giving these concessions which the Grand Trunk was supposed to avail itself of.

Mr. WALLACE. And to protect the public.

Mr. McCARTHY. And to protect the public. But the Grand Trunk, under an old provision of its charter, which had been lost sight of, acquired the Northern Railway and the lease of the Pacific Junction.

Mr. SPROULE. I was going to say that this clause does give the right to the Canadian Pacific Railway to run over that portion of the line.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not from Gravenhurst to Toronto?

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, that part of the line also. The clause is as follows:—

The company shall make running arrangements with, and give running powers to any railway company or companies in the Dominion of Canada (whether incorporated by the Dominion or any of the provincial legislatures) which are now or may hereafter be situate on the line or lines hereby authorized, or which touch or cross the same, or any line or lines which connect with any such lines, upon terms to be agreed upon;—

Mr. McCARTHY. That gives the right to them, but it does not make the old road subject to the obligation of the new road.

Mr. SPROULE. It does to this extent, that it gives running powers over it.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. What does it mean when it says "any line or lines which connect therewith"? It goes on:

—and such running powers shall include all proper and necessary facilities in sidings for obtaining fuel and water, and generally for the working or passing of the trains of the company or companies exercising the same, and the facilities so to be given shall be equal to all companies exercising such powers, so that no unfair advantage shall be given to any one company over another in the use of the said lines.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not read it for a long time, but that was not the intention.

Mr. SPROULE. That was the understanding of the members who went with the deputations to Sir John Macdonald about it.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is the new line.

Mr. SPROULE. The provision is made for running powers not only over the Canadian Pacific by this company but over any other line running over it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There may be running powers over either end of the road, but that is not covered by that agreement, according to my recollection.

Mr. SPROULE. Then if there is no right over the road from Gravenhurst to Toronto, that means that there is only a road of 111 miles left out. There might be a justification to build an independent line over that portion, but, when that is done, there is no reason why Parliament should build another line—because there will undoubtedly be an appeal to help the building of it over this 132 miles from Gravenhurst to North Bay, or, as some propose, to Sudbury. Some say there is need of a line from Toronto to Parry Sound. That is entirely a different proposition. I believe there may be need of a road through there to improve the connection between Toronto and the west by way of Parry Sound and Sudbury instead of North Bay. We have already one line that we can take possession of if the public is not served and we can save the cost of building another line over these 132 miles, and we can demand the right, in the interest of the public, that any railway company should have the right to pass over that road and take its traffic over it. For that reason I say, while I am in favour of building this road, I do not see that the passing of this charter will do any good. What do the hon. members for Toronto say? They say: It will help us to negotiate. With whom? With men who already hold two franchises and who may amalgamate their interests and a railway company with a road already built. This seems to me to be for a chance to buy or sell a charter, with somebody to make money out of it in the meantime. And when I see the parties connected with this scheme—not this last one, because I admit they are only trustees for the city of Toronto and could have no interest to sell—I am not inspired with great hope.

Mr. SPROULE.

An hon. MEMBER. Some of them are members of Parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. Some of them are members of Parliament, I admit. But because they are members of Parliament does that say they never sell a charter; never manipulate a charter?

An hon. MEMBER. Never.

Mr. CASEY. Hardly ever.

Mr. SPROULE. Hardly ever, perhaps. Who are these men? One is an hon. member of this House, a gentleman who expresses great anxiety to have some connection between Toronto and the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway at the earliest date, the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bertram). Another is Senator Cox, who has been a railway manipulator for many years. Another is Mr. Donald D. Mann. The other is Mr. Mackenzie. I am told that there are some other members of this House connected with it. I do not know that, and, therefore, will not say. But I say that the fact that these two charters are held by this crowd is justification, to my mind, for saying that the charters are held rather in the interest of individuals than in the interest of the country. If this corporation would go on and build the road, there would be no complaints, for then south-western Ontario would get what it wants and what it expects, and Toronto would get what it wants. But there is no getting out of it that, through this agreement between these individuals and these several corporations and after they can arrange matters financially among themselves to suit their own purposes and make the best out of it, they will agree, perhaps, for one company or the other to build the road.

But then the other feature of it is that this charter which is proposed for the purpose of constructing a railway between Toronto and James Bay, practically may be shut up for nine years before that road is built, at least shut up for two years to give the other railway company a chance, and this charter becomes null and void practically for two years. Then there are two years more during which it may commence operations, or practically four years before there need be a shovel full of earth turned for building that railway between Toronto and North Bay, so far as this charter goes. Then what is the trade of Toronto going to do in the meantime? What is the public going to do in the meantime? Where is the interest of the public and the interest of the shippers to come in? They have got to suffer, because the rival corporations cannot come to an agreement that suits their own purposes and give the benefits which the country naturally expected to receive when they granted charters to these various corporations. I may say that I hold one view in connection with charters that ought to be impressed upon the public, and I think the time will come when it will be impressed upon Parliament and upon the country. I believe that when we grant a charter to any corporation and they build a railway, that railway ought to be very much like a highway, that is to say, available to every person in the community, or like a turnpike road, that every person paying a fair compensation for the use of that road should have a right over it. When Parliament subsidizes a railway company for the purpose of building a road that is not in the interests of the general public, the public should not suffer because the holders of that charter do not see fit to work in the interest of the public, and so soon as the company control that corporation to the disadvantage of the public, either with regard to giving running rights to other railways over it, or running facilities, in the interest of the public, then I say Parliament should interfere, and we should claim the right to control that road in the interest of the public the same as provincial governments control every highway in the interests of the public. I say the time should never come that we should give up our control over the railways to the extent that we cannot interfere in the interests of the public until the people build a railway entirely with their own money, not asking any assistance from Parliament. But as long as Parliament gives assistance, then I say we should hold control over these railway corporations. I do not like to oppose this charter, because if the giving of this charter resulted in the building of a railway, it would be a great boon for us, and that is what we want. But I claim that the granting of this charter will not give the benefits to the public which it is claimed it will give.

I claim that those gentlemen who are professing to represent the city of Toronto, and to be so anxious to promote the trade of that great city and north-western Ontario, are not taking the best means at their disposal to accomplish what they profess to be desirous of accomplishing, otherwise they would not lock up the country for either two years or four years, in this fast age of the world, when trade once established cannot be easily diverted from its channels. I say they would not lock up that section of country for either two years or four years before they can move hand or foot to relieve the people of the burdens under which they are labouring to-day. Then I say on the other hand that Parliament should step in, we should not give up our rights, as we practically do by granting this charter, because if we accept the explanations of the representatives of Toronto as a justifiable reason why Parliament should give the charter, it is because we are helpless to do otherwise, and all the provision which Parliament up to the present has made, is of no avail in the interest of the public. Therefore we must step in and devise some other way or some other means to accomplish it in the interest of the public. Then I say Parliament is giving over its rights, abandoning its rights, or acknowledging that it cannot exercise the control which it claimed it would exercise in the interest of the public if such a condition of affairs arose as exists at the present time between these two railway corporations between Toronto and North Bay. I am told that the company who are pressing to build that railway to-day is the Canadian Pacific Railway. Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will be on to build that railway in a short time, and I hope they will do so in the interest of the country, and in the interest of Toronto, and in the interest of south-western Ontario. But they will build it when it suits their own purpose, and the only fear is that as soon as they do it, an understanding will be come to between the two roads, and the travelling public will be no better off, and the trade of the country will be handicapped as it is to-day, and practically no better off than if we had the one road. We give a right in this charter to amalgamate with either of these companies, to sell out to either of these companies to have running rights with either of these corporations. We leave it practically as it was before, because the parties that hold these charters can turn round and agree with each other and can sell out, the one can sell out to the other, and they can leave the public as they are at the present time. Now, while I am not disposed to oppose the granting of this charter, I think it my duty to bring these considerations to the attention of the House, I think it my duty to show where the parties are, and how they are acting who profess to be so desirous of giving, in the interest of Toronto and in the interest of the travelling public, the facilities which they ought to have between Toronto and North Bay, or between Toronto and Sudbury.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of private Bills having expired, the Committee of Supply will resume.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

High Commissioner's Office, contingencies $11,700

Mr. WALLACE. When the committee rose at six o'clock, I was going to make a remark or two upon this vote proposed for the High Commissioner's office in London. In my opinion the time has arrived when we should reconsider the whole position of the High Commissioner's office. I think that during the last two or three years it has drifted away from the original intention of what that office should be. To-day I do not think it performs the functions that Canada desires. What we want now, and what the office as at present constituted does not fulfil in any degree, is a business office. The business of Canada with Great Britain has increased enormously of late years, and we look forward in the future to a much larger increase. So far as I know, we are not taking very serious steps to promote that business, and I think it is time that we did so. In my opinion the Government should either change largely the functions of the office, or, if they find it necessary to continue the present management, they should have at any rate a business establishment in Great Britain to promote Canadian commerce. I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that about five-eighths of the total exports of Canada goes to Great Britain, and two-thirds of it, perhaps, to Great Britain and her colonies. Our total exports last year amounted to 130 million dollars, of which $82,500,000 went to Great Britain and her colonies, and about $77,250,000 went to Great Britain alone.

There is acknowledged to a great future for Canadian exports. Of the products of the fisheries, amounting to the value of about $10,000,000, more than $4,000,000 worth goes to Great Britain; of the products of the forest, amounting to $31,000,000, the value of $14,500,000 goes to Great Britain; of animals and their products, to the value of $129,000,000, $33,000,000 in value goes to Great Britain. All these are articles of commerce, which require great care in handling, to retain the market owing to the great competition, and our shippers have to depend on other than Government agencies to see that their interests are protected. Of a total export of agricultural products to the value of between $17,000,000 and $18,000,000, no less than $13,500,000 in value goes to Great Britain; and of manufactures, out of a total of $9,500,000, more than the value of $3,500,000 goes there.

Mr. SPROULE.

We have no agencies there to-day, no special facilities to enable the people of Canada to market their products there and no one to assist our shippers in enlarging our markets and looking after our general interests. It was originally intended that the High Commissioner's office should attend to these duties, and no doubt some years ago a good deal of work was done in that direction, but within the last two or three years the business portion of the work of the office has fallen away. There may be some reasons for the Government continuing the office as at present constituted. If there are, the Government should state the particular duties performed in the High Commissioner's office. We all know that the present incumbent of the position, with his enormous wealth, large interests and splendid hospitality, could hardly be expected to give attention to business interests, and I know from my own knowledge that this is the case. I think that the Government should take into consideration the propriety of establishing in London or Liverpool, say in the business part of London, a business office for the Dominion. It may be said that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have a business office here, and it is true they have an office where they look after their own particular business interests, which are undoubtedly to a large extent, Canadian interests. Those interests, however, are simply railroad interests and the selling of the company's lands, and the obtaining of settlers for those lands. But in our commercial interests the company are not interested, and it is not their business to look after the hundred and one business matters affected, and which belong directly or indirectly to the whole producing population of Canada. Those interests are not looked after by any one. I commend this suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who, I know, has given attention to it, in order that he may consider the advisability of establishing a large office, in charge of competent men sent from Canada, who would have associated with them men who understand business methods in England, for the purpose of looking after and promoting Canadian commercial interests. Let hon. gentlemen consider that no less than $77,000,000 of our total exports of $130,000,000 go to the British Isles. They are landed at two or three ports, and Canadian agents could look after our interests at the different points. The expense, whatever it might be, would be nothing compared with the results, if we secured good and competent men for the work, and surely such men could be found who would make it their special business to promote business interests and push Canadian goods, and look after the interests of the business men and producers of the Dominion. Take our exports of animals and their products, bacon ham, eggs, butter and cheese, and imagine the results that would follow if there were good men appointed whose duty it would be to advise our Canadian shippers, ascertain the best markets for our products and look after our interests. The expenditure by Canada would be returned one-hundred fold. To-day the High Commissioner's office is removed from the business part of the city, and the officers there do not pretend to look after the business of Canada. Many other things we might fairly expect they would look after which at present are not attended to. I called at the High Commissioner's office one day when in London, and inquired when the next steamer would go to Canada, and there was no one there who knew when the next steamer would sail, and the officials had to send out to procure the information. If a business office were established it would have direct communication with all the steamers going to and from, and would know all about our products, and the returns would be most satisfactory: in fact, our exports would be very largely increased if the Government took up the question and dealt with it by establishing commercial agencies in Great Britain instead of adding to the present High Commissioner's office, if it should be considered advisable or necessary to continue the duties of the office as at present carried out.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am not at all disposed to undervalue the advice given by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. We are perfectly well aware that for some time to come at all events the trade of Canada with Great Britain is likely to continue to develop greatly, and as every one knows, and as the hon. gentleman has truly stated, it has already attained very extraordinary proportions. With respect to the question in hand, the hon. gentleman may rest assured that it has not at all escaped our attention; but I may tell him that what he requires may possibly cost a little more than he supposes, although it is very likely the expenditure would prove to be money well spent. The High Commissioner's office, as no doubt the hon. gentleman is aware, was originally constituted more with a view to assist in financial and diplomatic relations, which must always prevail between a Dominion like Canada and the mother country, than with the direct view of attending to any other business, except possibly to some extent supervising emigration to this country. That as far as I remember was the statement made to the House when it was originally instituted in 1879. We had not a High Commissioner in my time; he was an Agent General.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Jenkins.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes, he was agent general and his functions were much more limited than those assigned to the High Commissioner.

The first High Commissioner was Sir Alexander Galt, and at that time a statement was made, if my memory serves me, by Sir John Macdonald to the House, in which he pointed out the advisability on financial and diplomatic grounds of having a man of high position in London to represent the people of Canada. It was also understood that the High Commissioner would exercise a supervision as far as he could over the immigration branch of the Government business, but it was not supposed possible that he could do that and at the same time attend to the commercial interests of the Dominion unless indeed he was supplied with a considerably larger staff. The place where he resides and carries on his official duties is, I think, immediately adjacent to the offices occupied by the agents general of the other colonies.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are in a row together.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The question that has been raised by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) as to having separate commercial agencies distinct from the High Commissioner's office, one in London and peradventure one or two in other great centres of population in England, is undoubtedly one of very considerable practical importance.

Mr. McCARTHY. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And it is one which requires the serious consideration of Government. I may say further that probably some member of the Government, immediately after the termination of this session, will proceed to England and look into that question on the spot. More than that, I am not prepared at present to say. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace), and the House in general, that we are fully alive to the great possible importance to the trade of Canada of giving some further facilities in that direction.

While I am on this subject I may venture to say that I think that although it is true no doubt, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has said, that we can hardly expect Lord Strathcona to devote his attention very much to matters of purely commercial detail, I believe that Canada has in very important respects been extremely well served by Lord Strathcona since he has represented us in England.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is a matter of no small moment to Canada that our representative should be well and favourably known from one end of the Kingdom to the other, and more especially on the London Stock Exchange, as a man of the highest honour and probity, and a man whose word is universally admitted to be as good as his bond.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I need not tell the House that the emoluments of the office are absolutely nothing to Lord Strathcona. I need not tell the House that in all probability the exercise of the hospitality which he has indulged in during a single London season will vastly exceed all that is nominally assigned to him as the representative of Canada. The hon. gentleman is as well aware of that if he has visited London—and I think he did recently—as I am. I think every member of the House who has occasion to visit England will testify, that whether or not the office in other respects comes up to all that he desires, Lord Strathcona at any rate is most worthy of upholding in every possible way the honour and dignity of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I may add further that Lord Strathcona is a man whose advice is eagerly sought and has very great weight indeed with the English Government, and with Englishmen of every rank and station. As regards his influence in what I may call the diplomatic circle and the ministerial circle, and in financial circles, and on the Stock Exchange, Canada would find it very hard indeed to replace Lord Strathcona.

Mr. McCARTHY. I desire to say a word in support of the view put forward by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) to which I attach the very greatest importance. I think it would be a very great mistake, a retrograde movement that we ought not to think of for one moment, to withdraw the High Commissioner from the diplomatic position, so to speak, which he now holds. We are aware that every other country has its consular agents in different parts, and upon them the trade of the country relies to a very great extent for the information necessary in order to compete in the markets of Great Britain with the commercial rivals which they are sure to find. There is no reason at all, so far as I can see, why the High Commissioner's duties should not be extended to enable him to have under him in the more important trade centres of England, officers—not, of course, consular agents, because that we would not be entitled to have—but gentlemen who would fill the same position so far as trade is concerned, and who would keep an eye upon the various interests of Canada as to the commodities in which we could compete, and who would be in a position to offer advice to Canadians, which no doubt we would be able to avail ourselves of in order to get possession of the markets which we have not up to the present moment been able to reach. I do not desire to say a single word against the high qualities of the present High Commissioner. I quite echo all the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said in that regard, but I think at the same time that the office perhaps wants a little shaking up. I am glad to know that a Minister is about to visit England after the session, and I think on inquiry he will find that perhaps it is not quite up to date in all respects. I think sometimes people go there to inquire into Canadian matters, and they can get very little more information than they could in any railway office in the city of London. That, of course, is not altogether the fault of the High Commissioner; it is the fault of the system which has grown up, and he has fallen into it, and perhaps he has not taken any steps to change it as might very possibly with advantage to us be done. The other matter to which the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) alluded is still more important than anything else, and that is that we should have gentlemen in the leading centres of England who would advise us as to what branches of trade were opened to Canadians, as to the quality of the goods, and as to the different means that ought to be taken to secure such trade as we would have an opportunity of entering into advantageously to the people of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt the subject is an important one which has been discussed briefly, and very much to the point by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken. I would not like it to be taken for granted that nothing had been done by the High Commissioner's office in the line in which my hon. friend argues that something should be done, because for the last eight or ten years past, and even longer, the High Commissioner's office has been doing very useful work in that direction. We have only to take the reports which have been written from year to year by Mr. Dyke, the former efficient emigration agent at Liverpool, to convince us of that fact. While I was Minister of Finance, and just about the time I became Minister of Finance, I remember that we attached especially to the duties of Mr. Colmer (under the High Commissioner then, Sir Charles Tupper), and to the immigration agents in the different cities and centres of Great Britain; we attached to their duties as mere immigration agents, that of being commercial agents much in the line in which my hon. friend suggested, and I think a very large portion of their time was occupied, and certainly very efficient work was done by them in these lines. They kept themselves advised as to the varying markets, the wants of the markets, and everything of that kind, and they sent most valuable reports, some of which were in pamphlet form distributed, and all of which appear in the reports either of the High Commissioner or the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think you will find that it will not be possible to do it in connection with the High Commissioner's office. I do not think you can use that office for anything more than an executive or supervising authority over it. If you are going to exploit commerce and trade in that way, you will have to do it by having thoroughly live business men, men who have been brought up in business, and who know its modern methods, who will be employed to do that and nothing else in the different centres. Possibly it would be well to have them under the general supervision of the High Commissioner. Whether you will have them simply find out the conditions of the markets and what is needed or whether you will go a step further and have an up-to-date exhibition mart of the products of Canada, or if you go further, whether you will have a sort of commercial mart in these large emporiums, over which they shall preside and be the principal agents and administrators—whether you can carry on that which is a semi-commercial business or not, I do not know. But I think the Government would be justified in having thoroughly active and practical business men in some of the centres of Great Britain to devote their whole time to the exploitation of the markets and the bringing together of the buyer and seller in the interest of Canada. I want to add my word of testimony to the thoroughly efficient way in which the present High Commissioner is representing Canada in Great Britain. The representative and diplomatic character of his office is, I think, sufficient in itself to warrant the Government in keeping the High Commissioner near the Government offices. I do not think we can over-estimate the advantage of having such a valuable medium of communication between Canada and the home authorities.

Post Office Department, amount required to pay those officers of the Savings' Bank Branch engaged in the balancing of and computing interest on depositors' accounts, to 30th June, 1898.. $2,950

Mr. FOSTER. I see that there is an increase of $100.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. These persons are paid in proportion to the number of accounts; and as the volume of business increases, there is a little increase in the expense.

The Governor General's Secretary's Office, contingencies $13,500

Mr. FOSTER. What is the policy of the present Government with reference to the item of newspapers for the different departments, which has excited a good deal of hostile criticism in past years. I remember that there was a rule adopted by the late Government to reduce all to a maximum of $500 a year. Has any change been made, or is the old rule still followed?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There has been no change.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an existent Order in Council. That maximum is exceeded in the Governor General's Secretary's Office, but I think that was always exceeded in that office, on account of its being that office and on account of so many old country papers being required there.

The Queen's Privy Council for Canada, contingencies..... $7,500

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have an explanation of the item of lunches for the Cabinet, $118. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce should explain that. What in the world does that mean? Do we have to pay the board of the Cabinet? It may not be amiss to call attention to the facts that the same old items appear as in former years. Penknives 43, jackknives quite a number, but there is one very suspicious thing here I would point out. It is an eyelet punch. Was that for the use of the Cabinet? I notice the Minister of Public Works looks very conscious.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know anything about that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is an article for fastening papers.

Mr. FOSTER. There is an item for car fare of $126. That seems a very large item.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. For the last two or three years the messengers with us, as in all establishments, use the cars to save time, and it promotes economy in other ways.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not like to be critical about things of this sort, but I remember that when the late Sir John Macdonald was Prime Minister, certain items were very severely criticised. I find here travelling expenses $962 and cab-hire of Sir Wilfrid Laurier $121. I do not think that is excessive for cab-hire, but it used to be severely criticised by hon. gentlemen opposite, and of course consistency ought to make them careful about that. There is $126 for luncheons, but I suppose those were lunches that took place on Saturdays when the Cabinet sat a long time.

Department of Justice, contingencies.... $9,600

Mr. FOSTER. I find that in the contingencies there are a great many items for books. If I am not mistaken, the Justice Department has had for some years an appropriation for its law books, and of course that would not come in under contingencies.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no separate vote for books, but they come in under contingencies. There is no separate appropriations for the law department of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CLANCY. I see an item of fifty-six boxes of pens. Is that amount used each year in the Justice Department; also thirty-eight dozen pencils and seventy-two bottles of ink.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is not much for a department in a year—$16.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not looking at the amount so much as the bulk.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that the Justice Department exceeds the rule for newspapers, paying $678.50. That is a very large appropriation. Nine-tenths of them are perfectly useless to the department.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I think the criticism is quite acceptable, and I may say that only last month the Minister has revised the newspaper list of the department.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not disposed to cavil with the departments for having newspapers, but a liberal supply can be got for $500, and if a department exceeds the rule then another department is pressed to go beyond it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is very difficult to follow the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in the least. If the Minister makes up his mind and tells the deputy to carry it out, it will be carried out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The rule is a good one.

Mr. FOSTER. There is another item which appears frequently in this report, and which I will just mention—press clippings from the Canadian Press Bureau. So far as my experience in that sort of thing goes, there is no utility in these press clippings. It may be a little interesting to the Minister to know what the newspapers are saying about him, but it is much more interesting for the enterprising canvasser for that sort of work. It may be an advantage to him, the Minister, to have judicious clippings from the press of his own country; his secretary is largely for that purpose.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have never seen the clippings, so far as I know.

Mr. CLANCY. I see an item here for "cushion keys." What does that mean?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is in the Minister of Justice Department.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No doubt they are part of the machinery of a typewriter. I hope that information is correct, but I do not guarantee it.

Mr. DAVIN. I have some idea of the Department of Justice, but it seems to me that the item I see here for pens, $31.07, is very large for fifteen clerks. There are 56 boxes, $15.07 two fountain pens, $8; and a gold pen, $4, and two gold nibs, $4. These latter items it seems to me are a superfluity of naughtiness. Such an item as this multiplied by the number of the departments, and all such items added together makes a very large sum indeed.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to know what fifteen clerks in the Justice Department do with twenty-three almanacs. Does each clerk have an almanac to carry around with him?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That would be no more than one apiece.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose when one almanac is worn out he gets another. But there is another question a little more important. I notice in all the departments they are taking the eclipse files—which are good files. Are there any arrangements by which these files can be got by the Government at wholesale prices? Running through the items for the departments, I find that the total expenditure for these files is very large. It would be interesting to find out whether it would not be possible to supply these to the Government by contract. Or does each department simply buy them at the retail price? They are an article which can be sold by wholesale.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. So far as I recollect, whenever any department requires files, they make an order on us and we buy them at the best possible price.

Mr. FOSTER. In what way does my hon. friend buy them?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know that the chief architect has been buying them by wholesale, so far as he was able. But my hon. friend knows that we cannot always foresee what quantity will be required. A department may call on us for some to-day, and it may be a month or two before we get any call for others. I do not think we have been buying them wholesale all the time, it would not be feasible.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it would be very possible to order from the makers of the Eclipse Files as many as may be needed by all the departments for a year, and they certainly would quote you the prices.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will look into the matter.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to call attention to page 1—5 of the Auditor General's Report, brief bags, $12. Then a little further down, four brief bags, $22.75. So there is $34.75 for brief bags for the hon. gentleman's department.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I remember there was one for myself, and one for each of my secretaries. There was a French gentleman in my office, and another young gentleman who is also connected with the department, each of whom had one. The charge is a little high, but my hon. friend will notice that I was obliged to equip the department when I came in to the extent even of getting a code of laws. There was not a statute in the office when I came there. I am not responsible for that expenditure. The hon. gentleman will admit that these requisities are not easily dispensed with in an office where law is supposed to be taken care of.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has not solved the mystery of the almanacs yet.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot find the item.

Department of Militia and Defence.... $7,190

Mr. DAVIN. Do sundries, $3,000, include travelling expenses?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. I find here: travelling expenses, Hon. F. W. Borden, $1,171.89; C. E. Panet, $246.42; H. W. Brown for self and Minister, $304.66, making a total of $1,190.87. Also telegrams, $1,078.80. I want to call attention to the fact that this seems to have been at the time when the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence was ill, away from the House, for which we voted $1,000, and very properly. But if he was lying by, I do not understand how the country is to be charged with $1,171 for travelling expenses.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Minister of Militia and Defence is not here; it would only be fair to wait till he is present.

Item stands.

Department of Indian Affairs..... $8,090

Mr. DAVIN. There is an increase here of $410.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. When I started in the department, there were certain extra clerks employed. Last year when I recommended this vote, I thought we would be able to dispense with the services of a couple of them, and I did not ask for sufficient appropriation to pay them. I found, however, that I was not able to dispense with their services, I therefore, ask this year for a supplementary vote to cover their salaries. There is no change in the service.

Mr. CLANCY. What is this item of "books, blank, attendance"? Then there are cushions here again, an item which appears in every department. There is also an item for fifty-one pocket knives. How many clerks are there in that department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Forty-five clerks.

Mr. CLANCY. I observe eighty-five boxes of pens. They may be very cheap, but each clerk has more than two boxes. Then, there is twenty-seven boxes of mucilage and 207 penholders. As a matter of information, I should like to know if each department is equipped at the commencement of the year with certain quantities? The quantities seem to be large.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Department of Indian Affairs superintends the entire school system of the Indians, and there is a school branch in the department here. A great portion of the supplies in the lines to which the hon. gentleman has referred are for the schools, not for departmental use.

Mr. CLANCY. Is there a department here where school education is going on with respect to Indians?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The entire system of Indian schools is under the charge of the Department of Indian Affairs, and there is a very large sum expended. A considerable number of those articles are called for because we have a school branch in the department, and those supplies are purchased for the use of the school branch.

Mr. CLANCY. But I understood they were entirely for the department.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Not all, a considerable quantity is required for the school branch.

Mr. POPE. How are we to tell what quantity is required for the department and what for the schools?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I can give the committee the information at a later stage, if necessary. This is the way it has always been done—there is no change whatever.

Mr. POPE. I observe there is an item, flowers of Manitoba, $3.18. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman decorating his office, but he should be able to find flowers nearer his office than Manitoba, while I admire his prairie patriotism.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is referring to a book called the "Flowers of Manitoba."

Mr. POPE. There is another item—baskets. Is it because this is the Indian Department that so many baskets are required; are these purchased to encourage industry among the Indians, or are they required in the department; or is a portion used in the Indian schools and a portion in the department?

Office of the Auditor General..... $3,700

Mr. DAVIN. It is satisfactory to see there is a decrease. Do I understand that the size of the Auditor General's Report is to be diminished? •

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We would not object

Mr. CLANCY. This involves a question that was touched remotely in another place with respect to the Auditor General's office. I suppose we have no right to discuss anything that took place in a committee until a report is submitted to the House. What were the travelling expenses for in connection with the Auditor General and Mr. Reid?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Auditor General visited some of the public works to make inquiries into some accounts pending before him, and I imagine these items are in connection with that.

Mr. CLANCY. Can the hon. gentleman say which of the clerks have received the increase?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The three who received the increases were Messrs. Wagner, Steeves and Johnston.

Mr. CLANCY. Why were these given increases and the others not?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur.) I think this discussion is not germane to the item under consideration.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Post Office and Agriculture are both reserved for discussion.

Mr. CLANCY. I have no objection to postpone it, and discuss it when the proper time arrives.

Mr. DAVIN. I see here a sum of $325 to E. W. Burley for services and expenses investigating Alberta election accounts. What was that for?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. A very large account indeed was sent down by one of the returning officers, and the Auditor General sent a special officer to investigate the matter.

Mr. McDUGALL. What is that $20 for "re promotion of third-class clerks"?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Audit Act allows the Auditor General to take legal advice, and of course he is allowed to pay the usual legal fees.

Mr. McDUGALL. What is the $20 for "re Goodwin contracts"?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He took Mr. Lash's independent opinion.

Mr. McDUGALL. Is that the contract about which Mr. Goodwin went to law?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Department of Finance, contingencies.. $6,800

Mr. DAVIN. What is that increase of $280 for?

Mr. DAVIN.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Several of the private secretaries have not yet received any permanent position in the Civil Service, and consequently they are receiving much lower salaries than the gentlemen who have been fortunate enough to obtain permanent positions. It is proposed out of the contingencies to permit these gentlemen to the number of five or six, to be paid a sum not exceeding $1,500. One part of this vote is to enable the private secretary to be paid that additional sum out of contingencies as respects the Finance Department.

Department of Customs, contingencies.. $7,050

Mr. BENNETT. On page T-17 of the Auditor General's Report, under salaries, the payments amounted to $1,783, and this year an amount of $2,730 is asked? Why this increase of nearly $1,000?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The item for last year, for clerical and other assistance, was $2,770, and this year we are asking for $2,320, which is $450 less. For printing and stationery we are taking the same estimate. For sundries we are taking the same estimate. The decrease this year over last is $450, and it is brought about in this way. Last year in the clerical and other assistance, my private secretary was down for $600, and he has been transferred to the permanent list, so that we effect in that way a saving of $600, out of which we provide for an increase to five of the extra clerks at $30, amounting to $150, which leaves a net decrease in contingencies of $450.

Mr. WALLACE. What salary does the private secretary get now?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It is proposed to give him $1,500. He is made second-class clerk at $1,100 and will get $400 instead of $600 as private secretary.

Mr. WALLACE. Has he been in the department before?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, he came in with the change of Government.

Mr. BENNETT. There is an item of file-boxes, $187.50, which should be explained.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. There are necessarily a great many papers in that department, and I presume we were put to extra expense for these on account of the fire.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the private secretary of the Minister has been treated a good deal more generously than his predecessor. The previous secretary, Mr. Bristol, was paid for his services in the department $450 or $500, and he got $600 as private secretary, and I can certify that there could have been no more efficient private secretary than Mr. Bristol was. He had the advantage of having been in the department several years before he became private secretary, so that he had a very complete knowledge of the department, and had not to learn his business.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. All I can say is that I think the gentleman who is acting as private secretary at present is very well worth his salary, and the hon. gentleman will find, if he looks at the accounts, that the sum we are asking does not exceed what was asked before, although there has been a great deal of extra work in the department. He has been made a second-class clerk at $1,100, and we do not propose to give him $600 as private secretary, but only $400. I think what the hon. gentleman has said about Mr. Bristol is quite correct.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Why is the department asking for $2,700 this year for sundries, when only $1,780 was spent last year?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That only proves how economical we were.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It looks as if you were preparing to have a better time this year.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the Minister of Customs whether there is an educational department in some part of the building where he resides like that in the Department of the Interior, because I find the following expenditures last year:—Dictionary and encyclopedia, $68; English dictionary, $12; Funk & Wagnall's Standard Dictionary, $18; Haydn's Dictionary of Dates, $8. Were these consumed by the fire, and had the hon. gentleman to buy a new outfit? I fancy these account for the learned speeches of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. The dictionary has short speeches. His was a very long one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Sometimes when new Ministers come in they do not find any there.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can give some explanation of why he required three dictionaries in one year.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know that I am able to do that. I do not remember any purchase of a dictionary myself. I fancy my predecessor must have given the order.

Mr. WALLACE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I gave no order for a single dictionary. I see there is an item of $68 for the Century Dictionary, and $12 for a French and English dictionary. I think the Minister of Customs will have to assume the responsibility for them.

Mr. POPE. There are some very interesting items here. I notice an item of three rat-traps, $1. I suppose we may understand that the hon. Minister used these for the purpose of furnishing fresh meat to Li Hung Chang during his visit to Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. POPE. I am somewhat surprised, knowing the hon. Minister as well as I do, to find that there should be required in his department three cork-screws.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Shall I tell the hon. gentleman what these are for? They are to open the bottles of ink.

Mr. POPE. There is another item in close proximity to that—water filters. Is that for the ink also?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think my hon. friend ought to know what water is.

Mr. POPE. I have not had much experience with water; but the hon. gentleman, I thought, would offer some substantial information, especially with regard to the rat-traps. I will insist on knowing what they are for.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will make the hon. member a present of one.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask about the sum of $464.74 for newspapers. I do not know whether, measured by the custom of the past, or by what is contemplated in the future, that is to be considered moderate. But, apart from either consideration, I am going to ask the hon. gentleman if that is a reasonable expenditure for newspapers in a single department? It is not perhaps so large as some that I see, but it does seem to me to be a very large sum. I can quite understand that the pressure is very strong, but I cannot help thinking that this is a very large sum to be expended on newspapers. It is inconsistent to haggle over the statutory increase of $50 a year to a sessional clerk and allow newspapers to be piled up to this extent, not one in fifty of which, I venture to say, the hon. Minister has ever looked at.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. All I have to say is that we do not take the newspapers, but they take us, and it is a continual fight to get rid of them. So far, the average expenditure has been about $500, and I am proud to say that I have reduced it by $37. If you allow any newspaper to get a footing in the office, it is very difficult to get rid of it. I would be very glad to give up about nine-tenths of them.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not know whether that comes within our jurisdiction or that of the provincial legislatures, but it is a decided abuse in the country that newspapers should be sent without being ordered, and then the people to whom they are sent forced to pay the subscriptions by the court. In many cases these newspapers are taken unwittingly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The local legislatures have jurisdiction in that matter. It is a matter of contract.

Mr. CLANCY. It is a great abuse. I know of persons who have been sent American publications, and have received them as a mere matter of curiosity, not knowing that they were in law compelled to pay for them, and the result was they were forced to pay in the courts.

Mr. McDOUGALL. For whose benefit were these photographs taken for which there is a charge of $19?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Mine was not taken. Those were the photographs of some of my hon. friends on the other side.

Mr. POPE. I do not see what consolation the hon. Minister can have in looking at his wall decorated with the photographs of Cabinet Ministers since confederation. I see in the next line a charge for a photograph of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, $3. That is cheap enough, and I can quite understand that my hon. friend should derive a certain amount of consolation from having that photograph in his office when his chief is absent. But I do not see any necessity for the larger item of $19 for photographs of Cabinet Ministers since confederation.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They were not ordered by me, but by some of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me. I have not even received the photographs, though I have paid for them.

Mr. POPE. That is showing great disrespect, and an order of this House should issue that they be hung up in the hon. gentleman's office, since the country has paid for them.

Department of Public Works, contingencies $7,000

Mr. BENNETT. When such commendable economy is being practiced by the Minister of Public Works, it is disgraceful that there should be such outrageous expenditure in other respects. He has certainly set the other Cabinet Ministers an example, because he has been independent enough to pay his own cab-hire for the year, with the exception of a sum of 40 cents, and it is a pity that his colleagues do not emulate his example. But while the hon. Minister is to be credited with this economy, it would seem that those under him are very profligate with the public money. There is no less an item than $25.75 for five brief bags. I can readily understand why the hon. gentleman should have one brief bag, but why there should be four others in the department is a thing that requires explanation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That must be one brief bag at $25.

Mr. BENNETT. Surely the hon. Minister does not sport a $25 brief bag.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They are $5 a piece; that is all right.

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot understand why there should be five gentlemen in the hon. Minister's department all equipped with a brief bag. Seeing the amount of litigation the hon. gentleman himself has on hand, I could quite understand his requiring one bag.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All my briefs turned out all right.

Mr. BENNETT. There are three typewriters, $300. That seems a considerable increase. The work surely could not have accumulated to such an extent as to require three additional typewriters. Then there is an item that seems outrageous. Newspapers and magazines $1,760. The hon. Minister is a busy man, and has certainly not had time enough to peruse even the outside of these publications. It seems to me that we should know why such a large amount is expended in the department on periodicals.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was an old amount of $1,700 for newspapers, and I got a special vote of Parliament and paid it.

Mr. BELL. I thought it was $800.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend has only to look at the figures as given at the discussion when the item was voted.

Mr. BENNETT. There seems to be no other payments for newspapers. Were there no current newspapers at all taken in the department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman looks higher on the page he will find some payments for newspapers. It is a difficult thing to prevent newspapers coming into the different departments, as those who have been Ministers know.

Mr. CLANCY. Do I understand that the accounts for which the hon. gentleman got this special appropriation were not recognized by his predecessor?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, they were recognized.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The amount was voted by the House.

Mr. CLANCY. The Government has a good majority, so I have no doubt the amount was voted. But were they recognized by the former Government?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As a matter of fact, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) steadily refused to recognize accounts for more than $500 a year from each department; but, at the same time, my predecessors had allowed the newspapers to come and the liability had been incurred, we had to pay.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman came into office on the pledge that he would do better than his predecessor.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am doing better.

Mr. CLANCY. Is he doing better by paying an old account and allowing it to go on as large as before?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman does not understand. I had to pay these accounts incurred by my predecessor. This year, I have not exceeded the amount authorized by Order in Council, $500, in fact I have spent less than that.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman still at the mercy of the newspaper men?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. CLANCY. I notice here an item of expenditure for a magnifying glass. Is that what the hon. gentleman uses in spying out persons who have been guilty of offences against hon. gentlemen opposite in the past?

Mr. ELLIS. As to the newspapers taken in the department, it should be stated, in the first place, that newspapers in the country are constantly increasing and there is, no doubt, much pressure, as there is upon private individuals to subscribe to many periodicals. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) seems to have a special pick at the newspapers. I think they treat him pretty well. In the Department of Public Works it must be necessary to subscribe to many high-priced technical and scientific journals. Still, I think the Government should exercise close supervision over this item.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Five hundred is quite sufficient.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I notice here an item of 72 boxes of pens at a cost of $26.47, also drawing pens, fountain pens and pen-holders; I find also 85 bottles of ink charged for. I suppose these were quart bottles and I cannot understand how the department would use so much ink especially where the principal part of the work is now done by typewriters. That item surely ought to be reduced.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have in my department at Ottawa about 140 employees. We have spent $26.44 for pens and $44.65 for ink. But I may say at once that half of our pens and pencils and ink are stolen. I am very sorry to say it, but I think it is true of all the departments. We cannot keep pens and pencils. Even from my own desk, over and over again, my pens have disappeared.

Mr. POPE. Does that kind of thing increase during the session?

Mr. CLANCY. I just wish to say a word as to what has just fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis), who is always moderate in his views. I am not complaining of the newspapers. It would be an unseemly thing if the papers of the country were not found in the offices of the Ministers as well as elsewhere. What I find fault with is the unnecessary accumulation of newspapers.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is quite right.

Mr. POPE. There seems to be a tremendous lot of soap used in the department. Of course there is a certain amount of dirty linens to be washed and everybody has seen the washing, but it is hardly fair to charge 42 dozen of soap.

Mr. DAVIN. And I see by the accounts that Miss Seguin had 246 dozen of towels to wash and Mrs. Bray 106 dozen towels, so that a total of $88 was paid for washing towels. I do not know whether the Minister would say as the Lord Bishop of Winchester said on one occasion. When visiting Oxford, he was asked by a lady why he was called Soapy Sam, and he said it was because he kept his hands cleaner than did his brethren.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As clean as theirs. They could not be cleaner.

Mr. RUSSELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has not told the story quite as I heard it. The Bishop's answer was that whenever he got into hot water he always came out with clean hands.

Mr. CLANCY. I see that $1,059.39 is charged for travelling expenses of Ottawa officials. It is put in as a lump sum. We should have some explanation of that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On page Q-216 of the Auditor General's Report will be found the details.

Mr. CLANCY. I think we should have some explanation from the Minister here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All I can say is that my officials, engineers, clerk of works, &c., are obliged to travel a good deal to inspect public works. I cannot control that expenditure myself, no Minister can do so. All these accounts have to pass before the Auditor General.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman has not explained why it was that the Auditor General criticised that item.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman will find, by looking at the criticism, that the Auditor General calls attention to certain expenditures that he thinks should not have been made. But I must say that when an engineer, for instance, is ordered to go and inspect a work, if he has not a fur overcoat, he will have to hire one. The Auditor General objected to that, but I do not see how we could ask engineers, who are earning very small salaries, to buy a heavy coat when they go out travelling on public business.

Mr. DAVIN. The Auditor General makes some important suggestions in addressing the secretary of the Public Works Department, in a letter dated January 12, 1897 :

Sir,—I have completed my analysis of the travelling expenses of your Ottawa officials during 1896-97, on the same plan as that shown at pages Q--11 to Q--16 of 1895-96, and beg to offer the following remarks thereon :—

The objectionable items mentioned in my letter of February 7, 1895 (1894-95, page P--213), viz. : books, shaving, cleaning boots, baths, umbrella, medical attendance, hire of fur coat, and wear and tear of coat and suit, are now almost eliminated, and a slightly closer scrutiny on the part of the accountant will, I have no doubt, remove them altogether. The overcharges of previous years should, however, be refunded ; please see that this is done.

Progress in the line of purchasing return tickets is as yet only partial. For instance, in travelling between Ottawa and Montreal, Mr. Emery L. Lafontaine, the new engineer, charged 9 return tickets at $5.85 between March 30 and June 30, 1897 ; while during the twelve months, Mr. F. W. Cowie charged 40 single trips at $3.50, and Mr. E. D. Lafleur 28 single trips at $3.50, with no return tickets for either of them.

An economy which was feasible for Mr. Lafontaine, with his inexperience, should be equally feasible for older officers like Messrs. Cowie and Lafleur. Please call their attention to this.

There seems to have been no notice taken of my suggestion that frequent travelling should be done on mileage-books. Books for 1,000 miles each are issued by either railway company for $25, being the equivalent of return ticket rates. Payments for single fares amounting to more than $125 were made by : J. C. Blais, $129.10 ; L. Coste, $204 ; I. Coté, $444.35 ; F. W. Cowie, $342.55 ; E. B. Godwin, $246.25 ; E. B. Lafleur, $154.85—total, $1,520.90. This, at three cents a mile, would make 50,000 miles, or $1,250 for mileage-books, a practicable saving of $250.

There is a suggestion of the Auditor General that my hon. friend will agree should be attended to.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly so. Mr. Emery Lafontaine was appointed since we took office. He has been going on very modestly. I see the old engineers have not been as economical as the new ones. Still, I have no doubt that they will try in the future to comply with the advice given by the Auditor General.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is another suggestion :

Similar remarks apply to the charging of large sums for cabs to and from the Ottawa stations, where other people use the street cars. Marked instances of the use of street cars will be found under the names of—

He gives the names of five parties.

—Such representative names demonstrate that this economy is within the reach of all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Auditor General was right.

Mr. DAVIN. I can safely say from observation on my own part that Ottawa swells, for some years, would not go in street cars. I remember asking them just to enter a street car with me, and they would not enter it. But now they will take street cars.

Department of Marine and Fisheries.... $11,000

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is an apparent increase here of $1,000, but it is only apparent, as there has been no change whatever in the department.

Mr. BENNETT. There are $1,900 for telegrams. That would run nearly on an average of 25 a day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My department is one of those that has constant telegrams from all marine ports, about all kinds of shipping news. I cannot stop it.

Mr. POPE. There is one item here that I cannot see the use of—Blower handles, 5, $1.25. I have known the hon. Minister for many years in this House, and I do not think he needs any blower handles. This is a superfluous item, and should be struck out.

Mr. DAVIN. What is this $2,558 for printing ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The ordinary printing of the department, There is an enormous number of blanks printed.

Mr. BENNETT. Five new typewriters in that department, $477, less $45 allowed for an old one.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I suppose that was caused by the fire, but I could not pledge myself to it.

Mr. CLANCY. A considerable charge appears for dictionaries, French and English.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The library in the Marine Department was much injured by the fire. I have the poorest library of any of the departments, and I have not yet gone to any expense in connection with it.

Mr. POPE. I notice an item of 75 cents for three jugs. Is there anything in any of them.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the item, New Brunswick Dictionary, mean?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think my predecessor must have got that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is an item for 120 packs of cards. Were they playing cards?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, no.

Mr. CLANCY. Then there is an item for Statesmans' Year Book.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That is an annual publication.

Mr. POPE. There is another item—a hammer. Each Minister seems to have a hammer.

Department of Railways and Canals.... $8,000

Mr. DAVIN. I observe a saving in printing.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The amount was not correctly distributed. It was erroneous to place the sum for printing at $6,000 and for the other expenditures at $2,000. While the amount has not been increased it was thought desirable to transfer $500 from one heading to the other in order that the vote might correspond with the circumstances.

Mr. DAVIN. In the light of the dictum of one Minister and the ex-Finance Minister, there should not be more than $500 expended by each department for newspapers. I observe an item of $1,189 for newspapers and magazines.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We found that a great many bills, extending over many years, had not been paid. We could not discontinue, according to the general idea, the subscriptions to newspapers, an immense number of which were coming to the department, until we had paid the bills already incurred. I gave instructions to have all the bills verified, adjusted and paid. I stated last year when I asked for an additional sum that it would be required in order to clear the deck. We have done it now, and have matters in such a shape that the expenditure will not exceed $500 in future. The sum of $1,189 will be found to include very many years' arrears.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There is an item of $1,107 for files. This is a very large sum for files for a department that has long been established.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will make inquiries and let the hon. gentleman know the result.

Mr. BENNETT. There are new typewriters in the department.

Mr. POPE. Is there a jug, and anything in it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I make a point of keeping it empty.

Department of Trade and Commerce.. $6,200

Mr. DAVIN. There is a decrease in the general vote, but perhaps the Minister will explain the increase which has occurred in the item for clerks and sundries.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is partly because there are a couple of permanent employees, whose salaries have been somewhat increased. That will represent about $150. A larger amount was asked for printing and stationery than is required. But we were a little short for sundries and had to increase the amount a little. I, therefore, reduced the printing and stationery by $500 and added part for sundries and extra clerical assistance. The total vote is reduced by $150.

Mr. McDOUGALL. What is the strength of the staff?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The permanent staff numbers eight, and there is a varying number of extra clerks according to the amount of work to be done. I want to get out the quarterly reports somewhat more rapidly, and shall be obliged to obtain three or four clerical assistants. The practice of the department has been to issue these quarterly reports, but they have not been issued as rapidly as I would wish or as the trade requires.

Mr. WALLACE. How long after the end of a quarter will it be before the report is issued?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I hope to get them issued within a matter of four weeks after the termination of the quarter; that is, if I can get the printing department of the Government to do the work as fast as I think it ought. Of course, when the House is sitting, it is a matter of some difficulty to get these things done rapidly in the Printing Bureau, and we have been a good deal retarded, but for the benefit of the commercial community I know that these quarterly reports ought to come out within two or three weeks, and in order to do that I have arranged for two or three extra hands under the head of clerical assistance.

Mr. BENNETT. I see these ubiquitous brief bags figure here to the number of three. Does the Minister hope to equip the other five clerks with brief bags this year, so they will all be on the same footing.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will endeavour to do so.

Mr. McDOUGALL. There are twenty-three boxes of pens, and other pens amounting to $22. I cannot see how eight clerks with the addition of two or three extra during the year, can use that many pens when they have three or four typewriters besides. There must be a great deal of "lifting" going on in that department.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think $11 for pens is very extravagant.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is $22.69 altogether. There are some fountain pens.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Oh, well, we did not find any fountain pens when we came into the office, and we had to supply them.

Mr. POPE. Will we find any when the Minister goes out of office.

Mr. BENNETT. Did they get away with the typewriters, too?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I found very little when I went into the office.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the Trade and Commerce Department well supplied with newspapers?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I cannot say that it is. This department requires a certain number of expensive foreign publications, and it is not quite as well equipped as it ought to be; but I did not care to exceed in that matter, as I have sometimes criticised the newspaper items in the old times myself.

Mr. INGRAM. Could not the Department of Trade and Commerce supply the Department of Customs and Excise with these newspapers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It would cost more for a messenger to carry the newspapers between the departments than it does for the papers.

Mr. CLANCY. The Minister of Trade and Commerce only asks for $192 for newspapers, including foreign journals, and yet Customs takes $600 and Public Works $500. He is administering a severe rebuke to his colleagues.

Care and cleaning of Departmental buildings..... $27,900

Mr. CLANCY. Is there a fixed sum for this every year?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes. It is voted in a lump sum. There is a practice as to the rate of pay for these charwomen—75 cents a day, I think—and there has been no change.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is as much as your life is worth to take $1 off these charwomen.

Mr. CLANCY. I am not objecting to this rate of pay, but I simply wish to know how it is managed.

Mr. BELL. How does this item come to be in the Finance Department?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is a surprise to me. I was there for some time before I knew I was in charge of the department of charwomen. Although I am responsible for it, the matter comes very little before me.

Resolutions reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, the House ordered the Yukon accounts to be brought down, and I am told they have not been brought down yet. I do not see the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) in his place, but I would like to know if the order of Parliament is to be obeyed.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will call the Minister's attention to that as soon as I have an opportunity of seeing him.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 2nd May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

On the order being called for motion for the introduction of Bill (No. 129) to amend the North-west Territories Act.—(Mr. Davin.)

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of that Bill so that it might be on the Order paper in case the Minister of the Interior did not bring in a Bill, but the Minister has given notice, and I shall have an opportunity of moving the amendments to his Bill; in fact I believe that one of his proposals conforms with one of my proposed amendments to the North-west Territories Act, so that I would ask that the order drop.

Order dropped.

MINERS' LICENSES AT WHITE AND CHILKOOT PASSES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Government whether there is any foundation for the following statement appearing in the San Francisco "Examiner." I am sorry the Minister of the Interior does not happen to be in the Chamber, but perhaps the Government will make a note of it and communicate it to him.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). He will be here in a minute or two.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the meantime I will state this: The "Examiner," of San Francisco, has the following flaring headings:—"Klondike Trade Falls to America." "Miners may Secure Free Licenses at the Summit." "No need of Stopping at Victoria to Secure Permits." "Will therefore Secure their Outfits at some Point in United States." "Minister Sifton's new Order." "Uncle Sam's sons win the Battle they have long been waging at Ottawa." These headlines are attached to what purports to be a telegram from the Minister of the Interior and is contained in a special despatch to the "Examiner," dated Vancouver, B.C., 18th April. It says:

Vancouver (B.C.), April 18.—Indignation here knows no bounds, and civil war in politics is bound to be the outcome of the decision of the Dominion Parliament to have free miners' licenses issued at the summits of White and Chilkoot passes. Within twenty-four hours four of the six members of the Dominion House who represent British Columbia will be asked to resign.

The following special despatch was received from Ottawa to-day:—

"Hon. Mr. Sifton has given orders for free miners' licenses to be issued at the summit of both the White and Chilkoot passes."

This is the concession for which the American miners have been clamouring. By those who are in a position to judge of its effect, it is claimed that the concession will be disastrous to the trade of Victoria especially, as well as to Vancouver, as it will not be necessary for American miners and others outfitting at Seattle, Tacoma and other ports to lay over at Victoria or Vancouver to procure licenses or outfits.

This new order is the death-knell to Canadian trade, and within twenty-four hours every city in Canada will resent it. Although Canada owns the Klondike, America can secure 99 per cent of the trade if the licenses are granted as proposed. The United States has won, and Puget Sound has gained the victory over British Columbia.

Now that the Minister of the Interior is in his seat, I may say that the foundation for this telegraphic despatch in the San Francisco "Examiner" is that the Hon. Mr. Sifton has given order for miners' licenses to be issued at the summit of both the White and the Chilkoot passes. I would like to know whether such order has been given by the Minister.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I will ask the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to let the matter stand until to-morrow, and I will make a full statement in regard to it.

TRANSPORT OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES TO THE YUKON.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask whether the Grand Trunk Railway Company has received a contract for carrying militia and police supplies to the Yukon?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). The Grand Trunk Railway Company has not received any contract, but is sending a portion of the supplies over its road. A portion is going over the Grand Trunk Railway and a much larger portion over the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. DAVIN. But the portion that goes over the Grand Trunk Railway will go over the Northern Pacific?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not know—I suppose so.

Mr. DAVIN. And, therefore, will go to an American port and be shipped in American bottoms?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Orders of the Day.

WRIT FOR BAGOT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he is yet able to inform the House when the writ for Bagot will be issued?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is a question which we have considered, and I would like to have the view of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), as to whether he thinks it is advisable to have this by-election held on voters' lists which are already four years old, when we have the prospect that we can have it held on much more recent lists at no distant date?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that discussion is in order, but my right hon. friend has asked my opinion, and I suppose I may have the indulgence. I do not quite see why this discrimination should be made at this particular time. It strikes me that the election in West Prince, P.E.I., was carried on upon the same lists, as well as other elections that have taken place since this House has been in session. The leader of the Opposition is at present absent from the House; but, speaking for myself, I certainly think it but just and right that Bagot should have its voice felt here upon a list which is no older than the list on which the newly elected member for West Prince carried on his election.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). Mr. Speaker, I beg to rise to a question of privilege. A few evenings ago the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) referred to the mayor of Annapolis in these words :

He is from Judique, your town, and is another traitor, and we have one or two more there of the same kind.

Later on, the hon. gentleman spoke thus :

Before the committee rises I wish to make a personal explanation. In reading the "Hansard" to-night, I was astonished to find that the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. McLennan) had stated with reference to me that which was entirely untrue. As I see it has been recorded on "Hansard," I wish to correct his statement. I say here emphatically that I never ran for mayor of the town of Annapolis in my life, and not having run for the mayoralty of that town, I could not have been defeated.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I certainly indicated the hon. gentleman's nominee. He had his nominee in the field, and backed him for all he was worth.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McLennan) is entirely wrong. I had no nominee, and never ran for mayor of Annapolis.

I wired to the mayor of Annapolis in these words :

H. E. Gillis, Esq., Mayor of Annapolis.

Mills referred to you in debate as traitor. I rejoined he smarted under defeat in mayoralty contest. He denies having opposed you. Wire whether he did.

A. McLENNAN.

I received the following reply :

Annapolis, April 29, 1898.

Mills brought out my opponent in mayoralty contest. He canvassed himself personally, and drove 15 miles to see two voters. His canvass was : "A vote for Ritchie was a vote for him—that it would never do to have me elected in Annapolis." I defeated him, and will do it again.

H. E. GILLIS.

You will see, Mr. Speaker, that my contention was correct. I repeat this sentence : "His canvass was, a vote for Ritchie was a vote for him."

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman is going too far altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. I think a copy of these telegrams should be laid on the Table. May I ask my hon. friend to lay them on the Table ?

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). By all means you will get a copy. They are in "Hansard" now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What was the rest of that sentence about "a vote for Ritchie" ?

Mr. SPEAKER. Orders of the Day.

Mr. FOSTER.

MILITARY FORCE FOR THE KLONDIKE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I think it would be well for the Minister of Militia to take the present or some near-by opportunity to inform the House as to the extent, nature and cost of the military expedition he is sending to the Klondike. I see it stated in the papers that it is going to cost a large amount of money, and that the force is fairly large ; but, so far as I recollect, the matter has not been discussed in the House at all. The tax-payer will have to pay the bill, and no vote has yet been put before the House. Therefore, I think it would be very interesting and instructive if we had that information either to-day or some day near-by.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Mr. Borden). To-morrow.

ACCIDENT AT WELLINGTON BRIDGE, MONTREAL.

Mr. QUINN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the Government to an accident that occurred on the Wellington Bridge, Montreal, last Monday evening. I wish to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if any report has been received from his officers in Montreal concerning that accident, and if any steps have been taken to look after the people who suffered ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Is that what is known as the Curran Bridge ?

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have received no official information whatever on the subject. I have seen and heard nothing further than the newspaper reports.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE RESOLUTION.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my right hon. friend whether he has yet determined as to his course with regard to the resolution which stands in my name—whether he can give me a day for the discussion of it ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I have no objection at all to give a day to my hon. friend ; but I have not fixed a day, and I am not in a position to fix it to-day. I shall have great pleasure in meeting my hon. friend privately, to see if we can arrange something between us.

Mr. McNEILL. I would say to my right hon. friend that it is more than a fortnight since I first asked him in regard to this matter across the House, and it is three weeks since I spoke to one of his colleagues in regard to it. I have allowed my resolution to stand in order to meet what I believed was the convenience of the Government; but the time of the session is drifting away, and I hope my right hon. friend will be able to give me an assurance that he will fix an early day.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not know that my hon. friend's waiting was for the convenience of the Government. I think it was as much for his own convenience because if he had brought his resolution forward by the usual system we would not be hearing of it now. However, I would rather have a discussion on it.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sorry my right hon. friend has said what he has said, because it was to meet the convenience of the Government that my resolution was not brought forward until the Budget was brought down. That is the only reason why I did not bring it forward in the ordinary course. Will my right hon. friend let me have an early day?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have said to my hon. friend that I shall be glad to discuss the matter privately with him, to see if we can make some arrangement.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I would like to ask when I may expect the papers ordered on the 18th of April, in connection with the death of Macdonald and Fraser, who were employed on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Will my hon. friend send a note of what he wants?

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask when I may expect the papers ordered on the 30th of March respecting the dismissal of Thomas H. Miller and the appointment of Albert Harris as shipping master at the port of Bear River; and also the papers ordered on the same day respecting the removal of the remains of piers of the old bridge at the mouth of Bear River.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). So far as I am concerned, I will make a note of it.

THE MEMBER FOR NANAIMO.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not wish to pester my right hon. friend for information; but we have been somewhat saddened on this side of the House by the news in the papers of the taking away from us of the young and brilliant member for Nanaimo (Mr. McInnes). It is reported that he has either handed in his resignation or is about to do so. If my right hon. friend would give us the information, it might either assuage our grief or enable us to put our condolences in proper form.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am very glad to be able to assuage the grief of my hon. friend at once. I have not received any information of that kind from my hon. friend from Nanaimo.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Toronto and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Clarke.)

Bill (No. 94) to authorize the Canada Eastern Railway Company to convey its railway to the Alexander Gibson Railway and Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Tucker.)

MILES CANON AND LEWES RIVER TRAMWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MORRISON moved that amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Miles Cañon and Lewes River Tramway Company be read the second time. He said: There is only one slight alteration in paragraph 12. The section, as it passed the committee, said that the company should not obstruct the navigable waters of such river. That has been amended by making it read "navigable waters," which, of course, would include lakes as well.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER COMPANY.

Mr. MacPHERSON moved,

That amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 100) respecting the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company, be concurred in.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). What is the amendment?

Mr. MacPHERSON. The only change is with respect to the extension of time. The House of Commons granted three and six years, but the Senate reduced it to two and five years.

Motion agreed to, and amendment read the second time, and concurred in.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 124)—from the Senate—incorporating the Alberta and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company.—(Mr. Casey, by Mr. Fraser.)

Bill (No. 126) respecting the Saskatchewan Railway and Mining Company, and to change its name to the Saskatchewan Pacific Railway and Mining Company.—(Mr. Landerkin, by Mr. Scriver.)

APPOINTMENT OF MR. CHARLES A. JONES.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Has the vacancy in the German division, section or department of immigration bureau, Winnipeg been filled up? Has Mr. Charles A. Jones been appointed? If so, where does he come from? Why was not a German appointed to the position? Is this Charles A. Jones the second appointed to that position since the advent of the present Government to power? If so, was the previous appointee a German?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The following are the answers to the hon. gentleman's questions:—1. The Immigration Office at Winnipeg is not divided into departments or sections. 2. Mr. Charles A. Jones has been appointed to a position in the immigration service at Winnipeg. 3. He comes from Macleod, N.W.T. 4. A German was not appointed because there was no particular reason for appointing a German; but it may be added that Mr. Jones speaks both German and French, and that ample provision is made to serve the interests of German immigrants. 5. No. 6. The answer to No. 5 disposes also of No. 6.

APPOINTMENT OF DR. EDWARDS.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

1. What salary was paid to Dr. R. B. Cotton as medical officer of the jail, Regina, N.W.T.?

2. What salary was paid Dr. Willoughby as medical officer attending the Indian Industrial School, Regina? Who has been appointed to discharge the duties discharged by these medical men?

3. Was Dr. Edwards appointed to discharge these duties by Order in Council? What salary does he receive? Is he a brother of Mr. W. C. Edwards, M.P., for Russell? Is it understood between him and the Government that he can while a Government officer, pursue private practice?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) I beg to say:—1. The salary paid to Dr. R. B. Cotton, medical attendant officer of the jail, Regina, was $10 a month. 2. Dr. Willoughby was paid as medical attendant of the Indian Industrial School at Regina at the rate of $480 per annum. 3. Dr. O. C. Edwards has been appointed by Order in Council to discharge these duties. He receives an annual salary of $1,400; but for this remuneration he gives medical attendance to the Indians of the Muscowpetung and Assiniboine Agencies, in addition to performing the duties of medical attendant of the Industrial School. He is also paid at the rate of $30 a month as medical officer of the Regina Jail. There is nothing in the agreement between Dr. Edwards and the Government to prevent his engaging in private practice so long as such practice does not interfere with his official duties. Dr. Edwards is a brother of Mr. W. C. Edwards, M.P., for Russell.

APPOINTMENT OF IRISH ROMAN CATHOLICS IN CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HUGHES asked,

On unrevised "Hansard," page 4318, the hon. the Controller of Customs in speaking re the dismissal of certain Irish Roman Catholics from office, is reported: "How could I possibly be prejudiced against two officers because of their nationality, when in the discharge of my public duties I endeavoured to act as a judge and discharge my duties faithfully, I am at a loss to know, especially in view of the fact that I have nominated ten times the number of men of the same nationality and faith as officers of my department, and some to very high positions."

1. What are the names of the officers so appointed, and where are they located?

2. What are the names of the officers whose places the newly-appointed officers fill?

3. Does the hon. the Controller of Customs mean that he has appointed ten times as many Irish Roman Catholics to office as he has appointed Protestants?

4. Or, does he mean that he has appointed ten times as many Irish Roman Catholics to office as he has removed from office?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Pater-son). The answer to questions 1 and 2 is as follows:—The following are names of twenty Irish Roman Catholics appointed to office in the Customs Department since I became the head thereof; the places where stationed, and the names of the officers whom they replaced, namely:

Daniel McBride, Hamilton, appointed in place of S. W. Townsend.

Hugh Leahy, Prescott, appointed in place of Wm. Connell.

J. C. Mahoney, Sarnia, appointed in place of J. A. Couse, Charles Ryan, Georgetown, Ont., new appointment.

P. Cullen, Canso, N.S., appointed in place of Thos. C. Cook.

J. E. Campbell, Halifax, N.S., appointed in place of A. Doyle.

W. Burns, Victoria, B.C., appointed in place of F. Berry.

M. O'Reilly, Nelson, B.C., new appointment.

P. Harvey, Montreal, appointed in place of P. McNeill.

Walter Welsh, Windsor, Ont., appointed in place of W. P. Killackey.

E. Donahue, Montreal, appointed in place of J. Dufresne.

Thos. Mulcahy, Halifax, appointed in place of W. Shanks.

D. J. Reddy, Halifax, appointed in place of J. A. Mitchell.

Chas. P. Roche, Halifax, appointed in place of M. Dwyer.

Frank Langan, Montreal, appointed in place of H. Jokisch.

E. P. Flynn, Arichat, N.S., appointed in place of R. Benoit.

Jas. Ryan, Toronto, new appointment.

James Harquail, Dalhousie, N.B., new appointment.

E. M. Johnson, Gananoque, appointed in place of A. E. Meggs.

J. O'Neill, Str. "Argus," Halifax, in place of A. Young.

The answer to the 3rd question is: No. And to the 4th question: No.

DISMISSAL OF MR. DAGNAULT, PAYMASTER.

Mr. MARCOTTE (by Sir Adolphe Caron) asked,

1. Has Mr. Dagnault, paymaster for the St. Maurice division, been dismissed?
2. Why?
3. At whose request?
4. By whom has he been replaced?
5. At whose request and by whose influence?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). In answer to the hon. gentleman's questions. I beg to say:—1. Mr. Dagnault's services have been dispensed with. 2. Because the Minister was of the opinion that it was in the public interests. 3. The Minister is responsible for his action. 4. Louis Philippe Dallaire. 5. Mr. Dallaire was recommended by persons in whom the Minister has confidence.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. How many postmasters have been dismissed in Canada since the 13th day of July, 1896?
2. What are the names and residences of the postmasters dismissed in Canada since the date mentioned?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say:—1. Owing to the closing of unnecessary offices, the inconvenience of sites, insufficiency of accommodation, failure on the part of certain incumbents to properly discharge their public duties, also undue activity in connection with political party issues and other good and sufficient public grounds, 521 persons have in the public interest been relieved of duty. 2. Owing to the length of detail involved in answer to the second question, the inquiry would more properly be the subject of a motion.

CANCELLATION OF MAIL CONTRACT IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. GILLIES asked,

1. How many mail contracts in Nova Scotia have been cancelled by order of the Postmaster General since the 1st day of August, 1896?
2. What were the routes over which these contracts extended?
3. Who were the contractors that held the contracts so cancelled?
4. What portion in each case of the period for which these contracts have been entered into was unexpired at the time of its cancellation?
5. What were the dates that these contracts were entered into, the period for which they were entered into, and the dates of their cancellation (in each case) by the Postmaster General?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The information asked for in this question would appear to be more properly the subject of a motion for a return.

POSTMASTER, ST. FELIX DE VALOIS.

Mr. DUGAS asked,

1. Who is now postmaster of St. Félix de Valois, in the county of Joliette?
2. When was he appointed?
3. Who was his predecessor?
4. When and why was he dismissed?
5. At whose request?
6. How many years had he served?
7. Were complaints in writing against the former postmaster laid before the Government or the Post Office Department?
8. What is the nature of the said complaints, and who made them?
9. Was an inquiry granted to the late postmaster before his dismissal, and if so, by whom was it made?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Max Crepeau is at present postmaster of St. Felix de Valois. There are no accessible records to show when he was appointed, although the departmental records show that having been in office in 1854, he has served at least forty-four years. There are no records in the department to show who his predecessor in office was, or that any complaints were ever made against him or any inquiry granted.

CANDIDATURE OF MR. DALTON MCCARTHY FOR BRANDON.

Mr. DAVIN asked,

Whether Dalton McCarthy, Esq., Q.C., M.P., was a candidate for election to this Parliament for the constituency of Brandon, Manitoba, in 1896? Whether the Hon. Clifford Sifton was an active supporter of Mr. McCarthy? Whether in fact he was not the leading manager in organizing the Liberal electors of Brandon in support of Mr. McCarthy?

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out that the last two portions of that question do not relate to any matters before the House, and therefore are not proper to be asked. The first part, I suppose, is.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply, then, to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, I beg to say that Mr. Dalton McCarthy, Q.C., M.P., was a candidate for election to this Parliament for the constituency of Brandon, Man., in 1896.

Mr. FOSTER. The other two are very interesting questions.

Mr. SPEAKER. They relate to matters outside the House.

INDIAN AGENT, RESTIGOUCHE INDIANS.

Mr. McALISTER asked.

1. Has V. J. A. Venner been dismissed from the position of Indian agent for the Restigouche band of Indians?
2. If so, who is appointed in his place, and by whom was he recommended?
3. Where does he reside? How far is his place of residence from the Indian reserve?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. Germain Patry, recommended by the representative of the district. 3. He resides at St. Alexis de Metapedia. That place is 18 miles by road from the Restigouche reserve. Patry's predecessor lived across the river in New Brunswick.

Mr. McALISTER asked.

1. Is Dr. V. J. A. Venner dismissed from the position of medical attendant to the Restigouche band of Indians? If so, is another appointed in his place, and by whom recommended?
2. If no successor is appointed, who is the acting medical attendant; and by whom was he recommended?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. No successor has been appointed, but the Indian agent was, after the dismissal of Dr. Venner, authorized to employ a medical man to attend the Indians when necessary, and he has availed himself of the services of Dr. W.W. Doherty, of Campbellton, N.B.

CLAIM OF WM. BEAUMONT.

Mr. McINNES (by Mr. Maxwell) asked,

Has the claim of Mr. William Beaumont for salary for services rendered as postmaster at Maple Bay been investigated? Is it the intention of the Government to allow this claim?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The nature of the claim of Mr. Wm. Beaumont having been investigated, it would appear to relate to services performed by that gentleman, for the province of British Columbia, prior to confederation, and consisted of his receiving at his hotel, near the wharf, a bag containing correspondence, and delivering the same. It would seem that claims of this nature, prior to confederation, are not chargeable to Canada.

KLONDIKE OFFICIAL GUIDE.

Mr. MILLS asked,

1. How many copies of Ogilvie's Klondike Official Guide has the Government received from the Hunter, Rose Company?
2. Is it part of the agreement with the said Hunter, Rose Company that the said company will furnish to the Government 3,000 extra copies, provided the Minister of the Interior notified the said company to that effect by March the first?

Mr. SPEAKER.

3. Was such notification given? If not, why not?

4. What is the total number of copies which the Government will receive?

5. Is it intended to make an equitable distribution of all the said guide books to Senators and Members of Parliament?

6. If not, what does the Government purpose doing with the copies in its possession?

7. Has any distribution been made?

8. If so, to whom, and to what extent as to number?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. 5,500 copies in English; 2,150 copies in French. 2. Yes. 3. Yes. 4. 10,000. 5. 6. 7. 8. In answer to the remaining questions: 10 copies of the English edition were given to each member of the House of Commons and 5 copies to each member of the Senate, and members and senators were furnished, and are being furnished with such additional copies as they apply for, the total number supplied them to date being about 4,000 copies; 700 copies have been distributed to educational institutions and public men and others outside of Parliament; 250 copies have been forwarded to the High Commissioner in London, and 300 copies to officials of the Government, making a total distribution of 5,250 copies of the English edition. Of the French edition, 875 copies have so far been distributed, each French member of both Houses being furnished, first, with ten copies and then with such additional copies as have been applied for.

Mr. DAVIN. In that connection may I ask my hon. friend if he is issuing a new hand-book for the department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. At the present time there is a hand-book of Western Canada under preparation, but no arrangements have been made yet for publishing it.

ROCHE FENDUE AND CALUMET DAMS.

Mr. POUPORE moved:

Copies of all correspondence and documents in relation to claims for damages caused by the construction of the Roche Fendue and Calumet dams in the county of Pontiac; also, all reports made to the Government by the Government valuers in the connection.

He said: My object in making this motion is to draw the attention of Parliament to the condition of things as they existed in Pontiac, regarding the construction of certain dams on the Ottawa River, in 1883, whereby a number of the property holders along the Ottawa River sustained very serious loss and damage.

In 1882 the Government of Canada gave a contract for the construction of the Roche Fendue and Calumet dam for the purpose of raising the navigable waters of the Ottawa between Bryson and Culbute Canal.

The works were duly completed, and as a result all the low lands along the Ottawa River were submerged, very large tracts of lands belonging to individual farmers along both sides of the river were drowned out, thus inflicting on the holders of the property very serious loss and damage. The Government of the day, realizing that these parties had justice on their side in seeking redress, sent Dominion arbitrators to assess the damages thus caused and settle with the owners of the property for fair compensation for the loss sustained. I have a memorandum here which shows that a large number of claims were sent in. The Government arbitrators visited the different localities, informed themselves of the extent of the injuries done to the different parties, and arrived at a basis of settlement of claims, which the Government from time to time paid. A number of other claims were presented; in fact the same valuers adjusted a number of claims and reported to the Government that a settlement had been arrived at with the different parties, and recommended that the Government should pay those respective amounts. I find on the list I have received from the Department of Railways and Canals that a large number of those claims—I now refer to the cases adjusted and amounts agreed upon—have remained unpaid. Prior to the general election of 1896 several appeals were made to the Government to have justice done to the parties whose cases had not received final treatment. I have a letter from the Department of Railways and Canals in respect to one of these claims in which it is stated definitely by the then Minister that as soon as the bustle and trouble of the election were over the matter would be attended to. However, the result of the elections in 1896 made a slight change in the complexion of the political management of public affairs and hon. gentlemen who made promises were unable to fulfil them. I should like to call the attention of the Government to the absolute necessity of looking into these claims, which are certainly just claims. I find in the list that the valuers in going through and examining certain properties for the purpose of reporting to the department, stated that in some cases the titles are imperfect and consequently the matters were allowed to remain in that position. What I should like to ask from the Government is that they would notify the parties whose claims have been adjusted by the arbitrators or appraisers that they must perfect their claims and send them to the department, and then the department would pay the money agreed upon between the Government appraisers and the owners of the property. There is another class of cases in respect to which appraisers have examined the properties but have in many cases made no report; in fact, in some cases they have reported there has been no damage done. It is rather a cavalier way of treating matters of this kind. I think wherever there has been real damage done to a private citizen of Canada by the Government of Canada, there is not only a legal obligation, but also a moral obligation to see that the citizen shall not be deprived of his rights by the chief authority of the state without any recompense. This is a matter which has caused a good deal of disquiet and unrest in the minds of the people of the county of Pontiac. I learn that last week at a meeting held at the village of Bryson, at which a very large number of those claims were represented by legal advisers, it was decided that a deputation should be sent to Ottawa, asking that this matter be taken up and dealt with on the basis of justice and equity. I do not claim anything more. I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no political scheme, so far as I am concerned; it is purely a matter of asking the Government to do only justice to people who have been injured since 1883. They have suffered on account of the drowning out of their lands. There are some cases, I confess, where perhaps the claims are extravagant; but where there has been real injury, and there are many cases of this kind still unsettled, it is not becoming for the Government of any country not to adjust the grievance, and to give a remedy to those thus affected. It is a very serious matter when we come to consider the condition of the people who are affected by the drowning out of those lands. Here are people who are obliged to pay every year a railway bonus, apart from their municipal and school taxes. The people have some difficulty in meeting their ordinary obligations apart from the railway bonus which is an impost on that county, and now when they have been injured to the extent I have pointed out, thus rendering their lands absolutely useless along the edge of the Ottawa River, the portion of their lands which was most productive and valuable, they find not only their revenue cut off to a large extent, but their burdens also increased. If the Minister of Railways was aware of the condition in which a large number of these people have been placed and the individual cases of hardship that exist in consequence of the construction of those dams, he would be prepared, apart from any report made to the department, either during the administration of his predecessor or since, to deal with the cases in his usual benevolent manner and he would feel glad to come to the rescue of those people. This is not a matter of politics with me, it is simply one of rendering justice to parties where justice is due. As a simple matter of fact I should like to say this, that a great number of the parties whose claims have not been adjusted happen to be owners of property in the county who are not political friends of my own; therefore, in advocating that justice be done. I am not electioneering nor taking action with any desire to secure advantage in urging the Government to do its plain duty in those cases. Had not a change of Government taken place in June, 1896, the predecessors of the present Government would have felt it an obligation upon them which they could not shirk, to carry out the promises which had been made for years before the election, and they doubtless would have continued the work of valuing the losses sustained by the different holders of the properties to which I have referred. I say, Sir, that had the late Conservative Government remained in office after 1896, they would have been forced to carry out their promises to do what is just and proper towards the people who have been injured there, and whose injury was caused by the Government carrying out work which was for the public benefit. The Government of Canada conceived it desirable to construct certain dams for the raising of the water in the navigable portions of the river, and in doing that they raised the water so high as to injure the properties of private owners along that river. Some three or four years ago it was thought advisable to blow up the dams in order to put the river in its natural state. The very moment that was spoken of remonstrances came from all over; not so much from the persons whose lands were injured as from those concerned in lumbering interests on the Ottawa River, and we know those holding those interests are very greatly concerned in keeping the water up to the navigable height. When it was suggested, therefore, that the dams should be blown up so as to remove the cause of injury, the Government then discovered that it would be doing even a worse act than they had before perpetrated. They dammed the Ottawa River so as to improve the navigation and that conferred a benefit on a very large portion of the community, but in doing it they injured the properties of private individuals. Now, Mr. Speaker, the simple way, and the only business way of dealing with this question is for the Government to find out what the extent is of the injury done, and to adjust it and compensate those injured, as a business man would do. I cannot for the life of me comprehend how it is that this simple act of justice should be refused. Surely the Government of the country are not going to take shelter behind the fact that they happen to be the supreme authority; surely they do not want to shelter themselves behind that authority and say, that because they are all-powerful, they refuse to do a simple act of justice towards some of Her Majesty's subjects. If the Government do not seek to take that course, then there is only one other course open to them, and that is to ascertain the real extent of the damage and pay for it. If they are not willing to pay to the full extent let, at all events, a fair adjustment be arrived at, and let some reasonable consideration be given to the persons who are suffering. If that be done the people of the country will feel that they can look with confidence to the Government of Canada, and that when an injustice is perpetrated upon them they may hope to obtain redress.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Poupore) permit me to ask him a question so that I may get information. I would like that the hon. gentleman would say whether he wishes to convey the impression that my attention has been called to individual claims, and that I have declined or neglected to give them any consideration. I would like to know if the hon. member (Mr. Poupore) would suggest that, because I must say that I have not in my mind at the present moment, a single individual case that has been called to my attention in connection with this river, that I had not looked into, and with reference to which I have not made a proposal of settlement to the extent to which I thought was the outside limit we would be justified in going.

Mr. POUPORE. I would be sorry if the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) should for a moment think that I am making any charge against him. I am simply endeavouring to bring to his notice in connection with these drowned lands, facts that I am perfectly confident he knows nothing about. I am perfectly satisfied that if the Minister were himself aware of the injustice that has been done he would feel it his incumbent duty to at once see that redress was rendered to the parties aggrieved. I am glad to know, from what has fallen from the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair), that he has been looking into some of those cases. I may say that I have made several inquiries, not directly from the Minister, but I have inquired at intervals in the department to know if anything was being done. Last session I put a question on the Order paper, asking if it was the intention of the Department of Railways and Canals to place a sum in the Estimates to pay off those claims, and I think the answer I received then was that "it was not the intention of the Government to do so." I inferred from this answer that the Government were remaining inactive in the matter. I am glad to know now from the Minister of Railways that he is interesting himself in those claims, and I trust that in due course of time those who are entitled to redress shall receive it. My only object in moving this motion was to bring before the notice of Parliament and of the Government, the urgent necessity of having something done for those parties who have been injured by the Government through the construction of those dams. I do not wish to detain the House longer than to repeat, that I have no motive in the world other than simply to try and get justice for those people who have been suffering under an injustice for the last fifteen years. Some of the parties were paid as long ago as ten years and others have been paid more recently. Those who have been paid are of course all right, but what think you of the position of those who have equally just claims and have not yet been compensated? The statement just now made by the Minister of Railways is the first intimation that I have received that any steps had been taken towards granting redress to those parties. I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, if he does not think it would be proper to have the Government arbitrators ascertain the claims that are reported in this list, and while I am alluding to it, I want to mention one particular case. There is a gentleman named Bishop Hennessy whose lot was appraised by the Government valuers; the amount of his compensation was fixed at $400, and afterwards it seems that the then Government thought they would blow up the dam.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. And they did blow it up partially.

Mr. POUPORE. No.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Well, they tore it down.

Mr. POUPORE. I beg your pardon.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Poupore) say that the obstruction was not to any extent removed?

Mr. POUPORE. Not to my knowledge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. My hon. friend (Mr. Poupore) must be misinformed upon the subject. I understand the situation to be this: After there had been some progress made—I will not say that any portion of the dam had been blown up, but I surely have been correctly informed by my officers when I say, that a considerable portion of the dam had been removed. After that had been done there were complaints made and the work was stopped. I have been given to understand that what work was done in the way of removing the dam was sufficient to have prevented a recurrence of the injury, and that no damages are being suffered now by the people along the river, by reason of that fact.

Mr. POUPORE. I thought the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals did not understand the question at all, and he has given the very best evidence of it now. The fact is that preparation was made to blow up the dams, but the remonstrance came before that was done. The remonstrance came, not from the parties whose lands were affected, but from a sufficiently influential body of men, and the Government decided that it would be inadvisable to destroy the dams.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does my hon. friend say that the dam was intact as it was built?

Mr. POUPORE. That is my conviction.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. All I can say is that the officers of my department advise me directly to the contrary. They may be wrong, but that is their report.

Mr. POUPORE. I do not want to be positive, but I am convinced that I am right. There has not been enough of the dam disturbed to lower the water.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Has the hon. member been there recently?

Mr. POUPORE. Yes, I have been there, and I know exactly what I am saying. Had the dams been blown up, the water would have been restored to its original natural height. Some fifteen years have elapsed since that injury was sustained by the parties. Does the hon. Minister imagine that parties who have suffered injury for fifteen years would not be entitled to compensation in any case?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not questioning that. I am asking as to the recurrence of the injury.

Mr. POUPORE. My information is correct. I remember that at the time the question of destroying the dam was spoken of, dynamite and other combustibles were sent there for the purpose, but a remonstrance came from a source that influenced the Government of the day not to do it, because it was going to cause injury to the lumber interest. They may have put in a shot or two, but the dam itself remains intact. They found that the blowing up of the dam in such rapid water, was a particularly difficult operation, owing to the difficulty of placing the combustibles in the proper place. One thing I do know is that the water remains at the artificial height at which it was intended it should be brought by the construction of the dams and the injury I complain of still exists. The lands are still submerged in the spring of the year so much as to prevent the owners of the soil from plowing and getting in their seed at the proper time, so that the lands cannot be used at all. The particular case to which I wish to draw the Minister's attention is that of Bishop Hennessy, of the township of Waltham. The valuers visited his property, and fixed the damage at $400. Mr. Bryson, who represented Pontiac at the time, wrote to Mr. Hennessy, stating that the Government had decided to blow up the dams and that he would have to be satisfied with half the amount, say $200. Mr. Hennessy refused to accept that amount, on the ground that the valuers had fixed the damage at $400, and that if he was entitled to anything at all, he was entitled to that amount. I would like the Minister of Railways and Canals to make a note of this case, because the name of Bishop Hennessy does not appear in the list that I have received from the department. In fact, no mention is made of the case; but I have other papers in my possession to show that he has a claim, and that he was offered through Mr. Bryson $200 if he would reduce his claim to that amount. There are many other cases which remain unsettled for one reason or another. Defective title seems to me the great trouble. In each case certain remarks are made by the valuers. There is the case of C. Barsalou, lot 27, north range, Calumet Island. The amount of the claim is $200. The valuers say they do not recommend the payment of it. I do not know anything special about that case. But a number of cases have been settled for and the amounts recommended by the valuers to be paid. I certainly cannot see why any objection should be made to the payment of those claims. I think it is imperative on the Government to ascertain what the extent of the damage is; and, if they feel that they cannot pay the full amount, they ought at least to make some compensation. I hope the Minister of Railways and Canals will give his attention to the matter and see that justice is done to the different parties, regardless of their political complexion or anything of that kind—that he will just see that fair and reasonable justice is done to all who have suffered.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I quite exonerate the hon. member for Pontiac from having any other purpose than a legitimate and proper purpose, as the member representing that county, in bringing this subject before the House. I have a good deal of hesitation in opposing my knowledge of the facts to that of the hon. member, because I know that he can speak in a large measure from personal information, whereas I can only speak from information furnished to me by my officers. I must say that I have had a very clear conviction, from the information I have thus received, that a few years ago a portion of the dam was either removed by being blown up or in some other way, so that the water was permitted free course where it would otherwise have been obstructed; and, as a result of that removal of a portion of the dam, the damage which was complained of as having previously been done by reason of the dam, was not continued.

The damages which it is claimed had previously been done by reason of the dam were not continued, and as a consequence there was no recurrence or revival of claims for damages from the residents along the river. That is my opinion. But since the hon. gentleman tells me that I have been quite misinformed, I shall make it a point to ascertain positively whether I am correctly informed or not; but I think I ought to say that there are circumstances which rather lead me to infer that my hon. friend must be in error, because since I have been in Parliament, I have had no claims submitted to my consideration which have not been of long standing or which relate to any damages of recent occurrence. In fact, I may go so far as to say that there have been only one or two claims in all brought to my notice, and I was not aware that a considerable number of persons are still pressing demands on the Government for damages occurring in that connection, which have not been satisfied. I am not aware of any, and could not have got any from individual claimants, because none have been visiting my department for the purpose of bringing claims to my notice. Ordinarily I have not found it necessary to look people up to ascertain whether they had any claim against the department. They generally find it desirable to present their claims directly or through some member of Parliament, or friend or solicitor, and press it on the notice of the head of the department. That has been my experience hitherto, and the cases of the claimants in respect of the Calumet dam must be exceptional, or the claims non-existent to a very considerable extent. However, the hon. gentleman says that there are claims. Well, if there are any, I have no hesitation whatever in saying to my hon. friend that if there is any good reason why there should be any further inquiry into the facts, I shall have inquiry made. If the reports heretofore made by valuers are not satisfactory to claimants, I do not undertake to offer any sum in excess of the valuations in these reports. The claimants have either to accept the reports or seek their remedy in the courts, which are open to everybody, and which are the usual means of disposing of these claims. If, on the other hand, the valuers have not made reports, I shall see that they do. If my hon. friend will point me to any particular case in which valuations have not been made, I shall see that the valuers are sent at once to ascertain and report on the amount of damages. If the hon. gentleman will deal with me as he would with any gentleman in ordinary business affairs, I shall be happy to afford him every facility.

Mr. POUPORE. I am very much obliged indeed for the kind assurance of the hon. gentleman that he will look into the matter. The reason why these claims were not pressed individually is because of the answer I received last year to my question and to which I have already referred.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I had no estimate presented to me from the department of amounts which we required to pay or which claimants were willing to accept, or which the claimants had a right to ask. I asked my deputy what sums he wanted for such purpose, and he said that he did not want any. That did not mean that there might possibly have been claims to which my attention should have been called, but there are none now. There are two or three cases in which persons claim large damages, and in which valuations were made and the sums offered not accepted. I am not in a position to ask for an appropriation to cover these. They can only be settled by the courts.

Mr. POUPORE. I thank the hon. gentleman for the assurance he has given me.

Mr. MACKIE. I rise to endorse the statement of my hon. friend from Pontiac. There is no doubt that farmers in that part of the country have suffered considerable loss by the drowning of their lands, and a curious fact in that connection is that some of them were paid and some were not by the late Government. There were valuations made of the lands, and the late Government paid a number of the claimants, and the others they did not. A great many settlers got offers of certain amounts in settlement of their claims, which they refused to accept. I do not say that the Government would be justified in paying the full amount in every case, but I think they should satisfy those who suffered loss, on the same line as that taken by the late Government—so much for every claim. The hon. Minister of Railways thinks that this dam was blown up some time ago.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In part.

Mr. MACKIE. I do not think it ever was. It is standing there yet, and I never heard of any part of it being blown up. The water is as high now, I think, as when the dam was built. My object in rising was to ask the Government to look into the matter and try to satisfy these claims. He will find, no doubt, that there are some unpaid.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not looking up the old files to see if I cannot find old claims that are unsettled, but I shall be very glad if the hon. gentleman will tell me what claims there are unpaid and I will look into them.

Mr. MACKIE. I shall be in the vicinity of the dam in a few weeks, and I am satisfied that it is standing there now as when built. I shall inquire into the matter and let the hon. Minister know.

Mr. POUPORE. I am perfectly satisfied with the assurance of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSALS ON LACHINE CANAL AND ST. ANNE'S LOCK.

Mr. GILLIES. In the unavoidable absence of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), I beg leave to move for the following return:—

Return showing the names of all employees on the Lachine Canal and St. Ann lock dismissed from the public service since the 23rd day of June, 1896, the cause of dismissal, the name of the complainant in each case, the amount of salary paid to the dismissed official, the name and salary paid to his successor in office.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). There has been already a return furnished to the House of the names of persons formerly employed on the canal and who were not re-employed. I think it was furnished a year ago. The hon. gentleman does not desire that we should repeat the return. If he will be content with a return giving the names of all the employees whose names have been already furnished to the House, I shall be happy to accept his motion.

Mr. GILLIES. That will be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

BRANCH RAILWAYS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other papers in possession of the Government relating to the proposed branch railway from South Port to Belfast and Murray Harbour, and the proposed branch railways in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: The Parliament of Canada has never been slow in granting aid for the construction of railways. And there is no doubt that railways have contributed to the development of the resources of the country. There is no doubt also but Parliament has spent money freely in railway construction. So freely has the Parliament of Canada voted money for the development of the country by the construction of railways, and so anxious was the Parliament to spend money in the construction of railways that some years ago, in 1883, if my memory serves me right, it broke through what may have been a very salutary check in the constitution, and did so in order to spend money to aid the construction of railways still more freely than the North America Act contemplated. At first aid to railways by the Dominion Government was confined to railways connecting two or more provinces. But in 1883, for some reasons which may have seemed very strong and plausible, Parliament broke through that check and railways which were not of interprovincial or Dominion importance have been assisted all over Canada. I do not know that in the construction of these railways, which were, in many cases, merely local, even-handed justice has been done all over the Dominion. At least, I can claim that the province from which I come aid has not been given for the construction of railways on the same generous scale as in other provinces of Canada. I think I speak with accuracy when I say that the aid extended to Prince Edward Island in this respect has been altogether inadequate. If we refer to the railway statistics we find at confederation that Canada had only 2,078 miles of railway. To-day we have 16,687. In order to increase the mileage to this extent aid has been given by the Parliament to the extent of at least $200,000,000. As every taxpayer in Canada must contribute his share towards the interest on this immense sum, it would naturally be supposed that, in giving this aid to railways, some respect at least would be had for the claims of the different provinces. There is such a thing as provincial autonomy and provincial rights. Prince Edward Island has been contributing largely to the interest upon this great sum of money for the construction of railways from which she has received no direct benefit. When I say that not a mile of railway in Prince Edward Island has been built, as far as commercial purposes are concerned, I think I make a statement which may astonish some hon. members of this House. It may be said that thirteen miles of railway have actually been built in Prince Edward Island, and that to this extent my statement is incorrect. It is true that thirteen miles of railway have been built in that province, but not for commercial purposes or traffic. On the contrary, the few miles built by the Dominion Government in Prince Edward Island was only built to carry out, or to attempt to carry out the terms of confederation in regard to the winter navigation between that province and the mainland of Canada. So the only advantage that Prince Edward Island has had from this large expenditure of about $200,000,000 is the construction of about thirteen miles of road, which for reasons I will give later, are of no advantage to the commerce of the province at all.

When Prince Edward Island entered confederation in 1873, the Dominion of Canada had only a mile of railway for every 700 people, while Prince Edward Island, that small province, had a mile of railway for every 480 people. This shows that the small province of Prince Edward Island was much more alive to the advantages of development accruing through railway construction than was the rest of the Dominion. But how does it stand to-day? To-day, Sir, the conditions are reversed. While the railway mileage of Prince Edward Island has not increased, the population has increased, and Prince Edward Island now has only a mile of railway for every 510 people, while the Dominion has a mile of railway for every 300 people. The people of Prince Edward Island, I may say, would raise no objection to that were it not for the fact that Prince Edward Island is very heavily taxed for that large extension of railway mileage in the Dominion. I think this shows clearly that a burden has been placed on that little province which is not warranted by any principle of fair-play.

Therefore, the small claim put forward to-day for railway extension here is a very good one, a just one and an equitable one. Sir, the House is aware that last session I had a motion similar to this one on the Order paper, and after it had been to some extent discussed, the debate was adjourned on motion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the question was not reached again during that session. I may say that that delay has been attended perhaps with some advantages; at least, it had one advantage, that a good deal of new light has been thrown upon this question of railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island. Some hon. members may remember that I asked for a return last year, or rather 1896, covering the railway expenditure by the Dominion in each province of the Dominion separately. That return was brought down, and hon. members who will take the trouble to look over that return will be disabused of the prevailing opinion in regard to railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island. When I say the report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, covering a period of at least twenty years, has misrepresented the railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island, I am sure I will be saying something that will astonish this House. But, what proof have I to adduce for that statement? My proof is the return which I moved for and which has been placed on the Table of the House last session showing that instead of $3,750,000 being spent in Prince Edward Island, only $635,000 had been spent altogether in that province since confederation, and all we have to show for it is those thirteen miles of railway built in connection with the winter navigation of the Straits of Northumberland, to which I have already referred. It is true that I made this statement last session as I had carefully gone over the figures. I made it before this return was brought down, and I know that it was received, when I made it, with some incredulity on both sides of the House, in view of the great difference between the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals and the statement I have made. The return issued from his own department, which was laid on the Table of this House. Hon. members who have taken the trouble to look over it must have done so with a good deal of astonishment. It is almost impossible to believe that a report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, supposed to have been prepared with a great deal of care, showed a discrepancy between a return issued from the same department regarding railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island of over three million dollars. I think that is a condition of affairs which the Minister of Railways and Canals is called upon to rectify and he should lose no time in order to place the truth of the matter fairly and squarely before this House and before the people of Canada. The correction of this mistake in reference to railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island will, I hope, have a good effect.

I have to say that I was very much pleased that the Minister of Trade and Commerce took so much interest in this question last year as to move the adjournment of the House. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has not hitherto been known as very sympathetic towards the maritime provinces, and I fondly hoped when he moved the adjournment of that debate that a change was coming over the spirit of his dreams, and that the maritime provinces were hereafter to receive, perhaps, a little more generous attention at his hands. I am sorry, however, that the hon. gentleman is not in his place.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). Yes, he is here all right.

Mr. MARTIN. I am pleased to see the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is taking his seat. I am not, however, referring to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, he will excuse me, I am referring to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I may say to him that the reference I made to the Minister of Trade and Commerce was this: that last year he had moved the adjournment of the debate on a motion similar to this one, and that the matter was not reached again during the session. I also remarked that I was very proud to see that that hon. gentleman was taking a little more interest in the affairs of the people of the maritime provinces, and I thought it augured well for the success of this proposed undertaking that he should have done so. Above all, I do hope that this question will be approached without any reference to party politics. I am very sorry to say that on previous occasions that has not been the case; that was not the case when this question was brought up in 1896, and it has not been the case since then. In 1896, hon. gentlemen may be aware that the Government came down with a proposition to build in Prince Edward Island some ninety miles of railway, and the most sensational and untruthful reports were spread broadcast over Canada in regard to the action of the Government. At least, whether or not that is the exact number of miles which was proposed to be built, the expenditure proposed to be made by the late Government was about a million of money. During the election campaign of 1896 the most sensational reports were scattered broadcast over Canada for political purposes in order to bring the Conservative Government into disrepute because of their proposed expenditure in Prince Edward Island, and even the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries was, perhaps, a sinner in that respect. We find that the hon. gentleman went over to Nova Scotia and stated at a public meeting there that the Government of that day proposed to expend $4,500,000 in constructing railways in Prince Edward Island. But, in order to do the Minister of Marine and Fisheries justice, I may say that I think he corrected that statement, and reduced the figure of $2,000,000, and even that was above the mark. But, Sir, the report had done its work; the report had been spread abroad in order to damage the late Government by misrepresenting the amount of money proposed to be spent by them in railway construction in Prince Edward Island. But while that statement had been spread broadcast over Canada, the denial of that statement, the correction which was afterwards made, had not the same extensive publication. Not only that, but I find by the press of the day that even in this city, no less than the Secretary of State stated, that Ottawa's share of the proposed railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island would be $125,000. If Ottawa's share of the alleged railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island were $125,000, no wonder people were alarmed, for, taking the population of Ottawa at 50,000, the sum proposed to be spent on railways in Prince Edward Island would be $12,500,000 instead of $1,000,000. Those statements did a great deal of injury and were calculated to damage the Government of the day and prevent this question being settled in a fair and equitable manner, without reference to party politics. But I may say that not only was that the case under the late Administration, but to-day when the present Government proposes to grapple with the question, the Conservative press is taking the same stand on this question as was taken by the Liberal party when they were in Opposition. When I speak in this regard I must refer to a paper for which I have great respect in other matters and I will relieve myself of any charge of partiality by making reference to the Toronto "Mail and Empire." When the present Government proposed to take up this question, no doubt in order to make political capital, it was stated by that paper that "Prince Edward Island had not built any railways and that Canada owns and runs its local line." For a journal of the reputation of the Toronto "Mail and Empire," which should be conversant with public questions, to make such a statement as that Prince Edward Island had not built any railways, is not only doing itself very great harm, but is doing the party with which it is associated a great deal of injury also. I hope in the discussion of this question party politics will be dissociated altogether. The province has a good claim for the construction of the railway mileage covered by the motion, and I trust the discussion will proceed without the introduction of party politics. But as the Toronto "Mail" has stated that Prince Edward Island has not built any railways I wish to refer to an authority which I trust will satisfy that paper that it is in error. This is a matter which is constantly cropping up, and in the interest of Prince Edward Island and for the sake of clearing up the question I will appeal to the records and see whether the Island has paid a cent for railways or not. In the sessional papers of 1876 I find the following :—

By Order in Council dated Windsor, 26th June, 1873, Her Majesty thought fit to approve the terms and conditions set forth in the Addresses from the Houses of Parliament of Canada and from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, May, 1873, and it was declared by Her Majesty : " From and after the 1st day of July, 1873, Prince Edward Island should be admitted and become part of the Dominion."

By the resolutions which formed the basis of union it was provided that " the railways under contract and in course of construction for the Government of the Island shall become the property of Canada."

To carry out the above provision it was agreed that the cost of the railway should be borne by the Dominion, and the money so paid, charged as a debt against the Island.

The total cost is $2,862,766, being at the rate of $14,400 per mile, exclusive of the right of way damages and general expenses, which it is estimated will be covered $1,900 per mile—making the total cost $16,300 per mile, the amount originally appropriated, which would amount to over $3,000,000

If the writers of the press, and of the Toronto "Mail," to which I have referred, had been conversant with the terms on which the island entered confederation, this statement which was made in their paper would not have been made, because it is here stated distinctly, and it is in accordance with the facts, that the money so paid by the Dominion for railway purposes in Prince Edward Island was charged as a debt against the province. I hope this extract from an order of the Queen's Privy Council—the very highest authority—will finally settle this question and have the effect of preventing the Minister of Railways from again stating in his report that $3,750,000 have been spent in constructing and operating the island railway, which conveys the erroneous idea that the island never spent a dollar on railway construction, whereas, according to the statement I have read, it paid all the cost of those railways up to $3,144,000, which amount was charged against the province as a debt. There is no doubt whatever that it has been charged against Prince Edward Island. The question is, has Prince Edward Island paid it? The Island of course has paid it, and the sum of $3,144,214 has been deducted from the amount in account between the Island and Canada at the time of confederation. I do not know whether my labours will be altogether in vain if I succeed in correcting this mistake in regard to railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island.

I have confidence that justice will be done Prince Edward Island, by the press of this country, which is the great educator of the people, and I hope the statements which I make will clear the way for Prince Edward Island getting justice. There is no Parliament or Government in the world which would saddle a small province like Prince Edward Island with its share of the cost of railway expenditure all over Canada, and refuse a reasonable and necessary railway expenditure for that province itself. It is all very well to say that the policy of the Government should be reversed in regard to granting subsidies to railways. It is all very well to say : Go on with the construction of canals now, and thereby let those provinces which have reaped a large share in the construction of railways get the largest share in the construction of the canals also. But, Sir, the province from which I come has never received any aid from canal expenditure, and with the exception of the St. Peter's Canal in Nova Scotia there has been no canal expenditure in the maritime provinces. That fact strengthens considerably the claim of Prince Edward Island now. I wish to read to the House the statement of the reasons given by the Dominion Statistician for the policy which the Government adopted in the year 1883, of subsidizing railways which are not of interprovincial importance or railways not connecting two or more provinces. The Dominion Statistician says :

Owing to the danger to provincial finances consequent on pressure upon the provincial governments for aid for local railways (within the province), the Dominion Government, in 1883, determined to change their policy, which up to that time had been to give aid only to those lines which ran through more provinces than one. The change of attitude was necessary. Railways had to be built. The provincial governments could not build them without running into debt. This compelled them to make application to the Federal Parliament for enlarged financial arrangements, a proceeding which, in the interest of the system of government adopted in Canada, was calculated to deprive the provincial governments of that independence of the federal authority which it is deemed advisable should ever be maintained.

This was the object of the Government when in 1883 they began large expenditures on railways which were only of local importance, and railways with regard to which the province of Prince Edward Island has hitherto received no aid or benefit. That policy did not relieve the people of Prince Edward Island in building railways, because the railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island was made by that province previous to that year. But, Sir, it did relieve the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec and the province of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick and every other province in the Dominion except Prince Edward Island. Before that policy is now reversed it should also be applied to Prince Edward Island. I find in the report of the Minister of Railways for the year 1878, a statement which has been the means of misleading the public mind in regard to railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island ever since that time. By reference to Sessional Papers No. 23 to 146, of 1878, I find the following railway statistics:—

Aid from—
Dominion Govt. for railways.	$65,939,900 51
Ontario for railways.....	2,229,639 02
Quebec do	8,573,613 27
New Brunswick for railways..	2,730,000 00
Nova Scotia do ..	818,750 00
Municipalities do ..	7,224,579 00
Total.....	$87,456,481 80

This is laid down to be the aid from the Dominion Government, from the provinces and municipalities up to June 30, 1878.

Now, Sir, I think I am within the bounds of truth in stating that this extract was the means of perpetrating an injustice against Prince Edward Island, an injustice which has worked its injury to the province up to the present day. I have read from the terms of union, where the sum of over $3,000,000 was charged against Prince Edward Island for railways, but here are these railway statistics for 1878, which say that not a dollar was paid by Prince Edward Island. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this mistake is not of very recent date. It started at least in 1878 under the Mackenzie administration, and it has done very serious injury in preventing Prince Edward Island obtaining that share for public works which it ought to have. We find that Prince Edward Island has not participated in the large expenditure which has been made upon the canal system of this country. The blue-books show that on canals there has been expended as follows:—

Expenditure on land up to the 30th June, 1896	$66,992,736
Additional expenditure for—
Renewals	2,352,293
Repairs	5,103,787
Staff and maintenance.....	6,476,706
Total.....	$80,925,522

Now, Sir, why is it that the Government do not propose to reverse their policy with regard to the expenditure on canals? I do not say that canals are not necessary for the development of commerce, but railways are of as much advantage as canals. There is one thing at least that may be said of railways—they are generally distributed all over Canada, and may be made as useful to one part of Canada as to the other. That cannot be said of the canal system of the Dominion, which is altogether in the interest of the two largest and most influential provinces of the Dominion; I refer to Quebec and Ontario. These two provinces united in 1883 to get aid for railways of local importance, and they have been getting aid largely ever since. Those two large provinces have been getting more than their share of the money expended on railways. Now they are saying, Reverse that policy in regard to railways, and continue your policy with regard to large expenditures on canals. Let us see what return the Dominion of Canada gets from that large expenditure on canals. We have been told that the railways of Canada should be self-sustaining—that the Intercolonial Railway, especially, should be self-sustaining. It was proposed last session to expend more of Canada's money in building Government railways in order to make the Intercolonial self-sustaining. Do the Government propose to make the canals self-sustaining? Is it not just as necessary that the canals should be made self-sustaining as the railways? Has any effort ever been made to make the canals self-sustaining? After the two largest provinces have got more than their actual share of the expenditure on railways, while provinces like Prince Edward Island have received none at all why should the Government reverse their policy in regard to railways and expend more freely on canals? The two most influential provinces of Canada, Quebec and Ontario, will receive the advantage of this expenditure, and will receive it at the expense of all the other provinces, the maritime provinces, British Columbia and the North-west included. But what returns has Canada received from the canal system? I find that in the year ending the 30th of June, 1896, the tolls collected on the canals of Canada amounted to only $339,539. That is a very small return from an expenditure of $80,000,000. The interest on $80,000,000 would be about $2,500,000; and yet in this case there is only a direct return to Canada of $339,539. How do the returns to-day compare with those of some years previous?—for instance, with those of the year 1868? I find that in 1868 the tolls received from the canals of Canada were $403,879, that is, thirty years ago the tolls from the canals were larger than they are to-day, although at that time the expenditure on those canals was only $20,692,244, against $80,825,522 to-day. Now, I ask, is this large expenditure on canals going to continue? Is the policy to be propounded that the railways of Canada must be self-sustaining, but no effort at all is to be made to make the canals self-sustaining? In fact, it seems that the more we expend on the canals the less we get from them. The expenditure has been increased by leaps and bounds, and year by year the tolls have been decreasing. If the Government wished to act in the interest of the tax-payers of Canada, when they say that the railways are to be self-sustaining, they would also say that the canals must be self-sustaining. I put up that plea on behalf of the whole of the maritime provinces as against the two largest provinces, Quebec and Ontario. I put it up especially on behalf of the province from which I come, where not one dollar is expended on canals or railways either. I may say that if this policy is persisted in, there is a danger in centralizing the power of this Government in the largest provinces. Two of these larger provinces may unite, and propound the policy that the tolls on the canals should cease. That is altogether in the interest of the two largest provinces, Quebec and Ontario. We found that out not very long ago. We found last session that this Government were ready to do that. They are going to be free with their expenditure on canals, but they say they are going to shut down the expenditure on railways. I have a clipping from one of the newspapers, printed at the time of a by-election at Point Lévis, which shows how freely the Government is ready to expend money in some cases. When the by-election at Lévis was at its height, the Hon. J. Israel Tarte went there to plead for the Liberal Government candidate. He said :

I give you my word that within a few days the Minister of Railways and myself will come here to discuss with your council about the works which we must execute here. Do you want wharfs ? Do you want elevators ?

The report of this meeting in the newspaper then went on to describe how he entered into a long discussion of the policy of the Government concerning railways and canals which would require an expenditure of $10,000,000 to $12,000,000. The only thing, he said, the Government ask for is your support. Which is the best man to represent Lévis ? I do not know whether he or the Minister of Railways went to Lévis as promised, but if they did not go to Lévis, Lévis came to them, and they were ready with their money. That is their usual system, and it is a great pity we had not a by-election in Prince Edward Island, because if we had, no doubt the Minister of Public Works would have gone there, and we should probably have had this railway under construction. The Government appear to be alarmed by the large expenditure which they proposed to make on canals, and they say that they are going to call a halt in further expenditure on railways. Well, Mr. Speaker, I protest, in the name of the province from which I come, and which has been overlooked in this matter, against any halt being called, in so far as that province is concerned. If the Parliament of Canada wishes to do justice, if it wishes to extend fair-play and expend evenly and fairly the money of the country devoted to public works, it will see that Prince Edward Island is given her share of railway expenditure, in proportion to that made in the other provinces.

When discussing this question on a previous occasion, I was asked why did not the late Government build this railway. Well, I suppose the late Government could just as well have put the question : Why did not our predecessors do it ? We might as well be asked why was not this road built immediately after confederation, which was perhaps the most favourable time, for then the circumstances attending the entrance of Prince Edward Island into the union were fresh in everybody's minds. But we are not now dealing with the past. What we have now to deal with is the present. I can say this much for the late Government, that with all its delay, for which I am not going to offer any excuse, they did bring down a proposition to do justice to Prince Edward Island which would have been satisfactory to the province. And the present Government has also gone one step at least to carry out the proposition of the late Government. It has sent down engineers to survey this road. That survey is said to be completed. When that question was brought up during the first year of this Parliament, we were told that no railway construction should be undertaken. Then when the next session came on, we were told that a survey would have to be made before construction could be proceeded with. We are now in the third session, and it seems that as far as railway extension in Prince Edward Island is concerned, to which at least one of the members of the Government was very strongly committed, almost nothing has been done. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries went over the whole province during the last electoral campaign, and made the construction of this railway part of his platform, which I was very much pleased to see, but since he has come up here he has evidently found out that he has not anything like the influence which his friends in the island boasted of his having with his colleagues. Either he has no influence at all with the Government or has gone back on the promises he made to the people of Prince Edward Island. Great hopes were raised among his friends when the hon. gentleman obtained the seat in this Government. We were told that when he would take his seat here, he would occupy a place in the Cabinet second to none ; but now that we are in the third session of this Parliament, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman is in rather a delicate position, and has not that influence with his colleagues which he should have, and to which he is entitled. Last year he pleaded that we must have a survey before beginning construction, but this year the Estimates are down and not a dollar to start the building of this line. I see by the press that the hon. gentleman is going to take wings for Washington in a few days. What will become of the Prince Edward Island Railway extension then ? Is the hon. gentleman going to make some effort to have the Government carry out his pledges in regard to this railway ? I had hopes that the hon. gentleman would have exerted the influence which he ought to have in this Government, and thus have fulfilled the predictions of his friends, who said throughout the campaign : " Prince Edward Island will never get justice until the hon. member for Queen's (Sir Louis Davies) has a seat in the Government. I am afraid, however, that the people of that province are going to be disappointed. I am afraid that what hopes we had of a sum being placed in the Estimates for the purpose of railway extension in the island are gone unless they repent at the last moment, before they bring down the Supplementary Estimates. I have heard the hon. Minister of Marine say that we should not advocate this on the eve of an election; we are now within measurable distance of a general election.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You are not anxious for one now.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman may not be anxious, but I think he had better prepare for one, and his best preparation would be to redeem some of his pledges. He will find that the people of Prince Edward Island are watching him closely, and unless some of the pledges he has made are implemented, he may appeal to them in vain when the time comes.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to a return to which I made reference in the beginning of my remarks, as I am sure that that return will assist hon. members in coming to an understanding with reference to railway expenditure in Prince Edward Island. I have here a return dated 30th June, 1896, and numbered Sessional Papers No. 66. It is entitled as follows:—

Return to an Order of the House of Commons dated 28th September, 1896, for a statement showing the amount of money expended by the Dominion Government since the 1st day of July, 1873, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada, with the number of acres of land granted as subsidies, and their estimated value. Also, a statement showing separately the parts of such expenditure made in each province of the Dominion and in the North-west Territory, deducting any sums that may have been charged against any of the provinces or North-west Territory, in their debt account with the Dominion.

(Sgd.) R. W. SCOTT,
Secretary of State.

The first statement in this return shows the amount of money expended by the Dominion Government since the first day of July, 1873, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada. Amount expended $106,026,567.66. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the total amount of money expended by the Dominion since confederation, but it is the total amount expended from 1873 to 30th June, 1896. I called for that statement because it was in the year 1873 that Prince Edward Island came into the union, and, to make a comparison, the figures ought to show what share Prince Edward Island received out of that expenditure since that time. The statement also shows how this money was divided between the provinces. And here it is. It is entitled:

Statement showing separately the amount of money expended in each province of the Dominion and in the North-west Territories by the Dominion Government, from the 1st day of July, 1873, to the 28th September, 1896, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada:

Ontario	$29,889,153 51
Quebec	14,666,937 61
New Brunswick	9,045,538 07
Nova Scotia	14,718,155 81
Manitoba	8,024,432 37
British Columbia	21,441,700 42
North-west Territories.....	7,604,819 60
Prince Edward Island.....	635,830 27

I desire to call the attention of the House to this statement and also to compare it with a statement in a return brought down from the Minister of Railways Department. If you will look over the volume of railway statistics, table No. 1, summary statement of capital year ending 30th June, 1897, you will find that it is said that for Prince Edward Island, the Dominion Government paid $3,750,565.38 for railways. I think I am only doing my duty when I call attention to the discrepancy between these statements. When I say that that discrepancy, that mistake—I will call it nothing but a mistake—has appeared in these railways statistics every year since Prince Edward Island entered confederation, I say something which I am sure will not be regarded as creditable to this Parliament or to the Department of the Minister of Railways. And even at the risk of repeating myself I trust I am doing some service not only to this Parliament but to the province from which I come when I call attention to this discrepancy. I trust that a report from the Railway Department will never be presented to this House again showing that this large sum was spent by the Dominion on railways in Prince Edward Island when such was not the case. The figures I have just quoted showing the expenditure in the several provinces, are not complete. In fact, the return is incomplete as it does not cover all the facts called for. The order of the House was for a return showing not only the amount of money spent but the quantity of land voted by this Parliament to assist in the building of railways. I think you will find, Mr. Speaker, that the quantity of land voted for this purpose is about 53,000,000 acres. That land was the general heritage of Canada, and obtained at great expense to the taxpayers of Canada—the people of Prince Edward Island among the rest. It would represent $53,000,000. What share of that has the province of Prince Edward Island received? None whatever. Now, analysing this return of moneys paid which I have just given, we find that the per capita of expenditure by the Dominion in each of the provinces is as follows:—

Province.	Per capita.
Ontario received	$14 13
Quebec do	9 85
New Brunswick received.....	28 15
Nova Scotia received.....	32 69
Manitoba received	52 61
British Columbia received.....	218 40
North-west Territories received.....	76 84
Prince Edward Island received.....	5 82

That is, for every settler we have in British Columbia, the Government of Canada, since the year 1873, has paid to that province, out of the revenues of this country, $218 for railways; while Prince Edward Island has only received $5.82; Ontario, $14; Quebec, $9; Nova Scotia, $28; New Brunswick, $32; Manitoba, $52; and the North-west Territories, $76.84. I ask again, is that justice to Prince Edward Island? Is it fair to Prince Edward Island that you should expend $14 for railways per capita in Ontario and spend only $5 in Prince Edward Island? Is that fair-play? Will the Government of to-day be doing justice to Prince Edward Island by saying: We will reverse the policy of subsidizing railways, we will not subsidize any more railways, we have got all the railways the country needs, and now we will turn our attention to canals and spend all the money on canals we possibly can. There are no canals in Prince Edward Island, there are none in the maritime provinces, we will scoop in all the money we can, and Ontario and Quebec will certainly have the best of it. But I wish to look at it from another standpoint. I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would give me their attention for a few minutes, because I am going to read a very important tabulated statement which bears directly on the argument I am presenting to the House. I have shown you the amount expended by the Dominion, now I will show you the amount expended by the provinces and municipalities themselves in aiding railways. I hold in my hand a tabulated statement showing the sums contributed by the local governments and municipalities for railway construction up to the 30th June, 1896:

Ontario, local government... $ 7,306,538
do municipalities..... 10,069,143
	$ 17,375,681
	or $8.21 per capita.
Quebec, local government... $12,409,008
do municipalities..... 482,075 $ 12,991,082
	or $8.72 per capita.
N. B., local government.... $ 4,169,729
do municipalities..... 273,500
	$ 4,443,229
	or $13.83 per capita.
N. Scotia, local government. $ 2,376,116
do municipalities... 261,685
	$ 2,637,801
	or $5.85 per capita.
Manitoba, local government. $ 770,677
do municipalities.... 595,600
	$ 1,376,277
	or $9.02 per capita.

Mr. MARTIN.

B. C., local government... $ 37,500
do municipalities..... 37,500
	$ 75,000
	or 76c. per capita.
N. W. T., local government..... do municipalities.... $ 25,000
	$ 25,000
	or 25c. per capita.
P. E. I., local government.. $ 3,144,214 do no municipalities.....
	$ 3,144,214
	or $28.82 per capita.

These figures show that the provinces which have received so much aid from the Dominion Government have done very little for themselves. Sir, I think these figures tell a tale. Prince Edward Island has only received aid from the Dominion Government of $5.82 per capita, and has spent out of her own resources at the rate of $28.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Since confederation?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, since confederation, for railway purposes.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Where were the railways put?

Mr. MARTIN. In Prince Edward Island of course.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think the hon. gentleman was misunderstood. Perhaps he will restate his proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. My proposition is this: I am reading here the contributions made by the provinces themselves for railway construction since confederation.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Since 1873.

Mr. MARTIN. Since confederation.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. But you were not in the confederation before 1873.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Is my hon. friend quoting what was spent before confederation in the island and not quoting what was spent before confederation in the other provinces?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not understand the hon. gentleman.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). All the provinces did not come in at the same time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Do I understand that the local government and municipalities in Prince Edward Island have spent these sums?

Mr. MARTIN. I certainly not only think so, but am sure of it. I may say this, that that money has been spent by Prince Edward Island for railways since confederation, and not previous to confederation. As a matter of fact, a railway was under construction previous to 1875, but the payments that have been made on that railway were not made until then. So that, so far as that question is concerned, I think my statement is correct and pertinent to the argument that I am making. I say again that Prince Edward Island, out of its own resources, has contributed for railway construction at the rate of $28.82 per head, while the province of Ontario has contributed $8 and Quebec $8.72.

Mr. TISDALE. Do you mean to take those figures since or before confederation?

Mr. MARTIN. Since confederation. I say again, for the information of hon. gentlemen on both sides, that when Prince Edward Island entered confederation we had a railway under construction, and it was agreed by the terms of confederation that Prince Edward Island should hand over that railway to the Dominion Government as a free gift.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Will you take it back as a free gift?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, if the hon. gentleman will take the canals, we will take the railway. The hon. gentleman was not in his seat when I referred to the large expenditure made on canals. I noticed last year that when the House was voting expenditures on canals in Ontario, the hon. gentleman seemed very well pleased. But I will offer this bargain to the hon. gentleman: If he will take the canals in Ontario and operate them, and pay interest on the money spent by the Dominion on their construction, equipment, repairs and maintenance, and take the tolls in return, I think Prince Edward Island will take its railways.

We should look into this matter a little closer. A fiction had some years ago been uttered by the Hon. Edward Blake that Ontario is the milch cow of Canada. It appears, however, that Ontario is not the milch cow but that the large expenditures on canals and no less than $29,000,000 on railways since 1873 is much more than her milk is worth. It appears rather that Ontario is a heavy Durham cow running to beef, and the cost of feeding her is more than we are getting out of the milk. The province from which I come, on the other hand, may well be called the small Jersey cow of Canada which helped to pay its household expenses. If the hon. Minister is now willing to take the canals and work them for the interest of the money invested and take the tolls as a return on the investment, he will end in being a much poorer man in twelve months than he is to-day. I will not state as a contrast the sum expended in each province by the Dominion Government and also the sum spent by the local governments and the municipalities, and thereby present the case in a new light to hon. members. I have prepared a tabulated statement, as follows:—

Expenditure per Capita by the Dom. Govt. on Railways in each Province up to June 30, 1896.	Expenditure per Capita by the Local Govt. and Municipalities on Railways in each Province up to June 30, 1896.
Ontario.....$14 13	Ontario.....$ 8 21
Quebec.....9 85	Quebec.....8 72
New Brunswick...28.15	New Brunswick...13 83
Nova Scotia....32 69	Nova Scotia....5 85
Manitoba.....52 61	Manitoba.....9 02
British Columbia..218 40	British Columbia..0 76
N. W. Territories..76 84	N. W. Territories..0 25
P. E. Island....5 82	P. E. Island...28 82

I said, in discussing this question last year, that in the provinces of Canada where the Dominion Government spent largely, the province themselves paid little—and vice versa. I think the Government should give serious attention to the statement I have read, and I hope that this state of affairs will not long continue in Prince Edward Island as regards railway expenditure, but that before this session is over the island will receive justice. I have prepared another tabulated statement, which will be interesting to members of the Government and this House as bearing on this question, and I trust it will be of some help to the Ministers when this question comes before the Council.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 4) to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers.—(Mr. Casey.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 7.

Mr. TISDALE. Has this Bill been before the Railway Committee?

Mr. CASEY. A similar Bill was sent to the Railway Committee last session, but this session, the Bill being a public one, it comes in the usual course to the Committee of the Whole House, and has been adopted as far as section 7.

Mr. TISDALE. Such Bills as these are usually sent to the Railway Committee or to a special committee. I notice that the Minister of Railways is absent, and I presume that my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) would not wish to push this Bill, in the absence of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair). I am informed by a member of the House that the Minister of Railways was to have an opinion from the Minister of Justice on this Bill, and that being the case, it is all the more reason why we should not proceed with it now.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Railways was asked to procure, not exactly an opinion from the Minister of Justice, but to find precedents bearing on the matter. The Minister objected that he had doubts as to the power of this House to pass the particular clause now under consideration. He did not say positively that we could not pass it, but he was to get an opinion on it, and I hope to see him here in a few minutes.

Mr. TISDALE. Better let the committee rise, and in the meantime go on with something else.

Mr. CASEY. I do not want this Bill put after all the other orders.

Mr. TISDALE. Under the circumstances, I think the committee should rise and report progress. That will not prevent us taking it up again.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would be disposed to adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale). We can go back to the Bill.

Mr. CASEY. On the understanding that we can take it up after the other items this evening, I am willing to move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

ATTACHMENT OF SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the House again resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 14), an Act respecting the attachment of salaries and money in the hands of the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. We have not the printed Bill with the amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Bill was printed a week ago and was distributed last Monday. At least I have a copy of it.

Mr. CASEY. It must be printed, if it got a second reading.

Mr. DAVIN. The Bill was printed but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) made a new Bill of it, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said very properly that it would be necessary to have the new Bill before us.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I saw that the Bill was printed personally, and I was at the distribution office and got a copy of it last Tuesday, both in English and French.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to have your ruling with regard to this Bill. We read a Bill the second time and we got into committee on it, and not only was that Bill gutted, but as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, it was absolutely destroyed. The hon. Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the Bill certainly must be reprinted. The Bill is absolutely a new Bill now; this Bill never has been read a second time, and I rise to the point of order, as to whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) can go on with it as though it had been read the second time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course, the hon. gentleman cannot raise the point of order that the Bill has not been printed and distributed.

Mr. DAVIN. That is not the point I raise.

Mr. SPEAKER. The order of the House is stated on the Order paper, and there can be no debate or discussion about it. The House made the order on the previous day, the 18th of April, that the House shall to-day go into committee on this Bill. I cannot interfere with that order of the House. The House goes into committee now automatically. When it goes into committee, then it will be for the committee to say what it will do.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. TISDALE. I would ask the chairman what Bill he has.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Bill before the Chair is naturally the Bill that has been presented. Now some motion can be made.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand that the Bill that was originally introduced has been entirely stricken out. The hon. gentleman struck out section 3 of that Bill, and introduced what he called sections 1 and 2. I understood that the substance of these two sections were to be referred to the Solicitor General for his opinion whether or not they were within the power of this House to pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I may say that there was a difference of opinion as to whether it was in the power of this House to pass the Bill as originally printed. When I introduced the Bill, it was with the single purpose of finding out what we could do to remedy an acknowledged evil in the country. As a result of a suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), and a conference among a number of the legal members of the House I decided to substitute two very brief clauses for the original Bill. I will read those clauses, and members can judge of them for themselves. There can be no object in raising any objection to them at the present time. If they waited a week, or even a year, hon. members would not be in a better position to judge of the merits of the Bill than they are now. The two clauses of the Bill are as follows :—

1. All moneys or salaries due, or accruing due, to any person employed by the Government of Canada, shall be liable to attachment in each and every of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada, according to the laws and rules of procedure in force in such provinces.

2. This Act shall not apply to any debt contracted before the passing of this Act.

The object is that the Bill shall not be retroactive—that it shall not apply to any old debt contracted by any civil servant.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have no desire to do anything against his Bill that is not fair; but I want to know from you, Mr. Chairman, as a matter of order, whether he can go on, in view of the fact that there is not an atom of the old Bill left except this :—

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

which you will find at the head of every Bill. Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the old Bill are withdrawn by the hon. gentleman, and he now offers two brief clauses. Therefore, the point I raise is this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think this is a point of order well taken. There is a Bill before the committee containing three clauses. I understand that a motion is to be made to amend these clauses, and to substitute some other clauses for them to the same effect. So that I do not think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not see what object the hon. gentleman has. I do not think he has an evil object, of course; but surely he will join with other members of the House when we desire to gain a good object. What can be gained by raising technical objections at this stage? If members desire to kill the Bill, let them do so; but let us have a fair vote on the question. With regard to the first clause, which is really the crux of the whole Bill, you will see how it is amended. As the Bill was originally introduced, the onus rested on the Federal Government, and I recognized the force of the arguments brought forward that it might entail a great deal of work on the Government. Therefore, I amended the Bill in such a way as merely to remove the ban as it exists in the provinces. Where any province has an Act, as have the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba and Quebec, permitting the garnishment of money due to local civil servants, the Bill merely removes the ban as it applies to Dominion or federal civil servants, so that the law may apply equally to all civil servants in the different provinces. There surely can be no objection to that. I may say that my Bill is really the result of a suggestion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that something of this kind be substituted. Besides, I secured the opinion of a great many members of the legal profession in this House, that this Bill is not ultra vires. Therefore, I would urge members to vote for the Bill, and we will see what the result will be. Surely there is no desire that federal civil servants shall be exempt from garnishment when the salaries of local civil servants can be garnisheed. In the province of Quebec, and I think in the province of Ontario, only a certain percentage of the salary of a civil servant can be garnisheed, and this Act will place the federal civil servant in the same position, so that only the same proportion of his salary can be garnisheed. I may say that during the discussion here a couple of weeks ago, I expressed my willingness to withdraw the Bill entirely, if the Government would make a statement in the House that they would pass an Order in Council providing for the dismissal of any civil servant who allowed his salary to be twice garnisheed; but no such statement has been made, and therefore I will move that section 1 of the reprinted Bill be adopted.

Mr. INGRAM. In view of the statement which was made the last time this Bill was before the House, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is satisfied that the Government are of opinion that this Parliament has the power to pass legislation of this kind. Would any member of the Government undertake to say that it has?

Mr. BRITTON. The question of the power of the Dominion Parliament to pass legislation of this kind does not trouble me in the slightest degree. But there are other objections to the Bill as it seems to me, and I should think that the Government would hesitate a good while before they would allow such a measure to pass. Hon. gentlemen will notice that this is not only an attempt to garnishee salaries accruing due to any person employed by the Dominion Government, but it applies to all salaries or moneys due.

Mr. RICHARDSON. To persons employed by the Government.

Mr. BRITTON. Yes, I know the word "employed" is used, but that does not limit the Bill to civil servants. It means, if it means anything, that if a person is employed by the Government to do any special service, and if a claim is made upon the Government for remuneration for that service, instead of it being determined by proceeding against the Government by the party who has rendered the service, a third party, a creditor of the one employed is allowed to intervene; and according to the ordinary rules or laws in force in the different provinces this third party may institute proceedings to attach the moneys alleged to be in the hands of the Government for the service rendered. Now, I would suppose that a clause in such general terms as that would be a very dangerous one for the Government to allow. If a simple Act could be passed allowing the salaries, up to some amounts that are defined and certain as between the employees of the Government and their creditors to be attached for some small debts, probably something of the kind would be in the public interest, in the interest of shopkeepers and tradesmen. In the very few cases—and I am free to admit there are only a few in which such laws are required—this would be a positive benefit to the creditors, and would be no hurt to the great majority of the civil service. But I submit with all confidence that this clause is too wide, too general, in its terms. It would be difficult to make operative and would be a very dangerous thing for the Government to allow, for the reason I have just given. I am not going to mention names, but, no doubt, hon. members will recollect that a claim was brought against the Government for something it was alleged a Minister of the Government employed a person to do. An application was made to collect this claim by petition of right, and that was refused, and then suit was brought against a prominent member of the Government individually for the recovery of this claim. If this Bill passes as framed, there is nothing to prevent proceedings in any province where the creditor of a person employed by the Government lives against the Dominion of Canada for the recovery of the claim.

Mr. RICHARDSON. While this Bill might appear to go beyond the regular civil servant, it will be remembered that the expression "Any person employed by the Government" was suggested by a prominent member of the legal profession, for he said a man might not be a member of the civil service, he might be employed under salary only temporarily, although that temporary employment might last two, three or four years, and his salary should be garnisheeable the same as that of any civil servant. If the committee think this expression too wide, I have not the slightest objection to any amendment that would cover the ground and meet the approval of my hon. friend from Kingston. The committee knows exactly what I seek to accomplish in this matter, and, I am sure, will agree to any reasonable amendment. And if the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) could suggest any word or words that would get over the difficulty that he points out I, for one, would be glad to accept the amendment. The Bill only puts the federal civil servant in the same position as the civil servant in the various provinces, and surely that is perfectly constitutional, and a fair position to take.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The situation as stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) is not by any means the case in all the provinces. The rule is not uniform. Speaking as to my own province, we have never permitted the Government to be embarrassed by garnishee or attachment proceedings of any kind in respect of the unpaid bills of the civil service or employees of the Government. I have always had a strong opinion on that point. I have always felt that in the public interest, it was not desirable that the Government should be subjected to any of the annoyances or embarrassments which must necessarily follow if procedure of this kind is permitted. I have not had the advantage of hearing the several discussions that have taken place on this Bill, and, therefore, I may perhaps be going over ground that has already been traversed in stating the objections I have to this Bill. The Bill is an improvement on that which was first introduced, but still I would regard it as a very serious matter to place upon the Statute-book a law which will make it necessary that we should practically organize a department of the Government to follow up and pursue all the proceedings to which we may be subjected in all parts of the Dominion under a portion of this Bill. I ask my hon. friend to consider whether the Government of the country is not already encumbered to a sufficient extent in matters necessary to the administration of the country's affairs without being overloaded with matters of this kind. Persons who give credit to the employees of the Government, my hon. friend will say, should be in as advantageous condition and should have the same remedy available to recover their debts as those who give credit to private individuals. Yet we must not shut our eyes to the fact that there is something due to the Government, that we should not allow the instrument of Government to be paralyzed even to the extent, though he will say that it is to a limited extent, to which it is liable to be paralyzed by proceedings of this kind. People who credit employees of the Government do so with their eyes open and ought to realize that they may possibly not be able to recover their debt, and so ought to take the ordinary precautions which persons take who think there is doubt about the credit of the individual to whom they are asked to give credit. Therefore, I should see with much regret this Parliament passing the Act my hon. friends desires us to place on the Statute-book. There are many objections which I will not occupy the time of the committee in stating, but I think the difficulties must impress themselves upon the minds of hon. members. I agree with my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Britton) that this Bill goes much farther than the case of the regular civil servant. I think that we would meet with a difficulty as to what is meant by the word "employee" or persons employed by the Government. The contention might be raised that it applied to persons constructing public works, and if the Government are to be liable to proceedings of this kind in respect of such persons, and consequently compelled to be always on the alert, I take it that the effect will be very injurious to the public service in many ways and of very doubtful advantage to the creditors whom the hon. gentleman desires to serve. I think it is legislation that ought to be very seriously considered, and I am not prepared at present, as a member of the committee, to unhesitatingly subscribe to the passage of this Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry to hear that the province of New Brunswick is not up to the times in the matter under consideration. The province of Ontario has not found its administration powerless or any practical difficulty on account of allowing garnishee proceedings, nor has the province of Quebec, and both these provinces must have vastly greater number of civil servants than the province of New Brunswick. The hon. Minister seems to exaggerate the amount of work it would entail. I am sure that the Government do not employ a greater number of employees than do the great railways of the country—the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, which do not seem to be at all embarrassed by these garnishee proceedings.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). They simply dismiss their men.

Mr. CASEY. I do not see why this Government should not follow the same rule. It might perhaps afford much more rapid promotion, and be a very effective means of weeding out those employees whose services it is not desirable to retain, but whom the Government do not care to discharge lest they might be accused of acting from political reasons.

Mr. TISDALE. I heartily concur in what has been said by the hon. Minister of Railways. The Bill contains a provision that it shall not apply to any debts contracted before its passage. The hon. gentleman, I think, should be satisfied with the strong feeling expressed in Parliament as to the necessity of our public servants paying their debts, which cannot fail to be a warning to them in the future. As the hon. Minister of Railways has said, if this Bill were to become law we would require a special department to meet all the labour it will entail on the Government. I think that the Government might at times exercise the salutary authority which the railway companies do over their employees, and this they could do without resorting to a system of espionage on the service. From what knowledge I have of the service, I do not think that the conduct of the Government employees has been such as to render legislation of this kind necessary. I might further add that the hon. gentleman has now brought in what is completely a new Bill, as compared with the one he first introduced, and he tells us that he does not care whether it be adopted in its present form or not, provided the committee put it in such a shape that its main object will be carried out. I must say that when an hon. member of this House introduces a Bill, he should introduce it in such shape that it shall not require to be completely remodelled. That is the work which he should not entail on the committee. What the committee is here for is to amend Bills in their details, and not assume the responsibility of completely remodelling them and passing a measure altogether different in form from the one originally introduced. The precedent set by some of the provinces has been quoted to us, but hon. gentlemen have not seen fit to go into the details of the legislation of these provinces, and we have only a very general idea of what that legislation is like. In any case, this federal legislature is responsible for its own legislation, and while I do not pretend that we should not give consideration to the deliberate conclusions of the provinces, we must, after all, make laws to suit our own circumstances, and there are many reasons why, even if it were well for the provinces to allow the garnisheeing of the salaries of their civil servants, it might not be equally well for us to adopt a similar law. The ramifications, the extent of the work, the circumstances are altogether different in the two cases. For these reasons I am quite prepared to take the responsibility of saying that I am not prepared to support the Bill before us.

Mr. FORTIN. I have spoken already on this measure, and have not since heard anything to induce me to change my mind. I must say that I am astonished to find members of Parliament oppose a measure which aims at putting the civil servants of the Dominion on the same footing as ordinary persons.

I am mistaken when I say an ordinary citizen, because even the salary of a labourer is seizable for debt in many provinces, whereas according to the Bill as now amended, it is only a portion of the salary due to a Dominion official that would be seizable. I see no good reason in the world why the salaries of these gentlemen who are so anxious to enter the service of the Dominion Government should not be attachable to a certain extent, according to the laws in force in the different provinces. I have listened with attention to the arguments advanced against the measure by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. His main argument is, as I understand it, that it would embarrass the Government. Well, if it does embarrass the Government, let the Government be embarrassed. Somebody has spoken of a special department. If a special department is required, that is the very best reason why the law should be passed. If the number of civil servants who will not pay their debts is so great as to require the institution of a special department, that is the very best reason why this law should be passed, because it would show that there was so much dishonesty among the civil servants that special legislation was required to meet it. Some hon. members have cited the case of great corporations who have many men in their employ and whose salaries are attached every day for debt. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway; I think they have there a special department. That company has thousands of men of all classes in its employ, and their salaries are attachable. So it is, I think, with the Grand Trunk Railway, so it is with the banks, so it is with all great corporations, and it is a scandal that Dominion officials should enjoy special privileges in this respect. Take, for instance, the corporation of the city of Montreal, employing hundreds of men, their salaries are all attachable for a certain portion thereof according to the laws of the province of Quebec. Under those laws, one-fifth is seizable when the salary is under $1,000; one-fourth is seizable when the salary is over $1,000; one-third if it exceeds $3,000. Take the Montreal court-house, the salaries of its employees are seizable. Go half a mile further west, and there is the Montreal post office, the officials of which receive salaries much in excess of those received by the officials of the provincial government, and still you cannot touch them.

Mr. QUINN. Would you attach the salaries of the judges?

Mr. FORTIN. Well, if any one would suggest that a judge administering justice would not pay his legitimate debts, I say we should have a special law adopted to meet their case. A man who receives $5,000 a year to administer justice, and who is empowered to send to jail other men who do not pay their debts, I say if such a man should not pay his debts, his conduct would really call for special legislation or for his impeachment. I do not think the judges themselves will take as a compliment my hon. friend's suggestion made as an argument against this law.

Mr. INGRAM. Suppose a civil servant in the city of Winnipeg owes a small debt. If this section becomes law, would the hon. gentleman state what procedure he would adopt to collect that debt?

Mr. FORTIN. I am sorry I am not able to answer the hon. gentleman, for the reason that I am not acquainted with the provincial laws of Manitoba. But according to our statutes in Quebec, if an employee of the Montreal custom-house, for instance, was owing a debt and if this law was passed, a copy of the writ of garnishment would be served upon the collector or deputy collector.

Mr. FORTIN.

Mr. QUINN. My hon. friend must remember that the provincial Act does not provide for service upon a deputy collector, it provides for service upon the chief of the department in which the local officials are employed. But there is no provision for the federal employee, and there could not be. As a matter of fact, as I understand it, the pay-lists in all these public offices in Montreal comes from Ottawa.

Mr. FORTIN. That would not make any difference. I think the hon. gentleman is correct that our provincial statute does not provide for procedure as regards the seizure of salaries of Dominion officials. The Quebec statute was passed for Quebec officials only, and there is no provision applying to collectors of customs or other Dominion officials. However, there would be no difficulty on that score; we could as well have a writ of attachment served upon the head or deputy head of a department, as we can have it served upon like officials in the city of Quebec. However, I would go a little further. If there was any difficulty we would only have to amend our provincial law, but until this Parliament takes action, we can do nothing in the province whatever. We cannot declare that when ever a writ of attachment is served upon a Minister or Deputy Minister, he will be bound to transmit a certificate or declaration giving the amount of salary due to the person, his annual salary, and so forth. In order to reach the salary of a Dominion official, we must have the consent of the Dominion Parliament, and this Bill is equivalent to such a consent. If this Bill passes, this Parliament will declare that the salaries of officials of the Dominion Government will be seizable according to the laws of the different provinces. If it suits a province to say that a salary should be seizable, then let it be seizable; if it says that only a portion should be seizable, then only a portion would be seizable. If it was found that in the province of Quebec, for instance, as our law exists to-day, the procedure would not be complete, then we will make it complete. A Bill of this kind, as I have stated, was introduced into the Quebec Legislature last session. Unfortunately, it was killed in the Upper House, a majority of whose members, as is well known, are Conservatives, perhaps too many of them are Conservatives. But we have in the province of Quebec a Liberal Government, and I think that a Liberal Government would make liberal laws. In point of fact, a law such as is now proposed in this Bill would be to the advantage of the Dominion officials themselves. I have heard some of them complain that they cannot get credit. When they go and rent a house, giving their names and occupation, as soon as it becomes known that they are in the employ of the Federal Government, landlords will not rent them houses unless they give security. Therefore, I say, if they were placed on the same footing as ordinary citizens, they would be in a better position, because then they could obtain credit.

I am willing to acknowledge that a majority of them are honest and respectable, but in regard to those who rely on the positions they enjoy now, a law should be passed to place them on the same footing as ordinary debtors. As regard the working of the clause, objection has been made to it on the ground that it is too wide. I do not think the terms used are too wide. Perhaps the terms might be altered so as to read: "Any person in the employ of the Government of Canada." I would go even further, however, and declare that all moneys of any kind due by the Government are attachable by any ordinary citizen but I understand there will be some difficulties where disputed claims are filed against the Government. I am sorry the first provision has been abandoned, because I had intended to move an amendment declaring that all moneys due by the Government on undisputed claims should be attachable as are moneys due to an ordinary citizen. However, the Bill as it is should be passed. The state of the law is antiquated. It was probably a good law two or three centuries ago, but it is not so today.

Mr. QUINN. It was not my intention to have sought again to impress my views on the House, having expressed myself on a former occasion and declared myself against the spirit of the Bill; but I feel called upon to do so as the hon. member for Laval has spoken on the question, and has referred to civil servants in the province of Quebec. I interjected a remark about the judges of Montreal, when the hon. gentleman on referring to the civil service in Quebec stated that salaries might be seized in the court-house and be free from seizure a couple of acres away and I said the salaries of judges in the court-house could not be seized. The hon. gentleman waxed warm when he declared that no man was fit to be a judge if he did not pay his legal debts. I would be very sorry to subscribe to that opinion, and I am not saying anything disrespectful to judges or to chief justices when I say that very many of them have been unable to pay their just and honest debts, and if this law had been enforced a few years ago the country would have been obliged to dispense with their services, because some of the cleverest men on the bench in Canada receive salaries which barely enable them to exist. We know that the Canadian judges are the most poorly paid officials in the world. My hon. friend from Laval knows better than anybody else that in Montreal the judges receive miserable salaries of $5,000 a year, which render them incapable of supporting anything like the position they should occupy. The judges who should be able to maintain the dignity of their position, owing to the expense of living in Montreal, are compelled to live in boarding-houses and hotels because they cannot keep house on their salaries. We know that in many of the provinces, particularly in Quebec, the best men on the bench have often been those who through misfortune or spending their lives in the public service and engraving their names on the history of Canada, have died poor men, even when they have been twenty years on the bench. The hon. member for Laval stated that they were unfit to hold their positions and they soiled the judicial ermine if they could not pay their debts. I cannot believe that such is the fact, for many of those men have been among the most honoured and able judges to be found in the world. There are judges who under such a law as is now proposed, might have their salaries seized. The fact that a man owes money does not make him dishonest or dishonourable, and there is no reason why judges should be placed in the miserable position of having their salaries docked one-third. They cannot exist to-day on the salaries they receive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not proposed to seize their salaries for any debt now due. It is to make them pay in future.

Mr. QUINN. Then I say it is dishonest if we are going to give a preference to persons with whom debts may be contracted in the future. Why specially protect them?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has the hon. gentleman the audacity to lay down the proposition that judges must swindle the men who trust them? That is what it means.

Mr. QUINN. I do not think the House can congratulate the hon. gentleman on the language he uses or the way in which he presents his case.

Mr. CASEY. He says precisely what I say.

Mr. QUINN. I am rather surprised at this remark, because I usually hear reasonably fair ideas from the hon. member for Elgin. If this Bill does not propose to make the judges' salaries seizable for debts already contracted, it is dishonest to give a preference to debtors with whom they may contract debts, and leave them free and clear as regards debts already contracted. I desire to express myself clearly on this matter for the benefit of the hon. member for West Elgin, who, I hope, will not fall into the habit of the hon. member for Lisgar; but if a judge owes money, that is no reason for saying that he is a dishonest man. With reference to the position in which the Government would be placed, it would be utterly impossible for a judge to remain on the bench in any part of Canada with one-third of his salary cut off for any debts contracted by misfortune, probably when he was at the bar or when he was serving as member of this House. The principle is bad in that

It would deprive the country of the services of the brightest men in Canada. Further, I look upon it simply as an attempt to loot the treasury by having officials appointed for the purpose of working out this Bill. Some hon. gentlemen say, look at the provincial governments. Take Montreal. There are the officials in the prothonotary's office, clerk of the peace's office, and the registrar's office, and these are the only officials connected with the local government in the court-house. There are, however, the Lachine Canal, the harbour works, custom-house, inland revenue department, post office and the provincial St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary in the constituency of Laval, each institution having an army of Dominion officials, equalling in number the total employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway in Montreal. What steps would be necessary to enforce such a law as is now proposed? Machinery would have to be provided by which in each case the person who wished to seize a salary would serve notice upon a representative of the Dominion Government in that particular locality. It must be referred to Ottawa, instructions must be given to some one to represent the Government in every one of these cases, each of which will require a special representative of the Government. The result will be an army of lawyers employed throughout the Dominion and another army of officials for the purpose of making a declaration under the provincial Act to establish whether or not there is any money due to the person whose salary has been seized. We will find that this will be simply a means in this country for making Her Majesty's writ run against herself. We will have an execution issued by Her Majesty against Her Majesty, for moneys belonging to Her Majesty, but due to some one else, because, forsooth, some official of the Government has neglected to declare that Her Majesty did or did not owe a certain amount of money to, say, one John Jones. I do not think that the principle of the Bill can stand for one moment, or should be considered by this committee.

Mr. CASEY. I am very much astonished that my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) and so many other lawyers should oppose this Bill, if it is going to make all the work for the lawyers they say it will. I believe myself that if it were going to increase business in their professional line, there would not be so many of them against it. The contention that it would be necessary to have a special department and special officers, to look after the garnishee business of the Government seems very absurd, when you know that they do not have a special department for that business in the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, they have.

Mr. QUINN.

Mr. CASEY. Pardon me, they do not have anything of the kind. They do not on the Grand Trunk Railway or the Michigan Central.

Mr. QUINN. I do not know about the Michigan Central.

Mr. CASEY. They do not have a special department in the Governments of Quebec or Ontario to look after the garnishees. There can be no doubt as to whether the Government owes a man his salary or not, and the only question is whether it shall be paid to the officer or to his creditor. As to the judges, I am sorry if I misunderstood my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn), but it certainly did seem to me and to those around me, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) said that the judges in Montreal and Quebec were not paid enough to live upon.

Mr. QUINN. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. That they could not live on $5,000 a year; that they had to go into debt to keep themselves and their families alive, and that they would be ruined if they were compelled to pay their debts out of their salaries.

Mr. QUINN. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. CASEY. When my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) sees his words in "Hansard" he will see that they bore that meaning and no other. When the hon. gentleman's attention was called to what he was saying, he explained it in another way, but up to the time he was interrupted by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) and by myself, the drift of his remarks was certainly in the direction I have indicated. As to the contention that this Bill is dishonest because it does not include past debts, I think it is quite the other way. If the hon. gentleman knows the spirit of British legislation, he knows that it is not ex post facto, as a rule. I do not know whether I also misunderstood my hon. friend from East Elgin (Mr. Ingram), but I judged from the current of his remarks, although he said nothing very definite, that he was also opposed to this Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) must know from his personal and general knowledge of the condition of affairs in St. Thomas, that garnishee orders have been regularly enforced upon employees of the different railways in that railway centre. He knows that it has been quite a source of grievance amongst them, and that considerable ill-feeling has existed against those who enforced these garnishee orders. I do not know whether my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) means to suggest, that while railway men are still subject to the garnishee order, the civil servants should be continued in their present exemption from it. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) to say that, and it was as much a surprise to me as the remarks of my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) about the judges.

Mr. INGRAM. I expressed myself very clearly on this Bill when it was last before the committee, and I intend to express myself in the same manner now. I am opposed to this Bill for two very good reasons. I am opposed to it because the cure is worse than the disease. A number of years ago, and before the railway companies took a very decided stand with respect to garnishees, there was much to contend with, and when the companies adopted the plan of dismissing men for being garnisheed more than twice, it reduced the number of garnishees, and it also was the means of introducing a better class of men. We have a much better class of men in our railway service to-day than we had years ago when there were a great many garnishees. My suggestion is, that this Government should take precisely the same action as they took in Washington, where each department issued a circular, that when an employee was garnisheed more than twice he would be dismissed from the service, unless he could show good and sufficient cause why he should be retained. So far as the county of Elgin is concerned, I do not think we have a civil servant there who would be liable to have a garnishee against him. They are all honourable men, men capable of paying 100 cents on the dollar, and no doubt that may be the same in many other constituencies in Canada. But, Sir, if by passing this Bill, we establish a system of employing lawyers from one end of this Dominion to the other, and we know that their costs figure up to a pretty high sum, then I would prefer seeing the different departments of the Government issuing a circular to their employees, that if any of them should get into debt, and have their salaries seized, they would be dismissed from the service, unless they could show good reason against it.

Mr. CASEY. I fail to see why the Government should have to pay any more costs in respect to this than have private individuals or corporations, nor do I see why civil servants should be put on a different basis with regard to this matter than are railway servants or any other employees.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I regret very much that my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) did not take kindly to the word I used. When I used the word "audacious," it was because I thought it was the only word which correctly described the position the hon. gentleman took. My understanding of his language is exactly the same as that of the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). I believe hon. members will back me up in saying that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) stated, that it would be an outrage on the judges of Quebec if you made their salaries seizable, and that if you deducted, say one-third, from their salaries, they would not be able to live.

Now, what is the legitimate conclusion from that? It is that the judges of the province of Quebec, according to my hon. friend (Mr. Quinn) get $5,000 a year, and swindle their creditors out of $1,500 or $1,600 a year in addition. Surely no other deduction can be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks; and if that is not an audacious proposition, I would like to know what is. The hon. gentleman spoke of the miserable pittance the judges of the province of Quebec received; and I am sure hon. gentlemen must have felt inclined to take their handkerchiefs out and mop from their eyes the tears they were shedding over the pathetic position of these judges who are compelled, forsooth, to accept only $5,000 a year. I will venture to say that the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn), like Pooh-Bah, would be quite willing to submit to the insult of a position on the bench carrying a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. QUINN. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am also sure that he will be willing to accept the post long before his name is enshrined in the history of this country, which he spoke so feelingly about. If the hon. gentleman got $5,000 a year as a judge of the superior court of Montreal, I think he could live tolerably well on that sum. I am quite sure, from all I know, that the hon. gentleman has in past years lived on even less than $5,000 a year. Yet he has been able to subsist, and he certainly does not look like a man who has been obliged to live on less than three meals a day; and I have no doubt that he has sometimes been able to enjoy a Welsh rarebit before he retired near midnight. Now, that argument could not fail to have but one effect on the members of this House. It must have convinced them that if the judges of Quebec are unable to live on their salaries, they must get ahead of their creditors. I appeal to every member of this House to stand by this Bill and see that the judges of Quebec, even though they receive but $5,000 a year, shall be compelled to pay their honest debts. That is the only object I have in introducing and pressing forward this Bill. It was with considerable pain that I heard my hon. friend the Minister of Railways take the position he did to-night; for I have the profoundest respect for that hon. gentleman's acumen, and I am sure that had he remained in this House and heard the debate on this question night after night, he would have changed his view. It is not fair for any member of the Government, or any member of the House, to come here on the last occasion probably that the Bill comes up, and say, "Oh, it has not been fully considered or argued, and I think the hon. gentleman had better quietly withdraw it," and that will be the last of it. I may tell hon. members of this House that during the time my name has been associated with this Bill, and that has been during the last two sessions, I have received petition after petition from strong associations throughout the Dominion, and letters from all parts of the Dominion, pressing me to go on with the Bill. It is because of that fact that I find myself standing up to-night and urging the Minister of Railways to withdraw his opposition, and let the Bill go through. Even though there may not be many members of the civil service who are dishonest—and I am not here to make any general charge against the civil service, I believe, as a body, it is as honest and upright a body as we have in the Dominion of Canada. But there are exceptions, and no matter at what cost to this country, we want to cure the evil created by these exceptions. Let me give you one sample, and I am sure that members of this House will agree with me that if there are only ten cases like that, the time has come when this Bill should be passed. I know one gentleman in the civil service of this Dominion—I will not name the city where he lives—who is in the receipt of a large salary, and who, when he erected his house, got enough marble from a poor dealer to erect an altar in one of the rooms, in order that he might go there and worship God under his own vine and fig-tree; and what do you think happened? He never paid for that marble. The man from whom he got it applied for an order from the court to compel him to pay for it or to allow him to take it out of the House; but he took refuge under this exemption of the civil service, and up to the present time he is able to worship at his own private altar. I would like to have an evil of that kind remedied. There may not be many such cases; but that one case should show the members of this House the absolute necessity of passing a Bill of this kind. Suppose it does result in the establishment of a garnishee office, which it will not do, I agree with my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Fortin) that no matter what the cost may be, we ought to remedy this evil right here and now. I see that my hon. friend the Premier has been preparing notes on the question. I sincerely hope he will not take a position against the Bill, because I know the very subtle influence of his sunny ways over the members who sit to the rear. If he will just consent not to speak on this question, I will be satisfied; but if he does speak, I will urge all hon. members to remember that it is the Premier who is speaking, and that he naturally desires to smooth matters over. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) suggests that he be urged not to help the bar on this question. I know the right hon. Premier does not patronize the bar to any serious extent, and I hope that on this occasion he will not do so. Now, it has been said, why pass legislation of this kind? Well, I would point out that the provincial legislatures in various provinces have passed such legislation as this, and it has been found to work admirably. It has not been found necessary to establish a gar-nishee office, nor has the work of the departments increased in consequence. When the members of the civil service realize that there is such a law as this on the Statute-book, they will pay their debts like honest men, and we will not have such scandals as the one I have mentioned. I am satisfied that it will work admirably, as it has been found to do in regard to the provincial civil service. I may say that two eminent members who sit on this side of the House, who criticised the Bill as it was originally introduced, have told me that they are quite prepared to endorse this Bill. One of them is the learned member for Halifax (Mr. Russell); and the other is one of the members for Ottawa (Mr. Belcourt) who spoke the other night in opposition to the original Bill. In concluding, I would express the hope that if the Premier does speak, he will support me, but if he does not, I would urge hon. members to wink the other eye, and vote for the Bill.

Mr. ANGERS. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, in rising to participate in this debate, I have no hesitation in stating, from the outset, that I do not think any serious objection can be raised to the principle of this Bill. The only object of this Bill is to place the civil servants on the same footing as the other members of the community. Is there anything unfair in such a position? Is there any interference with the rights of the civil servants of this country? It would occur to nobody to criticise the fact that other citizens, like clerks and labourers, are liable to be sued and have their salaries garnisheed. Why then, I ask, should federal civil servants who live in more comfortable circumstances, and who, as a rule, are being paid higher salaries, not be placed under the ordinary law? Why, I ask, should they be exempt from garnishment and be allowed to escape the payment of their honest debts and to shirk their responsibilities? I think, if we closely look into the matter, it will be found that the federal civil servants are now enjoying an unwarranted and unfair privilege, and one that is not grounded on any principle of sound policy. It is an unsafe and invidious policy to create exceptions in favour of a privileged class of the community. The reason why this Bill commends itself to my approbation is the idea that the Government employees, shall henceforth, under this Bill, be placed on the same footing as every other class in the community. For my part, I cannot help endorsing a policy which was ever upheld and proclaimed aloud by the party to which I have the honour to belong. The Liberal party in Canada have always strongly opposed monopolies and combines, which they have successfully removed and uprooted from our midst. The question now is whether we are willing to go back on that policy. The hon. gentleman asks whether the larger proportion of the civil service pay their debts honestly? With that question I am not concerned here. And if one is to judge from the numerous grievances that arise all over the country, it cannot be denied that a good many civil servants show very little willingness to carry out their contracts and to satisfy their creditors. But, as I said, this is a matter with which I am not concerned now. The object of this Bill is to provide that in the future the members of the Dominion civil service shall stand on the same relationship with respect to their debts and the collection of those debts as any other member of the community. As to those members of the civil service who carry out their contracts and pay their debts honestly, this Bill will afford them protection instead of proving detrimental to them. This Bill will prove troublesome only to that category of civil servants who shirk their honourable responsibilities and thus bring discredit upon their colleagues. Is there any hon. gentleman in this House who would deem it creditable to vindicate the conduct of dishonest employees who refuse to pay their debts? In my opinion, this Bill ought to commend itself to every member of this House, because it is framed in the best interests of the civil service employees, as it tends to enhance their credit and to keep them in the straight path, as it removes from them the temptation to which they might otherwise yield of not paying their honest debts.

The hon. member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Quinn) has strongly opposed the principle of this Bill which I have just endeavoured to vindicate. As to the objections which he has raised to it, I hardly think them well taken. The hon. gentleman laid much stress on the fact that some judges he is acquainted with are involved in debts, and should this Bill be crystallized into law, they might have their salaries seized under such a law, and it would be utterly impossible for them to remain on the Bench, and the country would thus be deprived of the services of some of our brightest men. Supposing that the fears given expression to by the hon. gentleman were realized, I fail to see what objection there could be to that, and how such an event could warrant us in shelving this Bill. For my part, I do not think such a fear is well grounded. And no doubt, the hon. gentleman has somewhat drawn from his fancy, as often happens in the heat of the debate. I am acquainted with a good many judges of the land and I do not know that a single one of those magistrates would have to suffer in the least from the adoption of this Bill by the House. In his zeal for the magistracy, the hon. gentleman should not forget that he is incurring the risk of placing that same magistracy on a rather discreditable pedestal, when endeavouring to show that with salaries of $5,000 a year, they cannot maintain the dignity of their position and pay their honest debts. Were such a state of things as that pointed out by the hon. gentleman prove true, it would warrant the belief that there are deplorable abuses to be eradicated, and the sooner the better. The hon. gentleman laid much stress on what he considered as an unfair and dishonest feature of this Bill, I mean the clause providing that it shall not apply to debts contracted before the passing of this Act. I must say, Sir, I was not a little amused at the assumed indignation of the hon. gentleman in this regard. In his opinion, it is unfair, it is even outrageous to pass a Bill providing for the attachment of the salaries of the civil service employees. Now, if the hon. gentleman were really in earnest and his opinion well matured, he ought to be grateful towards the promoter of this Bill, for having to a large extent removed the odium that might have attached to his Bill, by providing that it shall not be retroactive and shall not apply to any old debt contracted by any civil servant. For my part, I would not think it unfair if the law were made retroactive, so as to make the salaries of civil servants liable to attachment even for old debts. However, in order to allow the necessary latitude to the Government employees who so far, have relied on the exemption of their salaries from seizure, I shall not oppose the passage of the Bill in its present shape. At all events, it must be borne in mind that if any hardships were to result from this feature of the Bill, it would be the creditors who would be subjected to them, though it would be only partially so, as the object of the Bill is to remove a hardship which has existed for a long time. Now, I come to another objection raised to this Bill by some hon. gentlemen who contend, that if it were passed into law, it would cause considerable inconvenience and expense to the Government. In their opinion, a special machinery would have to be provided, and the result would be an army of lawyers employed throughout the Dominion, and another army of officials for the carrying out of the law. I think those objections are chimerical and ungrounded. And no better proof of it can be adduced than the way in which that system works in the province of Quebec. Here is the way it works in Quebec: A writ of attachment is served upon the head of the department in which the official whose salary is to be seized is employed. The head of the department is in no way compelled to attend in court or to send somebody to represent him in court for the purpose of making a declaration on his behalf; nor is he compelled to employ a lawyer to represent him. There are, in each department, certain forms of declarations, and all that is required is to establish the amount of salary due to the employee whose salary is garnisheed, and the amount of arrears due to the same. This declaration is forwarded to the prothonotary of the court which has issued the writ of attachment and judgment is given in favour of the creditor. When the judgment is issued, a copy of it is forwarded to the head of the department and then the accountant of the department forwards to the judgment creditor that portion of the salary which falls due at the end of each month. Should there be several judgment creditors, the distribution is made at so much in the pound. On these several grounds, Mr. Chairman, I would be sorry to see this Bill rejected by the House, and for my part, I must say that I am very anxious that it should pass into law.

Mr. QUINN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I could not allow the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to put words in my mouth which I did not utter or distort my views for the purpose of furnishing himself with arguments. The hon. gentleman is a past master in that sort of thing, having served an apprenticeship to it in the North-west rebellion, where he earned, in this respect, an unenviable reputation. I never suggested that the judges of the province of Quebec wanted to avoid the payment of their just debts, but what I said is that there are very few men in this country raised to the bench without having spent considerable time either in this Parliament or some of the local legislatures, and without having contracted considerable political debts, to meet which their salaries are not sufficient without practising the strictest economy, which is not always consistent with the proper maintenance of the dignity of their position. What then will be the case if they are to be forced to devote one-third of their salaries to the payment of such debts? I do not mean to imply that they are in any respect dishonest. On the contrary, I maintain that the judges of our country are above suspicion and willingly curtail their personal expenses and practice the most rigid economy in order to meet these debts. Some of them are struggling under a load of debt, to meet which would require the payment of one-half of their salaries. But, apart from this view of the case, I say that it is an absurdity that a writ should issue to drag Her Majesty into Her Majesty's courts just as an ordinary private citizen may be brought into them. We should not forget that we are living under a limited monarchy and not a democratic form of government, and that the name of Her Majesty is consequently entitled to the greatest respect in this country. What procedure is necessary to obtain the payment of a just claim against any public department in this country which is disputed? A petition must be presented to Her Majesty asking her to deal justly with an individual claim. It has never been heard of under the laws of this country or the laws of England that any individual should have the right to sue Her Majesty and obtain judgment against her as against any private individual. My hon. friend, with that courtesy which is his distinguishing characteristic, informed the House that I was not in the same class with him, and was obliged to live on less than $5,000 per year. I did not say that I was in a position to spend $5,000 or $10,000 a year, nor did I say that I would accept a judgeship. It would be exceedingly premature in me to express any opinion on that latter point. This remark of his is only in keeping with a certain quality distinctive of him, which I am unable to describe without using language that would not be parliamentary, and which makes him always ready to talk about something of which he knows very little. If I would not accept a judgeship, one of the first reasons would be that if I accepted a salary of $5,000 a year, I could not, with the debts I have at present, be able to live. I make this confession openly, and there are very few lawyers who are not in the same position. We all have debts and try to pay them honestly, but do not always very well succeed; and when one of us does get a position on the bench, it will be very humiliating to have a bailiff come right into court and order him to pay over one-third of his salary to some creditor. Can it be said that a judge, under such circumstances, would be able to give that attention to his duties which would entitle him either to the salary he is paid or to the respect of those who are called on to plead before him.

I attack the principle of the Bill. I say that it is not in keeping with the institutions of our country and the form of government, under which we live, that Her Majesty should be compelled to come before any of her courts at the suit of a private individual. My hon. friend said he noticed that the hon. Prime Minister was taking notes. It was my intention to ask the right hon. gentleman to give his views on this subject. I know that they will be sound views, and if he is prepared to assume the responsibility of supporting this Bill, as a matter of principle, because that is the point on which I object to it, there cannot be any difficulty in the House adopting it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I merely rise to make one observation with regard to the sneer which the hon. member—I regret that the rules of the House compel me to call him an hon. member.

Mr. QUINN. I rise to a point of order. The language of the hon. gentleman is not such as ought to be used in the House of Parliament.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that before I am through, I shall make it clear that I am perfectly right and within the rules.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand the hon. gentleman is discussing a point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. and distinguished-looking gentleman thought that he would get a shot at me by retalling a little piece of small gossip which, I have reason to believe, was poured into his ears by another hon. member who sits near him.

Mr. QUINN. I submit that the hon. gentleman is not discussing the point of order I have raised.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The hon. gentleman's ways are like those of Providence, mysterious and past finding out, and I cannot make out what his point of order is.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. He claims that the language used by the hon. member is not parliamentary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the language I used which he objects to?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not hear anything unparliamentary fall from the lips of the hon. gentleman. Perhaps it was because I did not pay very much attention to what he said.

Mr. QUINN. The point of order I raised was that the language of the hon. gentleman was unparliamentary. In the first place he said that I sneered at him; and, in the second place, he said that by parliamentary courtesy he was obliged to call me an hon. gentleman, otherwise he would not.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman does not wish to say anything which could impute motives to the hon. member for Montreal, and besides I have no desire to use any language which would be unparliamentary.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No matter what I or other members may think about the hon. member for Montreal, I did not say anything that was unparliamentary, nor would I desire to do so, because I like to defer to the rules of the House on all occasions. I simply observed that I applied the word to him as it is applied in Mark Anthony's famous oration, when he laid particular stress upon it when saying, "they are all honourable men." He put an emphasis on the word "honourable" which I think it is parliamentary in me to put on the word when I apply it to the gentleman from Montreal. The hon. member detailed a small beer piece of gossip about myself in connection with the North-west rebellion, and I merely desire to say that I was not at the front during that rebellion and that any charges against me with regard to despatches sent during it were apologized for in the most abject manner in the press of Winnipeg. The parties who made them had to take them back, and they did so. If this House will only appoint a special committee to inquire into the past of my hon. friend and my own, I am quite willing to stand comparison with him or any other member of this House. I deprecate extremely this sort of thing, because it is not my practice to indulge in personalities in the conduct of debates; for I like to confine myself to a discussion of the question on its merits. And when I criticised the statement of the hon. member for Montreal that these hard-working judges were unable to live on $5,000 a year and pay their debts, I think I am in the judgment of all hon. members that I said what was right and what will be endorsed by all those within hearing of my voice. I think that I am quite within the rule of the House when I say that the hon. gentleman, be he ever so learned in the law, did not understand what he was talking about to-night.

He persists in talking about the hardships that judges and others may be subjected to in having their salaries garnisheable for past debts. Now, I have a clause in this Bill which distinctly exempts debts which existed prior to the passing of an Act. There is no hardship with regard to the past, for this Bill applies to the future. And when it becomes known throughout the length and breadth of this land that members of the Dominion civil service shall be placed on the same footing as every class in the community, I am quite satisfied that the best opinion in this country will approve the measure. I may tell hon. members of the House and I may tell the Government, that this is a far more serious question in the constituencies than they believe. People throughout this land have read about this Bill, and judging from the letters that have poured in upon me, I can see that they are very much in earnest with regard to it, that every man who votes against this Bill will be called upon by his constituents to say why the Dominion civil service shall be placed upon a pedestal and have privileges granted to them that are denied to other classes of the community. If I were asking for class legislation or singling out any class of this country against whom to direct an unjust law, I should expect to be driven from the Chamber in derision. But I am simply asking for righteous legislation, and I appeal to every hon. member to stand by me and see that this Bill is carried. I went into the same fight last session and was unable to reach my Bill. Five or six times has it come before the House this session, and we do not want to have it sidetracked any more. I would like to have a straight vote on the Bill, and I would like to have it now, and let every hon. member know that his constituents have their eyes upon him and that they will ask the reason why he should vote to place any class of the community upon a footing not enjoyed by others.

Mr. TISDALE. If the hon. gentleman would argue the question, he might enlighten me. I am most desirous of voting right on this Bill, but if his is the right side, then he should be able to resolve these difficulties that confront us and have already been pointed out. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) spoke about lawyers. I am a lawyer, though it is a long time since I practiced law. I am proud to know that if the records of this country are searched, among the brightest, whether on the Liberal side or on the Conservative side, whether of living men or of dead men, will be found the records of the lawyers. And when the hon. member makes an insinuation of this sort, I, as one who years ago practiced at the bar, as one who took a pride and still takes pride in the bar of this country, whether in politics or in the courts, venture to tell him that it does not become him or any man to insinuate that the lawyers in this House are not as desirous as others of doing right as representatives of the people. I say that in passing. In one thing I agree with the hon. mover of his Bill, and that is in regarding this as a serious matter. But while he says it is a serious matter, I fail to see that he has even touched, much less answered, the arguments of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Britton) and the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). He has not shown wherein this Bill is applicable, he has not shown that the benefits it is supposed to bring are greater than the difficulties in the administration of it, he has not even shown that it would benefit even the very class in whose interest it is proposed. And yet the hon. gentleman almost threatens those who dare to stand up here and speak their minds on this question regardless of whether what they say is popular or not. I say that the legislator who stands up against what is apparently popular in the country is the man who probably has the best of the argument, and will be supported by the best public opinion, whether among Liberals or Conservatives. We who oppose this Bill, even if we do not express ourselves quite so well as we might desire, are yet endeavouring to give some reasons for the position we take, and not to make mere appeals to hon. members that are not supported by sufficient reasons. I understand that the Bill was postponed the other night, and, if so, we should have had better means of information upon it. I have no doubt but the hon. mover from what I have seen of him, expressed his views frankly. But had the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) been here to speak upon the matter, he could have spoken to us with authority, because it is his duty to guide the House in these matters. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) has spoken several times, but he has not touched the difficulties of the question, he has not shown that the Bill is practical or that it is constitutional. He has not shown how the law will be carried out. And in answer to what the hon. member for West Elgin has said, I may point out that none know better than lawyers that no legislation is more subversive of the respect for law, than that which will not serve the purpose for which it is passed, because it leads to unsatisfactory, to interminable contentions. In the very first section of this Bill, there are principles that could only be settled in my opinion, by going to the highest court of the Empire the Privy Council. One of these is the constitutional question. Are we then to be carried away by the appeals of the hon. gentleman—against whose motive I have not said one word and do not propose to. But in justice to my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Quinn) I venture to say that the hon. mover of this Bill has not presented his case with the good temper or calmness of argument that I should like. While I would like to see all proper means provided by law for the recovery of debts, I am not therefore convinced that it is wise to pass such a law as this, which according to my own judgment and the opinion of those upon whose opinion on such matters I rely, will not accomplish enough good to counter-balance the harm that it will do. The second objection and one that was presented very strongly by the Minister of Railways is that the hon. gentleman did not attempt to show how it would be possible to carry out the law without hampering the Government with great difficulties and great expenditures. I am not so much in love with garnishee proceedings as some people might be. While they have served some good purposes, they have not been the cheap remedy that is sometimes thought even in simple procedure, and we in Ontario have the simplest and best system that I have ever read of. I shall not be suspected of saying too much on behalf of the Ministers, but I do say that the Ministers and their departments are overworked in coping with the many difficulties that arise in the administration of the affairs of an increasing population in a great and rapidly developing country.

The hon. gentleman says that ten cases are enough to justify all this. He acknowledges himself that it is not the general rule, and still we are ridiculed because we decline to stand up and support a measure so ill-considered. We are asked here to delegate the powers of this Parliament to the provinces, because the Bill says: "According to the laws and rules of procedure in force in the different provinces. I say that is absurd. Let the provinces legislate for themselves, and let us legislate for ourselves, and keep within our powers. In conclusion, I repeat that the well-considered arguments of the hon. member for Kingston and of the Minister of Railways and Canals, besides the result of my own study of the subject, have convinced me that it would be wise for us not to pass this measure at present.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for Lisgar says that last session he devoted a great deal of time to the consideration of this Bill. The hon. gentleman introduced this Bill (No. 14), and during its first trial before this Parliament he abandoned every principle he had put into the Bill. I should suppose that if he had given the Bill any consideration at all, he would surely have consulted the department of Justice to find out whether it was within the competency of this Parliament. I wish to draw attention to the Bill that he abandoned, notably, to section 3. I find that the Solicitor General, when expressing his views on this question, spoke as follows :—

It is provided here by paragraph 3 how the creditors are to proceed to levy a judgment. I say that is a matter to be settled by the provincial courts ; it is a matter over which we have no control, with which we cannot deal at all. Clearly, then, we have got to eliminate, at all events, that part of the Bill entirely from our consideration.

The hon. gentleman, no doubt, discovered at that time that this section of the Bill was not within the right of this Parliament to pass, and therefore he abandoned the third section. We find here to-night that he has introduced section number 1 of which has been read to the House, and here is the opinion of the Solicitor General with respect to the principle involved in section 1 :

Suppose we declare here that the salaries of public officials in the employ of the Federal Government are attachable, and find ourselves in Quebec face to face with the statute there which declares that they are not attachable, immediately a conflict of authority would arise, which it seems to me desirable we should avoid.

Now, if there is any doubt about this Bill at all, if it is liable to create dissension between this Parliament and the province of Quebec, surely a little delay in passing it, or even its rejection, would not be out of place until we have the opinion of the Solicitor General as to whether we have a right to pass this section.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether it is constitutional for us to pass such a law ; it is my business to ask or answer that question. But if we have the right, I do not see any objection to the Bill. I have always held that there should be no class of the community exempt from paying their debts ; they should all stand upon the same footing with regard to discharging the legal obligations against them in the ordinary transactions of life. It seems to me that if we have the right to pass such a law, it would not be out of place for us to pass it, and the sooner the better.

Mr. BEATTIE. I would like to put this case before the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). In the province of Ontario it is well known that every man is exempt to the extent of $25, and how is he going to get over a case like that in the province of Ontario to-day ? He says that we should put the civil servants on the same basis as every other man. I hold he is doing the very reverse, because every man in the province of Ontario, by a law passed twenty years ago, is exempt to the extent of $25, and cannot be garnisheed.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry). I have not heard the discussion of this Bill, and have only looked it over since I came in to-night, but on general principles I may say that I am in favour of the principles of the Bill. However, reasons have been advanced why this Bill should not be carried. The case of judges has been mentioned, and I may say at once that I think the poorest citizen of this country should have the same right as a judge or any other man receiving $5,000 or $10,000 a year. The poor labouring man has to pay his debts, and I do not see why a man receiving a higher salary should be exempted from paying his debts also. However, we find that banking institutions and large corporations in Great Britain and Canada who employ many men, will not retain employees who do not pay their debts. The Bank of Montreal will not retain a man in their employ unless he pays his debts. If the passage of this Bill would cause any annoyance to the Government in the different departments, then let the Government make a rule that if a man does not pay his debts he shall be dismissed from the employment of that department. If that were done, I think there would not be any difficulty. Let it be known that if a man is not prepared to pay his bills he shall make room in the civil service for a man who will pay. We know that such a rule prevails in the banking institutions and other large corporations of this country, and I think such a rule would answer the purpose very much better than this Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I want to add just one word to what I have already said. My hon. friend who is promoting this Bill has made an earnest appeal to the members of this committee to support him in passing it. Now, I think I would be justified in making a counter appeal to my hon. friend. I can assure him that I am sincerely desirous of assisting him in any legislation he may wish to promote, so far as I possibly can do so. But my hon. friend ought not to expect the members of this House to support a Bill which, in their judgment and conscience, they cannot approve, merely because he is anxious to see it pass. He is asking us to subordinate our judgment to his, and to abdicate our function for the purpose of helping him in passing a Bill that he thinks ought to be passed. I believe those who are opposed to this Bill hold opinions quite as strong as those of my hon. friend in favour of the Bill. I feel myself that the Bill ought not to pass, and I cannot vote for it. I think my hon.

friend is hardly presenting this question fairly. He is assuming that we who are not in favour of this Bill oppose it because we are willing or desire to extend some special consideration to the civil servants which we are not willing to extend to other classes in the community.

My hon. friend is rather reversing the arguments in the case; he is approaching and examining it from an entirely different standpoint from that from which it is being approached by those who oppose the Bill. It is not a question of extending favours or immunity to civil servants; that is not the view in which the strongest objections appeal to my judgment. It is because the Bill is against the public interest that I am opposed to it. I am not desirous of withholding or conferring privileges or immunity on the civil service that is not conferred on or withheld from any other class in the community, but I feel strongly that the general interests of the public are of greater moment and higher consideration than the individual interests which are appealed to in connection with the present Bill. Whether A can obtain judgment of his debt due from B or not is not a matter of public interest, but it is a question whether the administration of this country would be in any degree hampered by the adoption of such a law as is proposed. It is because I am convinced of the importance of this point that I am not prepared to agree with the principle of the Bill. There is no question that in some of the Government branches there are already ample means of protection afforded in the interest of creditors. Take the case of the Intercolonial Railway. Thousands of men are employed on the Government road, and for about two years the Government have enforced an order which makes it obligatory on employees to pay their bills, otherwise they place their positions in jeopardy. The effect is, that while we have some complaints, and we cannot hope to remove all causes of complaint on the part of creditors, it is having a very salutary effect, and after a while we will achieve the desired result. I will say to my hon. friend (Mr. Richardson) that even if the committee were in favour of this Bill, we cannot pass this clause. If we pass the clause it would be utterly unworkable. It would not afford a particle of relief to any creditor. There is no way provided in the Bill whereby you could take any action against any civil servant or employee under the Crown. There is no machinery provided for doing it. There is no machinery provided by the provincial legislatures to accomplish it. We have no right to declare by Act of Parliament that a man's salary should be liable to attachment. I would not like to see such a declaration pass this House. With all respect to the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill and those associated with him, it would not be creditable to us to pass through this House the clause which declares as to who should or what should be liable to attachment. We cannot do it. Then if it is going to be law, it will be necessary to provide some machinery, which is not provided by the Bill, whereby the Queen can be sued. You cannot take one single step in order to enforce a remedy against the Crown unless Her Majesty permits herself to be a party to the action. The Queen can only be sued upon a petition of right, a fiat has to be granted by the Government. Some provision to meet such a case will have to be adopted. I say, with all good feeling towards the hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill, that it is not in the shape in which it can be passed, even if we thought the principle one that should be adopted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have only a word to say in reply to the Minister of Railways. What are laymen to do when they find lawyers disagree among themselves? I brought down a Bill early in the session providing that garnishees should be served upon the Federal Government. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is an able lawyer, suggested the present form of the Bill, and I have adopted his suggestion and introduced it as now framed. Then half a dozen able lawyers who are members of the House looked over the clauses and said the Bill was exactly what was wanted. What are laymen like myself, and other hon. members behind me, to do under these circumstances? The Minister of Railways is undoubtedly a very able lawyer, and so is the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, but their opinions differ.

An hon. MEMBER. And the hon. member for Montreal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I could not say as much for the hon. member for Montreal. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries looked over the Bill and said it was all right. The present position should induce every layman to vote for the Bill. If it is not workable, let a case be taken to the Privy Council and settle the question whether we are able to garnishee the salaries of civil servants or not. I know the Minister of Railways has great influence in this House and that his speech will have a powerful influence on hon. members, but I would appeal to all laymen to draw their own conclusions when they find the lawyers differ; and I say, let us have the vote right now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has been rather severe on the lawyers in the House, but he has shown himself to be the best friend of the lawyers, because he has admitted that he is not quite sure about the jurisdiction, and he thinks the best way would be to take a case before the different tribunals and up to the Privy Council. That is certainly helping the lawyers. I do not wish for a moment to express an opinion as to the principle of the Bill; but surely the hon. gentleman will see that the House is unprepared, more especially in view of the scanty information it has received, to take up this measure now. The hon. gentleman has given one reason for passing it which does not at all apply. He said that a case presented itself to his knowledge in which a civil servant had built a marble altar in his house, and the tradesman could not get paid. But that is not a question of salary. If the hon. gentleman will consult the eminent lawyers sitting behind, some of whom seem to approve this Bill, they will tell him that the case does not come under the purview of this Bill. A man who has been working in a house or building a house has his recourse at law, which would not be in the least affected by this Bill. I should like to know from the hon. gentleman whether he has looked into this question. The jurisdiction of this Parliament in so far as the law is concerned is limited. Civil rights are protected by the provincial legislatures. The hon. gentleman cannot tell me that we can legislate here and declare that the departments can be garnisheed for the debts of individuals, although it might be all right if one special federal law could be made applicable to the whole Dominion. But when you travel from the province and enter into another province, the law is different.

The laws in Quebec are protected by treaty, and have been in existence ever since the province came under the British Crown, but they differ from the laws of the other provinces. As one, who has had some little experience in official life, I say that we should not make the departments of Government collecting agencies for merchants who with their eyes open have taken the risk of giving credit. I say that a Minister of the Crown has more than enough to do, without placing upon him the extra duties which this Bill will force him to undertake. I hold, Sir, that the law officers of the Crown should pronounce upon this Bill before it becomes law, and should say whether or not, it interferes with the rights of the provinces to such an extent as to be ultra vires of this Parliament.

Committee divided: Yeas, 50; nays, 23.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved that the following form part of the Bill as clause 2:—

This Act shall not apply to debts contracted before the passing of this Act

Motion agreed to.

Bill reported.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to remind the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) of the understanding that was come to when Bill (No. 14) was allowed to take precedence over my Bill, which stood first on the Order paper to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Call the order now.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the order for consideration of Bill (No. 4) be again considered.

Order called,

The House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 4) further to secure safety of railway employees and passengers.—(Mr. Casey.)

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have not heard the hon. gentleman state whether he got the opinion of the Minister of Justice or not.

Mr. CASEY. It is not my place to get the opinion of the Minister of Justice. The hon. Minister of Railways himself was to get the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and the opinion of the Minister of Justice, whatever weight it might justly bear, would come before this House only as an opinion. Nobody's opinion is decisive, either for or against the constitutionality of this or any other Bill. We have known the most distinguished lawyers now in this House support Bills, and have them carried through, which were afterwards knocked endways by the Privy Council; we have known other Bills, which were put through by laymen, sustained by the Privy Council; and I do not propose to take anybody's opinion as absolutely conclusive on this question. But if there is anybody who should bring the opinion of the Minister of Justice, it is the hon. gentleman who is opposing this Bill. I say this Bill is all right, its clauses are constitutional, and the country demands them, and if anybody opposes them, let him bring some authoritative opinion or some authoritative decision against them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) may be quite right, but I take it that the Minister of Railways would have sought, if he required to seek it, the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon this question. I do not consider that he required to go to the law officers of the Crown for the information he required. His experience in his own department would make him the Minister who should give information to the House upon a Bill of this sort, and I think my hon. friend from West Elgin is wrong in supposing that we should dispense with the opinion of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. CASEY. I am not saying anything about the Minister of Railways.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think it is most important that we should get the opinion of the Minister of Railways. The fact that Bills introduced by laymen happened to be good Bills does not at all remove the objection I would have to any measure against which the leaders of the House, on whatever side they might happen to be, have expressed their opinion. I think we have to look to the Treasury benches for opinions on the measures that come before the House, and I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways what his opinion is upon this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I ventured to express to the committee, on the two previous occasions when this Bill came up, the judgment I had formed as to the competence of this Parliament to pass the clauses up to the general heading of section 7. The first evening that the matter came to my notice, I expressed doubt upon it; the next evening I was a little stronger in my doubt; and I am stronger to-night than I was when I last stated my view to the committee. I am very much inclined to believe that this seventh section is not within our legislative competency. My hon. friend does not have very much respect for the opinion of lawyers because lawyers differ, and yet it is by lawyers that these questions are ultimately determined. That is my view, and I leave it with that statement.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend must not think that I have no respect for the opinion of lawyers.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not at all sensitive on that point.

Mr. CASEY. But we have had such distinguished lawyers as my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) giving opinions in this House, and carrying Bills through this House, backed by the Government of the day, which turned out not to be worth the paper on which they were written when they came before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I am not saying that it was his fault. It may have been the other lawyers who were wrong. I am only trying to emphasize the fact that you can never be sure of a legal or constitutional position until the question is decided by the Privy Council. And I say that until there is an authoritative decision of that highest court which can be quoted to show, even by analogy, that a measure which I or anybody else proposes in this House is unconstitutional, this House has a right to assume that it has the power to pass it, each member of the House exercising his individual judgment on the question, and each member voting according to his own individual opinion without regard to mere opinions given by legal gentlemen, however eminent. That is the stand I take in regard to these clauses. I have laid them before the House as part of the Bill. It is for the House to say whether it will take the responsibility of passing them or not. I intend that the House shall take the responsibility of accepting them or throwing them out, and that the Bill shall not be dropped, or these clauses dropped out of it merely by a side wind. The question is much too important, and has been much too long before the country to be decided in any other way than by a vote on the merits of the question, pro or con. My opinion as to the constitutionality of the Bill has the support of some lawyers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Are they members of this House?

Mr. CASEY. One, at least, is a member of this House, and was a member of the committee on this Bill. I refer to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Powell). His opinion as a lawyer has been taken, even by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, within the last week or two, in amendments to legislation; and his opinion is in favour of the constitutionality of these clauses. He approved of them in the committee, and he told me that he going to speak in favour of them, and urge their constitutionality, if the Bill came up. Not being a lawyer, I am not going to discuss the constitutional question, any further than I have already done on the two former occasions when it was discussed. This is the third time that the Bill has been before the committee, and I must leave it to the committee to say whether it will accept these clauses or not.

Mr. WALLACE. For my part, I am most heartily in accord with the Bill. In the first place, on the clauses providing safeguards for the employees, I think there ought to be no difference of opinion.

Mr. CASEY. That is all passed.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of the whole Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member must confine his remarks to the clause under discussion—clause 7.

Mr. WALLACE. I am coming to that. I am also discussing the other clauses, and I am quite within my right to do it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman has any right to discuss the other clauses of the Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. If necessary, I will move that the committee rise, and then I can discuss what I please. I wish to promote the passage of the Bill. I was referring, when you called me to order, to the fact that the Bill was divided into two parts, and I was coming to the second part. The railway companies are the only business people in this country whose business steadily increases. The business of every railroad that has been built originally on any business basis, has year by year, or at any rate in every decade, largely increased. Years ago the Grand Trunk Railway was doing but a small fragment of the business it is doing to-day. I remember when it was said that the Canadian Pacific Railway, when it became a competing line with the Grand Trunk Railway, would largely decrease the business of the Grand Trunk Railway. But experience has shown that the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway has grown exceedingly, and that the business of the Grand Trunk Railway has doubled and trebled on these same competitive lines. The country is improving, and the railroads get the advantage of the country's improvement and progress more than any other class of the community. The men who are employed on these railroads are undergoing great risks in the interests of the company they work for, and in order that the whole community—because almost the whole community travel more or less on the railroads—may have protection and safety. These men are risking their lives in order to carry goods and passengers safely, and it is no more than a fair proposition that the railway companies, which are growing large and wealthy, could, in the first place, be compelled to protect the lives of people using their lines, by means of the most improved machinery, and in the second place that where accidents occur, the railways should clearly assume responsibility for them. That is what section 7 provides. It seems to me that there is no clause in that 7th section which does not commend itself to the fairness of any one who is a disinterested citizen. It simply provides, in every case, for fair-play to the employee and imposes no hardship or injustice upon the railway companies. It has been suggested by the hon. Minister of Railways that it may not be constitutional. He has expressed, however, no positive opinion upon that point. The Minister of Justice, who was to have examined into it and give his opinion has not reported, and I presume he has not reported because he could not report adversely to it. The Minister of Justice was in the House of Commons for many years, when the principle of this Bill was frequently submitted to the consideration of this House, and is quite familiar with every subsection of section 7; and if I remember rightly—though I would not like to speak positively—he always expressed a favourable opinion of it. If that be the case, the House need have no hesitation in endorsing it as a very just and equitable measure.

Mr. CLARKE. I shall have very great pleasure in casting my vote in favour of this Bill, for I have received a great many letters from men employed by railway companies, asking me to do so, and have not heard a word from any particular interest against it. If it is in the competence of Parliament to pass this Bill. I do not think any one will assert that the railway companies will ask the shareholders to set apart a portion of their profits for the purpose of paying the compensation provided for by section 7. The public generally will have to provide the necessary moneys by the payment of increased fares and rates; and in view of the hazardous nature of the employment in which the railway employees are engaged, it is only reasonable and just that exceptional legislation should be passed in their interest. We know that time and again, in cases before the courts arising out of accidents, the railways appeal from court to court, and in many instances employees who had been injured, and who had obtained judgment in the first court, were unable, from want of means, to press their claims through the higher courts, and had either to abandon them or accept an unjust compromise. The provision is a reasonable one and will be endorsed by the great body of railway servants and the people of this country.

Mr. DAVIN. It shall have my hearty support, and I hope we will go on and carry this legislation through Parliament.

Mr. INGRAM. We have not had the objection of the railway companies stated, and perhaps it is only fair that it should be made known to the House. The law, as it now stands, puts the onus on the employee to prove negligence on the part of the company, but this Bill will put the onus on the company to prove negligence on the part of the employee. The railway companies hold that as this is a new country, requiring the construction of a great number of miles of railway, the effect of this would be to prevent capitalists from investing in railway construction, under the belief that this legislation would work such a radical change as to entail very heavy expenditure on railway companies to meet claims for compensation. That is the argument of the railway companies against this section. Personally, as a member of the committee on this Bill, having listened to the evidence of employees from different parts of Canada and to the representatives of the railway companies, I am strongly in favour of the Bill. I believe it is a step in the right direction. The occupation of railway employees is a very dangerous one, and every safeguard should be thrown around it. A few years ago I went carefully into the number of accidents that had occurred in this country and the United States, and was astonished to find that many thousands of men were yearly killed in the United States and Canada and thousands of others injured, by losing legs, and arms, and so on, and I think it is the duty of Parliament to place around the employees of these companies all the barriers possible to prevent accidents.

The PRIME MINISTER. This section goes much further than has been stated by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat.

Mr. INGRAM. I have particular reference to the subsection.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman stated that the object of this section was simply to reverse the well known rule that any body making a claim for compensation, as the result of accident, is bound to prove negligence on the part of the party against whom he makes the claim. That principle is now to be reversed, and it will be for the defendant to prove negligence on the part of the claimant. But the Bill goes much further. It makes the company liable whether it has been guilty of negligence or not. An accident may occur through the negligence of a company but it may also occur without any negligence on the part of the company or anybody else. Suppose a freshet takes place which destroys a section of railway, if an accident should happen and an employee became disabled, he would be entitled, under this Bill to compensation, though there was no negligence, either on the part of the company or the employee. The principle is one which I am not prepared, either to combat or affirm. The Government desires to have and will have the opinion of the Department of Justice upon this question. We have not been able to have it up to this time, not for the reason given by the hon. member for York (Mr. Wallace) but because the Minister of Justice unhappily has been called away from the Capital owing to sickness and death in his family. However, I do not wish to keep back this Bill at all, so we may have the section passed and simply reserve the action of the Government for future occasion.

Mr. INGRAM. In answer to the hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I may say that while this subject was put before the committee the question was put to the employees who were there whether they would expect compensation in the case of an accident which was not the fault of the company or of an employee, but that was, as might be said, the act of Providence. For instance, if, on a frosty day a train were passing over a line and a engine ran off the track owing to a broken rail, but through the fault of nobody, would they expect compensation? This case was put to them, and they said decidedly not. So far as my judgment is concerned, I believe that the Bill could be framed on that line.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then the Bill will have to be amended.

Mr. INGRAM.

Mr. McHUGH. I do not wish to speak on the constitutionality of the Bill, but I am in sympathy with the object of it. I see that it is a Bill designed for the protection of human life, and I think that is an object to be promoted even if it does involve the forcing of some obligations upon railway companies. I hope to see the Bill become law even if, in an amended form. I have received petitions from very respectable parties, employees of railways, asking me to support the Bill. I believe that the railway employees do not wish to ask for anything unreasonable. Let the Bill be amended so as to be in accordance with reason and justice, and I believe the committee and the House will adopt it.

Mr. TISDALE. I submit to the Prime Minister that there would be some difficulty unless the understanding was that we should get back in committee with regard to this clause 7. There are a number of propositions there that it would be useless to discuss, upon which the opinion of the Minister of Justice should be expressed. But, to attempt to discuss the matter on the third reading would be unwise, because the discussion could not be carried on so freely.

The PRIME MINISTER. Let us pass the clause. If the Minister of Justice reports against it, we would have to strike it out. If he is in favour of it, we can adopt the principle, but the whole section will have to be recast.

Mr. CASEY. I propose to add something to the Bill. There was another Bill which equally passed the special committee last year. It was introduced by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) and provided for the use on railway trains of automatic couplings and air brakes. I would like to add the provisions of that Bill to my own, as my hon. friend has not introduced this Bill this year. As my hon. friend practically has a prescriptive right to the proposals in that Bill, I did not introduce them in mine, but, as his measure of last year is not before the House, I propose to add them, and I move that they be added as sections 8, 9 and 10 of this Bill.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Does not my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) think it would be better to give notice of this amendment?

Mr. CASEY. Very well, let that stand as a notice to be moved on the third reading.

Mr. TISDALE. We cannot discuss it on third reading with the same freedom.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think that clauses should be tacked to this Bill in this way. It is hardly fair to the committee that we should have this hasty legislation on this important matter.

Mr. CASEY. These have been just as long before the House, and have been fully accepted by the House as the provisions of the present Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER. But that Bill has not been introduced this year.

Mr. CASEY. No, but I propose to add the clauses to my Bill, and I have given notice that I will move, on the third reading, to refer the Bill back to committee to make these amendments.

Mr. ELLIS. With regard to the objections I took to the Bill on a former occasion that it should be made to apply only to the roads under the jurisdiction of the Dominion I offered an amendment covering the first six sections. I would like to move it now. It is as follows :

The first six sections of this Bill shall not apply to any railway within the limits of any one province, unless the same is declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or of two or more provinces.

It was quite understood by the committee, I think, that this Bill should not apply to railroads that were so poor and had such difficult work that some of them were not even able to pay their employees.

Mr. CASEY. But they are rich enough to kill their employees.

Mr. ELLIS. We all have to take some risks in this world.

Mr. CASEY. I quit agree with the understanding in committee as stated by my hon. friend from St. John's (Mr. Ellis). We understood that this legislation would not apply to any railways except those under the control of the Dominion of Canada, and I have no objection to saying so in so many words.

Mr. TISDALE. That is introducing a principle that I think we had better leave alone. Surely we are not going to pass both a positive and a negative law. It is clear that the laws we pass relate only to railways under our jurisdiction. If my hon. friend thinks there is any doubt about it, he had better consult the Minister of Justice.

Mr. INGRAM. It is not necessary that the amendment of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) should be tacked on to this Bill. I do not understand that the committee has any power to promote a Bill affecting railways wholly under the control of a provincial legislature, but only those under the control of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. ELLIS. Although the hon. gentleman may have given a great deal of attention to the Bill, he evidently does not understand the effect of the 7th section of the Bill. It was the understanding in the committee that in the case of those railways in the smaller provinces that were just living from day to day, it was not advisable to enforce against them restrictions which are no doubt necessary in the case of others. My hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) says that there can be no doubt about this.

But there is doubt about it, and the Bill as drawn would seem to convey the idea that it applies to all the railways in the country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is quite certain that we cannot legislate for any railway that does not come under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The only railways which are recognized as being affected by the jurisdiction of this Parliament, are those which are declared to be for the general benefit of Canada. Now, surely, as my hon. friend says, we are not going to adopt a clause stating that we do not consider that a law passed by this Parliament can affect a railway that does not come under our jurisdiction. I think to do so would make our legislation ridiculous. The clause had better be dropped.

The PRIME MINISTER. Perhaps I may suggest to my hon. friend that as this Bill must be referred to the Minister of Justice, the amendment might also be referred to him at the same time; and that, therefore, it would be better not to press it now.

Bill, as amended, reported.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all Orders in Council, complaints, depositions, reports, correspondence, papers and other documents in relation to the dismissal of Mr. Elzéar Larouette, postmaster of St Anne de la Pérade, and to the appointment of his successor.—(Mr. Marcotte, by Sir Adolphe Caron.)

Return showing the number of acres seeded in 1897, the nature of the seed sown, and the amount of crops grown on each Indian reserve in the provisional district of Assiniboia during the year ending the 31st December, 1897.—(Mr. Davin.)

Copies of all correspondence, estimates, tenders, reports and petitions addressed to the Government in reference to the proposed works upon River St. Pierre in the vicinity of the Lachine Canal, and the dredging, deepening and widening of the said river.—(Mr. Monk.)

Copies of correspondence and reports addressed to the Militia Department concerning accidental shooting at Côte St. Luc ranges, of a farmer named Larose, of the parish of St. Laurent, in Jacques Cartier county.—(Mr Monk.)

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Might I ask the right hon. leader of the House what he intends taking up to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. The Plebiscite Bill to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 3rd May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 130) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The first two sections of the Bill are provisions empowering the senior assistant in the land office to take certain affidavits. The third section provides that a certain quantity of the Dominion lands may be withdrawn from ordinary sale or settlement for the purpose of enabling a group of settlers to occupy the land on the hamlet system, under which a certain portion of the total area of the land will be cultivated instead of a certain portion of each quarter section. Section 4 provides for the taking of affidavits by a clerk. Section 5 is for the purpose of bringing the provisions relating to the amount of cultivation required on a second homestead into conformity with the rest of the Act. At present a person who takes up a pre-emption as a second homestead has to cultivate forty acres, but if he takes up a second homestead not a pre-emption, he does not have to do so. The purpose of the section is to make the law consistent. Section 6 is in reality an amendment of the amendment of the Dominion Lands Act which was passed last session, and the purpose of which was to enable the settler who took a second homestead adjoining his first homestead, after he had received his patent for his first homestead, to put in his residence on his first homestead. It is found undesirable to compel the settler to remove from the first homestead and to put up a shanty on the adjoining land and live there; but the clause was so drawn that it only applied in case the farmer who took up the second homestead had obtained a patent for the land upon which he was living as a homestead. Immediately after the Act passed a number of cases arose in which persons who bought land and improved it had taken up adjoining lands as homesteads. Of course, there did not seem to be any reason for treating them differently from others, and this recasting of the clause will put them in the same position. Section 7 is simply for the purpose of more clearly defining the meaning of the section. The section as it stands is difficult of interpretation. It required that a homesteader should prove:

That he has fulfilled three years' residence upon the land which is the subject of his entry, if the land is a homestead, and upon his homestead if the land is pre-emption, in accordance with the provisions as to three years' residence upon a homestead, which are contained and explained in this Act.

Section 7 amends subsection "a" of clause 10 of section 4 of the Dominion Lands Act, as amended by chap. 29 of the Act of 1897. That subsection provides that the Minister or the commissioner of Dominion lands or the Dominion lands board must be satisfied that the settler has fulfilled three years' residence upon the land which is the subject of his entry, if the land is a homestead, and upon his homestead if the land is pre-emption, in accordance with the provisions as to three years' residence upon a homestead which are contained and explained in this Act.

The wording of that is somewhat confusing, and I propose to change it by simply providing, in lieu thereof, that the Minister or commissioner shall be satisfied that the settler has fulfilled three years' residence within the meaning of this clause.

Section 8 of the Bill is inserted for the purpose of giving the board of examiners of Dominion land surveyors the power to allow certain provincial land surveyors to become Dominion land surveyors upon passing a special examination. This is inserted at the request of the board of Dominion land surveyors.

Section 9 of the Bill provides a penalty for any defacing or removal of survey posts. A good deal of difficulty has occurred in the North-west Territories and Manitoba by reason of the removal of survey posts, and the Deputy Minister of Justice has suggested this section for the purpose of getting rid of this difficulty.

Section 10 provides that a person entitled to make a homestead entry may select as his homestead one or more of the legal subdivisions of any section which comprise one-quarter section, and if the area he takes up is not greater than 80 acres, he may be granted his entry therefor for one-half of the amount of the fee exacted for the homestead entry of the whole quarter section.

Section 11 gives power to the Government to make certain exchanges of lands with the Manitoba Government. These exchanges have in reality been provided for—some of them some years ago—and the question arose whether the lands given the Dominion in exchange shall be deemed Dominion lands. This section provides that they shall be Dominion lands, subject to administration under this law.

Section 12 reads:

The Minister of the Interior may withdraw from general sale and settlement, under the homestead provisions of the said Act, any lands in the North-west Territories which he believes to be so arid as to be unsuited for proper cultivation without the aid of irrigation, and he may dispose thereof to any persons for such price, upon such terms, and subject to such conditions as to the colonization or settlement thereof and as to the cultivation thereof by the aid of irrigation, as the Governor in Council fixes and determines.

Section 13 provides that when a time sale is cancelled, the department may allow the land which thus reverts to the Crown to be homesteaded; but may fix a price to the land in addition to the homestead conditions, if deemed advisable.

Sections 14, 15, 16 and 17 were drafted by the Deputy Minister of Justice for the purpose of providing legal machinery for the ejectment of persons wrongfully in possession of Dominion lands.

Mr. DAVIN. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether, in the case of those communities whose settlement he proposes to facilitate, they will be allowed to settle on the odd and even-numbered sections alike? He said that he was providing, by the first section, for the withdrawing from general sale and settlement, under the ordinary homestead provisions, any available Dominion lands, for the purposes of such associations. I did not catch whether these comprise odd and even-numbered sections.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Both, where we can do it.

Mr. DAVIN. With regard to section 10, what has led the hon. gentleman to revert to the division of 160 acres into 80-acre homesteads? Has there been any demand for that? At one time we did have 80-acre homesteads, and we did not find that work very well.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am not reverting to that at all. All I am providing is that if a man comes along and finds 80 acres of Dominion lands, he may take them up as a homestead. The Act at present provides that he can only homestead a quarter of a section.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACTS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 131) further to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories. He said: Section 1 is for the purpose of striking out the words "Lieutenant-Governor in Council," and inserting instead the words "Legislative Assembly" in the clause giving power to legislate respecting education in the North-west Territories. Last session a Bill was introduced largely amending the constitutional Act of the North-west Territories, and changing, amongst other things, the definition of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Lieutenant-Governor in Council now means what it means in the provinces—acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council. Under the old Act it meant the Lieutenant-Governor acting by and with the advice of the legislative body which was called a council. Last session, although the amending Act was carefully revised, this clause was overlooked, so that it was found that the legislative power rested with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and not with the legislative assembly. Section 2 of the Act will be struck out in committee. Section 3 provides that the Supreme Court in the North-west Territories may sit at such places as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may appoint. At present the Supreme Court is compelled to sit at Regina, and the judges desire the power to sit at Calgary at times, because a large amount of litigation arises there. It is at their request that this provision is inserted.

Section 4 may give rise to some discussion when the Bill comes to a further stage. It is for the purpose of removing the disqualification which exists in the case of officers of the Dominion Government, preventing them from sitting in the legislative assembly in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DAVIN. The first section is an important amendment, and it was to provide for such an amendment that I gave notice of a Bill, but waited to see if the hon. gentleman would bring one forward. Has the hon. gentleman considered whether the action taken since the passing of the Act of last session by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council in regard to education is valid?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I discussed that with Mr. Haultain, and he was satisfied to leave it to the legislature to re-enact what they have done rather than that we should undertake to do it here.

Mr. DAVIN. In regard to clause 3, he says that it is introduced at the request of the judges. Do I understand that the judges wish to sit in banc in Calgary and elsewhere?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There is no suggestion that they wish to sit elsewhere, but it is suggested that they should sit at Calgary, and they want this Bill passed so that it will be within their power to do so if they see fit.

Mr. DAVIN. I was under the impression that some persons had wished that the sitting in banc should be perambulatory, but my impression, after talking with the judges was that they do not wish that, but they wish it to be stationary.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That is as it was represented to me. I will look it up and see if there is any correspondence on the subject.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 132) further to amend the Land Titles Act, 1894. He said: I think it would be better for me to defer explanation of this Bill, which is a long and somewhat involved measure relating to real property in the North-west Territories, until we get to the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BOUNTY WARRANT EXTENSION.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 133) to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the militia force on active service in the North-west. He said: After the rebellion of 1885 an Act was passed providing for certain grants of land to persons who had served in the militia. Under this Act the Governor in Council made grants of homestead or scrip, generally known as bounty warrants. There was a time limit placed upon persons who had served, under which they were required to make application. This time limit was extended, I believe, in 1891, again in 1892, also in 1893 and, I think, in 1894. Within the last few weeks certain persons have sent in a request to have it extended again, so as to allow parties who desire to do so to put in applications. I saw no objection to their doing so and the Bill is to give them this privilege.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CLAIMS OF A. E. KILLAM.

Mr. McINERNEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Government when they propose to bring down the correspondence, papers and documents ordered on the 30th March last concerning the claim made by A. E. Killam for cattle injured or killed at Chandler's Cutting on the Intercolonial Railway. I may explain that about thirteen days ago I spoke of this matter to the Minister of Railways and he promised to have the return brought down shortly afterwards. He may have omitted to call the attention of his officers to the matter, and so I thought I would bring it to the attention of the Government again.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I gave directions that the papers should be forthcoming at once, but they have not yet been received from Moncton. Now that I am reminded of the matter, I will make further inquiries and have the return brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. SIFTON.

PROHIBITION PLEBISCITE.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 121) respecting the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. He said: When I moved the first reading of this Bill, I was asked to explain to the House the nature and provisions of the Bill itself, and it will not be necessary for me, therefore, to-day, to go into those points. But perhaps it would be well for me to say a few words with regard to the principle of the Bill and the events that have led up to its introduction. I feel keenly the honour and responsibility resting upon me in having charge of this Bill, because for many years I have been earnestly active in the work of the Prohibition cause in this country, and I feel that in the progress of the cause, the introduction of this Bill marks a very decided step in advance. It is now twenty years since what might be called the last Prohibition law was passed by the Parliament of Canada. It was in 1878 that the Canada Temperance Act was adopted by this Parliament, and it is worthy of note that the gentleman with whose name this Act has always been connected, the Hon. Senator Scott, is again to-day a member of the Government which is responsible for the introduction of this Bill. During the years from 1878 to the present time the question of Prohibition has been frequently before this House, being brought to the attention of hon. members usually in the form of a general resolution in favour of the total prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in Canada. These resolutions have been dealt with in various ways in the House of Commons. Sometimes they have been voted down directly, sometimes they have been so amended as to emasculate the proposition, sometimes they have been adopted with amendments which have materially altered the scope and object of the resolution. But at no time has the House of Commons deliberately and definitely declared that prohibition should come into force in the Dominion of Canada. I may refer specially to the fact that in 1889 a motion was introduced in the House by my friend, Mr. Jamieson, who was then the hon. member for North Lanark, and seconded by myself:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition, and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government, through specially appointed officers.

In amendment to that, the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) moved:

That all after the word "purposes" in the original resolution be omitted, and the following substituted therefor:—"When the public sentiment of the county is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition."

This amendment carried, and the resolution thus amended was eventually adopted by the House. So that the House of Commons of Canada in 1889 was committed to this principle :

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes, when the public sentiment of the country is ripe for the reception and enforcement of such a measure of prohibition.

The question having thus been decided in the House of Commons that when the country was ready for prohibition it was advisable that prohibition should be enacted, the next step would seem naturally to make some provision by which the opinion of the people of the country could be obtained, so that Parliament might be guided thereby in its consequent action. Since that time there has been no effort made, however, to find out what is the opinion of the people of the country ; on the contrary, another mode of proceeding was adopted by the party in power during the last Parliament ; and in 1891, when a prohibitory resolution was introduced into this House, the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster), then Minister of Finance, moved that a royal commission should issue to inquire into all the facts connected with prohibition. In 1892, on the 14th of March, a royal commission was issued with this object :

Whereas it is deemed expedient to obtain for the information and consideration of Parliament the fullest and most reliable data possible respecting :

1. The effects of the liquor traffic upon all interests affected by it in Canada.
2. The measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate or prohibit the traffic.
3. The results of these measures in each case.
4. The effect that the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law in Canada would have in respect of social conditions, agricultural business, industrial and commercial interests, of the revenue requirements of municipalities, provinces and the Dominion ; and also, as to its capability of efficient enforcement.
5. And all other information bearing on the question of prohibition.

That commission was appointed in 1892, and in 1895 the report of that commission was completed and issued. However, there has been no action taken as a result of that inquiry, or as consequent upon that report. Now, Sir, in the meantime, although Parliament has taken no positive action, although there was no result from the commission on prohibition, still the public opinion of the country, and I think I may also say the habits of the people of the country, have been progressing. The people of Canada have been steadily, if not very rapidly, progressing towards that condition in which a prohibitory law might fairly be expected to be possible of enforcement. I think I may safely say, without going into details, that to-day the drinking habits of the people of Canada have largely and visibly decreased ; I think that I may safely say that there is very much less drunkenness in the country to-day, and we know that there has been a large decrease in the consumption of liquor. We know that in Canada to-day the consumption of liquor per head of the population is very much less than it is in other countries similarly situated and inhabited by the same races. I think that a large portion of the people of this country are of the opinion that Canada is ripe for a prohibitory law. Under these circumstances, therefore, it is not to be wondered at that when, in 1893, the great Liberal party of Canada met in convention at Ottawa, the question of what could be done to meet the views of the prohibitionists of Canada should have been discussed and decided. We know that that convention was one of the most representative gatherings that had ever taken place in Canada, that it was not only representative of the Liberal party from all parts of the country from a party point of view, but that it was also representative of the views and opinions of the people upon all questions connected with the constitution and good government of the country, that it was in fact representative of the bone and sinew of the land, of the most respectable and responsible elements of this our country. Under these circumstances, I say, it is not to be wondered at that this question of prohibition came to the front, and that a resolution, proposed by myself, should have been passed in that convention as an outcome and result of the development of prohibition sentiment in this country. The resolution was this :

That whereas public attention is at present much directed to a consideration of the admittedly great evils of intemperance, it is desirable that the mind of the people should be clearly ascertained on the question of prohibition by means of a Dominion plebiscite.

That resolution was adopted, as the report of the convention says, by an overwhelming majority. The party which was thus committed to this view of dealing with the prohibition question, went before the people in 1896 with their platform clearly defined ; they went before the people on the very questions put forward and defined by resolution after resolution passed in that convention, amongst others, upon this method and manner of dealing with the prohibition question. Everybody in this House and throughout Canada knows the result of that appeal to the country ; we know that the Liberal party, coming into office as a result of the election of 1896, have been and are desirous of fulfilling the pledges of their platform adopted in that convention of 1893. In the pursuance of that policy, and with a desire to accomplish that end, the Government of the day, representing that party, are now introducing a Bill for the purpose of fulfilling that pledge and carrying out that plank in their platform. Now, Sir, the question before us is one for ascertaining the views of the people of Canada upon the question of prohibition. It is not my purpose, and I do not think it would be at all in place, for me to-day to discuss the question of prohibition. That is not the question which is before the House of Commons, that is a question which by the very nature of this Bill, is to be removed from the arena of the House of Commons for the time being, and to be relegated to the electorate of the country for them to declare their views upon it. The discussion of the question of prohibition seems to me to be relegated to the campaign which will arise if this Bill becomes law, at the hustings where the question will be thrashed out. When the vote has been given, when the people of the country have declared their will in respect to this question, it will come back again to the floor of Parliament and will have to be dealt with again by the representatives of the people in Parliament. But until that time comes, it would be, I think, out of place and inadvisable for us to discuss the question at issue, and I do not myself intend at all to deliver here a prohibition speech, strongly as I feel on the question, largely identified with that side of the question as I have been for many years, in fact I think any particular exposition of details in regard to the question itself would not only be out of place at the present moment, but would contribute against and militate against a proper discussion and would tend to hamper eventually the votes of the people by directing their attention away from the main question, resulting in a discussion on mere detail which are not necessary to be discussed in the presentation of this Bill in the House or in the passage of the Bill through Parliament. Sir, the Bill is a simple one. It has been our desire, as much as possible, to make it a simple Bill for the purpose of removing any chance or opportunity to cavil at it, any chance or opportunity to take issue so as to retard the passage of the Bill through Parliament. We know that a large number of the people have earnestly desired that this Bill should be presented. We know that the Government was unfortunately prevented from introducing the Bill last session in consequence of the pressure of work at the early part of the session, and the departure of the right hon. leader of the House to attend the Jubilee in England, and there was great disappointment felt by a great many people because the Bill was not presented. Sir, there would be still more serious disappointment felt on the part of the people were the Bill not now to be passed as rapidly as possible and become law, so that they might have an opportunity of entering into the campaign which must result from the passage of the Bill, at which time we Prohibitionists expect to be able to show that Canada is ripe for prohibition and for the passage of a prohibitory law. Under these circumstances, I hope and trust that while the Bill will be fairly criticised and fairly understood by Parliament and the country, there will be no serious opposition to it, but that the Bill will pass through Parliament and become law and give the people that opportunity as early as possible. In this connection it may not be out of place for me to say, speaking for the Government, that while in the Bill no fixed date is named for the taking of the vote, it is the intention and expectation of the Government that as early a day will be fixed as is consistent with the other business of the country and consistent with the proper convenience of the electorate in calling on men to cast their votes on so important a question. I will only say in addition, that when the Bill comes into committee it is my intention to propose a single amendment, in the form of the ballot, so as to simplify it a little and make it, I think, more clear, so that there can be no possibility of spoilt ballots when the election comes off. When that section is reached in committee I will move the amendment respecting the form of ballot, which I have now before me. I do not think it necessary to enter into any further details and particulars in moving the second reading of the Bill, but leaving the question before the House after the few words I have addressed to it, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the hon. Minister takes his seat, will he be kind enough to let the House know, if he has at hand the information, whether the form in which the question has been put in the provincial plebiscites, and the form in which the question is to be put under this Bill, is the same, or whether there is to be any distinction between the several forms used?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the provincial laws at hand at the moment. I can, of course, send to the library for them, and no doubt they will be produced in the course of the debate. The other plebiscites to which the hon. gentleman has referred were taken under the laws of the provinces, and a different form was used in the different provinces, not differing, however, in any important particular, and speaking from memory, not differing much from that which will be submitted to the people of Canada. There is a slight difference in the actual shape of the ballot and the wording of the question, but there is no material difference that I remember in regard to the form of the question submitted at the different provincial plebiscites. I may say further that the provincial plebiscites were a little different in their nature from this plebiscite. At that time it was not understood and supposed that the provincial legislatures had any power to pass a prohibitory law, and, therefore, these plebiscites were more of the nature of the submission of an academic question without any subsequent results being anticipated. This plebiscite is in an entirely different position, because it is well understood and thoroughly ascertained by the highest tribunals in the land, that the Canadian Parliament has a right to pass a prohibitory law without question or doubt. Since the provincial plebiscites were taken, there has been a decision rendered by the Privy Council of England, which was referred to in some detail when the question of prohibition was discussed in this House and when this expected decision was made a reason on several occasions for not dealing with the prohibition question in Parliament; and that decision, speaking as a layman, and with some diffidence, because the decisions of the Privy Council on the question of the sale of intoxicating liquors have been somewhat complicated, clearly indicates that the provincial authorities have a right, to a certain extent at all events, to pass prohibitory laws in their various provinces; but that does not and cannot be held in any way to diminish, lessen or interfere with the absolute right of the Parliament of Canada to pass a prohibitory law for the whole Dominion, whenever it considers that the time has come for doing so. I think, therefore, the question as put under this law will meet the views of the people of the country, who have been asking for an opportunity of expressing their opinion, and who would be delighted and glad to take the opportunity thus afforded them.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman any idea of the cost that will be entailed by the proposed plebiscite?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman having been Finance Minister and having dealt with various elections in the Dominion of Canada, must appreciate fully what the cost of an ordinary election is, and I have no reason to suppose that the cost of the plebiscite vote will be anything very greatly different from the cost of a general election.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be about how much?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Speaking from memory, I think it costs from $200,000 to $250,000 to carry on a Dominion election.

Mr. BERGERON. I think it is more than that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Well, I am speaking from memory, but my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) ought to know better than I, he having paid the bills on one or two occasions.

Mr. MONTAGUE. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) whether the amendment he proposes to make with regard to the ballot paper will affect the discussion in any way?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not think so. It is a mere matter of the form of printing the ballot paper.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is not in regard to the wording of the question.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not in the least. The wording is exactly the same. It is merely with regard to dividing the ballot paper for the putting of the cross so as to simplify it as much as possible.

Mr. BERGERON. May I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) the reason why he classes cider amongst the beverages which should be avoided?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am very glad indeed to answer the question of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron). Cider is included because cider is known to contain alcohol very frequently, and being an intoxicating drink it ought to be prohibited by a prohibitory law. I may say, however, that personally—and I think I am speaking for others—that the word cider put here in the list of intoxicating liquors means cider fermented. It means "cider" and not apple juice. It means cider which is in the nature of an intoxicating drink and not simply apple juice. The hon. member (Mr. Bergeron) probably understands very well the difference between grape juice and wine. Grape juice is simply the juice squeezed out of the grape; wine, is after it has passed through certain stages of fermentation and has become alcoholic. So in the same way the word "cider" means apple juice which having been treated in manufacture has become an intoxicating drink, and it does not mean apple juice simply in its raw state.

Mr. BERGERON. As my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) says, I know something about it, but of course we are to assume that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) himself does not know. I believe my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) is very sincere in wishing that this question in the plebiscite should be answered "yes," but is he not frightened that when cider even is forbidden, a great many people will vote "no" instead of "yes." When the hon. gentleman speaks of cider which is intoxicating, he no doubt refers to cider that they make in Normandy, France, which really is intoxicating, but we never had that kind of cider in this country, and the people who vote on this ballot paper are people who are accustomed to get weak cider.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) is mistaken when he says that the cider in this country is not intoxicating.

Mr. BERGERON. How do you know ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergeron) will endorse my statement when I say that I am not in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquor, but I have frequently been tempted to drink cider by people who told me it was not an intoxicating drink, and when I was younger and more innocent I sometimes took them at their word, and tried the cider which they told me was not intoxicating.

Mr. BERGERON. What was the result ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I can assure the hon. gentleman that sometimes under such conditions and circumstances, I have felt the effects of that cider in my head, and consequently as a temperance man I consider that it is very important that such cider as that should be prohibited in this country.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then that should be explained to the voters.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I therefore think it quite right that this question should read as it is printed here :

Are you in favour of the passing of an Act prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale of spirits, wine, ale, beer, cider and all other alcoholic liquors for use as a beverage ?

If the hon. member will read the question carefully he will see that cider is put in amongst certain alcoholic liquors, and that there is the qualification immediately afterwards: "and all other alcoholic liquors." This very evidently indicates that this cider which it is intended to prohibit, is the alcoholic cider which I have just described and which certainly any temperance man who values his principles must hope to see prohibited, just as much as wine. I venture to say that to-day there are wines in Canada and elsewhere which contain no more percentage of alcohol than do hard ciders or fermented ciders. Therefore, I am satisfied that it is important and right that cider should be included, meaning the cider which is an intoxicating liquor.

Mr. BERGERON. That word "cider" in the question will surely make a great deal of difference in the vote.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think, with the explanation I have given, if it is read at all or understood at all, there can be no doubt about what this cider means: and if the people understand what they are prohibiting, those who are in favour of prohibition will be quite desirous of prohibiting that as well as "all other alcoholic liquors."

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) has not looked into this question very carefully or he would have seen that it is not because of the intoxicating effects of cider that it is included in the question, but because of the "knocking out" effects of cider.

Mr. POWELL. Since the Minister of Agriculture seems to be an authority on this matter, I would like to ask him if it is well known what percentage of alcohol must be in liquor in order to make it intoxicating ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. POWELL. It occurs to me that the question is put in this form for the purpose of defeating prohibition.

Mr. McCLEARY. What objection can there be to describing it in the question as "fermented cider" or "hard cider" ?

Mr. FOSTER. It would not be courtesy to my right hon. friend and his Government to allow so important a Bill to go to the second reading without at least giving an expression of opinion with reference to it. I am sorry that I was not in the House when my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) commenced his remarks, and I do not know just how much, or what important parts of his observations I have missed. Therefore, in the very few remarks that I am going to make on this matter, I shall have to deal with what I did hear the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) say. Every one will agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) that the Bill he has introduced is important, and for several reasons. It is important in the first place, because to a certain extent—I am not going to say just now to what extent—to a certain extent it voices the desire of a very large, a very respectable, and a very intelligent number of the electors of Canada—I had almost said a majority, but I do not wish to anticipate the vote which is to be taken upon the question. But certainly the observation I made will be agreed to by members on both sides of the House. I must limit that remark by this, that I do not think that this large and intelligent element of the people of the country who are in favour of temperance and prohibition have at all, of their own free choice, asked the submission of a plebiscite Bill to this House. That is, I do not think the Government, in introducing this Bill for the taking of a vote on the abstract principle of prohibition, are doing what the great majority of the temperance people of this country wished them to do. The temperance people of this country asked the Government to do something else and something more—something far more practical; but the hon. gentleman has voiced to-day the opinion and the action of this Government, in that they have simply decided to go so far as to submit the abstract principle to the vote of the electorate. The hon. gentleman said that at the present time he did not consider that it was necessary to go into a discussion of the principle of prohibition. He said that was relegated to the campaign which would take place upon this Bill, if it became law, and that possibly it would be in order later, when the results of that campaign were consummated, to have the question again brought before this House. That probably gives a clue to the action of the Government as a matter of policy. They did not wish to commit themselves on the question of prohibition, and so they chose a non-committal policy in order to avoid that very difficult point, which was to make the policy of the Government known, not upon an abstract question, but upon a concrete question. And so my hon. friend to-day deprecates a discussion of the principle of prohibition or the applicability of the principle of prohibition to the conditions of this country. Well, I think that every discussion should come upon its proper and germane matter; and I agree with my hon. friend that if to-day we are simply to take into consideration whether we shall give the electorate of this country an opportunity to answer yes or no upon an abstract principle, it probably is going wide of the field if we undertake to discuss the whole question of prohibition and its applicability to this country. But I want to point out another thing: I hinted at it when the hon. gentleman introduced his Bill. It is, to speak in a careful and candid way, simply a matter of little moment, a matter which does not possess a very great element of interest, if the Government are not prepared to follow out what, if it has any justification at all, is simply the first step in a plan which requires a second step. What I wanted to say to my hon. friend was this, that I believed his remarks did not go far enough to satisfy this House or far enough to satisfy the temperance people of this country; because he omitted all allusion to this point, namely: provided the step now taken results in approval by the electorate at large of the abstract principle of prohibition, whether my hon. friend and the Government which he represents are prepared to take the second step, and translate the will of the people into a prohibitory law, to be introduced into this House, and to stand or fall by that measure. Unless the Government are prepared to take the second step, it is altogether foolish to take the first step, and a costly proceeding as well. I put the question to my hon. friend, how much he thought the cost of polling the vote would be; and my hon. friend answered me that it would cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $250,000. He is asking Parliament to take a vote upon an abstract question, which will cost $250,000 of the people's money; and I hold that we have no business to do that unless the Government are prepared and Parliament is prepared, if the vote is in the affirmative, to take up the question, and translate the will of the people into a stern, strong prohibitory law. I think the country has a right to ask the Government, and to get a straight, frank answer from them to the question: "If we take up this Bill and vote upon the question which you submit to us, and a majority of the total electorate of this country not divided into provinces, vote in favour of the principle of prohibition, will you as a Government be prepared to introduce a Bill in accordance with that vote, and push it to a conclusion"? Otherwise, we are legislating to little purpose—to less purpose than the provinces legislated in a like direction within the last five years; for there is to-day a different aspect to this matter from what there was ten years ago. During the last five or six years we have had plebiscite votes in four or five different provinces of the Dominion, and these votes have resulted in most cases in the affirmative, with sweeping majorities. That shows, with reference to the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Manitoba, and I think we may say the same with reference to the North-west Territories, that the Government and the country will know no more after this vote is taken, with reference to the sentiment of the electorate in these provinces and territories, than they know to-day, namely, that a majority are in favour of the principle of prohibition. What may take place in the province of British Columbia, I do not know; what may take place in the province of Quebec, I do not know. I only hear it stated by gentlemen who come from the province of Quebec that that province will not vote in the affirmative on this question—that the people's vote in the province of Quebec is so overwhelmingly on the no side of this question that it may wipe out the overwhelmingly large vote on the yes side in these other provinces. Unless that can be predicated—and I doubt whether it can be or will be attempted to be predicated here—what better position will the Government be in after the vote than it is to-day? Or is the Government going to take the position—and we should like to be enlightened on that point as well—that unless there is a majority in every province in the Dominion in the affirmative, it will not consider that it has a mandate from the electorate of this country to introduce a prohibition Bill and carry it out into law? My hon. friend was entirely silent on that point, but that is a question which is asked in this House and in the country, and which ought to be answered or else after this vote is taken, after the plebiscite has been acted upon, the subject will not be advanced to a settlement one single step. I do trust that before we get through with this debate, we shall have a frank and clear statement on this point. Is it to be considered that the decision of the majority of the total electorate, if given in the affirmative, will constitute a mandate to this Government sufficiently clear to demand for the people of Canada a prohibitory law? That is a question which ought to be answered before this Bill is passed and the people are called upon to go to the trouble of a canvass and a vote.

I put strongly the next point, that if this Bill is passed and the people called on to vote, they should know, and this House should know, whether this is but the initial step that the Government is taking and that if the majority of the electorate vote in favour of prohibition the Government will then translate their wishes into a prohibitory Bill to be submitted and pushed by the Government through this House with the majority at their back. These are two important questions which should now be determined.

As to the form of the question, a very legitimate curiosity has been excited. For a number of months this curiosity has been whetted in the country—a curiosity which has not simply arisen from the desire of the people for knowledge, but which has been piqued and goaded somewhat by the diversity of opinion expressed and the diversity of stand taken by the Government itself, or if not by the Government itself, by very important members of it, from the right hon. leader of the Government down to less important but still influential members of the Cabinet. It was said for a long time that the temperance people were a little dubious as to whether they should have a vote on the simple question: "Are you in favour of prohibition or not?" There were certain utterances of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government and the Finance Minister in a certain conference which took place, which, like some of the utterances of judges and the law lords, when a case is being argued before them, would lead to the inference that it was not the simple, naked question of prohibition—yes or no—that was to be put before the people, but that the whole case was to be put before them as to what prohibition really entailed. Then, the hon. and gallant knight who sits opposite to me, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), took a notion at one time to write a letter for the purpose of enlightening one of his own constituents, and through his own constituent the constituencies of the Dominion. I am prepared for a negative assertion on his part; but still I venture to make the statement that at the time that letter was written, he must have had the firm belief that the Government proposed to submit a double question to the electorate and not a single one. I have not the letter before me, but every hon. member who has read it knows that the plain inference to be drawn from it, and the impression created by it, was that 't was impossible to submit the question in the shape the temperance people wanted it submitted, namely, the simple question: "Are you in favour of prohibition or are you not?" but that along with that question other questions were also to be submitted, whether they were prepared to take the consequences, whether they were prepared to submit to the extra taxation necessary in order to raise the revenues which would require to be raised in case prohibition should be carried. That letter was explicit. How could the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries have indicted it and sent it out to the public at that particular time unless the Cabinet had then pretty well come to the decision that it was not going to submit the single question, but was going to put the double question. My hon. friend does not deny my statement, and I hope he will endeavour to show his consistency now. But very few weeks have elapsed since he wrote that letter, and if he speaks in the course of this debate, he should explain why the Government have decided to put the simple question before the people, not encumbered with other issues, and to credit the temperance and other people with intelligence enough to consider the matter in all its aspects, and to know, when they vote, quite well what the consequences of their decision will be. My hon. friend has experienced a change of heart. Why? The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill must have laboured earnestly with him, and his arguments appear to have been strong enough to convince my hon. friend. Or was it the fear of certain votes in the tight little island of Prince Edward that made him think that after all it was probably best to cater to the temperance people in this respect, and that, in some way or other, the end which he desired to be brought about would be brought about in a different way.

Then, there is another element in the Government. There is the Minister of Justice (Senator Mills) who has charge of the legal conscience of the Cabinet, and who absolves the different heads of the different departments of the Government, so far as he consistently can, by giving the opinion that whatever they do is legally just and right. The Minister of Justice has very strong opinions upon this question of prohibition—opinions, abstract and concrete, as to what should and what should not be put before the people; and having arrived at a somewhat mature age, he is not as changeable as is the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and not as liable to a change of opinion. Convictions he has from long years of study, and when once he has reached convictions, he, at his mature years, does not change them. What did Senator Mills say at one time, with reference to this matter? Not long ago, when asked the question—and you will find it in a letter to the "Globe"—"Are you in favour of the abstract question, 'yes or no'?" he replied:

I am not; I am very much opposed to it. The honest thing to do is to put the whole matter before the people.

And I have no doubt that three weeks ago, just about the time my hon. friend (Sir Louis Davies) indicted that letter to his constituents—the Government had determined to do what Senator Mills called the honest thing, namely, put the whole question before the people, or both sides of the case, so to speak. The now Minister of Justice went on to say :

Of course I do not know what action the Government and Parliament will adopt, but, in my opinion, the measure that is to give effect to the decision of the public, in case prohibition carries, ought to be the measure on which the vote is taken.

Unless the Minister of Justice (Senator Mills) has changed his opinion entirely, he believes that this abstract principle is not the proper one to submit to the people, but that the honest thing to do is to submit the whole question, so that the people may know what they are voting upon. I can understand the Minister of Justice saying that the people may vote on this abstract question, and vote in favour of prohibition, and then that all they will have done will be to affirm the principle, and that the question will not be solved, except through the long and tedious way of a vote at the general election, when that comes round, in connection with all other controverted questions. He said :

The Ministers must decide upon how they will meet the loss of revenue that will be caused by the adoption of prohibition, and the creditors of Canada are entitled to know how the $7,500,000 of the revenue that will be wiped out by prohibition is to be made up.

I think that is a proposition the Government should have met, and I have no doubt that before they committed themselves to this Bill they had before them the result, which, if they are honest and sincere, must eventually follow if there is a majority in favour of a prohibition measure. And it would have been instructive if my hon. friend who introduced this Bill had told how, in the event of that measure being required—and I know that he thinks will be required, because he believes that the prohibition vote will be carried by a large majority—they will meet the deficiencies in the revenue. If a clear and definite statement, showing how easily this loss might be made up, had been given this afternoon by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, what an argument it would have been for the temperance people in the coming campaign—to have been able to quote the utterance of Ministers to the effect that if we vote yea and prohibition becomes an established fact, the matter of revenue may be arranged in this way or in that way quite satisfactorily to the country. Will the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), before this debate is finished, satisfy the laudable curiosity of this House and the country on that point? And, as in the course of his Budget speech, he took occasion, incidentally, to throw out a very strong argument against the plebiscite on prohibition by detailing the amount that would be lost to the revenue by prohibition in case the majority voted in favour of it, cannot he now administer the antidote and give his views to the House and the temperance people of the country as to how he, as Finance Minister, if called upon, will be able to make up that deficiency. And how, if the deficiency is made up, it will be to the benefit of this country, not morally only, but in every other sense, that the vote should pass and a Bill founded upon it should become law. So the Hon. Mr. Mills felt three or four months ago. How he feels now, I do not know. He goes on :

There should be a well-considered Bill prepared, and the vote should be taken upon it.

But the vote is not to be taken upon a Bill. Mr. Mills, as Mr. Mills, is of one opinion, but Mr. Mills as the Minister of Justice, as a member of the Cabinet, can, it seems, subordinate his opinion, as a Minister has to do, to the general opinion of the Cabinet. But that subordination measures either the strength of the opinion or the complaisance of the man held or not.

The question is not whether the public favour prohibition in the abstract. It is whether they are really honestly to carry it out in the concrete. The abstract position does not mean anything, and it will be wholly delusive to submit it, because it will not be indicative of the will of the people.

That is a very strong utterance from the Minister of Justice. Now, I will not follow it up with the opinions of other members of the Cabinet who have spoken on this question; suffice it to say that these different opinions expressed have excited curiosity to a greater degree than would otherwise have been the case, as to how this question was to be put. I congratulate my hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Government upon having at least the good sense to submit this question plainly upon the issue of prohibition, yes or no, as the temperance people understood it, as the leader of the Government, if he knew what the opinion of the temperance people of this country was, must have known they understood it, and, consequently, in accordance with what was the pledge that actually passed between them. I hold that anything else would have been a violation of the pledge, which was well understood as between the Government and the temperance people of this country.

Well, Sir, my hon. friend stated that there was some disappointment last year that the Bill was not introduced. There was. And the disappointment was well founded, and the excuse given for it—if I may be allowed to say so—was as lame an excuse as was ever given in this Parliament. And what was the excuse given? The excuse given last year was that the Prime Minister was not in his seat and this important legislation could not be gone on with. But the Prime Minister was not in his seat when the most important legislation we had in this Parliament last year was introduced by his Ministers and carried through the House in the latter part of the session. That excuse is not a valid excuse. It helped to put off the question for a little time, and the temperance people have been thinking seriously during the past whether there was to be a proposition to put off this vote to some future period. And, just on that point, let me ask the attention of the hon. gentleman who introduced this measure to a suspicion to which he has appeared to give some foundation, that there was hidden in this measure a probable further postponement of the taking of the vote on prohibition. In this way: I find a very peculiar clause in this Bill, to the effect that the regulations to be made for taking this vote, without which the vote cannot be taken, shall be such as are set forth in what is known as the Dominion Elections Act and the North-west Territories Representation Act and their amendments and the Franchise Act of 1898. Now, can any good reason be given—my hon. friend has not given it—why that peculiar wording should appear in this Bill? Would not every purpose have been fulfilled if, instead of saying "the Franchise Act of 1898" the Bill had said "the Franchise Act in force at the time the vote is taken"? This would have covered the case if the Franchise Act now under consideration becomes law, but it would not have baulked the measure as this Bill will be if by any manner of means the Franchise Act does not become law. That is why I say to my hon. friend that in the opinion of many people he is harnessing two issues which ought not to be harnessed together. Everybody knows that the Franchise Bill is to a large extent a party measure, everybody knows that the Plebiscite Bill is to no extent a party measure. Adherents and opponents of the Plebiscite Bill are to be found on both sides of the House. But the Franchise Bill of 1898 has its adherents on one side and its opponents on the other—that is to say, it is a party measure. Why did my hon. friend think it well to risk the plebiscite on the chance of a vote on a partisan measure, on the party question whether the Franchise Bill should become law or not. And if the Government should give up their Bill, as they may be induced to do, at the last moment, or if the Bill should be defeated, or if there should be an amendment made in it which the Government may take it into their heads not to assent to, then the foundation is taken away from the holding of this plebiscite vote, and it is deferred for another year or more. Again, I propose this pertinent question: Would it not have been better simply to have made the carrying out of this Plebiscite Bill depend upon the Franchise Act of the Dominion, rather than to make it depend upon a partisan measure which has not yet become law and which is still simply a Bill and not an Act? Now, my hon. friend who leads the Government was very eager to take cause of offence and challenged what he was pleased to call a threat when my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) pointed this out to him when the Bill was being read the first time. He wanted to know from my hon. friend if it was a threat that the Senate was going to throw out the Franchise Bill. That was unworthy of my right hon. friend, I do not think he will repeat that again in this House. No Government has a right to come down to this free Parliament and to take it for granted that every measure it brings down, by the very fact of its being brought down, is therefore tantamount to enactment, and that it will become a law. Such is not the spirit in which free Parliaments ought to be treated, and such is not the spirit in which this Parliament of Canada will consent to be treated. There are possibilities that may go to prevent that Act from ever becoming law. Is my hon. friend prepared to say that unless the present Franchise Bill is carried through, the temperance people of this country should not get a chance to vote on the plebiscite? If he is seeking for delay, if that is the arrangement by which another year of grace may be given then, he may have provided for it fully. But if he has had an eye simply to have a plebiscite poll, it seems to me that he had better change that clause, and put it, as I have said, the Franchise Act which, for the time being, or at the time of the vote being taken, may be law in this country. Again, my hon. friend was all indefiniteness on the point of the date for the taking of this vote. When we were listening with bated breath as to the date when this vote was to take place, the hon. gentleman simply defined it in this way: That it will take place at a time consistent with the other business interests of this country, and with the interests of the electorate of the country. Now, why cannot the Government tell us within some definite period when this vote will take place? Do they wish a vote of this importance to take place without thorough discussion in this country? They cannot, surely. Whichever side wins, and whatever the result may be, whether in favour of the prohibitionists or of the anti-prohibitionists, it is in the interest of this country and of its people that the most thorough possible canvass shall be carried on by both sides so that the people may, from one end of the country to the other, see every side of this question that is possible to be presented, and come to their conclusion on reasoned convictions. What notice is this Government going to give to the people that this vote is to be taken, and when it is to be taken? Simply the notice in an issue of the "Gazette," that six weeks from a certain day a vote will be taken? Surely not. Is it not fair to both sides in this great contest, which will sometime, if this is carried out, take place in this country, is it not fair that timely and stated notice should be given in order that the electorate may proceed to its task of discussing this question and preparing the minds of the people for the coming vote? Why cannot my friend do this in the interest of the whole country—telling us somewhat definitely when this vote will be taken? Will it be taken this summer, will it be taken this autumn, will it be taken in the winter or before? I think it is a duty that my hon. friend owes, not only to the temperance people but to the country as a whole, to give notice now, when this is being discussed before Parliament, of the probable date when this election will take place.

Now, I think I have made most of the criticisms that I have to make at present with reference to this matter. I propose to say a word or two as to my own personal position upon the question. So far as I am concerned, I may state to my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill, that it will not meet with any opposition from me. If the Government thinks it is worth the expense, I am quite willing that the whole electorate should have an opportunity to poll its vote on the abstract question. I again appeal to the Government to give the people this benefit in the contest which they are evoking, that they shall tell the people honestly and frankly whether it will be followed by consequent legislation if the vote is in the affirmative. Earnest people whose time is worth something, desire, when they fight a contest, to fight it upon issues which are somewhat definite at least, and if the Government were to state to-day that the object of this Bill was to give the people a chance to vote upon the abstract question without its being followed by consequent action if the vote was in the affirmative, I do not think you would arouse the electorate of this country in the least to a vote upon it. The country does not wish to play at voting or to play at canvassing. When people have taken the time, when they have spent an immense amount of energy and of money, which they will have to spend in the three or four months canvass of this question and a consequent vote, they want to know whether it is going to be followed by action if the temperance people, as they believe, are in the majority in this country, and vote in the affirmative. So I say that no opposition will be received on the principle of this vote from the temperance people on this side of the House. We consider it defective in these two points that I have stated: First, as to what the Government will consider a majority vote, whether of all the provinces, or whether of the total electorate as massed; or, whether of all the voters upon the list, or of the voters who simply come out to vote? What is their position upon the question of consequent action in the event of the majority of the electorate voting in the affirmative? I do not myself place, under present circumstances, very much stress or force upon the result of this vote in the Dominion of Canada. Suppose it goes to a vote, and suppose that a majority of the electorate vote in favour of the principle of prohibition as an abstract question, my own opinion is that, barring the educative effects of the canvass which will take place, we shall be in about the same position that we were before. To-day the temperance people know their strength in five provinces, and believe that they are fairly strong in two others. They will not know much more when this vote is taken, and when the result of the poll is totalled up. So that I do not see, outside of the educative effects of the campaign, very much good that is going to result. I would see much good that was going to result from it if we had the pledge of the Government that, if the affirmative carried, a Bill giving effect to that affirmative vote would be introduced and carried by the Government with all its force in this Parliament. I would have taken a position different from this ten, or twelve, or fifteen years ago. Why? Because at that period the opinions of the people of this country were an unknown quantity so far as this principle was concerned. Not a single plebiscite had been taken, and with the exception of the province of New Brunswick, in 1854, or 1855, there had never been a poll upon the question of prohibition. The only knowledge at that time was gathered from the different Scott Act contests which took place in some of the provinces of the Dominion, and the Dunkin Act contests which took place in some other provinces of the Dominion, contests which were not altogether satisfactory, even to the strongest temperance men. But, Sir, since that time, things have changed, as I have said, and you have had your provincial plebiscites in four or five provinces of the Dominion, and the relative strength of the parties is pretty well determined, almost as well as it will be by this Bill. To my mind, practically, we will not in this way put the temperance people in a much better position to come to this Parliament and ask for the legislation that they need, and to press for that legislation, so that this will be a much less useful measure than it would have been ten or fifteen years ago before this question was polled by general votes in the different provinces. I am not going to take up the general question of prohibition and its enactment in this country. I know that there are difficulties with reference to such a measure. If the Government undertake to say that they will introduce a prohibitory law, and if this Parliament undertakes to pass that prohibitory law, I do not shut my eyes to the facts of the case as they appear to me, that there are grave and serious difficulties still in the way of the march forward to that time which I think, most men would like to see, the time of complete sobriety in a great country like ours. Those difficulties are financial, they are racial, they are constitutional, they are of various kinds, and they have been set forth in every way; but the only one I wish to refer to to-day is the revenue difficulty. Everyone knows, every temperance man knows as well as others, that the moment you prohibit the sale or importation of intoxicating liquors you have to face a large fall in the revenues of the country. The Finance Minister knows that, as every man knows who has been Finance Minister, and every thinking man who has not been Finance Minister knows; that is a question of practical moment which the legislature has to face in the first place, and the electorate has to face in the second place. Do I consider that this presents a difficulty so great that the very effect of the statement ought to make prohibitionists pause and not call for a prohibitory law? I do not think so. As a temperance man, as a prohibitionist I am willing to pay my share of the taxes, either direct or indirect, that may be necessary to make up the revenue, and my belief is that if you could pass and enforce a strict prohibitory law and make it effective, greater progress and greater prosperity and a larger revenue would ultimately result. There is the difficulty of the enforcement of a prohibitory law which has to be looked at, and the Government and the Finance Minister have to face the question as to whether two things may not happen, namely, on the one hand, a loss of revenue, and on the other hand an inefficient enforcement of prohibition in the country. That is a practical difficulty, and you will have difference of opinion as to whether it will work out in experience according to theory. My belief is that if the people of the country by an overwhelming conviction want prohibition enforced, they can have it enforced as well as other laws are enforced in this country, that if they do not honestly and earnestly and by a very strong majority want it, they cannot have it as well enforced as old settled laws are enforced. But taking all these things into consideration, this is an age of progress, an age of advancing legislation, and legislation is attempted in all the great Parliaments of the world that would not have been thought of ten or fifteen years ago; and I am here to say that if the strong opinion of the majority of the electorate of Canada believe that prohibition would cure this evil, the existence of which they deplore, they have the right to press for a trial of their plan, and to have it tested honestly and fairly. We will never arrive at a decision in any other way. It will be an academic fight all the time until you try such a law under fair conditions, and once you have tried it under fair conditions you have made a fair experiment and you have arrived at a conclusion one way or the other. My position, therefore, is this: I am a prohibitionist, and I am going to vote for this resolution. With the limitation I have stated, it may do some good and cannot do so much harm; and I will hold the Government, so far as they are concerned, to the consequences of the first step, and if they give the people a chance to vote on the question and a majority of the electorate vote in favour of prohibition, I shall, so far as I am concerned, press the hon. Minister and his colleagues to show the honesty of their first step and to face the consequences of their action, and place upon the Statute-book of this country, as they can easily do with their strong and consistent majority behind them, a prohibitory law, which will ring out the knell of an evil which the temperance people of this country, myself among the number, have deplored for a long time, and deplore at the present moment. May I ask if some member of the Government will enlighten the House and the country on these practical points I have raised. There are three of them, and I need not re-iterate them.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Mr. Speaker, those who have just heard the speech of my hon. friend and who know his record in this House were not surprised that he was shocked and horrified at the simple idea that a man might possibly have an inconsistent record on this question of prohibition. If there is any inconsistency in regard to the record of any hon. member in this House, it cannot apply surely to the hon. gentleman. He has never changed, he always was consistent. He told us to-day that he had been a prohibitionist. I have heard the same declaration before from the hon. gentleman, but it is at least seven or eight years since I heard anything from him on this subject. The hon. gentleman is consistent, I must admit; his convictions were simply dormant, he has been slumbering, but though sleeping, he was always the same man, always an advocate of temperance but a silent advocate. But to-day my hon. friend has been aroused to his former enthusiasm in favour of the cause of prohibition. Do we not remember that in the early years of his parliamentary career hardly a session passed but he introduced in this House a resolution in favour of prohibition, asserting that according to his own convictions, at all events, the time had come when the Parliament of Canada should enact a prohibitory liquor law. But as time went on his enthusiasm diminished, until it disappeared for ever. How long is it since we heard the hon. gentleman speaking on the prohibition question? At least seven years. The last time we heard in any way from the lips of the hon. member anything on the question of prohibition was on the 24th June, 1891. And then did he speak in the same strain in which he had spoken before? Not at all. At that time he did not declare that the Parliament of Canada should enact a prohibitory law, but he simply stated that when he had spoken before, he did not know what he was talking about, that when he made statements in favour of a prohibitory law he had spoken in a moment of weakness; at that time he wanted to have more information than he had received on the subject. Five years before, in 1884-85-86, and so on and on, the hon. gentleman had stated to this House that the time had come for this Parliament to enact a prohibitory liquor law; but in 1891, having on his shoulders the responsibility of office, the hon. gentleman asked Parliament to appoint a commission on the question of the liquor traffic, to ascertain: "The effect of the liquor traffic upon all interests affected by it in Canada; the measures which have been adopted in this and other countries with a view to lessen, regulate or prohibit the traffic; the results of the measure in each case; the effect the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law in Canada would have in respect to social conditions, agriculture, business, industrial and commercial interests, of the revenue requirements of the municipalities, the provinces, and the Dominion, and also as to its capability of efficient enforcement."

My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) wanted to have information on all these different aspects of the question. He got his information. His commission was appointed, and if I remember aright it cost nearer $200,000 than $100,000 to enlighten the soul and the mind of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). But whether he was enlightened or not, we never knew up to this moment, when again he tells us that he is a prohibitionist and a temperance man. Well, Sir, if my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is a prohibitionist and a temperance man, I take it that he ought to be satisfied with the present Bill, which is, at least, a step in the direction he advocates. But my hon. friend is not satisfied with this Bill, which he tells us to-day is purely an academic measure which will be barren of results. Then, Sir, if my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is not satisfied with this Bill such as it is, if it does not go far enough for him, why, he and his friends have the remedy in their own hands. He can do what he has done before; if he and his friends who sit on that side of the House are not satisfied that we have gone as far as we could go on this question, it is open to them to do on this occasion what they did in the case of the Yukon Bill; they can vote against it and have it rejected. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will not do anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will be satisfied to stab the Bill if he can, but he will not oppose it directly. The hon. gentleman is quite satisfied to reap whatever political advantage he can on this question, as to which he says there should be no party division. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), notwithstanding this declaration is, however, quite prepared to take out of this measure—which, he says, ought not to be a party measure—whatever he can of party advantage by sowing the seeds of discord. He can do that, but when it comes to the point of opposing the Bill, which he says is imperfect, his courage issues out at the tip of his boots and he will not do it.

Sir, this Bill has been brought down in this form for good and obvious and certain reasons. I admit that the preparation of this Bill gave to the Government a good deal of anxiety. I am not above stating that it was a difficult question, and the Government had to deal with it knowing full well that no matter how they dealt with it they would be subject to the opposition of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. But, Sir, we were not scared by that. We prepared the best measure that could be prepared under existing circumstances, and we prepared that measure to be submitted to the people of Canada with one sole object in view, the object of obtaining, as far as could be obtained, the views and opinions of every individual elector in Canada, as these views and opinions exist in his own heart and conscience. That is the object of this Bill. We might have put a rider to it; yes, we might have added several riders to it.

When we came to the preparation of this Bill, we had representations made to us by those who favour prohibition; we had representations made to us by those who did not favour prohibition; we had representations made to us to add a rider such as my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) wants now, as to what shall be the immediate consequences should the vote be in the affirmative.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my right hon. friend allow me to ask him a question here? What does he mean by that, because it is well to be clear, when he speaks of a rider such as I wish to have added?

The PRIME MINISTER. I mean that there were representations made to us that we should put a rider stating that the Bill should come immediately into effect if there was an affirmative majority in favour of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Which Bill? This Bill will come into effect the moment it is passed.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, that is a very nice distinction, but it is too thin for practical effect. This Bill to take a vote will come into effect when it is passed, but what I meant to say was that there were those who wanted to insert a rider stating that prohibition would come into effect the moment there was an affirmative answer. There were those, on the other hand, who wanted to put a rider in another direction, so as to take the vote upon the consequences of prohibition itself and to place before the people that if prohibition were to become law the people should say whether or not they were prepared to submit to the consequences in the way of additional taxation. We would not submit either one class of rider or the other.

With reference to what shall be the effect of a prohibition law in the matter of the falling off in revenue, should such a law be enacted, that is a question which we thought it better to leave to the electors themselves to ponder over and to consider, and to state their judgment upon in the best way they thought fit. Of course, as has been said by my hon. friend, if this Bill should result in a prohibitory law, then it goes without saying that the Minister of Finance will have a very serious task before him in deciding as to the method of replacing the revenue which would be immediately cut off. We receive at the present time something like $7,000,000 in customs and excise duties from the liquor traffic. Should this Parliament pass a prohibitory liquor law, the Minister of Finance would at once have the serious task before him of finding other modes of taxation. It has been stated that if we were to pass a prohibitory liquor law, there should be additional taxation. I do not think the phrase is an apt one. There should not be additional taxation, because taxation has always to be governed by the necessities of the revenue, but there must be a displacement of taxation. The Minister of Finance will have to provide other sources of revenue. If the Minister of Finance has not the $7,000,000 which to-day flow to the treasury from the liquor traffic he will have to get it from other sources. He may have to get a revenue, for instance, from coffee, or from tea, or from sugar, or from tobacco, but there is this consideration which temperance people must keep in their minds; That the duties which can be placed upon these different articles in order to produce a revenue must be moderate, for if they go beyond a certain point they will not produce a revenue. Take the duty on tobacco under the present law. At the present time we have a law which gives us $7,000,000 a year from the liquor traffic, and if the Minister of Finance has to seek other sources of revenue he may put a duty on tea, on sugar, and on coffee, but he cannot put a single penny more duty on tobacco. If he were to put any heavier duty upon tobacco it is well known that it would not produce any revenue at all; indeed, it is a question whether or not the duties now levied on tobacco are not too high for the purposes of revenue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. This, therefore, shows the difficulties of the situation; difficulties which have been pointed out by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) himself. You can put taxation to a certain extent upon these commodities, but if you raise these taxes beyond a certain point they will cease to be productive of revenue, and therefore it is quite possible that we may have before us the necessity of direct taxation. But, Sir, these questions are to be left to the electors themselves to judge. We would not put them upon the ballot; we did not put them in the Bill; we left them for the consideration of the electors to be determined by their own judgment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

Now, Sir, this brings us to another consideration which has to be kept in mind by those who have to vote upon this question. Would prohibition prohibit? That is a question which the electors have also to consider. There are those amongst us who favour prohibition; there are those amongst us who do not favour prohibition, but whether we favour or whether we do not favour it, the question which the electors have to solve in their ballot is as to whether or not—let them be ever so ardent prohibitionists—whether or not a prohibitory liquor law would prohibit the liquor traffic. That is a question as to which there may be serious doubts. We have the fact that at the present time, tobacco which is moderately taxed, although somewhat highly, but after all moderately, yields practically no revenue because we know there is a considerable amount of smuggling done in that article. This is a consideration for the electors. As I said a moment ago, all these considerations might well have formed part of the question to be submitted to the electors; but we thought it better to leave the question unhampered by these considerations, so that every man would be free to give his vote on the simple question, according to his own judgment and conscience. I come to the other class of rider which has been suggested by my hon. friend, namely, that we should provide in this Bill that if there should be an affirmative majority, then, immediately and mechanically, prohibition would come into force.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has a perfect right to state his own views, but he certainly is not stating mine, as I stated them. All I ask is, that when the Government take the first step, which involves this expense and requires a contest, they will let the people know whether they will follow with the second step if the people will tell them to do so.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, I do not know whether I understood my hon. friend, or whether he was correct in his first statement or not. I do not care; I accept his present version. My hon. friend wants to have a declaration from the Government to this effect. I have often said, and I can only here repeat, that when the will of the people has been affirmed, as it will be affirmed one way or the other, then the Government—every Government—must be prepared to abide by the consequences.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I understand that my hon. friend, if he will permit me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend stated a moment ago that he would hold us to a strict account if there was a majority recorded in favour of prohibition. I accept the challenge and the notice of my hon. friend. He will hold us to a strict account, to bring in immediately a prohibitory liquor law. Well, all I have to say to my hon. friend is simply this, that before he does that he will have a little bill to settle with my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), because my hon. friend from Beauharnois will not second his motion or vote for such a law as that. My hon. friend need not be too previous. If he thinks we shall have our little troubles, he has his troubles on his own side. We would not put that rider in the Bill, simply because we wish to leave the people free to determine the question, and to dictate to the Government what should be their policy afterwards. I have only to say that if the Government should be recreant to the duty that will be imposed upon them by the people, my hon. friend will be there to remind the Government of it, and to abide by the will of the people.

Mr. FOSTER. For the sake of clearness—we want to know just where we stand. The hon. gentleman has said that whatever the will of the people is, he will carry it out. That is one version. I want to ask my hon. friend if that means that if there is an affirmative vote for the principle, my hon. friend will straightway, at the next session of Parliament, we will say, introduce a Bill to carry out the will of the people.

The PRIME MINISTER. It means nothing of the kind. It means that the Government, when they have the will of the people before them, will have to take such steps as will give effect to the will of the people. There is the question of revenue to be considered; there is also the question of compensation to be considered. There are different questions which will have to be considered.

Mr. FOSTER. The people consider them when they vote.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman stated a moment ago that there were difficulties in the way, constitutional and others. Sir, the game of my hon. friend is very plain, very obvious. We have already had evidence of it. He commences by saying that this Bill is not sincere—that it will not be followed by any action. If this Bill is not sincere, I can only say that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House will only be too glad to have a stab at the Government if they do not perform their duty. If this Bill is to be followed by serious action in due course, my hon. friend is not playing the part of a temperance man, which a moment ago he said he was, but is playing the part simply of a party man, the part of a Tory, when he seeks in advance to discount the effect of this Bill. But, Sir, I place myself and the Government in the judgment of the people of the country, those who are in favour of prohibition, and those who are not in favour of prohibition, and I ask them if the Government have not acted in this matter as sincerely and as honestly as it was possible for them to act. For, what is the task we have before us at the present time? I will not try to shield myself, as the hon. gentleman did on a former occasion. We introduce this Bill at the present time in the form in which it has been asked for by those who had a right to speak on this question, not the hon. gentleman; and those who have a right to speak on this question have expressed their satisfaction with it, so far as I know; and if they are satisfied with it, my hon. friend as a temperance man ought to abide by their decision. But there are two men in the hon. gentleman; there is the temperance man, a very small man, and the party man, a very big man. My hon. friend, in his attitude on this question, looking, not after the interests of temperance, but after the interests of his party, wants to know what we shall do and what we shall not do. He wants to discount the Bill; but the only thing the people of Canada are looking for at the present time is the opportunity to express their views on this question. This is a question that has been troubling the people for a very long time. I have sat in this Parliament for about twenty years, and I remember that in the very first year that I was here I heard this question mooted. At last we are taking a practical step—the first serious step that is to be taken if prohibition is to become law. At present the only thing we want is to have the honest expression of the people on this question; and we have provided for obtaining this expression by disentangling the question from every other consideration, and by asking every man who comes to the poll to say whether or not he is in favour of a prohibitory law. The hon. gentleman stated that there would be a certain majority in certain provinces and a certain majority in other provinces. All that remains to be seen. I do not know what the vote will be—I do not care. I simply claim this for the Government, that they have honestly redeemed the pledge they made to the people that they would endeavour to obtain, without favour to anybody, and without fear of any consequences, an honest expression of the opinion of the people on this important question.

Mr. OSLER. Mr. Speaker, this is apparently one of the questions on which most of the members of the House would like to say nothing. I have as strong views on this subject as the most ardent temperance man. I do not think you can put a country into greater turmoil or do greater damage than by introducing such a measure as the Government propose. This is one of the ante-election promises of the Government that I would have well forgiven them if they had broken, like so many of their other promises. Prohibitory laws have been a failure wherever they have been enacted. Failure is written in broad plain letters upon prohibition wherever it has been tried. It is bound to end in failure. It will create a demoralizing influence in the community and lead to perjury and deceit and a degraded moral sense, far worse than intemperance. Canada is progressing steadily and firmly on temperance principles. We are improving from day to day, and from year to year as a temperance people. We are improving in that respect without prohibition, without one part of the community taking another part by the throat and saying you shall not do this, but simply owing to the increasing moral sense and knowledge of the people that drinking to excess is wrong and vicious. Let us go on steadily, from year to year, improving as we are doing, and thus helping to solve this question in the only way it can be solved, by creating temperance living in the country. I believe that no greater calamity could befall Canada than an attempt to enforce a prohibitory law. Such a law cannot be enforced, as we know from experience everywhere. With regard to the point, whether the question submitted should be simply: "Are you in favour of prohibition, yes or no," I do not agree at all that it should be put in that shape. I think it is the duty of statesmen, when face to face with an important measure like this, to tell the people how they are going to provide for the loss of revenue which would be involved, in case the majority should vote in the affirmative. We are, I hope, a fair-minded British people, and yet it is proposed to do away with all the buildings and money and capital invested in enterprise which is now perfectly legal. Why, you cannot put this law into effect without compensating all those now engaged in the legitimate traffic, the manufacture and sale of liquor. You are stirring up strife among the people, you are taking a leap in the dark, and you are declaring that we should take a step which involves the loss of seven millions or eight millions of dollars of revenue and perhaps one hundred millions of dollars of capital, and you are about to do this simply on a chance vote "yes or no." I claim that the people should have before them, when voting on this question, all the consequences involved, and should be called upon to vote whether they are prepared to face these consequences. I firmly believe that the Government have not the slightest intention of ever putting prohibition into effect, even should the majority vote in the affirmative. They are simply trying to deceive the temperance people and catch their votes. If the people vote in the affirmative in Ontario and in the negative in Quebec, if they vote in the affirmative in Nova Scotia and in the negative in New Brunswick, do you mean to tell me that this Government is going to enforce prohibition on a community which has declared itself opposed to it? I do not wish to speak at any length on this Bill, but simply desire to put on record my opinion on the legislation now proposed and my strong belief that the Government are simply attempting unblushingly to delude and deceive the people.

Mr. SPROULE. I was somewhat amused at the line of argument taken by the right hon. leader of the Government. He steadily avoided any reference to the Bill whatever, but did, as he has often done in the past, lead away to other lines and scenes so as to show the people later on that he did not commit himself in anything he said on this measure. His first effort was not in defence of the Bill but an attempt to lead us away to ancient history by referring to the commission appointed to inquire into the whole question, including the amount of revenue we would have to raise by other means if a prohibitory law were passed. He took a good deal of time in commenting on the conduct of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) who is one of the parties that was instrumental in the appointing of that commission. Well, I shall only say with regard to that liquor commission that notwithstanding the fact that it cost a good deal of money to the country and that there was some time wasted in doing its work, it put on record a lot of valuable information which we can use to-day, in considering this most important issue. Although the amount expended was large, it was not, in my judgment, money altogether wasted. It seems to me that the right hon. leader of the Government was very much chagrined and disappointed because the Opposition did not oppose this Bill. He would have been very glad, evidently, if we had come out flat-footed in opposition to it and given him something to talk about. He floundered about for a long time, without saying anything about the Plebiscite Bill at all. That Bill is evidently an effort by the Government to carry out one of their promises to the people which they could not very well avoid, because the Government have staved off so long, on one excuse or another, action on this matter, that the forbearance of the temperance people ceased to be a virtue and the pressure became so great that they forced the Government to do something to redeem its pledge. I am not in favour of the principle of a referendum. I have always held that it is un-British and utterly opposed to British parliamentary usage. The heads of the various departments of the Government, or the Executive Government itself, are charged with the duty of governing the country, and are bound to be sufficiently well informed on the condition of things in the country to be able to decide whether special legislation is required on any subject, without asking a special vote of the people on that subject. The Government in 1878 might just as well, instead of introducing and carrying out the National Policy, which they had pledged themselves to enact, have referred that policy to the people for a special vote upon it, and asked them: Do you want it or not? and thus wasted two or three years ascertaining what the opinion of the people was. And they might have tried to hedge that question with considerations, which would have prevented a direct decision of the people's will with regard to it. They might equally have referred the question of the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the question of the deepening of the canals, or any other of these great questions, which a Government are supposed to deal with, to a special vote of the people. We have the right to expect in a British colony, where the Government of the country is based on the same principles as that of the mother country, that the executive for the time being will take the responsibility of saying what the country requires and providing legislation to carry that out, without asking the people, by means of a referendum, whether they want a certain thing or not. The referendum is not in harmony with our system of government.

The hon. gentleman, by one of the clauses in this Bill, in my judgment, will go a long way towards defeating the very object he is supposed to have in view. I do not know whether he is responsible for the Bill as now drafted, but whether cider has been included as one of the beverages that should be prohibited, on his own motion, or at the request of his colleagues, or of the temperance people, it is bound to defeat the purpose of this Bill. If it was his suggestion it shows how insincere the hon. gentleman and his colleagues must be in regard to this important measure, because there is no doubt a large number of people will vote in the negative for the very reason that cider is included as one of the beverages that will be prohibited. A great many who raise fruit and who sell it for that purpose, and who drink cider as one of the harmless beverages, will vote against the principle of prohibition so as not to interfere with them to make and use cider right, so that, whether intentionally or otherwise, the Bill is very much handicapped by having that beverage included in it.

Now he puts another restraint upon it, not in the form of a clause in the Bill but by telling what must happen if the vote is carried. He says that higher duties must be put on tea, on tobacco and on sugar, and so he virtually threatens what the result will be in an attempt to deter the people from carrying this vote. With regard to the wisdom of prohibition or otherwise, I will not go into that matter, because, in my opinion, it is not pertinent to the question before us. The Government are making an effort whether willingly or unwillingly to carry out one of the pledges made to the people, and I am not disposed to throw anything in the way of their doing so, because they seem reluctant enough to carry out their promises without any one on this side attempting to oppose them when they do make an effort.

Mr. CASEY. There is a consensus of opinion that the second reading of this Bill will be adopted without opposition, in which opinion I fully agree. This is a measure that was promised to the people by those who are now the Government during the last campaign. They are compelled to keep their promises and I, as a supporter of theirs and one who shared in their pledges, feel compelled to support the Bill on its second reading. But I cannot induce myself to do so without a few words on the subject of the principle involved. We do not seem to be aware that in adopting this Bill we are taking a very grave step in a new direction, a direction which is entirely new to our constitution. I will not say hostile, or even foreign in the bad sense, that is for us to decide. But we should realize what we are doing when we refer a question to a popular vote which should be decided within the walls of this House. I have in years past declared my opposition to that principle, and cannot now vote for a Bill involving it, without a protest that I do it, in consequence of a promise given and arrangements made over which I had no control. I do not refer to the action of the Government or members of the Government, but to the action of the convention of 1893, of which so much has been said. This plank in our platform was not adopted on that occasion as the result of calm deliberation, but it was adopted at the end of a very exciting session of a very large convention, and its adoption, Sir, is a proof to my mind of the awkwardness and inadvisability of framing a party platform by means of a convention. The gentlemen who formed that convention were not all conversant with our constitution, they were there practically to adopt what was brought before them by a committee. This and other motions being so brought forward were adopted by the leaders of the party and the party generally. Now, I think there is no doubt that the members of this House should take the responsibility—should have taken it in the first instance—of saying whether they wanted prohibition or not. We have long had that question before us. It has been before this House ever since I became a member of it, and that is more years ago than I care to remember. But, though the question has been brought up from time to time it has invariably been shunted, and this is the first practical step that has been taken in the direction of ascertaining what the people think should be done, and it is for this reason, in addition to those I have given, that I am prepared to give this Bill, though in opposition to my judgment in its principle, my hearty support in its general features. It is time something was done to settle whether we are to have prohibition or not. This settled we may cease to waste the time and energy of the country discussing it without effect. If the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), a former apostle of prohibition in this House, does not believe in the principle of the Bill or in its provisions, why does he not now propose in amendment that this Bill be not read now a second time but that it be resolved that the time has come to pass a prohibitory Bill without reference to the people at all. If he would do so he would be consistent. But he is, as the right hon. Premier has said, simply trying to make capital against the Government, to damage their Bill and prevent its success as a means of ascertaining the opinion of the people.

Granting the principle of a popular vote on this question at all, I am compelled to range myself entirely with Hon. Mr. Mills in his opinion of how it ought to be done. The people should not be asked to vote for an abstract proposition but they should be asked to say whether some particular scheme of prohibition which is laid before them suits them or not. I need hardly enlarge on this point. Anybody who knows anything of the popular vote, knows that it is easy to get people to vote for an abstract proposition like free trade, or protection, or prohibition, or anything else, while you could not get them to agree, by the smallest majority upon some particular plan of carrying out the principle that might be adopted. The logical plan, therefore, would be to adopt the referendum rather than the plebiscite, to pass a Bill through this Parliament with the condition that it should not become law until it was carried by a certain specified majority of the people of the country. They are both foreign to our constitution, an hon. gentleman beside me says, yes, but of two foreign expedients, I would adopt the more reasonable and logical one. Therefore, I should prefer the submission of a Bill rather than the submission of an abstract proposition. In his criticism of the features of the Bill, there is no doubt, the hon. member for York had some reason to complain that the vote was only on an abstract proposition. But I am afraid that what reason and logic his remarks showed in that respect was at the expense of his prohibitionist friends who have forced this form of question upon the Government.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) will allow me, I do not think that he is right in saying that the prohibitionists or temperance people of Canada have forced this on the party or on the Government.

Mr. CASEY. It is, perhaps, going too far to say "forced," because we do not admit that this Government can have its hand forced on any question. But there is no doubt that the prohibitionists urged that upon the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. CASEY. I am afraid I must differ from my hon. friend (Mr. Foster). All the prohibitionists that I know are strong upon that point, and I know nearly all that are in this House. I know that they urged that the question should be put in that form as likely to be the one least embarrassing and least likely to divert the mind of the voters from the point at issue. They said: It is not fair to ask the voters a lot of outside questions; it is impossible to get the voters to agree upon any scheme of prohibition that you may draw up. I think that is so. But if the people cannot be got to agree upon any particular form of prohibition, it shows they are not ready for prohibition, and a vote upon such a Bill would give more enlightenment to the Government than a vote upon an abstract question. In fact there is no doubt that the question as it is to be put has been drawn exactly to suit the prohibition sentiment of the country.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I misunderstood my hon. friend, then. If my hon. friend meant to say that the form of this question suits the prohibitionists, then I agree with him. But what I understood him to say was that the plebiscite policy was forced on the Government by the temperance people.

Mr. CASEY. I do not say that, I said the form of the question was made to suit the prohibition sentiment of the country, and I think it was made to suit that sentiment without due consideration of the trustworthiness of the information to be obtained by the submission of that question. I hope that the Government will allow, without prejudice to their Bill, a free discussion of the question of the wording of that question in Committee of the Whole, when we get there, as we undoubtedly shall. It would add greatly to the public confidence in the measure if free discussion were had on this question, and I think it would add greatly to the usefulness of the Bill if more information was asked.

It is said that you should not submit arguments to the people on a ballot. I quite agree that you should not submit arguments to them, they will not read them. But we want information, or else this plebiscite is of no advantage. We want to know, not only whether the people are in favour of prohibition as an abstract idea, but whether they are willing to submit to the consequences of enforcing prohibition. One of those probable consequences will undoubtedly be direct taxation. You do not ask the people to vote for direct taxation; but if it is necessary, in order to have prohibition, to have direct taxation, you should ask them: are you willing to bear it? The Government should ask the people if it is found necessary, as a matter of fair-play, to compensate those whose business is destroyed by a prohibitory law: Are you willing to agree to that? In other words, will you agree to direct taxation or compensation, one or both of them, if prohibition is passed? There should be three distinct questions. You cannot get the information you want by a plain yes or no to one simple proposition. Then I think, if the question goes in this abstract form, it must certainly be distinctly understood by those who agree to the passage of this Bill, that the mere vote of a majority of those who attend the polls on that occasion shall not bind this House. My hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) has been trying to get a definite pledge from the Government. Well, it is quite open to the Government to pledge itself, and to say it will introduce the Bill if such and such a thing happens. But nobody can expect, not even the apostle of the prohibitionists can expect the House to pledge themselves, and to say that they will accept as conclusive a verdict given on an abstract question like that proposed to be asked under this Bill, which takes a verdict given of the difficulties and dangers surrounding it, and that they will bind themselves to pass such a prohibitory law as may be introduced. I certainly shall not forswear my independence and responsibility to that extent. Then, I consider that a vote, taken as this Bill proposes, will simply obtain the abstract opinion of those who vote upon the question. I think that will be very valuable information to be used for what it is worth as one of the elements to be taken into account when considering whether we shall have a prohibitory law. It is going to cost a good deal to get it, and I hope it will be very valuable. We all know that even when a concrete Act is submitted to the people, the vote is not an absolute index of their feelings in regard to it. In most parts of Ontario we have seen the Scott Act adopted by overwhelming majorities, enforced nominally for three years, and repealed by large majorities at the end of that time. We have noticed that during those three years the zeal of many who voted for the Scott Act evaporated with the mere act of casting their ballots, and that during the subsequent three years they were quite as ready to take advantage of a chance of getting a drink as others who had voted against the Scott Act. How much more would that be the case if a mere abstract proposition was submitted to the people. I speak in regard to the Scott Act from having personal information on that point. I regret to say that I was not altogether guiltless of violating the Scott Act myself while it was in operation in my county; and I had means of observation which, fortunately, for myself I do not now possess. I feel able to speak on this question with absolute impartiality, because I have tried both sides of it, the teetotal side and the other.

Mr. BERGERON. Which side do you like best?

Mr. CASEY. Well, I like the teetotal side best at the present time, and I am sticking to it. But that is quite apart from the question of how this vote should be submitted to the people of the country. I want to emphasize the fact that even a vote on a concrete measure like the Scott Act does not prove that those who voted for it will assist in having it carried out and made effective after it becomes the law of the country; and that therefore the value to be attached to a vote on an abstract question like this must be only such as each member of this House, in his individual capacity, sees fit to give to it. I shall support the second reading of the Bill, and I shall support the final passage of the Bill in such shape as it goes through the committee; but I urge the Government to allow full consideration in committee, without drawing party lines, on the points to which I have called their attention.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman having mentioned my name two or three times in connection with the discussion of this Bill, on a previous occasion and to-day, I wish to say one word to prevent the impression going abroad that I am not a temperance man because I oppose this Bill. I may say that in opposing it I am simply following out the position I have always taken on the question of prohibition during the twenty years that I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House. As has already been said, this question has been before Parliament at nearly every session since 1878, and I have always voted in the same way upon it, that is to say, that while wishing to see temperance promoted in this country, I do not approve of promoting it by the policy of prohibition. Sir, I think this Bill is very characteristic of the present Administration. They made promises before the elections, they fabricated a platform in 1893, full of promises, and they have broken every one of them so far. But now they think it is about time to fulfil one of their promises, and they have pitched upon this one. Why did they select this one?

Because it was the easiest to adopt. It is no sacrifice on their part at all, it will cost $300,000 or $400,000, probably, but it is the people's money, and therefore does not concern them. When the right hon. gentleman is asked what action his Government will take in case the electorate vote in favour of prohibition, he makes no answer. He speaks in a most eloquent way, he always does that, but he avoids answering questions. He chaffs my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) because of the position he formerly took on this prohibition question. My hon. friend from York might turn round and make the same remarks concerning some of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I think they are all sincere, but we have remarked that whenever these gentlemen were in power they began to modify their opinions. Take, for instance, my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), in whom I have entire confidence and whom I respect as one of the most interesting men in this House. That hon. gentleman has taken a very strong position on the liquor question ever since he has been in Parliament. I have always admired him for the position he has taken, because I think he is sincere. I am convinced that instead of voting for a plebiscite Bill, that hon. gentleman would much rather vote at once fairly and squarely in favour of immediate prohibition of the liquor traffic, thinking in his own conscience that the people of this country would be better off under prohibition than under the system which prevails to-day.

The hon. gentleman was obliged to modify his opinion and declare that he would support the measure of the present Administration and be willing to have the people declare whether they want this measure proposed. The Government wanted to keep one of their promises made to the people, and they have chosen this one. I asked the other day from the Government, and I expected an answer to be made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, whether any report had been made to any department of the Government by any law officer of the Crown whether a constitutional question is not involved, whether we are not here attempting to enact legislation that will prove useless after it has been passed at a large expenditure of the public money. I stated the other day, and I repeat it, that in the opinion of leading men in my province, in the opinion of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec, if this measure is carried, if the people of the six provinces declare they are in favour of a system of entire prohibition in Canada, such a measure cannot be forced on the people of Quebec or any other province not in favour of accepting prohibition. Where are we going to land? After we have brought this country into the turmoil of a general election, and the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) has stated to-day that we are going to do a great deal of harm in passing this Bill, this Parliament will probably be unable to put prohibition in force and the whole measure may be declared to be unconstitutional. It would then cost the Government nothing to simply say that they have adopted what measures they could, but the people would have been called upon to spend nearly half a million dollars to secure that result. It has also been declared by lawyers of prominence that the Parliament of Canada cannot prevent the manufacture of liquor in the different provinces, because this is a civil right. This Parliament can prevent the importation of liquor and it can deal with the liquor trade, but we cannot by Act of this Parliament prevent the manufacture of liquor in any of the provinces. When we have asked the people to prevent the importation and manufacture of liquor, and have found that we have worked to accomplish no result and that we cannot enforce the measure adopted, I hold we shall have been acting in a manner not worthy of this Parliament. If there is one thing more objectionable than another in this world it is hypocrisy. I want to go further, but I do not wish this remark to be considered personal to the present Administration. Every time this question has been before Parliament, the Government in power, in order to shield themselves, have acted in a manner that was not manly. Under the old Administration the Government had recourse to a commission which perambulated through the country and took testimony. We knew in advance what the evidence would amount to. They brought in a majority report to show that prohibition was not in the interest of the country, but that commission cost, if my memory serves me, over $100,000. Whatever the expenditure may have been, and we will not quarrel over the figures, whether it was $80,000 or $100,000, the money was spent without achieving any result whatever. This Government announces that it has promised the country to have a plebiscite or a referendum, and it must hold to its promise. I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite came into power on that issue, and I believe the people had not this question in their minds at the time of the general elections, or at all events very few of them thought of it. We are now going to spend a large sum of money upon it, and the action of the Government reminds me of the saying of a great politician, who said that it was very important to give the people of the country something to play with in order to keep them busy. The leader of the Government proposes to keep the people busy with this question up to September and then go through the turmoil of an election. The right hon. leader of the Government has not yet answered the question whether, if the people of Canada by a majority give an affirmative answer when the vote is taken on the plebiscite, the Government will bring down a measure to establish and enforce prohibition. Until the Prime Minister makes this statement and the Government give their pledge, the whole of this action in regard to the plebiscite is nothing more than a huge farce, and it will prove a very costly one, too.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, on a division.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you, Mr. Speaker, hold that the Bill has been read a second time on a party division?

Mr. SPEAKER. It means that the vote is not unanimous, and any one hon. member, I suppose, can prevent it being unanimous without the yeas and nays being taken.

Mr. DAVIN. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I may say that if the second reading had been carried, as I understood it would be carried, unanimously, I would not have spoken at all—

Mr. SPEAKER. The House has decided that it go into committee now. It is moved by Mr. Fisher, seconded by Mr. Sifton, that I do now leave the Chair.

Mr. FOSTER. Six o'clock.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will five minutes do?

Mr. DAVIN. Five minutes will not do.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

Mr. DAVIN. A considerable number of my constituents take a deep interest in the question of prohibition, and whenever the question has been asked me as to what my position in regard to prohibition was, I have always replied, that to this extent I was a prohibitionist: that I was in favour of prohibition, and the only thing in which I differed from a prohibitionist was, that I did not think it feasible. Now, Sir, this question has been bandied about the country so long and it has been so falsely played with, that even if the Government only brings in a plebiscite Bill I am ready to vote for it with a view of seeing the question as it were rounded down to a final issue. But, Mr. Speaker, it is, as you, an old parliamentarian, must feel, a melancholy thing to find a Government, powerful at least in its majority, bringing in a Bill of this kind, which is the sign and symbol of the dethronement of Parliament, which is the abandonment by this Parliament of its functions, and which is a shirking by the Government of Canada of its responsibilities. It is a continuance, Mr. Speaker, of what we have seen in regard to other measures, a continuance of the policy of skulking. We have had an extraordinary spectacle here this afternoon, and it is not desirable that the House should go into committee until it is remarked on and the attention of the people called to it. Here is a Bill brought into this House that is an innovation of the British constitution, and the Minister who introduced it never gave a reason why it was necessary to resort to this innovation. He contented himself with giving us some ancient history in regard to this question in Parliament and out of Parliament, since first it came up in Canada. Then we had a speech from the Prime Minister, and what did he do? He, supposed to be a disciple of Edmund Burke, he, supposed to have sat at the feet of English constitutionalists, what did he do? When this innovating measure was introduced by one of his colleagues, he got up and criticised the conduct of the ex-Minister of Finance. Sir, we are not concerned, nor is the public of Canada concerned with the past history of the ex-Minister of Finance upon this question. What we are concerned with now is the conduct of the Government and its supporters with reference to it. The feeling throughout the country, that the Government in regard to prohibition is insincere, and the feeling that in the political character of the Prime Minister there is a lode and vein and mine of inexhaustible insincerity; that feeling will be intensified by the course taken by the right hon. gentleman this afternoon. When the Prime Minister taunted the ex-Minister of Finance with inconsistency, I could not help thinking of the utterances of the right hon. gentleman not quite twelve months ago, for it is not quite twelve months since a deputation of gentlemen interested in the manufacture and sale of liquor waited upon the Prime Minister, and this is what he said to them at that time. I quote from the "Globe" of May 14th, 1897:

Mr. Haverson had objected to the naked question going to the people, that it should not be—

I ask the attention of the House to these words of the Prime Minister:

—that it should not be a mere academic question, but should be a practical one, so that the people could give a practical answer as well.

Later on in the same speech the Prime Minister said:

The revenue was the really important point, and was a very serious consideration to the Ministry, and to the Minister of Finance especially. If prohibition were applied, revenue to the amount of $8,000,000 would be wiped out at once, and would have to be made up in some other way. What source of revenue was there that had not been adopted already? Direct taxation was the only source open. It was not the policy of the Government to advance the duties on customs, but rather to restrict them. If it were possible for any one to point out any other way than direct taxation he would like to know it. The people who favour prohibition said the country was ready for it, even if it meant direct taxation. He believed they were honest, and that they were prepared to undertake the burden of direct taxation, but whether the rest of the people were prepared for that remains to be seen.

What impression did that language make upon those who read and heard it at the time? The impression was that when this question was put to the people there would also be a question that would make it, according to the words of the right hon. gentleman, a practical one. That was the impression given to the writer in the "Templar," who characterized the words of the right hon. gentleman, then the Hon. Mr. Laurier, in this way:

Mr. Laurier's reply must be very disappointing to all who expected the promised plebiscite as an honest effort to promote temperance reform or to solve the drink problem. Undoubtedly thousands of sincere friends of the cause believed that the plebiscite policy was prompted by a desire to further the interest of temperance and to ascertain whether or not public sentiment was ripe for temperance legislation.

And the "Templar" goes on to assail the Prime Minister for the answer then given by him. The reason I refer to that is, because there is nothing to show in the speech delivered by the Prime Minister this afternoon that he has changed his opinion, that he considers that this question he is putting is an academic one, or that the question to be put is a practical one. There is nothing to show that he does not still hold that the question that will be put to the people under this Bill is a non-practical one, and so far we have no guarantee whatever, if there should be a majority in favour of prohibition, as to the further action of the right hon. gentleman and of his Government. He was asked at that time what majority should be given in order to enable the Government to act upon the verdict of the people; and what was his answer? He said fifty per cent at least of a majority, whatever that meant—whether it was fifty per cent of the whole or fifty per cent of the majority. I say, therefore, that the hon. Minister in not explaining what he would do, or in not giving us any information as to whether he abandoned his proposition of twelve months ago, leaves us to infer that the Government are merely placing before the people a scheme that is intended to play with the prohibitionists, as they have been already played with many a time and oft.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were two questions which the hon. gentleman was bound to answer, to himself, to this Parliament and to the people of Canada, before he introduced this Bill. One of these questions was this: what is our constitutional position in regard to legislating on this question? Because, if the doubt that has been raised, inside of this House and outside of this House, as to our power to prohibit the manufacture of liquor, has anything in it, then, after going to the expense of a plebiscite, and learning what the people want, we may see this Government turning round and saying to the people, "We have gone to the trouble of getting your verdict, and now that we have got it we really do not know what to do, because we do not know what jurisdiction we have." We must remember that up to a short time ago there was a member of that Government who had played hide and seek with the people of Ontario in regard to this very question; we must remember that there is another member of that Government who treated the people of Nova Scotia in a similar manner; we must remember that Mr. Greenway, another Liberal Premier, treated the people of Manitoba in that way also; and are we to see the converse of the thimble-rigging in regard to this question that took place in these provinces, perpetrated by this Dominion Government? And, as the provincial governments told the people, after putting them to the expense of a plebiscite, "We can do nothing, because the judicial decisions show that the responsibility and the authority are in Ottawa." are we now to find the Government of the Dominion turning round, after they had got a majority for prohibition, and saying, "We find that we cannot prohibit, and you must go back to the provincial assemblies and the provincial governments once again." That this is not a mere theory of mine, I want to read the language of the present Minister of Justice. I am not going to read the letter which the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) read in his able speech this afternoon. I am going to read another letter written by the present Attorney General of Canada, who was properly described by the hon. member for York as the keeper of the conscience of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. In response to a question asked by a Liberal Premier as to where the authority for dealing with this question lay, Mr. Mills, no farther back than April 7, 1898, wrote as follows:—

Office of the Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, 7th April, 1898.

Dear Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th of March, and in reply beg to say that the regulations to which you refer are all within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature to legislate in the direction which you indicate, as far as they think it in the public interest to go, to the extent of total prohibition. There is nothing to prevent any province prohibiting the sale of intoxicants for consumption as a beverage within the limits of the province, if so disposed.

Yours truly,

DAVID MILLS.

It is plain that the authority cannot inhere in the two bodies. If it is in the provincial legislatures, it cannot be here; and if it is here, it cannot be in the provincial legislatures. But we have the Minister of Justice giving his high authority to the statement that it inheres in the provincial legislatures. Of course, there is the chance that these hon. gentlemen are going on. There is the speech of the Prime Minister twelve months ago, which of course will be placarded by the liquor men, very properly too, all over Canada, in which he says that eight million dollars will be lost if this policy is carried out, in which he says that it is not the policy of his Government to impose more taxes, in which he says that direct taxation will have to be resorted to. I admit that hon. gentlemen have a chance that there may be a majority against prohibition. But what we may have to confront is this, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) to-day. Suppose you get a clear majority of the electorate throughout the entire Dominion, and yet one large province, say Quebec, gives a majority against the measure. We had the dictum recently laid down in this House in regard to another question by the Prime Minister himself—I speak of the franchise—that it is the provincial view that is to prevail in these matters. With that principle before them, hon. gentlemen opposite will turn round and say, "It is true, we got a majority of the Dominion electorate in favour of the measure, but there is an adverse majority in one of the provinces, and therefore we cannot act." There is another thing necessary in order to place this matter honestly before the people, and it is this. If you get a clear majority of the electorate to answer in the affirmative, what will be the size of the majority that will satisfy you? If you get a majority of the whole Dominion, and there is an adverse majority in one of the provinces, will that make you pause? That the prohibitionists are fully aware that they are being hoodwinked, I want to call attention to what a leading prohibitionist, the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, says on the subject of plebiscites :

I am not one of the men who worship the plebiscite. I believe it is the duty of the Dominion Parliament to pass a prohibitory law without the preliminary of a plebiscite.

Of course, that is not only the opinion of a clergyman speaking on this question as a clear matter of duty, but it is the opinion of statesmanship—that if a question is to be dealt with in this House, the Government of the day should take the responsibility of dealing with it. He goes on :

What has the plebiscite done in Ontario, Manitoba and those other provinces? It has deduced the public sentiment of the provinces, for which I am glad, and the coming Dominion plebiscite will give a magnificent view of public opinion, but will the Dominion Government follow its provincial precedents and ignore the issue?

So that not merely to me has it occurred, but it has also occurred to a leading clergyman and prohibitionist, that this Government may do the very thing that was done elsewhere. He continues :

What has the Government at Ottawa done in response to the popular opinion that has been put before it? It is true it has abolished the bar-room of the House of Commons. The Senate, however, could not see its way clear to follow suit—that was going a little too far, in senatorial estimation. The Government also appointed a Royal Commission, but four out of the five persons appointed were known to the Government to be opposed to prohibition previous to their appointment. And what has resulted from this famous commission, but the useless expenditure of an immense sum of money? In the matter of legislation we have not advanced a single step.

It may be remarked that resorting to this plebiscite is resorting to the same kind of action that the right hon. Prime Minister condemned in the previous Government. That previous Government, I grant you, shirked responsibility by issuing a commission on the subject, and now you have this Government shirking responsibility by bringing in a Bill for a plebiscite. You have the same shirking of responsibility, and in this, as in other things, we have seen this Government, which is a Government of imitators, imitating its predecessors, not merely in policies that are useful and wise, but in their very mistakes. And what has resulted from this famous commission? In the matter of legislation, we have not advanced a single step, and there is not very much reason to believe that we shall advance under the present circumstances any further.

Now, Sir, I want to call the attention of the House to our real position in regard to legislation. We are not here as the mere delegates of constituencies. The delegate of a constituency, who does just what his constituency orders, does, generally speaking, merely what the leading wirepullers in that constituency require him to do. And in the case before us, what do we see? It has been painfully illustrated since the present Government came into power, more than ever before, that the Government has completely usurped the functions of the members of the House. The influence of each member of the House of Commons is reduced to zero, because the Government of the day insists on initiating all legislation and of repressing all initiative on the part of members. Such a thing as an independent member among the following of the Government seems to be now unknown, and the result is that the three or four most active members on the Treasury benches are those who control everything in this House and Parliament is self-effaced. I want to read to you the opinion of the great statesman, Mr. Burke, on what a representative should be. He had been condemned by the people of Liverpool for having voted in the House of Commons in advance of the views of statesmen and politicians, but the course he took is now the gospel of what is wise in legislation. He was condemned by the electors of Liverpool, and he proudly said to them :

Your representative owes you not his industry only, but his judgment, and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to his opinion. I maintained your interests against your opinions with a constancy that became him. I knew that you chose me to be a pillar of the state, and not a weathercock on the top of the edifice.

Sir, if that be true of a member of Parliament, how much more is it true of the man whom the people have placed at the head of the Government and the parliamentary head of the nation. We chose the right hon. gentleman to be a pillar of the state and not a mere weathercock, and certainly we did not choose him to present the spectacle he presented here to-day when he shirked from assuming all responsibility, skulked behind evasive utterances, and gave this Parliament to understand that he intended, in passing this Bill, to screen himself behind it and avoid all responsibility in regard to this great question of prohibition, although we have on record what his real opinions are and what impression those opinions made at the time on men competent to observe and deal with them and who were deeply interested in this question.

I have declared to you, Sir, the view I take with regard to this question. I am sorry to see it treated here as it is. I am told on pretty good authority—and it was not told to me in confidence—that in the recent caucus a gentleman declared that he was strongly in favour of prohibition, but that he was before all things a party man, and that the only thing to do was to yield to the people, and then that a hint should be given in various quarters to knife the measure. Sir, I have seen for fifteen years in this House men interesting themselves outside in a very active way in this question, and then playing hide-and-go-seek with it in this House, allowing their position as party men and their strong allegiance to party to dominate their allegiance to the Dominion Alliance and the prohibitionists. And we have, on the other side of the House now, an hon. gentleman who is the head and front of the representatives in this House of the Dominion Alliance, and who, when the party to which he belonged was in Opposition, spoke in the strongest manner in favour of the proposition, but who now sits there silently when he ought to be the very first to come forward and demand of his leader that he at least should say this, that if, when this Bill is passed and the plebiscite put in action, the verdict of the country is in favour of prohibition, then the Government of Canada will bring forward legislation to carry out the will of the people. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) asked the right hon. gentleman if he would do that, and what did the right hon. gentleman reply. He did what, I grant you, he is a master in doing, he used language that reminded me of the greasing of an eel, and the more you try to lay hold of a greased eel the more it slips from your fingers. The right hon. gentleman is a master of dubious expression and a great coiner of sentences with nothing in them. It is not merely that when the people ask for bread he gives them a stone. He does not give them anything so substantial, but gives them an airy nothing, without either local habitation or name in thought or fact. That is the sort of language he uses with regard to everything, and I was sorry to see him take the position he did to-night, because when he was leading the Opposition there was no man in this House who felt a greater regard for the right hon. gentleman than I did; but no sooner did he become weighted with power and responsibility than he flung to the winds the reputation that for fifteen or twenty years he had been building up, and in the short space of twenty-two months—although we all still feel for his gracious and kindly character much of the regard we once felt—he has dispelled all regard we ever had for his honesty of purpose. From Halifax to Vancouver his utterances on every question have been so contradictory and dubious that you can hardly find one man, the least instructed in past events, who would put the slightest faith on any political statement or programme or comment of the right hon. gentleman. I am sorry for that, and I am sorry, in the face of such a serious question as prohibition, in which many of the most earnest people of the country take so deep an interest—people who are the backbone of its moral and business and intellectual character—to see the Government unwilling to assume even the responsibility of stating that if the measure they themselves have introduced should eventuate in a given way, they would be ready to take the responsibility of action, which one would think would be mechanically—not to speak morally—forced upon them by such verdict.

Motion agreed to, and the House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 5,

The persons entitled to vote shall be all persons who would be entitled to vote at a Dominion election the day of nomination for which was the day appointed for the voting.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the attention of the House ought to be called to one of the bad features of the Franchise Act as it has been practically adopted by the House. The vote will be taken through the whole Dominion, and I suppose the subsequent course of the Government will be dictated by the majority vote. But attention should be drawn to the fact that the vote, in comparison to the population must be much larger under the proposed franchise arrangement in some provinces than in others, which not only shows a weak feature of the Franchise Act, but must give an unfair advantage to one side or other with regard to this question.

Mr. DAVIN. I think this clause should be amended so as to enable that class of the community to vote who are most interested. The women of Canada should be allowed to vote on a question like this. It is simply a pedantic adherence to symmetry on the part of the Government that causes them to shrink from including among those entitled to vote on this question the ladies in every constituency in Canada who take an interest in public questions generally, and above all in this question. What body has had the greatest effect not only in Canada, but all over this continent, in spreading temperance views, in circulating temperance literature and creating a sentiment in favour of temperance, but the Women's Christian Temperance Union. That great body includes in its membership some of the most distinguished women in Christendom and we ought to give a vote to those ladies who, in every constituency, exercised such a powerful influence—

Mr. TAYLOR. Particularly property owners.

Mr. DAVIN. Particularly property owners. I do not see the Minister of Agriculture here. This is an extraordinary thing, and I have to comment upon it, as it shows the utter want of earnestness of the Government in this measure. The Minister who introduced this Bill is actually not in his place.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). He is receiving the monster petition.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). From the very women the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) is talking about.

Mr. DAVIN. Then that excuses him. I hope he will come up laden with the petition. Do I understand from hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches that the Government of Canada is receiving, in one of the sacred edifices of the capital, this petition, and the Prime Minister is there too?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I hope there is no harm in that.

Mr. DAVIN. As to that, with the greatest possible reverence for the place where the petition is being presented and for those who are presenting it, I say that it would be more becoming for the Prime Minister and the Minister who has charge of the Bill to be here. They could easily have chosen another time for presenting that petition, when Parliament was not sitting. But that is another question. I move that this fifth section be amended so as to provide that all who are entitled to vote in municipal elections shall be entitled to vote on this question respecting prohibition.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). While the hon. member (Mr. Davin) is writing out his amendment, perhaps I may be allowed one observation with reference to the remark of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). I think that if my hon. friend who has charge of this Bill were here, he would point out to the hon. member for Haldimand that it would be more in accordance with the fitness of things that the same constituency which has the right to choose the representatives of the people in this House should also pass upon the question of prohibition. If I am right in assuming that, I should think also that any addition to the electoral lists for this purpose would be attended with rather serious results. It might happen that the larger constituency to which the hon. gentleman would appeal in this case would not come to the same conclusion as the constituencies which elect the members of this Parliament.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If my hon. friend (Mr. Blair) will permit me, I was not asking to have the constituency widened and any additional persons given the right to vote. But I wish to point out that this is a practical illustration of a very peculiar and at the same time a very unjust feature of the present franchise system, or the system about to be adopted. The point I made was this, that whereas in some of the provinces there was manhood franchise, and consequently every one of the full age of twenty-one years, and a British subject, could vote, in an adjoining province there was a property qualification, and not nearly so large a proportion of the people of that province would express their opinion upon this question as in Ontario. But when it came to totalling up the votes, it must be the majority that rules, and while in one province a small number in comparison to the population has voted, in an adjoining province a larger number in proportion to the population has voted. The remarks of the Minister of Railways and Canals are quite applicable to the gallant motion which has been made by my ever gallant friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but they do not refer to the point which I mentioned.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. With all deference to my hon. friend I think they do have reference to the suggestion which he made, because any Government that would undertake to deal with this question as the result of a vote taken upon it would necessarily take into account the strength which those who vote yes to this question would have in Parliament as reflected by the vote taken. The number of representatives in this Parliament is not in the slightest degree affected by the number of electors in the different constituencies. After all the potential voice is the voice which is expressed by the representatives here when we finally come to deal with this question. Therefore, I do not see the force or application of my hon. friend's remarks.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think my hon. friend still misunderstands me. The decision on this question must be the popular vote in all the provinces as expressed at the polls; and the point I made was this, that it was unfair to take, for instance, a municipality in the province of Ontario where you have manhood suffrage, and where every man twenty-one years of age, and a British subject, and not disqualified, has the right to go and mark his ballot on this question; whereas if you go across the line into the province of Quebec, in a municipality of the same size, possibly, with exactly the same population, but where you have a property qualification instead of manhood franchise, and where consequently not nearly so large a proportion of the people can vote as in the corresponding municipality in the province of Ontario; but when you come to find out how the question stands at the close of the election under this Plebiscite Act, you must take the total number of votes for and against. The point I made was this, that it was unfair to one province under a property qualification and where a smaller proportion of its people have the right to vote, to pit that province against another province having manhood franchise where a larger proportion of its people vote. As regards the election of members to this House, of course, it makes no particular difference. However, if I may be permitted to go back to the Franchise Act, I may point out that in the province of Quebec one man may vote in three, or four, or even eight constituencies if he chances to have property in as many, and if he is able to visit each constituency on polling day; while in another province a man can only vote in one constituency. That brings up the question as to the effect of the vote under this Plebiscite Act. Are you going to permit one man to vote in every constituency where he has property, or is he to vote only in one?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I take it that no doubt he has a right to vote in as many constituencies as the local franchise will give him a right to vote in.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend will see what an exceedingly incongruous thing will happen. In the province of Ontario a man may have property in twelve constituencies, but under the provincial franchise he votes in only one against prohibition, we will say. A man in the province of Quebec has a vote in eight constituencies, and he votes in the eight constituencies for prohibition. In other words, one man in the province of Quebec is as good as eight in the province of Ontario. Now, with every respect for our fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec, I do not think one man there is as good as eight in Ontario.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

gentleman sees that the same man would have a right to vote for twelve members of Parliament in the same way. The same apparent incongruity exists there, and has already been discussed in the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My hon. friend sees how the difference would affect the result on this question. By as many votes as he can poll in the province of Quebec, he is advantaging his side and disadvantaging the other side under the peculiar Franchise Act which the hon. gentlemen have placed on the Statute-book. I can scarcely think that on this question where the popular vote decides, the Government will follow the idea which has just been thrown out by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and give a man a vote in four or five constituencies in one province on this question while he only has one vote in another province.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman is basing his arguments upon the assumption, which, so far as I am capable of forming a judgment at this moment, is not well founded. He assumes that in determining whether the policy of prohibition has been carried throughout the Dominion, inquiry will be made as to the total number of votes polled in all the constituencies on each side. Now, I am not going to say whether that ought to be done or not, but I can well conceive that the suggestion the hon. gentleman has made is a strong reason why we may well consider whether it would be proper to total all the votes that are recorded on one side or the other and draw our conclusion from that as to whether legislation ought to follow.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is the only way to judge.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not concede that that is the only way to judge. There are many considerations that must be taken into account in determining whether the country is prepared to adopt the policy of prohibition. You must satisfy yourself, among other things, that it is likely to commend itself to the approval of Parliament. Well, if the apportionment of the votes in the different provinces is such that a very much larger number of votes would be polled in an election on this question than the number which would be polled for an election for members of Parliament, or relatively with the whole parliamentary representation, the hon. member can see that it would be very proper to consider how far that ought to influence the final result. I quite take in the point the hon. gentleman is making, but I think he is suggesting it at a premature moment. It would be proper for him to consider it when the matter reaches a more advanced stage than the present.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman, I am quite sure, sees the point I was endeavouring to make; and I propose to move later on that an oath be added so that a man who comes up to vote has to swear that he has not voted in any other constituency previously at that election. I do so for this purpose. Take the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal. A man has property in say three constituencies in the city of Toronto, but under the Franchise Act of Ontario he votes in only one constituency; while another citizen in Montreal who has property in five wards may vote in those five wards under the Franchise Act of Quebec. Both men vote on the one question; and while the citizen of Ontario has only one vote for his view of the question, the citizen of Quebec has five votes for his view of the question.

I am referring to the fact—I may be wrong in the suggestion—that if a plebiscite were carried by a majority vote, hon. gentlemen opposite would bring in a Bill on the matter to which it refers. At least I must go this far, that the size of the vote on both sides must be one of the factors that will influence hon. gentlemen as to their course in the future. What I am contending is, that in the province of Quebec or any other province where a man has a right to vote in four or five constituencies, he has the power of swamping votes which oppose his view of the question, especially the votes of men in other provinces where a man has only one vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The hon. gentleman, no doubt unintentionally, overstated the question. I do not understand that electors in Quebec, certainly under the election law, have more than one vote for one candidate. No doubt a man may have five votes in five different constituencies.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I intended to mention different constituencies.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The number of men who vote in more than one constituency is very few. The same law prevails in Prince Edward Island and in New Brunswick.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are thousands of men who can vote in three or four electoral divisions.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The law is no different in the province of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and for ought I know, in Nova Scotia. I will not say it is a difficulty that is pedantic or imaginary, but it is one not involving very much danger.

Mr. CLARKE. Notwithstanding the explanation made, the fact remains that in Ontario the electors who are entitled to vote for members of this House or members of the legislative assembly can only give one vote on this question, while in the provinces to which the hon. gentleman has referred, Quebec, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, an elector can vote as frequently as his property qualification entitles him in the different constituencies. There are thousands of electors in Ontario who have property qualification to entitle them to vote in more than one constituency, but by this clause these electors will be discriminated against by not being given the same opportunity that is given to their fellow-electors in the different provinces to which mention has been made. There seems to be, rightly or wrongly, an impression prevailing in the House that the majority of the electors of the province of Quebec are not in favour of prohibition. I do not know whether that opinion is well founded, but in provinces like Ontario and Manitoba, provinces that have emphatically expressed their opinion by a plebiscite in favour of prohibition, electors should not be placed in a less favourable position than the electors of a province supposed to be opposed to prohibition. It would be fair and reasonable that if property qualification may enable a man to give more than one vote, and this privilege is allowed in Quebec, it should be allowed to electors in other provinces.

Mr. INGRAM. I wish to call the attention of the committee to sections 17 and 18. Section 17 provides:

17. Immediately upon the receipt of the return from each electoral district, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall in the ordinary issue of "The Canada Gazette" give notice with respect to that electoral district of—

- (a) The total number of affirmative answers to the question, and
- (b) The total number of negative answers to the question.

That refers to each electoral district. Section 18 says:

18. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall also in the ordinary issue of "The Canada Gazette" in which any such notice is given, publish a summary of all the returns then received, classifying the totals in each particular according to provinces, and in the North-west Territories by provisional districts.

2. This summary shall be so arranged, and contain such further particulars based upon the returns, as the Governor in Council sees fit to order.

It is quite evident that electors in the province of Quebec who may have five or six votes in different electoral districts, will count in the grand total as compared with electors in other provinces.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are comparatively few.

Mr. INGRAM. We know by experience in Ontario that men may have four or five votes or more; in fact, there are thousands of men of that class.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Does not the hon. gentleman

see that that rule works both ways, that it applies both affirmatively and negatively, so that it cures itself. No doubt there will be as many names applicable on one side as the other.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) negatived.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I beg to move in amendment, that after the word "voting" in third line of section 5, the following be added :—

Provided, nevertheless, that no elector shall vote more than once in this election.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would observe to the hon. gentleman that practically I think there is very little danger of any injustice being done. In the first place, he must bear in mind that those who vote in more than one constituency are few, as has been already pointed out. There is another point which deserves consideration, and it is this. Any man who has had personal experience with the returns of voters knows that the voters in Ontario in proportion to the population are far more numerous than the voters in the province of Quebec. Ontario in this way will have a far larger total vote than Quebec if the proportion of the population of the two provinces be taken into account. This duplicate vote will prove a slight means by which the people of the province of Quebec will be able to neutralize that condition, and I repeat that a comparatively small number will be able to vote in more than one constituency and it will be far less than the number of people in Ontario who will be enabled to vote by reason of the greater extension of the franchise there.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If this amendment involves any sound principle it should have been incorporated in the Franchise Act, and it should not be introduced at the end of a clause in the present Bill. The object we all desire, I take it, is to ascertain the views of the constituencies, and the views of those constituencies as they find expression in this Parliament. It would be entirely unwise and would weaken the effect of any vote—and I am sure the hon. member does not want to do that—that might possibly be given on this question, if it were possible to declare that the vote which carried prohibition in the affirmative had been less than the vote necessary to elect to this House a member who would be in favour of prohibition. Whatever may be the conclusion which may be arrived at by those who may have to deal with this question, it must be in accord with the sentiment of Parliament. Therefore, it strikes at the very basis of the whole question here, and if the amendment were to carry it would be a fatal alteration in this Bill. I do not think my hon. friend would wish to press the amendment, in view of its having such serious consequences.

Sir LOUIS DAVIES.

Mr. POPE. I do not agree with the conclusion arrived at by the hon. Minister of Railways. In submitting the plebiscite to the people you make one grand constituency of the Dominion, and the result is totalled up, and so far as that goes the lines of the constituencies are obliterated. It does not make any difference to a member of this House what happens inside of a particular constituency, but it all goes to show that according to our British system of parliamentary government the plebiscite is entirely out of place. We are in this Parliament elected to deal with public questions, right or wrong, and to assume the fullest responsibility for the action we may take. In disposing of the question of prohibition or any other, if I were left to choose the position I would wish to assume, I would face the issue squarely, and I would not get behind any curtain or any hypocrisy, nor would I dodge the real issue. If the time has arrived and the opportunity is here when it is in the best interests of the people of Canada that prohibition should be law, each and every member of this House ought to be ready to assume that responsibility, and he is bound under the constitution to assume it. This plebiscite is only a farce; it is going to be an expensive farce to the people of this country, and when it is all over, we are not going to have prohibition, it has got to be passed by the vote of the members of this Parliament. In the end it is the members of the Dominion Parliament who will have to face the issue. I do not myself see why it would not have been better for us to face the issue now. If the time is ripe and the hour is opportune, it would be better for us to vote prohibition or no prohibition, rather than to put the people of this country to this extraordinary expense which after it has been incurred, will leave us very little nearer the final result. Of course, it is not necessary nor opportune now, to speak of the effects of prohibition in other parts of this continent. There are many large territories which now enjoy, if enjoyment it is, prohibitory laws. For many years there has been a prohibition law in the State of Maine and I do not think there is any State in the Union where you can find so many Gold Cure Institutes and places of retreat for gentlemen who overindulge than you can find in that State. Notwithstanding that, when you come to the legislature of the State of Maine, you find a peculiar influence that carries prohibition. I can well understand that when some hon. members in this House are making nothing out of the liquor traffic and have no material interest in it, there is a disposition on their part to say, "We will get rid of this question by voting for it whether we believe in it or not. But this is a serious matter, and hon. gentlemen should consider well what the result will be before they ask the people of this country to spend at least $200,000 for a plebiscite. When you have got that election completed, you have simply polled up a whole lot of votes in one volume, you have found so many thousands on one side and so many thousands on the other, and then you have got to come back to Parliament and ask Parliament to do precisely what it is the duty of Parliament to do now. Since the Government have seen fit to propose this plebiscite since they have taken this means of dodging the real issue, no matter what it may cost the country, I suppose it is useless for any hon. member in this House to do other than to enter his protest. There is no object in taking up the time of the committee and prolonging the session by arguments against it, and so I wish to place myself on record as being perfectly prepared to-night as well as on any other occasion, to cast my vote in this House either for or against prohibition as I believed would be in the best interests of this country. As to the details it does not make a great deal of difference, because hon. gentlemen in this House will eventually have to vote on prohibition according to their judgment irrespective of whether the plebiscite was in favour of prohibition or not.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. What way would you vote ?

Mr. POPE. I should vote according to the dictates of my conscience. If standing up in this House for prohibition, I should vote straight for prohibition. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) knows precisely how my conscience lies in that particular ; and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to be as frank to this House as I have been, and to state how he would vote on the question of prohibition.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I voted lots of times.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. POPE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) does not chose to avail himself of the opportunity to answer, I suppose we may take it for granted that he is a dodger.

Mr. CHAIRMAN (Mr. Brodeur). Order.

Mr. POPE. That he is afraid of somebody inside of his constituency ; that he has not the courage of his convictions.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have voted in this House for prohibition many times.

Mr. POPE. You have voted, but you will never do it again.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How do you know ?

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) repents that he voted for prohibition. He has said that he has voted for it, but the very tone in which he says it designates him as a doubtful character.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Not at all.

Mr. POPE. If I were running as a candidate, and if the hon. gentleman answered in the tone he did to-night, I would put him in the very doubtful list. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Somerville) regrets that he ever did vote for prohibition.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You are entirely mistaken.

Mr. POPE. Hon. gentlemen in this House have played with this issue ever since I have been a member of it, and judging from the expert manner in which both sides of the House have handled the question, I fancy that they must have had a training before ever I came here, and that they had been amusing themselves with it before.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Brodeur). I do not like to interfere with the speech of the hon. member (Mr. Pope), but I am of opinion that his remarks are not absolutely in order.

Mr. POPE. Yes, sir ; I was just coming to the point.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. We are not now discussing the principle of the Bill.

Mr. POPE. I know. I was just coming to the point. And now in order to continue that play and amusement they are proposing to give, by this peculiar Bill an opportunity for a man in the city of Montreal to cast five votes as against the one vote of a man in the city of Toronto. Now, Sir, if that is not continuing the game of trifling with the affections of a most sacred and highly moral cause, I do not know what trifling with any cause is.

While there is something in what has been said by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that in the province of Quebec we have very large families, and therefore we do not have as many voters per capita as the province of Ontario. I think, for that portion of the population that really has the right to vote, we stand man for man with the province of Ontario. So that, as this is a peculiar election, an election of the common people, all voting together on one question, I do not see that it is a violation of any sacred rights or privileges which the Government are giving under the Franchise Act, which I presume is soon to come into force, that an equality vote should be taken on this question in all the provinces. Therefore, I think the Ministry should take into serious consideration the amendment that has been proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. BRITTON. I think there can be no doubt, on principle and logically, that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) is right, that in a matter of this kind there is a very great difference between voting on a particular question in one large constituency, and voting for representatives, where the provinces is limited to a certain number of representatives. In the present case everybody voting either for or against the measure is counted. Notwithstanding that. it seems to me that as we have taken this Franchise Act for better or worse, we had better stick to it; and I submit to the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House on the question, whether there is really going to be any practical wrong done in the matter. Let me illustrate. Suppose we have in Ontario a place with a population of 1,000, and in Quebec a place with a population of 1,000. Unquestionably the place in the province of Ontario will give more voters than the place in the province of Quebec. Therefore, the place in the province of Quebec might say, and say justly and properly: "This is an unfair thing; the place in Ontario, with only 1,000 population, can give 200 votes for or against prohibition, while we cannot give more than 150 votes, so that the province of Ontario has an unfair advantage either way."

Mr. QUINN. How does my hon. friend prove that a thousand people in the province of Ontario will give a larger number of votes than a thousand in the province of Quebec?

Mr. BRITTON. The reason I said that, and I think it is correct, is that in Ontario we have a manhood franchise, a wider franchise than that in the province of Quebec, which I think is a property franchise.

Mr. QUINN. I do not think it is wider than the Quebec franchise.

Mr. BRITTON. I suppose it is, and it was on that supposition that I used the illustration. That, together with the argument used by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies), seems to satisfy me that as we cannot have something that is going to do complete justice between all parties, and as it is likely that as many who have more votes than one will vote against prohibition as will vote for prohibition, and whether one man has one vote or five votes, no harm is done. So that it seems to me that we ought to stick to the Franchise Act.

Amendment negatived, and section agreed to.

On section 6.

Mr. DAVEN. I beg to move that after "1898" in line 7, the words be inserted, "should this last measure have been passed by Parliament." Here we are asked to pass a clause which speaks of "the Franchise Act, 1898." There is at present no such thing as the Franchise Act, 1898. There is a Bill; but suppose that Bill miscarries. This is another element in this legislation that emphasizes the insincerity of the Government in regard to this matter. Suppose anything prevented that Franchise Bill carrying. The Government would then be in a position to say, "We cannot go on with this plebiscite," which of course they are dying to be in a position to do. Therefore, if we insert the words I propose, they cannot do any harm in case the Franchise Bill should pass, and in case it should not pass, they will save the Plebiscite Bill; whereas, if you pass this clause as it is at present and the Franchise Bill should miscarry, then the Government might seize on it as an excuse. Now, I think it is very much for the honour of the Minister of Agriculture that he should accept this amendment. When the hon. Minister was introducing this Bill, my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) suggested how illogical, how impolite, how unjust it was to place this phrase, "the Franchise Act, 1898," in the section; and thereupon the Minister of Agriculture, with great confidence, said that they considered it a perfectly certain thing that the Franchise Act would pass into law. Well, Sir, I do not think this House of Commons has so completely lost all freedom that the hon. gentleman was in a position to speak with that arrogant confidence; and now I say, in the interest of prohibition, in the interest of fair play, in the interest of honesty and common fair dealing between man and man, do not let this principal clause of the Bill be tainted with a phrase that seems to imply by irresistible necessity insincerity on the part of the Government of Canada.

Mr. McCLEARY. Surely the hon. Minister of Agriculture will give some reason why this clause should not be amended. It does seem most unfair to those interested in the prohibition question that it should be subjected to the contingency of the Franchise Bill passing this Parliament. Of course we were told the other day that it would pass, but this same Franchise Bill was brought down last session and did not pass.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is nothing in the Bill which says that the vote must be taken under the Franchise Bill of 1898.

Mr. McCLEARY. It says "and the Franchise Act of 1898 shall apply." If there is uncertainty as to the Franchise Bill passing, we are entitled to have an explanation as to what will be the conduct of the Government in regard to taking a vote.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not think the amendment required any reply because I do not think it makes the slightest difference in the meaning of the section or is worth discussing. I cannot conceive myself that the Franchise Act of 1898 shall not become law. The principle of the Bill has been accepted by the House of Commons, it has passed its second reading, and almost passed through committee, and I cannot think for a moment that an other Chamber would interfere in a matter concerning the election of members to this House.

Mr. HENDERSON. It does not appear to me that the amendment would have any material effect. Section 6 provides the machinery that will be employed for the purpose of taking this vote. It mentions the Dominion Election Act, the North-west Territories Representation Act, and the Franchise Act of 1898. If a portion of that machinery does not exist when this vote is taken, the vote would simply be taken on the other Acts in force at the time, so that the amendment is quite unnecessary.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend would be quite right if he were face to face with a Government bent zealously on carrying out this policy of pushing forward prohibition, but everybody knows that they would be delighted to have any quibble by which they could get out of acting on this plebiscite if it should succeed. We have leading prohibitionists supporters of the Government, who, when they were on this side were loud and long in favour of prohibition, suggesting, in the committees and elsewhere, that the plebiscite itself should be postponed until a general election. And when we find such evidences of the cloven hoof, do you suppose we are not to read a clause like this with suspicion. What I want is not to allow the Government a single hook on which they can hang a pretext for refusing to carry out the provisions of the Bill. I know very well that if the Franchise Bill were not to pass, they could go to the country under this clause; but I also know that if the clause remains as it is, there may be an excuse for a Government that loves to hide behind a fence, hiding behind a very small fence indeed, but still small enough to cast its shade over hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. In reply to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, I might say that the third reading of the Bill has not taken place. How then can he know that at its third reading it will not be defeated? How can he know that a measure, the worst that ever was presented to any Parliament, having been further considered by members of this—shall I call it a free Parliament—and the members having had time to reflect on the demeanour of the Government and the general character of the measure, may not, if they are not slaves, defeat it on its third reading? Of course, if he has not the conscience and intellect of every man behind him in his pocket, if these members, are members of a free Parliament, and not so many members of a flock shepherded by gentlemen on the Treasury benches, the hon. gentleman cannot speak that way.

Unless they are like sheep following the bell wether he cannot possibly say with confidence that, on the third reading we may not be able to beat that Bill. I remember reading of a traveller in Switzerland going across a great bridge between two hills. He saw a bell wether leading a lot of sheep across the bridge. And whether because the leader became demented or not, he pushed himself through an opening at the side of the bridge and leaped down, and for nearly half an hour there was a little cataract of muttons going down. It may be that hon. gentlemen opposite have determined to follow their leader, however degrading to their own sense of independence, however injurious to the country, however false to their pledges, to their constituents. But, not knowing that, the Minister of Agriculture is not in a position to say with confidence that this Bill will not be beaten on the third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. Section 5, no doubt, settles who are entitled to vote, and therefore settles the electoral lists so far as this Act is concerned. Now, the hon. gentleman who has charge stated in regard to section 6 and my hon. friend's amendment, that he thought there was no doubt that the Franchise Act would pass and seems to think the only chance it had of not passing would be that in another House some adverse action might be taken. And he took the opportunity of putting in a word as a sort of warning to the members of the Upper House not to interfere with this legislation. Well, I take equal exception with my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) to the utterances of the hon. Minister that a Bill which has not become law, which has not even passed this House, must necessarily become law, is so certain of becoming law that another Bill can be founded upon it. That is not, I think, the rule of legislation in this House.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is very frequently done.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman point out an instance.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I could point out twenty.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be glad if my hon. friend will take the floor and point out these instances.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman might as well ask me to carry the statutes of the realm in my mind.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not ask the hon. gentleman to carry about too much. I do not wish to overburden him. I ask my hon. friend if it is the usual way?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is often done.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not asking the hon. Minister of Railways, but the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot say whether it is usual or not, but it is the way we are doing in this case.

Mr. FOSTER. But that is very far from being proof that it is the constitutional way or the usual way or the right way. But I ask the hon. gentleman why such an expression as this was put in. I had ventured to point out that it is not the usual form of legislation. Every Bill that comes to this Parliament is supposed to stand by itself and be complete in itself, and any legislation that is introduced, as I understand it, is made conditional upon the passage of some other measure. Every one knows that legislation is liable to changes in its passage through the House. But I ask my hon. friend would it not be just as well as to have this vote taken under the Franchise Act at the time existing and in force. I have heard the contention from some hon. gentlemen on the other side that to leave it out would not modify matters at all. Then why is surplusage introduced into the Bill? Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) knows that there is no class of legislation so liable to legal proceedings as temperance legislation, and it ought to be the object of my hon. friend in introducing a Bill to carry out the plebiscite to avoid putting anything in the Bill upon which could give even a chance of the constitutionality or the legality of any act performed under the Bill being called in question. Now, suppose that the Franchise Act of 1898 does not pass this Parliament, but this Plebiscite Bill does pass, and the vote is held under the Bill, does not my hon. friend think that there would be a chance for a legal case to be brought up against the legality of the plebiscite as having taken place under conditions laid down in a Bill which never was passed and consequently is non-existent? Now, I wish to say to my hon. friend, and I do not say it in any party sense, if as some hon. gentlemen opposite have contended, it makes no difference if these words are left out, then, why not leave them out? Why introduce this element of uncertainty? What is the objection to leaving this vote to be taken under the Franchise Act in force at the time?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I can tell my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) very easily my objection. In the first place, I want to do what the hon. gentleman has pointed out—to make it clear and distinct under what franchise law this plebiscite shall take place to make the machinery complete, so that there may be no room for doubt in the minds of the people. The hon. gentleman is supposing all the time that the Franchise Act of this session will not become law and I have stated already that, for reasons which to my mind are conclusive, I cannot suppose anything of the kind, not because of any action of the Government or any effort of theirs to impose it on the House, but because the House has accepted the principle of the Bill, and has practically passed it in committee, and because it is a Bill which essentially applies to and is within the purview and within the proper control of this House. There has been no threat on my part. When I spoke as I did of the other Chamber of this Parliament, it was simply because I cannot conceive that the gentlemen in that Chamber would take upon themselves to reject a franchise Bill which had been accepted by this House. What I said was not a threat, but a tribute to what I conceive to be the intelligence of that House. Suppose the hon. gentleman's suggestions were taken and it were provided that the vote should be taken under the franchise law in force at the time. The franchise law of to-day is most cumbrous in its application, a law which requires a very expensive and difficult and troublesome operation in the way of revising the lists.

At the present time the lists under that law are about four years old. If it was for a moment contemplated that this plebiscite would have to take place under that law, we would be on the horns of a dilemma. Are we going to accept lists four years old? As a temperance man I would not for a moment consent to taking a vote upon those lists. The alternative is that we must have a revision of the present lists during this summer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would not the old lists be better for your cause?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not care whether they would be better for my cause or not, they are improper lists on which to take a vote, because they would disfranchise hundreds and thousands of men who have a right to vote. It would be an outrage to ask the people to vote upon those lists for an election of any kind. Under these circumstances, whether they are lists which might be better for my side of the cause or better for the hon. gentleman's side of the cause, I would not consent to allow a vote to be taken upon them under any Bill of which I had charge. But if we do not adopt those lists, we have to have a revision this summer, a revision which must cost in the neighbourhood of $200,000, when the hon. member for York is already deploring the fact that an election under this plebiscite law will cost over $200,000. The hon. gentleman's contention simply brings us to this point, that we will either have to do as we propose under this section, or vote upon lists four years old, or else make a new revision, and that at a time when we are about repealing the old franchise law, as if it is not repealed this session, it must be repealed by the intelligence of this Parliament before another general election.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend's argument is altogether aside from my contention; it has no more to do with it than an argument about the configuration of the moon. My hon. friend wants us to put in these words, "the Franchise Act, 1898," when no such thing exists. The hon. gentleman is asking us to pass here in section 6 a thing which has no existence in this Parliament at all. There is a Bill before this House which is called the Franchise Act, but no such Act at present exists. My argument was not at all that you must either vote upon the Franchise Act as put in here in these words, or else you must have a revision of the lists. That is not at all my argument. I simply asked him if his measure would not be equally strong if, instead of putting in "Franchise Act, 1898," which has no existence, he should put in something like this: "Under the Franchise Act at that time in force in the Dominion." That takes away the whole of the gravamen of the hon. gentleman's charge that I was trying to saddle the country with great expense or to bring on an election under antiquated lists. The hon. gentlemen have, with fine discrimination, carried on an election lately in the province of Prince Edward Island upon these very lists, and with equally fine discrimination they have refused to carry on an election in Bagot on these lists. Why, I do not know. The hon. gentleman's whole argument has been as to the cumbersome machinery of the present Election Act. But he is not obliged to face that if he puts in the words I suggest. I wish to correct my hon. friend in another respect. I did not deplore the expenditure of $200,000 or $250,000 for this purpose. He is scarcely fair in saying that I deplored it. What my words meant, I think, was this, that I would exceedingly deplore an expenditure of $250,000 in order to carry out this vote upon an abstract principle unless the Government were prepared to introduce an Act of prohibition, provided the affirmative was voted when the plebiscite was taken.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What is the use of these words here in clause 5 providing that every man who is entitled to vote at a provincial election is entitled to vote at this election? I submit that in the opinion of any lawyer it is clear that there can be no necessity for defining the Act under which a man may vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. This relates to the machinery and the modus operandi of taking the vote. Without some such provision as that, the Act would not apply at all.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The strong point made by my hon. friend still exists, that the Franchise Act mentioned in section 6 is not in force, and we are building upon something which has no existence.

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is a very serious objection that you mention "Franchise Act, 1898," which has no existence. There has been a Bill introduced into this House, but the House has not finally pronounced upon it. There are likely to be some amendments made to it before it is finally passed. I do not see what justification the Government has for doing this except what has been insinuated by the Prime Minister himself some days ago when he said that these two Bills had to go together. I think that is a great mistake. If it is the desire of the Government that this Bill should pass, they should not compass it around with objectionable provisions. It appears to me to be on the same lines as the other clause to which objection was made this afternoon, as to including cider among liquors that are to be prohibited by the passage of this Act. Provisions have been inserted in the Bill that should not appear there, but there is an important omission in view of the discussion this afternoon, the lack of a provision that legislation will follow the passage of this Act. It is true the Prime Minister said this afternoon that Parliament would be asked to give effect in some way to it. But there should be a definite statement that this Bill is not for the purpose simply of obtaining an opinion on an abstract question, but that it means practical legislation, that if a majority of the voters record their votes in favour of prohibition the Government will feel themselves bound to introduce a measure to prohibit the manufacture, sale and importation of intoxicating liquors. What makes the people suspicious is that in Ontario, and I am told in other provinces of the Dominion, plebiscites have already been taken on this question. In Ontario the people did not obtain a pledge sufficient to bind the provincial Government, for although they thought they had such a pledge, Sir Oliver Mowat and his successor denied they gave any such pledge; and although the province was turned upside down and people took party sides on the question of prohibition, and it was carried by an enormous majority of about 80,000, from the time that vote was taken no step has been taken towards the passing of a prohibitory law in Ontario. Are we to have a repetition of that kind of humbug carried out by the Government of Canada under the Bill the House is now considering? Is no legislation to follow with a view to carry out the wishes of the people if the majority decide they are in favour of prohibition? The Government on this point has not given a very certain sound. The people will come to the conclusion that the Government on this question are lacking in sincerity, that they are trying by this means to get rid of a very perplexing and disagreeable question, that they have placed themselves on record on this matter in Parliament and in their conventions by the statements of the Premier and other leading members of the Government, and now come to Parliament to supplement their actions, and at the same time they do not pledge themselves, even if a majority of the electors vote in favour of prohibition, to do more than consider the next step to be taken, if any advance is to be made. Parliament should be told definitely what the Government propose to do, and to that end a suitable clause should be inserted in the Bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is going outside of the clause under discussion.

Mr. WALLACE. What clause is under discussion ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Clause 6.

Mr. WALLACE. The Chairman omitted to read the clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to make such an insinuation, when a moment ago he asked what clause was under consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. I make the statement that the clause was not read.

The PRIME MINISTER. The clause has been put again and again.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand it is the usual custom in important matters like this that the clause be read, and I make the statement that the clause was not read.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We are not obliged to read the clause, and according to the procedure adopted some time ago, according to parliamentary procedure by Dr. Bourinot, we are not obliged to read the clause except when a member asks that it be done.

Mr. FOSTER. Any member can have it read.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No member asked that it be read, and so no insinuation should have been made.

Mr. WALLACE. I presume it is not yet too late to ask that it be read. The omissions as regards the Bill must be pointed out, and I cannot find any more appropriate clause on which to do this than on No. 6. In my opinion there should be a definite statement as regards the intention of the Government to submit practical legislation, if a large number of the people pronounce in favour of prohibition.

Mr. INGRAM. The introducer of the Bill dislikes the idea of using a voters' list four years old. It has occurred to me that there is an unfair situation in view of the speech delivered by the leader of the Government this afternoon. He stated that if the people pronounced in favour of this measure it may eventually result in direct taxation. If that be true, surely those who would be called upon to pay a large proportion of the necessary taxation to make up the loss of revenue should not be excluded from the franchise, for thereby great injustice would be done. As an example of what I mean, I will take the people owning property in one of my own subdivisions, in polling district No. 3. No less than 54 ladies hold property there, and they would be called upon to contribute to the taxation necessary to be raised in case a prohibitory measure should become law, and in order to make up for the loss of revenue.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Does that follow ?

Mr. INGRAM. I am taking into consideration the remarks of the First Minister.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Taking them into consideration, does that result follow ?

Mr. INGRAM. I consider it would follow as regards ladies just as much as gentlemen.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It does not follow that there will be direct taxation on property.

Mr. INGRAM. The First Minister considered the question of imposing additional taxation on tobacco, and he thought that would not work ; he also spoke of additional taxation on tea and sugar, and then he said, to use his own words, it might result in direct taxation. If that be true, ladies owning property would have to contribute their share the same as men. Taking into account the strong temperance principles of the Minister of Agriculture, one would have naturally supposed that he would have been strongly in favour of giving ladies an opportunity to vote on any prohibitory measure. For that reason I think there is a great injustice done to that class of persons in this country.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg leave to move :

That the section be amended by leaving out "1898" after the words "Franchise Act" in the sixth line ;

And by adding after the words "Franchise Act" the following :—

"In force at the time the vote is taken."

I do not see why this amendment should not be accepted, and if it be accepted it would settle any suspicion that has been in the public mind that there has been an attempt to saddle two Acts together, in order to use the one as a leverage for the other.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is no suspicion in the public mind.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there not ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Fisher) knows a great deal but he scarcely knows what the public mind is.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. You will find I do.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I see many reasons why that amendment should commend itself to the consideration of the Government, and I cannot see how the Government can object to it. In so far as I am personally concerned, I am absolutely opposed to the plebiscite to settle any public question. Under the form of Government which obtains in Canada, I believe the plebiscite to be antagonistic to the constitutional principles which prevail both in this country and in England. There is another very strong objection to this Bill, and that is that Parliament is asked to consent to anticipate the action of Parliament. Even if we knew that the Franchise Act of 1898 was going to be passed to-morrow, we must consider well that it is not yet the law of this country, and without any party feeling, I say that to anticipate its passage is utterly opposed to all precedents. We know that many times before the Railway Committee, and other large committees of this House, Bills have been deferred because they were based upon legislation which had not received the sanction of Parliament. If the Franchise Bill of 1898 were law, I could understand that we should make it the basis for the plebiscite, but why should the treasury benches be afraid of accepting the amendment of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster). This is one of the most important questions that has ever come before us, a question so important that the Government have set aside the constitutional principles which have hitherto prevailed in Canada and in England, in order to deal with; and I ask why should the Government be afraid of the amendment of the hon. member for York, which leaves the people of Canada to vote on that question under the machinery now provided by statute. If the Government want to use the new Franchise law, then why not wait until the Franchise Act of 1898 is passed, and then all objections will disappear. I ask Parliament to pause before it sets aside the old precedents which have been our guide in legislation. I say that this proposal of the Government is an infringement upon the constitutional principles which have made the English Parliament the mother of Parliaments, and on which we have modelled our Parliament. If you break the rule now, and anticipate the action of Parliament in one instance you may anticipate it in many others, and thus open the way to grave abuses. I am opposed to the plebiscite for I believe that the parliamentary system which has made England great and Canada progressive is sufficient to settle all public questions. The Minister of Railways said he could quote many precedents for this.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS. Yes; many.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have had the honour of sitting in this House for a good many years, and I fail to recollect one single instance where important legislation like this was based upon a Bill which had not yet received the sanction of Parliament.

Mr. CLANCY. The amendment of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is so reasonable that it is humiliating to see hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House oppose it simply because it is the will of the hon. Minister (Mr. Fisher), that it should be opposed. So far as the principle of the thing is concerned, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) might with as much reason ask the House to assent to a Bill that had not yet been introduced. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) that the people have neither so much confidence in him or in his Government as to believe that their pledges are going to be carried out.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, the record of hon. gentlemen opposite is not such as to give any guarantee in that direction. This Bill asks this House to assent to a fiction and a falsehood. There is absolutely no such law in existence as the Franchise Act of 1898. What does the Franchise Act of 1898 mean if it has any meaning at all?

It means no more, nor does it mean any less than a law which is not in existence. Suppose it should be in the will of these hon. gentlemen, as it is in their power, to so completely change the Franchise Act as to cripple the vote on this question in the future. The fact is that the hon. gentleman who has this Bill in charge is asking that a blank check be signed and given to himself and his friends. I say that there was never in a representative assembly in a civilized country a more childish piece of play than for these hon. gentlemen to ask their supporters to assent to a Bill which is based on legislation that has no existence whatever. If you open the door to that kind of thing, I am afraid the Minister of Railways and Canals would have a precedent for the first time for what he was asked to-night to give us an instance. His memory either failed him, or he did not have an instance; but to-morrow morning he would have an instance, the first that ever occurred in this Parliament, and I should hope the last. I must say that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is not cutting a very great figure as the champion of this Bill when he refuses to amend this clause, and refuses as well to give a reason. I think the House and the country may conclude that the reason he refuses to give a reason is that he is absolutely without one.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill is a layman, like myself, and I want to submit a proposition, not only to him, but to the legal minds in this House. Suppose we pass this Bill through committee to-night and to-morrow it receives its third reading and then becomes law. Suppose then that this Bill should be attacked, as no doubt it will be attacked, in the courts. The question will be raised that when this Bill was passed, it referred to an Act of 1898 which had no existence. Would not this Bill be illegal?

It looks to me as if it were not common sense to pass this Bill and to put it in force to-morrow when it refers to an Act which is not in existence to-day. That is a question which it will be for the lawyers to settle and to my mind the chances are that they will say that the Bill is not legal in referring to an Act which has no existence.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has put a suppositious case which I cannot conceive. He says that this Bill might be read the third time to-morrow and become law; but my reading of the constitution is that a Bill has to pass through the Senate and be assented to by His Excellency before it becomes law; and, as I explained before, the Government who have charge of this legislation purpose that the Franchise Bill shall precede this Bill in its course through Parliament, and therefore by the time this Bill becomes law, it seems to me likely that the Franchise Bill will be law.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. Minister has not quite caught the point of my hon. friend. The point, I take it, is that there is a doubt as to the constitutionality of the Franchise Act.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Who has doubt about it?

Mr. McNEILL. I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has expressed in this House his opinion that it is a grave question of law whether it is constitutional or not.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You must have misunderstood him.

Mr. McNEILL. I must have greatly misunderstood him if he did not say in reference to that particular point that it was a very grave point and one worthy of the deepest consideration, on which he required all the light the lawyers in the House could give him.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend misunderstood him.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not think it possible to misunderstand such plain language, because he distinctly asked to have all the light the lawyers could give him on that point. Under these circumstances, I think the point made by my hon. friend is a very grave point indeed, that this Act is needlessly encumbered with that legal difficulty. I do not see any reason why it should be made dependent upon another Act which is not yet in existence, and which may not be constitutional when it does pass this House and the other Chamber. According to the principles of hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not see why that is necessary at all. To those of us who object to the franchise of this House being made over to the local legislatures, I could understand that there might be more reason in the position the hon. gentlemen have taken; but in view of the fact that the Government hold that the franchises of the provinces should govern, I do not see why they should not have provided that the vote should be taken on the local franchises. I do not see why they should have placed this Bill in the peril in which it will stand when it does pass, by tacking it on to a Bill which has not yet become law, and which when it does pass this Parliament may prove to be ultra vires. They have the franchises of the provinces to go upon, if they wish, and, that being their principle, I do not see why they should not adopt it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been complaining a good deal that their strictures on this portion of the clause have not been replied to at all on this side of the House. Now, I desire to pay every respect to the understanding and intelligence of our hon. friends opposite; but I have felt a good deal of difficulty in treating their criticisms seriously, for the reason that I felt that it would be paying a very small tribute indeed to their understanding and knowledge. I have thought their sole object was to chaff the gentlemen on this side, and that they did not feel any serious difficulty upon the question they have been remarking upon. Now, it is much to be regretted, if our hon. friends opposite are really serious, that they have not taken counsel with some of the professional gentlemen on their own side of the House with regard to this question. There are lawyers of standing associated with our hon. friends opposite, and if they had referred to any gentleman of any standing in the profession among their number, they would have been told that what they have referred to as a blot or blemish on this Bill is not an unusual or unprecedented matter in legislation, either in this country or in the motherland. I have been called upon to name a case in which this peculiarity occurred, and because I have not been able to do it on the spur of the moment, hon. gentlemen have chosen to assume that it cannot be done, or that my memory must be at fault. It is an exceedingly difficult thing for any gentleman to call to mind a particular case of this kind unless it has made a deep impression on his mind; but I affirm with all confidence that it is something of frequent occurrence not only here, but where my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. McNeill) would look for the best examples—in the Imperial Parliament. There is no question at all that on principle it is quite proper and reasonable in every way; and the reason on which it is founded is this, that these Acts will speak from the moment they receive the assent of the Crown. They are not Acts until they receive that assent; and when this Act is put beside the Franchise Act of 1898, it is eminently proper that the one should refer to the other.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Suppose it does not receive the assent?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Then no harm is done. If there is no Franchise Act of 1898 in existence, this Bill will not be injured in any way; but if the Franchise Bill does become law, it would be an immense advantage that it should be referred to in distinct terms in this Bill. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) said it was assumed on this side that the Bill would be just as well without the Franchise Act of 1898 as with it. I have not heard that statement made nor am I prepared to make it, but I am prepared to say that it will be entirely effective, even if the Franchise Bill does not pass, because we have provided in the section 6 that the proceedings to be taken shall be those provided in the Dominion General Election Law. I do feel that my hon. friends cannot be serious in spending so much time in making so many speeches upon a question which, if they were to take the trouble of consulting some one who has knowledge of the law, they would be advised has nothing in it.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad to hear the hon. Minister of Railways say that if the Franchise Bill does not pass, it will not affect this measure.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I say that in that case you can take the vote under the Dominion General Election Law, according to this Bill.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad to hear that statement, because I have heard considerable talk to the effect that if the Franchise Bill did not pass, that would block this Bill, and it would not be effective. The hon. Minister of Railways says that will not be the case.

Mr. FOSTER. On the other hand, the hon. Minister of Agriculture has said that if the Franchise Bill is not included by name, the vote will be taken upon the present Dominion Franchise Act.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is a question of policy.

Mr. FOSTER. And the machinery of the Dominion Election Law is so cumbersome and a revision so necessary, that it will be practically impossible to have the plebiscite under it.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman will see, if he wishes to see it, that that is a question of policy and not a question of interpretation. It is a question of the effective operation of this law.

Mr. FOSTER. It is so much a question of policy that the hon. gentleman who has the Bill in charge has practically declared that unless the Franchise Bill is passed, to make a revision of the lists of the Dominion and carry out the Dominion Election Law, under the cumbersome machinery of that law, would make the taking of a plebiscite practically impossible.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I said it would be very difficult but not impossible.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman gave the impression that it would be exceedingly doubtful if the Government would in that case carry out the Bill.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is very likely.

Mr. FOSTER. Therefore, I say that the Franchise Bill blocks this one.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not a question of interpretation at all.

Mr. CRAIG. I said that I was very glad to hear the statement of the Minister of Railways, but I do not know now whether I am glad or not, because things seem a little mixed. However, I was pleased to hear the statement that supposing the Franchise Bill is not passed, then this measure will not be affected. But it seems there would be some difficulty in carrying it out. I notice that the Minister of Agriculture said that the Government will see that the Franchise Bill precedes this all the way through. I do not know whether that means that in case the Franchise Bill is not passed by the Senate—and I hope it will because I have no desire to see any interference by the Senate with our Franchise Bill; but supposing the Franchise Bill should be amended in the Senate and the amendments not be acceptable to the Government, would that block the Plebiscite Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We will deal with that when it comes.

Mr. CRAIG. That is all right. I was going to ask this question, and I ask it with the object of supporting the Government and being friendly to this Bill, and that is, what objection there is to accepting the amendment of my hon. friend from York?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It would not be very becoming in us to say that we are in doubt as to the passage of the Franchise Bill.

Mr. CRAIG. If the Government are satisfied, I am.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it customary, in legislating, to imperil the fate of one Bill by making it depend on the passage of another? We have two Chambers. The popular Chamber may pass a Bill but the other may not; and by tacking one Bill to another which has not passed a second Chamber, you are tying up that branch of the legislature completely by telling them that unless they pass the first Bill, the second will have to be withdrawn.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to say that this objection to the Franchise Bill was first raised by a lawyer in this House, and until to-night I have not heard any one suggest that the objection was badly taken. Does the hon. Minister of Marine say that, in his judgment, the failure of the Franchise Bill would not in any way militate against the proceedings under this Bill now before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Bill is clear as it is.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the failure of the Franchise Bill affect it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Such an improbable contingency has not been considered.

Mr. McNEILL. That is not a reply. We were told by the hon. gentleman's colleague that its failure would have nothing to do with it. He said that no one who had any knowledge of the law would suggest what we were suggesting, that the failure of the Franchise Bill would imperil the operations of the Bill now before the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was referring to the contention that it was improper to dove-tail one Bill into another when the Bill so dove-tailed into the other has not passed the House.

Mr. McNEILL. He was not doing that alone. He distinctly laid it down as his opinion that those on this side of the House who said that failure to pass the Franchise Bill of 1898 would imperil this Act were talking nonsense. I understand that the hon. gentleman would not take that position. It should be understood, then, that though the Minister of Railways has made that statement he is not supported by other lawyers on his own side of the House, and the condition is, as is pointed out, that the success of this Act is contingent upon the passing of the Franchise Act. I think that it is as well that that should be distinctly understood.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived, and section 6 agreed to.

On section 8 (form of ballot).

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I desire to propose a change in the form of a ballot and to substitute a form I now submit to you, Mr. Chairman. This form is exactly the same as the one in the Bill, except that the lines which cross the upper part of the ballot are taken out and the words "Yes" and "No" appear on the same level with the top line of the question as printed. There are thus no lines at all upon the ballot except the two perpendicular lines which divide the spaces in which the cross should be put. It was thought it would make the ballot less complicated and give less opportunity for errors.

Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the word "yes" come in a line and with and just after the word "Act"?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, but there is a line between.

Mr. FOSTER. Where does the voter mark?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Anywhere within the space the "yes" or "no" is put.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In this form of ballot, though I do not know that I can suggest anything to remedy it, you are likely to have it marked "yes" or "no," instead of with a cross.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The words "yes" and "no" are printed. It is the duty of the returning officer, as in an election to Parliament, to inform the voter that he is to vote by making a cross. I think that the cross as a sign of voting is now so thoroughly understood, as it is used in every form in ballot in use in the country, that voters will readily understand that they must use it in this case. The only question in my mind at all is whether the spaces in which the cross would come were perfectly clear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Notwithstanding that, I think you will find in practice that the voter will vote by saying "yes" or "no." This is a peculiar vote. I would ask whether any instructions will be given to the returning officer not to adhere too strictly to the law as to counting ballots.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think it would be well to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think so, because this is not a case of contention between the two parties where fine points of law might come up. Anything that indicated the intention of the voter should be accepted as a vote one way or the other.

Mr. CLARKE. Will there be any lines across the ballot?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, they have been eliminated.

Mr. CLARKE. And the top line of the question will be close to the top line of the ballot?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There will be no lines or divisions, except the divisions of the question from the columns "yes" or "no," and the division between these two.

Mr. CLARKE. No room to make a cross above the words "yes" and "no"?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE.
No.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask that this section be amended by striking out from the ballot paper the word "cider." I think its presence there would have a tendency to weaken the temperance vote.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That has already been carried in section 3, where the form of question is given.

Mr. MILLS. Then I will make that motion at a later stage.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity on the third reading.

Mr. FOSTER. Though it is clear enough to us as we are discussing it I think you will find that in a multiplicity of cases the man who is in favour will write "yes" and the man who is against will write "no." He reads the question "are you in favour of the passing of an Act prohibiting, &c.," as his answer is "yes" or "no." I believe in many cases he will write that answer.

Mr. BEATTIE. I think we should strike out the words "yes" and "no." and put in "for prohibition" and "against prohibition." Then there could be no mistake; that might meet the difficulty.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Even then some would vote "yes" or "no" instead of with the cross. But those who mark their ballots thus shall be returned. It is got like counting the ballots in the election for members of Parliament. The actual facts will be returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Nobody would contend that if a man marked his ballot "yes" instead of with a cross that that should invalidate his vote.

Mr. FOSTER. But suppose it comes to a case and—improbable case though it be—that there is a very small margin one way or the other. Suppose that the affirmative have carried it by a small majority, could not a legal case be made up against it, that it was not actually carried, unless these cases referred to are actually mentioned in the Act. I still adhere to my opinion that you will find a large number of people who will write their answer in the column where they should make a cross.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think that under any form of ballot that we can adopt there will be some loopholes for people who cannot possibly do the right thing. We know perfectly well that in elections there are occasional lapses, and ballots are thrown out. But when we consider the large number of votes which are cast in our Dominion elections, and the comparatively infinitesimal small number of spoiled ballots that are found, I think I may safely say that the electorate of this country pretty well understand the way to mark their ballots. The way they are to mark their ballots in this election will be thoroughly explained to them, and they will understand that they are to vote in the same way as they do for members of Parliament, that is, that they are to put a cross on their ballot in the space which, in Dominion elections, indicates the person for whom they vote.

Mr. FOSTER. But in the case of the person you do not put the question in print. "Are you in favour of John Jones?"

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I understand that, but at the same time the great mass of the people understand that it is a simple question on which they are voting, to be answered then and there on the ballot. I acknowledge that it is possible still for some people to make mistakes, they make mistakes to-day. But I think the ballot that is now proposed after very careful consideration of the matter, is on the whole the one which will give the least chance for mistakes to the ordinary elector.

Mr. INGRAM. No doubt there will be many spoiled and rejected ballots. Take the city of Kingston, a very intelligent city; but in the provincial election of 1894 there were 36 rejected ballots and 18 spoiled ballots, out of a total of 3,418.

Mr. BEATTIE. I have the honour to represent one of the most intelligent constituencies in this country, and for the information of the Minister of Agriculture, I will say that there were over 400 spoiled ballots cast in the city of London at the last Dominion election.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). They were not London residents, they came from outside.

Mr. BEATTIE. We did not permit any from Prince Edward Island to come there and vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill that he amend it by striking out all the words after the word "of" in the third line, until he comes to the word "alcoholic." Then it will read: "Are you in favour of the passing of an Act prohibiting the importation, manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors for use as a beverage."

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is provided for in section 3.

Mr. TAYLOR. This ballot is the question that is to come before the voter. Does the Minister who has charge of this Bill want to say to the voter that he cannot manufacture cider? I live in an apple country where a great many people manufacture cider. A man who manufactures cider sees that ballot and immediately says to himself, If I vote for that, I must stop manufacturing cider. I want to hear what the hon.

member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) will say to that, as he comes from an apple country. It seems to me this word was put in there purposely to damage the temperance vote of this country. Why not put in champagne and half a dozen other articles that you might mention? Why mention cider particularly, which is an article manufactured all through this country for family use? Section 3 does not come before the voter, this simple ballot comes before him. Are you in favour of prohibiting the manufacture of cider, among other articles? My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has suggested striking out the word "cider." If that word was dropped the ballot would not be so objectionable. Then it would simply include spirits, wine, ale, beer and all other alcoholic liquors.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would that not take in cider?

Mr. TAYLOR. Cider is not alcoholic. But being named here it is prohibited from being manufactured.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But it is intoxicating.

Mr. TAYLOR. Cider is not intoxicating. Hard cider is, after it is a year or two old.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yesterday, in conversation with a gentleman, he told me that a friend of his got drunk every fall on cider.

Mr. TAYLOR. That may be, it may be specially prepared with alcohol, but the cider our farmers manufacture is not intoxicating. But being specially named here, no matter what the character of the cider is, it is prohibited from being manufactured in the country. In my opinion it is put in here purposely to injure the temperance vote.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will this prevent the manufacture of cider in the ordinary way on a farm?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Alcoholic cider.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is all right to talk about that, but will it prevent a farmer from grinding up his apples and barrelling the apple juice? I would like to have the opinion of the promoter of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It will not interfere with apple juice in any way whatever.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will put the question straight: Will it apply to a man who grinds his apples up in the fall and who bottles or barrels up the apple juice in the ordinary way of farmers?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I do not understand what the ordinary way is that the hon. gentleman alludes to. But certainly if a farmer or anybody else ferments his cider and makes it an alcoholic drink, that will be interfered with by the operation of the Act which may be founded upon this Bill. If it is not an intoxicating drink, I do not think it will be interfered with.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman being himself a farmer knows how cider is made. The apples are ground into cider, and after a time certain preservatives are put into it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. When these preservatives are put in, it does not ferment and become alcoholic.

Mr. McCLEARY. I would suggest adding after the word "beer," the words "fermented or hard cider."

Mr. CLANCY. By the wording of the section you declare that cider is an alcoholic liquor, and comes within the prohibited list. That is clear because the hon. gentleman uses the words, "all other alcoholic liquors," therefore cider is understood to be one of the alcoholic liquors. I do not think the Government intend to draw the line at the cider that a man might innocently manufacture for purposes of domestic use, or for such sale as farmers make. I think that would be very unreasonable. If that is not the meaning of the section, then it has no meaning. It will certainly restrain a farmer from selling in that way. I think the hon. gentlemen have put this in, believing in their own minds that it will never become law.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is intended that there should be a counterfoil on this ballot, any number or mark by means of which the ballot could be traced from the counterfoil remaining in the possession of the deputy returning officer.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There has not been any provision made for that, I confess. I do not think there is any need for it. I do not see why there should be, but if the House thought it was best to do so, it would be very easy to have a small space left on one end which could be torn off. I did not myself think it was necessary.

Mr. CLARKE. We have a ballot that is used in the provincial elections in the province of Ontario that has a counterfoil and a number, and a corresponding number on the ballot paper proper. I presume it is not the intention, from what the Minister says, that this should be anything but a secret ballot.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly not.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not think there is any occasion myself for a counterfoil. But I understand it is to be an absolutely secret ballot.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is intended to be an absolutely secret ballot.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I call attention to the fact that the ballot is to be printed by the Queen's Printer, and the present distinguished occupant of the Speaker's Chair introduced a provision that a certain weight of paper should be used for the ballots in Dominion elections, and I presume that course will be followed out.

Mr. McNEILL. In regard to the secrecy of the ballot, I called the attention of the hon. member for York to the question as to the word "yes" being admitted. If ballots are permitted to be marked "yes" or "no," you may as well allow the votes to be given without secrecy. No doubt it will be found in this election, as in other elections, that a good deal of pressure will be brought to bear on both sides, and men may go to the polls and deliberately write "yes" or "no" in order that their votes may be traced through their hand-writing. That is a point worthy of consideration.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) if the pledge of the Sons of Temperance includes beer and cider?

Mr. FLINT. I am not now a member of the Sons of Temperance, although I was so when I was younger.

Mr. MILLS. I rather think the introduction of the word cider will have a tendency in Annapolis county and in a large portion of Nova Scotia to weaken the temperance vote. My county is largely a temperance county and an apple-growing county, and I do not think they make cider from apples for the purpose of getting drunk on it, but they use it for beverage purposes and for cooking purposes; and the Government would do the proper thing and secure a more representative vote by striking out the word cider, or at all events striking it off the ballot so that it will not be before the temperance men of Canada when they go to vote.

Mr. FLINT. There are two points made. One is in regard to the desirability of allowing electors to mark their ballots "yes" or "no" instead of making a cross. Hon. gentlemen who make that objection forget the agitation that will be aroused on this subject and the large quantity of literature that will be placed before the electorate in which no doubt this point will be dwelt upon, and the electorate will be educated not only as they are in general elections but also specially educated by literature on this subject. In regard to the introduction of the word cider in the form of ballot, I may say that those familiar with the working of temperance societies and organizations must be aware of the very lengthy and elaborate discussions had during the last thirty years on this question, and I am justified in saying that throughout Canada, with very few exceptions, the course has been followed by those identified with total abstinence of placing the word cider in all pledges. The argument made against cider being considered an alcoholic beverage has been set aside by the practical experience of those labouring in temperance work, and they have almost unanimously named cider in the pledge as a drink which should be prohibited just as fully as ale, lager beer or any of the light wines. I agree with that idea.

Mr. McNEILL. It is not stated here to be alcoholic cider.

Mr. FLINT. If cider is left out, we open the door to such evasions of the law as will render all efforts of the prohibitionist party nugatory.

Mr. McNEILL. Why not say fermented cider?

Mr. MOORE. The effect of introducing the word cider will be prejudicial as regards prohibition in my county. The people of my county are largely composed of farmers who raise apples, many of which are not suitable for market, and are therefore ground up and made into apple cider and vinegar. Under this section a great many temperance people will vote against the Bill, and I therefore would prefer a clause inserted under which they would be able to manufacture sweet cider.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I think a mistake has been made with respect to the position of Annapolis county on the question of cider. Many years ago a distinguished representative of that county, Mr. Longley—not the gentleman of that name who now acts as a nightmare to the hon. member for that county in this House but a rival of his—was a leader of the temperance movement in the legislature of Nova Scotia, and a very prominent member of the Sons of Temperance, having filled the position of Grand Worthy Patriarch for many years.

Mr. MILLS. He was a member of this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The temperance pledge of that day, and I presume it is the same to-day, referred to wines, spirits, cider or other intoxicating drinks. At that time, after a very thorough discussion, the late Mr. Longley, as the representative of the temperance men, included cider among the intoxicants. In Annapolis there is a distinction drawn between cider and apple juice, as has been done by the Minister of Agriculture to-day.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the difference?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Apple juice is not alcoholic and cider is alcoholic.

Mr. BRITTON. I can remember very distinctly the pledge of the old Sons of Temperance. It included spirits, malt liquors, wines and cider. I think I know something also of the sentiment of the temperance people at the present time, and of the reasons given by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) why they want the word cider in the ballot. They all remember very distinctly the difficulty experienced in enforcing the law when the question arose respecting 4 per cent beer as to what beer was prohibited and what was permitted. So it is in the case of cider. We all know there is cider and cider, some harmless and some intoxicating.

For my own part I am not as willing as the hon. member was this afternoon to say just how I would vote on the question of prohibition. In this particular matter I for one wish to give the temperance people what they want themselves, an opportunity at all events of testing public opinion on this question, and if it so happens that prohibition is introduced and is carried, then the temperance people will have no difficulty such as they have had in the past, of giving it a fair trial. If cider is not among the articles proscribed there will be the greatest difficulty, because everything in the shape of intoxicating liquor will be called cider. Every one who has had experience of the Scott Act and Local Option, will remember the attempts that were made to evade it in the province of Ontario, and the omission of the word "cider" would certainly help in attempts to evade the law.

Mr. MOORE. I am very well aware that what the hon. gentleman has stated with regard to the pledge exists. In many associations they are obliged to take that pledge and the result is that it keeps hundreds of people from taking that pledge and joining these associations throughout the country. The constituents of the Minister of Agriculture in Brome County, make large quantities of sweet cider every year to be made into apple sauce and vinegar, and if they are compelled to forego the use in this way of the small apples for which they cannot find any other market, I believe the promoter of this Bill will not be able to justify its wisdom before the electors of his county. It would be in the interest of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher), as well as in the interests of the farmers of this country, to modify the clause in such a way as to permit farmers to make sweet cider for the purpose I have mentioned. Including the word cider in the clause in question will greatly weaken the temperance vote amongst the farmers of the county.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Public Works is in a contemplative mood now, and we would like to have his opinion on the matter of cider.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He is only an authority on ginger ale.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not like to be so personal.

Mr. CRAIG. It is just as well to leave this clause as it stands. As far as admitting the word "yes" in marking the ballot is concerned, there is no necessity for that at all. I think we all agree that it will not be desirable to pass a prohibitory law unless there is a large majority in its favour, so that the case mentioned by the hon. member for York would not apply.

Mr. BRITTON.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You would not do it on a recount.

Mr. CRAIG. No. With reference to the word "cider." I think we had better leave it in the clause and prohibit cider as well as other intoxicating liquors; because cider is rather a dangerous drink in the view of temperance reformers, and if it were not included in a prohibitory law people might be open to the temptation.

Mr. POWELL. As regards the form of the ballot paper, I may say that the Minister of Agriculture has not that range of experience in this matter that I thought he had. In the very intelligent city of St. John, N.B., last election hundreds of ballots were rejected for being improperly marked, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Ellis) will bear me out in that statement. This may not be a very serious thing, and it may be a very serious thing; it just depends upon what view the Government will take of the result of the election. If they are going to require a certain percentage of the total votes upon the lists, then it would be very important indeed because all these votes would be counted against the temperance party. If the Government inclined to act on the majority of votes it will not be a very important matter, because there will likely be as many spoiled ballots on one side as on the other. Every precaution should be taken to have the matter as clear as possible. I believe there were over 150 spoiled ballots in the city of St. John at the last election, and I would like to hear from the hon. member (Mr. Ellis) as to that.

Mr. ELLIS. I cannot speak accurately from memory, but my recollection is that there were between 500 and 600 ballots rejected.

Mr. POWELL. That is a most intelligent constituency and yet between 500 and 600 ballots were rejected. If that were to occur on the plebiscite vote it might be a very serious matter, for if the Government require a certain percentage of the total vote the cause of the temperance people will suffer very seriously indeed.

On section 18,

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have not yet had any policy declared by the Government as to what they propose to do if there is a majority of votes in favour of prohibition? I think it should be given in connection with this clause because I presume it will be announced in the "Canada Gazette" whether or not it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Prohibition Bill.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We shall see when the "Canada Gazette" is published.

On schedule "b."

Mr. TAYLOR. I propose that the following be added as schedule "c":

I (A. B.), do solemnly declare that I have not before voted at this election at any other polling place.

In making this motion I have had it upon the best information that in the city of Montreal there are a thousand persons who average five votes each in Montreal in the different constituencies surrounding that city. There are at least 2,000 voters in the city of Montreal who have five votes each. These 2,000 persons voting five times against the Bill would be giving 10,000 votes, whereas 2,000 persons in Ontario could only give 2,000 votes. Therefore, I think this schedule should be added that an oath can be tendered to every voter, that he has voted only once on this question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. member was not in the House when the amendment was moved to section 5 by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in just the same sense, and it was lost.

Mr. TAYLOR. That simply referred to persons having one vote, whereas this refers to the oath that may be put to the voter. If the oath is not tendered, he may go on and vote.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The other amendment provided that no elector could vote more than once at this election, and I think it is the same opinion that is made by the hon. member now.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, he may vote if the oath is not tendered, at as many places as the law of the province will permit; but if the oath is tendered, he is only permitted to vote once. I think the schedule should be added.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In view of the specific declaration which we have had as to the policy of the Government, I think we should have another clause added to the Bill—it should be section 19—to the following effect:

Nothing in this Bill shall be taken to mean that the Government shall, under the circumstances, be compelled, morally or otherwise, to introduce a prohibitory measure.

I am humorous of course in proposing this, but I see that the Government do not see any humour in this matter at all. To them it is, Sir, no joking matter. It is getting serious.

Mr. CRAIG. I am glad the First Minister is in his place, because I desire to ask him a question about which it is most important this House and the country should know something at this time, that is, what will be considered a majority—a majority of the votes cast or a majority of the votes on the list? This is a question that has been talked about a good deal in the country. I am not speaking for the purpose of talking or finding fault, or criticising, or placing the Government in a false position, or in a hole, or anything of that kind. The hon. Minister of Railways a while ago rather insinuated that we were treating this matter in a jocular spirit. I am not treating it in that spirit at all. I know that a great many people, both temperance people and people who are not in favour of prohibition, think that before the Government should feel any obligation to bring down a prohibitory Bill, there should be a majority, not of the votes cast, but of all the voters on the list. I notice that that question has been discussed in some of the papers. It is feared that if this policy were laid down, it would simply mean that prohibition would be killed, because they say it would be impossible to get a majority of all the voters on the list for any measure of this kind—that no member of Parliament was ever elected by a vote of that kind. Whether that is so or not, before this measure, one of the most important that can be contemplated by any Government, goes through the House, we ought to have, if he will give it to us, the opinion of the Prime Minister, which will, no doubt, be the opinion of the Government, whether they will feel any obligation to propose a prohibitory law in case there is not a majority of the votes on the list cast in favour of it. I myself would like to have some declaration on that point. I have my own view, which I shall be pleased to state at the proper time.

The PRIME MINISTER. Would the hon. gentleman state his own view?

Mr. CRAIG. My own view is this, that in a measure of this kind there ought to be cast a majority of the votes on the list.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, we will take that into consideration.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not think that is treating me very fairly. The Prime Minister got me to state my view, and I think he should let us know what he thinks about it. My view makes no difference to the country, but his view may make a great deal of difference to the country.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend knows that I have great respect for his view on all questions, and I shall be glad to take into consideration his suggestion tonight.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Bill is reported, I would like to ask the hon. First Minister if he would now give the information to the House, and through the House to the country, as to the probable time when this vote will be taken. It is of the first importance that upon a vote of this kind there should be a thorough and exhaustive campaign and full notice provided for. I suppose, unless we have some declaration, that the people will only know the date of the election within four or five or six weeks of the time. I think that is not long enough for a campaign of this nature, and the First Minister would be doing a favour to both sides in the contest if he could name about the probable time at which the vote would be taken?

The PRIME MINISTER. I may say that it is the intention of the Government, as far as they can, to consult the wishes of the people in this matter. I presume that if the vote were to be taken, say towards the end of the summer or in the early fall, or thereabouts, that would be a convenient time.

Mr. FOSTER. That is somewhat satisfactory, and the country will understand from that unless some cataclysm takes place, the vote on this question will be taken about the end of the summer or the early part of the autumn.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is no cause for anxiety upon this point.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not indicating that there is anxiety at all whether or not there will be a vote. I think it would relieve the public mind and be fair to both parties if it were known about when the vote would take place; and the hon. gentleman has defined it as nearly as I think he can define it, about the end of the summer or early in the autumn, which I think is a very fair and satisfactory time to take the vote. There is another point, of academic importance; but it would be very interesting to know what operated to change the mind of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Louis Davies) within the last fortnight. He was very explicit when he wrote that letter, and he and the Government are very explicit today, but the two positions taken are diametrically opposite.

Mr. MILLS. In this connection I may say that it is a very interesting fact that a petition was sent by some persons in Nova Scotia about the time this letter came out from the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, calling upon me to use my best endeavours to see that the Government on this question required in answer a plain yes or no. But that petition was retained, the gentleman in whose hand it was placed being more of a politician than a temperance man, and it was not sent to me until yesterday, when it was found that the Government had changed their mode of procedure, and would require a plain yes or no in answer to the question.

Mr. FOSTER. A more interesting occurrence than that, I am told took place. I am told that one of the principal papers in the island has been vigorously arguing that there should be submitted just the plain question "yes" or "no." Very shortly after the publication of my hon. friend's letter, that paper came out in strong editorials saying that after all probably it was better that all sides of the question should be voted upon, both the prohibition question and the matter of taxation. I have not heard since what position that paper has taken.

Mr. FOSTER.

Amendment of (Mr. Taylor) negatived.

The committee reported Bill with amendments; amendments read the second time, and agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman state what will be the business to-morrow?

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. colleague the Solicitor General has been detained in Quebec by the unfortunate demise of a friend. We will take up the Franchise Bill if he is here to-morrow, and if not we will take up a few minor Bills, and then Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. If it will not interfere with the programme of the Government, I would prefer that the Franchise Bill should be left over until the day after to-morrow.

The PRIME MINISTER. That will be convenient to us, if the hon. gentleman desires it.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be more convenient to both sides of the House in the case of the Solicitor General's absence.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the Solicitor General is absent, then we will hold the Bill over to suit the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 4th May, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND STEAM BOILERS.

On the order being called for the introduction of Bill respecting the examination of stationary engineers and the inspection of steam boilers.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

Mr. SUTHERLAND. When this Bill was first brought up for discussion, members on both sides suggested that the legislation proposed was not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, but that of the provinces, and it was suggested that the opinion of the Department of Justice should be had on that point. The Department of Justice has given its opinion that this legislation comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and therefore I would ask you to withdraw it.

Order dropped.

THE CRIMINAL CODE.

Mr. FLINT moved first reading of Bill (No. 134) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892. He said: This Bill is of a purely technical character and its object is to provide that where imprisonment may be inflicted in the case of the contravention of certain portions of the criminal law, on the non-payment of the pecuniary penalty, hard labour may be added. By some strange oversight in the framing of the Criminal Code, it appears that, in many instances, imprisonment with hard labour can be inflicted for the non-payment of costs, but that only imprisonment, without hard labour, may be inflicted upon non-payment of the fine imposed. My attention was drawn to the case of the Queen vs. Horton in the province of Nova Scotia, in which this matter was discussed, and in which it was held that although in certain cases the penalty of hard labour might be imposed for non-payment of the costs, it could not be imposed for non-payment of the fine. I propose then to amend section 872 of the Criminal Code by inserting after the word "months" in the 9th line of paragraph A, the words "with hard labour," and after the word "months" in paragraph B, the words "with hard labour." I do not care to go into a thorough explanation of this Bill on the first reading, as I think it would be more desirable that hon. members should have the Bill printed in their hands before we enter into any discussion of it. It certainly does appear an oversight that under any clause of the Criminal Code, hard labour can be imposed for non-payment of costs and not for non-payment of a fine. I am informed by a stipendiary justice carrying out the law, that it works to the disadvantage of the public in this respect, that parties convicted, perfectly able to pay the fine, and who would have paid it if the justices had the power to inflict imprisonment with hard labour for non-payment, prefer to spend the allotted term in prison without hard labour, rather than pay the fine.

Mr. TISDALE. The session has reached such a stage that I think it is hardly advisable to take up the consideration of a matter of that sort which will involve, according to the statement of the hon. gentleman himself, considerable discussion. It would probably be better to let the notice stand and bring up the Bill at an earlier stage next session. By introducing his Bill now, the hon. gentleman will give us an opportunity to consider it during recess, but I think it would not be desirable to press it to a second reading, for we could hardly hope for a discussion of the principle of an important amendment to the Criminal Code at this stage of the session. I hope that we are getting within sight of prorogation, and if that is the case, we can hardly be expected to deal with so important a measure introduced at this stage.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT KILLARNEY.

Mr. ROCHE (by Mr. Taylor) asked.

1. Were charges made against Thomas Shannon, late sub-collector of customs at port of Killarney? If so, what was the nature of those charges?
2. Who made the charges, and was an investigation held? If so, by whom?
3. Was counsel permitted to represent either party at investigation? If so, who?
4. Was a petition sent into the Government, after the holding of investigation, asking to retain the services of Mr Shannon?
5. Who is now sub-collector at Killarney? Is he now personally discharging the duties of the office, or has he received leave of absence? If so, for what purpose?
6. Has the present sub-collector given bonds?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Mr. Shannon was charged with political partisan conduct during the last Dominion general election. 2. The charges were made by Mr. R. L. Richardson, M.P. An investigation was held by A. N. MacPherson, barrister, of Winnipeg, a commissioner appointed for the purpose of this and other investigations. 3. It does not appear from the record that either party was represented by counsel at the investigation. The department is not aware that a request was made by either party to have counsel present. 4. Yes. 5. Hugh Miller Sutherland is now sub-collector of customs at Killarney. He is not personally discharging the duties of the office at present, being laid up through illness. 6. The department has not yet received bonds from the sub-collector, but it is informed that application has been made by him to a guarantee company for such bonds, and it is expected that the same will be received soon.

THOMAS NULTY.

Mr. DUGAS asked,

Has the Minister of Justice received petitions asking for a commutation of the sentence of death recorded against Thomas Nulty, convicted of murder at the last assizes for the district of Joliette?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No petitions have been received asking for the commutation of the sentence recorded against Thomas Nulty.

POSTMASTER AT ELKHORN, MAN.

Mr. ROCHE (by Mr. Taylor) asked,

1. Who has been appointed postmaster at Elkhorn, Manitoba, in the place of the late John McLeod ?

2. Who recommended his appointment ?

3. Was a petition received for the appointment of James S. McLeod, son of the late postmaster ?

4. If so, how many names were on the petition ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state that William M. Cushing has been appointed postmaster at Elkhorn, in place of John McLeod, deceased. Mr. Cushing was appointed on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior, who represents the riding in which the post office is situated. No petition was received for the appointment of Mr. James S. McLeod until after Mr. Cushing had been appointed. Subsequent to that appointment, a petition asking for Mr. McLeod's appointment was received.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has not answered the last question.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not the number of names on the petition. I thought it was immaterial in view of the fact that the petition came in subsequent to the appointment.

DREDGING TORONTO HARBOUR.

Mr. CLARKE asked,

1. Has a contract or agreement been made for the dredging to be done in connection with the Toronto harbour works for the season of 1898 ?

2. If so, upon what terms ?

3. Were public tenders asked for ? If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. On the 19th July, 1897, an agreement was entered into for the dredging required. The same agreement holds good for season of 1898-99. 2. W. E. Phin, at the rate of $8 per working hour. 3. No. It has always been the custom of the department to give out dredging of this nature to persons having the plant required, at a fixed rate never exceeding $8 per hour.

DISTRIBUTION OF KLONDIKE OFFICIAL GUIDE.

Mr. MILLS asked,

What are the names of the Senators and Members who have been forwarded the Ogilvie Klondike Official Guide, and how many of such guides to each ?

Mr. DUGAS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Ten copies of the Klondike Guide were forwarded from the Department of the Interior to every member of the House of Commons whose name appears in the official list of members, and five copies to every member of the Senate whose name appears in the official list of Senators.

Mr. MILLS. Quite a number did not get them.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is the fault of the post office, then, for they were all sent.

FASCINE FISHERY AND RIPARIAN OWNER.

Mr. FOSTER asked,

1. Was any objection made by D. and A. Gauthier, of St. Irénée, Charlevoix County, to the reissue of a license for erecting a fascine fishery in front of D. Gauthier's property by one Paulémon Gauthier ?

2. If so, what was the objection, and to what extent did it prevail ?

3. To whom was the license granted, and on what grounds ?

4. What is the rule of the department in regard to the licensing of fascine fisheries in front of properties owned and occupied, when applications are made by owners and non-owners ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Sir Louis Davies). The answers to the hon. gentleman's questions are as follows:—1. Yes. 2. The ownership of the property in which the fishery was set; their claim to the fishery was not admitted. 3. Mr. Paulémon Gauthier, who had been an occupant of the fishery for twenty years. 4. Other things being equal, if a license were granted the owner would get the preference; although the department does not necessarily recognize riparian ownership as carrying with it the right of such license.

THE VACANCY IN BAGOT.

Mr. BERGERON. I desire to ask the right hon. Premier (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if the Government have appointed a returning officer and fixed a day for the election in the county of Bagot ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). They have not.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the right hon. gentleman if it is his intention to do so during the life of the present session ?

The PRIME MINISTER. I suggested the other day what I thought was a very reasonable course, but this suggestion does not seem to have been received with favour by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), and the Government will have to consider its action again.

FREE MINERS' LICENSES.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to remind the Minister of the Interior of the promise he made to inform us as to the issue of miners' licenses in the passes at the entrance to the Yukon country.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). When this matter was brought up by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), I asked that it be allowed to stand because I came in when the hon. gentleman was making his remarks, and I did not know what he had said before I entered the Chamber. The matter referred to was the issue of free miners' licenses in the Yukon district. I beg to say in regard to that matter that I have given directions that miners' licenses should be issued by all the customs officers and mining recorders in the Yukon district. This course has been taken in consequence of the report of Major Walsh, the commissioner, who reported that there was serious difficulty arising in dealing with the people who had gone in and who could not get miners' licenses without going back to Victoria or Vancouver, which would be impossible.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior whether the rumour is true that Major Walsh is returning from his travels without having reached the Yukon country, and if so, what is the cause of this turning back?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that Major Walsh has been in the Yukon country for several months, and he is not returning without having reached Dawson City, which is, I believe, the point the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has in his mind.

Mr. WALLACE. Has he reached Dawson City?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No, he has not.

Mr. WALLACE. Is he returning?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. He is not.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the return he has brought down to a motion made on the 14th of March, for copies of all papers connected with the letting of the contract for the construction of a railway bridge at Edmonton, including advertisements, specifications, tenders, the contract, and any subsequent modification of the same, correspondence, and returns respecting the forfeitures connected with said contract, and the action of the Government thereon, and a further return stating the condition of the work at present. I call the Minister's attention to the fact that the papers are not complete; he has not here the extension of the contract. On September 22nd, the engineer reported on the subject, and there is an Order in Council here, but the paper dealing with the subsequent action of the department with the contractor is not here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I can only say that I instructed my officers to give everything we had, but I will draw their attention to what my hon. friend says now.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the Minister allow me also to suggest, although it is not literally called for here, yet I think it was by implication called for, and as there could be no objection to it—would the Minister also give directions that not only the extension of the contract should be brought down, but also the plan?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot see any objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if anything has been done in connection with the matter I brought before the House a few days ago concerning the Saskatoon bridge. He promised to look into it, and to say what the Government would do.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Immediately on receiving the correspondence from the hon. gentleman, I forwarded it with some inquiries to the Department of Justice for the opinion of the Minister thereon. I have not yet had a reply from him.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to remind the Minister of the Interior that he has not brought down that return in answer to an Address passed early in the last session for a list of the mining and dredging licenses.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I will inquire and let the hon. gentleman know to-morrow. The return must be very voluminous, and extra clerks have been working on it. I hope to be able to lay it on the Table within a day or two.

Mr. CALVERT. I desire to ask the Government when we may expect the papers with reference to the late London election fire, for which an order was passed some time ago.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will take note of that.

THE YUKON CONTINGENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to mention a matter which came up two or three days ago when I made a suggestion that the Minister of Militia and Defence might very well give some information to the House with reference to the military expedition which I believe has been prepared and is now on its way to the Yukon. It is a matter, as I stated then, involving a large amount of expenditure, and information has not been given to Parliament as to the reasons for it, its size, and generally information with reference to the expedition. The hon. gentleman, I think, promised to give that information in a day or two. I will suggest now that if he is prepared to give it, it would be convenient for the members to have it when they go into the Estimates. There may be a little discussion about it.

ACCIDENT AT WELLINGTON BRIDGE, MONTREAL.

Mr. QUINN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like again to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the subject which I brought up on Monday last, that is, the accident at the Wellington bridge, Montreal, and to an incident connected with it wherein a young man named Mattison risked his life for the purpose of saving the lives of those who had fallen into the canal. The Minister of Railways and Canals was good enough to say that he would cause an inquiry to be made concerning it; and I wish at the same time to draw his attention to the conduct of this young man, and to suggest that some recognition of his services should be made by the Government, or that his conduct should be reported to the Royal Humane Society.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have given instructions to inquire into the circumstances of that accident, and I will be glad to take into account what the hon. gentleman has said.

PREFERENTIAL TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask my right hon. friend whether he has been able to decide to give me a day, not later than Wednesday of next week, to discuss the subject of preferential trade with Great Britain.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I will be able to give a day to my hon. friend, and during the course of to-day, I will tell him what day we can give to that subject.

DEPARTMENT OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Bill (No. 114) further to amend the Act respecting the Department of the Geological

Mr. FOSTER.

Survey was read the second time, and the House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have some reasons from the Minister as to why this change is necessary, and as to what extent he proposes to use this power.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Bill is for the purpose of giving power to the Minister who has charge of the department, upon the recommendation of the director of the Geological Survey, as my hon. friend will see by reading the two clauses, to employ such a number of temporary assistants as technical officers as may be necessary, without being limited by the provisions of the Civil Service Act in regard to the payment of these officials. Under the Civil Service Act it would be impossible to pay these men more than $400 per annum. The director of the survey finds it necessary for short periods to employ men possessed of special technical qualifications, and it is impossible to procure the services of those men for $400 a year. It is not desired to appoint them permanently, but he wishes to have this power so as to have a free hand on special occasions when work requires to be done.
