The increase of $1,900 for the administrative division comprises $1,400 for printing and stationery and $500 for travelling expenses. In the dairy produce division, there is an increase of $9,775, for travelling expenses, but against that there is a decrease in other branches of the service, so that the net increase is $7,500. In the dairy markets division there is a total increase of $6,300. There is an increase of $156.60 for communication services. In order to take care of the purchase of a thermograph and repairs to same, the amount for equipment has been increased by $500. Under miscellaneous current expenses there is an increase of $12.50, and other increases as follows: salaries, $2,166; general supplies, $225; refrigeration car service, $1,500; travelling expenses, $1,740—and that increase is largely to take care of the travelling expenses of the new supervisor of condensers—dairy research division, increase of $800—and this is made up of an increase of $181 for supplies for dairy research laboratory—an increase of $25 in transportation charges for materials, and it has been found necessary to increase the amount for travelling expenses by $594. In the milk utilization service the increase is $1,500. This includes an increase of $25 for communication services. There is also an increase of $25 in the amount for wages for assistants at exhibitions. The amount provided for travelling expenses for 1936-37 was found to be less than required, and it has been necessary to increase this amount by $1,450. This makes a total increase of $18,000.

Mr. THOMPSON: What does the minister propose to do in connection with dairy marketing? In what way is he going to expend the increased grant which has been made for that purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: I just gave the explanation, in reading from the items that are contained in this appropriation: dairy markets division, an increase of $6,300. It has been found necessary to increase the amount for communication services by $156.60. That is a very small item of increase in the matter of communication expenses. In order to take care of the purchase of thermographs and repairs to the same, the amount for equipment has been increased by $500. That increase does not necessarily mean that there is any particularly increased service; it is a matter of buying thermographs and paying for repairs to them. Under miscellaneous current expenses an increase of $12.50 is shown. In salaries an increase of $2,160 is made necessary on account of the appointment of a supervisor of condenseries. It is not an additional service. It shows an addition in this particular branch, but it has been taken out of another branch, and the individual who was doing this work before in one of the other branches is now appointed in this one, with this particular title. The other amounts are small.

Mr. THOMPSON: I asked the question because, although we hear a great deal about improved conditions, we have not improved conditions in the dairy business. As regards our butter and our cheese we are very slightly better off than we were a year ago, and the dairy farmer is not receiving any participation in what is called the return of prosperity. It is true that we in Canada have been manufacturing the best cheese in the world. It commands in the British market a higher price than any other make except the English cheddar, and it has lately been displacing that, because they are not making it in such large quantities as formerly. The cheese we are producing and exporting is selling in the British market to-day at a premium of two cents per pound over the best New Zealand cheese. That speaks for itself. We cannot say so much for our butter. We cannot compete with New Zealand as regards butter, and if we were to export our butter to-day we should have to take at least five or six cents per pound less than we are getting on the local market. To-day our local markets are no better than they were a year ago. By that I mean that the dairymen are not participating to any very great extent in the return to prosperity.

In respect of the increase in salaries, I should like to know whether it represents increases in the salaries of the present staff or an addition to the personnel of the staff.

Mr. GARDINER: So far as the references to the condition of the dairy farmer are concerned, I think the figures indicate that those statements are scarcely in accordance with the facts.

As regards the price of cheese, the average increase last year, taking the year through, over the previous year is 2·6 cents per pound. That is a very considerable increase when one remembers that a year ago cheese was selling at around ten to eleven cents per pound. The average increase over the year of 2·6 cents is a very considerable percentage of the price we were obtaining at that time.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the minister where he obtained those figures?

Mr. GARDINER: I obtained them from the records of the department, and I believe an examination of the records generally will indicate that to be true. It is just six o'clock, and probably it would be well to discuss this matter at greater length after we return at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

THE LATE HON. CHARLES MARCIL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since the house rose at six o'clock we have had word of the death of Hon. Charles Marcil, one of our members, the oldest in point of service in the house, and a former Speaker. On discussing the matter with such members as I have been able to reach in the meantime it was felt that it would be a fitting tribute to his memory if this house adjourned. I therefore move that the house do now adjourn.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to associate myself with what has been said by the Minister of Finance. I think it is entirely fitting and proper that this chamber, out of deference and respect and regard and esteem for its oldest member in point of service, and one who has been the first commoner of Canada, should now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 8.05 p.m.

Monday, February 1, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HON. CHARLES MARCIL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house is already aware of the great loss which its membership sustained on Friday last by the death of the hon. member for Bonaventure, Hon. Charles Marcil. The adjournment of this house on Friday evening was an impressive collective tribute on the part of hon. members to the memory of one who had attended forty consecutive sessions of this parliament, and who in point of service was its oldest member. This morning the citizens of the capital and many from other parts of the country joined with hon. members of both houses in paying a further tribute of respect to the memory of him who had become so familiar a figure in the public life of our country. The press, of all shades of political thought, have united in expressions of appreciation of Mr. Marcil's many years of public service. The tributes thus expressed have been supplemented by others from former political opponents as well as personal and political friends and by the clergy of the church of which he was so devout a member.

In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising this afternoon is primarily that of gratefully acknowledging what has already been said by way of tribute to the memory of our late fellow member, and of saying, on behalf of those who knew him best, how worthy he was of the eulogies which have been expressed. Mr. Marcil's public life in Canada is generally known to all who are here assembled. I imagine that what our own and future generations will regard as of surpassing interest in his long career is the link which it affords between a past which is rapidly receding and a future which is certain to be full of change.

The Hon. Charles Marcil came of a family nine generations of which had lived in the province of Quebec and of which ten generations extend over three centuries. He was born in Ste. Scholastique on July 1, 1860. Like the late Hon. Peter Veniot, his deskmate for a period, to whom tribute was paid only a few days ago, he was one of the very few remaining members of this parliament who were born prior to confederation and who, from memory, could recall incidents associated with that great event. He was one of another group, somewhat larger but also much too rapidly disappearing who sat in this house with the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

With Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Marcil was privileged to enjoy a close personal as well as political friendship. There was much in the lives of Mr. Marcil and Sir Wilfrid Laurier which made the association between them natural as well as close. Both, as I have said already of Mr. Marcil, came of families that for many generations had lived in the province of Quebec. The early careers of each had its association with journalism, each came to devote his entire time to politics. Both Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Marcil were endowed by nature with real distinction in appearance which their habit of thought and manner of life, as the years went by, continued greatly to refine. Both were gifted as writers and speakers, and each spoke with equal fluency in the French or the English language. I doubt if anyone who had not heard Mr. Marcil in his prime can imagine with what freedom and grace he spoke alike in French and in English. He was, I think, at his best depicting a scene from the romantic background of our country's history, or foreshadowing the greatness of Canada's future as he conceived it would become. He was a true Canadian, with great faith in Canada and the place Canada would come to hold among the nations of the world. That faith, throughout his life, he ever sought to impress upon his fellow countrymen. He was an ardent Liberal, strong in his convictions, but always moderate and tolerant in the manner in which he spoke. Like Sir Wilfrid, he exhibited at all times those attributes of courtesy and chivalry so characteristic of the race and generation to which each belonged. It was a part of Mr. Marcil's contribution to the parliament of our day that when he presided over the proceedings of this chamber or participated in its debates he was true not only to the Laurier tradition in his point of view but, expressed himself in the Laurier manner with grace and dignity.

An estimate of Mr. Marcil's contribution to the life and work of this parliament would require perusal of its records and debates over forty sessions. To such a degree did he enjoy the unbroken confidence of his constituents that he was elected by them to ten consecutive parliaments. With the exception of two instances, so far as I have been able to ascertain, this record has not been surpassed. I believe Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself and the late Hon. John Haggart each sat in this House of Commons through eleven parliaments.

Mr. Marcil's return on so many occasions was a well deserved record of confidence and one which reflected equal credit upon his constituents. Last night I took occasion to glance through the pages of Hansard of the previous session in order to see what Mr. Marcil had said on the last occasion on which he spoke in this chamber. It was not surprising to discover that his last word was one of grateful acknowledgment to a minister of the crown for something the minister had been able to do which was of assistance to the constituency represented by Mr. Marcil and to adjoining constituencies. Confidence akin to that so fully given to Mr. Marcil by his constituents was also expressed in a very real way by his fellow members in this house of commons who elected him successively to the position of deputy Speaker and chairman of committees in 1905, and to that of Speaker in 1909, a recognition which was further emphasized by his appointment in 1911 as a member of the privy council of Canada. During the last four parliaments his fellow members of the Liberal party chose him as permanent chairman of the party caucus. In the course of his long life of public service, there was much else in the way of recognition of his abilities and attainments by municipalities, representative organizations, societies, universities and by governments in our own and other countries.

Mr. Marcil was in his 77th year. For a life so full of service, of achievement and of well merited recognition, there surely can be either for him or for us no occasion for regret that he was taken away while still a member of the House of Commons and its oldest member in point of service. We shall miss the benefit of his long experience and wise counsel in parliamentary affairs, but to have had his faculties unimpaired to the end, and to have been spared the infirmities, disappointments and decline which too often are the accompaniment of advancing years is something which of itself is in the nature of a benediction, and something we should not begrudge him who has been taken from us.

It was his to enjoy the fulfilment of the ancient promise—

"Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age
Like a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

As one whose life's endeavours were thus rewarded, his name will hold an honoured place in the history of this parliament, and his memory will continue to be cherished by all who knew him.

Mr. Speaker, this house will look to your Honour to convey to Mrs. Marcil and other members of the family an expression of its sincere and deep sympathy in their bereavement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are reminded by what has been said, as well as by our own observation and experience, that the hand of death is ever with us. My first expression is one of deep regret that this house has lost the knowledge and experience of one who was its dean in point of service.

With respect to the character and extent of the service rendered by our late comrade and fellow member, I can add nothing to what has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). To have been a member of the house during ten parliaments is an almost unique experience. Indeed he was a connecting link between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries; for he was elected Speaker of the house before most of us had a seat in the chamber. His life is a history of the years from 1900 to 1936.

I should like, too, to express my sincere sympathy to the right hon. the leader of the government, to his colleagues and the supporters of his administration, in the loss they have sustained both collectively and individually. They have lost a faithful friend, a warm supporter, a devoted follower, and a worthy exponent of the principles of Liberalism as he saw them. Faithful in the discharge of his duties, he was ever mindful of the claims of those who lived in the Gaspé peninsula. Those of us who have listened to him in the house will realize that while his convictions were strong he spoke but seldom, and expressed them in terms both moderate and persuasive.

Obviously it is not for one situated as I am to speak with any degree of authority as to the value and extent of the service he rendered to his party, and through it to the country. But I can say that on the other side of his life, that side we describe as citizenship, his example was of the first order. By precept he created for himself an influence which cannot readily be estimated. Sometimes it is difficult to appraise the value of public service. Opinions clash, criticism is keen, antagonisms are great, and regard for human frailty is not very evident. But when we come to consider the life of one who was a citizen of the community and occupied a public place, I think we are well within the mark when we say that by precept and example Mr. Marcil's life must stand as an influence to younger men not only of this day but of the generations which have come into the world during the time he lived among us. He was courteous; he was kind; he was considerate of others; he was unselfish; he was generous to a fault, and, within limits, he was most tolerant. He had that inward peace which is reflected in the outward man. His countenance indicated that quietness of mind which rises superior to all philosophic doubts or scientific dogma. He was devout, intensely so; he believed in religion as a practical living and moving force. He practised it, and the influence of his example among younger men cannot fail to have had a very marked effect among those with whom he came in contact.

These attributes were known to us all, whether he was our close personal friend, our political associate or otherwise known to us. Those of us who sometimes saw that courtly smile always received it as almost a benediction. I think I can say nothing that would more clearly indicate the impression his life has made upon mankind than the words I have just spoken. If ever there was among those whom I have known in the House of Commons and elsewhere one who seemed to me to give a fair answer to that age-old question, a question that concerns us all—"And what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"—it was Charles Marcil, whose passing we so greatly deplore.

Speaking for those associated with me, I trust the leader of the house will convey to the sorrowing relatives he has left behind an expression of our deep and sincere regret at the great loss they have sustained.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my personal tribute to those which the prime minister and the leader of the opposition have just paid to the memory of our late lamented fellow-member. Hon. Mr. Marcil was the only member of this parliament who was in the house in 1904, when I came here for the first time. I knew him previously, for he was one of the public speakers whose eloquence had thrilled my youth. His melodious voice, his phrase which seemed to flow harmoniously like a clear and beautiful stream, his imposing and dignified presence made him a favourite speaker among the people. Sir Wilfrid Laurier once told me that he knew of no Canadian who had so perfectly mastered the two official languages of this country. During thirty-three years, I sat at his side, and it is with deep emotion that I bear testimony to his having always been a devoted friend, a loyal colleague and a wise counsellor. Owing to his extreme kindness he could not have enemies. "Charlie" Marcil never hated anybody. Nothing could ever impair his equanimity and natural rectitude. He gave all his intellect, all his heart, all his life to his country, to his friends, and to the principles he held dear. Intensely religious, as it has just been pointed out, he was a model of piety, charity and devotedness. He was a great Canadian.

To Mrs. Marcil and the other members of his family, to his faithful constituents in Bonaventure, I wish particularly to tender the sympathies of the French Canadian members of this house.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my poor tribute to the dear dead colleague whose passing we to-day mourn. He was my friend and intimate, and I think it is probably true to say that at the time of his death I was his oldest living friend. It was in 1879, fifty-eight years ago, that he began his journalistic career on the staff of the Montreal Gazette, with which paper I had been associated since June, 1874. My recollection is that Mr. Marcil as a youngster—he was then only nineteen years of age—had a great flair for politics. He began life as an adherent of the Conservative party, and his earlier speeches on the public platform were delivered in the cause of that party. Not many years thereafter, from convictions the sincerity of which no man who knew Charlie Marcil will for a moment doubt, he changed his party allegiance. Throughout the rest of his life it can be said that he was a consistent and stalwart member and supporter of the Liberal cause.

His attainments were great. He was distinguished in many ways. He not only served his country in this House of Commons, but he served the city in which he lived, Montreal, first as a member of the city council and subsequently as one of the commissioners to whom the management of the city was entrusted. Summing up his character in a word, one can say of him that he was a gentleman.

The duration of his public life is almost unexampled. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to two other men in public life, Mr. John Haggart and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who sat in parliament for perhaps as long a period as did Mr. Marcil. Of course the outstanding example of public service in parliament was that of Macdonald, who sat for forty-seven consecutive sessions, first in the legislature of the old province of Canada and then in this House of Commons. In a way the greatest tribute that has been or can be paid to Mr. Marcil is the fact that during the nearly thirty-seven years in which he was a member of this house he represented the same constituency, which is at once a tribute to his integrity, his character, his kindliness, and his ability. He was a most fluent speaker, as has been said, in both languages. Having had an Irish mother he probably lisped English at his mother's knee, but doubtless he would call himself, because of his ancestors through a long line, a French-Canadian, as he was in heart and spirit. He was a broad-minded man. I would not call him a partisan; I think that would be an unfair term to apply to Charlie Marcil. I would call him a moderate Liberal. He was always ready to give and take, and any opponent who may have crossed swords with him or differed from him in discussion would at least have agreed that he was fair in the maintenance of his views, and would have concluded that discussion with an esteem and respect and even an affection for Mr. Marcil.

I have said that as a young man campaigning in the good old province of Quebec he made a reputation as an orator. I know as a matter of fact, and he was no mean judge, that the late Sir Adolphe Chapleau, regarded Mr. Marcil as one of the rising young men of Canada, an appreciation that has been fully justified.

Let me just say this in conclusion. If it can be said of any man it can be said of Charlie Marcil that—

> He had kept
> The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not necessary that anything more should be said, but we in this group would like to associate ourselves with the tributes of respect that have been paid and to offer our very deep sympathy to those whom our late colleague has left behind him. The distinguished bearing and finely chiselled features of Mr. Marcil marked him out, I think, in almost any company, and, further than that, they seemed to indicate a certain spiritual quality not very common. I had thought, in trying to sum up the impression Mr. Marcil had made upon us, rather of the words just uttered by the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White)—he was a gentleman; and I think I might add—and I do in all respect—a gentleman of the old school. We shall all miss him.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, judging from the manifest sincerity of the words of esteem with which previous speakers have praised the life of the late Mr. Marcil, and of the tone in which they were uttered, I deem it a privilege to join my voice with those who have already honoured him. It has been written: Blessed is he who has found his work; let him seek no greater blessedness. This man evidently had found his work, and ably he did it. During much of my life I have felt that one of the greatest blessings would be that of having the privilege of dying in harness. Mr. Marcil was blessed thus, and it can therefore be said that he has been blessed both in his living and in his dying. Our group rejoices to honour such a man.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO HIGH PRICES WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO INCREASES FOR 1936

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, since the subject matter of this motion has been before the house previously and the names of the members of the committee have been considered by all groups, I would ask leave of the house to move, without notice:

That a select special committee of the house be appointed to continue and complete an inquiry begun by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, pursuant to a resolution of the house on March 2, 1936, into the causes underlying the high prices of farm implements, with particular reference to the advance in prices in the year 1936.

That the said select special committee shall have the power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

That the said select special committee be authorized to engage the services of counsel, auditors, technical advisers, clerks, stenographers and investigators to aid and assist the said committee in the inquiry, and to print the evidence, proceedings and documents received by the committee.

That standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto, and that the select special committee shall consist of twenty-five members and the following be appointed members of the said committee: Messrs. Bouchard, Brooks, Cochrane, Coldwell, Davidson, Donnelly, Fraser, Gardiner, Golding, Johnston (Lake Centre), Lacroix (Beauce), Leader, Macdonald (Brantford City), McLean (Melfort), McNevin, Needham, Perley (Qu'Appelle), Reid, Robichaud, Senn, Stevens, Taylor (Norfolk), Thorson, Tolmie, Ward.

And furthermore, that the records, exhibits and evidence received and taken by the standing committee on agriculture and colonization during the last session of parliament be made available to the said select special committee.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, for reasons that I made quite clear last session I do not agree with the steps that are being taken, but it is sufficient to say that; for it is quite evident that the government desires to proceed in this way, and having sufficient numbers to enable it to do so, that is the end of it. I think an inquiry of another kind would have been very much better than an inquiry before a political committee. I think it would be very much better to have a non-party body—not partisan but non-party—judicial or otherwise, than a committee of this house, to consider a matter that will lend itself to so much acrimonious discussion. I assume it was for that reason that the government selected a judge rather than a committee of this house to investigate textile matters. I believe that that is a much sounder method, but since the government has decided to proceed with a committee, I think the motion itself is hardly ample so far as the last paragraph is concerned. It is a motion to continue an investigation that has already been partly carried out, and it is not sufficient to say that what has already been done should be made available to the committee; it should be provided that what has been taken in the way of records shall become part of the records of the continuing committee. Simply to make it available does not enable the committee to utilize it for the purpose of predicating findings upon it. It should become part of the records of the new committee. I shall content myself with making this observation, but I cannot think that the end sought will be accomplished as effectively as it would be by the utilization of the other method. Had that been done, the inquiry might have been carried on during the recess and the results made available to parliament, which is hardly possible now so far as this session is concerned.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my right hon. friend that the government is proceeding in this way because of an undertaking given at the conclusion of last session that this committee would be reconstituted. If my right hon. friend had raised the point then—

Mr. BENNETT: I did. I opposed it very strongly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then, what I was going to say will not apply. However, the reason we are proceeding is, as I have indicated, because a pledge was given to the house that the committee would be reconstituted at this time.

Mr. GARDINER: As to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition, I did not catch the point, but I understand he suggested that the words be added, "and made part of the records thereof."

Mr. BENNETT: I merely suggested that so that no question should arise.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I think that would be an advantage, and I move that those words be added.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT, 1931

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13 to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Mr. RINFRET: Will the hon. member explain?

Mr. ESLING: By this bill it is sought to amend two sections of the Copyright Act which refer only to musical works. Hon. members will recall that the Canadian Performing Right Society exercises authority under the statute to issue licences and to collect fees in compensation for the use of music which the society claims to control. As a matter of fact it assumes control of between two and three million titles. It assumes control of almost everything that is on the air, and when, an applicant for a licence suggests to the society that it should give him a list of the titles to which it claims control, it simply replies with a statement that the society does not have to furnish such a list and that the applicant can get the information by going to the copyright office in Ottawa. This is not a very satisfactory response to an applicant in, we will say, Saskatoon or Prince Rupert or some far distant community, and the purpose of one of the amendments is to require the Canadian Performing Right Society to furnish to each applicant a list, certified to by the Secretary of State, showing that the society is in actual possesion or control of the titles to music in respect of which it attempts to collect a fee.

As to the other amendment, under the tariff just revised by the copyright appeal board the various broadcasting stations throughout the dominion will pay to the Canadian Performing Right Society the sum of $70,000, which covers fees for receiving sets known as domestic receiving sets. I assume that to mean that they are receiving sets in private homes. But there is a special licence and special fee required from stores, skating rinks, lodge halls, hotels, restaurants, cabarets and like places; this speacial fee is fixed at a minimum of five dollars, with accumulations and conditions making gradual increases to a maximum which is uncertain. These establishments contend that, in view of the fact that the broadcasting stations pay such generous licence fees to the performing right society, a second tax by way of a special radio license fee is unjust. The second amendment therefore seeks to exempt stores, skating rinks, hotels, restaurants and such small establishments from a second radio tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What share does the federal government contribute to the provincial government of Quebec, under the Old Age Pensions Act?
2. Has the federal government, under this law, granted certain sums to the Quebec provincial government?
3. If so, what is the amount?
4. Does the federal government appoint any investigating officers to examine the claims of those applying for Old Age Pensions in the province of Quebec?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Under agreements between the dominion government and the provincial governments drawn under authority of the Old Age Pensions Act as amended, the dominion pays 75 per cent of the net amount paid out for pensions by each province which has signed an agreement.

2. No. An agreement with the province of Quebec was signed on August 13, 1936. Later the province of Quebec amended its legislation and these amendments will make necessary a new agreement with the province before any payments may be made by the dominion.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Officials of the dominion government will examine all papers and documents relating to the province's expenditure of the moneys granted by parliament for the payment of Old Age Pensions.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any loans been made to date in the city of Toronto, arranged by the federal unemployment commission through the banks, under the Housing Act of 1936?
2. If so, how many, and what is the aggregate amount of said loans?

Mr. DUNNING: Up to December 31, 1936, there had been made in the city of Toronto, under the home improvement plan, a total of 274 loans aggregating $103,330.27.

IMPORTS OF WELSH COAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many tons of Welsh coal were imported into Canada during the last three years of record?
2. Has the attention of the government been called to the report of the investigations by "The Welsh recovery committee" relative to the lifting of the ban on Russion anthracite by Canada?
3. Will the government allow the house an opportunity of discussing the removal of the ban on Russian coal?
4. How much Russian coal has been received in Canada during the year ending December 31, 1936?

[Mr. Rogers.]

5. When will the report of the commission headed by Dr. Tory, regarding coal inquiry, be tabled?
6. Have any prosecutions been made of those cited during the last federal inquiry?
7. Have any parts or provinces of Canada been exempted from the Russian import coal agreement?
8. How many tons of Nova Scotia and other coal from the maritime provinces have been moved to the head of the lakes during the past three years?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. There is no record of Welsh coal imported into Canada as distinguished from other coal from the United Kingdom.

2. No: though from time to time statements of the South Wales trade recovery and expansion committee have been noted in the press.

3. Question of policy.

4. There were no imports of coal from Russia during the year ended December 31, 1936.

5. The report has not yet been received, but will be tabled following its receipt.

6. Ten coal companies in the province of Quebec were convicted in trials following the investigation made in 1933 under the Combines Investigation Act.

7. No. In the statement issued by the official Soviet Russian news agency on the lifting of the embargo on the importation into Canada of certain Soviet products, it was stated that "Soyuzgleexport (the All-Union Coal Export and Import Corporation) has no intention to ship coal for consumption in the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island."

8. No record of shipments of Nova Scotia and other coal from the maritime provinces to the head of the lakes during the past three years.

IMPERIAL SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Mr. REID:

1. Was the Canadian government represented at the Imperial conference held in London in 1936, at which the matter of subsidized ships operating on the Pacific Ocean, was discussed?
2. If so, who represented Canada at that conference?
3. Were any conclusions reached with regard to the maintaining of ships of British or Canadian registry and ownership, operating from British Columbia Pacific ports?
4. Were any proposals made that Canada should join with Great Britain and the sister dominions in maintaining an all-British shipping route on the Pacific ocean?
5. Has any report been submitted to the Canadian government by the representative?
6. If so, when will that report be available to the members of parliament?

7. Have any representations been made by the imperial government with reference to this matter during the past twelve months?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1 and 2. No imperial conference was held in London in 1936. The Imperial Shipping Committee, acting under their general terms of reference as amended by the Imperial conference of 1930, have conducted an investigation of a fact-finding nature into certain matters specially referred to them in June, 1936, by the governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, concerning the possibilities of a passenger and cargo service between Western Canada and Australia—New Zealand. The High Commissioner for Canada in London is a member of the committee on behalf of the government of Canada and acted accordingly in this special investigation.

3, 4 and 5. The report of the Imperial Shipping Committee, as submitted by the chairman on behalf of the committee to each of the above mentioned governments, was published on December 7, 1936. It sets forth the committee's findings of fact and views as to alternative possibilities regarding the matters specially referred to them.

6. A copy of the report is being laid on the table.

7. During the past year the government have been in communication with the government of the United Kingdom regarding the questions involved, but no conclusions as to policy have been reached.

The answer contains a clause stating that copies of the report will be tabled. With the permission of the house I should like to lay on the table a copy of the thirty-fifth report of the Imperial Shipping Committee.

ST. ANN'S, ONT.—POSTMASTER

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Was Ernest L. Snyder postmaster of St. Ann's, Ontario, during 1936?

2. Increased.
3, 4, 5, 7 and 8. The administration of the projects covered by the agreement including supervision is in accordance with the terms of the agreement the responsibility of the provincial authorities.
6. No.

[Mr. Green.]

TORONTO POST OFFICE—NIGHT WORK

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are any changes in the working conditions and hours of the night shift at the Toronto post office under consideration at the present time?
2. If so, what are they?
3. Have any requests been received therefor? If so, from whom?
4. How many hours' work per each employee is performed by the night shift?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. No.
2. See answer to No. 1.
3. Yes. Employees have made representations in favour of returning to a 7 hour tour of duty when on night shift.
4. Employees on night shift are required to work the regular week of 44 hours.

TORONTO BOARD OF EDUCATION—FEDERAL AID

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any applications been received by the government, or any member thereof, from the Toronto Board of Education or others, for federal aid towards the cost of erecting a new annex to the Central Technical School, for teaching of aircraft work and training students for work in civil and military aviation?
2. If so, what action, if any, has been taken?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes; by the Department of Transport.
2. No action taken, for reasons set forth in the correspondence.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL TRAINING AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION

Mr. CHURCH:

What is the exact text of the short findings of the federal royal commission on technical education, appointed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government, to the effect that technical education was exclusively a federal problem under the British North America Act?

Mr. ROGERS:

The exact text of the findings of the royal commission on Industrial Training and Technical Education, 1913, under the chairmanship of Dr. J. W. Robertson, C.M.G., is set out in sessional paper No. 191d of the Journals of the House of Commons, 1913, but is not to the effect that technical education was exclusively a federal problem under the British North America Act. The commission's opinion as to control and regulation is expressed in the following extract, from page 21 of the said sessional paper:—

"The commission is of the opinion that, industrial training and technical education in order to be of greatest benefit to individuals, to industrial development, to localities, to the several provinces and to the dominion as a whole, should be organized and maintained in accordance with the following principles:—

"1. It should be under provincial control and regulation.

"2. It should receive financial support from individuals, from local authorities, from provincial governments and from the dominion."

The commission's opinion as to federal participation in technical education is to be found in the following extract from page 26 of the same sessional paper:—

"5. The very considerable increase in the population of Canada by immigration is throwing additional burdens for elementary education upon the communities and the provinces. The enhanced public revenues due to growth by immigration goes in a large measure into the dominion exchequer. The increase of the volume of trade brings in larger amounts through the customs offices. This would indicate that the new financial responsibility and burdens for industrial training and technical education, on a scale large enough and generous enough to be available to all the people between the ages of 14 and 18, should be sustained in large measure by funds from the Dominion government."

The commission's recommendation in regard to the extent of the financial assistance which should be rendered by the federal government to the provinces is set out on page 268 of the said sessional paper, as follows:—

"The commission recommends that the sum of $3,000,000 be provided annually for a period of ten years by the parliament of Canada and paid annually into a dominion development fund."

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—HEAD OFFICE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. In what year were the head offices of the Canadian National Railways moved from Toronto to Montreal and on whose recommendations and on what grounds?

2. Has the attention of the government been called to the announcement in the press of January 22 and January 25, of Sir Edward Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the general manager and vice-president's headquarters of eastern lines is to be moved to Toronto?

3. Will the government give consideration to the re-transfer of the Canadian National Railways head offices back to Toronto?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Montreal was made the headquarters of the Canadian National Railways on the establishment of the Canadian National system in 1923, on the recommendation of the late Sir Henry Thornton. Toronto never was the headquarters of the Canadian National Railways as now constituted, the Grand Trunk Railway always having been managed and operated from Montreal.

2. Yes.

3. The government does not act in such matters except on the advice and recommendation of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FISHERY ACT LOANS

Mr. NEILL:

1. How many applications have been received from British Columbia for loans under the Canada Fishery Loan Act?

2. How many have been granted?

3. What is the aggregate of the loans so granted?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. Twenty-one.

2 and 3. Three applications for $1,500, of which two amounting to $1,100 dropped by applicants subsequent to approval.

CROWN LAND AND SEIGNIORY DIVIDING LINES

Mr. POULIOT:

What are the division lines between the property of the dominion government and, (1) the seigniory of Terrebois; (2) the seigniory of Rivière-du-loup; (3) the seigniory of Leparc; (4) the seigniory Villeray; (5) the seigniory of l'Isle-Verte; (6) the seigniory of Trois-Pistoles, along the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. HOWE: Under the British North America Act, all crown lands are vested in the right of the province except the beds of such harbours as were public harbours at the time of Confederation the line between which and the ripa is the high water line.

INDIANS ON RELIEF

Mr. POULIOT:

What is the number, (1) of Indians, and (2) of their dependents who have received relief each year since 1929?

Mr. CRERAR:

1930-31	6,937	9,088
1931-32	8,011	11,193
1932-33	11,119	16,364
1933-34	14,314	22,407
1934-35	14,016	23,406
1935-36*	13,633	23,034

* Up to October, 1936.

EXCISE ACT—SEIZURE OF AUTOMOBILE

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Did officers by virtue of the Excise Act seize an automobile in the possession of a man named Martin, of St. Alexis de Montcalm, and was the latter prosecuted in the court at St. Jerome?

2. If so, (a) has judgment been given by the magistrate; (b) on what date; (c) has said automobile been declared confiscated?
3. Was said automobile sold after seizure, but before the said judgment?
4. If so, (a) by whom; (b) to whom; (c) at what price; (d) upon what date?

1. How many emigrants embarked on the steamship "Montcalm" at Cherbourg on September 23, 1936?
2. What were their nationalities?
3. Were they all taken through Montreal?
4. What, if any, restrictions were placed against the disembarkation of passengers at Quebec?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Twenty-five immigrants arrived at the port of Quebec on the steamship "Montcalm" on the 30th September, 1936. There were no other emigrants on that ship destined to Canada.
2. Hungarian 11; Italian 2; Roumanian 5; Yugoslavian 5; Czechoslovakian 2.
3. Yes.
4. None.

COST OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have any requests been received by the government or any members thereof, suggesting the appointment of a royal commission to investigate the huge cost to the people of Canada of federal and provincial governments?
2. If so, will the government take any steps in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer to the first part of the question is, yes. Representations were received from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce on December 5, 1935, for submission to the dominion provincial conference meeting December 9, 1935. The other part of the question relates to a matter of policy and it is not usual for the government to make statements on matters of policy in giving replies to questions.

ONTARIO'S POSITION IN CONFEDERATION—BURDEN OF TAXATION

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government consider the appointment of a royal commission to make a survey and investigate Ontario's position in confederation, with a view to giving agriculture, industry, municipal authority and real estate in the province some relief from heavy burden of taxation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have just said with respect to the government not replying to questions which relate to matters of policy is applicable to this question.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TIES PURCHASED IN QUEBEC

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What quantity of ties was purchased in the province of Quebec, in 1936, for the Canadian National Railways?
2. To what persons or companies were contracts for the sale and delivery of such ties awarded?
3. What quantity was awarded to each?
4. What price was paid to each?

Mr. HOWE: This is the type of question that deals with the management of the railways which the Canadian National Railways have consistently refused to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

STAFF AT PORT CHURCHILL

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. How many men were employed between the 1st day of June and the 31st day of December, 1935, on the seasonal or temporary staff at the port of Churchill?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY AND PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On Friday last the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) asked a question of my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) as to whether the government had any intention of introducing a certain bill at this session. The Minister of Justice replied that, in the absence of the leader of the government, the question would have to stand. I may say to my hon. friend, in answer to his question, that the matter is one of policy and therefore if any action is to be taken it will be made known by the government in due course. However, I am rising at the moment more particularly to direct the attention of hon. members to the rules of the house with respect to questions. Standing order 44 reads:

(1) Questions may be placed on the order paper seeking information from the ministers of the crown relating to public affairs; and from other members relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the house, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question or in replying to the same no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same. And in answering any such question the matter to which the same refers shall not be debated.

(b) If a member does not distinguish his question by an asterisk, the minister to whom the question is addressed hands the answer to the Clerk of the House, who causes it to be printed in the official reports of the debates.

Standing order 45 has also to do with notices of questions and matters of that sort. I wish to point out that the rules have been framed for the convenience of members and for the saving of the time of the House of Commons. The question that was asked by the hon. member might have been put as a notice on the order paper and it would have been replied to in the regular way. If he had wished an oral reply all he would have had to do was to distinguish it by an asterisk. But to rise and ask a question orally in the house and in the absence of the minister concerned to expect another minister to answer it is simply to take up the time of the house to no good purpose. May I respectfully say that I have noticed during this session that many hon.

members are falling into the habit of handing to members of the government, just prior to the time at which the house convenes, questions to which they expect ministers to make verbal replies. This procedure is all right where the matter is urgent and it is clearly in the public interest that the question should be asked at the moment, and where some interest would suffer if it were not then asked; but with that exception, I think it would be in accord with the wish of hon. members in all parts of the house that the rule with respect to giving adequate notice of questions should be followed.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I say a word in reply to the Prime Minister? I sent a copy of the question to the Prime Minister forty-eight hours before asking it, and on the morning of the day I asked the question the Prime Minister's secretary telephoned me and said that in view of the fact that the Prime Minister would not be in the house he had arranged with the Minister of Justice to answer it. He telephoned me this morning and said that he had misunderstood the Minister of Justice. I gave the minister sufficient notice and if I had known that he preferred that I should put the question on the order paper I would have followed that procedure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend has just said only proves the wisdom of the rule. If my hon. friend had sent the question to the Clerk of the House it would have appeared on the order paper and an answer would have been ready. It so happened that on Friday it was impossible for me to be here at the opening and I thought I had arranged to anticipate any matters which might come up. I raise the point, not by way of criticism of my hon. friend but merely to bring forward a course of procedure to which I think the attention of the house should be drawn with a view to saving unnecessary repetition in questions of the kind. May I at the same time say a word about some of the information and returns which are being asked for. The government has every desire to give to the house all information that is desired. But some requests are made that involve a large expenditure, an expenditure far out of proportion to any end that might be served by the information requested. I would suggest that where members have requests of the kind to make of the government they take up with the minister concerned in the first instance the possibility of securing the information, and that they consider carefully the form in which requests are worded. For example, on today's list there is question No. 48, relating to civil servants. The question reads:

1. How many civil servants entered the various departments of the government under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, since 1920?
2. What was their place of residence when they entered the service?
3. How many are bilingual in each department?

That means a search from one end of Canada to the other for the information which is requested. I question whether the reply, while it may be possible to have it compiled, if it is to be accurate, can be made available within several years. That kind of question does not facilitate the business of the house nor does it keep down the expenses of government. I would also direct attention to question No. 42, which it would seem is also unnecessarily detailed:

In each of the following branches of the Department of National Defence, (1) administration, (2) treasury office, (3) central registry, (4) contracts branch, (5) printing and stationery, (6) naval service, (7) chief of the general staff, (8) signals, (9) historical section, (10) adjutant general, (11) medicals, (12) records, (13) quartermaster general, (14) master general of the ordnance, (15) Royal Canadian Air Force, (16) No. 1 aircraft depot, (17) Royal Canadian Air Force station, Ottawa, (18) Connaught rifle range, (19) drill halls—how many, (a) officers and, (b) men, are (1) older, and (2) younger than thirty-seven (37) years?

Surely those are not fair questions or questions to which answers in detail should be expected. If they should be answered a little more abruptly than might be thought desirable, I hope my hon. friends will not misunderstand the reason.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I were to close my eyes, and if the inflection of the voice were slightly changed, I would fancy that the right hon. gentleman was speaking for one who sat in that place not so long ago. I am fearful that the new members of this house have learned the habits to which the right hon. gentleman referred from reading Hansard between 1930 and 1935. I very much fear that is the real cause, because every word the right hon. gentleman has uttered with regard to expense, the time that must be occupied in obtaining the information and the uselessness of such returns when obtained, you will find in Hansard frequently between 1930 and 1935.

I have only one word to add. As leader of the opposition the right hon. gentleman sometimes remarked, when observations such as those to which we have just listened were made by the then prime minister, that after all it was not really the proper thing for the prime minister to lecture the house about such matters; that the clerk had certain discretion as to the placing of questions on the order paper. I do commend the matter to the attention of my right hon. friend, and I suggest that when he has read again the record of 1930 to 1935, if it is necessary that he do so in order to refresh his memory, probably he will realize just why so many new members have pursued a course which is supported by so high an authority.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WAINWRIGHT BUFFALO PARK EMPLOYEES

Mr. FAIR:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, charges, evidence and other documents, dated from January 1, 1936, to date, in the possession of the Department of Mines and Resources or the office of the prime minister, relating to the dismissal of the following from the buffalo park at Wainwright, Alberta: H. B. Walker, D. W. Walker, John Novak, R. A. MacKay, H. B. Knox, Fred Grayson, Robert McLean, Jas. Henderson, Cliff Abernathy, Joe Beckett, and John Hardy.

Also a statement showing the dates of appointment and dismissal and reasons assigned for dismissal in each case, along with all information received which resulted in such dismissals, and the name or names of the person or persons who assumed responsibility for or furnished such information.

Also a statement showing the names of the men appointed to fill the vacancies caused by the above-mentioned dismissals and the name or names of the person or persons who recommended these appointments.

EMILE LECLAIR

Mr. LOCKHART (for Mr. Wermenlinger):

For a copy of all correspondence, recommendations, reports in connection with the dismissal of Emile Leclair from the harbour commission at Montreal in 1936 and the appointment of Joseph Simard in his stead.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSION—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY AT MOODY, B.C.

Mr. MacNEIL:

For a copy of all documents, letters, telegrams, memoranda and agreements relating to the negotiation for purchase and actual purchase by the Vancouver harbour commission of the property described as the Moodyville property and situated at Moody, British Columbia.

CANADA LAND AND IRRIGATION COMPANY

Mr. MITCHELL:

For a copy of: (a) all agreements between the Canada Land and Irrigation Company and the crown; (b) all orders in council relating to said company; (c) all correspondence passing, to date, between the said company, or any of its officials in Canada or elsewhere, and the dominion government.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put may I say to my hon. friend that it will be impossible to supply all this information. In 1930 the resources were transferred to the province of Alberta, and in due course all the correspondence and agreements that obtained up to that time. As far as the orders in council are concerned, they can be brought down. I should think also that part of paragraph (c) of the question could not be answered fully, for the reason I stated a moment ago.

Motion agreed to.

FISH TRAPS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA WATERS

Mr. NEILL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memorandum and other documents exchanged between any member or officer of the present or late government and any other person in connection with the subject of fish traps in British Columbian waters from the 1st of September, 1934, to date.

Mr. MICHAUD: If the house adopts this resolution as it is drafted it will impose an obligation almost impossible to perform and a duty upon some of the ministers which it will be impossible to discharge. The order of the house can be complied with if it is restricted to the official files of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. NEILL: That will be quite satisfactory. I would point out that the time referred to is very limited, in order to save expense.

Motion agreed to.

SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN—SPECIAL PROJECTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. MacNEIL:

For a copy of all instructions and regulations issued by the Department of Labour relative to the conditions under which single unemployed men have been engaged on the special projects authorized by the agreement between the Department of Labour and the government of the province of British Columbia, November 16, 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: I would ask the hon. member in whose name this motion stands to withdraw it, in view of the fact that the information for which he asks has been tabled already. The agreement between the dominion government and the province of British Columbia was tabled the day following the opening of the session, and further information as to regulations is given in the answer to a question on the order paper, tabled to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

ST. ANN'S, ONT., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. LOCKHART:

For a copy of all correspondence, communications, charges, evidence and reports dated during the years 1935 and 1936, in connection with the dismissal of Ernest L. Snyder as postmaster of St. Ann's, Ontario.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the year 1935 be changed to 1932, as I am advised there is some correspondence between those dates that would be material to the matter.

Motion as amended agreed to.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND AMENDMENTS LOOKING TO IMPROVEMENT OF SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, in view of the urgent necessity of effective action for the improvement of the social and economic conditions of the people of Canada, and, in view of the condition of social and other legislation passed by parliament during the tenure of office of the late government, and, in view of the forward-looking legislation recently enacted in the United States and other democratic countries, a special select standing committee of the house be set up to recommend the specific amendments to the British North America Act required to enable this dominion parliament to enact necessary and desirable legislation for the better social conditions of the Canadian people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since the resolution was placed on the order paper when the house met in January, the subject matter of the resolution has become of more than academic interest. Of course last Tuesday's debate, initiated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), to a great extent anticipated a discussion of the matter now before us. But since that time the judgments of the privy council with respect to social security measures of the late government have been delivered, and they create something in the nature of a national emergency in relation to the whole question of social and economic legislation. People find their wills thwarted by constitutional difficulties undreamed of when the British North America Act was passed.

To-day Canada finds herself definitely unable to enact progressive social legislation on a national scale through a national parliament, and thereby a situation of national concern and emergency is created. Apart from any argument as to the desirability or otherwise of the legislation affected by the judgments, it is imperative that in days when democracy is being undermined ways and means shall be found at once to rectify the situation and to restore to the Canadian people their faith in our democratic institutions as instruments of reform. In my opinion this involves both a short term and a long term view. To meet the latter the resolution was originally placed upon the order paper. To meet the former it seems to me that without delay, now that the dominion jurisdiction has been denied, an interprovincial conference should be summoned to consider what measures should be taken to protect and improve standards of living. With parliament in session and the legislatures either sitting or about to sit, the situation might be met temporarily by the passage of concurrent legislation. It seems to me however that because it is both cumbersome and unsatisfactory, this should be regarded as only a temporary method of dealing with matters of the kind.

I am pleased to note that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act has been declared valid, and I trust no attempt will be made to restrict its terms or provisions, indeed if anything is done regarding this measure, I hope its terms and provisions will be widened rather than narrowed. Of the measures disallowed several are of fundamental social and economic importance. Who will deny, for example, that uniform legislation for the regulation of hours of industry, the weekly day of rest and the setting of minimum wages, is necessary? Conditions exposed in some industries by recent investigations cry aloud for immediate legislative action.

What about unemployment insurance? If, as we are frequently told, business is on the upswing, then immediate preparation should be made for the inevitable downward plunge, the time to make that preparation is when economic conditions are said to be improving. The same consideration would apply with equal force to legislation and plans for the orderly marketing of our farmers' produce. Such legislation should have the approval of the producers. In the opinion of many people —and I can speak at least for those in western Canada—a natural products marketing act is a primary necessity. My submission is that failure to provide such measures of social security will invite widespread discontent and seriously undermine public confidence in parliamentary institutions. Hence the recent judgments of the privy council may become the source of further grave unrest, unless steps are taken by parliament and the legislatures to give effect to the demands of farmers and workers for social legislation and security measures. Whatever else may be contemplated, it seems to me an emergency interprovincial conference should be called immediately to deal with the situation which has arisen as a result of the privy council judgments.

Having said that, may I add that when I placed the resolution on the order paper I intended, first, to focus attention upon amendments to the British North America Act and, second, to discuss proposals designed to give greater social and economic security to the masses of the Canadian people. During nearly twenty years of active participation in public affairs, in common with others I have supported various suggested reforms which almost invariably in their initial presentations have been met by the argument that they could not be undertaken because of the British North America Act. I was one who perhaps regarded the argument rather more lightly than events of the past week might have warranted. This act, which is the cornerstone of our constitution, I fear has become at times a pillar behind which reactionary interests have sought to shelter and to hide. Proposals have been made recently for the appointment of a royal commission to investigate economic and other conditions in western Canada. I believe the suggestion has much to commend it, but I would point out that in view of the judgments just delivered we need, first of all, to amend or remodel the British North America Act in order to be able to make effective any recommendations of such a royal commission.

Perhaps because of my old country education and training in the rights and duties of British citizenship I find it very difficult to understand the profound reverence for written constitutions and documents which I have found in many quarters in the country in which I now live. Possibly this arises out of our susceptibility to ideas emanating from south of the Canada-United States border, where the constitution of 1776 has been regarded as almost too sacred to be criticized. I am glad to note that in the discussion which occurred in this house last Tuesday there did not seem to be a disposition to regard the British North America Act in a similar light.

Parliament is elected by the people to carry out the will of the people as expressed from time to time. It is intolerable that men, no matter how wise and how good they may have been in their day and generation, or parliaments long since gone by, should be able to bind the hands of a new generation and of their successors. Recently we have heard much about the supremacy of parliament. Under British constitutional practice the House of Commons in that country is, in the finanl analysis, the supreme power. If there were previously any doubts as to this, I take it that the events surrounding the abdication of King Edward VIII settled the matter once and for all. Therefore I believe an attempt should be made here, in Canada, to deal with our constitution so that it cannot be used as a drag upon the progress of the Canadian people. Morever, unless we bring it more into conformity with the requirements of our age, its inflexibility, like the rigidity of a sealed container full of air when heat is applied, will sooner or later cause an explosion. If we look over our economic and social situation at the present time we shall find many factors generating heat and making for such an explosion.

As was indicated the other afternoon, the British North America Act is a relic of the pre-industrial age. Some people have called it the ox cart age, but "pre-industrial age" I think describes it more accurately. The chaotic conditions of the dominion-provincial financial arrangements illustrate how out of date the act has become in the field of modern social and economic requirements. There can be no permanent or satisfactory adjustment in these relationships until we come to grips with the social and economic problems involved in the constitution. I venture to say that there is not a member of this parliament or a public man in Canada who has not felt at some time or other that the constitutional question has been used as a drag upon Canadian progress.

However well it suited the requirements of 1867 it is no longer a satisfactory instrument for the completely changed conditions of 1937. The seventy years which have elapsed have seen a world more completely transformed than did the thousand years which preceded them. Let me emphasize the fact that the British North America Act constricts our activities, makes for confusion, and encourages sectionalism and general instability. Public discussion and consideration of this aspect of our constitution must accompany proposals for measures leading to greater economic and social security. That is why this resolution has been placed upon the order paper. I said a moment ago that under the British constitution the House of Commons is, in the final analysis, the supreme authority. It is time we brought our constitutional practice into conformity with that of Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament, not the House of Commons.

Mr. COLDWELL: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) says, "parliament, not the House of Commons." But I was just coming to that point. In my opinion the House of Commons is, in the final analysis, the supreme authority under British parliamentary practice. For example, I can see no good reason for the continued existence of the senate, which was established ostensibly to protect provincial rights but which I believe no longer does so. If the abolition of the senate is not considered by such a committee as the one I have in mind, then the question of an elective senate might be considered. We should at least bring our parliamentary practice into conformity with the practice in Great Britain. In that country when a bill has been passed by the House of Commons and turned down by the House of Lords in two consecutive sessions, it becomes law without the consent of the upper chamber when it is passed by the House of Commons in the third consecutive session.

Mr. CAHAN: Do you think provincial legislatures should be continued and sustained?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, I do. I think there is a place for the provincial legislatures, just as I think there is a place under the British unitary system for local self-government on the county plan although they are not analogous. However, if we are to have a parliament legislating on social and economic matters for the people of Canada, a divided authority on the same matters is a very dangerous thing and is likely to lead to dissatisfaction and unrest among the people. I am simply suggesting that this committee should consider the Parliament Act of Great Britain, as passed in 1911, and study ways and means of providing legislation of a similar sort for Canada.

It may be said: how can these amendments be made effective? I think that the fathers of confederation, who were silent on that particular matter in the legislation which created this federal parliament, clearly contemplated that any amendment to the British North America Act or the constitution of Canada would be a matter for legislation on the part of the imperial parliament. In my opinion that was distinctly a colonial idea and one which prevailed in what might be called colonial days. I believe Canada should have the right to amend her own constitution. I was reading Professor Keith's treatise on the King and the Imperial Crown. In discussing the Statute of Westminster at page 428 he indicates very clearly that Canada did not desire that particular power when the statute was under discussion. He says this:

> The views of Canada were decisively in favour of retention of supreme power,—
> Supreme power by the British parliament.
> —for as yet Canadian constitutional change in essentials depends on British legislation.

Since then in South Africa the issue has been met by enacting the Status of Union Act of 1934, which provides that no imperial act shall extend to the union unless it is extended by a union act; and secondly by the enactment of the Royal Executive Functions and Seals Act of 1934, which provides that any instrument may be signed by the governor general by the authority of the cabinet where the king's signature for any reason cannot be obtained. Since the governor general is the nominee of the government, that clearly gives the Union of South Africa power to amend its own constitution, to proclaim its neutrality, and to decide its destiny.

Mr. BENNETT: It had the power to amend its constitution before.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you. In view of the confused international situation, and in conformity with our ideas of equal commonwealth status, Canada should be endowed with at least somewhat similar powers.

I would say that such a parliamentary committee as the motion suggests, should consider, first, ways and means by which the will of the Canadian people as expressed by the House of Commons can be made supreme. Since 1867 we have travelled far, and the Statute of Westminster quite definitely lays down the principle that the self-governing dominions are co-equal partners in the free association known as the British commonwealth of nations. Canada then as a nation must have the right to deal with its own social, economic and constitutional problems. If we achieve that right the problem on which the committee should make recommendations is that of the method to be followed within the structure of confederation.

I do not suggest that there should be any interference with minority rights peculiar to our national groupings. I do suggest that the time has arrived when power to legislate upon matters not contemplated when confederation was realized should be clearly defined as between this parliament and the provincial legislatures, and since the use of legislative powers usually involves financial commitments the whole question of the fields of provincial and federal taxation should be carefully reviewed. To-day we have many instances of serious overlapping. Moreover, we have provinces that do not levy certain forms of taxation, which consequently are used as shelters to cover those who wish to escape those particular forms of taxation. I do not think that that is desirable or good or wise.

In recent years doubts regarding the respective rights of this parliament and of the legislatures have retarded the enactment and proclamation of really necessary and worthwhile legislation. Matters not contemplated when this dominion was established have become of first-class political and social importance, and necessary reform is thus unduly delayed by needless constitutional discussions, references to courts of law and subsequent judgments, resulting in discontent and widespread unrest and disaffection.

All this needs careful investigation and clarification so that no legal doubts nor unprogressive law courts can thwart the people's will. Social legislation demanded by the people remains to-day inoperative because of constitutional and legal differences of opinion, and now definitely of judgments. Until these barriers have been removed there is difficulty in securing that uniformity of action in regard to minimum wages, orderly marketing, health services, social insurance, old age pensions, and so on.

Duplication in administration involves added costs and regrettable delays in rendering the desired service to the people of the country. Action concerning matters of national interest is prevented by the lack of parliament's power to deal with them. In such matters we can proceed only as rapidly as the most reactionary provincial government will permit. Surely this is far from being a satisfactory state of affairs, and in these days it tends to discredit our democratic institutions as instruments of progress just when it is important to strengthen public confidence in them.

As I said a moment ago, we can proceed only as rapidly as the most reactionary provincial government will allow this country to proceed. I am not saying which or if any of the provincial governments may be placed in that category at the present time, but I do submit that if that point is debatable now, there may come a time when this, that, or the other province may have a reactionary government while all the other provincial governments are progressive, and under such a situation desirable legislation of a progressive nature might be held up indefinitely. In a rapidly changing world Canada lags behind already in social and economic legislation.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

This I think can be largely attributed to the constitutional doubts and difficulties which I have already indicated, and to the refuge which parliament and the legislatures have taken from time to time behind the cloak of the constitution. Yet surely both bodies today realize that the problem must be dealt with. Unrest among the people of the various parts of this dominion will continue and become intensified unless we solve the problem arising out of divided jurisdiction.

Already the financial side of confederation settlements has undergone drastic, if temporary, revision. How these revisions were undertaken is a matter of recent history. But upon what basis they were made is not at all clear to the public and the provinces, or, may I suggest, to the members of this house. I find, for example, that the subsidy payments to four provinces by the dominion have been greatly augmented to such an extent that in two cases the augmentation is only slightly less than the original subsidy, while in the other two it greatly exceeds the annual subsidy. The public accounts for the year ended March 31st last reveal that the subsidy for British Columbia was $874,561.46, which under vote 209 was augmented by a special grant of $750,000. The subsidy for Prince Edward Island, $381,931.88, was augmented by a special grant of $275,000. The subsidy for New Brunswick was $693,040.16, and it was augmented by a special grant of $900,000, while the subsidy for Nova Scotia was $653,047.60, and it was augmented by a special grant of $1,300,000. Obviously there were good reasons for making these grants, but equally obviously it is difficult for the public to understand why a distressed area such as the province of British Columbia, with a large population, received so much less than Nova Scotia, with a much smaller population. I am not at the moment criticizing the justice of these grants, but I venture to say that few members of this house could explain them, and I am using them to illustrate the point that the whole question of financial relationships between the dominion and the provinces should be carefully reviewed, because, after all, to a large degree they are based upon agreements and constitutional practices.

The financing of the various social projects should also be reviewed. For example, old age pensions have now reached the point where they are becoming nation-wide; hence they should be entirely federal and more nearly uniform. Incidentally, the clause in the old age pension act permitting the authorities to take liens on the small estates of the pensioners should be repealed. As long as that remains, the payments are not pensions but loans repayable at death. Many old folks endure hardship and privation rather than relinquish their right to little bits of property which represent their savings of a lifetime. At the moment Canada lags behind both Great Britain and the United States in economic and social legislation, and demands for what we call social security measures will tend to increase rather than to decrease as this fact becomes more generally known and its implications realized. Hence it seems to me that preparation should be made, not next year or the year after but now, to meet these needs by clearly defining the powers of parliament and the legislatures, and, may I add, not only the powers but the responsibility of these various bodies. That would be one of the principal tasks of such a committee as that which the resolution asks shall be set up.

Sooner or later, too, this country will have to face the problem of debt in all its forms and phases. Last week we had an opportunity of discussing the problem of increasing purchasing power, and at that time we indicated how wealth was becoming accumulated and pointed out some things that might be done to redistribute purchasing power and remove some of our debts to those who have acquired the ownership of such obligations. I do not propose to traverse any of that ground this afternoon, but simply desire to suggest that the power to reduce debt and interest must be more clearly defined. In some provinces we have two debt adjusting authorities operating under dominion and provincial statutes respectively. Endless arguments arise as to which of the two authorities or statutes is the better, and doubts and difficulties also arise in the minds of harassed people. Yet debt adjustment must continue, and since the problem is nation-wide, national consideration should be given to it.

I intended to outline at some length what other countries or dominions were doing in relation to these problems, but time does not permit me to touch more than briefly upon their legislation. We are in many respects twenty-five years behind the motherland in such measures as unemployment insurance, housing legislation, and health benefits. British legislation along these lines first came into effect in 1912, after, it should be said, some European nations had adopted somewhat similar measures. We have now the benefit of their experience, and the bitterly condemned "dole," as it was called, of a quarter of a century ago has earned universal approval from all save a few reactionary persons here and there who have not realized the needs of the changed times in which we live. True, there are dark places, very dark places, in the old land, but there would have been more of them but for her social legislation. We could well afford to give effect to unemployment insurance, to schemes of housing and health services, upon a more generous and national scale. Money thus spent would, I submit, be more wisely spent than what may be expended for armaments even at the present time. More recently the United States has travelled far along the road of social security legislation, but owing to its constitution greater difficulties than we are likely to experience have had to be met. In spite of this, under the leadership of the central authority, unemployment benefits, old age pensions, pensions for the blind, the care of dependent children, and so on, are all well on the way. Our proximity to the United States makes it inevitable that increasing pressure will be brought to bear in Canada for the enactment of similar legislation. Preparatory to meeting these demands adequately a committee such as the motion proposes could recommend to this parliament appropriate legislation to enable us to meet them on a national basis.

In our sister dominions great progress has been made lately. This is especially true in New Zealand, where under a socialist administration—headed, incidentally, by the Hon. Michael Savage, and, incidentally, a gentleman who is a devout Roman Catholic—a series of progressive measures has been enacted, among them the control of the financial system through the national ownership of the central bank; the passage of a primary products marketing act so that minimum fixed prices are guaranteed from time to time and butter and other dairy produce marketed through a single government agency; measures for the prevention of profiteering, the control of hours and wages in industry, restoration of wage and pension cuts; and legislation is foreshadowed to control investment of national savings. At the close of 1936 the minister of industries and commerce for New Zealand was able to report significant rises in all departments of economic and social activity. In spite of the fact that New Zealand has grave difficulties on account of her remote position and her relatively small population, the minister was able to say that the dominion as a whole is marching towards an era of prosperity which will be reflected in higher standards of life for the masses of the people.

New Zealand has been able to go forward because no constitutional difficulties lie in her path. She is a small country, not a federal union, but a legislative union—the unitary system, as it was described here the other afternoon. We have questions which arise out of our federal union which ought to be settled at once. I would therefore suggest to this house that it approve of the government establishing a committee to inquire into the constitutional changes necessary to modernize our constitutional practice. That is what the motion asks, and I feel that members who do not necessarily agree with all the suggestions I have made in support of the resolution can nevertheless support the principle of it.

The privy council decisions made public a few days ago emphasize the importance of dealing with this matter at once. From time to time we hear in this house of what are termed subversive elements in our midst, but let me point out that if we have such subversive elements, they spring and grow from bad economic and social conditions. Repression will not stamp them out. The only way we can meet the demands for the better life, and the discontent that arises from a denial of those demands, is to enact measures in the parliament of Canada that will give to men and women an opportunity not only to work but to enjoy the natural resources of the country and the benefits of the machines and of science with which we are surrounded.

May I say that this is particularly true of the younger people in our dominion. There is discontent among them, and I believe that that discontent can be either healthy or unhealthy. They have a right to live, to enjoy the blessings of home and of marriage. They have a right to make a living. To-day they are denied those privileges. Can we wonder if there is discontent? Yet, through all these years, ever since the war, when new measures have been suggested to meet the economic and social situation that has been developing, again and again these measures have been opposed on the ground that they are not constitutional. To-day we have a demonstration of the fact that some of these much needed measures have been declared by the highest court in the empire to be unconstitutional. It is therefore of primary importance that parliament at this time consider ways and means of enabling either the dominion or the provinces to enact incontestable social legislation; but I submit that you must consider these problems on a dominion-wide scale rather than from a provincial point of view. Either the dominion, or the provinces, should have the right and the power to legislate to meet the social and economic situation that exists to-day.

I see that my time is just up, and I am going to ask the house to support this resolution and the government either to accept it or to suggest an alternative which is better. If such an alternative is suggested and appears to be better than the resolution I have proposed, I shall have a great deal of pleasure in supporting it.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The other afternoon a debate of this kind took place, and at that time, with my limited knowledge of the rules of the house, I thought it was entirely out of order. But nobody seemed to call Mr. Speaker's attention to the fact, possibly owing to the prominence of the hon. members who started the debate. I think it is a good thing for the house to discuss at considerable length the British North America Act and possible amendments thereto, and as there are on the order paper no fewer than three resolutions dealing with the same subject we shall have plenty of opportunity to discuss it.

In the first place, confederation was formed for two main reasons. I have heard it said that confederation was formed in the first place on account of fear, but I do not altogether agree with that. Confederation was formed for two main reasons—the purpose of defence of the then colonies, and in order that those colonies might trade freely with one another. If the fathers of confederation had had in mind some of the things that have been done since then by this parliament, confederation would never have been formed. Some eleven or twelve years after the date of confederation there was put into effect by the then government a policy that has gone far towards wrecking confederation in this country, and it may succeed in wrecking it if it goes much further. I refer to the policy of protection, or the protective tariff. Had a protective tariff been in the minds of the fathers of confederation and been spoken of at the time, certainly some of the provinces would not have joined that confederation, especially had they been able to see into the future and visualize what would happen in this dominion.

Some two or three years ago a commission was formed in Nova Scotia to determine the effect of the protective tariff on that province, or rather evidence brought before a commission went to show that certain parts of the dominion paid to the extent of about twenty-five cents out of every dollar to the protected industries of the country, receiving nothing in return. The protective tariff has developed in one particular section of Canada large industries at the expense of other sections—not in a provincial way, because where that industrial area lies the provinces as a whole are not helped by it to any great extent, but certain favoured individuals in that area are assisted. This has meant that industry in Canada has been drawn largely into one part of the country and any benefits therefrom have gone to that section to the detriment of other parts of the dominion. This has greatly affected the confederation. When one realizes that the fisherman on the Atlantic coast, who is a primary producer, must turn over from a fifth to a quarter of his fish in order to uphold protected industries in Canada; that the coal miner must turn over from a fifth to a quarter of the coal he mines in order to uphold those protected industries; that the man in the woods in Quebec who hauls in pulpwood must turn over from a fifth to a fourth of his load in order that the protected industries of Canada may prosper in one small section; that the miners of the north, the lumbermen, the farmers from one end of the country to the other must do the same thing, it is hard to say that confederation, when we have such policies carried on under it, is a good thing for Canada as a whole, and Canada will not hold together if that policy continues very long.

I heard the other day a statement, by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I believe, that there was no danger of splitting Canada at the present time. Well, I should like to tell him and the members of this house that there never was a time in the history of Canada when there was more danger in that regard than there is right now. The people in the outlying parts of the country and the provinces farther away from that protected area are becoming sick and tired of paying through the nose and getting no return, while certain favoured people in one section are benefited. There are large sections of the country that have very few ties, or ever had, with that section. And when you find that certain portions of the country are and always will be devoted to the production of primary products and therefore under such a policy always will have to pay and receive nothing in return, the danger of trouble in this country is apparent.

The protective tariff has done another thing. We set up certain kinds of taxation for the federal government and certain kinds for the provinces. Now that under the protective system all industry has been driven into one small portion of the country it is very difficult for many of these provinces to procure the necessary amount of money to carry on their business. For instance, the executives of all these large industries—and I would link with them the financial houses and insurance companies, which are grouped in the same parts of the country—who draw down large salaries, are required to pay income tax only in one province. An income tax is a proper tax for the provinces, under direct taxation, but many of the provinces cannot reach the people whom they should be able to tax. These people who are gathered in one small portion of the country collect much of their revenues from every part of the dominion, but they are liable for income tax only in the province in which they live.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Provincially that is so. Then there is another thing. A succession duty tax is a proper tax for a province under direct taxation. If a man happens to have been successful throughout his life until, we will say, he reaches the age of fifty-five and then desires to sell his business and invest his money in this country, naturally he turns for investment to Canadian industries. If he happens to purchase stocks in the industries of Canada and dies while still owning such stocks, he can be taxed in any outside province only on the property that he owns in that province. On the stocks he has purchased, however, the succession duty tax is paid to the province in which the head office or transfer office of the industry is located. In other words the tremendous amount of money that has been invested in industries located in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec by people living in other provinces is made to pay toll, in the form of succession duty tax, to those two provinces, while the other provinces are unable to collect that tax. We have often heard it said in this house that by far the largest portion of our taxation is collected in certain cities in eastern Canada. Of course that is so, but it is so because people in those cities are doing business with all the other parts of the country.

Everyone seems to have adopted the view that we must amend the British North America Act in certain particulars. I am not so very sure that we have to amend that act a great deal, because when the British North America Act was framed a certain field was laid out for the provinces and another field for the dominion. If many of the provinces cannot carry out the work allotted to them by the British North America Act the only reason is that they are financially unable to do so. When these provinces entered confederation in the first place they were separate, sovereign states or democracies. Under the British North America Act they are still separate, sovereign states and democracies within a certain field, and this parliament has no right to encroach upon their rights, as we have done so often in the last few years. For instance, while every mode of taxation was made available to the dominion, at that time it was not anticipated that the dominion would dip into direct taxation so deeply that it would be difficult for the provinces to collect enough revenue to enable them to carry on.

Further, Mr. Speaker, in this parliament we have passed certain legislation which has been more or less coercive in regard to the provinces. In effect we have said, "Well, the people want a certain thing. We will put at the disposal of the provincial governments so much money, and let the provinces put up the rest." As a result the moment we put an act in force in this parliament saying that this government was willing to give so much money if the province put up the remainder, the people of the province invariably forced the provincial authorities to spend that money, whether or not they wanted to do so. In this way the provinces have been obliged to make expenditures at different times which they could not afford. We passed an act here in connection with technical education. We started this thing and then, after it became a costly venture, we dumped the whole proposition over on the provinces and told them to go ahead and handle it. The same thing applies to roads. It is perfectly all right, if the government wants a trans-Canada highway, for the government to go ahead and build it. They have no right to say to the provinces that they must put up a certain amount of money in connection with such a venture. In that connection the federal government coerced the provinces into spending money that they did not want to spend, and the same thing applies in connection with old age pensions. I was in this house when that measure was passed, and we had no more right to pass an old age pension act than we had to pass a good deal of the other legislation we have enacted. Again we forced the provinces into something, whether or not they wished it. As I said a moment ago, they are sovereign states; they are democracies in their own right, and in this parliament we have no right to force a province into anything which it does not want to do, at least until we amend the British North America Act.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Prior to 1867, there had been a certain amount of taxation in the four provinces which formed the confederation. At that time a certain line of work was laid out for the provinces and another line for the dominion. If we look back to that time we find that customs and excise revenue for those parts of the dominion amounted to about $8,500,000. In order that the provinces might have sufficient money to carry on the work they were to do the dominion turned back to them about $3,000,000, or almost half the amount of money then collected through customs and excise. I do not think the provinces would be in such great trouble to-day if the dominion had continued to do that. We must revamp the distribution of revenue between the provinces and the dominion.

Some people have said that the provinces have been coming down here with their hats in their hands only to get more money from the federal parliament. We should arrange matters so that they can get more of the total revenue collected than they are at present able to get. It is a crying shame that at this time, when interest rates are so low, the provinces are placed in the position that they cannot refinance the great debts they carry. No doubt in a short time interest rates will be back to normal, and the debt the provinces carry, if they can carry it, will be a tremendous load upon their shoulders.

I do not agree with the resolution because I do not think a committee of parliament can be set up to handle the matter properly. I believe there should be plenty of discussion, and each side of the question should be set forth in debate. Sooner or later some government will endeavour to arrange matters so that the provinces will get a proper portion of the total revenue collected to enable them to carry out the business the fathers of confederation entrusted to them.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coldwell) who introduced the resolution spoke, as he always does, with vigour, and followed a well prepared argument. I was hoping he would give some reason which would justify the creation of a committee of the kind suggested by him.

May I review what has been done in the matter in recent years. As to the usefulness and even the necessity, under present circumstances, of amendments to the British North America Act, I think we must all agree, but I fail to see where the procedure suggested by the hon. member will be useful. Indeed I am afraid it would hurt rather than help the end he has in mind. In 1935, on motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the house adopted a resolution whereby it set up a select committee consisting of Messrs. Cowan, Guthrie, Turnbull, Ernst, Gagnon, Lapointe, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Ralston, and Woodsworth—

—to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended, so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in their scope.

Although the language of the present resolution is not quite the same, I believe the meaning is absolutely the same as the one I have set out. The committee in 1935 was appointed for the very same purpose. It sat practically all session and in the course of its proceedings heard various legal experts and professors. In order to impress the house with the fact that the committee did its work in the best possible manner, may I point out only a few of the names connected with its work. They were W. S. Edwards, K.C., Deputy Minister of Justice; Doctor O. D. Skelton, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; M. Ollivier, K.C., Joint Law Clerk of the House of Commons; Doctor W. P. M. Kennedy, Professor of Law, University of Toronto; Doctor F. R. Scott, Professor of Law, McGill University; Doctor Norman McLeod Rogers, Professor of Political Science, Queen's University, and Doctor Arthur Beauchesne, K.C., C.M.G., LL.D., Clerk of the House of Commons.

After discussing the matter in detail the committee adopted the following resolution:

The committee recognizes the urgent necessity for prompt consideration of amendments to the British North America Act with reference to a redistribution of legislative power and to clarify the field of taxation.

In view of that, surely we do not need to set up another committee to make the same finding. The report continues:

It is further of opinion that the conference hereafter proposed should carefully consider the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amendment.

In view of the fact that the several provinces did not feel it advisable to give the committee the benefit of their views with respect to the method of procedure to be followed in amending the constitution, the committee is of the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter of the resolution is finally made, that the opinions of the provinces should be obtained otherwise if at all possible and for that reason recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be held as early as possible in the present year to study the subject matter of the resolution. The proposed conference should have ample time in which to study every phase of the question.

In view of the above recommendation the committee expressly refrains from recommending any form of procedure for amendment so as to leave the proposed conference entirely free in its study of the question, except that the committee is definitely of the opinion that minority rights agreed upon and granted under the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

That was the work of the committee of 1935. In accordance with its recommendation a conference with the provinces was summoned in November and December of 1935, upon which occasion a subcommittee dealt with constitutional questions. That constitutional subconference had an agenda containing the following items:

1. Revision of the British North America Act.
2. Agreement on future action with reference to social legislation.

After the subconference had completed its work it adopted a resolution, which was ratified by the full conference, as follows:

This conference, in the interests of the dominion and of the provinces, is of the opinion:

(a) That amendments to the British North America Act are now and subsequently may be necessary and imperative.

(b) That, as in the case of all the other self-governing dominions, Canada should have the power to amend the Canadian constitution provided a method of procedure therefor satisfactory to the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures be devised.

(c) That the Minister of Justice convene at an early date a meeting of appropriate officials of the dominion and of the provinces to prepare a draft of such method of procedure to be submitted to a subsequent conference.

(d) That a conference be held at an early date after such draft has been prepared to consider such a method of procedure.

This committee of experts, composed of officials of the dominion and of the provinces, was called for the purpose of doing the work assigned to it by the conference. These officials, representing most of the provinces, spent part of the session of 1936 working in Ottawa with the dominion officials. A tremendous amount of work was done; drafts were prepared and agreement was reached on many important matters which had been debated previously and in connection with which some difference existed. There are still some matters upon which agreement has not been reached. I may say that the fact that general elections have taken place in certain provinces during the summer and fall —this applies particularly to one province— may be the reason why the work of this committee has not been concluded. May I suggest with all due deference to my hon. friend that the work he proposes should be done is of a delicate nature. It should be entrusted to a committee of legal experts rather than to a committee of members of the House of Commons. What can this committee do in addition to what was done in 1935? I have not heard one good reason advanced by my hon. friend in support of his resolution. He suggests that this committee would devise ways and means by which the will of the people, as represented in the House of Commons, would prevail. I believe that would be the one way to bring about greater friction with the provinces at a time when it is necessary to have agreement. We would have a committee composed of members of this house asserting that we must have this or we must have that, when in fact there are other parties who have something to say and something to do with this matter.

My hon. friend says that we have the Statute of Westminster which gives us more power and more rights. That may be so, but the provinces have exactly the same powers, the same rights and the same jurisdiction which they had prior to the passing of the Statute of Westminster. That is all reserved to them in the Statute of Westminster, and I do not think it could have gone through without those reservations. Until there has been a very great change in that respect, I cannot see how the Statute of Westminster would provide a good reason for the creation of a committee of this kind. While the Statute of Westminster may have changed the relations between the Dominion of Canada and the imperial parliament, it has not changed one iota the relations between the Dominion of Canada and the provinces of the confederation.

My hon. friend has said that this committee would define the respective powers of the dominion and the provinces. I have all the respect possible for the qualifications of the members of this proposed committee, but I am afraid that we must have more confidence in the decisions of the privy council and the Supreme Court of Canada. What could such a committee do except to read these decisions? It could not define powers and jurisdiction other than as they exist and as they have been defined by the courts. As I have stated in other circumstances, the fact of saying that we have jurisdiction does not give it. The assumption of powers which we do not have, does not give those powers to us. It will only make for greater difficulty and not for the settlement of those questions, the settlement of which we all have so much at heart. I am afraid that instead of helping toward an agreement, this method would be more of an obstacle.

Those who sat on the committee in 1935—I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree to this—will agree with me when I say that provinces resented the fact that this committee was sitting. When the committee decided to summon the attorneys general and other officials of the provinces to present their views before it, they answered—and I think they answered properly—that they would deal as between government and government. They did not think the provinces, which were sovereign within their sphere, should be called upon to appear before a committee of the House of Commons. As I say, I think the provinces were right in making this answer.

I believe they would take the same position to-day. They would resent the fact that a committee of the House of Commons had started on the work of revising the constitution. As I have said, much more work will have to be done by way of negotiation and communication with the provinces. I think we are all in agreement as to the necessity of some amendment being made. I hope this will be done, but I repeat that it can be done only by securing the agreement of the provinces and not by asserting that we in the House of Commons can change the constitution of Canada by ourselves.

Canada is a confederation. My hon. friend referred to the greater ease of operation of unitary governments. No doubt he is right about that, but our constitutional situation is the result of conditions which prevail in Canada. Unless those powers had been left to the provinces they would never have agreed to come into confederation, and let me repeat again what I have said on a similar motion. The dominion is the child of the provinces; it is not their father. The provinces were in existence, had their powers, had their jurisdiction; they agreed to depart from a certain portion of their powers provided they were left with jurisdiction in other spheres, and they would never have come in and formed this Canada as it is if there had not been agreement at the conference which took place and which resulted in the British North America Act, a statute which was passed in England, that those provincial powers should remain within the sphere of authority of the provinces.

I repeat that what remains to be done is indeed very, very delicate work, and I do not see, with all deference to my hon. friend, that the committee which he suggests would in any way help the solution of the problem which we want settled.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion may I at the outset lay down two rules which must be fully grasped and appreciated if the remarks that are to follow are to convey clearly and concisely the necessity of carrying out the request made in this resolution.

The first rule is this: The vitality of national life, being dependent upon the harmony of its component parts, is capable of resisting temporal erosion in proportion to the degree in which harmony exists.

The second rule is: The deterioration of a political entity, subject to the diversity of its constituent elements, is slow or rapid in proportion to the fractional facets of its local problems.

With these thoughts in mind I had placed on the order paper a resolution which calls for the establishment of a commission to investigate the circumstances and problems of western Canada. I firmly believe that the resolution now before us is out of place, because before we can be in a position to amend the British North America Act, we must first find out what the problems demanding solution are, and this cannot be done until the problems affecting various parts of the country are studied. In my resolution I suggest a commission to investigate conditions in western Canada simply because I feel that before we attempt to amend the British North America Act, we should know what is the trouble with us. Therefore, in speaking to the resolution before us, I shall take up particularly western Canadian problems because there is a possibility that my resolution on the order paper may not be reached this session.

On March 29, 1867, the British North America Act received royal assent, and it became operative by royal proclamation on July 1, 1867. The purpose of this act, we must assume, was first of all to benefit all parts of the British North American colonies through legislation passed by the central government and designed to increase commerce. In the debates of the house in 1879, at page 429, we find Sir Leonard Tilley making the following statement:

> The time has arrived, I think, when it will become our duty to decide whether the thousands of men throughout the length and breadth of this country who are unemployed, shall seek employment in another country, or shall find it in this dominion; the time has arrived when we are to decide whether we will be simply hewers of wood and drawers of water; whether we will be simply agriculturists raising wheat, and lumbermen producing more lumber than we can use or Great Britain and the United States will take from us at remunerative prices; whether we will confine our attention to the fisheries and certain other small industries, and cease to be what we have been, and not rise to be what I believe we are destined to be under wise and judicious legislation, or whether we will inaugurate a policy that will, by its provisions, say to the industries of the country, we will give you sufficient protection; we will give you a market for what you can produce; we will say that, while our neighbours build up a Chinese wall, we will impose a reasonable duty on their products coming into this country; at all events, we will maintain for our agricultural and other productions largely, the market of our own dominion.

Second, as is shown by the records of that time, on the insistence of the British Colonial Office there was an attempt to meet the policy of defence of the imperial government. With this second reason we are not for the moment greatly concerned. In any event the western provinces are now within the scope of confederation, and their entry must necessarily have been harmonious with the hope expressed by Sir Leonard Tilley.

In 1856 the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, comprising an area of 2,000,000 square miles, contained 6,691 persons in addition to the Indians. Less than 9,000 acres of land were under cultivation. Fifteen years later, in the same area the population had increased to 73,228, and ten years later to 122,400, with 279,249 acres under cultivation.

The policy of the Canadian government at that time was that expansion of settlement westward was logical and desirable, and that the agricultural possibilities of the country were too great to admit of its being reserved any longer for the fur trade. The settlement of the western Canadian plains was a clean-cut experiment in agricultural colonization. Thus we find that between 1897 and 1905, under the Hon. Clifford Sifton, the west developed at an amazing rate. Our immigration propaganda in the United States, Great Britain and Europe was most vigorous. For example, the report of immigration for 1904, part 2, at page 16, shows that no less than 2,703,646 pamphlets were sent out. These were issued not in the English language alone, but in French, German, Dutch, Norwegian and Swedish. The idea was to attract immigrants and to develop western Canada as rapidly as possible. It is plainly seen to-day in what manner this has affected the problems of the west. Settlers were encouraged to go west, but not with any particular guidance. Settlements sprung up rapidly. The inducements were great, and thousands trekked to western Canada and settled where they desired.

During the sixty years in which the Canadian northwest has been part of Canada its population has increased from 73,000 to 2,354,000, and the improved acres of land have increased from 279,000 in 1881 to 59,854,000 in 1931, out of 109,778,000 acres of occupied land. While this increase was fostered wholly by the federal government, no thought was given at the time to the problems which eventually must be faced by the provincial governments in regard to roads. Secluded areas had to be linked. Hundreds of miles of roads had to be built, and to-day a large part of the obligations of the western provinces may be traced directly to capital outlays for road construction.

It is perhaps unusual to ask a federal government to realize how it could in any measure be responsible for capital outlays made by autonomous and responsible legislative assemblies, but one must remember that the spirit of expansion and development was bred into western settlers' minds by federal immigration policies, and those settlers, of course, insisted and still insist upon more and more roads. Thus it would seem to me that out of the experiences of the past a better method of settlement could be worked out. For example, certain areas of land now sparsely settled could be considered by both provincial and federal governments as "prospective settlement districts." These districts should be permitted to be settled only under a definite settlement scheme. The area could be thoroughly surveyed and settlement permitted only at certain points agreed upon by both provincial and federal governments. The type of settlers could be chosen. Roads could be built only where necessary.

The northern portions of the western provinces all contain land, which some day will be settled. Even to-day settlers are being taken out of dried out areas and dumped somewhere in the northern bush, in places almost impossible of access. Of course these settlers want roads; they are entitled to them and the roads should be built. However, this entails hundreds of miles of roads for a small population. This expense could be lessened without suffering to anyone, always providing, however, that foresight and judgment are used.

The methods of colonization have resulted in bringing about unbearable financial difficulties to the western provinces, and if a commission is set up, this grievance can be thoroughly investigated. I feel sure that a remedy would be found.

Another source of ill feeling in western Canada is the present structure of freight rates. It is true that, owing to substantially low rates on grain, grain-growing in western Canada has been helped, but to-day the situation is not the same. In days gone by, many people settled in the west simply with the idea of attempting to make a fortune raising wheat; they were wheat miners. After making a fortune, it was their intention to return to eastern Canada to live. This is no longer the case. The people of the west have come to think of western Canada as home and as a result have become engaged to an increasing degree in producing other commodities than wheat alone.

When it is generally admitted that substantially low rates on grain had a beneficial effect, surely similar rates applied to western production would work the same way and would be beneficial in more than one respect. They would encourage mixed farming which, in the final analysis, is the best and safest method of assuring a degree of security to western farmers. Mixed farming means many things. It promotes protection of farm land by necessitating crop rotation, more extensive growth of fodder crops, such as grasses, sweet clover, etcetera. It permits certain sections of land retaining wooded areas, a protection against drought. It supplies a ready market for grain and an income of some sort.

Furthermore, the west knows that competitive factors, both on the Pacific coast and in eastern Canada, have compelled basically lower freight rates in those two sections of the country, but in the case of the prairie provinces no comparative basic change of freight rates has taken place for the last twenty-two or twenty-three years. Also eastern Canada, being older than the west, naturally has better roads. This fact has encouraged transportation by truck and bus to a degree sufficient to compel revision of railway rates in many instances.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not like to interrupt an hon. member, particularly on the discussion of a motion, but I must ask hon. members to refrain from going too far. They have already discussed the question of an amendment of the British North America Act, and they have discussed also the question of specific amendments required to the British North America Act to enable parliament to enact legislation "for the better social conditions of the Canadian people." I should not like hon. members, upon this particular motion, to wander over all the field of amendments.

Mr. PELLETIER: Mr. Speaker, the reason I am mentioning these matters is that before we can intelligently discuss amendments to the British North America Act, certain problems must be pointed out and certain remedies proposed for them. It is impossible to amend the British North America Act unless we know what it is about, and I believe these matters are in line with the resolution.

I should like to quote the freight on a few items, so as to give a clear idea of what I have in mind. Let us take dry goods, for example. The distance from Montreal to Calgary is 2,324 miles. The freight for 100 pounds of dry goods in boxes is 19·04 cents per 100 pounds per 100 miles. On exactly the same dry goods in the same packages, shipped from Vancouver to Calgary, a distance of 641·5 miles, the rate per 100 pounds per 100 miles is 34·10 cents. The distance between Montreal and Winnipeg is 1,410·3 miles and the rate for dry goods in boxes per 100 pounds is $2.67½. The distance between Vancouver and Winnipeg is 1,473·02 miles, or 63 miles further than the distance between Montreal and Winnipeg, but the rate is $3.72 per 100 pounds. The cost for those extra 63 miles is $1.04½ per 100 pounds.

These rates are supplied to me from an official source and were in effect on January 20 of this year. I have not attempted to compile a large set of figures, embodying various commodities, but the principle which governs freight rates in this particular instance also governs freight rates in others, and therefore, comparatively speaking, the same condition would be found to exist.

In any event, sixty per cent of the total freight revenue of the Canadian Pacific railway is derived from western Canada. These figures were quoted by President Beatty at the last meeting of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. If for no other reason than that western Canada provides the most freight revenue, it is entitled to a hearing, and that reason alone would be sufficient. I am not, by any stretch of the imagination, touching upon all the various expressions of feeling heard in western Canada regarding freight rates. A commission would gather a wealth of material and give westerners an opportunity of "getting things off their chests."

I am also of opinion that the effect of Canada's tariff structure causes one of the most serious wrongs on western Canada. The west supplies the bulk of Canada's exports in the form of grain, cattle and lumber. Canada's industrial plant is in the east and of course industry requires some protection and obtains this protection but only at the expense of western Canada. Other nations are quick to retaliate by shutting out Canadian wheat, cattle and lumber.

The natural resources of the east, their earlier development than has been the case in the west, the water powers and the tariff have naturally concentrated manufacturing in Ontario and Quebec. Industrial development in the east has been a benefit to Canada as a whole. While one cannot disagree with the principle of the tariff, one must recognize the fundamental principle under confederation of the equal right of all provinces; this, of course, can be worked out only under a general "give and take". In doing this and considering the tariff one must take into account the centres of manufacture in Ontario and Quebec; the long freight hauls to markets in the west; the barrier of the Rocky mountains, and the beneficial effects the west, through the construction and operation of the Panama canal, may have to trade with other countries.

Let us see what has been the outgrowth of the tariff policy in Canada. The only complete study of this matter was done by the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and published in the report, "A Submission on Dominion-Provincial Relations and the Fiscal Disabilities of Nova Scotia within the Confederation," Province of Nova Scotia Royal Commission Economic Inquiry. In this report, on page 99, is set out the following, in part:

The enhancement of prices due to the tariff (1931)

Manitoba	$29,185,740
Saskatchewan	29,228,285
Alberta	27,909,396
British Columbia	37,737,247
Total	$124,060,668

The position of the various provinces in relation to gains and losses suffered by the tariff is set out in the following table which gives for each province separately the per capita tariff subsidies and the per capita tariff costs:

Province	Tariff subsidy per capita	Tariff Costs per capita	Net gain per capita	Net loss per capita
Prince Edward Island	$ 5 32	$23 20	....	$17 88

The Minister of Labour states at pages 100 and 101:

It may be contended that the value of the computation of the provincial incidence of the tariff is vitiated by the fact that there is no reason to believe that 26 per cent is an accurate measure of the effect of the tariff in enhancing prices of protected manufactures. It has already been acknowledged that existing statistical information does not permit an exact calculation of the effect of the tariff on prices. The figure of 26 per cent was taken because it was the flat rate of the average ad valorem duties on dutiable imports in 1931. But suppose the measurement of average enhancement of prices were 20 per cent instead of 26 per cent. The only difference would be in the absolute amounts and not in the relative distribution between provinces. The relative disparity between Ontario and Quebec as opposed to the other provinces would still remain. It would still be true that Ontario and Quebec would show the only surplus of manufacturers' tariff subsidies over consumers' tariff costs, and that the other provinces would show uniformly a substantial deficit of consumers' tariff costs as compared with manufacturers' tariff subsidies.

He goes on further to show the difficulties which the Canadian tariff problem presents as a whole to western Canada and how much the other provinces, apart from Quebec and Ontario, have suffered in the past from the Canadian tariff policy.

I have this suggestion to offer to the government, and I believe it is one that is really worthy of consideration in view of the present situation especially in western Canada. If I mistake not, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has suggested that this government and the British government have agreed in principle to a trade agreement. It seems to me that a commission for western Canada could not possibly come at a better time than just now, for it would serve a very useful purpose in supplying information to this government when negotiating a trade agreement with the British government. I believe further that the question of tariffs is one which calls for a full investigation, and therefore offer this suggestion. There is such a thing as a regional tariff. In my opinion western Canada has suffered long and suffered a great deal from the Canadian tariff policy, and I suggest that a commission could very well look into the question of regional tariffs, fully investigating that method of handling the tariff question in Canada to see whether better conditions than prevail at present could not be brought about in the west.

In the British North America Act it is provided that certain sums of money known as subsidies shall be paid by the federal government to the various provinces. In view of the fact that the government has at the moment someone—Mr. D. A. Skelton, I believe—investigating the whole structure of subsidies and grants in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, it would be unwise for me to say anything about subsidies at this time. I understand, from reports I have read, that it is the intention of the government to act upon the report which will be submitted by Mr. Skelton, and there is a possibility that grants to the western provinces may be increased when that report is made. I would content myself now, therefore, with simply saying that the question of subsidies is one which deserves and should receive the attention of a commission that should be set up to look into the matter.

The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggested that we should have a constitutional conference, and in support of this contention he said:

No one can fail to realize, for instance, that there is a sharp conflict at the present moment between legislatures and the parliament of Canada.

Upon those words he proceeded to develop his idea. I concur in the view expressed by the mover of this resolution that that was anticipating an argument to come up in this house. I agree that to introduce party politics into such an argument would immediately cheapen the proposal and destroy its value, but I fail to realize the weight of the argument unless it embodies some inkling of the cause of that sharp conflict. It is said that the question of jurisdiction must one day be determined; in other words, the interpretation of our constitution has become difficult. Why is this? In my opinion it is because provincial legislatures have been pushed to certain actions in consequence of the persistent failure of federal governments to better conditions from the point of view of the man in the street. Thousands of people have suffered during recent years and, pushed beyond endurance, have sought relief from other than federal sources.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PELLETIER: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to show that this resolution really does not cover what in my opinion is necessary in order to settle some of our difficulties as far as the constitution of Canada is concerned. Continuing, I would say that owing to the variety of interests in our dominion, in both the political and the economic spheres, these expressions of a desire for betterment have not been identical in all provinces. People in some provinces think assistance would be forthcoming if a certain thing were done. People in other provinces, facing the same problem, because of local factors believe that the difficulty can be best solved in some other manner, thus bringing about that ever present conflict between the provincial legislatures and this parliament in the exercise of their constitutional jurisdictions. Thus it is most difficult to find any point of mutual agreement that would form a basis for a conference such as has been suggested by my hon. friend.

This was definitely proved when the Prime Minister read from the report of the 1935 committee on the British North America Act, before which Doctor Beauchesne recommended a convention to draft a new constitution. In that report, as the Prime Minister pointed out, the views of the various provinces are brought to the surface, and they indicate utter lack of mutual agreement with regard to any one suggested change. In almost every instance a desire for change was expressed, but nowhere do we find agreement as to what changes should be made. In Canada to-day we find a restlessness which is becoming alarming. Discontent, discord, lack of stability and uneasiness. prevail. No one knows what may happen next. There is nothing solid. That is how people feel, but in my opinion we have something solid; we have our constitution.

I come back to a rule which I laid down in my opening remarks. That is, the vitality of national life, being dependent upon the harmony of its component parts, is capable of resisting temporal erosion in proportion to the degree in which harmony exists. At the moment harmony does not exist. At the moment in the west people live in the shadow of wrongs, either fancied or real. They fancy that eastern Canada does not understand them. On the other hand the people of eastern Canada feel that the west is a burden; they picture western Canadians as individuals who are forever running to the federal treasury for loans. They fancy that the east pays the bills while the west lives in irresponsible affluence. The west resents this attitude. It knows that factors beyond its control took away its purchasing power by immensely reducing its income from the growing of grain. It knows how it has suffered through drought, hot winds, grasshoppers, hail and frost. It feels its wounds, not because they hurt but because they bring no sympathy. The west is part of Canada; it is the child of the east, and now that adolescent child is abandoned to lick its salty sores and whimper alone. The guns of Europe might rumble once more. Perhaps that would be important to Canada, but of greater importance still is that slow-burning fire of distress which leads to hate smouldering in this Canadian family. The child of the east cries out; it extends its hands in earnest desire for friendly cooperation and justice. Let the east awaken and reply in kind and encourage us so that we in whom Canadians have placed their confidence may fail not. Let us, within the framework of our constitution, our solid constitution, offer that opportunity of expression which must result in dispelling distrust and bring back once more the harmony which is so essential to the survival of this nation.

Let us give the west a hearing. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, certain things that have happened in western Canada have resulted from the conditions I have mentioned to-day. It seems to me that if we attempt to remedy the situation by amending the British North America Act we must know first of all what it is we are seeking to do and how to go about securing the desired result. It seems to me that a commission or a committee of this house, empowered to look into these problems in Canada, could not possibly arrive at sound conclusions or discover the correct answers unless first it knew exactly what it was looking for. We do not need any further proof of that than what recently happened in western Canada, as far as the expression of public opinion is concerned. As I have said already, we hear all sorts of expressions of opinion, and I believe many of them originate simply through the failure of the federal government to give effect to laws which are demanded by the man in the street. We find that he must have some medium of expression, and that medium has not been provided by the federal government. So he has turned his attention to the provincial legislatures and has forced them to enact laws some of which come into conflict or are said to come into conflict with our federal laws.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the government will take into serious consideration the points I have brought out. Western Canada is an essential and a great part of Canada, and I believe that in its desire to maintain confederation, seeking cooperation and desiring assistance, it will receive that help and that cooperation which I know this parliament can give.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with my colleague the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in urging the government to consider seriously the appointment of such a committee. I recall that I introduced a motion of this kind as far back as 1924, and again in 1931. Two years ago, in 1935, I brought forward another motion, a little different, a little more limited in scope, which was referred to a committee, to which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred this afternoon. My motion read:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.

In presenting that resolution I was careful to assure the house that there was no thought in my mind of interfering with any of the existing rights of the provinces, and I tried especially to safeguard the rights of racial and religious minorities.

The house received that resolution very favourably, and the committee, I think I may say, worked quite conscientiously in endeavouring to find some way by which we could amend our constitution. However, the committee failed lamentably, because of a lack of cooperation with the provinces, and I believe, behind that, because of the assumption that we must have the consent of all the provinces before we could take any action. So the committee brought in finally what I must confess was a milk and water sort of report, suggesting that this whole matter should be referred to a dominion-provincial conference.

The resolution that has been placed before us to-day is somewhat different. It suggests that a parliamentary committee should study and report upon the specific amendments which might be brought in to meet the outstanding needs of our country at this time. The committee which sat two years ago dealt with the method. This time we have approached the matter in a different way, urging that the committee at least might survey the field and suggest the particular changes needed to meet the urgent problems which face us to-day. I regret that the government has not seen its way to accede to our request, and to appoint such a committee. I regret even more, however, that the Minister of Justice, who spoke for the government, has offered no alternative.

I shall not attempt again to traverse the ground so well covered by my colleague from Rosetown-Biggar, but may I venture to call to the attention of the house, a house which since 1935 is partly new, several considerations I tried to emphasize in 1935. Why should we not have an amendment to our constitution? The then Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), during the debate in the house on April 13, 1934, made this statement:

> Two answers could be given to that question; one is the political answer and the other is the legal answer. The legal answer is that if this parliament—and that means both houses—adopts a resolution embodying a petition to the sovereign for the enactment of legislation by the parliament at Westminster amending the British North America Act, under the Statute of Westminster such legislation would be enacted accordingly.

I believe there can be no question that that is a fair statement of the situation. It seemed to me that this afternoon the Minister of Justice rather receded from the position which was common two years ago in this chamber. It seemed to me that he was going back to the old idea that there exists a sort of treaty between the provinces and the dominion and that we have to live up to that treaty. I hope I do not misrepresent him, but as he spoke this afternoon that was the impression I gathered. Again let me point out that as a matter of fact the British North America Act has actually been amended in various ways. It was once amended by the British parliament on the strength of a simple request by the Canadian government, without the proposal even coming before parliament. A great many people have the idea that the British North America Act is like the laws of the Medes and Persians, that it can never be changed. But we forget the very large number of amendments that have already been made in the act. Once a request which was made by the dominion parliament carried the formal endorsation of eight out of the nine provinces and was opposed by one province. On the other occasions the British parliament acted on the joint request of the Canadian House of Commons and the Senate. The precedents therefore suggest that the British parliament will enact any legislation to amend the British North America Act on the recommendation of the Canadian parliament.

If we are to wait until we have a dominion-provincial conference and until such conference unanimously adopts not only a method of amending the act but also the amendments which should be made, I am afraid we shall have to wait indefinitely.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Nobody has said that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I say that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You do?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; I am afraid of that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You do something, and then you refute it afterwards.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Probably the minister does not understand what I say. I am giving my opinion, namely that if we have to wait until we call a dominion-provincial conference and some sort of unanimous—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "Some sort"?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —yes, some sort of unanimous consent, not only to the methods by which amendments may be brought forward but also as to what particular amendments should be made, we may have to wait indefinitely.

Then there is another consideration we ought to keep in mind—the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) called attention to it in an interjection to-day—that we must have the consent of the Senate. It is true that parliament consists of the House of Commons and the Senate, but I submit we cannot forever permit the Senate to thwart the will of the commons which presumably represents the great mass of the people of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend think he can change that by creating a committee of the house?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no; we do not suggest that. The minister is expecting the committee to do a great deal more than that for which the resolution calls. In emphasizing the point to which reference was made this afternoon I should like to quote no other than the leader of the opposition. In 1915, on the occasion of the Senate declining to agree to an address for an immediate change in representation in that chamber, he denounced the Senate. At page 2338 of Hansard of that year he referred to the upper house as an "irresponsible body which thwarted the will of democracy, as expressed by this House of Commons." Perhaps that is stronger language than I might use! However, all I want to say is that if the Senate attempts to block amendments which are generally desired, we shall have to find means of dealing with the Senate. That is all I need say at the moment, but I think it should be said.

Referring to a statement by my colleague the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the Minister of Justice stated that the Statute of Westminster did not alter the relationships between the provinces and the dominion. I think we all agree with that. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not argue otherwise, but if I followed his argument it was this, that the parliament of Great Britain is sovereign. In Canada parliament has occupied a subordinate position. Under the Statute of Westminster Canada to-day is supposed to be as sovereign as the parliament of Great Britain. I think no one doubts that the parliament of Great Britain could alter the British North America Act, and conceivably could do so without an address from the two Canadian houses. It could make alterations in opposition to provincial representations. I do not assert that such action is likely, but I say the British North America Act is an imperial statute and can be altered by that imperial body. Since the passing of the Statute of Westminster the Canadian parliament ought to have an authority equal to that which exists in the imperial house. I believe that it was along these lines the hon. member was making his argument. If not, I take it as my own.

We cannot go on indefinitely under the arrangement that we must refer matters to some body other than our own. We have full authority here to deal with Canadian affairs. The thing that worried me this afternoon was not so much the suggestion of the minister that this matter could be dealt with better by some sort of commission—and I am getting a little tired of commissions composed largely of lawyers; I think we might very well get away from that kind of commission and have commissioners who represent a great many other interests in the dominion—and not so much that it could be dealt with by a dominion-provincial conference—that may be the best way to deal with it—but rather that the minister offers very little by way of an alternative to the existing situation. If he would give us a guarantee that the dominion-provincial conference will be called within six months and pledge his word that that conference will take action—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) laughs.

Mr. DUNNING: I have tried it and I know something of the difficulty.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some of us who have followed the reports of these conferences know something of the difficulties. The trouble is that this thing has gone on year after year and decade after decade until conditions have become almost desperate. We can get no assurance whatever from the government that prompt action will be taken.

Mr. DUNNING: How far is my hon. friend prepared to go in compromising with regard to his principles? That is always a point in connection with these conferences. I do not believe my hon. friend would compromise to any extent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope my hon. friend is correct in his estimate of me. I have tried to make that my rule. However, I think there are principles and principles. There are certain things which have been elevated to the position of principles, which are regarded by some people as being principles, but which have not universal application. It may be said that in this connection there are two principles at stake.

Mr. DUNNING: Judging by what the provinces say to us, there are many.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Fundamentally the principles at stake are certain rights of the provinces, certain powers known as provincial autonomy, and, on the other hand, certain rights and powers of the dominion. It may be said that those two principles clash. That may be so, but my point is that we cannot let this situation go on forever, drift as it has done, without imperilling the whole of confederation.

Let me bring a further matter to the attention of the house. From my standpoint, the recent decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council were most unsatisfactory, if I may say so without getting into trouble with all the lawyers in this house. They are unsatisfactory from my standpoint because the privy council, sitting in England, cannot have the information and point of view that we have in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They agreed with the supreme court here.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is quite true. If we refused to send legal questions to the judicial committee of the privy council I think we would be a little bit more careful about the decisions given by the Supreme Court of Canada. If I might be permitted to say so, I think we would also be a little bit more careful as to the calibre of the judges we put in our supreme court. It would tend to throw greater responsibility upon our own institutions. I am not criticizing this or that or the other individual but I submit that as long as we remain in tutelage, as long as we look overseas for someone to tell us in the last analysis what must be done, we shall remain immature and all our decisions will be of a tentative nature. For one, I shall be very glad when we stand on our own two feet and recognize that we must work out our own problems right here in Canada.

I want to say one thing further in this connection. I belong to a province and I come from a section of this country which was not a party to the British North America Act. At the time that act was passed my people were all in eastern Canada and I had not been born, but as eastern Canada dealt with this matter it might be claimed that I must accept some responsibility. I come from Manitoba and I have lived most of my life in the west. We as a province, or as provinces, were not a party to the British North America Act and you could not possibly put over such an act to-day and have the west a party to it. I do not like threats, but I want to remind this house of the sporadic movements which have sprung up in the west from time to time looking in the direction of secession. These movements will spread unless action is taken in the not distant future. The west has reached a stage where it simply cannot carry on. One province has defaulted and in all probability, unless some very special arrangements are made, it will not be very long before other western provinces default.

We find that there are certain ideals which are common to all four western provinces, but which apparently are not held by some of the provinces in the east. We want it understood that we cannot go on indefinitely suffering under certain disabilities which could be altered if we operated under another constitution. If the fathers of confederation whom we praise so highly had sense enough to get together and work out a constitution which no doubt was more or less fitted for their day, I urge that we are not worthy sons of theirs unless we in our day can get together and work out a constitution, different perhaps from the old one, which will serve the needs of our day.

Mr. CAHAN: What changes would the hon. member suggest?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) asks me what changes we would suggest. That is the very thing for which we want this committee appointed.

Mr. CAHAN: We want to hear from the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr Coldwell) spent some considerable time outlining these changes and I do not propose to cover his speech to-night. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George can read it to-morrow in Hansard. Certain very definite changes are outlined in the resolution now before us and they deal largely with the social problems that face us.

Mr. MacINNIS: The changes advocated last week by his leader.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend behind me says that they are the changes advocated by the leader of the party of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Let me read the resolution again:

—in view of the urgent necessity of effective action for the improvement of the social and economic conditions of the people of Canada—

Whether such action is needed in the community represented by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I am not prepared to say.

Mr. CAHAN: Explain; social and economic conditions mean nothing definite.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They do mean something to me. Let me read this:

—in view of the conditions of social and other legislation passed by parliament during the tenure of office of the late government—

Does that mean nothing to my hon. friend? He was a member of that government. He knows how most of that legislation has gone by the board.

Mr. ROGERS: Did he approve and does he approve the method adopted by the late administration in acquiring that measure of jurisdiction which formerly had always been regarded as belonging to the provinces?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know that I am required to answer whether or not I approved that legislation, especially in view of the fact that it has been thrown out by the judicial committee of the privy council as unconstitutional. But I do say that the things which were attempted by the previous government by way of certain measures to provide for unemployment insurance, the eight hour day and all the rest of it, were in my judgment highly desirable.

Mr. ROGERS: What of the means?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am asking that means be devised. The Minister of Labour gave evidence before the committee of a year ago and I think he is very well acquainted with certain means that might be attempted. We are not urging that this particular measure should be the only one before the house. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, if this is not satisfactory, we shall be very glad to support any other measure which might be considered more satisfactory. But we want some measure.

A few minutes ago, I referred to secession, this not by way of a threat because I have always opposed secession movements on the ground that they were an attempted political solution for some of our great economic problems. But someone should point out that some sections of our country will be driven ultimately to attempt some such solution. We cannot go on in this way very much longer. We are urging that before things become too desperate, the situation in Canada should be saved.

I read several editorials following the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council. I want to read the opening paragraph of an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of January 30, 1937:

There is ground for a great deal of satisfaction on the part of Canadian business, as well as on the part of all minorities in this country, in the fact that the British North America Act has survived the efforts of a dominion parliament to shoot holes through it.

That was the opening paragraph, and I think it is wonderfully revealing. All minorities should rejoice in this, it says. Now my own position with regard to minorities has been stated again and again. It was stated in that resolution which I brought into the house two years ago. Let me read it:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.

I have every respect for, and I want this country to safeguard carefully the racial and religious rights of minorities, but on the other hand I do not believe that a minority, even a racial or religious minority, must be allowed to hold up progress in this country. I should like some time to talk on the rights of majorities.

Mr. BRADETTE: Page Mr. Rowe.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I am no religious fanatic, and anybody who knows me recognizes that I am no fanatic so far as language or anything of that kind is concerned, but I do say this, that the majorities in this dominion have certain rights and we must not forever be held down by the ideals of one or two or three or five particular sections of the community. In reality I am not so much concerned with racial and religious minorities as I am with some other kinds of minorities. I am thinking of financial minorities, and I am thinking of some industrialists in this country, small groups of people who for their own ends ask that progress be delayed. It is from this standpoint that I read this opening paragraph in the Gazette:

> There is ground for a great deal of satisfaction on the part of Canadian business, as well as on the part of all minorities—

The Gazette is published in Montreal, and it is perhaps a good political move to stir up a little bit of racial antagonism in that way. It may catch the people of Montreal or the people of Quebec; it may catch some here, there or yonder; I do not know. I repeat, I stand for the rights of minorities, racial or religious. But when the Gazette says that this is a matter for great satisfaction to Canadian business, I cannot but think of resolutions that have been sent to me during the fifteen years I have been in this house, as well as editorials I have read, in which Canadian business, that is organized big business, has done its best to thwart eight hour day legislation, to thwart the minimum wage legislation, to thwart old age pensions, to thwart unemployment insurance. Canadian business has been again and again opposed to these things. On occasion they would say: We are British. When we have pointed out that in Great Britain they have social legislation of this kind, and have had it for years, "Oh well," they reply, "that is different." They back away from their patriotism then, and a cheap patriotism it is, too, when you put it up to them. For years they came to our committees and said, "We cannot do anything because we have to compete with the great republic to the south of us. They have no eight-hour day in many of the states, no unemployment insurance, no sickness insurance; so we cannot do anything at the present time in Canada." Now a large measure of social security legislation has been enacted in the United States, and yet here in Canada we have Canadian workers, in the steel plants, working, I am credibly informed, thirteen hours at night when we have vast numbers of unemployed. We cannot do anything to alter the situation because the British North America Act stands in the way. We have five thousand families unemployed in my city, and have had them for years. They are growing old in receiving relief. These people should have had unemployment insurance years ago, but when we propose it we are told: "We cannot do anything—the British North America Act!" And Canadian business rejoices because the British North America Act blocks any legislation of the kind. These are the matters to which we ought to pay some attention. But the Gazette says:

> There is ground for a great deal of satisfaction on the part of Canadian business, as well as on the part of all minorities in this country, in the fact that the British North America Act has survived the efforts of a dominion parliament to shoot holes through it.

Was there anything in the legislation proposed by the late government two years ago, in regard to the eight-hour day, unemployment insurance and all the rest of it, that took away the rights of minorities? Not that I know of. We all agree that these things should be done, and the British North America Act is just a herring across the trail. What we really have to face is a certain class of people in this country who will stand behind this old document seventy years of age and prevent us from progressing on to better things.

This government should be given a chance to determine its action. I did not expect any action last year, because it was the first year of a new government in power, but when we come this year and urge that something be done, about all that we get from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), representing the government, is simply an enumeration of a number of difficulties in the way.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: And he says we cannot do anything about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I never said that. I said you could not do anything by the appointment of a committee. That is not the way. I said that this must be done by communicating with the provinces and negotiating to try to come to an agreement—not your committee way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have been communicating and negotiating with the provinces for years past, and now something in the way of action is demanded.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member has just said he did not expect anything last year, but he expects something this year. I do, too, but not by the appointment of a committee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I think the least the government can do is to give us the assurance that at the very earliest date such a conference as the minister has suggested will be called, and that ways and means will be found at that conference of bringing about the desired reforms. When I said that before, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) rather laughed at it. I want to say that "where there's a will there's a way," and I am quite confident that if the Minsiter of Finance, who after all knows the west very well, or he did a few years ago—I do not know whether he has forgotten the pit from which he was digged—

Mr. DUNNING: I shall not take second place to the hon. member in my knowledge of the west right now.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All right. If he remembers anything of the west, then I say it is possible for him and the Minister of Justice and others to work out schemes by which these practical reforms will be brought about. I am not a lawyer and I am getting tired of this talk of constitutional questions and quibbling of all kinds. What I want, and all that my friend who moved this resolution (Mr. Coldwell) wants, is to discover some means of solving the practical problems that so seriously menace the welfare of this country.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I wish to speak briefly to this resolution and in support of the objections to its adoption which were expressed so clearly this afternoon by my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The mover of the resolution in his concluding remarks made the novel and refreshing suggestion that he would be quite prepared to withdraw it if he could be convinced that there was some better way of dealing with a constitutional amendment at this time. Perhaps he is already convinced that there is a better way; at all events, I am going to take him at his word, and shall try to indicate the reasons why in my opinion this resolution is inopportune and unacceptable at this time.

My first objection to the resolution is this: No investigation by a special committee of this house and no resolution of this house can promote or expedite the amendment of the British North America Act. We may declare here that the dominion parliament ought to have jurisdiction over hours and wages and unemployment insurance, but this declaration would not of itself bring us any closer to the realization of that objective. The question of how the proposed amendments would be given effect would still remain unsettled.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point.

Mr. ROGERS: That question, as was pointed out by the Minister of Justice this afternoon, can be determined only by consultation and cooperation between the dominion and the provinces, and it has already been brought to the attention of this house that such consultation and such cooperation are now in progress.

The truth of the matter is—and I am quite sure it is known to most members of this house—that we do not possess in Canada at this time any recognized procedure for the amendment of our own constitution. So far as I am aware the Canadian constitution is the only federal constitution the world over which suffers from this particular infirmity. It is perhaps only of antiquarian interest to seek to determine why it was that there was this great omission in the original terms of the British North America Act. There are some who suggest that the omission was simply a matter of inadvertence. There are others who contend that the omission was deliberate. I am bound to say that there is a body of evidence to support each point of view. But that particular question does not concern us now. We are confronted with this situation, that the British North America Act does not of itself contain any procedure for its own amendment. Any recommendations that might be made by a select committee of this house would be nothing more than recommendations. As I suggested a moment ago, they would not of themselves advance the amendment of the British North America Act.

There are different opinions as to how we could proceed to develop a mechanism for the amendment of the British North America Act. Indeed I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will admit that the determination of the procedure by which we shall amend the British North America Act is of more vital importance than the determination of specific amendments which may be made at any given point of time. And even if a select committee of this house were able to agree that the dominion parliament ought to have jurisdiction over hours and wages and unemployment insurance, we would still be faced with the necessity of consulting with the provinces and seeking to secure from them an agreement as to the precise measure of consultation and agreement which would be required in order to enact these amendments. Upon that question, as was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), there is a divergence of opinion in this country. There are those, for example, who contend that the British North America Act, lacking as it does any specific procedure of amendment, can be amended only when all the provinces have given consent to any proposal for amendment. There are those on the contrary who have suggested that the dominion parliament should of itself propose amendments, as has been done in times past, and that a joint address of the two houses of parliament at Ottawa should be a sufficient basis upon which the amendment to the British North America Act could be grounded. Between those two extreme views you have another view that there should be the assent of the two houses of the dominion parliament, in the form of an address, and at least some measure of approval by the various provincial legislatures. But that vexed question has yet to be determined, and in advance of its determination I do not see that any select committee of this House of Commons could serve a useful purpose at this time in proposing specific amendments to the British North America Act.

My second objection to the resolution is this: In view of the recent decisions of the privy council it would be more appropriate, and probably more effective, to give the provinces an opportunity to take the initiative in proposing specific constitutional amendments at this time. In support of this contention it will be necessary to remind the house of the sequence of events which led to the far-reaching decisions of the privy council which were announced last week. Until January, 1935, it was generally assumed in this dominion that exclusive jurisdiction over hours and wages and unemployment insurance lay with the provinces. As a matter of fact I remember reading a report of a most interesting address by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) which was delivered in the month of November preceding January, 1935, in which he stated in the most vigorous terms that no lawyer doubted that the exclusive jurisdiction over these matters lay with the provincial legislatures. How was it, then, that despite the view of the courts of this country and of legal practitioners generally we find the dominion parliament assuming a jurisdiction over these matters which everyone had supposed belonged to the provinces? I do not think I misrepresent the situation when I say that this astonishing change came about as a result of a decision which was reached by the then Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett). Early in September of 1934 the present leader of the opposition went to Geneva. I suggest that on his way to or from Geneva he saw a great light. As events have proved, it was a false and deceptive light, and with his wide knowledge of law and history he ought to have known that it was a false and deceptive light. But he chose to accept its guidance, and because he accepted its guidance we find ourselves in the position to-day of having a definition of provincial rights in respect to these matters which to some extent, I think, goes further than any decisions have gone in previous years.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. minister had better wait until he sees the decisions before making such an emphatic statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I might say that before the attempt of the late administration to appropriate provincial powers under section 132 of the British North America Act, the trend of recent decisions of the privy council was toward an enlargement of the federal jurisdiction under peace, order and good government, and at least toward a more sympathetic interpretation of the trade and commerce clause as a means of enlarging the authority of the dominion parliament. It would appear now that this trend has been arrested if not reversed and that our last state is worse than our first.

Mr. CAHAN: It is exactly the same as the first.

Mr. ROGERS: With great deference to his legal knowledge, I beg to differ with my hon. friend on that point. The violence of the attack on provincial autonomy and the arbitrary method employed by the present leader of the opposition in his invasion of provincial jurisdiction had the natural result of placing the provinces on the defensive, and accentuated their determination to maintain their autonomy before the courts. As a consequence it would seem that the decisions of the privy council as announced last week have gone further in emphasizing and entrenching provincial rights than any decisions given for many years. Indeed, I think I may at least express this view, that when the decisions come to us, if they bear out the newspaper reports already published, it will be found that this country is going to be more fettered in respect to certain phases of its external relations than it has been hitherto. In other words, I believe it is possible to say that the counter-attack has been more successful than the attack. Instead of gaining ground the dominion government has lost ground; instead of enlisting the cooperation of the provinces, the method adopted has thrown a cloud of suspicion and distrust over the field of dominion-provincial relations, and instead of reconciliation there has been recrimination and at least a measure of reaction.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this attempt of the late administration to use section 132 of the British North America Act as a means of amending the constitution—for it was that—has produced some of these results I have indicated and has actually left dominion-provincial relations in a less satisfactory state than before. One fact at least has been established; it is the one cause for satisfaction which can be salvaged from this episode. We now know, if there was any uncertainty before, that exclusive jurisdiction over hours, wages and unemployment insurance lies with the provincial legislatures; all doubts upon this point have been dispelled. But I want to suggest that it has cost us something to have these doubts removed; it has cost us far more than was necessary. It would have cost a vastly greater sum if the leader of the opposition had carried out his original intention and had built up an elaborate civil service organization to administer the several statutes which now have been declared invalid by the highest court of appeal. We heard, only a few days ago of members of the Employment and Social Insurance Commission who, because of the recent decisions of the privy council, find themselves without employment. In 1935 an order in council was passed which contemplated something in the neighbourhood of one hundred key positions under the Employment and Social Insurance Act. This did not begin to include the clerical positions which would have been established across this country had that act been put fully into effect. What it would have cost individuals and business enterprises to adjust and readjust their operations to these invalid statutes is beyond calculation.

There is an old maxim that it is well to forgive and forget. I am quite willing, as we must all be willing, to forgive; but I think, in the interests of this country, we ought not to forget this particular transaction. What has happened and what has been avoided should serve as a warning to all governments against forsaking the tried and proved foundations of constitutional usage for the shifting sands of political expediency. I shall say no more on this question.

Mr. BENNETT: Say it over again.

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite sure that if the leader of the opposition has exception to take to what I have said he will find ample time for reminding me of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROGERS: We are now, however, confronted with a situation which at least is fairly definite.

That brings me to the second objection I take to the resolution which is now before the house. The provinces possess the jurisdiction to deal with labour and social legislation. This jurisdiction cannot be taken from them by violence or by any declaration that can be made by this parliament. It will not, in the light of existing judicial decisions, be transferred to the dominion parliament by the process of judicial interpretation. It can be given to the dominion parliament, in whole or in part, only by an act of voluntary surrender of jurisdiction by the provincial legislatures. The initiative, in other words, now lies with the provinces themselves.

It has already been brought to the attention of the house that an effort has been made through a dominion-provincial conference to determine the procedure by which the British North America Act shall be amended in future years. This resolution, however, appears to contemplate something in addition to that, namely, the adoption of a number of specific amendments here and now as a result of which jurisdiction over social legislation might be transferred from the provincial legislatures to the dominion parliament. I have had a very brief experience of dominion-provincial conferences. I happened to be present as a member of the secretariat at the conference of 1927, and I have attended two or three dominion-provincial conferences during the past year. I do not think it would be unfair or in any way unreasonable to suggest that sometimes these conferences have failed because they have met in an atmosphere of suspicion and excessive caution. At times there appears to be a feeling on the part of the provinces that the dominion government has some ulterior object in view whenever specific proposals are made to them. At all events we do know that dominion-provincial conferences from time to time have not been as successful as we could have wished. I agree wholly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in that observation. But I wonder whether, in view of the recent decisions of the privy council, the initiative does not now belong with the provinces.

Would any useful end be served at this time by the dominion parliament concurring in the report of a select committee proposing to the provincial legislatures that they should abandon some portion of their jurisdiction over social questions? After all, any doubts which may have existed before have now been resolved; the provinces possess the jurisdiction. Would it not be more reasonable to leave it to an interprovincial conference, if you will, to go into this question of whether certain measures of social legislation can be carried out more effectively by uniform action on the part of the provincial legislatures or by action of the dominion parliament? A few days ago it was said that public opinion in this country is tending more strongly in the direction of supporting more social legislation, and also supporting the view that such legislation should be enacted by the dominion parliament. I wonder why that public opinion could not be focussed also upon provincial legislatures, so that they might of themselves, without any compulsion, without any undue pressure from the dominion government, voluntarily surrender their jurisdiction in some respects to the dominion parliament.

It would not be the first time the question of constitutional amendments has been dealt with by an interprovincial conference as distinguished from a dominion-provincial conference. As a matter of fact, the first conference which was held after confederation was a conference of that kind. It was summoned by Mr. Mercier, then premier of Quebec, acting in close cooperation with Sir Oliver Mowat, then premier of Ontario. As a result of its deliberations that conference actually did propose a number of specific amendments to the British North America Act. It is not necessary to go into the history of those resolutions. As a matter of fact, they fell by the wayside. They were sent to the imperial parliament with the suggestion that apart entirely from the views of the dominion parliament they should be enacted as amendments to the British North America Act, but it was represented to the imperial government of the day that this conference did not speak for Canada as a whole and that the dominion government would take strong exception to any attempt on the part of the imperial parliament to enact those resolutions as amendments to the British North America Act.

My point is simply this, that there is nothing to prevent the provinces from meeting together and discussing, in the light of the recent privy council decision, what they will do and how far they are prepared to go in adopting uniform statutes to deal, let us say, with hours of labour and wages; or, if they are not so prepared, to agree among themselves that they will transfer this jurisdiction to the dominion parliament.

My third objection to the resolution before the house, Mr. Speaker, is this: The mover of the resolution seems to have assumed that substantial amendments to the British North America Act are necessary in order to obtain adequate measures of social security in this country. I doubt if that assumption is wholly justified. I share entirely his view that owing largely to the increasing hazards associated with the changing character of economic life we must go further in the direction of social security than we have gone hitherto, but I do not think it follows of necessity that the sole responsibility for erecting that structure of social security should fall upon the dominion parliament. Clearly, the main object is to realize certain of these purposes, to remove as many as possible of these hazards or to afford protection against them, but I believe it quite possible and perhaps desirable that, particularly in a country of this kind, the framework should include legislation passed by different legislative bodies. At the present time practically all provincial legislatures have passed enactments providing for mothers' allowances and for workmen's compensation. Municipalities in some provinces have cooperated with respect to mothers' allowances and old age pensions. In the case of old age pensions there is a division of financial responsibility, though the legislation itself was enacted by this parliament. Already one province has embarked upon a measure of health insurance and another province has upon its statute books an act providing for state medicine, though as yet it has not been proclaimed.

After all, we must recognize that within a federal constitution we do have a collection of political entities; we do have a division of obligation and of powers. I do not think it follows of necessity, therefore, that in order to achieve these social objectives we must enact far-reaching amendments to the Canadian constitution. Much requires to be done in the way of a survey of the whole field in order that each may know what it can do efficiently. I am not suggesting that the dominion parliament ought not to have some powers which it does not now possess, but as I said a moment ago I do not think it follows that substantial amendments are necessary in order to carry out the objectives the mover of the resolution has in mind.

Let me speak for one moment of the United States; the hon. member referred to the social security program in that country. That program has not been carried through by a transfer of jurisdiction from the states to congress. In the main it has been carried out as a result of financial assistance being given by congress to the states providing that particular measures of social security enacted by the states conform to standards laid down by congress.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I just ask there: Does the Minister of Labour regard that as a sound principle?

Mr. ROGERS: I quite agree with my hon. friend that there is an objection to a separation of the taxing and spending authorities. I have no doubt that was the objection my hon. friend had in mind when he asked that question. But it may be that under a federal constitution certain legislation of this kind may serve during a transition stage or may even operate as a substitute for a definite transfer of jurisdiction from one authority to another. Upon that question I am bound to say I have no final opinion; indeed it would be a great mistake to have a final opinion.

Apart from his suggestion that this select committee should concern itself with the proposal of specific amendments to the British North America Act touching social legislation, the hon. member who moved this resolution indicated his own belief that the committee should go much further than that and consider the financial relations between the dominion and the provinces, the reform of the Canadian senate—I think I am correct in suggesting that this also was in his mind—and in general deal with what he termed constitutional questions.

Apart from the objections to the resolution which I have just indicated, it does seem to me that to vest a committee with such wide terms of reference would most certainly defeat the object my hon. friend has in mind. I agree with him wholly that one cannot usefully consider the transfer of jurisdiction over social questions apart from the consideration of dominion-provincial finance. But the subjects of dominion-provincial finance, of debt and of other related subjects are not of a kind to lend themselves to useful investigation in the short period which could be given them during the present session of parliament.

For these several reasons I repeat my opposition to the resolution and express the hope that the mover may see fit to withdraw it.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), it seems to me that the confused remarks made by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Coldwell) have been still further confused by the address just now delivered by the minister. As a matter of fact it is not a question of the transfer of jurisdiction; that does not enter into the real picture. The British North America Act as originally drafted, interpreted and construed, was indeed a very good act. In fact I believe to this day it remains a very good act, and I doubt whether a committee of the House of Commons can be expected successfully to clarify it.

When the act was passed certain legislative authority was given to each province. Section 92 states:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 1. The amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this act, of the constitution of the province, except as regards the office of lieutenant governor.
> 2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.
> 3. The borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province.
> 4. The establishment and tenure of provincial offices and the appointment and payment of provincial officers.
> 5. The management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon.
> 6. The establishment, maintenance and management of public and reformatory prisons in and for the province.
> 7. The establishment, maintenance, and management of hospitals, asylums, charities, and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.
> 8. Municipal institutions in the province.
> 9. Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licences in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local or municipal purposes.

Paragraph 10 deals at length with local works and undertakings other than those such as lines of railway crossing from one province to another. Although I should like to read it, I shall not take time to do so. Then paragraph 11 reads:

11. The incorporation of companies with provincial objects.
12. The solemnization of marriage in the province.
13. Property and civil rights in the province.

Paragraph 14 is somewhat longer, having to do with the administration of justice in the province. Paragraph 15 deals with the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment. Paragraph 16 reads:

16. Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

From the first to the last of the discussions in the Supreme Court of Canada and in the judicial committee of the privy council without exception it has been held that all legislative powers not found in section 92 are vested in the parliament of Canada. There is no doubt about that. Hon. members may have heard of the discussions when the British North America Act was framed and those which took place during the first twenty years of confederation. I knew personally the men from the maritime provinces who had to do with the framing of the act. Time and again in private conversation and in public I have heard them state their belief as to the meaning and intent of one section of the act. Certainly paragraph 13, dealing with property and civil rights in the province, never was understood at confederation or for twenty years thereafter as including unemployment insurance, the control and regulation of industry in the province, the hours of labour, the maximum or minimum of wages of labour. Those matters were never thought to rest within paragraph 13, property and civil rights in the province. All the remaining paragraphs, with the exception of 13, are clear. There is no ambiguity. Except for the ambiguity and confusion which is found in the words "property and civil rights in the province," there would be absolutely no doubt in the mind of any student that unemployment insurance, hours of labour, wages and the regulation of industry are within the exclusive legislative control of the parliament of Canada.

I cannot give an exact date, but I believe until about 1896 I had a copy of every decision made by the judicial committee of the privy council and a copy of the shorthand report of every argument before that body concerning the British North America Act. So far as my intelligence permitted I have made a careful study of the matter. It was not until after Sir John Macdonald came into office in 1878 and followed Edward Blake in asserting certain powers of the dominion in respect to imperial and external affairs that the judicial committee of the privy council began, with decision after decision, to give a wider interpretation and construction to "property and civil rights," and to cut down the general power vested in the parliament of Canada under section 91.

Section 91 states:

91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say—

And then follow twenty-nine paragraphs.

I think I have read every one of the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council which were applicable to Canada, and in recent years, certainly in the last forty, it has never exercised strictly judicial functions. The judicial committee of the privy council differs from the high court of justice in England in that its decisions indicate pronouncements of what it believes to be high political principles, as apart and distinct from strictly legal interpretations. I suggest that it is not advisable for me to follow the Minister of Labour in a discussion of the recent opinions of the judicial committee of the privy council. They themselves have suggested that their opinions in respect of these references are simply advisory and that they have no legal binding obligation upon the courts of Canada. However, if the recent cabled reports are borne out by the express terms of their opinions as they will be found finally reported in the law reports, certainly I think the criticism which I have made as to decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council in the past may still be found to apply to some of the opinions recently given.

My hon. friend quoted from an address which I gave in November, 1934, and which I still think was a pretty good address. I think I gave a fairly clear summary of the decisions given, not only by our supreme court but by the judicial committee of the privy council prior to that date. There then arose certain contentions. The legal experts of the labour section of the Geneva conference contended, by a series of articles pronounced and published in international journals, that under section 132 of the British North America Act, and in view of the radio decision and the aeronautics decision which had just previously been delivered—

Mr. ROGERS: Were they not in 1932?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, but what is a couple of years in a matter like that? It sometimes takes a year to study these decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council before one can form any accurate idea of their meaning or intent. They had been delivered previously and they led to public discussion in legal and other journals to the effect that the parliament of Canada was not fulfilling its duty to Geneva and to the League of Nations because it had not ratified the labour conventions dealing with hours of labour and rates of wages and had not exercised its legislative authority to put them into effect.

Mr. ROGERS: Did they suggest that we ought to acquire jurisdiction in that way?

Mr. CAHAN: They suggested we had already acquired it under and as set out in section 132. We were not thereby acquiring jurisdiction. No jurisdiction could be acquired other than the jurisdiction vested in parliament by section 132. They argued that in the opinions given in the two cases I have mentioned it was decided by the judicial committee of the privy council that that jurisdiction had been acquired.

Mr. POULIOT: A convention which is not ratified is not a convention.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going to discuss that with my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: I will express my views afterwards.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member has a perfect right to discuss his views, but he has no right to make impertinent remarks.

Mr. POULIOT: I may not be as bad as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CAHAN: Probably not. I know I am always being unfair in making insolent remarks and I have no doubt my hon. friend is simply following my bad example.

Mr. POULIOT: Not to the same degree.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend's accusation that there was a deliberate attempt on the part of the government and the parliament of Canada to filch jurisdiction is not well founded and is not fairly made. If he presents it as a criticism of the government of Canada under the leadership of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), then it is also a criticism of parliament itself and of a parliament in which none of the members had the courage to register their votes against the resolutions approving these conventions or against the legislation based thereon.

Mr. POULIOT: I did.

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend is so singular it is possible he may have. I do not remember, but I accept his statement. Therefore what was done was merely to exhaust another possible legislative power which, if held to be within the legislative competence of parliament, would enable parliament to deal with the social and economic questions which were then worrying the people of Canada. The final decisions have now been given and we are back to the condition of affairs which applied when I delivered my address in November, 1934, the address so highly commended by the hon. gentleman. But where are we now? By successive decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada and the judicial committee of the privy council it has now been held that all questions relating to compulsory insurance, to salaries and wages and to hours of employment are vested in the province, since section 92 of the British North America Act states that legislation respecting property and civil rights in the province is vested in the province. This vast field of legislative action which is now declared by the courts to be vested in the province is exclusively covered by that section dealing with property and civil rights in the province and the last clause, number 16, which reads:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

Nobody has contended so far, at least that I have noticed, that legislative jurisdiction with regard to wages and hours of labour is vested in the province because those are matters of a merely local or private nature. They come under an interpretation of clause number 13, which was never thought of by the framers of the British North America Act. It was not discovered until some years after the British North America Act of 1867 had been enacted that under property and civil rights the province had exclusive jurisdiction in a vast legislative field dealing with every phase of our industrial life. Now what is required, I think, is not so much to ask the provinces to forego any legislative jurisdiction which is really vested in them. All that is necessary is a clarification of one or two sections of the British North America Act—one clause of section 92, and perhaps also section 91, in the recital preceding its first clause.

How can that best be done? We know that, in the past, in no case where parliament by a joint resolution of both houses has asked for an amendment or modification of the British North America Act, has it been denied by the imperial parliament. I suggest that the government of which my hon. friend is a member have not altogether abandoned that procedure because we had an occasion last session when a joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons was introduced for the purpose of securing from the imperial parliament a very radical amendment of the British North America Act, far more radical than any amendment required to enable parliament to adjust our social and economic difficulties, and what I would suggest to my hon. friend is that to follow the procedure suggested by the Minister of Labour is simply to prolong the agony, as he calls it, or perhaps it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who spoke of the problem as being agonizing. In any case the suggestion was boldly made that if something were not done we would have organized insurrection and an attempt by force of arms to disrupt this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I must protest against anything of that kind being put in my mouth.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, I have heard this evening from some hon. gentleman that there was likely to be a complete disruption of this dominion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said there was danger of secession.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, secession was tried in the republic to the south, and it cost a million lives; if secession were tried in this country it might cost something in proportion. Canada is not prepared for secession. No province is going into secession, and the threat of secession, by way of intimidation, is the worst possible way to try to secure conciliatory action on the part of any province or of this dominion.

To cover what is now pressing, I asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for a precise statement of the remedies which he had in view. It is confusing to talk in philosophic terms when one is dealing with the precise wording of a statute, and the hon. member did subsequently explain, in very simple language which we could all understand, that he had in view the legislative power of this parliament to bring into being a system of compulsory unemployment insurance; second, the legislative power of this parliament to deal with hours of labour; and, third, the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with minimum wages. Now, if that is what is required, why not draft in simple words—I am sure the Department of Justice can do it, and I am quite confident there are other members of the legal fraternity who could do it—some simple amendment to the British North America Act, sections 91 and 92, which would authorize the parliament of Canada to exercise such legislative jurisdiction? Let us have it in concrete form. Let us have it expressed in a joint resolution of both houses.

Mr. THORSON: Would the hon. gentleman support such a resolution?

Mr. CAHAN: Why, certainly. I think there may be doubt as to whether this parliament is more capable of dealing competently and adequately with the question, for instance, of hours of labour and perhaps of wages, than the provincial legislatures. There is a difference of opinion about it. Arguments can be urged on both sides. There is no doubt now that any one province can legislate with regard to these matters. The contention, as I understand it, is this, that parliament should deal with wages and hours of labour in such a way that its legislation would prevail throughout the length and breadth of the whole dominion. On the other hand, there are those who suggest that the conditions complained of are not the same throughout the length and breadth of the country. I remember an argument which I listened to in my own province of Quebec, in which it was suggested that conditions were not the same in all parts of that province, and that hours of labour should be different in the northern mining country, in the lumber camps, in some of the industrial towns, and in the city of Montreal, and reasonably strong arguments were made from that point of view.

But this parliament is in favour of having uniform legislation throughout the length and breadth of Canada. At least, if I understand the expressions of opinions which were given during the last session of the late parliament, in the 1935 session, if I fully appreciate the political speeches made by the right hon. leader of the opposition of that day, and if I understand the same suggestions which have been made from the government side again this session, there is a consensus of opinion that parliament can deal more efficiently and more effectively with these matters than can the several legislatures. That opinion may be due to what I have observed during my twelve years as a member of this parliament. I notice that whenever any question comes up in which the legislative competence of the dominion is pitted against the legislative jurisdiction of the province, the members of this parliament on both sides immediately assume, with a unanimity that is seldom observed, that the parliament of Canada is more intelligent, more experienced and more competent to deal with such matters than is any provincial legislature.

On the other hand I notice that in the provinces with which I have experience, especially the two larger provinces, the members of the legislature think that with regard to these matters they are closer to the people; they are closer to the soil; they know better what is needed to remedy the evils which exist. I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that this parliament is not the only parliament of the country. There is a real difference of opinion as to whether this parliament is more competent to deal with certain social questions than are the legislatures of the provinces. But if we are resolved that parliament should do it, and that parliament should acquire the legislative competence to do it, the matter is really one of procuring simple amendments to the British North America Act as it exists at present, so as to make it clear that regulations of wages and hours of labour are not included exclusively in "property and civil rights," and so as to make it clear that the parliament of Canada has legislative competence to deal with the question of unemployment insurance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my hon. friend suggest that we should do it without first consulting with the provinces?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not suggesting that. My hon. friend knows that one weakness I have shown in this house is in contending, whether under the federal government of my hon. friends opposite or under federal governments led by the successive prime ministers under whom I have served, that to maintain peace, order and good government in this country there should be the utmost efforts at conciliation and cooperation and joint action between the federal and provincial parliaments. But this I say, that every provincial conference which I have attended or of which I have read the proceedings, failed to arrive at concrete decisions simply because its members went off into a discussion of all sorts of philosophical and hypothetical questions with regard to government. I suggest that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice should have his department draw up two or three simple amendments—a very few words would express them—which would give parliament beyond a doubt the jurisdiction which he desires, and have those amendments submitted to this parliament, and, if he so desires, submitted to each of the provincial governments. The discussion would then be restricted to really concise and definite propositions, and we would be more likely to reach a unanimity of opinion.

I did not intend to enter upon any such discussion as this, but I was provoked to it by what I thought was the unfair criticism on the part of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), which was due not to any malicious desire on his part to be unfairly critical of the late government, but rather to the fact that his philosophic brain has not yet taken into consideration all the points in issue in this discussion.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, very seldom have I followed a debate so closely as this one. This afternoon the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was very interesting, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) very energetic, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) very enthusiastic; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) spoke as a business man; the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) spoke as a statesman, as did the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). And now, looking ahead of me, I see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) to whom I have listened very attentively. He has expressed many views on this matter, both inside and outside the house, every time contradictory, and never right. It is most extraordinary that an hon. member has expressed such divergent views without once attaining the truth. It is a marvellous accomplishment. But are we serious? Yes or no?

Some hon. MEMBERS: You are not.

An hon. MEMBER: We do not take you seriously.

Mr. POULIOT: What is that legislation which has been referred to so often this afternoon and to-night? It is a fake, a bait, a vote-catcher announced by the big broadcast of January, 1935, made by the right hon. leader of the Tory party (Mr. Bennett). There was nothing to it; it was only another attempt to have the Canadian people forget the way he mismanaged the business of this country during the years he was in power. The same criticism applies to all his colleagues of that time with the exception, perhaps, of the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart), who looked only after his own department and had nothing to do with that so-called social legislation. I except him.

But speaking of contradictions, we just heard the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George say that the British North America Act was a good act; yet afterwards he said that he had found ambiguity and confusion in section 92. I am not surprised that he says that an act in which ambiguity and confusion are found is a good act. I can say the same of his speeches: they are good, but they are full of confusion and ambiguity. He said—I took a very careful note of this—"I doubt whether a committee of the house could clarify it"—that is the British North America Act—"successfully." A committee composed of the laymen who are in this house could not do that. On the other hand, the hon. gentleman said, members of the legal fraternity could draft a little amendment to suit the purposes of this resolution. It cannot be done by a committee composed of members duly elected by the people of Canada, but it can be done by civil servants. This reminds me of what has been said by the leader of the Tory party about legislation. Legislation is drafted by officers of the crown. A government submits it to the house. It is passed by parliament and then it is interpreted by the judiciary. They sometimes understand nothing in it; so much the better.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George spoke about the exclusive legislative control of the Dominion of Canada. It is not exclusive on one side only; it is exclusive on both sides. It means that on the one hand the dominion government has exclusive jurisdiction and that on the other hand each of the provinces has also exclusive jurisdiction. St. Lawrence-St. George spoke of the fathers of confederation, but he must have been very young if he had those conversations with them, because most of the fathers of confederation died a long time ago. If he was old enough to have conversations with them, especially at the time Sir John Macdonald came into power in 1878 as Prime Minister of Canada—well, he must be nearly a hundred years old. I speak of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must not refer to the hon. gentleman as "St. Lawrence-St. George;" he must say "the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George."

Mr. POULIOT: I was not referring to the two saints but to the member for that constituency. However, I will say the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George; I have no objection to that. The exclusive legislative control of the dominion and the exclusive legislative control of the provinces constitute a most important point. What does it mean? It means, according to the British North America Act, that the dominion government can do certain things which the provinces cannot do, while on the other hand the provinces can do other things which the dominion government cannot do.

I do not want to recall any personal matters, but may I tell you, sir, that my grandfather fought confederation with Mackenzie and other members of the Liberal party—I mean Alexander Mackenzie and those who voted against confederation—because he found in it a disguised legislative union. And that is the Tory point of view, to have a Tory legislative union for confederation—in other words, centralization. The Liberal party fought for decentralization, and I keep as a family heirloom the text and translation of speeches made by the great leaders of the Liberal party in Ontario such as Alexander Mackenzie, Blake, Mowat and others who respected the principle of decentralization and regarded it as a Liberal principle. In the province of Quebec the Liberals think on that point just as the Liberals of Ontario do. We fear centralization; we fear that confederation might become a disguised legislative union; and the fathers of confederation wanted to make that clear, to make it definite, so that there should be no provincial encroachment upon federal powers and no federal encroachment upon provincial powers. That is clear and simple. How can it be interpreted differently?

It is most ridiculous that one of the leaders of the bar of Ontario, who is now chief justice of that great province, and one of the leaders of the bar of Quebec, a former president of the Canadian Bar Association, as well as other masters of the legal profession had to cross the sea in order to discuss before the privy council that so-called social legislation of 1935. Was that legislation based upon obligations arising from a treaty? No sir, and for a very good reason which I shall explain. Section 132 refers to the binding obligations arising from a treaty. It is said that parliament had not ratified these conventions; but how can a convention exist when it is not ratified? It reminds me of the astonishment of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George last year when he heard a member in the far corner of the house speak about a unilateral agreement. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George laughed at that; he thought it was nonsensical. But what did he say when he argued about the binding force of a convention that had not been ratified? Is that not a unilateral convention such as he laughed at last year?

We see that the so-called social legislation which has been thrown into the waste-paper basket by the highest court, the privy council, was simply a vote-catcher. There was no treaty; there was no convention; it was only a formula drafted by the experts at Geneva, suggesting what could be done if it were desired. Did Canada sign a treaty with any other nation represented at Geneva for that so-called social legislation? No, sir; you know too well to say that. It was a matter of make believe, to make the Canadian people believe that we were bound by a treaty to pass such legislation, not in accordance with the constitution, but against the constitution. The right hon. leader of the Tory party must remember that when we were on the opposition side the member for Témiscouata told him that before declaring that he was going to amend the British North America Act, there was one thing which he should indicate, namely, what amendment or amendments he had in view. It was pointed out to him that it was a very bad thing to declare that he was going to amend the British North America Act without saying in what specific way he would do so. He had to indicate that such and such a section of the act would be amended for such and such a reason; and only these sections should be amended, not the whole act.

Personally I am not very fond of the British North America Act, and for a very good reason. I do not believe it is perfect, because it was inspired by fear, the fear of annexation. On the other hand, since it is our constitution, it must be respected to a certain extent and it must not be changed without sufficient care. Let us look at the report of the special committee on the British North America Act—a committee of this house. It is a book which I recommend to every member who has not read it or who does not belong to the committee. It contains very interesting evidence. This committee, having sat for several days, did not reach a single conclusion. No amendment was suggested and we find in the report only the answers of the representatives of each province and a resumé of the evidence given by several witnesses who appeared before the committee.

I am in favour of a committee of the House of Commons to study the British North America Act, not with regard to social legislation but with regard to taxation, in order to see how taxation should be divided, in order that each province should be at home in its field of taxation, in its sphere of action, and that the dominion government should be equally at home in its field of taxation and its sphere of action. It is not in order to create any kind of trouble between the dominion and the provinces; it is so that we may have order as between the federal government and the provinces, and that order will come when taxation is adjusted, when the provinces spend only the money they get from their own taxation and when Ottawa will not have to distribute to the provinces or municipalities money obtained by federal taxation.

I want order, and the right hon. leader of the Tory party is responsible for the disorder that exists not only in dominion but also in provincial finances, and in the municipal field as well. He has a great responsibility in that connection. He may come and say, "On my authority as a member of the bar, with a standing of many years, I tell you that we were bound by treaty in connection with that so-called legislation." That is false; there is nothing to it. To support my contention I do not have the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but I have the most intelligent judges sitting on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada and the members of the privy council of England, men without prejudice, who say that so-called legislation is just bunk. To show my sincerity, sir, in the votes and proceedings to-morrow you will see notices for the introduction of six bills to repeal the acts passed by the Bennett government in connection with their so-called legislation. Those bills will bear the name of the member for Témiscouata. I am being true to my word; I said those bills, which were simply fakes, should go to the waste-paper basket.

I will add a word of comment and praise with regard to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I know he is sincere, and I give him credit for that, but I tell him —as he knows very well—that it is impossible to have a dominion enactment with regard to hours of labour and wages. The hon. member knows very well that it is impossible even for a province to pass a statute applying similar hours of labour in every part of the province and equal wages to men engaged in the same industry in various parts of the province. It must be regulated by order in council. The member who addresses you now, Mr. Speaker, drew the attention of the house a very long time ago, before any labour member spoke about the matter, to hours of labour and wages in Quebec. Why was that done?

It was because I could not conceive that in my native province men should receive much less than their compatriots in other provinces, and I wanted to draw the attention of the government to the matter in order that those wrongs might be redressed.

That was done, as far as the federal government could do it. For that I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleague, the Minister of Labour of the time, the Hon. Peter Heenan. They imposed conditions with regard to minimum wages and hours of labour in regard to men engaged in work being done for the dominion government. They could not go further because of a limitation imposed by a ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada. They wanted to do the right thing in order to help the people; they wanted to do something that might be useful, so they went the limit and we passed the legislation which was introduced by Mr. Heenan. Following that, those who were working for the dominion government received fair wages and were not asked to work more than a certain number of hours per day, or if they did work longer they received overtime. That was fair, I think. If we do something, sir, we must do it in such a way that it will help those concerned; I am sure my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar will agree with me. What is the use of passing legislation which is no good and which does not help those concerned? It is all right to express the pious wish that we could do this or that, but there is a way in which it can be done. We have the Statute of Westminster, and in this connection I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). According to section 4 of the Statute of Westminster, the parliament of the United Kingdom is not to legislate for a dominion except by consent. This means that the dominion government must express its wish before any legislation, especially any sort of legislation amending the British North America Act, is passed by the United Kingdom. It is important to have that.

Supposing the British North America Act is studied by a committee of the House of Commons, or a joint committee of the commons and senate, in order that this small group of men, representing the government and the official and unofficial opposition, may discuss the matter and reach an understanding as to what is lacking in the British North America Act. They will find that the first matter to be adjusted will be that of taxation, and they will express their views fully in that regard. They will come to the house with legislation, and if all parties represented on the committee come to an agreement it will be very easy to have that legislation passed. Later the opinion of the provinces can be secured.

Sometimes there are things which are not done but which members of the house would like to have done. If we have not the power to pass legislation such as that mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the ruling of the privy council means that the provinces have that right, because it must exist somewhere. If we do not have the right the provinces have it, and if the provinces have it the people of this country should be told so, in order that the people may know that if the provinces do not pass such legislation as they desire they will be remiss in their duty. Then the matter will be clear and very easy to understand. This, it seems to me, is the thing to do. I ask hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house to consider that point very seriously, so that these things may be done by the proper authority in order that they may benefit those concerned.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, until I listened to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I had not intended to speak on this resolution. In my opinion the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George made a suggestion which merits the careful consideration of the house. He outlined, I believe quite accurately, the essential objectives of the British North America Act. He made specific reference to sections 91 and 92, and after reading section 92 made reference to that paragraph of section 92 which deals with property and civil rights in the province, and the last paragraph which deals with matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

I believe it is recognized that it was in the minds of the fathers of confederation that there might be a shift of jurisdiction from the provinces to the dominion; that we were providing in our constitution for a centralized federalism; that circumstances might develop whereby matters might cease to be of a merely local or private nature in the province and become matters of national concern, and that as this change took place in the nature of the subject matter, so the courts from time to time would interpret the legislation. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George stated, I believe quite accurately, that when confederation was contemplated, it was never thought that the paragraphs of section 92 dealing with property and civil rights in the province, and matters of a local or private nature in the province would include such subjects as unemployment insurance, or the wages or hours of labour. On the other hand, the decisions of the privy council have practically destroyed the effect of that portion of section 91 of the British North America Act which deals with the peace, order and good government of Canada.

What is then the situation left by the recent decisions of the privy council? The decisions mean that this parliament has no jurisdiction whatsoever to deal with unemployment insurance, no jurisdiction to deal with hours of labour, and no jurisdiction to deal with the subject of wages. I think it follows also from these decisions that parliament has no jurisdiction to regulate or control industry. The recent decisions have left all these subjects within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Except criminal law.

Mr. THORSON: Yes, except criminal law. Nominally the provinces now have jurisdiction to deal with these subjects. They have power to deal with unemployment insurance; they have power to deal with hours of labour, wages, conditions of employment and the regulation and control of industry. But how real is that power? If any province sought to exercise it in the manner in which many hon. members and many people throughout Canada think it ought to be exercised, what would happen? It would mean that industries would boycott the province which sought to exercise its power, and the result is that only nominally does that power now reside anywhere in Canada.

Theoretically, under the decisions of the privy council the power now rests with the provinces, but as a matter of fact, since there would be fear of driving industries out of that province which might otherwise wish to exercise proper control and regulation of industry, the power does not in actual reality exist, because no province would dare to put its full power into operation and—

Mr. BENNETT: Unless they all got together and passed the same statute.

Mr. THORSON: Yes. And what probability is there of the provinces getting together? For that reason I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George merits the approval of the house; it would bring back into our constitutional scheme the original spirit of confederation. That spirit was that unless one could find within the four corners of section 92 specific jurisdiction in the hands of the provinces, then such jurisdiction automatically belonged to the dominion. If we followed the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George of drafting a proposed amendment to section 91 of the British North America Act—

Mr. BENNETT: And 92.

Mr. THORSON: —making it perfectly clear that the dominion had jurisdiction in the matter of unemployment insurance, wages, hours of labour and the control and regulation of industry generally, and then submitting an address to both houses of parliament asking that the necessary amendments be made to the British North America Act, we would then place definitely and concretely before the people of Canada a problem which from one end of the country to the other is demanding public attention. The provinces would have the opportunity of saying whether or not they approved of such an address being adopted by both houses of parliament.

Last year we set a precedent for this course of procedure. Although I did not personally approve the proposed power to be given to the provinces and was glad that the senate threw out the particular amendment then proposed, I believe that the precedent then set for proposed amendments to the British North America Act was an excellent one.

For the reasons I have briefly set forth I commend the suggestion so clearly placed before the house by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this time to discuss the British North America Act. At the appropriate time I intend to discuss the judgments of the privy council. If the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) had been a little more careful in examining what my course had been, he would not have made the observations he did. It was commonly understood, I think, by most lawyers that in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, the provincial legislature and not the federal government had the power to enact the social legislation in question. This came about by reason of a decision or opinion of the supreme court upon certain questions submitted to it by the executive. However, with the privy council decisions on the radio case and the aeronautics case we had an entirely new conception of our powers.

Lord Sankey, the chancellor in the radio case, summarized the constitutional situation with what I think was considerable care. He made certain declarations as to the power of parliament which were far wider than any that had heretofore been made. When Lord Dunedin had to deal with the aeronautics case and with the treaties or conventions which were under consideration, he made a declaration as to the power of this parliament wider than anything that had heretofore been made. He declared that under peace, order and good government this parliament had jurisdiction to deal with questions which might arise out of conventions or treaties. He also placed upon section 132 of the British North America Act a construction which was far wider than had ever been placed upon it before the radio case.

In my judgment that section is a limited one. It expresses itself in terms relating to the British Empire. Had my friend the Minister of Labour been a little more anxious to know the facts rather than to endeavour to make political capital, he would have found that in this chamber while his party was still in office, I took the view, before the decisions in the radio and aeronautics cases, that we had no power to deal with these matters. The Solicitor General of that day directed my attention to section 132, and his remarks will be found in Hansard, as I hope later to indicate. After these decisions, the constitutional lawyers of this country had an entirely new conception of our powers. If hon. members have any doubt on that point, let them read the opinion of Chief Justice Duff in these very references. I think it is the consensus of opinion that his judgment is at least entitled to great consideration.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My friend should say, at least the opinions were divided.

Mr. BENNETT: They were divided, but I can say this without question, that the one who had the widest experience and who was constantly in attendance at the privy council held the strong view I have indicated. We have not the text of the judgments before us and I do not intend to discuss them. There may be many additions; there may be controlling sentences and parentheses which will change entirely our conception of them. I hope so. The newspaper reports would indicate that the general trend of the judgments was to the effect that the parliament of Canada was a very powerless institution with respect to matters affecting the welfare of Canada.

There were three points to which the Minister of Labour might have directed his attention. First, there was no concrete case before the courts. Second, the privy council have said that the opinion which they themselves have delivered has just as much value as the judgment of the Minister of Justice or of any law officer of the crown. Third, a judgment upon a hypothetical case is worthless. That is the position we are in. If the suggestion we made had been followed, if a real case had been taken before the courts, if the facts had been presented, then we would have had a judgment. Now we have no judgment.

Mr. ROGERS: Would it necessarily have been different?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not suggest for a moment that it would necessarily be different, but I do suggest beyond all question that it would be a judgment based upon the facts of a particular case. For instance, take the marketing act. There is in that act nothing to warrant any such construction as the newspaper reports indicate. It expresses itself in exact terms; it refers only to exports and to interprovincial business. It had attached to it, for the purpose of making it complete, the statutes of the various provinces dealing with their own domestic business. This same privy council decided, not on a hypothetical case but on a real case, that the legislature of British Columbia had certain powers, which powers it exclusively enjoyed. If one takes the two together there is no doubt as to what result one might expect.

As I pointed out, in the aeronautics case there is a continuous expression of what is contained in the radio case, and upon these this legislation was submitted to this house. Had it not been for the judgments in the aeronautics and radio cases, this legislation would not have been here. When the Minister of Labour so far forgets his position as to suggest that because someone was going to and from Geneva he conceived a certain idea, it seems to me he does not do very much justice to his own intelligence.

Mr. ROGERS: I read the letter sent by the then prime minister to the provinces on the eve of his departure for Geneva.

Mr. BENNETT: And the reason is perfectly obvious. If the hon. gentleman had been in the house he would have known, but he was not. This is the position. We now have an opinion, but not upon a case. This opinion has no more binding effect upon parliament than has the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is upon the whole statute, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly, but the opinion as to its being intra or ultra vires has no more binding effect than has the opinion of the law officers of the crown. Questions were asked as to the validity or invalidity—not upon a concrete case; that is the trouble. The privy council was very clear about that and expressed itself in strong terms as to the value of answers given to questions on references.

Mr. THORSON: It would have a great deal more persuasive effect.

Mr. BENNETT: But persuasive effect and judicial effect are two different things. There is a vast difference between a judgment and a mere opinion.

Mr. THORSON: In reality there is no difference.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a very great difference. Permit me to say that at least the judicial committee has said that there is a great difference. They felt that there was a great difference. One has a probative effect and the other has not. One is binding and the other is not. One is a judgment upon which execution may issue, if it be a civil matter; the other has no effect at all; it is no greater than the opinion of the law officers of the crown.

It was upon the strength of the aeronautics and radio cases that these statutes were submitted to this house. It is suggested that the provinces might be deprived of all power by a convention or treaty between a foreign power and the dominion, but I do not think one can help but remember what the privy council has so frequently said, namely, that we must not assume that parliaments and legislatures are going to pass legislation of that kind. It must be expected that they are going to be reasonably intelligent. It must not be forgotten that the representatives in parliament represent the same constituents as do the representatives in the provincial legislatures. However, perhaps I should not make any statement until I read the judgments in detail.

I am asked: What difference would it make? I put this to my hon. friend. The Lemieux act was passed by this parliament and was acted upon for a little over twenty years. A case under it then arose which went to the privy council and the decision was given that the act was bad. It had been bad for twenty years, but no government had submitted it to the privy council to have a declaration made. When the case arose the result was that the act was declared invalid.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask my right hon. friend a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: (Quebec East): If I am not mistaken, my right hon. friend has based his argument largely upon the radio and aeronautics cases. They were on reference in exactly the same way. So, if the decisions on the present references have no worth, how were the decisions so good on the radio and aeronautics cases?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point to which I was just coming. My hon. friend knows that in neither case was there the judgment of a court. Had there been a judgment in the aeronautics and radio cases the privy council could not at least have overruled its own judgment, but when it comes to expressing an opinion they can do anything they like because it is not a judgment. That is the reason why the court made it clear that we must have judgments. Everyone knows that is so. There may be some difficulty about some people understanding it, but there is no doubt it is a fact. In the United States they decline to submit questions to the courts on reference; the questions must arise out of concrete cases. In the United States in every one of the cases in which decisions of far-reaching consequence were given, the cases had a beginning in a federal court, often on a very small issue, and on the facts of the case as presented, the validity or otherwise of the statute was determined. If in this case unemployment insurance had been thus tested, I cannot think the judgment of the court would have been at least as reported in the newspapers. If the marketing act had been dealt with in accordance with the facts and the real significance of its provisions made known as they were applied by the various provinces in their domestic proceedings as compared with export and interprovincial business, I cannot conceive how the judgment could have been written as reported in the newspapers, and I say this with reserve as to the judgment being modified by other paragraphs that were not cabled. If the question of hours of labour and the question of wages, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, had been dealt with on the basis of privy council proceedings in the aeronautics and radio cases, we could not have had a conclusion of that sort. Unfortunately we have now a mass of opinions which are not judgments, and which have arisen because of the method of presenting the cases for consideration. The Lemieux Act is the outstanding and striking example of legislation of this parliament which in a concrete case was declared to be invalid but which had been acted upon by general acceptance very beneficially over a period of about twenty years until the judgment of the privy council was rendered.

One step more. There was also this anomaly, that you had a government providing for the support of the validity of legislation which it had denounced as invalid when it was passed. Had a case been permitted to proceed to the courts you would not have had that anomaly. Had it gone to litigation you would not have had that anomaly. You would not have had the government of to-day that bitterly opposed and denounced the legislation endeavouring to support it in the manner in which it did in London. I had only reached London and made inquiries when I was told that never in the history of our time had any case been presented so inadequately.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not fair.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the opinion which prevailed, for reasons that I shall give before I conclude.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My right hon. friend said otherwise last year.

Mr. BENNETT: The chief justice of the supreme court of Ontario who presented the case before the supreme court here did not present it in London.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. St. Laurent did.

Mr. BENNETT: He presented only one case. The others were presented by another gentleman, an eminent lawyer, but constitutional lawyers are very few in Canada. The most eminent of them, by common consent, is a resident of Toronto, and the gentleman who presides over the supreme court of Ontario was another. Unfortunately you cannot acquire, in a week or two weeks or a month, a knowledge of all the decisions and of all the trends and tendencies in connection with the interpretation of the British North America Act. It is a long progressive study, and all you have to do is to read the judgments of the privy council and see the counsel who in succeeding years have presented the cases to realize how sound that statement is. It is not any reflection upon the capacity of anyone.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is.

Mr. BENNETT: The reflection is upon their lack of training in that particular class of work.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am sorry my right hon. friend says that.

Mr. BENNETT: I go further. I say that the Department of Justice was not heard at all on that reference. They had counsel there. Did he speak? Why not?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They arranged it among themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is known to me. He would have to contradict the submission of his leader.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, sir, that is exactly the fact, if you want to know the way in which these cases were handled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think this is gossip my right hon. friend may have heard. It is not fair at all.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not gossip. Has my hon. friend read the arguments?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The arguments were reported in part in the London Times. I have not seen them in detail.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think my right hon. friend will be sorry for these statements.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot be sorry for them; I know them to be accurate, and what is more it is the considered opinion of those who are able to express adequate opinions. It is not the first time that has happened and it will not be the last. You cannot project a counsel, however eminent, into a constitutional case without any training in constitutional matters. That is obvious, I think, to everyone. I propose at a proper time to discuss the question of these judgments when they are available.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We shall all do it.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall all do it, I hope, but it is not going to change two essential facts. One is that prior to the judgments in the aeronautics and radio cases there was no suggestion, after the decision of the supreme court, that we had any jurisdiction to deal with these matters, but in those judgments—

Mr. DUNNING: They were not judgments, my right hon. friend said.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, opinions, I should have said. I thank the hon. gentleman, the learned counsel—

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend cannot have it both ways.

Mr. BENNETT: No one suggests he wants it both ways. After the expression of those opinions there was an entirely modified view with respect to our power, a view which was acted upon and believed to be sound, and when we read the decision we shall know whether it is or not. I do not know how far the decision does go. That, however, is the position. But for those judgments the legislation would not have been submitted to this parliament.

But, worse still, by reason of these statutes being submitted, not as concrete cases but as hypothetical ones, we have now an expression of opinion as reported in the press that is a complete reversal of the radio and aeronautics cases, and we have the creation of sovereignties in provinces with respect to our international obligations wholly at variance with anything that has been heretofore understood. That, I think, cannot be denied by anyone. That is the reason why I believe we should discuss the matter in the light of the exact judgments themselves.

I trust that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will withdraw his motion for the reason I suggested the other day, namely, that we should have a conference, as was indicated by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson).

The nature of the amendments that have to be made is one issue. The willingness to make them is another. The reasons given by the hon. member for Selkirk as to the necessity for their being made seem to me to be completely unanswerable. As to the method to be employed, I think the method we have of a joint address could probably not be changed very readily in this country. As to how to arrive at the questions to be considered, I think that can be done only after careful consideration with the provincial authorities. I say this to the Minister of Justice, that we had to deal with an extremely difficult matter, the question of the preparation of a section of the Westminster act dealing with Canada, and we had a conference in this city of representatives of all the provinces. We met at ten o'clock in the morning; they went away the next day; and, as I said the other day, their initials are upon the amendment that was agreed to, upon the document which is now in the archives of this country, because we had placed before them our idea as to what the proposals should be, and after a conference with them we were able in a very short time to arrive at a solution of our difficulties. I believe that what was said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, coupled with what has been said by the hon. member for Selkirk, indicates a method of dealing with this situation which would not take too long a time but rather would enable speedy adjustment of our difficulties to be had.

As I have said, I shall hope that an opportunity may arise to discuss these judgments in the light of their entire text and not of a part of it.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I feel that to a very large extent the purpose of placing the motion on the order paper has been fulfilled, both by the discussion which occurred last Tuesday and by that which has taken place to-day. The motion was placed on the order paper entirely from a layman's point of view. I am not so much interested—and I think there are many members of the house in the same position as myself—in the constitutional and legal aspects of this particular problem as in the social and the economic situation which has to be dealt with and remedied. And I take it that although we have had decisions from the privy council, those decisions may serve an added and a good purpose in that they must focus the attention both of this parliament and of the people of Canada upon the grave condition with which we are confronted.

Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon misunderstood some of the remarks which I made. I said, for example, that in my opinion the will of the people as expressed by parliament must prevail. I did not say, nor did I intend to have it inferred, that the will of this parliament ought to prevail over the rights of the provinces, whatever they may be. In my opinion —and I think it is the general opinion in this house—in the event of the provinces placing in the hands of this parliament any jurisdiction which formerly belonged to them, this would be done partly of necessity and wholly of their own volition. That is fundamental.

I also referred, and the minister referred, to the Statute of Westminster. I alluded to it as evidence that the self-governing dominions were now regarded as coequal partners in the British commonwealth of nations. I did not mean to convey that in any respect I thought the Statute of Westminster gave us the right or the power to override provincial rights and provincial jurisdiction. It is true that an assumption of power by either the dominion or a province does not give that power, and I do not think this parliament should assume power which it does not have. But it seems to me that the time has arrived when greater powers must be given to someone to secure at least some measure of uniformity in social legislation in this dominion and as between the provinces. The sovereign power of the provinces was not denied by any of us this afternoon; indeed we recognized it, and my reference by way of illustration to the unitary system of legislative union in Great Britain and to the necessity there of a certain devolution or handing over of power to some local authority, such as the counties, does not mean that we should infer that the provinces have no greater status in our dominion than have the counties in England. I do not hold that view at all.

The minister told us that a committee of parliament would not suffice. I submit that if the government has an alternate proposal to place before this house, parliament and the country should be taken into the confidence of the government at an early date, because I can assure hon. members that not only in the industrial centres are such questions being asked as those to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and other members have referred, but in the rural areas, at least of western Canada, there is a great deal of misgiving and of unrest regarding the position of the marketing act, and also of the wheat board, which did not come under that act but nevertheless is, in the public mind closely allied to the question of orderly marketing.

Mr. VIEN: Why should not each province in turn, within its own jurisdiction and territory, assume these duties?

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall deal with that in a moment. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) answered that question adequately when he pointed out that, altogether apart from other difficulties, a province legislating with regard, for example, to hours of labour and wages might find itself at a grave disadvantage in comparison with provinces which were, shall I say, more backward and would not legislate along those lines. I regard the method of individual provinces legislating in social matters of that description as cumbersome and quite ineffective, and I do not believe we shall be able to find satisfactory solutions to the problems which confront us if we rely upon that particular method of procedure.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. VIEN: May not conditions be very different in various sections of the country? And how could one section impose its own viewpoint in the light of its own particular interests upon other sections of the country whose interests may be very different?

Mr. COLDWELL: I can quite understand the question, and I think the answer is this. In a country as large as Canada conditions of necessity must differ in various provinces; there are diverse conditions. But I submit that it is quite possible for a government to lay down regional regulations which would meet the situation in the various regions with widely dissimilar conditions. When you speak of minimum wages and so on you need not apply those minimum wages in the same form in provinces with varying costs of living.

Mr. VIEN: The same is true of hours of labour.

Mr. COLDWELL: You need not apply the hours of labour to industries in precisely the same manner. For example, take agriculture. We speak industrially of an eight hour day, but in agriculture there are certain seasons of the year when the hours of labour must be longer than eight hours, and in legislation of the type to which I refer certain exceptions, certain regional difficulties can quite well be met; at least that is my opinion.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) considered the resolution inopportune and somewhat objectionable at the present time, but I would reply by stating that the resolution was quite opportune inasmuch as it was placed on the order paper without a knowledge of the fact that the privy council decisions would be down before the resolution was discussed. In my opinion it has served the purpose of bringing at least certain aspects of these decisions before the House of Commons at this time.

We are told that parliament ought to have jurisdiction only through cooperation and consultation between the dominion and the provinces. I believe, of course, that position is sound. Before I sit down, however, I should like again to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk. I took a number of notes when the Minister of Labour was speaking and I intended to reply step by step to certain of his remarks as he made them; but the hon. member for Selkirk demolished the minister's case entirely in a comparatively few words, and I would advise the minister to study that answer to-morrow morning. The hon. member for Selkirk, in my opinion, made the position clear. If there is no power in this parliament to regulate or control industry and if that power is vested in the provinces, how real is that power? There is the crux of the situation as it faces this parliament and the dominion to-day. He pointed out that industry would boycott a province which was more progressive in these matters than other provinces. In other words, the pace of progress in Canada would be regulated by the most backward and reactionary of the provinces, whichever that province at a given time might be.

It has been suggested to me that the resolution setting up this committee might result simply in a recommendation for the presentation of an address from both houses of parliament and that this recommendation might cover the situation at the moment. I am not going to withdraw the resolution, because I do not believe the government have placed before the house any indication that they have any other plan in mind. They have not told us that they are calling an interprovincial conference or even suggesting that that should be done, and therefore, in my opinion, the resolution should stand.

Motion (Mr. Coldwell) negatived on division.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 2, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE HERBERT EARL WILTON

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon I crossed the floor of the house to express to the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) my thanks and those of my colleagues for their expressions of sympathy on the loss which we and our party had sustained in the death of a much revered member of this house, the Hon. Charles Marcil. While talking with my right hon, friend he handed me a communication he had just received from the press gallery informing him that only an hour or two before one of his own supporters Mr. Herbert Wilton, the member for Hamilton West, had passed away. This word was the more startling in that as late as Friday of last week Mr. Wilton had taken part in one of the debates of this house. I rise to express to my right hon. friend and to those who sit about him the sincere sympathy of all hon. members on this side of the house in the loss they have sustained. Mr. Wilton had been in the house only a short time. He was returned at the last general election and as a consequence had been here for less than a year. His election at the age of sixty-seven years to represent the city of Hamilton must have been in part a recognition of the public services which for several years he had rendered in the civic affairs of that city, first as alderman and subsequently as mayor. It was evidence as well of appreciation on the part of his fellow citizens of his public spirit as disclosed in the many activities with which at one time or another his life was concerned.

Having been for so short a time a member of this house many of us did not have the privilege of more than a passing acquaintance with Mr. Wilton. However we had the opportunity of hearing him speak on several occasions, and I believe the impression he left on all hon. members was that he was a man not only of pleasant personality, but of high purpose and one who had sincerely at heart the interests of his fellow men. He leaves behind a wife and several children. I am sure the sympathy of this house in the fullest measure will go out to all who have been so suddenly and so greatly bereaved. Again may I express to hon. gentlemen opposite the deep sympathy we feel for them in their loss.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those who are associated with me, as well as for myself, I wish to express our grateful appreciation of the kind and sympathetic words spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his capacity as leader of the House of Commons, concerning the loss we have sustained in the passing of one of our numbers.

I can add little to what has been said by the leader of the government. Mr. Wilton was first known to me last year when he was a candidate for Hamilton West. I learned that he had touched the life of his community at many points. He had been a journalist, which is the kindergarten and high school—very often the university—from which the men who come to this house graduate. He had been a telegrapher and more latterly had been interested in business in a larger way. He had served his city as alderman and had been an enterprising and devoted mayor. Many desirable improvements were made in the city of Hamilton through his initiative. Mr. Wilton was of a most friendly disposition; he was kind and considerate, and most thoughtful of others. Perhaps that fact, together with the long years of faithful service he had rendered to his fellow citizens, enabled him to survive the deluge of 1935.

We will miss him greatly, not only because of his friendly and kindly disposition but because he possessed what is characteristic of so many of his type, common sense. He had sound judgment and a keen appreciation of public opinion. The people of Hamilton will mourn one who was their friend, and those who have known difficulties and trouble will sorrow greatly because of his passing. We will miss his sterling sense. I recall not long since reading what a great man said respecting a statesman of his day who had not had the benefits of academic training, but who was regarded in his own country as one of the foremost men of his time. This distinguished commentator said: "I would rather have half an hour of his common sense expression of opinion on the problems of my country than the considered opinion of many others for long periods of time." Mr. Wilton was to us not only a valued colleague, not only a friend, but one whose common sense could be said to be a cross-section of the great community in which he lived. His loyalty to Hamilton was perhaps his distinguishing characteristic, and his willingness to help that community in any possible way was always manifest.

We are reminded that in the midst of life we are in death; for it was only on Friday last that Mr. Wilton was in this chamber, and now he has passed from us. I am sure that his wife and children will read with satisfaction and pleasure, tempered of course by their great sorrow, of the fact that in the chamber in which he served so short a time he had made so many friends, and that he merited the views expressed by the right hon. the Prime Minister in the statement which he has made to-day. As our expression of the sense of loss we have sustained is conveyed to the bereaved they will have the assurance of our recognition that he who now has gone from us made some contribution in this chamber to the public life of the country he loved so well.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the late Mr. Wilton did not belong to our group, but he sat in close proximity to us, and I sometimes think that proximity is a rather severe test of a man's qualities. I feel that in the short period he was in the house he revealed himself to us as being friendly and kind. I can think of no other words that would better describe him. We join with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in tendering to his wife and children our very deep sympathy in what must have been to them the very great shock of his sudden demise.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, during the short time the late Mr. Wilton was in the house he impressed me as being calm, sane, open-minded and progressive. We cannot but regret the loss to us and to those who loved him. May we join our voices to those who have spoken already in his honour.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF HANGING AS DEATH PENALTY—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house, I move, seconded by Mr. Elliott (Middlesex):

That pursuant to the motion passed by the house on January 28, the special committee thereby appointed to study the subject matter of Bill No. 6, intituled an act to amend the criminal code, be composed of the following members, namely, Messrs. Barber, Bertrand (Laurier), Blair, Clarke (Rosedale), Girouard, Hall, Hamilton, Howden, Hyndman, Macphail (Miss), McCulloch, McIntosh, McPhee, O'Neill, Plaxton, Raymond, Sinclair, Taylor (Nanaimo), and Veniot, and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

INSTRUCTION TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT ON METHODS OF EFFECTING REDISTRIBUTION

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and amendments thereto, and the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, and amendments thereto, be instructed to study and make report on the methods used to effect a redistribution of electoral districts in Canada and in other countries and to make suggestions to the house in connection therewith.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the question to be considered is the redistribution made in 1933 of the electoral districts of Canada. I should like to make a gift to the library of the House of Commons of a report on all the federal redistributions effected in the province of Quebec between 1853 and 1933. This report contains, first, a list of the 16 counties in which no change for federal purposes was made during that period. Then, a list of former constituencies, to the number of five, which are to-day joined to other electoral districts but which had not been altered since 1853. The next list covers six constituencies in which alterations made as a matter of form only, left the former boundaries intact. The next one comprises two constituencies enlarged by additions of territory. Then there is a list of fifteen united constituencies. Between 1853 and 1933 three constituencies were given a new name. Six new constituencies were formed outside the urban districts. The report also contains a summary of the changes made in former boundaries of constituencies and a statement giving in slightly greater detail the changes effected at each redistribution. There is appended to it Act 16, Chapter 152, a bill introduced by Hon. Augustin Norbert Morin, on October 1, 1852, to increase popular representation in parliament.

In order to realize the effects of the redistribution of 1933 it is essential to trace the history of each redistribution in each district from 1853 to the present day. The act of 1853 was reproduced in the statutes of 1860 and, in addition to the documents already mentioned, there is the complete text of the description of each electoral district, the original description of each district as given in the act of 1860, and the complete text of all subsequent changes up to 1933. There is also a list of the changes made in the electoral districts of Quebec from 1860 to 1903. That is the first part of the report.

The second part gives the history of each redistribution from 1860 on, together with a table showing all the electoral districts of the province of Quebec in 1860 and the description of each one as it appears in the statute of 1860. It will be found on examination that in some cases there has been no change from 1853 to 1933.

After the statute of 1860 we come to the first Conservative gerrymander, in 1872, in which changes were made in three ridings. The art was then in its infancy. Later on, under Sir John Macdonald's administration, a second gerrymander was carried out in 1882 by the statute 45 Victoria, chapter 3, which altered the boundaries of six constituencies.

We come now to 1892 and 1893, when the Conservative party, which was at death's door, effected a shameful readjustment of seats both in Quebec and in Ontario. It was a real electoral orgy. The boundaries of 23 ridings were completely altered by removing Liberal parishes from counties to which they had belonged since 1860 and replacing them by Conservative parishes, in order to create Conservative strongholds in Quebec. It is when passing judgment on this shameful legislation of a dying and rotten government which sought to change the electoral boundaries of the old provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes that Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated on April 29, 1892, on page 1862 of Hansard: "That is a gerrymander with a vengeance."

We now come to 1903. The only alterations the Laurier government made in that year to the gerrymander of 1892 and 1893 consisted in putting back the old parishes in the electoral districts from which they should never have been removed.

In 1914, under the Borden administration, seven constituencies were reunited, one was divided, changes were made in five others, new boundaries were fixed for six ridings and twelve new electoral districts were created in Montreal.

In 1924, the government then headed by our present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took steps to have the boundaries of the eighty-year-old federal districts respected. This necessarily involved a rectification of the new provincial subdivisions created in 1922.

We then come to the shameful redistribution of 1933, which did not give the results expected of it by the Tory government of the day which was swept away in the province of Quebec. The important thing, sir, is to have a table showing the population of each electoral district before and after the gerrymander of 1933. I have such a table here, and I add it to the report which I now hand to the clerk with the request that he submit it to the proper person and have it kept in the records of the House of Commons in case it might prove useful.

Motion agreed to.

COMPANIES ACTS

COMMITTEE OF DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS NECESSARY TO UNIFORMITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, in November last a conference was held between representatives of the federal and provincial authorities on the question of bringing about a greater uniformity between dominion and provincial companies acts. I should like to ask the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) if it is the intention of the government to table a report of the findings of that conference.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I must thank my hon. friend for being kind enough to give me notice of his question. In the course of a recent debate the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) also alluded to this matter. I may say that it is not the intention of the government this session to table an official report of the conference, which has not completed its work, but I have here a few notes which it may be of interest to place on record, if the house will permit.

Following a resolution unanimously adopted at the last dominion-provincial conference the Secretary of State convened a committee of officials of the dominion and the provinces to prepare a draft of a new companies act or of amendments to the present act for the purpose of endeavouring to secure uniform laws dealing with companies throughout Canada. The first meeting of this committee was held at Ottawa, November 3, to November 7, 1936. There were present representatives of various departments of the dominion government and representatives of governments of eight of the provinces. British Columbia did not find it possible to have a representative present at the time selected for the meeting, but it is expected that the province will be represented at future meetings.

The committee made excellent progress in a preliminary study of the questions, and the representatives have submitted reports to their respective governments. Subcommittees were set up to deal with particular branches of the subject. Some of these subcommittees have already had meetings to prepare their reports for the consideration of the committee, and others are expected to meet during the next few months. It is hoped that these subcommittees will be able to report to a subsequent committee meeting which will be held during the coming summer or early in the autumn.

The committee reviewed very carefully the prospectus sections of the present Dominion Companies Act and decided to recommend the adoption of prospectus sections which are based very largely on those in the present dominion act. Since the amendments suggested by the committee in regard to the prospectus sections dealt largely with form and not with the substance of these sections, I have not considered it necessary to recommend amending legislation at this session of parliament. It appears possible that the committee, at its next general meeting, may make such further progress as to enable it to submit to the government a draft bill which would deal with other important provisions of the present act, and which might involve a general revision of the act.

In addition to dealing with the question of proposed legislation, the committee has been able to make substantial progress in arranging for a better exchange of information on questions of administration not only of the companies acts but also of the securities acts of the provinces.

[Mr Rinfret.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I was interested in the statement made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). It will be recalled that the late government, with the aid of Mr. Fraser of Toronto, prepared a draft companies act which was circulated amongst all the provinces because they had agreed to a uniform companies act. The question at issue, which was not settled, was whether or not incorporation should be by letters patent or by what is the equivalent in a very limited sense of letters patent, under the seal of the Secretary of State, or by memorandum and articles of association. The statement made by the minister did not seem to cover that phase of the matter, or what has been done in consequence of the previous agreement to have a uniform act and the steps taken in that regard by the Secretary of State, who engaged Mr. Fraser of Toronto to assist in it.

Mr. RINFRET: No mention was made of that work at the conference last fall, of which I have given a very much summarized report. I thank my right hon. friend, however, for the remarks he has just made, and will take note of them.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I may say that the various provincial governments refused to agree upon any amendments such as those proposed. British Columbia, as I have stated in the house, refused to agree because they wished to retain their present form of act, which was drafted in accordance with the English companies act. Nova Scotia took the same ground. The government of Quebec said that they were not prepared to accept incorporation by letters patent because they believed that, under a decision of the judicial committee of the privy council, a grant of incorporation by exercising the prerogative right of the crown, which was then vested in the lieutenant governor, gave the companies so incorporated powers far beyond those which could be created by legislation in the province of Quebec. So that there was no unanimous consent by the provinces, with the result that I went ahead and made my own draft and placed before this house an almost entirely new companies act which was accepted and passed by the house and the senate and became law.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Is the government in a position to make a statement regarding the request of the Manitoba government for financial assistance?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I do not think any good purpose would be served by a statement at the moment, which could not go further than the statement made by the premier of Manitoba a few days ago.

GOLD CLAUSE OBLIGATIONS

DECISION OF HOUSE OF LORDS RESPECTING PAYMENT OF BONDS IN CURRENCY OF COUNTRY OF PAYEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Will the Prime Minister inform us whether the government has received a complete copy of the recent decision of the House of Lords, which is briefly mentioned in the press, relating to the payment, in the currency of the country of the payee, of bonds expressed to be payable in gold, and if so, will he be so kind as to lay a copy upon the table of the house?

Mr. POULIOT: Is it a decision, or just an opinion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) had better answer that question.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): We are expecting the text of the decision on the first boat coming from Great Britain.

SALES TAX ON FLOWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Would the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) care to indicate whether the government is giving consideration to the removal of the sales tax on cut flowers and other horticultural products?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I am sorry that it is quite impossible for the government to give any indication prior to the budget with respect to taxation proposals or the consideration of them.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

PROVISION TO ENCOURAGE REPAIR OF RURAL AND URBAN DWELLINGS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes.

He said: I need add little on the motion for second reading to the information which I placed before the house when the financial resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill was under consideration. It will be much more convenient to take up the details in committee of the whole, and I hope the house will soon move to that stage in order that we may go into the proposal in detail.

In the meantime I desire to indicate that while of necessity the guarantees will be administered by the Department of Finance, the organization of the cooperative community effort which is necessary if the objective is to be attained will be, and in fact is, in the hands of the National Employment Commission, which reports to my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). It is because this function is all-important in relation to the attainment of the objective that I devote a few minutes to it.

In brief, the commission has undertaken to put steam behind the plan. This involves arranging publicity to make the Canadian public home-repair conscious and to explain the plan to all concerned. The publicity takes the form of distribution of booklets, which have already had quite a wide distribution; newspaper advertising, radio broadcasting, and public addresses. Much work along these lines has already been done, and the success evident during the first two months' operation is an indication that results are beginning to accrue. I should point out in this connection that the costs involved in the publicity campaign will be financed not by government moneys but by private funds raised from public-spirited citizens and business interests who expect to benefit from the expenditure involved.

I believe the organization of provincial committees has now been almost completed by the employment commission. There will also be local advisory committees in every community to stimulate home improvement activity, to afford every encouragement and information to prospective borrowers, and to interest local participating industries and business groups. A vital point which is being taken up vigorously by these local committees is the matter which was mentioned the other day during the discussion on the financial resolution, that of the increase in assessment which normally would occur in a community when home improvement had been undertaken according to the plan. The dominion government stated, in announcing the plan originally, that it deemed it to be essential that local efforts should ensure that the home improvement plan should not be frustrated as a creator of employment by increased tax assessments. In all parts of Canada local committees are dealing with that phase of the matter, either with their municipalities, where the municipalities have power to deal with it, or by making, in respect thereto appropriate representations to the provincial governments.

The point I am making is that this is a genuine national community effort. It is not in any sense of a partisan political character, and in that respect I was particularly appreciative of the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) the other day. I think it may be said that all these local and provincial committees throughout the dominion are doing their best in a community effort regardless of whether they are Liberals, Conservatives, Labour men, members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or Social Crediters. That is the spirit which the employment commission found had made such a success of a similar plan in the United States. I only desire to say at this stage that there is every evidence that the community effort now being put forth across Canada will, ere the spring months, produce a very considerable volume of much-needed employment and in a manner tending to make more comfortable the living conditions of our people.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to say a few words on the second reading of this bill as it affects the industrial workers of Canada. I ask the government: When the seed planted by this particular type of Purvis bill has reached its maturity, what will the harvest be? The harvest will be reaped by the taxpayers of Canada and the harvest will not be in the forms of crops which will fill their barns but in the form of taxes which will empty their pockets.

Under the rules of the house the time to discuss the principle of a bill is on its second reading. The rules provide that when a bill is read the second time the house approves the principle of it. The minister's cry—and it is the cry of all ministers—is, "Wait until you get into committee." That is the cry they always make; we must wait until we get into committee before we can get any information. Well, the industrial workers of Canada will wait until doomsday before they get any relief from this Bill No. 11, or from Mr. Purvis, the head of the duPont dynasty in Canada, who has been selected after many years of travel to take charge of this matter. He travelled around the world from 1912 to 1923; he went to South America, and during the war years he was in South America and the United States. Then in 1923 he came to this country, to the city of Montreal, and is now head of all these large industries. There are two of the largest of them in my riding. He supported the late government in by-elections and in the general election, and what was the battle-cry which you could find on the bill boards in different parts of the country? It was this: "Return the government to power and the industrial worker will see the end of unemployment; he will see slums abolished; he will see a housing scheme put into operation," and protection for industrial workers, and so on and so on.

The principle of this bill is not new by any means; I have called the attention of the house myself to it fifteen or twenty times the past three years. The unemployment that exists in Canada to-day has not, however, been remedied to any extent by the Minister of Labour and the professors of universities who have been appointed to these commissions and have staffed them from beginning to end. As a matter of fact, as far as the Minister of Labour is concerned we might as well go home, because this is only a mock parliament to-day. The government have appointed so many commissions that parliament has abrogated its powers under the British North America Act to a commission government behind the scenes. I have here the report of the committee of labour and education of the United States which investigated unemployment in 1928 and 1929 and which was presided over by the late Mr. Couzens, the great mayor of Detroit and governor of Michigan, as well as senator, who did so much for the relief of unemployment and in connection with housing in the United States. The bill which is now before us is based entirely on this report of President Roosevelt's new deal, recommending what is known as the home-owners' legislation. How has that legislation worked out in the United States? Look at the Evening Telegram of Toronto—last night's Telegram—and see for yourselves the condition of affairs in Milwaukee. You will see the result there.

This is not something new, as one hon. gentleman suggested last Friday; it was before the housing committee two years ago in 1935, and I moved a motion in connection with housing and the question of slums, especially as it relates to our industrial workers and a committee of the house sat three months and made a report. That committee went into the subject and now we have before us this particular bill. Now, you cannot on the second reading of a bill go into any discussion of individual clauses but can refer to them, and I do not intend to do so, but I wish to offer two or three observations with respect to the principle of the bill as I see it. In the first place, parliament's powers have been taken away and given to a Purvis academic commission, which has announced an expenditure of $50,000,000. I believe that appears in the bill as the limit, but that is not what we learn from other quarters. Last Friday there appeared a whole page picture in the Toronto evening papers of some fifteen gentlemen chosen as a commission to administer the bill—and this before parliament ever heard of the bill—from the publicity agent of Mr. Purvis. Mr. Purvis, whom the government seems to regard as omnipotent, has announced a policy which it is said will run into something like $200,000,000 according to the said papers. Along with this announcement there appeared, as I say, a picture of these twelve gentlemen good and true for Ontario, and it looked almost like a Liberal campaign fund. The other day I moved for an order of the house with respect to loans in the city of Toronto under this act and the reply given yesterday was that $103,000 to the end of 1936, was all that had been spent in Toronto.

Mr. DUNNING: That is in two months.

Mr. CHURCH: There have been 274 small loans a total of $103,000. The industrial workers comprise fifty-one per cent of the taxpayers and they have been driven out of their homes by high taxes, foreclosures, and the lack of protection of their equity, because it is no use asking the industrial worker to go to the bank and sign a note. I have been in banks every day and have never yet seen an industrial worker in one; he cannot afford to go to a bank. He has lost his equity and property. His property has been taken from him by foreclosure and nothing is done for him. There is protection under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for the fisherman and for the farmer. If the farmer or fisherman loses his home he can take advantage of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and get a loan, paying a low rate of interest. But how is the industrial worker treated? Last session the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) brought before the house a motion with regard to the industrial worker and the government promised a study of it all. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) spoke on it; he comes from an industrial riding and knows a great deal about real estate conditions in Toronto. Under present conditions in this country nobody wants to hold or own real estate in the cities and towns. I venture to say lots of hon. members in this chamber would be glad to unload all the real estate they have on the federal government and on Mr. Purvis's commission, because the taxes take all the income and through no fault of the city are a rent in itself. The income tax was the field of the municipalities exclusively from the time of confederation until 1917, when the federal government came along and took it. It was to be just a temporary measure. Then along came the provinces, and now it is a triplicate tax in some parts; Ontario has taken the income tax as a province. A million dollars has been deducted off relief in Toronto alone. The city used to get $2,600,000 from the income tax, but it has been taken away by act of the provincial parliament and they deduct that $860,000. That tax went far to enable municipalities to pay their way and maintain municipal services without government aid. Now where will that burden fall? The whole $2,600,000 will fall on real estate, in Toronto and in other cities such as Ottawa, Montreal, Hamilton, London, Winnipeg and the rest, a proportionate amount.

This bill is faulty for another reason. The Ontario Assessment Act will not permit the exemption of the improvements covered by this bill. It is all very well to promise relief, but the assessment act provides for the assessment of buildings and improvements. The Mayor of Hamilton a great and able executive attacked this piece of legislation when it was announced with a great flourish of brass bands and waving of flags last September. He said he doubted its usefulness. He said he did not believe in it, that it was not practicable, that the remedy was worse than the disease it professed to cure. Mr. Hepburn attacked the proposal also, on account of the high interest rates and charges. It is very high for an industrial worker who is out of work to have to pay. He cannot even pay his taxes or insurance which are almost confiscatory in the cities and towns, and in consequence arrears of taxes are piling up through no fault of the municipalities. Does any hon. member know anyone who wants now to invest in or to own real estate, with its accompanying burden of federal and provincial taxes loaded on to municipal taxes illegally? I know hundreds of people who would be glad to part with their real estate. The assessment act cannot be evaded in this way at the call of Mr. Purvis.

The committee of 1935 on housing had this matter before it, and it was proposed—I think the present Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) suggested it—that the Ontario legislature, which was to close within a week, should be urged to exempt from taxation these repair improvements, such as new plumbing, new verandah, new roof, new floor, and the modern conveniences which should be in every home. The city of Toronto took up the matter of home improvement and got separate legislation from the province to compel the owners of such property, which included the Synod of Toronto, to clean up their property and put in plumbing and modern conveniences.

They were given power to make loans up to $50 or $100 a house to clean up conditions which needed improvement, similar to the principle of this bill. The province of Ontario has recently announced a new housing and slum clearance policy as set out in the legislature by the provincial minister of labour. As far as the building trades are concerned, in to-day's issue of the Globe and Mail it is stated that in Toronto alone the value of building permits for 1936 was $8,114,000, while for Montreal it was $6,905,000. There is a large amount of building going on in the northern, eastern and western part of Toronto at the present time. All winter they have been building dwellings, many of them duplexes. How are they going to compete with this particular type of spoon-fed legislation? There are to-day altogether too many burdens and artificial barriers obstructing and placed on business, with the result that we have the taxation situation that now exists which is prohibitive and one of the main causes of unemployment. It is almost too late now to go into this proposition. I am not opposed to federal aid towards lowering interest rates and building, bank, and loan and insurance rates, but some of the legislation passed by this parliament last session is the direct antithesis of this bill. I had an order of the house passed for a return about these small loan companies in 1936, and it showed that their interest rates were as high as 35 and 42 per cent per annum. Names and figures will be found on page 2453 of Hansard of May 4 of last year.

This legislation in my opinion is going to be a glorious fiasco. If you go into a branch bank in any residential district in Toronto and ask the manager for a loan of $50 or $100 he cannot make it without reference to the inspector at head office. He cannot permit an overdraft of $100 without the authority of the inspector. When the housing committee had before it this matter as affecting the industrial workers we were laughed at because we proposed protection for all the people all the time and not for some of the people some of the time, when I proposed to give the industrial and suburban worker the same protection as the farmer and fisherman. Something should be done for the small home owners and the farmers who to-day are without proper conveniences. But these people, like the industrial workers, cannot get a dollar from the banks on a note. And what protection has the industrial borrower? The time limit of the loan under Bill 11 has been extended from one to five years in view of the criticism that has been forthcoming. That was included in a recommendation of the housing committee. There is a moratorium act in Ontario which does something to protect mortgages, and that is to be extended for another year. But when you sign a note at the bank there is no moratorium protection; they can get speedy judgment immediately on the note and take your property. Any real estate man knows that as soon as you do any improvement to your property up go the taxes and assessment under the Assessment Act, while you do not get much increase in rent. Everyone here knows the difficulty of making real estate carry itself these days.

The proposed plan has been largely advertised in Toronto but the harvest so far has been very small. Up to December 31, 1936, there have been 274 loans aggregating $103,330.27—note the 27 cents.

I may say in conclusion that the head of the commission is Mr. A. B. Purvis, President of Canadian Industries Limited, a man who is connected with the Bank of Montreal, the duPont dynasty, British American oil, the Bell Telephone Company and other concerns. He is the gentleman who is carrying on the work over his own signature, and those of the other members of the new board. Here we have a full tone picture—not a half-tone—in the newspaper. Here is a full-face view of this wonderful commission which, headed by its dynamic chairman, has taken over the administration of the work in the province of Ontario. I can say to that dynamic chairman that if parliament does not wake up and do something for the industrial workers, instead of spending days and weeks talking about international affairs, and if we do not devote more time to the betterment of the conditions of the industrial worker, then it will be that much worse for the people of Canada and the cause of order and good government.

When the price spreads and mass buying commission was sitting the conditions of white-collar workers were described. They have had the bailiffs in their homes, and under the present measure I can see very little help for them. In the United States not only the banks but the insurance companies, loan and mortgage companies came to the support of the industrial workers. Those insurance and loan companies made loans to a much greater extent than is being done in Canada. A short time ago, in 1935, I read of the good work the New York Life Insurance Company was doing at Gravesend beach, Brooklyn. Aside from the home owners' program of the Roosevelt administration, $25,000,000 is being supplied in Brooklyn to help build small homes for the working people there.

During the depression they estimate there were at least 60,000 people in the city of Toronto who moved into apartment houses. They had to give up their homes because they could not meet the mortgages. Many of those mortgages were foreclosed and the unfortunate people in several cases put out on the street; their goods and chattels, right down to the kitchen stove, were taken from them. Some of the shark loan companies which are charging forty-two per cent interest are putting people out on the city streets to-day. When it was proposed in the house that the banks and insurance, loan and mortgage companies should change their ways, did they do so? No; they came here to parliament with a body of the highest paid lawyers in Canada in 1934 and 1935, to oppose lower rates.

I do not wish to throw any more cold water on the bill, but I have very little faith in it. Here we have a man on one side of the street struggling to make ends meet, without any spoon-fed aid from parliament, trying to put a verandah and repairs on his house by doing some night work. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) lives in the Earlscourt district of Toronto, composed largely of industrial workers. This is not a matter to laugh at; it is to the credit of the hon. member's constituency and himself. Once I represented it, and I can tell this house that that district was built up by hard working people who built their own log cabins, many of them 20 years ago, and their own houses after coming home at five o'clock from their work, and they are fine houses. I fail to see where the so-called increase in business under this bill is going to do very much for these people.

Hon. members talk about the Jameson raid in South Africa. Let me tell them that the Jameson raid was nothing when compared with the raid this parliament and provincial legislatures have made on the belated income taxes of the municipalities and took their income away. In the city of Toronto the municipality will sooner or later be forced to place $2,600,000 of income tax taken from them for the first time by force, on real estate. Who wants to own real estate under such conditions? It is said in Toronto that $876,000 income will be paid back. The provinces receive from this parliament seventy-five per cent of old age pensions. I say the federal parliament should collect its own income tax, and let the provinces shift for themselves and collect their own, and not act as an accessory. It was a retrograde movement when this parliament came along and attempted to take income taxation away from the municipalities. The government of that day, 1917, deprived the municipalities of taxation which they enjoyed from 1867 and which relieved the position of people holding real estate.

I have pleaded the case of the industrial worker, and I shall go no farther. The responsibility rests on the government of the day, so long as they hold that position, to go forward with a plan similar to that which has been advocated all over Ontario, namely a plan to relieve the industrial worker from confiscation, from losing his equity in his home, and from having his goods and chattels thrown out on the city streets, and to save and protect the municipalities of the province from these raids, which are contrary to the British North America Act.

The time has come for the minister to be up and doing in connection with these large insurance, loan and mortgage companies which have so much money set aside. A few years ago they had plenty of money to gamble with the premiums of their policy-holders on all kinds of common stock the world over, and they gambled instead of investing and allowing the poor industrial worker to obtain an easy loan at an easy rate of interest on a home in Canada. I see no reason why this bill should not go to a committee. If we are to have any parliamentary government, then here is a bill which should go to a housing committee, and reassert the supremacy of parliament over the Purvis way.

There is now a notice of motion on the order paper which, if accepted, would provide for a committee such as I have indicated. I have discussed the matter of housing and reconstruction in my motions for two sessions, and I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) intends to carry the matter further. I hope his notice of motion will be discussed next Monday. The bill should be referred to a select committee before which industrial workers could be heard. Let the labour unions be heard and all parties thereto, and the municipalities. Let the trust companies and loan and insurance companies be brought here, and the banks. Let us hear from the shark loan companies. I shall name them: I will refer hon. members to page 2453 of Hansard for 1936 where they will find reference to the Central Finance Corporation. That company has just sent through the mail a leaflet stating what it does do for the industrial worker. How did those leaflets get into the mail? Then, there is the Personal Finance Corporation, and many other such companies.

If ever there was a bill which should go to a committee of the house, it is this one. We should know what the effect of the measure will be. We should know whether we would be justified in enacting it and how the rate of interest would work out; and we should know the results of any housing efforts which have been so far made. Personally I believe they have not been a success. How would such a measure react in the way of taking taxation from the municipalities? We should investigate the relationship between real estate and Bill No. 11. We should look into the matter of taxes paid on real estate, and many other matters in this connection could be laid before parliament.

I have little faith in the assertion that good results would come from the bill. For about ten years I have considered the matter. I have looked into the evidence taken by the housing committee set up in 1929 by the United States, the Couzens committee, and the committee which I moved for two years ago, and have considered the effect of this type of legislation on the economic situation. The result of my research is the belief that the whole question and position of the industrial worker, his home and the equity in his property should go to a committee of the house to hear all sides of Bill No. 11. The problem is a most important one. We must relieve the holders of real estate in the municipalities, because if much more is loaded on them, municipal institutions in Canada will be automatically abolished by the raids of the provinces; and may be abolished by the arbitrary action of the provinces. Municipal institutions are at the parting of the ways, and I venture to say that before long if we impose many more of these regulations upon them, and take away their revenues, we will see a day when municipal institutions will cease to exist and a lot of useless provincial governments will take their place.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, before the bill is sent to a committee I should like to make a few observations. I listened carefully to the minister's statement, and some of his remarks made me feel that perhaps the bill will not be as valuable as I had hoped it would be. I felt that way particularly when the minister indicated how costs were to be paid.

On January 29, when the bill was given first reading, I brought to the attention of the minister the circumstances in connection with a resident in my constituency. The person in question is a working man well known to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Church). I felt that his case was of an example which the government had in mind. Apparently the government's intention was not only to assist the home owner, but to provide work.

I have in mind a particular workman. This man came from the old country as did many other workmen who live in that particular part of my riding. The majority of these men brought with them the idea of old country thrift. Their first thought was to buy a piece of land and then erect a small cottage upon it. Thousands of these men came out here in 1907 and through the years they have demonstrated that they are good citizens. I believe a larger number of them own their homes to-day than do similar workmen in other parts of Canada. The particular man I have in mind bought a piece of land upon which he built a small cottage of two or three rooms. His house did not have a foundation; it was placed on posts which were encased with lumber. This small cottage has served him as a residence through the years, but he would now like to put in a foundation and add one room to the upper part of the cottage, necessitating a new roof. How can that man get money with which to do this work? He owns his house outright and has steady work with the city of Toronto. I cannot see how this man would be able to repay a loan of $750 in three years. He figures that this is the amount he will require to do the work he wants to do, and if he borrows it he will have to repay it at the rate of $250 a year.

While I believe that the intentions of the government are good, while I want to give them every credit, while I commend the minister for endeavouring to promote the repairing of homes and residences to provide work, I cannot see how the ordinary home owner will be able to take advantage of these loans. He cannot pay back a loan of, say, $750 at the rate of $250 a year. The particular man to whom I have referred makes something over $28 per week. He works only ten months in the year and it would be utterly impossible for him out of such wages to pay back $250 per year. I should like some consideration given to this angle of the matter.

I had intended to ask the minister with reference to the costs when he was speaking, but I thought it would be better to let the bill go into committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall try to deal with that point when we are in committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: With the point I have just raised?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: With reference to costs, I cannot see how this measure will be as beneficial as we hope it to be if the municipalities are to share the costs. Many municipalities are bankrupt.

Mr. DUNNING: There is to be no sharing of the cost.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the minister to say that part of the cost was to be borne by the business interests which would benefit from this work, and also a part by the municipalities which would benefit. I am glad to know that the municipalities will not have anything to do with the cost.

When the bill was introduced I was under the impression, apparently wrongly, that 15 per cent of the individual loans were to be guaranteed by the government. I realize that such a method of guarantee would mean a great deal of bookkeeping, but this is a measure to give relief in most serious times and we ought to be prepared to do some bookkeeping. I am afraid that when a man such as the one to whom I referred goes to a banker for a loan of $750 he will be told that the bank does not want to be bothered with a loan of that size because the government does not guarantee the loans individually. He may be told that a good deal of red tape will be necessary before the loan can be collected out of the aggregate guarantee in case of his failure. I know the government proposes to guarantee fifteen per cent of the aggregate and I hope some provision will be made to prevent lending companies from refusing to advance loans because individual loans will not be guaranteed.

There is one further item I should like to discuss. In my opinion this bill was designed primarily to benefit the home owner who has not been able to obtain necessary loans during these very strenuous and hard times. However, I note that the bill covers multiple houses. I have no objection to duplexes, but I should like to see some limitation placed upon the number of apartments in a building upon which a loan could be obtained. Unless that is done the large apartment owners will get too much of this money.

I want to thank the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) for speaking so highly of the people in my riding. At one time he represented part of my riding and he gave the people very good representation. They are thrifty and sound people and I hope this bill will benefit them. I cannot see how it will be other than beneficial unless its effectiveness is reduced by some of the matters to which I have referred.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit party has refrained up to the present from criticizing the appointment of the National Employment Commission because we hoped that some good would come out of it. On many occasions we have urged that the problem of unemployment can never be solved in its entirety, that in this mechanized age it is impossible to give work to all men. This opinion was upheld the other day by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), when he said that public works will never solve unemployment. I think it is generally understood that the home improvement loan scheme is the brainchild of the chairman and other members of the employment commission. I do not believe it, for I credit these gentlemen with more intelligence than to offer just this one solution of the problem after almost a year's work. To me the price we have paid for the plan has been very high, and certainly it far outweighs the material benefits we have received. If my information is correct, and I have no reason to doubt the authenticity of it, this is not an original scheme. It has been in operation in the United States, and we are told that a similar scheme was hatched by officials of the federal Department of Finance, collaborating with bankers, and offered to the people of Windsor, Ontario, some time ago as a means whereby they might solve their economic problems. Evidently all has not been well in the city of Windsor.

Mr. MARTIN: It is improving, though.

Mr. MARSHALL: It has had its financial difficulties as many other Canadian cities have, and because the people of Windsor were thinking in terms of reduction of interest and perhaps of repudiation, terms which supposedly came out of the west but which have been in constant use in many of the cities of the east, this scheme was presented to the people of that city in order that they might become home conscious and that their minds might be kept away or diverted from the large burden of debt they are shouldering.

Mr. MARTIN: Quite wrong.

Mr. MARSHALL: The general outline of the scheme is well known to all, so that it is not necessary for me to go into it fully. It has been brought to the attention of the people of Canada by an intensive advertising campaign. In my humble judgment it is going to cost this country a great deal more than $7,500,000 when we take into consideration the cost of the commission, the cost of advertising, the cost of broadcasting and finally the amount we will pay eventually to the banks as a guarantee under this scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, doubtless he did not hear my statement that the whole cost of the publicity campaign in connection with the home improvement scheme is being borne not by the government but by voluntary contributions gathered from all over the dominion.

Mr. MARSHALL: I heard the statement made by the Minister of Finance, but eventually the cost of advertising will be included in the cost of goods and the people of Canada will have to pay it.

One of the things to which I take strong exception is the use of the term "discount 3¼ per cent." To me that is misleading. Those who are not constantly dealing with financial concerns might easily confuse discount with interest. They not only might; they actually do. Last fall I was in conversation with many people in regard to this scheme. They seemed to think it was a splendid idea that the government, through the medium of the banks, should place $50,000,000 at the disposal of the people of Canada at such a low rate of interest. They had confused discount with interest. When I drew to their attention the fact that discount at 3¼ per cent was equivalent to interest charges at 6·32 per cent, the scheme took on a different complexion.

I was surprised to learn that at one time the financial institutions had asked for a discount rate of five per cent, or interest at approximately ten per cent. I also learned with a great deal of surprise that commercial loans carry a rate of interest equal to this and that instalment buying is carried on at a rate of interest almost double. Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that this country is on the verge of bankruptcy? This racket has been going on for so long that we are experiencing the greatest difficulty in stamping it out. I wonder when the people will awake to the fact that international finance is responsible for most of the present ills of this dominion. The government boasts that it can borrow short term money for less than one per cent and on long term bonds at less than four per cent. Yet it gives its blessing, it sanctions, it permits financial institutions to charge 6·32 per cent, and by every means at its command urges people to patronize the scheme.

The other day the Minister of Finance stated that the borrower required no backing on his note. Why should he? What finer backing could any financial institution have than the word of the dominion government? We were told that the borrower must have character and credit. These are characteristics which will obtain a loan for any individual at any time from any financial institution; at least they should. If the borrower has both those qualities I maintain that he requires no backing. Under this scheme, when a man goes into a financial institution he is asked such questions as: Is there a mortgage on the property? What is its size? What shape is it in to-day? He is asked about the taxes, whether they have been paid up, whether they are in arrears or whether the property is in danger of being offered for sale under the taxation laws. He is asked about the insurance on the property; he is also asked if he has a job, and, if so, whether it is a permanent or a temporary one. Finally he is asked what his monthly earnings are, and if he can answer all these questions satisfactorily the loan is granted to him. I venture to say that any individual who went to a financial institution and was able to answer these questions satisfactorily should have no difficulty in raising a loan to-day, without any backing or guarantee of any sort.

Certain things have been said with regard to the person who improves his property but does not wish to have the matter known to the taxation authorities. In other words, there is a certain type of citizen who realizes that improvement means increased valuations, and that an increased valuation means increased taxation. We have been assured that this—supposedly—will not be taken into consideration when valuations are placed upon property, but I do not think the dominion government has any power in the matter of assessments or of municipal taxation.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not pretend to have.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not see why one individual should be allowed to be free of additional taxation because he obtains a loan under this plan from a financial institution, while another who puts his own money into improvements is not granted the same privilege. In short, the scheme is this. The banks, finding a strong current of public opinion against them, come forward as the saviours of our country. They propose by means of bookkeeping entries to create $50,000,000 of credit, lend it to the people of Canada and in process of time take back $50,000,000 plus $3,160,000 for services rendered. Why is it that we do not hear a word about inflation? Simply because it is the banks who are doing it on this occasion. The banks create $50,000,000 against $50,000,000 of production, and they place a stranglehold on the country by demanding $3,160,000 which was never created in the first place, and this, too, with the full sanction of the government. The Canadian Farm Loan Board to-day charges only five per cent, and that board, I understand, is making profits.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is misinformed.

Mr. MARSHALL: The farmers' creditors arrangement boards operating throughout the country are cutting down interest to five per cent. Why, then, I ask, are banks allowed to charge 6·32 per cent? The government itself could easily have created this $50,000,000 through the central bank and lent the money at lower rates to the people to whom the banks are lending it to-day, and the profits, if any, could be used to reduce our debt. But naturally in that case we would hear the cry that it is "inflation." It is said that we have not the facilities for doing so. I do not agree. We have soldier settlement board officers throughout the country; we have farmers' creditors arrangement boards; we have inspectors; we have a hundred and one different agencies operating under the dominion government. Why could we not ask them to do what we are asking the banks to do? The solution of our difficulty lies in the control of currency and credit to be used for public needs rather than private gain. If this scheme is all the National Employment Commission can offer, even as a partial solution of the unemployment problem, after almost a year in office, it might well be abolished and the responsibility again placed where it rightfully belongs, on the shoulders of the Minister of Labour. I feel quite confident that a man of his intelligence and capability could easily have done as much as the commission has done, in less time and at less cost to the country. The government of Canada by commissions is a costly affair, and it may be that at some future time the present government, to its sorrow, will find that out.

I am not opposed to the idea which is behind the bill, but I object to financial institutions being given a monopoly in the matter; I object most strongly to the excessive interest charged; and I most strongly object to the government giving a guarantee when in the first place the scheme in every essential is being promoted to assist financial institutions in gouging from the people of Canada at least three millions of dollars.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): As I read the bill, it seems to me that it is designed to give some benefit, but that the benefits to be conferred are very limited and will be of advantage to a very small group of people. There are several outstanding problems which we in Canada must face: unemployment, cheaper credit, debt, and housing, and in my judgment this bill does very little to help in their solution. It is put forward with the idea of helping employment. Possibly it may stimulate a certain amount of employment in the building trades, and for that reason I think it is along the right lines. But, as has been pointed out by the previous speaker (Mr. Marshall), this is the only measure which has been given us by the employment commission, and if this is all that is to be put forward I would say that it does not begin to touch the great mass of the unemployed people of this country.

One of the dangers is that, upon the government putting forth this scheme, there is a great hullaballoo about it; the people think they are getting something, only to find later on that it has very little real effect on the mass of unemployment. Further than that, we need cheap credit, but I cannot think that this is the best way in which cheap credit can be given to those who most need it to-day.

Again, as a previous speaker has said, I believe that the government itself is in just as good a position directly to advance credit as the banks are; or, if it is not desirable that the government should do this, steps might be taken to force down the rates which the banks charge. But here apparently the banks or other lending institutions are to be very carefully protected. Clause 3 seems to contain the principle of the bill; that is, the guarantee to approved lending institutions against losses which they may sustain as a result of home improvement loans made by them. The arrangement is a help to the lending institutions.

Again, no credit is offered to many people who very greatly need it at the present time. I quite admit that certain classes of people whose homes are run down might not be able to get credit, and under this scheme they can. So far, so good. But there are large numbers of people who very much need credit and who will not be able to qualify under this scheme; no provision whatever is made for them.

But there is a still more serious question which must be considered, and that is debt. Not only are the industrial workers head over ears in debt, but a great many of them are actually losing their homes; and much the same is true in the country districts. Until therefore there is some more comprehensive way of dealing with the debt problem, I do not think we have advanced very far towards promoting that general prosperity which in itself, if it were here, would solve a great many of these problems.

Mr. ISNOR: What class of person coming within the scope of this bill is not taken care of?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not suggest that the people who come within the scope of this bill are not being taken care of. What I said was that the majority of the people who need help, do not come within its scope. I am speaking of the limitations of the bill. As far as it goes the bill may bring benefits to some, but the benefits are so limited in scope that I cannot be very enthusiastic about the bill.

The point that has been stressed in the elaborate broadcasting of this proposal is that it is a splendid housing scheme. The fact is, it simply does not touch the great problem of housing that faces the country at the present time. In common with many other members I have read some of the housing surveys made by a number of our cities in recent years. I had thought it might possibly be well to put some of these figures on Hansard, but I do not want simply to clutter the pages of Hansard with them. The conditions in many of our cities are, however, simply appalling, and this bill does not touch them. Most of the people who are in the worst condition cannot take advantage of the provisions of the bill. I wish the minister could lay this bill over until we could have a discussion on the resolution standing in the name of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). He proposes to bring before us this whole question of housing, and it seems to me that the house should discuss that resolution and then come to a consideration of this bill in the light of such a discussion of the whole problem. As it is, a bill which touches a very small segment of the problem is presented to us and we are asked to pass it. Some will say. "Very well; raise your objections to this, that and the other particular clause, but let us pass the bill." That is not the way in which these things should be done. We ought to have a survey of the whole problem of housing in Canada, and then we should be in a position to say how far the provisions of this bill might help in solving that problem, especially in regard to home owners.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the hon. member now speaking of housing in its social aspects as a measure of improving the health of our people? He will agree with me that there is a marked distinction between different purposes that may be effected by housing legislation. This home improvement plan is designed, as I understand it and as I think he must understand it, rather to afford employment to the building trades; it is not designed to improve the conditions of which he has complained.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but it has been put forward in a general way as being a housing scheme, and there is no other housing scheme which has so far been presented by the government. We heard a few years ago the expression "nuisance value." I am afraid this bill may have a sort of nuisance value—

Mr. DUNNING: Not to the men getting wages as a result of it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; it has a value to a comparatively limited number of people. The trouble is that it may become a substitute for a more comprehensive scheme. I think we should consider carefully the larger question which so far has not been before the house. While it is all very well to distinguish theoretically between housing as it affects the health and social conditions of the people and housing as a means by which builders may earn a livelihood, I think the two should be considered together. I would remind the minister that even the people engaged in the building trades are themselves living in houses, and some of them amid very wretched conditions, so that even the class of workers engaged in the building industry must be considered, not merely as workmen but also as human beings having to live with their families in certain houses. But I am speaking not merely of building workers but of industrial workers generally, and this bill makes very little provision for the mass of industrial workers.

Just one other consideration at this point. The bill provides that the government shall stand behind the approved lending institutions. The government does not stand behind the home owners, and I think there is a very considerable distinction. If a man enters into this arrangement and is not able to make good I assume he may lose his home.

Mr. DUNNING: It has nothing to do with that at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why not?

Mr. DUNNING: Simply because this bill takes no account of whether or not he may have a mortgage on his home.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the point.

Mr. DUNNING: The point is that nonpayment of the loan he secures under this act certainly cannot affect the question of his being deprived of his home.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am sure the minister must recognize that the amount he can make use of under the act is only a fraction of the value of his home.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This bill does not stand behind him in his struggle to obtain a home for himself. He may be heavily mortgaged at the present time, and if he is too heavily mortgaged I doubt whether he can qualify under the bill. But in the long effort he is putting forth to establish a home for himself the government does not stand behind him, whereas the government does stand behind the lending institutions, so that they are saved from any loss. An hon. member behind me suggested to me a little while ago, it might be possible that a bonus to home owners, to some such extent as this, might be just as sure a way of helping the home owners and might do just as much to stimulate employment. I have not gone into that question.

Mr. DUNNING: I have.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, I shall be very glad to hear the minister explain that in due course. My point was simply that the government stands behind the lending institutions and guarantees them against loss, and considers only the aggregate loss. It does not stand behind the individual home owner in his efforts to secure a clear title to his home. There is one of the real difficulties.

As I said before I shall be glad to vote for the bill, but I regret that the government so far have not brought down more comprehensive measures which would deal with the outstanding problems which I have tried to enumerate.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): On second reading the principle of the measure is to be considered by the house; the details stand for consideration in committee. The principle of this bill, as far as the government is concerned, is to guarantee lending institutions against loss to the extent of fifteen per cent of any sums they advance for the improvement of homes, not more than $2,000 in any one case.

There are two or three observations which might be made as to details in connection with that guarantee. The lending institutions are to be approved by the governor in council. We will assume that "lending institution" will mean any bank or insurance company or trust company or financial institution of any kind. The other day in answer to a question the minister said that the guarantee was for the aggregate of fifteen per cent to any lending institution, which institution might have many branches. A result of that might be that in a favoured community all the loans might go bad. That is, if the total sums advanced by any lending institution having a hundred branches throughout Canada amount to $300,000, the country has guaranteed $45,000, and that $45,000 might all be lost in one community. That is perfectly clear. Whether or not it will be satisfactory to work it out in that way I cannot say; I merely direct attention to the facts disclosed by the measure itself. But it does appear to me that, assuming an institution lends $1,000,000, there might be a loss of $150,000, distributed over two or three communities, representing fifty or sixty per cent of the loans made in those communities, and as a result of careful supervision of the loans made in other communities there is no loss there. So that the guarantee provision applied in that way might not work out as was intended.

As far as the general purposes are concerned I doubt very much whether this will accomplish what was intended by the promoters of it. Much might be said, and will be said at another time and place, with respect to the character of the publicity that has been given to it and the consequent misunderstanding on the part of many people as to what it really means. That there is such misunderstanding I think will be found by those who desire to make inquiry concerning it. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) a moment ago said it has nothing to do with the housing question. That of course is true. These loans may be made on a property mortgaged to the hilt, provided the owner can induce the lending institution to advance the money, and companies which have security on the property will of course be only too pleased to see money expended on it; for whatever may be said, such improvements will enure to their advantage. A judgment against a defaulting borrower will not be available for the execution holder against the property, yet the security of the mortgage has been increased. As far as that phase is concerned, however, I do not think it seriously enters into the matter. The whole question is, will the lending institutions in the exercise of their discretion in the several communities throughout Canada, whether urban or rural, in which advances may be made, grant credit—for that is what it gets down to—for improvements on terms indicated by this measure to any appreciable extent? And by appreciable extent I mean an extent which will provide employment to any substantial number of craftsmen.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole issue. The government's action violates some of the tenets of faith so dear to professors and others of the Liberal party, notably the extending of credit before parliament has authorized it, and the undertaking by mere letters of responsibilities that never should be undertaken. How the welkin would have rung had any effort of this kind been made by the preceding administration! It was done, as will be recalled, in a smaller way with respect to some matters. The very idea of authorizing the expenditure of public moneys without a vote of parliament is so contrary to all principles which govern and control public finance that I was horror-struck when I read in the press the original statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that when parliament met money would be authorized and appropriated and the scheme put in operation. A few days later that position was abandoned and it was said that by arrangement with the lending institutions the finance minister had succeeded in inducing them to be assured that with the large majority behind the administration they could rest in perfect peace that the guarantee would be honoured and in effect would be retroactive.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but that is the sense of it. The language of the letter read the other day makes it abundantly clear.

I congratulate the government upon adopting plans which they find now in practice are essential, although in theory they may seem unsound. So often during the last few months we have seen evidence of this. The cold, calm theorist in opposition becomes wedded at once to plans of concrete usefulness when he is in office. If the Minister of Finance sees it is essential that a plan become operative in order that unemployment may be lessened, of course he should bring it into operation. I have no doubt about it, and never have had. The fact that we are now in opposition and the government are doing what they opposed when they were in opposition is no reason why I should reverse my position. I support the government in what they have done; what they did was right and proper and sound, and what we did and would do to-morrow if we had the same responsibility. But we throw back to the government now the criticisms they made in those days, and remind them that after all you can quote at great length books on public finance, but the cold-blooded fact is that when the public interest demands that employment be furnished now—not then, not at some other time in the future, but now if possible—by the operation of a plan which is thought to be effective, it is not the time to oppose if within the general bounds of our constitutional practice it is possible to give immediate effect to that which is useful.

There is one other matter in connection with the guarantees which I think is important. If the lending institutions are bound by the strict law of guarantee as it now stands, no extension of time can be given in case of default, not a single day. A variation to the slightest extent of the terms of the guarantee would operate to release it. And no one knows that better than the lending institutions themselves. Unless, therefore, it is provided—and I think it would have to be done by statute, not by regulation—that the granting of an extension of time by the lending institutions shall not operate to discharge the guarantee, it is quite obvious that the institutions will not for a moment permit their guarantee to lapse by granting an extension of time. They will at once institute proceedings for the purpose of collecting the moneys that may be due. I mention that because I think it should be a statutory provision rather than a mere regulation. That is, a statutory power should be conferred upon the lending institution to grant extensions of time; for the maximum time extends over sixty payments. The minimum is thirty-six, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: With the larger loans it extends over five years.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It will be observed that if the lending institution does not strictly enforce its rights, or grants extensions, this will have the effect of releasing the guarantee. Knowing what we do of lending institutions in connection with their every-day operations, we know perfectly well they will not take that chance. I suggest that principle is very important in making this measure effective.

It has been said so frequently it is not necessary to repeat that the legislation, in itself, is not new. Therefore it seems to me we should profit somewhat by the experience of other countries. It must be remembered, however, in dealing with matters of this kind, that Canada is a country entirely different from the great republic to the south of us, as will be found by those who have to administer the legislation. It is undesirable to arouse too great expectations with respect to a matter of this sort, when it must be patent to even the superficial observer that the limitations of benefits are very apparent.

The twofold object which the commission, and through it the government, have in mind is, in the first place, the improvement of the homes of our people, and in the second place —and perhaps this should be indicated first—employment on as large a scale as possible in useful and productive service. Whether we put one or the other first, it does not make any difference. For that purpose the country is obligating itself to a maximum of $7,500,000, which is fifteen per cent of $50,000,000. Seven and a half million dollars is a substantial sum of money, and we run the risk of losing all or part of it. We would run a risk of losing very little of it if it were not that apparently we have agreed, although it is not so indicated, that the lending institution is to be regarded not as a series of branches, but as a whole. A lending institution having two hundred branches each of which advances $5,000 will have $1,000,000 lent out. Fifteen per cent of that is $150,000, which the country would have to pay. I am not quite sure if that is sound finance, but it is exactly what the bill means, in view of the answer given the other day.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not in the case of two hundred institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: Two hundred branches, I said, each one advancing an average of $5,000.

There is a vital factor in that connection affecting the success or failure of the whole plan. I make my submission not in a critical sense, because I desire that any suggestions I may make may be helpful. My experience has taught me that when one is dealing with a question of a guarantee and with branches being in a position to make advances, one must keep in mind, first, that the law of guarantee is very strict and, second, that the sum of the losses in all the many branches through which the lending companies may make advances may place upon the country a burden which would be avoided if each was made responsible for its own fifteen per cent.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there any clause in the bill referring to the wages the workmen are to be paid while carrying out repairs to buildings indicated in the measure?

Mr. ROGERS: No clause in the bill deals with that particular subject. Fair wages legislation of the dominion parliament does not affect work done through private contracts. It extends only to public works and public contracts. Therefore the matter of wages paid to those who will be employed on the improvement of homes will be for the determination of the authorities in the provinces where the work is being done.

Mr. MacNICOL: Regulations as to wages will come under provincial legislation?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Can the minister impose any restriction in connection with the use of moneys obtained under a loan? For instance, we know of houses which, although being lived in, are unfit for human habitation and should be condemned and demolished. Under this measure the owner of such a house could apply for a loan, repair the house and put it into a state of repair sufficient for certain purposes. However, even after the repairs were made the house would not be fit for human habitation. Is any machinery set up whereby a person would be prevented from obtaining money to repair a house in a condition such as I have described?

Mr. DUNNING: The question is important and indicates one of the difficulties faced by the federal government when it attempts to assist in fields certain phases of which are under other jurisdiction. As the hon. member is aware, the duty of condemning a dwelling house as being unfit for human habitation is a provincial matter. The power is generally conferred by the provinces upon the municipalities. Through legislation of the kind before us we can have only a very broad and somewhat distant connection with the problem. Through the lending institutions we can attempt to indicate that it is not the policy of the government to make loans to place slum dwellings in the condition described by the hon. member. I submit, however, that the federal authority cannot enter into an argument as to whether a dwelling is or is not habitable or suitable for human occupation. The determining authority in such instances would be not ourselves but the local authority, usually the municipality.

Mr. McNIVEN: I should like further information on the question asked by the hon. member for Davenport, namely with regard to wages of workmen employed. The object of the bill is to increase employment, but I anticipate that in so doing it is the intention not merely to create a job but to bring about a condition of affairs which will assist workmen in reestablishing themselves. Therefore it seems to me that in guaranteeing the payment of certain moneys parliament has a responsibility toward the men who are to do the work. The dominion government has recognized this principle by incorporating a fair wage clause in every contract given out by the government. We are using the public credit to guarantee certain expenditures and it seems to me we could well take steps to ensure that the expenditure of that money will assist in reestablishing these men instead of giving them merely a few days work. It will be little satisfaction to this parliament and to the public at large if, after a summer's work, these carpenters, plumbers, steamfitters, painters, decorators, and other artisans have to go immediately on relief. If such a thing were to occur, then this parliament would be losing both coming and going.

The borrower must make an application to the bank. Could there not be incorporated in that application an undertaking that he will pay the going rate of wages to the various trades employed? There are still many chisellers around who delight in preying upon the unprotected artisan, and I think we have a responsibility in that connection.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, the question just raised by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven), and previously by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), has been before the Department of Labour for consideration. It is quite true that in addition to laying down scales of wages for public works, the Department of Labour has followed the practice of inserting a fair wage clause in government contracts. I am sure my hon. friend is aware that that fair wage clause provides only for the payment of the going wages in the locality where the work is being done. We have never attempted to lay down a definite scale of wages apart from public works and public contracts. In other words, the determination of the wages is a matter of local usage or is decided by local authorities, as in a number of provinces where labour codes prevail. I am bound to say that we have had suggestions that we should move in the contrary direction. It has been suggested that in certain localities the wages paid to some classes of labour in the building trades are abnormally high, and that this fact has tended to discourage building operations. I would doubt the wisdom of inserting in this bill a clause which would mean an extension of the fair wages policy of the government beyond public works and public contracts. Hitherto we have never gone beyond public works or public works' contracts. I think I might add this further observation. Provision has been made for setting up advisory committees in every province and in every large city and town. Labour will be represented upon these committees, and it does seem to me that the proper means of securing what my hon. friend has in mind would be for such committees to bring their influence to bear upon the local authority to see that fair wages were paid for this particular type of work.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven). The solution he offers is simple and effective. When the borrower applies for a loan, which he undoubtedly will do by filling out some form, he should give the undertaking suggested by the hon. member. That is a reasonable provision to make in cases of this kind and it provides the necessary safeguard. The minister's statement with reference to wages paid on public works is correct if he has in mind only common labour, but it is not complete in all its details. Each year the Department of Labour determines upon a scale of wages for the skilled trades in the different areas. It thereby sets the rates of wages. Those rates are sent to the Department of Public Works and the schedule is posted on the works being carried on. The different contractors agree to pay the rates of wages specified therein. These rates are made part of the specifications and the department not only undertakes to see that the going rates of wages are paid in the case of ordinary labour, but enters into the field of fixing and determining the rates for the skilled trades.

Mr. ROGERS: Based upon the prevailing wages in the locality.

Mr. STEWART: I do not know what the basis is, but it is determined by the Department of Labour. They do not leave it at that; they say that so much per hour or so much per day is the schedule of wages which shall apply to this work in the area concerned. That schedule is posted on the work for the information of the employees.

Mr. BROOKS: A few days ago when this bill was being discussed an hon. member asked a question with reference to improvements on farm buildings. At that time I understood the minister to say that the terms of this bill would apply to outbuildings such as barns and so on, as well as to houses on farms. I cannot find anything in the bill to lead me to believe that these buildings are included. Yesterday I received a pamphlet from the National Employment Commission, issued under the authority of the dominion government. I assume all hon. members received copies of this. In one section it states:

> Loans are to be made solely for the purpose of making repairs, alterations and additions (including built-in equipment) to either rural or urban dwellings. The proceeds of such loans can be used for no other purpose than the above.

It will be noted that the purpose stated is sufficiently broad to include repairs or alterations inside the house, or improvements or additions to the house. It would also include an attached or detached garage on the same property.

But there is nothing to indicate that the farmer's barn, hog pen or other buildings is included. The farmer has had just as hard a time as the city dweller; his buildings are very necessary to his livelihood, and I think such buildings should be included in a scheme of this kind.

Mr. DUNNING: The section which would cover the point raised by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has not yet been reached and I should like to confine the discussion to the section before the committee. However, I can assure him that the present regulations under which the scheme is presently operated do include farm buildings. Loans have been and are being made for the purpose of improving farm buildings.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), I might point out to the committees that unless a change is made in this procedure, it would be quite competent for a man to get a loan wherewith to buy materials or appliances to install in his own home. There is nothing to prevent a man who is an artisan from doing his own work. I know a number of cases where this has happened. Under this scheme an artisan capable of doing the work has gone to the bank and secured a loan with which to purchase the materials wherewith to do work in his own home, and I think that is good business. It is providing labour, because some other men made the materials he is buying for use in his home. While the statistics indicate that 85 per cent of the total of the advances under this home improvement plan goes in wages, this does not mean that 85 per cent goes in wages to the men who actually work in the houses carrying out the alterations. It does mean that the labour factor involved in the lumber, in the paint, in the bathtubs—and a great deal is being done by way of installation of modern plumbing in homes that hitherto have not had it—in the cement for putting foundations and basements under homes that hitherto have not had these facilities, which labour factor is included within the cost of all these materials, is making work somewhere in Canada.

We can very easily exaggerate the necessity of attempting to enforce, through the medium of this bill, a fair wage clause on that portion of the labour which possibly could be reached by this measure. I suppose it would be possible to add something to the application form; I have before me a form such as a man uses in applying for a loan. A statement by him to the effect that he intended to pay fair wages could be made a part of the application, but I submit that it would be valuable only for the sake of its moral effect unless we were prepared to set up a system of policing machinery which would be very, very expensive and, I think, of very doubtful effectiveness. We must bear in mind that the experience of the two months during which the scheme has been in operation indicates that the loans are quite small. In the more than three thousand loans which were made in the first two months the average amount was some $380 per loan, if my memory serves me aright; at any rate it was less than $400. Imagine the machinery which would be necessary to make it possible to enforce, by action of this parliament or this government, a fair wage clause in connection with the operation of all these little jobs, when as a matter of fact fair wage arrangements are being dealt with in and by most of the provinces and local communities in which this work is going on. I doubt very much if we would accomplish anything by attempting to legislate along this line in connection with the guarantee we are giving. I am willing, of course, to consider any views which may be expressed by the committee, but I do urge that we should not clutter up this scheme with red tape. Every effort has been made, in dealing with it, to reduce red tape to the minimum in order to secure the major objective, which, of course, is the provision of employment. The manner in which trades and labour organizations in practically all the cities of Canada have cooperated and are cooperating with the local committees in creating that kind of community cooperative spirit which will make it possible to attain the desired objective, is evidence that the interests of the men who are working for wages are being well looked after, and I believe the danger suggested is more apparent than real.

Mr. MacINNIS: I tried to get the floor two or three times, but others caught the eye of the chairman. This is a very important point, and it is something this house and this government should keep in mind continually, whether or not it can be incorporated in these agreements.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) referred to the cost of policing in connection with these loans, and stated that the cost which would be involved if such a fair wage clause were written into the agreements would be very heavy. When it comes to protecting the interests of the wage-earner we are always met with a reference to the cost and the difficulties involved. It is almost impossible to get authorities to act to protect the interests of the wage-earner. Some little time ago my attention was drawn to a city in this country in which two cases were brought before a magistrate. In the one case an unemployed man stole a small amount; at the moment I do not know whether it was money or goods. In the other an employer was brought into court for violation of the minimum wage act. In the first case the magistrate did not hesitate at all before imposing a term of imprisonment upon the unemployed man, pointing out that the community must be protected from an individual of this kind. When the violation of the minimum wage act came before him, however, he said that at a time like this employers could not be expected to pay any attention to minimum wage laws. That is something which cannot be overlooked by this or any other government.

Mr. DUNNING: May I ask what possible relation that can have to the matter before the committee?

Mr. MacINNIS: It has a relation in principle. The answer of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was exceedingly unsatisfactory. He said that never before did we attempt to do anything except to insert a fair wage clause in public works contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: He could not have been in the house from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. MacINNIS: I quite agree. As a matter of fact, before the fair wage legislation was passed there was no protection at all in government contracts. If we adopted the principle of the Minister of Labour that we should not do anything because it had not been done before, we would never make any progress at all.

There is another point. The minister mentioned that in his opinion some wages in the building trades were too high.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not say any such thing.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me correct my hon. friend. I said complaints had been received in the Department of Labour that in certain localities certain tradesmen in the building industries were charging wages which made it difficult to get the amount of building started that otherwise would be proceeded with. I did not myself state that those wages were too high. I said that as a matter of fact complaints had been received.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sorry if I misquoted the minister; I apologize. My understanding, however, was that he thought a lower scale should be inserted in the contracts.

Mr. ROGERS: No; there was no suggestion of that.

Mr. MacINNIS: In any case the minister said the reverse would have to be done.

Mr. ROGERS: What does that mean?

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know; the minister made the statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid my hon. friend is putting the words into my mouth. I certainly do not recall having made a statement of that kind.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I withdraw the statement, if the minister objects. But that just emphasizes the point we wish to make, that wages are always too high for the employers of labour and that they never pay a living wage unless they are forced to do so. If we take the building trades workers, we know that in most cities, in fact in nearly every city, they work for only a few months in the year, and if they are to live at all during the other months they must have a reasonable wage, a wage that might appear rather high for a person who has a steady job the year round. I think it would be quite easy for the government to insert in this agreement a clause which would to some extent protect the wage workers. The fact that a few individuals obtaining loans might do some of the work themselves would not make such provision impossible, and if it could be inserted it would have a moral value, if no more.

Mr. MASSEY: I assume that the bill is sincere in its broad statement that it is a bill "to increase employment." I was interested in what the minister said as to the use which could be made of the loan to obtain materials, and his statement that in many instances further work would be done by the man himself, he being perhaps a skilled mechanic. I imagine that in a good many cases those who obtain loans can do a good deal of the repair work, such as their own painting, their own carpentry, and so on. But the declared purpose of the bill is to increase employment. Many of the people who receive loans are in a position to improve their homes as a result of this legislation, but they are also in a position to employ men for a few days to do the work. Some of them can afford to do that. They can get their material for three or four hundred dollars—the average, I think it has been stated, is three hundred dollars—and could pay say twenty or twenty-five dollars of that amount in labour charges to have the work done. I was also much interested to hear the minister say that in the publicity campaign which was to be launched there would be direct advertising in the newspapers and also radio announcements. Would it be possible to incorporate in this advertising something which would stimulate a desire on the part of those obtaining loans whenever at all possible to employ labour; in other words, to make the act carry out as far as it can its declared purpose, which is to increase employment, and thus give emphasis to the fact that the object of this loan is not only to repair homes but to give men jobs?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the motive. The suggestion of my hon. friend will be passed on.

Mr. COLDWELL: While this measure may be regarded as a step in the right direction, nevertheless it will not touch our badly housed people in the rural districts; it is largely an urban scheme, and should be so regarded. I should like to see the ministry of labour and perhaps the ministry of agriculture endeavour to work out a plan of rural housing apart from a home rehabilitation plan such as this is. I doubt very much whether many of our rural people will be able to take advantage of this particular scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: I can tell my hon. friend that they are taking advantage of it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am very glad to know that. In what provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: In practically all the provinces; to a larger degree in Ontario than anywhere else. Perhaps if I tell my hon. friend that in cities with a population of 40,000 and over, the total number of loans in two months was 1,252 out of a total number of loans of nearly 3,200, it will be appreciated that the larger proportion must be in the smaller communities. From a cursory examination of the returns I know that the scheme is spreading out more and more into the rural districts, and we have information that, with respect to those areas, the early spring months, just before work on the land is possible, are going to be the most advantageous time from the standpoint of repairs of farm outbuildings and work on the homes. In that regard it must be remembered that, while I can give the information with respect to cities of 40,000 and over, I cannot at the present time subdivide that further with respect to the balance, because of the fact that we are only just getting the machinery for recording these reports into such shape as to produce the information which I know the committee would want and which I hope to give in great detail next year as a result of the machinery now being set up. But there is a definite interest in the rural areas which is very encouraging.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am very glad to know that. I wonder whether the minister has the figures broken down to show the distribution of the loans as between the provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; I can give that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that might be interesting.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course, always bearing in mind it is only for the first two months.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister give the amounts?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I shall leave off odd dollars and give it down to hundreds, if that will be satisfactory. In Prince Edward Island 31 loans, $10,800; in Nova Scotia 328 loans, $102,300; in New Brunswick 179 loans, $56,500; in Quebec 518 loans, $266,400; in Ontario 1,153 loans, $415,000; in Manitoba 131 loans, $50,200; in Saskatchewan 91 loans, $28,700; in Alberta 281 loans, $121,800; in British Columbia 447 loans, $146,000. My officers point out that it is not fair to regard this list as at all indicative of the progress made, because of the fact that the setting up of the organization in various provinces has not synchronized, and we are only now reviewing two months' experience. Some provinces were rather slower than others in getting fully organized, and of course economic conditions prevailing in certain parts of the country have an effect on the immediate use of the scheme.

Mr. COLDWELL: At another time when the minister discusses this matter in the house it might also be of interest to know the number of applications made and the number granted in the various provinces, if that information can be secured. I am not asking for it now.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know that we have provision to get it.

Mr. COLDWELL: The statement has been made that this is a scheme for home rehabilitation apart from mortgage and other indebtedness, and therefore it would be interesting to see the proportion of grants to applications made in various areas of Canada. However, I am not pressing for that information now; I am just suggesting that it may be of interest at a later date. I was, however, going to add my views in support of the suggestion as to the inclusion of a fair wage clause. It is important that somehow this shall be done, even if it is simply stated on the application form that a fair wage should be paid. I believe it should be obligatory; at any rate on the form of application some attention should be drawn to it. I understood, like the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the minister's remark to mean that probably, if such a suggestion were carried out, it would involve a reduction of wages in some localities. Apparently we misunderstood him.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say anything like that.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I alluded to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

Mr. ROGERS: At any rate that was not my intention. If I said so I should be glad to correct it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably some other members of the house may have the same impression. In that regard, some years ago when I was connected with municipal affairs in Regina, I heard the same suggestion made over and over again, and the bricklayers were the ones who were usually the targets of that particular complaint. I had an opportunity of examining the earnings of some of the best bricklayers in that city for, I think, the year 1928, and to my amazement I found that the total wages these men were making, at $1.35 or rather more per hour, was something less than $1,200 a year. Consequently a rate which, on an hourly basis, looks high is often, on a yearly basis, not very high. I am glad to know that applications are being received from rural sections, for, as the Minister of Finance knows, in many areas in western Canada rural housing is in a most deplorable condition.

Mr. LOCKHART: I want to add a word to what I said the other day when the bill was first presented. I agree with the minister that loans are now being made in the rural districts. I am closely associated with the distribution of building materials and therefore know something whereof I speak. Considerable interest has been manifested on the part both of residents in urban centres and of the rural population, but there seems to be some doubt in the minds of those in the rural sections, more so perhaps than among those in the urban centres, as to the conditions and the qualifications for obtaining this money. I cannot altogether agree with the hon. member for Greenwood in insisting upon the labour to be engaged in order to make use of materials.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. MASSEY: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, I did not say "insist," but urge whenever possible.

Mr. LOCKHART: I beg the hon. member's pardon; possibly I misunderstood him. Houses by the score are being built to-day—this was very noticeable in 1936—by men who are doing as much as possible of the work themselves in order to make their money go as far as possible. I am quite convinced that the amount of the loans which will be outstanding at the end of the first year will probably be very small, as intimated by the minister. But there is just that doubt in the minds of men who are looking for information, and naturally they come to the building material dealer for information. They say that they cannot get quite clearly in their minds the qualifications for obtaining this money, and I am more than pleased to know that the minister is making an effort by radio or otherwise to acquaint the people most definitely with the regulations and the qualifications that are called for. I urge upon him again and upon those in charge of the work of drawing up the instructions which are to be sent out to the heads of the banks and the lending institutions that they take some pains in this matter. Many of our best men in Canada are not particularly versed in the methods of banking institutions; they are not versed in financial practice. If bank managers and others interested will give these men some simple instructions as to how they may obtain three or four or five hundred dollars, for use possibly in the installation of bathroom equipment or something else which they have not had in the past, and if this is carried to the fullest extent in the instructions which are sent out, so that those who have struggled hard to maintain their little homes may be fully informed on the subject, I am sure this bill can be of considerable benefit to the people not only in the cities but in the rural sections, who, I know from experience, are now inquiring as to the cost of material for certain pieces of work.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no doubt this bill can be of considerable advantage to those who are in a position to avail themselves of its provisions. I do not know how many will be able to qualify, how many there are whose signatures would be accepted by banks or lending institutions. Personally, I hope the lending institutions designated under the terms of the bill will be fairly liberal in their interpretation of the provisions of the measure and will not turn down too many applicants. In the first place, the minister ought to inform the committee as to what provision the government itself is making with respect to the loans that will be made by lending institutions.

Mr. DUNNING: We have not yet come to that section.

Mr. HEAPS: If there is a provision covering that question, we can discuss it when we come to it. The minister ought to inform the committee if he can whether the term "lending institution" will be narrowed down to banks and mortgage companies or whether others will be allowed to lend money if they are in a position to do so, and, in the opinion of the Department of Finance, are suitable agencies for the purpose.

Mr. DUNNING: We have not yet come to that, but I may answer the question now. Banks of course qualify; mortgage companies do not. They would not undertake it, and in any case the law with respect to mortgage companies in the various provinces would render it rather difficult to make it a part of the mortgage company's business. I believe we have at the present time approved one company, Heating and Plumbing Finance Limited, which is organized to finance improvements in connection with the heating and plumbing trades. Of course, in entering into an arrangement under this act they must comply with its discount provisions, which, as everyone here knows, are much lower than the normal discount provisions with respect to instalment buying of anything. We are prepared to consider approving as a lending institution any one which is equipped to do the work and will comply with the maximum limitations on discount which we impose. We will look at any one which wants to do this job and judge whether or not that institution is capable of rendering service. If it is, we have no objection to approving it.

Mr. HEAPS: There should be some supervision over the companies that might qualify to lend money or to give out materials under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Naturally.

Mr. HEAPS: We are dealing now with lending institutions.

Mr. DUNNING: No, we have not reached that yet.

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on clause 1.

Mr. GREEN: Both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour have referred to local committees, and apparently there are committees in each province and in the larger cities. Speaking for the city of Vancouver, I know there is a thoroughly responsible committee there. I believe all these committees are serving without remuneration, but there is not a word in this bill to indicate what the powers and the duties of these committees are. Last year, when we were dealing with the veterans' assistance commission, a section was inserted setting out the powers and duties of the honorary local committees. There should be a section in this bill covering the duties of the local committees and also providing for their expenses. I believe they will have a paid secretary in each city, and no doubt office rent and similar expenses.

Mr. DUNNING: They are paying that themselves.

Mr. GREEN: Well, there is no mention of these committees in this bill. This is not fair to these responsible citizens, who are giving of their time and energy to make this plan a success.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Would an applicant for a loan be limited to one house? I know people who a few years ago built perhaps five or six houses in a community, and as times recently have not been so good these houses have become to some extent dilapidated, owing perhaps to reduced rents. Under this scheme could an applicant apply for loans on five or six houses?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Is there any provision whereby the rent will not more than compensate the interest that is going to be added?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not understand my hon. friends' last question. As to whether more than one house owned by the same owner can come within the provisions of the plan, I answer yes. There is nothing in the bill relating to rent. That depends upon the individual case. But one owner can borrow with respect to more than one house.

Mr. GREEN: Might I have an answer to my question?

Mr. ROGERS: I intended to answer at the first opportunity. There is no provision in the bill itself for advisory committees, because the entire organization, which includes provincial committees and local advisory committees, has been set up through the National Employment Commission and is upon an entirely voluntary basis. There seems to me very much to be said in favour of leaving that type of organization very largely to the guidance of experience. It would probably tend to restrict rather than to encourage the work of the committees if their duties were definitely set forth in the bill. The members serve voluntarily; the organization is under the National Employment Commission, and I have in my hand a folder published by the commission setting out useful suggestions for local advisory committees, so that these committees are not left entirely without guidance. But it seems wise to leave them on a voluntary basis, rather than to give them statutory form.

Mr. GREEN: But the committees under the veterans' assistance commission also serve without remuneration and are also working with the National Employment Commission. It is to be hoped that this National Employment Commission will evolve many different schemes. Are we to have five or ten or fifteen different committees in a city, without any legislative definition of their powers or duties? I suggest that it is impracticable to have them working without some definition by parliament of what they are supposed to do; it will only lead to confusion.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it desirable that there should be a certain amount of government supervision of construction or repairs in connection with all buildings. In the first place this is desirable because I have a strong feeling that if building or repairs become active we are likely to find an increase in the price of materials. It would not be the first time this has happened. Particularly is this true in the case of plumbing supplies, which are practically controlled by a monopoly. And the minister pointed out that he had complaints from some quarters that labour costs were too high. Have the government given some consideration to the cost of building supplies? There was an inquiry a few years ago, and I believe it was found that in some cases costs had risen to far in excess of what they should be. The whole purpose of the scheme may be defeated if the cost of building materials jumps too far beyond what it should be. For that reason at least I should like to see some supervision of a direct sort by the government. There should be some committee of either the Department of Finance or the Department of Labour or even the National Employment Commission to see that prices of building materials do not rise as soon as building becomes active.

Second, the government should also see that the maximum rate of 3½ per cent, which may be about 6 per cent in fact, is not exceeded by the lending organizations. For these reasons I would impress upon the minister that his or some other department should exercise supervision over the operation of this plan to make it a success, for in my judgment the administration of the measure will be one of the most important features. Unless there is proper administration the whole thing may fall to the ground.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

COPYRIGHT AMENDMENT ACT, 1931

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 13, to amend the Copyright Amendment Act, 1931.

Mr. NEILL: Explain.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Speaker, I am confident that if hon. members would refer to the Canada Gazette of January 2, they would be somewhat bewildered by the ambiguous tariffs under which the Canadian Performing Right Society operates. I am not at all concerned about the tariffs and fees they collect from theatres or broadcasting stations, because those institutions are well able to look after themselves. But the continuous complaints from small music users in the interior of British Columbia, from such places as lodge halls, orchestras, skating rinks, stores and the like, together with the unjust fees the society seeks to collect, certainly suggests that there should be some remedy for the existing situation.

The society in coming into a community attempts to collect a minimum of $30. If it cannot get the $30, it will come back next day and indicate its willingness to take $20. If it cannot get $20, it will take $10. The purpose seems to be to get money some way. It is not a satisfactory way, because most of its collections are induced by threats. At the last session of parliament we had an extended review of the set-up of the Canadian Performing Right Society. Hon. members will recall that there was an American Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers, and an English society with which were affiliated various associations in the different European countries. Those societies are about fifty per cent publishers. The publishers are the people who acquire the copyrights on various pieces of music, and are those who profit chiefly by such fees as can be collected.

There are about twelve hundred members in the American societies and an equal number in the English and affiliated societies.

The directors of the two societies apparently saw a fertile field in Canada for the collection of money, and as a result in 1925 the Canadian Performing Right Society was incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act. It had a capital set-up of 10,000 no-par-value shares. To show that there was very little Canadian interest in the matter, may I say that only seven of the 10,000 were retained in Canada as qualifying shares.

Prior to the time of Judge Parker's investigation in 1935, there were no Canadian authors or composers participating in or benefiting by the collections. This was the cause of some criticism. On the floor of this house some six months later it was revealed that there were only seven Canadian authors and composers. The directors of the American and English societies simply assigned to the new Canadian Performing Right Society copyrights to between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 pieces of music. One might say that that is the stock-in-trade of the Canadian Performing Right Society. It is on these alleged copyrights that they proceed to collect fees from users of music throughout the dominion.

Who is there in the house who can say that the American and English companies had title to the copyrighted music transferred to Canada. Nobody knows whether they had title or not. They simply come in and tell the government that they have title to between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 pieces of music, and under the statute they are authorized to issue licences and to collect fees in compensation for the use of the music. They have proceeded to collect their fees in a most arbitrary fashion, largely by threats. A bill may be presented to an applicant, and in the event of the applicant refusing to pay, or in the event of his using a piece of music on which they contend they have a copyright, legal action is suggested.

At present the Canadian Performing Right Society is the only company exercising the right to issue licences and to collect fees in Canada. But one cannot say how many more concerns may come in and claim the same right, provided they can show title to certain pieces of music. I do not think it would be difficult for them to show just as good title as the present Canadian Performing Right Society is able to show

My point is that there is nothing to indicate that the society which collects the fees does have actual possession of or actual right to the copyrights in question, and there has never been any particular effort to make them prove their right. Under the statute they are compelled to register their titles in the copyright office. Early in the period of their business operations when they were depositing between two and three million titles in the copyright office, they simply deposited whole catalogues showing various pieces of music. As recently as last year they have been known to attempt to collect fees on music to which they had absolutely no right or title. If this is done in one case it is fair to assume that it is done in others. Their fees until the appointment of the appeal board have certainly been varied, and subject to all sorts of combinations.

Since 1931, when they first attempted to collect fees they have filed no less than nine separate tariffs, each one of which had a tendency to increase rather than to reduce. The joker in the present tariffs is that everything is based upon a minimum and from the minimum there may be gradual increases by calculations and conditions until a maximum, the certainty of which can never be established, is reached. Between the minimum and the maximum they are on safe ground. It would appear, therefore, that the Canadian Performing Right Society is a very clear example of "heads I win, tails you lose."

Thus far they say they have deposited in the copyright office about 200,000 titles. The purpose of the amendment is to require the society in its collections to give to every user of music a list of the titles to which it claims ownership or upon which it claims authority to collect fees. That list should be certified by the Secretary of State. The excuse is made that this would involve an expenditure of $10,000 for printing. Let us assume that such is the case; that would simply be a capital expenditure on the part of a firm doing a very profitable business. This concern, under the 1937 tariff, collects $70,000 from the broadcasting stations of this dominion. Our own Canadian Broadcasting Corporation contributes $15,000 of this $70,000. Is there anyone in business who has not to make some capital expenditure? A lawyer must buy his books, his office fixtures and so on, and a merchant must put up his shelving and counters, buy his stock and do his advertising. Those are capital expenditures which must be made. Why should not this performing right society expend $10,000 or $20,000 in order that the public may be protected?

We all admit the principle that an author or composer should be protected, that his rights should be secured, but the public generally is also entitled to protection. In addition to the $70,000 contributed by the broadcasting stations, the theatres of Canada pay $60,000 annually as fees to this society. Then to this total must be added the numerous minimum fees paid by stores, skating rinks and other places of amusement. I ask hon. members if it is unreasonable to require that this performing right society shall give to every applicant for a licence a list of the music to which it claims to have the copyright and for which it claims authority to collect a fee? Is there any hon. member willing to hand out $30 in payment of a bill without knowing what it covers? Why should not the same principle apply to the payment of licence fees?

I am going to ask this house to give earnest and sympathetic consideration to these amendments which concern the protection of the public. When these people go out to collect licence fees they should be required to satisfy the applicant for a licence that they have ownership in that which they offer for sale. It is unfortunate that this whole matter is not of a more material nature. There is no reason why this society should not be paying a sales tax. I suppose we can hardly apply a sales tax to music, but the fact is that they make their money far more easily than the average merchant or professional man. There is no reason why they should not pay for the privileges they enjoy in this dominion.

They do not stop to consider for one moment how much of a drain the payment of a licence will be upon the resources of an applicant. If the applicant refuses to pay, he is told that they will bring action against him. I commend the minister for having set up an appeal board. This board is doing the best it can under the circumstances to carry out the provisions of the act. However, it is serving simply as a stop-gap in preventing the Canadian Performing Right Society from changing its tariffs two or three times a year.

The second amendment deals with the licence fees charged the smaller users of radios and an exemption is asked for these users. As I said before, under the 1937 tariff the broadcasting stations paid a total of $70,000, of which $15,000 was contributed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In addition to the broadcasting stations there are the little fellows, the skating rinks, the lodge halls, the hotels, the restaurants and so on that use radios for some purpose or other. We may have a restaurant with four or five tables on either side of an aisle with a little radio to provide music for the guests. Along comes a representative of the Canadian Performing Right Society who charges this man $5 as a minimum fee. He is then told he must make continuous and voluminous reports as to what music is played, how many hours per day and how many days per week the different pieces are played. There are more reports to be made to this society than are necessary in making income tax returns to dominion, provincial and municipal governments. These small users of radios claim that they have paid for their radios, that they have paid the dominion government a fee of $2, and they want to know what use their radios will be if they cannot get music from the broadcasting stations without additional expense. The minimum fee is $5, with increases up to a maximum beyond all reason.

I appeal again to hon. members to give sympathetic consideration to this bill. The amendments suggested therein affect every constituency in the dominion, no matter how large or how small it may be. I could not possibly read these amendments myself, so I ask the Clerk to be good enough to read them in order that the house may have a clear conception of their meaning.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) upon the sincerity of his purpose and upon the constant study he has given to copyright matters. The hon. member has participated in every debate which we have had on this question during a number of years, and has shown considerable moderation in the presentation of his views, which I must say I cannot altogether share. I hesitate to recommend the adoption of this bill. Perhaps I can put the position more clearly by saying that I cannot recommend its acceptance as I do not consider this to be the opportune moment to offer such amendments. The amendments themselves are not acceptable.

Last year the Copyright Act was amended very materially. All matters of copyright which concerned the Canadian Performing Right Society were inquired into by Judge Parker during 1935. His report was received after an exhaustive study had been made of the situation. The government last year brought down amendments to give effect to that report, and the amendments covered very fully the recommendations which were made by Judge Parker. Those amendments were submitted to the house and were adopted both in this house and in the other chamber. The bill went before a committee of the senate, and I remember that over there the senators recommended that a fair trial be given to the recommendations made by Judge Parker; that we should let time prove to what extent they were desirable. I must repeat that both points which have been made by my hon. friend to-night and which are covered by his bill were very fully covered in the report of Judge Parker, and in both cases his conclusions were quite different from those at which my hon. friend has arrived.

As the house will remember, the bill that was put through last year provided for the appointment of an appeal board to which these question of the performing rights of musical compositions could be referred. The bill provided that the fees of the performing right society should be filed by the month of November, and if any objection were taken to them, those objections were to be referred to an appeal board. The appeal board, which was set up in December, is composed of Mr. Justice Maclean, a judge of the exchequer court, the under-secretary of state, Mr. Coleman, and a lawyer from the Department of Justice, Mr. Fontaine. The fees of the performing right society were published in the Canada Gazette of November 7; the board heard the objections to them and listened to representations from both sides, and on January 2 the Canada Gazette published the revised tariffs which are to prevail during the year 1937.

I appeal to the house: After both chambers have approved the bill which provides for this tribunal to hear both sides and to act as arbitrators in the matter, and after the fees have already been arbitrated and are now officially in force for the year 1937, is it reasonable, only one month after this is done, to ask the House of Commons to amend the act further and to change the whole situation by act of parliament? I do not think it is. I think the least we can do is to let things go along as they stand and to watch the results of that arbitration, which was a compromise effort to bring together the representatives of the performers on the one side, and of the society, representing the composers, on the other.

I know there is in this house quite a considerable body of opinion that even as now existing the performing rights of the Canadian Performing Right Society are exacting. I say that purposely for, because of my own views and feelings on the matter and because of a desire for good will of the government, I resent very much the stand taken during last session by societies of authors and composers who cursed the government and who directed against the member of the government in charge of this bill a certain literature which was very unworthy and very unjust, when I do stand here in the honesty of my purpose to reach a compromise in this matter that will be fair to the composers, on the one hand, and to the performers and the public on the other.

With the discussion which took place last year,—and I must say in all fairness that it did take place somewhat late in the session and therefore perhaps did not afford the fullest expression of views from all corners of the house—I think the authors and composers must have felt that with the bill we did propose we were standing as a protection between them and the feelings of quite a number of hon. members representing the public in this country. But the house did give its confidence to the government; as I said, the bill was before a committee of the senate, and the senate took the attitude that it was worth while to try this experiment of having an arbitration exercised in this matter by the tribunal which I have just described.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that it is not opportune, now that these tariffs have been in force for only a few weeks, to ask the house further to amend the Copyright Act and to throw overboard all that we did last year.

I also wish to say that notwithstanding that general view of the question, I cannot accept, at least for the present, either of the amendments which my hon. friend proposes in his bill. In the first section of his bill my hon. friend suggests that the performing right society should not only file a copy of its works with the department of the Secretary of State, but also, when a licence is applied for, furnish to each applicant a complete list of all the works so filed. That, at first sight, may appear to be a fair demand, but it is absolutely in contradiction to the very spirit of copyright. When a copyright is filed with us or when a patent is applied for or when a trade mark is asked for, it is never stipulated that the owner of that copyright or patent or trade mark must supply the public with a description or a list of that thing, whatever it may be. Such a procedure, moreover, would not in the least apply in this specific case because here we are dealing with a society which controls the performances of practically all musical works of composers of the different countries of the world. It is because the society is of that kind that we maintained that we could control its prices notwithstanding the convention of Rome and the undertaking there given by Canada together with other countries. We have to deal with a very special case. We have to deal with a necessary monopoly, if I may put it in that way, and that is why we believe we are justified in having established a control of its tariffs. That is also a reason why we should not exact from the society, not merely the filing of all its musical compositions with the Department of the Secretary of State, but what my hon. friend further asks for, namely, that whenever a licence is applied for the society should furnish a complete list of its musical compositions. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the number of these compositions runs into a million, and the senate last year amended the bill to make it read that only musical pieces in current use should be filed with my department. So, least of all, should my hon. friend ask that the act should be amended in such a way as to force that society to supply a complete list of its works to the public. I insist also that this is not practical. Inasmuch as the society collects a licence fee which covers all musical compositions, there is no practical use in any member of the public having a complete list because the licence covers them all. Dealing with that particular point, I might add that Judge Parker was very clear in his report that the filing of such a list was not practicable. Let me quote from his report at page 33 on the filing of lists. The judge said:

> When it is shown by program analysis that of the 25,982 musical numbers performed in Canada in 1934 only 4,841 numbers were controlled by Performing Right Society and 4,370 numbers were controlled by all other European Societies, it seems absurd and significant that Canadian Performing Right Society should waste time and money on filing a list of the works that possibly never have been and never may be performed in Canada.

That is the statement made by the judge who inquired very fully into this situation. Therefore I say that it is neither practicable nor justifiable to ask from that society not only the filing of their lists with the department of the Secretary of State but the supplying of those lists—which would be voluminous and very costly—to all applicants for licences.

As to the second section of the bill of my hon. friend, I shall be very frank about it and say that some day may come when his wish will seem acceptable and when it will appear that we have reached the point which is dealt with in that section. But again I say I do not think it would be advisable to accept that amendment now. If the hon. member will refer to the terms of the convention of Rome, 1928, which is the amended convention of that of Berne, he will find that in article 13 this very point is covered. Let me read article 13 of the convention of Rome:

> The authors of musical works shall have the exclusive right of authorizing (1) the adaptation of those works to instruments which can reproduce them mechanically; and (2) the public performance of the said works by means of these instruments.

I again point out No. 2, "The public performance of the said works by means of these instruments." This means the performance of such works by a corporation or a radio operating in a public place, and that is exactly what is covered by what my hon. friend wants his amendment to strike out from our Copyright Act. The matter was dealt with by Judge Parker in his report, and if my hon. friend refers to it he will find that under different titles—page 34, concerning the broadcasting tariff; page 40, the hotel tariff; page 42, the parks, small fairs and community halls tariff; and page 43, restaurants, skating rinks, et cetera— Judge Parker has recommended a lower minimum than the one which was requested by the society. He has maintained the principle that these small places should pay at least a minimum licence fee, and that is what has been maintained by the appeal board, as will be seen if anybody refers to the tariff filed and published in the Canada Gazette of January 2.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we should avoid bringing in this year further amendments to the Copyright Act, and should especially avoid these amendments, because they have been dealt with by the judge, by the house, by the senate and by the appeal board, and in every case a decision has been arrived at which is totally different from the one that is proposed in this bill.

In conclusion I may say I know that the Copyright Act, like any other act, is perfectible, and I know by my own experience with these matters—and it has not been very pleasant all the time—that there exists a great difference of view in this country about copyright. At the same time I believe we have gone as far as possible to meet the desires of the public and to curb the activities of the Canadian Performing Right Society, and by going further at present we would risk ignoring the rights of the owners themselves, who after all also deserve consideration.

As I say, the new tariff has been in force for only one month; the appeal court sat about five or six weeks ago, and it would be a great mistake not to allow several months to pass and permit this new experiment, this new arbitration, to work itself for the time being. Therefore, while not compromising any future consideration that we may have of the act, I cannot see my way clear to accepting the bill as it is, and I shall have to recommend to the house not to pass its second reading.

May I add that there should have been an international conference in Brussels last fall. For several reasons it unfortunately did not take place, but it is contemplated that the various nations which were parties to the conventions of Berne and Rome will meet either this fall or perhaps in the spring of 1938. This, I believe, is a further reason why we should not disturb the amendments that we have brought to the act in the course of the last session.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I am sorry that the minister has announced his intention of declaring "thumbs down" on this bill, and particularly so at this stage, before he allowed the ordinary members of the house, other than the introducer, any opportunity to express their views. It is customary, I think, to hear what may be said by the various members and for the government, ostensibly at least, to sum up the situation and announce their decision. In this case the decision has been given first. Nevertheless I feel impelled by the interests that my constituents and I have in this matter to support the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), and I congratulate him upon the attitude he has taken and the very able manner in which he has expressed himself.

Dealing with the remarks of the minister, I believe he took a somewhat different view of the bill from that which is justified by its terms. The minister said or suggested that the hon. member was trying to change the whole set-up of the radio act. I do not think a consideration of the bill bears out that statement. There is no suggestion of material change, and certainly there is no suggestion and no attempt to change the arbitration features of it which were in the good act which the minister introduced last year, and which were a very good thing indeed. The bill does not in any way interfere with them.

The minister talks about the amendments not being opportune, and says that we are proposing to amend a bill which was introduced or passed only last year. It is always opportune to correct a grievance or an error, and I think the history of parliamentary practice and of legislation will show that it is quite a common thing to amend an act a year after it has been passed because experience has shown a need for amendment. I imagine that was the motive of the hon. member for Kootenay West in bringing in this bill. My personal complaint would rather be, not altogether as to the charges that have been proposed there, but as to the method of computing them, and I shall deal with that a little later on.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, as he stated, asks two things. He suggests that the company should give out a list of all articles or songs or music over which they claim the exclusive control. I do not think that is unreasonable. When the agent of the company comes around to these small people and says "I want to collect so much from you," and the man says, "What is it for?" and the agent says, "Why, you are using or you are going to use articles or music of which we have the sole control," I do not think it is unreasonable for the man to say, "Well, show me your authority or show me your ownership."

As regards the alleged enormous cost of printing these titles, I suppose this would be only the titles of these various songs or pieces of music. It is surely not unreasonable to suppose that this company, who claim that they own them and have obtained the exclusive copyright in them or had it assigned to them, have a list of what they possess, and if they have it, the actual cost of printing it would be very small indeed. They claim that they have had this copyright assigned to them in many cases, I think, and that they collect these charges and allocate them or at least a portion of them to the authors. How are they going to know where the authors are, or who they are, or what they shall allocate to them if they have not a list? I do not think the company themselves would dare to say that they have not a complete list of all the articles over which they have jurisdiction, and if that is so, the cost of reprinting the list would be trivial. Otherwise it leaves the door open for the company to come forward and make a claim to ownership of articles and music to which they have no right, and we are utterly helpless and in their hands and are obliged to pay up, in total ignorance as to whether they have the least elemental right to some of the things over which they claim jurisdiction. Surely it ought to be open to any man running some small place such as a restaurant to say, "I will not use any of the music over which you claim to have jurisdiction, any music to which you claim sole rights, but you tell me exactly what those are and I will make use of the others." But, no. The agent simply comes along and says, "We claim jurisdiction over practically everything that is printed," and the man has to pay.

The bill proposes to do away with charges for the use of radios or gramophones in certain hotels, public halls and stores, but it does not apply to theatres or other such places; it is only the smaller halls, restaurants, stores and so on. As the hon. member who introduced this bill points out, the radio broadcasting stations pay $70,000 to this copyright society—some people would call it a racketeering society. This is supposed to cover compensation for private and domestic use only.

The purpose of the bill is to make it cover also the use of music in small stores or halls, hotels, skating rinks and the like.

I would call attention to the method by which these charges are computed and ask hon. members whether they think it reasonable or conducive to the ordinary running of a business. I am not referring now to the big departmental houses that can afford to employ lawyers, statisticians and mathematicians to calculate the fees; I am referring to the man who runs a small business such as a hotel, a pool-room, a Greek restaurant, or a barber shop. One of these agents will come along and, as the hon. member has said, use strong-arm methods. He will say, "We want to collect $18 from you"; the pool-room man will reply that only a short time ago he paid $25, and he will ask what the extra charge is for. The agent replies, "Never mind what it is for; these are the charges; you can calculate them for yourself, and if you don't pay up you will be prosecuted," and he immediately produces a list of successful prosecutions. They have always been successful in their prosecutions, because in days gone by they had an iron-clad law behind them, and they would threaten—the hon. member for Kootenay West was justified in using that word—about what would be done if the victim did not pay up at once. This small man is perhaps not too familiar with the English language, or too well educated, even if he should happen to be of British birth; how then is he to cope with a situation such as this?

I propose to read to the house the method by which the charge is arrived at. This is in connection with halls, restaurants, skating rinks and stores, and it gives the fees "on maximum basis," whatever that may be. On that basis the rates are so much. These are not maximum charges but charges on maximum basis, and further on it deals with charges "on actual basis." There is always a minimum fee to begin with. What I shall read consists of 144 words and it is all one sentence. There are only a few commas in it and I shall indicate them, so that I may not be accused of trying to make it out to be worse than it is. After I have read it through, if any hon. member can assure me that he understands it I shall sit down and make no further objection to this racket. The clause reads:

> The rate is one and one-half cents for each "performer hour" for a licence covering the maximum number of "performer hours," the maximum of "performer hours" being determined by multiplying the maximum number of performers (including musicians, orchestra leader and vocalists) that may be employed at any time during the licence year by the maximum number of hours of all or any musical performance during which is desired a licence to perform in any day during the licence year wholly or in part from the society's repertoire, by the maximum number of days for which a licence is desired in any week in the licence year, by the same number as the number of weeks occurring between the opening and closing dates of the period of time within which musical performances may take place, but in no case by a number less than thirteen (weeks).

Does anyone know what figure is charged there? Some suspicion of this question seems to have dawned on the man who drafted it because he goes on to say what the actual basis is. What I have just read is the maximum basis, but on actual basis the rate is as follows:

> The rate is three cents for each "performer hour" for a licence covering all actual hours of musical performance during the licence year.
> A payment is required on account and in advance equal to the amount due at the above rate on the total "performer hours" as estimated by the applicant, the advance payment to be not less than $5.
> The licensee is required to report, at the end of the licence year or of each operating season within the licence year, the actual number of "performer hours" during such period, giving dates and times of all musical performances and the number of performers engaged thereat, the licensee at such times to make payment of any balance due.

Next we come to hotels:

> The fee payable is determined as follows:
> (1) An initial payment is required annually in advance in an amount calculated at the rate of 10 cents per room charged on the total room capacity of the hotel, the minimum initial payment being $15.
> (2) At the end of each quarter an additional payment is required in an amount determined by multiplying the number of rooms in the hotel by the units of performance, by the number of months within which music is at times performed, by the rate (1 cent or less).

This is not quite clear and so the draftsman undertakes to explain it:

> The rate is determined as follows:
> If the hotel's average daily occupancy in the months within which music is at times performed is 80 per cent or over, the rate is 1 cent. If occupancy falls below 80 per cent, the rate is 1 cent less a deduction of 2 per cent thereof for each 1 per cent that occupancy falls below 80 per cent.

This is as clear as mud; the barman or the man who cleans boots could figure it out.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What is the hon. member quoting from? Has it been approved by the department?

Mr. NEILL: Yes; it is from the Canada Gazette of January 2.

An hon. MEMBER: One can hardly believe it.

Mr. NEILL: But the worst is yet to come. Let us see what "units of performance" are:

	Units
Music at lunch time (12 noon to 2 p.m.)	2
Music at tea time (2 p.m. to 5 p.m.)	2
Music at dinner time (5 p.m. to 8 p.m.)	2

And so on. Payments are made on as high as ten units. The following example is given:

An hotel having 250 rooms—initial payment	$25
On 4 units of performance during only 2 months of the quarter, the average daily occupancy being 70 per cent during the 2 months—additional quarterly fee (250 x 4 x 2 x ·8 cents)	$16

It works out that it is $16. I would rather pay the $16 than go through the calculation.

That, then, is what one would call the fundamental charge, then there are extras. If a hotel has a radio in a public room there is an extra charge for the number of bedrooms. Then there is a charge for an occasional entertainment, or for a single entertainment. If that does not lend itself to unhindered extortion I do not know what does. Of course it is useless to argue, because the minister has given his ultimatum. I can only say that a great many people in Canada think of this society as the hon. member for Kootenay West and I do, that it is a racket.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I add a word in regard to the interpretation of this law? It has been my experience to follow very closely the application of this act to benevolent societies and fraternal and friendly organizations. I shall cite a particular instance, relating to a building in which I am interested as chairman of the trustee board. The inspector of the society attended a gathering there as a detective and then wrote a letter stating definitely that the program included four items subject to fees. When a request was sent in to get a list of the protected numbers, the answer came back from the society that they did not furnish lists. I contend that fraternal organizations which during the past five years have been making an earnest effort to raise funds to take care of less fortunate members should at least have the protection of being provided with a list of numbers which they may not play unless they pay a licence fee. I know many hon. members have had experiences similar to mine in this matter. Fraternal organizations, church societies and similar groups, which have been trying to raise money to distribute to less fortunate people, find themselves compelled to pay these fees. The society should at least be required to provide a list of its protected works; then it would be easy for small groups, where the orchestra may consist of only a piano and two other instruments, to avoid playing numbers licensed by this society. These small organizations, carrying on useful social and benevolent and fraternal work in this country, should have that protection.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

PROVISION TO ENCOURAGE REPAIRS OF RURAL AND URBAN DWELLINGS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. POULIOT: Are the regulations for the guidance of the officials of the Department of Finance or of the lending institutions?

Mr. DUNNING: Of the Department of Finance.

Mr. POULIOT: But are there any loans which would come to the department for approval, or will the department approve the loans which will be made by the institutions? If John desires to borrow a thousand dollars for repairs, would he go to the Department of Finance or to the bank?

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. DUNNING: To the bank.

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore most of the regulations are for the guidance of the banks which lend money to private individuals. So far as I can understand, the department guarantees part of the possible losses made by the lending institutions. I believe the minister agrees with that. What statute under his department has control of this lending business? I believe there is a Mr. Nicolls. Are there others besides Mr. Nicolls, who look after this matter?

Mr. DUNNING: There is a small staff in connection with the housing act, which is not this bill, which is being used in connection with the home improvement plan. Under the regulations as at present existing, lending institutions making loans are required to send to the department fortnightly all the applications which they have received in order that they may be checked to ensure that the lending institutions are complying with the conditions of the regulations so that they may come under the guarantee of fifteen per cent contemplated by the legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: Supposing Joe wants to borrow some money; he will go direct to the bank and not to the department?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: The department has a check only on loans made and does not approve or disapprove them when they are being made?

Mr. DUNNING: When an application reaches the department, if it is apparent that it does not fall within the scope of the legislation, if for any reason the purpose of the loan is not covered by the measure, the lending institution will be advised that the guarantee of the government will not apply to that particular loan. It is necessary for the department to be certain that loans are being properly made. Before a guarantee can be given, the department must assure itself that a loan is a bona fide one within the terms of the legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: When a bank makes a loan which is not in accordance with the departmental regulations, such a loan would be made at the bank's risk?

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Mr. POULIOT: It would be made by the bank before being approved by the department. The department could refuse to approve a loan and no guarantee would be given on such a loan?

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite correct. Loans are reported to the department after they are made. The department examines the forms provided for the purpose in order to see that the loans have been made under the conditions prescribed by the regulations and the act. If, in the opinion of the department, a loan does not come within that category, the bank or lending institution will be in the position of having made a loan without having a government guarantee with respect to it.

Mr. POULIOT: Supposing someone asks for a loan and is refused; can he go to his member to ask for a recommendation that such loan be made?

Mr. DUNNING: I must point out that the discretion with respect to the credit of the individual applying for a loan is with the lending institutions. We have attempted to eliminate a great deal of the red tape associated with small loans and have prescribed the limit of discount which may be charged. There must be no endorser or other collateral asked for; it must be a loan upon the personal credit of the individual. We do not take any steps to influence a bank to lend to one man or to another; the bank must be the judge of the individual's credit standing. I know of nothing which would be a surer way of involving the full guarantee of the dominion than to create a situation whereby pressure could be brought to bear upon the lending institution to make loans in particular cases. I think that would be very bad for the plan. The criticism with respect to this might be that the banks may not be reasonably sympathetic. I may point out that committees are to be formed in local communities all over Canada. If, because of some technicality, a bank is unable to grant a loan, it will be the duty of the committee to investigate the case and, if possible, to adjust the technicalities in order that the loan may be made.

I cannot make it too clear that the lending institution must be the judge of the character of the applicant. We cannot pretend to set up, in connection with the hundreds of thousands of loans which we hope and believe will be made under this law, machinery whereby the government could insist upon a loan being made to John Jones or William Smith. Certainly if a complaint is received by the department that a branch of a bank is adopting an arbitrary attitude or is unwilling to proceed in accordance with the legislation, the department will take up the matter and ask for an explanation as to why cooperation is not forthcoming from this branch as it is from others. I think to ask the department to interfere with respect to particular cases, to insist upon a loan being granted to a particular individual, would defeat one of the major purposes of the bill. I may say I have had no complaint in that regard during the period which has elapsed since the plan has been in force.

Mr. POULIOT: I was not intending to criticize the banks; they lend the money and they must take the greater risk. I wanted to have it made clear to the committee that these loans were to be made without any political consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite.

Mr. POULIOT: That is what I wanted to make clear. Without abusing the generosity of the hon. gentleman, I should like to ask him the fundamental difference between this legislation and the housing act. Also, what salary is paid to Mr. Nicolls and to his assistants in the Department of Finance?

Mr. DUNNING: I think I might be excused from attempting to answer the first question. Obviously the housing act and the bill now before the committee were each designed for entirely different purposes. They have no relation whatsoever to each other. The official in charge receives a salary of $4,800, and there are two other assistants in that branch of the department.

Mr. POULIOT: According to what the minister has said, the work performed by Mr. Nicolls is not that of an architect; he is doing the work of a checker.

Mr. DUNNING: No. Mr. Nicolls is a qualified architect and a qualified architect is required in connection with the administration of the housing act. There are many aspects of this legislation which make the technical knowledge of an architect quite useful. Mr. Nicolls was appointed under the housing act, and when this work came along, instead of other officials being appointed, Mr. Nicolls was put in charge with one additional member being added to his staff. At the present time three people, including Mr. Nicolls, are carrying on this work. As to whether it will be necessary to expand the staff by the appointment of checkers and that sort of thing will depend upon our future experience.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it possible to get plans from Mr. Nicolls, the architect?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to confuse two things. We are discussing section 2 of this bill. Under the general housing act I shall be very glad to give information on any particular. As a matter of fact, the housing administration of the Department of Finance has been and is supplying to-day literally hundreds of modern plans for use.

Mr. MacNICOL: Free of charge?

Mr. DUNNING: It is 25 or 50 cents for a booklet containing a number of plans. I am not too positive, but I shall see that my hon. friend gets the information. It is just a nominal charge. The demand for these plans has been very great indeed.

Mr. HEAPS: Just before the dinner hour recess I was suggesting that if at all feasible a certain amount of supervision should be exercised over the loans made under the provisions of this bill. I know it would be rather difficult to have supervision exercised by a central authority when loans are being made throughout the dominion, but I believe that in order to assure the proper and efficient working of this bill something along that line ought to be done.

Mr. DUNNING: To supervise what?

Mr. HEAPS? To see that the money is properly spent.

Mr. DUNNING: Properly spent?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes, and that there is nothing wrong so far as the lending of the money is concerned, that more is not being charged by certain corporations which shall be designated as lending corporations. Certain organizations might be lending corporations and be supplying materials too, and they should not be allowed to overcharge their customers for the materials used. All these abuses are liable to creep into work of this kind. A person goes to the bank and says: I want a loan of $500 or $1,000 to repair certain property. What is there beyond that which the bank or anybody else knows how the money is going to be utilized? I wonder whether there is not some form of supervision that could be exercised by say, local authorities. Is any power granted to them to exercise a certain amount of supervision, or is a person who is seeking to borrow money compelled to bring in some form of document to show how the money is going to be used? I make this suggestion because in the past I have had a little experience in housing operations, and I know something of how money has been spent, even squandered at times, after it has been lent. I know the difficulty which provincial governments have to-day in repaying money that was borrowed under the housing act of 1919 just because of lack of supervision at that time. This time I hope, whether it is a federal housing act or an act for the purposes of rehabilitation, that proper supervision will be exercised to see that the money is spent properly and to the advantage of the individual concerned and the country as a whole.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, in the discussion before the dinner recess the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) asked a question of the minister relative to what was a home, and he furnished the reply that in the rural areas a home included any barns and outbuildings of various kinds. It seems to me that it would be wise in section 2 to include a definition of what a home is under this legislation. The minister understands, and his law officers understand, but the local bank may not understand and this may cause difficulty and delay, whereas if there was a definition in the bill that delay might be obviated. I would suggest that the minister consider including a fifth definition under paragraph (e) of what is a home under this measure.

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact, in our first draft of the legislation we attempted to arrive at more specific definitions, but as the work went on for the first two months the differences which arose between localities caused us constantly to consider widening the definition of a home. If my hon. friend will look forward to section 8, paragraph (e), he will find that provision is made for regulations in regard to the definition of rural and urban homes:

> "Rural and urban homes," with power to include in such expression all such property as may reasonably be considered as part of a rural or urban home.

I thought that the committee might reasonably want to have that more closely defined, but I frankly confess that I had some difficulty with regard to it in actual operation. For instance, there had to be a regulation with regard to new houses that a man had built but had not quite finished. Should we deal with those? There had also to be regulations with respect to the inclusion of certain buildings with a farm house. Shall a barn or a garage be included? Shall a summer cottage be eligible? Then, with regard to combined stores and dwellings, we had to evolve a regulation to provide that the plan would not be abused by being used for commercial rather than dwelling purposes. That is a matter of some difficulty, as my hon. friend will understand. Tourist cabins—there was a thorny question.

Mr. MASSEY: A temporary home.

Mr. DUNNING: I could go on over a couple of pages instancing the degrees of variation which arise, and which caused me finally to decide to recommend to the committee that we be given power by regulation to make definitions subject to that qualification I have just quoted, "which may reasonably be considered as part of a rural or urban home." On consideration I felt that that was the best solution.

With respect to the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), I am afraid we are rather at cross-purposes. He speaks of the necessity for supervision in order to see that the money is spent for the purpose for which it is loaned. Well, Mr. Chairman, if this plan is to succeed in its major objective, which is to create work by encouraging people to do hundreds of thousands of small jobs, effectively to follow the money to its ultimate spending by the individual who borrows it in small amounts is virtually impossible, and I believe it would be regarded by borrowers generally of small sums of from one to three hundred dollars as more of what is generally described as governmental red tape. Only this afternoon I had a criticism from a member about what? About the information demanded of a man before he could get a loan. You see, we get it coming and going. In the one case we have not enough supervision, and in the other the criticism is that we have too much. I would point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North, who I know is desirous of assisting, not of blocking, the plan, that the application for a home improvement loan must be made on a form approved by the department, and it is the only form the use of which properly filled out will qualify the lending institution to get the government guarantee with respect to the amount loaned in the particular case. That form asks for a complete description of the repairs intended, along with much other information—my hon. friend criticized the amount of information asked for—and it winds up by saying—this is the borrower authorizing the lender:

> I authorize you to obtain such information as you may require concerning the above statement, and agree that it shall remain your property whether or not my note is finally accepted by you. I certify that if the loan is granted to me the entire proceeds will be used exclusively in payment for alterations, repairs and/or improvements on the property described above. I hereby affirm that the foregoing information is true and correct.

That is what the borrower says. When this form goes to the department, there is a certificate from the manager of the branch bank advancing the money:

> I certify that this day a loan for $..... for ..... months repayable in ..... instalments, was made to the above mentioned applicant for the purpose named by negotiating his note for $..... less discount of $..... calculated in accordance with the official tables, and having scrutinized and checked this application with the care ordinarily required of me by the bank, I certify to the best of my knowledge that the conditions and purpose of this loan are such as qualify it for the dominion government guarantee under the home improvement plan.

That is signed then by the bank manager. The information which appears on the form, the affirmation of the borrower, represents the distance which we believe we should go in creating red tape in the form of supervision around the expenditure of this money. After all, the people who will be borrowing this money are not well-off people. It is a loan. It must be paid back. Community interest in the plan involves that a considerable number of people will know what is going on, and I think in that widespread publicity and in the community nature of the enterprise rests our major protection against wrongful use of the money, together, of course, with the affirmation and with the penalty further on in the bill with regard to misrepresentation and obtaining a loan not in accordance with the provisions.

Mr. LAWSON: Section 2 (a) of the bill defines "approved lending institution" as one which is approved by the governor in council. I understood the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to say this afternoon that loan companies have not been and would not be approved as approved lending institutions.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say we would not approve them, but they—

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry; I intended to say mortgage companies. Can the minister suggest to me any institutions now in existence in this country, other than banks, which might come within the terms of an approved lending institution, with the possible exception of such an one as he suggested this afternoon, which was apparently created by one phase of the building trades to extend credits for the purpose of carrying on this business?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, so far I have mentioned the one concern in addition to the banks.

Mr. LAWSON: Plumbing.

Mr. DUNNING: And another concern—I suppose I had better not mention names unless it is really necessary—which deals with a very wide range of commodities, has no regular finance subsidiary but is operating through one of the chartered banks. The banks are filling the gap to which my hon. friend refers in that case and are gradually branching out into others. Another concern, a very large supplier of materials, which has no subsidiary, has in the past financed direct through dealers. They themselves are not lending institutions and therefore, as my hon. friend points out, we could not approve them, but this concern has expressed a willingness to go ahead making these loans on its own responsibility without government guarantee and in accordance with the financial conditions laid down in this bill, and its operations, I may say, cover a very wide range of supplies. One of the type of institutions known as acceptance corporations, which states that it cannot accept our low interest charge, may nevertheless work out a special arrangement with one of the large suppliers under which it will do the financing but with the supplier making up to it the difference between the rates called for by the legislation and the rates which the acceptance corporation deems it necessary for it to have in connection with its business. That latter arrangement has not yet been approved; there are some features of it which I am naturally doubtful, for reasons which will occur to my hon. friend, but in the main, I must say, the banks are displaying a very cooperative attitude in regard to the matter.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not doubting that in the least, but it appears to me that the institutions which would be carrying out this legislation by advancing the money would in the main, of necessity, be the banks.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: For example, the minister mentioned this afternoon one concern, a plumbing and supply company. Would they be loaning amounts in excess of the purchase price of materials which might be purchased from them or some of their subsidiaries or affiliated companies?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should like to ask the minister for a list of those institutions which are authorized to make loans in British Columbia.

Mr. DUNNING: All of the chartered banks.

[Mr. Lawson.]

Mr. BENNETT: The trust companies?

Mr. DUNNING: No trust companies have yet come in.

Mr. MASSEY: I trust the minister will not think that I am trying to obstruct unduly. I am trying to be constructive rather than destructive. But let me return to a point that was discussed a few moments ago. I learned my draftsmanship on a board with a T-square and compass, not with a pencil and law books and an imagination, but it seems to me that the brochure which has been issued and a copy of which I have in my hand is peculiarly clear on the inside back page, page 15, where it lays down the kind of improvements that are allowed under the home improvement plan. The last paragraph states:

In other words, whatever permanently improves the property.

I see no language to that effect in the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MASSEY: What I am getting at is this: Somewhere in a little town farmer Brown comes in to get a loan. He speaks to the banker, and the banker perhaps does not have a copy of this brochure before him.

Mr. DUNNING: That is just what he has, though.

Mr. MASSEY: He is going to have it?

Mr. DUNNING: He has it now.

Mr. MASSEY: Then the minister feels there will be no difficulty in regard to farmer Brown not being able to make his case perfectly clear?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MASSEY: But the bill does not specify that.

Mr. DUNNING: I must confess that such difficulties as have so far arisen are due to the inventiveness of persons with respect to what constitutes an improvement to the home. That is, the difficulties met with so far are in restricting the matter to proper expenditures. For instance, we do not feel that loans can be made for detachable or movable equipment. A great deal of representation has been made with respect to certain kinds of movable equipment, but we do not think it would be sound to guarantee loans made for the purpose of getting an installation of something which merely plugs in and can therefore be removed as a piece of furniture. That is not, from the point of view of the department or the government, an improvement in the sense that the home improvement plan calls for. But inasmuch as I shall probably not get the bill through committee to-night, I should like to assure the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) that I shall give consideration to his suggestions as to, if possible, a somewhat broader definition, and see if I can make any suggestions when the bill is again before the committee.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister may be interested to know that the case I had in mind was that of one of my constituents who wanted to put a portable garage behind his house. He was told that was not "permanent;" it was not a permanent improvement because it was portable. He assured the official that he was not going to take it around with his car. However, there was some little dispute and the matter was delayed for two or three days, in the course of which the price of the portable garage went up. It was perhaps rather an absurd case to bring to the attention of the committee, but it seemed to me that if any delay of that kind could be obviated it would be to the benefit of the legislation.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should appreciate a further explanation from the minister as to the test to be applied to determine whether an applicant is credit-worthy, to use the term the minister himself used. I have in mind two types of applicants, the rancher on the coast who is not within easy access of a chartered bank or a lending institution, and the fisherman whose income is seasonal.

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult for me to answer in specific terms, because, as my hon. friend knows, credit is something that belongs to a man's own self and to the conditions under which he lives and under which he receives his income. I know of cases in which loans have been made where the income is seasonal, as in farming or fishing, but I could not attempt to lay down any specific rule to determine the credit-worthiness of an individual except to say this. Generally speaking, I am advised that these loans are being approached on the basis of character. But of course, even with respect to a man of good character, the lender is not doing a service to that individual by lending him something which it is quite apparent, from the man's circumstances and his prospective income, he cannot repay. All these considerations must enter into the determination of the question whether or not an individual loan should be made. I am sure that my hon. friend, who is familiar with the middle west, as I am, will acknowledge that many of us out there were considered more credit-worthy during one period of the history of the west at any rate than we turned out to be, and even some of my hon. friends from Toronto have had that experience as well as those of us from the west.

Mr. McIVOR: It would depend upon the lender; a particular lender might consider a man credit-worthy. Suppose a banker in Fort William were asked for a loan; he might be more willing to lend than a banker in Toronto. He might be more generous in a particular case. In this respect, therefore, I am glad that no supervisor is necessary, because that will eliminate expense. Any banker in the community, before he lends his money, will be sure that the borrower is worthy and that the loan will be of service to him.

Mr. DUNNING: As indicated last evening, the government is rather anxious to get a couple of departments into supply and therefore I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Civil government—
Salaries, $916,375.
Contingencies, $110,000.

Mr. LAWSON: There is an increase of $35,000 in this item. Will the minister give a general outline to show whether the increase is caused merely by the normal advancement of civil service salaries or whether there are special items contributing to it.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member will note that on the whole item the increase is not $35,000 but the difference between $30,285 and $35,000, or a net increase of $4,715. The increase is arrived at in this way. There is a decrease in salaries amounting to $30,285. This is due to the abolition of fourteen positions not further required, amounting to $19,435, and to the fact that twenty-five positions are occupied by temporary employees who were not made permanent as expected and whose salaries, amounting to $26,195, are provided for in the contingency item. In addition to those two sums there is a net saving, by the promotion of officers at lower salaries than those paid to their predecessors, of $6,405. The total of the three sums I have mentioned is $52,035, against which one must place statutory increases amounting to $21,750, leaving a net decrease in the salary item of $30,285. Now I come to the increase in the contingency item. The increase in this item amounting to $35,000 is due to the transfer of the salaries of twenty-five temporary employees from the permanent vote, amounting to $26,195, plus $8,805 to provide a safe margin for future requirements.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister has me confused in a mass of figures. Are the detailed items included in item 14 on page 7 those set out in detail on page 83 of this year's estimates? If so, I wish to call something to his attention in connection with some details, in order to save my raising the point on each item.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Thank you. In the estimates of 1936-37 which were before us last session, in several individual instances very substantial increases were shown over the previous year. If my recollection serves me aright, the minister explained those increases last year as being due to increased staff required to handle matters in the department. This year the minister in his estimates shows a decrease over last year, but a large increase over the year before, indicating that last year in the estimates he showed large increases which apparently were never required and never used. For example, take item 17 of the 1936-37 estimates, on page 83 of this year's estimates. This year it is shown as $49,080 as against $48,000 last year. The same item in the estimates of 1936-37 which were before us last session showed the estimated expenditure as $51,0000, as against $47,100 for the year before. The net result is that last year's estimates showed a very substantial increase, whereas this year it shows a decrease, but in reality there has been a steady increase in the item each year since this government has been in power. And I have picked only one item out of seven or eight which I could enumerate in this year's estimates. I should like to know what was the scheme or idea of inserting in last year's estimates vast increases which obviously were never required. Was it in order that this year the estimates might show a decrease?

Probably I should call the minister's attention to item 65 of last year's estimates—because it was the outstanding one— which would be item 52 in this year's, shown on page 83. This year the estimate shows $69,930. In the outside column it shows that last year there was voted $82,620. Therefore the minister says there is a decrease of approximately $13,000. On the other hand, if we take exactly the same item in last year's estimates, we find that last year it was increased from $63,000 to $82,620. I should like to know the explanation of that amazing apparent juggling of figures.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am unable to appreciate my hon. friend's adjectives, if he will pardon my saying so. The terms "vast" and "amazing" do not apply to these minor changes.

Mr. LAWSON: The sum of $13,000 is hardly minor.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first item my hon. friend pointed out is the one referring to head clerks, where the difference is between $48,000 for 1936-37 and $49,080 for 1937-38. I assume that difference would be due to statutory increases. As to the other item which my hon. friend mentioned, it is not correct to refer to that as item 52. The word "number" at the top of the left hand columns on page 83 relates to the number of persons employed. The number employed in 1936-37 was sixty-five, and for 1937-38 the estimated number is fifty-two. We apparently have been able to cut down somewhat on the staff, either that or they are in the temporary class instead of permanent. I think the latter is the proper explanation.

Mr. LAWSON: May I interrupt to make my point clear? If the minister will be good enough to look at last year's estimates—

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not have them before me.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, if he will accept my word that in the column of numbers in 1935-36 there were shown forty-nine persons employed, he now submits an estimate for sixty-five persons for this year, and asks for an increase from $63,000 to $82,620, or, in other words, an increase of $19,620. If we take the corresponding item for this year, it shows that instead of having sixty-five employees as contemplated, he had fifty-two. But according to the estimates submitted this year the committee and the country would be led to believe that the number of employees in that branch had been curtailed from sixty-five last year to fifty-two this year with a corresponding reduction of $13,000 in salaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: I may correct any erroneous impression the country might get on that point. Last year there were forty-nine stenographers, and they were permanent. It was expected, no doubt, that the number of permanents would be increased to sixty-five, but it was not deemed advisable, nor was it possible, to make them permanent, and so the number of permanents is only fifty-two, substantially what it was last year.

Mr. LAWSON: Three more.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it is about where it was, instead of being considerably higher. No doubt this means that substantially the same number of stenographers are engaged, but they are still temporary. There is an increase in the contingency item equivalent to the decrease in the permanents.

Mr. LAWSON: And a little bit over.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, a little bit over.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does item No. 14 include customs appraisers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Only those at head office.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who is responsible for the regulations under which appraisals are made? Is it the minister, or are there certain officials in the department who advise the minister? Perhaps I can make myself clear in this way: I believe somewhere in a discussion of the estimates a question should be asked as to the regulations which have been made in the past year with respect to the $100 tourist exemption. When parliament prorogued, certain exemptions had been made, and following the prorogation of parliament apparently a number of regulations were issued to officials at customs offices. In many instances the regulations seemed to limit or to abolish the exemption.

For example, I have in mind regulations laid down in connection with radios. One could bring in a radio in his car, but could not bring in a radio attached to his automobile. I heard of an instance of a car coming into Canada with four new tires bought in the United States. The owner who crossed on the boat from Seattle to Vancouver or Victoria was warned that if the tires were on the car they were dutiable, but if they were off the car they could enter duty free. He took the tires off, ran the car in on the rims and brought the tires in duty free. May I add I was told that by an officer of the department. If such things can happen, then I say the provision in the budget has been made ridiculous by departmental regulations.

I have been looking for an item under which the matter may be discussed, and I thought this might be the proper place to do so. I have in mind difficulties which have arisen in Calgary and elsewhere in connection with persons who have imported radios and then have found themselves in the position of being liable to attack for the violation of certain patents. One point which seems to puzzle people in Canada, myself included, is how the companies concerned with the patents know, without access to or advice from the department, that an individual has imported a radio containing tubes which infringe patent regulations. Reviewing three or four striking cases which have been brought to my attention I believe the intention of parliament has been largely nullified by regulations which have been laid down. Either the exemption is good or it is not good. I think these facts should be brought to the attention of the minister and the officials with him so that through the minister they may be able to advise the committee as to the regulations which have been made.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before I say what I have in mind, may I read tariff item 703 (b) which states that the following goods are free under all tariffs.

(b) Goods valued at not more than one hundred dollars included in the baggage accompanying residents of Canada returning from abroad after an absence from Canada of not less than forty-eight hours and acquired by them for personal or household use or as souvenirs or gifts, but not bought on commission or as an accommodation for other persons or for sale, under regulations prescribed by the minister.

Then follows a proviso. The words to which I would draw the attention of the hon. member are these: "Included in the baggage accompanying residents of Canada returning from abroad." I am quite free to admit that the department has experienced difficulty with these words and has received quite a number of complaints from residents of Canada returning from abroad. Almost entirely their complaints have been limited to the two matters mentioned by the hon. member, namely radios installed in cars and tires mounted on the wheels of cars coming into Canada.

The view taken by the department and by myself was that unless we depart entirely from the language of the item, as the Department of National Revenue we cannot possibly declare that automobile tires on wheels, revolving and in use when they come into Canada, are goods "included in the baggage accompanying residents of Canada returning from abroad." Similarly the department has said, and I agree, that we cannot rule that a radio affixed to a car as part of it, used in the car abroad, and actually brought back into Canada as part of the car, could be described as goods "included in the baggage of the resident returning to Canada."

Mr. BENNETT: But if he detached it and put it into his trunk, it would be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We have tried to give this a rather liberal interpretation—

Mr. BENNETT: Conservative.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member will bear in mind that the Department of National Revenue is an administrative department. We have to carry out the will of parliament as expressed in the items we are administering. Otherwise we would be making administrative law, rather than carrying out the will of parliament. We have gone so far as to say that if the returning resident brings back a radio sitting loosely in the back seat of his car we shall regard it as baggage. Further, we have gone so far as to say that if he brings tires back he may carry them with him or have them loosely in the back seat of his car and we shall regard them as baggage. But when they are part of the car we cannot say, without departing from the language of the section, they are part of his baggage. These are the reasons for the rulings which have been made. Whether or not there should be a change in the wording of the item, I cannot say; at present we are not concerned with that.

It is very unsafe for an administrative department to depart from the undoubted meaning of the language. If we did so it would be subversive of law.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can understand that, but I am pointing out what is a ridiculous state of affairs.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be.

Mr. COLDWELL: A man may import four new tires into Canada if he carries them in on the back seat of his car. But if he has a blow-out in the United States, is forced to buy a new tire and run his car into Canada on that tire, it is classed as a new tire attached to the car, and he is liable to duty on it.

Mr. BENNETT: He always was.

Mr. COLDWELL: I cannot see that that is any different from a lady coming into Canada wearing a new pair of shoes because she lost her sole in the United States—I mean the sole of her shoe. I fail to see the difference. The minister may be right in stating that the department cannot depart from the language of the section, but I suggest it should make a recommendation regarding these matters so that they will not appear so ridiculous to the public. I hope, too, that the legislation will make the interpretation more liberal than it has been during the past year.

The other point I raised was in connection with patent infringements. I do not know just how this difficulty can be met, but I feel it is a serious matter. Here we have an exemption and then people who bring articles in receive letters from firms claiming to have a patent thereon. The feeling has become prevalent that these firms have access either to the local customs returns or to the files of the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the last suggestion of the hon. member, that owners of patents have access to the files of the department, I want to say that such is not the fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to have that assurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have no such access and if an application was made for any information, it would be refused. It has always been the law that a person importing a patented article for use or sale is liable to action. It has, however, never been part of the functions of the customs authorities to advise importers as to whether or not the importation of any article violates a patent. That is something upon which we are not qualified to advise.

Mr. HEAPS: How do they get to know about it?

Mr. JACOBS: Second sight.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how patent owners learn that their patents are being infringed by importers, but I can think of many ways in which they might find out. Not long ago I heard of an instance where an exporter in the United States was advertising extensively that he was selling a certain patented article to Canadians. The owner of the patent in Canada immediately looked around to see where these were coming from, and I believe he started an action against some people.

Mr. MacNICOL: Very frequently importers tell others how cheaply they were able to buy an article in the United States and thus give themselves away.

Mr. LAWSON: My recollection is that there is a provision in the act permitting the inspection of invoice entries on payment of a nominal fee.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not available to anybody.

Mr. ILSLEY: No stranger.

Mr. LAWSON: It is limited to the importer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: I should think it would be possible for the Minister of National Revenue to place a less liberal interpretation upon the section to which reference has just been made.

If my recollection serves me correctly, the debate which took place in this house on that particular item was not such as to justify the minister and his department in taking such a liberal view of importations of this kind. If the minister would allow his Scotch instinct to prevail, this ultra liberal view would not be in force in the department. Canadian tradesmen ought to be given a little consideration. I hardly think the person who signed the treaty with the United States republic in which this clause was embodied, anticipated an interpretation of this sort. If the minister were an ordinary layman travelling back and forth between the United States and Canada, he would realize how ridiculous is this interpretation. It seems ridiculous when a man has to take a radio off his car, put it in the back seat until he gets past the customs and then attach it again to his car in order to comply with the interpretation of the regulation.

Mr. MacNICOL: In order to get by.

Mr. WALSH: We should interpret this regulation somewhat differently. While I am on my feet I should like to direct the attention of the minister to another matter in connection with his department. I have found the officials of his department to be extraordinarily capable, but I have also found that they are housed in an extraordinary manner. It is a real shame to expect capable officials to carry on their duties under such conditions as prevail at present in the department. There is one office which I visit quite frequently in which are located six men. On a recent visit to this office I found each of these six men trying to interview another man. The office was so littered with papers that one could hardly step from one desk to the next, and yet all these papers were necessary to the work of the department. The minister should give some consideration to the people in his department who are doing such efficient work. The conditions under which these people work should be improved. This would create a better impression in the minds of the public who visit these offices from time to time. Perhaps a better distribution of the space available would bring about the necessary results. It is awkward for someone trying to get information from an official to have five other officials giving information to five other individuals in the same office.

Mr. ILSLEY: I appreciate the force of what my hon. friend has said. I am glad to join with him in paying a tribute to the officers of the department. I agree with his statement as to their capability and competence, and I agree also as to the necessity for some improvement in office space. That matter is being considered at the present time and plans are being matured.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to know what interpretation the minister places upon baggage contained in a car. Would that be hand baggage? I suppose many hon. members receive complaints in connection with this particular regulation. I had one incident brought to my attention of a man who had visited the United States where he had seen an oil stove of a type not possible to obtain in Canada. This was priced at about $80 and he thought he could bring it in. He had it crated and put into his car, but when he arrived at the port of entry he was assessed the regular duty. I understand the officer explained to him that if it had been a small parcel with a rope on it, something that he could carry, it would have been classed as baggage, but that the crate could not be thus classified. It is a question of baggage. I thought perhaps a large trunk would be considered as baggage. This is no bigger than a trunk.

Mr. ILSLEY: The department takes the commonly accepted railway interpretation of baggage, what a passenger travelling on a railway train might be able to check as baggage or carry with him into a Pullman car. It may be that there is some variety of interpretation by different collectors because it is difficult to make a thoroughly consistent application of a rule such as that. It must be borne in mind that the past year is the first one during which this item has been in force, and it may be that certain collectors have taken one view and other collectors a different view, but the rule I have just mentioned is the rule of the department, which we follow very closely.

Mr. BARBER: I agree from what I have heard that the interpretation is not uniform, because the gentleman informed me that if he had gone through another port he would have got through all right; that is, if he had understood before he came back that his own interpretation was wrong. As it was, he had to pay $31 or $32 duty on the stuff.

Mr. LAWSON: I really cannot let this item pass without congratulating the minister upon one subitem in it. I well recollect that when an item was up last year for secretaries to the executive, I questioned the necessity of the minister having two secretaries to the executive instead of one, and I must confess that with some force he argued the necessity for two such secretaries. I am delighted to see that this year he has come to the conclusion from eighteen months of experience that two are not necessary, and that he has apparently come back to one secretary to the executive because I notice that in this year's estimates provision for only one is made, with a saving of $2,100.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I am in order I should again like to refer to the case I brought up last year of Mr. Cave, a former employee of the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under date of March 18, 1930, Mr. Charles S. Cave, at that time a customs excise examiner on the staff at Halifax, made application for transfer to the port of Toronto in view of the health of his family since the Halifax explosion. I want to say that no private institution would treat any employee as Mr. Cave has been treated. I do not blame the department particularly. Perhaps it is because of some regulations that nothing has been done, but certainly something should be done to right a very great wrong. Mr. Cave says:

> At the time of the Halifax disaster I was on duty (customs) at the Halifax graving docks, close to the point where the Mont Blanc blew up. I was blown into the Halifax harbour and my house, not far away, was blown off the map, three of my children were burned to death, and my wife and only surviving daughter were taken to Truro in a very serious condition. My wife has never fully recovered and for several years was under the doctor's care. I was advised by him that we would have to move elsewhere for her health's sake, so we decided to move to Toronto where her only surviving relatives were located.

Now it appears that he could not be transferred to Toronto, and later on, as I said a moment ago, he resigned from the department, but on the assumption that at a later date he would receive an appointment at Toronto. On various occasions he applied to the civil service commission for an appointment, and finally he was turned down because he was slightly over the age limit.

I want to compliment one official of the department, Mr. C. E. Wood, Commissioner of Customs, upon his humanitarian view of this case. In writing to the civil service commission, perhaps at the instance of the minister himself with whom I took this matter up a year ago, Mr. Wood says:

> In view of the extenuating circumstances of which the department was not fully cognizant at the time, also the fact that while employed at Halifax, Mr. Cave's services were of the highest order, it would be appreciated if some way could be found to facilitate his re-entry to the customs excise service, notwithstanding that he now appears over the age limit.

[Mr. Lawson.]

The department also states that through his many years of service at Halifax Mr. Cave rendered excellent and efficient service, without any complaint at any time being made against him. I do hope that something will be done to give some consideration to this man who, while he was in the service of the government, lost his whole family but one through no fault of his own. It does seem to me, as one who has had a great deal to do with the employment of labour and who knows how labour should be treated, that a government official should not be treated as this man has been, and I would ask the minister to reconsider this case so that this man may be reemployed. Scores of officials have been appointed in Toronto since I brought this matter up, and surely this man can be put into some position.

Mr. ILSLEY: The appointments to Toronto have been made by the civil service commission, and my recollection is that when we took this matter up with the commission we were told that it was impossible to do anything for this man. Does the hon. member know the age of the man in question?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, but I know he is a comparatively young man.

Mr. JACOBS: How long had he been in the service?

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty odd years. He is over the age required by the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: He was with the department for many years and gave excellent service. It appears now that he is slightly over the age limit.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the age limit?

Mr. BENNETT: Thirty-five.

Mr. MacNICOL: I think in view of the circumstances, when a man while in the service of the government had his house blown away at the time of that terrible disaster at Halifax, had three of his children burned to death and his wife left naturally in a state of collapse, and found it necessary, after struggling on for years at Halifax, to move away to some other part of the country, as any man would do under those circumstances even if he lost his position, something should be done for him. I do not believe any private company with branches scattered throughout Canada would have treated an employee in the way in which this gentleman has been treated.

Mr. BENNETT: There are several cases of this kind arising from time to time in various departments of the public service. The mistake in this case arose with the gentleman resigning. Once he resigned there is no power in the statute for anybody to place him in the public service again if he is over the age of thirty-five years, and the civil service commission could no more place him in a position than they could me. But there is a way in which the minister can deal with it if he so desires, and that is by placing an item in the supplementary estimates providing for the man's appointment notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. In view of the circumstances to which reference has been made, and the letter written by a departmental official pointing out that all the facts were not in the possession of the department at the time this man felt compelled to resign in order to remove to another place where his wife could live, I would suggest that what I have indicated might be a very reasonable thing to do. This has been done more than once, and the only way in which it can be done is by act of parliament, because the statutory prohibition is such that he cannot otherwise be employed legally. The only way by which he can be legally employed is under a supplementary estimate, which of course is an act of parliament.

Mr. GREEN: What is the total value of the imports under the $100 exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the seven months ended December 31, 1936, the total is $3,528,639 from all countries. The total from the United States is $2,931,691.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister that by classification?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should perhaps mention that importations of goods valued at less than five dollars are not declared, but I imagine they would not amount to very much. Does the hon. gentleman want these by classes?

From the United States: automobile accessories, $100,826; automobile tires and tubes, $48,968; boots and shoes, $285,091; clothing, $1,455,924; foodstuffs, $11,702; furniture and household appliances, $442,004; miscellaneous commodities, $578,176, making the total previously mentioned of $2,931,691.

The totals from all countries are: automobile accessories, $100,871; automobile tires and tubes, $49,002; boots and shoes, $303,959; clothing, $1,755,013; foodstuffs, $15,207; furniture and household appliances, $467,529; miscellaneous commodities, $837,058, making a total I mentioned of $3,528,639.

Mr. BAKER: What was the total of clothing and boots and shoes, the two important items?

Mr. ILSLEY: From all countries?

Mr. BAKER: The importations under this $100 exemption from all countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Boots and shoes, $303,959; clothing, $1,755,013.

Mr. BAKER: Did the minister stop to think of how much labour that is depriving the people of Canada?

An hon. MEMBER: Out of order.

Mr. HEAPS: Before this item carries, I think the minister ought to deal a little more definitely with the case raised by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). If the department desire, ways and means can be found to have that man reestablished in his duties, around Toronto. Could he not at least be placed in temporary employment?

Mr. BENNETT: He cannot be placed in the service at all.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the minister spoke the other evening of a large number of appointments to the stenographic staff. If there is any way of having a special item in the estimates to meet his case or of placing him in the temporary service, I believe the government should do what any ordinary employer in Canada would do—transfer him from the employment in which he was formerly engaged to a place where he can find more congenial surroundings than in the place he left, namely the city of Halifax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that this officer did not leave the service until thirteen years after the explosion. The explosion occurred in 1917, and this officer left the service in 1930; that may have some bearing on the matter. However, I shall be glad to go into the case again and consider it in the light of the representations which have been made here to-night. With regard to this item, my colleague the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) is anxious to introduce his estimates, and if the committee would care to pass it—

Mr. BENNETT: It is not necessary to pass it, you know.

Mr. ILSLEY: —all right. If not that will be all right also.

Item agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Civil Government—

Salaries, including the assistant deputy postmaster general and general superintendent of postal service at $7,500 a year from April 1, 1937; amounts required to pay allowances to office appliance operators, grade 2, operating mechanical audit card punching machines in accordance with the terms of order in council P.C. 280/383, dated February 17, 1930; to pay allowances to typists, grade 1, employed cutting stencils in accordance with regulations approved by order in council; and to pay allowances to office appliance operators, grade 2, in the revenue division employed as key punch operators, schedules and rates to be decided upon by the civil service commission and the post office department and approved by the governor in council, $1,318,488.

Contingencies, $215,000.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): Perhaps I should make a statement as to the increases. The item for salaries is $1,318,488, an increase of $69,828. The increase is accounted for by 391 statutory increases amounting to $27,540. If my hon. friends would like to have the details I can give them very readily, but they are the regular statutory increases. Then there is one special increase of $600 to augment the salary of the assistant deputy postmaster general and general superintendent of postal service to $7,500, effective April 1, 1937. There are fifty-two additional positions; these are required to provide an adequate establishment for the administrative services and financial branch. The positions were approved by the civil service commission and authorized by order in council dated July 10, 1936, and October 23, 1936. They will be filled by the civil service commission by promotional competition or appointment. What I have already given amounts to $27,540. There will be deducted three positions no longer required, amounting to $9,600, and the difference in salaries of employees who have left the service and the salaries of those who have replaced them, amounting to $1,620, and current salary deduction amounting to $2,952. There is a total of deductions of $14,000, making up the $69,828.

Mr. MacNICOL: I notice this item in the estimates of 1937-38 is No. 16, and in the estimates of 1936-37 it was No. 20. Looking through the auditor general's report of 1935-36, I find it scattered in three or four different places. It is almost impossible to check one item with the other so as to find out where we are going or what we have under discussion. An estimate appears for a large sum of money like this and about the only thing we can do is to ask the reason for the increase, or some question which has no more import than that. If we want to check over the figures contained in the previous year's item we have not yet the details. The latest report I have is the auditor general's report for 1935-36; next year we shall get the auditor general's report for last year, 1936-37, and the year following we shall get it for the item now under discussion. I do not know that anything can be done in the way of better bookkeeping than we have at present, but it is a nightmare to connect the items of this year with last year from the auditor general's report of 1935-36.

Mr. PELLETIER: I want to ask the minister what led his department to decide that the postal employees of Canada should be compelled to work on statutory holidays. Undoubtedly a decision for which he is responsible was arrived at by his department, and he should make a statement.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That question can better be discussed under item 275 and I suggest that we defer the discussion until then.

Mr. HEAPS: In this connection I suggest that the minister bring down the return to the question asked him a few weeks ago and passed by the house. A request was made for the tabling of correspondence relating to changes made in the regulations of the department respecting hours and conditions of labour during the past year. When may we expect that correspondence?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The great volume of it is ready now, but it is not complete. I expect to be able to table the report within a short time.

Mr. BENNETT: A great volume is ready but the small volume is not.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): A considerable volume still remains.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that three positions had been abolished. What were they?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): One was superintendent of mail contracts, $6,000; one principal clerk, $2,400; one packer and helper, $1,200, or a total of $9,600.

Mr. BENNETT: Who were the incumbents?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Mr. Anderson was the superintendent of mail contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: That position was vacant; he had been superannuated.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes; it was joined with the air mail office and the position was abolished.

Mr. BENNETT: Who has taken on the responsibilities of the mail contract service?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Mr. Herring is performing them at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: What is his title?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Chief superintendent of air and land mail services.

Mr. STIRLING: This covers superintendent of air and land mail services. Will the minister give us some information with regard to what air mail services there are now in Canada?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That also comes under item 275. I have a full list of them and I could give them now, but perhaps it would be better to give them under item 275.

Mr. GRAYDON: What are the duties of the director of public relations of the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Largely publicity, to endeavour to keep track of matters that are taking place in the various branches of the department and to give information concerning them from time to time. These duties are carried out with the fourfold object: increasing revenue; obtaining the cooperation of the mailing public; maintaining supervision over the various branches with the idea of creating an esprit de corps among the different branches, and the creating of good will.

Mr. ISNOR: Is the department carrying out an accounting system of its own showing complete revenue and complete disbursements as applied to the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): We have an accounting system that keeps track of the business in the department and that is under the supervision of the financial superintendent and for expenditure under the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. ISNOR: Is the minister in a position to state, from his financial set-up showing revenues and disbursements, whether the Post Office Department pays it way?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am in a position to state that the department more than pays its way.

Mr. JACOBS: Except the dead letter department.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I may say that in the last year it more than paid its way. If time permitted, I should like to give my hon. friend the total revenues and expenditures for the past year. Perhaps I have time.

Mr. BENNETT: Time to start anyway.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The total estimated revenue for the year closing March 31, 1937, judging by the nine months that have passed, will be $41,178,199. From this we deduct $6,868,164 paid to commission postmasters, leaving net revenue $34,310,035. This represents an increase of $1,802,146 over the preceding year. The outlay for the year is $30,100,101.63.

Mr. HEAPS: Does that include gross outlay or just the net?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No, that is outlay reckoned according to the system to which my hon. friend objects, but which has been in force since confederation. It does not include the item to which I know he refers, of rental for buildings—

Mr. HEAPS: Maintenance.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): —maintenance of those buildings, including char service, coal and that sort of thing. Perhaps to clarify the matter—

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might break down the items at his convenience.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes. I should like to say a word in regard to that so as to give my hon. friend the information for which he asked.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 3, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is a minor amendment to the Canadian Red Cross Society Act asked for unanimously by the council of the society. The effect of one amendment will be to reduce the council from sixty to forty members. The other amendments are purely consequential.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN WHEAT BOARD AND WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle):

1. Was an agreement made during the month of December, 1935, by the present wheat board with the members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange as to the delivering of wheat by the board to the members of the grain exchange or exporters to fill overnight sales of wheat?

2. If so, was the agreement made with the knowledge and on the advice of the wheat committee of the cabinet?

3. If such agreement was made, how long did it remain in force, and if cancelled, when and why, and was it cancelled with the knowledge and advice of the wheat committee of the cabinet?

Mr. ROGERS: The subject to which this question relates, namely, the marketing of Canadian grains abroad, is now being investigated by the royal grain inquiry commission, which has not yet reported to the government.

NATIONAL WAR MEMORIAL

Mr. PINARD:

1. What are the dimensions of the national war memorial to be erected in Ottawa, as follows: (a) height from ground level; (b) length along ground level; (c) depth at greatest part?

2. What will be the depth of the foundations below ground level?

3. Before finally proceeding with the erection of the memorial will the government cause to be constructed a rough wooden model of space and height, so that the government, members of parliament and all others interested may judge as to the suitability of the site?

Question dropped.

CONFISCATION OF IMPORTED RADIOS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Did officers of the Department of National Revenue since January, 1936, seize or confiscate radios illegally imported into Canada?

2. If so, what number in each case?

3. Did the customs commissioner order the confiscation of a radio purchased in good faith by D. Christin in the county of L'Assomption?

4. Did Mr. Christin offer to pay the customs duty after the seizure but before the confiscation of his radio?

5. Upon what date did the commissioner order the confiscation of Mr. Christin's radio?

6. Was such radio sold or destroyed?

7. If sold, (a) to whom; (b) by whom; (c) when; (d) at what price?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. Seized, 94; confiscated, 65.

3. The assistant commissioner of customs under the authority given him by the minister under the provisions of section 174 of the Customs Act rendered decision in this case forfeiting the radio. This is the regular procedure established for dealing with such cases.

4. Yes.

5. Decision was rendered on January 21, 1937.

6 and 7. By statute the owner is allowed thirty days within which he may give notice of non-acceptance of such decision. If notice is not given decision then becomes final. The radio will not be sold as it has been condemned by an electrical inspector operating under the provincial laws of Quebec.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—CONTRACT FOR HAY

Mr. SENN:

1. Has a contract been made with one Greenlees for a supply of hay for use at the Royal Military College, Kingston?

2. If so, were tenders invited before such contract was made?

3. What is the duration of such contract?

4. What are the quantities and dates of delivery?

5. What grade of hay is stipulated in the contract?

6. What is the price per ton on delivery?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Contract awarded October 7, 1936 for the period ending March 31, 1937.

4. Approximately 40 tons. Deliveries to be made as required.

5. Number 2 Timothy.

6. Twenty dollars per ton which includes delivery into the Royal Military College forage loft or other building as directed.

CANADIAN MILITIA—HONORARY COLONELS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. How many regiments are there in the Canadian militia?

2. In such regiments, (a) how many colonels are there; (b) how many honorary colonels are there?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Arm of Service	Permanent Active Militia	Non-Permanent Active Militia	Total
Cavalry	2	20	22
Infantry	3	89	92
Total			114

2. (a) Regiments comprising two active battalions have a colonel provided for in their establishment. At present, the total number of colonels so appointed is two (2).

(b) Each regiment may, under the regulations, have appointed thereto one honorary colonel. The total number at present appointed is forty-eight.

MEADOWVILLE STATION, N.S., MAIL SERVCE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. When were tenders last received for mail courier service R.R. No. 1, Meadowville Station, Pictou county, Nova Scotia?

2. What is the name of each person who tendered, and the amount of each person's tender?

3. Is the contract awarded? If so, to what person, and for what amount?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. 10th July, 1936.

2. John Robert Holt, West Branch River John, $600; James Blackie, Meadowville $649; Edward Charles Hansford, Pictou No. 3 R.R., $675; Daniel R. Sutherland, Meadowville Stn., No. 1 R.R., $749; Leod Murray, Meadowville Stn., $775.

3. Yes. John Robert Holt at $600 per annum.

Mr. BROOKS:

1. When were tenders last received for mail courier service R.R. No. 2, Meadowville Station, Pictou county, Nova Scotia?

2. What is the name of each person who tendered, and the amount of each person's tender?

3. Is the contract awarded? If so, to what person, and for what amount?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. 18th December, 1936.

2. and 3. The contract has been awarded to the lowest tenderer. Information respecting tenderers and amounts will be furnished as soon as contract is executed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

DUTY ON CORN

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Was a duty placed on corn coming into Canada?

2. If so, at what date, and (a) what was the rate of duty; (b) to what country did it apply?

3. Was this duty removed during years 1935 or 1936?

4. If so, (a) on what date did free entry become effective; (b) what amount of corn was imported since the suspension of the duty; (c) what quantities from each country shipping corn into Canada?

5. Is there a duty on corn imports now in force?

6. If so, when did it become effective?

CANADIAN MILITIA—HONORARY COLONELS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What are the names and addresses of the honorary colonels of the Canadian militia?

2. (a) On what date was each of them appointed; (b) for what record of military services, and (c) upon whose recommendation?

3. What are their functions?

4. What formalities are required for the appointment of an honorary colonel?

5. Are they supplied with uniforms and arms by the state?

6. If so, with what uniforms and what arms, and what is the annual cost for each individual?

7. Are the honorary colonels required to pay a tax, or any contribution or hororarium to the state in such capacity?

8. If so, is same paid before or after their appointment has been published in the Canada Gazette, and how much?

9. What do the honorary colonels cost the country?

10. In their capacity as such, how much do they pay to the state?

11. What services have the honorary colonels, as such, rendered to the state to date?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NEWCASTLE, ALTA., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. QUELCH (for Mr. Johnston, Bow River):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, charges, evidence and other documents, dated from June 1, 1936, to date, regarding the dismissal of the postmistress of Newcastle, Alberta.

Also a statement showing the reasons assigned for dismissal and the name or names of the person or persons who assumed responsibility for or furnished such information.

FOUNDERING OF THE "SAND MERCHANT"

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government, relative to the foundering of the ship Sand Merchant, in Lake Erie, October 17, 1936.

Also a copy of evidence taken by Mr. Justice Errol MacDougall relative to the matter, along with a copy of his report.

Also a list of the owners of the said vessel.

Mr. HOWE: May I say to the hon. member that the department has only one copy of the evidence and one of the report. The evidence runs into 567 pages, and the report comprises 22 pages. If the hon. member would permit us to lend him the report and evidence it would save a great deal of time in the department.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall be satisfied with the judge's report. It is nothing but a whitewash, anyway.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

PROPOSED CESSATION OF SUBSIDY TO CANADIAN PACIFIC PENDING REPLACEMENT OF ORIENTALS BY WHITE SEAMEN

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved:

Whereas a resolution was introduced into parliament and debated the 26th February, 1936, asking that "in the opinion of this house the government take such steps as will provide for employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens, on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registration, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury of Canada";

And whereas, the resolution after debate was referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations;

And whereas, the committee held numerous sittings and likewise heard numerous witnesses on the subject matter of the resolution;

And whereas, after hearing all evidence presented to it, the committee recommended,—

1. That, in view of the substantial subsidy granted yearly to the Canadian-Australian line by Canada, the small number of Canadians employed in its service be brought to the attention of the company, and that they be requested to afford Canadian seamen a reasonable degree of employment at the earliest possible convenience.

2. That, as up to the year 1913, the decks of the Empress boats were manned by white seamen, and in as much as the deck service is an important and responsible branch of the work of these boats, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace with Canadian seamen, the orientals now so employed, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity.

And whereas, the recommendation presented by the committee passed the House of Commons unanimously, and thereby became an order of parliament;

And whereas, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has ignored the instructions and has not complied with the order given by parliament, whereby Canadian seamen were to be given employment as deck hands in preference to orientals,

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, no further moneys from the treasury of Canada by way of subsidy be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company towards the operations of the Empress ships operating between Vancouver and the orient, until such times as they do obey the order of parliament, by replacing the Chinese seamen now employed and engaging Canadian seamen on the deck service of the subsidized ships operating between Vancouver and the orient.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will perhaps recall that last year I introduced a resolution stating that great numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast were out of employment; that owners of ships and vessels of Canadian registry on the Pacific coast of British Columbia were giving employment in large measure to great numbers of orientals; that other countries give greater consideration to the employment of their own nationals on ships and vessels belonging to their own country; that the Canadian government grant large sums of money to the owners of ships and vessels by way of subsidies, and that it was desirable that every encouragement be given for the employment of our own nationals. My motion ended with these words:

Therefore, be it resolved, that, in the opinion of this house, the government take such steps as will provide for employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive sums of money from the public treasury of Canada.

[Mr. Reid.]

An amendment to my motion was offered, and finally the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) moved that the matter be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for discussion and investigation.

Many meetings of the committee were held; witnesses were brought from the Pacific coast. The steamship company most interested brought its chief witness from the city of Vancouver, and was also ably represented before the committee by Mr. Flintoft, general counsel for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It is safe to say that every aspect of the matter was considered carefully and fully. After due deliberation the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) presented a final report, which was adopted on June 17.

May I draw the attention of hon. members to what was agreed to last year. I shall be as brief as possible, realizing that I have discussed the question for at least three or four years, but I should like to take time to place before hon. members part of the report accepted by the house. Dealing first with coastwise shipping, the report states:

1. As regards coastwise shipping, the work is done by Canadians mainly, and their is no issue.

2. Shipping to Australia and the antipodes is carried on by the Canadian-Australian line. This company, which receives an annual subsidy of $300,000 from the Canadian government, employs but eight Canadians in the crews of five hundred and ten men.

The committee went into the question of oriental shipping, pointing out the great numbers of orientals engaged on ships plying between the port of Vancouver and Chinese ports. As a result of their investigations they recommended:

1. That, in view of the substantial subsidy granted yearly to the Canadian-Australian line by Canada, the small number of Canadians employed in its service be brought to the attention of the company, and that they be requested to afford Canadian seamen a reasonable degree of employment at the earliest possible convenience.

I believe that in large measure this request was met by the company in question. Then, clause 2 is as follows:

2. That, as up to the year 1913, the decks of the Empress boats were manned by white seamen, and in as much as the deck service is an important and responsible branch of the work of these boats, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace with Canadian seamen the orientals now so employed, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity.

One could say possibly that I have not crossed every "t" and dotted every "i," because I state in my resolution that this company has defied the order of parliament. It was pointed out to me that an order of parliament means an order of the House of Commons and of the Senate, and that this was merely a request by the House of Commons. But surely, Mr. Speaker, a request by the House of Commons is tantamount to an order, or at least should be.

I shall attempt to point out to hon. members the seriousness of the matter. This is not the first time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has defied orders. I might refer hon. members to an instance not so long ago where orders were given by the board of railway commissioners, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company refused to obey them. If there is anything in these days of unrest likely to create more disorder, it is the fact that we have in Canada an institution which, it would seem, is above the law of the land and which replies, irrespective of what it may be asked, "We are not going to carry out your wishes."

If the request had been made without first having a full inquiry and without taking time to go into every aspect of the matter, and if we had not tried to find out the numbers who could work on the boats in preference to orientals, and all facts in connection with every matter affecting the granting of large sums of money, I would say that perhaps there might be some excuse for allowing the company consideration. But the matter was considered fully by the committee. Every argument that could be advanced by the company's representatives was brought forward on that occasion. But as has already been pointed out, after due deliberation the committee appointed by the house brought in a report which was unanimously adopted and which has not been carried out by the railway company.

Although I have discussed the matter on many occasions, there are some salient points that I should like to bring before the members of this house. I am going first to touch briefly on the history of the subsidies. That history started away back in 1889, when the imperial government made a grant of $300,000 for the operation of a route from Halifax across Canada and from Vancouver to the orient; it was known as the all-red route. I wish the originators of that project could see what has happened now, because that red route has now taken on a yellow tinge, for the majority of employees of the ships are from oriental countries and we designate them, not in a derogatory sense, as the "yellow" race. The Canadian government of that time was asked to contribute $75,000, and that grant was continued for ten years. In 1914 the agreement was suspended, but in 1916 the company made an appeal for assistance and it was granted. But this fact should now be noted, that from 1921 to 1930 the company did not receive one five-cent piece by way of subsidy from the treasury of this country, and when asked in committee how they could carry on without obtaining large sums of money, well, they thought perhaps trade was a little better, et cetera, but no satisfactory answer to that question was given. In 1931 they appealed to the government and obtained in that year almost a million dollars by way of subsidy. Later the amount was reduced, and last year they obtained a total of $749,000 for twenty-three round trips.

I suppose it is only natural that notice is not taken of many statements, wise and otherwise, made in committee, but I should like members of this house to give serious attention to certain statements made by the company's chief expert who appeared and gave evidence under oath before that committee, a man named Captain Aikman, R.N., who at one time was in the Royal Naval Reserve and is still attached, I believe, to the naval forces of Great Britain. He was asked in that committee, if he were compelled to pay the same wages to Chinamen and to Canadians or Britishers whom would he employ, and without hesitation he stated "Chinamen." He stated also that they were better sailors. He, a British Royal Naval Reserve officer with seemingly no great pride of nationality, admitted under oath that if he had to employ men of one of these races and pay them the same wages he would employ orientals. It is no wonder that I said to him, "Well, you had better advise the British admiralty that there are better seamen in China than in the British navy," when that was the argument he made before the committee. He was asked, would he hire Canadians if they were available, and he made no answer to that question. He was also asked, if he were given lists of Canadians would he employ them? There was no answer to that. The reason those questions were asked was that the company's representatives had stated under oath that there were no seamen available in any of the Pacific ports and therefore they must of necessity hire orientals or Chinamen from Hong Kong. Evidence was produced that there were at least 1,100 men of all classes, whose names and addresses were given, available for this employment, but apparently, to judge from Captain Aikman's evidence, it was the settled or avowed policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company not to employ Canadians.

To me this is extremely serious, as also is the witness's statement that he preferred Chinamen to our own people.

During the parliamentary recess I went into the question of the numbers of men who are or could be available if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were disposed to employ our own nationals. I have before me the latest figures supplied by the provincial relief department of British Columbia. There are actually registered at the moment close to 300 men who class their occupation as "seaman" in one capacity or another, and on the Pacific coast there are also some four to five hundred men who are employed for the summer season but who are not listed, I believe, in the relief figures I have given. I mention this to disprove the statement made on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that there are no men available.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the figure of 300 for British Columbia or for Vancouver?

Mr. REID: For Vancouver. The figures would have been larger had they included the province of British Columbia. This does not take into account the number who are not registered as being on relief or the numbers in homes or out on small ranches or elsewhere who would be glad to accept employment were they given the opportunity. While I do not like to picture a wintery aspect of the city of Vancouver, which is something unusual as we have had this year unprecedented winter weather, I have a paper which reached me here the other day—and I should like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to take note of this—a picture of 400 men many of whom had stood in line all through the night waiting for a job next morning to shovel snow.

Miss MACPHAIL: Did the mayor of Vancouver when he was in England not urge emigration to Canada?

Mr. REID: The former mayor of Vancouver can very well answer for his own statements. I would never presume to speak for him. But, Mr. Speaker, I again call to the attention of the minister—and it is something I think he believes—that while there may be the odd man here and there in the country who is not willing to work, the fact that men will stand in line all night long in the hope of being given employment the following morning in shovelling snow is ample evidence that we still have in this dominion hundreds of men, young and otherwise, who are willing to work if only they are given an opportunity. Nevertheless we find here a company receiving an annual subsidy of over $700,000, which tells this House of Commons, irrespective of what request is made, "We are not going to hire Canadians; we are going to hire men from Hong Kong because we believe that they are better sailors." If they were telling the truth they would say, "Chinamen are more docile; they are more easily handled; they will not kick up a fuss over bad treatment and they work for low wages."

The company was ordered to take the deck crews off. The matter, I understand, was taken up by the Department of Trade and Commerce through its officials, and the other day I received a return in connection with this. One point that particularly struck me was that they were negotiating through the Department of Trade and Commerce, and when they made the statement that there were no men available they suddenly switched the correspondence to the deputy minister of marine. Surely a corporation with high officials such as theirs did not do that just out of ignorance. They had been dealing right along with the Department of Trade and Commerce; yet the statement they made to the government that there were no Canadians available is suddenly switched to the attention of an official in another department who has nothing whatever to do with the matter under discussion and is not conversant with the details. I take strong exception to the statement that there are no men available. I have in my hand official particulars—and I repeat them—of the numbers of men in Vancouver alone who are available for these ships, but they will never be acceptable to this company so long as it can hire cheap labour from the orient. I for one do not propose to allow them to get away with that kind of policy.

It is strange that every country in the world with the exception of Canada looks after its own nationals. I would point out the possible seriousness of what could take place with 486 orientals on one of these ships, carrying only a nucleus or handful of white men. It is well known, to those in British Columbia at least, that there is no love lost between the Japanese and the Chinese, and were any trouble to arise I wonder how long the Japanese would allow ships carrying 486 Chinamen on board to sail between the two ports. In my resolution I was not advocating that the ships be manned one hundred per cent by Canadians, for I quite realize that a certain percentage of passengers are returning Japanese or Chinese. I was, however, asking that a greater number of white men or men of Canadian or British birth be employed on these ships. When one takes into consideration the statement made under oath that the average passenger list is from sixty to sixty-five per cent oriental, it is not too much to ask that the Canadians employed shall represent say thirty or thirty-five per cent of the crew. At the present time the percentage of officers, Canadian or British, is roughly fifteen per cent and in some instances it is below fifteen per cent of the crew. The great majority of those employed on these ships are orientals; 486 is the figure in one instance, and I have figures for all the others, the total on four ships being approximately 1,900.

I have in my hand a statement made by the president of the company, Sir Edward Beatty, and he advises the business men of the country to speak up—"speak your mind," he says. Of course, I do not believe he really intended that I should speak my mind in this connection and say what I think about the Canadian Pacific railway doing anything like this. If he goes to the old country and advocates emigration to Canada, or when he advocates immigration when speaking in Canada, I should like him to tell the facts as they are. Let him say. "Yes; we want immigration; we want people to come to Canada, but remember when you come here we are not going to hire you because we prefer Chinamen." I wonder what the people of the old country would think if he told them the truth—because that is the truth. We want population; oh, yes, we want people to come here. But when it comes to giving them employment, oh no; they are not good enough; Chinamen are better seamen; they work for lower wages and so on. Would he tell the people of the old country all the facts? Would he tell them that? If he did, I venture to say that he would need a strong bodyguard to escort him back to his ship or hotel.

I shall make this suggestion to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) and I think it is a matter that should be discussed in this house. We have perhaps only the nucleus of a navy, but young men entering that navy, such as it is, go in as cadets. After taking their course of training what do they find? They find themselves on the street, or at any rate looking for employment. Would it not be a fine gesture to find openings for these cadets on these ships? In the event of trouble there would be trained men to meet the situation. But what hope is there for us in training seamen with any national spirit at all if, after they have received their training as naval cadets, they find themselves confronted with a situation where there are 486 Chinamen on board each of these ships, there being no room for any one of these cadets, and a company such as the Canadian Pacific railway declaring its preference for orientals.

Mr. ROGERS: I know the hon. member wishes to be fair, and I am bound to say that I shall shortly have occasion to agree with much that he has said, but it would be well to make it clear that he is referring solely to the Pacific service of the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. REID: I thought that was understood, because I have confined my remarks to the service on the Pacific. The principle, of course, is the same right through. I do not know the conditions on the Atlantic. Evidence was given before the committee, and perhaps there are members of the committee who can speak with more authority than I can with regard to the service on the Atlantic. At any rate a greater number of Canadians or men of British birth are employed on the Atlantic than on the Pacific. I am speaking, however, of those cadets who come out after receiving their training, only to find themselves without employment, with nothing facing them but relief. I suggest to the Minister of National Defence that this angle of the question should be studied. The serious part of the matter is that this company came back with the old argument that there were no men available on the Pacific coast. They said, "We have investigated the situation and have found this and that." Well, they were not looking very keenly for men. They did inquire of the shipping master in the port of Vancouver, but as is well known, few seamen ever go near the shipping master in their search for employment. But even if they did, what does the shipping master say? I interviewed him a month prior to leaving for the house and he said that there were at least eighty-five men registered and available. I believe that was the figure quoted from the provincial government as to the number idle in Vancouver, and it is ample proof that large numbers of men could be available were this company willing to take them on. But suppose there were no seamen available; does anyone say that at least some of those 400 men who fought for jobs and stayed up all night would not be glad to be taken on as deck-hands on these ships? And how can anyone learn to be a deck-hand unless he is given a chance? The only way to become an able-bodied seaman is to be given an opportunity to work on a ship.

I am going to close my remarks by urging upon the government and the house the seriousness of this matter. I know it is being viewed seriously in British Columbia, not only because of the lack of employment for our own people but in view of the fact that this company has declared, "We are not going to heed the request made by parliament." I urge the house to accept this resolution and to enforce its provisions until such time as this company accedes to the request that has been made by parliament.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): As one of those who served last year on the committee on industrial and international relations, which dealt with the subject matter of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid); in view of the fact that the recommendation of the committee was unanimous, and as I have been trying for the past five or six years, whenever this subsidy item has been before the house, to elicit some assurance that before the subsidy was paid some check would be made in connection with wages and working conditions of the crews employed on the Canadian Pacific ships, I unhesitatingly support the motion.

The hon. member for New Westminster made his remarks brief. I know there is much more he could have said had he thought it necessary. I also will speak briefly. I should like, however, to bring to the attention of the house a comparison of wages now paid to the Chinese crews on these ships and the wages that would be paid to Canadian seamen replacing them. This comparison was placed before the committee by a representative of the Canadian Pacific steamships last year.

The comparisons are for the four Empress boats on the Pacific. These ships have Chinese crews numbering in all 1,768. If Canadian seamen were employed to take their places it is assumed that a smaller number would be required, namely, 1,475. The number of Chinese employed on the decks is 277, and the monthly wages total $2,925, or an average of $10.55 each per month. If Canadian citizens were doing the same work, the number required would be 186, and the total monthly pay-roll would be $9,040 or an average per person of $48.60. It is not difficult to see why the Canadian Pacific steamships prefer Chinese to Canadian seamen on their ships, when the additional wage would amount to $38.05 per person per month.

Coming to the other ratings you find a similar situation. In the engine rooms they employ 558 Chinese. The number of Canadians which would be necessary is nearly the same, 537. The monthly wage for 558 Chinese totals $6,045, or an average of $10.83 per person. If Canadians were employed in the engine room the total monthly wages would be $25,345, and the average per person, $57.99.

Mr. WALSH: If the hon. gentleman will permit a question, in making these comparisons is he comparing equal grades of work in all instances, engine work with engine work, and so on?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, in all instances. These figures are embodied in a statement, included in the records of the committee, given by Mr. Flintoft, representing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

It is not necessary to go over all the figures. The yearly total of present wages for a Chinese crew is $203,880. The total if the company had to employ Canadian seamen would be $929,808. It is largely, therefore, a matter of dollars and cents, but not altogether that; it is that and something more. We were told by the same representatives that, employing Chinese, they can shift them from one service to another, which could not be done with white sailors. I asked whether these men had an organization which could take up grievances with the proper officials of the company. I was told that they had no such organization, that the company dealt with each man individually. Now my understanding is that the crews for these boats are supplied by an agency in Hong Kong, and that these agencies control almost the very lives of the men so supplied. This house would be doing something worth while if it stipulated that before any further subsidies be paid to the Canadian Pacific steamships for this service the government or the department would have to be satisfied that the wages and working conditions on the boats were comparable to those prevailing on similar boats either in this country or in other countries.

At some other time I may bring up the matter more specifically, but this year at the international labour conference I believe six conventions were passed relating to wages and working conditions of men who follow the sea for their living. Ours is a maritime country and sooner or later this government will have to consider ratifying these agreements. I am quite satisfied that the conditions at present prevailing on Canadian Pacific boats will not fit in with the conventions adopted at the international labour conference. Therefore we might as well take the matter in hand now so that in this respect we may be on what more nearly approaches an even basis with other maritime countries.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): I was a member of the committee which dealt with this question, and although I am from the extreme east I am in hearty accord with the resolution of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). He approached the question in a very reasonable manner. On the committee last year all the groups in this house were represented. The case was presented and the evidence submitted in the same reasonable manner. The recommendation submitted to the committee by the subcommittee was accepted unanimously and presented to this house, where it was approved, so that it seems to me the two companies involved, the Canadian Pacific steamships and the Canadian National steamships, should be compelled to abide by the decision.

The question is one of principle, and it was definitely shown by the evidence that it has a direct bearing on the unemployment problem. The necessary seamen are available among Canadians on the British Columbia coast, therefore the Canadian Pacific steamships should make use of their services in preference to those of men of other nationalities. The same condition exists on the Atlantic coast, and it is with that in view that I approach the subject, having regard to the non-compliance of the Canadian National steamships with the very reasonable recommendation or request of parliament.

As will be seen at page 211 of Hansard for January 25, 1937, I asked several questions dealing with the number of people employed by the Canadian National Steamships, with particular regard to masters, pursers, doctors, engineers, plumbers and electricians, firemen and oilers and stewards. In nearly every case, Mr. Speaker—and I say this advisedly—the answers submitted to the Minister of Transport and in turn tabled by him were camouflage. They evaded the question by referring to British born subjects. The question we were dealing with in our committee and in this house was the employment of a greater number of Canadians. I feel that if we are to have resolutions carried out after they have been adopted by this house we must have the support of the minister in charge of the department, and he must see that the officials under his jurisdiction do not send to him answers such as were tabled in reply to the questions I asked. I say that in a kindly way, but nevertheless I urge that the answers submitted to the minister certainly were not in keeping with his position as head of a large railway and steamship system. I am not satisfied with the answers I received, and I intend to pursue the matter further.

I am glad this resolution has been brought up, because it gives me an opportunity of definitely supporting the stand that has been taken by the hon. member for New Westminster. I need not go over this whole question; the ground has been very thoroughly covered by the mover of the resolution. I believe that the principle should be supported by every member of the house. Why should we appoint a committee to spend hours, days, weeks and months listening to evidence under oath and to make a finding—and I say it was a very reasonable finding, not calculated to disturb the existing set-up—if we do not see that the finding is carried into effect? The report only asked, in regard to the Pacific coast, that of some 2,033 employees some 277 in one particular department should be replaced. That was in the department comprising the deck-hands, which was efficiently operated up to 1913 by white seamen. It would mean a few dollars extra as far as the company is concerned, but in very large measure it would relieve unemployment among seamen on the Pacific coast. I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) should take that point into very serious consideration, and from that angle I should think he is more or less duty bound to support this resolution. I know he is sincere in his desire to bring about a greater measure of employment among Canadian citizens. That being so, he should support a move which has for its object the greater employment of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast.

What applies to the Pacific coast applies equally to the Atlantic coast. The request made in that connection was very fair. A complete replacement as far as the West Indies service was concerned was not asked; a fifty per cent replacement was recommended. I should like to read that recommendation. After giving a large number of sound reasons the committee said:

> In view of the above and other reasons presented, it is respectfully recommended that, in so far as the Atlantic coast is concerned, the Canadian National Steamships Limited be advised that it is not suggested nor desirable to change the general set-up of the officers and engineers in so far as Canadians are concerned, but that this company be requested to employ a greater number of Canadian citizens, particularly as applying to positions in connection with the steward's and firemen's departments, and your committee recommends that at least fifty per cent of those employed in these two departments be Canadian citizens, domiciled in Canada.

I say that was a very reasonable request, but what has happened? They have practically ignored that recommendation. On December 6 I drew attention to the fact that at the end of another nine days, on December 15, six months would have elapsed since the recommendation was made by this house.

Up to that time I think something like thirteen or fifteen men were employed. Quite recently they advised me that I would be pleased to learn that they had employed fifty-nine men throughout the maritime provinces. I say that is not good enough, Mr. Speaker. I think the Minister of Transport would be well advised to bear in mind that a recommendation approved by this house should be placed before the Canadian National Steamships in such a way that the spirit of the resolution will be fully carried out.

I do not think I need add anything further. As I have already said, I am supporting the resolution because I believe the general principle is sound, and I believe it is a step that will bring about greater employment among our Canadian citizens and to that extent relieve the unemployment that exists to-day.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question. I was a member of this committee; I listened to the evidence given before it, but I would like to have my memory refreshed. In the evidence given before the committee was it not brought out that one Canadian would do as much work as two or three Chinese?

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Since I was chairman of the committee on industrial and international relations, Mr. Speaker, and thus had something to do with the investigation into this question and the report that is now before the house, it might be well for me to make a brief statement in connection with that committee, its investigation and its report.

I think hon. members are well aware of the fact that the committee on industrial and international relations was established about 1924 or 1925. There has been some discussion as to whether or not this committee should be divided. The suggestion has been made that there should be one committee to deal with industrial questions and another to deal with international questions. Up to the present this suggestion has not been followed out and we still have one committee which deals sometimes with purely industrial questions and sometimes with purely international questions, or the both combined.

The question before the committee last year was both industrial and international in scope. This committee, like all standing committees, was representative of the membership of the house. I believe there were thirty members making up the committee and its membership was fairly representative of the house as a whole. The committee gave the matter every consideration, and its report was unanimous. Further than that, the decision of the house with reference to this report was also unanimous. Here we have a picture of what took place. A committee of the house investigated this industrial and international matter; the report of the committee was adopted unanimously in the committee and accepted unanimously in the house. The report had reference to two of the great shipping companies of the dominion, the Canadian National (West Indies Steamships) Limited, and the Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited. Reference has been made in the house to the fact that the Canadian National has taken some action in connection with the report. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has just stated that this company has taken partial action in this connection. I think that hon. members who keep in touch with committee reports have a feeling that Canadian National Steamships Limited have accepted this report in the right spirit. We look for further action in this regard. The action taken up to the present would lead members of the committee to believe that all that is necessary to be done is for the responsible minister to direct the attention of the Canadian National Steamships Limited to the limited action they have taken on the report or have same repeated if it has already been done. I think we can look for a total acceptance of the report by that company in the near future.

But what about Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited? What has that company done with regard to the report? The feeling seems to be that up to the present nothing has been done. I would not want to see the matter referred again to the committee for further investigation. I believe that when a committee investigates a matter referred to it by the house and brings in a unanimous report, that should settle it. Any further action should be taken by the government. I believe the committee on industrial and international relations did its work successfully in this regard and any further reference to it would be a mistake. In explanation, may I say I took the same stand last year when the matter of pensions for the blind came before the house. This matter had been investigated by a committee and reported upon, but no action had been taken. The question was raised in the house as to whether or not there should be a further reference to a committee, and I took the stand that there should not be. I think that stand has been supported by the fact that the government has taken action this year in this regard, and that pensions for the blind are a reality without any further investigation.

There is still hope that the Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited will reconsider this report and do its best to follow out the recommendations made therein. That is my candid conviction. Perhaps the next move therefore ought to be an investigation by the Department of Trade and Commerce to see whether the men desired by the Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited for deck service are available. If we have well trained Canadians available for this shipping service, they should be employed even though it is necessary to pay them more. This means we should know exactly where we stand as a House of Commons on the question and have all the facts at our disposal. The Canadian Pacific should be given a square deal in this matter, and its fullest explanation sought. I believe the Department of Trade and Commerce should get in touch with the company and investigate the availability of Canadian seamen for the work required. If the investigation were started as soon as possible and the facts disclosed, we would then know just exactly where we stand.

I am not placing any blame upon any department of the government, but as chairman of that committee I should like to see the matter cleared up for good. I am confident that if the problem were tackled in the right way that is cooperatively by the Canadian Pacific, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Labour department as well, if it is thought necessary, a solution no doubt could be obtained in the very near future.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I was also a member of the committee which met last year and listened carefully to all the evidence submitted to it. As a member of the house I voted in favour of the report of the committee, and I believe I ought to make a brief statement with reference to the resolution now under consideration.

Before going into detail may I say that I observed a good deal of applause from the government benches when the hon. member (Mr. Reid) introduced the vitally important resolution now before us. The applause would seem to indicate that if it goes to a vote those who applauded so vigorously will not do as they did yesterday, after they had applauded the motion of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) in connection with an amendment to the Copyright Amendment Act of 1931. Yesterday hon. members opposite who were in the house applauded the motion most vigorously.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There is no objection to applauding.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We applauded a good speech.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) cannot get away with that. When the vote was called quite a number of hon. members left the chamber, and those who came in for the vote like good children stepped up to the front and did as they were told. They voted against that which had been applauded by hon. members who were in their seats. I hope there will be a little more stamina in their backbones to-day. Although at the moment I am not stating whether or not I should support the resolution, may I say it is of such tremendous importance that I do not believe we should be hasty in coming to a decision. I notice the Postmaster General is looking at me earnestly.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am not applauding.

Mr. MacNICOL: Upon looking at the minister's estimates I notice a subsidy of $600,000, which must have been endorsed by the government, to be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to carry mail to the orient.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In what department?

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the Postmaster General, at page 38 of the estimates.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Look again.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister should have the information without asking me for it. I refer to page 38 of the estimates, under the heading "Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions." However, this is a small item so far as the Post Office Department is concerned, and probably the minister has forgotten it.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It is under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MacNICOL: As the vote to which I have referred must have been discussed and endorsed by the government, in what position will the government be when it deals with the resolution now before us? That is why I said at the outset that if the government is opposed to the resolution, all hon. members opposite who have spoken in favour of it will have to step up to the front and vote against that which they applauded and which, by their speeches, they have favoured.

In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) I suggest we should have a statement from the acting minister indicating the government's position. No doubt a resolution of such importance has been discussed by the government. The chairman of the committee which sat last session, the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), proved to be an excellent one. He went to no end of trouble to see that the committee obtained all the information which could assist it in arriving at a decision. The suggestion he made a few moments ago appeals to me; as a matter of fact before he made it I had the same idea in mind. He has recommended that the government appoint someone to go to Vancouver to ascertain whether the statement made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—and I have questioned them in the matter—to the effect that there are not men available to replace the present crews, or the contention of the hon. member for New Westminster that men are available, is the true one. In what position are hon. members when they must judge as to the accuracy of either contention. The government ought to be in a position to tell us whether or not they have made an investigation. Had I been minister of trade and commerce I would have had someone go to Vancouver to make a thorough inquiry into the submissions of the hon. member for New Westminster and of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

I am in earnest when I say it was obvious that the hon. member was sincere in his observations. I believe he was conscientious, that he made an exhaustive inquiry, and that his presentation was in the interests of the working men of Vancouver. On the other hand I have no reason to doubt the sincerity of the position taken by the representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company who appeared before the committee. Contradictory statements were made, and I repeat the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that someone should be sent to Vancouver to ascertain which of the two statements is one hundred per cent true, and whether or not anything can be done.

We are now faced with the necessity of voting either for or against the resolution. If we vote for it we are agreeing that no further moneys from the treasury of Canada by way of subsidy be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company towards the operation of the Empress ships operating between Vancouver and the orient. Certainly there is no give or take in the wording I have quoted; we must vote either for or against it. If we vote for it, what will happen? There would be no use in the Postmaster General granting $600,000 to carry the mail to the orient. If we vote for the resolution now before the house we immediately shut out the necessity for the money asked by the Postmaster General. The minister shakes his head,—well, I tell him that if the house accepts the resolution and if every hon. member who votes for it intends to stick to the value of his vote, then those hon. members would have to vote against the minister's estimate.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I hope not.

Mr. MacNICOL: They cannot vote for it. Hon. members cannot vote for a resolution which states we must not give a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and then later vote the very subsidy we say we must not give. I am fully in accord with the recommendations the committee made at the last session. They were read, but I think they are worth reading again, leaving out the preamble in each case.

1. . . . and that they be requested—

That is the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

—to afford Canadian seamen a reasonable degree of employment at the earliest possible convenience.

I am strongly in accord with that. I believe the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should employ workmen who are citizens in the fullest sense of the term. How otherwise are we to have a completely Canadian marine service? Someone—I believe it was the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor)—speaking a short time ago, strongly advocated the employment of Canadians, and so do I. I would go as far as the suggestion referred to by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh), and if the further employment of Canadians should necessitate an increase in the subsidy I would be in favour of it. I recall that a year ago when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's representatives appeared before the committee, they intimated that they would be in accord with such a proposal, and that if a larger subsidy were given they would go further than they have done in employing Canadians. The second recommendation was:

That . . . the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace the orientals now so employed by Canadian seamen, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity.

I am not sure whether the company has yet had sufficient opportunity to select and try out the number of seamen sufficient to carry out all the recommendations made by the committee.

An hon. MEMBER: They have had seven months.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am in favour of the recommendations we made, but I should like the responsible minister of the crown to tell us just exactly what will be involved if this resolution is carried. It states in emphatic language that no subsidy should be given, and that means immediately. My mind is not definitely made up as to what I should do. Will the minister representing the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us what is the import of this resolution? If it will cripple the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, this house should think carefully before passing any resolution of this kind. I am not here to speak for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. During my whole life I have been associated with thousands of workmen, and their interests are paramount with me; but having had that experience I realize that one cannot help labour by crippling a great organization like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I know what industry is. I am talking from twenty-five years of experience of the practical end of it, not book knowledge or the knowledge of a man who looks at industry from the outside. If you cripple industry you reduce employment. I think the government should be in a position to tell us, before we vote on this resolution, what will be the actual effect if it is passed. When all is said, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have done a very great deal for Canada. If my memory serves me aright, last year it was stated before the committee by one of the company's representatives that they had 53,000 men employed in their business in Canada.

Mr. REID: Railways and all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course, railways and all. You cannot hurt one part of an organization without hurting the whole of it. In addition they purchased in Canada $53,000,000 worth of goods, a large proportion of which would represent labour. I remember that I asked a Canadian Pacific railway witness where they carried on their repairs. Some repairs, if not most, it was stated, were made in Hong Kong. Then I asked him where they got the material that was used in making repairs to their ships, and he said, in Canada and in Great Britain.

It is not up to me to say just what should be done to this resolution, but it is the duty of the government to tell this house, before we go any further, what their position is in reference to a refusal, in accordance with this resolution, to give a subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company unless they immediately employ Canadians and displace the orientals now engaged. I am in favour of the Canadian, but I do not approve the crippling of any great industry without knowing the effects upon trade and employment in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before the hon. member takes his seat, might I ask him if, as representing an industrial constituency, he considers it in the interests of Canadian workmen to have work done in Hong Kong.

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked the witness that question, from the point of view that personally I favoured having the work done in Canada. But the reply was that in Hong Kong the docks, including machine shops and the necessary equipment to make major repairs on their ships and engines, were more suitable, and I understood that if the work was not done in Hong Kong they would have to send the ships to Great Britain or the United States as we did not have that equipment in Canada. I am sorry we have not; I would much rather that we had, but as we have not I would rather that the work be done in Hong Kong, a British territory, than in the United States.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I have but a very few words to say on this matter. I notice that most of the hon. members who have spoken to the motion were members of the committee which investigated this matter and brought in a report. It is nearly a year since the report was presented, and the substance of it may be a little hazy in the minds of many members. It is not my desire or intention to read the whole report, but it seems to me that the intent and wording of the report were very clear and that there should not be much difficulty about making up one's mind as to what should be done with this resolution. If, therefore, I might claim the indulgence of the house for a few moments, I should like to read the explanatory paragraph dealing with the Canadian Pacific railway oriental ships on the Pacific coast. May I explain that there are, apparently, three types of Pacific coast shipping dealt with: coastwise shipping, shipping to Australia and New Zealand, that is the antipodes, and shipping to the orient, which is carried on by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's Empress boats. In the report the explanatory paragraph states:

Oriental shipping: the third type is chiefly carried on by the Empress boats of the Canadian Pacific railway transpacific service. These ships receive a substantial subsidy from the government. The total number of men employed to man them is 2,033, of whom 265 are white British, engaged as officers and engineers. The remaining 1,768 are Chinese, comprising 277 deck-hands, 558 in the engine room, and 933 victuallers. It is claimed by the company that, as much of their passenger trade, namely 67 per cent, through and local, is oriental, this type of labour is not only cheaper, but infinitely more satisfactory than white labour, since the latter could not be gotten to cater to oriental passengers on the one hand or mix with oriental labour on the other. It is moreover claimed by the company that the service is now supplied at a serious yearly loss and that the extra cost involved in the substitution of Canadians for orientals would make the service practically impossible of operation.

That paragraph practically covers the testimony which was submitted to the committee on this matter, and it is explanatory; it leaves nothing very much to be guessed at. The committee has taken it for granted that the testimony contained in that paragraph was bona fide and was the real substance of the investigation so far as orientals on Canadian Pacific ships are concerned. And we have taken it for granted that the statements made are true; we give them full credit for their truth. Our recommendation on the occasion was:

That, as up to the year 1913, the decks of the Empress boats were manned by white seamen, and inasmuch as the deck service is an important and responsible branch of the work of these boats, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace with Canadian seamen, the orientals now so employed, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity.

I do not believe there is anything very arbitrary in that report. The report seems to me to be a very reasonable and fair-minded view of the whole matter, and the request embodied in it, submitted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to replace Chinamen on deck with white seamen, as had been the practice prior to 1913, is a very reasonable one. It does not involve such a very great change, because 277 deck-hands out of a total of 2,033 is not a very large number.

I am going to vote for this resolution, naturally. I believe it is reasonable and fair. In my opinion the request made of the Canadian Pacific is altogether fair and, besides that, it is in the interests of the travelling public that the decks of these boats should be manned by white seamen. This is not an inconsiderate request to make. Altogether the resolution is eminently reasonable and I cannot see how any member of the committee can do anything but vote for the report which was submitted. I am voting for it.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): I desire to say a word in support of the resolution inasmuch as it is of interest to the seafaring people of Nova Scotia, where unemployment is a problem. Nova Scotia being a maritime province, it is, of course, natural that the people should wish to make a living on the sea. With the passing of sailing ships in our province we had many splendid sailors and many officers who, being advanced in years, and not having started with the big companies as apprentices and worked their way up, found that there was no place for them in the seafaring commerce of the world. This has been a problem in Nova Scotia for some years. There was a time when our men could go to the United States and get berths on American vessels, and by that means a good many Nova Scotians maintained their families in the province. But the United States has tightened up its laws in the interests of its own nationals. Its immigration and shipping laws are more restrictive to-day, so that Nova Scotians are not able to find the employment which was available to them in that country a few years ago.

This problem that faces us now is not new; it is the outcome of selfishness—the common selfishness of large corporations which act in their own interests. Shipping has become highly centralized and perhaps necessarily so, and enterprises that become so centralized use their influence with the government of the country to obtain subventions and subsidies. They get what protection they need, and after they have obtained that protection for themselves they want to hire sailors in the world market. That is unfair, and it is not even in sympathy with the policy they represent to the government. If there is one class of people who need protection to-day it is those of our nationals who try to make their living on the sea.

We have no colour problem on the eastern coast; the yellow peril does not exist to the same extent there. I should regret, therefore, to see the colour line drawn, because we have many coloured sailors and citizens in our province.

An hon. MEMBER: It was not drawn; the resolution was amended last year.

Mr. KINLEY: I am glad to hear that. The Dominion Coal Company asked for a subvention; it also asked for protection on coal in order that it might sell to the people of central Canada coal mined in Nova Scotia. I subscribed to that request. At the same time, however, they will hire foreigners to man their ships in the coastal trade of Canada to carry our coal to the markets in which it is sold, and I as a representative of Nova Scotia am expected to support that policy, while they are operating against the interests of the people I represent. That is not good enough. Those who think they can advance their own interests in Canada by means of such a selfish policy will find in time that they are working only against themselves.

In my opinion, we surrendered the privileges and the rights we enjoyed when we entered into the merchant shipping agreement with the British Empire. There may be some reason why in inter-ocean trade there should be some latitude in the hiring of sailors, but why we should give up our rights in the coastal trade and hire anyone but Canadian citizens is something which I cannot understand. This country cannot hope to compete with the sailors of Europe, and if we are ever to have a merchant marine we must see to it that we go through the educational and missionary period, so to speak, and produce and sustain sailors who will be a credit to Canada. Most of the ships on the Atlantic coast are manned by aliens, while there are many Canadians who would like the job. This year the merchant shipping agreement is due to be revised. There is to be an imperial conference after the coronation, and I submit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the government that in making any future arrangements they should take into consideration the interests of Canadian seamen.

We hear a great deal about the balance of trade between Canada and Great Britain. We sell them natural products. Do not forget that they have the carrying of all these goods, and that there is sometimes more profit in carrying the goods than in selling them. You must set off against the trade balance of this country the money that goes out for insurance and carrying charges. We sold our Canadian merchant marine ships that were running to Australia. I think that was a short-sighted policy for this country. We performed the missionary work; for years these ships did not pay, and immediately they began to show a balance on the right side we sold them for practically nothing and allowed other people to do our carrying trade. It is most important with regard to foreign trade that we control the transportation, because the moment others get control they can raise the freight rates. Also if it is in the hands of outside interests, if they see that we are doing too much competition business with another country, they can control it through freight rates.

No country becomes great that does not pioneer upon the sea. All the great countries of history were great upon the sea. In Canada, if we hope to build up the merchant marine and build up a good export trade, we must see to it that our trade routes are properly sustained, that we have men able to man our ships, and that we have the proper trade treaties with foreign countries. So this resolution is of more importance than we may at first think; it is important not only for the present but for the future; our merchant marine is an important factor in building for the future. Also we should do like other countries, look after our own nationals and give them preference in our own country.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I hope the mover of the resolution (Mr. Reid) will feel that its purpose has been largely served by the discussion which has taken place this afternoon. Most, if not all, of those who have spoken were members last year of the industrial and international relations committee. Without exception I think they have expressed disappointment that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not seen fit to comply with the request of that committee, which was concurred in by this house. I say without any hesitation that I share that disappointment.

At the same time this resolution goes far beyond an expression of disappointment. I should like to consider first its form, and then its substance, both very briefly. I think it is correct to say, as indeed the hon. member for New Westminster acknowledged, that it is not proper to speak of a request concurred in by this house as an order of parliament imposed upon the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Obviously the concurrence of this house in that report was in the terms of that report. In other words, it is a request that was communicated to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. For that reason I do not think it will be possible for this house to accept the resolution in respect of its final paragraph, because the suggestion there is that a penalty should be imposed upon the company for non-compliance with an order of this parliament. As I said a moment ago, I share fully the disappointment of other members of the committee in the failure of the company to comply with the request, but I do not believe that we can go to the length of assuming that an order was communicated to the company and that we are entitled to impose a penalty upon the company for refusing to obey an order.

I should like to say a word regarding the communications between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There was no negligence and no delay on the part of the department in communicating the request of the committee as concurred in by this house to the company. The report was concurred in on June 17. On June 29 a letter from the department was sent to the company clearly setting forth the resolution, and the attention of the company was directed to it. On July 8 the Canadian Pacific Railway Company replied to that letter and in their reply they indicated that they doubted their ability to comply with the request upon three grounds: first, that the company could not afford to carry out the request for the employment of Canadian seamen as deck-hands on the trans-pacific service without additional subsidy—

Mr. CAHAN: Has that been communicated to the house?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe these papers were placed upon the table of the house as a parliamentary return.

Mr. CAHAN: Recently? I tried to find them but I could not.

Mr. ROGERS: Within a few days.

Mr. CAHAN: They should not be gone into unless they are at the disposal of the house in considering an important matter like this.

Mr. ROGERS: My impression is that they were placed upon the table of the house on Friday last.

The second objection by the company was to the effect that they anticipated difficulty from labour troubles if Chinese deck-hands were replaced by Canadians. And the third objection, which to my mind is the one material objection, is based upon a doubt as to whether there were enough white seamen available to make the required replacements.

Mr. McINTOSH: All those matters were discussed fully in the committee.

Mr. ROGERS: That is quite true. We have this difference of opinion, however. The hon. member for New Westminster pointed out this afternoon that evidence was submitted to the committee last year that some eleven hundred seamen of all classes were available for employment—I believe that was in British Columbia. He also stated this afternoon that he had discovered by inquiry of the relief department of British Columbia that there are 300 men now on relief in Vancouver who give their occupation as seamen. We have also had it stated that the shipping master of Vancouver reported eighty-five seamen as available. In other words, there is a marked discrepancy in the figures as to seamen who conceivably would be available to replace Chinese deck-hands in the service in question. It has been suggested by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) —and I believe his suggestion was approved by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)—that where such a difference of opinion exists there should be a most thorough investigation to ascertain the facts. It does appear to me that before we are entitled to go further with this matter we should make such an investigation in regard to the availability of a sufficient number of suitable seamen in Vancouver as might be conducted, for example, by a representative of the Department of Trade and Commerce and a representative of the Department of Labour acting with the shipping master of Vancouver. I am bound to say that at first glance it does not seem reasonable that you could not find two or three hundred suitable seamen in Vancouver or along the coast of British Columbia. On the other hand it should be said in fairness to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they have indicated that it would not be wise or in the interests of safety at sea to take on inexperienced seamen. They also draw a distinction between seamen engaged in the coastwise trade and seamen accustomed to deep sea navigation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If Canadian seamen are not available, according to the Canadian Pacific, might they not find some British seamen whom we could bring over as immigrants?

Mr. CAHAN: There are British seamen employed now. There is no doubt that they are British.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe as a matter of fact that the Atlantic services of the Canadian Pacific are now staffed almost exclusively in that way.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I mean for the Pacific services.

Mr. CAHAN: The seamen employed on the oriental service to Hong Kong and Manila are British subjects.

Mr. ROGERS: These seamen are British subjects; that has been put forward as part of the contention of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

I should say one further word in regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and supported by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor). It does seem unsatisfactory that this country, with a Pacific and an Atlantic coast line, should have done so little to develop employment in shipping services. I agree entirely that an effort in that direction is overdue. I have never been able to understand clearly why shipping companies operating Canadian services do not seem able to take on Canadians as apprentices. There was a time in Nova Scotia when Joseph Howe made the prediction that this little province one day would maintain half a million men upon the sea. Even in that day it seemed perhaps an extravagant prediction, but that was in the days of sailing vessels, and the sails of Nova Scotian vessels could be found in the far harbours of the world. To-day that prediction seems fantastic. I have not the figures before me, but I doubt very much whether more than a very few thousand inhabitants of Nova Scotia follow permanently the calling of the sea.

In many fishing ports of the maritime provinces undoubtedly there are young men who, if given the opportunity, I am sure would be willing to follow that calling, and I have no doubt that the same is true on the Pacific coast. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, through its officials, has informed me that it now employs Canadian cadets on the Pacific ships. That, I think, is decidedly a move in the right direction, but I feel that much more could be done in order to train some of our Canadian young men for the mercantile marine. Just how we might proceed in that direction is perhaps not a matter which we need discuss at the present time, but I am inclined to think that corporations which receive substantial assistance through subsidies from the Canadian government have an obligation, in addition to that which they would have without subsidies, to do what can reasonably be done in order to provide such training and such opportunities as might assist us in this country in going further in developing a mercantile marine and in affording maritime employment, particularly to some of our younger men.

I need say no more on this question. At the beginning of my remarks I said I hoped the mover of the resolution would feel that his object had been served very largely by this discussion. I do not think we can go the length of adopting the resolution in its present form, so I would ask the mover if he would withdraw it, on the distinct understanding that the Department of Trade and Commerce, I think I may say acting in conjunction with the Department of Labour, will look into this question of the availability of Canadian seamen for oriental service in Vancouver and in British Columbia generally, and will continue efforts already undertaken to induce the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to do what reasonably may be done to afford a larger degree of employment to Canadian seamen on these vessels.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say. In the first place, the ships that are employed by the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company in the oriental trade are not Canadian ships; that is, they are not registered in Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: Are they not of Canadian registry?

Mr. CAHAN: No, I believe they are registered in London; at least that was so a short time ago, and they are really owned in London. They come under the Merchant Shipping Act of England and are controlled not only by that statute but by the regulations drawn up under it.

Mr. ROGERS: I speak subject to correction, but I always understood that the Pacific ships were of Canadian registry and the others were of British registry.

Mr. McIVOR: Subsidized by Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, Canada gets full value for what she pays for the transmission of mails over those lines. I have been over the Canadian Pacific line through to Yokohama, to Kobe, down to Shanghai and Hong Kong, on to Manila and return, and I have seen the operation of those ships. From my observations I would have been surprised at the statement contained in the report of the special committee which has been quoted by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) and which no doubt, as he states, gives a fair synopsis of the evidence presented before that committee, that sixty-seven per cent of the through and local passenger traffic is oriental. I notice that in the evidence presented and summarized by the consul general of China and attached to the report as an exhibit it is stated that from September 7, 1935, to November 16, 1935, an accurate computation showed that 61·57 per cent of the through passengers of all classes were orientals and 72·53 per cent of the inter-port passengers of all classes were oriental. I should have thought, from my observation, that the percentage would be larger than that, but probably that is an accurate computation, which is better evidence than my observations.

But, Mr. Speaker, those ships are operated under peculiar circumstances. For instance, from the time the ships enter the port of Shanghai until they return and leave the port of Shanghai—that is, during the voyage from Shanghai to Hong Kong and on to Manila and back, touching at intermediate ports—those ships are veritable ships of war, and carry a contingent of sepoys of the Indian army for protection. That is absolutely necessary. They are the only safe ships for Chinese passengers operating on that Chinese coast which are adequately protected against raids of pirates. From my observation I doubt very much whether you will find Canadian seamen prepared to accept even the rates of wages suggested by my hon. friend from New Westminster for service as deck-hands on those ships. From memory it seems to me that the officers and cadets were largely Canadians. The commander of the Empress of Japan was a Canadian, and I think the cadets on that ship included a number of Canadians also.

I doubt very much whether the ordinary Canadian sailor is prepared to mingle with and be part of a crew of Chinese seamen. I doubt if he would be willing to submit to supervision for weeks at a time on a ship sailing south and north by a contingent of Indian sepoys. It may well be that there are sixty or more unemployed seamen registered with the shipping officials of the government at Vancouver, but I doubt whether that number are available for this particular service.

So far as the other services on board ship are concerned, three-fourths of these stewards would be employed in the preparation and serving of food for Japanese and Chinese passengers. Chinese are required for the preparation and service of this food, because most of them understand sufficient Japanese to communicate with passengers of that race. Therefore a great deal is to be said in favour of the employment of so-called oriental seamen and oriental servitors.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think the question of stewards has arisen; it is solely a question of the deck hands.

Mr. CAHAN: Some complaint is made as to the number employed in the other services. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) quoted the report of the committee in this connection. I understood that emphasis was placed on the fact that Chinese were employed in the engine room and as victuallers. These ships purchase a large part of their supplies at Hong Kong. This is natural, in that the necessary supplies can be obtained more readily at that port. I noticed that some supplies were taken on at Vancouver, and also some fruit at Honolulu, but that was all. When seventy-five per cent of those on board are accustomed to Chinese or Japanese food as prepared by orientals, it is useless to talk of employing Canadians to perform this service. I doubt very much whether Canadian boys could be found who would be prepared to undertake such menial service as attending upon these oriental passengers.

A good deal has been said about shipping in Nova Scotia. The young men in Nova Scotia, who are prepared to start at the bottom to learn the marine engineering trade or the work of manning and operating a steamship, are now able to secure employment, but the fact is that the great body of young men who come out of school to-day believe they are fitted for some higher occupation in the educational and social scale. Very few of them are offering for this sort of marine service.

I had not looked into this resolution before, as no one had ever called it to my attention. However, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) told me the other day that he was bringing up this matter again. I am sure that the resolution cannot pass in its present form. The committee made a request; in their report they recited certain facts and then recommended that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace orientals now so employed with Canadian seamen, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity. I think it would be improper to regard those words as an order from this house. I do not know whether the house would be competent to make an order under the circumstances. We would be ordering a British ship registered under the Merchant Shipping Act of England to replace British subjects who are orientals with Canadian seamen simply because, first, the ship touches at the ports of Vancouver and Victoria, and, second, because it receives a certain amount under a contract for carrying mails. This is not a subsidy; it is a mail contract under which the company receives $50,000 per month, if I remember correctly. There is a contract outstanding. The question may arise as to the renewal of the contract when it is terminated. The present contract was made on June 26, 1936, and upon its termination a new contract must be drawn up and executed.

What is the government prepared to do? Is it prepared to do what is suggested, namely, to refuse to pay for the carriage of their mails to oriental ports by British shipping when the only competitors for this service, which is important to Canada and important to the whole empire, is American shipping sailing out of the port of San Francisco? That shipping is most heavily subsidized by the post office department of the United States.

Mr. KINLEY: And employing American citizens.

Mr. CAHAN: The subsidy is so heavy that they can afford to hire American citizens and pay them twice the wages paid to British subjects. They are not British ships and are not operating under the Merchant Shipping Act of England. True, they are employing American citizens, but it must be remembered that the sailors on these ships, who are hired at Hong Kong, are British subjects. Furthermore, if we sever that contract, refuse to extend it or attempt to make a new contract at the end of the current year, where will Canada obtain the service? I recall that when I served as a member of the privy council the question of this service came up for consideration. We went into it thoroughly and were convinced that it could not be maintained except through the payment of a proper compensation for the carrying of mails. I have not discussed the matter with the Canadian Pacific Railway officials, but I have read, and from statements made in public and the financial statements put out by the Canadian Pacific Steamship Company I have reason to believe, that this service is now being operated at a loss. That fact has been recognized by officials of the British Board of Trade in England. Only recently in the press I read a statement to the effect that the British Board of Trade is recommending that subsidies, in addition to those paid by Canada, be paid by the British government for the purpose of securing the maintenance of this service.

Therefore I believe the government would be wise indeed, as the Minister of Labour suggests, to take some further time to consider the whole matter. I went into the matter pretty thoroughly with my colleagues in the late government, when the question of subsidy was before us in 1933 and 1934. I acquired information which, although it may not be quite accurate at this time, leads me to the belief that it would be a gross neglect of national duty if at this date the government were to attempt to sever the contract or to refuse to extend it without first ascertaining all the real, basic, underlying facts—and those facts cannot be obtained in shipping offices in New Westminster or Vancouver. Grave international considerations would have to be discussed and weighed by the government. Therefore I trust the house will not adopt the resolution and that the hon. member for New Westminster, whose pertinacity and assiduity we all admire, will realize that there are graver interests concerned, especially in view of the relations among competing countries on the Pacific and other grave issues which may arise in that quarter. I believe he will admit that full and complete inquiry is required, and that that inquiry should be made before any decision is taken to cancel the present contract, or before the government decides it will not renew the contract except upon conditions mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. HOWDEN: In the hon. member's opinion is it reasonable to expect the railway company to consider the replacement by white labour of the 277 oriental labourers who man the decks?

Mr. CAHAN: Under the circumstances I doubt whether it is reasonable to state that a ship operating under the British Merchant Shipping Act should in all cases employ Canadian rather than British seamen. I believe the committee are to be commended in setting forth in their report the case as they understood it, and as indicated in the passage read by the hon. member for St. Boniface. They were acting within their legitimate jurisdiction in making the recommendations they did make. It is another matter, however, to decide whether their recommendations could be carried out without serious loss to the company and without grave repercussions in quarters other than New Westminster and Vancouver.

Mr. R. E. FINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly I was not in the house when my colleague from Halifax (Mr. Isnor) addressed the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. FINN: This is the first time I have ever been asked to talk louder. I was pleased, too, to hear the statements of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who also comes from Nova Scotia. I do not wish to misinterpret his observations, but I believe the effect of his statement was that the company was receiving $2,000 per month for carrying the mail.

Mr. ROGERS: $50,000.

Mr. FINN: I have before me an estimate which shows that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company on the Canada-China and Japan service is receiving $600,000.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, for the year.

Mr. CAHAN: $50,000 per month.

Mr. FINN: This reminds me of arguing a case in court. Fifty thousand dollars per month, if one does not consider the total for the year, looks small; but when it is $600,000 a year, over half a million, it looks large. The same company, for its service on the Atlantic, receives $250,000 from the treasury of Canada.

Hon. members have spoken about oriental deck crews and the reluctance of white people to mingle with the orientals in filling positions on board ship. There is a condition in connection with the West Indies service which I believe has been carried a little too far. I refer to the exclusion of the white man to the advantage of the coloured man. I want to be fair to Sir Edward Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and to the shareholders of the company, when I repeat my observations of last year to the effect that for its service on the Atlantic the company in question receives a subsidy of $250,000 per year for carrying the mail. Their port is the port of Saint John. I have no objection whatever to that. It is a sister eastern port that was developed largely under the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he was prime minister of this country; I refer to Courtenay bay. But I would say in reference to the port of Halifax, upon which millions of dollars have been spent, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should consider turning at least one or two of their boats at that port each year and not turning them all at Saint John. They now turn there all their Mont boats, all their Duchess boats, and all their Beaver boats of 10,000 tons deadweight capacity which are freight carriers. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has correctly stated that they come under the British Merchant Shipping Act; they are under the British flag; they are not registered in Canada but in the old land. They are receiving three-quarters of a million dollars a year in Canada and are paying no attention to the desire for development of all ports in connection with their service.

[Mr. Finn.]

There is no doubt that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are giving a splendid service. They have excellent ships, and their new boat, the Empress of Britain, is, if not the largest, one of the finest in the world. But I would say, as I said last September to Sir Edward Beatty in conversation with him at Montreal, that the officials of the company should consider this question, because under the former administration, and in the days of the late president of the Canadian National railways and steamships, Halifax being the eastern terminus of the Canadian National system, an agreement was entered into with the Cunard line and the White Star line by which they were provided with something in the nature of a subsidy on condition that a certain amount of freight should be provided, and the subsidy was to be reduced in proportion to the volume of freight over and above that amount. The result was that the White Star line and the Cunard line increased their business in freight tonnage at the port of Halifax by over fifty per cent. To-day they are calling at the port of Halifax and getting as much as they can, but not as much as we would like to go through the port in order that our stevedores, the men who work on the waterfront, and those who are employed at the terminal in casual and temporary labour during the winter season when the St. Lawrence is closed, may receive more adequate returns. If we are to continue to make grants to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in respect of their Atlantic service, those two ports should be served by their boats; they should not land passengers and mail and run their own trains over the Canadian National, in competition with that system, to Montreal and through to the west, with the result, as was stated in the committee last winter, that most of the mail to Vancouver was carried on Canadian Pacific trains, because it was said, the Canadian National did not have mail cars, though it was shown when the matter was investigated that the Canadian National had plenty of cars. But the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were carrying practically all the mails to the more important points between Montreal and Vancouver.

We hear a great deal about deficits on the Canadian National Railways. Last year the deficit was $41,000,000 on the Canadian National lines, and on what they call the eastern lines it was $5,400,000. That was made up of two lines in the province of Quebec, the line from Halifax to Riviere du Loup, the roads they have taken over in the maritimes, and the road from Riviere du Loup to Diamond junction outside Montreal. If that is held up to the people of Canada as a bugbear, as a reason for the unification of the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National lines, I would submit this consideration, I am not a mathematician, but if reference is had to the number of years that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not been paying dividends to their shareholders, it will be found that the annual amount is almost equal to the deficit on the Canadian National system. That is a complete answer to the many public utterances of outstanding men who to-day are favourable to the unification of these two roads, or at least to the handing over of the best paying sections of the national system. Our late lamented leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, placed upon the statute books of Canada the Transcontinental Railway Act. That act was a statutory agreement between the Grand Trunk and the government of the day.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I would point out to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Finn) that he should confine his remarks to the resolution before the house.

Mr. FINN: Well, sir, as I have once before said in this house, I have never taken exception to your ruling, though it seems to me that I am in the unfortunate position that any point of order which is taken by the chair is taken by the hon. gentleman who now occupies it. I will limit my remarks as closely as I can within the four corners of the resolution. The facts therein contained are food for thought for every hon. member.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) made the statement that Canadians do not desire to accept menial positions and therefore it would not be fair to employ them as deck-hands and in similar occupations on these Canadian Pacific boats running out to China and Japan. He also intimated that conditions in respect of weather were such that orientals were more suitable, that they understood the coast better than Canadians. I take issue with him on that point, because it will be found that when we were operating the Canadian merchant marine, running ten ships to Australia and New Zealand, only once was there an accident in typhoons or any other kind of weather that is encountered south of the equator, and that was due to the fact that the third officer of the ship did not carry out the instructions of the captain, who had gone into the chart room in order to refer to the chart, ascertain his true position and take his bearings in reference to cape Moreton light as he was going in and up the lovely Brisbane river, to the city of Brisbane in Australia. If our Nova Scotia captains, officers and crew can successfully navigate these ships on the Pacific, surely they can navigate them to China and Japan. Does my hon. friend mean, and is he serious when he says, that they are not capable, that these Chinese or Japanese are more capable? If so, I would ask him this question: How can he justify that statement in view of the fact that the Empress of Britain is to-day on a trip around the world, and that on that ship is the same crew that operated her between the port of Quebec and the port of Southampton? On this trip around the world she will encounter all sorts of weather, and the tour will take six months. The crew is British, but I am sorry to say there are very few Canadians on board. The captain is a Nova Scotian, as I have said.

As the ex-Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said, we maritimers take an interest in the development of our young men. To-day, however, we find that young men of twenty-two, twenty-three and twenty-seven, holding masters' foreign-going certificates, cannot set foot on board a ship because there is not a ship for them to go on board, although, as I have said before, it took us so long to establish a great trade route for which we acquired a number of ships. That fleet was a paying concern when it was sold, ten ships for $450,000, or $45,000 each. Some of these ships were afterwards sold for $115,000 and there is some explanation due the people of this country in that regard. The people must have that explanation. Why were these ships sold in such haste? In the contract there was a clause providing that the ships were to be operated for two years and that, if the officers and crews were competent, they should be retained. But when these ships got into Montreal and were sold at $45,000 each, the captains and officers simply had to walk ashore without a job. The ships were sold to the Japanese and Chinese and to-day the steamship companies that are operating the line to Australia and New Zealand have not on their ships one Canadian; they have not one maritimer, not one man from British Columbia, nor any Canadian from the inland waters.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George comes from Halifax, having lived there a great many years, and he knows the calibre of men there—and the same is true of the men of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. And yet these men are to-day landlubbers, with nothing to do but to look out and see the waves washing on the shores of Nova Scotia. When things have come to such a pass I submit that before we vote these vast sums of money for any steamship company, whether it be a British or a Canadian, an Australian or a New Zealand company, we should see to it that Canadians are taken care of. Our first duty is to Canada and Canadians, and I hold that the responsibility is with the government and not with hon. gentlemen opposite who relinquished that responsibility in 1935. The responsibility is to see to it, without disrupting any of the great services either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, that our Canadian sailor lads—and I speak more particularly for those of Nova Scotia and especially those lads in the county I have the honour to represent along with my colleague (Mr. Isnor)—shall be fairly represented among those who are engaged on ships operated by companies that receive subsidies. To my knowledge there are on the Canadian Pacific boats two cadets who are Nova Scotians, but apart from these most of the men are from the old land. In order to get a place our men must go to England and serve for a time on some training ship, then enter as cadets and work their way up to the rank of fourth officer, and so on. This was not the way with the hardy men on the coast of Nova Scotia; it was not the training that the commander of the Empress of Britain received, the commodore of his fleet. He was never a cadet; the ships on which he served were schooners, brigantines, barques, full-rigged ships, and he worked his way up to the very high position he now occupies as commodore of the Canadian Pacific fleet, a great honour to Canada and especially to the province from which I come.

Before these subsidies are paid, I submit that there should be taken up seriously with the executive of the various companies who are operating these ships to Australia and New Zealand, under a holding company in Montreal, with the executive of the Canadian Pacific, and with the management of other lines, the question which we have been discussing to-day affecting our Canadian seamen. Let me say that I am not singling out the Canadian Pacific, because they give splendid service and many millions of dollars are involved. I do submit, however, that there should be at least what might be called a happy compromise to the advantage of those in Canada who make their living on the sea, who have taken up seamanship as a profession, and whose ultimate goal is that which has been attained by the captain of the Empress of Britain. I regret to say, however, that the opportunity for such men is passing rapidly, as rapidly as we are passing generally from the old school into the new, not only in politics but in every other walk of life. One does not realize that more than when he is at the grave of someone who has passed to the great beyond and hears those words pronounced—"He is no more." The Canadian sailor lad might say, the Nova Scotia sailor lad might say, as the Spanish champion said:

> No more, there is no more to lift the sword for now,
> My king is false, my hope betrayed, my father; O! the worth,
> The glory and the loveliness are pass'd away from earth.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): At a convenient time when the estimates are under discussion I propose to discuss the question of shipping as it affects this country. It is not my purpose to do so now. I rise to direct the attention of the minister responsible for the administration of the department to the language of the resolution. Surely the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) will agree that this house cannot adopt a resolution in that language—

Mr. ROGERS: I sought to point that out.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the minister intended to. We cannot adopt this resolution—

Mr. ROGERS: I entirely agree.

Mr. BENNETT: —in view of the effect it would have upon the whole system of government provided for by the British North America Act. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who is so happy in expressing his opinions and so tenacious in holding them, should not have spoken to someone before he placed in his resolution these words:

> And whereas the recommendation presented by the committee passed the House of Commons unanimously, and thereby became an order of parliament.

Parliament consists of three estates: the crown, the senate and the commons. Until such time as parliament has acted in the manner provided for by the British North America Act, any action of this house cannot be said to be an order of parliament.

In the next recital the hon. member unfortunately repeats it:

> And whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has ignored the instructions and has not complied with the order given by parliament.

And in the closing paragraph of the resolution he says that they should not receive subsidy—> —until such times as they do obey the order of parliament.

I have no observations to make about the resolution except that surely the government cannot permit such a resolution to be placed upon the journals of this house without doing such violence to our constitutional practice as will run contra not only to the declared foundation of our constitution, but also to the judgment in the referendum and initiative case, in which the court of last resort expressed the view that there could be no valid legislation of that kind because it was essential that the three estates—in that case two, the lieutenant governor as well as the legislature—should operate together to produce a valid law. It would be beyond my conception of the eternal fitness of things if the Minister of Justice permitted such a resolution as this to be placed upon the journals of the house.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): One reason why I am very much interested in this resolution is its bearing upon our greatest national problem, namely unemployment. If there are not enough efficient white sailors on the Pacific coast, we have at the head of the lakes a large number of unemployed sailors, any one of whom would be as good as any three Chinamen. I do not blame Sir Edward Beatty for what he has done, because I think he is doing just what every hon. member is trying to do, serving his constituency in the best possible way at the least possible cost. The opinion of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is contained in the report; I wonder whether any further investigation would result in their changing their opinion. If one company has taken notice of the findings of our committee, why not another? To my mind they have shown discourtesy to our committee. Whether the committee was intelligent or not, we sat under a very intelligent chairman; the committee did its best; we had all the facts before us; we arrived at our conclusions and the house honoured them.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I am sorry that the time remaining this afternoon is too short to reply in detail to many of the statements and opinions expressed by hon. members on this resolution. But there are some that I should like to touch upon briefly before six o'clock. One is the statement made by the acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Rogers) regarding the numbers of unemployed seamen. It is true that when the matter was debated in the committee before, there were figures given of some eleven hundred unemployed designated as seamen on the Pacific coast, and that this afternoon I quoted official figures from the Vancouver relief office, showing some three hundred plus eighty-five, given by the shipping master in Vancouver. But that, I claim, is aside from the point. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company did admit under oath that one Canadian employed would replace two if not three Chinamen. There are employed on the decks of these four steamers a total of 330 Chinamen. If the ratio of two to one is taken, it would mean that there would be employed 165 Canadians in place of the Chinamen. I think no one will seriously dispute the statement that there could be found among the present unemployed on the provincial government's register 165 men who could be placed on the decks of these steamers, and who would have been, I maintain, if the request of this house had been carried out. I am well aware that the statement of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is correct; it was not exactly an order of parliament. At the outset of my remarks I made it very clear that the wording of the resolution is not quite correct. However, it was a request of the house, and as stated by the minister, that request was conveyed by the department to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Personally I am not against the granting of subsidies to steamship lines; I realize that in these days of subsidized shipping subsidies must be granted to enable these steamship companies to carry on. But I was surprised to hear the statement of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that all these ships are registered in London. I was under the impression that they were registered in Canada, although of course they are British ships.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member will allow me, I have looked into the matter and I am assured by the department that the Empress of Japan, on which I journeyed, is registered in England, and the same is true of the Empress of Canada. The other two ships are registered in Canada.

Mr. REID: Be that as it may, the fact is that they are receiving large sums from the treasury of Canada; they operate as British ships, and we as Canadians are British subjects. I was also interested in his statement that he was of opinion that Canadians would not fulfil properly the duties which the Chinamen are now performing on these vessels in the far east.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not suggest that.

Mr. REID: Well, I took the words down as the hon. member was speaking.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not suggest that they were incapable of doing the duties. I suggested that under the conditions they would not be willing to be employed to do them.

Mr. REID: I doubt that very much. Of course I have heard the statement made that on ships travelling to the far east oriental or Lascar crews must be employed. It may interest the house to know that British passenger ships sailing to the far east have only some 11 per cent of Lascars in the crews, that the crews as a whole are practically British, and even the deck crews fifty-fifty. I have the figures from the British Board of Trade Journal, and if I had time I should like to place them on Hansard. The figures are given for passenger ships of the same size operating over the same routes to the far east from Great Britain, and their crews are 11 per cent Lascars and 89 per cent British.

Mr. CAHAN: I travelled on an East Indian ship on which the only white people were the chief officers and the steward. Every other person I saw was a Lascar or East Indian.

Mr. REID: The reason the committee recommended that Canadian deck-hands be employed was this: It was felt that perhaps it would be unfair at the start to ask Canadians to work among Chinamen, but it was felt that one particular part of the crew might be replaced by Canadians.

In my opening remarks I pointed out that practically every country employed its own nationals. It may interest the house to learn what was done just the other week by France. France has passed an order providing that all salmon going to that country from Canada must be carried in French bottoms. They are looking after not only their seamen but their shipping; they are now demanding that goods imported from Canada shall be carried in French ships. If you investigate every country, with the single exception of Canada you will find that some provision or another has been made for the employment of its own nationals. On the Australian line operating from Vancouver to the orient, which is in keen competition with the United States lines, practically all the employees are British subjects.

I should like to point out to the house that it is not only the wages which are paid that determine whether or not the service shall succeed. At the British shipping conference last fall it was stated that the Matson line, which is in competition with the Canada-Australian line, is superior to the Australian line for two reasons; first, the speed of their vessels and, second, the courtesy of their employees. For these reasons that line is taking trade away from Canadian ships; yet when the committee was in session we were told by the Canadian Pacific that Chinamen were so courteous that Americans and others were very glad to travel in our vessels in preference to others. This shipping report, which was laid on the table just the other day, states that the United States line is taking a great deal of trade away from the Canadian ships because of the speed of their vessels and the courtesy of their employees.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask who asserts it is the courtesy of the employees of the Matson line that is responsible for getting trade away from the Canada-Australian line?

Mr. REID: I have the 1935 report of the shipping committee with regard to the possibilities of a British passenger and cargo service between western Canada and Australia and New Zealand. On page 19 of that report I read:

> The important fact to be borne in mind is that the Matson line has won its present position not by cutting rates but by superiority of amenities and speed.

I take that "superiority of amenities" to mean superior courtesy.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wanted to know if the hon. gentleman was putting his own construction on it, because if there is one thing that is not so, it is that the courtesy shown on those ships is greater than that shown on ships of the Canadian-Australian line. The word "amenities" is not open to the construction the hon. gentleman has placed upon it. I do not desire to discuss the point now; I shall do so later.

Mr. REID: I am sorry I have not time to develop that a little more. Neither my right hon. friend nor I was at the conference, so while my opinion may not carry quite as much weight as his, I suppose I am still entitled to it.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, but "amenities" in that case has nothing to do with courtesy.

Mr. REID: I see it is getting near six o'clock. As I have said, I am not against the granting of some subsidies, and I realize that subsidy agreements have been signed. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has made the suggestion that I withdraw this resolution, and he has said that the matter will be taken up by a committee consisting of one representative from the Department of Labour and perhaps one from the Department of Trade and Commerce, who will investigate at first hand the situation in pacific coast ports. I think I would be inclined to accept that suggestion, on the distinct understanding that the matter will be fully investigated and that the bald statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that there are no men available, together with their statement that they prefer Chinamen to Canadians, will be seriously looked into. And I hope that committee will not overlook the strong stand taken by that company against the employment of our own people. Surely it is a laudable thing to attempt to secure employment for our own Canadian people, and I make no apology to anyone for my stand on behalf of our Canadian nationals in preference to orientals from Hong Kong or from other countries.

I wish I had time to develop further the argument introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that these orientals are British subjects. When I previously introduced this question it was held by the then government of which he was a member that those orientals from Hong Kong were British subjects. I seriously dispute that view; I claim they are orientals and Chinamen. However, I am prepared to accept the statement of the Minister of Labour with the understanding that this matter will be gone into fully and seriously and a report made as to the real reasons why the request of parliament can not be carried out.

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): May I suggest that in considering this problem the minister take full cognizance of the competition of United States and Japanese subsidized lines, and secure complete information as to the position of Canada in transpacific shipping and the desirability of maintaining transpacific routes with subsidized ships, as referred to by the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid).

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 4, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) presented the first report of the special committee on the elections and franchise acts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That on and after Monday, the 8th of February next, to the end of the session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Mondays over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: I am informed by the government whip that he has communicated with the whips of the various parties and that this motion is agreeable.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand that there will be no move on the part of the government for some time yet to take away Wednesdays.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Motion agreed to.

ANTHRACITE COAL COMMISSION

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report of the royal commission on anthracite coal.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the report be printed and distributed?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that arrangements have already been made for the printing and distribution of the report.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DUFFIELD BUILDING, HAMILTON, ONT.

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Is the building known as "The Duffield Building," at Hamilton, Ontario, still leased by the federal government?
2. If so, to what use is this building being put this winter?
3. What is the approximate monthly cost of maintenance for this building?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. Vacant since December 1, 1936.
3. Winter months—$397 a month.
   Summer months—$95 a month.

RAILWAY MAINTENANCE WORK, 1936

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many men were employed on the deferred maintenance work during the summer of 1936: (a) on the Canadian National railways; (b) on the Canadian Pacific railway, under the agreement entered into between the Canadian government and the said railways?

2. Were all the men employed by the said railways, under the agreement with the government taken from government relief camps?

3. What were the total amounts paid by the government under said agreement to: (a) Canadian National railways; (b) Canadian Pacific railway?

4. What were the total amounts by which the government reimbursed: (a) Canadian National railways; (b) Canadian Pacific railway, for (1) wages; (2) board and lodging; (3) bedding; (4) medical aid?

5. If the railways were reimbursed for medical aid, what medical aid services were rendered by the said companies?

6. What were the total amounts paid by the government to reimburse the railway companies in settlement of all claims mentioned in paragraph 5 of the said agreement?

7. What were the total amounts paid by the government for transportation under paragraph 2 of the said agreement to: (a) Canadian National railways; (b) Canadian Pacific railway?

8. What was the average number of days worked per man with: (a) Canadian National railways; (b) Canadian Pacific railway?

9. What was the average wage per man, for the season's work with: (a) Canadian National railways; (b) Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. HOWE:

1. (a) Canadian National railways.. 7,987
   (b) Canadian Pacific railway.. .. 8,344

2. No.

3. (a) Canadian National railways, $1,300,000.00; (b) Canadian Pacific railway, $1,326,026.17.

4.	C.N.R.	C.P.R.
(a) Wages.. ..	$1,300,000.00	$1,310,237.93
(b) Board and lodging	Nil	Nil
(c) Bedding ..	Nil	Nil
(d) Medical aid	Nil	Nil

5. The accounts of the companies for medical aid as presented to date are included with accounts for workmen's compensation and are presently under audit. No payments have yet been made to the companies covering these accounts, which amount to:

Canadian National..	$9,727.03
Canadian Pacific..	9,085.18

6. See answer No. 5.

7. Accounts received to date:

Canadian National..	$2,451.77
Canadian Pacific..	3,430.27

8 and 9. As to average number of days worked and average wage per man. The days worked per man varied from two to three days to the full period of six months, and the wages earned ranged from $5 to $312, depending on the duration of employment. The maximum permitted to be employed by each company under the agreements in question was 5,000 or 10,000 altogether, and to secure results a total of 16,331 had to be hired, including neighbourhood unemployed. The work gangs averaged 35 men, and there were two pay-rolls per month, or twelve pay-rolls altogether, covering maintenance projects from one end of Canada to the other. To work out the averages requested would entail examination and analysis of the days worked and amounts paid each of these employees on each and every pay-roll, and such information could only be secured at great expenditure of time and money. And, even if secured, the results would be inconclusive and misleading.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

IMPORTED CLOVER SEED—COLOUR REGULATIONS

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott):

1. When and why were staining regulations on imported red clover seeds established?

2. Why was it recently removed from seed imported from British Isles and New Zealand?

3. Was there any official request made by British government for removal of such staining regulations?

4. At whose request were these changes made?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. In 1923 colour regulations were applied to imported southern grown red clover seed.

In 1926 the seed importation regulations were amended to provide for the colouring of imported red clover seed grown in the United States 1 per cent orange, all other countries 1 per cent green, except red clover seed from southern countries such as Italy, Africa or part of Turkestan, which was required to be coloured 10 per cent red.

In 1928 the colour for imported red clover seed grown in the United States was changed from orange to navy blue.

These colour regulations were established as a result of plot tests conducted by the dominion agrostologist showing that red clover seed grown in southern countries was not sufficiently winter hardy to withstand Canadian climatic conditions, while red clover seed grown in countries with climatic conditions similar to those of Canada were quite or nearly as winter hardy as Canadian-grown seed.

2. Colour regulations were recently removed from imported red clover seed grown in Great Britain and New Zealand on the recommendation of the advisory board under the seeds act. It was represented that no similar requirement is made by these countries when seed is exported from Canada, and that, since our export trade in alsike, red clover and other kinds of seed is of considerable volume and value, the same treatment as received by us should be extended to these countries. It was also pointed out that red clover seed originating in Great Britain and New Zealand is of about comparable value to Canadian-grown seed in respect to winter hardiness, and is relatively free from many objectionable impurities now common to Canadian-grown seed; that in a year when there is a surplus Canadian production, seed imports will not be required, but when there is a shortage, imports must be made to supplement domestic production. Under these conditions serious market competition need not be feared.

3. No.

4. The British and Canadian Seed Trade.

OLD AGE PENSIONERS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. BROOKS:

What is the number receiving old age pensions in the province of New Brunswick under the following headings: (a) pension of $20; (b) over $15 and less than $20; (c) over $10 and including $15; (d) over $5 and including $10; (e) $5 and under?

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to point out to the hon. member who has asked this question that a great deal of detailed work is required to answer it. Old age pensions are administered by each of the provinces, which make returns to the federal government, of course, in order to justify the payment of the federal government proportion. To answer a question such as this involves a complete examination of every name, because the returns are not classified in the manner in which the question is asked. I would ask my hon. friend to allow the question to stand to-day and to give consideration to a possible amendment of it with a view to making the reply easier and less expensive.

Mr. BROOKS: This question was partly answered the other day.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: I assume it can be answered along the same lines as the question that was answered the other day with reference to those receiving twenty dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is insisted upon it will be answered.

HEALTH OF ANIMALS BRANCH—DOCTOR DUNBAR

Mr. NEEDHAM:

1. Has Dr. Dunbar, V.S., Melfort, Saskatchewan, been appointed to the staff of the Health of Animals branch?

2. If so, is the appointment permanent or temporary?

3. How often did he take an oral or written examination to qualify for a position on the staff of the Health of Animals branch?

4. What were the dates of these examinations?

5. What marks did he obtain in each case?

6. What marks were necessary to qualify for the position sought?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. Temporary, part-time.

3. Twice.

4. April 24, 1928; August 2, 1933.

5. 28·2 per cent and 46 per cent, respectively.

6. 70 per cent.

ENLISTMENTS IN 22ND BATTALION

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Who are the young men from the county of Témiscouata who have been recommended for enrolment in the 22nd regiment at the citadel of Quebec since October, 1935?

2. Upon what dates did the Department of National Defence receive these applications or recommendations?

3. How many of these young men have been enlisted in the 22nd battalion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. A. Leblanc, Cabano, 23-11-35; G. Breton, Cabano, 25-1-36; R. Laplante, Cabano, 13-3-36; S. Ouellet, Ste. Rose du Dégelé, 13-3-36; W. Beaulieu, Rivière du Loup, 6-3-36; G. Boucher, Cabano, 4-4-36; C. Gagnon, St. Jean de Dieu, 12-1-37.

2. On dates as stated against the names in the preceding answer.

3. A. Leblanc.

TELEPHONE LINES, MATAPEDIA-MATANE

Mr. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane):

Will the telephone lines constructed in Matapedia-Matane during the fall of 1935, and not in operation at the present time, be put into operation, and, if so, when?

Mr. CARDIN: It is expected that the telephone lines built in the Matapedia-Matane constituency in the fall of 1935 will be placed in operation as soon as satisfactory co-operation is forthcoming from the municipalities in which these lines extend. This matter is now being dealt with by the public service commission of Quebec and it is not known how soon a definite settlement will be arrived at.

SHIPPIGAN, N.B., POSTMASTER

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Was Alphonse G. Robichaud appointed postmaster at Shippigan, New Brunswick?

2. If so, has the department been informed of any alleged irregularities in his office since his appointment?

3. If so, has an investigation been held, and what, if any, is the nature of the irregularities in detail?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. The only irregularity reported is in connection with a shortage of $30.92 found in the official cash during an inspection on the 14th January, 1937. This was attributed by the inspector to the post office funds having been mixed with the postmaster's private funds.

STE. ANGELE, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Has Cyprien Plante, postmaster at Ste-Angele, Rimouski county, been dismissed? If so, (a) on what date; (b) what reason was alleged for his dismissal; (c) was an inquiry held in this case?
2. (a) What are the names of the other postmasters in the county of Rimouski who were dismissed; (b) was an inquiry conducted in each case?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes—(a) 5th September, 1936; (b) Change of site; (c) Yes.
2. (a) Joseph Michaud, St. Donat de Rimouski; Mrs. A. R. Tremblay, St. Gabriel Est; Etienne Levesque, Mont Joli; Timothée Rioux, La Société; Adélard Levesque, Biencourt; Alcide Boucher, Lac des Aigles; Joseph Lebel, Luceville. (b) Yes.

MONT JOLI-STE. ANGELE, QUE., MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Was Emile Plante, who carries the mail from Mont-Joli to Ste-Angele, Rimouski county, informed that his contract would be cancelled by the government in the near future?
2. If so, why?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.
2. In the public interest.

MONT JOLI, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Was Etienne Levesque, postmaster at Mont-Joli, dismissed? If so, (a) when; (b) for what reason; (c) for how many years had he held such office at Mont-Joli?
2. Was an inquiry held in his case? If not, why?
3. What amounts were paid as salary to the postmaster at Mont-Joli in 1935?
4. Is there a post office named Mont-Joli Nord? If so, how far is it situated from the Mont-Joli post office?
5. When was the post office at Mont-Joli Nord established, and for what reason?
6. Were applications received from returned soldiers for the postmastership of Mont-Joli? If so, (a) what are their names; (b) why were they not appointed?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes (a) 16th July, 1936. (b) Insufficient attention to duties and unsatisfactory management. (c) Twenty years.

[Mr. Brooks.]

2. Yes.
3. $3,677 out of this amount the postmaster had to pay for his staff and office supplies.
4. Yes. ¼ of a mile.
5. 6th April, 1927. In order to give improved postal facilities to residents on north side of the town which is separated from the south side by railway and tunnel.
6. Yes. (a) Alphonse Martin. (b) No permanent appointment made yet.

MONT-JOLI NORD, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. What amount will the government pay as rental for the new post office at Mont-Joli Nord after January 15?
2. To whom will such rental be paid, and who is the owner?
3. Who supplies the furniture for the said post office?
4. What was the rental paid for the former post office, and, in both cases, who has or had to look after the repairs?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The department is not aware of any recent change in post office quarters at Mont-Joli Nord. The postmistress provides at her own expense the post office premises and equipment and receives as compensation an allowance amounting now to $100 a year based on the revenue of the office.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TRAVELLING EXPENSES OF CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. BARBER:

1. What was the total amount of the travelling expenses of members of the government for the calendar year 1936?
2. What was the amount of the travelling expenses of each member of the government for the same period?

Mr. GRAY:

1. What was the total amount of the traveling expenses of the government for the fiscal years ending 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, and 1936?
2. What was the amount of the travelling expenses of each member of the government per year for the same period?

MONTREAL CUSTOMS SERVICE

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all the officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who were employed in the customs service at Montreal during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties, and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commission, the Department of National Revenue, or otherwise?

MONTREAL INLAND REVENUE SERVICE

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all the officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who are employed in the inland revenue service at Montreal during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties, and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commission, the Department of National Revenue, or otherwise?

MONTREAL—AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who were employed in the service of the Department of Agriculture at Montreal during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties, and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commisson, the Department of Agriculture, or otherwise?

MONTREAL—NATIONAL DEFENCE EMPLOYEES

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all the officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who were employed in the service of the Department of National Defence at Montreal, during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commission, the Department of National Defence, or otherwise?

MONTREAL—HARBOUR SERVICE

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all the officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who were employed on the harbour service at Montreal during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commission, the harbour commission, or otherwise?

MONTREAL—PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES

Mr. JEAN:

1. What are the names of all the officers and other employees, permanent or temporary, who were employed by the Department of Public Works at Montreal, during 1936?
2. What was the nature of their duties and what salary did each one receive during the year?
3. Upon what dates did they commence their duties, and were they appointed by the Civil Service commission, the Department of Public Works, or otherwise?

BANK OF CANADA BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). It is announced in the newspapers that the government is proceeding with the erection of a building for the Bank of Canada in Ottawa. Can the minister say whether the specifications for such building will permit the use of Tyndall stone from Manitoba, which was used in the erection of this centre block building? The people of Manitoba are anxious to know whether restrictions which have existed hitherto with reference to that stone will be removed in the future, and in particular with respect to this building.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): In answer to my hon. friend I would say that this government has nothing to do with the construction of an office building for the Bank of Canada. The bank itself, not the government or the Department of Public Works, is providing for that building. It is therefore a matter for the bank.

FOREIGN POLICY

PROPOSED STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES TO APPLY IN RESPECT OF WAR, THE CAUSES OF WAR, AND WAR MUNITIONS OR MATERIALS

The house resumed from Thursday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth:

That, in the opinion of this house, the foreign policy of Canada should conform to the following principles:—

1. That under existing international relations, in the event of war, Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be.
2. That at no time should Canadian citizens be permitted to make profits out of supplying war munitions or materials.
3. That the Canadian government should make every effort to discover and remove the causes of international friction and social injustice.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In continuing from the other day my remarks with respect to this resolution, I wish to make it very clear that I am voicing only my personal opinions, and I think it is up to every member of this house to do the same.

The problem of war is one which, to my mind, is dealt with too lightly. I discussed the other day the first two paragraphs of the resolution, and I wish now to refer to the third paragraph, which reads:

That the Canadian government should make every effort to discover and remove the causes of international friction and social injustice.

There, I think, lies one of the main causes of war, and I think there should be in this house a great deal of concentrated thought upon that one subject. I am in full accord with this part of the resolution; in fact, as I said before, I am in entire agreement with the principle of the resolution as a whole, but in view of the fact that it was probably rather loosely worded, some things in it would have to be changed before I could vote for it.

I believe that one of the great causes of discontent is connected with the search for foreign markets in the endeavour to expand national trade. It seems to me that a good deal of friction thereby occurs between the nations, because every nation is looking for the same thing. If our attention were more closely drawn to the possibilities of the home market through the supplying of our own people with the goods with which it is possible to supply them, we should not have so much difficulty in that direction.

One of the beneficial results of a proper international organization would be the reconciling of ambitions for colonial expansion. There is no doubt that the war of 1914, in which Germany was the aggressor, was waged for colonial expansion. The war that seems likely to break out in a very short time will be occasioned by the same thing. Surely there is enough colonial territory in the world to provide everybody with sufficient raw materials to carry on the industries they require. The urge for colonial expansion undoubtedly results from the search for raw materials, and if we could attain to some sort of organization, as was suggested in a resolution recently submitted in this house, whereby the nations could get together in conference—though I dislike the word—and discuss their grievances and adjust these difficulties, much good would follow for the world. For instance, if Germany is in need of crude oil, and a conference was held at which all nations were represented, possibly an arrangement could be worked out by which she could receive all the crude oil required for her domestic and industrial needs, though not to the extent of stimulating and increasing or commercializing the accumulation of war material. If our attention were concentrated on these matters we might get a little nearer the solution of the problem of war.

I am largely in agreement with what Bernard Shaw said about conferences in a statement to the Associated Press at San Francisco on March 5:

> Disarmament conferences are utter rubbish. They are held merely to keep the public amused, he smiled. No nation is going to disarm. They sit around a table and say, "If I shoot you with a 14-inch gun will you throw away your 16-inch guns?"

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

That has been the idea underlying most of these conferences. It has not been a question of whether we can really solve the difficulties which bring about war; the idea has been, as Bernard Shaw suggests, that if one nation throws away its 16-inch gun the other may shoot at it with a 14-inch gun.

One of the great causes of war is foreign financial investment. I was surprised to see the other day that Great Britain is even now contemplating a loan to finance Italy, a country which no doubt, if there is another war, will be one of our opponents. Why should any of our financial organizations in the British Empire be financing a country which is purely on a war basis? Our financial institutions have made loans to Germany and Russia, and these countries are carrying out a program of aggressive warfare. When our own financial institutions will assist foreign nations in the financing of a war program, I submit they are doing something that is entirely wrong; and that is one of the things which we should do our best to put a stop to.

It is true we have a great many organizations throughout the dominion that are spreading the doctrine of peace; we have anti-war organizations, we have different peace societies; and there are various church organizations that are devoted to peace. But I am reminded of the way in which these different peace organizations functioned during the last war. We have had these organizations for a number of years—we had them even before the outbreak of war in 1914—and what happened when war broke out? These very organizations that broadcast peace throughout the world were turned into a war propaganda machine, and they began to work in the opposite direction. During the war we had churches preaching to the young men to go into the war; in Germany preachers urged them to do the same. There can be no reliance on these peace organizations. I do not mean to imply, of course, that their intentions were not good, but they are not made use of for the benefit of human society, and we should not base our strength on these peace organizations.

I do not think we should entirely disregard the possibility of war; I do not think we should treat it too lightly. In my opinion we should go ahead and prepare a proper defence program, trusting neither to the United States nor to Great Britain nor to any of the other nations. If we declare to these nations that we are going to stand on our own feet, then we should not in any sense of the word depend upon Great Britain. I am absolutely against war and I believe it would be wrong for this dominion ever to participate in any foreign war without the consent of the Canadian people in the form of a plebiscite or by some similar method. Before we step off the continent to fight in any European war we should have the consent of the people of Canada. I would like to make that clear. If we proceed as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has said, on a purely defensive program, the cost involved will not be nearly so great.

This country is especially well-protected by nature. On the south, of course, there is one of the greatest nations in the world, the United States. We have always had amicable relations with them and we need not fear them. At the same time I do not suggest that we should put our trust in them. There is no reason to suppose, however, that the United States would ever attack Canada, nor would Canada attack the United States. Moreover, there is no reason to suppose that the United States would permit any foreign power to use its soil as a military base from which to attack Canada, or vice versa—the rule would work both ways. In the north we are protected naturally by the Arctic and it would be almost impossible for an attacking force to come down upon us on that side. Then we have the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. These two coasts would have to be protected in a purely self-defence program.

When we speak of the coasts we naturally think of the creation of a navy. In my opinion we have not a navy sufficiently strong to defend our coasts. I submit that we should have a navy second to none. I shall be asked at once: Where will the boats come from? Well, if it is a purely defensive program we should be starting a shipbuilding concern in Canada to provide the ships. This would take care of a great deal of the unemployment that now exists; it would provide work for a large number of Canadians, bearing in mind of course that it is a purely defensive program, and building the ships necessary for a decent navy manned by Canadian seamen. We should have a fleet capable of protecting us against any aggressive force, and it would not require a very considerable fleet either. It would not entail costs nearly as great as if we were preparing a fleet sufficiently strong to attack any of the European countries.

Along with that coastal defence we should have an air force second to none. That could be achieved in two ways. In my opinion, one of the best ways of establishing an air force would be to encourage commercial flying so as to educate fliers in Canada. That is the main thing. An adequate commercial air fleet could be turned almost overnight into a fighting force in an emergency. I do not say, however, that we should put all our strength in that; we should direct our attention to the building up of an effective military air force as well, so that in the event of sudden attack it would be able to take the initiative until the others were organized. That, too, would provide more employment in Canada and would help to solve a problem that faces us at all times. Then, in connection with coastal defence, we should need fortifications; the ocean ports would have to be properly fortified. That is purely defensive, because these forts would prevent any invading fleet from landing on our shores. It would be necessary to have a militia well equipped and possibly a standing army. This would tend to give employment to those now out of work, and it would not cause dissatisfaction among the people of Canada, because I do not believe there is a man either in this house or anywhere else in Canada who would say that we should not be prepared to build up a substantial organization for self-defence so that we should be able to protect ourselves in time of need. I do not think we need worry greatly over foreign invasion, when you consider the fact that it is next to an impossibility for any one of the foreign countries to attack us or to land safely, so as to make any progress. When you consider that fact you realize the absurdity of building up too tremendous a fighting machine, and it would not be in the interests of the country to do that. I submit, however, that we should have one of the best.

Some people may say that Europe is now so well equipped with air forces as to be able to land here overnight. Well, I do not know of any airship built so far that can traverse the three thousand miles of water separating us from Europe and make the return trip without landing here for refueling or repairs. True, the Italians last year demonstrated with a fleet of twenty air machines that they could come over. But what is twenty machines, what is one hundred machines when it comes to a question of conquering this country? And if they had nowhere to land they would be eliminated. Then we should have our own fortifications to meet them. They would have to get by our own fleet and if they got by that, they would have to attack our own air force. But that is not all; if they succeeded in landing their men their difficulty would only then have begun. We would have a militia to meet them, an air force and a navy, and on top of that they would have to establish a permanent base here.

To show you the impossibility of such an attack I want to read an extract from the Saturday Evening Post of November 17, 1936, giving the British experience in the last war:

British experience in the world war indicated that about forty pounds of general cargo per soldier per day was required to supply an army from an overseas base. In the A.E.F. we started out with that figure. We attempted to build up a ninety-day reserve for an army of two million men, but we did not get very far with it. On that basis we would have had to unload 40,000 tons of cargo per day. Loaded on army trucks that would have required a daily truck train more than 150 miles long.

This cargo consisted not only of food, clothing, guns, ammunition and all that sort of thing, but of such little odds and ends as 35,000 motor trucks, 1,500 standard locomotives, 20,000 freight cars, 5,000 miles of standard steel rails and 3,500,000 cross ties. We had all the French ports at our disposal. Our line of communication across the ocean was never seriously threatened. All we had to do was to run ships back and forth like ferryboats. But even so we had to shorten our objective to 30,000 tons per day, and as a matter of fact we never reached 25,000. Our shortage was met by the allies. Our own war experience illustrates why no foreign power could invade America provided we take ordinary common sense precautions to prevent it.

I think that is a very sensible argument. If we take ordinary common sense precautions there can be no question in the world of any foreign invasion of this country. I think, sir, we should have the world's best fleet in our own waters, we should have the world's best army on our own land and we should have the world's best air fleet in our own air, and never step off the soil of Canada without a clear understanding and declaration from the people of Canada, as I suggested a while ago.

One main question is, how are you going to finance this? I was interested the other day when I picked up a clipping from the Hamilton Spectator reporting a speech by the Minister of National Defence:

Hon. Ian Mackenzie, Minister of Defence, explains to a "defence-conscious" country that the government is also "acutely conscious of its primary responsibility for local defence." But, he adds, the question of how far Canada can go in discharging that responsibility depends upon "the extent to which the hard-pressed Canadian taxpayer is able and willing to meet new burdens and new taxes." The price of independence has to be paid.

I contend that if we have to depend for a defence program upon the amount of money which can be extorted from the taxpayers of this country we are not going to get very far. If I may be so bold as to say so, I do not think that was the minister's intention. Directly, yes, but indirectly, no, because the people of Canada cannot stand any more taxation to build up defences if it must be done by the orthodox method of borrowing. During the last war we built up a tremendous national debt; we have not paid it and never will pay it. In view of the fact that we have not paid for the last war, how are we going to finance another? We shall go into debt, just as surely as we are here, if we follow the method proposed by the minister. There is no alternative. I suggest following a different plan of financing. This government should finance its defence program on its own credit, not by borrowing money. To me it is ridiculous to see the government borrowing money from the banks to carry out its program. But, it will be said, if the banks do it there is no inflation. I am not going to argue the point whether or not it is inflation, but I say that if it is inflation for the government to do it, it would be inflation for the banks; if it is not inflation for the banks it would not be inflation if the government did it. The same amount of money would be put out in any case. Suppose it took $50,000,000; if the $50,000,000 can be created by the banks why should it not be created by the federal government? One of the speakers on this side said the other day that the former government created in that way about $15,000,000 for the railways. That did not cause inflation; you never heard any question of it. They said it was a time of emergency. Well, surely this is a time of emergency, and surely this is a time to take every precaution to build up good defences and keep our country from going any further into debt. If it could be done without serious consequences then, why can it not now?

The logical thing is for the dominion government to create the amount of money it would otherwise borrow from the banks, put the money in the Bank of Canada, if you like; pay them for the clerical work, say a quarter of one per cent—I am told that the actual cost is about one-seventh of one per cent for bookkeeping, but pay them well; I do not advocate cutting it too small, give them one-quarter or one-half of one per cent for the clerical work. One of the great advantages of this method of financing—which has been followed by the government in the past without any serious consequences, and could be done again without any more serious consequences, and would not be inflation if done by the government any more than it would be if done by the banks—is that we would not have to tax our people for the next five hundred years to pay the interest on a debt the principal of which never could and never would be paid.

There is one thing that would have to be considered no matter how this program is financed, that is, if we are to follow the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) the other day when he said there should be—he did not say there would not be—no profiteering, no blood money, no blood profits from war. Following that declaration I say there should be controlled prices. During the last war the price of wheat was controlled when it was going too high, and there is no doubt they will do it again as to that commodity. Why, then, can they not control prices of other articles? We know there were tremendous profits made in the last war. This is the time, right now, in this session, to go ahead and plan defences and let the people of Canada know exactly what the government intend to do and how they intend to do it. Then everyone will be satisfied.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): When this debate began a week ago last Monday it occurred to me that there was something ironic in the fact that it was initiated on the anniversary of the poet who optimistically wrote about the time—

> That man to man, the world o'er
> Shall brothers be for a' that.

That poet, however, was not always so optimistic; in another poem he wrote something which I have been treasuring in my mind for a good many years and obeying literally for the last two sessions. The lines are something to this effect:

> In politics if thou wouldst mix, and mean > thy fortunes be,
> Bear this in mind; be deaf and blind, let > great folk hear and see.

I cut that out about twelve years ago and have carried it ever since, but a few minutes ago I threw it away because it is no longer for me, at any rate for the time being, to follow that very sage advice. On this particular question I had thought to be silent in this house as I have been hitherto, but, sir, as one of those who fought in the great war to make the world safe for eight or ten or twelve per cent or whatever can be got —not, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) suggested, to keep the world safe for democracy—it seemed to me the expression of opinions in respect to foreign policy for Canada should not be left entirely to those who were either too young to fight in the last war or will be too old to fight in the next. It seems to me the returned soldiers of Canada have kept too much aloof from politics. If this country was worth dying for, as thousands did die, surely it is worth the while of those who survive to take some interest in and attempt to play some part with respect to the foreign policy of this country. The youth of to-day have been told so often the future belongs to them that the majority of them have come to accept it literally and are, I believe, willing to step in and carry on at any time. On the other hand, another generation older than ours has carried on through about twice their normal space of time in the direction of the public affairs of Canada. They have done that not perhaps of their own volition but because the generation which to a great extent disappeared during the last war has been so busy trying to establish itself, to keep alive and pay for the war they fought, that until recently they have not been in a position to take part in public affairs. We who belong to neither of these generations touch both of them. We, whose illusions are gone, perhaps need something of the vigorous, selfish viewpoint of youth. We who are a bit hasty in condemning smugness and lip service need the restraint of our more diplomatic elders. We need something of the tact, the diplomacy and the steadiness of the older generation who have carried on throughout the most trying period of our history.

The motion is divided into three parts. I take it, sir, that it relates more to the question of foreign policy than to that of defence. If I may be permitted to express my mind I would say that the first part of the motion is nonsense and the third part is only a pious expression. There are many of us who feel that the meat in the resolution is to be found in the second part. Mr. Speaker, when the day dawns in which war is unprofitable, that day will be the dawn of universal peace.

It has been stated often that in war everyone loses. That, sir, is arrant nonsense. It would be true to say that no matter who wins or loses the battles, the same people always win the war. Some of the greatest fortunes of the world were based on a foundation the mortar of which is human blood. I need not elaborate that point, because it is something the truth of which every hon. member is aware. And so when we look over the situation, as we listen to some of the discussions relevant to the question of national policy, and a great many that are not relevant to it, I wonder when we are going to stop fooling ourselves. When shall we stop chattering about treaties, leagues, and armaments? When shall we stop defining ourselves as militarists or pacifists, or whatever designation we may apply? We are playing our little part in the wings and leaving the centre of the stage to the apostles of the high god Mammon, whose right hand is Mars.

We ought to be honest with ourselves and with each other. We ought to be able to say definitely that when the hour strikes, if it does strike, the financial resources of Canada will be conscripted to the last dollar, even as men are taken, to the last unhappy youth. Do that, sir, and we shall have struck a blow in our own defence which not only will be heard but will echo and reecho around the world and without shedding blood. Then we shall be on our way toward peace, that which has been described as the peace that passeth understanding. I do not know why it passeth understanding unless it is because we talk so much about it that we cannot think about it. Perhaps we cannot hear the message of peace because of the clang and clank of the money-changers in the temple—and by that I mean the armament manufacturers.

The Prime Minister has said that the element of profit is necessary to the supply of arms and munitions. I agree with him. I wish he would say to the world that so far as Canada is concerned there is no profit to be made out of war. If that means nationalization of munitions in time of peace as well as war, I am still for it. If governments were as careful of our individual lives as they are of our collective credit we would feel a great deal more secure. I doubt whether any government can control inflation, but I know that while there is profit in war no government can protect us against it. Ten millions of people cannot forever hold half a continent in an overcrowded world. Neither can they defend it. It has been said that in the Armageddon to come Canada is in a favoured position. May I say to the house that if Armageddon comes, Canada, in the parlance of the gangster, is "on the spot." If might is to prevail, then it will seek the choicest prize. Look about you: throughout the world to-day there is no greater object of envy than the Dominion of Canada.

Permit me to repeat that there is too little of real honesty in discussions of this subject. I am pleased to note that so far in the debate there has been little of the emotional cant which is generally associated with true patriotism. My loyalty, sir, is not only to the land of my birth, but to the people in it. My inheritance is not a ploughed field, but a free spirit; mine is not the supreme Japanese privilege of dying for my country but the opportunity of living in it and doing something, if I can, to help the others who live in it to attain the free life which should be the lot of every Canadian. We cannot free the world from war; but, sir, we can declare on the question of war profits that Canada has taken a firm stand.

Then, another point has arisen in the debate which irritates me, as a returned soldier, and always has the same effect. Reference was made to men who fought and died for $1.10 per day. As a former soldier may I say the expression amuses me when it does not annoy me. Those who died in France and by whose graves some hon. members stood last fall did not die for $1.10 a day. The money element in war is reckoned not in wages but in dividends. Those men died for an ideal—hazy, half-understood; most of them would have scorned a description of it. But it was real. There was nothing of mob fatalism in their action. Beneath exteriors as varied as their numbers they wore a shining armour of idealism worthy of a greater and better cause. Deluded?—maybe; deceived?—perhaps; grumbling?—sometimes. Suffering and wretched, they carried on till death. Need I say it is beneath the dignity of any hon. member or any person outside the house to suggest that those men acted only for mercenary reasons, for $1.10 a day. Theirs was not the disillusionment; that was reserved for us, who did not die. We talk too much and think too little. We crave action when we ought to pause and reflect. There is no dearth of opportunity for action. We in Canada, in common with the world, have problems worthy of all the patriotic endeavour we can muster. There is a clear challenge to a fight with a worthy foeman, poverty—a fight in which none is conscripted but in which all must serve. It is a fight in which man allies himself with God, not as in the great war when the German carried His name on his belt-buckle and romantic British journalists described His angels leading from the clouds, but as one reverently thinks He intended us to act, in the fight against man's inhumanity to man.

I revert, in closing, to the resolution before us. Despite all I have said I cannot support it. The first clause limits our actions without having any regard to our position or need. The third clause offers lip service to an abstraction. It breaks no new ground and presents no appeal. It offers nothing and promises nothing. It is only a wind-sock on the political landing field. Parliament owes the Canada for which a generation died something more concrete, something more definite and something more sincere.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, many hon. members have declared that Canada should have armaments for defence purposes. Many people through the country express the opinion that war is inevitable and that before many months have elapsed Canada will be fighting someone somewhere. However, these people have not said whom we are to fight or what will be the point of dispute. I have heard no one name an aggressor; no one has stated definitely what such an aggressor might be after.

When we consider the question of Canada's defence we must also consider the natural protection we enjoy. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) that we are given protection on the east by the Atlantic ocean, on the west by the Pacific ocean, on the north by the great frozen barriers and on the south by a friendly republic. My opinion is that the west coast is not in danger of attack. China is in no position to attempt a conquest of Canada and the conquest of Manchukuo by Japan will engage the attention of that country for years to come, especially when we have in mind the strained relations between Russia and Japan, and also between China and Japan. Further, our neighbour to the south would never allow the conquest of Canada by any Asiatic nation. I believe one may safely say that for many years to come Canada need not fear for the safety of her west coast. No one would suggest seriously that any country in north or south America would consider the conquest of this country.

When we look to the east coast we find thousands of miles of water separating us from the great nations of Europe. Who would believe that Russia, Germany, France, Italy, Poland or any of the Balkan states is considering a possible conquest of Canada? No nation in Africa is in a position, nor has it the desire, to attack us. I believe it may be safely stated that in the near future Canada is not in danger of attack. All hon. members realize that up to the present the League of Nations has not proved an effective instrument for the maintenance of peace. I feel however, that it should be upheld and supported, because ways and means may yet be found to make it effective in the establishment of peace. I believe all units of the British Empire want peace, but the unrest in Europe and Asia, to say the least, is disturbing.

It has been said, and I agree, that the only real and permanent defence is good-will among the nations, and this is an ideal towards which all nations should strive. Unfortunately, however, good-will among a number of nations sufficient to ensure peace does not exist today. We must recognize this fact, and act accordingly.

Speaking of the necessity for rearmament, the Prime Minister of Great Britain made this statement to parliament:

German rearmament has been proceeding throughout the year at a steady but rapid rate. As to the fact of the rearmament there is no concealment, and it has been referred to with satisfaction in the statements of German public men; but regarding the details there is still a great deal of secrecy. In March last conscription on the basis of one-year service was universally reestablished; and the government announced a peace-time army establishment of 36 divisions with a strength of 550,000 men. The German Chancellor informed Sir John Simon last March that Germany was aiming at air parity between Great Britain, France and Germany provided that the development of the Soviet air force was not such that revision of these figures would become necessary. What has since occurred indicates a continuous development of the German air force. The naval agreement reached with the German government on the 18th June, 1935, is in a different category inasmuch as it limits the expansion of the German navy to a definite proportion of the strength of British naval force. Nevertheless, the new German navy, even within this limitation, is an addition to the armaments of the world which cannot be left out of account.

In France two-year service was reintroduced in the spring of last year. The French air force is in process of an important reorganization and reequipment. The barrier fortresses on the northeastern frontier are being extended at great cost to cover also the northern departments. Special borrowing powers have been obtained to meet specific items of defence expenditure.

In Belgium the army expenditure shows a heavy increase and the fortresses on the eastern frontier are being rapidly strengthened and brought up to date.

The Italian army has been for the past six months on a war footing. In October last it was stated that 1,200,000 men were under arms, and further recruits have been called up since that date. The Italian air force is being rapidly and completely reequipped and is also being enlarged.

The Soviet forces, according to the latest official figures given by a Soviet minister on the 15th January last, have now been increased to a total of 1,300,000 men. A further increase in the Soviet air force is already in progress.

In Japan the reequipment of the army continues to be pressed forward in accordance with a comprehensive program, and greater sums than ever before are appropriated in the budget for 1936-37 for the naval and military services combined. Already in 1935-36 the army and navy accounted for forty-six per cent of the total budgetary expenditure, while the deficit on the budget was £45 million.

In the United States the total annual expenditure on defence from revenue and loans combined has risen from £108 million in 1933-34 to £180 million in 1935-36. These figures include no provision for non-effective charges (e.g., pensions), which in the case of British estimates for 1935 represented no less than £18 million out of the total of £124 million.

In view of the extensive rearmament of powerful nations throughout the world, the British Empire must be in a position to defend its people, its territory, its trade routes and lines of communication. I would point out, however, that Great Britain must be careful of European entanglements, because while I feel certain the Canadian people are prepared to help defend the British Empire, they are not prepared to enter into a war of aggression or a war in any part of the world which does not vitally concern the well-being of the English speaking units of the empire. I would point out further that old methods of financing the building of armaments, and of conducting war, must be abolished. The people of Canada will not stand much longer the steady pyramiding of debts under the present system, which have as their direct result chaotic conditions in our economic life.

In this connection may I read a statement made by Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, as it was delivered at Birmingham on January 29. The news item is headed with the words "Living Standards are Endangered by Rearmament Plans," and is in the following terms:

> Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, declared to-day, "If something is not done" to reduce "the terrible burden of armaments it is bound to pull down the standard of living for a generation to come."
> Chamberlain referred in a public address to the "incredible folly of a civilization which is piling up these terrible burdens on the shoulders of the nation."
> "We are embarking on by far the largest program for defence ever undertaken by this country in peace times" he said. "It is involving us in the expenditure of hundreds of millions of pounds upon munitions and weapons which produce no economic return and which indeed have the inevitable effect of diverting our industries from more desirable activities. I believe that course was absolutely essential. We had no choice in the matter."

The government must finance defence without creating enormous debt burdens to be placed on generations to come. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said the Liberal party stands for the issuing of currency and credit in terms of the public need. We are of opinion that the country is in need of defence. Let us issue the credit necessary for the purpose without borrowing, and take steps to prevent profiteering on the manufacture of defence equipment. By taking the profit out of war we will be on the road to peace.

Mr. F. D. MacKENZIE (Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, as very often happens when a question is before this house, after several members have taken part in the debate there is very little to be said. It is not my intention to try to bring anything new into the discussion, but rather to emphasize and stress an idea already put forward.

In my opinion the first and third parts of the resolution have received more consideration than they deserve. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I think disposed of these completely. The second part of the resolution contains the germ of an idea which has some merit of a very practical kind. However, the wording of the resolution is too all-embracing, so much so that it defeats its own purpose. I think the resolution should read something like this:

> That, in the opinion of this house, legislation should be placed on the statute books of Canada ensuring that on the outbreak of war, in which Canada was engaged, Canadian citizens should not profiteer at the expense of their country.

Perhaps it could read something like this:

> That legislation should be enacted committing the country to the principle that should Canada ever be called upon to fight, either in defence of her frontiers or for other reasons, all the resources of the country such as men, money and material should be mobilized in a national scheme.

It could be put shortly as follows:

> If and when Canada goes to war, all the country's resources shall be nationalized.

In my opinion a resolution in the terms of the last one I have read would merit support.

When we returned to Canada from the last war there was a general feeling among the boys whom I knew that the conscription of wealth and labour, as well as of men for fighting, should be the basis of any arrangement for Canada entering another war. This opinion has become more general; as time has gone on I have found that more people support it. It is supported also by editorials in the press. From my own observations I have come to believe that the view is now very widely held that if Canada is forced into another war or undertakes another war, there must be a conscription of men and money.

This opinion is being expressed not only on the streets, in the clubs, and in the editorial columns of our newspapers, but by organizations of various kinds. Resolutions in support of this principle have been passed by organizations of province-wide strength. I hold in my hand a copy of a resolution passed by such an organization. I refer to the United Farmers of Manitoba, an organization which has always stood for sane, progressive and forward policies and which has always shown a careful, intelligent and conscientious leadership. This is no wild, irresponsible group of radical agriculturists; it is a body made up of men possessing keen minds and sound judgment. And generally speaking they are all peace loving men. On November 27, 28 and 29 a provincial conference of this organization was held at Neepawa. I should like to quote briefly from a resolution adopted at that meeting dealing with this very matter. The debate thereon was very interesting and in my opinion compared quite favourably with the debate we have just listened to on this resolution. I listened to men whose voices in years past had been heard and heard with effect right here in this chamber. Two findings of more than ordinary importance were agreed upon and embodied in a resolution. Right here may I say that the government might very well note the support in this resolution for their defence program, an implied support offered prior to the announced government program and anticipating some such program of defence. May I quote briefly:

> Whereas under the changed conditions as regards world peace, many people expect the Canadian government to enter upon a new and extended defence program, and
> Whereas, in our opinion, one of the vital elements in any defence policy should be the maintenance and extension of the spirit of peace,
> Therefore, be it resolved that we urge upon the government that if any defence budget is adopted, a reasonable and definite proportion of the total sum be devoted to promoting the peace spirit among our people and to giving the peoples of the world to know that in the hearts of our people there is a deep, intense and universal desire to live at peace with them all.

The resolution goes on to show how this plan might be put into operation, but I shall not take up the time of the house with the details. It continues:

> That in the undertaking of any preparations for the possible contingency of war (1) the government take steps to commit the nation to the principle that immediately upon the declaration of war, financial control of all industry shall be assumed by the government so that profiteering of every kind, out of war conditions and services, shall be rendered impossible and that all wealth shall be conserved and applied to the national purpose of maintenance of the population and the realization of the nation's war objective.

I commend this next clause to the attention of the Minister of National Defence. It reads:

> That the working out of plans for such mobilization of economic resources be made a part of any defence policy upon which the nation may enter.

I think hon. members will agree with me that the resolution I have quoted needs little elucidation. When one reads it carefully and follows out all its implications, can there be any doubt that here is possibly the greatest assurance of peace obtainable anywhere? It may be nationalization, yes, but only after a declaration of war and only after the ground has been prepared well ahead of time. There will have to be nationalization in some form or other should Canada enter another war. If legislation to this effect is placed upon our statute books so that all may know that the next war will not mean fat profits, that it will mean nationalization, the mobilization of all the men and resources for the country's fight, I ask you if we are likely to have another war in which Canada is concerned.

When we refer to the munitions maker I think we have in mind anyone who makes a profit out of war. Will the munitions maker want war when he knows that this plan has been put in effect? Will he want war when he knows that the government in case of war will immediately step in and take over control of all the production of the state? Think of this in all its implications. I want to leave this question with you.

How practicable is this resolution? Having seen something of war operations in more than one theatre, I know the tremendous problem of organization involved. The problem would not be increased, but rather would be lessened by preparation ahead of time. I realize that there are difficulties in the way of obtaining goods and services when the profit motive is removed; it might be said that we would be crippling our own cause as other nations would not do likewise, but I answer that by saying: If you have considered all the implications of the scheme and their consequences you will see, as I see, that this applies only after we are at war—at war under a national scheme—and if there is a firing squad for cowardice, for slacking or other mistakes on the fighting front, there would no doubt, under a scheme of nationalization, be the same arrangement for slackers on the home front, just as there is in Russia to-day.

I think the people should think of these things and be prepared for what is ahead if Canada enters another war. For myself I cannot conceive of the country ever entering another war on the free and easy basis on which we did the last. And when hon. members object to this scheme because it means nationalization in war, and would lead to a possible continuation of the same type of government after war, I would answer, quite true; but what hope of a democratic form of government, what hope of anything but dictatorship or anarchy, or what hope of any kind would follow another world war?

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, support the resolution as it stands on the order paper.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate, for one reason. At the first session of the present parliament there was introduced for discussion by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), a resolution which in many respects is similar to the one we are now discussing. For example, it stated "that, unless and until, there is a sincere acceptance and application of the above"—referring to certain principles therein stated—"by the member-nations of the league, Canada will refuse to participate in any foreign war no matter who the belligerents may be." On that occasion I spoke briefly to the resolution and outlined the studied opinion of the social credit group on war. This year the resolution which is sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) goes further, in my opinion; it has been broadened to include such matters as war profiteering and government plans to remove causes of war. I should, however, like to read from what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said last year in the debate on the resolution of the hon. member for Weyburn, to which I have already referred. It is found at page 675 of Hansard, and is as follows:

> We come to the policies of our country, and as yet, unfortunately in my judgment, this country, like a good many other countries is still relying more or less upon armaments as a last resort. I suggest that an isolationist position cannot be successfully maintained in the world to-day. Things may come to such a pass, if we are about to be dragged into a war and there may be no other policy open to us. We may be forced to adopt an isolationist policy and refuse to be dragged in. But it should be remembered that to-day the world is becoming more or less integrated industrially, financially and socially. We cannot stay out by ourselves. As long as we are in the world neighbourhood we have to deal with the people whom we meet in that neighbourhood. So we ought to recognize that the League of Nations, in so far as it is an association of nations seeking to promote peace, ought to be supported.

In my opinion this does not conform strictly to the first section of the present resolution. It is quite possible that I have missed the purport of the hon. member's remarks on that occasion, or indeed may have misconstrued them; if I have, I know he will put me right and I shall be glad to have him do so.

[Mr. F. D. Mackenzie.]

Some days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) outlined definitely and concisely the Liberal viewpoint of the world situation as it now presents itself to us and as it affects Canada. I think I am safe in saying that it was not an imperialistic viewpoint. He was followed by one of the younger members of the Conservative party, who spoke definitely in favour of imperialism, and I think he was speaking on behalf of the whole of his party. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group placed upon Hansard the complete manifesto of his party upon the subject. To me has been given the task of outlining what we of the Social Credit party sincerely believe are the causes of war and how such a calamity can not only be avoided but forever wiped out. Before doing this, however, I should like to make one or two general remarks.

The thing which concerns me most at the moment is not whether I am an isolationist or an imperialist, but what we should do now, when every nation is rearming feverishly. I must confess that I lean towards Canada taking some action now, although my whole being cries out against rearmament. I sometimes say to myself when thinking of the situation: What would you do, if you were leader in this Dominion of Canada, should the United States and Japan make up their minds some morning to shoot it out on the Pacific, or if one of these nations established or attempted to establish a base somewhere in Canada from which to carry on its operations? It is imperative that we face the facts now and make a decision on this difficult position.

In this resolution we are asked to lend our support to the taking of profits out of war. As the Prime Minister has said, if we eliminate profits from guns and ammunition and tanks we must also eliminate profits from horses and cattle, grain and foodstuffs. That would mean the socialization of industry, and I am afraid I cannot go that far. However, I will say this. I will support whole-heartedly any movement or any organization which pledges itself to smash munition rings and the international financiers who stand behind those rings.

Then we come to the last section. The Prime Minister said it should have come first. I agree with him entirely, but I would go further and say it should come first, last and all the time. We call the fire engine to put out a fire, but when the danger is over we plan how to prevent fires in the future. The League of Nations did the best it could, but we must see to it that a new league shall try out new schemes and new plans. If we persist in following the old ideas of bygone days we shall always have trouble. We must develop the courage to try new methods even though we may be prejudiced against them.

High tariffs and economic nationalism have been advanced as reasons for international friction. I do not agree. Tariffs are simply herrings drawn across the trail to deceive; and as for economic nationalism, I cannot see what is wrong with any nation aiming to develop itself internally to such a degree that its citizens may have all the food they want, all the clothes they want to wear and the finest homes they can possibly build to live in. That is what my understanding of economic nationalism is, and until a better definition of the term is forthcoming that definition is good enough for me. I believe I can bring many eminent authorities to substantiate the statement that commercial and industrial rivalry are entirely responsible for the jealousy and hatred amongst nations to-day.

It is surprising that on many occasions I find myself heartily in accord with the Prime Minister, but there is the odd occasion when we part company. Speaking the other day he said that if ever war should have to be declared parliament would decide. Well, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house I certainly do not crave or yearn for the responsibility; in fact I am not so sure that is the right course to adopt. Most of us at present sitting in this House of Commons and in the Senate as well have reached the stage in life when it would be exceedingly difficult for us to man a machine gun, to take up a bomber laden with deadly disease or gas bombs, or perhaps to take our turn in a trench or in a dugout. Yet in our hands lies the power to send some other mother's son to do the job for us. We have not yet by any means paid for the last war; we have not given economic security to those to whom such security was promised. We are at our wit's end to know what to do with the returned soldier problem. The Minister of Pensions is doing his very best, but the new problems that are constantly confronting him are in my judgment almost insurmountable. He, of all ministers in the cabinet, is deserving of much sympathy. Those who would have to suffer, and if need be die; those who have to bear the terrible burden and the costs of another war, should surely have something to say as to whether war should or should not be declared. In my judgment we should refer the matter to the people for their decision by means of a referendum. It can be done; it simply must be done.

And now may I read the statement which I mentioned a few moments ago as outlining the policy of the Social Credit party:

> Because we recognize that war is one of the inevitable consequences of the present monetary system brought about to a very large degree by the struggle for markets to establish favourable trade balances, and because we realize that until the nations of the world are prepared to depart from traditional monetary methods and substitute a money system based upon the productive capacity of the nations, we believe there can be little hope for lasting peace. We also believe that the greatest success in eliminating war may be achieved by the proper adjustment of consumption in relation to production and this, we believe, can most readily be brought about by the adoption of the basic principles of Social Credit.
> We believe that the nations of the world must be prepared to bring into operation systems based upon human values rather than material values so as to satisfy the requirements of their people to the full capacity of industry to produce and deliver goods and services.
> Having these objects in view we, therefore, propose to strive for their attainment which we believe will bring about among the nations:
> (1) The reduction of armaments;
> (2) The reduction of armies and navies;
> (3) The training of youth in other than war-like channels;
> (4) The discouragement of all activities having war-like tendencies;

You may disagree entirely with our viewpoint; that is only to be expected. Nevertheless, I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we are sincere when we say that only by these methods will war and its hellish horrors ever be obliterated.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is indeed a very important one, and although it is impossible for me to support it I am pleased to say that it serves a good purpose in bringing to the attention of the country conditions as they are in the world to-day.

My hon. friend has painted a picture of war which certainly is not overdrawn; he could have said a good deal more about it. Another world war under present conditions would result necessarily in a cataclysm which might be the end of civilization. Many thinkers believe that another world war would bring about revolution, and that is one of the chief reasons why the leaders of the world, in spite of difficulties they have to meet, are I think opposed to war and will try to avoid it. It is all very well to speak of neutrality, but scientific developments have bound all the nations of the world together in such a way that the fate of every one of them depends largely on the fate of the others. That is why it is essential that they should unite in order to prevent war and the consequences which would necessarily follow.

The best way to avoid our being involved in a war is to do our utmost to prevent it. The best way not to be involved in a war is to take steps to ensure that there shall be no war. And the statesmen of the world, to whatever country they belong, who may be in any way responsible for the prevention of the catastrophe of war will deserve well not only of their own fellow countrymen but of the citizens of other countries, even if they make mistakes in other policies. I do not yield to my hon. friend in my hatred of war. I hate war in every fibre of my being. I will do anything to try to prevent Canada being involved in a war. But peace is two-sided. As a world statesman, the present premier of France, Léon Blum, said recently, peace must be general because war would be general.

The main fault I find with the resolution of my hon. friend is that it is not at all constructive; indeed, to my mind it is destructive. Has my hon. friend realized that if his resolution were adopted by this parliament, Canada would be out of the League of Nations? My hon. friend and some of those who agree with him profess loyalty to the league, at least they give it lip service. But if this resolution were carried we should advertise to the world that we would not do anything in regard to observance of the pledges which this country has given to the sister members of the League of Nations. To article X, to article XVI of the covenant of the league, we are pledged. It is true that parliament would decide to what extent we should help a fellow member of the league if attacked by an aggressor. But reserving the right to judge as to the extent of our participation in the defence of that member is not neutrality, nor does it mean that in economic or diplomatic matters we would not side with the victim of the aggression rather than with the aggressor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would crave my hon. friend's indulgence to allow me to proceed without interruption.

There is no doubt that this resolution if carried would mean the withdrawal of Canada from the League of Nations. Thus we should be left with no connection with any organization through which we could work with the other nations of the world for the establishment of international peace. Yet my hon. friend says he is in favour of the League of Nations. They all say that. But in what way would he support the League of Nations? I agree that the League of Nations is not as effective as I would like it to be, not as effective as it was meant to be. But I will not admit that it has failed, as many hon. members including, I think, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), have said. Some nations have failed the league; my hon. friend is failing the league in introducing this resolution. But the League of Nations has not failed. When the league was created after the war there was behind it a strong wave of public sentiment. It answered a psychological need, a state of mind that existed everywhere after the war. The people of the world were eager for peace; they were craving peace; they had a passionate desire for peace. It is a state of mind which perhaps does not exist to-day, but this sentimental and mystic feeling still prevails. There is need that a prophet should arise somewhere to rekindle the flame. But the league is not dead.

I say more than that. If there were another war, from that terrible cataclysm the League of Nations would arise again and be revivified. It would emerge with some changes, perhaps; but surely the movement towards international order in the civilized world will not stop; it will go on. The only question is whether new blood may be necessary in order that the league may be more solidly entrenched in the world. After all, the League of Nations is only twenty years old, and it has to fight a condition that has existed for thousands of years. It has to replace with brotherly love and friendship the ferocious attitude which exists in many quarters of the world. This is a difficult work, but everyone should assist in it instead of trying to find reasons for criticism and blaming the league for not having done more than it has been able to do. And who can say that the league has not prevented wars? Conditions have been terribly difficult during the few years which have elapsed since the end of the war. War has loomed up many times, and the league has been successful in doing something. If it has not been successful in some instances, particularly in two glaring ones, does this fact take away every credit the league may have in regard to other instances with which my hon. friend is well acquainted? In that respect may I quote the words of the present Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, uttered only a few weeks ago. This is what Mr. Yvon Delbos said:

> Doubtless, also, some who pretent to be realists set up the concept of peace imposed by the single law of force against the ideal of peace through justice, the failure of which they proclaim. But are not they themselves the creators of the impotence which they denounce? In fact, the family of nations is weak only so far as they weaken it. Moreover, it is less feeble than they claim and than they desire. As for the concept which they set up against it, this has been tried out only too thoroughly. All history proves to us that the reign of force has never resulted in anything but bloody conflicts. And how can one claim that war is avoided by multiplying the sinews of war and the temptations to recur to it while refusing procedures which tend to avoid it; that the security of the weak is guaranteed by placing no restraint on abuses by the strong; that harmony among the peoples is to be accomplished by preventing them from organizing; that a champion of order is one who does not admit any international law? Such an attitude bears its own condemnation. But the risks of war which it creates and the obstacles which it opposes to peace-loving nations unfortunately retard the necessary organization.

That is no reason to renounce the ideal. On the contrary, redoubled efforts are necessary.

I associate myself with those words, and I commend them to the consideration of hon. members.

Occosionally there is some talk of the cost of the League of Nations. Well, Mr. Speaker, the whole cost of the League of Nations, the world court and the international labour office amounts to $9,500,000, which is less than the cost of a single first-class cruiser such as those which are being constructed by many at the present time.

I am not like my hon. friend, who believes in having force behind the League of Nations. I do not think war should be avoided by means of war.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask the minister not to put into my mouth what I did not say.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not want to put anything into my hon. friend's mouth; there is plenty in it already. I was of opinion that my hon. friend had most openly expressed himself in the way I described, but I accept his statement. I say I am opposed to force being exercised by the League of Nations, but I believe we should help the victim against the aggressor, economically, diplomatically or otherwise. I refuse to agree that we should treat the gangster, international or otherwise, just as we treat his victim, the one who is struck by him.

The weakness of the league, if weakness exists, is due to the anarchy which prevails in the world at the present time much more than to any defect in the structure of the league. Of course the extremists, whether they are militarists or pacifists, speak against the league; all those on the extreme side usually denounce the league. But that is the very reason why we who claim to be moderate should support it as strongly as we can.

There are contradictions in my hon. friend's position, as I think he will admit. For instance, he says he is not an isolationist. How does he reconcile that statement with the terms of his resolution? If this motion is adopted, we go out entirely from the concert of nations, and mind you, Mr. Speaker, it is not only to the League of Nations that we as a country have given pledges. When we signed the Pact of Paris we pledged ourselves to consider as a criminal any nation which would try to effect the settlement of an international conflict by means of war or which would accept war as a national policy in solving disputes. In that Pact of Paris which we signed, and which was accepted here unanimously, we declared that any nation taking that position would be an enemy of Canada. That is what is really stated in the Pact of Paris, but my hon. friend brushes that aside together with the pact of the League of Nations.

I will ask my hon. friend further: Has he seriously considered what a declaration of absolute neutrality, as embodied in his resolution, would mean? Has he considered that, according to all constitutional writers, this would mean the secession of Canada from the commonwealth of nations? I do not think my hon. friend wants to go that far. There is all the difference in the world between neutrality, and participation or non-participation, which we shall be always free to declare, in the event of any war. The parliament of Canada will be always free to say whether or not we shall participate in any war. But neutrality is quite different. In the constitutional position of Canada to-day neutrality would mean that an enemy of our king could be a friend of Canada; that we could trade with him during a war in which the king might be engaged; that to nations with which the king might be at war we could send ordinary material, anything that a neutral nation could sell to countries actively engaged in war.

This question as to the right of the dominions to be strictly neutral is one of the questions yet to be solved, and it will not be solved in the way suggested by my hon. friend. My hon. friend referred to South Africa and said that Canada should do as South Africa has done in that regard. I have before me the debates of the South African parliament for 1934 when the constitutional act of that country was discussed. At page 1939 I find these words, which were uttered by the Minister of the Interior, who was in charge of the bill:

If South Africa has not got the right of neutrality it can still do three things. It can decide to participate actively in the war. Or it can still be passively belligerent. And the third thing that may happen, it may want to go further, or it is possible that the hostile power may not be content with its passivity, and then South Africa, as the master of its own destiny, can, in the last resort, exercise its power of secession. I am not talking about the right of secession, but it can break away and thus assume that right of neutrality. We say, then, that whatever line we follow, whether we have the right of neutrality or not we find ourselves in exactly the same position. Any one of these things can happen and the ultimate result is the same. The only difference is that in the one case you have a revolution. That is to say that if we exercise the power of secession without the right of secession, it means revolution, but apart from that, the result is the same. So I return to the point I make, and that is, that in practice this question is an academic question on which we may have a difference of view.

Then may I particularly direct the attention of the house to a statement made by the Minister of Justice, General Smuts, who is well known throughout the British commonwealth of nations, and who has always fought for South African autonomy. This statement appears at page 2080:

To my mind these things, secession, neutrality and the like are impracticable and academic. I do not believe that anything we can say in a constitution will settle our attitude or influence it when we come to the day of secession or to the day to declare our neutrality. These events, if ever they come to pass, would shake the whole British Empire and perhaps the whole world to its foundations. It is futile. You may talk about these things in a debating way if you are a debating society, but men who have been through the ordeals we have been through attach no importance to formulae of words. Consider, for example, the position of the United States of America during the war. The United States did her utmost to keep out of the Great war. She fought a presidential election during the war to keep out of it, and everybody was pledged to the full to keep out of the war; but in spite of all in a couple of months she was in the war. She could not maintain her neutrality. Whether it is neutrality or secession or any of these things they will be decided, not by legal documents or the phraseology of a bill like this—

I might add—or a resolution like that of my hon. friend.

—but by the ordeal of facts, of great events which might shake not only this country, but even the world to its foundations. But sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Wise men leave these things alone.

I commend that to my hon. friend. I have not time to read all the quotations I have before me, but I would direct the attention of my hon. friend and of the house to a very valuable work. The Present Juridical Status of the British Dominions in International Law, written by Mr. Baker, who is a jurist of repute in Britain and who some time ago was elected as a labour member of the British parliament. Mr. Baker has a whole chapter devoted to this subject, headed The Problem of "Automatic Belligerency" and the Effect of the Covenant of the League of Nations, in which he takes exactly the view I have tried to submit to the house, and in which he quotes Pearce Higgins, Duncan Hall, Smith and Corbett, who are Canadian constitutional authors, as well as McNair, Keith and various other authors. He concludes with these words:

As Keith has said of the application of the covenant to inter-commonwealth relations, "the truth is....that the matter could not be thought out in advance," and in consequence it "presents a problem which time and usage alone can solve."

Mr. Baker states there what I have been saying, that there is all the difference between neutrality and passive belligerency; that participation in any war will be a matter strictly for the parliament of each dominion to decide, and that this decision will be taken in the light of the circumstances as they exist at the time.

May I conclude this phase of the discussion by quoting what my old leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, stated in regard to this matter:

Whilst I cannot admit that Canada should take part in all the wars of Great Britain, neither am I prepared to say that she should not take part in any war at all. I am prepared to look upon each case upon its merits as it arises....I claim for Canada this, that in future Canada shall be at liberty to act or not to act, to interfere or not to interfere, to do just as she pleases, and that she shall reserve to herself the right to judge whether or not there is cause for her to act.

History has shown that when a war breaks out, matters of this kind are not decided by whatever resolutions or even laws have been placed upon the statute books. They are decided in the light of conditions as they exist and, unfortunately by the feelings that are aroused when the time comes and hostilities begin. But that is human nature. It would be futile to place a resolution of this kind in the records of parliament. Parliament cannot bind its successors on this or on any other question. A resolution of this parliament would not bind the parliament which would be at the head of affairs when trouble came to Canada. By no means could future parliaments be bound by an act or by words of this parliament. I say that elementary prudence requires us to preserve our liberty, our freedom and our independence of judgment for the time when the occasion arises.

Let me tell my hon. friend that neutrality does not mean doing away with the necessity of armaments. The United States have proclaimed their desire for neutrality—they have passed no resolution of this kind—but they are increasing their armaments to a degree greater than has been seen by any American. Just a few weeks ago the King of Belgium made a statement to the world which aroused great interest. He proclaimed the neutrality of Belgium and stated that it was absolutely without any commitments to any other country. But he said that in order to assure that neutrality, Belgium would have to increase her armaments. He asked the Belgian nation to support the government in its policy of increased armaments. Increased armaments and neutrality go together. May I translate one or two sentences from his speech?

Unless she possesses herself of a system of defence capable of resisting, Belgium will see herself from the outset invaded and massacred. That is why we must, as the Minister of Foreign Affairs has stated recently, pursue a policy completely Belgian. This policy looks to our being placed outside the conflicts of our neighbours, it insures our national ideals, but it must be sustained by a military and financial effort. This will bring about the unity of Belgium and animate her people with an intense and primordial desire for peace.

Switzerland is perhaps the classical example of a neutral country, but I do not think my hon. friend would like to see Canada militarized to the extent of Switzerland. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was telling me that when he was at the League of Nations there were posters on nearly every wall in Geneva asking the people of Switzerland to subscribe to a national loan for armaments. When my hon. friend uses opposition to armaments as an argument in support of a resolution declaring neutrality, I think he is entirely wrong. Experience has shown that those countries which are stated, by law or otherwise, to be neutral, are compelled to have many armaments in order to protect themselves and their neutrality. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) wanted us to ask President Roosevelt to convene a world conference on peace. Everyone knows that the president is an apostle of peace and is working for peace. Does he think that is sufficient to warrant a policy of no protection at all for the United States? I have in my hands the New York Times of Saturday, August 15, 1936, which contains the full text of a speech on international affairs delivered by President Roosevelt at Chautauqua. This speech has been read by many people in Canada. The president said:

We are not isolationists except in so far as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war. Yet we must remember that so long as war exists on earth there will be some danger that even the nation which most ardently desires peace may be drawn into war.

I have seen war. I have seen war on land and sea. I have seen blood running from the wounded. I have seen men coughing out their gassed lungs. I have seen the dead in the mud. I have seen cities destroyed. I have seen two hundred limping, exhausted men come out of line—the survivors of a regiment of one thousand that went forward forty-eight hours before. I have seen children starving. I have seen the agony of mothers and wives. I hate war.

I have passed unnumbered hours, I shall pass unnumbered hours, thinking and planning how war may be kept from this nation.

I wish I could keep war from all nations, but that is beyond my power. I can at least make certain that no act of the United States helps to produce or to promote war. I can at least make clear that the conscience of America revolts against war and that any nation which provokes war forfeits the sympathy of the people of the United States.

Many causes produce war. There are ancient hatreds, turbulent frontiers, the "legacy of old forgotten, far off things, and battles long ago." There are new-born fanaticisms, convictions on the part of certain peoples that they have become the unique depositories of ultimate truth and right.

A dark old world was devastated by wars between conflicting religions. A dark, modern world faces wars between conflicting economic and political fanaticisms in which are intertwined race ratreds. To bring it home, it is as if within the territorial limits of the United States, forty-eight nations with forty-eight forms of government, forty-eight customs barriers, forty-eight languages and forty-eight eternal and different verities, were spending their time and their substance in a frenzy of effort to make themselves strong enough to conquer their neighbours or strong enough to defend themselves against their neighbours.

Further on, he says:

In spite of every possible forethought, international relations involve of necessity a vast unchartered area. In that area safe sailing will depend on the knowledge and the experience and the wisdom of those who direct our foreign policy. Peace will depend on their day to day decisions.

At this late date, with the wisdom which is so easy after the event and so difficult before the event, we find it possible to trace the tragic series of small decisions which led Europe into the great war in 1914 and eventually engulfed us and many other nations.

We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide have a sufficiently detailed understanding of international affairs to make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say "no" to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war.

Of all the nations of the world to-day we are in many ways most singularly blessed. Our closest neighbours are good neighbours. If there are remoter nations that wish us not good but ill, they know that we are strong; they know that we can and will defend ourselves and defend our neighbourhood.

We seek to dominate no other nation. We ask no territorial expansion. We oppose imperialism. We desire reduction in world armaments.

We believe in democracy; we believe in freedom; we believe in peace. We offer to every nation of the world the handclasp of the good neighbour. Let those who wish our friendship look us in the eye and take our hand.

I think those words of President Roosevelt could be reechoed by us and certainly represent the feelings of most Canadians. We are in a splendid position geographically, and we thank God for it. But perhaps we are over enthusiastic if we suppose that other countries are not thinking of Canada and its resources. The other day, while in the library reading some books on this question, I put my hand on a publication, "The Future of the League of Nations," which is a record of a series of discussions held at Chatham House during 1936. In attendance there were some of the best known British thinkers, including Sir Norman Angell, Lord Arnold, Sir James Barrett, Hon. R. H. Brand, Lord Howard, the Marquis of Lothian and other distinguished men. Even our friend H. G. Wells was one of the conferees, also Sir Arthur Salter and many other men who are well known to members of this house. This is what one of the main participants in the conference, Doctor Toynbee, said at page 120:

I think the Italian case—

He was discussing the Italo-Ethiopian conflict.

—shows the strength of the universal scheme. It seems to me that what really sent the Italians to fight Abyssinia was two things done by North American countries. The first was in 1927 when the Italians raised the point of access to raw materials and the Canadian delegate stamped on it; and the second was the passing of the two American Immigration Acts of 1921 and 1924 which produced this mass of baulked young men in Italy who had to be turned to something good or bad.

So it is obvious that the problem of the natural resources in which some countries are lacking, and which constitute the great wealth of this country, is far from being solved, and that Canada's resources are certainly coveted by many interests elsewhere. President Roosevelt, in the speech from which I have quoted, spoke of world conditions and the nature of the new conflicts that are raging in the world. To-day there are groups organized and ready to fight and die for an abstract creed. These are no longer wars of trade and frontiers; such groups are fighting for abstract ideas. My hon. friend mentioned two countries not by their names but by the names of their leaders, Hitler and Mussolini. I wish he had mentioned Russia as well. They are all fighting freedom and democracy, and we must include them all in our abhorrence of the creeds which they try to preach and spread throughout the world. In this connection may I say to an organization from which I receive occasional resolutions and other communications and which calls itself the League against War and Fascism, that I should be inclined to consider its resolutions and communications with more sympathy if it would add to its name and activities so as to make it read, the league against war and fascism "and communism," which it refrains from doing.

An hon. MEMBER: And deliberately.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And deliberately? I do not know. One of my hon. friends says so. But as far as we in Canada are concerned we are for our free institutions and we defend them, and if a big war in Europe is occasioned by a conflict between these two creeds or doctrines, Canada should not spend one cent or one life in support of either of them. Possibly it is unfortunate that some Canadians are taking sides in the conflict which is going on over there to-day. We should remain loyal to Canadian ideals. Totalitarian states, absolutism, dictatorships, the prevention of people speaking their own minds on pain of being sent to some island or concentration camp—to all these things whether they come from the right or the left, we in Canada are opposed; they are bad for us Canadians; I do not see why anybody should fight in support of either side in such a conflict, and we shall not.

But we must be able to defend our citizens against the madness of some present day rulers. If international chiefs or gangsters ever come to assail us in a mad impulse—because the world is mad at the present time—we cannot meet them with a declaration of neutrality. That will not do at all. In that regard, as my hon. friend often talks of South Africa, may I read one article in the platform of the nationalist party in South Africa, that is, the extreme party for South African autonomy. I find it in the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, where there is a report of the debate on May 22 last, and the leader of the nationalist party said:

In connection with the status of South Africa, the Prime Minister and other members of the government had said, over and over again that they were on a footing of closest cooperation with the British defence force. They stood for the maintenance of that connection and therefore differed in nothing from Colonel Stallard and his party.

The Nationalist party, in its program of principles, acknowledged "the duty of the government to provide an efficient system of land defence, both on land and sea, and in the air, for the protection of the country and its interests and consistent with our national independence."

I said that if on a mad impulse, in the course of a war, some of these people should come and try to injure Canada in any way, it would be our duty to defend ourselves. But there must be some preparation for that defence. When a house is burning it is too late to organize a fire brigade; that must be done before the fire occurs. When a flood is in progress it is then too late to build a dam; the damage is done before this precaution has been resorted to. Similarly, if we believe—if we do not, I give up my case immediately—it is the duty of Canada to protect its own citizens against any possible emergency, then I do not think anybody could oppose what is an elementary necessity for such defence, and for such defence alone.

My hon. friend took it upon himself to make a sort of appeal to the French-Canadian members. May I tell him that possibly the French-Canadian members will not accept his leadership in this regard. I was a member of parliament during the great war and had some experience of what took place; I had experience of what occurred in my own province. In the fight against conscription, against compulsory military service, which was waged in Quebec, I said to all who took part in it—and this statement was everywhere emphasized—that everyone in that province was ready to do anything for the defence of Canada when the time came. And that statement still holds good. We are prepared to do anything for the defence of Canada. But I do not think our people would like to be involved in a war that might be waged between communism and fascism, because they hate both. They are prepared, however, to defend their own country, and in that respect my hon. friend will not succeed in his passionate appeal to them.

The other day I read this statement by the great American economist, Roger W. Babson:

> The Spanish revolution is only the first round in a world conflict which will last for a long time.

If this is true, and if Canada wishes to remain outside that conflict, we must see to it that we shall be able to defend the women and children of our country should these madmen, in a moment of insane impulse, try to attack us.

These are my last words. The duties of a public man are difficult but they must be discharged. If I believe that there is some possibility of danger—and everybody says there is—I will accept my responsibility. I will not trust to the impassioned speeches of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or to the misrepresentations of any section of the press whether in my own province or elsewhere. I do my duty as my conscience bids me; I do my duty because I should not want to be accused at any time of not having done something to prevent the death of any Canadian woman or child. This is the position I take and by it I stand.

As to the last part of my hon. friend's resolution, let me assure him that Canada is anxious to do anything it can to prevent international conflict and to work for peace. We will do everything we can to throw Canada's influence into the scale on the side of peace, and we have always done so. May I refer to certain incidents. Take the Chanak affair; we refused to be bound to go to war because of some conflict in the far east. Take Locarno; we were asked to guarantee the eastern frontier of some countries and we refused to do that. We refused to be committed, and I regarded that as the proper course to adopt. We are not committed; we shall decide when the time comes whether we shall participate or not, and I trust that circumstances will justify Canada in remaining outside any conflict. But we want to reserve our freedom and our independence, as free men should, and not to be committed by any resolution such as my hon. friend has proposed.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before the house is called upon to vote upon so important a question as that of Canada's neutrality in the event of war, I deem it my duty to express my opinion. I shall do so with the frankness and straightforwardness that the gravity of the situation demands.

The government, perhaps with good reason, seems to have deviated somewhat from the policy adhered to in recent years as regards armaments and national defence. This deviation is seen especially in an increase in the defence estimates. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been taken rather unawares and that I have not been able to give to my remarks all the attention I should have liked. However, in view of the turn events have taken and of a body of opinion this is manifesting itself in many parts of the country, I feel that I should speak up without hesitation and, of course, without provocation, while fully respecting the opinions of those who entertain regarding our national situation views that differ from mine.

I agree with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) that we should cultivate a North American rather than a European mentality. It is hardly necessary to point out in detail the difference between these two mentalities. In most of the countries of Europe children, even on their mother's knees, constantly hear talk of war, of the enemy frontier, of hostile neighbours and their hated inhabitants. Later, at school, they learn how to make war, how to invade and attack some foreign nation. It is therefore not surprising that Europeans should be ready to sacrifice almost everything for armaments, for they have grown up in an atmosphere that we in this country hardly know. That is why, when war is seriously spoken of in Canada, a considerable part of the population becomes alarmed. Besides, we have been brought up in the hatred of war, of armaments and all their works. We have been told that many European nations make war in order to acquire territory, while we in Canada possess more territory than we can occupy and develop. Our public men and our leaders have taught us that competition in armaments was wrong or at least dangerous. Like many others who whisper what I shall say out loud, I have formed an opinion in accordance with that of the people among whom I live. In order to be logical and sincere, I must say that I am in favour of the first part of the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in so far as he wishes Canada to declare its neutrality, but on condition that such neutrality be compatible with our obligations, our honour and our national protection. Indeed, as representatives of the people, we must protect our citizens; our duty requires it. On the other hand, it must be admitted that should the empire be attacked Canada, as part of the empire, would be exposed to attack, and if we simply say: we are neutral, we will not fight, the enemy will have but one answer, which will be to summon us to surrender.

On the question of Canada's neutrality and her armaments, I should like to form an honest opinion, based on realities as well as on prudence, and this is how I analyse the situation. First, what alternatives have we? Should we separate from the empire? If so, we would naturally become an absolutely independent nation, and as such we could rely only on ourselves for our defence. We would have to provide for our defence and do so alone. Would that cost us less than it does now? Would we be better protected? We are told that the United States would defend us, but if they spend millions of dollars and sacrifice the lives of their soldiers for us, they will naturally seek some compensation. Do we want to belong to the United States?

Secondly, do we want to remain in the empire? If so, can we remain in it by folding our arms in case of a war, even of defence? In the event of an attack against the empire and against us as part of the empire, can we simply not defend ourselves but call England or the rest of the empire to our aid?

Thirdly, can we afford to arm ourselves sufficiently to repel a serious attack? Are we sufficiently rich in men and money to do so? I say that we are not. A small nation whose population is concentrated in a limited area with a short boundary line can resist an enemy far more powerful that she is, but Canada is too large in area and too small in population to offer a serious defence in case of attack. I believe that Canada could not defend herself against most of the European nations taken individually. I go as far as to say that, under present conditions, any defence that Canada could offer against a serious attack would be almost futile.

However, I consider that considerations of prudence and foresight demand that Canada, as one of the nations of the world, should have some kind of an army, in the same way that every city needs a police force. We therefore need an army whose size and cost should be measured by the danger that threatens us and our ability to pay. My opinion is that we are not exposed to great danger, and it is a fact that the state of our finances does not permit us to undertake any expenditure that is not absolutely necessary. I therefore object to the provision of armaments to an extent not justified by any immediate danger and by the financial resources of the country. Above all, Mr. Speaker, I object to any participation by Canada in the armament race. The most distressing, disconcerting and discouraging part of it is the apparent approval given, through a combination of circumstances both visible and invisible, to Canada's entry in the race for armaments.

With such boundaries as the north pole, the Atlantic ocean, the Pacific ocean, and the United States, whose president recently declared: "Our boundary line is the link that unites us," I wonder against what enemies we should protect ourselves if not, perhaps with some reason, against domestic agitators or certain subversive elements already active in this country.

Lastly, I am opposed to anything that smacks of imperialism. If my opinion in this matter differs from that of the members of the party to which I belong, and which no doubt is the best, there is no reason for astonishment, as I believe the Liberal party to be big and wide enough to include different opinions.

Mr. Speaker, with the reservations already mentioned, I agree with the principle of the first paragraph of the resolution now before this house:

> That under existing international relations, in the event of war, Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be.

As to the second paragraph of the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—his riding is like his resolutions, it extends in every direction—I cannot support this proposal which reads as follows:

> That at no time should Canadian citizens be permitted to make profits out of supplying war munitions or materials.

I fail to see why we should object to the manufacture of war munitions to be sold to an unjustly attacked nation. When a country attacks another unjustly, the country thus attacked is justified in defending itself and in looking for assistance. Since I do not agree with the resolution in its entirety, I have no other alternative but to vote against it as is customary. I felt that it was my duty to give these explanations before voting on the resolution.

When the National Defence estimates are brought down, I will follow the dictates of my conscience. I will take into account local requirements and certain menacing factors now prevailing in this country. For instance, I will bear in mind the significance of the recent uprising at Guelph, Ontario, which it is claimed is the result of subversive movements in our dominion. Recent occurrences in Quebec city will also be taken into account. I will recall the rather strange statement made recently by the hon. the premier of the province of Quebec at Trois-Rivières, which reads as follows:

> Speaking as Attorney General of this province, I affirm that communistic organizations distributed a short time ago money to the young men of the province of Quebec for the purpose of enrolling them in the Spanish communist armies, and they even supplied them with Canadian passports.

Again, I will not lose sight of the disturbing forces already mentioned that have been prevalent in other countries and which are now at work in Spain. I will take into account the extent to which Spain and other countries have suffered from the activities of these agitators, and I will not forget that we have in the province of Quebec similar principles and institutions to defend.

I will postpone to a later date the discussion on the possibility or likelihood of Canada being attacked. I may say that Norway and Holland have for many years followed an anti-armament policy, and both these countries found that, as a result, they were far better off. I submit that nations that have no armament program are less subject to aggression, as a country is often attacked as a result of armament. Approximately 50,000 human lives were sacrificed during the last war, exclusive of the huge expenditures that we had to meet and that still constitute a problem to-day. The consequences of the last war and our national defence program represent nearly two fifths of our budget estimates. This should be a lesson to us. In Canada, we should be chiefly concerned with the clearing of lands that are fit for cultivation; we should strive to develop our mines that are so rich and abundant. Unemployment is the worst enemy that we have to combat; we must wipe out our national debt by means of a sound and practical policy.

As a North American country, the first duty of Canada is to ensure peace and progress at home. Personally, like the rest of our population, I wish to convey the assurance of my loyalty to the crown but, I repeat, I am utterly opposed to any imperialistic tendency. I was taught to believe that I am not a mere colonial but that I belong to an independent, free and self-governing dominion. As a citizen of such a dominion, I am proud to say that I am a plain Canadian. It is as subjects of the British Empire that many of our people are led to take an interest in European affairs.

Personally, I would like all Canadians to be plain Canadians, and would be pleased to see Canada, in relation to the empire, placed in the position of those solid bodies that do not dissolve when they come in contact with or under the influence of surrounding elements.

In conclusion, I may say that before preparing ourselves, or whilst preparing to face any enemy from outside, it is urgent that we should maintain peace within our boundaries by putting an end to all dissensions, so that our citizens may enjoy their rights in Canada. Let those who constitute the majority of the Canadian population show generosity towards the minority; if not for the sake of love, let it be at least in a true spirit of solidarity. Let us make a truce, and rid ourselves of such political tactics as those used by the Ontario Conservative leader who sits in this house, and by his friend Mr. Drew against the French-Canadian population in the course of a by-election in the province of Ontario.

Let us first settle our local and national difficulties and, once for all, may we realize that Canada is big enough to ensure the complete development of the ideals and the free enjoyment of the respective rights of the two great races in this country. Let the "bonne entente" be our motto, not only in theory but in practice. We will feel better inclined to greater sacrifices for our country that we love so much at the present time, but for which we will show a greater love when we are sure that all the members of the Canadian family are prepared to gladly march forward hand in hand.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) spoke on his motion on January 25th, he invited the French-Canadian members to express their views on the advisability for Canada, in the event of war, to remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be. The hon. member may rest assured that the French-Canadian members, who are all patriots, have, irrespective of party, carefully considered his resolution. Notwithstanding the importance of the issue, it is not likely that every member will give his opinion to this house; but in order to make my position clear, I wish to say a few words on this subject.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moves:

> That under existing international relations, in the event of war, Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most interesting proposal. If the mere accepting of the motion could settle this question to the satisfaction of all, I am sure that the members of this house would be in favour of it. The province of Quebec is undoubtedly opposed to imperialism. The belief there is that the word means the taking over of territory belonging to other nations by means of warfare. Quebec is not inclined to enter into partnership with the gentlemen from London or elsewhere who have their eyes on oil fields, diamond mines, gold mines, etc., etc., lying in foreign lands. These men would not hesitate in any way to have the empire, including Canada, engaged in a war to enrich themselves at the expense of poor defenceless peoples, by sending young men from all parts of the British Empire as cannon fodder, so as to satisfy the lust of these worshippers of the Golden Calf. Quebec is utterly against it, and it is not a party question at that. I also believe that the other provinces of the Dominion are no more anxious to embark upon ventures of this kind. The province of Quebec is also of the opinion that Canada has never been the cause of any war in which England was involved since the Treaty of Paris in 1763; but on the other hand, Canada has been invaded by the enemies of England, first at the time of the American Revolution, then in the war of 1812, not to speak of the trouble occasioned by the Fenian raids some time later. I say England, because at that time, the words British Empire and British Commonwealth of Nations were unknown. I may say that all the questions pertaining to the settling of the Canadian boundaries were subject to arbitration and I do not think that Canada has gained very much by it. The Privy Council lately settled the Labrador boundary. The province of Quebec was far from being satisfied with this judgment, but accepted it without protest.

As to the cost of war, I would advise the members of this house to study the figures given by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) in his speech delivered on January 28th, which will be found at page 381 of Hansard. These figures, I believe, appeared in Maclean's magazine of September 1, 1936. They show that from 1915 to 1936—both years included—the war has cost Canada a total of $4,602,968,368, of which $2,000,000,000 is for interest only. And this is not the end; the worst is yet to come. As others have stated before me and with great eloquence, the worst feature of it all is the useless sacrifice of human lives, and the ensuing misery which seems endless. Unfortunately, this does not settle the question because, even though the Canadian parliament should agree to this resolution, this would not guarantee safety to this country, in the event of one of the great powers declaring war upon Great Britain. Such an enemy would not hesitate to attack the empire anywhere. Should a naval or air squadron reach our shores, could we protect ourselves simply by informing the officer commanding that we are neutral? The answer admits of no doubt. Indeed, it is evident that, neutral or not, Canada, in the eyes of non-British people, forms part of the empire.

It has been said that the United States would protect us. That may be. But I am not simple enough to believe that if our American neighbours come to our defence they will do so without our paying the cost in some way or another. We have not forgotten the case of Belgium. For many years Belgium had been protected by treaties signed by the principal European powers, but in spite of these treaties which were considered sacred, which were almost considered as the keystone of European politics, Belgium was invaded.

Here, we have had the Chanak incident, when Lloyd George, at the time Prime Minister of Great Britain, inquired of the dominions, of Canada in particular, whether they would support his country against the Turks. Canada's Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mackenzie King, replied that the matter would be submitted to parliament. It must not be forgotten that, speaking at Geneva some time ago, the right hon. the Prime Minister reiterated this position which, more recently, he asserted again in this house. Such is therefore the Liberal policy, the policy which we have adopted, the policy which received the approval and the encouragement of the thinking citizens of this country. Certainly, we are against all participation in war if it can possibly be avoided. We take the position that we are opposed to war. But should we be attacked we would necessarily have to defend ourselves.

I know that some people make a great deal of a separatist movement in Quebec. This movement should not be given greater importance than it deserves. There is no doubt that some of our young men are dissatisfied with the present situation. We can hardly blame them when we see hundreds upon hundreds of well-educated, healthy young men vainly seeking suitable employment. Their discontent is only natural. These young men find a further cause of discontent in the conviction that they hold—and I may add that we, the French-Canadian members of this house, are pretty much of their opinion—that our people do not obtain all the civil service positions they should occupy. Therein lies one of the causes of discontent. This discontent will vanish as soon as its causes are removed.

As to this separatist movement, there is in the province of Quebec a man qualified above all others by the high office he occupies to pass judgment upon it. This man is Hon. Maurice Duplessis, Premier of the province of Quebec. In its edition of January 18, 1937, the Gazette reports the premier as having said at a dinner given by the Provincial Command of the Federation of Catholic Scouts of the Province of Quebec:

> Again he condemned any separatist movement in the province, urging rather unity with all the other provinces for the real progress of the country.

Not only did Hon. Maurice Duplessis make this statement, but another member of his government, Hon. Bona Dussault, Minister of Agriculture, spoke as follows at a banquet of the Canadian Ayrshire Breeders' Association held at the Queens Hotel, Montreal:

> It is not by locking ourselves up in the province of Quebec that we shall be able to achieve anything tangible and stable. It is said that a separatist movement is manifesting itself in this province. I can assure you that it does not represent the sentiment of our population. I can understand how our young men, imbued with new theories and filled with ambition, should have wished for a moment to isolate Quebec from the other provinces of the dominion. Let us hope that those who launched this movement will return to the sound ideals of their fathers who wanted a United Canada.

This statement was published in Le Canada of January 29, 1937, and is to be found in La Presse and La Patrie of the same date. I hold these papers at the disposal of anyone who wishes to consult them.

I shall conclude without referring to the two other clauses of the resolution, as they are not the most important ones. The resolution is an excellent one from an academic viewpoint. Unfortunately, it belongs to the realm of dreams. Were the house to agree to it, it would have the same value as most of the resolutions that are so lightly made at the beginning of each new year.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LOUIS P. A. ROBICHAUD (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but in view of what may develop I feel it only right that I should place on record the reason why I am going to vote against this resolution, if it comes to a vote.

The first part of the resolution states that Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be. Let me say that I agree with the mover of the resolution in those sentiments. I think we should do everything possible to remain neutral in any future war, and strangely enough that is the very reason why I am going to vote against the resolution. It has been said by some hon. members, whether in or out of this house I do not know, that this resolution really is insincere; that it was meant to put some of us on the spot, as one might say. Of course I am too generous to say that of the mover of this resolution; I believe he is sincere, but to my mind he is taking the very course which will defeat his purpose.

I say that for this reason: Let us suppose we pass the resolution to-night, and word goes out that Canada is not going to take part in any future war. The very men who would be interested in moulding public opinion, in keeping alert and awake, in acting as watch-dogs against our taking part in any future war, would be lulled into a false sense of security, believing that since the parliament of Canada passed this resolution we would not take part in any war which might develop. Thus the purpose for which this resolution is brought forward would be defeated. I do not want to take part in any future war, but at the same time I want to keep public opinion alive and alert in working against this idea, of security from participation on our part in any future war, so I am going to vote against this motion. As was explained by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), if a time should come when parliament had to take a stand, no doubt emotion would sway a large part of the people, and if we are not constantly vigilant there would be the danger that this movement would carry us off our feet, so that before we knew it we would be at war. So I say that if we passed this resolution to-night it would have the effect of lulling us into a false sense of security. We would think, "Well, we have passed this resolution, so there is no danger of Canada taking part in any war that may arise." For that reason I am going to vote against the resolution.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a long speech on this motion. It has been before the house on several occasions; many speeches have already been delivered in connection with it, but inasmuch as it touches a question which in one way or another has been brought very often before those who are in public life, I think before casting my vote I should clearly and briefly give my reasons for opposing the resolution. In presenting my argument I may occasionally refer to facts that already have been placed before the house, but at the same time, in order to make my speech complete though terse and brief, I shall have to repeat some of the things that have been said already.

My first objection to the motion is that in my opinion it is inopportune. I do not see why at this stage either of this year or of this session our time should be taken up with a heated discussion of a problem which is only hypothetical and which is not really before us. I believe we have so many questions to solve and so many actual, local problems to deal with that it is, I shall not say a waste of time, but an inopportune time to bring up a question of this kind.

I also share the view already expressed that we should not bind our liberty and freedom of thought by a pronouncement in advance as to an event which may happen only five or ten years hence, under circumstances we can neither foresee nor foretell. I may say further—and this is another view of the question—that if we take the motion seriously and vote upon it as an engagement to be undertaken not only for the moment but for the coming years, then the argument as to refusing to bind our liberty as to future pronouncements is very strong.

I would be inclined to say, however, that I oppose the motion because of its futility under the guise of great importance and moment. Not only can we not bind another parliament by a decision here to-night; we cannot even bind this parliament for another session. We may decide to-night that we agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). Then we may come back next year with a motion of a different kind. Every hon. member who voted for this motion might rise on that occasion and say, "Well, I have reconsidered the matter. There are new circumstances which I had not foreseen or which did not exist at the time I voted before, so I am going to reverse my vote." Therefore, Mr. Speaker, whether we consider that by voting on this motion we may bind ourselves for the future or whether we consider on the contrary that it is futile to make a solemn pronouncement to-day on a matter which may impress us differently at another session, I do not intend to vote for the motion.

It has been pointed out also, with great effect, that there is an immense difference between neutrality and participation. We may decide to participate or not to participate in any war abroad. We may take our stand as to that. I say without hesitation that it certainly would require exceptional circumstances to convince me that we should participate in any European conflict, but neutrality is another thing. You may decide to be neutral but the other party may not want to consider you as such. Who is to say that when war is declared on Great Britain any of these European or Asiatic countries will accept a declaration of neutrality on the part of Canada, even if it should come from us? It is better not to mention any names, but if one country should decide on an expeditionary force against Canada, a flotilla of airships, for instance, to be sent against Halifax or Vancouver, it would not suffice for my hon. friend to stand on the wharves of Halifax or Vancouver and wave his little resolution as a white flag in the hope of convincing that country that Canada was neutral. Therefore a declaration of neutrality by Canada means nothing; it is a matter that is not within our control. We may like to be neutral, and we may say to the aviators, "Do not shoot at us; do you not know that we are neutral?"— but if they do shoot, we cease to be neutral. I do not wish to be harsh or discourteous to the hon. member, but when I consider the resolution, notwithstanding my effort to give it every consideration I believe I am still more opposed to it when I realize that it can lead us nowhere.

There is another side of the question I am proud to present to-night, and it comes from one who represents a county in the province of Quebec. It is well known that in that province we are not militaristic; it is well known that we are not anxious to support participation in European wars. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that a true Britisher from my province would like to speak the language of the resolution. After all, we form part of one of the British nations. We are part of the commonwealth, and what do we declare in the resolution? These are the words:

> That under existing international relations, in the event of war, Canada should remain strictly neutral regardless of who the belligerents may be.

If we take that declaration we must realize that it means this: Just for the whimsical caprice of saying it, and for no good reason at all, we are saying to Great Britain, "It does not matter what happens; it does not matter in what war you may be engaged; it does not matter if you are on the brink of defeat and destruction, we are not going to help you." I am too good a Britisher to hold with such language on the subject. It is the attitude one friendly country would not hold toward another. Certainly it is language which France would not use towards Great Britain, because they are on good terms. Are we going to say to the mother country, to Australia or to the sister nation of South Africa: "No matter what happens, no matter what your miseries or difficulties may be, even though you may be facing complete annihilation, we take a certain cynical pleasure in declaring to you that even if matters go that far we will do nothing to help you."

I repeat that a pronouncement of that kind is either futile or unacceptable and I shall not support it in either case. Why have we this motion? I know it is wrong to impute motive to a member, and in the present instance I do not impute one to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I must add, however, that I can see what certain groups in the country are going to do with the resolution. They will use it in an effort to appeal to a certain class of people they have not the least chance of reaching otherwise. Through it they will try to bring those people to certain of their social ideas.

I take exception to the motion because of its complex nature. In paragraph 1 it says one thing and in paragraph 2 it says another. There are very few people who would vote for the second paragraph, but those people might be induced to regard it with certain favour on account of the first one. Certain people may not be socialists, and may be far from communism or anything of the kind, but they are such confirmed pacifists that they might be induced to accept the resolution—at least that would seem to be the hope behind it.

It is a great mistake to place before the House of Commons a complex motion which can only confuse the issue. I have been trying to be clear rather than prolonged or eloquent and shall be content to conclude by saying that I am in favour of the third paragraph, namely that Canada should make every effort to discover and remove the causes of international friction and social injustice, but I believe the best way to do that is to vote against the two other paragraphs.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a great satisfaction to me to know that my resolution has brought forth a serious discussion on our foreign policy. On the whole I believe the speeches have been in good spirit. Undoubtedly we face a great and complicated problem, and I am pleased to know that most hon. members take the matter seriously. I am sure most of the speakers will forgive me if I do not discuss in detail the various criticisms they have offered.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), who has just made a short speech, has suggested that we have so many practical problems to face that we ought not to waste time on a merely academic discussion. I think he must be hard put to it when he brings forward an argument of that kind. Surely we all recognize the serious state of Europe to-day. None of us can read the newspapers without realizing that Canada may possibly be called upon to face a war in Europe. Surely then a discussion on foreign policy cannot be called academic. Further if the possibility of war in Europe is so remote, I should like to know why the government has included in its estimates a great increase for armaments. If war is so far away there can be no reason for changing our peace policy and increasing our armaments.

Throughout the years I have had great respect for the clear logic of the French people. But as I listened to the speech of the Secretary of State and even to that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), I am bound to say I hoped they did not represent the logic of the French people in Canada. The Secretary of State has said that decisions of this parliament cannot bind decisions of future parliaments. No one is attempting to do that. In the resolution we simply decide what at the time we think best. If the arguments we have heard were carried out to its logical conclusion, this would mean that parliament could do no business, or could not express itself. Again, I hope that the argument of the Secretary of State is not a sample of French logic.

May I refer, too, to the eloquent speech of the Minister of Justice. I would point out, however, that it was not so much a speech on my resolution as a defence of the increased military estimates, and a statement—or, in my opinion, a misstatement—of the situation in Spain. In one place the minister said that we must not treat the gangster as we treat his victim; yet apparently he proposes to treat a recognized government in precisely the same way as he would treat rebels. I do not propose to go into those particular matters to-night as there will be opportunities in the future. I shall simply point out that the Minister of Justice has interjected questions which are quite outside the scope of the resolution. He resented very much what he called my appeal to the French-Canadians and he suggested, rather sarcastically, that I might be endeavouring to be the leader of the French-Canadians.

An hon. MEMBER: No danger.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no such ambition, but I would point out that if the Minister of Justice keeps on as he has been doing he will cease to be the leader of French-Canadian opinion. Surely he is not so fearful of the policies of his government that he will not even permit an appeal to French-Canadians. I happen to be an English-Canadian from the west; there are others from Ontario who are French-Canadians. Surely we are all Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: Then why does the hon. member single out French-Canadians?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I spoke of the French-Canadians as I would speak of western Canadians or of residents of any other part of the dominion. I spoke of the French-Canadians for this special reason—I do not mean what I have to say as a disparagement of the French-Canadians. I do not know whether I should be expected to be ashamed of the fact; indeed I am not, but during the war I opposed conscription. At that time Sir Wilfrid Laurier led the opposition to conscription. I rather imagined that that fact, if nothing else, would give me the right to make an appeal to French-Canadians against militarism. Of course, if the present leaders of the French-Canadians in this house undertake to go back on the position of Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Hon. members say, "no, no," but let me assure them and the house that if we have war, conscription is inevitable. The Minister of Justice doubtless is sincere—I am afraid, judging from his speech, he does not credit me with sincerity—but in talking as he does he seems to me to be betraying the principles of peace and the whole collective idea which lies behind the League of Nations. In following the lead of other nations and attempting to plead that Canada increase her armaments, I think he has betrayed the fundamental principles of peace. Since he is the recognized leader among French-Canadians, have I not the right to appeal to them on that point just as I would appeal to my own group?

Mr. BAKER: Would it not be better to use the words "French-speaking Canadians?"

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no objection to that. My point is that I was one of those who opposed conscription. It was not so easy for me as I was living in an English-speaking community, a community made up of people of Anglo-Saxon stock. However, I did so and now it seems to me I have the right to hope that the French-Canadians who opposed conscription at that time will resist increases in armaments. I am trying to do what I can, so far as the western provinces are concerned, to prevent such increases.

The Minister of Justice confesses that war means revolution, and yet he urges that we prepare for war. If we are prepared for war and war comes, surely we cannot be said to have tried to avoid the path which inevitably will lead to revolution. He asserts that it takes two to make peace, but may I suggest to him that it is equally true that it takes two to make war. However, he did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It takes only one to make war.

Mr. BENNETT: There must be someone to make war against.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If that is the logic of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), then it is about on a par with that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A very good par; better than yours.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Minister of Justice said that he wished I had referred to Stalin as well as to Mussolini and Hitler. I referred to Germany and Italy and Japan, all of which are outside the league. The U.S.S.R. is inside the league and to that degree is committed to the principles of collective security. I had always thought that the Minister of Justice fought fair, but I suggest that such a reference as that is not fair. I shall have no hesitation in saying in the future what I have said in the past with regard to my attitude towards soviet Russia, but I do not think it is quite fair to bring that country into a discussion where it had no place and where it had not been mentioned.

As I listened to the minister it seemed to me that either he had the jitters or he wanted to give the jitters to the Canadian people. He tells us that the world has gone mad; he talks about gangsters and thieves and so on, but that was the very kind of talk we had before the great war in order to whip the people of Canada into a war fever. We heard of the beast of Berlin and the huns and all that sort of thing. The minister was saying that which is sometimes said to children, "the goblins will get you if you don't watch out." To him the world is full of goblins.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And there are some in the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister deprecates any talk about our foreign policy, and he concludes by saying, "sufficient to the day is the evil thereof." He tells us that a wise man will leave these things alone. I once more point out that this government is proposing a very heavy increase in armaments. If it is sufficient to wait until the evil day, why are they anticipating that evil day by preparing in this way? Surely it would be far more sensible for us definitely to face the whole situation and devise a foreign policy; then if it is considered that our foreign policy requires armaments, I suppose the government will have to provide them. If he will permit me to say so, I think it is downright nonsense for the Minister of Justice to tell us that we ought not to consider anything in connection with our foreign policy, that sufficient to the day is the evil thereof!

The government proposes a very heavy armaments program. Let me remind the house and the country that that will mean very heavy additional taxation. Worse than that, it offers no hope of security. It is the same old game again. We were told the last war had been fought to end war. Instead of that, it may be simply a prelude to a greater war. Canada, it would seem, is to follow the lead of the European nations. There are hundreds of thousands of people who came to this country from the old lands in order to escape the burdens of militarism. They came to a country where they thought they might have permanent peace, and yet we are preparing to follow methods which in Europe have proved to be absolutely futile.

An hon. MEMBER: A lot of those people should have been deported.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister's speech was undoubtedly one of passion, but it was full of contradictions.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke the other day, he admitted very frankly, and I was glad to have his admission, that war settles nothing. I remember a striking statement made in the Winnipeg Free Press in 1920:

> This is the point to which the great war carried the convictions of civilized society—

An hon. MEMBER: That was the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

> —that war is not only a horror in itself, but that it is a total failure; that it "settles" nothing; that it ruins the victor as well as the vanquished.

That stands out, to me, as one of the great lessons of the last war. I ask again, as I asked the other day, is there no other way? When the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) alluded to the disillusionment that had been experienced by many men who were at the front, I was reminded of some very bitter words by Jerome K. Jerome:

> I have to admit that for nearly four years I held opinions which I now find to have been an illusion. I clung to ideals which I now find to have been false.
> We were told that England was fighting to obtain a "righteous peace." I am learning now what "righteous peace" means. It means that when you've got your enemy down, the more you jump on him the more righteous you feel. . . .

I am learning what a "peace of reconciliation" means. It means that when you've persuaded your enemy to lay down his arms on certain terms, and on condition of the fulfilment of certain pledges, you then proceed to break every one of those pledges, and leave him to reconcile himself to his own folly. . . .

Wilson's oft-repeated assertion that America entered the war to make the world "safe for democracy" should rightly be interpreted "safe from democracy," since the iron heel of militarism is set down wherever democracy dares to lift its head.

These words are unfortunately only too true. We have sown the wind and we are reaping the whirlwind, but we are not going to prevent that whirlwind by sowing more wind.

The Prime Minister—most unfortunately, I think, because he is the head of this nation—really offered us no alternative to the present method of settlement. He proceeds to prepare for war.

I thought the Prime Minister had a rather curious idea of Christian ethics. If the other fellow is an angel of light, treat him decently. If you do not think him an angel of light, then treat him as you would the devil. That was practically his suggestion. I sometimes wonder why those who think this way do not come out frankly and repudiate the teachings of Jesus. This is a letter which I came across the other day in the Vancouver Sun:

No, we cannot function on dreams. This is a cold-blooded, practical world, with great nations hungering for land, and all the utopian theories of the C.C.F. of Canada will not change it.

Jesus of Nazareth said "Turn the other cheek," and they harpooned him on a cross, and basically human nature hasn't altered, let there be no illusions about that.

The teaching is evident. We must avoid doing anything that would bring disaster upon us.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Jesus is held up as a horrible example.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman believe that self-defence is ever justified?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not going into what is at the moment a purely academic question. I would suggest that not all members or leaders in the church take the position that the Prime Minister did. This is a resolution from the Alberta conference of the United church, 1936.

Mr. FRASER: What has that to do with the question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH (Reading):

Your committee would recommend re-affirmation of our unalterable opposition to all war, and particularly in view of the suggestions promulgated by the federal minister of defence that we must have a defensive force sufficiently strong to deal with subversive elements within our borders, and to repel any attacks from without. We would also utter our emphatic protest against the increased military appropriations by the federal government now in session, for cadet and other military purposes.

That conference had not heard of the recently announced action of the government, to provide greatly increased military appropriations.

The Prime Minister frankly said that he does not expect patriotism in munitions manufactures. He said, as reported at page 247 of Hansard:

Of one thing I am perfectly sure; no manufacturer of munitions will engage in that business for the sake of charity.

I think that is a significant admission. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) was right when he protested against people talking about the soldiers going to the front for $1.10 a day. Most of them went because they thought that the—

Mr. MAYBANK: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the member for Winnipeg South Centre made no such remark.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. gentleman means the member for Winnipeg South.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Exactly; I meant the hon. member for Winnipeg South. I was going to say that I think the great majority of men who went to the front did so with the idea that they were giving patriotic service to their country. Other people stayed at home and profiteered out of the war—there is no doubt about that—and they have never been held to an accounting. Certain inquiries were made by the Liberals just after the war, but before long this investigation petered out, and we have never dealt with the profiteers who—criminally in my judgment—made money while others of their fellow-citizens died in France. I am firmly of opinion that, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South suggested, if we could take the profit out of war we would do away with a great deal that now foments and fosters war. I have not time tonight to go into the revelations which have been made by the Nye committee and by a host of books like Merchants of Death.

Again, the Prime Minister, in referring to the British commission that dealt with the possibility of nationalizing armaments, says:

Members of all political parties served on the commission.

This leaves a false impression. Let me quote a note from Foreign Affairs in an article on the American and British munitions investigation, January, 1937, pages 320 and 328:

This commission also consisted of seven members but, unlike the American group, they did not hold public office. The chairman, Sir John Eldon Bankes, was a retired judge, 81 years of age. Two members (one a cooperator and one a retired magazine editor) were well over 70. The other members were a professor of comparative law, a journalist, a business man, and a woman who was formerly an official of the league. The personnel did not offer much promise of an aggressive enquiry; the members themselves had no first-hand knowledge of the problems with which they were to deal, and they were not authorized, as the senate committee was, to employ experts to direct the investigation and examine the witnesses. . . .

A little later:

It was not authorized, under its terms of reference, to undertake a detailed investigation of the evils ascribed to the munitions traffic, and consequently only three instances of alleged abuse were brought to its attention. On the whole, the argument for nationalization as presented to the commission, was, in its own words, "purely speculative in character and unsupported by evidence." But under the commission's mode of procedure it was impossible for the advocates of nationalization to present anything more than a speculative case. Possible evils could be cited, but no opportunity was provided to prove the existence of actual evils. . . .

There is, therefore, nothing that has been brought forward by the Prime Minister to offset the statements which were made to the effect that there had been grievous abuses under private manufacture, or to warrant anyone in saying that there is any evidence to prove that the munitions business should not be nationalized.

I urge that we do not deceive ourselves. Armaments mean war; there is no other reason for armaments than possible war, and the furnishing of armaments is one of the surest ways of inducing war. Let me cite two statements in support of that. Earl Grey, in Twenty-Five Years, said:

The enormous growth of armaments, the sense of insecurity and fear caused by them, it was these that made war inevitable.

We are following in the same old path. On this point I should like to quote some rather remarkable words spoken a few years ago by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). In referring to the peace pact he said:

The very essence of this instrument is that those who sign it . . . begin at once to destroy by peaceful means those instruments by which peace is rendered impossible. . . . We must therefore destroy the instruments that make for war, so that when such appeals are made to the emotions there will be no response—no cannon, no navy, no troops. That is the only way by which peace can be made lasting in this world.

Well, instead of that we are now proposing to provide more cannon, a greater navy and more troops and air forces. I wonder whether we are heading in the way that makes for peace. In connection with the heavy increase for national defence, may I venture to express the opinion that there should be no increase until the veterans of the last war are adequately provided for. We have at the present time some 50,000 veterans who are unemployed. I do not think I am asking too much when I make a plea on behalf of hundreds of veterans in my own constituency as well as those throughout the west, who have written and spoken to me. I urge that we should not make any further expenditures for war until the men who are suffering from the last war are adequately provided for. I would say further that there should be no increase in expenditures until the burden of taxation is shifted from the shoulders of those who now bear it to the shoulders of those who made profits out of the last war. That is only fair. We still have in our midst people who made profits out of the war and salted them down in tax-free bonds, while the whole population, including returned men themselves, are struggling under the burden. I say that no more funds should be voted for war purposes until those who made profits out of the last war are forced to surrender their ill-gotten gains.

Again, I would suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) that there be no increase for national defence until there is full provision for social services. Only last year the blind made an appeal to the minister for special attention. It is quite true that this year the age limit for the old age pension is being lowered to sixty-five in the case of the blind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Nobody said that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Below seventy. That, however, will not provide for the vast number of the blind. Last year when this question was under consideration the minister told us from his place in the house that he was quite sympathetic; but, he said, we have no money. We have no money. That was last year, and yet to-day the Minister of Finance can apparently supply, I do not know how much, perhaps twelve, fourteen and possibly, before we are through twenty million dollars additional for national defence. We have our unemployed boys sent to farms, receiving $5 a month and if they can possibly stick it out until the spring they get $7.50—and this after five years of unemployment. But we are told that we have no money to do anything better for them. I say, Mr. Speaker, that no money should be spent on war preparations until these boys are provided for. Every day brings to my desk letters from destitute people in the far-off districts of northern Manitoba and Saskatchewan, farmers and their wives in destitute circumstances. What can I say? I can only inform them that the government says it has no money; that relief is a provincial responsibility. There are districts out in the west that have been hard hit by the drought and the municipalities themselves are bankrupt; yet all the minister can say is, "Well, under our constitution nothing can be done; it is a provincial responsibility."

Mr. DUNNING: We are spending millions there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, but we should spend millions more until these people are adequately provided for; we have no right to spend money in armaments until that is done. Teachers in the west are almost starving and children cannot go to school. But there is money enough to send Canada into the ranks of the militarist nations. Our medical services are hopelessly inadequate in almost every province, and housing is abominable throughout the dominion. We have no money for any of these things, but we are asked to vote large sums for increased military expenditures.

The Prime Minister said the other day that the increase for defence is for the defence of Canada and of Canada alone. Well, that may be his idea, but I would remark that this scheme fits in admirably with the imperialistic designs of a great many people in the old land. The other day I read in the Ottawa Journal the following statement:

> Swansea, Wales, Jan. 28 (CP).—A complete air defence force of 1,000 fighting 'planes was advocated for Canada to-day by Sir Henry Page Croft, Conservative member of parliament for Bournemouth.
> "Collective security within the empire is essential," he said, "in view of the failure of collective security for the world."

I am sure that every effort will be made to draw Canada into such a relationship with the old land that Great Britain will be free to carry on her imperialistic enterprises. Frankly I am afraid of the influence these coronation ceremonies may have on those Canadians who go over to London to represent the government. I know how easy it is to be polite on such occasions, how easy it is to try to make a good showing from the standpoint of the Canadian people. In the same issue of the Journal from which I quoted, on the next page I saw this item:

> London, January 27. Purchase of twenty United States designed planes by the Australian government was questioned in the house to-day . . .
> Both he and Colonel Burton inquired if reasonable steps had been taken to coordinate the Australian-manufactured planes with British Air Force requirements or assign the licences to British firms.
> Sir Philip, replying, said: "The commonwealth government consulted His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom with regard to the projected factory early last year, and since that time close contact has been maintained. Negotiations have proceeded on the basis that the types of service aircraft to be produced in the factory would be British designed, and this is accepted by the commonwealth government as general policy.

It seems to me that our forces will fit in just like spare parts to the great imperial machine. Either the British manufacturers are eager for sales or the British government is insisting upon a uniform type. I do not want to-night to go into the question of our national armaments, but why should we have mechanized army equipment? Why an air force? Surely these are forces which could readily be transported abroad and are designed more for such purposes than to defend our coasts.

There are some who say that those who oppose armaments live in a dream land. But in reality have we anything to fear from the United States? Is there any reasonable supposition that Germany is going to invade Canada, or that Japan would invade our country? I do not think so. Until there is, can we not go on our own peaceable way?

The Minister of Justice had a good deal to say about neutrality. Let me point out that he differed very decidedly from the Prime Minister. The other day the Prime Minister made this statement, as reported at page 249 of Hansard:

> Participation in war is the positive aspect, if I may put it in that way, and the question of neutrality is the negative aspect. Over and over again we have laid down the principle that so far as participation in war is concerned, it will be for the parliament of Canada to decide. Having taken that attitude with respect to participation, I think we might well take the same attitude with respect to neutrality.

The Prime Minister was either leading the house to believe or labouring under the impression that we could decide in parliament whether or not we would be neutral. The Minister of Justice to-day took the other point of view, and I think the correct one. I should like to ask the Prime Minister some time—he is not in his seat—Is not Canada automatically at war when Great Britain is at war? It is all very well to say that it is for us to determine the extent to which we shall send reinforcements, if at all; but as the Minister of Justice explained to-day, if Great Britain is at war we are at war. But the Prime Minister says that parliament is going to decide as to neutrality. It is rather important to know that he thinks that way, but unfortunately that position is not sound. It is at present constitutionally impossible for parliament to decide to remain neutral in case of a war in which Great Britain is involved, until the first steps have been taken, as in South Africa, to secure Canadian control of the documents evidencing the crown's intentions. Canada has never yet declared war or made peace for herself, and could not do so as matters now stand.

The Minister of Justice quoted Professor Berriedale Keith. I too would like to quote Keith. In the Journal of Comparative Legislation, 1935, page 274, he is reported as saying that certain decisions—> —seem to establish that any royal prerogative in respect of a dominion may under suitable legislation be controlled by that dominion.

It seems to me it is possible for Canada to control her neutrality, but this cannot be done on the mere say-so of the Prime Minister, or even of parliament. As an authority on the constitutional aspect wrote me—and I take it as my own—from the point of view of constitutional law the question seems to depend upon whether the crown has or has not been divided; that is, whether or not the empire is now merely an association of states united by a common sovereignty or a common crown. There is a reasonable amount of evidence that the crown is still undivided and unitary.

From the point of view of international law, he says:

> While dominions of the British commonwealth have acquired international status as separate entities, the exact status which they have obtained is far from clear. The separate negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties on their behalf, the separate representation of the dominions in the League of Nations and the exchange of diplomatic representatives with certain dominions by certain foreign governments, may be interpreted merely as de facto recognition of the dominions as separate, though not necessarily independent, international persons. It does not follow that other member states of the family of nations have recognized the independence of Canada or other dominions de jure, nor their capacity to declare neutrality or war on their own behalf. The recognition of the independence of a territory or colony formerly part of a sovereign state without the express consent of that former state is generally regarded by authorities in international law, as well as by the practice of nations, as an unfriendly act. By analogy it might be considered an unfriendly act on the part of other states to recognize the right of Canada to be neutral in the event of Great Britain being involved in war without the express assent of the government of Great Britain or other recognized constitutional authority such as the Imperial conference.
> It would appear to be necessary that some formal declaration of the right of Canada to declare neutrality be made. The appropriate constitutional authority would be the imperial conference, and the appropriate procedure a formal declaration communicated to foreign governments.

As usual, I think I may say, the Prime Minister advocated the middle way, which means in effect, a do-nothing policy. He said, as reported at page 252 of Hansard:

> I believe that with a revision of the covenant which will enable the league to proceed along lines which with further consultation, conciliation, and mediation, we shall see develop a great institution that will serve the world well.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I have five minutes longer?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has already had the advantage of about four minutes additional.

Mr. HEAPS: The Minister of Justice had the advantage of almost half an hour.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot continue unless he has the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thank the house for their courtesy. The Minister of Justice objected to the use of force by the league.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend said I put words into his mouth. I have the reference before me; it is page 239 of Hansard. That is what he advocated, to give armaments to the league to enforce its decisions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is my position; I have said that personally I do not believe in the exercise of force in international affairs. I have said that I did not think the building up of our armies was the way to promote peace, but I have realized that our governments are not travelling in that direction. Under the circumstances it would be a decided step forward if we could have collective security instead of attempted security by the exercise of power on the part of individual nations. That was my point, and in substantiation of that I should like to read this paragraph by Mr. H. N. Brailsford, in his pamphlet Towards a New League, pages 58 and 59:

The Genevan idea that one can allow history to run on by its own uncoordinated motions, and then pull oneself up from time to time to arbitrate a "dispute"—this is thinking too obsolete for serious discussion...

What statesman of mature mind and ripe experience will undertake to give us peace, unless he can control such fundamental economic happenings? There are, of course, "disputes" that can be handled on police court lines—the Corfu affair was nothing more. But every major dispute demands planning and legislation on a wide international scale. If we mean to forbid the Japanese to conquer Manchuria, to fend off the Italians from Ethiopia, and to divert the Germans from an adventure at Russia's expense, we must have the authority and the intelligence to meet in other ways their problems of markets, capital investment, raw materials, and population. It is not enough to tackle these problems by improvisation after the dispute has arisen, as the league tried to do in the Lytton report and the Paris terms of August. Those were attempts to buy off the aggressor by a compromise at the sole expense of China and Abyssinia. That is not the way to do it. The only civilized way is by authoritative planning, which will assure to every nation the facilities indispensable in the modern world for an economic life geared to the highest attainable standard. This it must do for all, and not merely for such powers as are strong enough and egoistic enough to make a dangerous fuss. It must do it steadily, the world over, and not spasmodically at the expense of selected victims. This means more than the holding from time to time of an economic conference, whose recommendations can have no effect, until a miscellaneous horde of governments afterwards separately ratifies them. It means, in plain words, federal government, with a general staff for economic planning, and a strong executive responsible to a democratic legislature, that can enact its measures by majority vote.

This afternoon we heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) quote President Roosevelt as to the horrors of the next war. We all realize at least something of what those horrors might be. I simply ask that this house, as a group of reasonable people using the same methods, which, I think, they would employ in their private affairs, should seriously consider whether there is no other way of bringing about peace than by beginning to travel the road which, throughout the years, inevitably has led to disaster.

Motion negatived on division.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MONT-LAURIER, QUE., POSTMISTRESS

Mr. LALONDE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, evidence, reports and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, relating to an investigation conducted by the said department at Mont-Laurier in August, 1936, in connection with a charge made against the postmistress of Mont-Laurier.

WAR MEASURES

MOTION FOR CONSCRIPTION OF ALL AGENCIES AND RESOURCES FOR DURATION OF HOSTILITIES

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, legislation should be immediately brought down by the government of the day providing that, in the event of another war involving Canada's active participation, every agency, financial, industrial, transportation or natural resources, shall automatically be conscripted for the duration of such a war, and that a penalty be imposed for the violation thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not present this motion to the house as one who has lost all hope of peace or as one who anticipates another war. But in view of the fear of an impending conflict, to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred this afternoon, I believe the policy which this country would follow in the event of war should be discussed at this time.

This motion is in no way inconsistent with the resolutions that have been presented and the pleas for peace that have been made from time to time by our group in this chamber. It follows in logical sequence those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The hon. member for Winnipeg North asked that we should have a peace conference that might prevent war. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked that, if this was impossible, we in Canada should refrain from entering into such a war. Now, in this motion, I am suggesting that if it is impossible to keep out of a war, at least we should state clearly to the people of Canada the steps which we shall pursue in the prosecution of such a war.

At the outset, may I direct attention to the fact that if we are drawn into the maelstrom of war the legislation asked for in this motion would be invaluable. On the other hand, should war be averted, which I am sure is the wish of every hon. member, no harm possibly can have been done by placing upon the statute books of Canada measures such as are suggested in this resolution.

In the first place, may I point out to hon. members that this motion does not request the nationalization of industry. Personally I would favour such a step, but for the purposes for which this motion is intended nationalization would be unnecessary. The word "conscription" does not mean or imply social ownership. It means the compulsory enlistment or the regulation, control and regimentation of industry in the interests of the state during a pressing emergency. It would mean the strict control and supervision of industry to prevent citizens from making large sums of money at the expense of the state. It would mean the fixing of prices, the stabilization of wages and the national control of finance and credit, to the end that no person or group of persons, by reason of their age, their occupation or their particular position, should be enabled to benefit while other sections of the population were engaged in making sacrifices in defence of their country. It should be pointed out that this idea is not new and that practically every nation engaged in the last war was moving slowly toward this situation when the armistice was signed. In Great Britain, when Mr. Lloyd George was appointed Minister of Munitions, he began the coordination of industry in an endeavour to harness more efficiently the resources of the nation, and the British profiteering act of 1919 was a further step in this direction.

In March, 1918, Bernard Baruch was appointed head of the war industries board in the United States, and undertook to organize distribution so that the army's needs would be supplied, and the prices paid by civilians for depleted supplies of goods would be kept down to a reasonable level. This body fixed prices, stabilized wages, and even proceeded to fix prices on the basic commodities purchased by the consumer. Products were graded according to quality and sold at a fixed price according to grade. For instance, a person not having a war industries board card in the window was not permitted to sell shoes. Rents as well as the prices of wearing apparel and food products were to have been fixed, but the armistice made unnecessary any further action on the part of the board.

Mr. Baruch, who was an outstanding and successful American business man, was so convinced by his experience as chairman of the war industries board of the necessity of such a step that he has since been a constant advocate of a program to take profit out of war, and has spent a small fortune in research work along this line. In the Atlantic Monthly of January, 1926, he outlines in the following terms the program submitted by the war industries board:

In the event of war, the president would have power, acting through another war industries board, to fix prices at what was considered a fair level before the war. It would be illegal to buy, sell, serve or rent at any other than these prices. Brakes would be applied to every agency of inflation before the hurtful process started. The draft board would have before it the estimated needs of every business and profession in its relationship to the conduct of the war, and men would be selected accordingly. Prices would be made public and readjusted every three months, so that consumers would have redress if prices were considered too high. Money would be controlled and directed like any other resource.

Mr. Baruch continues:

A man should no more be permitted in war time to use his money as he wishes than he should be permitted to use the product of his mill or factory. Each part of the community must adjust its wants to the great undertaking in order to win.

He goes on to say:

If the government in the future has authority to fix prices and distribution of materials and labour, rent and use of man-power, transportation and all the things necessary for the conduct of war, any rise in prices will be prevented, even in the anticipation of war. This plan will remove the possibility of anyone's urging war as a means of making profits. The fact that profits would be less in war than in peace, and that wealth and resources would be directed by the government might have some active deterring influence on men of great resources. Instead of being passive they might become active advocates of peace.

Recently in France the government took steps to bring the entire armament industry under direct government control, with a view not only to prevent certain armament manufacturers from supplying potential enemies, but to ensure greater efficiency in the event of the outbreak of war.

In discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said:

Even if we succeeded in bringing about the nationalization of industry to the extent that all war materials could be manufactured without profit, I am afraid that for a long time to come we would not recover what in the interval we had lost in the way of individual initiative and freedom.

May I point out that the experience in the last war was just the opposite to the assertion made by the Prime Minister. Those who have followed closely the herculean efforts of Lloyd George during the famous shell shortage of 1915, or the struggles of Bernard Baruch in the United States, will never claim that private industry is able efficiently to supply the needs of a country at war. In practically every country engaged in the last war it was necessary to impose government control, and to place many of the entrepreneurs in managerial capacities in their own plants.

With reference to loss of initiative, I think the house will recognize that in time of war thousands of people are compelled to suppress their desire for initiative and are expected for the good of the state to subjugate their individual desire to centralized authority so that the war may be more efficiently conducted.

The motion is not an attempt to force the nationalization of industry upon the country or to suggest any policy which would make toward the lessening of our efficiency in the event of a declaration of war. The intention of the motion is that we shall begin now to take the necessary steps to remove the element of profit from any war which may occur in which Canada shall be involved, and that all the industrial, financial and human resources of the nation shall be mobilized for the purpose of bringing such war to a successful termination. Let me, therefore, draw to the attention of hon. members some of the advantages to be derived from taking the necessary steps to place upon the statute books legislation which would immediately conscript all wealth in the event of Canada participating in a war.

The first reason for advocating such a course is that private manufacture of arms permits a condition whereby individuals, and groups of individuals, motivated by the desire for profit, constantly foment war scares and stir up international friction. There is perhaps no story quite so black as the history of the armament manufacturers of Europe, Great Britain and the United States. The activities of private manufacturers of armaments may be divided roughly into three classes: First, their activities prior to the great war; second, their activities during the great war, and, third, their activities in the post-war period. For the purpose of this debate it is unnecessary to trace the origin of great armament firms such as Krupp in Germany; Schneider Creusot in France; Armstrong and Vickers in England; Gatling, Maxim and du Pont in the United States. Suffice it to say that for half a century before the great war these firms were growing in power in different parts of the world. They exchanged patents. They owned shares in each other's companies. They bought influential newspapers and periodicals, and put members of the civil and military authorities on their pay-rolls. I refer hon. members to a study of the armament industry written by Doctor Engelbrecht and Hanighen, entitled Merchants of Death, or Philip Noel-Baker's book entitled The Private Manufacture of Armaments, or E. Staley's War and the Private Investor. These three books are heavily documented. They are prepared not by journalists, but by men of research.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Very early in their development, armament manufacturers were quick to learn two things. One was that patriotism is not always profitable, and that to refuse to sell equipment to an enemy or a potential enemy may be patriotic, but it is very poor business. So the Franco-Prussian war was won by the assistance of Schneider's artillery, and Sir Basil Zaharoff, the wily Greek, showed his impartiality by selling submarines not only to his native Greece but also to her oppressor, Turkey. The pompom guns which wrought such devastating havoc in the Boer war were sold to South Africa by the British firm of Vickers. Krupp manufactured in Germany armour-plating for battleships that were later destined to defeat the fatherland in the great war. British arms-manufacturers fortified the Dardanelles where later thousands of young Anzacs were to meet their death. Some of the manipulations of this den of thieves were almost amusing. For instance, after the Russo-Japanese war Schneider wanted to rearm the Russian army, but found that the Russians were lacking in the necessary finances. Schneider thereupon organized a banking syndicate and floated a loan in Paris to facilitate the Russian rearmament. The Russian revolution which took place in 1917 resulted in the repudiation of all debts, and as a consequence the French people found that they had equipped the Russian army but had paid for it themselves.

The second great lesson which the members of the armament ring were quick to learn was that times of peace and security meant times of depression in their particular line of business. Consequently, they sowed discord in an attempt to keep the nations of Europe in a constant state of military and naval preparedness. For instance, Schneider had placed in those French papers which he owned statements purporting to have been made by German military officials boasting about their superior military strength as compared with that of France. The response was, of course, an increased military expenditure by the French. This was immediately brought to the attention of the German people and resulted in a similar step being taken by that country. In this way suspicion was kept at fever heat and every opportunity was taken by these salesmen of death to keep every nation in a maximum state of military and naval preparedness.

However, it was during the great war that the armament manufacturers showed themselves in their true colours. The great war revealed the fact that these armament manufacturers have no country and own no loyalty other than their personal gain and the satiation of their unending greed. The great war was a mass of contradiction. British ships foundered in the Dardanelles because of British-made mines and were crippled by British-made guns. French troops in Bulgaria were repulsed by French 75 mm. guns in the hands of their enemies. Bulgarian and Roumanian troops fought each other with weapons bought from the same firm. The Skoda company helped to rearm Russia and the Russians turned their Austrian-made guns against the Austrian armies.

The international solidarity of the armament manufacturers was shown by the Briey-Dombasle incident. The great iron mines of the French armament industry are in the Briey basin. Early in the war these were captured by the German forces and immediately used to supply Germany's ever increasing demand for armaments. In 1916 the French advanced sufficiently in this territory to bring the Briey basin well within the range of their heavy artillery. Throughout the entire war it would have been possible to continue aeroplane bombing operations against this section. It would have been possible at any time from 1916 to 1918 to destroy the mines and brass furnaces of the Briey district and to cut off the supply of metal which was keeping the German military machine operating. Yet, throughout the duration of the war, Briey remained one of the so-called quite sectors. Documentary evidence has since been produced in the French Chamber of Deputies showing that when queries were made as to why the iron mines at Briey had not been reduced to ashes, the reply of headquarters was, "If we destroy Briey, the Germans will at once retaliate and destroy our plant at Dombasle." That is, both sides would have been badly crippled; the war would have come to an end long before it did, and perhaps a million or more men would not have been killed. To the armament manufacturers this would have been the supreme tragedy.

Throughout the duration of the war there was a most significant and confused international trade in war materials even between enemy nations. German industrialists were shipping scrap-iron to France via Switzerland at the rate of 150,000 tons a month to be used to tear German boys to pieces. In the attack on Verdun German boys found themselves impaled on barbed wire which had been made a few months before in Germany. English merchants shipped into Germany through Scandinavia, glycerine and Canadian nickel which it was known perfectly well would be used to mangle English soldiers in the trenches. French nickel also found its tortuous way, greased by profit, into Germany. The construction of German submarines would have been practically impossible but for the shipment of French aluminum which arrived in Germany via Switzerland. Volumes of evidence have been produced by the Carnegie endowment for international peace, the Walter Haines school for international relations at Johns Hopkins university and the Nye commission appointed by the senate of the United States, to show that throughout the entire war patriotism was sacrificed to the making of profits and human lives were destroyed in order that dividends might be earned on armament shares. In every country that participated in the great war amazing profits were made by companies selling war materials to various governments.

With the cessation of hostilities in 1918 the armament makers had to resort once again to their old tactics of keeping nations in a constant state of armed preparedness and of stirring up international friction wherever possible. Before the war to end war was quite finished, Schneider, Vickers, Skoda and Krupp were busily engaged again. In fact, the peace conference was still in session when war broke out between Greece and Turkey. The British supported Greece and Vickers arms were amply supplied to the Greeks who advanced into Asia Minor. The French were also interested in that particular area and consequently did not prevent Schneider from arming the Turks. We have the ironical picture of the British and French delegates sitting at the peace conference while Greek soldiers with British guns were engaged in the task of fighting Turkish soldiers armed with French guns. An American correspondent reported as follows:

> First I saw the retreat of the Greeks. They left behind artillery and machine guns all of which bore the mark of the English firm of Vickers. Then I witnessed the triumphant entry of the Turks into Smyrna. They brought with them magnificent guns made by Schneider-Creusot. On that day I understood what the entente cordiale meant.

When the Riff uprising took place in Morocco it was put down at great cost of French soldiers. These wild tribesmen were found to possess large supplies of excellent modern military equipment of French manufacture. Discreet silence in official and journalistic quarters stifled comment on this discovery.

The rearmament of Germany under Adolf Hitler was financed and carried out to a very large extent by the firm of Skoda in Czechoslovakia and the Schneider-Creusot firm in France. In 1933, despite the fact that the treaty of Versailles forbade Germany from having a military air force, the Germans placed an order with a British aircraft manufacturer for sixty of the most efficient fighting planes in the market. Only the intervention of the British air ministry prevented the delivery of the planes to help in Germany's rearmament program. Nor are we here in Canada altogether free from this unscrupulous trade in blood and slaughter. With the consent of the house I should like to place on Hansard a table secured from the external trade branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics dealing with the export trade of Canada. From this table it will be seen that our exports of nickel have doubled.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) cannot put the table on Hansard without reading it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not want to raise the point, but several tables have been placed on Hansard this year by members who merely handed them to the Clerk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With the consent of the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS: If the house disagrees, of course I shall be compelled to read it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I object. We cannot answer things like that unless they are read. It is easy to make a long speech in that way.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) should be the last person to say that, after speaking an hour and twenty minutes this afternoon.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): At least I was reading what citations I wished to have recorded in Hansard.

Mr. REID: And the minister did not read his speech. Keep to the truth.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I shall not take time now to read this table. I shall be very glad in closing the debate to place it on Hansard or to have one of my colleagues do so. But I wish to say that the export of nickel from this country has been doubled since 1933, despite the fact that 1933 was our best year since 1929. To whom was this increased exportation sent? Our exports to Great Britain have doubled, and our exports to Germany have also doubled since 1933, while last year the increase was twenty-seven fold. The increase in the export of nickel to Italy has been phenomenal. The increase in 1935 over 1934 was fourfold, which recalls the fact that that was the year in which Italy was waging her ruthless campaign against Ethiopia. It is interesting to note the tremendous increase of nickel exports during the past three years to the Netherlands, which means in reality indirect shipment to Germany. That nickel is undoubtedly being used in Hitler's rearmament program. Fortunes are being made in Canada to-day by the International Nickel Company and by a number of firms selling huge quantities of copper to rearming nations in Europe. Last year the production of copper reached 420,000,000 pounds, the greatest number recorded in Canadian history. The Canada Car and Foundry Company, a firm which began in 1917 with the manufacture of arms to ship to Russia, has had a new lease of life on the expectation of orders from Great Britain to build aeroplanes. Press reports state that Canadian Vickers are said to be making contacts in western Canada with such firms as the Vulcan Iron Works in Winnipeg and the idle General Motors plant in Regina, with a view to establishing armament plants in that part of the country. Canadian Industries Limited, of which the president is Mr. A. E. Purvis, chairman of the National Employment Commission, controls the major chemical industries of Canada, has investments in General Motors and Dunlop Tires, and owns five explosives and armament factories in Canada. The total earnings of Canadian Industries Limited for 1934 are more than one million dollars above 1933, and for 1935 are slightly less than one million dollars over 1933.

Figures of the Department of External Affairs show tremendous increases in our exports to Morocco during the last three months of 1936. One of my colleagues will deal with that. I just want to say in passing that those exports consist in the main of large quantities of wheat which are going to Spanish Morocco and undoubtedly are being used to feed insurgent troops, and of large quantities of nitrate, which, the chemists say, can very easily be converted into high explosives. It is possible, in fact it is more than likely, that we are making a very large contribution to the unfortunate conflict which is now going on in the Spanish peninsula.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole history of the armament industry ought to teach us that the private manufacture of arms should not be left to the unpatriotic, unscrupulous, and oftentimes diabolical machinations of international racketeers. I contend that the parliament of this country has a responsibility to its people to see to it that certain corporations and individuals, motivated only by a desire for gain, should not be permitted, now or later, to supply war materials to enemies or potential enemies. This is particularly true of the export of nickel. In a modern war no country can fight long without nickel, since it is absolutely necessary for the manufacture of shells, cannon, armour-plating, tanks, et cetera. Nickel, along with oil, has become the indispensable requirement of modern warfare. Not only can no nation fight a modern war without nickel, but no nation can participate in a modern war without Canadian nickel, for we in Canada are in the fortunate position of controlling the major supply of the world's nickel. We have within our hands what may prove to be the key to the entire situation. Courageous and conclusive action taken at this time may well prevent the rearming of certain nations in Europe to-day. It is for this reason that I have urged in this house before, and now urge again, that the government consider seriously the advisability of setting up a commission to control the export of nickel from Canada and to prevent what easily may come to pass, the slaughtering of our youth by the very material which we have dug from our soil.

The second reason why I believe this resolution should be passed is that it would be a deterrent to keep us from plunging into war. In a time of crisis no nation can afford to have within its borders a small group of individuals who, for purely personal reasons, desire to see their country at war. That there are such individuals has been shown again and again by the history of the past fifteen years. The story of William B. Shearer, whose unscrupulous actions did so much to sabotage the naval disarmament conference at Geneva, is known to all hon. members. At a public investigation in the United States, Mr. Shearer claimed that he had been promised $250,000 by certain shipbuilding concerns and steel companies for his services on that occasion. Mr. Shearer represents a type, one that I am afraid is not altogether uncommon. This parliament can remove once and for all the profit incentive that might stimulate certain individuals to advocate war, by declaring unequivocally here and now that in the event of an outbreak of a war in which Canada is actively participating, all wealth shall be conscripted, controlled and operated for the sole purpose of winning the war, without so far as is humanly possible the making of profits by any corporation or individual.

The third reason why I believe such a step would be beneficial to the interests of the Canadian people is that it would give our citizens across Canada the feeling that fair treatment was being meted out to all and sundry, irrespective of rank, age, sex or social position. It is being recognized to-day by most students of international affairs that an outbreak of war will be followed almost immediately by a conscription of all available man-power. I have never had a very high opinion of the armament manufacturers, but nothing I could have said would have constituted a more scathing indictment than this statement of the Prime Minister the other day:

> Of one thing I am perfectly sure; no manufacturer of munitions will engage in that business for the sake of charity.

That is true beyond a doubt. But we shall expect men to hazard their lives not for charity but for patriotism. Once again we shall ask, as we did from 1914 to 1918, over half a million young Canadians to suffer the hardships and privations of a military campaign, indeed, even to lay down their lives on the foreign field, with no greater promise of reward than that a grateful country will erect a cenotaph to their memory or utter eulogistic orations over their graves. But while men are being asked to make the supreme sacrifice, other men will benefit by the very absence of these young heroes. Men engaged in industry will make higher wages. People in all walks of life will benefit by the scarcity of labour, while those engaged in the manufacture of implements of war will make fabulous fortunes at the expense of the state. Nothing we can say here will justify this discrimination. I for one have no wish to see Canada become involved in a war, but if we are compelled to participate in a war I would ask that the sacrifice which will undoubtedly be entailed shall be extended to all sections, classes and ages of the population. Let us have no more war in which the members of one group fight and receive $1.10 a day while others line their pockets in comfort and security. If we go into war we must all go in and not leave the burden to merely a few. If we have the power to conscript human life and to expose it to danger, who shall deny us the power to ask for the use of the economic and physical resources of the nation.

The final reason why I propose this motion to the house is that I believe it is one of the few proposals that, while acting as a stimulus to peace, nevertheless would strengthen us in the event of war. I take it that all of us want peace, and that none of us is desirous of seeing Canada participate in another world war. Yet all of us would hesitate to take in the interests of peace any steps which would leave us helpless in the event of war. We are citizens of the world, but first and foremost we are citizens of Canada and her welfare and security must always remain of paramount importance. But the proposals contained within this motion, while acting as a deterrent to war, would not weaken us in the event of war but would rather coordinate and strengthen our nation in any struggle in which it might be called to engage. No group of people know more about the horror of war than the men who served in the last great conflict that shook the world. At the dominion convention of the Great War Veterans' Association in 1925 the following resolution was adopted:

That the dominion parliament be urged to consider legislation, to mobilize the whole power of the nation for national service in the event of a declaration of war;

That, the property equally with the persons, lives and liberties of all citizens shall be subject to conscription for defence of the nation.

If I am informed correctly, I believe the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) was the individual who moved this resolution at the historic convention to which I have referred. I can conceive of no one better equipped than the Minister of National Defence to understand the procedure that would best recommend itself to all parts of the country. The fact that the minister, supported by the Canadian Legion, advocated such a step, ought to commend it to every hon. member.

At a more recent conference, namely, the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, held March 19, 1936, the following resolution was adopted:

Be it resolved that this convention reaffirms the resolution passed at the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion held at Ottawa in 1934, and at Niagara Falls in 1932, urging that in the event of another war the government take immediate steps to conscript the entire man-power, wealth, natural resources, public utilities, business and industrial institutions of the nation, so that by so doing the profit may be taken out of war and the entire citizenship may be moved in a common incentive to seek peace and maintain it.

These two resolutions, coming as they do from bodies of men who bore the brunt of the last titanic struggle in which we were engaged, speak more eloquently than anyone else can for the need of measures similar to those suggested in the motion now before the house.

During the last war, while some fought, others filled their pockets; while some laid down their lives, others laid up treasure against the morrow. Now, with the danger of another conflict hovering over us, men who fought so nobly and sacrificed so much have placed themselves on record, asking that should they or their children be called upon to expose themselves to danger in defence of their country, the burden of such an undertaking should be borne by the rich as well as by the poor, and by the aged as well as by the young. Only upon such a basis would any government dare to ask its people to undergo the rigours and excruciating suffering of another war.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): Listening to this debate during the last day or two I have come to the conclusion that we shall have no more wars. We shall be saved from war not by armaments but by resolutions discussed in this House of Commons by our peace time soldiers. War is the essence of violence, and when war comes we shall marshal what forces we can possibly assemble and hurl them against the forces of the enemy.

The only question which we need to discuss in regard to this resolution is this very simple one: Would the passing of the resolution and its embodiment in an act of parliament help us to strike harder when the day of war came? Well, I have my doubts. In the last great war twelve days elapsed between the murder of an Austrian prince and the outbreak of hostilities. During that time the military machine clicked in Europe. Sir Edward Grey and the other British leaders strove to prevent war and then came the pentecost of calamity.

When the next war comes I venture to suggest that it will come upon us much more suddenly. Perhaps we shall hear of uneasiness in the cabinets and in the capitals of Europe, and then wake up some morning to find that war has broken out. And what will be the situation at that time? The government will have the task of carrying on the business of the nation; it will have to conduct the war. I have considerable confidence in the present government, as many hon. members know, but I do not believe that a government which is running the affairs of this nation and at the same time taking its part in what will be the most titanic conflict the world has ever known, will stop at that time to consider the fact that a resolution had been proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), suggesting a change in our economic system.

My hon. friend suggests to-night that he does not propose that conscription shall involve the taking over of any particular plants or anything else in Canada. What does it mean? The suggestion is that these things shall automatically be conscripted for the duration of the war and that penalties shall be imposed for the violation thereof. I am not sure what this means; I am not sure whether it means that the penalty is to be imposed upon those who refuse to accept the conscription or whether it is to be imposed upon the government for not carrying out the act if passed. But what difference does it make? When the war comes the government of the day will do the best it can. It will take over what plants it needs; it will conscript men. But you do not improve the situation by passing a resolution declaring now that you wish to do this. I imagine that the government which is laying certain plans for eventualities that may arise will also consider other plans it intends to carry into effect so far as economic circumstances and financial conditions will permit. But I do not believe the government can suddenly decide to take over the country's entire industry. It will take over what is necessary and do the best it can to marshal the forces of the nation in the struggle which is before it.

We lost the last war not in the field but by peace. We may lose the next war, although fought for freedom and the establishment of our own political conceptions, if we attempt at the outbreak of hostilities to accept the ideas which are guiding our enemies in the conflict. We have in Europe to-day these war-mad nations, but they cannot be saved from their madness by government ownership of munition factories. They cannot be saved from it by taking the profit out of war. Russia has taken the profit out of war; Russia owns her munition factories; there are no profiteers in war supplies in Russia. If profiteering is attempted, those found guilty of it are backed up against a wall and shot. But Russia marshals the greatest war force in Europe to-day and is one of the prime disturbers, although perhaps she may feel her position justified because she faces the other great war nation of Europe which, accepting a different political theory also prepares for the coming conflict.

I venture to suggest that we have heard too much of the power of the armament makers to cause war. Does anyone in this house think that Great Britain has, on the advice of a few munition makers, turned to armaments as she has during the last two or three years? Is that possible? Great Britain has turned to armaments after risking her safety in the cause of peace; she has armed because she feels that she must be prepared to fight or lose her position in the world. But she is not doing that at the behest of some manufacturer of armaments. I suggest that the same thing is true of the United States. To-day the United States is spending on arms and equipment for war more money than she ever spent before. Does any hon. member believe that President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull are guided by a desire to please the munition manufacturers of the United States? Is that conceivable? We are preparing here to spend money on military equipment; does any hon. member think the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) are governed by a desire to give an order to some manufacturers of arms and war equipment? The action taken is because of the situation which exists in the world to-day. Rightly or wrongly they are convinced that our defences must be increased, and they are going about this in the way which, in their judgment, is best calculated to meet the situation. That is the position. There are other and far more potent causes of war.

This does not mean for a moment that during war we should not apply the principles of sound taxation to the profiteers and all who make money from war. We should endeavour as far as possible to conduct a pay-as-you-go war. We may accomplish all that is sought by this resolution by the application of taxes which will take from those who make money out of war the gains which they have made. But the situation cannot be improved by taking over factories, unless in special circumstances of particular need. You cannot help your side to win war by becoming communists or fascists, or by adopting the principles of communism or fascism. There are other and far more deep-seated causes of war than the munition makers or even the fascists, causes which have their being in the economic life of the people and the very nature of things as they exist to-day. There are in Europe to-day certain land-hungry nations, nations which have not the natural resources required to enable them to develop the life of their people as they desire. We have the same thing on the Pacific—Japan, with a rapidly growing population, struggling to make headway. It finds that other nations have acquired great areas of land, and now it proposes to acquire some on its own account. It is bursting with the forces of expansion. When that happens, it constitutes a problem which must be faced; it is a problem which we ought to discuss in this house, if we are going to avoid war. Germany wants colonies, Italy wants colonies. It is all very well to say that they cannot have them, if that is the viewpoint, but are you going to deny to them the right to do business with you? That is precisely what we are doing to-day. I have heard the argument, and it is true, that Germany or Italy can come to Canada for wheat; they can go to the United States for cotton; they can go to Australia for wool; all these countries are ready to sell them the raw materials which they possess. But are these nations willing to accept goods from Germany or Italy in payment for the products which they want to buy? I ask this house one question: At the time that we were holding millions and millions of bushels of wheat in the elevators of western Canada, if Germany or Italy had come to us and said, "We want one hundred million bushels of wheat; we will take it at a fair price and will ship in payment an equivalent value in goods," what would the government have said? I wonder what my friend the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) would have said. I am sorry he is not in his seat. I wonder what the government which formerly occupied the treasury benches would have said. There would have been at once the cry, we cannot permit the importation of these goods from outside because it would deprive our Canadian people of employment. Well, if you accept that doctrine, then you must keep your wheat at home, because the only means by which you can get payment for the goods which you send out is by accepting payment in goods.

Another particularly striking thing came to my attention the other day. Following the war American financiers loaned large sums of money abroad. In other words, there were large outward shipments of goods from the United States to different countries, and the Americans accepted bonds in payment therefor. Then the interest on those bonds became payable. Meanwhile the tariff of the United States had gone up and there was no chance to make payment in goods. What followed? The value of the bonds went down. The whole financial structure began to collapse, and that was the beginning of the crisis of 1929. The American people, no more intelligent than the average protectionist in this country—and that is not very intelligent—accepted the idea that if they were paid in goods for the goods they had sent abroad, ruin would stare them in the face; their people would be unemployed.

Let us follow the technique of that a little and see if we can make it clear. If the British government owes someone in the United States $1,000 on a bond, settlement would normally be made by the shipment of goods to the United States to the extent of $1,000; the goods would be sold and the bondholder would be paid—I leave out the intermediate transactions in exchange. The bondholder would then have $1,000 which he would spend in buying a new car. Would anyone be deprived of employment by that process? It is clear and simple; there is no difficulty about it. But the obstacle that stands in the way is nothing other than the economic ignorance—

An hon. MEMBER: Stupidity.

Mr. DEACHMAN: That is a good word; I shall put the two together—the economic stupidity and ignorance of the protectionist spirit which dominates the people of the world to-day. Can you save this situation by discussing a resolution like this? Can you save it by an amendment to the British North America Act, as was discussed in the house the other day? Is there any other way by which the people can get clear of the fear and the horror of war than by making them recognize that in a world which God has made an integrated and correlated world, you cannot live unto yourself alone and still have peace?

That is the essence of the whole situation. That is what we must do if we hope to escape war. As long as men are human, with human passions, you will not be clear of war and the fear of war until you get clearly into your minds the fact that you can exchange freely with your brother man without the slightest fear of injury to yourself. That is the approach in truth to the elimination of war. There is no other way by which we can escape that curse.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a word or two to the discussion on the resolution now before the house, and I wish to affirm my approval of it. I had intended to speak for a little while to the motion which was debated this afternoon, but I was one of the speakers listed to follow the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and I felt that it would be an imposition on my part to speak just at that time. I find, however, that some of my material will fit into this discussion very admirably, and with that in mind I wish to present a few observations.

I am certain that no one wants war. I am sure that if the peoples of the world were asked their opinion by way of a plebiscite or a vote, almost to a man the verdict would be: No. But we realize that conditions are as they are and that facts must be faced. Therefore we have the resolution reading "in the event of war." It is suggested that the industries—and I fancy the resolution means particularly the war industries—of the country should be conscripted in case of war. That may appear to involve a great deal; nevertheless it is not without its possibilities. I am conscious of the fact that there would arise the necessity of determining what manufacturing was for war purposes and what was not. This is not always easy. The same is true with regard to our exports. For instance, Canada is the leading nickel exporting country in the world. She produces about eighty-one per cent of the total nickel production of the world. Canada's production of nickel increased by more than fifty-one per cent from 1933 to 1934. In 1935, Canada exported about $28,500,000 worth of nickel, or about four times as much as she exported in 1933, and I have said nothing about the huge quantities of other kinds of metal that have been exported. It will readily be seen, therefore, that some difficulty may arise in determining which of these exports are for probable war purposes, and the same thing would be true, although to a lesser degree, in regard to finished products.

We cannot permit such difficulties to interfere with that which is right, and certainly to my mind it is not right for private industry to make money at the expense of life. I listened with some interest to the previous speaker, the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). Whether or not I got the complete force of his argument, I understood it to be that the resolution had to do with whether or not we could strike harder when war came. I do not think that is the intent of the resolution. It is not a question of whether or not we can strike harder when time of war comes; it is a matter of whether or not we are to be drawn into a war by the influence of the fine art of private manufacturers of arms. The hon. gentleman referred to Great Britain; he mentioned President Roosevelt, Mr. Cordell Hull and the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), saying that these men certainly would not be influenced by private manufacturers; that they would not go to war simply because private manufacturers of munitions influenced them. I am not going to debate that point. We do not assume for a moment that they would do so. Nevertheless the fact must be faced that for a long, long time private manufacturers of armaments have had their propagandists in the field. Those propagandists are not there to influence governments to stay out of war. While the mover of the resolution (Mr. Douglas) was speaking this evening he referred to the well known Mr. William B. Shearer. It was by sheer coincidence that I happened to be reading about this same gentleman at that very time. In this connection I should like to read a paragraph or two—

Mr. DUPUIS: What is the title of the book?

Mr. HANSELL: I will give that. I might mention also that some in this corner of the house have been accused of reading a great many quotations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, I am going to quote from a book which I believe to be exceptionally authoritative. It is the first in a series of two volumes by Philip Noel-Baker, M.P., entitled The Private Manufacture of Armaments. Someone may cry out, "Who is he?" I am going to read who he is. He is the late Cassell Professor of International Relations in the university of London; late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge; member of the British delegation to the peace conference, 1919; parliamentary private secretary to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, 1929-1931; personal assistant to the president of the disarmament conference, 1932 and 1933. In the book there is a prefatory note by Viscount Cecil.

Now for the quotation concerning Mr. William B. Shearer and the propaganda that goes on at disarmament conferences, if you please. I am breaking into the middle of the story:

> There are, moreover, some aspects of Mr. Shearer's work with which many British readers are unfamiliar. Most people, indeed, remember no more than the simple fact that Mr. Shearer was paid $25,000 for six weeks' propaganda at the naval conference summoned in 1927 by President Coolidge at Geneva.

That is a pretty nice sum of money for six weeks' work. It makes me feel that perhaps we who are endeavouring to unravel international complications are receiving the salaries of office boys. To continue the quotation:

> They forget that this was only one special job among a number, and that for several years he was doing the same kind of propaganda for a number of employers in the United States. Here is his own account of his activities, as he summarized them in the suit he lodged against the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, and the American Brown Boveri Company—the three most important private naval shipyards in the United States:
> "Services rendered and performed by plaintiff relating and with respect to the shipbuilding industry, the business of ship building, and the increase thereof, as affecting the business and financial interests and welfare of the defendants; service as representative of the defendants at Washington, D.C., Geneva, Switzerland, New York city, and other places in connection with the matters above referred to; the preparation and distribution of literature, data, and information relating to the above-mentioned and other matters; interviews and conferences with various individuals, including public officials and representatives of the press; the preparation and delivery of public addresses; the organization and conduct of a publicity campaign for the benefit of and aid of the business and financial interests of the defendants; consulting and advising with the defendants in relation to the above and other matters affecting their business and financial welfare; and generally aiding and assisting the defendants in the conduct and promotion of their business affairs."

In pursuance of these activities, Mr. Shearer:

(a) Visited Geneva during the meeting of the preparatory disarmament commission in 1926;

(b) Visited Geneva again during the naval conference summoned by President Coolidge in 1927;

(c) "Lobbied" in Washington during the "three cruiser fight" in 1927, to which reference has been made above;

(d) "Lobbied" again in Washington on the Jones-White Merchant Shipping Bill, which Mr. Wilder so successfully carried through in 1928;

(e) "Lobbied" yet again in Washington in the so-called "fifteen cruiser fight" in 1929;

(f) Conducted speaking tours throughout the country, interviewed the press, wrote articles, etc.

I think that is enough of that. But to say such work was not done in the interests of profiteering in war manufactures is to talk nonsense.

May I add one or two further observations, and I am getting them from the same book. Perhaps I am doing a good deal of quoting to-night, and some hon. members may object. I trust, however, that the objection is not raised because the authorities are so authoritative. As a general rule governments approve the private manufacturing of armaments, sometimes even to the extent of giving financial backing and assistance, although the British government has been against this policy of financial assistance for the armament export trade. Nevertheless, to say the least, financial concerns are sometimes closely related to armament firms. Vickers, Armstrong, Schneider and Krupp have either created their own banking houses to help them carry on their work or established close personal relations with important banks.

Then there is the sale of armaments to potential enemies. To some extent the mover of the resolution has covered this question. It is obvious that private manufacturers of armaments are in business not for pleasure or by reason of their great patriotism, but rather for profit. It could be said that if the profit were taken out of war there would be no private manufacturing of armaments. This means that armament firms are constantly on the lookout for foreign markets, which results in the sale of armaments to potential enemies.

[Mr. Hansell.]

At page 184 of the book I find that out of 141 warships built by Armstrong-Whitworth before the great war, 105 were built for foreign countries and thirty-six for Great Britain. At page 189 I read the following:

After the war the German armament industry, with the knowledge and collusion of the German general staff, did much to organize the rearmament of Russia. In particular, they allowed Herr Stolzenberg to set up a chemical warfare factory on Russian soil, and Junkers to build extensive aircraft works. In these and other ways, German arms firms helped the Soviet government to lay the foundations of its present military strength. To-day the governments of Russia and Germany are preparing openly and feverishly for war, and there is no more dangerous situation in the world than that which their hostility involves....Italy was a member of the triple alliance; she was bound by treaty to join Germany and Austria-Hungary if European war broke out; yet she failed to march in August, 1914, and within a year she was fighting on the other side. Other no less flagrant cases could be cited.

Then, at page 195:

The latest tanks are the result of long and costly experiment and research. Yet it has been stated that, when Germany started to rearm, and while her right to do so was still violently contested by the government of France, a great French arms firm sold 400 tanks to Herr Hitler's government. In order to evade suspicion, the tanks were shipped through Holland to Germany.

With these few observations I announce my determination to support the resolution. I am glad the mover of the resolution has stated that it is not intended to emphasize the nationalization of industry. Personally I am against the nationalization of industry, but I do not think that in a time of war industry should make huge profits out of that which kills and destroys our young manhood. It may be said that war is a national crisis and that we should conscript all industry. It might also be said that we are now in the midst of a national crisis and that all industry should be conscripted or nationalized. The national crisis we are in to-day is purely economic, whereas the crisis of war is entirely different. With these reservations, I intend to vote for the resolution.

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this resolution, but in view of the remarks made to-day and a few days ago by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) with reference to the exportation of nickel, I feel it to be my duty to say a few words. After listening to the hon. gentleman one would think that the producers of nickel in Canada are combined with the arms manufacturers of the world. I should like to prove to the house that this is far from being so. The International Nickel Company, which is the exclusive exporter of nickel from Canada, has made a great contribution to this country in the way of scientific and industrial advancement. It is true that some nickel goes into armaments, but it is not a great deal. Before the great war, nickel was not used to any great extent in industry and naturally a large part of the production was used in armaments. However, in 1929 more nickel was used in industry than was used for armaments at the peak of the war-time consumption. The company's representatives state that manufacturers of armaments now consume less than five per cent of its production. I should like to quote what was said by Mr. F. E. Lathe and Mr. S. J. Cook of the national research laboratories. These gentlemen presented a paper at the thirteenth annual meeting of the League of Nations Society of Canada on the control of war metals as a peace measure. These men made inquiries as to the production and exportation of Canadian nickel and at this meeting held in Ottawa on May 31, 1935, they said:

> The restriction on the production or movement of war metals would not necessarily prevent war. The only real hope of placing effective restriction upon the conduct of war operations by limiting the production or movement of key metals lies in international action.

They say that substitutes could be made available for aluminum and nickel, at least in so far as the application of these metals are concerned. As I said before, the representatives of the company state that only five per cent of its production is used for war purposes. After making a study of the matter, these two gentlemen state that eighteen per cent of the nickel exported is used for armaments. The International Nickel Company, the sole producer of nickel in Canada, has made a great contribution to the progress of this country. Nickel is used in this and other countries for almost every purpose. It is used for architectural and household purposes, mainly in the form of monel metal. Nickel silver and stainless steel are used for exterior and interior architectural ornamentation and also for restaurant, household and factory equipment. A large amount of nickel silver is used for hardware, plumbing and tableware. These are just some of the uses to which this metal is put.

During the past few years the International Nickel Company has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in research work to find new uses for this metal. These people are intelligent and they realize the word is being passed around that nickel is being used largely for armaments. They are trying to prove to the Canadian people that only a small percentage of their production is used for that purpose. The large portion of their production is used for purposes other than armaments. We see all around us examples of the use of this metal in one alloy or another.

I mentioned architectural and household use. Nickel is used also in the automotive industry. Nickel alloys are used for automotive parts subject to great strain such as gears, drive shafts, roller-bearings and forgings. Stainless steel is used for ornamental parts and nickel alloys are used for cylinders and other parts of the engine. Nickel silver is used for interior ornamental work and also in the manufacture of spark-plugs. These articles are not manufactured for war purposes and there are hundreds of thousands of pounds of nickel exported every day to be put to uses such as these. I discussed this matter with the officials of the company and I know for a fact that nickel is being used, not for armaments but for the different purposes I have mentioned.

Because of its lightness it is also used in aviation. The chemical and allied industries are large users of nickel. For instance, monel metal, inconel—these are different preparations of nickel—and stainless and corrosion-resistant steel for corrosion-resisting equipment for all sorts of articles in the ceramic, dairy, laundry, distilling, dry-cleaning, glass, ice-cream, pulp and paper, soap, textile, wine and beer industries. This indicates the wide range of uses of nickel. Then there are electrical and radio uses: nickel radio tube parts, monel metal bolts, nuts and fittings, nickel chromium electrical-resistance alloys for heater coils and elements of electrical heating appliances; nickel-iron alloys for thermostatic elements; nickel-iron and nickel-cadmium accumulator batteries. This again indicates the wide use of nickel. In machinery there is the rolled, forged and cast nickel alloy steel for stressed parts. That is where nickel comes most into use on account of its combination with steel, giving the greatest resistance ever found in steel. Nickel is used in gears, shafting and roller-bearings, nickel alloy cast-iron for bed plates, frames, cylinders, brake drums, rolls, housings, for heavy machinery, machine tools, agricultural implements, excavating machinery. Then in marine construction, we find nickel alloy steel propeller shafts, turbine gears, diesel engine parts, nickel alloy cast-iron pumps and valves. Then in the mining industry, nickel is used in drilling equipment and mine skips, car axles, crushing machinery, nickel alloy cast-iron for crushing and grinding equipment, pumps, and valves. It is also used in the railways. This shows that there is a very wide range of uses for nickel.

The hon. member for Weyburn mentioned the great exports of nickel to different countries. Everybody knows that the United States is the most advanced nation in the manufacture of mechanical instruments. They have hundreds of industries of that kind, and it is for their purposes that most of the nickel exported to that country is used. Forty per cent of our nickel production goes to the United States. The hon. member mentioned some time ago that nickel was going in increasing amounts to the Netherlands. I should like to give figures of the world distribution of exports of nickel. If I were allowed, Mr. Speaker, I could put on Hansard the whole table supplied by the bureau of statistics showing the exportation of nickel from 1927 to 1937.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Read it.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I refer to Canada's exports of nickel and its derivatives, by hundredweight, to the chief importing countries for the fisical years ended March 31. I know the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) has seen this report, but I contend that he has drawn false conclusions from the figures.

The total exports of nickel in hundredweights were:

Year	100 pounds
1927	624,447
1928	782,285
1929	1,074,822
1930	1,065,175
1931	819,293
1932	543,791
1933	325,607
1934	1,066,421
1935	1,195,025
1936	1,609,252

Great Britain and the United States are the greatest importers.

Great Britain imported, in hundredweights:

Year	100 pounds
1927	243,305
1928	346,639
1929	303,638
1930	138,284
1931	319,569
1932	198,755
1933	59,976
1934	340,393
1935	444,358
1936	607,906

The United States imported:

Year	100 pounds
1927	300,097
1928	317,511
1929	619,596
1930	790,511
1931	407,455
1932	247,871
1933	156,706
1934	515,893
1935	526,699
1936	721,986

The Netherlands imported:

Year	100 pounds
1927	75,558
1928	101,696
1929	95,733
1930	88,487
1931	24,056
1932	19,889
1933	28,274
1934	102,882
1935	70,673
1936	123,008

As the hon. member said, this shows the increase of exports to neutrals.

At this point let me observe that I cannot understand how an embargo or restrictions can be placed on the exportation of nickel. Those who import it will give all kinds of misinformation before, during or after war.

In the years enumerated the imports for Norway were as follows:

Year	100 pounds
1930	874
1931	36,656
1932	51,464
1933	69,517
1934	88,850
1935	108,181
1936	111,462

Let us take Germany, the bugbear of which we are so much afraid. Her imports were:

Year	100 pounds
1927	1,823
1928	6,528
1929	15,726
1930	3,284
1931	6,597
1932	9,885
1933	2,512
1934	8,303
1935	1,910
1936	833

These are all hundredweight.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about Italy?

Mr. HURTUBISE: These are the figures for Italy:

Year	100 pounds
1927	1,121
1928	4,502
1929	7,270
1930	7,758
1931	7,620
1932	3,363
1933	3,254
1934	2,575
1935	12,711
1936	25,114

The figures for France are:

Year	100 pounds
1927	Nil
1928	538
1929	23,827
1930	24,748
1931	879
1932	1,202
1933	115
1934	457
1935	1,864
1936	3,885

The figures for Japan are:

Year	100 pounds
1927	2,543
1928	4,516
1929	8,692
1930	1,991
1931	2,989
1932	3,821
1933	2,466
1934	7,009
1935	23,841
1936	14,312

Let me give now the total figures for foreign countries:

Year	100 pounds
1927	381,142
1928	435,640
1929	771,184
1930	926,888

Mr. DOUGLAS: What is the source of these figures?

Mr. HURTUBISE: The bureau of statistics. As I have said, the different alloys which the manufacturers of nickel in Canada produce and export are rendering a great service not only to this country but to all the nations of the world, and it is not by any means in the manufacture of armaments only that their nickel is used. The nickel is produced in Copper Cliff, three and a half miles from where I live, and I know the conditions there. Some hon. members are under the impression that the manufacturers are concerned only with armaments; that they are ogres; that they are great profiteers, and that their workmen are labouring like slaves and are badly taken care of. Let me take this opportunity to say I know for a fact that not only is this industry making a great contribution to the welfare of Canada but its labourers are the best-treated in the country. I do not have them with me, but in my files I have circulars from the labour defence league, which is a branch of the communist organization that is working so hard in Canada. These circulars make interesting reading. When the International Nickel Company almost closed down for a while for repairs or reconstruction, these people were cursing the company for not making use of a sufficient number of men, and now that the company is using more men and treating them well, what do we find? If an accident happens, if a man is killed, they put up posters all over the city to convey the impression that the workmen are being cruelly treated.

I can assure the house that in addition to research work the company is spending unlimited amounts to prevent accidents. Accidents will happen in any industry, in any walk of life, no matter what precautions we may take against them; they cannot be altogether eliminated. I can, however, vouch for the fact that the company is making every effort and spending considerable sums of money to protect its employees. Not only that, but it is taking care of them from the social point of view. Last fall when the communists around Sudbury were spreading propaganda with respect to the treatment the labouring classes were supposed to be receiving from the company, I went to the officials and asked for a report to show what the company was doing for its men and what its operations meant, not only for that district, but for the dominion. I have in my hand a report given me in September, and according to the figures set out in this report I find that in the ten years from 1926 to 1935 the company paid in wages and salaries, $84,000,000; in materials, $69,000,000, and in freight, power and dividends, $47,000,000, creating per annum an average of $20,000,000 in direct Canadian buying power. On the basis of present operations the company spent in Canada during 1936, in labour and salaries, $15,800,000; in materials, $12,500,000, and in freight, power and dividends, $8,700,000, thus creating in 1936 a total of $37,000,000 in direct Canadian buying power.

Mr. COLDWELL: What were their total profits last year?

Mr. HURTUBISE: I shall come to that in a moment. The estimated capital expenditure of the International Nickel Company in 1936 for Canadian labour and materials was $11,000,000. The company used more than 250,000 tons of Canadian coal. I said at the beginning that this company is making a contribution to Canadian life, in furnishing employment, in buying Canadian materials and in many other ways. On the basis of present operations the company will use in a year 53,000,000 feet of Canadian lumber. This would provide steady employment for a year for a lumber camp of more than 1,000 men. The company at present has more than 9,000 employees, which means that it is providing a livelihood for some 20,000 people in Canadian homes, and through its purchases the company provides a livelihood for an additional 20,000 people in Canada.

I hope I have been able to prove that the International Nickel Company have no connection with the manufacture of armaments. Their greatest ambition is to get away altogether from it. They cannot prevent some nickel from going for use in armaments, as will steel, copper or any other metal. But why discriminate against nickel when it can be proven that only a very small percentage goes to armaments, and that is uncontrollable? Why not say as much against copper or any other metal?

Mr. HANSELL: We would.

Mr. HURTUBISE: I have been in this house for seven years and the only talk of embargoes and restrictions on the export of metal has always been in regard to nickel, as if it were the only metal used in armaments. I know, because I am in close contact with what is being done; I talk with those concerned every year and I know the efforts they are making to extend the use of nickel in every industry in this and all other countries, and to lessen its use as much as possible for armaments. Why discriminate against this company? The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) as well as others who have spoken are far away from it; how can they judge of the program of the company? I am at closer range, and as I knew this question was to come up, I made it my business to procure these figures. I am more than ever convinced that this discrimination against the International Nickel Company is antinational; it is nothing but the thin end of the wedge of socialism. One speaker said tonight it was not their ambition to socialize everything. Well, it is nothing but the thin end of the wedge leading to nationalization of all our industries. Would the nationalization of the manufacture of nickel in Canada give better results than those I have demonstrated? I cannot think it would give more work, or better accommodation for their labouring men.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Or more profits to the shareholders.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member has not reached that yet.

Mr. HURTUBISE: Nationalization could not give as much protection and satisfaction to the employees. If we enter upon a socialization policy the results would be what they are in Russia. We have to take one or the other, socialization and communism or the profit system.

Not only has the International Nickel Company made a contribution from the scientific point of view, from the labour point of view, but it has brought into the coffers of the Minister of Finance over $3,000,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: What were its profits last year?

Mr. HURTUBISE: Last year its profits were over $23,000,000. But that has to be compared with its total production. If you do a $25,000 business and make $1,000 profit, how does this compare with such an enterprise as the International Nickel Company making $23,000,000 profit? The ratio is no greater. I say it is pure and simple discrimination against that company.

Mr. MacINNIS: It has not hurt them any.

Mr. HURTUBISE: Why discriminate against them? There are other industries in this country making big profits. Why should the International Nickel Company be blamed if they make the average rate of profit that the others do? It is because they are intelligent men and know their business that they succeed. If others fail, it is because they have not the proper men at the head of their organization.

Mr. MacNICOL: They pay big income taxes.

Mr. HURTUBISE: Yes, they pay according to their amount of work and their profits. They are on the same basis as any other company. If one compares the amount of business they do in one year with that done by other companies, are their profits any bigger than those of the other companies?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, they are.

Mr. HURTUBISE: The total is bigger, but the percentage is not. From the speeches we have heard to-day it is evident that the desire of some hon. members is to set up socialism and communism in this country. I trust that by these few remarks I have been able to dissipate the misapprehension and misinformation which some of the speeches we have heard this afternoon would convey to the Canadian public. In view of those speeches and the tenor of the resolution I cannot support it.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

First report of the special committee appointed to inquire into farm implement prices.—Mr. J. F. Johnston (Lake Centre).

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That the name of Mr. Brunelle be substituted for that of Mr. Girouard on the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and the amendments thereto, and the Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, and the amendments thereto.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

PROVISION FOR APPEAL TO PROVINCIAL COURT OF APPEAL IN DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to provide for appeal to the court of appeal of the province of British Columbia in divorce and matrimonial causes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GREEN: In the province of British Columbia the supreme court, which is the trial court of the province, has been trying divorce cases for many years. Its right to do so is based on the law of England as of the year 1858, which has been held to have been in force in British Columbia when that province came into confederation. But it has been held also that the court of appeal for the province of British Columbia has no jurisdiction to hear appeals in divorce matters. The result is that the only appeal is to the privy council, and that means, of course, that there is no appeal at all except for the very wealthy people of the province. In every other province of the dominion in which the courts have and exercise jurisdiction in divorce causes there is an appeal to the appellate court of the particular province. This national parliament alone has the power to correct this situation, because by the British North America Act we were given the exclusive legislative authority in divorce matters. The purpose of this bill is merely to bring the practice in British Columbia into line with the practice in the other provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the power of the various provinces by statute or otherwise?

Mr. GREEN: This parliament passed a statute six or seven years ago giving the courts of Ontario power to grant divorces, which I believe has been taken to include the power to hear appeals. Our difficulty in British Columbia arises by reason of legal decisions. It may be that these decisions are wrong, but they come from courts as high as the Supreme Court of Canada; and our present position is this, that there is really no appeal in this serious matter of divorce. The bill aims to set that position right.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

PROVISION TO ENCOURAGE REPAIR OF RURAL AND URBAN DWELLINGS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): This section was pretty well discussed the other day.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Institutions guaranteed against losses.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister explain how the losses are computed and how the dominion government will be protected in the matter of the amount of losses?

Mr. DUNNING: As indicated in the next section of the bill, the guarantee of the dominion with respect to loss is limited to fifteen per cent of the aggregate losses of the particular lending institution. As I explained the other day, it is not a guarantee of the individual loss nor is it a guarantee with respect to losses in particular areas or related to particular branches of an institution; it is the losses of the institution in its lending operations as a whole.

Mr. STIRLING: When will they be computed—annually?

Mr. DUNNING: As a matter of fact that has yet to be worked out—the precise cut-off date—because the measure as at present drawn is based upon a continuous operation with power to the government to terminate at any time the guaranteeing of further moneys. Further on in the bill will be found a clause relating to power of regulation, and among the matters to be regulated are the proceedings in the event of default, which regulations are now in process of being worked out. The leader of the opposition the other day raised a point with respect to the continuing of guarantee in case of default. That has been looked into since, and in order to make matters doubly sure the Department of Justice has supplied me with an amendment which I think will clarify the point. However, I think we shall reach that later on.

Mr. BENNETT: The point raised by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) is important, to this extent. I do not consider that regulations can confer any greater power upon either the government or the lending institutions than the statute itself provides. In other words, the statute must be the basis of it and the regulations must be within the powers of the statute. At least I so read it. There is a difficulty here unless the government desires to pursue the course it followed last year and disregard the terms of its guarantee with respect to ultimate loss. The loss arises the day there is default. That would be the legal position, and the result would be that on the day default was made the right of the bank to call for payment of guarantee would arise, unless we had covered it by some appropriate provisions in the statute. The question which the hon. member for Yale has asked is, I think, of the most far-reaching importance on this particular point. When does the liability attach to Canada? That is the question. In law it attaches the minute there is failure to pay according to the terms of the contract. That is to say, if a man borrowed $360, payable in thirty-six instalments—let us say for the sake of argument, $10 each, though that is not quite right—the minute he makes default in payment of the first instalment, as the case may be, that moment the right arises of the lending institution to look to the guarantor. Obviously, unless there is some provision that all instalments shall become due, you have the old story which is very well known to lawyers: the others to continue to go on and march into maturity as the time passes. But the obligation of the state to make good its undertaking has arisen at the moment default is made with respect to the payment of the first $10 or the second as the case may be. It does not seem to me that this is sufficiently covered by regulations. The question asked is one that goes to the very root of the transaction.

Mr. DUNNING: From a practical standpoint I agree entirely with the view taken by the leader of the opposition. Of course, I cannot offer a legal opinion except that of the Department of Justice, but looking at the matter as a practical one it is quite possible for a default by an individual debtor to occur while the lending institution is still lending to new borrowers.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: Let us assume for the moment that the plan continues in operation for a year. It is conceivable that some of the earlier borrowers at the end of the year may be in default, but at the same time the lending institution is continuing to lend to new borrowers. The manner in which the guarantee shall become effective as between the lending institution and the government has not yet been worked out in detail because of that difficulty. We have endeavoured to leave it subject to future arrangement, but it is important, as the leader of the opposition says, that whatever is done should have sound law behind it. The Department of Justice has said, regarding the matter, that once the debtor has made default the liability of the guarantor arises in the absence of provisions to the contrary in the agreement. The creditor is not bound to request the debtor to pay or to sue the debtor before proceeding against the guarantor. The guarantor, however, cannot be permitted to suffer by reason of any arrangement which has taken place between the creditor and the debtor. The rule is that any material alteration in the terms of the debt which is guaranteed, made by the creditor and the debtor without the guarantor's assent, will discharge the guarantor, and a binding agreement by the creditor to give the debtor an extension of time is deemed to be a material alteration. That is precisely the point my right hon. friend makes. It is important however to observe that the guarantor is not discharged if he agreed in the contract of guarantee or in some other way that time might be given to the debtor with impunity or if he afterwards confirmed any agreement giving time. Mere omission on the part of the creditor to press the debtor for payment will not, if there is no binding agreement to give time, discharge the guarantor even if the debtor subsequently becomes insolvent. By a binding agreement is meant an agreement given for valuable consideration and enforceable by debtor and creditor. The intention is to execute a contract of guarantee with each lending institution. The contract will be made subject to the act and the regulations made under the act, and the regulations will contain the conditions upon which an extension of time will be granted. Thus the lending institutions will have in the contract of guarantee itself the consent of the government to extensions of time, subject to certain conditions.

The question arises whether there is power under paragraphs (b) and (f) of clause 8 to make regulations permitting the lending institutions to grant extensions of time. The Department of Justice, while not admitting that the bill as now drafted is defective in this respect, thought that as the point had been raised it would be wiser to insert a new paragraph (c) in section 8 to remove all doubt. Perhaps I might read that now, although we have not yet reached the section. Paragraph (c) as amended would read as follows:

> In the event of actual or pending default by a borrower the extent to which the lending institution and the borrower may, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (c) of section 6 of this act, alter or revise any of the terms of their agreement respecting a home improvement loan without discharging the guarantee under this act.

With this amendment the Department of Justice say that regulations could be passed under which the lending institutions would be able to grant extensions of time in certain cases even if some of the instalments were not payable until more than three or five years, as the case may be, after the loan was first made. That is the advice I have on that point.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it the intention of the government to guarantee fifteen per cent of individual loans, or fifteen per cent of the aggregate amount loaned?

Mr. DUNNING: The aggregate.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then how are you going to arrive at the condition of default when the guarantee would become operative?

Mr. DUNNING: As I said just now, the transactions will be continuous. This must be worked out in practice. In a sense it will be a revolving amount. When shall we determine a block of aggregate losses? That is a question we have to work out with the lending institutions. If our experience is similar to that of the United States it will not be a troublesome matter, because the proportion of loss there has been very small. The point must be worked out between the lending institutions and the government in the guarantee agreement, as to when we will assume a cut-off date for the establishment of an aggregate loss with respect to the total loans made by an institution. The difficulty of course is the continuity of the transactions, the lending of ever more and more money. I cannot say in terms that we would positively make a cut-off one year or two years from the date of commencement of the scheme, but there must be a time agreed upon. I have taken this ground in communication with the institutions that we think in fairness to the government every reasonable effort to collect from a debtor must be exhausted before we will admit that a particular default constitutes part of the aggregate loss of that institution.

Mr. BENNETT: That will have to be set by agreement, though.

Mr. DUNNING: That will have to be set by agreement. We have to work it out. Precisely what the decision is to be is now under consideration.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Conditions of loans.

Mrs. BLACK: Mr. Chairman, paragraph (d) says:

> The maximum charge which may be made by an approved lending institution for a home improvement loan shall not exceed a rate of discount of three and one-quarter per centum for a one year loan repayable in equal monthly instalments and proportionate rates for other periods.

I asked the minister the other day if the same rate would apply to Dawson or the Yukon Territory, where normally we have to pay from twelve to twenty per cent interest. Money may be put in the bank, and no interest is paid on it by the bank, but we have to pay to the bankers there the rates of interest I have mentioned. Will the rate provided for by this subsection apply there?

Mr. DUNNING: No loan can be made anywhere in Canada under the provisions of this legislation at a higher rate than that named in the bill.

Mr. HEAPS: This is the clause dealing with the limitations, fixing the maximum which may be lent at $1,000 on certain homes and $2,000 in the case of a duplex. The purpose of the bill is said to be to provide employment. If that is so, personally I should not object if the measure went further than is proposed in this clause. It makes very little difference to a workman whether he obtains work in a small home of a value of three, four or five thousand dollars, or in an apartment block worth $50,000. I do not know how far the government might have to go in the way of guarantees if they went beyond the provisions of the present clause, but I believe the maximum is much higher in the United States. Could the minister give the committee some information on that point? I should like to know if there is any objection to extending the scheme to provide for the renovating and remodelling of larger premises than are provided for in the present clause.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the plan at present in operation in the United States, following their earlier experience they have extended it to include commercial buildings, churches, large industrial buildings and others of the kind. But we feel that we had better start with what we have and gather experience and then see whether it would be wise to extend it beyond the present limitations.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister the other day gave an idea of the amount which has already been granted by the banks for the renovating of buildings—

Mr. DUNNING: Homes.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, buildings as covered by the provisions of the bill. Can he give an idea as to the amount that has been requested from the lending institutions?

Mr. DUNNING: No, we have not that information.

Mr. BENNETT: The average is between $300 and $400.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the average amount which is being granted. What I am asking is the amount of money that has been applied for and the amount that has been granted.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot give the amount that has been applied for. The only return to the department is with respect to applications for guarantee, and any applications which have been refused of course do not appear in connection with applications for guarantee.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister inform the committee what this rate of interest, three and one-quarter per cent discount on a loan repaid in monthly instalments, really amounts to?

Mr. BENNETT: It is 6·32 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The other day I arranged to supply every hon. member with copies of the literature on the subject, in which we have been careful to publish complete tables for the guidance of borrowers. The actual effective simple interest rate equivalent to 3¼ per cent discount for a loan for a year would be 6·32—or 6·23, one or the other. In actual practice, of course, the borrower of $100 receives, instead of $100, the sum of $96.75. He pays back the flat sum of $100, distributed over the period of his loan. That is, he pays $3.25 for the use of $96.75 for a year, but he pays it in advance.

Mr. CAHAN: Could the minister anticipate the time when he will move amendments and allow us to see a draft of the proposed amendments? None have been published as yet in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. CAHAN: In matters of this kind one would like to have a certain time to consider these amendments.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister say what is meant by "long term lease"? I think in the different provinces a long term lease would be defined in different ways, and there does not seem to be anything in the bill to indicate just what is meant by that expression.

Mr. DUNNING: That question raises one of the difficulties of trying to qualify the term "owner" in connection with legislation of this kind which does not involve any security being taken on the property by the lender. My hon. friend will understand that if we limited "owner" to the literal meaning of the term "ownership" it would debar a great many people in various sections of the country where the long term lease method of holding property is in force. From the point of view of the present measure it is practically effectual ownership that is meant. At any rate such a long term lease certainly should not disqualify a person occupying a dwelling from what we intend to accomplish. That is why the words "long term lease" have been used. As a matter of fact we are thinking of widening it a little more; we are proposing to add the term "life tenants," because from the point of view of this legislation a life tenant ought to have just as much right to go to the bank and get a loan with which to improve the property of which he is the tenant. Then, in order to be sure that we are not debarring any class of person who ought to qualify, we are proposing to add at the end of (i) the words "and any persons having rights approximating ownership." This question arose in a case involving what in the west we used to call squatter's rights. The person concerned had occupied his dwelling for a long time. There was no title other than that which might obtain under squatter's rights, but it was a reasonably substantial home for a working class family. Why should not such a man get a loan if he is able to convince the bank that he can repay it? Why should he be denied the opportunity because he was not the actual owner, or had not a lease?

Mr. BENNETT: He was not the registered owner.

Mr. DUNNING: But he had something at least approximating ownership, from the point of view of the administration of this act.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister say that a loan could be obtained by a person who had a five year lease?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. GREEN: That would be a period two years in excess of the maximum time within which a loan has to be repaid.

Mr. DUNNING: The ruling we have already given in the department is this: the owner of such dwelling, for the purposes of the home improvement plan, includes the lessee of such property provided that the lease does not expire until three years after the date on which the last instalment of the loan is required to be paid. That is the regulation at present.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before the section carries I would appreciate it if the minister would give me a little information with regard to subsection (a). Do I understand that if a large house is to be turned into a four family dwelling the loan that will be allowed for that improvement will be $1,000 for each family unit plus an additional $1,000, or $5,000 in all?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, that is the maximum in such a case.

Mr. TUCKER: With regard to subsection (f), do I understand it to be the intention that there shall be no guarantee in any case where the bank takes security? If that is the intention of this legislation I submit that this subsection should be worded differently. It reads:

No security by way of endorsement or otherwise shall be required.

If the bank should take a more or less doubtful attitude with regard to a loan; the applicant might produce an endorser and offer his endorsement to the bank, the bank could then say they had not required the endorsement but it was offered to them, and the bank could claim the protection of the act. If it is the intention of the government that the bank shall not be able to claim a guarantee under the act in such a case I suggest that the clause should read:

No security by way of endorsement or otherwise shall be taken.

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly if such a loan were taken with security it would not qualify for the guarantee. As to the use of words, I do not like to dispute with my legal friends as to whether "taken" or "required" is better. Pesonally I have no objection to my hon. friend's suggestion. A point has been raised, however, on which I should like to have the view of the committee. We have been considering the addition of the words "so long as the borrower is not in default."

Mr. BENNETT: That is the question I was about to raise.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not very sure as to whether that is desirable, but having regard to the fact that this is a guarantee by public funds should we not be in the position of taking security after default in all cases where security is available? That is the argument. On the other side of the question the difficulty is that in connection with these small loans it is quite possible for a borrower to be in default just a short time, two weeks, three weeks, a month, involving only one or two instalments, and it would seem to me to be opening the door very wide to put every lending institution in the position of hounding such a man immediately for additional security. Perhaps the committee would express some view on that.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to point out to the minister that there may be a great deal of difficulty in connection with the default on one of these loans if no time is fixed within which you propose to mark the beginning of the obligation to pay. Far be it from me to say anything in behalf of the lending institutions; they will be quite capable of looking after themselves in making the agreements. But if default has occurred, we will say, on the first or second instalment on a $1,000 loan, and they ask for payment as soon as the default arises, it does seem to me that the guarantor, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, would have to pay, because they are not bound to exhaust their remedies against the creditor, as we have said. But the lending institutions will not be willing to wait for eight or ten months more at a discount rate of 3½ per cent. They will desire to be reimbursed as far as possible, at least to the extent of fifteen per cent of their loan, or to follow the course of collecting from their debtor, unless we do something to mark the beginning of the obligation to pay.

I do not see how we can get along with this loose—and I must call it an extremely loose —way of expressing it. I do not wish to be critical, but I believe the minister made it clear the other day that he was endeavouring to use terms general enough to permit of every case falling within it, because this is a measure not only to provide employment but to improve homes. I agree with that, but it seems to me that the terms cannot be so general as to leave them open on the one hand to abuse or on the other hand to fault finding on the part of the lending institution, which would place the unfortunate creditor in the position just now mentioned by the minister, namely that of being hounded to death. It seems to me the observations of the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) as to whether we should use the word "taken" or "required" would apply to the question of the taking of security, to which the minister has just referred. One means the act of the lending institution; it is a discretionary right. The other is a prohibition. That is the difference between the two. When we say "shall be required" we mean that they shall not ask him for security; but if he volunteers to give it, because of the general attitude of mind of the bank manager or the lending institution manager, that is the end of it—if he gives it. But if we say it "shall not be taken," then you have a positive enactment against it. On the other hand, the point the minister has just made, and concerning which he said he wished the opinion of the committee, is the one which arises there. We say they shall not take security, and they do not take security. There is default in the first payment, and then they say, "We want security for this loan, or we will sue."

Mr. DUNNING: That is my difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is. And it is not imaginary; it is a very real one.

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: Moreover I do not think there is power under section 8 to make regulations to meet the situation. The first part of the statement of the Department of Justice was almost identical with the words I used the other day. I can put it this way to the minister: I do not conceive that it is possible for the department to provide regulations to meet these cases, unless section 8 is broad enough in conferring power upon them to do so. I cannot believe that as it reads now it has any power to deal with those things, which look very small, to which I have referred. For instance, why is it the government never likes to take bonds for contracts? Because in almost every case there is a lawsuit as to what the bonds mean, and as to whether or not a man has done everything he should under it. We find cases going to the courts, and they say, "You did not advise us; you did not do thus and so; you did not enforce your remedy"—

Mr. DUNNING: In other words, did not read the small print.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; and our supreme court has said that in this day it must be taken that every man reads the contract he signs. My point is that section 8 is not broad enough to cover the various phases of the situation to which reference has been made.

As to section 6 there are only two points I wish to mention, one of which has already been dealt with by the hon. member for Rosthern. However, there is paragraph (e), which reads: "no service or insurance charges shall be made," and so on. I should like to go further and say: "no service, insurance or other charges of any kind shall be made." It would then read:

> No service, insurance or other charges of any kind shall be made by an approved lending institution and as long as the borrower is not in default no other additional charges of any kind shall be made.

The alteration would put the first part of the section on the same basis as the second part, because in the second part we find the expression "as long as the borrower is not in default no other additional charges of any kind shall be made." The first part covers what I conceive to be the initial charge, and I believe it should read "no service, insurance or other charges of any kind."

Mr. DUNNING: "Or other charges of any kind"?

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest that wording. I do not say that those should be the exact words, but I should like to have it made abundantly clear that in no case can the borrower be called upon to pay more than the government have arranged the lending institution should be paid. But that does not cover the case after his default—the point to which the minister has directed attention.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the inclusion of the words "no service, insurance or other charges" cover the point?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I do not wish in any sense to undertake to suggest how the section should be drafted. In fact I am careful not to do that because if I did, it would immediately be voted down. All I desire to suggest is that the last words would seem to cover the point. I do not believe the section as it now reads is quite wide enough. I take it the words "no service or insurance charges shall be made by an approved lending institution" refer to the initial payment that is made when a person goes to get the money.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what it means. Then the paragraph goes on to say, "and as long as the borrower is not in default no other additional charges of any kind shall be made." These words contemplate, I should think, that when he is in default other charges may be made.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: It should be made clear that when the money is borrowed in the first instance a person cannot be charged more than is provided in the measure. I think the minister should consider that. I confess I do not know what the attitude of a lending institution may be, but as it reads to-day it certainly is an invitation—or shall I go further and say it is an intimation that the lending institution will charge more when there is default.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course my right hon. friend will see immediately that when the loan is based upon a fixed rate of discount a charge after default is quite fair. In fact any other procedure would be distinctly unfair.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: Because the individual would have the use of the money, without charge, after default, having paid his discount in the first instance. The regulation at present provides for a maximum rate of interest on default not exceeding seven per cent simple interest.

Having regard to the constructive suggestions which have been made, and which I appreciate, could we arrange to get along with the bill as far as possible in committee, and then keep it in committee while I go over with the officers of the Department of Justice the various points which have been raised? Everyone is cooperating to make this a reasonably good piece of legislation, and while it is important to have it passed as soon as possible the rush is not so great that we cannot afford to take time to have it done properly. If we could agree to have the sections passed in committee we could leave the bill at that stage in order that the Department of Justice may give further consideration to the suggestions on points which have been discussed this afternoon, and which have come from various members of the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Might not section 6 stand, then?

Mr. DUNNING: In the meantime we can settle a couple of points with respect to section 6. In the light of the amendment to which I referred to section 8, paragraph (b) of section 6 might be amended so as to eliminate the proviso, which will not be necessary. I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to make a motion to this effect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Mr. DUNNING: We will eliminate the proviso in paragraph (b). Then, could I have consideration of the amendment to paragraph (f) incorporating in it the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosthern, changing the word "required" to "taken," and adding the words "as long as the borrower is not in default." With these changes the paragraph would read:

(f) No security by way of endorsement or otherwise shall be taken as long as the borrower is not in default.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment to section 6, paragraph (b). It is moved that the paragraph be amended by deleting the proviso thereto.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be better to define the words struck out than simply to refer to the proviso?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. We could use the expression "all the words after the word 'made'."

Mr. DUNNING: So long as the chairman strikes out the words, the result will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment would then read:

That all the words after the word "made" in the twenty-first line be struck out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment moved by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver), as follows:

That paragraph (f) of clause 6 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

(f) No security by way of endorsement or otherwise shall be taken as long as the borrower is not in default.

Mr. BENNETT: If I were rewriting that paragraph I would leave out the words "by way of endorsement or otherwise."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is one point upon which I am not clear. In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) the minister indicated that loans on larger properties were not contemplated. Then in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) I understood the minister to say that loans would be made on multiple dwellings to the extent of $5,000 for four families, the idea being $1,000 over the total number of families. Suppose there were six families, would that be all right?

Mr. DUNNING: That is all right.

Mr. COLDWELL: The absolute amount is not $5,000?

Mr. DUNNING: That was just an illustration. The distinction we are trying to make is between buildings which constitute homes, and buildings of another kind. As I mentioned the other day, it is difficult to frame regulations as to buildings used partly for home purposes and partly for business purposes. The intent of the law is to make it apply with respect to homes.

Mr. HEAPS: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, will the minister indicate whether the owner of an apartment building containing twenty or thirty apartments would be entitled to come under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly, if he can convince the bank that he will be able to repay the loan.

Mr. McGREGOR: Could the owner of an apartment building containing twenty apartments borrow $20,000 with which to build an addition?

Mr. BENNETT: Each $1,000 would have to be referable to a unit.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I am getting into rather deep water in attempting to answer questions such as that. My hon. friends are asking me hypothetical questions with reference to matters which may come up in a practical way. This is one reason why we must have regulations. It must be remembered that this bill will not mean that the man who owns an apartment can get money; he must qualify in other ways. We are merely indicating that if the lender is satisfied with the character and the ability of the borrower to repay, the lender may get a guarantee from the government up to fifteen per cent.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. CAHAN: The minister has suggested that certain sections of the bill should be held in abeyance pending consideration by the Department of Justice of criticisms which might be offered in this discussion. In view of that understanding I should like again to call attention to the criticism offered by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) as to the ascertainment of loss under the guarantee given by the government to the lending institution. I looked through the bill quite carefully, but I was unable to find anything which provides for the ascertainment of loss of any lending institution in the discretion of the government. If it is not in the discretion of the government as to time, then it certainly is not adequately provided for.

Mr. DUNNING: Has my hon. friend looked at paragraph (b) of section 8?

Mr. CAHAN: That reads that the minister with the approval of the governor in council may make regulations:

> (b) in the event of default by a borrower, the measures to be taken and the procedure to be followed for the collection of the amount outstanding of the home improvement loan and the method of determining the amount of loss, if any;

That is a regulation which may be imposed by the governor in council upon the lending institution in connection with its dealing with the borrower, but I suggest that that paragraph (b) does not apply to differences which may arise between the government and the lending institutions as to the determination either of the date or the amount of the losses sustained by the lending institution. I suggest with deference that there is nothing in the bill to enable the government to make such a provision in the terms of the guarantee which it gives and which the minister referred to as the agreement of guarantee.

If the chairman will permit me to refer back to a section already passed, I should like to refer again to section 4, which provides that the liability of the government in respect of guarantees shall not exceed fifteen per centum of the aggregate amount of home improvement loans made by any such approved lending institution. How is that fifteen per cent to be ascertained? Will the lending institution go on for a term of five or ten years before the losses are computed and ascertained? Must a certain period elapse before it is possible to determine that a loss has been sustained as between the lending institution and the government? I think there should be clearer phraseology than is here used. I am simply suggesting that the minister take the opinion of his legal advisers with regard to the matter before the bill finally passes committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I can tell my hon. friend as to how we intend it to work; I cannot say whether the draftsman has made the phraseology fit the method. Section 8 (b) provides the method of determining whether a loss has occurred. Then the lending institution has the right to ask the government to make good that loss. The amount of the loss will be charged up in the books of the treasury, signifying that such and such a lending institution has received so many dollars. No lending institution will be able at any time to receive a greater amount than is represented by fifteen per centum of the amount they have loaned under this plan. I intend that it shall be possible to deal with individual ascertained losses and to pay the guarantee once the government has ascertained that a loss has actually occurred with respect to a particular case.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister will find it difficult to do that in view of what he said the other day, that the aggregate of the losses of every one of the lending institutions must be ascertained before you determine what you have to pay. Therefore each case cannot stand on its own merits.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry; if I said that I was wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister said it in reply to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley).

Mr .DUNNING: What I intended to convey was that the guarantee was with respect to the whole of the loans by an institution.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is right.

Mr. DUNNING: And that the guarantee applied to the institution, not to all institutions cooperatively—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. DUNNING: —but to all of the branches of one institution considered as a whole.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I anticipate that there will be isolated cases under section 8(b) where it is dead sure that a loss has occurred. What should be done? In that case, under the provisions of the guarantee in section 4, the amount of the loss can be paid but the aggregate paid of such losses cannot exceed fifteen per cent of the amount which that institution as a whole lent. That is the way in which we want it to work. If the draftsmen have not conveyed that meaning I am sorry.

Mr. CAHAN: I merely suggest, following the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that section 8(b) does not cover the exigency which the minister has stated. The section says that the governor in council may make regulations in regard to—

> . . . the measures to be taken and the procedure to be followed for the collection of the amount outstanding of the home improvement loan and the method of determining the amount of loss, if any.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly that should be clarified if clause (b), in connection with regulations as to the procedure to be taken for the collection of the amount outstanding, is to be united with regulations for the method of determining the amount of the loss as between the government and the lending institutions. I suggest that for the consideration of the legal advisers of the minister. I do not wish to discuss it prematurely.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to know if I have understood the minister aright. Take a case such as this. A lending institution lends to one hundred persons. Eighty-five per cent of them pay their loans in full; that leaves fifteen per cent. The fifteen per cent represent losses; does the government make up the fifteen per cent loss so that the lending institution gets one hundred per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is subdividing the matter into persons. I assume, if I caught the remarks—

Mr. QUELCH: One hundred persons get loans; eighty-five per cent of them pay their loans in full; fifteen per cent of the whole are entire losses. Does the government make up that fifteen per cent so that that lending institution secures one hundred per cent of its loans?

Mr. DUNNING: In such a case that would be the way it would work out. Of course my hon. friend states a hypothetical case which could not occur in actual practice.

Mr. QUELCH: Oh yes, it could.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be many thousands of loans made by the same lending institution, and there will be differing degrees of default. That is to say, there will be many cases in which a proportion has been paid back by the borrower, but there will be all sorts of variants. The principle is simply this: the government is standing back of fifteen per cent of the total loans by any institution as a whole, and that institution cannot receive from the government under any circumstances more than a sum equivalent to fifteen per cent of the amount of its loans. Its losses may be greater or may be less, but the maximum amount it can receive from the government is fifteen per cent of that which it has loaned.

Mr. COLDWELL: If less, that is all the government guarantees, I suppose?

Mr. DUNNING: The government does not guarantee any more than the actual loss to a maximum of fifteen per cent.

Mr. LOCKHART: In order to be brief, I will refer only to section 6, clause (e), which states that no service or insurance charges shall be made as long as the borrower is not in default. Turning to section 8, clause (b), I find nothing that particularly defines the powers of the lending institution in the event of default on the part of a borrower. I have some experience in connection with the building industry, and I have in mind the fact that a man may become temporarily in default for a small amount, but within a period of two or three months thereafter he recovers and becomes in good standing with the lending institution. Is the matter of the penalty to be imposed upon the debtor to be left entirely in the hands of the manager of the lending institution?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is nothing, in my opinion, which defines the point. I am not suggesting that there are Shylocks among the managers of lending institutions, but I know of cases where conditions following a temporary default have been exacted of men who have borrowed money from banks which have made it very difficult for them to make repayment. I merely point that out to the minister with the idea that a direction in that connection might be given to the lending institution.

Mr. DUNNING: Power is given to the governor in council to make regulations covering such points as that raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to refer to section 6, clause (f) as now amended and put a supposititious case before the minister. A borrower receives a sum of money from a bank or other lending institution for alterations which he proposes to make in his home. He contracts for the making of those alterations and the contractor fails to make good. The mechanics file liens, and a new situation develops. What is the position so far as this measure is concerned, and what is the position of the government in regard to that new situation?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall have to ask a legal friend to reply to that. I do not think the bill touches it at all. The bill deals with the borrowing of the money. A borrower's troubles with respect to securing work for his money are his business, and I assume, would fall within the laws of the province relating to such matters as mechanics' liens. I cannot give the legal answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. QUELCH: Section 6(c) of the bill reads, in part:

> Home improvement loans shall be for a term not exceeding three years if the amount of the loan is one thousand dollars or less,

I fancy that a good many small-salaried home owners will apply for some assistance. In case any such man should find himself without an income, say two years after he took out the loan, would there be any attempt on the part of financial institutions to refinance the balance over another three years? Would that be permitted, or not?

Mr. DUNNING: That can be covered in the regulations.

Mr. FAIR: Section 6, clause (d), reads:

> The maximum charge which may be made by an approved lending institution for a home improvement loan shall not exceed a rate of discount of three and one-quarter per centum for a one year loan repayable in equal monthly instalments and proportionate rates for other periods;

Two nights ago we found on our desks an attractive little pamphlet, and I became interested in what it contains. I find in it statements with regard to the organization of certain committees. One of these is the financial committee. The statement reads:

> The financial committee raises whatever necessary money may be required for advertising and other local expenses. One of the functions of that committee is to investigate the number of possible homes in the community where improvement might well be carried out. In order that the various supply houses, contracting firms, building organizations may get a clear idea of what the market for improvement is in that locality, and see at a glance its value to them, the financial committee should be ready to advise all of these supply houses as to how to approach the householder, estimate the work to be done and arrange—if necessary—for the householder to be accompanied to the bank when the loan is arranged. In some parts of the United States it was found that the contractors and supply houses (such, for instance, as those manufacturing paints, heating and plumbing supplies, roofing materials, etc.) were the great gatherers-in of the people and their loans. The financial committee, however, might be reminded that this movement is for the improvement of people's houses and not a movement to induce people to borrow money from the bank. The bank borrowings are simply a convenient form of accomplishing the main objective, which is to get men employed through improvement of the home.

There seems to me to be some conflict there. Next we come to the women's committee, and we find:

> They exercise the greatest amount of influence in persuading the family to spend the family dollar for improvement of the home. The national women's organizations are interested in the project and whatever branches of these national organizations are located in the municipality might well be used. It is not necessary to emphasize the importance, therefore, of choosing a chairman who is sympathetic with this plan, as well as representative of social and welfare work.

Under the heading "Trouble Committee" we find the following:

> As a general thing, the chairman should be one of the most solid business men in the community, who enjoys the confidence of the banks, who is sympathetic with this idea, and who has broad human sympathies.

I have been wondering whether there is very much cooperation there. As I understood this bill the other day, before you can get a loan you must satisfy the lending institution. The lending institution must have perfect confidence in you; you must be of good character and you must have a job with an assured salary and a home. The man without a salary or without a home is not in on this deal at all, but only the man whose salary is assured, who has a home and has sufficient credit to go ahead on his own. But I would refer to a particular type of man who might come under this legislation, the man who receives a salary just sufficient to get by on and to pay his taxes or his rent as the case may be, and whose home is also mortgaged. In a bank the other day I was told that possibly seventy-five per cent of the people under this plan have mortgaged homes. Under this plan no security is needed, but there is no guarantee whatever that as soon as the improvements are made and the loan is repaid the mortgage company, if the man defaults, will not take the house after it has all been fixed up and the payments have been made to the financial institution. There is no cooperation whatever as far as the lending institutions are concerned.

Borrowers may obtain money at a discount of 3¼ per cent. I think it might be better to put it the way people are accustomed to see it stated—an interest rate of 6.32 per cent. That does not show any cooperation, because it is very little below the legal rate at which the banks may lend money. I suggest that instead of the 3¼ per cent the discount be reduced to 2 per cent; the banks would thus be given an opportunity to cooperate in a practical manner. If this is not satisfactory, then I suggest that the country's credit might be used, and we might make use of the Bank of Canada in this regard. This would be far better business than following the sound money policy which is adhered to in this plan.

Mr. TUCKER: There are three points which I wish to draw to the attention of the minister. The definition of home improvement loan is given in paragraph (b) of section 2:

> (b) "home improvement loan" means a loan or a purchase of obligations representing loans and advances of money made for the purpose of financing repairs, alterations and additions to rural and urban homes.

It may be rather late to suggest any change here, but I would ask that the minister consider the possibility of amending this definition so as to include the building of small homes. I have in mind some people in Rosthern who might build small homes that would cost say $1,500, which would provide as much labour by an expenditure of the same amount in improving an old home. But they cannot come under the scheme if they want to put up new houses. I suggest that some consideration be given such people.

There is another point namely with respect to default. When there is default and the bank calls upon the government to make good, what becomes of the debt? There is no provision in the bill to enable the government to collect later on if the debtor should become able to pay. I submit that the bill should contain some provision in that respect, because there might be a doubt.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be recovered by process of law.

Mr. TUCKER: There might be some doubt about it, and I do not see that there is any harm in making provision for it in the regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: What about paragraph (b) of section 8?

Mr. TUCKER: I submit it does not cover the point at all in the event of default and the payment of the guarantee by the government. In my opinion the government's position is not secured by paragraph (b) of section 8, and I submit that it should be made clear.

The third point to which I wish to call attention is this. I understand, from paragraph (e) of section 6, that no service or insurance charges shall be made by a lending institution at any time, and as long as the borrower is not in default no additional charges of any kind shall be made. That section is not worded very clearly. I assume the intention is that no service or insurance charges are to be made at any time, whether the borrower is in default or not, but that after the borrower is in default some charges other than for service or insurance may be made. What I think the government must have had in mind is that an interest charge be made. I understand from the minister that there is a clause in the regulations providing that interest may be charged not exceeding seven per cent. The difficulty is that there is no provision in section 8 for fixing that interest charge.

Mr. DUNNING: In section 8 provision is made with respect to the form of note, and what shall be in it.

Mr. TUCKER: Well, there is nothing in section 8 that says it very definitely. If it is the intention to restrict the lending institutions merely to charging interest, to keep them from piling up other charges, there should be something put in to the effect that when the borrower is in default no additional charges of any kind shall be made except interest on the amount overdue at a rate not exceeding that fixed by regulation under section 8. That would make it certain that they could not charge anything but interest, and would give the minister power to fix the rate. Those are the three suggestions I offer.

Mr. CAHAN: There is one observation I was about to make before the last member spoke. This guarantee is given by the government but it is not a guarantee against default. The guarantee has really no exact relationship to default.

Mr. DUNNING: To ultimate loss only.

Mr. CAHAN: The guarantee is against ultimate loss. Before the ultimate loss of the bank in respect of any single loan can be determined the bank must exercise all its legal rights in respect to the collection of that loan. I suggest that the bank would find it necessary to bring suit, to obtain judgment, and to execute the judgment upon whatever property the borrower may own. Therefore no liability arises on the part of the government until the bank has made a loan, there has been default by the borrower, and the bank has exercised all its legal rights for the collection of the loan, and after exercising all its rights of recovery it has been ascertained that there is a definite specific loss.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is not the hon. member ignoring the provisions of section 8 (b), which states that the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations governing the method of determining the amount of loss? The hon. gentleman assumes that there is to be an action and judgment, that the loss has to be determined in a certain way. But I should think from the wording of this provision that the minister with the approval of the governor in council may provide that a loss may be determined by a method shorter than or different from that outlined by the hon. member.

Mr. THOMPSON: Suppose a borrower goes to a lending institution, and his proposal to borrow a sum of money is accepted, will he get the money and be able to take it away with him, or will the money be paid by the institution only when he produces receipts showing it was expended as it was supposed to be? Suppose the property is an apartment house containing twenty apartments. If the owner could borrow $1,000 on each and go out with the money in his hand, what guarantee has the lending institution that the money will be spent as it was the intention it should be?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the business of the lending institution in determining the credit-worthiness of the person who borrows the money. I cannot say anything other than that.

Mr. HOWDEN: But the government undertakes to make good some of that money. That point has been worrying me. I assume the lending institution would protect itself, but at the same time in case of loss the government would be out a certain amount of money. It seems to me the government should have some way of knowing that the money actually goes into the enterprise.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is that the lending institution has an eighty-five per cent interest as against a possible fifteen per cent on the part of the government.

Mr. DUNNING: We have penalties, but that may not be considered much protection. The chief protection, after all, is the fact mentioned by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), that the lending institution, assuming there is a one hundred per cent loss, will lose eighty-five per cent. And in the event of any crookedness, you could not assume that after something improper had been done the man who did it would repay eighty-five per cent. Any policing in the manner suggested by the hon. member for St.

Boniface (Mr. Howden) would, I am sure, cost more than would be practicable. This scheme involves hundreds of thousands of small loans. As I said the other day, the average loan so far is $380. To contemplate the setting up of inspection machinery to ensure that an average loan of $380 is spent precisely for the objects for which it was granted—it is unthinkable.

Mr. BENNETT: They might have to appoint inspectors under the civil service commission.

Mr. HOWDEN: That is not the whole point. There is still the question not only of the money not being repaid but of its not going into the enterprise for which it was borrowed.

Mr. BENNETT: There is that possibility.

Mr. BROOKS: It occurs to me that since the bank is guaranteed up to fifteen per cent it will make every effort to collect the eighty-five per cent. But has the government any guarantee that it will make the same effort to collect the remaining fifteen per cent? I ask that in view of the reputation which has been given to the banks in this house in the last three or four weeks; it causes me to doubt whether they would exercise the same care in collecting money for the government as they would for themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me the first question to decide is whether or not the power to prepare regulations is extensive enough to enable the regulations to be prepared, and, second, what kind of regulations shall be prepared.

Mr. CAHAN: And what is their effect. They have no legal effect under this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: If the first point is dealt with adequately, the second also will be dealt with adequately. The first question that suggests itself to me is: What are the provisions of the agreement between the lending institution and the guarantor, the government, as to what is to be the result of default; (a) as to granting further time—that has been covered by what has been done here to-day; (b) as to the effect of default in payment of one instalment upon others. Shall the others come due, for instance? And it seems to me the third question to be decided, after you have settled those, is, shall the position of the guarantor, the government, be that of the bank as soon as default has been made, and payment of eighty-five per cent of the aggregate loan provided; shall the bank make an assignment to the government of its position—that is, shall there be subrogation, and is there any provision for it? I cannot conceive of anything worse than that the government should be mixed up in any sense in the matter of endeavouring to collect fifteen per cent of $380 in various parts of this country. I say that very frankly; I think it would be an absurd position. Then that question of the agreement between the bank and the guarantor is the all-important question on that side of it.

Mr. DUNNING: Agreed.

Mr. BENNETT: I say this with deference, but I think the Department of Justice can take section 8 and make it clearer than it is now. The point made by the hon. member for Rosthern, it seems to me, should be dealt with clearly by making it apparent in the statute itself that while the loan is not in default no charge is to be made for anything except such charges as are provided by that statute.

On the second point, in view of the recent decisions of the privy council I do not see how we can possibly go so far as to say that the bank, in its relations with its debtors, cannot do as it pleases when they are in default. Mark you, we do not make the loan; the bank makes the loan, and the rights as between the bank and the man who borrows from the bank have not been changed by anything we are doing. All we do is to say that when there is a loss of fifteen per cent in the aggregate of the loans thus made, we will pay fifteen per cent. That is the whole story. We have not substituted our discretion for that of the bank manager. He still has to be accountable to his head office for his discretion, as he always has been. He still has to determine whether or not it is a good risk to take, morally, and whether the character behind it is worth while. The only thing he does not do is to require security. It may be that the property is mortgaged; in many cases that will be so. The very reason this measure is being brought in is to enable some of those cases to be dealt with.

We must bear in mind, I say to the hon. member for St. Boniface, that the government cannot possibly police these loans. It would be idle to expect the government to have some one running around to see that fifteen per cent of a loan of $300, which amounts to $45, is being properly spent; for our responsibility in connection with that fifteen per cent would involve the spending of more than that amount in connection with inspection. If we did it on the basis of patronage I imagine it would be very desirable in some ways. I see my hon. friend from York North smiling. He lives near a large urban riding, and he would have a great many inspectors to appoint, but the civil service commission will look after that.

Leaving that aside for the moment, however, I think we should look upon this as a remedial measure which must be construed in the widest possible way. All that happens is that somebody goes into a bank and applies for a loan to be paid back within a specified time in monthly instalments. The bank has to do what all banks have done heretofore; it has to determine whether or not it will take the risk, and the only thing that makes this transaction at all out of the ordinary is that we say that if the banker makes a bad guess, and has not taken security—or as we say he shall not—at some time we are going to pay fifteen per cent. I think there should be a cut-off date specified, as was suggested by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), but in any case we say that we will pay fifteen per cent.

Mr. KINLEY: Of the aggregate.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course. That is the story.

Mr. KINLEY: That is much different.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, because there might be a one hundred per cent loss in one place which would be made up by a one hundred per cent recovery in another place. That, I take it, is why the minister has made it the aggregate.

Mr. DUNNING: The administrative cost of the other method would put it completely out of court.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. That is the position, and I think section 8 can be improved to the extent of making it clearer than it now is that the granting of power to the government to enact legislation by order in council is sufficiently ample to satisfy every reasonable requirement in an agreement between the lending institutions and the government.

While I am on my feet I direct attention to the fact that the government have seen fit to depart from that great principle upon which the whole foundation of responsible government is built, by making provision for taking money out of the consolidated revenue without any appropriation. That is a catastrophe. If you have any doubt on that subject, Mr. Chairman, I recommend that you read the speeches of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie) King) at any time during the period from 1930 to 1935, together with a few caustic comments by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. COLDWELL: There is one question I should like to ask the minister in regard to these guarantees. Let us suppose that a man repays fifty per cent of the loan and then defaults and pays nothing further. This loss is included in the amount which the government ultimately guarantees and pays. Does that mean that the original owner of the property who has made the improvements and who owns them pays nothing further for them, or does the lending institution step in and obtain possession of the property while the government still has to make up the loss? That is rather a tangled sort of question; it is over-simplification on my part, but cases of that kind will arise, and I should like to know what will be the position.

Mr. DUNNING: Let me see if I can follow my hon. friend's supposition. A borrower repays fifty per cent, and he does not pay anything more. Then the question is to determine whether or not that is an ultimate loss. The regulations must provide that the bank shall take all reasonable measures of collection having regard to the amount to be collected. The bank would not be allowed to engage the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, for instance, to prosecute in the case of a $50 debt, or my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue, or any other lawyer whose employment would involve expense greater than would be reasonable in connection with the collection of such a small amount.

Mr. BENNETT: Why deprive them of good lawyers?

Mr. DUNNING: I am advised that one of the first things good lawyers learn is how to charge.

Mr. HEAPS: Are high charges made only by good lawyers?

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a question to address to me, and I prefer to be excused from answering it. But if I can make it clear to my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this is the whole point: Is the remaining $50 lost?

Mr. COLDWELL: Fifty per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; that is $50 on a loan of $100. The regulations must provide a manner of determining definitely that it is lost. The government does not propose to pay its guarantee without being sure that every reasonable method has been adopted to avoid loss and to collect everything that can be collected. But on the other hand that does not mean that we would encourage the expenditure of a greater amount than the sum to be collected in an attempt to recover that sum.

Mr. BENNETT: The member for the constituency will look after that.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope the member for the constituency will keep his hands out of it completely.

Mr. BENNETT: But your literature says he will be the first man in it.

Mr. CAHAN: There is nothing in this measure that provides for any expenditure on or any charge by the lawyer. That evidently did not enter into the contemplation of those who drew up this bill. Where the loss arises is in respect of a loan, and a proportion of the loan being lost. At the moment I wish to state simply that I cannot accept the construction placed upon section 8(b) by the Minister of National Revenue. I think when these sections are reconsidered by the Department of Justice the point I made should be taken into consideration, because loss is not necessarily incurred upon default. As the minister now admits, the loss is the net loss after reasonable remedies have been taken to recover the loan in whole or in part. Paragraph (b) does not clearly refer to the measures to be taken and the procedure to be followed. These are not apt words, I suggest, to determine what remedies are to be taken. I think the word "procedure" is not sufficient to govern, and, second, regulations made by order in council have no more force in law than regulations made by the minister or by any individual. No provision is made which gives these regulations the force of law, and that omission should certainly be considered.

I disagree with my right hon. leader in this respect, that I consider the making of these regulations is not legislation by the government, because in this measure the government have not taken any authority to give force of law to the regulations they make. Such regulations, if made under this section, would, I suggest, be so much waste paper.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 6 as amended carry?

Mr. McGREGOR: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was to stand.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be well to let sections 6 and 8 stand. Section 6 is amended to this point. We shall permit sections 6 and 8 to stand, in order that I may again take up the suggestions with the Department of Justice. In deference to the officers of the department may I say to the committee that in drafting the bill they have had the advantage of watching the actual problems arise after two months' administration of the plan, and have had the further advantage of seeing the experience in the United States in the administration of a similar program. Of course, as always, I am in the hands of my official legal advisers with respect to the ultimate drafting of the measure. I thought it well to invite the committee, and particularly the legal members of it, to make suggestions, and such suggestions I shall be glad to refer to the proper department. The measure will be returned at a later date with such further amendments or reasons for not amending it as may commend themselves to the law officers.

If that arrangement is satisfactory, and if hon. members are content with the discussion thus far on section 6, we shall allow it to stand, with the amendments made. When we reach section 8, I shall be pleased to allow it to stand also, in order that the points raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in connection with paragraph (b) may be considered.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the law officers have had nothing to do with the question of default. We are now talking about remedies. They have not yet had anything to do with them, I hope.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a little early for that.

Mr. McNIVEN: Does the minister consider there is any conflict between paragraphs (c) and (d)? In paragraph (c) the expression is "and shall be repayable in convenient periodic instalments," and in paragraph (d) it is "repayable in equal monthly instalments." I raise the point because committees in Saskatchewan have been endeavouring to interest farmers in this important plan, and on every occasion we are met with the statement that farmers are not in receipt of a monthy income, and that their income is periodic. Therefore they would like to have a plan which would permit payment every two, three, four or five months. On reading paragraph (c), it occurred to me that that was the intention, but in paragraph (d) there is a reference to repayment "in equal monthly instalments."

Mr. DUNNING: I think the hon. member has misread the paragraph. Paragraph (d) sets up a maximum charge. In order to set up such maximum charge, the time of repayment must be specified. The hon. member will note the paragraph continues with the words "and proportionate rates for other periods." The three and a quarter per cent discount with respect to a one year loan is the measuring stick by which the discount rate to be charged for all other periods must be measured. That is the reason for paragraph (d) following (c). With regard to loans made under repayment conditions varying from the monthly period, may I tell the hon. member that in rural districts many loans are now being made in which the periods of repayment are being adjusted to the expected incomes of the farmers. But the measuring stick as to the discount rate is paragraph (d), and such discount rate must not exceed a rate of three and a quarter per cent when payments are monthly.

Mr. O'NEILL: Has it been found impossible or impracticable to determine the loss in each individual case or to judge each individual case by itself, in place of judging all cases in the aggregate ?

Mr. DUNNING: Each individual case will be dealt with by itself, but the application of the guarantee will be based upon the total sum lost, spread over all the loans. In one case the loss of the bank may be 100 per cent; in another case it may be only ten per cent, while in another there may be no loss at all. Each case must be proved. But in measuring the extent to which we will repay the lending institution, fifteen per cent of the total they loan is the limit to which the repayment may go.

Mr. O'NEILL: That is clear. The way it appears to me, however, is that by this manner of reckoning the government will have to pay more money than they would if they paid fifteen per cent on the loss which takes place in each case. If a man paid back 100 per cent, this would be all right, but if he paid back only fifty per cent they would be paying only on a fifty per cent loss. If he did not pay anything, the government would pay the fifteen per cent. When we reckon the whole thing in the aggregate, it seems to me that in most cases the government will have to pay. After everything is said and done, they will be paying nearly all the loss. I am not a banker, but that is the way it appears to me.

Mr. DUNNING: In that connection I can only advance the experience of the United States. They have a plan which involves a twenty per cent government guarantee, carrying a five per cent discount rate, or a rate almost double that in Canada, and after three years of operation their aggregate losses are less than two per cent. This is a new venture, so far as we are concerned, but it would appear from the experience in the United States that the hon. member's fears are apparently unfounded.

Mr. BENNETT: But the position there is vastly different.

Section 6 stands.

Section 7 agreed to.

Section 8 stands.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—False statement or improper use of loan.

Mr. DUNNING: There is one amendment to section 10 which will be apparent to all hon. members who look at the bill. The last word in line thirty-four is "and" and it should be "or." The change should be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. TUCKER: This brings up the point I mentioned. Why cannot this bill be made to apply to a man who wants to borrow money with which to build a new home? In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are people who own lots who have said to me that the only interest they have in this bill is the possibility of being able to borrow money to put up a small new home. If the idea is to promote employment, I cannot see why the bill should not be made to apply to the man who wants to borrow to put up a new home.

Mr. DUNNING: It would require a different statute altogether to provide for housing. In my judgment it would be quite impracticable to combine housing with home improvement. The situation in each case is quite different.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the government any intention of amending at this session of parliament the present housing act?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid my hon. friend will have to wait for an answer to that question.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not want to disagree too much with the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is at perfect liberty to do that; that is his privilege.

Mr. TUCKER: The basis of this bill is the personal liability of the individual borrowing the money. If a man is good for $2,000 to improve a house, why should not a man who owns a lot be good for a similar amount to build a new house? I cannot see how this would complicate matters, although I may be overlooking something. The government says to the banks that it will guarantee up to fifteen per cent of the loans made, providing the money is used to improve existing houses. How would it complicate things to say that the government will also guarantee loans made if the money is used to build a new house? What, in essence, is the difference between a man borrowing $2,000 to put up a little house on a lot which he owns, and a man borrowing $2,000 to improve his house? The same employment will be created. A man may have a home worth only $500 and may want to borrow money to improve it to make it worth $2,000. The question of security does not enter into the matter as the loans are to be based entirely upon the personal obligation of the borrower. All that is needed to make this bill apply to loans for new buildings is two small alterations in sections 2 and 10. I do not believe that during the next three years there will be expended under this act anything like the $50,000,000 expected, but if the legislation were made to apply to new buildings I am sure there would be twice as much expended as will be the case under the act as it stands. The idea is to provide employment and I think consideration should be given to this matter. Several people in Rosthern constituency have said to me that if they could borrow $2,000 they would erect new homes on lots which they already own. This bill as it is now will be of no use to them at all. If this bill is worth while, it should be worth while giving consideration to the extension in its scope in the way I have mentioned.

Mr. DUNNING: I can only repeat what I said before, that the principle is an entirely different one. It would involve the consideration of many factors other than those which apply in the case of home improvement. For instance, it would involve the consideration of the term of the loan. The term provided for by this bill is five years, and it is questionable if a man borrowing to erect a new home would be able to repay the loan in five years. May I suggest to my hon. friend, who is a lawyer, that the legal members of this committee would no doubt have numerous points to raise if I attempted to add to this bill provisions with respect to building new homes. Consideration would have to be given to the provincial powers with respect to property and civil rights and all that sort of thing. For instance, this is something that occurs to me as a layman and I put it to my hon. friend who is a lawyer. This bill provides that the man who borrows money shall give no security. What is to prevent such a man from borrowing money with which to build a new home and then after the home is completed, putting a mortgage on it? I know my hon. friend will say that we could legislate against that, but I mention that as one of the considerations which would enter into a change in the principle of this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Or he might sell it.

Mr. DUNNING: He might even sell the home. I submit that to ask for a complete change in the principle of this bill when it is in committee is something which should not be entertained. I respectfully submit to my hon. friend that he is out of order. If he had wanted to include a housing scheme in this home improvement legislation, the proper time to have done so was on the second reading or, better still, when the house was considering the financial resolution preceding the bill.

Mr. TUCKER: The limit of a loan under this bill is $2,000. I suggest that a man can repay $2,000 borrowed to erect a new home just as well as he could repay $2,000 to improve an old home. There would be no difference in his ability to repay.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is speaking of different men. The man who could borrow $2,000 under this bill would be a man who, in the judgment of the bank, was able to repay that amount within the time limit. Remember he has a home and is borrowing $2,000 to improve it. The other man would be presumably starting from nothing.

Mr. TUCKER: But the man who borrows under this bill may have his home mortgaged up to the hilt. What is the difference between a man who has his home mortgaged up to the hilt and a man who owns a lot outright and wants to erect a new home? Suppose a man has a shack worth only $200. He can borrow $2,000 to improve that shack. There is nothing in the world to prevent him from then turning around and doing what the minister has suggested might be done, mortgaging the improved shack or selling it. There is no difference in principle between the man who has a small shack and wants to improve it to the extent of $2,000 and the man who has a vacant lot and wants to put up a new house on it. I know of no difficulty in the law of the provinces standing in the way, although I may be wrong. If a difficulty can be pointed out, I am ready to defer to it.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment to section 10 has been moved by Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver), as follows:

That section 10 of the bill be amended by replacing the word "and" with the word "or" in line 34.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Does not the minister think the minimum penalty of $100 is rather steep? There is a possibility that a magistrate will hesitate to impose such a penalty. The case may be a borderline one based upon a technicality. I admit that a man who makes a deliberately false statement on an application which amounts practically to an affidavit should be penalized, but there is power to punish such a man under the maximum penalty. I have been a magistrate myself and I know that when the minimum fine is too high it is hard to get a conviction.

Mr. DUNNING: I am in the judgment of the committee on that point. I think there is some force to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said.

Mr. NEILL: There may be a mere technical evasion or violation of the act. The local bank manager may have made an error and been blamed by his higher authorities; he looks over the application, which he probably wrote himself and an uneducated applicant signed, and he sees that some statement which is made therein is not actually or entirely true, or that the man deviated from the requirements in some trivial condition such as, instead of having used the money entirely for repairs and alterations to his home, he did something which is technically a little outside, such as putting up a rabbit-hutch or a chicken-pen. So the manager gets back at this man and threatens that "if you don't do this or that I will lay an information against you, and remember, you will be liable for not less than a hundred dollars." That is the position as I see it. As the minister said he would be kind enough to take the opinion of the committee in this case, I would move a reduction of the penalty to a minimum of twenty-five dollars, with the maximum not more than five hundred dollars.

Mr. DUNNING: Leave the maximum as it is and reduce the minimum?

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would be desirable to abolish the minimum penalty. "Not less than. . . . . " has always been found not to work very well; I shall put it as mildly as that. If the clause read, "liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars," you would get the discretion of the magistrate, and that is the way most of the criminal code sections read. In addition, there is no doubt that, even without this provision, under one of the sections of the criminal code an offender under the section would be liable for having obtained money by misrepresentation. My personal view is that it would be better to say "a penalty not to exceed five hundred dollars."

Mr. DUNNING: I am willing to accept an amendment as suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. NEILL moved:

That in section 10, line 38, the words "one hundred" be struck out and "twenty-five" substituted therefor.

CANADIAN RED CROSS SOCIETY

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 14, to amend the Canadian Red Cross Society Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1,—Central Council.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not the word "given," in subsection 4, a poor word to use in connection with the conferring of powers? The subsection reads:

The executive committee shall have and exercise all the powers given by this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The act was drafted by the legal officers of the society and was then referred to the law officers of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: I know. But one never says that powers are "given."

Mr. DUNNING: "Conferred."

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REVISION OF ACCOUNTING SET-UP

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to provide for revision of the accounting set-up of the Canadian National railway system.

He said: A complete explanation of the purpose of the bill was given, I think, in committee on the resolution. At that time I stated that one purpose was to consolidate the component parts of the Canadian National system into one balance sheet. I think the importance of that action cannot be discounted. At the time of the Duff report the component parts of the system included some 130 separate corporations. Since then the number has been reduced to about 100 separate corporations, and the work of further reducing these numbers will be made considerably easier if all parts can be consolidated in one corporation. This the bill will effect.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely that is not what this bill is. The minister is not serious in saying that this bill consolidates the constituents in one corporation.

Mr. HOWE: We shall say that it brings them into one holding company with one balance sheet.

Mr. BENNETT: But the balance sheet issued by the Canadian National Railways is a single balance sheet.

Mr. HOWE: It is; nevertheless there are at the present time three separate corporations. As I explained, the Canadian National Railways as a corporate structure includes the old Grand Trunk railway and some sixty of its subsidiary companies, and quite a separate corporation is the Canadian Northern Railway Company with some forty subsidiaries. It is a separate corporation in every way, the stock of which is owned by the Minister of Finance, just as the stock of the Canadian National Railways is owned by the Minister of Finance. There is no connection between the two corporations except that they have a common board of directors. As I pointed out before, owing to the fact that the government does its financing, and its refunding as well, for both corporations, through the Canadian National Railways, the debt of the Canadian Northern is being gradually transferred to the Canadian National Railway Company, an entirely distinct and separate corporation. As I say, this bill will bring these roads under one control and the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways will be ipso facto the board of directors of what is now the Canadian Northern railway. The Canadian Northern Railway Company will disappear as a separate entity.

With respect to the writing down of the accounts of the railway, I may say that the bill, which has been distributed, is susceptible of analysis as to just what is contemplated in that regard. As to the discussion of the details of the bill, I believe the standing committee is the proper forum for the purpose. Expert accountants will be in attendance and it will be possible for the committee to go minutely into the various items that are set out. I took little exception to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when the resolution was being considered in committee. He then pointed out that a record should be kept of the sums invested by the dominion in its railways. In my opinion the method of doing this is one which must engage the attention of the committee. It is perfectly clear that, once we set up a balance sheet which cannot be questioned as to what is intended, this balance sheet should not be beclouded by reference to items which are now a part of the national debt and which will be so treated. I believe a schedule can be set up that will preserve the historical record, and this schedule can be made part of the annual report of the Canadian National Railways. That perhaps will satisfy the purpose as to a record.

I do not believe anyone will question the fact that the duplication as between the railway accounts and the public accounts should be eliminated. There may be those who take a different view as to the manner in which this duplication should be eliminated, but in my opinion there are only two ways in which this can be done; one is to take the duplicated items out of the railway account and the other is to take them out of the consolidated debt of Canada account. By taking a billion and a half out of the consolidated debt we could render the task of the Minister of Finance very much easier for this particular year.

Mr. BENNETT: The interest has to be paid just the same.

Mr. HOWE: It would give him a substantial credit in his next annual budget. I believe that a great deal of misunderstanding arises through duplication. The intelligent taxpayer of Canada is naturally concerned as to what his taxes are used for.

He is told that a certain proportion of the taxes goes to the servicing of the national debt. He is then informed that the losses of the Canadian National Railways in cash are so much; that is, that the taxes of the current year are charged a certain amount to make up the sum which must be turned over to the Canadian National Railways to keep it going. In addition to that, he learns that a mysterious sum shown in the statement of the railways is also a liability, and I believe most of the confusion with respect to the true position arises in connection with this additional sum shown as a loss which the railway does not pay. When the annual statement is brought down, there are newspapers that carry an alarming story about the situation disclosed by the account of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 charged up to the system, and most people have the idea that there is some intermediate amount somewhere between the amount they are taxed to service the national debt and the amount they are taxed to hand over to the railway for its losses. If this bill passes as drawn there will be no longer a question about that intermediate amount; the taxpayer will know that when he services the national debt and provides funds to be turned over to the railway for the indebtedness which must be paid by them, the whole story has been told as far as the position of the dominion and its taxpayers is concerned.

Some extraordinary charges are made with regard to this situation. A few weeks ago there appeared in Ottawa a man, a student of railway affairs, who used some extraordinary language about this proposed adjustment of the balance sheet. He spoke of "perfidy, to the public welfare," of "votes of the unthinking masses," of "pure deception," a "dissembling of the real facts," and "political debauchery run riot." I cannot think that there is anything in what we are doing to warrant any of these charges. The operation is a perfectly simple one. We are removing this duplication between the public accounts and the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, the latter being the property of the taxpayers of Canada. I do not think I need dwell on this any longer.

As I have said, the exact method of carrying out the intention of the bill will come under the complete review of the committee, who will report back to the house. The record of exactly what has been spent by the public in connection with the railways may tell a story, but it is by no means a complete story of what the public has spent on transportation. I have had a review made of the public accounts showing appropriations for transportation, and in this connection I wish to make this statement. In the situation of transportation to-day it is hardly fair to single out the railways for treatment different from that given any other form of transportation. Whereas twenty years ago the railways were the dominant factor in transportation—they then carried so large a percentage of the whole that the amount transported by other means was not very important—to-day the railways are only one factor in transportation and no longer the dominant factor.

In looking over the public accounts I find that from time to time sums up to $1,506,000,000 have been advanced to the component parts of the Canadian National railways and to that railway itself. That sum is without interest; the interest, I suppose, would amount to about another $600,000,000. I also find that the sum of $104,000,000 has been paid in cash to the Canadian Pacific railway and written off. The interest on that, as it goes back a great many years, would have been perhaps another $300,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not correct to say it was written off. Part of it was subsidy.

Mr. HOWE: Well, it was cash paid to the Canadian Pacific railway.

Mr. BENNETT: That is better. It was not a loan.

Mr. HOWE: I accept the correction. We also find from the public accounts that the sum of $1,257,000,000 has been paid for waterways and shipping. Let us not worry too much about a write-off on the railways when we have already forgotten—or at any rate we say very little about it—that vast sum which has been written off for waterways and shipping.

Mr. DUNNING: Not written off.

Mr. HOWE: Well, charged to the consolidated debt, where it does not appear each year to worry us about the expense of our shipping.

Mr. BENNETT: It does appear in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. HOWE: Well, I think that has a very small and select circulation. Then I find that we have paid directly for the construction of highways the sum of $64,000,000, and that in the short time we have been concerned about aviation and aids thereto in the way of radio services and so on we have spent another $15,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include the radio stations for navigation?

Mr. HOWE: No; they are in shipping. So as far as the record of the sums invested in the Canadian National Railways is concerned, I do not believe that is so important in the general scheme of things except for one reason, namely that this railway is competing with a privately owned railway which stands on its own feet. We must not forget that prior to the war we had three privately owned railways in Canada; to-day we have only one. The reason we have a problem with our own railway is largely that the other two privately owned railways were not able to meet the situation brought on by the war. I think in fairness to its private competitor that record should be kept, and I believe a way will be found by the committee to set up a record in a manner that will meet the suggestions which have been made along that line.

Something was said about the position of the South African railways. Their position is extraordinarily favourable for a government owned utility. But I wonder whether the people of Canada would be satisfied to have our railway operated along similar lines. First, we must remember that the South African railway has a complete monopoly, while our railway operation is highly competitive. In 1935 the South African railway was able to obtain a surplus of $27,000,000 after interest charges were paid and a charge of $10,000,000 made for depreciation, while in the same year the Canadian National Railways had a cash deficit of $47,000,000 after payment of interest due to the public but not to the government. We find also that the revenue per mile of the South African railway was $11,061, whereas the revenue per mile of the Canadian National is only $7,322; in other words the revenue per mile of the South African railway is 50 per cent greater than on the Canadian National Railways. If we could somehow obtain a 50 per cent increase in revenue per mile we could not only meet our debt to the public but have a small surplus in addition. Expressing it in another way, we contribute the amount to the public in the way of low freight rates, the lowest in the world, rather than have the surplus which the South African railway enjoys. I might also mention that the employees of the South African railways are about 30 per cent native, or non-European.

Mr. BENNETT: More than that.

Mr. HOWE: But to me this is the interesting thing about South Africa: I wish it were something that the public would take note of seriously. One provision of their railway act is that the mileage of 11,292 miles operated by the government is protected against wasteful and uneconomic competition in areas adequately served by the railway. Such areas are defined by proclamation under their Motor Carrier Transportation Act. Even taxis cannot operate a regular service between particular places without permission. I wonder whether our people would be satisfied with that. To-day Canadians have the option of travel by rail or motor. If the house thinks they do not appreciate both, hon. members might examine some of the cases heard before the railway board where the railways wished to abandon a branch line, where all the traffic was going to the trucks. In South Africa, if a community has a railway, or if a railway serves any section, service by any other means is absolutely prohibited.

Yet it is interesting to note that the writing off of capital is a live subject there, as it is here. In the report of 1935 it is stated that:

> The board of management have asked the government to reduce the capitalization by some $110,000,000 covering costs prior to union.

We come to the Australian railways, and find there a much more serious situation than in South Africa, quite as serious, I think, as we have in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Except that they are state systems, not one system.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; they are state systems, and highly competitive. We have the South Australian railways operating with a deficit, for 1935, of $3,866,343; the West Australian railways, with a deficit of $484,100; the Queensland railways, with a deficit of $573,000, the New South Wales railways, with a deficit of $6,248,700; the Victoria railways, with a deficit of $2,436,375, the New Zealand railways, with a deficit of $6,076,000; the Tasmanian railways, with a deficit of $1,554,700.

Yet the earnings per ton mile for the Australian railways average about four dollars, whereas the figure for Canada is 99 cents. In other words, our freight charges are about one-quarter of the freight charges of Australia.

The Victoria government has decided to reduce its railway capitalization by £30,000,000, or $146,000,000. The report of the Victoria railway commissioners for the year ended June 30, 1936, reads in part as follows:

> We are gratified to know that the government has decided to introduce legislation for the purpose of transferring approximately thirty millions of railway loan liability to the state's general account, and that it is proposed to effect the transfer as from July 1 next. This will be an important step in placing the railway finances on a proper footing.

The Queensland railways also reduced their capitalization in 1931 by £28,000,000, or $136,000,000. I mention this just to show that Canada is not alone in finding the operation of railways expensive, and adjustment of its railway balance sheet desirable.

I want to say a word for our railway system, though I do not know whether I need do so. In Canada we have the cheapest freight rates of any country in the world. I do not think that can be disputed. We are giving our citizens every convenience in the way of alternative methods of transportation. I have heard no one dispute the right of any citizen to have the advantage of the latest and most flexible means of transportation. In another chamber a bill is being introduced providing for the regulation of all forms of transportation, but it is not the purpose of that bill in any way to regulate one form of transportation for the benefit of another form. We take the view, and I think rightly, that a method of transportation must survive or perish on its own merits. If more efficient ways of rendering service are discovered, our citizens are entitled to the benefit of them.

As far as transportation generally is concerned, we are setting our railways a very difficult task. They are standing up to it wonderfully well; we have two very efficient and well managed systems. I believe we are on the way to better days as far as our railroad situation is concerned. Someone has said that the step we are now taking will not in any way change the actual results attained. That is true in a measure, although I think the clearing up of the duplication in debts will favourably affect both the railway credit and the credit of the dominion government itself. I believe it will also have an important effect in making clear to the public mind just what the railway debt situation is when it is added to the public debt situation, and so possibly help to bring about a higher regard for the railways in the mind of the public.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of what the minister has said as to the intention to leave to the special committee a large measure of discretion in dealing with the legislation, I shall confine myself to dealing with two questions.

The first is the distinct differences between the bill and the address delivered by the minister when he moved the resolution. In my judgment the bill does violence to sound principles of finance, and I cannot think the minister seriously expects the committee to adopt the bill as it stands. I have just sent for the report of the Canadian National Railways for the year ended December 31, 1935. I assume that within a reasonable time we shall receive the report for 1936. There never has been any difficulty in making a consolidated balance sheet. If the minister will be good enough to turn to pages 16 and 17, he will find the consolidated balance sheet as of December 31, 1935, but for the moment I am concerned only with the one item: Liabilities: stocks: capital stocks owned by the dominion government, $265,628,338.70; capital stocks owned by the public, $4,584,225. Obviously we cannot change that second item dealing with stocks held by the public. What we can do, as the minister indicated the other day—and I think it is sound—is to reduce the value of the capital stocks owned by the government to the sums we paid for them. In the case of the Grand Trunk we paid nothing; in the case of the Canadian Northern we paid the equivalent of some $18,000,000. It would not be difficult to deal with that item; that could be accomplished very simply. There it is; we reduce the amount to what these stocks represent in cash outlay.

The next item under liabilities is: Governmental grants: grants in aid of construction: by province of Canada prior to confederation, $15,142,633.33; other, $2,570,904.78, a total of $17,713,538.11. Subject to further investigation at the moment, I cannot think that any good purpose would be served by carrying this amount in the accounts. It represents subventions given by Quebec and Ontario prior to confederation to the old Grand Trunk and to lines acquired by the Grand Trunk.

Mr. HOWE: The sum of $15,000,000 represents those subventions.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: The sum of $2,000,000 is a little different.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes; that is something else altogether. I had occasion to look into that some time ago. It is not necessary to go into that in detail, except to say that one could justify the carrying of the $2,000,000 item but it would be very difficult to justify carrying the $15,000,000 item because it represents old Grand Trunk subventions which are not worth the paper on which they are written. That amount might just as well be eliminated as far as we are concerned. The only reason that has not been done is the reason given by the minister the other day. Then we come to the item: Long term debt: funded debt unmatured, $1,154,779,000.78. I challenge the right of this parliament to change that by a cent.

Mr. HOWE: We are not changing that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say. Therefore this item, namely the long term debt item, stands at $1,154,779,000.78.

The next item in the liability column is: Loans from the Dominion of Canada: temporary loans obtained for redemption of funded debt, pending refunding interest paid, $74,726,975. This is an item which varies from time to time as the government carries on refunding operations for the railway when its obligations mature and a lower rate of interest is obtained, and as far as this item is concerned it cannot be modified or changed. It stands.

The next item is the important one: Other loans from Dominion of Canada, $679,873,935.08. Interest on above accrued but unpaid, $495,030,137.29, or a total of $1,174,904,072.37. I deny the right of this parliament, in honest dealing with the public, to change this amount by a single cent. It represents money paid by the Canadian people into the capital of this enterprise; it represents loans from the Dominion of Canada. The dominion government went into the open market and borrowed money, and then lent it to the Canadian National, that is, the constituent companies which now comprise the Canadian National. The money was not given by way of subsidy. Let us not have any misunderstanding about that. It was not given by way of subsidy or subvention; it was not given by way of special advances for capital stock, as in the case of the old Canadian Northern. It represents loans made to the railways of Canada. My submission is that it stands in a position where it should not be changed even by one cent. Why? Because it represents loans made to the enterprises as going concerns. Just as the minister has said, these roads represent a combination of two privately owned systems and, he might have said, one of the difficulties the people of Canada have in dealing with the railways is that those roads were not constructed by a common proprietor, but were constructed by competing proprietors. Many of them were not built in such a way as to make it possible for them to yield a revenue, when combined with the other competing system. In other words, the Canadian Pacific railway was laid out, according to the plan of its proprietors, where they thought traffic was available. In the case of the other railways, one was a contractors' road, built for subsidies, and the other was built afterwards—and never should have been built—for the purpose of endeavouring to make a connection with the Grand Trunk system, between the east and the west.

These are important points to keep in mind when we are considering our position with respect to our railways. But, to get back to the financial statement: Why should we change a single cent or word of it? This is a certified report, submitted by trustees and certified by auditors. First, "loans from Dominion of Canada"; should that be written off?

Mr. MacLENNAN: Would it make any difference, if it were changed?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it would give a false conception of the position.

Mr. MacLENNAN: Not a materially false conception.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, very material. I suppose a few hundred million dollars is not important?

Mr. MacLENNAN: Oh yes, it is.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Do those loans in any way represent the year-to-year deficits of the railways?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that presently. At the moment I am considering the accounts. These represent moneys the Canadian people borrowed on their credit, and lent to the railways. There is no duplication in that. If I may use the term with respect, I would say that it is absurd to use the word "duplication" in referring to two separate entities which are keeping their separate accounts, the one borowing from the other. The accounts of the Dominion of Canada show what we owe the world. Our accounts show that we owe the world hundreds of millions of dollars. The accounts of the Canadian National Railways show that they owe us hundreds of millions of dollars which they borrowed from us when we, the Canadian people, borrowed money from the world. There is no duplication in that. Every person knows that is the way in which accounts are kept in every enterprise in the world. One enterprise shows where it got the money and, in turn, the other enterprise shows where it got the money. In its public accounts the Dominion of Canada shows that it borrowed money from people throughout the world who lend it. The Canadian National Railways borrowed from us, the people of Canada. That is the story.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: My right hon. friend has had a great deal of experience in corporation matters. Is it considered good bookkeeping to write off an item of the parent company and continue it in the subsidiary?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; it is done time and time again. The Bethlehem Steel enterprise, as I recall, has that form of set-up. In days long since past I have frequently had to do with enterprises in which the parent company lends money to the subsidiary. The subsidiary carries it at the face value at which it is lent. The lender or the home company may write it off, because it may not contemplate getting all that capital back.

But that is a different situation entirely; it is not the question which arises in this instance. I would direct the minister's attention to the consolidated balance sheet I have in my hand, and ask him what the loans of the Dominion of Canada were. Coming to the next item, a rather important one, I find that it deals with the point raised by the hon. member for Swift Current. It is:

Dominion of Canada expenditures for Canadian government railways

Road and equipment included in system investment account	$388,290,294 40
Working capital	16,771,980 54
Total	$405,062,274 94

I tried to explain the other day about the government railways which for all practical purposes we may eliminate from our consideration of this question. They represent the Intercolonial railway with branch lines attached to it, and the National Transcontinental. For our purposes, we know we have this investment of $405,062,274.94 in them. But that is not the matter about which the minister is greatly concerned, as he is dealing with them as part of the national system, because the national system is merely the operator rather than the proprietor of Canadian government roads. The title to them is still in us. They operate them, and we pay the subventions which arise in connection with the Maritime Freight Rates Act. It amounts to about twenty per cent of the freight paid by shippers who use these facilities during the year.

Now we come to current liabilities, totalling $45,330,201,96, and observe how they are made up:

Loans and bills payable	$ 356,408 44
Traffic and car service balances payable	3,473,222 92
Audited accounts and wages payable	6,871,490 57
Miscellaneous accounts payable	3,692,832 23
Interest matured unpaid	8,582,740 04
Funded debt matured unpaid	11,502,745 49
Unmatured interest accrued	9,390,843 18
Unmatured rents accrued	398,481 87
Other current liabilities	1,061,437 22
Total	$45,330,201 96

These are the normal and usual accounts kept by railway companies. In my judgment we cannot eliminate any of them from any balance sheet we may hereafter prepare. The amounts vary, and in the standard system of accounting provided by most nations in the world which have to control and regulate railways there will be found provision for that statement of current liabilities.

The next item is headed "Deferred liabilities." We need not discuss them, because they amount to only a little more than $3,000,000.

Next we find "Unadjusted credits," totalling $32,926,484.95. At this point I shall explain something which probably is within the knowledge of most hon. members, if they would but think about it. In Canada we have not made any provision for depreciation of our railways. In South Africa, as I shall presently indicate, they do, and they have done so in Australia. The law of the United States insists upon provision being made for depreciation. And so we find at page 17 of this report an item headed "Unadjusted credits," under which are the following amounts:

Tax liability	$ 1,351,952 98
C.N.R. insurance reserve	11,609,767 03
Accrued depreciation—road (U.S. lines)	2,491,586 60
Accrued depreciation—equipment (U.S. lines)	13,041,625 77
Accrued depreciation — miscellaneous physical property (U.S. lines)	1,540,010 34
Other unadjusted credits	2,891,542 23
Total	$32,926,484 95

Now we come to another item, and we find this language employed by the railway company: "Corporate surplus or deficit," and under it these items:

Additions to property through income and surplus (U.S. lines)	$ 683,581 03
Funded debt retired through income and surplus (U.S. lines)	587,465 33
Appropriated surplus	1,075,077 15
Profit and loss balance—deficit	$856,274,487 20

I ask, Mr. Speaker, by what process of bookkeeping can that item be honestly changed? That is my first question. How can we, without committing a wrong—to use a mild word—undertake to change that item? These are the railway company's accounts and, as I have pointed out to the house, the liabilities are indicated under the appropriate titles. No one has suggested that a change could properly be made in them except, as I said a minute ago, with respect to the stocks, which should be reduced to the cost they represent upon our books. That is the story, as disclosed by the report of the company. But there is a clearer balance sheet than that. That is the consolidated balance sheet.

When the minister spoke of the amalgamation of corporations, I know he did not mean that. The Canadian Northern railway has a capital stock of $100,000,000. The government of Sir Robert Borden made that provision. The subsequent purchase of stock reduced its value undoubtedly to $18,000,000, but the minister and I know it is not worth anything. So far as the government is concerned, I would not complain if they wrote it off entirely and indicated that we had paid $18,000,000 for it, or that we had made a loan of that amount. There is another phase of the matter to which I shall presently refer, that completely vindicates this position.

The Canadian Northern act passed by the government of Sir Robert Borden provided that the Canadian Northern system should be created out of the subsidiary and constituent companies. The constituent companies were those little enterprises which Mackenzie and Mann had gathered together all over the country. The subsidiary companies were those in which they had a controlling interest, for instance, in certain roads in Canada and one in the United States. The Grand Trunk system was built up in much the same way. The best illustration I can give to the minister is that of the Canada Atlantic railway. The late J. R. Booth built a road through to water and it ran into Ottawa. As a matter of fact, the Grand Trunk paid a certain sum of money for it, but that road did not become merged with the Grand Trunk. It became one of its subsidiaries and it still has a coporate existence because it has outstanding corporate securities.

With respect to many of these companies the difficulty lies in the fact, as is known to the minister, that they have outstanding securities. Some of them are covered by lease agreements under which a company, now part of the Canadian National Railways, would undertake every year to pay a rental equivalent to what its shareholders regarded as a reasonable return upon their money. For instance, take the Ontario and Quebec Railway. I dare say the minister has frequently seen in the newspapers notices of meetings of shareholders of that company. This railroad belongs to the Canadian Pacific railroad; it is part of their system. However, the Canadian Pacific railroad did not establish the road between Toronto and Montreal; that was the Ontario and Quebec railway company, a still existent company. It is one of the subsidiary companies of the Canadian Pacific. We have subsidiary companies in the Canadian Northern and in the Grand Trunk.

As is well known, there was in practically every province a new incorporation by the Canadian National and Grand Trunk Pacific. We had the Grand Trunk Pacific branch lines company operating in some of the western provinces; we had the Canadian Northern in British Columbia, and we had the Canadian Northern Alberta and the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan companies. In Manitoba we had the combination to which I referred the other day. I ask the house if it is sound for us when dealing with this matter to do other than make clear these heads which are subject to revision? Is it sound for the reasons that I have indicated, namely, the decrease in the value of stocks and shares now that the litigation has been settled?

The minister has suggested the setting up of a securities corporation, but this is at variance with all railway practice and all sound finance. We are saying that we are going to wipe out this investment, but it may have some value some time, and therefore we shall put it into the hands of a trust company. The corporate existence of that company is provided by this statute, which indicates also its officers. I think the minister will find that is unsound.

I go a step further. There should be indicated somewhere just how much of the Canadian National debt is represented by moneys lent to the road, not by way of subsidies and subventions but by way of aids since we undertook its operation a little after 1916. Let me put this to the minister: Compare the subsidies granted to the railways with the aid given to the Canadian National system. In the one case it is aid for the building of the roads; in the other it is money advanced to keep them in operation. Subsidies and subventions have been charged to the national debt of the country, for instance in connection with the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company in the province in which I have lived. Then there is the old Long Lake and Saskatchewan road. These roads were given assistance by a grant from the federal treasury.

Then take the Canada Atlantic, built by the late Mr. J. R. Booth. Long after Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power this road received a grant in cash by way of a subsidy or a subvention after it had been constructed. This was done because it was regarded as a pioneering and colonizing road. Such grants represent the will of parliament to assist in the construction of these roads. They gave $25,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific as well as grants of land which they bought back in part. Hon. members will recall the advertisements for the building of the Canadian Pacific issued by the late Alexander Mackenzie. He offered 50,000,000 acres of land as a bonus to those who would tender for this construction. These are subventions or subsidies, but when we undertake the operation of a railway system we must be able to know what it has cost us to nationalize our railways. We want to test the value of nationalization plans as compared with others. We want to be able to know just what it has cost us to operate this system as a publicly owned utility. The only way we can do that is to have the information upon the books. Another reason is that we must be able to ascertain the relation between freight rates and our capital structure. Another reason is the fact that those who toil upon the railways are interested in knowing just what the system has cost the people in connection with wages that are paid.

I hold in my hand the report of the South African railways, one year later than the report from which the minister read. I shall not take the time at the moment to read in detail, but as one of my hon. friends said a moment ago, in perfection of detail it is difficult to contemplate anything so perfect as this report. In it their capital structure account is set out. The minister might be interested in it as it is the same statement, but in a different form from that in the report for 1935. The capital account as of March 31, 1936, shows that they have invested in their railroads, harbours, airways and steamships something like £800,000,000. This is the way in which it is dealt with: Interest bearing capital, public debt, £149,935,817 11s 8d. That is, they got this amount from the union and this amount is now part of the debt of South Africa. Then there is the non-interest bearing capital which amounts to some £55,000,000 and which consists of that part of what is now the capital structure which came from the surpluses of operation during those years. There are other items in connection with the assets of private corporations. There is the capital structure. That is all there is to it, but it shows explicitly what is being done. You have to get your money from the government that advances it, and before I get through I shall show the care with which it has surrounded the granting of money. I am greatly impressed with the safeguards it has set out for the public treasury before it will advance money to the railway. First of all, the railroad lays its plans before the government. That is not sufficient; there has to be an investigation, and finally, under certain safeguards, the money is advanced.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Bennett.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think it would be fair to the dominion to compare the conditions in South Africa with those in Canada. It is unfair to Canada because in South Africa native labour is a very important item in their operations and they are able, therefore, to operate their system at a very much lower cost relatively than we are. In addition to that, they have, as the minister pointed out, a complete monopoly of traffic, whereas under the railway department we have the railways, the airways, the harbours, the highways and certain steamships, all of which constitutes a condition that is not comparable with that which prevails in South Africa. One phase of the operation of the South African railways that does appeal to me, however, is the efficiency of the operation. When I said the other day that out of their gross earnings, that is, before charging depreciation, only 58 per cent, and that after charging depreciation, only a little over 65·42 per cent of their earnings was required to maintain the system, leaving a substantial balance for other purposes, I indicated a condition which I think approximates perfection as nearly as possible in operations in these days. But the real, the essential fact is the difference with respect to labour costs. Of total earnings of the South African railways last year, only 38·13 was spent for labour. And that is the whole story; when you have stated that you have stated practically the whole of it. Comparing that with conditions in Canada, you find on page 4 of the report of last year that the operating ratio for 1935 was 91·77 per cent as compared with 92·14 per cent in 1934. Then follow the particulars of the expenditures that were made. As is known, of course, the labour cost involved was substantially twice what it was in South Africa; the figures are given in the report, but I will not take the time to deal with them.

There is only one other point I should like to bring to the minister's attention, and it is this. He cannot possibly say that the consolidated balance sheet of the railways—and I direct his attention to pages 16 and 17 of the report—is not a fairly complete report of the position of the system. If that is true—and I think it must be taken to be—why should we disallow any of the items contained in that balance sheet other than the ones I have mentioned? It cannot be claimed that there is duplication, because that balance sheet does not in any sense duplicate any report in connection with the national debt.

It cannot be said to be misleading so far as our credit is concerned, for it deals in extreme detail with the whole situation, setting out in succeeding pages the details of every issue that was made by the railway company and also borrowings from the Dominion of Canada. Loans from the Dominion of Canada will be found on page 29 of last year's report. These loans from the dominion make up a total of over $669,000,000 in addition to the sums required for financing last year. Why should we in any sense lessen these amounts in any balance sheet we prepare?

I am perfectly willing to be convinced—I have no feeling about the matter—but I believe that in fairness and in justice to the Canadian people we should make clear to them what the position is. Let me put to the minister one difficulty that has arisen by reason of the very statements made by him and others in this chamber. It has been suggested that the cash deficit last year was $48,000,000. That is not the fact. The Canadian taxpayer had to find $48,000,000 on income deficit, that is, on the income not being able to meet, not the interest on the money which the Canadian people had put into the enterprise but the interest on the securities which the Canadian National had issued, not those that represented money borrowed from the Canadian people on their general credit as part of the national debt. That is made abundantly clear by the report itself. Why, then, should we say that the deficit was $48,000,000? We know it was twice that. Why? Because the taxpayer had to pay the interest on the money which the dominion borrowed and lent to the Canadian Northern, and that is not included in the $48,000,000.

Total debt held by public (including therein $11,792,798.65 par value held in special funds and accounts) as per balance sheet..	$1,154,779,000 78

That is the total debt incurred by the companies which are now under the Canadian National system, all set out in detail. That debt of $1,154,000,000 odd was incurred by the railway companies; the interest on it is payable by the companies, and they had $48,000,000 less than what was required to pay interest on that amount held by the public. But turn to the other side of the question and look at the page to which I directed attention, page 29, showing loans from the Dominion of Canada. The loans from the Dominion of Canada being part of the national debt, the Canadian people are now paying interest on that debt. It has nothing at all to do with the $48,000,000; the amount of interest we paid last year on it came to the enormous sum of $35,949,676.70, as shown on page 29. So that, instead of $48,000,000, it was $48,000,000 plus $35,000,000, or $83,000,000, and that is in the report itself.

Mr. HOWE: Who paid it?

Mr. BENNETT: The $35,000,000?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It was paid by the Canadian people to the people who held bonds of the Dominion of Canada with respect to some of the money lent to the Canadian National Railways. That is the story. Now, should we do anything with that which would make it appear to be other than it is? I say to the minister in all sincerity that he will find in these documents nothing which could give rise to any confusion. The auditors have made it so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, may read. He who runs may read; there it is. I want to go one step further, however. There are certain figures which the minister has used in his bill as indicating his intention, shall I say, to wipe out or write off sums representing the real debt of this system to the people of Canada since we began to operate the system. Why should that balance sheet be changed, then, if that is what these figures are, namely, an indication of the losses sustained by the Canadian people in the operation of their property since they nationalized it? That is my position.

The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) asked a question to which I now direct attention. He wanted to know whether in these figures I have given there was included any portion of the moneys paid by the dominion for deficits. There were included in those figures deficits up to 1932, but neither in this report, which is the report of the railway company, nor in the public accounts, is shown the extent to which the debt of Canada was expanded to provide money to pay deficits since 1932. So that there stand to be added to these figures the deficits that were paid by borrowing money in 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935 and 1936. These are not included and must be shown in any complete system of accounting.

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask another question? Do the items on page 29 of the report indicate the deficits of the Canadian National Railways which were covered by loans from the dominion government?

Mr. BENNETT: I said a moment ago that up to 1932 in part they were paid out of these loans which are shown on page 29. Therefore the taxpayers of this country are paying interest on money borrowed to pay those debts.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I would appreciate hearing what the right hon. gentleman considers is the difference between a deficit in the Post Office Department and the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. They are both public utilities owned by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is so simple that I am surprised at my hon. friend asking the question. One has a corporate set-up; the other has not. The post office is a part of the operations of the government of Canada and any deficits are charged against the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. BOTHWELL: But in principle they are pretty much the same.

Mr. BENNETT: As far as the railway is concerned, a boast of Canadians has been that we set up an independent corporation which was free from political control, which was to be operated as a public utility publicly owned. That was our start. If we are going to treat it in that way we must make apparent in the balance sheet, as the auditors have heretofore done, what sums it has been necessary for us to provide every year from the public treasury to meet the deficits in the operation of our publicly owned utility, and also the extent to which we have pledged the public credit to enable us to maintain this nationally owned enterprise.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then, do I understand that apart from the corporate existence of the Canadian National Railways, in principle the deficits are the same?

Mr. BENNETT: Not at all. All the hon. gentleman would have to do as a lawyer is to read the statute creating the company and then read the Post Office Act.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I appreciate that, but I should like to know what the difference in principle is.

Mr. BENNETT: There cannot be any similarity in principle between the two things. One depends upon licking postage stamps and the other, I am afraid, upon licking the Canadian people.

But let us go a step further with my friend the minister. I pointed out in this house on previous occasions that the trustees of the railway are not unlike receivers. If it were not for the fact that the Dominion of Canada has guaranteed securities to the extent of the various sums which have been advanced for deficits, they would be in the form of advances made against receiver's certificates. Does anyone suggest that receiver's certificates would not be shown in the balance sheet as a liability? No one does. Everyone knows that when a balance sheet is drawn up by a railway company—all one has to do is to take one or two of the companies in the United States now in the hands of receivers and see this—the receiver's certificates are shown as liabilities of the enterprise. The bonded debt is shown; the capital stock is shown. The interest is not being paid on the funded debt because the property is in the hands of a receiver. These advances are of that kind, only as no one would buy receiver's certificates, the nation itself borrowed the money and lent it to the company. Therefore the company should show in the same way that these sums are unpaid.

Mr. HOWE: Does the right hon. gentleman think a company in bankruptcy is a parallel case? It pays no interest.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that were it not for the fact that we have guaranteed these securities, his trustees would be on all fours with receivers. I pointed out in this house five or six years ago that the reason we cannot treat this as a receivership, is that the solvency of the Dominion of Canada is involved, the dominion having guaranteed the securities. That is our whole difficulty. We can no longer talk about receivership for the simple reason that we have guaranteed the securities not only of subsidiaries and constituent lines but of the Canadian National Railways itself.

There is one word more that I wish to say. Is there any desire on the part of anyone to do other than disclose the exact facts in connection with the operation of our railway? If the minister answers that affirmatively, he will have to give some explanation why we desire to deceive someone, and I do not think he wishes to do so. If he answers in the negative, he must continue to show on his balance sheet the figures that the auditors say correctly indicate the position. Before I sum it up I want to put this to him. He cannot be unaware of the fact that substantial portions of the debt of the Canadian National railways, that is of the old Grand Trunk, Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern and other allied and subsidiary lines, have matured, and as they have matured, in some cases the railway company has issued new securities at lower rates of interest guaranteed by Canada, but in other cases we have provided the money at lower rates of interest to enable the railway company to discharge those maturities. Is it not of first importance that we should know from year to year the extent to which the taxpayers of Canada have put themselves directly into the enterprise, in order that we may learn whether our operation of this public utility is efficient or otherwise? Is that unfair? I think not. I am as much concerned about it being operated successfully as is any other man in the country, not only because I have had some responsibility in connection with it but because in my judgment the economic future of this country depends entirely upon some adequate solution of the railway problem. Our credit abroad is bad not because of duplications, but because of the colossal debt, and something else also, namely the fact that year after year that operating ratio is over ninety, meaning that, so long as it continues in that field, there is no possible chance for us to succeed.

I am going to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman on the second reading of this bill that it will go to a committee which, having the fullest opportunity for investigation of all the facts, may be able to make such recommendations as they may think desirable. If I followed the minister aright, the government says, not that we must accept this willy-nilly, but that those who have knowledge will be able to make such explanations as may be required to enable us to arrive at a reasonable conclusion.

This is my submission: (1) that the balance sheets heretofore published by the Canadian National Railways disclosed its liabilities as they appear upon its books; (2) that no balance sheet worthy of being called a balance sheet can be exhibited by that company which does not disclose its liabilities; (3) that its liabilities consist of (a) capital stock, (b) funded debt, (c) loans from the Dominion of Canada; therefore (4) that the balance sheet must as revised take cognizance of the fact that the stocks are carried at too high a figure and there must be a write-off to make the figure accord with the facts, and that the obligations of the company as set out in detail in the annual reports must continue to be exhibited in the balance sheet. The amount due the Dominion of Canada for moneys loaned by the people to the railway must be set out as a liability in order that the balance sheet may be properly constructed. The details of both those are set out in the annual statements of the company from year to year. I further submit that any departure from this principle would involve deception being practised upon the Canadian people. For the reasons which I gave this afternoon and which I need not now repeat, there can be no recovery of the system on the basis of efficient management unless those who are charged with responsibility realize the magnitude of the task they have to undertake and, shall I say, the difficulties in the way of being able to accomplish success.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I say that any effort to make it appear that a loan made to the Canadian National Railway Company by the Dominion of Canada is in any sense a duplication of the debt of this country is entirely misleading, for if they borrowed it from Morgan Grenfell and Company instead of from the dominion government, in their assets Morgan Grenfell and Company would show the bonds of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian National Railways would show money borrowed from Morgan Grenfell and Company. The fact that the lender is the Dominion of Canada does not in any sense change the accounting principle which I submit must be accepted if we are to keep faith with the people of this country who have provided the money with which to make these loans to this enterprise. Further, the continuance of the existing balance sheet in that regard not only being essential but imperative if we are to have frank accounting—and I use the word "frank" lest a harsher word might be misunderstood—it is important that it should be made plain to the Canadian people that the $48,000,000 last year was an income deficit, as it is shown in the balance sheet, and that in addition there was the large sum of $35,000,000 paid by the same people, the Canadian people, as taxes or as an addition to their debt, making a total liability of something over $83,000,000 that was incurred last year by the Canadian taxpayer, regardless of any question of compound interest or accumulations of interest either on dominion debts, on provincial debts or on any other obligations. The obligations to the various provinces which I mentioned the other day are all set out in the balance sheet also.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make it perfectly clear that in agreeing to the second reading of this bill I do so, and we do so, with the confident hope that the committee charged with this great responsibility will not permit themselves to be influenced by considerations of party, of partisanship or of anything other than the setting up of an honest, complete statement of the position of our enterprise—for it is ours— and of the amount which is required from year to year to enable that enterprise to continue to function. Anything less than that would be keeping bad faith with the Canadian people, if it would not be deception. Anything more than that could not be asked for. Less than that I do not think anyone, least of all any public man, should be able to either suggest or think of, for it is imperative that in matters of accounting we should remember that after all, except by repudiation, we cannot change the obligation of Canada to pay the interest on these securities. And in looking to the railway company, to whom we have lent the money, to repay the interest that we are paying, we are but looking as one who lends, that is, a lender, looks to his borrower. The balance sheet of the lender as well as that of the borrower should disclose the situation. On the one hand the loans are shown as assets; it may be that in the opinion of the lender the assets have a lesser value than is shown on their face, but that is no reason why the borrower should not indicate clearly the extent of his liability to the lender.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the house for only a few moments. The object of the government in proposing the legislation which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) now has before us is not, as I think everyone will agree, to deceive the Canadian people or to produce a set of accounts for the Canadian National which will not reflect, as accurately as the complexities of the Canadian National system will permit, the true condition. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just pronounced what I might term a doctrine of accounting perfection. No one can take exception to the broad general principles of accounting which he lays down, but with all respect may I point out that so far as the Canadian National balance sheet is concerned, the principles of accounting perfection were departed from quite a number of years ago, and have been departed from still further in the intervening years. I think it was back in 1920 or thereabouts when the difficulties incident to calculating the interest upon the unpaid interest on the money which had been advanced by the Canadian people to the Canadian National or its various units were a source of concern to the Minister of Finance of that day.

Mr. BENNETT: I eliminated that from my discussion.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend has eliminated that from consideration, but I am pointing out that, if not the first, at any rate that was one departure from the principle of accounting perfection. Quite obviously, if the Canadian people are required to advance money to pay interest upon money which was advanced by them to the railway, then interest on that interest is also payable from time to time by the Canadian people when it is not paid by the railway company. What the accumulation of that amount would be in the intervening years I am not going even to try to guess, but in any case, as far as the railway accounts were concerned, as far back as that the amount of interest due upon interest, which had been unpaid by the railway company to the Canadian people was dropped from consideration in the railway balance sheet. Later, my right hon. friend himself, facing the problem in 1932, I think, adopted the principle that in future the cash deficit should be paid out of the treasury of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That was a recommendation of the commission.

Mr. DUNNING: It was a recommendation of the commission, and as my right hon. friend indicated this evening, since 1932 no accumulation of the amounts paid by the Minister of Finance with respect to the cash deficits of the Canadian National Railways has been added to the balance sheet items from year to year.

The point I am making is simply this, that with respect to an undertaking of such tremendous complexity, with the history which has been so well outlined by the Minister of Transport and the leader of the opposition, at this date it is impossible to lay down the principle of accounting perfection, apply it throughout all the years of the undertaking and expect to reach any intelligible result. The principle upon which the Minister of Transport is working in connection with the bill now before the house is not to attempt to create a condition which will deceive the Canadian people into thinking they have not put into this railway the money which has been put into it, but rather to clarify the present position in that regard and to maintain before the Canadian people the amount which they have put into the roads as representing what it really is, the equity of the Canadian people in the railway after the fixed securities in the hands of the public have been taken care of. True, the value of that equity, as my right hon. friend says, is represented in the public debt of Canada at this moment. True, the Canadian people are paying the interest on that portion of the public debt just as they are paying it on the rest of the public debt, but with this qualification: The portion set up in the balance sheet of the Canadian National Railways to-day, plus the rate of interest calculated upon it, does not represent the cost of that amount of money to-day to the Canadian people. It represents a calculation based upon the rates obtaining when the various loans were made, under the contracts connected with them. As a matter of fact, there is little comfort in looking at our railway balance sheet picture, but there is this much comfort, at any rate, that the amounts set up by way of indebtedness in the present balance sheet do not cost the Canadian people quite as much as the amount set out there, for the reason that as a consequence of lower interest on moneys and refunding operations, the average cost of the public debt has been reduced, while the rates used for computation in the balance sheet remain about the same as those existing when the obligations were undertaken in the first place.

The government appreciates the attitude in which the house has approached the question. The minister has indicated that when the bill is referred to the special committee—and I hope it will be referred to-night—the most searching examination will not only be permitted but invited, to the end that we may, if possible, evolve a set-up which will be realistic in so far as it relates to the property as it now stands, and at the same time will not disguise from the Canadian people the amount of money which all down through the years they have invested in this great railway undertaking.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on national railways and shipping.

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received communications from two members notifying me that the following vacancies have occurred in the representation, to wit:

Of the Hon. Charles Marcil, member for the electoral district of Bonaventure, by decease.

Of Herbert Earl Wilton, member for the electoral district of Hamilton West, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the chief electoral officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Civil Government—

Salaries, including the assistant Deputy Postmaster General and General Superintendent of Postal Service at $7,500 a year from April 1, 1937; amounts required to pay allowances to office appliance operators, grade 2, operating mechanical audit card punching machines in accordance with the terms of order in council P.C. 280/383, dated February 17, 1930; to pay allowances to typists, grade 1, employed cutting stencils in accordance with regulations approved by order in council; and to pay allowances to office appliance operators, grade 2, in the revenue division employed as key punch operators, schedules and rates to be decided upon by the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department and approved by the governor in council, $1,318,488.

Contingencies, $215,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was about to make a statement on the last occasion his estimates were before the committee.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Postmaster General): The statement I had begun relates to item 275. I thought that if the committee were agreeable we should complete discussion on item 16, and then proceed with item 275.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): When the house rose on February 2, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) I was making a statement as to whether or not in the last year the department had made ends meet, and as briefly as possible I was endeavouring to give the committee a statement of receipts and disbursements, according to the method of bookkeeping which has been in vogue since the department was established.

I believe on the last occasion I had given the receipts and expenditures, as they appear at page 507 of Hansard, but for the sake of clarity I shall repeat them to-night. I shall give the figure for 1935-36 first, and then the best estimate we can make—and I think it is reasonably accurate—for 1936-37. Of necessity we can make only an estimate for the last two months of this fiscal year. In the year 1935-36 we received in gross revenue $39,203,499.82. From this sum there has to be deducted $6,210,498.70 paid to commission postmasters, leaving a net revenue of $32,507,-888.52.

For the year which will close on March 31 next the gross revenue—of course estimating the income for the last three months, in accordance with the income for the past nine months—will be $41,178,199.40, from which we must deduct approximately $6,868,164.56 paid to commission postmasters, leaving a net revenue of $34,310,034.84. May I say that in connection with the estimated revenue, in the cities we have been able to obtain figures as to income for the ten month period, but in the figure I have given the estimate is made for the last three months. The figure of $34,-310,034.84 represents an increase of $1,803,146.32 over the preceding year.

Those who are attempting to follow the last report of the Postmaster General, for the last complete year, will find on page 7 the information I am about to give. Perhaps the system adopted there will enable them more readily to follow the figures I am giving. For the year which will close on March 31 next, the outlay, estimating the last three months of the year, will amount to $31,043,227, or an increase of $943,126 over the preceding year. Comparing the estimated net revenue with the estimated expenditure for the year closing on March 31 next, we should have a surplus of $3,266,807.

That is the largest surplus we have had since 1920.

Mr. DUNNING: Can you pay me that tonight?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The banks are closed.

As will be noticed from the reports of the Post Office Department, that is considerably in excess of any recent year. Perhaps this would be the most convenient time for me to deal with the system of bookkeeping. I know this question will come up and I might just as well meet it now as wait for it to meet me.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister promised to do that.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I promised to do it and, like the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence), I like to keep my promises. I am going to give the nearest figures that can be obtained by the use of the system suggested as being the ideal one. I have looked over the discussion on the Post Office estimates for a number of years past, and I think this question has arisen in nearly every year. The department has been asked whether the expenditures as shown in the yearly report include all expenditures which should properly be charged up to the Post Office Department. First, we have an estimate of the rental value of all buildings throughout the dominion used for postal purposes. For the information of the committee I might say that there are 413 government owned buildings, and space for post offices is rented in 112 private buildings. The public buildings are constructed by the Department of Public Works, which department also supplies part of the furnishings. One rather odd feature is that this department supplies certain things like belting in the first instance, but when they are worn out, unfortunately the Post Office Department has to pay for them. I have argued this matter with some of my friends in the department with which I was reasonably familiar formerly. I said that if it were proper for them to provide these things in the first place, they should keep them in repair. The Department of Public Works is most familiar with the needs of these buildings in the way of equipment, char service, cleaning and all that kind of thing.

Mr. ISNOR: What is done in connection with replacements? Are they charged as capital expenditures or as operating expense?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): They are charged as operating expense.

Mr. ISNOR: In the first place they would be charged as a capital expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): They would not be charged against the Post Office Department even in the first place. What I am endeavouring to show is the estimated value. I am doing this in compliance with the many requests made by hon. members when we were last passing our estimates. The details which are very extensive have been furnished to me by my colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). The total value of space occupied in public buildings and services rendered is $2,555,072.58. That is that side of it.

There is a service rendered by the Post Office Department for which no charge is made. I refer to the franking privileges extended to other departments and to the members of this committee. Based upon the revenue which would be obtained from a similar amount of mail, this is valued at $1,101,763.

Mr. BENNETT: I remember asking once before how such an estimate would be arrived at.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I asked exactly the same question myself and the answer I received was that it could be given accurately by basing it upon other material being sent out. In addition, we run a savings bank. When profits are made from this operation they go into consolidated revenue, but every other expense connected with this phase of the department is borne by the department. The estimated cost for last year is $80,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the profit?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No, that is the cost of running the bank. Any profits would go to my friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning).

Mr. DUNNING: Who also bears the losses, if any.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no transfer of profits?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Those two, together with the $3,266,000 of surplus, make a total of $4,348,571. Deducting the $2,560,000 for servicing and rental of buildings leaves a surplus of $1,788,571.

I think I should refer to another matter in connection with which some questions have been asked. We receive certain services from some steamship companies for which a subsidy is paid. A fair estimate of the value of those services would be somewhere in the vicinity of $300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to interrupt the minister, but it must be more than that if the department charges for the services on a cubic foot basis.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. I am told by the departmental officials that that is a fair estimate of the value of these services to the department. I can give my hon. friend only what I have received from those who have figured it out.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if the rest of the work is as good as that, they are doing well.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Well, we hope we are. That is the situation as far as that is concerned. I have made that explanation to see if those figures would satisfy hon. members who were anxious to have some information along these lines.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad that the Postmaster General has brought down something in the way of a departmental report. Last year he promised to do so. After all, this report is only a partial statement of the workings of the post office. I should have liked it to include much more detail than he has been able to give us, but I realize that it has entailed a good deal of work on the part of the officials, and another year, no doubt, it will be rendered in greater detail. It would be a good thing if the post office estimates were dealt with in the same way as those for the railways, referred to a committee of the house to be gone into carefully. Our post office is a utility; it should stand on its own feet and not be a charge upon the public treasury. I understood the Postmaster General to say that there was a surplus of—was it $1,700,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): $1,788,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said $1,800,000 in round figures.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that the net profit or the estimated profit on the operations of the post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): We are estimating the last three months, but the estimates we have made are quite in proportion to the increase for the nine months that have already expired. If it is realized, we shall have a surplus, if we do not take in the $300,000 steamship subsidy of $1,788,571.

Mr. HEAPS: After allowing costs of operating the buildings and the rental of the buildings which come under the jurisdiction of the post office.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes; my hon. friend is quite right. The difference between the revenue and the expenditure on an operating basis is the amount that I have stated.

Mr. BAKER: Is that before the department pays the rent, or afterwards?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Afterwards.

Mr. ISNOR: Will the minister tell us whether the item of rentals has been taken into consideration in previous years, particularly since 1932?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If I understand my hon. friend's question, he asks if it was included in the other years. I have already stated that it has not been included since confederation.

Mr. ISNOR: This year the minister is going to include it?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. I am showing only what the result would be if we were to figure on that basis, and I gave that estimate for the information of those who wanted to know what would be the result if that other system of bookkeeping were adopted.

Mr. ISNOR: In view of the fact that, on the minister's own statement, a great many members are interested in this particular item, is it the intention to include it in future as a regular item of expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): As far as intention is concerned, that is something which will be disclosed after it is decided upon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): May I make myself clear? You cannot give expression of a government's intention in a matter of that kind until a decision has been reached.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps this is a laughing matter; I do not know.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not think it is.

Mr. ISNOR: To me it is a matter of business. Ever since confederation the practice of the department has been to set up in one column its revenue and in the next column its expenditure, and one subtracted from the other gives the net deficit or the surplus as the case may be. This evening the minister comes here and, after having been questioned with regard to the set-up of expenditure, says, in effect, we should or perhaps we shall include an item running into many thousands of dollars. Then, when I ask whether it is the intention of the department in future to include this expenditure, he laughs.

An hon. MEMBER: No, that is not correct. We laughed.

Mr. ISNOR: Then, I say, members of the house are not dealing in a businesslike way with this matter.

An hon. MEMBER: Do not be too serious.

Mr. ISNOR: I am not too serious, but I do not want to be laughed at when I am asking a question that I consider I am entitled to ask.

An hon. MEMBER: We were not laughing at the question; we were laughing at the answer.

Mr. ISNOR: May I point out that in 1935 the report shows a surplus of $2,274,007.94. In view of the statement which has been made by the minister we can take it for granted that that is not correct. The same thing applies to the 1936 report, showing a surplus of $2,407,768 and some odd cents. We can also take that statement as not being correct. This year, we are told, the item of rental is to be included.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ISNOR: That was included in giving the net surplus. I believe that if we are going to have a true picture of the position of the post office along the lines indicated by the minister the other evening, we should have the complete set-up of the revenues, including, perhaps, items that are not mentioned, fees collected by his various officers throughout the country for the sale of radio licences. I do not know whether that is taken into consideration; I do not see any mention of it. All these items should be included as revenue, and all other relevant items on the other side; then we shall have a true picture showing whether the post office department is paying its way. Until we have that, I do not think the minister is in a position to say "Yes, I can state that the department is paying its way."

Mr. DEACHMAN: I should like to support the view expressed by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor). In the administration of any department it is essential that all the facts should be revealed. If there are some items which the Post Office Department is getting from the other departments—as, for instance, the public works department—it should pay for them, and if the post office department is giving service to other departments of the government those departments should pay the post office, in order that when the yearly statement is brought down it will reveal to the public exactly what has happened.

One other item which the minister has mentioned relates to subventions to certain steamship companies. Apparently those companies are receiving subventions and also carrying the mails, and that is not charged against the department. We ought to know how much we are paying for steamship subventions and also how much is being paid for carrying the mails.

In this connection there is another matter I want to point out which I am sure the minister will appreciate. If the Post Office Department is paying rent for buildings, then the minister, as the shrewd manager of a business department, will endeavour to see that the rent is as low as possible. It is more than probable that if we had a separate department constructing these buildings and operating them, the eagle eye of the Postmaster General might not be quite so keen and his Scotch sense of thrift might not exercise itself with the same intensity as if he were footing the bill himself. I suggest, therefore, that in this department as well as in others we should have all the facts so as to know exactly what is being done, and when there is an achievement such as there is this year, a surplus being presented, we shall be able to congratulate the minister more fully than we now do inasmuch as we shall know the statement contains all the facts and is an exact reflex of the operations of the department.

Mr. POOLE: What is the amount which is collected in stamps used on cheques and which should be going into the consolidated revenue fund instead of to the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): We have no means of estimating the value of stamps used on cheques.

Mr. POOLE: Then how does the minister know what should be going into the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. MacNICOL: In arriving at the surplus, does the department take into account the matter alluded to by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman), namely, the mail subsidies to steamships? Is that deducted from the Post Office Department or is it charged to the department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In the estimate I prepared I did not deduct that; I called attention to the amount. It has never been the practice to deduct it and I am not deducting it. I am simply giving the estimate arrived at by the official of the department.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suppose that the subsidies to steamship lines include allowances for both mails and freight. If, in the amounts quoted as steamship subsidies, allowances are made for carrying freight, is the minister able to tell us how much is paid for carrying the mails and how much is allowed for freight?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): The subsidies are made by the Department of Trade and Commerce and I cannot give them accurately. All I am attempting to give is the best estimate we can arrive at of the value which the officials of the Post Office Department believe that these subsidies represent in the way of transportation of mail matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they not charged against the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No; against the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BAKER: Does the minister not agree that the rentals which have not been charged in the past for the buildings used should be credited from his department to the public works department? And should not the revenue from stamps, which belong to the finance department, be credited to that department? Would he not recommend that system in future in connection with these items? No one can tell from the figures which have been given whether the department is making a profit or not.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If my hon. friend had followed me he would see that the department had a surplus whether we counted those or not. There are certain items that enter into transactions which take place among the various departments and they make it difficult to estimate accurately the payments which are made in different ways and which are of value to one department or another. There is an item that might properly be charged on the other account, and that is civil government. The cost of civil government enters into the handling of all the mail that is franked. If my hon. friend went into the matter he would realize the difficulties that stand in the way of an accurate estimate of the amounts which should be charged for these various services. Let me say in reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Deachman), I know something of the workings of the public works department and I believe that one department can put up buildings and rent them much more cheaply than if the work were divided among two or three or half a dozen different departments.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I did not suggest that it should be.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No; but what my hon. friend did suggest was that if the Post Office Department were making these arrangements for rentals they would exercise thrift a little more, having to pay the money themselves. If my hon. friend says I misunderstood him I am glad to hear it, because I happen to know something of the workings of that department and I do not believe there is any other department of the government that scrutinizes more closely the obtaining of buildings at reasonable rentals.

Mr. BENNETT: Times may have changed.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No. I followed this pretty closely during the past six years when other departments were not doing as well as I thought they might have done, and I must say to the credit of the Department of Public Works that in those six years they did a lot better than many other departments.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make a few observations about the operation of the Post Office Department, for it is a department in which I took a great deal of interest before having any responsibility with respect to it, because I thought it might be conducted in a little different way. I suppose there has not been a House of Commons since confederation in which there has not been a debate in connection with the operations of this department. I looked into the matter in New Zealand first and then with some care in Australia. In New Zealand the Post Office Department is conducted as a business, and the head of it, Mr. Macnamara, operates not only the telegraph system but the telephone system as well. He also provides a savings bank in every post office in the dominion. The result is that, as the hon. member for Huron North has said, he is responsible also for buildings. A new building has been put up at Dunedin at a cost of £350,000. It was built out of depreciation allowances on buildings previously built. An analysis of conditions there I think would satisfy the most critical that it is possible to conduct the post office on the lines the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) has himself indicated to-night with respect to charging other departments for services rendered and matters of that kind.

In the Commonwealth of Australia the estimates are submitted to the house much as they are here. I have in my hand the volume of estimates of receipts and expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1937. The post office is treated as a business undertaking, and since the inception of the commonwealth all the money that has been expended in post office undertakings, telephone and telegraph undertakings, has been separately borrowed, and the interest charged against it separately. It is conducted as a business enterprise. Buildings are built, I do not know by whom, but from appropriations and borrowings, and the interest on the investment and likewise the other expenditures are voted by parliament. If we were sitting there to-night, this is what we would be considering: Postmaster General's department: estimated expenditures; special appropriations excluding interest and sinking fund, £363,000; salaries, over £7,000,000; other votes, over £2,700,000; interest costs, over £1,500,000. That is all charged against the revenues of the Post Office Department.

Then, every year they provide a little over a million pounds for sinking fund against loans raised for the undertaking. Exchange cost the enormous sum of £356,000 owing to the fact, as hon. gentlemen know, that £100 sterling is the equivalent of £125 Australian. The total, excluding additions and new works, is over £13,200,000. New buildings and additions cost £1,750,000. Then comes the grand total of £14,980,885.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Are those total expenditures or total revenues?

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the total expenditures.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that nothing more than the post office?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I said it includes telegraphs, telephones, the post office, and the savings banks in a small way. For the expenditures they have the annual votes, and they expect to have a small surplus on the year's operations. It is treated as I say as a separate and distinct business. What made me think of it was the question asked to-night by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) in connection with the Canadian National Railways. One who has listened to what has taken place to-night will at least understand the difference between the operation of a railway and of the post office, whatever else may be said. In Australia they do operate it as a business, separate and distinct. The estimated revenues are stated to be so much from the sale of stamps, so much from the various services—

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a question? Is this run as a political arm of the government or as a business, without political patronage?

Mr. BENNETT: I have never seen anything freer from political patronage than its operation. I am not going to tire the committee by talking at length about what is taking place in some other part of the world, but briefly these are the estimated revenues: from telegraphs, £1,300,000; from telephones, £7,000,000; from postage, £6,250,000, and miscellaneous, £1,136,000; total, £15,700,000; leaving a small surplus, something about £750,000. They show the details of their expenditures, their mail carrying contracts, for instance the Orient Steamship Company, £110,000. When I hear the minister speak of an estimate of $300,000 for carrying mails across the Atlantic, for one year, and carrying mails to Australia and New Zealand for a year, and to the orient, and all along these coasts, I say we must have a different conception; we must be dealing with different things. The space used at ordinary freight rates per cubic foot would come to more than that. Australia provides £110,000 to carry the mails between Australia and Great Britain by the Orient line for a year; that is $440,000. As regards the Christmas mails which come to this country, I have seen 3,000 tons of mail landed in Canada from a ship. So, when the minister speaks of $300,000 as covering the expenditure, I know that his mind is directed to something other than the real fact. Such a sum would be a mere fraction of the cost of carrying mails by water to and from this country. The Cunard White Star Line and the Canadian Pacific carry mails to Canada from Great Britain, besides those which come via New York, and we are told that the cost of carrying mails around the coast of Nova Scotia by water, if the ordinary rates were charged, would be as much as the subsidy we pay to the companies for doing this. Certainly the representation made to this house was that the subsidies which we grant to Atlantic and Pacific steamship lines bear a close relationship to what the cost would be if we paid for the carriage of the mails. Of course it depends how you compute it; if you compute it cheaply enough you could make it $30,000 instead of $300,000. In the United States they do not pay subsidies, as we call them, to the steamship lines; the rate is worked out on the basis of the movement of their mails. It increases with the rate of speed at which the mail is moved on the water. For a twenty knot speed there is one rate, another for twenty-one knots, another for twenty-two knots, until it gets up to a very, very high rate indeed. That is the reason why the subsidies they pay to some of their shipping lines are so much larger than anything we could hope to pay.

I leave out New Zealand for the moment because what they have done is so remarkable that it might be regarded as exceptional, with a population of only 1,500,000 people, as compared with what is done by Canada. But a comparison with Australia would not be unfair. First, they have an exceptionally good man there and they pay him an exceptionally good salary. He gets £4,000 a year for handling the mail service. That is at least $16,000, and he is not regarded as being overpaid. They brought him, I think, from the post office in England. Then every state has a director of the service in that state. Their estimates contain a statement of what that director gets and what every other servant gets and the cost of moving the mails in that state as well as the cost of moving them through the state. The business is conducted by the Postmaster General as an ordinary business, and I am bound to say I do not think they waste much time in discussing whether or not John Smith should be postmaster at such and such a place, because the difficulty would be to get anybody to be postmaster in some of these places, rather than the question of political patronage. I suggest that it might be well for the officers of the Post Office Department to study the question from the standpoint of a set-up as a business undertaking, and treat it as they do in Australia or South Africa.

The federal constitution of Australia dates from the beginning of the century. They started at scratch, with the advantage of seeing the mistakes that other countries had made, and they set this up as a business undertaking. The interest, the sinking fund, all these charges against capital expenditure are shown and are charged against the revenue of the year. Notwithstanding that, they still had a surplus. But they have the telephone service, which of course we have not, and they have the telegraph service, which we have not. It is an excellent service; the rates are very, very reasonable, and the service is widely used. But the question of handling mails from that island to all the rest of the world is exactly the problem we have to face, except that we are part of a continent. I cannot think that the responsible officials understood the problem when they suggested that $300,000 would be a reasonable charge for handling all the Canadian mails during the last year by the steamship companies which come and go to and from the Dominion of Canada. In addition, it must be remembered that we must pay our proportion of the charges for the movement of mails to Canada from New York, San Francisco and other parts of the United States.

I congratulate the minister upon the enthusiastic interest he has taken in his department and his earnest desire to make as good a showing as possible. It used to be an elementary rule that the Post Office Department was not run for profit; that it was a service, in the language of my hon. friends to the left—

An hon. MEMBER: Production for use.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, production for use and service, and not for profit. That has been the general rule which has prevailed in most countries. It has never been regarded as a large profit making organization, but in many parts of the world they have put it on a business basis. So, while congratulating the minister, I think it is not quite fair to conclude that the general exchequer has shown such great improvement, because in the end it will be found, I should think, that with proper charges we have about a balanced condition of affairs. If the department is conducted on a hit-and-miss basis, such as an estimate of $300,000, I should not judge that this was very much to be depended upon. If on the other hand it is carried on in the light of exact receipts and disbursements, as is the case in connection with postage stamps, for instance, we can perhaps better appreciate the situation. The profit on postage stamps, for example, is the difference between the cost of making them and what you get for them, but you cannot work that principle into every question with which you have to deal. It might be well for the minister in the recess to give some little consideration to the question as to whether, even at this late date, it might not be possible to treat the department as on a purely business basis, as what one might call one of the departments of business of government. I have long had that hazy idea in the back of my head. Like many other ideas I have, it may be in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, not very valuable, but I was desirous of seeing the extent to which that situation existed in other places. I had heard much of it, and I am bound to say that my investigation made me believe that not only is it practical but that it has worked with very great success in other parts of the king's dominions.

Mr. DEACHMAN: There is just one question I should like to ask the minister. Freight and express rates in Canada have declined sharply, I think, since about 1918. I should like to know if there has been a corresponding decrease in the cost of moving the mails. What was that cost in 1918, say, as compared with last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I shall be very glad to obtain that information for my hon. friend. I do not have it before me and my assistants tell me it is not in the data they have. There has been no substantial change for a number of years.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Since 1918?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): No, but for a number of years past.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I am going back to a time when express and freight rates were high in order to see if our friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) is getting away with too much.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Midfdlesex): I quite agree, and I shall be glad of the assistance of everyone to see if we can get a little more out of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. RYAN: I should like to ask if there was not a substantial cut in the subsidy paid the Canadian Pacific on the Atlantic service.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, I am advised that is correct. Offhand I cannot give the amount, since that comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I should like to say just a word to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, for whose opinions I have a great deal of regard, particularly with respect to financial matters. For the transatlantic service payment is made on the basis of space, as he has said; for the transpacific service payment is made on the weight basis. I am told positively that the estimate of $300,000 is a fair one, but I shall be very glad to have it reviewed.

Mr. BOTHWELL: On page 38 of the estimates we have an item of $2,087,470 for mail subsidies and steamship subventions. Surely it should be possible to analyse item 135 and show just what portion applies to mail subsidies and what portion to steamship subventions.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Swift Current undoubtedly remembers some of the representations which were made in communications directed to members of the house in times past with regard to the cost of the movement of mails in relation to subsidies. I quite agree that we should be able to break down that item. I was going to ask the minister, if I might, in view of the position which he discloses, if he thinks the revenues will bear a reduction of postage to the two cent rate again.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am not going to express any opinion on that. All I can say to my right hon. friend is that apparently the opinion of this committee is that we are undercharging ourselves in connection with certain items that should be charged against the Post Office Department. I suppose a great deal will depend upon just how the finances work out. While the situation is encouraging from the old standard of bookkeeping, it is not very encouraging from the standard which has been adopted by various other governments, including the government that was in power before us.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister think it too much if I asked him to give an indication of how that item is made up? I should like to have on the record how the revenue is made up; it will be helpful for the future.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I shall be glad to give that information, and I want the committee to understand that as far as I am concerned I consider all these questions helpful. I must confess that frequently I find myself in doubt in regard to many matters. Even after having been in the department for a year, I do not know it nearly as well as I should think would be possible for a person who had been there longer.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand there is one gentleman in the department who hardly knows the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Certainly he is missing a great deal.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that it is involuntary on his part.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It must be.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the break-down?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Middlesex): Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: To-night we have listened to a profitable discussion. The contribution made by the leader of the opposition in bringing to our attention the manner in which post offices are run in New Zealand and Australia should prompt the committee to inquire into ways and means of operating this great public utility on a more businesslike basis. I have not been a member of the house for very long, but during my short stay I have had all kinds of persons speak to me regarding the manner in which rural mail contracts and post office appointments are undertaken and made. As I am a non-government member, of course that does not mean that one has been approached for such appointments, but it does mean that in Canada, to a great extent apparently, the post office is looked upon as an arm for political patronage.

It seems to me that in all probability many of our troubles in the Post Office Department proceed from that particular cause. Where you have that kind of appointment and that kind of operation I believe you have inefficiency. As one who a few years ago had to make some investigation of the civil services of both New Zealand and Australia, I know that the efficiency of their services is due largely to the fact that they have been removed from political patronage. The sooner hon. members face the matter squarely and realize that we shall never have our post office or any other institution efficient until we remove political patronage from the service, the sooner shall we have the service for the benefit and use of the people of Canada.

Mr. MacLENNAN: Is it not efficient now?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is not. The fact that we had the statement brought down in the way in which it has been brought down in the last two years proves that we know nothing about the service in detail. The discussion we have had to-night regarding subsidies and payments for the carrying of mail shows that so far as we are concerned we have no conception of the business basis of the Post Office Department. When an organization such as that department cannot produce before the House of Commons a statement giving us a more approximate idea of the relative costs of the various services, and the relative receipts, such department is not efficient.

Mr. MacLENNAN: The hon. member attributes it to politics?

Mr. COLDWELL: To a very large degree I attribute it to political patronage within the service.

Mr. ISNOR: Included in the item is the salary of the superintendent of air mail service. I do not know whether I am entitled to discuss that phase of the matter at this time, but—

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That amount was passed under the civil government vote; however, so far as I am concerned I have no objection. The only point I make is that I should not like the doors to be opened wide, and to go back to discuss all persons who come under the civil government vote.

Mr. ISNOR: I purpose discussing it, not in a personal way, but rather from the standpoint of the service. Before doing so I should like to express my pleasure at seeing the increased revenue derived by this department in the past year. I know that in the east we had an exceptionally busy Christmas season. The Nova Scotia newspapers gave glowing accounts of the efficient service rendered by the post office employees, and I wish to take exception to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ISNOR: —when he speaks of the inefficiency of employees of the department. I come in close touch with the Post Office Department in Halifax, the centre for Nova Scotia, and I want to say that we have an exceptionally efficient and loyal staff. I believe the same condition applies equally throughout the whole province.

May I point out that we of the province of Nova Scotia appreciate the air mail service given in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, but unfortunately that service has not yet reached Nova Scotia. Ours is still the only province in Canada which is not served by air mail. May I draw particularly to the attention of the minister the fact that I believe we are entitled to the service, along regular lines. However, at this time the department has received from one of the air mail lines an offer under which it will not cost Canada a single cent to provide air mail service to Nova Scotia. With an offer such as that before it, I fail to understand why the government has not accepted the service and put it into operation in Nova Scotia. I draw the matter to the attention of the Postmaster General in the hope that he will not lose much time in giving air mail service to our province.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I make a correction, because I do not wish to be misunderstood. I was not criticizing the efficiency of the permanent employees under the civil service commission, but was discussing more particularly the service in the rural areas and the patronage to steamship and railway lines. I was not referring to the general, permanent service.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What particular complaint has the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar about the rural service, and where does he believe the Post Office Department loses money through any patronage he might have seen exercised in his district?

[Mr. J. C. Elliott.]

Mr. COLDWELL: I am pleased to answer that question. I would say that efficient people carrying the mail and running the post offices are changed sometimes when there are changes of government. It requires a considerable amount of time for a man or a woman to become efficient in a new job. Every time there is a change a new official must be trained, and I say that is a source of inefficiency. It lowers the morale of the whole service.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I can speak only of conditions as I know them, and I must say that I am not very favourably impressed by some of the work that has been done by the civil service commission. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent I know of instances where men have been appointed by the civil service commission to jobs for which they were in no way qualified. I know of one man who obtained marks of 98 per cent in the examination and yet was passed by in favour of a man who knew practically nothing about the work to be done. That is aside from the Post Office Department. I have represented my constituency since 1925 and during that time there have been only two changes in postmasters. These changes were not made because of political patronage. One man was using the post office as a recruiting ground for a political party, and when the citizens of the district protested he refused to desist. Such a man was not fitted for the post he held and he was dismissed. If that could be called political patronage, then there was political patronage. After looking over the situation for many years in my constituency, I have not seen any inefficiency. I do not believe the charge made by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is correct, unless the situation in other parts of the country is different from that which I have observed in mine.

Mr. REID: I should like to say a word or two on behalf of the rural mail carriers. These carriers do not come under the civil service; they are not appointed through patronage, which might perhaps be better; they carry on under the tender system. There are men in this country carrying the mails for less than the service is worth. They also have to make a considerable capital investment to provide motor cars. These people should be protected even against themselves. I should like to see the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) give some consideration to these rural mail carriers.

Another point to which I should like to refer is the order in council which stipulates that twenty per cent of the permanent staff must be temporary. This places a great hardship on many postal employees. Some of them must work ten, fifteen or twenty years before they are placed on the permanent staff. During those years they are precluded from contributing to the superannuation fund. I ask the Postmaster General if something cannot be done to permit men who have been postmen for, say three, four, five or six years to be placed on the permanent staff and not to allow them to go into old age while still on the temporary list.

Mr. McIVOR: As a new member I was surprised that I did not have to pay any postage on the letters I posted. If the Postmaster General and his staff did not do anything but carry the letters of the 245 members of this house, they would certainly be deserving of commendation. A dollar a day for 245 members—the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) is not here—for 100 days, which would be a short session, would mount up into the millions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McIVOR: I am not a mathematician.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIVOR: I want to say that I am better able to pay my postage now than I was before I came into the house. I think members of parliament should pay their own postage and thus put the post office on a paying basis. I have just one criticism to make. I should like to see the letter carriers get their holidays on Christmas day and Good Friday.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like an answer to my question with reference to the air mail service.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I have been trying for some time to get around to answering my hon. friend, but there seems to be so much zeal in offering commendation of the present system that I have not had an opportunity. With regard to Nova Scotia, I may say to my hon. friend that it will be a great pleasure to the officials of the department and myself when we reach the time when we can give the service to which he has just referred. I may say that this matter is receiving serious consideration and I hope to be able to make some reply before very long.

With regard to the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. McIvor), I want to say that he stands in a class by himself. I have been in this house for a good many years and his is the first protest I have ever heard against the franking privilege granted to members of the house.

Mr. REID: His mail must be light.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Perhaps I could answer two or three of my hon. friends who have spoken. As far as Christmas day and New Year's day are concerned, I do not see how it would be humanly possible to do without a service on those holidays. If I recall rightly, the receipts for the month of December were a little over $403,000 more than they were a year ago. Indications very early in the season were that this was going to be an unparalleled Christmas season. Apparently this was some indication of how the people of this country felt toward one another. May I refer to the city of Toronto—I do not want to pick out any particular place because I have not always picked out Toronto—

Mr. MacNICOL: It is a good Tory town.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): —as the city that has sent the best representatives to parliament. However, it has been improving in this connection. Perhaps my hon. friend will sympathize with the officials of the department when I tell him that on one day just preceding the Christmas rush 5,000,000, less 1,000, pieces of mail, incoming and outgoing, were handled in Toronto alone. I should like to say a word with regard to what happens when Christmas day or some other holiday follows a Sunday and a rush is on. I had better explain this, though perhaps I am trespassing on the time of my colleague who is to follow me. We were having Christmas day and other holidays following Sundays. In the large cities, if delivery is not made on Saturday afternoon, the mail that comes in after seven or eight o'clock on Saturday morning stands over until Monday. This year the mail received in the large cities on the day before Christmas and on Christmas day was substantially larger than in previous years. It must not be forgotten that formerly there were deliveries on Christmas day, New Year's day, and all these holidays, and now we are giving to those who handle the mail time off for the hours they serve on the holidays which have been granted them from time to time.

Mr. LENNARD: Are those employees satisfied with those conditions?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think the best answer I can give my hon. friend is that a large deputation representing the trades and labour council interviewed members of the government shortly after these changes were put through, and there was not a single protest against the changes.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps I might ask a question.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I should like to complete my answer to the hon. member before I reply to any other question.

Mr. GREEN: I wished to know whether the minister had had any protest from postal employees in the various cities. I am sure there have been protests from Vancouver.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): Yes, we have had protests. I doubt whether my hon. friend was listening to what I was saying. I said we had a large delegation from the trades and labour council, voicing their grievances and asking for certain changes which they thought should be made, and there was not a mention by any one of them of this matter of mail service on holidays. There have been deputations, but I might mention that this arrangement was arrived at only after serious consultation with representatives of the mail service from one end of Canada to the other.

What would have been the position if the change had not been made? We would have had people carrying, on the morning after Christmas, much more mail without any additional pay. We are now paying them extra. It is our intention to ask for an additional sum of about $185,000 to pay for deliveries on holidays and for the time, between now and March 1, that it will take to work off that over-time. It was thought that that work should be done to a large extent by people who are without jobs, and that the working off of the over-time should proceed during what is, to unemployed men, the hardest period of the year, namely between December 15 and April 1. I am assured by some of those who are affected that it has been a veritable godsend to them to have that extra work at Christmas and to have the prospect of additional work in the first three or four months of this year.

Mr. BAKER: With regard to Christmas work, one postman told me he was grateful to be able to deliver on Christmas day because he received in Christmas boxes twice the amount he had ever received before.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): There is no question about that. You can always get an agitation; they are much easier to start than to stop. But I may say there is no serious agitation against this arrangement. In certain sections serious objections on religious grounds have been made, but we have throughout this country a pretty good class of postmasters, exercising a wise discretion, and except in the larger places, where the mail can be delivered by midnight on Christmas eve, there is no great amount of pressure exercised for more than one delivery on Christmas day. We want to accord to those who object on religious grounds the greatest privileges possible, but I would say to them—and I know they are conscientious—that in the households of many of them they have maids working who are doing much more work on Christmas day than they do on any other day of the year. The same applies to New Year's day. Then there are the telegraphers from one end of the country to the other who work competitively in sending out messages at Christmas, which necessitates much heavier work on Christmas day than on any other day of the year. The same applies to those engaged in work on the street railways, the trains, and various other services. All we are trying to do is, in view of the necessities of the time, to have the mail delivered in an orderly way. Take the city of Montreal: with the immense amount of mail received there this year, if there had not been a delivery on Christmas day the Christmas mail would not have been all out by the following Saturday.

Mr. HEAPS: How was it done in previous years?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): It was done, until a few years ago, in exactly the same way as we are doing it now. Then they got New Year's day, and later on, Christmas day, and may I inform the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) that what was said by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Baker) is absolutely true—the great majority of these postal carriers get much better treatment if they deliver their mail on Christmas day than if they wait until the day after. Also, Christmas cards this year were much more numerous than they ever were before in the history of the department. That, I think, is a hopeful sign of the times.

Mr. DUNNING: A sign of good government.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): What does a Christmas card mean if delivered the day after Christmas? The thrill has gone, as my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps), who, I suppose, gets more of them than any other member of this house except the hon. member who is sitting beside him (Miss Macphail), should know. After Christmas has gone, there is not much thrill in getting a Christmas card.

As to the mail carriers, I think I should deal with them at this time.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is out of order. A number of members wish to talk on that subject.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I thought I would do away with the necessity of that if I answered my hon. friend now. With regard to the rural mail carriers, first of all it would be necessary to change the act. By section 67, contracts for the transportation of mail, if the amount is over $200, must be advertised for a certain length of time and then let to the lowest competent tenderer who furnishes proper sureties. There is nothing new about the tender system. What would my hon. friend say if, when we were letting a contract, for instance, for one of these buildings, it was not accepted because somebody bid too low? When I was Minister of Public Works a number of people bid so low they failed. The confederation block is an example. The receiver went on and completed it. These people tender at a certain price. Their tenders are not known to anybody else, and the man who tenders at a particular price knows he would rather have that job at that price than not have it. Let me give an example of what happened in one of the rural routes out here. Where we used to have, a few years ago, six or eight tenders on a rural route we had forty-two tenders. I would not be sure about this, but I believe I had a representative from every one of the forty-two, the highest of which was more than double the lowest, wanting the contract at the lowest tender. These people are driving out through the country serving people who are working perhaps longer hours at harder work for the same amount of money they are getting, and I know of very few mail carriers who want to throw up their job at the present time. I should like to see them get more; they will get more as times improve, and I believe we have definite evidence that times are improving. I know, having made that statement, it will render unnecessary any explanation to the hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall not refer to the matter the minister last spoke about, but I want to refer to something he said in reference to Toronto in connection with engaging a large number of temporary posties to permit the regular posties having a few days off after Christmas in compensation for having worked all Christmas day. A postie called at my neighbour's house shortly after Christmas and as he was a stranger to the community he was asked where he came from. It turned out that he did not belong to Toronto but came from one of the Yorks. I happened to accost him a day or two afterwards and I learned that he had a temporary job—I suppose a job such as the minister has referred to—and I understand that it will last perhaps until the first of March. I would not for a moment charge the minister with being partisan. I know he is far too broad-minded to issue orders that all these extra postal employees should belong to the Liberal party. He would not do anything like that.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I am glad to hear the hon. member say that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I like the broad view he takes of these matters and I know that if he had his way, when these poor unfortunates wanted jobs, he would issue an order to the authorities in Toronto to engage men just as they came along without regard to their politics. But I made inquiries myself, and with respect to all those about whom I inquired I found that back to their great-grandmothers —at any rate as far back as the inquisitor could go—they were supporters of the Liberal party. I know the minister does not want anything like that, and I should greatly appreciate it if he would instruct the authorities in Toronto it is his wish that in the selection of these temporary employees no questions should be asked concerning their politics. I should like him to issue a warning to the Liberal association there not to send letters to these applicants requiring them to have cards of the Liberal association. Let him warn the officials in Toronto it is his wish that anybody, Jew or Gentile, Hottentot or Greek, Grit or Tory, or anybody else, shall be equally welcome to be engaged by the department.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think my hon. friend knows the standing of the postmaster in Toronto in charge of the work there.

Mr. MacNICOL: A very capable man.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): One of the most capable men who can be found in any service, and that applies to most of the employees throughout the whole postal service, notwithstanding what some of my hon. friends have said to-night. His instructions were to get the best men who could be obtained for this work, and from what my hon. friend says, I gather that he succeeded.

Mr. POOLE: I want to ask the minister, in view of his avowed intention of giving us a more simplified statement, whether he would recommend a change in the present practice of using postage stamps on cheques. I have raised this question because if the excise stamp were used, the proceeds would go into the consolidated revenue fund and in that event I believe the Post Office Department might show a deficit rather than a profit.

Mr. SPENCE: It is amusing to hear the Postmaster General in his present vein of talk, and I wish to congratulate him upon the amount of information he has brought to the house. He has brought down more than any Postmaster General has done since I have been a member. No doubt this is due to the questions put last year which he has endeavoured to answer to-night. There is no general complaint at all about the Postmaster General or about the personnel of the Post Office Department, because our Canadian postmen cannot be excelled. But the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) mentioned something which is no doubt true, that politics was played to some extent at Christmas and has been since then. It was intimated that 200 letter carriers were required and an examination was held for the purpose of establishing an eligible list in Toronto; yet, from that day to this, that eligible list has been filled through hon. members who sit in this house, representing North York and one of the Torontos. They can go to the postmaster with three or four names of persons and they are appointed. Then people say to me, "My goodness! Have you lost all your prestige?" I reply, "I have nothing to say just now; go to my friends or to the defeated candidate; he may help you to get an appointment." We never played that game in Toronto until this Christmas. I was closely associated with the Post Office Department and the Public Works Department as the minister knows, and I can assure the committee we never played politics. The work was divided among the different ridings and the returned soldiers got their share. The thing was fair. This year, however, it was an absolute racket, and I am sorry to say the returned men received little consideration. The hon. member for York North (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor) were the ones who filled every job they could find in the post office. I am glad to say, however, that our party never played a game of that kind, because we divided the work.

We have heard a great deal to-night about estimates, gross receipts and so on, but at no time have I ever found a Postmaster General able to tell us anything beyond gross receipts; he never knew the expenditures. To-night we have received some information, but I do not think we have yet had sufficient to satisfy this committee that the Postmaster General or anyone connected with the department is running it efficiently. This is due largely to the fact that the Public Works department and the Department of Trade and Commerce do not keep track of the services they render to the post office, the cost of carrying mails on the ships, and the cost of buildings supplied by the Department of Public Works. That department should have a proper accounting system and charge for each building separately on the basis of its value. The minister said to-night he thought he was paying fair rentals, but we do not know what they may be. He may estimate that postal station A at Toronto cost only $10,000, but it cost $500,000. How does he estimate this fair rental? Does he base it on four or five per cent of the value? I think at least five per cent should be taken. What is it in Toronto?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I have before me a list of all the buildings; I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. SPENCE: No; we do not want to take up the time of the committee. If the minister can give the information in regard to Toronto, that will be sufficient. While he is looking it up, let me say it is no wonder the post office does not pay; it costs too much for franking privileges. If you went from here to-night on the Toronto train, to-morrow morning at station A you would see the postmen unloading bags of mail piled up ever so high, all franked from this house. Half of the publications from the different departments, and particularly the Department of Agriculture, should be eliminated entirely. We are breaking the backs of the postmen with the weight of the mailbags strapped over their shoulders, and mostly carried for no purpose.

Mr. BRADETTE: Why the agriculture department particularly?

Mr. SPENCE: All the departments. I am not going to say we should not have the franking privilege from this house, because it would make it very difficult for some hon. members if we did not have it. It would not for me, because I send very little, but I see hon. members sending out stuff that would cost them five or ten dollars a day.

Mr. BAKER: An abuse of the privilege.

Mr. SPENCE: I think the minister said it cost over a million dollars.

Mr. MULOCK: Will the hon. member permit a question? Did he mention that before the last general election?

Mr. SPENCE: No; at the present minute. I will bet you a hundred dollars that to-morrow morning—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: And it will be worse before the next election, if things go on the way they are. The hon. member had better keep quiet or I will tell a little story on him. I am not as dumb as he may think I am.

Mr. MULOCK: We never suspected that the hon. member was dumb.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): If I am not interrupting, I can give the estimated rentals for Toronto. This statement shows the yearly rental value including heating, lighting and cleaning of space occupied by the Post Office Department in public buildings throughout Canada, together with yearly cost of space in rented buildings, including all services. I am not sure that I have all the Toronto buildings; I do not think I have them all in one place. There is the Toronto general post office, apparently the rental value put on that is $14,000; Toronto terminal A, $185,247; station C, $3,285; station D, $2,210; station F, $5,680; station G, $7,370.

Mr. SPENCE: I must say that the figures are very fair. Those are fair rentals. I am glad the minister is now establishing a system of carrying on the post office in a business-like way. I shall give the Postmaster General credit for the fact that he has given us more information to-night than we have ever received before, and if he keeps on improving he will do better yet.

Mr. HEAPS: He might join the Tory party.

Mr. SPENCE: No; I am not one of those who cannot see some good in my Liberal friends—if there is any good in them.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh! Just when you were being nice!

Mr. SPENCE: I can see some good even in the hon. member for York North, although he trimmed us badly and stole all the jobs from us. He has some good qualities. However, that is getting away from the subject under discussion. A proper accounting system should be kept so that we might know the gross earnings and net profit of the post office, as in the case of any other business. This could easily be done.

Mr. BAKER: I wish to confirm what the hon. members for Davenport and Parkdale have said, not saying that patronage has never been exercised, but surely it is going too far when, for purposes of patronage, employees for post office service in Toronto during Christmas time, and even now, are hired from outside the city. Surely there are enough unemployed in Toronto, without bringing men in from outside. This is carrying patronage too far. There is a limit to how far the game should be played.

Mr. MULOCK: I do not know why my hon. friend should object so much. It seems to me that in the past many voters from Toronto used to come to North York.

Mr. BAKER: That has nothing to do with what I said at all.

Mr. SPENCE: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member for Parkdale, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) has the floor.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) but I cannot help thinking how interesting it is to find my hon. friends to my right objecting so strongly to patronage. It appears to me that there is always an objection to patronage on the part of hon. members in that section to the left of the Speaker.

Mr. BAKER: I do not object; I say there should be a limit.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. member's objection is not to patronage in principle but to the way it is carried on. In fact, if patronage were confined to the constituency of the hon. member it would not be so bad, but it is when someone from outside intervenes that patronage is bad, in whatever way it is carried on. I think the present Postmaster General has been good in comparison with his predecessors, but I wish he could eliminate patronage entirely. It would save him a great deal of trouble if he did. The number of jobs given by a member at Christmas time may amount to a dozen or a hundred as the case may be. If the opportunity were given to me of handing out patronage I would not want to take it. I do not think it is right that any member of this house should exercise patronage at all. The hiring of employees should be left entirely to the discretion of the officials of the various departments of the government, and members of parliament of whatever stripe should not interfere. After all, we expect these departments of the government to be run efficiently, and there cannot be efficiency if members of parliament keep interfering with the administration. The best thing that could happen, from the standpoint both of members of parliament and of efficiency of administration, would be for the officials of the departments themselves to have complete control of the men and women employed under them. I know the condition complained of has existed for a number of years. I believe the Post Office Department during the regime of the present Postmaster General has been freer from this fault than in former years.

Mr. SPENCE: Not in Toronto.

Mr. HEAPS: Toronto has always been a bad spot. Possibly, if the members from Toronto would get together and appeal to the Postmaster General, he might see that the abuses which apparently were prevalent during the last period when temporary employees were hired, do not occur again. To-night I would appeal to the Postmaster General to see to it that in future years, when extra help is required for the postal service of this country during the Christmas rush, help is hired from the regular employment agencies or other agencies of a similar kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or from the available list.

Mr. HEAPS: Or from the available list if that is the desire. It is most unfair, if what has been pointed out is true, that at the behest of a department of the government men should prepare for examinations; that they should write those examinations and perhaps be first on the eligible list, and then that a member of parliament should come along and practically eliminate the list, by employing a few preferred individuals instead of the men who happen to be on the list. I do not think anything could be more unfair than that. There is nothing that brings parliament or a member of parliament into greater disrepute than things of that sort. We would all be better off if we could eliminate patronage from our activities and give our jobs to the most efficient men available for the kind of work that is to be performed.

If I may say a word further, Mr. Chairman, the situation of the postal workers has been discussed this evening. On behalf of our Canadian postal workers I wish to say this: I think they are an efficient set of public employees, and further I believe that they are prepared to cooperate and assist to the full in an endeavour to make of the Post Office Department an efficient public utility. That being so, I think the way the postal employees were handled by the government or by the officers of the Post Office Department just prior to the Christmas rush was most unfair and, I would add, most unfortunate. It was a bad thing. It is wrong in principle to take away from the employees the holidays they have enjoyed for so many years. The fact that maids may work on Christmas day, that the telegraph companies may operate, that trains may run, that street railway lines may operate, does not in any way excuse the Post Office Department for compelling these postal workers to deliver mail on Christmas day. There is no analogy between the postal service and, say the operation of a street railway system, for the simple reason that a transportation system is essential, and it is necessary that it operate every day of the week. On the other hand, it is not so essential that mail be delivered twice on Christmas day, for the very obvious reason that when a postal worker takes mail to a business section on that day he finds practically all the stores and offices closed. I believe it was the experience of many men delivering mail on Christmas day that they had to take back to the post office a great deal of the mail; at least that is what I have been told by some of the employees who were delivering mail on that day. So I say there is no analogy. If, as the Postmaster General claims, it is wrong for maids to be working and wrong for other services to operate on Christmas day, I do not see how he can argue that two wrongs make a right, and really that is what his argument amounts to.

More than that, however, I object to what was done because I believe there was an important principle involved. It is this: I believe this government is in favour of the principle of collective bargaining; at least I hope so. It has been stated many times by hon. gentlemen opposite that they are in favour of that principle. It is against the principle of collective bargaining between employee and employer for the government, as the employer in this case, to lay down a set of rules and say to the employees, who have had no opportunity of discussing the rules with their employers, "You have to abide by these rules whether you like it or not." That is really what happened in regard to the change of hours.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): May I just correct my hon. friend. Before the details were arranged, the first question asked was, "Are we going to be paid for this overtime?" They discussed the matter with the officials of the department, principally with Mr. Underwood who is in charge of that branch, and while they would have preferred cash for the overtime, I think the great majority of them were fair enough to see that they, having jobs already, should be satisfied that somebody who was without a job should get paid for that extra time. That was what took place.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the Postmaster General if this arrangement, this change in the hours and conditions of labour, was taken up by the officials of the department with the unions concerned?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I do not know about the unions; I know that before the details were settled the postal employees met with the officials of the department. I do not know whether they suggested the interview or whether the department suggested it, but they were here and the discussion as to working out the details lasted a whole day.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the Postmaster General inform the committee as to who were here?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I think I have the names, but I could not give them offhand.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not want to know the names of the individuals, but I should like to know whom they represented. I have not the information before me; it is up in my room, but I am told that the men themselves were not consulted as to these changes. So far as they were concerned, there were notices posted in the various post offices, and they had to abide by these new regulations. I feel that our government, as an employer of labour, should be a model employer. When the government makes changes which may arouse resentment among those affected, such changes should not be brought about until the men themselves have been consulted so that a more amicable adjustment may be arrived at between the government and the men concerned. The Postmaster General and the officials of the department may have different information, but I am told that this was not done in this instance. I know that in Winnipeg a mass meeting was held and a good deal of objection was expressed to the new regulations which were put into effect by the Post Office Department. I know from the expressions of opinion at that meeting that practically all those attending certainly would have liked to have Christmas day off instead of being compelled to take out two loads of mail on that day.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) did not speak as a vulgar politician. He spoke as a statesman, and a statesman has no time to receive his electors. He is so busy studying the important problems which may affect the nation that he cannot do anything for the poor little fellow who would like to have a post office in his range or his township just for the convenience of the people around him, the twenty, thirty or forty families who would like to have a post office for their greater convenience. I cannot picture one of those men passing an examination set by a civil service commission which does not know anything about local conditions. Everything is left to the wisdom of the Postmaster General and the officials of his department, who decide first whether it is in the public interest to establish a post office there, and later whether this one or that one should be appointed postmaster.

My hon. friend does not know about the funny ways of some Tories. I know them better than he does. It is not my custom to trouble anyone in regard to a post office provided that the Tory incumbent does not boast of the fact that he stays there when a Liberal has not a job. The hon. member does not know about all the conditions in the country. He thinks he does, but in fact he does not. He represents a constituency in a very large city, but if he represented a rural constituency in Ontario, Quebec or even Manitoba he would possibly have one of his strongest opponents acting as postmaster in that small locality. That Tory would say, "I am here and I defy the member to dislodge me." That causes some trouble. The member must receive complaints from here and there saying, "That fellow should keep quiet; he has a government job, and he should do his work as postmaster. He should not provoke people. He should not go from house to house canvassing and saying 'I am against him. I have my job and he cannot dislodge me'". That is pretty brassy, and when it is done to the knowledge of the member, the only action left for him, in order not to create trouble for a Tory but to have peace in the community, is to write the Postmaster General and say that within his knowledge so-and-so is creating disturbances by canvassing openly, despite his government job.

That is one point. May I tell the hon. member that I do not believe in the merit system of the civil service commission. He does believe in it, because he does not know about it. I have before me an advertisement for the position of supervisor of time service, and micro-analyst. If anyone approached the hon. member in connection with that job he would say, "I have nothing to do with that; go to the civil service commission." Well, some supporters of the hon. member may admire him for his statesmanlike speeches, but at some time or another they may want a little chance somewhere. We Liberals and Conservatives understand that very well. We try to favour our friends to the greatest extent. We are just vulgar politicians, but the hon. member is a statesman and he will say to that particular man, "Joe"—or Abie or Enoch, as the case may be—"I have nothing to do with that job. You must go to the civil service commission and enjoy the fruits of the merit system. You must fill out your application for the examination, and then if you are the best competitor you will get the job, under the merit system. I have nothing to do with it." Then my hon. friend makes a wonderful speech about the League of Nations, hours of work or something like that, and does not give anything to anyone. I cannot understand why the hon. member is elected; it is contrary to human nature.

Mr. HEAPS: I might repay the compliment to my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot understand. Everyone who supports the hon. member may accept his views, support his ideas and believe in his speeches, but on the other hand it is human nature to expect something in return. Hon. members opposite, good Conservatives, understand that very well. I see some who have taken part in provincial politics, and the same condition obtains there. You try to reward your friends the best way you can; it is legitimate.

Mr. HEAPS: "To the victor belong the spoils."

Mr. POULIOT: Not so much as that; my hon. friend is all wrong when he says that. I do not believe every postmaster should be fired at each change of government. My idea is that two Tories should be fired for every Liberal who was fired by the previous Postmaster General.

Mr. SPENCE: You started it.

Mr. POULIOT: One must be honest about this. Afterwards the other Tories keep quiet and remain in their jobs. But when someone is troublesome or is a source of disturbance in the community he should see the long hand of justice, the long hand of the Postmaster General, reaching out to him and taking his post office from him.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North is a child, if he believes in the merit system. He knows very well that one of the officials of the civil service commission is still in gaol because he was selling jobs. He must know that, because it was in all the papers.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister believes in the merit system too.

Mr. POULIOT: He is all wrong in that. He knows one poor fellow is in gaol now because he was selling jobs. The hon. member must know very well that there is more narrow patronage in the civil service commission than there is in any department of the government. The hon. member must know, too, that there is a clique here in Ottawa of ten or twelve—

Mr. BAKER: I rise to a point of order. Are we discussing the department of the minister, or the civil service commission?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to see the hon. member for Eglinton running against the hon. member for Winnipeg North. But to summarize all I have said: I hope some day I may have a private conversation with the hon. member for Winnipeg North, at which time I shall show him my post office files. I have nothing to hide from him or from anybody else. I shall show him human nature at its best and at its worst. Then he must judge for himself, and he will know more about the matter than to-night he has shown he does.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 275.

Post Office—Outside Service—

Salaries and allowances, $16,713,338.50.

Mail services, including mail services by air, $14,520,000.

Miscellaneous, including $5,000 to provide for payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged, payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $1,004,600.

Mr. GREEN: Before the item is carried may I say that while I hesitate to impose on the good nature of our friends on the government side of the house at this late hour, I believe that this question of a postal service on Saturday afternoons and statutory holidays is far more important than they realize. Certainly that is true in the cities, and I can speak particularly of Vancouver.

After all, there are thousands of postal employees across Canada who are affected by this new provision. These men are serving Canada, just as we are serving Canada, and I suggest that their position should receive a little more serious consideration than it has to-night. I know hon. members have not meant to consider the matter lightly, but for example there has been talk about Christmas postcards having to be delivered, as though that were the matter of importance.

I believe the issue goes deeper than that. As I understand it the change was made on December 5 of last year, and it was made by order in council or by departmental regulation. I believe, too, that very little warning or notice was given to the postal service. I understand the post offices were given no chance to prepare for the Saturday afternoon and holiday services. In normal times the staff in Vancouver is short, even without the extra work which was added. No previous provision was made by the department for increasing the staff. In other words, there was no reasonable or common sense arrangement made to increase the staff to a point where it could handle the extra work.

We find that through the order there is to be a full postal service on Saturday afternoons when practically all business offices are closed. In my own office it is a nuisance to have mail delivered on Saturday afternoon, because it is apt to lie around on the floor or be misplaced by the janitor. I am sure the same observation would apply to thousands of offices across Canada.

Then, in addition there is to be a full—not a partial—postal service in post offices. I assume that service will be given on New Year's day, Good Friday, Victoria day, July 1, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day. On almost all these holidays not only offices but also all stores are closed. Surely there is no need for mail delivery on these statutory holidays. I suggest that there has been no great demand from the general public for mail delivery on these holidays. I understand that postal employees have had their Saturday afternoons and other holidays for many years, so why should a change be made at this time? There is no such thing as overtime pay; a man simply works more one week and less the next. It is all rather uncertain; he does not know what days he will have off. I know there has been the greatest confusion in Vancouver as to when the men will have their time off, and I am sure similar confusion must have arisen in other large post offices.

Will this affect the mail collection service? I understand that contracts for the collection of mail are largely on a six-day basis. Are we to have full mail collections on all holidays and on Saturday afternoons? The minister has said that the extra cost of providing this holiday service will be nearly $200,000. The extra staff required is not being obtained through the civil service commission. In Vancouver the same complaint is made that was made in Toronto. I know that many war veterans were unable to obtain the temporary work simply because they were not of the right stripe politically. It is all very confusing for the service. I understand there has been no request from the public generally for this service. There may have been requests from a few business firms, but I believe that is all. In fact, I understand that the public were more or less surprised when this service was inaugurated.

The Postmaster General has mentioned the difficulty when a holiday falls on a Monday. Surely it would be possible to make special arrangements to handle the mail on these occasions. I suggest that this change is not fair to the postal employees of Canada and that the matter should be given further consideration. It is a step backwards. In British Columbia the weekly half holiday and statutory holidays are provided for by a provincial statute, but here we have dominion civil servants being obliged to work when other employees, with very few exceptions, have the holidays. I think it is unnecessarily disturbing the postal service and I ask the minister to give the matter serious consideration. I believe he would alleviate the condition if he realized how much dissatisfaction has been caused.

Mr. HEAPS: What item are we on?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 275.

Mr. HEAPS: What about item 16?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That was carried the first of the evening.

Mr. DUNNING: In order to clarify the situation might I point out that the committee has been discussing item 275. For almost the last two hours the matters discussed would fall within the limits of item 16.

Mr. MacNICOL: Earlier in the evening I said that the minister was allowing a lot of discussion which was entirely irrelevant. Item 16 is the only item I have heard of to-night.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): That was carried earlier in the day. The leader of the opposition mentioned that it had been called "carried" the last time the post office estimates were under discussion, but had not been marked as such.

The CHAIRMAN: I may say to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and to the other members of the committee that item 16 was carried. I then called item 275.

Mr. HEAPS: I never heard it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I never heard it until this moment.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think anyone here heard the word "carried" in connection with item 16, and we certainly never heard item 275 called.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely you do not expect to carry an item of over a million like that.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 275 is before the committee; item 16 was carried.

Mr. MacNICOL: I did not agree to item 16 carrying.

Mr. GREEN: I spoke before that item was declared carried.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I may say to the committee that I have been following things pretty closely. I am sure if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) were here, he would bear me out when I say that it was carried and marked "carried." We then proceeded to item 275, which contains many items that were partly discussed the other evening.

Mr. MacNICOL: Item 275 has not been called to-night so far as I remember.

Mr. POOLE: Is it possible for me to have an answer to my question?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I must apologize to my hon. friend, but I have been trying to answer his question. I understand his question was with regard to the stamps issued by the Department of Finance for use on cheques and as to whether some method could be devised whereby postage stamps would be used entirely for that purpose. The stamps issued by the Department of Finance are excise stamps, and I suppose that is why they were issued. However, a large number of postage stamps are used on cheques. There is no way I know of, without incurring an expense out of proportion to the value of the information obtained, by which we would be able to check up how many excise stamps and how many postage stamps are used on cheques.

Mr. POOLE: I do not think the minister understood my question clearly, but I can understand that as there was considerable confusion in the committee. The minister has intimated his intention of giving us a more simple statement and I was asking if he would recommend the use of excise stamps only on cheques, and abolish the practice of using postage stamps. I have made an inquiry at various banks throughout the country and I understand that stamps used on cheques run about forty per cent postage stamps. I understand the revenue derived from the sale of excise stamps goes into the consolidated revenue fund, while that derived from the sale of postage stamps goes into the Post Office Department. When I see an item of $27,000,000 for stamps with a surplus of one and three quarter millions, it might well be that the department could show a deficit rather than a profit. I would suggest that either post office stamps or excise stamps be used exclusively.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): I understand for a time it was not permissible to use postage stamps on cheques, but many complaints were made, particularly in the rural districts, as to the difficulty in obtaining excise stamps. I think the preponderance of public opinion is in favour of the system as it now exists. I shall be glad to discuss with the Minister of Finance as to whether it is possible to make some arrangement which will clarify the situation as to the revenue derived from each source.

With regard to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), there is always a possibility of making some changes which will be of advantage to both parties. I have not found any lack of cooperation among those who are getting time off for Saturday afternoons and the holiday service that they give, and I think it will be found that they prefer a week's holiday at a time to a half day some Saturday afternoon and odd holidays at other times. I repeat that we shall cooperate with them as far as we can and do the best possible under any circumstances which may arise. We came to the conclusion that we must immediately adopt a system of working on Saturday afternoons and holidays, and we shall make such improvements as we can in agreement with the men engaged in the work.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not possible to work with skeleton staffs on statutory holidays and on Saturdays?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): In the smaller places that is being done.

Mr. GREEN: But is it necessary to have a delivery on statutory holidays? Take any holiday, even Christmas; I think the great majority of our people were accustomed to doing without mail on Christmas day. They would rather have the postman get his day off.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex): As regards the suggestion of skeleton staffs, I can agree with my hon. friend to a large extent so far as the offices are concerned, but in view of our experience so far, I cannot agree with him as regards doing away with deliveries on holidays.

Mr. GREEN: But let us take deliveries on, say, July 1. Is there any reason why the ordinary home owner should get mail on July 1?

Mr. WOOD: It seems to me that the only "skeleton" there will be in the mail service will be the rural mail delivery man. He is the one about whom I am concerned. Much time has been taken up in discussion about these postal men working on Christmas day. It is a repetition of the same old thing; anything that emanates from the urban centres must receive a great deal of consideration.

[The Chairman.]

Yet these postal men get pretty good pay; they also receive free suits of clothes, and I do not think they are deserving of nearly as much consideration as those engaged on rural mail delivery.

I have only two minutes, but I want to take this opportunity of supporting the views of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) with regard to the position our rural mail delivery service is in. We discussed that for a few minutes, but we spent an hour and a half talking about postal service in the cities. In my constituency there is a man who drives the rural mail over a route of twenty-one miles for $445, or $1.40 a day. I appreciate the stand taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) on behalf of labour, but I do not know why there is so much consideration for these people who happen to live in the specially privileged centres. Lots of farmers have to milk cows on Christmas day and hurry around in preparing Christmas dinner, very often for visiting aunts and uncles. There should be a little consideration for the class to which I have referred, and I hope the Postmaster General (Mr. Elliott) will appreciate the situation with which we are faced. It looks as though there is going to be an increase in the cost of living. What will be the position of these rural mail carriers when they find the cost of living has become so high that they cannot maintain themselves? It is not very difficult for some high-salaried men to get bonuses. The city postal service employees, I believe, come under the Civil Service Act and are entitled to superannuation. But the rural mail man is not protected in any way. As soon as he is off his job, well, he is off, and whether or how he lives does not seem to give anybody any concern.

The minister has been extremely kind and has given us a great deal of latitude in discussing his department. I very much appreciate his attitude and have nothing but praise for the manner in which he is conducting his department. I do not think there have been many complaints in regard to political patronage. In my constituency, at least, there has been no evidence of it.

I should like to get a statement from the minister as to what will be done on behalf of these poorly paid rural mail carriers in view of the way the cost of living is going up.

Mr. DUNNING: It is quite evident that hon. gentlemen are not going to allow an item to pass to-night. That moves me to say something, in moving that the committee rise, which I think should be said in the interests of the conduct of this committee. The misunderstanding which occurred this evening arose entirely out of our having permitted discussion on an item which was not before the committee. Had discussion been confined to item 16, there would not have been in anyone's mind any question as to whether that item had been passed. In spite of that, for practically the whole of this evening, and most of a former evening, during which post office estimates were before the committee, discussion was permitted over the whole range of the Post Office Department, although according to the rules we should have been discussing item 16, which would have restricted the discussion to the subject matter of the item. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there is only one way by which to avoid in future misunderstandings of that kind, and that is to hold the discussion strictly to the item under discussion. I believe it would be in the interests of all of us if that were done, and would prevent future misunderstandings. I move that the committee rise, and report progress and ask leave to sit again. It is understood that item 16 is carried.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, February 8, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

FARM IMPLEMENTS COMMITTEE

Mr. J. F. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): moved that the first report of the special committee on farm implement prices, presented to the house on Friday, February 5, 1937, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRAP FISHING LICENCES

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): With the unanimous consent of the house I beg to move:

That the question of the advisability of the government issuing trap fishing licences in British Columbia waters be referred to the standing committee on fisheries for study and report.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

ANSWER TO QUESTION ON FEBRUARY 3 AS TO AGREEMENT BETWEEN WHEAT BOARD AND WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to direct the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), not as leader of the government but as leader of the House of Commons, to what I conceive to be a breach of one of the privileges of the house in connection with an answer made to a question asked on February 3 last by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). The hon. member asked certain questions in connection with an agreement connected with wheat, and the answer was this:

1, 2, 3. The subject to which this question relates, namely, the marketing of Canadian grains abroad, is now being investigated by the royal grain inquiry commission, which has not yet reported to the government.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that an answer such as this is not quite in accordance with the rights of parliament, because the question was as to an agreement about which there was some knowledge, and had nothing whatever to do with this royal commission, which may or may not see the agreement. As the commissioner is now engaged in dealing with textile matters, one cannot think that parliament should be put in this position. I would have mentioned it before, but I conceived it to be a matter to be dealt with only by the leader of the house. If any ordinary minister were to undertake to answer questions in this way and the right hon. gentleman were affected he would have something to say much more caustic than the observations which I now make.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I feel sure that in the reply there was no intention to be disrespectful to any member. I understand the question was submitted last year to the commission and is under investigation at the present time. The reply was a statement of fact. However, I shall be glad to discuss with my colleagues the point which my right hon. friend has raised.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MARKING OF FRUIT AND VEGETABLE SHIPMENTS

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Are the shippers of packages of Canadian fruits and vegetables to the United States required to mark each package with the name of the grower and the country of origin?
2. Is this required of similar shipments into this country from the United States?
3. If not, will the government put a similar regulation into effect?

Mr. GARDINER: Stand.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that the last two paragraphs of this question could be readily answered. I should like to ask him if he could not give me an immediate answer at least to those parts.

Mr. GARDINER: This is a question which will be answered by the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret). I am not in a position to give the answer; it comes from two different departments.

THREE RIVERS—STE. ANGELE DE LAVAL BRIDGE

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Has the government taken action with regard to the resolution adopted by the House of Commons on March 9, 1936, with reference to the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence, between Three Rivers and Ste. Angele de Laval?
2. If not, why?
3. If so, what has been done?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. No.
2. Definite consideration has not yet been given to the proposal.
3. Answered by No. 2.

MORDEN, N.S., WHARF REPAIRS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. Did the Public Works Department have certain repairs made to the Morden wharf, Kings county, Nova Scotia, in the year 1936?
2. If so, what was the amount of money authorized?
3. To whom, and what amounts were paid for the following: (a) wages; (b) material; (c) supplies?
4. Was a special account set up for the purchase of lumber?
5. If so, in whose name?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. $16,600.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What is the number receiving old age pensions in the province of New Brunswick under the following headings: (a) pension of $20; (b) over $15 and less than $20; (c) over $10 and including $15; (d) over $5 and including $10; (e) $5 and under.

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The number of persons receiving old age pensions in the province of New Brunswick as at December 31st, 1936, was 9,617. The number under each of the abovementioned headings was as follows:

(c) 5,888.

Pensions transferred from other provinces are included in the figures shown above.

RURAL MANITOBA DROUGHT RELIEF

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What rural municipalities in Manitoba have been admitted to the federal relief area on account of drought?

2. On whose recommendation were these municipalities included?

3. Which of the rural municipalities included were recommended by the province of Manitoba?

4. Has the provincial government of Manitoba made requests for the inclusion of the rural municipalities of Stanley and Rhineland in the federal relief area?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The following rural municipalities have been admitted under the Feed and Fodder Agreement and the Federal Direct Relief Agreement: Albert, Edward, Arthur, Brenda, Cameron, south half, Winchester, Morton, Turtle Mountain, Roblin, Pipestone, Louise, Pembina, Riverside, Glenwood, Sifton, Whitewater.

2. On the recommendation of the provincial authorities.

3. All.

4. The first map submitted by the Manitoba government showed the drought area in Manitoba to include a section of Manitoba in which Stanley and Rhineland were included. An agreement was reached with respect to an area in the southwest corner of Manitoba for which the dominion government would be asked to assume responsibility. It was agreed to admit nine municipalities immediately and to consider bringing in the others later. The understanding reached has been adhered to and no further request has been received from the Manitoba government for the admission of the municipalities of Stanley and Rhineland.

EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES UNDER RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. What number of cattle have been exported to the United States to date in accordance with the terms of the reciprocal agreement, and how does this compare with 1935?
2. How much cheese has been exported to the United States to date in accordance with the terms of the said agreement, and how does the amount compare with exports during the year 1935?
3. What is the amount of hard wood and soft wood exported to the United States in 1936 as compared with 1935?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Exports of dairy cattle to United States in 1936 amounted to 8,194 head, and in 1935 to 6,266 head. Exports of cattle, n.o.p. to United States in 1936 amounted to 224,306 head, and in 1935 to 108,557 head.

2. Exports of cheese to United States in 1936 amounted to 114,564 cwt., and in 1935 to 4,749 cwt.

3. Exports to United States of flooring of hardwood in 1936 were 582 M feet, valued at $28,860, and in 1935, 537 M feet, valued at $25,868. Exports of planks and boards, softwood, to United States in 1936 were 484,804 M feet, valued at $11,284,090, and in 1935, 329,431 M feet, valued at $7,555,764. Exports of planks and boards, hardwood, to United States in 1936 were 40,882 M feet, valued at $1,457,093, and in 1935, 19,179 M feet, valued at $658,523. Exports of timber, square, softwood, to United States in 1936 were 4,579 M feet, valued at $71,210, and in 1935, 1,964 M feet, valued at $38,892. Exports of timber, square, hardwood, to United States in 1936 were 19 M feet, valued at $742, and in 1935, 3 M feet, valued at $244.

BANK OF CANADA—SILVER PURCHASE

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

1. How many ounces of silver did the Bank of Canada purchase for the government of the United States in 1936?
2. What price per ounce was paid the Bank of Canada?
3. What did the silver cost the Bank of Canada?
4. What proportion of a silver dollar is silver and what is the value?
5. What proportion of other metals and their value?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The Bank of Canada did not purchase any silver for the government of the United States for the year 1936. The bank, under an agreement with the United States treasury, has undertaken to act as intermediary between the silver producers of Canada and the United States treasury in connection with such sales of newly-mined silver as may be arranged.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Eighty per cent, the value being 27 cents when silver is worth 45 cents the ounce fine.

5. Twenty per cent copper, the value being approximately 15/100ths of one cent when copper is worth 15 cents the pound.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley):

What negotiations are being considered between the United States and Canada with regard to deepening the St. Lawrence waterways for transportation purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The St. Lawrence waterway project has recently been the subject of informal discussion, but no conclusions have yet been reached.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS—EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. SENN:

1. What was the total value of agricultural implements imported into Canada from the United States of America during each of the calendar years 1929 to 1936, inclusive, not including farm tractors?
2. What was the total value of such material exported from Canada to the United States of America during each of the said years?
3. What was the total value of farm tractors imported into Canada from the United States of America during each of the said years?
4. What was the total value of farm tractors exported from Canada to the United States of America during each of the above mentioned years?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The value of agricultural implements imported into Canada from the United States of America during the calendar years 1929 to 1936, not including traction engines and parts, was as follows:—

Calendar years
1929	$14,634,694
1930	10,804,404
1931	2,354,814
1932	1,284,377
1933	1,291,061
1934	1,538,883
1935	1,745,221
1936	2,391,025

2. The value of agricultural implements exported to the United States of America during the calendar years 1929 to 1936 was as follows:

Calendar years
1929	$ 5,126,864
1930	2,669,934
1931	926,379
1932	328,771
1933	245,421
1934	500,429
1935	2,009,457
1936	1,995,868

3. The value of traction engines and parts for farm purposes imported into Canada from the United States of America during the calendar years 1929 to 1936, was as follows:—

Calendar years
1929	$16,694,847
1930	9,839,477
1931	1,326,123
1932	678,880
1933	751,477
1934	1,311,501
1935	3,300,422
1936	6,420,237

4. The value of tractors and parts exported from Canada to the United States of America during the calendar years 1929 to 1936 was as follows:—

Calendar years
1929	$10,659
1930	17,917
1931	8,863
1932	6,149
1933	2,901
1934	7,424
1935	17,816
1936	7,958

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD—EMPLOYEES

Mr. MALLETTE:

What is the total number of employees of all categories at the head office and in each of the provincial offices of the Canadian Farm Loan Board, not including the field inspectors employed on a fee basis?

Mr. DUNNING: Head office 38, British Columbia 7, Alberta 25, Saskatchewan 39, Manitoba 21, Ontario 19, Quebec 58, New Brunswick 5, Nova Scotia 5, Prince Edward Island 3.

NUMBER OF RELIEF RECIPIENTS AND UNEMPLOYED

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What is actually the total number: (a) of heads of families; (b) of their dependents; (c) of individual cases of unemployed, all receiving relief at the present time?
2. How many of the three above mentioned classes are employable?
3. What is the total number of unemployed: (a) heads of families, and (b) unmarried boys and girls over twenty, not receiving relief at the present time?
4. What is the number of: (a) employable, and (b) unemployable unemployed in each province at the present time, and what was the average of each of both those classes of unemployed during the calendar years 1935 and 1936?

Mr. ROGERS: All available information was included in the report of the National Employment Commission with respect to the registration of recipients of direct relief which was tabled in the house on the 5th day of February. As other data is abstracted from the registration returns it will be made available.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—QUEBEC CITY PUBLIC COAL DOCK

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Is the National Harbours Board taking steps to provide the harbour of the city of Quebec with a public coal dock?
2. If so, when will this facility be in operation?

Mr. HOWE: Matter under consideration.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury):

1. What amount was paid for expenses of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of New Brunswick for the year ending December 31, 1936?
2. How many cases were before the New Brunswick board of review, and on how many was judgment given?
3. How many cases were actually settled, i.e. payments made according to the judgment of the New Brunswick board of review?
4. In how many cases did the board of review alter its first finding?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. $25,423.46.
2. 360 cases before the New Brunswick board of review and judgment given in 289 cases.
3. No information.
4. 2.

IMPORTS OF ELECTRICAL GOODS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Are customs officers required to note the origin or make of electrical goods, radio tubes and supplies, and electrical fittings for radios, both in the case of importers of these goods, and tourists returning to Canada from the United States with such goods in their baggage?
2. Is such information contained in a report that is sent to a divisional headquarters, or department headquarters or elsewhere, and if so to what officer?
3. To whom, outside of the customs service, would any of the information in question No. 1 be available?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The country of origin is required to be stated on the invoice of all importations of goods being merchandise for sale, and, in the case of goods brought in by returning Canadians under the exemption provided in tariff item 703b for personal or household use, the country from which the importer arrives is accepted as the country of origin for customs statistical purposes.

2. Copies of invoices and of declarations of returning Canadians are forwarded to the Customs Division, Department of National Revenue, Ottawa.

3. To the importer or his duly authorized agent.

BANK OF CANADA—LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO EMPLOYEE BROOKS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is there an individual named Brooks employed by the Bank of Canada, and, if so, what are his duties and his salary?
2. How long has he been so employed?
3. Upon whose recommendation was he appointed?
4. Was he granted leave of absence, with salary, in 1936, and, if so, for how long, and why?
5. Did the said Brooks accompany a member of this house on his recent trip around the world?
6. If so, in what capacity?
7. Has the said Brooks resumed his duties at the Bank of Canada, and, if so, on what date?
8. Who replaced the said Brooks at the Bank of Canada during his absence, and what salary was paid to such individual?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no information on record with the government of Canada with respect to the questions asked, but inquiries of this nature, and others relating to the Bank of Canada, raise a point which with respect to the Canadian National Railways was determined a number of years ago somewhat in this way: that questions as to matters of internal management were not usually answered in the house unless in the judgment of the management they could be answered without affecting the day to day management of the business. But in the case of the Canadian National Railways a standing committee has been set up during each of the past many years in which members were given the opportunity of meeting the officers of the railway and asking questions relating to the business of the road. The government is giving consideration to the advisability of referring the annual report of the Bank of Canada to, say, the committee on banking and commerce, in order that members of the house may have the same general opportunity with respect to the affairs of the Bank of Canada as they have to-day with respect to the affairs of the Canadian National Railways. This matter is now under consideration, and I give the information in view of various questions which appear from time to time on the order paper with respect to the affairs of the bank.

Mr. POULIOT: It would be a good reason to abolish the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I feel it incumbent on me to make at least one observation with respect to the question. I went away in August last. I might have taken one of the messengers, as the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did when he was leader of the opposition, to serve me in any capacity that might be required. Instead I concluded I would not do so, and I asked Brooks whether or not he was having his holiday. He had not been absent, had had no rest since the war. He applied for leave of absence, which was granted to him without salary, and I paid him the amount of salary which he was receiving, together with his transportation charges, during his absence.

Mr. POULIOT: Was it paid before or after the question was put?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: It was paid every month, Mr. Speaker, from August until the day he terminated his engagement with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman has referred to myself, when leader of the opposition, having taken with me a messenger, who was attached to the office of the leader of the opposition, when I was absent from Ottawa on one or two occasions. My right hon. friend did not say, though I imagine the omission was an inadvertent one on his part, that I personally paid all the travelling and other expenses of the messenger.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no question about that, but not his salary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I paid the expenses of the messenger when I went away, and the messenger himself is a permanent official. I may say to my right hon. friend that he did not pay the salary of his messenger while he was absent, but the salary was paid just the same.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, when he was here.

Mr. POULIOT: I wonder if I could not have gone in his stead.

CORONATION OF KING GEORGE VI—MILITARY CONTINGENT

Mr. REID:

1. Is there a contingent being sent to the coronation of King George VI?
2. If so, is it to represent all branches of the service?
3. What is the total number of such contingent?
4. How many from each branch of the service?
5. How many from each province?
6. How are they to be selected?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. Yes.

2. All arms (branches) of the three defence services will be represented. A detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will also be included.

3. 334.

4. Royal Canadian navy, 1 officer, 9 ratings.

Naval reserves, 3 officers, 17 ratings.

Permanent active militia, 6 officers, 54 other ranks.

Non-permanent active militia, 50 officers, 130 other ranks.

Royal Canadian Air Force: (permanent), 3 officers, 1 airman. (Non-permanent), 5 officers, 21 airmen.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police, 2 officers, 32 other ranks.

5. (a) So far as the non-permanent defence services and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned:

Province	Naval Reserves	Non-Permanent Active Militia	Non-Permanent Air Force	Royal Canadian Mounted Police
Prince Edward Island	2	6	—	1
Nova Scotia	2	11	1	3
New Brunswick	1	10	—	2
Quebec	4	50	2	3
Ontario	3	54	15	5
Manitoba	1	12	3	4
Saskatchewan	2	13	2	6
Alberta	2	11	—	5
British Columbia	3	13	3	3
	20	180	26	32*

* Two officers to be decided upon.

5. (b) So far as the permanent defence services are concerned:

Royal Canadian Navy: Four (4) ratings from the naval base at Esquimalt, B.C.; Five (5) ratings from the naval base at Halifax, N.S. One officer not yet selected.

Permanent active militia and permanent air force: Selection will depend upon the recommendations received from officers commanding and officers administering permanent units.

6. Defence Services: Naval Service: Selection will be made at National Defence headquarters, on recommendations received from commanding officers of Naval Service units.

Militia Service: selection will be made at National Defence headquarters, on recommendations received from district officers commanding which will be on recommendations received from militia units.

Air Service: selection will be made at National Defence headquarters, on recommendations received from commanding officers of air force units.

Selection will be made from active, reserve and retired personnel; and a substantial portion, at least one-third, of those selected will be from personnel who were on active service overseas during the late war.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police: Members of the force are to be recommended by their respective officers commanding throughout Canada. No final selection has yet been made.

HUME, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. Has the resignation of R. E. Juby, postmaster at Hume, Saskatchewan, been requested?

2. If so, for what cause?

3. Was any charge laid against him? If so, what was the nature of said charge, and by whom was it laid?

4. Was an inquiry held in his case? If not, why?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Yes.

2 and 3. The department was informed that this postmaster was a candidate in the Saskatchewan provincial election in 1934. The postmaster admitted the charge and as this constitutes political partisanship under the terms of section 55 of the Civil Service Act, he was called upon to resign.

4. There was no necessity for an investigation in view of the postmaster's admission.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION AND EXPORTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the value of the agricultural production in Canada, in 1935?

2. What was the value of such production in 1936?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. The gross agricultural revenue of Canada in 1935 was $943,081,000. This figure is subject to slight revision when the 1936 estimates are made in the near future.

2. Not yet available.

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was the total value of our exports of agricultural products in 1935?

2. What was the value of such exports in 1936?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Exports of Canadian farm products in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1935, were as follows:

Raw materials	$176,924,050
Partly manufactured	6,809,275
Fully or chiefly manufactured	78,702,008
Total	$262,435,333

2. Exports of Canadian farm products in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, were as follows:

Raw materials	$194,433,947
Partly manufactured	7,676,514
Fully or chiefly manufactured	88,377,312
Total	$290,487,773

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

TEMPORARY PROMOTIONS OF OFFICERS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Did any officers, during the war, receive temporary promotions for the war period only, and, if so, who are they?

2. Referring to the above question, who are the officers whose temporary promotions: (a) have been made permanent, and (b) whose have not?

3. With regard to question No. 2, upon what date was each temporary promotion made permanent?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I regret that this question cannot be answered in the form in which it appears. If the hon. member would limit the question to members of the permanent force now serving, it can be answered.

Mr. POULIOT: I am very glad to agree with that request.

DRILL HALLS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. How many drill halls are there in Canada, and where are they located?

[Mr. Lacombe.]

2. What amounts has the government received from commandants of military districts for the renting of each drill hall for other than military purposes, during each of the past five years from January 1 to December 31, in each year?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN BOARD

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What salaries were paid to each of the members of the farm loan board during the year 1936?

2. What sums did each receive for travelling and living expenses?

3. How many applications have been made for loans: (a) by province, 1936; (b) total?

4. How many applications were granted: (a) by province, 1936; (b) total?

5. What amount of money was loaned by the board during 1936: (a) by province; (b) total?

6. How many inspectors were employed by the board: (a) by province, 1936; (b) total?

7. What is the total amount paid to inspectors for travelling expenses and living expenses?

8. What was the total administration cost for 1936?

Mr. DUNNING: Return tabled herewith.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—NATIONAL DEFENCE BARRACKS

Mr. PURDY:

1. At how many points in Canada where the Department of National Defence maintains barracks, drill halls, etc., are headquarters or premises also maintained for the use of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

2. What is the annual cost for rent, light, heat, char service, upkeep, etc., of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police premises at these points?

MILITARY EQUIPMENT

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

What sums have been voted by this parliament, each year, from 1920 to 1936, for strictly military equipment?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NOVA SCOTIA COAL SUBVENTIONS

Mr. BROOKS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents, exchanged between the government or any member or officer of a department thereof, and the fuel board or any member thereof, in connection with payment of subventions on Nova Scotia coal sold and delivered or to have been sold and delivered outside of the said province, during the year 1936.

Mr. CRERAR: It will be observed that this is a rather unusual request. It asks for all the correspondence exchanged not only between two departments of government but between one section of a department and another, plus any letters that may have been exchanged between the fuel board and other departments of government.

Mr. BENNETT: For the year 1936 only.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. My information is that these exchanges are usually considered as privileged. Subject to this reservation the matter will be examined to see what information can be brought down. But I might suggest to my hon. friend, if he will permit me, that the resolution in this form might be dropped. I think if he inquires of the fuel board he will get the information he desires. If he cannot get it, the matter would be open for consideration later.

Mr. BENNETT: If the motion is dropped it will have to be placed on the order paper in another form, because the information must be obtained before the estimates in connection with it are passed. It can therefore be dropped if the minister prefers to have it put in another form. I will put one on myself in a form which I think will cover it.

Mr. CRERAR: We will let the order stand as it is, with the reservation I made a moment ago.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF TOBACCO AND AUTOMOBILE IN MONTCALM COUNTY, QUE.

Mr. FERLAND:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, documents, judicial proceedings, judgment, statement of confiscation and deed of sale in connection with a seizure of tobacco and of an automobile, and legal proceedings against one Martin, of St-Alexis, in the county of Montcalm, the judgment of the magistrate's court at St-Jerome, September 17, 1934, the execution of said judgment and sale of said automobile.

DISMISSAL OF G. R. J. WILSON

Mr. WOOD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, memoranda, evidence and other documents in possession of the Department of Transport, relating to the discharge from the civil service of Mr. G. R. J. Wilson, in charge of the Welland canal feeder at Dunnville, in 1931.

NORMANDIN, QUE., EXPERIMENTAL STATION

Mr. FONTAINE:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged since January 1, 1934, between the honourable the Minister of Agriculture or any officer of his department and any person, association or organization with regard to the choice of a breed of thoroughbred cattle for the experimental station at Normandin, province of Quebec.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act so as to constitute committees instead of one advisory committee, and to appropriate the necessary moneys for the continuance and extension of the work under the act for the fiscal years 1937-38 and 1939-40.

He said: In moving that this resolution go to the committee of the whole I should like to make a brief explanation. Dealing with the matter of committees I may remind the house that in the act passed in 1935 provision was made for the setting up of an advisory committee. The membership of that committee was indicated, not in its personnel but in regard to the organizations which were to be represented on it. We have had certain experiences during the last two years in connection with the carrying on of the work in the different provinces which indicate that it would be desirable to have authority to appoint more than one advisory committee. This particular committee which is provided for in the act as it stands will not necessarily be done away with.

It was provided in another section of the act that an amount limited to a million dollars a year could be expended in the years 1936-37, 1937-38 and 1938-39. By the amendment we are removing that limitation. I may say that I will be prepared, either in committee on the resolution or in committee after the second reading of the bill itself, to give complete information with regard to expenditures.

At this stage I would only wish to add that the total amount spent up to date in the two years is a little over $800,000. It is not thought wise to leave the limitation in the bill as at present because of the fact that many undertakings have to be refused consideration on the ground that there may not be sufficient money available, and we think the government can give consideration to the facts in each case to better advantage if that limitation is not there.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been the practice of this house, in any event under the present administration, not to make an appropriation in the form this resolution would indicate. The appropriation should be made in the estimates. In addition to that the minister will perhaps observe that he has left out the year 1938-39; the resolution refers only to 1937-38 and 1939-40. Presumably that is not intentional; it must be accidental; the year intended must be 1938-39.

Originally the appropriation was made in the statute itself, amounting to a million dollars a year. The proposal now before the house to do away with any such limitation necessarily must imply, I would submit, on the statement of policy made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) last year, that the appropriation should be contained in the appropriation bill, so there will be no blank cheque for an unnamed sum to be used for this purpose.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to say that as pointed out by the leader of the opposition, there is a misprint in the resolution; it should be "to" instead of "and" between the two dates, so that the resolution would read, "for the fiscal years 1937-38 to 1939-40 inclusive."

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, if this is for the purpose of giving notice that at the next sitting the house will consider this resolution, and if that is all, I desire to say that I think it was wholly out of order for me to discuss the matter. In any event the statement should be made that the assent of his excellency has been obtained and that the bill is submitted to the house under those circumstances, under the provisions of the statute.

Mr. GARDINER: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HARBOURS AND PIERS ACT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to amend the Government Harbours and Piers Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I stated during the discussion of the resolution, the proposed amendments to the Government Harbours and Piers Act are desired primarily to meet changes in wharf and transportation requirements that have taken place since the act was last amended, but particularly on account of the provisions of the Consolidated Audit and Revenue Act, which requires that all the revenue of Canada shall be paid into the consolidated revenue fund. The act involves no change in practice as far as the department is concerned. The change contemplated under this amendment is exactly the practice which has been followed for many years, but conditions have changed over the years, and these are minor amendments which are designed to bring the act up to date.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Before second reading is given, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my opposition to this bill in its present form, because it proposes to perpetuate a form of taxation which in its application to the smaller communities is unjust and shows unfair discrimination. I would not take up the time of the house but for the fact that I have brought the matter before the minister and the officials of his department on several occasions, and to my dismay they have expressed renewed determination to continue this system of collecting tolls and duties, leaving without redress the smaller communities, who have suffered in some degree because of the methods employed in the past.

I wish to make it clear that I am dealing solely with the smaller communities, whose only contact with outside civilization or with the industrial centres on which they must depend for supplies and to which they must ship their produce is over the government wharf. In the tolls that have been charged under this act the people in these communities have been penalized in their endeavour to face pioneer conditions, encouraged as they have been to leave the cities and face the inconvenience of life as found at some points along the coast. My plea is for the residents of these smaller communities. They are taxed, as all citizens are, for highways, but they have no access to our highway system. They are taxed for various public works, but it is seldom that they have an opportunity to enjoy the facilities provided in this regard by this dominion. Citizens who reside on the inland waters and canals of the country, for instance, and who use the wharves there located, are not taxed to the same degree, even though they have access to our highway and railway systems. They are not required to pay an additional toll for the privilege of importing necessary commodities or exporting their produce.

To show the impracticability of the present system of taxation under this bill I would refer to the returns requested by me last session. They indicate that during the fiscal year 1934-35 the total revenue secured from the collection of top wharfage was $92,096.71. For the fiscal year 1935-36 the total revenue secured from that source was $87,951.29. Out of the total revenue the commission paid to wharfingers in 1934-35 amounted to $24,862.91 and in the subsequent fiscal year to $26,034.91. That is, in 1935-36 from the imposition of top wharfage tolls the net amount was $41,916.38.

May I point out that out of about 900 government wharves within the jurisdiction of the act, during the fiscal year 1934-35 these tolls were collected on only some 216. During the fiscal year 1935-36 they were collected on only 220. I find upon inquiry that, for reasons which I have not been able to discover, there is frequently some delay in reporting to the Department of Transport wharves constructed at public expense by the Department of Public Works; consequently not all these wharves are listed for the appointment of wharfingers or for the imposition of tolls. Only a small number of wharfingers are appointed and tolls imposed at such wharves listed with the Department of Transport, and I believe only a comparatively small number are so listed.

There is a reason for this, and I should like to direct the attention of the government to the matter at this time, because of the unfair discrimination. It is becoming increasingly difficult to secure wharfingers. The reason is obvious. The imposition of taxation in this form is extremely inconvenient to the residents in a small community. I believe the wharfinger is allowed fifty percent of the first $200 in tolls collected, and fifteen per cent of the tolls collected thereafter. He receives no other remuneration, and is not required to perform any definite service to the public. He is not required even to take a line when a steamer docks. So far as I can learn he is not required to afford proper protection to the commodities which pass under his charge. To illustrate the discrimination I shall refer hon. members to a specific instance which came to my notice, namely that of the appointment of a wharfinger last season at Robert's Creek, British Columbia. I brought this matter to the attention of the minister at the time, pointing out that most unfair discrimination had resulted. Robert's Creek is situated only a few miles north of another wharf at Gibsons Landing. No wharfinger has been appointed at Gibsons Landing and no tolls have been collected in that community. After all, as it stands the power of appointment within the act is permissive. Immediately upon the appointment of the wharfinger the collection of tolls become mandatory. The appointee was selected for no other reason, I believe, than that he had been a faithful follower of the Liberal party, and his appointment caused grave discontent in the community. As a matter of fact at one time I thought there would be a repetition of the Boston tea party.

As the situation developed the people of the community felt that their only recourse was to make it so extremely inconvenient for the wharfinger that he might have to discontinue his duties. That was a most unfortunate situation, and one which I believe is not at all in the public interest. The two communities are connected by a road, and one can readily understand the feeling of the residents affected by the toll. Small storekeepers in that community, as compared with the storekeepers in the south, were penalized unfairly and discriminated against with consequent diversion of business. The residents of the community, many of whom are on relief, are required to pay the toll on every small shipment of assorted groceries. Although the amount charged may be exceedingly small, it amounts to no little inconvenience and hardship to people in straitened circumstances who are now suffering very definite distress. The dairy ranchers in the community who import or ship produce are unfairly penalized. True, supplies for fishing vessels and gear are exempt, nevertheless the supplies required by families of fishermen resident in the community are subject to the imposition of these tolls.

Under the act power is given to impose the collection of side wharfage tolls. That is, it is presumed that every steamship docking at a government wharf is required to pay a toll amounting to about 50 cents. However, steamship companies enjoy the privilege of a commutation rate, and on making inquiry at the department I find that the Union Steamship Company, plying between these points on the Pacific coast, and enjoying a subvention of $18,000 annually, does not pay side wharfage tolls at Robert's Creek. Consequently we have the situation under which the residents pay top wharfage tolls and the steamship company, already generously subsidized from the federal treasury, does not pay side wharfage. Upon inquiry I find they pay tolls only at two wharves in that district, namely at Irvines Landing and Gibsons Landing, and even at these points they enjoy a commutation rate of something like $5 per month.

I have in mind another wharf considerably north of the points in question, where every hour of every working day one can hear the rumble of the wheels of trucks connected with an industry transshipping logs for the export trade. No attempt is made at that point to levy tolls on an industry far more capable of paying them than are the residents in the community I have mentioned.

I consider the situation unbusinesslike and unfair. No stipulated remuneration is indicated, and the wharfingers have no definite responsibility to render a service to the public.

The residents in the community in question pay not only top wharfage toll, but also side wharfage, whether or not it is collected. That toll is incorporated in the freight and express charges levied upon goods carried by the steamship company. They also pay their portion of any tolls which may be collected on goods going in or out of the port of Vancouver. As a matter of fact, when these tolls are added to the prices paid in the small communities I believe it is not unfair to say that tolls are collected three or four times over, and that they constitute an additional imposition and penalty upon people who can ill afford to bear that burden. I repeat that in comparison with other citizens of the dominion these people are discriminated against.

Before the bill reaches the committee stage I would urge upon the minister that he give some assurance of an amendment which would exempt from the imposition and collection of tolls these smaller communities entirely dependent upon traffic which passes over the government wharves serving them. In a measure larger than heretofore I suggest that for the construction and maintenance of wharves the government should rely for reimbursement upon the collection of side wharfage tolls. No steps should be taken to collect more than side wharfage tolls, because after all they are passed on to the consumers resident in the district. I see no reason why the poorer sections should pay tolls twice over.

May I point out further that it is not within the range of practicability to appoint wharfingers at all these wharves. Public sentiment is definitely against such appointments. As I have pointed out, their appointment occasions grave inconvenience, and only too frequently the situation becomes so unpleasant that the official appointed is compelled to resign. Frequently those offered this unpleasant work refuse to accept it at the remuneration stipulated. The wharfingers collect commissions in very small amounts from small assortments of groceries and other small shipments. It would be a better policy if the government attempted to collect side wharfage tolls, which could be accomplished more easily and in a more businesslike way. The collections could be made at a lesser expense at the head office of the steamship companies serving the communities.

I strongly commend the matter to the consideration of the government, in order that we may not by the second reading of this bill perpetuate an unsound, unfair and unjust principle of taxation which in its application results in grave discrimination.

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this bill embodies an amendment to a statute, and it cannot be said to express any particular principle, apart from the one to which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacNeil) has referred. However, there is another matter of some importance which I think may be discussed in committee. I refer to the question of appointments. The old statute provided that these were to be made by the governor in council; the new bill provides that they are to be made by the minister, but that the salary is still to be fixed by the governor in council. To this extent there is a complete change in the principle embodied in the old statute. I do not desire to take up the time of the house in dealing with the matter at this time, other than to say that the adoption of the motion for second reading must not be taken as agreement to every point in the bill. Our rights, such as they are, to discuss the matters involved in the various sections when the house is in committee we reserve at this time in order that the bill may be expedited in its passage.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I assume that when the minister closes the debate he will deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). I think the hon. member has a misconception of the situation. He refers to the imposition of wharfage charges on these government wharves as taxation. I consider such charges to be payment for services rendered. The hon. member referred to the imposition of this taxation upon the people in these small places, but he went on to say that out of 900 wharves owned by the government, these charges were made at only 220. He stated that the wharfinger gets 70 per cent of the fees, but I believe he gets only 50 per cent up to $200, and 15 per cent after that. The hon. member said that the wharfinger rendered no services for these fees, but I think he does render a distinct service.

The wharfinger checks the freight into a shed which is kept under lock and key. When the countryman or fisherman comes along and asks for his goods, there is a guarantee that they are there, that they have not been stolen or tampered with in any way. The wharfinger checks the unloading and hands out the freight upon the production of the bill of lading. The fisherman is assured that he gets the stuff for which he has paid. If this freight were left on an open wharf with no one to take care of it, the first person who came along might take something belonging to someone else. The freight might get wet or the crows might destroy part of it. If I were living in one of these small communities I would infinitely prefer to pay the ridiculously small charge made in order to have guaranteed protection for my goods. The steamer arrives at many of these points at very uncertain intervals, and if there was no wharfinger it would mean the people would have to remain five or six hours waiting for the boat in order to take delivery themselves. I think the services rendered are worth far more than the charge made.

Mr. BENNETT: Many of the wharves have no shed.

Mr. NEILL: Many of them have no sheds; the freight is left in the open, and the crows can destroy a sack of corn in a very short time. The sea gulls are not altogether innocent in this regard. I believe the great majority of the wharves do have small sheds into which the freight can be put if only to protect it from the rain.

The hon. member suggests that side wharfage should be charged and collected from the steamer. Such a practice would substantially increase the expense to these people on whose behalf he is arguing. If side wharfage is collected from the steamer it will mean that these fishermen will have to pay considerably more for their goods. The steamers will certainly either increase their rates or add the charge to the customer's bill.

There is a schedule of rates fixed by government regulation, and anyone who looks at them can see how ridiculously low they are. The charges average not more than ten or fifteen cents per ton, and the wharfinger gets fifty per cent. After waiting three or four hours for a boat to come in, he meets it sometimes in the middle of the night and checks off perhaps two tons of freight. There are many places at which these steamers call where even less than that is delivered. He checks in the freight and he goes home. The next day somebody comes along and wants 200 pounds of freight. The charges might be ten cents, of which the wharfinger's share would be five cents. He may have to walk a mile to the wharf from his home if he does not happen to live right on the wharf. Tom Jones who receives a small shipment has a guarantee that his goods are protected. The wharfinger gets five cents commission. He walks home again and shortly afterwards Mrs. Smith comes along and wants a crate of chickens, on which the charges are eight cents, the wharfinger getting four. The charges are very reasonable when compared to the services rendered. The charges on privately owned wharves are two, three, four and sometimes five times as much as those on the government wharves.

The hon. member declared there was discrimination due to the fact that on one wharf there will be a wharfinger while on another one a few miles away there will be none. That state of affairs is not brought about by political pressure or instigation; it is simply due to the fact that no one will take on the position of wharfinger at that particular wharf. When a man is asked to take over the job he will reply that he cannot do it for the remuneration offered. This is what has happened at many wharves, and the result is that they remain without wharfingers and consequently without collection of wharfage.

The Department of Public Works build these wharves and then turn them over to the Department of Marine for operation. The hon. member for Vancouver North said he did not know why, and I do not know why, there is very often an interval between the time the wharf is built by the Department of Public Works and the time it is handed over to the Department of Marine. I have noticed this before but I have never felt inclined to kick about it. I have always considered that the wharf was better looked after by the Department of Public Works than it would be when handed over to the Department of Marine. Since the present minister took charge of the department he has sent out notices, I suppose of a general character, to all these places to the effect that he wants a wharfinger appointed. At times I have tried to get someone to take the position of wharfinger, but no matter who I asked or what his politics were, I have been unable to do so. In one or two places I have been told that the public preferred not to have wharfingers. They make a sort of day of it and go down to meet the steamers to get what freight is coming in. The great difficulty has been to get men to accept these positions.

I do not think the general public is discriminated against because of the charges made. I am quite sure that if I lived in one of these places I would be only too glad to pay the small wharfage charges in return for the services rendered. I repeat that it is not a question of taxation; it is a question of payment for services rendered, and these are out of all proportion to the revenue obtained. That is the trouble; you cannot get anyone at the revenue provided by the government. I think the government ought to give the wharfinger all he collects up to, say, $200 a year. I have no doubt the minister will deal with the matter when he replies.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the address of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has shortened mine considerably. A statement was made which I should correct, that no wharfage is charged on inland waters. That is entirely erroneous. Such docks as are built by the Public Works department and turned over to Transport for operation are provided with wharfingers where possible and exactly the same scale of fees is charged as on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. There are certain docks along the canals, and these charge a somewhat higher scale of wharfage. The revenues are taken into the canal accounts rather than into the accounts we are considering here.

The figures given by my hon. friend from Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) do not agree with mine. According to my figures there are 948 wharves under the management of the department, of which 381 have wharfingers and 567 have not. The gross collections for 1935-1936, that is, in respect of both side and top wharfage, were $146,697.07, while the amount retained from that as remuneration for the wharfingers was $26,034.94, leaving a net revenue to the department of about $120,000. Of the 381 wharves having wharfingers, only 282 yield revenue. For the remainder a wharfinger is appointed who makes his reports, but the reports indicate that there is no movement over the dock. Of the number yielding revenue only fifty-one yield $500 gross each; twenty-nine yield over $1,000 gross, and one wharf yields up to $15,000.

As for the abolition of wharfingers, I think that would be a backward step. Many of the docks require services other than just the tying up of ships and the counting of cargoes. Many of the docks have sheds used for various purposes, and of which the wharfinger is custodian. We have, for instance, potato wharves, some of them heated; many wharves have lights, and it would be quite impossible to operate lights for the dock unless someone is responsible.

I think it is a great pity to stir up feeling against the collection of wharfage at any point. Every town that asks for the accommodation of a public dock should have enough public spirit to fall in with the appointment of a wharfinger and pay the trifling fees that are charged for the service. In fact I think each dock should have a wharfinger, whether there is any business there or not. If the government builds a dock at that point, someone should be responsible. We should have the benefit at head office of reports from the locality indicating what repairs are necessary; and, where the traffic warrants, the dock should be lighted, and someone should be responsible for the lights.

The suggestion was made that side wharfage should be charged and top wharfage eliminated, and that side wharfage should be collected at head office from the steamship companies. That could be done, although it would be simply substituting an indirect tax for a direct tax on the user of the docks, and probably the indirect tax would be much higher than any direct tax paid through a wharfinger. The difficulty in that method of collection is that we would have no one at the dock responsible for the operation and condition of the dock, which is very important. Under all the circumstances, therefore, I believe the present system meets the case better than any other that has been suggested to-day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Application of act.

Mr. BENNETT: It says:

> Nothing in this act shall apply to any harbour under the administration, management and control of the National Harbours Board or of any commissioners appointed under any act of the parliament of Canada.

Are there not a number of places where a certain form of commission is appointed which would hardly be covered by this language? Is it broad enough to cover them all?

Mr. HOWE: I think it covers them all. I can think of no commission that is not appointed under an act of parliament. We appoint two commissions in some cases, and sometimes one.

Mr. BENNETT: I had in mind cases where the municipality appoints its own commission.

Mr. HOWE: I think in that event there is a commutation of wharfage. There are municipalities where the dock is leased to the municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: As long as the minister is satisfied on that point, I am.

Mr. HOWE: This corrects the old list of exempted wharves, which is now erroneous.

Mr. BENNETT: Toronto, for example, has a municipal commission.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but it is under a dominion act. We appoint two commissioners there.

Mr. BENNETT: We do not appoint the commission.

Mr. HOWE: No, but we appoint commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: We appoint only a certain number of the commission.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: The commission is a municipal one, and as a matter of fact the harbour works are harbour works of the municipality. We give some assistance to them in connection with the harbour, and we have a representative on the board. It was cases of that kind I had in mind when I raised the question. I wanted to be sure that there is no doubt about the legislation being comprehensive enough to meet the situation

Mr. HOWE: My right hon. friend will notice that the word used is "commissioners."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: It says, "or of any commissioners appointed under any act of the parliament of Canada." I think that covers the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to take up time, but that is the point I was raising. These commissioners are not appointed under an act of the parliament of Canada; they are appointed by the city council. In the case of Toronto harbour, I think we named two commissioners—I speak subject to correction—

Mr. HOWE: Ordinarily it is two, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the very words the minister has quoted which directed my attention to the thought that perhaps the language was not comprehensive enough. It says:

> . . . under the administration, management and control of the National Harbours Board or of any commissioners appointed under any act of the parliament of Canada.

These commissioners are not all appointed by act of parliament. However, the minister's attention has been drawn to it, and that is sufficient.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Appointment of officers and employees.

Mr. MacNEIL: In view of the discussion on the second reading I should like further information from the minister as to what instructions are given to the wharfingers. There seems to be some misunderstanding, because in the district I represent I have had no evidence that wharfingers are required to render service to the public of the kind to which reference was made by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). There is a haphazard performance of their duties. They do not assist in taking lines from vessels or share any responsibility for the care and protection of goods that are landed on the wharf. In the district to which I refer very seldom do vessels bring in goods to any considerable quantity except during daylight hours.

Mr. HOWE: The wharfinger has a general supervision of the dock. He is not necessarily a warehouse man. He does not assume financial responsibility for the goods that are put on the dock, though he has instructions to see that they are properly taken care of and distributed. He collects the fees at the dock, looks after the dock in a general way, takes care of the lighting if there is any, and so on.

Mr. MacNEIL: I may remark in passing that at the wharves I speak of there are no lights except such as the residents provide. In what manner are these appointments made?

Mr. HOWE: They are made by the minister. The recommendations come from the member for the district or from the department's agency, in case the member is not able to nominate a wharfinger. We use every means at our disposal to get a man who is willing to act. The difficulty is to get men. I have some 500 letters outstanding asking for wharfingers, and have not been able to get satisfactory replies. The treasury have men checking up as well because they must look after the interests of the treasury.

Mr. HEAPS: Why can men not be obtained?

Mr. HOWE: For the reason stated a moment ago. There is some little agitation worked up at local points; they may decide that they will not have a wharfinger, and if one is appointed he is not allowed to act. It is a local revolution, and I hope that hon. members will have nothing to do with one.

Mr. MacNEIL: I can assure the minister that if there is any local revolution I have nothing to do with it. I want to draw his attention to three wharves within a few miles of one another connected by road—Gibsons Landing, Robert's Creek and Wilson's Creek. These wharves were constructed and are maintained at the public expense. No top-wharfage tolls are collected, but side wharfage tolls are collected at Gibsons Landing. At Robert's Creek a wharf constructed a number of years ago and which was recently transferred to the Transport department, the wharfinger was appointed last season. The minister can understand the resentment that arises in a community, when after they have been shipping produce for a number of years without paying any toll, to have one suddenly imposed upon them at a time when hardship is bound to ensue. Immediately north is Wilson's Creek and as far as I have been able to discover that has not yet been transferred to the department. Those who enjoy the facilities established at public expense at that point pay no toll.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) referred to the collection of side-wharfage dues. The rate is set by regulation under the act, and I believe it is something like 50 cents per call for vessels of the size that make use of these wharves, vessels under 500 tons. In the fixing of freight and express charges on goods moving back and forth, the side wharfage charges are taken into the calculation, and the residents must pay the side wharfage due in such case whether it is actually collected by the government or not at any of these points. On what basis this is computed in the carriage rates I am not sure. In view of the circumstance I have brought to the minister's attention, I should appreciate some suggestion from him as to how this obviously unfair discrimination might be eliminated. Even if it is extremely difficult to appoint wharfingers some other scheme might be devised so that one particular community might not be singled out while others escape the payment of the toll. The imposition of this tax on the smaller communities is quite unnecessary. The people do not enjoy the services which one would regard as only reasonable in view of the charges collected, and they suffer many inconveniences in addition. I suggest that the residents of these places should be encouraged to stay there instead of being discouraged by the government. Has the minister any suggestion as to how this unfair discrimination might be removed?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has referred to Gibsons Landing, which is perhaps a fair example of many of these wharves. In 1928 there was considerable correspondence in an effort to obtain a wharfinger for that point, but without success. The effort was renewed in 1930, again without success, and in 1931 there was again a good deal of correspondence. Efforts were made again at the end of 1935 and early in 1936 and we are still unable to get a wharfinger. I understand that this place is in the hon. gentleman's constituency and if he is willing to look into the matter and suggest a name for wharfinger, we will be delighted to appoint him.

Mr. MacNEIL: Can the minister tell us why side wharfage tolls are not collected at all points and levied against the steamship company? I would point out to him that in these districts I have mentioned side wharfage dues are paid only at Irvine's Landing and Gibsons Landing. At Robert's Creek, although top wharfage tolls are collected, side wharfage tolls are not.

Mr. ESLING: At what points at West Kootenay, along the Arrow lakes and Kootenay lake, are there wharfingers?

Mr. HOWE: With regard to the question asked by my hon. friend (Mr. MacNeil), the wharfinger should collect side wharfage tolls at all points. If he collects at some and not at others he is negligent. The act provides that the minister may commute wharfage with steamship companies by paying them a lump sum for the season or per month through the head office by arrangement with the department, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is no attempt at evasion. As regards the question asked by my hon. friend from Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) I understand that he wishes to know at what points on the Arrow lakes there are wharfingers. The following wharves are on interior lakes. I am not quite familiar with the geography: Naramata, Peachland, Penticton and Summerland appear on the list as having wharfingers.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This seems to be the only clause in this bill of any great importance and I should like the minister to explain why he is suggesting this change, which is a rather serious one. Under the present law all the employees are appointed by the governor in council. It is quite true that the recommendations for appointments have always been made by the minister, but the onus of making the appointments rests with the government as a whole. In this clause the minister is asking that he shall be given the sole authority to make appointments without going to the governor in council. What possible reason is there for making such a change?

Mr. HOWE: This practice goes back to 1923. Prior to that it was a duty of the civil service commission, and prior to that, when this act was drafted, it was done by the governor in council. The civil service commission found it absolutely impracticable to handle these appointments, probably because it is so difficult to get anyone to act. In 1923 an amendment was passed to the Civil Service Act excepting these appointments from the operation of the act and placing them under the minister. I do not know why it should be under the minister rather than the governor in council, except that the transactions are so small that it seems hardly worth while cluttering up the minutes of council with them.

Mr. BENNETT: The council fixes the salaries.

Mr. HOWE: It approves the remuneration.

Mr. BENNETT: They are determined.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, the regulations are determined by order in council.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think the minister has given any good reason for the change. After all, this is the only clause of any importance in the bill. I quite agree that the civil service commission could not make these appointments satisfactorily, and I think the change was properly made giving the authority to the governor in council. But now the minister himself is asking for authority to appoint these people. It has been my experience that the recommendation of the minister has usually been agreed to by council. There must be some reason which we do not know why the minister seeks this change. Why does he not leave it alone? I take it the bill is brought in for no other purpose than to provide for the change suggested in section 3. I for one should like some satisfactory explanation.

Mr. HOWE: The present act provides that it shall be done by order in council. In 1918 the Civil Service Act provided that these appointments should be taken from the governor in council and placed in the hands of the civil service commission. In 1922 the Civil Service Act was amended to provide that these appointments should be made by the minister. That has been the practice since 1922; they are appointed by the minister by virtue of the amendment to the Civil Service Act of 1922. We are simply changing the act to conform to the existing practice. For the past fifteen years the appointments have in fact been made by the minister without reference to the governor in council, by virtue of the amendment to which I have referred.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister mean that notwithstanding the way this act reads at present the minister has been making these appointments without referring them to the governor in council?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. We do it, as I say, by virtue of the amendment to the Civil Service Act of 1922.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My memory of it is that it has not been done in that way, but if the minister is certain—

Mr. BENNETT: It was done by the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: My officers assure me it is done by departmental letter, and has been done in that way since 1922. In actual practice the minister is seldom consulted about it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is to see if they will take the position, but I can recall orders in council appointing wharfingers. The difficulty has been to find someone willing to be appointed, but when the time for appointment came I can recall some cases at least during recent years in which the recommendation of the minister was that so and so be appointed and that the salary consist of the fees which he receives; dozens of cases of that kind come to my mind at the moment. The minister is quite right in saying that there is no reference to the minister about it. When someone has expressed willingness to act, the appointment is made in the manner indicated in the statute.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps my right hon. friend is confusing wharfingers with harbour masters. They also are paid by fees of office. My two officers, one of whom has been in the department many years, assure me that no wharfinger has been appointed by order in council since 1922.

Mr. BENNETT: He should know. It may be that I confuse wharfingers with harbour masters.

Mr. ESLING: I think the minister will find that he is letting himself in for a lot of trouble, as far as the wharves serving small communities are concerned. Along the Arrow and Kootenay lakes there are about forty small wharves. In all my experience of forty years I have heard of only one wharfinger having been appointed in that district, and he had a rather unhappy experience. He had a consuming desire to possess a government job. He was appointed under the fee system. There happened to be an Anglican missionary parson there, and about the only real money that wharfinger ever collected was a dime. The parson was getting aboard the boat and happened to remember that he wanted to go back to the store. He left his suit case on the wharf. When he came back and took it up he was told to drop it; that it would cost him ten cents. The fact is that steamers along the Arrow lakes refuse to pay any fees; they just run the bow on the beach, throw out a plank and load or unload their freight on the beach. The communities protest against the payment of any fees. In one place they directed that their freight and express be unloaded on the wharf opposite and it would be brought over on the ferry free of charge. The wharfinger put the freight into the shed, locked the shed, which was an unusual thing, and went home for the day. About six miles away there was a logging camp. The men came in the evening to get their week's supply of meat, and found the shed locked. They observed that there were strap hinges on the door, so they got a screw driver and took off the hinges and took their meat home. The next morning the wharfinger came down and thought that someone had been tampering with the lock, so he bought a new padlock at his own expense. The next week the same thing occurred. Then he took a logging chain and put it around the shed and through the handles of the door. Shortly afterwards the loggers came down for their meat, and they took off the logging chain, door and all, and threw it into the lake. It required an order in council to have the man appointed and an order in council to have him removed on a protest from the people at that point. So as I say, the minister will have a lot of trouble, first of all through protests against the fees, and then if it is to be a salary over and above any fees he will have a good deal of difficulty in satisfying the innumerable applicants for these posts.

Mr. McIVOR: I think that is one case where the minister would be wise in not appointing anyone. It would be in the interest of the clerical gentleman.

Mr. HOWE: There are many communities more law-abiding than the one just described.

Mr. MacNEIL: I understand the minister corrected the figures. I may explain that these figures were furnished on an order of the house for a return last session. I understand that of some 948 wharves there are only a limited number on which top wharfage dues are collected. I am not so much interested in the appointment of wharfingers as in the exact number of wharves where top wharfage dues are collected. May I also ask if those 948 wharves represent the total number of government wharves or only those that have been transferred to the Department of Transport? Is there any considerable number of wharves over and above that number not yet transferred from the Department of Public Works?

Mr. HOWE: I may say that exactly 282 wharves yield revenue, both side and top wharfage being collected. There are many wharves that have not been turned over to us for administration, and are still under the Department of Public Works.

Mr. RYAN: In connection with the appointment of wharfingers, is it the intention of the government to appoint them for a number of years?

[Mr Esling]

Mr. HOWE: They are appointed during pleasure, which usually means that they are permanent during good behaviour.

Mr. KINLEY: How does the department determine when a wharfinger is needed at any particular place?

Mr. HOWE: We try to get wharfingers for all wharves, but that is not always possible. We have agents scattered all over the country; we get a report from our agent as to the business over the wharf, and if it is a very substantial amount we make a determined effort to secure a wharfinger. By law we are supposed to have a wharfinger for every wharf in Canada, and we make every attempt to do so.

Mr. KINLEY: But there is not a wharfinger for every wharf?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. KINLEY: I assume this bill has nothing to do with railway wharves?

Mr. HOWE: Nothing at all.

Mr. KINLEY: In my county there is a railway wharf at Lunenburg and another wharf at Bridgewater. It appears that the wharf at Bridgewater is controlled by the Department of Public Works and the wharf at Lunenburg is controlled by the railway company. There is no wharfinger at Lunenburg but there is a wharfinger at Bridgewater. I may say that the wharves which are under the control of the Department of Public Works are much better looked after than the wharves under the control of the railways; we find it much harder to get repairs from the railways. Very few of the wharves in my county have sheds on them, so that the service rendered in return for the top and side wharfage is not so apparent as it might be at other points. However, I must say that I do not think there is any attempt to collect wharfage from the small dealer who lands at the wharf; I think it is collected only from a ship with a cargo, and that sort of thing, and of course that is expected.

On section 4—Detention of vessel at subsequent port of call.

Mr. BENNETT: Should you not make it read "any other Canadian port" in line 9? We want to make it clear that we cannot claim the right to hold a ship anywhere else than in a Canadian port.

Mr. HOWE: I have no objection whatever.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it is implied in any case.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

General—Civil Pensions—
Life pension to Robert Allen, $269.52.
Life pension to Walter Pettipas, $515.90.
Life pension to Florence Walker, $360.
Life pension to Arnold Truman Townsend $420.
Life pension to Michael Mountain, $420.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): This is a non-contentious item, some of the details of which have been in the estimates every year since about 1916, dealing with injuries sustained by civilians who have been working in connection with the Department of National Defence, or the widows of such who died.

Mr. BENNETT: It has only to do with special pensions arising out of injuries during the current year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Out of injuries at various times, and for which provision could not be made either under the provincial compensation act or under our own Pension Act.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like to ask if, after one particular item has been passed, whether it stands good for the year for which it was passed? For instance, I read: "Life pension to Arnold Truman Townsend, $420." That will be good for one year?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: The department could not withhold any part of that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, not unless there was some compensating arrangement. The amount must be revoted by parliament each year.

Mr. ISNOR: Then I would like to direct the minister's attention to the fact that in the case of Michael Mountain there is something like three or four months of 1936 for which the pension has not been paid.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very happy to look into that case immediately for my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Civil Government—
Salaries, $640,248.
Contingencies, $42,088.70.

Mr. BENNETT: What does this cover?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): This vote involves an increase of $35,083. The increase is accounted for wholly by increases in salaries.

Mr. BENNETT: What are they?

Mr. ROGERS: In the headquarters staff and in the bureau of statistics. Shall I give the increases in order?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because this raises a question which I want to discuss in some detail. There is the question of what Mr. Muir is doing, and matters of that kind. I should like to have the particulars of the increases.

Mr. ROGERS: As I said a moment ago, the total increase over last year is $35,083. The first increase is that of Mr. F. E. Bawden, $240.

Mr. BENNETT: What does he do?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Bawden is connected with the branch of the department which deals with steamship subsidies.

Mr. BENNETT: What is his present salary?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Bawden's present salary is $4,260, which is being increased to $4,500. His title is director of trade routes and steamship subsidies.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister prefer that we discuss this appropriation item by item as we go along, or wait until he finishes?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe there are officials of the department here, and I am quite prepared to deal with these matters now if it seems desirable.

Mr. BENNETT: We will wait until they come, then. After the minister has made his statement we can deal with them further, when the officials are here.

Mr. ROGERS. I shall continue. Next, there is the salary of T. G. Major, transferred from Commercial Intelligence Service, $3,600; the salary of S. Cuddy, transferred from weights and measures, $2,790. That covers the headquarters office. I now come to the salary changes in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. They are these: One statistician, grade 2, vacant, $2,400; five clerks grade 2, at $1,080, totalling $5,400; one stenographer, grade 2, $1,080; 2 office appliance operators at $1,020, totalling $2,040; one stenographer, grade 1, $720; 18 clerks, grade 1, at $720, totalling $12,960, one office boy $600, making a grand total of $25,240. The column is completed by an item for statutory increases amounting to $3,213, making a total increase of $35,083, as indicated.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will observe that this departs from the procedure with respect to statutory increases in connection with salaries on a higher scale. I believe statutory increases amount to approximately five per cent; up to a certain point, that is the maximum. The others are cases in which special provision is made for those in the higher brackets. It would require something more than has been said to explain why that should be done, if it is not to be left open to the criticism that there was discrimination.

The other question I wish to raise is one which has to do with the dissemination of information. Some years ago the last government provided a publicity agent in the Department of Trade and Commerce, in the person of Mr. Muir. From information which comes to me I gather there has been some change in his position. I should like to know what his present duties are, and the kind of information he is responsible for gathering and sending abroad. I should like particular enlightenment as to the information he sends out of the country by cable and how and under what vote the bills for cables are paid.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be pleased to get the information as soon as possible. With reference to the first point raised by the leader of the opposition, may I say that in the case of Mr. Bawden the salary increase would be fully in conformity with the five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a maximum, and it exceeds the maximum.

Mr. ROGERS: It appears that Mr. Bawden was reclassified by the civil service commission, which accounts for his increase from $4,260 to $4,500. The other two in the headquarters staff were transferred.

Mr. BENNETT: I know about that.

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed Mr. Muir comes under the organization of the bureau of statistics and holds the office of an editor, grade 2. I take it that any information coming from him for publicity purposes would appear in the publications of the bureau of statistics.

Mr. BENNETT: So would I.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: I have no other information respecting the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point about which I was inquiring. Apparently the minister and myself have the same appreciation of the situation. I should like to know whether my information is correct. The minister will observe I was careful to say that I was informed; I do not know whether my information is accurate, but it is to the effect that Mr. Muir has been sending abroad cables in the nature of propaganda with respect to certain matters. I should like the minister to look into it and see whether he has incurred any bills for cables in the last few months. If so, out of what moneys are those bills paid, and is the bureau of statistics or the Department of Trade and Commerce responsible for them? In some instances the information is of a kind available in the department and known to the public only when given to it by the department. I believe it would be found that in some instances he has advance information with respect to matters, and makes it available by means which are denied—I think that is the proper word—to those who are responsible for the dissemination of information to the public generally. I would like the minister to look into the matter, fully realizing that he cannot answer to-day. The matter involves a question of principle which, I believe, is of some importance, which has been dealt with on more than one occasion, and concerning which the present leader of the government on more than one occasion in days past expressed very strong convictions.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be pleased to look into the matter. Of course the leader of the opposition realizes I have not the information before me at this time.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to have a precise understanding of the nature of the complaint. As I understand it, the suggestion is that Mr. Muir was giving information in a capacity other than that of an editor in the bureau of statistics.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know what he conceives his duty as editor to be. I was directing attention to information which had come to me, and I have asked the minister to ascertain whether that information has a foundation in fact, namely, that information has been cabled from this country at public expense. This information is in the nature of propaganda which at the time it was sent was not quite available to other organs of public opinion. I believe I have put it as fairly as I can.

Mr. ROGERS: I think I understand.

Mr. RYAN: Has any thought been given in the bureau of statistics to getting information respecting trade among the provinces of the dominion? It is almost impossible to learn from the figures obtained by the bureau what constitutes trade among the provinces. Some time ago the Duncan commission made a report on their inquiry into maritime claims in which they indicated that they had experienced difficulty in making a finding with respect to trade because they had not available the statistics to which I have referred. In the report of the commission we find at page 44 the following observation:

> We have had brought before us the lack of any comprehensive measurement of the trade of the maritime provinces with other provinces and with foreign markets. We were ourselves disappointed not to be able to pursue investigations on trade matters along lines which such statistics would have enabled us to do. We found on inquiry at the Dominion Bureau of Statistics that consideration had been given some time ago to this very subject but, mainly through lack of organization in the statistics relating to certain phases of transportation, it was not possible to proceed with the plans that had been formulated. We strongly urge that these difficulties should be overcome, as they can be, and that on this phase of internal trade a system of statistics should be made regularly available from as early a date as possible.

There was a recommendation made some years ago by the Duncan commission and I do not think any steps have been taken since then to obtain the necessary information. I appreciate the fact that the acting minister is familiar with the difficulties about which I am complaining, and I should like to know if any efforts are to be made to obtain statistics along these lines.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to find out what progress has been made by the bureau of statistics in the direction suggested by my hon. friend. I can say now that there are very serious difficulties in the way of securing that information accurately. I recall some years ago trying to arrive at an approximate balance with respect to a single province, and I found that the bureau of statistics could give little more than the movement of carloadings in and out of provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: And by water.

Mr. ROGERS: And the movements by water. After all, we could not reduce those to terms of dollars and cents; it is quantities only. Much of the carloadings consist of less than carload shipments and these could not possibly be reduced to dollars and cents. The bureau of statistics have done a very useful work in recent years in analyzing retail sales in the various provinces. I believe they have done that with a view to arriving at a more accurate measurement of internal trade than we have had hitherto. I should be surprised if the bureau felt at the present time that it could give us any assurance of being able to provide an accurate statistical summary of interprovincial trade. As a matter of fact the United States have encountered the same difficulty and have not been able to provide this information.

Mr. RYAN: Is the information as to retail sales available from the bureau?

Mr. ROGERS: If I remember correctly, this analysis of retail sales was commenced about five years ago. It was based particularly upon the census of 1931. Since that time there have been annual corrections and breakdowns of the retail sales in the various provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only an estimate, in the last analysis.

Mr. ROGERS: It does not profess to be accurate, although I believe a greater approach to accuracy is attained as the analysis is continued from year to year.

Mr. KINLEY: May I point out that this matter is becoming increasingly important because of the fact that some provinces now have income tax laws. Exporters in Nova Scotia have been subjected to taxes in Ontario on the profits of their trade in that province. The acting minister will see that this will disturb the balance as between a province which has an income tax and thus taxes the profit on trade from another province, and a province which has no income tax. For this reason I believe it would be very enlightening to have these statistics. We in the maritime provinces will be able to show that while we are subject to an income tax on goods going into the central provinces, we buy infinitely more from those provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: When the item covering the bureau of statistics is before the committee this information requested by the hon. member for Saint John (Mr. Ryan) and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) can be supplied. I have no doubt I shall be able to discover from the officials of the bureau just how far they have been able to make progress in the direction suggested, what obstacles still remain, and whether in their opinion they are insuperable.

As Mr. Muir is attached to the bureau of statistics perhaps I could give the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) the information he desires in this connection when that particular item comes up.

Mr. BENNETT: This item could pass so long as we are not precluded from getting to the bottom of that other matter.

Mr. ROGERS: The item could be carried subject to the undertaking that the case of Mr. Muir will be dealt with when the bureau of statistics item comes up.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Conciliation and Labour Act, $35,000.

Mr. ROGERS: This item covers the expenditures connected with the printing and publishing of the Labour Gazette, which is the official organ of the department. It also covers the salaries of persons employed as Labour Gazette correspondents, which range from $120 to $300 per year. At present there are only forty-three of these correspondents employed by the department. The item provides also for special work on rental and wage surveys, in providing statistics and for conciliation in labour disputes. I may say that it has been found desirable to make full use of the conciliation branch of the Department of Labour. Instead of encouraging the setting up of conciliation boards, it has been found that a conciliation officer from the department is often able to effect the same results at considerably less expense.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister indicate what changes have been made in the correspondents during the last year? I had one communication in connection with this matter.

Mr. ROGERS: I have before me a complete list of the correspondents but I have not a statement of the replacements. I can assure the leader of the opposition that there have been very few replacements.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought perhaps the minister could tell me what the changes were and why.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall have to speak from memory on this matter, but my distinct impression is that the changes made were due either to death or to retirement or, in certain cases, to the reinstatement of correspondents who appear to have been dismissed in 1930 or thereabouts. But there were very few cases of that kind.

Mr. BENNETT: There are only forty-three altogether.

Mr. ROGERS: To the best of my recollection there have not been more than half a dozen changes in the past year.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would ascertain at what points changes have been made.

Mr. MAYBANK: Would this item cover the expenses of the board which recently considered the dispute between the two railway companies and the men in connection with wage cuts?

Mr. ROGERS: That would come under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Conciliation boards to deal with railway disputes or disputes in connection with public utility companies would be set up under that act, which is covered by another item.

Mr. MAYBANK: Just one other question. Under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, while I cannot quote the section exactly from memory, the terminology of one section is such as to prevent, or to attempt to prevent, employers from changing hours of labour or general working conditions without reference to the employees of the particular industry affected. I wanted to bring before the house at some stage, and I ask whether this is the proper time, the question of the changing of the hours of labour and general working conditions in the Post Office Department, and to ask whether this government takes the position with reference to its own employees of being under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I should like the opportunity to discuss this question either under this head or at some other time, because it is most important that a government enacting legislation for the guidance of employers should itself be the best sort of employer, and ought to bring itself under its own statutes with reference to its employees. If this is not the proper time to discuss the question, I shall discuss it at some future time.

Mr. ROGERS: Without desiring in any way to curtail discussion on any particular point, I think it would be more appropriate if my hon. friend's question were brought up under the vote covering the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I might remind him, however, that the government has enacted a fair wages act, which does cover the wages and hours of labour of its own employees and also of those who are engaged on government contracts.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps under this item I might ask the minister if he can give us any information in regard to the strike at the cotton mills at Welland.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps my hon. friend will recall that last week the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Damude) directed the attention of the house to the strike at Welland and asked what progress had been made towards its settlement. I informed him at that time that a request had been received by the Department of Labour for the setting up of a board of conciliation. That request was made by the mayor of Welland on behalf of the city council, and also by the employees concerned. It was pointed out, however, that for the setting up of a board of conciliation for a dispute which did not relate to a public utility it was necessary to secure the consent of both parties to the dispute. When the hon. member for Welland put his question to me a few days ago, we were still in communication with the representatives of the company and hoped that they might see their way clear to accept a board of conciliation, but over the week-end it has developed that the company does not feel it desirable to have a board of conciliation established. At the same time they have advised us that they would welcome a conciliation officer from the Department of Labour. They have asked particularly that the chief conciliation officer should go to Welland in order to reopen negotiations for a settlement. That is the position at the present time.

I am glad to say that the employees concerned have also communicated that they would welcome the assistance of the chief conciliation officer at this time. It has been a prolonged strike of some six weeks' duration, if I remember correctly. The Department of Labour from the beginning offered its good offices in the matter, but up to the present time it has seemed to be impossible to bring the two parties together. However, in view of what has taken place in the last few days, I think we may assume that settlement has been brought nearer.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not criticizing anything that the department has done; for I think they have done all that is within their power to bring the parties together. But it does seem to me that the company concerned is playing for time, just in the hope that by keeping the men out longer and making their conditions more desperate they will ultimately compel them to go back on the company's own terms. I think that is a very unfortunate thing. I do not see myself why a company, particular one enjoying all the privileges of protection which this company does, should refuse conciliation, especially when it has been requested both by the employees and by the council of the town of Welland. I do not see what difference it makes whether they have a conciliation officer or a board of conciliation. There is really little difference. Had the company accepted the board in the first place, I have no doubt that the dispute would have been amicably adjusted within a very short time, but as it is now, there is no telling how long the strike may continue or the direction in which it may develop. I am sorry that the company has adopted the attitude it has, and I had hoped that the government would have found ways and means of bringing a company of that kind to time, at least to the extent that they would deal directly with their own employees.

Mr. ROGERS: I might point out that the mere setting up of a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act does not of itself ensure a settlement of the dispute, because it would still be open to either party to reject the proposed basis of settlement. So that the sending of a conciliation officer to Welland may conceivably have, and I certainly hope it will have, precisely the same beneficial effect as the setting up of a board of conciliation, and possibly within a shorter space of time.

I can inform my hon. friend that the Department of Labour did hope very much that the company would see its way clear to accept a board of conciliation, particularly in view of the fact that it had been requested by the city council and by the employees. We cannot do more than urge our views upon the company concerned. It rests with the company to determine whether or not under the circumstances it will consent to the setting up of a board.

Mr. HEAPS: All that I was pointing out, and it is borne out I think by what the minister has just said, is that if the company were willing to try to bring about an amicable adjustment, it would have been just as easy for them to say yes to the appointment of a board of conciliation as to say no, and it would at least have shown a willingness on their part to do something towards bringing about the settlement which I know the department so much desires. But evidently the company have thought fit to take a different course of action, and all I can do is to hope, as does the minister, that the chief conciliation officer will be able to bring about a settlement, which is much to be desired in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say a word supplementary to what has been said by my colleague? The minister says: We cannot do more. I think the department can do more. It is only a few weeks since I chanced to be in Welland for a few hours. The strike was then on. I met a number of fairly representative citizens, and they were, so far as I could find, unanimous in wishing for a settlement and in denouncing the very low wages and the very bad conditions that prevailed in that factory. The workers were trying to maintain order, and they were taking the only way open to them to press their claims for decent living conditions.

I received last night a telegram from the Welland textile workers strike committee, urging that this matter should be brought up in the house at an early day. They say they have done their part; they are willing to accept a board of conciliation. Indeed, they plead that a board be appointed. They refer to the very low wages and the bad conditions that have been revealed in the textile industry by the Turgeon commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would state the facts so that we might have them on Hansard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me, in view of the published facts with regard to conditions in the textile industry, and having regard to what the people in Welland call the arrogant attitude of the company in refusing to recognize the union or to accept a board appointed by the government, the state of affairs is such that it is not sufficient for the head of the Department of Labour to say, "We really cannot do anything about it."

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is not fair in that statement. I said that we could not do more under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act applies to public utilities generally. It can be applied to other industries provided that where a dispute has occurred in such other industry both parties to the dispute consent to the setting up of a board. In the present instance the employees did consent, in fact they requested, that a board be established and that request was supported by the city council of Welland. It was communicated to the company.

Mr. BENNETT: Both parties to the dispute could not have agreed.

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: After the decision of the privy council and the new act you had to have the consent of both parties or else the act was ultra vires.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. ROGERS: That is what I was trying to point out to my hon. friend. When I said that we could not do more I meant that we could not do more under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. We could not appoint a representative for the company.

Mr. HEAPS: When was the request made by the city council for a board of conciliation?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the file before me. I should think it was about ten days ago, and that request was communicated at once to Empire Cotton Mills, Limited, the head office of which is in Montreal. The communication received back from Empire Cotton Mills, Limited, was dated February 5, and was in the following terms:

> We will, however, be glad to cooperate with your department in any efforts which may seem to afford any chance of bringing the unfortunate situation in Welland to a close, and therefore we would welcome any opportunity to discuss matter further with you.

That followed the statement of the refusal of the company to consent to the setting up of a conciliation board, and upon receipt of that communication the Department of Labour at once wired the Welland textile workers' strike committee in the following terms:

> With further reference my telegram third letter received to-day from Empire Cotton Mills Limited declining for reasons stated to give consent to establishment of board of conciliation and investigation. This letter among other things states: "We will, however, be glad to cooperate with your department in any efforts which may seem to afford any chance of bringing the unfortunate situation in Welland to a close, and therefore we would welcome any opportunity to discuss the matter further with you." Copy of this letter being mailed to you to-day and shall be glad to have word from you in due course advising if in opinion your committee this department can be of further service.

Only this morning this reply was received from the strike committee:

> Press reports M. S. Campbell coming here.

He is chief conciliation officer of the department.

> We will appreciate his assistance immediately.

That comes from the strike committee, and the intention is that Mr. Campbell shall proceed to Welland at the earliest opportunity. Unfortunately he is ill to-day, but he hopes to leave for Welland with the least possible delay.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister limits the application of his words to what is possible under the conciliation act. I want him to go further than that. It seems to me that the government can go further in bringing pressure to bear upon the company and it should do so. As my colleague suggests, this company, in common with other textile companies, has very great privileges under our tariff. I have not the slightest doubt that if there were a strong and determined effort on the part of the government to impress upon the company very definitely that unless certain conditions were complied with these special privileges under the tariff would be withdrawn, not only would the company consider the matter twice, but pressure would be brought to bear by other textile companies to see that present conditions were remedied. When we have the abominable conditions that have been revealed to the public by the Turgeon commission—the public know all about it—I do not think we as a parliament can remain indifferent to this sort of thing. If the men riot and destroy property there is immediately a great cry and it is said that we must stand for law and order. Surely the most important duty of law and order is protection of the lives and welfare of the men, women and children of the country. In the textile industry men, women and children are being subjected to a degrading kind of life. They are not living as Canadians ought to live; it is impossible for them to live as Canadians should live. What is the use of safe-guarding law and order when we neglect the conditions that inevitably produce a breach of law and order—unless the people are content to become abject slaves. These textile workers, as far as I can gather, have proceeded in an orderly way and have been very patient. After a month their resources must be about exhausted, but this local company not only has its own resources but undoubtedly is backed by other aggregations of capital. I do not think the minister ought to stay within the bounds of the present conciliation act. In my opinion the department has a real duty to protect the interests of the workers, their standards of living and their right to organize.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) induce me to ask the minister to be good enough to state shortly the facts of this case. I always think—and my experience has taught me this—that it is very unsatisfactory and unfortunate for us to get a partial statement upon which we predicate conclusions only to discover subsequently that our conclusions were based upon an improper appreciation of the premises. Perhaps the minister would be good to inform us as to the date on which the trouble commenced, what was the cause of it, and what is the real issue which brought about the strike. If that were before the house it would be fair to all parties and would afford the members of this committee a fair opportunity to arrive at a much better understanding of the situation than can otherwise be expected. My hon. friend has used pretty strong language with respect to this strike, and I confess I do not know anything about it. That is why I was hopeful that the committee would have a statement which would enable each of us to apply such knowledge as we have to the facts that are agreed upon as being correct statements of the causes and of the point at issue between employers and employees, and as to what the contentions of the one and the proposals of the other are. The question of conciliation is another matter altogether. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act having been declared invalid, presumably the minister would say that the Prime Minister of that day was responsible for creating a condition much worse than the condition which existed before, in view of the fact that the court had held that the act was invalid.

Mr. ROGERS: In some respects.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I would expect that, the respects being purely political. But if we leave that aside, the position would be that the act having been declared by the court of last resort to be invalid in its application to an industrial dispute, let us say, we have upon the statute book a provision which means nothing at all. It merely says that if people agree to do something we shall do something. But if they can agree, they could agree to appoint a judge of the supreme court or anyone else as arbitrator. It is merely a statement that if they do agree, we shall appoint someone to represent us or we shall appoint the whole board. It is quite competent for two parties to a dispute to agree upon a mode of settling their difficulties. Our statute is merely declaratory, quantum valeat, of that right. The question of conciliation, however, stands upon an entirely different basis. There are a number of fair wage officers in the department—I am going to ask the minister about that presently—and those fair wage officers are charged with the duty and responsibility of investigating any differences that exist between employer and employees in communities.

Mr. MARTIN: Are they conciliation officers.

Mr. BENNETT: I say they are, broadly speaking. I thought the minister spoke of them as conciliation officers for the purpose of endeavouring to bring about what one might call a peaceful adjustment of differences in respect of many matters which arise in industrial establishments. My observation is that these conciliation officers have done remarkable work, and have brought about many adjustments of which I have had personal knowledge. In other words, in view of the fact that we cannot by law create a body charged with responsibility to determine the issue, for arbitration which was compulsory and therefore invalid, they have substituted negotiation. And that negotiation has in my judgment, brought about very desirable results.

I think the court held that the provinces have complete jurisdiction, that this is a matter of contract—the doctrine of property and civil rights once more—contract between the employer and employees, and the jurisdiction over the contract is provincial, just as Ontario has claimed jurisdiction over certain contracts between the Hydro Electric Power Commission and private enterprise. So, if I appreciate the decision of the court it is that such contracts of hiring, wages and employment are under the direct and complete control of the provinces. If the press reports are accurate—I make the statement with that reservation—the effort we made here to limit hours of labour and to provide for minimum wages, under the conventions made, was held to be bad because the court declared that, notwithstanding the provisions of section 132 and the peace, order and good government provision, this jurisdiction still rests with the provincial legislatures and not with this parliament. Therefore neither conciliation by fair wage officers nor adjustment by a board of conciliation may now be available as far as this parliament is concerned, but they may under the provisions of the Ontario statute, I think they reenacted the Lemieux act in terms; am I right as to that?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe after the privy council gave its decision the provinces did enact legislation which validated the Lemieux act with respect to disputes of the classes named in the dominion act, but which came within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is my apprehension of the situation. That is why I was anxious to have the exact facts. If that be so, then the jurisdiction to make a compulsory adjustment of contractual relations between employer and employee would rest entirely with either the provincial authorities or a body set up by them for that purpose. But I should like for my own satisfaction—and I think the members of the committee are in the same position—to have the minister give us a short résumé of the difficulties and of the situation as it now exists.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: The dispute was between the employees of the Empire Cotton Mills, Limited of Welland and the company.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that a subsidiary of another company?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no information before me which would indicate that. I am informed, however, that the head office of that company is in Montreal. It is possible that the same company conducts operations elsewhere. The dispute occurred on December 22 of last year. The matter at issue was a demand on the part of the employees for a twenty per cent increase in wages. A six per cent increase had been given by the company a short time before. The company took the position that, owing to the unprofitable operations in this particular plant, it was unable to grant the twenty per cent increase.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give us the hours of labour and the rates of pay that it was sought to increase by twenty per cent?

Mr. ROGERS: I would gladly give that information if I had it. As my right hon. friend realizes, these disputes are dealt with by a conciliation officer on the spot, and it is seldom that we have the record of all the facts until the dispute is closed, so to speak. I have before me a complete list of all the disputes which have been dealt with by conciliation officers and closed. But this present dispute is not yet settled and I am sorry that I have not before me the information asked for. If the committee so desire, I shall be glad to secure that information in order that it may be placed upon the record. It seems to me, however, that we are perhaps not in a position to judge the merits of the issue.

Mr. BENNETT: But we are; that is the very point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has expressed views which must be predicated upon knowledge of the facts. I have no knowledge of the facts, and I am therefore not in a position to say whether his view is too tolerant or otherwise. If we are to discuss it at all, it seems to me it would be well if we could have before us the facts upon which we might exercise a judgment, which might be wise or unwise, but which at any rate would be based upon knowledge of the facts. I cannot join issue with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, for I have nothing before me which would enable me to speak with any authority. He has used strong language with respect to one of the parties to the dispute; whether or not his language is warranted is a matter which I think we should be able to decide for ourselves in the light of the facts.

Mr. ROGERS: Then we shall let this item stand. I shall secure as quickly as possible all the information available and place it before the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister find out whether this is a subsidiary of one of the larger corporations?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I shall be glad to find that out.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the minister, in reading the letter from the company in Welland said that for reasons stated they would not accept a conciliation board. Would he let the committee know what the reasons were which were put forward.

Mr. ROGERS: What I read was from a memorandum, not from the letter itself. I have not the letter before me. I shall be glad to look into that as well and see if that information can be placed before the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has not before him at the moment the information as to why the company refused?

Mr. ROGERS: No; I have a memorandum which I requested just before the house convened this afternoon.

Item stands.

Fair wages and inspection, $11,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister tell the committee wherein, if at all, his department dealing with fair wages and inspection overlaps, conflicts with or duplicates the work of similar departments now operating in the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: The fair wages act which was passed by this parliament in 1935 applies to federal works and works done under contract for the dominion government. There is no question, I think, as to our competence to deal with wages in works of that kind. On the other hand, I think it is equally clear that it would not be competent for a provincial legislature to interfere with wages established by the dominion government on such works. There is no essential duplication at all in the operation of the fair wage act of the dominion parliament and similar legislation in the provinces.

Mr. MARTIN: I wonder whether this might be a convenient item on which to ask the minister if he could tell us how many conciliation officers there are; what is the difference between a conciliation officer and a fair wage officer and what are the duties performed by the conciliation officers when they are not engaged in attempting to settle disputes? I might ask also whether any changes are contemplated as to their functions, their duties and their numbers.

Mr. ROGERS: I am very glad this question has been raised at this time; whether under this item or another it does not really matter. There are four fair wage officers, with salaries ranging from $3,000 to $4,620, stationed at Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Ottawa. Their duties include the preparation of wage schedules for insertion in government contracts and investigations of differences arising on this point between contractors and workmen. Payments from the fair wages and inspection vote include travelling expenses of officers, telegrams, telephones, printing, stationery and sundries. It is found that these officers, by proceeding at once to the point of dispute, are often able to adjust differences, thus avoiding the expense of a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

I should like to elaborate upon that. In this country we have only four full-time conciliation officers—

Mr. BENNETT: Who are they?

Mr. ROGERS: —who at the same time are burdened, as I have said, with other duties which really do not arise in connection with the conciliation of labour disputes. I may give their names. There is the chief conciliation officer, Mr. M. S. Campbell, who, I may say, has been extraordinarily successful in the settlement of industrial disputes.

Mr. BENNETT: His residence being Ottawa?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Then there is Mr. Quirk, of Montreal, who covers the eastern district, including the maritime provinces; Mr. Compton, of Toronto, who covers what might be termed the central Canadian district, and Mr. Harrison of Vancouver, who covers British Columbia and the prairie provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: He was formerly at Saskatoon.

Mr. ROGERS: That is true. Last year I discovered that two of these gentlemen were approaching the retirement age. One of them is already over that age, and in the Department of Labour there are no understudies who are in a position to follow on after these men, who within a few years will have to retire. The work, as I see it, is one of great public importance, and I think I may say to the committee at this stage I felt it desirable that we should make arrangements at once for the appointment of four junior conciliation officers who would have the advantage of the experience of these older men before they were retired. That matter is not before the committee at the moment, but I believe it is in the interest of the efficiency of this branch of the department that this should be done, and I trust the necessary provision will be made for it very shortly.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently the information has leaked out.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think I can particularly complain of that, since I believe the change is in the right direction.

Mr. BENNETT: There is only one point to which I might speak, and it is one that arose in the years before 1935. Under the decision of the courts it is competent for any employer to say to a conciliation officer, "I do not want you here at all." That has been one of the difficulties which has appeared in a practical way. I wonder whether the minister has anything to say as to any further development in that connection. Perhaps the best illustration of that was found in a case some years ago in which the employer said, "I am quite capable of carrying on my own negotiations. Thank you: I do not want you." If my appreciation of the law as it stands is correct, we have no right to say to him that he must or should do so and so. Is that still the department's appreciation of the law?

Mr. ROGERS: The conciliation service operates more particularly under another statute, the Conciliation and Labour Act, which leaves it to the Minister of Labour at his own discretion to dispatch a conciliation officer to the scene of a dispute. But experience has proved that if the employer is entirely unwilling to accept the conciliation officer, to send him there may even prejudice a settlement which otherwise might be obtained. I believe actually this conciliation service of the Department of Labour is making its way through a recognition, on the part of employees and employers alike, of the fact that it can provide a very useful service in solving these disputes, and I doubt whether the matter can be dealt with upon any other basis. Compulsion is not going to induce employers or employees to accept willingly the services of a board of conciliation or a conciliation officer.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. HEAPS: How do they do it in Australia?

Mr. ROGERS: I had intended to come to that point. They have worked upon a somewhat different basis there. They have what in effect are wage courts.

Mr. BENNETT: Not in effect; that is what they are.

Mr. ROGERS: They operate as wage courts, originally under state law and now, I believe, under commonwealth law.

Mr. BENNETT: There were two. Mr. Bruce ran one election on the theory that there should not be two and that the federal court should be preferred to the state courts. The response was not quite as general as might have been expected. There are still two courts, the state court and the commonwealth court, and the very difficulty the minister has mentioned here applies in that country as well as in New Zealand. The decision of the court is not binding as a judgment of the court and therefore, notwithstanding the decision of the court, there have been strikes or cessations of effort. The ever present difficulty is the one to which the minister has just referred. You may negotiate and arrive at what you conceive to be a reasonable arrangement. Then, after you go away, one party to the dispute may say, "Well, after all we do not think this is satisfactory," and there is no power anywhere to give finality or effect to the decision that may be reached.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would the minister give us an idea of what value he places on these men, since apparently these matters seem to be under provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I may answer that in this way. The determination of wages and hours of labour would seem to fall within provincial jurisdiction, with the exception indicated as to federal public works and contracts for the federal government. But there is nothing to prevent the federal Department of Labour from offering the services of a conciliation officer to adjust any dispute whatsoever, provided the parties are willing. As a matter of fact, so far as the duties of a conciliation officer are concerned, it is not essential but it is obviously desirable that both parties be willing.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In this particular instance the one party was not prepared to accept these gentlemen.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe there is some confusion in the hon. member's mind. A little while ago we were speaking about a board of conciliation which might be set up under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. Within the last few minutes we have been speaking about conciliation officers of the Department of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: Who are negotiators only.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are they not the same men?

Mr. ROGERS: No; the board of conciliation is set up in this way: The employees' organization nominate a board member; the employers nominate another member, and these two bodies try to agree on a third member who will act as chairman. If they do not agree, the nomination of the chairman is left to the Minister of Labour. That is the way in which a board of conciliation is set up. On the other hand, a conciliation officer of the Department of Labour is a permanent officer of that department who gives his whole time to work such as I have described.

Mr. BENNETT: In a situation of some difficulty in which we were interested we had the province pass an order in council naming the same board as was named here, thereby eliminating the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my experience, conciliation officers have done good work. Even if such legislation were within the competence of the federal parliament, upon this occasion I am not going to express an opinion as to whether or not we should have compulsory conciliation or arbitration. Many observations could be made both for and against the convention. In industrial disputes usually one side or the other may not wish to negotiate. If the labourers or workers believe they have the advantage they take this position: "We have made our demands, and we are not going to discuss them." On the other hand, if the employer thinks the advantage is with him, and that he is within his rights in refusing to negotiate, he takes the same position. The conciliation officer may bring them together and point out to them that the dispute would not only affect the employer or the workers, but have social consequences as well, and in many instances he is successful in bringing the parties together. I believe every possible assistance should be given in the settlement of disputes, but it is my view that in the future the government may have to go much further than they have done in the past. In looking over the present world situation we find that in those countries where trade union movements have been generally accepted by employers and have become a part of the general life of the country, in the last few years labour disputes have been much less than in countries where employers have not accepted the trade union movement.

Mr. ROGERS: Great Britain, for example.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, and the Scandinavian countries. Although in past years there have been many important strikes in Australia, despite compulsory arbitration, in the last few years it has been fairly immune from protracted strikes. I believe the government will have to give the matter further consideration than has been given in the past.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. I notice that in the item fair wages are implied. I still receive complaints in regard to wages paid on government contracts, and I am wondering to what extent the Department of Labour goes in its investigation of these matters. Complaints are not so much about contracts let directly by various departments of government as about contractors to whom the government contractor has sublet, over which subcontracts the government may have no control. I wonder how far the Department of Labour can go toward seeing that the proper rate of pay is paid to workers on government contracts.

Mr. ROGERS: A schedule of wages is inserted in the specifications of all government contracts, and that specification also covers subcontracts. When a complaint is made an investigation is entered upon by the fair wage officer of the department. I believe one may say the sanction behind the discovery of any offence is the power of the government to withhold the balance of the contract price. I do not believe it is possible to have every government contract under continuous supervision. We have acted upon the principle that when there is a complaint it will be immediately investigated, and when proved, the remedy will follow.

Mr. HEAPS: Must there be a complaint before the department will make an investigation?

Mr. ROGERS: It is not necessary to have a complaint before making investigation, but on the other hand up to this time the department has not accepted the principle that we should employ enough inspectors to give continuous supervision to the performance of all government contractors.

Mr. HEAPS: I think there has been a good deal of confusion in connection with the fair wage stipulation in government contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on the part of the contractor himself.

Mr. HEAPS: It may be on the part of the subcontractor. I am speaking in a general way, and am not directing my remarks to any particular person who may perform government work. I do not believe the government, which has some responsibility in the matter, should wait until a complaint is received. The experience in all provinces has been that there is a tendency for employees to be afraid of submitting their complaints to union or government officials, because of the discrimination which ultimately might be exercised against such person.

Mr. BENNETT: Dismissal from his job.

Mr. HEAPS: I have known of cases in certain parts of Canada where proper wages have been entered in employers' pay-rolls, but where in fact the employers have not paid the wages prescribed by the provincial law and the terms of the contract. I do not suggest that there should be continuous supervision of the pay-roll of employers who are doing government work, but I do suggest that occasionally a fair wage officer should visit the concerns in question and examine the pay-rolls. Sometimes they might do well to get into contact with the officials of the union. Such action would no doubt have a salutary effect upon employers who may attempt to avoid responsibility.

Further, I have had complaints from good employers who want to pay reasonable wages as prescribed by law, or as arranged between themselves and trades unions. They complain about undercutting carried on by certain employers who are trying, by deducting from the wages of their employees, to make up the amount they have lost through a low bid. That is why I suggest to the minister the adoption of some method whereby a fair wage officer or some other employee of the department would have an opportunity of visiting these factories working on government contracts in order to see that the contracts are being lived up to.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend. I might say that there is quite effective supervision of the larger contracts. Also the schedule of wages is posted on the premises where the work is being done and is available to the trade unions particularly affected. In the nature of things, the complaint would come to the Department of Labour from the trade union whose members were adversely affected.

Mr. HEAPS: Supposing there is no trade union?

Mr. ROGERS: Any individual may make a complaint.

Mr. BENNETT: There is always somebody to write an anonymous letter.

Mr. ROGERS: Moreover, under the terms of contract, it is required that all fair wages schedules must be conspicuously posted on the premises, and it is therefore difficult for the contractor to avoid payment of the rates specified, as each workman employed can readily see for himself the rate to which he is entitled for the class of work which is being performed. The experience of the Department of Labour is that in individual cases where the proper wage rates are not being paid, word to this effect has generally reached the department either through the inspections made by departmental officers or through complaints from union officials, or from the workmen themselves. Very many of these adjustments made have to do with the proper classification of the work being done by individual employees. In all cases where it is found that workmen are not receiving proper payment for the class of service rendered, there is no hesitation in enforcing payment of the rates provided in the specification, for the full period involved.

In conclusion, I should like to say that when the department is enlarged, as I hope it will be, we shall be able to pay more attention to this phase of the work. However, I would not want to suggest that there has been any negligence on the part of departmental officers with respect to the enforcement of the fair wage clause. Any complaint which comes into the department is attended to without delay.

Mr. HEAPS: I realize that it would be impossible to carry on a strict supervision of all contracts let by the government, and I am glad to have the assurance of the minister that when the department is enlarged more will be done than has been done so far. No doubt there is in the files of the department a list of firms which have been notoriously unfair. Under these circumstances I do not think it would be out of the way to strike off the list of firms allowed to tender on government contracts those concerns known to be unfair, no matter what political stripe they might be. Perhaps the government could make up a sort of blacklist. In the past, blacklists of employees have been issued, so perhaps a blacklist of employers could be made up. I think this would have a good effect on employers in general and would tend to make other employers live up to the terms of their contracts.

Mr. BENNETT: I know of no case during the last few years in which any successful complaint has been made as to a violation of the fair wage provision of government contracts. There have been cases where it was contended that there had been a violation of the fair wage clause by subcontractors. I recall vividly the language used in this house by a former Minister of Labour in connection with wages paid on government contracts. The terms of the contracts are as strict as it is possible to make them in our language. It is provided that the wages to be paid shall be indicated on a notice to be posted up in a prominent place on the work so that every person working there shall have a clear appreciation of the wages to which he is entitled. However, on the other hand you have the subcontractor. In five cases out of every ten the work is not done by the original contractor. He lets a subcontract for his plumbing, for his foundation and excavation work and for his heating. This is where the real difficulty lies. In many instances the material was fabricated before the contract was even thought of; it is only when the material is delivered that they claim that particular establishment is unfair in the payment of wages. Bathtubs, copper piping and radiators may all be used in a building and may all come from subcontractors about whom complaints are made.

The minister is familiar with the clause in the contract, but that situation cannot be met in its entirety. We might as well face that quite frankly. I do not think any more men are required in the department to deal with all that we can legally deal with—I refer to the law as it now stands—because we cannot project the mind of the owner, the government in this case, into the past before a contract is let in order to determine that fair wages have been paid in the fabrication of certain materials. That was the fact in certain cases to which I could refer. Pipes, radiators and various items of that sort had been in stock at the time the contract was let. I had to investigate several of these matters and as I felt there must be something wrong, I went as far back as that. We then added to the contract the clause which is now in it referring to subcontractors. That did something to cure the evil.

A clerk of works is appointed on all large contracts. The duty of that clerk is to make a report to the Department of Public Works. Since his attention has been directed to this matter, this clerk now reports, first, that a notice has been placed in a proper place upon the premises. Then he reports as to whether or not any complaints have been made and as to whether or not the going wages as provided by the Department of Labour are actually being paid to the workmen. His job is to watch the progress of the undertaking. He is not the contractor's man; he is a government man. This is what he has been doing and I believe the complaints with respect to that phase of the matter have disappeared.

But we have not got past the subcontractor phase in its entirety. I cannot agree with my hon. friend in his suggestion as to blacklists. The very use of that word recalls memories of speeches in this house about the evils of blacklists; it was contended that these were almost as bad as the black plague or the black death. I do not think the government should do something which, if done by a private individual, would place him in a most difficult position in the courts of the country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I have in mind a different sort of contractor from the one referred to by the leader of the opposition. In connection with many of these contracts there will be subcontractors doing some excavating work. It is men like these who are usually the culprits. They hire people who are more or less connected with or dependent upon them, particularly in times of unemployment. They pay very small wages and no one knows anything about it. I remember several years ago we had a fair wage clause in the contracts let by the city of Regina for the erection of an additional building at the general hospital, and it was thought that fair wages were being paid. Not until some time afterwards did we discover that there was something which seemed to be collusion, and as a matter of fact the men who had been employed at lower than the fair wage were able to collect substantial sums. That is the type of subcontractor whom it is very difficult to deal with; yet he is the one who is something like a parasite upon labour. I thought it well to bring this to the attention of the department so that it might be guarded against so far as possible, although I know it is a very difficult matter to deal with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is another situation which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. I had a memorandum sent to me only this morning in regard to the condition on the waterfront in Vancouver. It seems that until a short time ago the freight handling, carloading, on the government owned Ballantyne pier and Lapointe pier was done by a certain group of longshoremen at the rate of 60 cents per hour straight time, that is from eight a.m. to five p.m., and 90 cents per hour overtime, which is any time outside those hours and all day Sunday. Now the rate is 50 cents per hour for any hour of the day or night, and the overtime rate applies on Sunday only.

The suggestion is that these rates have been altered by the Shipping Federation of British Columbia. The shipping federation is said to consist of certain dock operators and stevedoring companies and agents or representatives of various shipping lines, mostly foreign lines, together with harbour officials of the Dominion of Canada. It seems that these harbour officials sit in with this board. I do not know their exact relationship to the board, but the wages are determined by the shipping federation. This board refuses to recognize the I.L.A., the International Longshoremen's Association, as the name suggests, an international union. The question arises, what chance, under those conditions, have thesse men of having any voice in the fixing of their wages?

The men in their memorandum refer to what they state is order in council 7143, dated July 11, 1918. I have not checked this up, but I assume it is correct. Order in council No. 7143 provides that all employees have the right to organize in trades unions; that this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and that through their chosen representatives the employees shall be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay and other grievances.

Now these men have organized, but the shipping federation refuses to recognize them; it will not deal with them, and consequently they have no voice whatsoever. The men say. Why should the dominion government not carry out the spirit of this order in council and insist upon the recognition of the union, more particularly when the dominion government, through its representatives, sits in with the shipping federation which determines the rate of wages?

There is one other point which they bring up. They refer to what they say is the fact that during the waterfront trouble in Vancouver in 1935:

> A delegation of longshoremen were told on June 13, 1935, by a committee of the Shipping Federation of British Columbia that the Shipping Federation of British Columbia intended to smash all unions in British Columbia ports, take control of all waterfront work in British Columbia, and after that to give their fullest cooperation to the Pacific Coast Waterfront Employers in a campaign to crack open all unions down the Pacific coast. That proves the international interests of this body, in which the Canadian government is an acquiescing partner.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

It does seem to me that the government has a distinct responsibility in a matter of this kind. This may possibly be a matter which comes under the new transport department, but at the same time the conditions are directly related to the work of the labour department. I wish we could have a statement from the minister in regard to the policy of the government.

Mr. ROGERS: I take it that this memorandum relates back to a situation which developed on the Vancouver waterfront some time ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That condition prevails to-day.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite, but as a result of the situation which developed more than a year ago. As a matter of fact, a commissioner, Mr. Justice Davis of the supreme court dealt with the dispute then in existence.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Between the international and the other union.

Mr. ROGERS: Between the international and the shipping federation. As a result in large measure of his report, peace eventually was restored upon the Vancouver waterfront. My hon. friend will no doubt suggest that peace was restored, but not upon a satisfactory basis. As I understand it, the present position is this. The shipping federation of Vancouver has entered into an agreement extending over a period of years with two other longshoremen's organizations in Vancouver, and the bulk of the membership of these two organizations which now have an agreement with the shipping federation were formerly within the membership of the International Longshoremen's Association. The International Longshoremen's Association at present contains a smaller number of members than the two organizations which made this agreement with the shipping federation.

The right of association clearly does not carry with it any compulsion upon an employer to adopt the principle of the closed shop. There is a clear distinction between the two things. The right of association does mean and ought to mean that no employer should be guilty of discrimination; in other words, no employer should deprive any employee of his employment because he has been active in the organization of a union. But that does not carry with it the recognition of a particular labour organization as the exclusive organization with which a particular employer should enter into an agreement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the reduction of wages which has recently taken place?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that the shipping federation has these agreements with these two organizations, and that the officers of the two organizations have agreed to the existing working arrangements. I am not prepared to answer further the point raised by my hon. friend, but if I can obtain any additional information during the dinner recess I shall be very glad to do so. I think, however, the main points are as I have described them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that the shipping federation has entered into agreements with two other associations of longshoremen—

Mr. BENNETT: Which claim the right to make collective bargains.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to know the exact relationship of the government representatives to the shipping federation board.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to inquire during the dinner recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: Before the dinner recess the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked whether I would place before the committee the letter from Empire Cotton Mills, Limited, in which that company declined to consent to the setting up of a board of conciliation. I have the letter before me. It is rather long, but I doubt whether it would suit the full purpose of my hon. friend if I did not place the entire letter on Hansard. It is addressed to the Deputy Minister of Labour, who is also registrar under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The letter reads:

February 4, 1937.

Dear Sir:

We beg to acknowledge your letter of the 28th ultimo referring to an application on behalf of the textile workers formerly employed in our Welland plant for the establishment of a board of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Although it seems clear that the act, a copy of which you enclosed, does not provide for such a case as the present strike at Welland, where some of our former employees struck without notice, and without any intimation of any desire to discuss any alleged grievances, and although the present application has not been made until after thirty days from the commencement of the strike, so that none of the strikers are employees within the meaning of the statute, we have, nevertheless, given very careful and sympathetic attention to your request that we should give the application favourable consideration.

We should add that you will observe the applicants have been unable to complete the required statutory declaration which is a condition precedent to the valid establishment of a board, because, of course, they have been unable truthfully to declare that "a strike will be declared."

If we are right in our conclusion that there is no statutory authority in the present circumstances to appoint a board, any board which you might appoint would lack what authority would be conferred upon it if it could be validly appointed under the statute, and further than this, it would have no authority to inquire into many other circumstances related to this strike, amongst which we may mention the circumstances under which a United States union now under suspension by the American Federation of Labour, has attempted by methods of intimidation, the use of the administration of public relief funds, and illegal violence, to induce many of our former employees to join that union.

This union was not present at the commencement of this strike, but has apparently seized upon the opportunity presented to further its own objectives. Whilst doing this it ignores the true facts of the situation and for its own ends, through promises of impossible rates of pay, uses the workers to their own detriment as well as to the general detriment of the community, thereby demonstrating this union's incapability of assuming any of the responsibilities usually undertaken by such bodies. These circumstances have been important contributing factors to the continuation of the strike, and while we would welcome investigation by competent authority we have come to the conclusion that it would be inadvisable to concur in the appointment of a board which would, in fact, have no statutory authority.

We will, however, be glad to cooperate with your department in any efforts which may seem to afford any chance of bringing the unfortunate situation in Welland to a close, and therefore we would welcome any opportunity to discuss the matter further with you.

We have already written to your chief conciliation officer on the 15th January outlining our views in connection with the strike and we wish to emphasize:

First: That we have already restored approximately the 1929 wage scale or better before the strike was commenced. That our policy is to pay the wage rates prevailing in the textile industry in Canada for the same class of work and efficiency under similar conditions, but in many instances we pay higher than the current rates.

Second: That while we have every desire to keep the mill operating, we can afford to go no farther under present conditions. We have already filed returns and given your department information as to this and will be glad to furnish any further particulars you may require.

Third: That while there has been some talk of grievances with regard to mill conditions, etc., you will see that the enclosed draft agreement sent to the company under date of 9th January, 1937, apparently dealing with the demands of those directing the strike, provides for an increase of wages, but makes no reference to any other grievances with regard to conditions except for the general provision for discussion of such grievances as might arise. As we have already granted the greatest amount of increase which we can afford, we regret that we cannot suggest a compromise on wages. We always welcome, however, constructive suggestions for improvement of working conditions, and apply all reasonable remedies found to be within the means of the company, but this does not appear to be a real factor in the present strike.

Several of the former employees who desired to go on working, and desired to confer with us with regard to the strike, have been physically prevented by illegal methods of mass-picketing and violence from conferring with our officers. On one occasion, the mass-pickets on the public streets seized and turned the motor cars in which some of our former employees were endeavouring to come to the mill for a conference with our officers. On other occasions our office employees have been assaulted, traffic, including shipments of goods in and out of our premises was interfered with and for a time prevented by violence in the public streets.

While we deplore the continuance of the strike and the resulting unemployment of many of our former workers who desire to work, including those who have been misled by outsiders, we find that it is simply impossible for us to make further increases under present conditions other than those which have already been made.

We are, and have always been ready to meet our employees and discuss grievances with them, but we cannot think that it would serve any useful purpose to have a board of conciliation and investigation established without statutory authority on the request of an affiliate of a foreign union which has, at least, joined in conducting this strike by illegal methods.

The letter is signed by F. L. Mitchell on behalf of Empire Cotton Mills, Limited. He signs as assistant to the president.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is meant by a foreign union?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I ought not to try to explain what was in the mind of the person who wrote the letter. I would assume that he would be referring to a union which has its head office in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Or other foreign country.

Mr. ROGERS: Or other foreign country.

Mr. MacINNIS: To anyone who has not listened to or read some of the evidence which came out before the Turgeon commission, it is really touching to note this company's concern for the welfare of the employees, and the way in which they are being exploited by these foreign agitators. It is really very touching to anyone who does not know the circumstances, but it seems to me that their refusal, at any rate as far as the letter which the minister has read is concerned, is very weak. What statutory authority could a board of conciliation have? If the company were willing to have a board appointed, the board could hear evidence and investigate any matter which they might be asked to look into. I have taken part in the proceedings of many boards of conciliation and am quite well aware that their findings are not binding on either side, but I also know that the side which refuses to present its case has not a very good case with the public. Speaking broadly, I believe it is seldom that one side or the other refuses to accept the award of a conciliation board, because generally when they do they lose the public sympathy that they might otherwise have. So there are few awards turned down, even if they are considered by one side to be unsatisfactory, as is bound to happen in any case.

Mr. ROGERS: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) also asked if I could make a more extensive statement as to the matter at issue in this dispute. I have looked up the file and I find it contains the wage rates now applicable in Welland.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether they should be placed on Hansard.

Mr. ROGERS: I doubt whether it would serve any useful purpose. They cover the entire field of operations. They are provided confidentially to the department, as they are to the bureau of statistics, from time to time. They cover many pages. Perhaps I might repeat what is, after all, the essential matter at issue, namely, that the employees had asked for an increase of twenty per cent in the existing wage rates; the company declared that it had already granted an increase of six per cent, that the wage rates had been restored to the 1929 level, and that the operations of the company in Welland did not permit it to grant the increases demanded by the employees.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to ask the minister a question under item 179, limitation of hours of work.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a later item.

Mr. SENN: Certain articles appeared in the press to the effect that married men were receiving only $9 per week in the Welland mill. I should like to know if those were full-time or part-time employees.

Mr. ROGERS: The information we have does not make a distinction between married and unmarried employees. I doubt whether we have the information which would enable me to confirm or dispute that statement.

Mr. SENN: I asked whether these were full-time or part-time employees.

Mr. ROGERS: That information does not appear to be on our files. Generally speaking, the low paid employees in textile operations are women, and the wages of women are governed by the Minimum Wage Act in Ontario.

Mr. SENN: My information is that the notices which appeared in the press to the effect that married men were receiving only $9 per week were perhaps erroneous in this way, that they were only part-time employees, not full-time.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sorry I have not that information before me. It is material, certainly; I shall be glad to secure further information on that point.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that the document read to us a few minutes ago is so drawn as to prejudice people generally against the claims of the workers. For instance, as regards this foreign union business, the fact is that nearly all the unions in this country have their headquarters in the United States, the international unions. We have had Tom Moore here a considerable time and in this house again and again he has been lauded. He presided until recently over the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, which may almost be said to be the Canadian section of the American Federation of Labour. It is ridiculous that we should have these held up as foreign unions, and then, as soon as a Canadian union starts up, be told that it must be disregarded because "we want to deal with the well-established, recognized, international unions." Further, we are told that these organizers came in later. What can the men do but bring in the organizer of the union with which they wish to unite? We were told this afternoon that in a great many concerns the wage scales are posted in the plant. Is that true in this case?

Mr. ROGERS: If I might correct my hon. friend, the reference was to fair wage scales applicable to public works and work done under contract with the government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am glad to have the correction. It seems to me that in a matter of this kind where there has been no union recognized, where apparently the company refuses to recognize the union, it is very difficult indeed for the employees to know what is the prevailing wage. They know what they are paid, but they do not know what is the general wage. Whatever may be the ethics of the department in not giving this information to the public. I would say that, especially where there is no union, it is of interest to the public to know what wages are being paid in these factories. It is absurd for us to spend time in parliament discussing this case if all we know is that there has been a gain of six per cent. We do not know what it means; we do not know what the wage was before that increase. All we hear now is that this company adheres to the prevailing rates. Well, if the rates prevailing in Welland are those which prevailed in the factories which the Turgeon commission has been investigating, it is a disgrace to this country that any such institution should be allowed to keep its doors open. I think the responsibility is on the Department of Labour to make an investigation in this particular case and let the public know the facts. That is the only way the employees have any chance of defence unless they take the law into their own hands.

Mr. ROGERS: I hope my hon. friend will acquit me of any intention of placing upon Hansard information which is prejudicial to the employees in this case. He will recall that I placed this letter upon Hansard at the request of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I am speaking of the tone of the letter and the form in which some of the statements are made.

Mr. BENNETT: It occurs to me that not only may the minister be warranted in doing it, but it is his duty to indicate the rate per hour being paid to workmen in that factory. It is obvious that if there were a public inquiry those wages would be made known. In the Turgeon investigation wages were always made public. I cannot think that a letter sent to the minister or the department indicating the wages paid can be regarded as a confidential communication. On the other hand, I would not suggest that the minister should undertake to place on Hansard all that vast mass of material, but he should be able to indicate what those working on the looms receive per hour and the number of hours they work per day. He should be able to indicate what other classes of workmen receive for instance, spinners, and those having to do with other branches of activity in the manufacture of the product. I think there is force in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says when he suggests that we are discussing a matter about which unfortunately our knowledge is limited. I suggest to the minister that it is no violation of any possible confidence if he makes known to the committee and the country the rate of wages per hour being paid to the various classes of employees, both men and women, and I believe this could be done without much difficulty. I should think it would not take more than half a column in Hansard, because the divisions of labour are not very numerous, unless it is a mill that makes many products.

Mr. ROGERS: I assure the committee that I have no desire at all to withhold this information, but in the form in which it has been presented I doubt whether it would be intelligible. The schedules cover a great many different piece-work operations. Perhaps this is a confession of ignorance upon my part, but I am bound to say that it does not convey to me the information which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre desires to have. I shall be glad to see if it is not possible to put it into the form suggested by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: That should be possible.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to see if that cannot be done.

Mr. BENNETT: The several divisions are not numerous and the rates per hour can be ascertained.

Mr. COLDWELL: If we are going to get any information of that sort, I would suggest that the last suggestion be looked into, that of giving the hours of work. After all, a moment ago the minister mentioned piecework in these factories, and we know that in some factories men are not able to work the maximum number of hours per day or per week. Consequently a wage of $9 a week for part-time work is not uncommon. But that part-time work is really all the work these men can do on account of the operations they perform. I think in dealing with social security legislation and labour conditions, we shall have to take that factor in industry into account. I know that in a large plant of which I had some knowledge several years ago, men would go out and stand around for four or five hours a day waiting for work which would last three or four or five hours. While the rate probably looked all right, the aggregate amount of money that one of those men could earn in a week was relatively small.

I think a community is interested in the matter from this point of view: If men are unable to make enough money in their ordinary avocation to maintain themselves and their families, then when times become bad they become charges upon the community, and the community really has to bear part of the cost of industry, which I think should be borne by industry itself. If this matter of wages and hours could be looked into and reported upon, that side of the question might also be investigated.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to say just one further word on this point. I am informed by the officers of the department that this particular information is given to the department confidentially. I mention that for this reason, that so far as I am aware there is no law which compels these companies to provide this information, inasmuch as it may affect their competitive position in relation to other companies operating within the same fields. I would think that at all events it would be desirable to look into that aspect of the question. I simply state that as a reservation upon what I said just a moment ago. For my part I have no objection whatever to bringing this information before the committee provided it can be done without prejudice to the position of the Department of Labour in relation to these firms that are reporting to us for statistical purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could the item stand, then, until we hear the decision of the minister?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps the point could be discussed upon some other appropriate item, with the clear understanding that meanwhile I shall look into the point raised by my hon. friend. I can assure him that I shall obtain the information without delay and present the reasons for or against the policy which has been followed in the past.

Mr. BENNETT: If the information is received as confidential, it must be treated as such, but I suggest that it cannot possibly be treated in that way, notwithstanding what the officials say, for the simple and obvious reason that at the recent inquiry the evidence was forthcoming as to what was paid in every factory in Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: An investigation by a royal commission.

Mr. BENNETT: By a royal commission, of course, but a royal commission is the creature of this parliament, by a statute, it is true. But let me put this to the minister: This cannot possibly affect the competitive position of anyone, for the very letter which was read indicates that they were paying the going rate, that it was the 1929 rate, and further it is alleged that it is an even higher wage than is warranted by the scale in the locality. I wholly agree that the minister must assume a position which will protect the information that has been given to a minister of the crown or to a department as confidential, and that confidence can be removed only by the people who, relying upon it, furnished the information. But I submit that this cannot be so regarded. What is sought is not what the officials are talking about. It is the rate per hour and the number of hours per day that men work. I would undertake to get that information in half an hour in Welland to-night. This story about not being able to understand something —why, it is the duty of these officials to clear it up so that the minister can understand it. It seems to me absurd that in the twentieth century a minister has to rise in his place in the house and say he cannot understand what these figures mean as to the wages paid in industry. How much do they pay per hour to men and women; what are the classifications, and how many hours per day do they work? It seems to me that information should not be difficult to obtain. I am sure if the minister and I went to Welland to-night we would have that information before bedtime without any trouble at all. There is nothing of secrecy or anything like that about it; it is a plain, simple story as to what people are getting per hour and per day, and the number of hours they work per day.

Mr. ROGERS: My statement, as I think the leader of the opposition fully acknowledges, was made in recognition of the position which a minister must maintain with respect to information which is given to him confidentially.

Mr. HEAPS: What is so confidential about it?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend has referred to the fact that the royal commission on textiles has secured this type of information. That is quite true, but a royal commission has full powers under the Inquiries Act to take evidence of this kind under oath. In other words, the information may be said to be extracted even from an unwilling witness. On the other hand, I am informed that this information was presented to the department confidentially, and that is the only reservation I make. I would have no desire at all to withhold anything from the committee or the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, would the minister secure the information from the employees, who would be quite willing to give it? Would it be possible for the department to secure a statement from the employees as to what they were paid?

Mr. ROGERS: I can only say that I shall secure it in the best possible way with the least possible delay.

Mr. WALSH: In securing this information I hope the minister will bear in mind the peculiar manner in which a good part of the help employed in the cotton industry is paid; that is, by the piece, and also the fact that if these men worked a certain number of hours for a certain number of days they might earn so much. But from my experience, after many hours of labour in a cotton mill, it is difficult to gauge what the weekly wage is going to be, for a weaver in particular.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly. In other words the schedules do not mean a great deal.

Mr. WALSH: They do not mean a great deal. For instance, if a mill is rushed, they will see that the weaver is amply supplied with the wherewithal to continue operating, but I know that in cotton mills where there is not a tremendous amount of work on hand, work is backed up either in the slashing room or in the spinning room, and for that reason a weaver is unemployed for a certain period of time during the day. He is there, but probably he is running only fifty per cent of his looms, or even fewer than that.

Then we must also bear in mind this fact, which I have always felt was unjust to the labourer: He will weave his piece, which will be taken to the cloth room. There it is examined and flaws are discovered. These flaws may be the fault of the weaver or they may be the fault of anything else connected with the development of that piece, but he is called up and fined for these errors or omissions or mistakes. There again the wage of the man is affected. The fine might be only twenty-five cents or it might run as high as two or three dollars. That has a very definite bearing. So, if these figures are to be secured, in justice to the men I feel some reference should be had to the conditions under which they work. I do not want figures placed on the table showing that a weaver running six or eight looms is getting $15 per week, when that figure would represent only what he could earn if he were running those six looms for six days a week, eight hours a day.

Some one has already pointed out that probably his wage for the week is only $8 or $9. Personally I believe that through the Department of Labour some adjustment in the wages of these people should be made. They can be dealt with most unfairly, and can be made pay the cost of slack time, although being actually within the mill for the full length of time during any one week. The minister ought to bear that in mind when he is getting the information, and make absolutely certain that we are getting correct information and not that which is liable to be misleading. Probably if he got it from the employer and also from the employee, and struck an average, he might get a figure which would be nearer the truth than if he were to obtain the information from only one source. Then, again, I would not place too much confidence in any report which might be developed through the recent inquiry, which is more or less a political window-dressing—the Turgeon inquiry into the textile industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the committee took recess, the minister was answering some questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) concerning the situation on the Vancouver waterfront. Has he that information now?

Mr. ROGERS: I take it the particular point in the mind of the hon. member is that the harbour commission was represented in the shipping federation, which entered into the agreements of which he makes complaint. I believe he is correct in his belief that the representatives of the harbour commission in the past have sat in with the shipping federation with respect to the determination of wage agreements with longshoremen.

Mr. BENNETT: But since the harbour commission went out, what? What has happened since it ceased to exist? There is no longer a harbour commission.

Mr. ROGERS: No; but there is a port manager, and the harbour commission still functions as such in the city of Vancouver. Perhaps the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) could give us information on that point.

Mr. HOWE: The previous local harbour board was a member of the shipping federation. Since the central board came into being, consideration has been given the matter, and my view is that we should not be members of the federation. We are large employers of waterfront labour. Just at the time we were dissociating ourselves from the federation, the labour trouble came on and made it inadvisable to change the position at that time. However, I believe I can say that within the next few months we shall dissociate ourselves from the federation.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave briefly the information he had received from the International Longshoremen's Association in Vancouver. As I understand it—and I had some contact with the organization last summer—the situation is this: In 1923 there was a strike on the waterfront between the International Longshoremen's Association and the employers. The longshoremen lost that strike and from then until 1933 there was no workers' organization on the waterfront. In 1933 another organization known as the Coastwise Longshore and Freight Handlers Association was formed. Then, in 1935, there was another strike. In the fall of 1935 a local of the International Longshoremen's Association was organized but was not recognized by the shipping federation. The unions that were recognized by the shipping federation were the strikebreakers who had been taken in during the strike. Nevertheless men connected with the International Longshoremen's Association were doing some work on the waterfront, particularly for the Kingsley Navigation Company Limited.

Mr. ROGERS: Coastwise shipping?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not sure, but I believe they had deep-sea vessels; at least I was so informed.

Mr. MULOCK: How much were they being paid?

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot say what they were paid, but I shall show later that the pay as well as the work was satisfactory. On October 1 of this year the International Longshoremen's Association was informed by the Kingsley Navigation Company Limited that they would not continue to employ association members, because that company was a member of the shipping federation, and the federation insisted that they do not employ members of the association. The minister stated before recess that recognition of a union did not necessarily mean recognition of a closed shop, but I suggest that in this instance it does mean a closed shop. It means a shop in which certain workers belonging to certain unions cannot obtain work.

Mr. ROGERS: But does it not follow, when a company enters into an agreement with a particular union, that employment shall be given to the members of that union?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, but the union had an agreement with the Kingsley Navigation Company. However, this company was a member of the shipping federation and this federation, which controlled all shipping on the coast, insisted that only members of their union should be employed. The complaint of the longshoremen is that officials of the Vancouver harbour board sit in with the shipping federation and agree to this unjust discrimination. I hope the Minister of Transport will find ways and means of overcoming the difficulty, and the federal government will not be associated with a condition of this kind.

Mr. HEAPS: Prior to the recess the Minister of Labour said he would try to find out something about the Empire Cotton Mills, Limited, of Welland. He said he would try to learn whether they are part of another corporation, and, if not who the officers of the organization may be.

Mr. ROGERS: I had not forgotten the question. During the recess I was informed that the Empire Cotton Mills, Limited, was associated with the Woods Manufacturing Company, with head office at Hull. I have not been able to determine precisely the nature of the relationship between them.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not the government give fairly substantial contracts to the Woods company?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. HEAPS: I am under the impression that the Woods company of Hull at different times have been the recipient of government contracts. If such is the case, I believe there is ample opportunity for the government to bring pressure to bear.

Item agreed to.

Conciliation and Labour Act, $35,000.

Mr. ROGERS: This item was allowed to stand this afternoon until certain information asked for by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had been obtained. He asked as to what changes had taken place during the last year in connection with Labour Gazette correspondents. I now have this information before me. At Westville, Nova Scotia, Mr. Hale was appointed to succeed Mr. Swan. This was a case of reinstatement as Mr. Hale had been correspondent prior to 1930. At Sherbrooke, Quebec, Mr. J. Alfred Martin replaced Mr. Adelard Mollette. This was another case of reinstatement as Mr. Martin had been Labour Gazette correspondent prior to 1930. At Kingston, Ontario, Mr. H. F. Mooers replaced Major Allan Stroud. This change was made because Mr. Mooers was employment officer. Generally, where an employment office is in existence, the position of employment officer is united with that of Labour Gazette correspondent. Much of the information requested from the Labour Gazette correspondent relates to employment conditions in the particular community.

Mr. BENNETT: How long had Major Stroud been correspondent?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not absolutely certain as to the length of his service, but I think he was appointed shortly after the war. At Brandon, Manitoba, Mr. Edward Fulcher replaced Mr. W. A. Elliott. This was another case of reinstatement as Mr. Fulcher had held the position prior to 1930. At Calgary, Alberta, Mr. Frank Cusack replaced Mr. McPherson. This was not a case of reinstatement. The explanation of this change is that Mr. Cusack apparently was about to be appointed when, on the recommendation of Mr. Stanley, the former member for Calgary East, his appointment was held up and the position was given to Mr. McPherson. Subsequently this condition of affairs was rectified and Mr. Cusack was appointed to the position which he expected to obtain in 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: What were Mr. Cusack's qualifications for the position?

Mr. ROGERS: I judge they were of the same order as those of the man he succeeded.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not answer my question; this man did not succeed Mr. McPherson. Mr. Cusack was not appointed to the position, although he expected to be.

Mr. ROGERS: He is now.

Mr. BENNETT: I was asking about his qualifications. I could give some myself, but I should like to know.

Mr. ROGERS: The Labour Gazette correspondent supplies information to the Labour Gazette office with respect to employment conditions in the community in which he resides and also with respect to wages and other general information as will assist in the compilation of statistical returns. I would judge that Mr. Cusack had the requisite qualifications to carry out the necessary function of the office.

Mr. BENNETT: That is judgment based upon assumption but not upon any knowledge.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the pleasure of the acquaintance of Mr. Cusack or of Mr. McPherson.

Mr. HEAPS: What remuneration is paid in these positions?

Mr. ROGERS: The remuneration runs from $120 to $300 per year.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $10,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister could tell us how many investigations were held last year, and their cost.

Mr. ROGERS: There were nineteen applications and seven boards were established under the act.

Mr. MacNICOL: The auditor general's report lists eight boards. Could the minister explain to the committee the procedure of appointing one of these boards?

Mr. ROGERS: I think this brings us back to the discussion of this afternoon. The Conciliation and Labour Act permits the Minister of Labour at his own discretion to send a conciliation officer to the scene of any dispute.

Mr. MacNICOL: You do not have to be asked?

Mr. ROGERS: It was pointed out this afternoon that there was a decided advantage in having the consent of both parties to the dispute, even though this is not necessary.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the minister mentioned seven cases, did he have in mind the Bridge River gold mining dispute and the Canadian Collieries Limited dispute?

Mr. ROGERS: Those were in the previous year.

Mr. MacNICOL: I expected that answer and it gives me an opportunity to say that it is almost impossible to understand what we have before us when the report is a year behind.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend should read the Labour Gazette.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few minutes ago the leader of the opposition asked the number of disputes and the minister said seven. I turn up the auditor general's report and I find there were eight. The minister now tells me that these eight were in the previous year. I should like to see this bookkeeping speeded up so that we shall have before us the particulars of what we want to discuss.

Mr. ROGERS: The Labour Gazette, which is published monthly, gives that information from time to time. It will also be found in the report of the Department of Labour which is tabled each year.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister said there were seven investigations; would he tell us what the expenses were in each one and where they were held?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: For the fiscal year 1935-36 there was the Canadian National Railways and Western Stevedore Company and dock employees, costing $342.85. There was the Bridge River gold mining dispute, costing $2,883.65.

Mr. MacNICOL: Those are all in the report.

Mr. ROGERS: Then my hon. friend must have the correct information. I am giving the expenditures for the fiscal year 1935-36.

Mr. BENNETT: That ends on March 31 of this year.

Mr. ROGERS: I was quoting the expenditures with regard to the fiscal year 1935-36. Perhaps I should have given the expenditures for the fiscal year 1936-37, to December 31, 1936. I think that will explain the difference between the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and myself. I shall begin again and assume that the earlier information is not required.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister is giving it for the calendar year?

Mr. ROGERS: For the fiscal year 1936-37 to December 31, 1936, as follows:

Western Stevedore Company v. Canadian National Railways, $1,537.10.

Winnipeg Electric Company v. employees in gas production department, $1,835.14.

Algoma Steel Corporation v. employees, $1,438.27.

City of Edmonton v. employees (Street Railway), $1,662.18.

Hamilton By-Product Coke Ovens v. employees, $844.22.

Canadian National Railways v. pursers and stewards of the Pacific Coast Steamship Service, $969.30.

Canadian National Railways, Canadian Pacific Railway Company and subsidiary railways v. employees, $315.90.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the ones the minister read first?

Mr. ROGERS: Were of the previous year. I was in error.

Mr. MacINNIS: What have been the results following a report by a board? Has there been further trouble or did the report terminate the trouble?

Mr. ROGERS: The boards were successful in every case.

Mr. MacINNIS: That ought to be a good argument for conciliation in labour disputes.

Mr. ROGERS: I agree.

Item agreed to.

Employment Offices Coordination Act, $9,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What does this item cover?

Mr. ROGERS: This appropriation is intended to cover expenses for printing, stationery and other supplies, travelling expenses, and so forth in the administration of the Employment Offices Coordination Act. The amount of $9,000 submitted for the fiscal year 1937-38 is $750 less than was voted for the current year, leaving for the supplementary estimates any deficit arising out of the reorganization.

There is another item in the estimates of the department providing for a statutory contribution under the Employment Offices Coordination Act.

Mr. BENNETT: How many of these offices are there now in Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: There are sixty-six throughout the dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do our Canadian employment offices carry on the same work as the employment offices in Great Britain?

Mr. ROGERS: I would not go so far as to say that the service of the employment offices in Canada has yet reached a state of usefulness equal to that of the labour exchanges in Great Britain. The present situation is not wholly satisfactory. The dominion government makes an annual contribution to the provinces, and the actual employment offices are maintained by the provinces, which select the site and determine the personnel. The dominion office exists largely for the purpose of coordinating the work of these offices and compiling information on a national scale. My feeling is that much still requires to be done in order that the employment service in Canada may do the work that it can usefully do.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the moment there is a boom or the prospect of a boom in steel foundries throughout the country. A few days ago I was talking to a foundryman who told me that he had increased his staff to about two thousand men, and would be taking on more. I wondered at the time whether the Canadian employment service, either federal or provincial—apparently from what the minister says the federal office does not do much along the line of employment—assists, like the employment offices in Great Britain, in transferring steel workers, for instance, who may be out of work in Welland to, say Sault Ste. Marie, or steel workers out of work in Owen Sound back to Hamilton. Do our employment agencies do anything along the line of transferring men from one part of the country to another as they do in England?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I think it might be useful if I gave the following information.

During the fiscal year 1935-36 the offices of the employment service of Canada registered for employment a total of 677,408 applicants, men and women; listed 375,169 opportunities for work, notified by employers; placed in work 351,886 applicants.

In 7,787 cases of placement, applicants were assisted to move to employment by a special reduced transportation rate of 2·7 cents per mile given by the railways for use by the employment offices, where persons being placed are travelling to employment at a distance where the fare is more than $4.

Of the total of 353,802 placements made, 114,731 were non-local, that is, were made in municipalities other than those in which the placing offices are located.

Mr. MacNEIL: I agree with the statement of the minister that the operation of these offices is quite unsatisfactory. Is it not true that the employment council of Canada acts in an advisory capacity to the minister? Did the council meet in the last calendar year, and were recommendations made to which the assent of the provincial governments might be desired?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that the National Employment Service Council met early in 1930, or at any rate at some period in 1930, and has not been convened since. I would point out that to some extent the functions which would be performed by the council have been transferred for the time being to the National Employment Commission. I am far from saying that the composition of the National Employment Service Council was not such as would make it a really useful body, particularly at a period when there was expanding employment. I assume it was not summoned in the last six years because it was felt that there was not sufficient opportunity for it to render service.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Who is responsible for the staff of the labour bureaux throughout Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: The staff of the bureaux is selected entirely by the provincial governments.

Mr. MacNEIL: How many offices are in operation in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: Eight: at Kamloops, Nanaimo, Nelson, New Westminster, Penticton, Prince Rupert, Vancouver, Victoria.

Mr. MacNEIL: What are the functions of these offices with respect to the registration of transient unemployed?

Mr. ROGERS: No duties with respect to the registration of transient unemployed are imposed upon these officers by the federal government. It is possible they have been utilized by provincial governments for that purpose, but we would not necessarily have knowledge of that fact.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister indicated that approximately half of the requests for work are filled by employment offices throughout the country. Has he a classification of the type of work that was found for these people?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me. I am not certain at the moment whether it is obtainable at once in the form suggested by my hon. friend. I take it he would wish to know how many have been transferred to woods operations, how many to relief work, how many to factory work—

Mr. HEAPS: And farm placement.

Mr. ROGERS: As far as farm placement is concerned, under the existing scheme with the province that information is available, but I suppose my hon. friend is interested in farm placement apart from any scheme of government assistance.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there no farm placement within this category?

Mr. ROGERS: I have before me for the previous year a report printed by the Department of Labour. The hon. member would have no difficulty in securing a copy of it. I could read or place it on Hansard, but I shall be glad to see that he receives a copy of it.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does not the Department of Labour assume responsibility for the policy of placement in Canada? I have reference to the policy as applied to single, unemployed women transients and the difficulties they encounter in being placed in domestic service. Does not the federal government assure these women suitable protection when migrating from one province to another for placement in domestic service? Does the government see that they are protected against unscrupulous employers? It has been brought to my attention recently that there have been sent to questionable sections of cities a number of young women in destitute circumstances whose situation has been taken advantage of by the touts of the underworld. Cannot the federal government exercise supervision to ensure that when any young woman seeks employment and is sent to some address she shall be given reasonable protection and be placed with respectable people?

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. ROGERS: On that point, we do not interfere directly in the administration of employment offices within the provinces. We have assumed, rightly I believe, that the provincial officers who have special responsibility in this matter would have the same desire that our own officers would have to prevent the sort of abuses described by my hon. friend. If, on the other hand, he has any complaint or if we receive complaints that these abuses do occur, we shall certainly be pleased to take them up with the provincial governments concerned. The general administration has, however, been left to them.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total cost to the federal government of the operation of these offices?

Mr. ROGERS: That comes under another item in the labour estimates, authorized by statute—the organization and coordination of employment offices, under the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927. The cost is $150,000 a year.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that all it costs the federal government?

Mr. ROGERS: That is the total federal contribution.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the total cost of running these offices throughout the dominion?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I might put on Hansard in parallel columns the total expenditures for employment service and the contribution of the dominion government in the several provinces:

	Total expenditure	Federal subvention
Nova Scotia	$ 12,857 48	$ 4,040 13
New Brunswick	14,040 87	4,411 97
Quebec	101,949 79	32,035 04
Ontario	196,804 93	61,840 78
Manitoba	30,764 31	9,666 88
Saskatchewan	40,354 15	12,680 23
Alberta	37,166 51	11,678 60
British Columbia	43,428 85	13,646 37
Total	$477,366 89	$150,000 00

Mr. MacNEIL: Returning to the question of single unemployed women, I have no complaint against the officials in charge of the various offices, but the impression seems to be that they lack adequate facilities to deal with this very serious matter, and I was wondering whether the minister would not consider some extension of this service so that a more satisfactory placement might be accomplished and proper protection afforded young women in the circumstances to which I have referred.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to look into the question raised by my hon. friend with a view to removing any abuses that do exist.

Mr. MacNEIL: To what extent are these various offices in Canada attempting to reclassify the unemployed? I understand that many are now engaged in a reclassification to determine those who are actually unemployable.

Mr. ROGERS: The employment commission has been proceeding with a re-registration and classification of the unemployed on relief, and some provinces may be supplementing that by an attempt to reclassify the unemployed whether they are on relief or not. We had a discussion on this point last year. It does not seem feasible to take a general census of the unemployed. Indeed, it is dou.btful whether such a census could be taken accurately without taking a complete census of Canada. That has been the experience of the United States. It was thought at one time that they could take a census of the unemployed separately, but I believe the conclusion has been reached that they could not obtain accurate results in that way. I agree that the employment offices might serve a useful purpose in the direction suggested by my hon. friend, and certainly, with employment opportunities improving, it is all the more important that there should be a more precise classification of all those who register at employment offices.

Mr. MacNEIL: If, in the reclassification now actually under way, a person in receipt of relief is listed as unemployable, what steps are taken to determine responsibility for further payment of relief to that individual?

Mr. ROGERS: At the present time those who are listed as unemployable are so listed by the municipalities, and I think we are justified in taking it for granted that the test of unemployability is almost entirely a health test. That is, I do not believe that what might be termed occupational disabilities are taken into consideration. I mean by that phrase not disabilities attaching to the occupation, but rather the loss of power to practise an occupation owing to long years of idleness. I do not think one can say that our present test of unemployability is wholly satisfactory. There is a strong pressure on municipalities to narrow the definition, for the reason that it has generally been accepted that care for the unemployable is primarily their responsibility; therefore the tendency is for municipalities to put a rather narrow construction upon that term, and to confine it to those who are completely incapable of performing physical labour.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who then accepts responsibility for their relief?

Mr. ROGERS: In most of the provinces unemployables have simply gone on the relief rolls. That is one question we have to face in this country, namely, that our relief rolls do not consist solely of unemployed who have become unemployed as a result of the depression. That is one element, and we can still say the predominant element, but our relief rolls also contain those who formerly received poor law assistance in some provinces and municipalities and those who might be termed charitable cases. In fact, where formerly we had a number of distinct classifications, those classifications have now tended to disappear; the boundaries, such as they were, between them have been blurred in consequence. It is going to be a problem of great difficulty and magnitude to restore that distinction between unemployment due to physical disability and unemployment due to lack of opportunity for work.

Mr. HEAPS: Where would the minister draw the line between the two?

Mr. ROGERS: I would prefer not to be drawn into a statement on that point at this time. I think that discussion would be more appropriate when the special supplementary estimates are before the house. I have no desire to curtail discussion on the point, for it is most interesting, but there will be full opportunity to bring it up at that time.

Mr. POOLE: Would the minister say there are more unemployables to-day than there were prior to the depression; that the depression has caused many to become unemployable?

Mr. ROGERS: I would agree that it is probably so, but I do not know of anyone who can state accurately the extent to which long idleness tends to create unemployability.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the distinction is reestablished between those who are unemployed and those who are unemployable, and that distinction is made in order to place upon the local authorities the responsibility which they formerly had, then, if that is the purpose of making the distinction, I submit that is an almost impossible burden in view of the financial condition of the municipalities.

Mr. ROGERS: I was careful to avoid saying that was necessarily the purpose.

Mr. COLDWELL: I noticed the minister was careful to avoid making that statement, but I wondered whether that had been considered, because I think it is impossible for the municipalities to bear the cost of those who have become unemployable as a result of the depression.

MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and Geology Branch

For administration of the Explosives Act (Chap. 62, R.S. 1927), $8,000.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): It might be useful, with the indulgence of the committee, if I made a brief statement concerning the reorganization of several departments into the Department of Mines and Resources. Hon. members will recall that the legislation necessary to effect this reorganization was passed last session. That legislation provided for the possible setting-up of eight directorships. A committee consisting of the proposed deputy minister of the department and several of the other senior officials spent about two months in working out the details of the reorganization. It finally resulted in the setting-up of five branches in the new department. Those branches consist of the Mines and Geology branch, the Lands, Parks and Forests branch, the Surveys and Engineering branch, the Indian Affairs branch, and the Immigration branch. In addition, there was set up under the immediate direction of the deputy minister the Administrative services branch, which supervises the work of all branches in relation to personnel. The purchasing of all departments is centralized in this office, also the legal section, the editorial and publicity section and the mail distributing section. It will be recalled that this new department is a combination of four former departments, namely the Department of Mines, the Department of Immigration, the Department of the Interior and the Department of Indian Affairs. As hon. members will recall, most of those departments had editorial sections, publicity branches and engineering services.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not have in 1935.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I think they had.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. CRERAR: If my right hon. friend will read Hansard of a year ago, I think he will find that my statement is correct. At any rate the work has been centralized in this manner. The total net reduction in staff is forty-seven. The total reduction in administrative cost, that is in the city of Ottawa, what might be termed the head office of the Department of Mines and Resources, is $144,000. In my judgment that is only the beginning of the consolidation of work. In carrying out the reorganization regard had to be had to the length of service and the position of many employees. When the bill was under consideration a year ago, I stated that the aim would be to bring about the reorganization with the minimum of hardship to the employees of the department concerned and that aim we have earnestly and honestly kept in view. But what has already been done does not in my judgment by any means complete the economies that can be effected as time goes on.

Now that I am bringing these estimates before the committee, it may be interesting to give some information with regard to the work of each of these branches. For instance, there is the mines branch. There has been a notable improvement in the mineral production of Canada in 1936 as against 1935. In the main that has been due to an improvement in the price of metals, particularly base metals, and also to an increased production of gold. Our gold production for the calendar year 1935 was approximately $116,000,000. We have not yet fully compiled the production for 1936, but it will run very close to $131,000,000, if, indeed, it does not exceed that figure. During 1936 thirty new gold-mining properties came into production, and probably there will be eight or ten more in production within the next four or five months. I doubt if 1937 will see the increase in mill plants that occurred in 1936, but apparently it will not fall very far short of it.

The total mineral production of all kinds in Canada in 1936 amounted to $360,000,000 as against $312,000,000 for 1935. I have already given the increase in gold production. The production of non-metallic minerals increased from $94,500,000 in 1935 to $104,000,000 in 1936. In supplies and wages paid by the metal mining industry in Canada in 1936 we have a total of about $200,000,000, roughly divided almost equally as between supplies and wages, and the dividends paid in 1936 amounted to $78,000,000. I think hon. members will appreciate the fact that this represents a very important contribution to the economic life of the country.

As far as our parks are concerned, as I recall it was stated to the house a year ago that our total investment in the national parks of Canada, if we include administrative costs to date approximates $30,000,000. During the year work was started on the park in Nova Scotia, at the northern end of Cape Breton island. Hon. members will recall that $100,000 was appropriated for that development last year, and another $100,000 is being asked for in the estimates that will be brought before the committee. In Prince Edward Island $40,000 was appropriated and a site was selected, known as the Dalvey site, if my information is correct, some eighteen or twenty miles from Charlottetown on the north shore of the island. Then hon. members will recall that in our estimates a year ago provision was made for hard-surfacing some roads into our parks in the Rocky mountains, notably from Kingsgate to Radium Hot Springs. That work progressed; the government of British Columbia put up an equal amount as its contribution, and now this road is hard-surfaced from Kingsgate to Kimberley. I may say that this road is in the upper end of the Columbia valley, where the rainfall is very, very small. I motored over the road last autumn, and I think without a doubt it was the most uninviting road to motor over that could be imagined. There is an area there known as the Skookumchuck prairies, and if any person wishes to get an understanding of what real dust is like on a motor road, I advise him to motor over that road. In the estimates this year, not the estimates now before the committee but the special supplementary estimates, we are asking for an additional sum of money toward the completion of that road.

It is estimated that over seven hundred thousand people visited the national parks of Canada last year. The increase at Banff of Canadian and United States tourists, as well as tourists from other countries, was quite notable. In connection with the Banff-Jasper road, which, as hon. members will recall from the discussions of a year ago, is a road to connect the Banff and Jasper parks, $220,000 was spent last year. We are asking for a larger amount this year. Last autumn I had an opportunity of motoring over that road from both ends, as far as it was constructed, and I can say to the committee that without any question it affords access to some of the finest mountain scenery to be found anywhere in the world. Work was also done on the road known as the Big Bend highway, which is the contribution of the federal government to the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia. The east leg of that road is practically completed. Some additional expenditure will be necessary there, and work is now being concentrated on the western section of it from a point called Canoe Encampment, where the Columbia river turns southward down to Revelstoke.

Now we come to the Department of Indian Affairs, which has been receiving a good deal of attention. This branch receives the largest single vote that we are submitting to the committee for any of the branches. I think a serious condition is looming up in our Indian administration. At the last census the total Indian population was 112,000, and I am told that this population is increasing at the rate of from 1,200 to 1,500 a year. If one compares the expenditures during, say the last three or four years or even back as far as six or eight years, with the expenditures of twenty-five years ago, a very substantial increase will be found. That increase is made up mainly in the costs of medical care and hospitalization and in relief costs. For the fiscal year ended March 31 last we spent $755,000 in Canada in direct relief for Indians. In addition to that, some $200,000 was appropriated from band funds for relief purposes, making a total of almost a million dollars for relief.

Mr. BENNETT: About $8 a head.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, almost $9 a head. Medical services and hospitalization for the same period required $940,000, and the amount spent on education was $1,936,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the largest item.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is the largest item. For the current year which will end on March 31 next, I am afraid our relief costs and our costs for medical care and hospitalization will be even larger than they were in the previous year. This is due to the fact, as far as relief is concerned, that the manner of living of the Indians has changed as compared with the way they lived in years gone by. For instance, in the northern part of the prairie provinces, and to a great extent in British Columbia, the Indians lived mainly by trapping and fishing. I believe I stated to the house a year ago—if not I shall give the information to-night—that twenty-five years ago there was an annual shipment from the northern part of Manitoba of from 750,000 to 1,000,000 muskrat skins per year. In recent years it has declined to a mere fraction of that number. There are vast areas in Manitoba suitable for no purpose other than the raising of fur-bearing animals. The same holds true of eastern Manitoba.

Last autumn in Winnipeg one of our Indian agents told me that if something were not done to improve trapping conditions in that part of Manitoba, within five years practically all the Indians would be on relief. We spent a small amount last year and, if I can get the appropriation, will spend some money this year in creating conditions to bring back the fur, particularly in the northern part of Manitoba. It has been demonstrated elsewhere that this can be done. For instance, muskrats are bred in the state of Louisiana to a point where the annual production of muskrat skins approximates about 6,000,000. The pelts are much inferior to those produced in Canada, and if we go about the business in a proper manner I can see no reason why fur cannot be brought back in Canada, as it has been elsewhere. Indeed, practical experiments conducted on a small scale have proven beyond question that it can be done.

The great difficulty, so far as the Indian is concerned, has been the invasion by white trappers. The white trapper traps clean. It will be of interest to hon. members to know that in the winter of 1935-36 a trapper in the northwest territories used an aeroplane to look after his trap lines. He had qualified for a pilot's licence, had bought a plane, and his trap lines stretched over about 125 miles, following a series of waterways and lakes. The effect was to drive the Indians from that trapping area. We are regulating the trapping by aeroplane because we have learned there are other trappers qualifying to get pilots' licences, and it would have been only a short time until a considerable amount of relief would have been required in this part of the northwest territories. I am already discussing with one or two of the provinces the possibility of setting aside areas adjacent to Indian reserves at which points the trapping will be confined exclusively to Indians. Those negotiations are not yet to a point where I can give further information to the committee. I feel, however, that this aspect of the Indian problem is one of considerable gravity.

I am hopeful, too, that we may be able to make some improvements in our educational endeavours among the Indians. May I bear willing tribute to the splendid work done by the Christian churches of Canada in their effort to raise the standard of living among the Indians. We have seventy-nine residential schools, and in addition a great many day schools. The difficulty in the past in the residential schools was that at perhaps six or seven years of age the Indian boy or girl was taken from the reserve and spent eight or nine years in residential school, where he or she learned about the white man's way of living. When their school terms were over there was nowhere for them to go, other than back to the reserves. This matter is now engaging the serious attention of some of the departmental officials. It is hoped that we may give a training which may be of a more vocational nature than it is at present and thereby make it more valuable to the students. After all, the Indian people in Canada had a culture of a kind. The Indian woman, who perhaps had never seen or been close to white civilization, had developed arts, among which was the art of tanning leather, and making leather goods, some of which were of fine quality.

Mr. BENNETT: And bead work.

Mr. CRERAR: For instance, we find that the Indians of Nova Scotia made excellent axe and pick handles, and excellent baskets, but there was no means by which they could market them. We hope to improve that condition, and I feel quite certain it can be done. Far too often when the Indian had acquired a few furs or something he could turn into cash, advantage was taken of his inexperience in marketing and in values. I believe that this offers a useful field for our educational and welfare departments.

Medical costs are very high, and I am not altogether satisfied with the basis upon which our medical services are being carried out. If the Indian has a slight ailment, in too many instances he is taken to the hospital, and heavy expenses incurred. I make that statement not wishing in the slightest degree to reflect upon the administration. After all, the expenditure is so large that I do believe steps must be taken to try to keep it within bounds, and if possible to reduce it. We have had enough experience to warrant us in the assumption that this can be done. It is a mistake to think the Indian has not intellectual equipment. He has, but it must be directed along the right channel. Above all, our Indian agents and the people entrusted with the administration must have sympathy and understanding, if we are to obtain the best results. I have almost concluded my observations concerning the Indians. Those associated with Indian administration need something of the missionary spirit and zeal.

The immigration branch is, of course, a stationary one. It may be of interest to hon. members to know that a total of 27,000,000 people were passed last year by immigration authorities. That number, of course, includes people who may have gone back and forth many times across our borders but who, on each occasion, would have to pass the immigration officials. In the fiscal year 1935-36, 11,103 immigrants were admitted to Canada, and in the calendar year 1936, which, of course, includes part of the figure I have just given, there were 11,643. For the calendar year 1935 there were 11,277. It would appear, therefore, that at the moment immigration to Canada is practically stationary.

I thought hon. members might be interested in this brief review of the organization of the department, and some of the problems in administration we are facing.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the Minister of Mines brought down his estimates a year ago, he told us that he intended to make a survey of the different branches of the departments under his control, such as mines, Indian affairs and so on. It is encouraging to have the minister state to-night that he has carried out this promise. Personally, I always like to compliment anyone who makes an effort to grasp the matters under his control. It is not my intention at the moment to discuss any branch other than that of mines, particularly iron. During my surveys this summer I came across several places where the minister had been. When the Indian estimates are up later on, I shall have something to say on them. I was very much pleased to hear what he said about the Indians, and I shall be ready to support him in that connection.

In connection with mines, I should like to throw out a suggestion to the minister in connection with a national iron policy. I know the minister was over the Algoma Central last year because I was told he had been there when I made a survey of the Helen iron mine. He may have something along this line in mind. I remember a year ago I said something about the necessity of an iron policy in Canada, and to-day I am more convinced than ever that the time has come when Canada should plan such a policy. A short time ago when there was some talk of trouble in Europe, the great republic to the south passed legislation prohibiting the exportation of war materials to certain European countries. I have been associated with the iron and steel business for some time and I was wondering what would happen in Canada should Great Britain get into some kind of trouble that we could not or should not keep out of and the United States determine that there would have to be a prohibition of the exportation of iron to Canada. Such action would disorganize completely the iron and steel plants in Canada, particularly those which might be engaged in the manufacture of war materials.

As the minister knows, nearly all the iron ore coming into Canada, particularly into Ontario, comes from the Mesaba and other great iron ore regions south of lake Superior. When he was going over the Algoma Central, the minister undoubtedly heard a good deal about the Helen iron mine and those other great mines up there which are able to produce a low grade ore. The minister may have given considerable thought to this matter, but I should like to see some encouragement given to the development of this so-called low grade ore in Algoma. While I was up there, some engineers and geologists were making a survey as to the possibilities of this ore. I learned that over in Minnesota, where most of the iron ore used in America is produced, outside what is produced in Alabama, they were commencing to use low grade ores. These low grade ores are roasted or sintered in order to take out the carbonate and reduce it to iron oxide. I learned that they figure that within reasonable length of time, perhaps twenty-five or fifty years at the outside, the great ranges of Mesabi and those along Iron river and south of lake Superior will become more or less exhausted. In order to protect the great iron and steel industries of the country they are beginning to mix low grade ore with the high grade.

I am informed—the minister and his department heads will know more about this than I do—that with a reasonable expenditure the new Helen mine could be reopened and a commercial product produced by roasting or sintering the ore. If that could be done it would be a great boon to Canada as the iron and steel industry would be safeguarded and the employment of thousands of men protected should the contingency to which I referred before occur.

I went to the top of the Helen mine. This was rather a hard journey for me as it is about 2,800 feet up and it was quite steep in many places. At the top I was able to see the trenches which had been cut across that mountain to reveal the ore. I forget the number of trenches which had been cut, but I was told that there were plainly visible 100,000,000 tons of ore which could be got out quite easily. I went into the mine about 900 feet to the point where they had stopped taking out the ore, I believe in 1918. If the department could plan some economical and reasonable way in which this iron ore could be developed in Algoma, there would be tremendous possibilities for that fine city of Sault Ste. Marie and the other cities in the south which would be able to obtain iron and steel needs from the plant at Sault Ste. Marie. While I had a word or two to say last year about the iron ore industry in Canada, since that time I have covered a lot of territory. I was very much interested to find that in townships of Leeds and Lanark occurred the first iron smelting in Ontario.

Mr. REID: Is that hematite ore?

Mr. MacNICOL: It was a very high grade ore in Leeds when it was taken out.

Mr. REID: Is it hematite?

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be hematite quality. Hematite means a high grade of iron oxide, and it was high grade ore that was taken out of Leeds. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman as his Scotch is too broad for me, although I am part Scotch myself.

Mr. REID: I asked the hon. gentleman if it was hematite in order to find out whether he knew just what it was.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Algoma ore that was taken out of the old Helen mine was hematite, and the ore that is in the New Helen mine is called siderite or iron carbonate. I know a little bit about the iron business. I found out that the first iron ore production in Ontario was in the county of Leeds. There was also some production at about the same time in Lanark county, but the larger production occurred in Leeds.

It is very interesting to read what the early administrators of this province had to say about it. About 1784 Major Edward Jessup, a resident, I assume, of either Leeds or Grenville—I used to know a Jessup family in Grenville, in the town of Prescott some years ago, and it may have been one of that family, as they were a military family—writing to the governor, said:

> As iron is a necessary, expensive and heavy article to transport, and as we are told there is an iron ore bed and a good place to build iron works between the settlements of Oswatia and Catraque, I beg leave to suggest to His Excellency the setting apart of these lands.

That would be for the development of iron ore. It was 1801 before they commenced producing and they produced until 1811. The next start was at Normandale in 1820 on the shores of lake Erie, where for twenty-seven years they produced what is called swamp iron, a very soft iron, almost 100 per cent pure iron. Then later on production took place at Marmora. All these mines are extinct to-day or, at all events, are not being worked.

The best place to commence, as far as I can see, a national iron ore policy, is the Helen iron mountain in Algoma. Other countries are developing their low grade ores. I read only a few days ago an article stating that the German government had issued orders that all their low grade mines should be put into operation. New methods of roasting the low grade ores make it possible to develop them commercially at not too great a cost.

The minister, I am sure, has in mind what the former Ontario government did in 1923, I think it was, to encourage the production of iron in Ontario. The Ferguson government offered to any body of men who would undertake the production of iron ore in Algoma a grant of one cent a unit, about 75 cents per ton for the finished ore. In the state of Minnesota they are mixing a low grade ore to-day with their high grade ore, and if something were done—the government may have already done it, I am speaking from the point of view of one who does not know what is being done—to encourage the development of the New Helen mine, I am sure that that ore could be taken down to Sault Ste. Marie, to be roasted there, and a large tonnage shipped over to Minnesota for mixing with their high grade ore. Of course, the government cannot give a bounty to iron ore that is exported, but such a development would promote the production of a large volume of iron ore for consumption in Canada. We have large steel plants in Hamilton, for example, and I was told in the United States when I was visiting that country last summer that a company over there was entertaining the idea of erecting another steel plant in Canada just as soon as things got a little further advanced. In view of what the government is now doing to assist the railways in spending about $20,000,000 in rehabilitating cars and so forth, the production of iron ore in Canada would help us, if any effort could help us at the moment, by promoting the expenditure of money on every side right from the production of the ore down to the finished product in the cars.

I believe the time is ripe to commence a national iron policy for the production of iron ore in Canada. I was happy to learn recently that the Hepburn government—I cannot very often say anything good about the Hepburn government; perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite can, but they will forgive me for not saying anything particular in its favour—had announced that it would give a grant of one cent a unit for the development of iron ore in Ontario. I am told by engineers that it would be difficult to produce it for a bonus of one cent and that there is little encouragement in one cent a unit, but if the federal government would do what the Ferguson government expected it would do, also vote one cent a unit for the production of iron ore in Ontario, I honestly believe the iron ore business could be started in Canada again, many thousands of men put to work, and great assistance given to the iron foundries in Canada. It would also be of great advantage, in the event of trouble, if the importation of iron ore into Canada from foreign countries were prohibited. We would then have our own iron for our iron and steel industries, and iron and steel constitute one of the basic industries of the country.

Mr. DEACHMAN: May I ask how much is one cent per unit?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the equivalent of 75 cents a ton of the finished ore. That would be approximately $1.50 per ton of finished ore, if both governments contributed. I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is very wise.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not a case of fearing the hon. gentleman in any way. I have been associated with men working in the iron and steel industry for a long time, and it is difficult for me to argue with someone who knows absolutely less than nothing from the practical standpoint about the production of iron and steel. I would gladly discuss the matter with some practical man who has served in the industry for more than a month or two, and then perhaps we could get somewhere, but economists and all that ilk—save me from them, and save them from me too.

I have finished what I had to say. I rose first to congratulate the minister because I crossed his path on several different occasions this summer, and I was pleased to see that he thought enough of his department to go out through northern Ontario and elsewhere to find out just what could be done about improving his department. I hope that great benefits will result from his trip.

Second, I rose to try to encourage, even in a very humble way—because I have not tried to elaborate on this subject at all as it is hardly up for discussion at the moment—the reopening of what is undoubtedly one of the best low grade iron mines in this country, and the reopening could be done economically I am told, because of the vast improvement in iron roasting machinery. I am told that the New Helen makes really good iron when sintered.

Third, I rose, in the hope that Canada will be placed in the position, in the event of her not being able to obtain ore from outside, of producing her own ore necessities so as to keep her own steel and iron plants in operation in times of trouble, or, better still, in times of peace.

The CHAIRMAN: I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member in his interesting remarks, but I wish to remind the committee that we are on item 144 for administration of the Explosives Act, and I would suggest—

Mr. MacNICOL: I followed in the footsteps of the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: I would suggest to the committee that if they passed this item, the next two would afford opportunity for a discussion of the subject started by the hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: The discussion was not started by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). The minister, in introducing his estimates, stated to the committee that he thought it desirable to make a statement with respect to the administration of the whole department, and in the course of his remarks he spoke of the mineral resources of the country and the development of the gold industry. The hon. member for Davenport confined his observations to the development of another mineral, namely iron ore, and the discussion initiated by the minister and carried on by the hon. member for Davenport would seem to be appropriate now in view of the fact that the minister, in opening his estimates, discussed the whole subject matter covered by them.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 144 was called.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. CRERAR: I have very great respect for the leader of the opposition, but I do not agree with his logic on this occasion. I expressly said that I wished to take advantage of the opening of the discussion of the estimates to give a brief survey of the work of the department. That could have been done if the Speaker had been in the chair and the house were going into committee of supply, but it was the only opportunity I had of making the statement and it was after the item had been called by the chairman. I think it is desirable that the discussion should be kept to the item affected; otherwise, if the logic of the leader of the opposition is sound, we might get into a discussion of parks or water powers or anything else. If we keep to the particular item under discussion we shall probably make greater progress. I have no criticism to offer concerning the hon. member for Davenport, but I think the ruling of the chair is correct. The hon. gentleman's remarks would be entirely appropriate under the next item.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no desire to waste time, but when the minister opened his estimates he discussed parks; he mentioned the sum of money spent in Nova Scotia and the sum he proposed to ask for additional parks. He mentioned the sum of money in Prince Edward Island and told of the total investment in parks. He took mines and spoke of the production in Canada of gold and of baser metals and he also turned to Indian affairs, dividing the expenditures into the sums used for education, medical services and relief. He then turned to the fourth branch, immigration, and said it was stationary. My submission is that it has been customary for ministers—the custom was started in this house by a minister of railways under Sir Wilfrid Laurier—to open their departments to the house, and that precipitated a minor debate with respect to the whole subject matter, giving rise to speeches such as we have heard from the hon. member for Davenport, and to which I understand the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) was about to make an appropriate reply. Surely, once there has been an opening of the department by the calling of an item—and this could not be done until the item was called—the item having been called, and the minister having made a statement, we must take it for granted, unless the chairman stops the minister, that those who follow him should have the same latitude. That is logical, and on that assumption I propose to act.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall certainly not get into a controversy with my right hon. friend, but I believe I did state in my opening remarks that I wished to have the indulgence of the committee to make a general statement.

Mr. BENNETT: And I think it is a very proper thing to do; I compliment the minister upon it.

Mr. CRERAR: It might facilitate matters if this item were allowed to pass. It is a stationary item that has been in the estimates each year, having to do with explosives administration. It covers the expenses of travelling inspectors for the administration of the Explosives Act. If this item is passed, then the way is wide open for the hon. member for Davenport or the hon. member for Huron North or anyone else to take part in the discussion we have been having.

Mr. BENNETT: When I hear the minister suggesting that, by the declaration "carried" by the chairman, one can convert a discussion that is otherwise out of order into one that is in order, I think it is time we ceased to quibble about parliamentary procedure. If it will help the minister more readily to accommodate himself to further discussion, I shall not object. The chairman will say "carried" and call the next item, whereupon the member for Huron North will proceed with his speech, after which I may make one myself.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. CRERAR: I did not suggest that the chairman declare the item carried. I suggested to the committee that it might pass the item inasmuch as it is non-contentious, and there would then be an opportunity for hon. members to take part in the discussion of iron deposits.

Item agreed to.

For investigation of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, expenses of testing and research laboratories; for publications, English and French, for purchase of books and instruments; for miscellaneous assistance and contingencies; and for investigations by the Dominion Fuel Board, including salaries and all other expenses, $273,000.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Now that the uproar has ceased, I wish to ask the minister a question as to the difference in cost to the public between iron ore produced from Ontario mines and iron ore when imported, as we do import it now, from the United States. Perhaps the minister could give us information in that regard, because I noticed in the speech of the hon. member for Davenport at least the implication that, provided the product were made in Ontario and made by workers in Canadian iron and with Canadian capital, it did not make very much difference what it cost. He cited the case of Germany and the progress which that country was making in connection with the utilization of its products in the manufacture of certain commodities. I read an interesting article in Harper's Magazine a short time ago. It pointed out that Germany was making rubber at six times the cost of producing it from imported raw rubber. Germany is also making gasoline from coal but at a cost which is four or five times what that commodity would cost if imported. I should not like this parliament, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Davenport, to adopt such a policy in connection with the administration of affairs in Canada. My reason for that objection is that the great basic industry of agriculture in Canada is not in a condition to bear these burdens, and so I protest against having them imposed upon us at anybody's behest. After all, true economy is to bring your raw material from wherever you can get it and to manufacture the product cheaply, and distribute it to the people at the lowest possible cost, and if Canadian capital had thought it worth while to tackle this problem of using Canadian iron I venture to say it would have done so. But we are told that they could do it if you gave them a cent a unit, and an additional cent, or perhaps $2 or $2.50 or whatever it is, per ton of finished ore, for the privilege of producing iron ore in Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not $2.50; it is $1.50.

Mr. DEACHMAN: My hon. friend wants help from the dominion government, help from Ontario; both hands are held out.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a very tender place in my heart for the agriculturists; anything I can do to help them will be gladly done, and any industry I have been associated with has always been happy to help agriculture. But we never find my hon. friend having a good word to say for labour men or industry; we always find him opposing them; he has nothing good to say for anything except agriculture. I like to help agriculture, but I also think of the 800,000 to 1,000,000 men working in industry.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to say a few words about this important item. I commend the Department of Mines and Resources for the wonderful work it has done, under both the present minister and his predecessor from my neighbouring constituency, Hon. Wesley Gordon. I praised him both personally and publicly when he inaugurated the new policy of sending out geological parties covering practically the whole mineral area of Canada. I was glad to see that last year and this year again this vote is enlarged, as this work has resulted in greatly adding to the knowledge of our country and its mineral formation.

There is one other item for which I beg the government to enlarge its appropriation in the supplementary estimates if at all possible; that is road construction to the newer mining sections. There was a time when northern Ontario and, indeed, the whole of northern Canada was thought to be a barren waste. Northern Ontario has shown not only to Canada but to the whole civilized world that we have there the greatest potential mineral wealth under the sun. There are occasions when, through lack of roads, it has been impossible for some of the new mines to be developed. I should not like to see the government embark upon a policy which would favour certain kinds of wild-catting, which exists to some extent at this time. There may be a little too much speculation at the moment; this is not the time or the place to mention what has been going on, but I know it came to the ears of the department that in some sections the public had been taken for a ride, and I hope the provincial governments more particularly will see that at the present time when we are emerging from the depression the people will not be fleeced. But the responsibility rests upon the federal administration to help road construction in some of the new mining sections of Canada. I would never be in favour of a policy of spending large sums in sections where there are merely new prospects not proved by actual development. But the fact remains that at present there is a shortage of roads, summer roads and winter roads, but more particularly summer roads, to give access to new mines.

I commend very highly the Department of Mines and Resources for their policy of road construction inaugurated last year, and hope they will find it possible to enlarge it. Perhaps it is not divulging any secret if I say we thought that in northern Ontario, in Temiskaming and Cochrane, and also in northern Quebec, not enough money had been spent. Doubtless the committee have heard some talk about secession from some of our newer sections, but there is nothing in that. At the same time the government must know that as far as northern Ontario and northern Canada are concerned, the mineral industry is a source of great riches and of revenue to both provincial and dominion governments. We do not want all the money to be spent in our own section, but we feel we are entitled to a fair share. The words of praise and commendation which I spoke of Hon. Mr. Gordon apply just as forcibly to the present minister. I was also able very sincerely to compliment the former Minister of Mines of Ontario, Hon. Mr. McCrea, and I feel that the same commendation is due to his successor, Hon. Mr. Leduc. Their work has been of great help in bringing the country out of the depression. Again I express the fervent wish that the federal government will find it possible to spend more money on road construction and also to increase, if possible, the geological parties we have had for the last two years.

Mr. BENNETT: If the faith of the minister is anything like that of his predecessor, whose footsteps the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) says he follows, one can suggest that he continue his activities. The explanation which he has given of the consolidation of his department I think merits the approval of this committee. When he suggests that the total saving in personnel is forty-seven in the Ottawa administration, it is important to ascertain what the effect was on what one might call the outside service, about which we may have occasion to speak later. The monetary saving at the moment is apparently over $100,000.

I sympathize with the minister when he refers to the difficulty of dealing with men who have been long in the service. When the Department of the Interior parted with the natural resources and they were turned over to the provinces, the same difficulties arose and they have not yet been disposed of, for many of those who took pension at that time were not old men, and although orders in council were passed that they should, whenever possible, be afforded opportunity for employment, many of them are still out of the public service. So the difficulty the minister has had to contend with has been considerable.

He divided his observations into four heads. He spoke of the mining industry. May I say to this committee that in the mining industry as such the Dominion of Canada has a very limited interest; for the natural resources belong to the several provinces and not to the federal government. The federal government is no longer trustee for the natural resources of the country except in that part which is not under provincial control. In the Northwest Territories we have still direct control of the mineral wealth. The extent to which, without compensation by way of taxes, the federal government should interest itself in mining ventures is a matter that is open to much discussion. In South Africa 60 per cent of the profits of the great Premier diamond mine was taken by the state. And in the great mining development which goes on in that country 50 per cent of the increased price of gold is paid to the exchequer; it is less than 50 per cent in some mines, but broadly speaking that is the proportion. Why? Because the nation is responsible, and not the individual provinces, for the increase in the price of gold and the values thus created. That matter is one which has been dealt with by this parliament in a manner without precedent, as was stated in the speech of the Finance minister last year, about which something will be said later. That is the position in South Africa, and in other parts of the king's dominions.

Here we are rendering a very distinct service, and we have it on record that the government do not propose to ask that any contribution be made by the gold mines other than that which they pay as income tax, like other industries. In no other part of the world has gold itself been so looked upon—and why it should be here, is, as the late Rudyard Kipling would say, another story. But I do point out that in dealing with the question of mines and minerals we have some obligations in respect of the unexplored territories, and it is our duty so to conserve those resources as to see that the utmost value enures to the people for whom they are held in trust. I have no doubt it would be desirable for the dominion government to carry on gold-mining operations in the Northwest Territories. If we should be successful in finding a large deposit of gold, it would enable us to make a payment of our national debt on a scale that otherwise is denied to us, for the only method by which we can hope to make any large payment on that obligation is through some effort of that kind.

The same applies to some of our provinces. That, however, is a matter which involves policy, which need not now be discussed. It must not be forgotten, however, in dealing with our mines and minerals, that the rearmament program of the nations has provided a new market for lead, zinc and copper, and already there are distinct signs that with respect to these metals there is a diminution of demand and an increase of supply. So we must not think that by substituting mining for agriculture we can bring about anything like a restoration of the prosperity of the country. Although it is new wealth it must not be forgotten that it is a failing asset. It is an asset that disappears once and for all, as far as the country itself is concerned, and our only direct receipt of income from these organizations is through the income tax which is paid. I think it was well worth while, as the hon. member for Cochrane has said, to take the steps which were taken by the former Minister of Mines, because at that particular moment this country was in such a position that any increase in its new wealth by methods such as were pursued was greatly to be desired.

I would be loath to believe that of all men the Minister of Mines and Resources had concluded that the mining industry could ever take the place of the agricultural industry in a country such as this. We have conditions here that are very difficult for us to overcome. No man ever realizes that more than when he goes away from home. Climate, the nature of our soil, drought, and matters of that kind make one realize the magnitude of the problem with which our people have to deal. In connection with mining we have the uncertainties to which the minister alluded, as compared with the certainties that prevail on the Rand in South Africa, where they have a completely developed territory and know exactly what can be found, because they have a uniform quality of mineral deposit that is certain to produce results from their operations, which is not quite true in this country at the moment. I think we can reserve further observations with respect to the mining industry for another occasion, because there will be ample opportunity on one of the other items.

With respect to the Indian problem I confess that I share the minister's view as to its seriousness. We have less than 125,000 Indians in Canada. The population has increased slightly. At one time it was diminishing. It has increased because we have taken such good care of the Indian population, and in my judgment that in itself is to the credit of the Canadian people. The minister has very properly pointed out that the cost seems to be out of all proportion to what reasonably might be expected for the service rendered. I must say that there are two items I have always found it difficult to understand. When estimates were prepared; when one had to consider the question from every angle in days of great depression, I must say that I found it difficult to ascertain by any explanation which could be afforded what value we got for nearly $2,000,000 spent on education. I say that to the minister very frankly, and I agree with every statement he has made. Sometimes I used to fear that there was more interest in getting a per diem allowance with which to enable institutions to continue their work than there was in anything else, because it goes without saying that what the minister has indicated is true. You cannot take boys and girls out of teepees at five and six years of age; put them into residential schools; turn them back to their homes during summer vacation and finally back home after they have completed their education, and expect them to give that account of themselves which one would expect for the moneys expended. Not long ago I heard of a Cambridge graduate who had gone back to his coloured country people in Africa and had reverted to the customs and habits of his tribe, despite all the effort that had been put forth in regard to his education.

I have been close to the problem in various parts of my own province, in connection with the Blood Indians in the southern part of the province; the great tribe that lies just west of my own constituency, the Stonies, the great hunters; the Sarcees, who are not far from Calgary, and that great tribe which has its headquarters near Gleichen. At Macleod, at Morley, at Sarcee and at Gleichen there are four distinct tribes of Indians, and certainly the effort which has been made to preserve their health, to teach them some of the elements of sanitation and to give them some ideas in the way of education has been highly successful in this sense, that they now realize the value of a hospital; they realize the value of cleanliness and they realize that preventive medicine is more to be preferred than any curative efforts that may be made. We have established doctors upon the reserves; we have built hospitals. In some cases the band funds have been responsible for it; in other cases we have made direct grants, but I do not see how we can lessen those contributions to the well-being of the Indians if we are to maintain the ground that we have won by such great effort. I have seen the change which has taken place since I have been in western Canada. At one time there was a diminution in the Indian population. It is now increasing, and this is a distinct tribute to the efforts that successive governments have made to provide medical services and teach the rudiments of preventive medicine to the Indian population.

I have thought, and perhaps the minister will agree, that in some of these places they might be more successful in their grazing operations. They have raised cattle with indifferent success, for some strange reason. At Gleichen they have a coal mine which they operate with success, and the herds on the Blood reserve are substantial, but whether the operations of the department in that regard can be expanded, I do not know. That is a matter which, I imagine, would engage the attention of the minister and his officials. In connection with the question of education, however, I believe the minister's observations are entirely warranted.

Having exhausted what he had to say with regard to mines and the Indians, the minister turned for a moment to the position in connection with parks. I sometimes think we exaggerate the exact value of the tourist traffic in this country, but that it is a very, very important industry for the purpose of adjusting unfavourable trade balances, as an invisible item, goes without question. When one contemplates the number of people who cross and recross the boundary between this country and the United States and the amount of money that is left here from year to year, it is difficult to estimate it exactly. The parks have played an ever-increasing part in that tourist traffic, and we can afford to spend money in developing them, because that money will produce a real dividend. I am not sure that, as far as the federal government is concerned, the tourist traffic does not give us a greater direct dividend than the moneys we receive, for instance, from one industry at least that has been mentioned. The tourist traffic is so important from the standpoint of an invisible item in our trade relations with other countries that it is difficult to overestimate its value.

With respect to the various park administrations, one can only say that the expenditure of $30,000,000 includes administrative costs as well as capital costs. I hardly think it is fair to include administrative costs, in that sense, but the minister has given them to us only for the purpose of information.

With respect to immigration, I find it difficult to understand why, on the set-up, the services of the deputy minister were dispensed with, for of all the men engaged in the public service from 1930 to this day, no other single man brought about such economies in the public service as did that man. He took the soldier settlement and allied problems connected with loans, and made adjustments such as saved this country more money than is involved in what the minister has now done. Instead of there being forty-seven less people in the employ of the country, the number is very much larger. Before we conclude our discussion of the estimates I shall be able to ascertain what the number is. I remember having noted it, because it struck me as being very large. I do not believe any public servant during my time made a greater contribution to the economic and efficient operation and administration of a department than did the gentleman whose services were dispensed with. However, that is by the way. This does not seem to be the proper place to discuss a question which I believe is very important, namely, whether or not the question of the movement of people into Canada should longer remain stationary. This is a problem which will have to be considered at greater length than I feel disposed to deal with it to-night. But the time is rapidly approaching, if in fact it has not already arrived, when we must realize that the burden of taxation imposed upon our people, and the revenue necessities to meet the charges against our income, have become so very great that an additional number of units is necessary, if we are not to overburden per capita those who are in this dominion.

In addition, there is a larger problem connected with the issue, which need not now be discussed, namely the problem of the waste places of the country being peopled, and the necessity for a readjustment of population in the world. However, this is not a matter with which I shall attempt to deal to-night.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) referred to the iron industry, and I believe the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) also dealt with it. I have only this to say: On more than one occasion I have investigated the matter, and I fancy the minister has done likewise. In Canada we have not, in quantities, iron ore of a quality which would enable us, without importation from some source, to produce the pig iron essential for the production of various kinds of steel. We have iron ore; we have good iron ore, but we have not iron ore located in quantity and quality so as to enable us to deal with the problem in its entirety. Successive ministers have grappled with the problem; successive governments have investigated it, and I regret to say that successive reports have shown just what I have indicated.

At this time, apart from importations from the United States, we import a quantity of ore from Newfoundland. As is known, Newfoundland sells large quantities of ore to Germany. Great as are the German deposits, they still have to rely upon importations. Britain no longer finds herself able to supply her own requirements, and iron ore importations to England come from Sweden, some even from Wabana, Newfoundland, and other parts of the world. The only countries in which I have seen deposits of iron ore located within reasonable distance of the sea in quality and quantity sufficient to produce the highest grade of pig iron and steel, are in South Africa and Australia. The plant at Newcastle, Australia, is one of the four great steel plants of the world: yet we never hear of it. The one in South Africa is far inland, at Pretoria, where they have iron ore situated at some distance from the city, and of a quality which enables them to produce pig iron and steel of the highest grade.

I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Davenport. It is highly desirable that if there is any iron ore in Canada capable of being developed to produce pig iron or steel, we should develop it. I can say to the hon. member, however, that successive governments have made the most extensive investigation, and without the importation of certain qualities of iron ore from other countries we are not in a position to produce the quality of pig iron essential to the development of a great steel industry in this country. I say that with great regret, because it has always been my opinion that the Mesaba range should have been part of Canada on any fit and proper adjustment of boundaries. However, it was decreed otherwise. If one will take the trouble to read with care the life of the late Sir William Van Horne, he will find how nearly the iron ores in that range were to being in possession of a Canadian company rather than a great American company. However, that is not a matter of importance at this time. It is important only because we rely to a great extent upon another country for our supplies of iron ore to serve our blast furnaces.

The minister has before him a very great opportunity. I can only say to him that I sometimes envy him that opportunity, for in days of great depression the visions and hopes which one had of being able to make reorganizations and adjustments along business lines in some of our departments were never realized. In part, they were realized in the Department of Finance, but outside that they were not. Attacks made when the Department of the Interior was reorganized by reason of resources being passed on to the provinces brought about an almost intolerable position, even in this community, because of the resultant superannuation of so large a number of persons. The very fact the minister has been able to reduce the staff by consolidation only by forty-seven indicates not only the difficulty but also something of the strength of that imponderable force which one has to meet whenever an effort is made to improve the public service of Canada by any reduction in its numbers.

If he will study just one front page of one document, one magazine which came to my hands the other day, he will realize clearly exactly what I mean. If consolidation is to be brought about, we shall all have to help in doing it. There is not a general disposition on the part of all of us to see our friends, as distinct from somebody else's friends, deprived of the employment by which they earn their livelihood. We are all perfectly willing that somebody else's friend should leave his position, but none of us is prepared to think our own friend should, with the result that a reduction of forty-seven is the net result of the effort the minister has made. I congratulate him upon it. I miss my guess if between now and the time when tired and worn, he surrenders the seals of office, the forty-seven has not been reversed and the figures show plus, not minus.

Mr. McIVOR: I shall try to be brief, but I should like to commend the minister for his hearty cooperation in helping to develop the north country. I believe it is the duty of members from mining constituencies to make themselves familiar with everything in those constituencies. I found that while I visited mines in other places I was not familiar with those of my own constituency. When I got off the train I made a trip of twenty miles in to a mine. May I say it took five and a half hours to go in and five hours to come out. Perhaps the truck ran better on the way home. I think we could have walked much faster. I thought that mine was being forced to operate under unfair conditions. I got into touch with the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar); he got into touch with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and with the provincial members, and we were finally able to get $4,500 for the improvement of the road into that mine.

I answer the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with some fear and trembling, and I congratulate the minister upon the progress he has made in taking care of the Indians. I visited three bands of Indians north of lake Nipigon and I found there something which I did not think existed in Canada, that is, cooperation being practised on a very large scale. I saw the finest patch of potatoes I have seen since I left the Emerald Isle. This patch was thirty acres in extent and the potatoes were all large and clean. These boys knew how to raise, plant and cultivate the potatoes. I think our Indians should be taught how to live as well as how to make a living. With the exception of two old people, not one person in those bands was receiving relief. I think the minister should be commended for the progressiveness and the educational features of the Indian affairs branch.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say a word or two about this very important item. I consider it to be one of the most important to be considered by the committee of supply. It deals with mining and metallurgy, with the Dominion Fuel Board and all that sort of thing. I must say that there is only a skeleton department to handle this very important phase of the natural resources of Canada. There has been a steady increase in the number of students enrolling at McGill, Toronto, Queens and the other Canadian universities for courses in mining and metallurgy. We should compare this item for this very important work with the items voted in the United States. There may be concurrent jurisdiction as between the dominion and the provinces, but I do not think it goes far enough. There is no coordination, and there should be.

The universities have been coming to this parliament for many years but we are doing nothing for them. Three years ago the Canadian Council of Mining and Metallurgy met in Ottawa. This organization is composed of the great men in this great profession. Many of these men are graduates of the universities of this country. We should consider the work being done along these lines in Germany. Many students who are in their third and fourth year of practical science spent last summer working at pick and shovel jobs in the mines. These students should be taken care of the way they are taken care of in Germany; they should be put to work making a scientific study of these problems. We are absolutely behind the times. We are voting only three-quarters of a million dollars to provide merely a skeleton department to handle this very important work. This is the same sort of department as we have in connection with health matters.

If the government want to do something to bring about better times, they should take note of what is being done in some of the large universities of the world. In those universities every provision is being made for the advanced study of these great problems. The government would derive untold revenue if they provided further assistance along these lines. Many of our great engineers have gone to South America, South Africa and Australia. The number of students enrolling for these courses has increased in recent years. At one time civil engineering, chemistry and other courses used to be popular, but now it is mining and metallurgy. The former government voted about $2,000,000 in order that surveys might be undertaken throughout the country. This was only a drop in the bucket to what could be done.

The latter part of the item deals with the Dominion Fuel Board. This board does very good work. As all members know, this is one of the coldest countries in the world. We have from seven to eight months of cold weather and we are still dependent upon American supplies of coal. We are not doing very much to provide the working classes of this country with cheaper fuel. The two inquiries which have been held into the matter of fuel supply did not touch the national fuel problem. Ten or twelve years ago this house adopted a national fuel policy. Under this policy all the fuel used in Canada would be British mined, that is, mined in England, Wales, Nova Scotia or Alberta. In answer to a question the other day the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) said that they could not give the movement of coal from the maritimes to the head of the lakes. There is a booklet issued by the Department of Labour containing fifteen or twenty tables which deal with this fuel problem and its relation to the work of the fuel board. Are we going to be dependent forever upon the United States? Why do we not develop our own fuel supply?

Why do we not utilize the latent talent now lying idle in the universities of this country? The last commission's report shows that they did nothing and they did it well. I think the work of this Dominion Fuel Board should be expanded. The universities should be given the opportunity of cooperating with the government. We should develop a policy of Canada for Canadians. The engineers who took part in the great hydro development were all graduates of Toronto, McGill, Queens and other Canadian universities. I can see very little hope in this item for our universities. What we should be doing is voting several million dollars to provide for surveys all over the country which would utilize every student in our universities. This opportunity should be given to the poorer students who are dependent upon what they can earn at such work to pay their fees. I hope in the not too distant future we shall wake up in this dominion. We are miles behind the times. I direct the attention of the committee to what is being done in Germany and also in Wales. There are very good men connected with this Dominion Fuel Board, but their hands are tied and they can do nothing. I commend the minister and his officials for the good work done already, but much better work can be done if an opportunity is given to these men to do it.

The deputy minister has a national reputation, and I want to compliment him upon all he has done for the mining industry. If we are to increase the wealth of this country and have a greater output from our mines, I plead with the government to utilize students during the summer time so that when they graduate they will not leave their country but will stay here and be a credit to Canada after all the toil and labour which they and their parents have put into their training.

Mrs. BLACK: Mr. Chairman, coming from a mining constituency I should like to say a few words to the hon. minister (Mr. Crerar).

For the past few years, as he knows, we have had geological surveys coming into the Yukon, and they have done wonderful work. I believe it has been intimated that in the future men are to do some prospecting for the government. I hope that is so. We have an enormous territory covering over 200,000 square miles, and we export only gold, silver, copper, zinc, lead and a few other metals. There are some coal mines in that country, but so far the coal has not been of a quality that we could use comfortably.

The gold mines have been far more valuable in the last few years because of the rise in the price of gold to $35. In Dawson district one company has operated very largely, and it did very much better in the past year than in previous years. I spoke of their camps last year. This summer when I went north I found that new camps were built, and that the men were far better looked after than in all the years I have been north. At one of the camps the superintendent told me it was only a temporary camp. I looked at him when he told me it was only a temporary camp because to my certain knowledge it has been a temporary camp for seven years, and is likely to be so for another seven years unless somebody gets after it. But generally the camps have been improved, and that part of the country is doing infinitely better.

They have not done what I feel they should do with regard to their hours of labour. They work their men ten and twelve hours a day, and I do not believe a man can work properly at mining for ten and twelve hours a day. In the silver mining camp, at Treadwell-Yukon, the men work eight hours a day.

The Mayo district is dependent almost entirely upon the output of silver. In the early twenties when silver went to $1.38, a new high, the district was a beehive of industry; we were fortunate in having in charge of the Treadwell-Yukon mine a mining engineer who was a worker himself, an ambitious man, and he did the best he could for that part of the country. In 1925-26 silver went down to 58 cents, and in 1928-29 to a low price of from 25 to 27 cents, and the mines were closed down and hundreds of miners were thrown out of work.

The silver mining industry is a difficult industry in that country because the ore must be sacked. At first it was raw-hided, taken fifty miles to the river bank, stored on the river bank during the summer, then put on barges and steamers and taken down to Stewart on the Yukon river, then moved up river to White Horse, and from White Horse transferred to barge and steamer, then put on flat cars and taken to tidewater at Skagway and brought out, and again transferred from steamer to train. It is pretty difficult when one has to carry ore in that way. At the Treadwell mine in Juneau, the ore can be worked at a profit of from 90 cents to $2 a ton, but in the Yukon there is only a very small profit when silver is 40 cents an ounce. That I think the minister can readily understand when he knows what our transportation system is.

Owing to the very high water we had this summer there was trouble along both the Yukon and Stewart rivers. Several barges were lost; some ore was lost; other ore had to be resacked and transferred, not once but several times. If it had not been for the ore stacked on the shore at Mayo, the town would have been almost washed out. In that town there were only three buildings which were not under water: the government liquor store, of course, and this was a blessing in a way; the Roman Catholic church and the Anglican church. The one person in the town of Mayo who seemed to have a sense of impending disaster was a Cheechako, a newcomer who warned people that the river was going higher. The manager of the local bank moved out the bank books and valuables and stored them in the tower of the Catholic church, and the bank furniture was the only furniture that was saved.

I hardly intended to go into all this detail to-night, but I did want to speak of it and convey a very hearty invitation to the minister to come to the Yukon and see for himself what we need. I believe the people in the Mayo district would be more than pleased if he did so and it is almost a necessity for them to have a mining engineer settle in that country for at least one year. He could help our prospectors, help the men who have the silver mines, and do a great deal of work for us.

I see it is now eleven o'clock, and with the permission of the Chair I should like to resume when this item comes up again. I thank you.

Item stands.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 9, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF HANGING AS DEATH PENALTY—FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to consider the subject matter of Bill No. 6, to amend the criminal code (death penalty), and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

DIONNE QUINTUPLETS

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West) moved:

That the private bill entitled An Act for the Protection of the Dionne Quintuplets, filed with the clerk of the house on February 4, based on the petition read and received by the house on February 5, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders to ascertain the extent to which standing orders 93 (1) and 95 have been complied with.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES ON GRAIN WESTWARD AS WELL AS EASTWARD

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Explain.

Mr. REID: The proposed bill is the same as that introduced last session. It asks that the freight rates on grain and mill feed, including flour, from the prairie provinces to British Columbia for use within that province shall not be higher than the rates for like mileage on grain and mill feed carried eastward from the prairie provinces. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the proposed bill asks that British Columbia be discriminated against no longer and that the Crowsnest pass rates on grains and mill feeds shall apply westward as well as eastward.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION FOR AMENDMENT TO PREVENT UNNECESSARY NOISES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to amend the criminal code (noises).

He said: The purpose of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is to adopt the law of England in order to prevent unnecessary noises, which have been shown by health officers throughout this country to be most dangerous and injurious to the public health.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BENNETT

BANK OF CANADA—LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO EMPLOYEE BROOKS—NEWSPAPER REPORTS OF PROCEEDINGS OF FEBRUARY 8

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I very much regret the necessity of mentioning again in this chamber a matter of privilege. Yesterday I made a statement, which is reported in Hansard; the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a statement, which is reported in Hansard, but the Citizen and Journal of last evening, and again of this morning, contained a grossly inaccurate statement as to what took place. It is grossly inaccurate not only as to what was said by the Prime Minister but also as to what was said by myself.

I am reported to have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded by a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to explain certain incidents in connection with my absence from the country beginning last August. The statement contains these words:

> He (Mr. Bennett) observed that Prime Minister Mackenzie King had taken a messenger from the permanent civil service on some of his journeys abroad.
>
> Mr. Mackenzie King said that in such cases he had paid personally the salary of the employee concerned.
> "Certainly—of course," Mr. Bennett agreed.

The record makes it clear that I spoke because of a question which was placed upon the order paper by a member of this house, and further that I referred to the fact that I might have adopted the course of taking one of the permanent messengers, as the then leader of the opposition did when he went to England in 1934. I did not pursue that course, for reasons which were good enough for me. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that the salaries of all permanent messengers were paid by the state, and that he had paid the expenses, transportation and otherwise, of the messenger he took with him. I said "certainly," but the right hon. gentleman then also pointed out the fact that the messenger of the department, the permanent messenger attached to the office of the leader of the opposition, was still drawing his salary from the state whether or not I was here, which was a correct statement.

I do deprecate having to mention these matters, but I am sure this chamber realizes that it is grossly unfair to have these statements published in the press, for which the newspapers themselves are not to blame. It does seem to me that a little care on the part of those who report the proceedings of this chamber would obviate the necessity of one having to explain what is distasteful to talk about and still more distasteful to have to refer to again.

SUPPLY

STATEMENT OF MRS. BLACK ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—SUGGESTED ISSUE OF SILVER DOLLARS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in the press a few days ago I saw that the governor in council at Ottawa had adopted a ruling that certain duties should be imposed on coronation souvenirs, and that seemed to me a correct thing for any government to do. Immediately after the recent abdication I also noticed in the press that hundreds of people in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Roumania and other central European countries had been thrown out of work because of the cancellation of orders for coronation souvenirs.

It does seem to me that the British Empire is quite large enough to furnish its own coronation souvenirs. In England we have well-equipped factories producing most beautiful china of all kinds. In this country as well, in New Brunswick, in Alberta and in British Columbia, we have china clay that would make excellent souvenirs. But above and beyond all that, coming as I do from a mining constituency it seems to me that this would be the time for the government to consider issuing silver coronation dollars. The government could issue dollars, as the government did at the time of the jubilee ceremonies, but of course they could not force people to take the dollars. For some time the banks failed to supply to their customers the silver dollars issued at the time of the jubilee, for the obvious reason that they had to pay cartage on the silver, which amounted to a fairly substantial sum; but the situation later was rectified by an arrangement with the government. Canada is the third silver producing nation in the world, and the silver mines of Ontario, Quebec, the middle west, British Columbia and my own constituency of Yukon could very well supply the minister with the silver out of which these dollars might be made. The Minister of Finance has authority, under the revised statutes of Canada, to purchase silver and other precious metals, and I should think the government could well afford to put on the market a million silver dollars.

At the time of the jubilee about half a million silver dollars were coined, out of which I believe the government made a profit of about $300,000. For every sixty cents worth of silver which is struck off in silver coins the government clears approximately $1.15. It is not very often that a member of this house is able to rise and tell the government how to make money; rather we are all holding out both hands and saying, "give me." I should like to feel that the government, through the Minister of Finance, would be willing to authorize the striking of a million silver dollars in order to help the miners and the communities in which the silver is produced, and also because of the fact that it would be a money-making proposition. Next summer we will have thousands and thousands of tourists. All of us, men and women alike, are more or less souvenir hunters. Practically every tourist would take back a souvenir dollar, as happened in connection with the jubilee dollar. It would not be like the Aberhart money, for which some of us paid a little premium. I know I paid $1.50 for a dollar scrip, but that is scrapbook money. If, however, the government issued a silver dollar it would always, so long as government endures, buy a dollar's worth of material. After the first expense, the cost of striking copper, bronze, nickel, silver, or gold coins is not great.

In the name of the mining constituencies, and especially on behalf of the Yukon, I would ask the Prime Minister to consider the matter, and show his willingness to strike as souvenirs for Canada one million silver dollars.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not like to interrupt the hon. member (Mrs. Black) when she was speaking, but I am not quite sure whether she was speaking to the notice of motion which stands in her name on the order paper and which, in the ordinary course of events, would have been the first order of business to-morrow. When the hon. member began to speak I assumed she had in mind saying something on the orders of the day. However I imagine the house will grant permission to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to answer the hon. member's questions, if he is in a position to do so. Perhaps the minister's answer will cover what the hon. member has in mind.

Mrs. BLACK: Thank you.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot deal with the portion of the hon. member's question which relates to souvenirs. I believe my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) could give information as to what is to be done in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member indicated that the matter of souvenirs is only incidental.

Mr. DUNNING: But with regard to the main question, namely that regarding coinage, may I say that the government found itself in some difficulty. At the time of the abdication of the former king certain steps had been taken and certain approval given with respect to the image of the king which was to appear on our new coins. None of the new coins had been issued because in fact dies had not been received from London, where their final preparation was undertaken. It was necessary therefore to begin all over again, and only recently has the necessary approval been received with respect to the image of the head of King George VI which is to appear on all Canadian coins minted in the future. There is some doubt as to whether we will receive the dies in time to have the issue of any new coins in circulation by coronation time. Every effort is being made to bring that about, but under the circumstances no arrangement has been made for the coinage of any special coins.

I believe I am in a position to give some information regarding silver dollars. Up to the present time we have issued 743,720 silver dollars. Of course, as required, the minting of the King George V coins is proceeding until such time as King George VI coins can be minted. A reserve supply of these silver dollars is kept available at all offices of the Bank of Canada throughout the dominion, and the chartered banks therefore can secure conveniently from the provincial headquarters of the Bank of Canada a supply of these dollars in order to meet the public demand for them. There is a substantial demand in the parts of Canada which are interested in the production of silver, but generally speaking, in the other parts, the demand appears to be moderate and mainly for souvenir purposes. I believe that is all I can usefully say in the matter.

I do not believe that at this stage it would be practicable to attempt to evolve a special jubilee dollar, nor would it have been possible in the time at our disposal before the coronation of King George VI to secure the dies necessary for a special dollar. Of course it would differ in some respects from the ordinary one. May I explain to the hon. member that the side on which the king's head does not appear is not changed as the result of a change in the person of the monarch. The only change would be on the side on which the monarch's head appears.

In order to issue a souvenir dollar in time for the coronation we would require a die with a completely different obverse side. I believe the hon. member will readily understand that in the manufacture of dies for coins we cannot complete the finishing process in Canada. As other parts of the empire have their work done in London, the house will realize that at this time there is a heavy strain upon the facilities there available.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention to speak to this subject when the notice of motion should come before the house to-morrow. I speak now, however, because, although I am not as conversant with the rules of the house as many hon. members may be, I am afraid in view of the observations to-day of the hon. member for Yukon (Mrs. Black) there will be no opportunity to-morrow to speak to this matter. Personally I should have liked to see a full dress debate on this important matter and in support of silver.

As an advocate for the past six or seven years of the use of silver, I feel it incumbent upon me to support the hon. member for Yukon in the suggestion she has made. May I point out to her, however, that if it is her object only to popularize the silver dollar it might be as well to place on one side the image of the Duke of Windsor and on the other that of Mrs. Simpson. If that is the hon. member's only object, may I observe that the mere issuing of one million silver dollars will do very little to popularize the greater use of silver, as such, in Canada.

I should like to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) seriously consider taking over all silver in Canada, and issuing silver certificates. Such action would do much for Canada. Not only would it provide employment for many thousands of our citizens, but it would also put currency in circulation at no cost to the government. It is not my intention to delay the house on this occasion, upon going into supply, because possibly I may have more to say at another time. I feel it my duty, however, to join in urging that serious consideration be given to the issuing of silver coinage, including silver dollars, to a greater extent than has been done.

It is true, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, that over 743,000 silver dollars have already been issued, but as they can be produced at the rate of 20,000 per day with the present equipment at the Mint, only about fifty days would be required to issue a million.

It is true that perhaps silver dollars are not as popular as they were in days gone by, but in view of the fact that the government is making seventy per cent profit there is no reason why another machine should not be purchased to run at full blast. This would not in any way injure the credit of Canada. Hon. members who bewailed the fact that such procedure might injure our credit need only look at what has happened across the boundary line. Would any person say that to-day the American dollar is worth less than the Canadian, or that the credit of the United States is not as good as that of Canada? Yet during the past two or three years that country has purchased over one billion ounces of silver, and paid for it by issuing silver certificates. That could be done in Canada, if we had only the intestinal fortitude as against the bankers, if I may use the term, to go ahead and do it. That could be done, despite what they tell us.

I am not unmindful of the cry against any inflation in Canada. Germany is usually pointed out as the horrible example. I am not advocating that we should repudiate everything, but I will say that the credit of Germany is just as good to-day as that of any other country, because it would appear that Great Britain is only too willing to lend money to that country. There is nothing very serious in that argument.

However, I shall leave any further observations in this connection until later. As I say, I join with the hon. member for Yukon in the suggestion she has made, but I am sorry the discussion has taken place on such short notice. I should have liked to see the resolution discussed in the regular manner when called on Wednesday, but, speaking as a comparatively new member, may I say that one never can tell what will take place in this chamber.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on frequent occasions I have endeavoured to ascertain why fifty cent and one dollar silver coins circulate so little in Canada. In England the half crown is greatly in circulation, and our silver dollar, at least the last one minted, is not so large a coin. I may say that I have never recived one of these dollars over the counter as change since they were first issued. The difficulty is not, as suggested by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), the unwillingness of the country to coin them; it is the unwillingness of the people to use them. I rise only to ask the minister if there is not some method by which we could popularize the use of these coins. The fact is that people will not and do not circulate them. Could the minister say how many of the 743,000 silver dollars which were issued are now in circulation, as against those in the custody of the receiver general?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot give an exact figure. We endeavour to adjust the supply to the demand, holding merely a reserve sufficient to enable us to supply what experience indicates the demand to be. I think most of them will be found to be in circulation.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion was made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that the heads of the present and former kings should be placed on these dollars. I do not think anyone could take the place of Queen Elizabeth. King George and Queen Elizabeth are equal and no one could take the queen's place. It would be less popular to have the present king and the former king on these coins.

Mr. REID: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. My remarks have been misrepresented by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McIvor). What I said was that if it was merely a matter of endeavouring to popularize the silver dollars, that would be the best way to do it. I did not suggest that the two names should appear on the coins.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to discuss this matter, but I should like to make just one observation in passing. It must be a source of encouragement to hon. members of this group to see members in the government ranks agreeing with the social crediters as to the issuing of new money.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Salaries, $31,240.50; contingencies, including allowance of $2,500 per annum to the secretary to the Governor General, $69,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This amount for the Governor General's office is the same as in previous years. The increase shown is brought about by the statutory increases.

Item agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Civil Government—
Salaries, $104,051.
Contingencies, $69,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is an increase of $2,000 in the salary of the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs. The rest of the increase is accounted for by the statutory increases.

Mr. BENNETT: As one who has occupied the office I think it is only fair to say that I believe that everyone who knows the character and the extent of the duties discharged by Mr. Skelton will join with me in congratulating the first minister upon providing for an increase of $2,000 in his salary.

Item agreed to.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Salaries, including appointment of A. Tunwell as a clerk, grade three, at $1,620, $42,487.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the Prime Minister will explain the appointment in this manner of a clerk, grade three. This is a matter to which attention always used to be directed and I am curious to know why it is done in this case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend is aware, there are a large number of clerks in the service who have been serving year after year as temporaries. The clerk mentioned here has been in the service in one capacity or another during the last fifteen years. As he has personal responsibilities of his own to meet and performs necessary duties it was thought advisable to have him made permanent.

Mr. BENNETT: The objection which has been taken in this house during the last five years to this course of action is that it sets at naught the provisions of the Civil Service Act, and provides for a salary based upon the exercise of arbitrary discretion. I agree with the Prime Minister that there are occasions on which it should be done, and it has been done, quite properly in my judgment. I only point out that it comes within that category of cases about which in days long since past we used to hear quite frequently.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the point has been well raised. It does seem to me that there is a good deal of injustice being done to a large number of persons in the public service who are kept on as temporaries from year to year and who have no guarantee as to the permanency of their positions. I believe the whole situation ought to be reviewed at the proper time.

Item agreed to.

London.—Salaries and expenses of the office of the High Commissioner for Canada, including $1,900 additional salary for the high commissioner to that authorized by chapter 15, R.S.C., $137,000.

Mr. BENNETT: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is undesirable to modify a statute by an item in the estimates rather than by amendment of the act itself, in order to increase the salary of the high commissioner. While I am not going to quarrel with the excellent reasons that will be given for increasing the salary, I do suggest it would be far more desirable from every point of view that we amend the appropriate act that deals with the matter. If the Prime Minister's attention had been directed to it I think he would have agreed with me that when you are dealing with a statute which itself provides for the compensation to be paid to the officer named in the statute, the proper course to pursue, if it is desired to increase the salary, is to amend the act by deleting the words "twelve thousand" and substituting therefor the words "fourteen thousand." But what has been done here is to add to the salary $2,000 less five per cent, which means $1,900. I can only voice my objection against the practice in the strongest possible terms and have it go on the record of this house, because it constitutes a precedent that I think is very dangerous, and what is more, very undesirable. The statute itself should always indicate the compensation that attaches to the office.

Beyond that, I think the Prime Minister should give us some explanation of the increase, as I am sure he will; because certainly it would be difficult to justify the increase in view of the criticisms that were made in the past with respect to the cost of administration of the office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point raised by my right hon. friend is a good one, but may I say that his criticism is rather of himself than of the present administration, because what has been done in the present estimates is simply to carry forward the item in the form in which it appeared during years my right hon. friend was in office.

Mr. BENNETT: I think not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think so.

Mr. BENNETT: I amended it one year, to my certain knowledge.

Mr. LAWSON: Two wrongs never make a right, anyway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: An increase was made in the salary during the time Mr. Ferguson was high commissioner, I think, and the item in this particular simply carries forward what appeared in the estimates before. That I think answers one point of my right hon. friend.

As to the extra amount required, there has been a good deal of additional work thrown on the high commissioner's office of late. This past year the pilgrimage to Vimy had to be in large part managed through the London and Paris offices combined. There was a great deal of work thrown on the office when the pilgrims were in London. This year the coronation ceremony and the preparation for the imperial conference, which will come immediately after, will also involve a great deal of additional work. Then, too, the Quebec government and the Ontario government have withdrawn their offices in London and Paris, occasioning a largely increased number of inquiries to be directed to the high commissioner's office with respect to many matters. A number of questions have also come up which have required additional stenographic assistance in the high commissioner's office, matters which the house will probably find referred to in the report. I think that covers all that was asked.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As one who has had nothing to do in the past with the method of fixing these salaries, it seems to me that the leader of the opposition is quite right in saying that if there is an act, the proper method of increasing the salary is to amend the act instead of putting in the estimates an item such as this. We are left completely at sea if we pass a statute and then disregard its terms. Whether or not the leader of the opposition, when he was responsible for the administration, did the same thing is quite aside from the question. It seems to me the statute ought to rule in such matters, and I oppose very decidedly this method of proceeding. I see a little bit further on in the estimates another example of what is getting to be very common, a vote "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments." We are simply driving holes through our statutes.

Mr. LAWSON: Are the details of this $125,000 of expenses shown anywhere?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will find in the auditor general's report pretty full details of the expenditures.

Mr. LAWSON: But the difficulty is that the auditor general's report deals only with expenditures up to March 31, 1936. We are now almost one year past that, and are being asked to vote money for the year that is to come.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot tell my hon. friend what the expenditures will be for the coming year, but I can give him the particulars of current expenditure which I have here.

Mr. LAWSON: The information is available with respect to other departments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can give my hon. friend general figures showing how the total is made up for nine months, April to December, 1936. The salary of the high commissioner is $12,000 a year, and staff salaries for nine months, $50,000. The other details are as follows: Allowances, high commissioner and secretaries, $25,874.91; travel, $1,630.08; motor expenses, $1,372.60; telegraph and telephone, $4,852.33; postage, $1,462.64; printing and stationery, $2,538.09; newspapers, $938.12; sundries, $2,642.26; petty cash, $985.48; extra typewriting services, $2,232.46; removal, Mr. Massey, $2,157.75; removal, Mr. Ferguson, $1,010.12; and an amount in suspense of $970.60.

Mr. LAWSON: Is the item of $25,000 for salaries for secretaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Allowances for high commissioner and secretaries.

Mr. LAWSON: It goes to them?

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not an allowance of $40,000 also?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: High commissioner, $12,000 salary and $28,000 allowances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we should have a statement from the Prime Minister as to why we should disregard the statute. The Prime Minister did not answer that, but went off on another track and suggested that the expenses were very heavy. That does not answer the point at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must beg my hon. friend's pardon if he thinks I in any way tried to evade answering the question. I thought I did state that the estimates in the particular mentioned were no different this year from what they had been during the time my right hon. friend was in office, and the only reason the statute has not been amended is that we have simply followed the procedure that was adopted in the past. I agree with my hon. friends that usually it would be better to amend the statute. That can be done another year if the house thinks it advisable, but I can assure my hon. friend that there was no intention in any way to adopt a different method from that which had been pursued before.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that the statute will be amended another year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to see that the matter is considered between now and next year, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister is quite right in saying that the form in which this additional compensation is provided for in the estimates is as it was done in previous years. I certainly remember having dealt with it once, but as I recollect, the answer given to me was that it was in the nature of a temporary arrangement, and that there was a reduction of ten per cent in the amount, making it $1,800 one year, and this year it is $1,900; $2,000 has been paid in addition to the $12,000, I surmise, over the last ten or twelve years. My view was and is that it would be desirable to change that figure of $12,000 into some more appropriate amount, much more than $14,000. It is idle to suggest that the salary of the high commissioner should be twelve or fourteen thousand dollars, and then in lieu of salary vote other amounts. We have been doing it consistently, one administration following another, for the last twenty-five years, but the allowance has been increased as the years have gone by. But just why $2,000 was added to the salary and then $28,000 added by way of allowances I have never been able to make out. The practice is not new; it has been followed in the last five years excepting as to variation of the figures; indeed it has been done for a long time. It is one of the matters that engaged the attention of the right hon. gentleman's predecessor, as to whether we should not provide a salary in the High Commissioners Act that bears some relation to the responsibilities which devolve upon the high commissioner and the duties he discharges. It seems a nonsensical thing to provide $25,000 for secretaries and services of that kind for which account is given, and $28,000 for personal allowances, the whole of which is used for the purposes of his office, and then provides that the salary, which is $12,000, shall be increased by $2,000 less five or ten per cent. I think the whole matter should be put on a proper basis. I recall that on one occasion the explanation given to me was that it was because of the temporary character of the $2,000 item. The Prime Minister was quite correct in saying that it was carried in the same manner in the previous estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to all these positions in the diplomatic service I might point out that the service is a new one, and it is difficult to anticipate within the course of a few years what the necessities of these different offices may be. I think it was felt by the previous administration, as it has been by the present, that we ought, if possible, to review the whole situation and arrange not for salaries only but also for pensions, allowances, etc., so that the diplomatic service may be duly regularized. There has not been up to the present the opportunity to effect this. I hope that it will be possible to accomplish it within the next few years.

Mr. LEADER: I hope I am not presumptuously criticizing the estimates of the Prime Minister when I say that to my mind our expenditures in connection with our offices overseas and in the United States have been growing at an alarming rate. Last year in this house I criticized the increase under the late administration in the cost of upkeep of Canada House. To-day I find myself in a peculiar position, supporting a government for whom I have a great deal of respect, but which is increasing the estimates for this very same institution. With regard to the salary that our high commissioner enjoys in London, it is difficult to know just how much he gets. I think the salary is actually about $14,000 a year, and on top of that he gets an allowance of $28,000, which means that he receives a salary of over $40,000 a year.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right.

Mr. LEADER: And if I understand aright, this estimate provides an additional salary of $1,900.

Mr. BENNETT: That is part of the $14,000.

Mr. LEADER: At that rate he is getting $42,000 a year. I listened to the Prime Minister as he read the different items of expense, but I did not hear him read the item to which I am about to refer, and which to me would be ridiculous if it was not an imposition on the taxpayers of this country. In the auditor general's report you will find that the Canadian taxpayers are asked to pay a dog tax of $2.25 to the high commissioner in London. Looking a little further one finds that we are paying $28 for dog tax to our ambassador at Washington.

Mr. LAWSON: The question is, who is the dog.

Mr. LEADER: To me it seems ridiculous.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I at once correct my hon. friend? The dog tax that is being paid for by the government is not for any official of the Canadian government. In the case he mentioned it was a tax which was paid for the High Commissioner of Great Britain who is resident in Ottawa. I believe there are also dog taxes paid for some of the ministers of other legations. That is done because of a custom that exists as respects the diplomatic service generally whereby local taxation is borne by the government of the country to which a minister may be accredited. That explains the dog tax item.

Mr. LEADER: I thank the Prime Minister for his explanation, but I still think the taxpayers of this country should not be called upon to pay a dog tax for anyone.

Mr. BENNETT: I am pleased that the Prime Minister made the statement to which we have just listened, because I remember being asked a similar question. The truth is that the government is paying taxes of all kinds in the city of Ottawa that are imposed against the offices held by the representatives of foreign governments in this city. I was shocked when I first heard about the dog tax—I daresay the Prime Minister had the same feeling—and I found that it is not an item that goes before officials as a matter of detail; all the taxes that are paid to local authorities are lumped, and the cheque issued accordingly, whether it be for one dog or two, or a dog and a pup. Payment is made of the amount of taxes that is exacted by local authorities. That is a matter of custom, just as France pays our taxes in Paris, just as our high commissioner's office taxes in London are borne by the British government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say a further word to the hon. member who has raised a question concerning allowances. In the matter of diplomatic representation abroad the government is necessarily obliged to take account of what is done by other countries. Canada cannot afford to have her representative go to London and live or have an office on a back street, while Australia and South Africa and New Zealand and other parts of the British Empire have the best of accommodation for their high commissioners. Also my hon. friend must know that in London the expenses of living in certain parts of the city are very much greater than they are, for example, in Ottawa or other cities in Canada. All these factors have to be taken into account. It may be unfortunate that this is so, but I feel sure that if the hon. member would make a comparison of the costs he would find that Canada's expenditure on her representative institutions abroad are very much within the mark of what is being paid out by most other countries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to question that statement of the Prime Minister. Canada House is located in the very heart of London, in one of the most expensive sites imaginable. That involves of necessity a very heavy expenditure. Several years ago I happened to visit Tokyo, and I found there again that the Canadian legation was one of the most expensive in that city. We are a small country. As a matter of fact that legation was built without the knowledge of this house. It was done under a former administration; apparently the administration was afraid to bring the matter before the house; the whole of the very heavy expenditure was authorized by order in council, and thus we as members of the house knew nothing about it formally until the building was erected, and then we were required to refund the money that had been borrowed privately. I object to that way of doing business. It is not the proper way. In my judgment there is no necessity for such a costly establishment, as we have at Tokyo, although we had as the then minister a delightful man, but of expensive tastes, who wanted to be second to none in Tokyo. Once you have your legation established on the grand scale there is no end to the expenditure involved. I do not want to be regarded as a demagogue, but tens of thousands of our people are living on the very narrowest margin; tens of thousands are unemployed, and others, middle class people, are doing their best to educate their children and can hardly make ends meet. It seems to me there is nothing humiliating in the representatives of Canada living on a little more moderate scale, representing as they do a country which in population is not a great country, one which of course wants to maintain its self-respect but at the same time should seek first to do its very best for its own citizens. I do not want to single out any one particular item, but rather to offer a general criticism. As representing in a special way the poorer classes of people of this country, I protest against the steadily increasing expenditure we are asked to vote for official and ceremonial affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First with respect to the London building, I submit that the offices which Canada has there are really unpretentious as compared, for instance, with what Australia and South Africa have.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I spoke of the site.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but may I say that no better investment could be made for Canada than to have a building on that site. It is not money wasted; it is part of the permanent property of this dominion, and as long as Trafalgar square remains the centre not only of London but one might say of the British Empire, that property will go on increasing in value. From that point of view it is a thoroughly good investment. I submit that, abroad and in foreign countries, it is all-important that a country should keep up appearances, if I may use that expression.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Keep up with the Joneses.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not keep up with the Joneses, but at least keep up appearances. I ask my hon. friend quite frankly whether he would be content to have Canada still represented on Victoria street as it was years ago, with Australia, South Africa and other parts of the empire represented as they are in London at the present time. I am sure he would not.

With regard to the building in Tokyo, my recollection is that the former prime minister made a statement to the house with regard to that matter when the estimates were before the committee—in fact I questioned him on it myself.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The building was erected before the estimates were brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I tried in vain to get a copy of the order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not accurate, Mr. Chairman. All the hon. gentleman had to do was to move for it and get it. He got it without moving for it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It was not brought down before the close of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to the building in Tokyo may I say that it was obtained for the government of Canada at a remarkably moderate cost for the style of building that it is. I question very much whether it could be built to-day for double the amount that was paid at the time. I understand that the reason the previous administration proceeded with the construction at that particular time was because conditions were so favourable for construction then. If Canada is to have legations abroad it is necessary that we have suitable buildings in which to house ministers and to carry on the business of the legations. Is it not advisable, therefore, to secure the right kinds of buildings to begin with, and is there any economy in postponing the making of the necessary arrangements? One has only to look about this city to see what the governments of other countries are beginning to do with respect to their legation buildings and the housing of their representatives here. Can we afford to make less adequate provision in their capitals for our own officials?

Mr. BENNETT: I was interested in this matter because of discussions which have taken place in this house from time to time, especially the observation made on more than one occasion that we pay more than other countries do. I hold in my hand the estimates voted by the parliament at Canberra, Australia, a few weeks ago for the period ending June 30, 1937. Here are the particulars for the high commissioner's office:

Salaries and allowances as per schedule	£23,610
Extra duty pay	200
Temporary and casual employees	50
Salaries of officers on retirement leave and payments in lieu	100
	£23,960
General expenses:
Travelling and subsistence	£1,000
Office requisites and equipment, stationery and printing	750
Postage, telegrams and telephone services	2,000
Freight and carriage, including removal expenses	65
Cablegrams	2,500
Municipal and other taxes	7,250
General upkeep of Australia House	10,800
Upkeep of official residence	625
Allowance to High Commissioner for expenses of official residence	1,950
Other incidental expenses	780
	£27,720
Total of the two	£51,680

On the basis of a four dollar pound that is something over $200,000, and we are voting $137,000. There are the figures of the estimates which have passed the Australian parliament. I wonder why the hon. gentleman persists in making statements of that kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the right hon. gentleman wants to misrepresent what I say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: On a point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not say that our expenditures are higher than those of other dominions. What I did say is that they are higher than are warranted by the state of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: Well Mr. Chairman, I have a fair memory of what I have recently heard. I heard what the Prime Minister said and I heard also what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said. He wondered why the Prime Minister had made the statement that the cost of maintaining our offices was less than that of other countries, and he wondered what he would say if he looked into the cost of the offices maintained by other dominions in London, and he referred to South Africa and Australia. Remembering these estimates, recently passed, I sent for them and I gave them to the committee.

As far as Tokyo is concerned I cannot think the hon. gentleman would deliberately misrepresent it, but certainly he succeeded in doing so, whether by inadvertence or deliberation is a matter that he himself must determine. I will give him the benefit of the doubt and assume he did it inadvertently and not deliberately. The fact is it was made known by a statement in this house that the then minister at Tokyo was prepared to advance money for the purpose of constructing the building at that time because conditions made it possible to purchase the land and erect the building at a cost so much less than it was believed it would be later, in view of the trend of prices, that we should not lose the opportunity. I am bound to say it was a departure from ordinary practice and procedure, and I am bound to say also that we did not have the money at that time. The Minister of Finance said he could not find the money at that moment, but the minister was prepared to provide the money and he did so. The site was acquired; this house was made aware of the fact. The plans were approved; this house was made aware of the fact. The building was completed; this house was made aware of the fact, and, what is more, this house voted the money to repay the cost of the building before the late government went out of office. It is in the estimates. Therefore there was nothing done secretly or evasively, and the fact that a statement was made was all that was necessary, as far as the order in council was concerned. I cannot think the hon. gentleman strove very hard to get the order in council, because there was nothing to keep back about it. It was an open and aboveboard transaction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When was the house apprised of the plan to erect a building?

Mr. BENNETT: Before the building was started at all, right here in this chamber, if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look it up. What is more, before the late administration went out of office we were able to provide the necessary money to enable parliament—not the government, but parliament—to vote an amount covering the cost of that building, and parliament did so. If my memory serves me aright it was thought to be a good bargain, and I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that it has turned out so satisfactorily. The last time I saw the minister he told me the work could be done to-day only for a very much larger sum than it cost at that time, and certainly those with whom I have come in contact tell me that we have one of the most favourable and desirable sites that could be obtained. And of course it will be within the knowledge of this house that under international arrangements the taxation is borne not by Canada but by Japan. As far as we are concerned we have a building and a site upon which taxes accruing in Tokyo are paid by the Japanese government, and it was acquired at a price that I believe was not much more than half the present value of the property.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before I could accept the statement of the leader of the opposition, Mr. Chairman, I would require to have some definite reference to Hansard to show that the proposal to erect a building was brought before this house; that the plans were approved by the house—

Mr. BENNETT: Not by the house; I did not suggest that they were.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How were they approved, by order in council?

Mr. BENNETT: They were approved by the government. Did the hon. member ever hear of plans being approved by the house?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought the right hon. gentleman said they had been approved by the house. My statement was that the house knew nothing about the matter until the building was erected, and then the estimates contained an item to cover the cost of refunding the loan which had been advanced privately to construct this building. I know the building was erected at a very low cost. Advantage was taken of the depreciated yen. I know it is a beautiful building; I am not suggesting that it is not. My point was this: I objected to a private individual lending money for the erection of a building, the whole thing being done simply by order in council without this house being consulted. I do not think that is the right way for this country to make expenditures. My second point was that it seems to me that these buildings, these great establishments in the hearts of these big cities, beautiful as they are, are more elaborate than they need be. That was my statement, and I see nothing whatever to retract. I feel that with Canada still a comparatively small country there is no need for us to try to equal or outshine some of the legations of the great nations in Tokyo.

Item agreed to.

Washington—Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $100,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Could the Prime Minister give us an itemized statement of the proposed expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. This is the same amount that was voted last year. The expenditure in 1936-37 was considerably less than that of the previous year, largely because of the fact that during part of the time the office of minister was not filled. The items are as follows from April 1 to December 31, 1936:

Salaries—Minister and staff, $27,420.37.
Allowances—Minister and staff, $18,683.89.
Travel, $507.95.
Telephone and telegraph, $1,242.09.
Printing and stationery, $362.12.
Newspapers, $738.87.
Fuel, light and office keeping, $1,084.09.
Postage, $150.
Residence furnishings, $468.10.
Office furnishings, $775.12.
Legation maintenance, $3,032.70.
Sundries, $398.91.

That makes a total of $54,864.21 for the nine months, April to December. I cannot give the details beyond that date.

Tokyo—Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act, or any of its amendments, $68,000.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to say a word with regard to this item. If the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation continue in their present ways, and if we are to open up embassies the world over, I would nominate the hon. gentleman who spoke to-day to occupy one of them. A year or two ago it was proposed to open still another embassy. I do not represent the opposition; I am a private member of parliament. There is a very considerable body of public thought in this country that does not agree with the extension of these useless embassies and separatism the world over. It was very fortunate that we did not open an office in Italy, since we challenged Italy with such disastrous results that the Minister of Justice had to rise in his place and disclaim our responsibility for sanctions. And then we have been doing nothing but offer moral lectures to Japan, with equally disastrous results to the British Empire in the Pacific.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The other day, Mr. Chairman, I was reading a long article in a leading English magazine, the English Review, which devotes more space to foreign affairs than any other publication within my knowledge, in which reference was made to the fact that the British people do not understand the situation as far as Japan is concerned, because the papers have suppressed much of what should have been printed. The article stated that there is a large body of public opinion in Japan looking to the next war; that to-day the young people in the universities, the professors, the artisans and the tradesmen are talking of the coming war on the Pacific with the American people. I think it would be well for Canada to take notice of the handwriting on the wall, and have no more of this separatism.

I hope Tokyo will be the last legation to be opened by this country. We have trade commissioners, all that are necessary, in these various cities throughout the world, and it appears to me that this division in our empire, to which I referred the other day, has progressed to such an extent that to-day the British Empire cannot act as a unit in time of trouble like France and other countries, because of separatism in the dominions so fatal in peace, and in war it would be most disastrous for us to have separatism. In Canada we are holding a great heritage in trust for the British people. I speak only as a private member, and not as one belonging to any particular political party. May I say that there is a large body of sensible public thought in Canada which is very much alarmed at the division taking place in our empire to-day among the dominions in empire matters. Only recently the French Prime Minister said to one of our foreign ministers that to-day Great Britain cannot deal properly with a foreign country because she cannot act as a unit. I believe that statement is correct; it was borne out in the matter of sanctions against Italy. South Africa would not act because she was interested in the sale of horses to Ethiopia. Canada agreed to sanctions, and then, in a most lamentable fashion, backed out because we have no army and no fleet to protect our shores. Mussolini had only to come west and sail up the St. Lawrence rather than go south. We might have had a rude awakening if he had landed. As a British subject, both in and out of the house I shall protest against opening up throughout the world any more of these useless embassies. It was proposed to appoint one to Rome and open an embassy in that city.

A few days ago I saw a map of the world, which I believe was published by one of the departments. On that map were little red patches indicating the members of the British Empire. One was struck by the way in which they were distributed, with the inscription, "the Empire on which the sun never sets." The principle of dividing British peoples in peace and war is most disastrous. We were fortunate that at the time of the constitutional crisis the empire acted as a unit; that may not happen again. The Prime Minister did well, and showed wisdom and judgment. Canada's part in the crisis was to do nothing, but to do it well. I suggest that if we were to do nothing about the embassies the world over it would be much better for the future of the British Empire. I know many people are becoming very much alarmed as to the future of the empire, and undoubtedly in the future it will have to act as a unit. We are occupying the greatest heritage in the world. Before God to-day Great Britain stands as trustee for the peace of the world. Why, then, should not hon. members sitting to my left, who are devoting their attention to ambassadorial and foreign affairs, devote the same time to a discussion of domestic affairs, especially in view of the suffering which prevails throughout Canada. I believe we should send them overseas to try to pacify Europe. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would be a most eloquent representative in Rome, where it was once proposed an embassy should be set up. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) could be sent to visit our friend Hitler to see if we could not get a little better results from our relations with that country.

So far as I am concerned I am opposed to setting up more embassies. Had I been in the house when the system was begun there would have been one member at least, out of the two hundred and forty-five, who would have voted against it. Sooner or later I believe they will bring about the dismemberment of the British Empire.

We can now make our own treaties. We have a seat in League of Nations discussions. Hon. members to my left, however, seem to have abandoned the league in favour of the star-spangled-banner policy of pan-Americanism at Washington. They seem to rely on that and the Monroe doctrine as protection for Canada in time of trouble now and not the league. Let me tell them that if that is what they depend upon for protection they would be very sorry for not having seen the handwriting on the wall if the enemy were to sail up the St. Lawrence. Not only is there a possibility but, in view of the condition of affairs there is a probability of attack. I am not prepared to say who is responsible for this separatist policy, but I can say that a great body of public opinion in Canada, a British country, do not believe in it.

I do not believe in the procedure of setting up ambassadors throughout the world, and I have not believed in it since I have been a member. We know they are supposed to look after trade matters. Under the Statute of Westminster we are a separate country and make our separate treaties. Only invisible ties bind us to the motherland. We are as independent under the Statute of Westminster as Spain or Ireland, and I repeat that if the present policy is carried to its logical conclusion it will most certainly lead to the dismemberment of the empire.

In connection with the trouble with Italy Canada announced as an independent nation that she would apply sanctions. In my constituency I have three or four hundred first-class Canadians who wanted to know what it meant. "Does it mean that Canada is opposed to Italy?" The same question was asked candidates throughout the country during the last election campaign. So far as I am concerned if I have the honour to sit in the house any longer—and I do not care whether I do or not—I shall consistently oppose these votes for useless ambassadors who wear three-cornered cocked hats and go among foreign peoples representing Canada, a nation with no army, no navy and no air force to protect its shores but that of the motherland for its defence.

Instead of leaning on the Monroe doctrine let us seek something more substantial. May I tell hon. members to my left that in the late war, without the protection of the British fleet the American government could not have transported a soldier. That is how much independence we may expect in the future, if we depend on that country.

I believe the work in Tokyo could be done just as well by a trade commissioner and that the embassy might as well be closed up. It is fortunate that we did not open an embassy in Spain or Italy, because had we had one in Spain it might have been lost. We might have had to send Canada's ignoble and vainglorious navy over there to protect us. The people of Ontario do not believe in the policy of establishing embassies, and they are definitely opposed to the doctrine of separatism, because, sooner or later, it will mean dismemberment of the empire.

Mr. REID: I was going to suggest that the Prime Minister give some consideration to the appointment of a permanent trade commissioner or ambassador to China. When one realizes what is taking place politically and economically in that country one readily realizes its trade possibilities. May I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in 1926 we did a trade with China valued at $27,000,000, which in 1935 had dropped to just under $8,000,000. As a matter of fact the trade with Japan in 1935 was less than our trade with China in 1926. I would urge that the Prime Minister look into the matter of appointing a permanent official to China, distinct from the Tokyo embassy. As is well known, the two races are entirely separate, and no one commissioner from Canada could hope successfully to represent Canada in both Japan and China.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the hon. member spoke about a trade commissioner I believe he must have been referring to a minister. As a matter of fact at present there are trade commissioners at Hong Kong and Shanghai. However, the question of appointing a minister to China is one which will have to be carefully considered, and I trust it may be. Beyond that, I cannot give the hon. member any assurance at the moment.

Mr. BENNETT: I find it very disagreeable to say what I have to say, but I do not think it is fair to Canada to be represented as we are at Tokyo. It puts us in an extremely humiliating position. I say this in the best of good feeling, but I must say it. I do not think it is right to send to represent this country a person whose sight is gone and who finds it difficult to get about. In saying this I know I repeat the views of thousands of people who have business there and who feel that something should be done about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my right hon. friend found it very distasteful to say what he has just said and I know he is only fulfilling what he believes to be his duty when he raises the point he does. In taking exception to the fact that the minister at Tokyo has found difficulty with his sight, I would recall to my right hon. friend's mind the well-known instance of Fawcett who held the office of Postmaster General in London during years in which he was totally blind. The fact that the Hon. Mr. Bruce was able to fill the position of lieutenant governor of British Columbia for many years, notwithstanding the infirmity of sight from which he suffered, is a very good indication that he is not unduly handicapped in that regard.

[Mr. Church.]

It so happens that very few men in Canada have a knowledge of conditions in British Columbia comparable to that enjoyed by Mr. Bruce. Many of the questions that come up as between Japan and Canada relate more particularly to that province. I may say that it is a very difficult business to secure a person for any of these positions who combines all the qualities needed. Notwithstanding what has been said as to the expenditures being made by this country on legations, they do not begin to meet what is necessary on the part of whoever holds the office of minister. At the present time those who are representing Canada abroad, either in England as high commissioner or in other countries as ministers, without exception have had to draw upon their own private means in order to supplement the allowances made by this country. At the time of making the appointment to Tokyo Mr. Bruce was available as one who had a first hand knowledge of some of the conditions to which I have referred and who was able to accept the appointment immediately. He was a gentleman in whom the government had every confidence. The word I have received from those who have seen Mr. Bruce in Tokyo and from the representative of Japan in this country is that he has filled the position which he now holds very admirably since the time of his appointment.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to labour a matter about which I prefer not to speak. I have known Mr. Bruce from my earliest days and have acted for him professionally. I know his condition perhaps as well as any man in this house, but I share the view expressed by those who are in a position to speak with authority that it is not fair to the Dominion of Canada that he should be our representative in Japan. I would not expect a Japanese minister, with the well known courtesy of that race, to do other than express the greatest satisfaction with any person who might happen to be appointed to that position. I know that Mr. Bruce discharged with complete satisfaction the duties of lieutenant governor, but I still think it is unfair to this country to have the present representation. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), who represents a substantial body of opinion in this country, has expressed considerable opposition to the maintenance of these legations, and the present situation makes it much more difficult for those of us who believe that a minister may serve a useful purpose to support the institution as it is at present organized and presided over by our minister. I know that what I say, and say regretfully, represents the view held by those who put truth above all other considerations and who are not concerned about what the effect may be of the mere statement of it. I am hoping that possibly the directing of attention to this matter will bring about a very necessary change on the part of the gentleman himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I asked Mr. Bruce to accept this appointment he directed my attention to just the criticism which my right hon. friend has made as something which might have to be met. He told me that in the circumstances he would like the government to feel that he would be quite prepared to retire at any time the government might wish to make some other appointment. He said that at most he could not remain in Japan very long. It was thought by the administration at the time of Sir Herbert Marler's transfer from Tokyo that it was advisable not to leave that particular post without a minister. Mr. Bruce possessed the necessary qualifications for the post from many points of view. The only possible limitations were his years and a certain infirmity of sight. He possesses some qualifications as a diplomat which I imagine are not excelled by any man in any post anywhere.

Mr. NEEDHAM: Could the Prime Minister give us an idea of what is spent by Canada in maintaining ministers abroad, and also what is spent by other countries in maintaining ministers in Canada? We would then be able to see what balance there is as between the money spent in other countries by Canada and the money spent in Canada by other countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have never tried to balance the sheet in that way, but I imagine if I were to attempt it I would find that a good deal more money was being spent by representatives of other countries resident in Canada than is being spent by our representatives abroad.

Mr. BENNETT: When did the present minister present his credentials in Tokyo?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The letters of credence were signed on September 2, 1936, and he presented them in November.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was appointed when the house was in session last year and he did not take up his appointment until November, 1936. He has been in Tokyo for a matter of only three months, so that the urgency of his appointment could not have been very great.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The appointment was not made until the time I have referred to.

Mr. BENNETT: It was made when this house was in session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The appointment was not made; there was an announcement of the intention to make an appointment.

Item agreed to.

Geneva—Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1937, including secretariat, international labour organization and Permanent Court of International Justice, $155,775.

Mr. BENNETT: Is the reduction because of a smaller assessment?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is due to the devaluation of the franc in Switzerland and the florin in Holland.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Is the decrease due only to the devaluation in the Swiss franc? There has been no decrease in the contribution of Canada to the League of Nations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was also a devaluation of the florin in Holland.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no decrease in assessment, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give the full particulars.

As a result of the devaluation of the Swiss franc and the Dutch florin (salaries and most other expenditures being incurred in Geneva and The Hague), it was possible to make a reduction of twenty per cent all round in the contributions which would otherwise have been required. The Canadian contribution will be 155,775 gold dollars; provision for an equivalent number of Canadian dollars is made in Vote 206, while the balance, approximately $100,000, varying according to exchange fluctuations at the time payment is made, will, as usual, be met from the vote for exchange, No. 213.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of Canadian delegates to the Assembly, conferences and commissions of the League of Nations, $14,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This is for the expenses of the delegates to the league. I should like to ask if it covers the expenses of all the delegates, including the ministers of the crown, or whether some expenses are paid for in other ways, by allowances such as are usual when a person is sent on a commission somewhere.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed that the item covers all the expenses, including those of ministers and others who may be representing Canada.

Mr. BARBER: Can the Prime Minister tell us who represented Canada last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the last assembly we had three delegates, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and Senator Dandurand. The delegation also included Doctor Skelton, Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs; Mr. Vanier, who is in the London office, and Doctor Riddell.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, the question put by the hon. gentleman who spoke immediately preceding the Prime Minister provokes me to make one or two observations in connection with the personnel of the Canadian delegation that attended the last assembly of the league.

I have criticized a good many of those who represented Canada at the League of Nations, and I know it was not because of anything that I had said, but perhaps in spite of it, that the delegation this year was of an exceptionally high order. I had the privilege of attending on my own account the last assembly of the league and of being present at its discussions both in committee and in general assembly, and I am sure I am expressing an opinion that will be shared by every member of the house when I say that we must always feel it a great honour for Canada to have been represented at the league by the Prime Minister and the ministers and others in attendance with him.

I seem to have been in the habit of following prime ministers. I was in Geneva when Sir Robert Borden was in attendance, and I was also at Geneva when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was likewise head of the Canadian delegation. I want to say first of all about his representation that unfortunately his indisposition at the moment precluded him from giving that attention which normally he would have given to the affairs of the league, but his was a representation of a very high character. The Prime Minister of Canada when he attends the assembly of the League of Nations gives to the delegation a distinction and a prestige which normally it does not possess, and that was particularly true, Mr. Chairman, this year. I think some mention should be made of the character of that delegation.

There was first of all the Prime Minister. I have taken pains to go through the list of all the delegates, and our Prime Minister was the only head of a government in attendance at this year's assembly. In addition we were represented by two other ministers of the crown, the Minister of Labour and Senator Dandurand; also by Doctor Skelton and Colonel Vanier. Of equal importance is the fact, which should be noted by the committee and which has not been mentioned for obvious reasons, that the Prime Minister of Canada was singled out for very high distinction at the assembly, having been selected as one of the four vice-presidents.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that members of the house on all sides are fully convinced of the importance of proper representation at international conferences generally, and it is a source of gratification to the country that the government decided to send a delegation so fully representative of Canadian thought, and clothed with the fullest authority.

While I am on my feet may I make one or two other observations that are made from a study over a period of some time. I believe we are fast approaching the period when we should have in this country a foreign service act. That may not be altogether in harmony with the views of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I believe it is essential that not only those in charge of our legations but as well those who are acting in minor capacities in our legations should be given ample opportunity, particularly if their own pecuniary circumstances do not permit, to keep fully in touch with what is going on in this country. I know at least two gentlemen in our foreign service who have not visited Canada for some time, who have not had the means to come to Canada. One in particular, in my judgment, in spite of his good intentions and wishes, is no longer seized with the current thought of his own country. I think that is to be deplored. It should be possible for minor and major officials to visit their own country periodically, as officials of the League of Nations are permitted to do, and indeed as minor officials in other legations of other countries are permitted to do.

I simply make these observations, Mr. Chairman, but I think they have great merit. In conclusion, it does seem to me that the time has come in this house when these matters—I do not refer particularly to the Geneva estimates but rather to questions coming within the category of international affairs—should be discussed by a properly constituted committee. If we are to attain some measure of thoroughness in dealing with them we should pursue in respect of international affairs the same course that we pursue in respect of our purely domestic problems.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Might I venture to agree with and if necessary supplement what has just been said by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It does seem to me that there ought to be a better opportunity given to the house to study our foreign affairs than is given upon consideration of the estimates. We have a committee known as the industrial and international relations committee. It is only occasionally that any matter referring to international relations has been referred to that committee, and I am afraid the committee has not been taken very seriously. The whole range of matters coming under external affairs, at least those that are not strictly confidential in character, might automatically be referred to that committee. The members of the committee would benefit very largely by their study. Certain representations by the committee might be made to the house. It could have before it the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, who might at least outline many of the problems that face us at this time. There should be before the committee a detailed report of what was done at the last assembly of the League of Nations. Only as members of the house secure fuller knowledge of international affairs than most of us have at the present time can it be hoped that there will be a deep interest in these matters on the part of the people generally. On several occasions I have spoken to the Prime Minister about this matter. I hope he will see his way clear in the near future either to refer these matters to the present committee or, even better, to appoint a separate committee charged with studying on behalf of the house the whole of our foreign policy and international relations generally, as is done—a colleague suggests—by the foreign relations committee in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I have followed from time to time the statements made by members of this house who suggested that the foreign policy of Canada should be studied by a committee, and the more I have looked into the matter the more certain I am that it would do harm rather than good. No one would suggest that the foreign relations committee at Washington has at all times served a useful purpose. The essence of foreign policy in England, for instance, has been continuity of policy and, so far as might be, unity of thought and action on the part of successive governments; that is a Liberal government succeeding a Conservative administration has endeavoured to carry out the general outline of large policy which its predecessors thought desirable in the interests of the country. Public examination into details of foreign relations tends to create the impression that that which must be withheld from the public has a sinister meaning, though in fact it has not. One cannot discuss foreign problems—and when I use the word "foreign" I employ it in the sense of everything external to Canada—as one discusses domestic problems, because the other man's point of view must be considered, and yet it cannot be disclosed; he does not do business on that assumption, and without his specific consent his communications or dispatches or expressions of viewpoint cannot be made known to the public.

One of the difficulties in connection with foreign policy that have been experienced by countries which have pursued the course that has just been suggested is that they find it hard to do business in the way in which foreign relations have usually been maintained. The essence of democratic government is that so far as possible the government shall be responsive to the mind and will of the people. But if people's minds are to be distracted by extreme views and the suggestion of sinister purposes and motives in connection with matters that cannot be fully exposed at the moment to the public mind, because their disclosure must be delayed until something further has occurred, a government may experience the negation of the very effort it is making to secure a successful issue of the matter in which it is engaged. During the last few months every government in the civilized world has been worried and worn by the conditions that obtain throughout the world. Now if we are to resolve ourselves into a committee, small or large, and have statements made by prominent officials, and examine documents and papers, when an announcement is made that this or that paper cannot be produced at the moment, someone will say, "Why can we not have it? Are we not the people?" and the net result will be that you will create an atmosphere unfavourable to the sense of tranquillity and confidence on the part of the public which every government, I think, aims to secure.

When Lord Granville went out of office in 1870 he told his successor that the horizon had never been clearer than at that moment, yet within a few weeks the Franco-Prussian war broke out. That is an illustration of the uncertainties that pervade the atmosphere of foreign offices. At the moment we have no such terrific responsibilities, but our partnership in the commonwealth of nations does place us in a position wherein a public discussion by a committee of matters that I could name, were I so disposed, might and I think would be most injurious in respect of many problems that are constantly engaging the attention of the prime minister and his government. For these reasons I have never been able to bring myself to an appreciation of what is meant by the proposal to refer to a committee matters relating to our foreign policy.

The foreign policy of this country is so obvious that it does not require much discussion. On points where there may be differences or wherein an acute situation may arise, the responsible ministers are always desirious of informing the public, not only for their own safety but because they have a sense of responsibility in that regard. But there are some matters which can be peacefully adjusted by reason of the very fact that they are not made known for public discussion, whereas such a result would be made difficult if they became the subject matter of bickering and unpleasant and unhappy reflections. I am certain of that. I have made it my business to ask in many quarters, not only in our own empire but elsewhere, and I have received but one answer, and it is this: with the tremendous responsibility that rests upon those who have to accept the duties of office, to meet a committee of parliament and be asked about matters which cannot be divulged because they may be in a state of partial completion, would be impossible without creating that very suspicion and unrest and distrust which all governments endeavour to prevent or allay. I cannot bring myself to any other view. I should like to feel that there was something in the suggestion that has been made, but I cannot see that it would have any effect other than to injure rather than advance the cause which the hon. member has in mind.

The discussions in the foreign relations committee of the United States are of two kinds, one public and the other private. The senate of the United States goes into executive session about every matter that affects the interests of the United States with respect to treaties when they are up for discussion and ratification, and it does not permit the general public to have any knowledge of them. It was asserted that this had always been a matter of tradition. There is said to have been such tremendous applause that the windows of the old senate chamber rattled when, in connection with the Alabama claims, Sumner quoted:

> It was that fatal and perfidious bark,
> Built in th' eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
> That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
> [Mr. Woodsworth.]

That is what he is alleged to have said at the height of his eloquence. In the United States they do not permit public discussion of those matters which are of tremendous and vital force in connection with their foreign policies. Surely there has been in this house no limitation by any government to the fullest possible discussion of every matter that affects the relations of Canada to the empire and to foreign countries; I have seen no such effort on the part of anyone, and I know of none on the part of the late government at least. But to send matters of that kind to a committee for discussion I cannot but think would have the effect of destroying that very sentiment and sense of solidarity and continuity which is so desirable in connection with our international relations, whether with other members of the British commonwealth or what one might technically call foreign nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend, the member for Winnipeg North Centre, that in bringing on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs at this early stage of the session, I had hoped that this year at least the government would be meeting his wishes in the matter of affording early opportunity for the fullest discussion of external affairs. Two or three times my hon. friend has complained that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were held until near the end of the session with the result that no opportunity had been given for discussion of External Affairs. This year I tried to bring on the estimates early so as to avoid that criticism. As to ample opportunity of discussion may I say that opportunity is being offered now. The house is in committee, there is no desire in any way to limit discussion. I must say however that I agree with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just said about the great responsibility which rests upon a minister in charge of foreign affairs to-day. If there is any time or occasion where the doctrine of ministerial responsibility applies to the full it is in these matters which relate to the affairs of foreign nations and other countries. For example, I cannot imagine a committee calling before it the under secretary for External Affairs and expecting him to take responsibility either for giving or withholding information in relation to foreign affairs. That is something for which the minister himself must take responsibility. That being the case, it seems to me it is much better that the minister should take his stand before the house as a whole rather than appear before any committee. With the condition of the world what it is to-day, I feel very strongly that there are some things which it is just as well to avoid discussing. On the floor of the house a minister can give his reasons for withholding discussion and will be expected to do so. I do not see what could be added in committee that could not be given on the floor of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appreciate the kindness of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in bringing down the estimates at an early stage of the session. But it seems to me that both he and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) have a wrong idea of what is involved in my proposal. I recognize that there are certain matters which, by their very nature, must be more or less confidential. No one wants to drag those out, especially when delicate negotiations are going on. I recognize also that no under secretary ought to be asked to give information with regard to matters of policy. But I believe there is much taking place in the world to-day that ought to be known to our general public. Comparatively little information is given in our press concerning international affairs; even in our schools and universities little opportunity is given to follow them. If even we in this house are to form an intelligent judgment on these matters, an opportunity ought to be afforded for studying them.

What I speak of is the setting up of a new piece of machinery. With regard to the business of almost every department we have committees; every hon. member is familiar with what is done in those committees; the head of the department or other officials may be called in, not to discuss policy but rather to give information. Sometimes outsiders may be called in; representative men or women from many walks of life appear and give information or their expert knowledge. It is for the government to decide later what the government's policy shall be, but at least the committee is more or less informed as to the subject matter under discussion. Surely we should get away from this idea that foreign policy must be conducted in secret. The suggestion is made that if the public knows just a little more, it will become restless. I cannot see the force of that argument. The fact is that if it is considered that foreign affairs must be conducted in secrecy, the public is much more likely to imagine that something is wrong.

The leader of the opposition suggests that we ought to have continuity in our policies as regards both commonwealth affairs and dealings with foreign nations. I would suggest to him that it did not look as if he were very strong on continuity when immediately on accession to office he altered our representation in both London and Washington.

Mr. BENNETT: There was not any representation at Washington at the time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, very shortly afterwards there was representation of a very different kind. I am not urging that in committee we should cover the whole field, but instead of merely passing an item to cover the expenses of our delegation to Geneva, we might well have that delegation appear before a committee, tell its experiences in Geneva, share with us some of the information acquired there. Then, with regard to relationships that we have with other countries, instead of our being forced to discuss in the house details with regard to our relations with China, Japan or any other country, it seems to me it would be far more intelligent to have some definite machinery through which this could be done to greater advantage. That is all I have in view. I do not think the answer of either the leader of the opposition or the Prime Minister has really touched the proposal which I made in this connection.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—To provide for hospitality in connection with visitors from abroad, $15,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask when the vote pertaining to the International Joint Commission comes up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Provision for the International Joint Commission is made by statute. It is not necessary to discuss the appropriation in committee because provision is made under an act which sets forth the amount to be paid year by year. If however, my hon. friend wishes to ask any questions on the matter, he is perfectly free to do so at the present time.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I remember the figures correctly, the auditor general gave them for 1935-36 as $38,272, whereas for 1936-37 and 1937-38 they are $73,000. I was going to ask if the increase arises because of the meetings of the International Joint Commission during the past summer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact, the statute provides for the larger amount but only the smaller amount was actually paid. I think that explains the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNICOL: And does the International Joint Commission report directly to the minister on matters that came up at the meetings of the commission last fall?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The commission makes a report to the minister, yes, upon the different matters that come up for discussion.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the moment I have nothing to say with regard to what was discussed at the meetings of the commission that I attended. I refer particularly to the part of the reference to the commission concerning the Richelieu river. This matter will come up under the public works department, and I shall have something to say then. I must say, however, that I was amazed at the proposal of the Lake Champlain Valley Council Association before the commission, to divert water from lake St. Francis across country, having it flow by gravity into the Hudson river. The water level of lake St. Francis, above sea level, was proposed as stationary at 152 feet. The proposal was to run a canal directly across to lake Champlain, the water to enter that lake through one or two locks having a total drop of about fifty feet. It was proposed that the level of lake Champlain should be maintained at 100 feet above sea level by constructing works at the outlet of the lake in order to regulate the flow into the Richelieu river at, I suppose, approximately a thousand second feet. The balance of the proposed diversion of 5,000 second feet—

The CHAIRMAN: I do not like to interrupt, but we are on item 210, to provide for hospitality in connection with visitors.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Prime Minister gave me permission to ask a question about an item that was not called, and in any case I shall be through in a moment. As I said, the proposal was to control the flow of water at the outlet of lake Champlain so as to maintain the level at 100 feet above sea level. Then it was proposed to tunnel or excavate through the height of land south of lake Champlain and take the water across country to Northumberland on the Hudson river. That height of land is about 147 feet above sea level. I covered that territory very thoroughly during the fall, and I am familiar with the whole layout of the country.

It struck me, Mr. Chairman, that if anything of this sort was ever permitted it would be ruinous to the harbour of Montreal, and anything that would ruin the harbour of Montreal would ruin the whole economic fabric of this country. I am confident that the minister would never permit the diversion of 5,000 second feet of water out of lake St. Francis, across country and through two locks into the Hudson river at Northumberland but if an association carries on propaganda and keeps it up for a long time there is no telling how far it may go. I wondered whether that report had been received by the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the inquiry was originated at the instance of the United States. Some hearings have been held already, and the commission will be holding further hearings in April. It will be some time before any report is made, and when that report is prepared it will be printed and sent to the governments of both countries. The commission will not be in a position to commit either country to any project. The purpose of the inquiry is to get information which will enable the government to decide what may be best with respect to any project of the kind.

Mr. BARBER: Would the Prime Minister explain this item and give us a statement as to the money expended last year?

Mr. BENNETT: Just before that point is left, I wonder whether the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has given any thought to the effect of the privy council decisions, which I have read in the newspapers but of which I have not seen the full text, with regard to the meaning of section 132 in relation to the treaty having to do with the International Joint Commission. If the newspaper reports are accurate, I am not quite clear as to whether or not the treaty is invalid. Perhaps when the minister gets the opportunity, he will look into that question when he is looking into the other matters that have to be dealt with.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have just received the information that the text of those decisions has reached the department, so I shall be able to communicate the text to the house to-morrow and the matter to which my right hon. friend calls attention will certainly be investigated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has asked for an explanation of the hospitality vote, which shows an increase of $10,000. This again brings up a point, which will come up in connection with other items which will be presented this afternoon, as to the position which a country is obliged to take as a country when belonging to the family of nations. The custom does exist among different nations of extending something in the way of hospitality to important personages from other countries. When Canada is represented abroad by its public men they are frequently entertained by the governments of the countries to which they go, and on our part we are obliged to extend similar courtesies, or at least we feel that we should do so, to distinguished personages visiting Canada from other countries. This year, due to the coronation and the imperial conference, we expect that there will be a considerable number of persons of importance visiting Canada to whom some hospitality should be extended by the government, and for that reason the amount is somewhat larger than otherwise would be the case.

I might mention in particular that we have learned that Prince Chichibu the brother of the Emperor of Japan proposes to go to London for the coronation via Canada. His Royal Highness will be visiting Ottawa on his way to London, and will be staying in this country for a short time. The government feel that it would wish to extend appropriate courtesies to the emperor's brother.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no overestimating the importance of having this dominion properly discharge its duties to those from other parts of the British Empire and elsewhere who visit us. It will be within the memory of this house that we did entertain the brother of the Emperor of Japan and his wife, and we did entertain the King of Siam. They intimated that they were passing through this country, and we considered it our duty to extend some courtesy by way of entertainment. I can not in any sense come within the qualification imposed by the first minister in his observations, as being a distinguished person, but I was embarrassed by the kindness and courtesy extended to me in New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. The governments of those countries certainly make it their business to extend hospitality to people from other parts of the dominions. We have done less of this than most of our sister dominions, and in view of the great stretch of country we have it is highly important that we should provide that those who come among us and, to put it on a selfish basis, who may do us a great deal of good, should get the best possible view of the country as they pass through it and the best possible impression with respect to it. I feel quite certain that this view, which is held in other countries, should prevail here. As far as my information goes, there is no country that does not maintain a hospitality fund of substantial proportions. In Canada the accounts are audited by the auditor general, and I think it may be said in the main that there has been little cause for complaint either as to the method of inspection or as to the persons who have been selected to be what one of our friends once described as the victims of our hospitality, there being some danger that hospitality may be extended too generously.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to meet loss on exchange, subject to approval of treasury board, $135,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a matter which would come under the Department of Finance, but there is no reason why we should not pass it. It is an exchange item.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is a reduction in the item. It is due to the devaluation of certain foreign currencies.

Item agreed to.

Canada's portion of expenditure of the Imperial economic committee, the Imperial shipping committee and the executive council of the Imperial agricultural bureau, for 1937, $18,690.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a fixed item, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom and Europe, $350,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the advertising for, and why the increase?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The vote for advertising and publicity in the United Kingdom in 1936-37 was $250,000, but a further amount of $25,000 was made available from the fisheries vote for that year. It was to aid in extending the sale of products of Canadian fishermen in foreign and domestic markets, in order to intensify the Canada Calling campaign in connection with fish. The details of the expenditures from April 1 to December 31, 1936, are:

Advertising in Canadian Chamber of Commerce Journal, £100.
Contract with Service Newspapers Limited, £400.
Advertising arrangements with the Empire Home-makers Institute, £400.
Advertising in publication "Quebec", £100.
Advertising in Canada's Weekly, £1,500.
Advertising in Imperial Review, £100.
Poster advertising on selected sites, £3,000.
Press advertising, £4,899.
Advertising on commercial and public vehicles, £10,000.
Printed matter, £9,653.
Canadian bacon advertising, balance due from 1935-36, £210.
Salaries of permanent staff, $8,000.
Salaries of temporary staff, £332.
Allowances, permanent staff, $2,000.
Miscellaneous expenses, Ottawa, $500.
Office expenses, London, £3,000.
Services of James Spence, £735.

Imperial Institute for servicing of Canadian films, £200.
Hire of sandwich board men in Glasgow, and supplying posters, £97.
Canadian electric sign, Liverpool, £2,400.
Printing in Ottawa, $2,064.
Dominion day advertising, £3,534.
Advertising on curtain of Kings theatre, Edinburgh, 52 weeks, £312.
Canada Calling campaign, outdoor and aeroplane advertising, £1,246.
Canvassing, £1,107.
Canada Calling campaign, organization expenses, £208.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the results are satisfactory, I suppose the expenditures are warranted. I have noticed that recently some of Canada's advertising in old country papers has been greatly improved. I was wondering whether the increased expenditure is due to the new or improved method of advertising. May I ask if included in the amount is the advertising done by the Department of Agriculture in connection with Canadian farm products?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, this does not include the agricultural item. An amount is voted specially for that purpose. The present high commissioner has given particular attention to the whole question of the organization of publicity in the United Kingdom. What the hon. member has observed by way of improved conditions is I believe the result of careful study which has been made in connection with advertising, in which there has been an attempt to bring together all the interested parties, and to include all departments of government which advertise abroad. The expenditure for the Department of Agriculture remains separate.

Mr. MASSEY: What proportion of the vote is allocated to the United Kingdom and what to the rest of Europe?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe it is something like ninety-five per cent to the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: A sharp issue is raised here, in connection with advertising. It will be recalled that the former high commissioner endeavoured to consolidate in Great Britain the advertising done by Canada. The Prime Minister will recall that he directed attention to certain efforts made by one department to carry on advertising "on its own," so to speak.

The statute dealing with the office of high commissioner provides that he shall have general supervision and control of our activities in the United Kingdom. I read and always have read the statute as indicating that he should be in charge, and I use the expression "in charge" in the colloquial sense in which we use it in Canada. The former high commissioner endeavoured to consolidate advertising services. I believe the Prime Minister will recall that in one year we increased the vote to, I believe, about $250,000. That represented all the advertising expenditure to be made in the United Kingdom and Europe in that year, and we endeavoured to bring it under the control of the high commissioner.

Mr. James Spence, to whom reference has been made, is in charge of that section of the advertising carried on under the direction of the high commissioner's office. Various departments have endeavoured to conduct their own advertising campaigns. At one time it was the Department of Trade and Commerce, to which exception was taken, and at another time it was the Department of Agriculture. The question as to the relationship between these two departments I purpose discussing at a later time. The story is a very old one, and involves a close and careful analysis of the situation. If the Department of Trade and Commerce is to be treated as it has been on several occasions in the past, then it will fail in the discharge of its duty. That department is responsible for the trade commissioners.

I read an article in one of the weeklies—I believe it was Canada's Weekly—dealing with the impingement by one department upon the operations of others. Our trade commissioners are highly efficient and effective men. The principle underlying the agricultural activities of Canada will be found in the British North America Act, and in the statute dealing with the department. It was never intended that it should be charged with a responsibility outside Canada. Its duty was to see that our products were standardized, that they were of the highest possible quality and that every possible step was taken to ensure that they met the requirements indicated by the Department of Trade and Commerce. So the trade commissioners are responsible for the work outside Canada. If the testimony to their effectiveness and efficiency that one receives in other parts of the world is correct, these men, who are mostly young, have discharged their duties and responsibilities in a highly satisfactory manner. If another body is to be set up to do the same work or to have any responsibility in connection with it, the result will be disastrous. I know that in times past acute differences have arisen between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. Those of us who have listened to the statements of a former minister of agriculture and of a former minister of trade and commerce will realize the necessity of there being a clear delimitation of their activities as provided by the statute. The Department of Agriculture should be charged with the responsibility of seeing that the requisitions as to fitness and quality and everything connected with the preparation of our exports have been complied with. When they leave these shores the responsibility should belong to the other department. I mention this because it touches the question of advertising. The Prime Minister says that the question of advertising does not touch the Department of Agriculture, that the statute makes it perfectly clear that the trade commissioner's office should be responsible for it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my right hon. friend says, any advertising is carried on through the high commissioner. I was answering the hon. member who spoke a moment ago with reference to using money voted to the Department of Agriculture for its work. That money is used for the purpose of gathering information through officers of the department in England as to what would be helpful in determining types of commodities required and in connection with grading and the like. I think that is what my right hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. BENNETT: If the right hon. gentleman had made that statement before, he would have been saved having to listen to my observations of the last few minutes.

Mr. HEAPS: The Prime Minister gave details of expenditures and mentioned one expenditure of £1,500 for advertising in one newspaper. Could he tell us what paper that was?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Canada's Weekly. This paper goes into every public library in the old country.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the circulation of the paper outside the libraries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. MASSEY: Could the Prime Minister tell us how this money is allotted? As some of us who have been in the advertising game know, there are advertising agencies and other aids to those who would place advertising accounts of considerable dimension. I am not attempting to criticize what has been done, as I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he says that the advertising has been excellent and is a credit to the high commissioner. Are Canadian advertising agencies having branches in London consulted with regard to this advertising, or are British agencies used exclusively? What is the course of procedure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is part of the "Canada calling" campaign. I have the details before me and perhaps the committee might be interested in having them on record. They are:

Early in the fiscal year the High Commissioner decided to reorganize and coordinate the publicity activities of Canada carried on in London. For this purpose a committee was constituted under the chairmanship of the High Commissioner, consisting of Colonel Vanier, Secretary of the High Commissioner's office; Mr. Hudd, Chief Trade Commissioner; Mr. Gerahty, Director of Trade Publicity; Mr. Pearson, First Secretary, High Commissioner's Office, and Mr. Spence, Publicity Agent, formerly with the Department of Immigration.

Plans for a policy for the advertising of Canadian products in the United Kingdom were considered, particularly with a view to whether it would be desirable, in future, to concentrate expenditure under a well defined scheme rather than by making small and separate contributions to a variety of publicity enterprises.

After considering plans submitted by four of the most reputable and successful advertising establishments for the advertising of Canadian products, the contract was given to the firm of Mather and Crowther, Limited, a well known London firm. The Mather and Crowther plan was based on regional rather than national advertising, as it is not possible effectively to carry through a national advertising campaign with the amount of £40,000 or £50,000 when one is attempting to sell, not a single product, but to create general goodwill for a large range of products emanating from a single country. The regional campaign proposed is to cover the large urban areas such as London and the home counties, Manchester, Glasgow and the Clydeside, Liverpool and Birmingham. This regional campaign will last for about four months. The first month will be devoted to trade canvassing, to the arranging of window displays and organization work. The second month will initiate an intensive press and poster advertising campaign, with films and other forms of publicity used. During the third month press and poster advertising and retail displays will be maintained, but in a lesser degree, while in the fourth month there will still be a considerable body of very valuable "reminder" advertising. Each regional campaign will cost in the neighbourhood of £4,000.

It is hoped to secure the complete approval and cooperation of Canadian producers, Canadian importers in the United Kingdom and all Canadian advertisers, governmental or otherwise, engaged in the fostering of Canadian trade.

These regional campaigns, which have been called "Canada calling Great Britain," have been planned at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Liverpool, Cardiff, Leicester, Birmingham, London, Leeds, Manchester, Belfast, Sheffield, Newcastle, Hull, Southampton, Nottingham, Plymouth and Bristol. I continue:

The Canada calling campaign has for the first time effectively mobilized and concentrated Canadian government publicity in the United Kingdom in the larger marketing areas where there is a big consumers demand for Canadian products. Trade inquiries for Canadian goods have increased remarkably in the cities in whch the campaign has been centred. Reports from retail distributors, produce brokers and the Canadian government trade commissioners confirm the impression that the campaign is achieving its purpose of stimulating the demand for Canadian goods. It is receiving the active cooperation of United Kingdom merchants and importers as well as of Canadian producers, and has enjoyed an extremely appreciative reception in the United Kingdom press where Canada and Canadian news do not always get as much space as we may think they deserve.

The campaign, in the six months which it has been in operation, has already justified the provision for its continuation and development included in the estimates. It has now been launched in the London area where an intensive covering of shopping districts will be more difficult and more expensive than in some of the earlier regional campaigns which have been carried on in Scotland and the industrial north. In the coming year it is hoped to increase the effectiveness of the trade publicity by an increased use of films, press and poster advertising and by enlarging the number of regional campaigns that will be carried on at one time.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the nature of the campaigns for advertising onions, apples and so on, be left to the discretion of the high commissioner's office in London, or will they be governed from Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume that will be a matter of conference between the two.

Mr. MASSEY: Did I understand the Prime Minister to say a while ago that advertising for the Department of Agriculture would be handled by the high commissioner's office?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not make myself clear in my reply. I was answering a question about a vote which had been made for the purpose of agriculture. The purpose of that vote was to enable the officers of the department to gather information in England with respect to quality grading and other matters which would be helpful to the department here. Such advertising of agricultural products as is done will be done by the high commissioner's office.

Mr. MASSEY: I congratulate the high commissioner's office upon the advertising they are doing. Such advertising as I have seen of late has been of a very high quality, and this vote, large as it is, is well justified by the returns to this country.

Item agreed to.

Expenses in connection with the negotiation of treaties, $20,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust the chairman will allow me to ask a question as to the matter which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) mentioned a moment ago. I understood him to say that he had received copies of the judgments on the recent references which were made and came before the judicial committee of the privy council.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have just been sent the information that we have received them.

Mr. CAHAN: I wonder whether it would not be possible to have them printed so that the members of the house might have access to them. It will be one or two months before the law reports are published. We have now on the order paper certain bills introduced, strange to say, by a private member for the repeal of certain statutes enacted by this parliament in 1935, and the question of their repeal must depend very largely upon a careful consideration of the opinions delivered by the judicial committee of the privy council. On that ground alone it seems to me that we should have at an early day copies of the judgments made available to all members who are interested.

Another more important matter was mentioned by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) a moment ago, and that is that the opinions of the judicial committee of the privy council, as summarized and reported in the press, seem to go to the very root of the previous constitutional practice and to suggest that the government of Canada no longer has the legal authority or the constitutional right to negotiate with foreign nations treaties except those to which the parliament of Canada can give legislative validity. As that question must, I think, come up for discussion, it is important that the text of the opinions delivered by the judicial committee of the privy council should be made available. Certainly I trust that the government will not allow certain bills which have passed a first reading to come up for a second reading until we have the text of those opinions available.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I realize the importance of those decisions being made available to all the members of the house, and it was my intention to lay on the table to-morrow, at the first opportunity, copies of all the decisions. Then, perhaps, either the house will order that they be printed and distributed, or possibly if they are not too lengthy they might be inserted in the Votes and Proceedings, so that they would reach all the members of the house the following day.

Mr. BENNETT: And a few extra copies of the Votes and Proceedings might be printed.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has said that certain bills for the repeal of certain legislation have already received their first reading. Those bills are still on the order paper for first reading. The decisions of the privy council doubtless have much to do with the consideration which members will give to those bills when they come up, if they do come up.

As far as the right of Canada to enter into treaties is concerned, the only references in which the question of treaties arose were the labour references respecting minimum wages, hours of labour and the weekly day of rest. They were special. It was even represented in this house that they were not treaties at all. They were conventions which were accepted by the house in 1935, and I believe it will be seen from the decisions of the privy council that their lordships did not consider them as ordinary treaties, such as my hon. friend suggests. However, we had better wait until we see the text, which I myself have not yet seen.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of the reference by the governments of Canada and the United States of certain complaints arising out of the operation of the smelter at Trail, B.C., to the tribunal constituted pursuant to the provisions of the convention signed at Ottawa the 15th April, 1935, $50,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is only the voting of money that will be repaid to the country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses connected with Canada's representation at the coronation of His Majesty, $35,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister indicate how much money altogether it is proposed to spend on the coronation ceremonies?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have estimated $35,000 as the amount required, but that is exclusive of the $197,000 which will be required for the contingent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, here again I am afraid I must protest against these large amounts. It seems to me that this country might very well be represented by the Prime Minister and several individuals who could represent it with dignity, but I cannot quite see why there should be these very heavy expenses for what is, after all, simply an elaborate ceremonial, I turn over to the next page of the estimates, opposite vote 249 for $197,000 for the expenses of the contingent, and I find these grants: grant to the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, $13,100; grant to the Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene, $10,000; grant to the Canadian Social Hygiene Council, $5,000; grant to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $18,000; grant to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association, $20,250; grant to the Victorian Order of Nurses, $13,100; grant to assist the Canadian branch of the St. John Ambulance Association, $4,050; grant to the Canadian Red Cross Society, $8,100; grant to the Canadian Dental Hygiene Council, $750. I give those as examples of the comparatively small grants that we make to these important institutions.

I am thinking more particularly of the large number of people who are living on very low standards, some of them in actual destitution, and who will have to pay the large sums required to send this contingent and the various delegates to London. We have just passed large votes for the advertising abroad of wheat, fish and so on, but the actual agricultural workers, the fishermen, the miners and the textile workers, whom we were discussing here last night, and generally the great masses of the producers of this country who really are the foundation of our national life, are to-day receiving in their personal incomes very small amounts indeed. Some of them are trying to bring up families on the small wages they are receiving. I do think—though I may be the only one in the house who ventures to express himself along these lines—that we are getting away from the earlier ideals which inspired the people of Canada, ideals of simplicity, ideals of living within our means. We have a sort of false front; we have to live in as good a house on the international street as anybody else. This is all wrong. We are not living within our means, and in our efforts to advertise this country or to be present at a great ceremonial, we are making large expenditures, when as a matter of fact we refuse to make even comparatively small expenditures to meet the needs of the producers and of the large numbers of unemployed who are constantly begging us for alms.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is hardly fair in the comparison he has made. He was trying to draw a contrast between what is being spent for the purpose of representation at the coronation and what is being spent in the way of money for social services. For any such purpose he ought to give the committee a statement in full, which would include what is being spent by the provinces for all social services—

Mr. BENNETT: And the municipalities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and what is being paid out by municipalities. He ought to take account of what has been disbursed by the federal government in the last few years in unemployment relief—

Mr. BENNETT: And by private benevolence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and for old age pensions, and now we have pensions for the blind which are being proposed this session. All that the hon. member has quoted are a few contributions being made from the federal treasury to help some private agencies which are carrying on a very creditable work and wish to be assured, through assistance given them by this government, of an amount sufficient to pay their secretarial staffs. I mention that only because I think it is important that a true perspective should be preserved.

With regard to the matter of representation, I believe citizens of Canada generally will wish this country to be represented at the coronation on a par with Australia and South Africa and New Zealand and India and other parts of the British empire. After all Canada is the largest and the oldest of the dominions. We take a certain pride in having a status of our own as an autonomous nation with all the powers and rights of a full nation. If we are to be represented at all at the coronation, surely it should be with some regard to the position that Canada holds in the eyes of other parts of the empire and other countries of the world.

My hon. friend speaks continually about what we are spending for one purpose and another and asks why we cannot afford a little more for peace policies. Many of the items that he has questioned this afternoon are for purposes which perhaps go further than any others towards promoting good will and good relations between countries. Our legations have been instruments for avoiding conflicts, for getting at the root of difficulties at their inception. The amount that will be expended in connection with the coronation will be a means, I am perfectly sure, of bringing together representative groups from all parts of the empire in a way which will further effect cooperation and good will among them. I think we must view these questions from the larger point of view that we are a full grown nation, with not only the opportunity of fulfilling the obligations of a nation but with a certain pride in the way in which we do it.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Send farmers and fishermen and textile workers, then, instead of sending soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. member that I believe the young men who are in our defence forces, who are prepared to give, if need be, their lives at a time as critical in the affairs of the world as the present time, are deserving, whether they serve in the air force or the naval forces or the militia, of all the encouragement and all the honour that this parliament can give them. I resent strongly the imputation that a man who is prepared to offer his life in the service and for the protection of his country, on behalf of those who are unable to defend themselves, is not discharging an all-important function for the nation to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no such imputation. I said that we should send as our delegates persons who represent the different classes of our people. The Prime Minister has stated that we should send people who would promote peace. My suggestion was that if we were sincere in our desire to promote peace we might well send representatives of farmers and fishermen and miners as well as sending soldiers.

An hon. MEMBER: You said, instead of sending soldiers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All we are sending represent one class. I suggest to the Prime Minister that it would be equally possible for me to say that he insinuated that the farmers and the miners and so on were not the people who were at the foundations of our life. I do not charge he did say that, but I resent his suggestion that there was any justification for the statement he imputed to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that in the militia service there will be many taken from the ranks of the artisans of this country; there will be farmers, miners and representatives of other trades and callings. I was not making any insinuations. My hon. friend remarked that we had better not send soldiers, and I was trying to point out that in a world such as we are in to-day those who are offering their services to the state as soldiers are deserving of all the recognition we can give them.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I doubt whether the Prime Minister's statement is altogether correct, that the people of Canada are greatly interested in seeing that Canada makes as good a showing as South Africa and New Zealand and Australia. There are thousands of people across the dominion who are not particularly anxious about the kind of showing we make, but who are face to face with their greatest problem, that of making a living. When passing expenditures of this sort, and one to which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) referred the other evening, this parliament should bear in mind that there are people in Canada, people in the province and the constituency from which I come, who are living on relief grants of from $6.50 to nineteen or twenty dollars per month, people who are receiving five dollars in their home when they are expecting the arrival of a child, people unable to get eye glasses or proper dental or medical care. To such it must be a striking contrast that we pass votes, one of $35,000 for the delegation to the coronation, one of $197,000 for a contingent to attend the coronation, one of $65,000 to decorate buildings across the dominion with flags at the coronation, one of $40,000 for the imperial conference. If we omit the item for the conference, there is a total of around $300,000, and it is in striking contrast to the fact that to the people I have mentioned we dole out a few cents here and a few cents there, sometimes after a most humiliating examination of their circumstances. When the Prime Minister feels that we are particularly worried over the matter of keeping up with the other members of the British commonwealth of nations, may I remind him that there are thousands of people who are much more interested in seeing that we properly discharge our responsibilities to our people who are in need throughout the dominion.

DIVORCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

PROVISION FOR APPEAL TO PROVINCIAL COURT OF APPEAL IN DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, to provide for appeal to the court of appeal of the province of British Columbia in divorce and matrimonial causes.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to provide for an appeal in divorce causes in British Columbia to the appeal court of that province. At the present time, in divorce and matrimonial causes, the only appeal in that province from the trial court, which is called the supreme court of British Columbia, is direct to the privy council, which means in actual practice that except for very wealthy people there is no appeal at all. This is an anomalous situation, for in every other province in which the courts have and exercise jurisdiction in divorce matters there is an appeal to the appellate court of the particular province. Let me make it quite clear at the outset that the purpose of this bill is not to give a new or wider jurisdiction to grant divorces in British Columbia. It is merely to give power to our appeal court to review decrees which are made by the trial court.

Hon. members may wonder how it happens that the trial court, known as the supreme court of British Columbia, has jurisdiction in divorce causes, while the court of appeal, which is a senior court, has not such jurisdiction. It does seem a ridiculous situation. It came about in this way: When the colony of British Columbia entered confederation in 1871, there was a trial court known even then as the supreme court, but there was no appellate court. At that time the law of England as of November 19, 1858, was in force so far as it was not inapplicable through local circumstances. This law of England included the divorce law of England, which accordingly was in force in the colony of British Columbia. Upon that colony entering confederation, the law-making power in so far as divorce matters were concerned passed by section 91 (26) of the British North America Act from the colony to the dominion, where it has ever since reposed. But the dominion passed no divorce legislation, so under section 129 of the British North America Act the divorce law of England remained in force in British Columbia, and it so remains to this day.

In 1877, a few years after the province entered confederation, it was held by the supreme court of British Columbia that this divorce law of England was still in effect in the province and that the supreme court of British Columbia had power to grant divorces. Those who would care to check the decision will find it in Sharp v. Sharp, reported in 1 B.C. Reports at page 25.

So much for the trial court. The appeal court has not been so fortunate. As the population of the province grew, the need for a court of review became apparent, so the provincial legislature passed legislation setting up a court of review, which was known as the full court, and giving to that full court the power to review every judgment, decree or order made by a judge of the supreme court. One might think that was wide enough to give an appeal in divorce causes. But in 1891 the full court itself held that it had no power to hear appeals in divorce matters, because under the British North America Act the provincial legislature had no power to confer divorce jurisdiction upon any court. That remains the law to this day. It was confirmed within recent years by the present court of appeal for British Columbia, which has replaced the full court, and also confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada in the case of Claman v. Claman, the decision of the appeal court of British Columbia being found in (1925) 35 B.C. Reports, at page 137, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in (1926) 68 Supreme Court Reports, at page 4.

I should like to quote an extract from the judgment of Chief Justice Macdonald of the appeal court of British Columbia in this case. He said:

> In the early history of this province, the courts considered that the English Divorce Act was in force here, and that an appeal would lie only to the privy council. Since that time appeals have invariably been made to the privy council and not to the court of appeal of the province, so that that became the established or recognized rule and has remained such for many years unquestioned.

That, of course, leaves the only appeal from the trial court an appeal direct to the privy council. In every other province in which the courts have and exercise jurisdiction in divorce causes, there is an appeal to the appellate court of the province. For example, in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick I believe the divorce laws which they had as colonies before confederation remain in force, and there is an appeal. In Ontario, where there was no divorce law before confederation, this parliament by chapter 14 of 1930 declared the English divorce law as of July 15, 1870, to be in force in the province. And this parliament went further and gave the Ontario courts jurisdiction to hear divorce causes. which included, of course, the right to hear appeals. In the three prairie provinces privy council decisions have established that the English divorce law of July 15, 1870 is in force, and decisions of the provincial appeal courts within the last few years have established their own right to hear appeals. British Columbia remains the only province where there is no such right to hear appeals. In that province the court of appeal can hear appeals of all other kinds; for instance they can hear an appeal from a county court judgment in the sum of $100 or over, but they cannot hear an appeal in such vital matters as a decree dissolving a marriage, an order for the custody of the children of that marriage, or an order for alimony.

[Mr. Green.]

For some time this position has been recognized as unsound by the barristers and solicitors in British Columbia and by the benchers of the law society there. The law society at its annual meeting two years ago passed a resolution requesting that provision be made for appeals to the court of appeal in British Columbia, and the benchers of the law society on April 6 of last year passed the following resolution:

> That the benchers request that provision be made for appeals from divorce matters to the court of appeal in the same manner as in civil cases, and that copies of the resolution be sent to the Minister of Justice, Hon. Ian Mackenzie, and the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Now the provincial legislature cannot provide for such appeals because the British North America Act gives the dominion parliament exclusive authority in divorce matters, so an appeal is impossible unless it is provided for by this parliament. We are not asking that divorce jurisdiction be conferred on the provincial courts as was done in the case of Ontario, because our supreme court already has that jurisdiction. We are merely asking that the right of appeal be provided.

The question is of great importance. After all, the setting aside of a marriage is a serious matter; deciding as to the custody of children of that marriage is a serious matter; and yet in British Columbia a marriage can be set aside and the custody of the children determined without any right of appeal except to the privy council, which in the great majority of cases means no appeal at all. As a result I fear that our people think that divorces are easy to get; I fear that they do not give the serious consideration to the question of divorce which it merits. I suggest that it is not fair or wise that there should be no appeal in British Columbia when there is an appeal in all the other provinces exercising divorce jurisdiction.

I ask that the bill be passed, because I think it is really constructive legislation meeting a great need. It is put forward without any idea of partisanship, and, as I have said, simply to meet a condition which must be remedied. This parliament is the only body that can provide the remedy.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this bill has come before the house for second reading only this evening and it was introduced, I believe, only last Friday. My hon. friend has set forth very clearly his arguments in support of the bill, but I must say that, knowing this matter would come up this evening, upon investigation this afternoon the officers of my department told me that some representations had been made by the legal department of the province of British Columbia in regard to this question. I do not know as yet what they are; I have not had an opportunity to consider them. So, unless other members desire to speak this evening, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate in order that I may be able to take a stand on the bill when it comes up again at the end of the week.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Exchequer Court of Canada—Contingencies—Judges' and court officials' travelling expenses; remuneration to sheriffs, etc., printing, stationery, etc., and $150 for judges' books, $6,200.

Printing, binding and distributing court reports, $2,000.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I may tell my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that I just want to call this one non-contentious item, so that I shall be able to come in with my estimates later on.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Civil government—
Salaries, $299,264.
Contingencies, $86,760.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister explain the details of this item?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): This includes the salary votes of the Department of the Secretary of State and of the patent and copyright office, which have been merged, with contingencies appertaining to both departments. I may point out that there is a decrease in both branches. In the Secretary of State's department there is a decrease from 96 permanent clerks to 89; in the patent and copyright office there is a decrease from 90 to 83 permanent clerks. The same will be observed in other departments. This decrease is due to the fact that we have generally decreased the number of permanent clerks in the service in the different departments, and their work will be carried on by temporary clerks provided for by the contingencies vote. I may say that in the Secretary of State's department in addition there has been a slight decrease in the activities of the naturalization branch, due no doubt to the fact that there is always more work in that branch around election time. Probably there is also a slight decrease in the activities of the companies branch.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask how many naturalization certificates were issued last year?

Mr. RINFRET: There were 24,334 in all sections, as compared with 22,469 in 1935, and a much larger figure in the previous year.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Patent record, $25,200.

Mr. BARBER: What is the reason for the reduction?

Mr. RINFRET: We did not spend the extra amount voted last year, so we decided not to ask for it this year.

Item agreed to.

International office for the protection of industrial property, international copyright union office and union for the protection of literary and artistic works, $2,700.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister explain what this vote is for?

Mr. RINFRET: This is our contribution to the international patent office and international copyright office in Berne.

Item agreed to.

To provide for salaries and expenses of the bureau for translations, $233,961.

Mr. RINFRET: This is the total amount for translation work in the several departments the translation work of which has been brought under the one bureau. The reason for the decrease is that certain senior translators have been superannuated and replaced by young newcomers who have passed their examinations and have been appointed at lower salaries.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask if this bureau is now working satisfactorily?

Mr. RINFRET: I do not suppose the committee would expect a long statement, but I may say that there is much merit in this way of organizing the translators. This brings them all under the one control. That applies especially to the translators of Hansard and the senate debates, who formerly were busy only during the session. Now we can use their services throughout the year.

There are still some departments the translation work of which has not been brought under the bureau, but I may say that I have been in communication with the departments of Trade and Commerce, Labour, National Defence and Mines and Resources, and I expect the translators of those departments to come under the bureau on April 1 of this year. The work has been quite heavy. We had the reciprocity treaty with the United States, which had to be translated in so many hours; we had conferences in Ottawa the proceedings of which had to be translated, and during the abdication crisis there were very important documents that had to be translated. I may also mention the reports of the inquiries that are held, which reports previously were translated outside the bureau in a more or less haphazard way. All the duties of the bureau for translations are now carried out methodically. May I point out that the translation of Hansard has been speeded up. Hon. members may have French or English translations of Hansard on the same day as the original transcription appears. In fact, there have been issues of Hansard where the English translation has been annexed to the original copy. The senate have asked us to deal with their Hansard. Their translation used to be delayed for weeks, but now it appears the day after the original copy is printed. All this is due to the fact that all the translators are under one head, which permits their being used to the fullest extent, and the work being distributed in a methodical way. In my opinion the bureau for translations is working very well.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be a matter of satisfaction to those who initiated the legislation to have now the stamp of approval of those who a few short months ago gave it their greatest condemnation.

Mr. McCANN: Are there any translators in the department of the minister connected with the translation service?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes; the bureau is in my department. I have one translator who, at the same time, is an editor in the patents department. He works under me, not under the bureau for translations. His work is done in a dual capacity. The same thing applies to a few clerks in other departments who act partly as translators and partly as editors.

Mr. McCANN: I see under an item passed a few minutes ago there is an amount of $3,000 for a chief translator acting under the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. RINFRET: That is the gentleman to whom I referred. His name is not in my mind, but he works in the patent branch as editor of the Patent Record.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Expenses under the Naturalization Act, $20,000.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister explain the item?

Mr. RINFRET: We carry it every year.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it carried for purposes of investigation?

Mr. RINFRET: It is for expenditures, printing of certificates, and expenses incurred in courts in different parts of the country. It is not used for investigation purposes.

Item agreed to.

Expenses under the Canada Temperance Act, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the present position in regard to this item?

Mr. RINFRET: It is a small vote which is not used, but which is voted every year in case it might be needed. The Canada Temperance Act is now in force only in a very few remote parts of the country. But if a plebiscite were asked for from any such portion, we would have to carry it out. The amount has been voted from year to year, but we have made very little use of it.

Mr. HEAPS: Was anything spent last year on the item?

Mr. RINFRET: I am told we spent $1,500 on an appeal to the privy council respecting a case in Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the result of the appeal?

Mr. RINFRET: I am informed that the Ontario government withdrew the case, and therefore we withdrew the appeal.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the status of the county affected? What is its position with respect to the Canada Temperance Act? I was out of the country when the appeal was being carried forward. Hon. members will recall there was litigation as to whether or not the Canada Temperance Act was in force in a particular locality. What is the present position?

Mr. RINFRET: I am informed that in the counties of Peel, Huron and Perth the effect of the act was suspended.

Mr. BENNETT: There was litigation over it, if I remember correctly. What was the result of the litigation?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe there was a county court decision to the effect that the Ontario liquor law was more strict than the Canada Temperance Act, and that, therefore, the former should prevail. So far as I can remember, however, this was not the decision of the higher courts. There was an appeal by the county of Huron, but the appeal did not proceed. For these reasons the matter would not seem to be very well settled. It is not clear as to which of the two laws is more favourable to temperance.

Item agreed to.

Public Printing and Stationery

Printing, binding, etc., the annual statutes, $8,500.

Mr. RINFRET: This is the usual amount voted for the printing of the annual statutes.

Mr. BARBER: I understand there are purchases of the statutes made throughout the country. Is any revenue derived from such purchases?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes; some copies of the statutes are distributed free to a certain list regulated by order in council, and some are sold. In 1935-36 the approximate revenue was $8,035, including statutes for that and previous years.

Item agreed to.

Canada Gazette, $23,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): What is the circulation of the Labour Gazette?

Mr. DUNNING: The vote is for the Canada Gazette, not the Labour Gazette.

Mr. RINFRET: I am afraid I have not the figures showing the circulation. In 1935-36 the revenue amounted to $49,295.14, including advertisements paid by the public. I am sorry to say the king's printer is not here, and I have not the figures showing the circulation. Perhaps I could give them at another time.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the minister any idea how many people read the Canada Gazette.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All members of parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: I cannot say how many.

Mr. DUNNING: There are a great many interested parties.

Mr. RINFRET: It would be hard to tell in connection with any paper.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give the committee any idea of the income and outgo in connection with this paper? Many discussions have taken place in this chamber as to whether or not it could be made a self-sustaining paper, and on one occasion the Secretary of State gave many details with respect to the matter.

Mr. RINFRET: I have the figures from 1930-31, which are as follows:

	Expenditures	Revenue
1930-31	$31,008 46	$71,197 14
1931-32	29,925 80	73,589 82
1932-33	24,023 04	73,835 72
1933-34	21,196 41	55,721 70
1934-35	20,943 82	47,256 76
1935-36	22,749 66	49,295 14

Generally speaking, the revenue is about twice the expenditure.

Item agreed to.

Plant—repairs and renewals, $10,000.

Mr. THOMPSON: What repairs and renewals does this item refer to?

Mr. RINFRET: This is for the printing plant. There is a reduction this year. A couple of years ago extensive expenditures were made to renovate the plant at the printing bureau, but this vote is to provide for any emergency which might arise.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps this might be an appropriate place to bring to the attention of the committee a matter brought to my notice by the custodians of documents in South Africa and Australia. These gentlemen tell me that they have been unable to secure a complete record of all our public documents which are issued from time to time, although they supply a similar record to us. Perhaps the best way to direct attention to this matter is to have it placed upon Hansard in order that those responsible may endeavour to remedy the existing difficulty. These countries are sending to us a complete record of all public documents published under the authority of their parliaments. They attach considerable importance to some of our documents which apparently they have not been able to get. It is possible they have communicated with the libraries instead of with the proper authorities, and I know they would greatly appreciate it if they could receive complete copies of all blue books and other publications authorized by parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: I thank my right hon. friend for his valuable suggestion. I shall read his remarks in Hansard and give them my best consideration.

Item agreed to.

Printing and binding official publications for sale and distribution to departments and the public, $40,000.

Mr. BENNETT: How much of this item was expended last year?

Mr. RINFRET: In 1935-36 the expenditures were $35,139.03 and the revenue amounted to $67,459.33.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—To provide for the expenses of delegation to the imperial conference, 1937, $40,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this would be an appropriate moment to ask the leader of the government if he is in a position to indicate what will be the general matters that will engage the attention of the Imperial conference at its approaching meeting and what we might expect will be the attitude of the administration toward the problems that will have to be considered. As nearly as I can remember, this is the form in which the right hon. gentleman usually put the question in the five years from 1930 to 1935. If I have not put it as succinctly or as delightfully as he did, he will have to take it as having been put in that sense.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall try to follow my right hon. friend by giving the reply which, as I recall, he made to me. At that time he was in possession of the agenda of the conference and was perhaps able to give more detailed information. The agenda of the forthcoming imperial conference has not yet been prepared. This is a matter of consultation at the moment between the British government and the governments of the different dominions. As soon as the agenda has been definitely prepared, it will be made known simultaneously to the parliaments of the different countries.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the right hon. gentleman has adopted the answer which the one then occupying his position gave, because it adds lustre and distinction to the answers thus given.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

PROVISION TO ENCOURAGE REPAIR OF RURAL AND URBAN DWELLINGS

The house resumed from Friday, February 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

On section 6—Conditions of loans.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, when the committee reported progress the other day, sections 6 and 8 had been allowed to stand in order that consideration might be given by the law officers to various suggestions which had been made by members of the committee. As a result of that consideration I hold in my hand amendments to these two sections, and for the convenience of the committee I arranged for them to be printed in Monday's Votes and Proceedings.

It is proposed to strike out paragraph (e) of section 6 and substitute the following therefor:

(e) no service, insurance or any other additional charges of any kind shall be made by an approved lending institution as long as the borrower is not in default.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask a question, Mr. Chairman, under paragraph (e). Suppose the owner of a property gets into some kind of default with the bank. Has the bank power to raise the rate up to 10 per cent, as the motor car companies do?

Mr. DUNNING: Our regulations at the present time provide for a rate not exceeding 7 per cent interest on arrears under such circumstances.

Mr. HAYHURST: Does paragraph (e) mean that no insurance will be placed upon the building?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no. The insurance referred to is not insurance with respect to the buildings but what is sometimes described by instalment finance corporations as an insurance charge on the loan. This paragraph provides that there must be no such charge.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—Regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: The proposed amendment to this section will also be found in the Votes and Proceedings. It is to cover particularly the suggestions made for the improvement of the section by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and one suggestion made, I think, by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). It is proposed to amend the section as follows:

That clause 8 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"8. (1) Subject to the provisions of this act, the governor in council may by regulation:

(a) prescribe the forms of applications for home improvement loans, notes, agreements, certificates and any other documents necessary or desirable for the effective operation of this act;

(b) provide that, in the event of actual or impending default by a borrower, an approved lending institution may, notwithstanding anything contained in section 6 of this act, with the approval of the borrower alter or revise by way of extension of time or otherwise, any of the terms of his agreement, and that such alteration or revision shall not operate to discharge any guarantee given under this act, and in the event of default by a borrower the legal and other measures to be taken and the procedure to be followed for the collection of the amount of the home improvement loan outstanding and the rate of interest to be charged on payments which are overdue;

(c) provide for the determination of the amount of loss sustained by an approved lending institution and the procedure to be followed in making claims in respect of any guarantee given under this act;

(d) prescribe tables showing maximum charges for loans of varying terms and varying methods of repayment;

(e) require reports to be made periodically to the minister by approved lending institutions;

(f) define for the purposes of this act the following expressions:

(i) "owner" with power to include as owners life tenants, persons holding property under agreements for sale or under long term leases and any other persons having rights approximating ownership;

(ii) "rural and urban homes" with power to include in such expression all such property as may reasonably be considered as part of a rural or urban home;

(iii) "repairs, alterations and additions";

(g) make provision for any other matters concerning which regulations are deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intention of this act.

(2) Regulations made hereunder shall, when published in the Canada Gazette, have the same force and effect as if they had been included in this act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHURCH: This amendment provides that the governor in council may make regulations covering the various matters described in paragraphs (a) to (f). Suppose the owner of a property has borrowed money from one of these shark loan companies, which charge anywhere from 20 to 40 per cent. Under this power of the minister to make regulations, is there any way by which such a man could give up the shark loan company and come in under this scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid that there would be no opportunity under this scheme for an approved lending institution to take over a loan which had been previously made by another lending institution. Obviously that would create very great difficulties, and it would not be in accord with the spirit of the legislation, which is to provide employment through the improvement of homes. If a man had previously borrowed from some other lending institution, presumably that money is already spent; and we could not under this legislation make provision for taking over loans made by other lending institutions.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the minister might very well consider what I say in this connection. A large number of our industrial workers are out of work, and have gone to these shark loan companies. The minister will remember that last session he very kindly brought down a list of them and the rates they charge. Some of our industrial workers, after pleading with parliament for three or four years to do something, have finally gone to one of these shark loan companies and borrowed a small sum, perhaps fifty or a hundred or two hundred dollars, to fix up their property, put a roof on, fix the verandah or paint the house. Surely these men should be allowed to do what the farmer and the fisherman is allowed to do, namely, wind up their affairs with the private mortgagee and come under the government subsidized scheme. If you do that, I venture to say you will find a lot of people coming under this scheme who otherwise would not, and whose case ought to be considered.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is some little difficulty in using in paragraph (f) the words "approximating ownership." I do not like to see that in any statute because it confers a power to define something which is wholly at variance with what is ownership, and to leave it to the discretion of any person to say that something "approximates" ownership is to invite a wide variation in the administration of the statute.

I have discussed the proposed amendments with my colleague from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who is not in his place to-night. They cover in a general way the suggestions which we made to the committee, except the suggestion made by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that there should be an annual report or an annual statement of the claims for losses on loans by the lending institutions. It will be recalled that the question was raised, When was this to be determined?

There is a conflict with the Bank Act that I did not mention the other day. It will be recalled that the Bank Act provides that it is the duty of the directors to put certain classes of loans in what may be called the bad debt class. There is a special provision about it, and if these loans are in default and provision may be made for their renewals and extensions, it might come in conflict with that section; I have not had an opportunity of looking it up to see to what extent it might do so. I take it, however, although I am not quite clear on the point, that if there were any such conflict, this legislation would prevail.

There is one other criticism which I desire at this time to offer to the minister. To say that they shall pay nothing exceeding 7 per cent specifies a rate which is too high in legislation of this kind. Having regard to the fact that the interest is 3¼ per cent, I submit that provision of a rate not exceeding 6 per cent would be fair to everybody. It must be remembered that the lending institutions themselves make the selection, and they must be assumed to do so with care. To give them the right, when default does occur, to make a new agreement that would contemplate a payment not exceeding 7 per cent is too dangerous a power, having regard to the general influence that lending institutions may exercise upon their debtors. I should have felt happier if the provision had been of a rate not exceeding 6 per cent, which I conceive would be more in keeping with the action taken by the government in reducing the initial discount of the 5 per cent discount rate to 3¼ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I thank my right hon. friend, particularly for his latter suggestion, because it will help me in connection with the regulations to which he has referred. He will understand that the regulation with respect to interest on payments which are overdue is still the subject of negotiation, and his remarks in that regard, with which I entirely agree, will be helpful in arriving at a conclusion. I do not want to be too definite, but I think there is every hope of arranging for the maximum of 6 per cent instead of the maximum of 7 per cent.

With regard to the other point, approximate ownership, my anxiety was to have a broad enough power to ensure that nobody who is reasonably entitled under this legislation to borrow should be debarred from doing so. I agree with the criticism of the word "approximate," but it must be remembered that the power conferred by the legislation is on the governor general in council by regulation. The regulations will have to deal with a class of cases, not a particular case.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: And the lender, of course, has something to do with it. One admits that in connection with new and somewhat experimental legislation of this kind it is difficult to devise something which will cover all cases and at the same time not be general in terms. I suggest that we might try it as it stands. The law officers have given very careful consideration to it. With respect to the report to parliament, section 9 provides for a report. I do not think it wise specifically to include in it—

Mr. BENNETT: It does not say, "annual." That was the point which was raised.

Mr. DUNNING: It will be annual.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not say annual, I think.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes: "Shall annually prepare a report."

Mr. BENNETT: That covers it.

Mr. DUNNING: The point with regard to possible conflict with the Bank Act is dealt with, I think, by reason of the fact that this is a partly guaranteed loan; it does not fall into quite the same class as those which are dealt with under the section of the Bank Act to which my right hon. friend referred. In any case, if the committee of the house passes this legislation substantially as it stands, I think we can operate successfully under it during the year. We may and probably shall discover weaknesses in it. If such weaknesses develop I shall come here next year to tell the committee of the house frankly what they are and ask for amendments. I think, having regard to the experience of the last three months, the bill as now amended deals fairly well with all the situations that have arisen in actual practice.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of the use of words in connection with ownership is, of course, one of great importance. When one says "approximate ownership," it must not be forgotten that the word "ownership" in relation to real estate refers to a fee simple title, to a life estate, and to a lease-hold in interest, which is an estate for a term of years, and when one speaks of "approximate ownership," a 999-year lease was declared by statute in Great Britain on one occasion to be interchangeable in terms with a fee simple. But if we put it in at 30, 10, 15, 20 years, is that ample? I am not going to labour the point, but to have a regulation passed by the governor in council that a five year lease approximates ownership is stretching one's conception of the value of language in connection with estates in land.

Mr. DUNNING: That is dealt with under the previous wording, long term leases.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that, but I am using it as an illustration of what approximates ownership. What does approximate ownership? The other day the position of the squatter was mentioned. If the squatter has not been in possession for a sufficient length of time to prohibit by operation of law the statute of limitations being set up, he is nothing more than a person who may be ejected at any time by writ of ejectment. His squatter's rights can grow into a title only if he has had adverse and continuous possession for a period in excess of the period of the statute of limitation.

Mr. DUNNING: That is five years, is it not?

Mr. BENNETT: Twelve years: twelve years in the British Real Properties Act; in some of the provinces of confederation it is twenty years, and against the crown it is sixty years. Suppose a man has been in possession for thirty years of a piece of land belonging to the crown; the average citizen would say that that approximates ownership, but as a matter of fact he has no title and is subject to eviction by the crown the next day if it sees fit to take proceedings. I use this only by way of illustration. It does not matter to me one way or the other, except that I do not care to see the use of the words "approximate ownership" in a statute that affects the question of title to real property, because it is real property we are dealing with.

Mr. TUSTIN: I do not know whether this matter arises under clause 8, but I have been asked on several occasions whether, when a home owner goes to a bank and makes arrangements for a loan and then goes on and does his work, he receives the money from the loaning institution or whether the loaning institution pays the contractor.

Mr. DUNNING: It depends upon the nature of the arrangement. He can, if he wishes, do the business through his contractor and arrange for the bank to pay his contractor, or he may borrow money directly and pay his contractor.

Mr. TUSTIN: The reason I asked the question was that one of the members of the advisory committee for Ontario, giving an address in my home town last week, used these words: "When the banker is satisfied the applicant will be able to make repayment of the loan, the loan is granted. The work is completed and the banker pays the contractor. The householder does not handle the money."

Mr. DUNNING: That is one method of procedure. The other is also available.

Mr. ISNOR: I feel that the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is worthy of consideration. I am a little fearful of the danger that may result in connection with the purchase of loans. In reading section 8, we must take into consideration paragraph (c) of clause 2. It is more far-reaching than merely the purchasing of loans. It could possibly mean the advancing of sums of money by business firms in large amounts such as could be made available only by large business institutions, and so would be discrimination in some measure against small business concerns. I draw that to the attention of the Minister of Finance because there is a danger there. Paragraph (c) reads:

"Lending institution" means any chartered bank and any other company authorized to lend money or to purchase obligations representing loans and advances of money.

The last part of that clause has, I think, a direct bearing on section 8. I would ask the Minister of Finance to bear that in mind when he is compiling the list of approved lending institutions. I would like to see inserted the words "or recognized" after the word "approved." That would overcome the possibility of large firms taking advantage of this lending scheme to establish a better line of credit, or, let me say, of a firm with large capital, at the expense of the government, being guaranteed to the extent of 15 per cent, being more generous in extending credit to its customers than otherwise they would be.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, an "approved lending institution" involves an examination, in advance of approval, of the institution and all the matters mentioned by my hon. friend. There is involved also in administration the necessity of continuous check by the Department of Finance with respect to applications granted by each lending institution. I appreciate the force of what my hon. friend says, and these matters will be borne in mind by the department in determining approval.

Mr. NEILL: I call the attention of the minister to the sixth line of paragraph (b):

—and in the event of default by a borrower, the legal and other measures to be taken and the procedure to be followed—

There is nothing to connect it with the first two words of the paragraph. The word "provide" should be added; otherwise you leave that suggested action up in the air. It should read:

—and provide, in the event of default by a borrower, the legal and other measures to be taken—

Mr. DUNNING: I should not care to debate the matter of language, when so many lawyers have had to do with shaping it. The intention certainly is that the words "provide that" with which the paragraph commences shall carry through to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. NEILL: It is not a question of law; it is a question of grammar. If you start with the words "provide that," and there is a comma, then it will read:

—provide that, in the event of default by a borrower—

If the first "that" was not there, it would be different. You have to carry the words "provide that" along. It lacks a verb. It is bad grammar.

Mr. CLARK (York-Sunbury): In the case of a lending institution being paid by the government, say 15 per cent, would the ownership of the notes be in the government or in the lending institution.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a matter of practice yet to be determined. Under the United States plan the notes themselves are transferred to the Department of Justice, presumably for collection by that department. We have not yet determined to follow that course. Regulations in regard to default and how the notes shall be dealt with are still in process of negotiation with the lending institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: The lending institution still has an 85 per cent interest in the note.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act so as to constitute committees instead of one advisory committee, and to appropriate the necessary moneys for the continuance and extension of the work under the Act for the fiscal years 1937-38 to 1939-40 inclusive.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the better course would be to have the minister give the explanation now with respect to the resolution, so that questions may be asked, rather than to enter upon a discussion before it is taken up by the committee.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. GARDINER: The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is a short act passed in 1935. It was brought into being as a result of conditions which prevailed over a section of western Canada which includes about twenty municipalities in Manitoba, about one hundred and fifty in Saskatchewan and probably one hundred in Alberta, an area which has been affected by particularly dry seasons during the past seven years. The act provided for the setting up of an advisory committee. That advisory committee was to be composed of representatives of different organizations and corporations in Canada. The act provided also for the doing of certain work in western Canada, the Department of Agriculture, which under the bill was designated as the department responsible, acting on the advice of the committee which was set up under section 3. This was in order that certain things might be done, such as providing supplies of water for farmers attempting to raise live stock in that area and for tree culture, in order to protect lands against blowing, if possible, in certain areas; the promotion of strip farming; the regrassing of some of the lands that had been found unsuitable for wheat growing, and anything else that might be found in the interests of the farmers of that area or that might rehabilitate them as farmers.

In order to carry out the intentions of the act it was provided under section 8 that during the first year, which was 1935-36, a sum not exceeding three-quarters of a million dollars should be provided for expenditure in that area, and that during the succeeding four years a sum not exceeding one million dollars a year should be available for expenditure. Members of the house will recall that a year ago we voted $750,000 as the amount that would be available for expenditure. I may say that during the two years that have gone by less than $850,000 has been spent. The amount that was set aside for the first year was not exhausted, nor was the amount set aside for the second year. This was largely because of the fact that the work was in the experimental stage, and it was not thought wise to proceed more rapidly with the expenditure of money than our experience would warrant. Now, however, we feel that we have gained sufficient experience in the work to have more definite ideas as to what ought to be done and as to the amounts of money which may be necessary in order to carry out the original intentions of the act.

We also feel that in carrying out some of the work which is contemplated it will be necessary to have more than one advisory committee. The committee that was created under the original bill advised on matters of general policy, but we think it wise to have, in some of the local areas, advisory committees that will be more familiar with what is being carried out in those areas and that can give advice which probably will be more advantageous to the department. Therefore we are suggesting that section 3 be amended in order to make it possible for us to have more than one committee and so that we shall not be confined to the appointment of the representatives of any particular organizations in forming such committees. Just in passing I may say that the members of those committees act without remuneration.

Then it is intended by amending section 4, to widen to some extent the work that may be undertaken under this act. The experience of those living to the south of the international boundary line in dealing with similar problems brought to our minds the thought that something similar might be done north of the boundary line, altered in some measure so as to meet the different conditions which exist in this country. In other words, we are hoping to make use in a larger way of the available water supplies and to provide artificially water supplies for the purpose of assisting in resettling people in this vast area. In addition to that, we hope to take advantage of the experience of the government of Saskatchewan in connection with what is called a community ranch, which is operated more in the form of a community pasture, available to the people of a considerable area to the north of the Saskatchewan river, and which is known as the Matador ranch. Similar experiments have been conducted in the states immediately to the south, though some of them have differed slightly from what has been done in Saskatchewan. Some experimental work has been done in Alberta in making available to farmers who are settled in the drought area larger areas for pasture, and we hope to enlarge our work to assist further development of undertakings of that sort.

The only other important amendment is the one having to do with the supply of funds for carrying out the purposes of the act. We feel that the government could accomplish more without the limitation of a million dollars which is contained in the bill. As the act now stands, a million dollars is the limit which may be spent in any one year, and we are asking for this change in spite of the fact that we did not think it wise to spend even three-quarters of a million last year or the year before. We think that with the experience we now have we can probably spend more than a million dollars during the year, if we can get such an estimate adopted by this house, and it is in order to provide more than that amount that I am asking for this amendment.

Those are the important changes to be made in the act if the present bill passes, and if any other information is desired, I shall be pleased to try to furnish it.

Mr. BENNETT: The problem with which the original legislation dealt is at this time one of extreme gravity to something like three hundred municipalities in the three western provinces. At the time the legislation was passed in 1935, the number of municipalities affected was not so large as it is now, but in the great provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta practically 250 municipalities are affected by this legislation, a number of which, added to the municipalities in Manitoba, makes a total of nearly three hundred municipalities, a vast area in the three western provinces, that may be described as being almost incapable of producing crop at the present time. I believe that over a period of years these municipalities have not produced a crop. I have not the figures before me, so I am not in a position to state what period of time has elapsed during which they have produced no substantial crop, but certainly in Saskatchewan and in a portion of Alberta that period is in excess of five years. As to how long it may be in Manitoba I have no recollection, and therefore I cannot speak with any authority.

I rise to point out the seriousness of this situation. It is so serious as to have ceased to be regarded in any sense as a local matter. In the truest and largest sense of the term it is national. I have heard various suggestions made, some by men with a wide scientific knowledge, as to whether or not we can look for any rehabilitation of some of these areas. I have never been regarded as a pessimist with respect to these matters, but I confess to this committee that during the last twelve months I have become extremely apprehensive about the situation. That fact does not make it any more or less important; I merely record my opinion. When I last saw that area, in the great heat of the closing part of the month of July and the early part of August, it was calculated to depress the spirits of almost any Canadian who looked at it. The minister of that day closely investigated the matter, and came to his colleagues with certain recommendations and suggestions. As a result of the suggestions and recommendations, the statute chapter 23 of the statutes for 1935, was enacted. The minister now suggests that it is desirable to amend the statute by creating advisory councils in local areas.

I am bound to say that the minister of that day, supported as he was by those with whom he had conferred, was of opinion that it was wrong to endeavour to give a purely local bent to the efforts which were being made, and that in the largest and best sense of the term we should secure, as an advisory committee, representative men in all of the provinces who would deal with the problem as one common to all, and not as one which affected merely local interests in the municipalities concerned. If the government are of opinion that the best purpose will be served by setting up small advisory committees in the municipalities, it is not for me, without having the knowledge that they possess, to offer objection. But I do say this: I was struck at the time, and I still am, with the fact that it may be possible to create purely local interest as distinct from what I conceive to be in the truest and best sense of the term an interest which is widespread, which concerns the whole area, which is concerned, not with the fortunes of individuals but with the fortunes of the whole three hundred municipalities, and the large numbers of people residing in them.

Having in mind the purpose the then minister had in view when making the recommendations, recommendations which were not made until he had conferred with many people, we find the advisory council was to comprise certain members whom I shall indicate shortly. The committee was known as an advisory committee, and it owed its origin to the governor in council. One of the members was to be appointed chairman by the governor in council, and the committee was to consist of the following:

(a) One representative of the Manitoba grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(b) One representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(c) One representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(d) One representative of Saskatchewan livestock farmers from the drought areas;

(e) One representative of Alberta range farmers from the drought areas;

(f) One representative of mortgage companies of Canada.

That is an organization which, while having no statutory being, is a voluntary organization of mortgage companies of the country. In addition there were to be the following:

(g) One representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association;

(h) One representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways;

(i) Two representatives from the Dominion Department of Agriculture; and

(j) One representative of the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The committee, hon. members will observe, is in no sense local. It was believed—and I think the belief has been wholly warranted by the results—that the committee would take a broad view of the situation, and that Manitoba would be deeply interested in what affected settlers in the drought and soil drifting areas of Manitoba or Alberta, and vice versa.

To set up a local committee in a municipality will, I trust, be a success. I think, however, it is only fair to point out—

Mr. GARDINER: May I say it is not the intention to set up municipal committees. Perhaps I should have explained that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is proposed to place a limitation upon the size, is it?

Mr. GARDINER: The intention is to maintain the committee now operating, and it is just possible that we may require in a ranching area a special committee of ranchers, or in a wheat growing area a special committee of wheat growers, to deal with questions peculiar to a particular part of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: The very reasons I have given are responsible for the personnel as I have read it. It was felt that there was a danger of self interest dominating judgments with respect to policies, and that the wisdom and experience of men of divers occupations concerned with areas some of which were fit only for grazing and ranching, and some of which were fit for farming, might result in the formulation of plans which would be more conducive to the well-being of the whole.

I make these statements only because I would hesitate to support any proposal which might bring about a measure of friction between the central committee, to which I have referred, and any committee which might feel a deep and abiding concern about one matter, and one only. That is, you might have a committee which would be concerned only about the farming area, and another only about the ranching area, and you would have the age old struggle as to what constitutes a purely ranching area or a purely farming area. For instance, I think there is no difficulty to-day in getting at least seventy-five per cent of people affected to say that areas which were opened for agricultural settlement never should have been so opened, and that they should have been retained as ranching lands. The problem is not one which is wholly singular to Canada. It has arisen in other countries as well. I believe it has arisen in Australia. I suggest that the danger of a conflict between what I describe as the national interest dealing with the national problem and the personal interest dealing with the purely domestic or local problem is one which must be ever present.

I assume the government is taking discretionary authority, and does not make it in any sense obligatory that the committee should be set up, because I apprehend that if it were obligatory that it be set up, there might be conflict such as would not be beneficial to the interests of any.

There comes then the question as to the measures to be taken. I for one at the proper time would like to hear a complete statement by the minister as to what has been done and what he hopes may be done. If there is to be provision in the appropriation bill, that would seem to be the appropriate time to make such a statement. I confess that in looking at the situation from my angle I have been a little depressed, and have found it most difficult to get much encouragement from any reliable source as to the method which can be adopted to bring about a solution of this difficulty, short of providence once more smiling upon the land with steady rains.

Mr. DUNNING: A change in the sun spots is said by the Smithsonian people to be our best hope.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, changes in sun spots, as indicated by the Smithsonian institute, would, I suppose, involve spelling the word s-o-n and attributing the changes to the present government. But, be that as it may, I see nothing short of that, at the moment. Impounding water has its merits, but there must be water to impound. That is the difficulty. While I was absent from this country I took the trouble to look at efforts made to impound water in one of the dominions I visited. In that instance this was done for the purpose of watering cattle, and I am bound to say they had supplies of water that I had not seen impounded in this country.

The question of making available for farmers the waters in our rivers is one which received the attention of the advisory committee which acted last year, and I believe there are certain recommendations to which the minister will no doubt refer when the appropriation is before parliament. I am bound to say some of the recommendations contemplate an expenditure so vast as to make it almost inconceivable that one would suggest it. There is a limitation from the economic standpoint of the amount which may be expended, having relation to the benefits to be derived therefrom.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the joker.

Mr. BENNETT: If the information which I have received can be relied upon, suggestions have been made for expenditures which bear no relation at all to any possible value that the land could have after the expenditure has been made, unless you place upon the land a value that far transcends any suggested value I have heard of in my time.

I am deeply interested in this matter. When the proposals came before us in 1935 they followed the drought of 1934. When that statute was being prepared, it was quite apparent that we were going to have a dry season in 1935, dry from the standpoint not of lack of rain, but of lack of moisture from snow. There was no accumulation of waters resulting from melting snow and the impounding of it in any part of the country. It is not a matter of importance, but I cannot say that I view with great approval the question of authorizing expenditures in excess of $1,000,000 a year. One million dollars a year is a substantial sum of money. I thought possibly the minister was going to suggest that he was going to amend the statute by striking out the provisions with reference to any period beyond this year and to make in the estimates such appropriations as experience warranted in the light of the knowledge which he would then possess. The statute, as it is now, reads as follows:

> For the purposes of this act the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada during the fiscal year 1935-36 and for each fiscal year for a further period of four years a sum not exceeding $1,000,000 per annum as may be necessary to continue and extend the work undertaken under this act.

I understand the minister to say that he thinks $1,000,000 is a limitation that should not be imposed upon the expenditures contemplated by the act. He is in possession of information that induces him to believe that he can usefully expend over $1,000,000. In view of the position taken by the leader of the government with reference to the absolute necessity of including any such appropriation in the supply bill, I suggest that instead of including it in this bill, which would be superfluous, expenditures be authorized up to March 31, 1938, at a figure which the minister may regard as being reasonably satisfactory, having regard to the knowledge which he possesses. In view of the position taken by the government as to the desirability, nay the necessity, from their standpoint, of any provision of this kind being included in the appropriation bill, which we refer to as the estimates when before the committee of the house before being embodied in the bill, it would perhaps be desirable to repeal this section in its entirety and make provision for a single year. The government could then adopt the policy which they urged strenuously in days gone by and ask for an additional sum of money in the light of the experience derived from the operations of the past year.

I hope, when the appropriation is before the committee, the minister will prepare himself to give us as complete a statement as possible of what has been done. I say this because I believe in every part of Canada and in many parts of the world eyes are being directed to what is being done in western Canada in an effort to bring back these lands to their former fertility. For instance, this matter is of tremendous importance to this province.

Mr. DUNNING: To our whole economic structure.

Mr. BENNETT: On one occasion I said that there was not a citizen of this country who was not interested in it, and I still believe that to be true. When the appropriation is before the committee, I hope the minister will have prepared himself to make as full a statement as the facts warrant with respect to what has been done and with respect to the possible results of the efforts that may be made. For one, I would greatly appreciate it.

I think there are many people in this country who are deeply concerned about the problem which arises from the fact that about three hundred municipalities in western Canada are suffering from a lack of moisture to such an extent as to make farming operations not only unprofitable but impossible. In many instances this condition has compelled the rancher to move his herds from the areas affected. I can conceive of no problem at the moment that is of greater importance to Canada. The government with which I was associated was responsible for initiating this movement and we are perhaps more anxious than one can readily understand to see that some results accrue from the efforts that were initiated and carried out with small expenditures. I am advised that it is well that these expenditures were not larger for this would involve the loss of the moneys which might have been expended for that purpose.

I am not unmindful of the fact that south of us there exists a situation not unlike our own. Although it has existed for a shorter period, it has been acute. The methods adopted there to deal with the situation are similar to those we have used. Consideration has been given to strip farming and to the question of the cultivation of certain grasses. In the desert areas of one of the dominions I found that they have a particular kind of grass which has been found exceedingly valuable. I made inquiry of the Department of Agriculture with respect to it, and I was informed that it would make an excellent binder and is of fair nutritive value. I cannot say whether it would bring about any satisfactory results in a soil such as ours, which is largely alluvial as compared with that of the other dominions.

Hon. members should visualize a situation in which the grass binder which covered this area has been cut to pieces by man's efforts. The soil has just become like talcum powder. When exposed to wind it blows about like snow on a winter's day. I saw one farm, which at one time produced the largest quantity of wheat per acre in that locality, covered with great drifts of earth as high as the desk in front of me. There were no visible crops and there had been none for years. How this situation is to be met is a problem that faces the government of this day. Something must be done to recover the economic strength and the fortunes of the people who occupy this country. At one time these people had good homes and fine outbuildings, and they thought themselves to be in circumstances beyond the possibility of any disaster that might come to them in their lifetime. As the minister has said, some of these people are to-day on relief.

Mr. DUNNING: A great number of them.

Mr. BENNETT: A great number of them. Under those circumstances anything we can do by timely suggestion, by support of any action to strengthen the hand of the government in dealing with this problem, we shall do, not only because it is our duty to do it, but because we all realize how important is the problem from the standpoint of the maintenance of the integrity of this country.

Mr. LEADER: Mr. Chairman, I feel that I should seize this opportunity to offer a few remarks in regard to conditions which prevail in western Canada. I feel that the magnitude of the terrible disaster which has overtaken that portion of our dominion cannot be too often impressed upon this house, and I believe the people of western Canada will be very grateful indeed for the remarks which have been made to-night by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

While I do not live in the dried-out area, yet it is coming pretty close even to Portage la Prairie. While we had a crop last year, one did not need to go over fifteen miles west before one ran into the dried-out area. I had the opportunity to drive through that dried-out portion of Manitoba two years ago, and to see for myself the conditions that exist there, and so true is the picture which has been painted by the right hon. leader of the opposition that one's imagination can scarcely grasp it. One has to see that country for oneself. A person will drive hundreds of miles and not see a green shoot anywhere. Even the leaves on the trees are dead, and the shrubbery along the road has died off. Even the gophers and the grasshoppers have left those districts, for want of something to eat.

As a farmer and from my experience as a live stock breeder, I should like to suggest to the minister, when he brings down his legislation for the rehabilitation of that area, to have some regard also for the live stock industry and what it means to that part of the country. We must all recognize that wheat growing in a portion of western Canada must give way to the raising of live stock, and the remarks I want to make to-night bear especially upon the beef cattle industry.

I assume the government is going to make some expenditure in providing capital for the dried-out area, and I want to impress upon them the necessity of procuring good stock, especially good sires. The quality of our live stock has depreciated during the last seven or eight years, and there is a reason for it. People have not had the money to buy good sires. At the recent cattle-breeders' meeting held in Regina, the prevalence of scrub bulls which infest western Canada, and especially that dried-out area, was declared to be alarming, and the cattle breeders are asking the government to furnish more money so that the farmers may be able to procure better sires and to build up a better quality of cattle. Realizing the possibilities of the British market for good cattle and the possibilities of the American market—we know what these markets demand because we have men both in the United States and in Great Britain whose business it is to find out what the people demand, and I am aware the officers of the department know the quality of cattle that these markets demand—I believe it is only good business on the part of the department to see, when they are building up the live stock industry in that devastated area, that any money spent in that direction will be spent especially for the purpose of procuring good sires. I want to impress that upon the minister and upon the committee to-night because, from my experience in the business for a good many years I know the value of good sires, and I know what will happen to any live stock grower if he persists in using poor ones. The government, I understand, realize that the farmers must desist from wheat growing and that facilities must be provided for rearing live stock, and I say that facilities must be provided because they do not exist at the present time.

Owing to the drought and other conditions, such as draining the country, we find that there is not enough water even for the animals. The government realizes this, and is providing dugouts, damming up streams, and conserving the water supply of that area. This is an indication that they intend to rehabilitate the live stock industry in the area.

Just before resuming my seat I would again impress upon the minister the necessity of providing good sires, and sires of the proper beef type if any pretence of raising good beef cattle is being made.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, might I suggest to the minister that when he brings down his legislation for the rehabilitation of the prairie farms, he be prepared not only to tell the house what has been done and what it is proposed to do, but that he give the house a survey of the actual conditions which exist and of the problem which really arises out of those conditions. This is very largely a new House of Commons, and although in the last house very much was said about the conditions then arising in western Canada, this House of Commons is unfamiliar with the problem. Moving around eastern Canada I find that people do not appreciate the vastness of the area which is affected and the tremendous problem which faces not merely western Canada but the whole of Canada because of conditions in the prairie provinces. Very few members can realize an experience which I am sure the Minister of Agriculture has had as well as I, of driving for a whole day across a couple of hundred miles of territory in Saskatchewan, and during the whole day not seeing our radiator caps except occasionally through the dust that was caused by the soil erosion. Yet people are living there under such conditions.

The leader of the opposition said that in some parts there has been no crop for five years. I know of districts that have had no crop for seven years. I do not believe, however, that all these lands are by any means lost. There are areas—I do not think they are very large—where the top soil has drifted away, and where the erosion has gone to such an extent that you will see holes six and eight feet deep blown out of the surface. But, as I say, those areas are, I think, comparatively small. If proper steps are taken,

I believe the country can be largely rehabilitated, but in my opinion the rehabilitation will involve not only a land rehabilitation plan but also a resettlement plan. When the minister brings down the legislation, might I suggest that he give us some of the figures from the recent soil surveys which have been made in our province. The university of Saskatchewan has done a great deal of work along these lines, as the minister told the house the other afternoon, and we know something of the soil constituents, of the moisture deficiency, of the loss of fibre, of the future possibilities of that vast area comprising over three hundred municipalities, now suffering from various degrees of drought. If we are to consider this measure intelligently, we should have that background. Not only has the minister the required data available, but, as the head of a government in Saskatchewan during several recent years, and with his long experience of administration on the prairies, I do not think there should be anyone better fitted than the present Minister of Agriculture to give the house authentic information. I believe that we should have this information and that the people of Canada, through the minister, should be informed of the condition that really faces us, because, like the leader of the opposition, I have been sometimes depressed and very gloomy concerning it.

When I went west last summer, I drove through the United States, and for a thousand miles from Minneapolis to Regina. As one saw the crops withering, and realized that one could go another six hundred miles west and south of Regina and see the same condition everywhere, one wondered what was going to become of the country that appeared to some of us twenty-five years or more ago as among the most beautiful pieces of prairie land which could be found anywhere in the world. I think it would be not only interesting but useful to the house to have that information, because men and women in the stricken area are suffering; children too are suffering. As I said the other afternoon, the schools are sometimes cold. We are told authoritatively that last winter for days on end some schools did not have fuel enough to keep the temperature above freezing point. Teachers are working for ten dollars a month. There are people on the farms who have not seen much in the way of money for many months, indeed for years, and there are people without proper clothing. Although the people of eastern Canada have responded splendidly to the appeals which have been made, and we express to them our thanks whenever we get the opportunity, nevertheless that is not going to solve the problem. The problem remains unsolved, and I suggest to the minister that when the legislation comes down, it would be well for this house to have presented to it a clear picture of the problem in western Canada as it affects the entire dominion. Incidentally, I do not think it can be solved in a short time; a long range program will have to be inaugurated by this parliament.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to attempt to shorten the discussion, but I should like to take advantage of the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition, by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and also by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, to say that I intend to move this bill to second reading for Thursday, and I shall attempt between now and Thursday to prepare for the house not only a review of the situation as we know it in the department and as I knew it in the province before I came to the department, but also a review of what past governments have spent in that country, and, through past governments having made these expenditures, of what people in other parts of Canada have really done in order to assist in rebuilding not only the soil of that country but the morale of the people themselves. It would be good for all of us to have a complete picture of that side of the whole experience. If, after that is presented to the house, there is not sufficient information to form a background for any discussions that it is desired to have of the whole problem, another opportunity will arise, as was suggested by the leader of the opposition, when the estimate is brought before the house setting forth the amount of money the government desires to make available for expenditure in that area this year.

With regard to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, I wish only to say I am a little afraid that setting up a sum for one year without anything in the form of a statutory provision for an expenditure in at least two succeeding years would not be an improvement on the present act.

Mr. BENNETT: You would be just as well off.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I would rather see no definite limiting dates at all for the time being. I may say that the United States—although I speak from memory I think I am correct—is dealing with an area of country which is not materially greater than the area which is affected in western Canada; perhaps its situation has been a little more serious in some years than it has been in western Canada, but the area is not materially larger—

Mr. BENNETT: More densely settled.

Mr. GARDINER: More densely settled, yes, and the United States government is providing $500,000,000 to be spent over the next ten years. That is $50,000,000 a year. Of course, I do not suggest that the Dominion of Canada can even think of spending a similar amount of money, nor am I suggesting that that amount could be spent to advantage in western Canada at the present time. I am stating the fact only in order to indicate to the committee that there is hardly a limit to the amount of money which might be spent in dealing with the problem that exists there. As to the amount which can be spent, and spent effectively, that is another matter. I should like to be in a position on Thursday next to present to the house all the facts that we have had and the picture as we see it, and also to indicate to the house something of our plans to deal with the problem.

Mr. CHURCH: The minister presides over a department that is spending $7,500,000 on commissions and committees. Coming from the prairie provinces, he is very fond of this committee and commission business, but I may tell him that in the United States, with 130,000,000 people, similar work is handled by one man only, Mr. Hopkins, and they did not have the bungling and muddling that have gone on in the last six months in connection with the administration of this particular farm rehabilitation act. I have heard and read a good deal about it; it has been very badly handled by those who have had charge of it in the last year. The minister now proposes to have a vaster committee system than before to handle this vote. Everyone wants to see that the poor people on the prairies who have suffered shall get every possible assistance. It is to come, no doubt, out of the revenues of the consolidated fund and income derived from the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which pay about eighty per cent of the taxes.

Hon. members will recall the rosy picture which was painted by the minister in the last few days of last session, when he indicated that everything was going to grow like the flowers upon the prairie. His committee of one hundred will soon expand to two hundred. This committee system, as I see it, is against the whole principle of responsible government. This is a department which is spending seven and a half million dollars for deputy ministers and their apostles to go all over this country from coast to coast. I think the time has come for us to get back to responsible government instead of this government by committees inside and out. Why does the minister not look around the country for another famous dynamic figure like Mr. Purvis who was to get all the unemployed on the payrolls in the industrial cities and has yet found no jobs. As one who comes from Toronto, an industrial city, I believe—this is a protectionist doctrine—in helping these unemployed to the utmost credit of the country, but let us help these poor people on the prairies too. I believe in equality of treatment. Let us play the game fairly, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said the other night. He always plays the game fairly himself, and he knows a great deal about agriculture. The time is coming when this farm rehabilitation scheme must be applied to all the provinces; I would not limit it to the prairies, although I would give them every support. But last summer I saw farmers in the province I come from, when the temperature was 108 to 110 degrees, suffering very nearly as much as those on the prairies.

There should be an end to all this committee system. I am sick and tired of the way in which this parliament is appointing commissions and committees, and the next year we get a report and we find it is not as rosy a picture as has been painted. We see the mistakes that have been made in rehabilitation schemes in the United States. I fail to see where the new system of committees, we do not know how many, will produce any better results than the old. There should be equality of treatment; the minister's department should look after the other provinces where farmers are suffering in much the same way as they are in his own province.

Mr. TOLMIE: Would the minister kindly outline the operation of a community cattle ranch, as carried on at the Matador, I think he said.

Mr. GARDINER: The Matador ranch is situated in the bow of the Saskatchewan river northwest of Moose Jaw. At the time that territory ceased to operate as a ranch the provincial government took over the area, fenced it and put a man in charge, and the people of the community round about put their cattle in, paying a fee of so much a head. I understand that ranch has paid more than the running expenses; it has cost the government nothing from the time it was started. It has given accommodation to the people of the surrounding area for pasturing their cattle, relieving them of the overhead for maintaining and carrying extra lands themselves. Anything that is done along that line will naturally have to be done in cooperation with the provincial governments, because they now own the lands and control the operation of them. Anything done would be done by the province, probably with some assistance from Ottawa in the way of direction and otherwise in connection with the stocking.

Mr. BAKER: What is the size of this area?

Mr. GARDINER: About three or four townships, I think. It is irregular in form, the river forming the southern boundary. A township contains thirty-six square miles.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is that ranch growing its own hay and winter feed?

Mr. GARDINER: Well the stock is mostly taken out in the winter and taken home by the farmers. The stock belongs not to any one person but to scores of persons round about, and they look after putting up the feed for the winter.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I should like to ask the minister when bringing down this report to have in mind the enormous wealth which those prairies have produced during the last thirty-five years. I say that for the special benefit of our comrades from Ontario. Had the west not poured out that great wealth, there would have been very little manufacturing in Ontario.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to say a word to encourage the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). He does not need to worry about that great move he made in introducing the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme. There is abundance of water, especially in the foothill areas on the east side of the Rocky mountains. There is great opportunity for storing that water; the possibilities seem to me to be well nigh limitless. I should like to commend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for his ambition in reaching out and setting no limit within reason to the amount of money which he will spend as he deems wise. There are tremendous possibilities. We should remember this also, that although we have not been in this country long enough to be able to be certain, it appears that the weather goes in cycles. In my constituency we have had great scarcity of moisture during the last several years until we began to think we were deserted entirely by the deities controlling precipitation. But now we have more snow there than we know what to do with, and it looks as if we are going to have abundance of moisture in the coming season. So I feel that we need not be greatly alarmed by this talk about an insoluble problem. If we go at it in a systematic, persistent way it will be solved. The prairie farm rehabilitation scheme is a good one which will give excellent results in the days to come.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. QUELCH: In dealing with the problem of drought, it is well that we recognize at once that this is a permanent or at least semi-permanent condition in large areas of western Canada. A great mistake is made in considering it a temporary state of affairs, one that will right itself as soon as more moisture becomes available. When we consider that these conditions existed many years ago, and that year after year reports consistently warned against the danger of these dry areas being opened for settlement, we must change our opinion on this matter. In spite of all these warnings these areas were thrown open for settlement by the federal government, and owing to the continuous drought and the loss of fibre in the soil a very serious condition prevails in that part of western Canada, a situation so grave that it is entirely beyond the ability of the western provinces to cope with. Many people feel that it is largely a western problem, and therefore we have no right to expect the federal government to deal with it in its entirety. But as I have already pointed out, report after report by government engineers and surveyors classified these areas as unsuitable for grain farming. Therefore, as the federal government were in charge of the natural resources at the time this land was opened up for settlement, they must assume a large share of responsibility for the serious condition that exists to-day.

It might be of interest to read into Hansard a brief history of these earlier reports, taken from a Report on the Rehabilitation of the Dry Areas of Alberta and Crop Insurance, drawn up by a committee of the Alberta government:

> In 1901 the population of the three prairie provinces was approximately 420,000, with 5½ million acres under cultivation. From 1901 to 1911 there was a rapid influx of settlers, with 1911 being the peak year. Previous to 1906 there had been no invasion of what is known as "Palliser's Triangle" by the grain farmer, but from this time on there was a continuous increase in settlement within the triangle, particularly after 1911, and at this point it may be well to review briefly the story of Palliser's Triangle and some of the geology and climatology of the short grass plains, because much of the tragedy of prairie settlement is associated with this area and the problem of its use is one of the most important to be faced by governments, both federal and provincial. During the years 1857 to 1860 Capt. John Palliser, accompanied by Doctor Hector and others, was commissioned by the British government to explore "that portion of British North America which lies between the northern branch of the river Saskatchewan and the frontier of the United States, and between the Red river and the Rocky mountains, and to record the physical features, nature of its soil, its capability for agriculture, the quantity and quality of its timber, and any indications of coal or other minerals." As a result of his explorations Palliser divided the country between the Laurentian Shield and the Rocky mountains into two parts, the "fertile belt" and the "semi-arid desert." The fertile belt was the wooded and park area, while the more or less arid desert was the treeless prairie or "true prairie" as he called it. Following his survey of this area, Palliser sketched his now famous triangle, which is more nearly in the shape of an irregular pentagon. This triangle at its base on the United States boundary extended from Turtle Mountain in Manitoba to a point near Waterton in Alberta on the west and then northwest to the old Bow Fort on the Banff highway. From there the line ran northeast to Olds and then almost due east along the 52nd parallel to a point south of Saskatoon, and from there southeast to its junction with the base line on the 49th parallel at Turtle Mountain. From the map it will be seen that this triangle took in more territory on the west than was justified, but in the main it corresponds to the dry area as we know it to-day. In his daily journal as he explored the region, he often mentioned that sloughs and creeks were dry and that he had difficulty in getting water for his horses and that pasture was very scarce in many parts. Palliser gave it as his opinion that the northern fertile belt was well suited to agriculture and would maintain a farm population, but that the area within the triangle was unsuited to agricultural settlement. Speaking more particularly of that portion of Palliser's Triangle which lies in south Saskatchewan, Hind (11) in 1860 said, "No tree or shrub or even willow could be seen in any direction from our camp (near Moose Jaw Forks) . . . the country was an undulating, treeless plain, with a light and sometimes drifting soil, occasionally blown into dunes, and not in its present condition fitted for the habitation of civilized man." Prof. John Macoun (19) said in 1870, "There were at least 400 miles from Moose Jaw where there were no trees and scarcely a shrub. . . . In 1879 I found dried and withered grass . . . in 1880 there were dried creeks on each line of travel . . . and again in 1894 the country was drying up, lakes were disappearing, many settlers were leaving the land. Nearly all the lakes and streams on the prairie had dried up and ceased to flow. . . . In all my explorations so far we have found the country extremely dry." This statement is all the more interesting because Macoun had previously taken exception to some of the estimates concerning the dry area made by Palliser. Later on, in 1904, when reporting to the British Board of Trade, Prof. Jas. Mavor (21) stated that the area approximating Palliser's Triangle was mainly suitable for pasturage and to a very limited extent for wheat.

The foregoing are the most important of the early statements made concerning the use to which a large area of western Canada should be put. The accuracy of those statements is a matter of record to-day as well as the results of not paying closer heed to the advice they contained. These early records very effectively answer a mis-statement that is frequently made to-day, namely, that the climate of western Canada has changed and is becoming more dry as the years go by. This is definitely not so.

I just read these statements, Mr. Chairman, to show very clearly that various reports which were made in the past stated that this land never should have been opened to settlement, that it always has had a very dry climate. Last session the Minister of Immigration and Colonization questioned my statement with regard to reports which had been made to the government regarding the drought area in the vicinity of Acadia, so I asked for an examination of the surveys made at that time, and I received this reply:

I am advised that upon examination of the reports of the surveyors who subdivided lands within the district of Acadia, and in particular townships 23-32, ranges 1-14, west of the fourth meridian, it is found the southerly two-fifths of this area, townships 23 to 26, comprising the most of the southeastern portion, was subdivided in 1883 when the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway was under construction. Of the fifty-six townships involved, twenty-three were reported as suitable for agriculture (settlement or tillage), sixteen for grazing, five for agriculture or grazing, and twelve for neither, but the description would indicate grazing rather than agriculture.

It appears therefore that fifty per cent of the area was rated for agriculture, with the percentage a little higher in the eastern portion.

The province of Alberta was formed in 1905.

The area from townships 27 to 32 was subdivided in 1905 in a very dry season. Of the eighty-four townships fifty per cent was rated as too dry and unproductive; thirty-seven per cent was rated for grazing and, given sufficient moisture about thirty per cent was conceded for farming.

Yet these areas were thrown open to settlement, and to-day we see the tragic conditions which have followed that settlement. It has been stated that in some districts there have been no crops for the last five years and that in other districts there have been no crops for seven years, but we find that in crop divisions No. 3, 5, and 7, relief has been paid every year since 1918 because of drought conditions. Again I should like to quote from the report on the rehabilitation of the dry areas:

Crop district 3, 5 and 7 in Alberta lie within what might be termed the permanent drought belt of the western prairies because some part or all of these districts is affected by drought during a great portion of the time... Each year, since 1918, the taxpayers of the province have been called upon to provide relief for dried out farmers in this area in varying amounts. The sum total spent for relief by the province in this area in the 17 years since 1918, is approximately ten millions of dollars. This would indicate that this area is a permanent fringe area in the economic sense and unless some reorganization takes place, it will continue to be a liability to the taxpayer of the province.

There are quite a few questions I should like to ask the minister, but I shall leave them until the estimates are brought down. I just want to stress the point that drought is really a permanent condition. There is no use in hoping that a change of climate will take place in the near future and bring about a change in these conditions, because we can go right back to 1857 and find that we have had to face this problem ever since that time, so it is not likely that these conditions will change within any short period.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, $44,896.65.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The Cold Storage Act, as hon. members know, provides that when a cold storage plant is constructed according to the regulations laid down by the department, which cold storage plant is to be made available to the public, the federal government will pay thirty per cent of the cost, and the payment of that thirty per cent is spread over five years.

Mr. HEAPS: Cost of construction?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, cost of construction. The payment of that thirty per cent is spread over a five year period. This money is to provide for the amounts that may have to be paid under the act.

Mr. HEAPS: Is that a permanent provision in the act?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: That is, until the act is changed, governments will always provide a thirty per cent subsidy for the erection of cold storage plants?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, so long as the government leaves the act on the statute books.

Mr. COLDWELL: The reduction is due to the fact that some subsidies have expired.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. GARDINER: The real reason is that at this time of the year it is almost impossible to estimate the amount which may be necessary. In other years, when the session has run on until the month of June, we have followed the practice of bringing down supplementary estimates. This vote is identical with the one passed a year ago, but the additional amount was covered by a supplementary brought in later in the session.

Mr. HEAPS: How much was actually paid out in the last fiscal year?

Mr. GARDINER: In round figures, $84,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Why is only about half that amount provided this year?

Mr. GARDINER: For the reason I gave a moment ago. It is impossible at this time of the year to estimate exactly how many applications will be made throughout the year. Later in past sessions we have been able to estimate more nearly the amount, and have brought down a supplementary to cover it.

Mr. THOMPSON: How many cold storage plants are being operated in the different provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: The plants operated in the provinces are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	5
Nova Scotia	12
New Brunswick	2
Quebec	8
Ontario	36
Manitoba	1
Saskatchewan	4
Alberta	2
British Columbia	22
Total	92

The total subsidies are as follows:

Prince Edward Island	$ 39,202 05
Nova Scotia	833,578 67
New Brunswick	57,773 10
Quebec	100,136 19
Ontario	605,200 60
Manitoba	9,600 00
Saskatchewan	80,612 10
Alberta	72,600 00
British Columbia	700,080 47

Mr. HEAPS: Those are not annual payments?

Mr. GARDINER: The total amount paid since the act came into force.

Mr. HEAPS: When was that?

Mr. GARDINER: 1907.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are these chiefly cooperative plants?

Mr. GARDINER: Both cooperative and privately owned plants in which there is customs storage.

Mr. MARSHALL: What are the two plants operated in Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: The Merchants Cold Storage Company of Calgary and the Edmonton Cold Storage Company of Edmonton.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the minister tell the committee how many of these plants are privately and how many cooperatively owned?

Mr. GARDINER: We have not the figures on that basis. We would have to go through them, and get the totals.

Mr. HEAPS: How many new cold storage warehouses have been erected during the past year for which subsidies have been requested?

Mr. GARDINER: The contracts entered into since April 1, 1936, are at the following points: Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island; Kensington, Prince Edward Island; Grand Pré, Nova Scotia; Aldershot, Ontario; Kingston, Ontario; Simcoe, Ontario; Strathroy, Ontario; Thornbury, Ontario, Kelowna, British Columbia; a second one at Kelowna, British Columbia; Naramata, British Columbia, and at Summerland, British Columbia.

Mr. COLDWELL: What four plants are subsidized in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: The Moose Jaw Cold Storage Company at Moose Jaw; the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Regina; the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Saskatoon, and the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries at Vonda.

Mr. HEAPS: Before the Department of Agriculture agrees to granting a subsidy, are the plans and specifications submitted to the department, or does the company which proposes to build simply go ahead and build, and then make application for the subsidy? In other words, is there any regulation or control over the erection of plants or cold storage warehouses?

Mr. GARDINER: According to the regulations, plans have to accompany applications, and inspections are made. Not all applications are passed by the department. In many instances they are sent back and the applicants are asked to make provision in addition to that shown in the original plans. I brought down a special supplementary last year to take care of two plants which in previous years had started operations before making application to the government. It took them about three years to satisfy the government that they had provided facilities sufficient to warrant the payment of the grant.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose in a district there is more than sufficient accommodation to take care of the requirements; in such case would the government give a subsidy for another cold storage plant?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the government would not give a grant if in its opinion the building was too costly or of dimensions greater than required to satisfy the existing conditions.

Mr. THOMPSON: Do I understand the minister to say that when the federal department makes a grant for the erection of these buildings, they are then turned over to the operating company, or does the government make grants in addition to those made in connection with the erection and equipment of the building?

Mr. GARDINER: The grants are paid over five years, and under certain conditions additional grants are paid. But the plants are always subject to regulation with regard to charges, and are open to the public for storage purposes, as long as they are operated.

Mr. THOMPSON: In that event the federal government will not derive any benefit from charges made for storage?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the federal government does not get any financial returns. In the first instance the intention was to encourage the construction of cold storage plants.

Mr. SPENCE: Do we understand from the minister that in some cases the department gives more than thirty per cent?

Mr. GARDINER: No more than thirty per cent is paid on any plant that is built. It is only when an addition is made to the space that another thirty per cent is paid.

Mr. SPENCE: If an addition is added, the department adds another thirty per cent?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: Have certain of these companies gone out of existence? Are all the cold storage warehouses being operated at a profit? What is done in the case of a warehouse which is not making any profit?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as the department knows, they are all operating. Some of them are operating in connection with trading concerns and probably are not operating exactly in accordance with the provisions set up at the time they were first built.

Mr. SENN: Is there any tariff of charges issued by the department, or are these different warehouses allowed to make their own charges?

Mr. GARDINER: The organization or individual building a storage plant must file with the application, a list of the rates to be charged. These rates cannot be changed without the consent of the governor in council. I think it will be admitted that this is a necessary condition in view of the situation in the different localities.

Mr. SENN: I suppose different rates are charged for the different classes of goods stored.

Mr. GARDINER: That is true.

Mr. TOLMIE: Could the minister give the names and locations of the plants in British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: They are as follows:

Farmers' Cold Storage Company, Limited, Hatzic.
Kaleden Cooperative Growers' Association, Kaleden.
Apex Orchards Company, Limited, Kelowna.
Kelowna Cold Storage Limited, Kelowna.
Kelowna Growers' Exchange (1), Kelowna.
Kelowna Growers' Exchange (2), Kelowna.
Occidental Fruit Company Limited, Kelowna.
Okanagan Packers Limited, Kelowna.
Naramata Cooperative Growers' Exchange, Naramata.
Kootenay Cooperative Storage Association, Nelson.
Pacific Coast Terminals Limited, New Westminster.
James Fitzpatrick, Penticton.
Penticton Cooperative Growers' Association (1), Penticton.
Penticton Cooperative Growers' Association (2), Penticton.
Maple Ridge Cooperative Produce Exchange, Port Haney.
Canadian Fish and Cold Storage Company, Prince Rupert.
Salmon Arm Farmers' Exchange, Salmon Arm.
Summerland Cooperative Growers' Association (1), Summerland.
Summerland Cooperative Growers' Association (2), Summerland.
Inland Ice and Cold Storage Company Limited, Vernon.
Vernon Fruit Union, Vernon.
B. Wilson Company, Victoria.

Mr. BROOKS: Are these plants used for the storage of any products other than market products? For instance, are they used for the storing of fish?

Mr. GARDINER: They are used for the storage of fish or any other products of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON: I notice that there are thirty-six of these plants in Ontario. Would the minister give the names and locations·

Mr. GARDINER: They are as follows:

Aldershot Distributing Cooperative Co., Aldershot.
Brantford Cold Storage Company, Brantford.
Whyte Packing Company, Brockville.

McGeachy's City Dairy, Chatham.
Wilson Company Limited, Chatham.
W. L. Hamilton, Collingwood.
Lambton Growers Cold Storage Company, Forest.
Wellington Produce Company, Harriston.
Kingston Cold Storage, Kingston.
Flavelles Limited, Lindsay.
Meaford Fruit and Canning Co. Limited, Meaford.
Whyte Packing Company, Mitchell.
R. H. Ashton, Morrisburg.
Lemon Brothers, Owen Sound.
Palmerston Cold Storage Company, Palmerston.
W. Scott Company, Limited, Peterborough.
Prince Edward County Fruit Growers, Picton.
Algoma Produce Company, Sault Ste. Marie.
Norfolk Fruit Growers Association (1), Simcoe.
Norfolk Fruit Growers Association (2), Simcoe.
Norfolk Fruit Growers Association (3), Simcoe.
J. D. Moore Company, St. Marys.
Elgin Growers Cooperative Limited, St. Thomas.
St. Thomas Cold Storage Company, St. Thomas.
Middlesex Growers Cooperative, Strathroy.
Middlesex Growers Cooperative (2), Strathroy.
Thedford Cold Storage Company, Thedford.
Georgian Bay Fruit Growers Limited (1), Thornbury.
Georgian Bay Fruit Growers Limited (2), Thornbury.
Georgian Bay Fruit Growers Limited (3), Thornbury.
United Farmers Cooperative Company, Toronto.
Trenton Cooperative Mills Limited, Trenton.
Trenton Cold Storage Company, Trenton.
Federal Warehouse Company Limited, Windsor.
Windsor Ice and Coal Company, Windsor.
Oxford Fruit Cooperative Limited, Woodstock.

Mr. BROOKS: I have been struck with the apparent discrepancy in the number of cold storage plants in the different provinces. I believe there are five in Prince Edward Island, two in New Brunswick and twenty in Nova Scotia. Is there any particular reason for there being only a few plants in some provinces while there are more in others?

Mr. GARDINER: The number of cold storage plants in a particular province depends largely upon the necessity for cold storage in that province. Where fruit and fish and dairy products are largely produced, naturally cold storage is needed. British Columbia has a large number of storage warehouses, as have Ontario and Nova Scotia.

Mr. LENNARD: Is the plant at Aldershot being operated successfully? I have no criticism to make of this plant, but I should like to have that information.

Mr. GARDINER: The departmental officials think it is being operated successfully.

Mr. LENNARD: Has the government been requested to subsidize a plant at Burlington?

Mr. GARDINER: No application has been received.

Mr. SPENCE: Some time ago the government took over a large cold storage plant at Brighton, which at one time belonged to Simmons Shuttleworth and Company, of London and Glasgow. Is the government still operating that plant?

Mr. GARDINER: It is not in the list before me as having been subsidized.

Mr. BAKER: In view of the fact that these plants are subsidized by the government, is there any control over where a plant shall be erected? When an application is made to erect a plant, does the government sometimes say that there are already sufficient plants in that locality?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is optional with the government whether a grant will be given. Consideration is given to conditions existing when the application is made. If there is no need for the plant, of course the government does not agree to give a grant.

Mr. BAKER: The government has control of that?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: What inspection and supervision are exercised by the government over these cold storage plants?

Mr. GARDINER: As long as the instalments are being paid, the plants are inspected at least annually. After that time there is no regular inspection, but there may be an inspection at any time.

Mr. SENN: Is the minister sure that the list he read from is up to date as far as Ontario is concerned? I understand from what he just said that after the instalments are paid regular supervision is not exercised. I have an idea that some plants which he mentioned in Ontario are not operating today at all. That is one question I asked the minister some little time ago. What action would the government take in case one of these cold storage plants found it impossible to carry on? Would they be allowed to be abandoned, or would some action be taken?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as we know, two of them were destroyed by fire, but they have been rebuilt. There may be one other that is not operating. If there are any others not operating, I should be glad if the hon. member would give me their names.

Mr. SENN: I understood that there was one at Morrisburg which is not in operation at the present time. Is that the one to which the minister referred?

Mr. GARDINER: It was one that, I understand, was burnt and has not been rebuilt.

Mr. SPENCE: I know the minister does not mind taking a little advice, and my advice would be to make a close scrutiny of any applications for cold storage plants. He is not only losing the 30 per cent he put in, but encouraging others to put their money in and lose it: I know several cold storage plants that had better not have been built at all. I am not going to name them. He can look them up himself.

Item agreed to.

Dairying, $290,000.

Mr. THOMPSON: I wish to call the attention of the minister to a condition which I think has more to do with the quality of our cheese exported than anything else, and that is the practice of shipping our cheeses too green. There is a regulation that the graders are not supposed to grade a cheese until it is eight days old, but any regulation that might be passed compelling a cheese maker to hold cheeses in his factory for eight days, or whatever other time might be specified, does not remedy the evil for this reason: It is not the shipping of the cheese, it is the boxing of the cheese that causes the trouble. If green cheeses are placed in boxes before they are sufficiently dried, the moisture causes a mould that discolours the cheese and very often causes a soft rind. Many of our small cheese factories have not enough shelf-room to hold more than two or three days' make of cheese, and if they are compelled to hold cheeses more than a week in the factory, they simply box them up, put them in the corner and leave them there over the week. These cheeses should be left on the shelves without being boxed, and should be turned every day for a week. One exporter told me that he had worked up a splendid trade for cheese for a certain firm in the old country, but that he could not supply them with these mouldy cheeses which had been boxed before they were properly dried out, because while the mould on the outside very often does not deteriorate the cheese itself, it certainly spoils its appearance.

There is another matter that is bothering the dairymen at the present time. Some years ago parliament passed legislation prohibiting the importation of oleomargarine. That prohibition was of great benefit to the dairy farmers, but its advantage is being nullified to a certain extent by the importation of vegetable oils. Vegetable oils are coming in and being manufactured into shortening and other ingredients used in baking and cooking, and these are taking the place of butter. We manufacture in this country on an average ten million pounds of butter a year more than we can consume, and for that ten million pounds of butter we must find a market outside Canada. These vegetable oils which are coming in are coming from countries with a low scale of wages where the standard of living is very low. They are bought very cheaply, and after they are refined, the better class of oils goes into shortenings and other ingredients used in cooking and baking, and they take the place of our butter and lard. This displaces the consumption of our own butter and animal fats, as the shortenings are frequently used in the place of butter. The lower grade oils are made into soaps. About eighty million pounds of vegetable oils are imported annually, and the importation in the last two years has increased by twenty-four million pounds, so that they have become a serious contender with butter in this country.

I would point out to the minister that the United States has protected its dairymen by imposing a duty of 4½ cents a pound on vegetable oils entering that country, while they enter Canada free. That duty has turned the tide of vegetable oils into the Canadian market. I would ask the minister to take this matter into his serious consideration because our dairymen to-day are becoming alarmed at the ever-increasing sales of shortenings which are made from vegetable oils and which are taking the place of our butter and animal fats.

Mr. GARDINER: An application with respect to vegetable oils, has been made to the tariff board and is now receiving its consideration, so I do not think I am in a position to say that any further consideration can be given the matter at the moment.

Mr. SENN: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which I think ought to have been brought to the attention of the house sooner. On the previous day the agriculture estimates were considered in the house the evening papers carried the announcement that the whole Department of Agriculture was to be reorganized and that there were to be three main branches: production, research and marketing. It came as rather a surprise to me and, I think, to other hon. members, that this had not been mentioned before the agriculture estimates were considered.

[Mr. Thompson.]

I should like first of all to commend the action of the minister for choosing the men he did to head these branches. Doctor Archibald and Mr. Rothwell are well known to agriculture generally throughout the dominion. I do not think there is a better authority on agricultural matters in Canada to-day than Doctor Archibald. The administration of his department in the past has been very excellent indeed. The same may be said for Mr. Rothwell. He has made himself deservedly popular with the live stock men of this country. I am glad the minister has seen fit to retain the services of these two men in the department.

It is difficult to understand how the estimates are to be allocated after this reorganization takes place. Take, for instance, this branch of dairying. We have the production activities, the research branch and the marketing branch. Just how this vote is to be divided among the different branches is difficult for me to understand. Again, as far as the marketing branch is concerned, if I am correctly informed or if my ideas are correct, marketing within the province is solely within the jurisdiction of the province. The supervision of marketing outside the country or interprovincial marketing has largely been, as I understand the matter, the work of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I think the minister would be wise, in view of the reorganization, to make a statement as to how these estimates are to be divided, so that we may discuss them more intelligently.

Mr. GARDINER: I had intended to discuss fully the matters referred to upon the vote for marketing, which is the last vote, on page 19. If hon. members will permit of it being done at that time it would be preferable, I think, to starting in to explain the matter at five minutes to eleven o'clock.

Mr. SENN: Then I think the minister should let this item stand until we have a chance to hear his explanation.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it really has very little to do with this item. The marketing item covers the whole matter under consideration; anything that is to be taken out of the different branches and put under marketing will be dealt with under the marketing vote.

Mr. TOLMIE: I should like to ask the minister how many dairy cows there are in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: About 3,800,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am afraid the minister is out by many millions. How many of them are under test?

Mr. GARDINER: About one and one-third per cent of the cows in Canada are under test.

Mr. TOLMIE: Do those figures apply to pure bred cattle? How many pure breds are there in Canada? They are all registered.

Mr. GARDINER: That includes all the pure bred cattle. I am not in a position to break down the figures in order to give the pure breds and the others.

Mr. SENN: Will the minister explain why the vote for dairying is so small in proportion to some of the other votes for agriculture? Last year I gave the house a few figures showing the relative importance of dairying as a branch of agriculture. I do not wish to be understood as finding any fault with the size of the votes allotted to the other branches, but it would seem to me that, in view of the relative importance of dairying as compared with other branches of agriculture, its vote is quite small. The value of animals and animal products from 1932 to 1936 was approximately $636,000,000; of our poultry and egg products, $327,000,000; of our dairy produce, $1,169,000,000, and of our wheat, $900,000,000. When we consider the size of the vote in comparison with the importance of these different branches of agriculture, the amount of money that is derived from them and their value to the industry itself, it seems to me that a very small amount is being expended for dairy purposes. It is not necessary for me to go into percentages. I think the amount of the dairy vote is something like four per cent of the total vote for agriculture. The vote for live stock amounts to about twenty per cent. If one turns to the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, one will find nearly $2,000,000 is allocated for the administration of the Canada Grain Act alone, which has largely to do with the sale and marketing of wheat.

Mr. DUNNING: The grain pays for it.

Mr. SENN: I know, but after all, that amount of money is expended on marketing and—

Mr. DUNNING: Not by the government.

Mr. SENN: Perhaps not by the department itself.

Mr. GARDINER: The farmers pay for that themselves, direct.

Mr. SENN: At least there is a vote in the Department of Trade and Commerce for that amount.

Mr. GARDINER: And a revenue of the same amount.

Mr. SENN: My argument is that if it is necessary to expend large amounts to market our wheat successfully, which has a value considerably smaller than our dairy products, the amount allowed here is too small, and I think the minister might very well explain to the committee why this vote is so small.

Mr. GARDINER: The vote for dairying has been increased this year by $18,000. It was increased last year. I might draw to the attention of the committee the fact that the subsidies paid for cold storage are an assistance to dairying.

Mr. SENN: And to other branches as well.

Mr. GARDINER: The item for live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions—a considerable percentage of that is intended to be assistance to dairying. Experimental farms, including investigations concerning plant diseases—a large part of that vote is in order to encourage dairying and to make it possible for dairy farmers to have better stock and better feed for their dairy stock. The health of animals, administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, an expenditure of $1,817,000—a very considerable part of that is to improve the dairy herds through improving the health of the cows throughout the country. I might say that the greater part of the vote is really a vote for dairying. It can be very easily argued and shown that more of the vote is spent for dairying than for anything else.

Mr. SENN: I have something further to say, but it is eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 10, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—CHANGE OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. McLean (Simcoe East) be substituted for that of Mr. Slaght on the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1934, and amendments thereto, and the Franchise Act, 1934, and amendments thereto.

Motion agreed to.

VALIDITY OF DOMINION ACTS

TEXT OF DECISIONS OF JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL TABLED

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table of the house copies of the text of the decisions of the privy council on the various references, which decisions, as hon. members are aware, were delivered on January 28 last. Yesterday some hon. gentlemen expressed the wish that this text might be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give instructions to that effect.

Mr. SPEAKER: Instructions will be given to that effect.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE EXPORTS—MARKING OF PACKAGES

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Are the shippers of packages of Canadian fruits and vegetables to the United States required to mark each package with the name of the grower and the country of origin?

2. Is this required of similar shipments into this country from the United States?

3. If not, will the government put a similar regulation into effect?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes, with the name of the packer or shipper who may be the grower (to conform with Canadian regulations) and with the country of origin (to conform with the U.S. customs regulations).

2. The country of origin is required, but not the name of the grower.

3. Will be considered in due course.

WESTERN PROVINCES QUINQUENNIAL CENSUS STAFF

Mr. HURTUBISE:

1. How many candidates presented themselves in May, 1936, at the civil service examinations for positions in connection with the quinquennial census of the western provinces?

2. How many French-speaking candidates were there, and how many English-speaking?

3. How many candidates were placed on the list of those eligible?

4. Of the eligible candidates, how many were French-speaking, and how many English-speaking?

5. How many of these candidates did the government employ during the first six months of the census work?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

6. Of the candidates employed in this census work during the first six months, how many were French-speaking, and how many English-speaking?

7. Of the candidates employed upon this census work during the first six months, how many resided in Ottawa before the census, and how many resided elsewhere?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. 7,206.

2. French-speaking, 1,482; English-speaking, 5,724.

3. 604.

4. French-speaking, 21; English-speaking, 583.

5. 276 (including one replacement).

6. French-speaking, 8; English-speaking, 268.

7. Resident in Ottawa, 64; elsewhere, 212.

"French-speaking" indicates those candidates who wrote the examination in the French language, and the same applies to the term "English-speaking."

CANADA GAZETTE—LIST OF REGISTRARS OF ELECTORS

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. Who ordered the publication of the list of registrars of electors in the Canada Gazette of January 16, 1937?

2. Why was that list published about two months before the time fixed by statute?

3. What was the cost of the publication of the list of registrars of electors in the Canada Gazette of January 16, 1937?

4. Will the list of registrars of electors be again published this year in the Canada Gazette during the period fixed by statute, namely: between the first and twentieth days of March?

5. In that event, who will pay for the unauthorized publication of the list of registrars of electors in the Canada Gazette of January 16, 1937?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. The list was sent by the dominion franchise commissioner.

2. It was published ahead of time—as soon as received.

3. Cost not appreciable in amount, since the work involved in setting type is trifling.

4. Yes.

5. Answered by No. 3.

CAPTAIN FREEMAN HATFIELD

Mr. BROOKS:

What is the present position of the extradition proceedings affecting Captain Freeman Hatfield?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): From information received, Captain Freeman Hatfield intends to appeal from the decision of the United States circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SOREL, QUE., GRAIN ELEVATOR

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Did the private company which built the grain elevator at Sorel utilize a wharf for the foundation of said elevator? If so, was this wharf constructed and paid for by the federal government?
2. How much did this wharf cost?
3. What is the name of the company which owns the grain elevator at Sorel?
4. Who are the directors and shareholders of said company?
5. What rental is paid to the government for the use of said wharf?
6. Do the wharves which serve as foundations for the grain elevators at Montreal and Quebec belong to the government, and have they been built entirely and paid for by said federal government?
7. Are the following charges collected at the port of Sorel: "tonnage dues," "wharfage" and "moorage charges"?
8. Are the following charges collected at the ports of Montreal and Quebec: "tonnage dues," "wharfage" and "moorage charges"?

Mr. RINFRET: Return tabled herewith.

TERMINATION OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS WITH INDIVIDUALS—LOSS OF SALARY

Mr. MUTCH:

1. What was the cost to the federal treasury in each of the fiscal years from 1929 to 1936, inclusive, arising out of the termination of contracts entered into between the federal government and individuals and involving compensation for loss of salary as provided in such contracts as may have been thus voided?
2. Who were the persons with whom such settlements were made?
3. What was the date of the contract in each instance, and the date it was terminated?
4. How much did each individual receive?

DISMISSAL OF QUEBEC POSTMASTERS AND MAIL CARRIERS

Mr. WERMENLINGER:

1. How many postmasters in the province of Quebec were dismissed since November, 1935?
2. How many were dismissed in each of the other provinces of the dominion?
3. How many mail carriers have been replaced since November, 1935: (a) in the province of Quebec; (b) in each of the other provinces of the dominion?

SURVEY PARTIES—QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. How many geodetic, geological, hydrographic, topographic and land survey parties were working in the province of Quebec, during 1936?
2. What are the names and salaries of the members of each of these parties, and which of them were only employed temporarily?
3. In what sections of the province of Quebec were these parties employed, and what was the nature of their work?

HOUSING POLICY

ELIMINATION OF SLUM CONDITIONS AND PROVISIONS FOR OVERCOMING SHORTAGE OF DWELLINGS

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood) moved:

Whereas the home is the quick centre of all national life;

And whereas, there is an appalling scarcity of homes in this dominion, and also that slum conditions exist to a shocking degree in most of our urban centres;

And whereas, as a result of conditions beyond their control, many working men who do not own homes are unable to build;

And whereas, housing plans have been operating with outstanding success in many countries, especially, for example, in the United Kingdom and Sweden,

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give full and immediate consideration to the setting up of a housing plan, with a thought to eliminating slum conditions; to overcoming the shortage of sufficient dwellings, adequately, properly and happily to house our population; and to making possible to the working man who wants to build, and who is at present unable to build, the building of his own home.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I introduce this resolution to the house recognizing five existing and contributing factors: First, that we have a national employment commission that has been functioning for nearly a year to investigate and report upon ways and means of providing employment. Second, that Bill No. 11, to provide for a home improvement plan, on recommendation of the national employment commission, has already passed to the stage of third reading. Third, that the need for houses and the necessity for slum clearance is both appalling and appallingly obvious. Fourth, that experiments in housing plans and slum clearance schemes are by no means untested and untried, having proved to be a preeminent success in many countries, particularly in the United Kingdom and Sweden. And, fifth, that the hurdles of provincial and municipal cooperation must be negotiated before the federal government can step in.

I plan to approach this great problem of slum clearance under three main headings: First, the moral responsibility of the nation to protect its national life; second, the vital obligation of the nation to preserve and enhance national life; and, third, the prime necessity of employment both for those who have worked and are out of work, and for those who are prepared, equipped and ready to work but who cannot get a job—in other words, our youth.

First, as to the moral responsibility of the nation to protect its national life. As the resolution states, the home is the quick centre of national life. It may sound platitudinous to say, nevertheless it is true, that as goes the home so goes the nation. If the house is but a house and not a home, how can national home life exist? If the house is dilapidated, dirty, insanitary and inadequate, or if the conditions are those of overcrowding, and are unhealthy, demoralizing and a virtual insult to any sense of human decency, those who live under such conditions are bound to be the victims of the circumstances of their environment.

The converse is also true. If the people live in happy, tidy, clean homes, there is at once set up a sense of ownership, a desire to "possess possessions" and the feeling that, after all, the person owning a home has a stake in the state. The fact that people live in homes, not just in houses, is of inestimable value to any country. Broadly speaking, can we say to-day, particularly of urban centres, that the backbone of these communities, the working men, all have the opportunity of living in homes rather than in houses?

For nearly eight years, since 1929 and during the days of the depression, we have witnessed what may be described as a gradual undermining of Canadian national life. Some have lost their homes as a result of having purchased them under a mortgage plan, and have been unable to continue payment of the interest rates charged. Failing to meet payments on mortgages, they have lost their homes and their stakes in them and have been compelled to live in inadequate houses and to move about from place to place, usually at each move going lower and lower down the scale in the standard of living. The effect of such catastrophic events on youth, the industrial worker, or the farmer, is too great to estimate.

Then, too, in the past seven years no less than 1,500,000 of our young people have reached the age of sixteen years. What has been the effect on them as they have watched their parents suffer the indignity of having to move about from place to place? What has been the effect upon these young people, as they have been forced to witness the demoralizing spectacle of the parents being paid money to keep body and soul together, and still not being able to get work? Then, there are the conditions occasioned by the doubling up of families, conditions which have produced awful and degrading circumstances. Not long ago I was in a room of not more than two hundred square feet in which were living two families consisting of five adults of opposite sexes. I hold in my hand the report of the lieutenant governor's committee on housing conditions in Toronto. It is a most illuminating document, and as one peruses its pages he cannot help but be impressed by the fact that in the city of Toronto at least conditions prevail which the average citizen would not care to contemplate, but which as representatives of the people it is our sworn duty to contemplate.

There are many interesting statements in the report, but none quite as staggering as that concerning juvenile delinquency. At page 45 of the report we find that the rate of juvenile delinquency in good housing areas is 7.9 per 10,000 of population, while in areas where housing is totally inadequate and where slum conditions exist the rate stands at no less than 36.6. In other words it is five times as great in one as in the other. Then, at page 50 I find this:

> The whole plane of sex morality is likely to be lower in districts of poor housing. The breakdown in self respect due to lack of privacy and indiscriminate intermingling of the sexes results in a general increase of sex delinquency. The social consequences of dark halls and stairways are also seen in the increased number of nuisances committed where such conditions exist. In conference police officials stated that "houses of ill-fame" are more numerous in areas of dilapidated and outworn housing, and a prominent social worker gave it as her opinion that illegitimacy and social diseases are more than generally prevalent among the occupants of bad houses.

I have gone to many of these areas and have visited families living in them. I believe I can speak with knowledge and certainty of conditions which exist in Toronto. In many of the areas the conditions are worse than deplorable, and always inexcusable. There are those who have attempted by manipulation of pencil and paper to show that there is no overcrowding in some of our urban centres. I maintain that in the light of the knowledge we all have, such statements are nothing short of criminal.

The Bruce report, to which I have referred, and many others, bring to our attention with crystal clearness deplorable conditions existing in many of our urban centres—yes, and not only in the cities, but in rural areas as well, where often they are desperate, conditions beyond the control of those who are forced to live under them. We are inclined sometimes to sit back and say, "Well, at least a man can be clean." I say there are conditions under which it is impossible for a man to be clean, and that therefore we should condemn ourselves for permitting these conditions to exist. A few days ago I was speaking to an hon. member of this chamber who comes from Saskatchewan, and who informed me that in some parts of that province there are houses where protection against the cold is so inadequate that one member of the family must sit up all night to attend the fire with whatever fuel is available in order to attempt to keep frost out of the house.

It is not my intention to try to prove by figures, by quoting from reports, or by placing on Hansard a volume of evidence to substantiate it, the truth of the statement that we in Canada to-day are facing a shortage of between 75,000 and 100,000 houses, that in urban centres slum conditions exist which are virtually a disgrace to Canada, let alone to the cities in which they exist, and that the housing of our rural population is desperately in need of attention. Mr. Speaker, we have had investigations and commissions, commissions and investigations, almost ad nauseam, —but in the main, what has been done? The purpose of the resolution is to bring to the attention of the house not merely the conditions which exist, but the necessity for immediate action in connection with this most vital of national problems. How long are municipalities to be permitted to permit this cancerous growth of slums to eat at the very vitals of our nation? We talk about putting men to work, about that burning problem which has the attention of everyone to-day, namely that of employment and the finding of jobs for people who are out of work. Yes, by all means put men to work—but from what background?

In this house and out of it we have discussed at length the great problem of youth—youth that is undernourished and in ill health, whose morale is gone. What are we doing to build up our youth? We exercise great care over their education and this question has been discussed in the house. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), whose motion follows mine on the order paper under notices of motion, is introducing a resolution in connection with scholarships. Splendid, but what of the morale of youth?

I had the privilege of visiting the United Kingdom this summer and I realized that the mother country had not been slow to recognize the necessity of building up the morale of the worker. It is with essentially such a background that the mother country has launched and put into effect so efficient a housing scheme. The same is true of Sweden. A filthy house and the environment of a poorly ventilated, insanitary, verminous and smelly room will set up only one set of reactions in the mind of a human being—a sense of inferiority, inadequacy and despair. If a man is red blooded at all, these feelings turn into but one thing—rebellion. There is an undermining effect from spending the day in walking the streets looking for work and then returning to an evil smelling, verminous and filthy space that is all a man has to call home. This is a fact which we are perhaps sometimes slow in recognizing.

I have in my hand a publication of the London County Council with reference to Becontree, one of the new subdivisions of the city of London. This subdivision has an area of 2,778 acres and houses no less than 25,000 families or 120,000 people. Attractive and clean cottages and flats are to rent, each with its garden and all that goes with it. A three-room cottage may be rented for $3.10 per week, or a six-room cottage for $5.60. This subdivision is only one of many around London. I have before me a map prepared by the London County Council showing the housing estates in operation in 1936. Hon. members who have seen this plan are amazed at the number and extent of the areas which have been set up by the London County Council under their housing plan.

I do not wish at this point to criticize in any way the operations of the national employment commission, but surely it is not necessary to spend thousands of dollars on investigations and use up months of time in connection with this matter of housing. The home improvement plan which we have been discussing in this house is splendid as far as it goes; it is a step in the right direction, but of what possible good is this plan to the man who has been evicted from one hovel after another, who is renting a place he is forced to call his home? The other day in committee I asked the minister a question concerning the use of money to be granted under the home improvement plan and whether any machinery had been set up whereby a home would be demolished when the owner should demolish rather than repair it. The minister's answer is to be found on page 479 of Hansard of February 2, 1937, as follows:

> As the hon. member is aware, the duty of condemning a dwelling house as being unfit for human habitation is a provincial matter.

The home improvement plan is only one small step in filling the great need for housing. May it not be to the government as the words of the hymn, "One step enough for me."

In the second place there is a vital obligation on the nation to preserve its national health. As has been said already in this chamber this session, sickness costs this country approximately $300,000,000 a year.

Much has been done to cure tuberculosis, while typhoid fever and diphtheria have been practically eliminated. All diseases of bacterial origin have decreased in a striking manner. We rejoice in Canada in such medical achievements and the achievements in the realm of science such as those of Sir Frederick Banting. But our governments, municipal, provincial and federal, do nothing to eliminate slum areas in our cities and to improve living conditions in some of our rural districts. Whole city blocks of so-called dwellings and many farm houses are virtually breeding grounds for the most filthy of diseases. The occupants of these places are unable to do anything about it. The slum areas of our cities foster all the evils of infant mortality, infantile paralysis, tuberculosis and other insidious diseases. These diseases are being fed by the conditions under which we compel men and women to live. One of the most filthy of all plagues, venereal diseases, is fostered by overcrowding in slum areas. On the basis of public health alone, it is incumbent upon the government to adopt the spirit of this resolution by doing as much as possible toward the elimination of slums and building up toward the happy housing of our population. Yes, the government should do all possible to assist the provinces and municipalities to eradicate this slum evil, the greatest blot on the escutcheon of Canada.

Unemployment is a burning question in this country to-day, but what is the use of giving work to men who are rendered physically incapable of working, as a result of the conditions under which they have been compelled to live. Within the last few days it was my privilege to talk to the one who was responsible for this report, the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, Doctor H. A. Bruce. During the course of our conversation that was the point he stressed, what is the use of expecting men to be able to work who have not worked for years and who have lived under the most unfortunate conditions.

There are some startling figures to be found in this report. In Glasgow the death rate per thousand in areas where families live in one room, is 29·9; where the families live in four rooms the rate is 10·8, just one-third. In Edinburgh the death rate in a certain area in 1892 was 45·5 per thousand. In 1933, after the elimination of slum conditions, the death rate in the same area was only 15 per thousand, just one-third what it had been. The challenge is here and something must be done. This job of work is an active, not a passive job. There is no possibility that good times of themselves will clear up our slum areas. There is a job of work that must be done. May I quote the words of that great statesman of the nineteenth century, Benjamin Disraeli, who said:

> The public health is the foundation upon which rests the happiness of the people and the welfare of the nation. The care of the public health is the first duty of the statesman.

In the third place, there is the prime necessity of providing employment. A few days ago Mr. Tom Moore, vice chairman of the national employment commission, speaking to the Canadian Construction Association, then convened at Ottawa, is reported as follows:

> Mr. Moore said that out of approximately 2,000,000 houses possessed by the Canadian people, based on the average life of a house at 30 years, 30,000 houses per year would be a fair estimate for new building. The total reported for the last five years had not been more than half this.
> "According to this approach there would be a deficit of about 75,000 houses which, at an average cost of $3,300 each, would amount to a total building requirement of $247,500,000," Mr. Moore declared.
> He pointed out that of 95,000 families on relief in Canadian cities of over 25,000 population, approximately nine per cent occupied one room and 11 per cent two rooms, making a total of 20 per cent, living in one or two rooms.

It is a well known fact that the building of houses provides more work than any other type of construction, with the possible exception of the building of concrete roads. Approximately 80 per cent of the cost of a house is used in labour, direct and indirect. Thus in the $3,300 home of which Mr. Moore speaks, there would be $2,640 of labour direct and indirect.

It is unnecessary to call the attention of this house to the depressed condition of the building industry. Sufficient be it to say that the building industry to-day is struggling along about one-third of normal, and in this industry normal at no time in Canada has been anything to write home about. In the city of Toronto, my own city, in 1928 our building permits amounted to $51,607,188, while in 1935 they had dwindled to $9,905,455, or 20 per cent of the 1928 figure. The city hall has reported a further drop for the seven months ended July 31, 1936, as compared with the same period the year before, the actual figures being $3,869,041 as against $5,951,602 for the previous year, or just two-thirds of the amount for the year previous.

What better, broader, fuller way to create employment efficiently than by a housing and slum clearance plan? Those of us who have talked to men in the trade, to secretaries of unions and to those who are concerned with the building trades realize that an increase of even only a slight amount in the building trade would make a spectacular difference to employment in Canada, and a 25 per cent increase in the building trade means, Mr. Speaker, that we would have in Canada a scarcity of skilled mechanics. Here then is a magnificent opportunity for apprenticeships. Increase the rate of building in Canada; create a scarcity of skilled mechanics, and as a result thousands of apprentices who have studied through the technical school or some other medium to be plumbers, electricians, carpenters or whatever it may be, have an opportunity to step in, not to displace any adult skilled mechanic, but to learn their trade.

Slum clearance, let it be remembered also, does not necessarily involve construction only, for there is demolition; there is the elimination of what already exists, and elimination can be accomplished by unskilled labour. Therefore a housing and slum clearance plan at once accomplishes three purposes—the providing of jobs for skilled labour, the providing of jobs for unskilled labour, and the providing of jobs for apprentices and those who wish to practise what they have learned in the schools and otherwise as their trade.

The need for a dominion-wide housing plan is indeed a crying need, and if the plan is delayed much longer it seems to me that the results will inevitably be one of two, or both together: the breaking out of a severe epidemic in congested areas, or an understandable open revolt of those who are compelled to live within these areas. How much longer are 33,449 families going to occupy 15,780 houses? These are actual figures recently released in the city of Toronto. We have heard something of late in this chamber about subversive forces at work in this dominion. We have heard certain statements made in regard to the alleged rise of communism in Canada. What is the answer to these subversive forces? What is the answer to communism in Canada? Is it bludgeoning? Is it force? God forbid. The answer is in jobs and in proper homes. But what has been done? We have a national home improvement plan. That is one step. But what has been done on a broad national scale?

Mr. CHURCH: Nothing.

Mr. MASSEY: Nothing, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) says.

Mr. CHURCH: And they have done it well.

Mr. MASSEY: That is at least encouraging. Let us consider what has been done in England. I have in my hand a publication of the Ministry of Health dated March, 1936, on housing, house production, slum clearance, et cetera, in England and Wales. May I read a paragraph or two:

> At the date of the armistice the number of houses in England and Wales was a little under 8,000,000. Between that date and the 31st March, 1936, 2,981,417 new houses were provided.

And further:

> The total number of houses provided in the half-year ending 31st March, 1936, was 174,009. This constitutes a new record, the total being 5,282 more than in the half-year ending 31st March, 1935, the figure for which was a record at that time.

And still further:

> Good progress is being made in slum clearance. During the year ending 31st March, 1936, 37,920 houses were demolished or closed under the act of 1930 as compared with 24,273 in the previous year. Up to 31st March, 1936, 80,611 houses (with accommodation for 380,042 persons) has been provided for the purpose of rehousing persons displaced under the act of 1930, nearly one-half of which were completed in the year ending on that date.

Now let us look at Sweden. Building schemes in Sweden are by no means new, for as early as 1849 Sweden began to contemplate seriously and actively her housing. Rapid changes in population had taken place in that country from 1850 to 1936. The change in population in the city of Stockholm, for example, has been an increase from 93,000 in 1850 to 534,000 in 1936, plus a suburban area with a population of 175,000. There has been set up a "build your own home" scheme, known as the Smastugebygge, which has been a preeminent success. Without going into details of the plan, it is possible for a man to make a down payment of only $80 for a beautiful little home worth $2,500 or $3,000, on a lot 80 feet by 125 feet, and to pay for it over a period of thirty years at the rate of $20 per month for the first ten years, $17.50 a month for the next ten years, and $7.50 per month for the last ten years, and these figures include ground rent, amortization of the loan, fire insurance, taxes, street cleaning, garbage removal, chimney sweeping and water service.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the rate of interest?

Mr. MASSEY: Various, usually about 3½ or 4 per cent. The "HSB" a cooperative society for the building of blocks of flats, has been so preeminently successful that to-day they can offer for sale an apartment consisting of a living room, three bedrooms, kitchen, bath and balcony, along with modern stainless steel kitchen, with an electric refrigerator, for $10.50 a month. And that is for purchasing the flat, not renting it. Tens of thousands of these flats have been built in Sweden in the last few years. I have in my hand two prospectuses of this scheme, if hon. members care to look at them. The environs of Stockholm are virtual parks, and are known quite justly as the garden suburbs of Stockholm. I hold in my hand a map of the western portion of the city, showing large areas purchased by the city in the course of its housing scheme.

How can we in Canada achieve such results as have the United Kingdom and Sweden? Let us look at the problem for a moment. There are three main difficulties in the way, and let us recognize them. The first is that the federal government cannot force municipalities and provincial governments to introduce housing schemes and slum clearance plans. Second, there is our system of realty taxation. Third, have we the funds available to underwrite such schemes if, as and when approved by the provinces or the cities?

Let us attempt to answer the third difficulty first. As has been stated in this chamber this session, and concurred in by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the number on relief is not decreasing rapidly. The total of the payments for relief by the federal, provincial and municipal governments during the last six years has been approximately $600,000,000, an annual payment amounting to, in round figures, $100,000,000. That is money being spent in many instances to keep men in idleness. Suppose such an amount as $100,000,000 were directed toward a housing scheme. It would mean that $80,000,000 would be put into the pockets of Canadian labour. If the average earnings were $1,200 a year—as low as that—it would mean that 67,000 men would be put to work. The government, we understand, can borrow money at three per cent or less; therefore the interest on money so borrowed would be $3,000,000 or less. Thus if the relief bill to the federal government were reduced by $3,000,000 a year the interest would be met by this saving alone. But I am suggesting putting the $100,000,000 to productive use—not into public works; not into buildings that will continue to be a drain upon this government; not into roads that will involve further expense in maintenance. I am suggesting putting money into a housing scheme where there will be a return to the government, from the person who purchases or rents the house, of, let us say, five per cent, or $5,000,000 a year. This would show a profit to the government of $2,000,000 on a hundred million dollar housing scheme. True, the national debt is increased by $100,000,000, but the money has gone into homes; it has not cost the taxpayer a penny; the houses are gradually being purchased and the debt is gradually being reduced by the home owner. It is in essence upon this simple principle that the modified housing schemes in effect in the United Kingdom and Sweden have been worked out.

But the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) may well say, "Can we, dare we, increase the national debt?" Is not that a question to be answered by, "It depends upon the purpose." That is the way in which the question has been answered in other countries. And what is the purpose? To raise the morale of Canadians, to give people pride of ownership, to raise the standard of living, to reduce crime and delinquency, to improve public health, to provide jobs, to revive a broken-down yet vital industry, to give youth a chance, and at the same time to receive a five per cent, more or less, income from a three per cent loan.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish my hon. friend would be good enough to amplify that. The one thing I am not clear on is how the state could get back five per cent from a three per cent loan.

Mr. MASSEY: I stated, Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, that if the government were to borrow $100,000,000 at three per cent—I believe this could be done at that figure or less—the interest on that loan would be $3,000,000 a year. If the hundred million dollars were invested in a housing scheme, or if houses were erected to the worth of a hundred million dollars, the return on that money through rents and purchases should be around five per cent per year.

Mr. DUNNING: But if you did that you would not have low cost housing.

Mr. MASSEY: That is exactly the basis on which low cost housing has been organized in the other countries of which I spoke. I will also say to the minister that the financing of housing schemes and slum clearance plans is not the great bugaboo; I think he will grant me that. There are two other far greater difficulties; the one, the system of realty taxation existing through this entire dominion; the other, the fact that under the British North America Act it is up to the provinces and the municipalities to institute action.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the greatest difficulty.

Mr. MASSEY I have said that. The greatest stumbling block in the way of ridding our cities of the scars that mar them, the greatest difficulty in the way of rehousing our rural population, is to be found, on the one hand, in the present system of realty taxation, and, on the other, in the restrictions placed upon this government by the British North America Act. If the national employment commission has spent its money and its time only on the study of taxation and can bring any recommendations on this question that are attractive to provincial and municipal governments, then their work has been well worth while on that basis alone. We cannot expect extensive building, either under building societies or under the aegis of provincial or municipal governments, until our system of taxation is completely readjusted. I urge upon the government with all the earnestness of which I am capable that full and complete study be given to this phase of our national scheme of things.

At this session of parliament—yes, and in the last session and before that—we have heard it said again and again that we cannot do this or that in the way of social legislation because the British North America Act says no. If the British North America Act stands in the way of our providing the obvious necessities for this nation in respect of such matters as I have been discussing, or in such matters as social reform, then for God's sake let us amend the act! Let us not disturb its intent. Let us not disturb its principles. Let us keep intact the great purpose for which it was designed. Let us guard the great principles which motivated the minds of those who drafted it seventy years ago. Let us not take away any of its binding force. Let us not weaken it in such a way as to lessen the rights of minorities or to increase the rights of majorities, or in respect of any of the things which have been so important in the development of Canada. But I am one of those who firmly believe that the exploitation of labour, and other abuses which have crept into our social system, cannot and will never be eliminated until this federal parliament has the power to eliminate them. Further, I do not believe that those who drafted the act seventy years ago expected it to remain just so in perpetuity. I have too high a regard for the life and work of the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to believe that at any time he had it in mind that he could continue to run this Dominion of Canada from the grave.

In conclusion, just a word that seems to me to be of the greatest importance. We realize that there are forces at work within our nation that are attempting to overthrow democracy and to undermine us,—insidious forces, at work not openly but burrowing in underneath and preying upon the gullibility of disillusioned youth—understandably disillusioned—and upon the sensitiveness of those who have starved and shivered and suffered these many years. These foreign agents paint a rosy picture of the possibilities of development under their system. They disguise its true colour, and the picture they paint is attractive to those who have been disillusioned. They realize how sensitive are those who have been forced to live only upon the generosity of the state, who have been paid to be kept in idleness, who have been compelled to live under such conditions I have attempted to indicate this afternoon. Democracy will be safe in Canada and Canada will be safe for Canadians only so much longer if something is not done to create work and provide the opportunity to our noble fellow citizens to live in good clean homes. We may talk earnestly and seriously about this item of legislation and that, about this job of work and that, about making available, to those who are denied them, means of education, scholarships and all the rest—all splendid things; but the ultimate answer for the safety of democracy and social security is to be found nowhere but in pay envelopes and good homes! As long as men are unemployed, as long as men who want work cannot get it, as long as men are compelled to live in a state of squalor, this nation is in jeopardy.

As a parliament we are challenged to make possible the creation of work, challenged as no parliament in this dominion has been challenged before. Outside of all that I have been attempting to say in regard to human values, moral values, social values in connection with the need of housing, there is this crying need for the creation of work. In the words of the resolution:

> . . . in the opinion of this house, the government should give full and immediate consideration to the setting up of a housing plan, with a thought to eliminating slum conditions, to overcoming the shortage of sufficient dwellings, adequately, properly and happily to house our population; and to making possible to the working man who wants to build, and who is at present unable to build, the building of his own home.

It was Walt Whitman who wrote:

> The house builder at work in cities or anywhere,
> The preparatory jointing, squaring, sawing, mortising,
> The hoist-up of beams, the push of them in their places, laying them regular,
> Setting the studs by their tenons in the mortises, according as they were prepared,
> The blows of the mallets and hammers—
> Paeans and praises to him!

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house I consider that I represent all classes of citizens, among whom are the unemployed, the unemployable and the low wage earners all of whom require low cost housing. Therefore I should like to say a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), also to congratulate him upon his wide grasp of the problem.

In the riding from which I come, St. Paul's, Toronto, conditions of living in some sections are appalling. Of that I have personal knowledge. The Bruce report deals with the slum areas there. I am sorry to say that in my riding is to be found a majority of the slum areas of the city of Toronto. In the larger centres of population there is a necessity for stern and serious work to remedy the loathsome conditions which have grown up in what are called slum areas. It is not a new problem, and it is not true to say that it has not been studied in Toronto and other places in Canada during the past ten or fifteen years. Improved housing conditions were advocated in England more than one hundred years ago; a manufacturing philanthropist did this. Napoleon III saw the need of it in Paris and took steps, perhaps not as compelling as they might have been, to bring about some measure of reform. Within recent years, Germany, Russia, Sweden and other European countries have attempted a solution with varying degrees of success. As I said, Great Britain has been studying the problem for many years. One of the most useful examples that we can find in the world is provided in England where some three million houses have been erected at a cost defrayed by state subsidies or by local authorities.

What is a slum? In the first place, it is an ugly scar upon the face of any decent community. In the second place it is the breeding ground for disease and crime. Crime does not lurk in open spaces and in decent environments. As disease and crime are a wasteful expense to the nation, why should not the state provide the means of eradicating both disease and crime, by obliterating slum areas and making it possible for people to enjoy life that is theirs?

I offer, for the serious consideration of the house, the principle that proper housing is a public service which should be assumed by the state in the same way that education, health, and compensation for injuries sustained in industry, mothers' pensions, old age pensions and unemployment insurance are state obligations. Some may cry socialism. It is not socialism for people to be able to wash their faces, to bathe regularly, to breathe clean air, to drink pure water, to avoid disease, as well as to be educated, in order to discharge their responsibilities as citizens.

[Mr. Massey.]

Action already taken through the Dominion Housing Act and the rehabilitation measures has to do with a class of citizens who are in no particular difficulty regarding housing. The dominion act deals with builders, owners and those who are not usually in need of assistance from the state. Those who borrow the money under the rehabilitation measures are in the same category. The loans available under the Dominion Housing Act are made upon the security of property which has to be maintained and amortised upon an economic basis; that is to say, owners of houses coming under this act are, theoretically, and to a large extent actually, in a position to pay out of their income enough to discharge the maintenance and amortisation of the property; the same thing is true of borrowers under the rehabilitation measures.

The Minister of Finance has said that under the home improvement plan all those who are credit worthy can get loans from the banks. What about the others who are not considered credit worthy—the low wage earners, the unemployed, the unemployables? They are, unfortunately, a very large proportion of the population. If they are not credit worthy, what will they do? A great many of them are decent people who, through lack of opportunities, are in the position in which they find themselves to-day.

Something must be done. These arrangements are all very well in their place and I think they will stimulate employment and building to some extent, although I think in their present form they are not likely to be taken advantage of on anything like the scale that their sponsors hope and no doubt expect. But the big housing problem in Canada is created by conditions surrounding low cost housing. To state the position clearly, it may be assumed that the economic cost of maintaining and amortising, in forty years, a new standard four-room housing unit in an urban area is $21.76 per month, or approximately $261 per annum. The assumption is that the cost per house is $3,000. The economic cost is made up as follows:

	Per cent
Taxes (assessment 60 per cent of value)	2·40
Management	0·15
Amortization	1·05
Maintenance	1·00
Insurance	0·10
Interest	4·00
Total	8·70

There is a large class in Canada consisting of unemployables, unemployed and low wage earners whose ability to pay rent is limited. At the present time in the city of Toronto unemployed and unemployables have one-half their rent paid for them if they are on relief. The general situation is that all families in the unemployable, unemployed and low wage earning class inevitably gravitate to the house which can be rented at an average of $12 per month, whereas the economic rent for modern standard houses would be, roughly, $21.76. Therefore there is a condition under which all these families are compelled, generally speaking, to live in houses at least fifty per cent below standard. In view of this situation it is my opinion that the federal government should cooperate with the provincial and municipal authorities to bridge the gap between the economic rent of standard low cost houses and the ability to pay. The present occupants of these houses, unless their conditions improve, will gradually move down the ladder until they find themselves eventually in the poorest possible type of house that municipal bylaws permit to be lived in at all. In Toronto we now have a rehabilitation bylaw which forces property owners to maintain low cost houses under conditions as regards sanitation, and so on, as set out in the bylaw. Failure to comply with the bylaw results in the house being condemned and closed up.

The trouble is that there is no provision for the replacement of low cost houses in this country. If the ability to pay rent is represented by the sum of $12 per month and the economic rent necessary to support the investment is $22 per month, how can there be any replacement except with state assistance? Much is heard of private enterprises, building societies and public utility companies in Great Britain. But there is the problem—a fifty per cent gap between the ability to pay and the economic rent. How can private enterprises, in any form, be expected to enter a field of business which involves a loss of fifty per cent of the capital before you start?

The national housing committee of Great Britain made a report in 1934. The following is a summary of their views as adapted to Canada. If the state enters into a housing program, let us look at what might be called the assets and liabilities. What is the financial liability involved? Let us suppose that the nation, having built 10,000 houses, allows them to be occupied free of rent. Suppose, further, that the cost of the houses, including land, was as high as $3,000 per house, or $30,000,000; then the economic annual cost at 8·7 per cent would be $2,610,000. The supposition that all houses would be occupied free of rent is, of course, absurd. On any reasonable assumption the cost to the exchequer of the investment involved would not be excessive. If all the annual cost to the nation were collected from those occupying the houses, there would be no loss to the state. The fact is that cheap finance minimises subsidy and risk alike through bringing the economic rent within the wage-earner's capacity to pay. There will be a financial liability in respect of housing where land values are high and in respect of certain low paid workers who could not afford a rent of $22 per month, but public finance is already assuming burdens in these respects so that any new burden will not entail entirely fresh obligations but will replace obligations which would arise in any case in the course of granting relief. Beyond this, the risks involved are likely to be small as, on balance, the $22 per month which I have suggested is probably below the average of the rents already being paid under conditions of overcrowding.

It is improbable that at least fifty per cent of the annual cost would not be collected. In this case the annual cost to the nation would be $1,305,000. Against possible liabilities may be set certain very real, if in some cases immeasurable, assets. Good housing means less expenditure on prevention of disease, less crime, greater benefit from education, less unemployability as opposed to unemployment. The elimination of bad conditions has a cash value as well as a moral value to the nation. Further, there are wider economic aspects to consider. The value of decent living conditions to the state has, in my opinion, been too little regarded by the country as a whole. Looking at this aspect from the purely selfish point of view as far as the state is concerned, and considering that upwards of sixty per cent of delinquents come from areas where improper housing obtains, and that a delinquent is a possible embryo criminal, one must face the possible cost to the state in this regard. Each delinquent is a possible liability that with proper housing and living conditions might be converted into a real asset.

The question of absorbing labour by industries catering to a home market becomes an important part of the attack on unemployment. A bold and constructive housing policy will have this effect and will increase employment both directly and indirectly through the activity generated. Tangible assets will be created while, to offset any liabilities on the national finances, the cost of unemployment will be directly reduced and the yield of income tax increased by the profits of those in building and allied industries as well as of those who benefit from the increased spending power of wage-earners employed through the scheme.

The conclusion is that an effort on the scale indicated would not prove in any way a strain on the nation's financial resources but would contribute materially to its economic recovery. It may be that these figures are not exact, but they are true enough to enable anyone to get a proper view of the serious condition existing as affecting thousands of families in this country who, through no fault of their own, are in one of the categories referred to, and also a view of a possible remedy.

I realize that many difficulties will have to be surmounted in dealing with this problem, but I do not think the problems are insurmountable. The question of competition with private landlords is a troublesome one, but as there is no great likelihood of a substitute program being commenced on a very large scale, this question will, no doubt, become clearer as time goes on.

A housing scheme in Toronto was carried out as the result of an appropriation made by parliament, I believe, about 1921, to relieve the housing shortage. The funds provided by federal authorities were relayed in this form to the provinces, thence to the municipalities and thence to a housing commission, which was set up at that time, not to be confused with the Toronto Housing Company. The money thus loaned to Toronto became a direct liability of the city. The enterprise has not been successful. We must bear in mind, however, that this housing scheme of 1921 was not a low cost housing scheme. That field of housing, in my mind, is not ordinarily to the same extent a basis for government assistance. That field is private enterprise where competition plays its full part.

The low cost housing field, as I have stated, is one in which the principal part that private enterprise can play is to keep going thousands of dilapidated, obsolete, broken down old houses. That is not compatible with a young, rich country like Canada with its great potential wealth and rapidly developing natural resources. The crying need of the moment is for a federal low cost housing policy that will serve the double purpose of replacing obsolete, dilapidated, low cost houses, and thereby creating much needed employment in building and allied trades and raising the standard of housing for thousands of families in this country, gaining all the economic, sociological advantages that such a change would bring about.

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

I hope the low cost housing problem will receive the earnest consideration of the government and hon. members. Broad and courageous action will bring, I believe, rich, economic and sociological returns. I understand the National Employment Commission and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) are giving this subject their careful thought.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques-Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in presenting this motion the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) made his explanations with his customary skill in debate and convincing eloquence. He dealt with the subject in a manner both thorough and sympathetic, and undoubtedly gained for his motion the support of the house, which is ever on the alert to cooperate in any movement likely to improve conditions for Canadians, especially those in unfortunate circumstances.

In his presentation the hon. member covered his subject so thoroughly that not very much remains to be said, and I should not have risen from my seat did I not believe it to be my duty to offer to my colleagues some suggestions which I believe to be constructive in the fight against slums.

In 1935 parliament adopted the Dominion Housing Act. The object of that legislation, as I understand it, was twofold. First, it was to help people already in possession of a small amount of money to borrow at reasonable rates and for a reasonable period the balance of the sum required to build their own homes, and thereby provide employment. As I have watched the application of the measure in my county I have come to the conclusion that the lending companies are not deeply interested in loans on houses costing less than $5,000, and for that reason people with small salaries are left out in the cold. An agent for the largest of these companies has explained to me that one of the difficulties was that houses in course of erection had to be inspected at least twice a week, and that where a house was being built fifteen or twenty miles from their head office the expense and loss of time in travelling to and fro was so considerable that they could not entertain proposals from other than the larger centres of the dominion. Nevertheless I do not make this statement as a criticism of the measure, because I believe this act was a step in the right direction. As its operations expand I am sure ways and means will be found of making it more useful. To a certain extent it will help the fight against slum conditions that the hon. member for Greenwood has begun to-day.

After passing the Dominion Housing Act we were asked to consider legislation to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes. That, too, was in my opinion a step in the right direction. I have discussed the matter with bank managers with whom I am acquainted, and hon. members will know how sympathetic they are towards would-be borrowers. May I add that at that time I was not a would-be borrower. These men told me that the act was working well, and that they were looking forward with confidence to even better results in the spring. Hon. members may be interested to learn, in passing, that for once in my life I had the privilege of refusing a loan from a bank, and certainly that gives one a thrill.

I submit that while these measures are praiseworthy, if we are to avoid the prevalence of slums we must take steps to stop their increase. One of our first duties should be to help the small home owner to retain his home. When the previous administration introduced the Dominion Housing Act I believe it was received as good legislation. I submit, however, that they put the cart before the horse. In the first instance we had legislation to encourage people to build houses, and later legislation was introduced to encourage the repair of existing houses; but nothing is done for the poor fellow who has a house and who should be encouraged to keep it.

In his eloquent presentation the hon. member for Greenwood referred to the value of the home. All hon. members know its value, and it need not be described in terms of poetry or statistics. We know what the home means, and I for one believe that if we are to go ahead with social legislation of this kind something must be done to help small home owners to retain their ownership. It is my humble opinion that every citizen should own his own home just as he owns his own clothes.

It is said that in the sixteenth century when Francis I, King of France, was planning to send navigators westward to explore the then newly discovered America, representations were made to him that the Spaniards and Portuguese were already in possession. It is reported that the witty King of France, Francis I, known as le roi chevalier, the knight king, replied, "Well, I should like to see the article in Adam's testament which has willed the whole or any part of America to the Spaniards or Portuguese." As regards the ownership of houses or land, I should like to see the article in the same testament which has willed all the good things of this life, including the earth and homes, to just a few privileged people. If when the king of France on that occasion referred to America he had known how conditions in America would develop, I believe he would have been surprised, and most certainly would have agreed that the good things in this country should not be the property of only a more fortunate class.

Hon. members may say it is easy for me or for any other hon. member to make a suggestion as to how best to preserve our homes. I know that if I made a suggestion my good friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) would meet me with his blue pencil and say, "How do you propose to do it?" Let me admit at the outset that I am not a great financier. Possibly if I were a great financier such as Sir Herbert Holt, Mr. Wood or Mr. Gundy I might carry more weight when speaking to this honourable chamber, but even as a small financier I have a little plan I should like to present. It is not very long, nor is it difficult to follow. If the preceding government and the present one can find means of producing money for those intending to build or to repair homes, why could not the same provisions be widened so as to include those who want to keep their homes? The government could undertake the responsibility for a small proportion of the loans, just as is being done under the Dominion Housing Act, or under the legislation to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes.

I am told that bank deposits have reached a record high. It is well known that every day insurance companies receive large fortunes through the payment of premiums. Trust companies have huge funds to invest. The banks have had to lower their interest rates as an inducement for people to borrow. The money is available, and might be had, and the beneficial effect of helping small home owners would be tremendous. The first care of the owner is that of taxes, and the second is that of interest on the mortgage. If an owner paid his taxes the money would go to the municipality, which, in turn, would pay its loan to the bank, thereby causing the money to circulate.

I do not wish to be sectional in my observations, but hon. members are no doubt familiar with the small rentiers of the province of Quebec. These people have a few thousand dollars invested in their small properties; the money is out at fairly reasonable rates of interest, and when they do not get the interest they are ruined and have to go on relief. I speak for two classes, namely those who have homes they want to retain, and the small rentiers who are trying to keep their savings loaned on mortgages. I hope some way may be found to help both classes, and I am sure the minister will give his best attention to any suggestion which is made. In case hon. members may say this suggestion has nothing to do with slum clearance as proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood, I say it has a lot to do with it. It would stop the ever-increasing number of people who are forced to go on relief. I know it has always been said of the people of Canada that everyone should stand on his own feet and fight his own battles. If the present conditions were applicable only to Canada, then I would say there was something wrong, but they are applicable to the whole world. I have no doubt that the government is doing its best to overcome these conditions.

Let us go a step further and try to help this one class which deserves every possible encouragement. I refer to the small home owners. I support the motion to that extent. I hope that speakers who follow me, and who no doubt will be better qualified than I am, will particularly discuss this point, because I believe its merits are obvious.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) on his manner of presenting the resolution now before the house. I take it that the resolution itself and the hon. member's presentation of it constitute approval of the steps which the government has taken and is attempting to take in connection with this very important matter. I was pleased indeed to note that while the subject lends itself to eloquence—my hon. friend was indeed eloquent—he did not allow his eloquence to carry him away from the practical considerations and realities of the situation. I refer particularly to his recognition of the fact that complete jurisdiction with respect to this problem does not rest in this chamber or in this parliament.

From the time of confederation all measures with respect to the building of houses have been provincial laws or municipal bylaws passed under authority of provincial legislation. We might as well face that fact. Recently we have been put in our place by a very high authority with respect to our powers. Our powers with regard to matters of this kind are limited very largely to paying out the money of all the people of Canada for the benefit of some of the people of Canada, under conditions which are largely affected if not governed by provincial jurisdiction. I am not for one moment saying that we should not assist in the national interest. My purpose in rising was rather to give some information to the house with respect to the working out during its short history of the present Dominion Housing Act.

While the Dominion Housing Act was placed upon the statute books before this administration came into office, in the nature of things it was not at all active. In fact the first loan was made under its provisions in September, 1935. The information I am about to give may be regarded as a year's experience in developing the provisions of the present housing act. Up to the end of January, 1,119 family units had been provided for under the terms of the act. The term "family unit" is used because, as hon. members know, the act applies not only to individual houses but to duplexes and moderate sized apartment buildings. The only way to get any appreciation of the working of the act was to deal with it on the basis of family units. These 1,119 family units were provided at a cost of $5,376,000.

Our experience has been one of endeavouring, through administrative methods and in cooperation with the lending institutions which have entered into agreements under the law, to develop means of overcoming the manifest weaknesses which developed as a result of experience. I am not claiming for one moment that all weaknesses have been overcome. After endeavouring to administer the act during last year I do say that I believe it contains the framework within which can be fitted many very useful housing schemes. We have been compelled to modify the regulations in certain particulars. Having regard to what I said a few moments ago, we must remember that we are operating by agreement.

The major part of the money is supplied by the lending institutions which must comply with the conditions of the act. But these lending institutions are not compelled to lend. I do not think any housing scheme in England, Sweden, Canada or anywhere else is based upon the lender being compelled to lend. There are in existence direct governmental housing schemes in which the element of compulsion by political pressure is present, but in none of the schemes which have been advanced and discussed in this house or which have been considered as suggesting anything useful for our purposes has there been the provision that the lender is compelled to lend. I think everyone will concede that such a principle could not be developed.

On the other hand, the degree of willingness on the part of the lender to lend with reasonable freedom is one of the most vital features of the plan. We have had considerable experience in this regard during the past year. Many members of the house have communicated with me and indicated that in their particular locality, especially in what might be called the smaller communities as distinguished from our great cities, the lending institutions are unwilling to lend under the terms of the act. As a result of investigation and discussion with some of the lending institutions we found that in some cases the objection was to the extremely heavy local taxation which, in the opinion of the lender, rendered his loan unsafe. In other cases objection was raised to the cost of inspecting a few loans. This matter was referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Mallette). The lending institutions found the expense so great as not to warrant their embarking on the granting of loans in these small communities. An endeavour was made to meet this situation and also to meet the complaint that the scheme did not encourage the building of low cost homes, that it operated rather to encourage what might be called the middle field of residential buildings. An effort was made to meet that, partly by the architectural competition held last spring for designs for low cost houses, but mainly by the changes in administration which were made last September by order in council under the authority of the act, designed to encourage the lending institutions to make loans for low cost homes and to make loans in the smaller and more remote communities. In the order in council, authority was secured to bear a greater share of the loss and of the special expenses made in making these two classes of loans—the small loans, and loans in small communities. The original formula for allocating losses was modified. Wherever the lending institution made an 80 per cent loan for an amount of $4,000 or less, the dominion government agreed to bear 80 per cent of the loss in the case of such loans up to $3,000, 75 per cent of the loss where the loan exceeded $3,000 but did not exceed $3,500, and 70 per cent of the loss where the loan exceeded $3,500 but did not exceed $4,000. The effect of this order in council is now becoming more visible, particularly in the erection of the lower cost houses. The average cost per house since the scheme was inaugurated has been $4,861. Obviously that is high. That is not a low cost house. But as evidence of the greater development since September last, as a result of the order in council to which I am referring, I might point out that ninety-nine family units were built in the month of January, and the average cost of the whole ninety-nine was $4,123, a drop in the average for the whole scheme from $4,861 to $4,123, greater emphasis being placed, as these figures show, upon the lower cost unit.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the minister be good enough to state in what parts of Canada these houses were constructed? Was it pretty much all over the country or was it concentrated in any particular areas?

Mr. DUNNING: I could give it by provinces and the figures for some of the larger cities, but it is a pretty long list.

Mr. MASSEY: Just generally.

Mr. DUNNING: In Ontario the number of family units is 472; Quebec, 503; New Brunswick, 13; Nova Scotia, 101; Prince Edward Island, 6; Manitoba, 13; Saskatchewan, nil; Alberta, nil; British Columbia, 11.

With respect to the lower cost houses, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) with respect to Sweden's experience. I have read quite a bit regarding their scheme. While I have not had the privilege, as my hon. friend had this summer of seeing it, I have, as I am sure he has, studied most of the authorities with regard to it, and I was particularly interested in my hon. friend's citation of figures with respect to the rental cost. I take it he was referring to the lowest cost plan now in force in Sweden in the city of Stockholm.

Mr. MASSEY: Correct.

Mr. DUNNING: And the rental cost was $20?

Mr. MASSEY: Twenty dollars a month for the first ten years; $17.50 for the next ten years, and $7.50 for the last ten years.

Mr. DUNNING: And that included taxes?

Mr. MASSEY: It included everything one can think of, even chimney sweeping.

Mr. DUNNING: The only comparison I can make of what is possible under the Dominion Housing Act is to say that an approved house—that is, all the specifications have been approved by the housing administration of the Department of Finance—containing a living room, kitchen, bathroom, three bedrooms, full basement, central heating, insulated and well constructed—incidentally, the criticism that we have had is that our specifications are too stiff—can be built on an average lot for approximately $2,700. An eighty per cent mortgage would amount to $2,160, leaving an equity of $540 to be supplied by the owner. There is the difficulty.

The monthly cost to pay interest and amortise the principal on that house would be $14.12. I submit that $14.12 to amortise a house of that kind puts it definitely in the category of low cost housing.

Mr. MASSEY: It does not include taxation?

Mr. DUNNING: I am just coming to the joker. The main reason why people who have $500, and who could get a home of that kind of which they would be proud, are not going into the scheme, is not because of any interest factor, not because the $14.12 per month is too much for them, but because the local taxes are what they are, and again I say that is within provincial and municipal jurisdiction.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister stated that the house including the lot could be built for $2,700, and that it comprised six rooms, fully modern. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DUNNING: I prefer my own description, if my hon. friend does not mind, because I know it is accurate. I shall give the description again: "Low cost housing plans have recently been approved"—it is definite, you see—"for a house which can be built in many sections of Canada at a cost of $2,400." I allowed in my statement, when I said $2,700, $300 for the lot. This house contains living room, kitchen, bathroom, three bedrooms, full basement, central heating system. It is also insulated and well constructed.

Mr. HEAPS: With full plumbing?

Mr. DUNNING: I said bathroom. I do not know how one could have a bath without plumbing.

Mr. HEAPS: That is all right, but the cost seems to me extremely low. I have had some experience in housing, and if it can be done at that price it is a revelation to me.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall not dispute with my hon. friend regarding it. I simply say that these matters are necessarily under continual study by the housing administrator, who is a qualified architect. I have already said that one of the criticisms we are receiving is that our specifications are too stiff. At the same time we are anxious, as I put it, not to start building new slums with dominion government aid. We must have minimum standards and decent homes. But one cannot expect a rush to build under a scheme which rests, as I pointed out, on a degree of willingness on the part of private lenders to co-operate. We have not had 100 per cent co-operation in that regard; I admit it frankly.

A number of the great insurance companies have cooperated splendidly, in working under the Dominion Housing Act. Others have not. May I say for the benefit of those who complain of what great corporations do or refuse to do that the least cooperation we have had has been from the local financial institutions in various parts of Canada. The local institutions have not cooperated under the dominion housing scheme to anything like the same extent as the great insurance companies doing business from coast to coast in Canada have done.

I do not intend to take a great deal of time, Mr. Speaker, but I did think it was due the house to be advised of the progress which has been made under the present housing act. Without claiming that it is perfect, I believe that it can be developed at a much greater rate. One of the insurance companies states definitely that it has now five hundred loans in sight for spring building; another company states that it can see two hundred loans coming, from the maritime provinces alone, relating to spring work. One company submitted, on February 3, thirteen loans, all in Nova Scotia. That is an indication of the way in which the use of the act is growing. With respect to growth, I might point out that in the first six months the total amount involved was only $810,000; in the second six months it jumped to $3,037,000, nearly four times as much, and the final quarter of 1936 showed an amount four times as large as during the corresponding quarter of 1935. Of course this is not a great quick-acting hundred million dollar over-night scheme. But I submit that, having regard to the fact that it is wholly experimental, that administrative regulations had to be developed, agreements entered into with all sorts of lending institutions for working under it, and difficulties ironed out from day to day and week to week, $5,300,000 worth of building under the scheme constitutes a fair start. And while we are talking of greater schemes and plans for slum clearance and the rest, I hope the house will not overlook the fact that we have within the four corners of the Dominion Housing Act a possibility of steady, sound growth along lines which will do a great deal of good if we can keep up reasonable cooperation on the part of lenders and if we can deal with the problems associated with loaning in the smaller and more remote communities. There is a very considerable development along that line since the regulation was changed with respect to the cost of inspection. If we can do these things we are accomplishing something, having regard to the fact I stated at the outset, that while all that flows from bad housing constitutes a national problem, the authority which deals with housing is not in this chamber but in the legislature of each province.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly.

Mr. LAWSON: I wanted to seek some information in connection with his last statement. Has the minister or the government considered whether there would be any question of jurisdiction if, let us say, the government of Canada through a statute of this parliament, and authorized by this parliament, proceeded to build one hundred houses in any given community? Does any question of jurisdiction enter into that? It is true that the provinces have jurisdiction with respect to property and civil rights, but surely the dominion government can build houses just as they can a public building if they want to.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot give an answer to a lawyer, but my impression would be that the dominion would have to comply with provincial law with respect to the building of those houses.

Mr. LAWSON: Unquestionably.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, that, of course, is the whole point. I do not deny that this government can give out money, but I am finding it more important than I formerly thought it to be that we should have jurisdiction over what we spend money on. I am finding that particularly in connection with old age pensions, a well intentioned piece of legislation on the part of the dominion, worked out, because of the provincial jurisdiction involved, by means of agreements between the dominion and the provinces. Rather more than a year ago the administration of that legislation was turned over to the Department of Finance. During the coming year it is not going to be an easy task to iron out the difficulties which have arisen, and they rest solely upon the point that we are spending seventy-five per cent of the money but the provinces have the jurisdiction in the administration; we deal with them only by agreement; we can deal with them by withholding that which we agreed to pay, but that is not a very satisfactory method of working out a partnership arrangement. I do not want to be too emphatic on this; I am sure my hon. friend realizes the force of the point as well as I do.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): I wish first to congratulate the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey) upon his excellent speech. I was sorry that he was not in the house from 1929 and on to make speeches like that, but I am very glad that he is here now and that he has spoken as he has.

I think we all know now that the time for governments to spend or to encourage spending along such lines as housing is in the depths of a depression. Much as I appreciate the speech just concluded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and glad as I am that the housing act has been followed up by one providing for a renovation of buildings, I am sure that as we get further away from the depression expenditures by governments will be less useful. We ought to have gone early into the housing problem. The scheme should have been ready when the depression started so that we could have gone on with it at the time when the greatest need for employment existed, and there was just as much need for housing then as there is now. However, it is easy to say that; let us bear in mind the days that are to come. When conditions are good is not the time for governments to spend, because individuals are then doing it, but rather when depression comes making extensive individual spending impossible, government activity should greatly increase. I believe that Canada is at least a decade behind the times in evolving or setting up a housing act. I am glad we have it now.

The Minister of Finance touched upon something which we all know is true, when he said that the most difficult problem is to get houses for the low wage groups, whether they are workers who receive a pay envelope or those who live on farms or in smaller communities. Even yet there has not been evolved a plan whereunder people with low wages can be assured of good housing. When we are considering the cost of housing we should be willing, and I think we are, to subtract from that expenditure a good portion of the cost of sanatoria, of hospitalization, of reformatories, of gaols and of penitentiaries, because it need not be proved from the authorities that poor housing leads to poor health and crime and all the allied difficulties and charges they entail. The cost of good housing is never too great, since the better the housing, at any rate up to a reasonable standard, the less will be the costs in these other directions.

I noticed in to-day's Montreal Gazette a statement made by the Child Welfare Association in these words:

Inadequate incomes, poor housing conditions, tuberculosis and lack of understanding regarding nutritional and mental health needs, are the problems faced to-day by those who are seeking to improve the health of the community.

I am not going to deal particularly with Canadian housing conditions, because that has been well done, and we have available to everybody a series of pamphlets published by the Social Service Council of Canada on that subject, as well as the report of the Bruce commission. But I want to take a few minutes to tell the house something about housing as I saw it in Sweden this summer. I was not able to be in Sweden as long as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey)—

Mr. MARTIN: Were you there together?

Miss MACPHAIL: No, nor at the same time, I am sorry to say. But I was very much struck by the housing enterprises, and spent a good deal of time seeing them. It is hardly believable that one third of the city of Stockholm has been rebuilt since 1921 as part of the tremendous building program by which Sweden sought to overcome the depression. That was a building program which in my opinion was carried on at the right time. They went through the small depression, as we did, from 1921 to 1924, and seeing that they might again need an extensive program of public works, when the better times came between 1924 and 1929 they prepared very carefully for public works which would carry them through the next depression. They called them in many cases reserve projects. Not all were of a housing nature, but so much rebuilding was done that one-third of the whole city has been built or rebuilt since 1921.

Mr. ROGERS: By the government, or by private enterprise?

Miss MACPHAIL: In all sorts of ways—some by federal assistance, some by municipalities entirely, and some by cooperatives.

Mr. DUNNING: Some entirely cooperative.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, some by cooperatives entirely. Even yet housing in Stockholm is not particularly cheap; it is a difficult city for building. To begin with, it is built on fourteen islands; it is rocky; the cost of the numerous bridges and of the blasting necessary in making excavation makes it expensive, and housing was too dear. That I think is one reason why they have developed such splendid cooperative schemes, because it is not so long ago that housing cost almost fifty per cent of the average income, which was much too high a proportion. This led to a great deal of investigation. They went into several schemes. They have studied housing needs much more thoroughly, I think, than we have. They do not consider that all who want houses have families of about the same size. One thing I found very interesting was that they have houses for elderly people of slender means, started by what they call the flower fund. Instead of sending flowers to show respect at a time of bereavement, people send to the flower fund and with that fund apartment houses have been built for elderly couples. These apartment houses have a central dining room, and trained nurses in attendance. That is a scheme by itself. They are good-looking apartment houses, built particularly for the sort of people who occupy them.

Then I went through some apartment houses built to accommodate five hundred families, who had three or more children. The federal government was anxious that children should not be raised in slums, with resulting ill health and juvenile delinquency. Working with a cooperative concern they build apartments for families of different sizes. Where the parents cannot support the children as the state thinks they should be supported, for a family of three the state, that is, the federal government, pays thirty per cent of the rent. If the family consists of four children the government supply forty per cent of the rent, and for families of five they supply fifty per cent. The H.S.B. house agent who showed us through these particular apartment houses said that on October 1 five hundred such families who were all being assisted by the federal government would move in.

Mr. ROGERS: In speaking of the federal government does my hon. friend mean the national government?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, the national government. The agent said further that they planned to accommodate 2,500 such families in Stockholm in the next year or two.

In Sweden over twenty-five per cent of all married women in Stockholm work outside the home. They have built houses designed for such families. In connection with the apartment house there is a nursery, which is complete or separate except that it is in the house. There are facilities to care for the children, sleeping rooms, play rooms and kitchen for the preparing of three meals daily for the children, and a trained nurse in attendance. The particular one that I visited had a central dining room, and a gymnasium which the families in the house could use not only as a gymnasium but also as a concert and lecture hall.

I suppose the best known cooperative concern for house-building in Sweden is the Tenants Savings Bank and Building Society, known to all the people in Sweden as H.S.B. They build three kinds of houses, known as the A, B and C types. In the A type house the person who is going to occupy the apartment—to purchase it really, because they can purchase apartments as well as houses—

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, the H.S.B. does not build houses, but apartments?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, cooperative apartments.

Mr. MASSEY: They are starting houses this year.

Miss MACPHAIL: A person buying an apartment pays ten per cent down if he wants one of the A type, five per cent down for the B type, and for the C type he pays no deposit at all. The remainder of the purchase price for an A type is apportioned between the city and the state and a private lending company. It is such a mixture of cooperation and private ownership and government assistance that you can hardly tell where one begins and the other ends.

Then this H.S.B. had what I thought a very interesting scheme, and certainly a very useful one. The tenant gets six per cent interest annually on that deposit. If he chooses he need not accept six per cent but can take five per cent and let one per cent go as a premium of insurance which will provide on the death of the wage earner for the return of the entire deposit and annual rent reduction for the family is reduced by twenty per cent, thus providing security which is not provided here.

I visited one group of these H.S.B. houses where there were eight parallel blocks, built north and south so that both sides were open to the sunlight at different times of the day. Each block was separated from others by quite a wide grass plot. Each contained one hundred apartments, mostly one and two rooms with kitchenette and bath. But I should say that in Sweden what they call a two-room apartment is almost equivalent to what would be called four rooms here, because they always have a couple of extra entries or small rooms which are not counted in calling it a two-room apartment. These apartments were occupied by people earning small salaries, but they were very modern. They had laundries and drying rooms; they even had a very neat coffee room in the basement where the women who were doing the laundry could go in and make coffee. It was part dining room and part kitchen, and was a very nice place.

The cost of these blocks of which I am speaking was very moderate. The cost of what they call a one-room apartment with kitchen and bath, which would be equivalent to what we would call a two-room apartment, was about $240 a year, with the larger ones coming higher. In addition they have to pay small sums for the laundry and the nursery. The cost of gas and electricity is not included in the figures I have given. The occupants were mostly skilled workmen receiving from 3,500 to 4,500 kroner per year, that is from $875 to $1,120. The corporation of Stockholm, in some cases I believe in cooperation with the government of Sweden, seems anxious to induce people to go into houses rather than into apartments.

Mr. DUNNING: Did the hon. member see the magic houses?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, I was just going to speak of those. We spent the better part of two days looking into magic houses. Certainly they go up like magic; some of them, as far as the framework is concerned, are put up almost in a day. To induce people to go into them the houses had to be relatively cheaper than the apartments, so that the first thing the corporation of Stockholm did was to purchase large tracts of land beyond the city limits, which they then surveyed and laid out in streets. Water mains and sewers were installed and gas and electricity provided for. The projects are called garden cities, and in no case is the land sold; the leasehold is given for sixty years, the occupier paying an annual ground rent amounting to five per cent of the value of the site. In some cases rather expensive homes were put up financed by private money, but what was called the magic house was really a low priced house, almost a cottage, with a nice garden plot, for people of small means.

The corporation of Stockholm employed architects who designed many types of these cheaper houses. Then they prepared standardized material, and the workman who wanted such a house could start building it with practically no cash deposit.

Mr. DUNNING: He contributed his labour.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes. He has to undertake, under the supervision of an architect, to construct the house. He goes to the warehouses where all this material is kept, selects what he needs and brings it to the lot, and usually starts the construction of the house by having a bee. He gets as many as possible of his friends to come in the morning, and they start putting up the framework of the house. We saw one house they started that morning. We were in it before six o'clock in the evening and the framework was almost finished; the rafters were on for the roof. After that the man may hire some of his friends, or they may trade work back and forth. They try to get the outside work all done in the summer time. In the fall and winter they do the interior work, the painting and so on. Possibly both the man and his wife who are building this house have other jobs, so they can do the painting and other finishing work only when they are not busy with their regular occupations.

I was in many of the houses, and some of them are really beautiful. As a rule they are nicely furnished, because the Swedes are a very clean people with a fine sense of beauty. A four-room cottage of the kind I am now describing costs about 11,400 kroner or about $2,850. What they call landscape architects are also employed by the city to design the grounds to fit in with the house. I saw some of the raw houses where the grounds were not finished; I saw some houses where the gardens had been started, and I also saw houses where the gardens were three or four years old. These last were really beautiful, though I could hardly say that all the houses were beautiful. Some of them were pretty ugly, but they were all very comfortable.

There were many things to show how proud they were of their houses. I remember the pride with which they showed us all through, pointing out all the details. They were anxious that the H.S.B. man should let us see how splendid the housing project was. Not long ago I read an article in the Toronto Saturday Night, written by the hon. member for Greenwood, in which the hon. member mentioned the fact that these people had pride of ownership. In fact one man had a sign outside, reading "Small, but mine own."

Mr. DUNNING: About how many houses have been built under that plan?

Miss MACPHAIL: It must run into thousands. There are ever so many garden cities at different points surrounding Stockholm.

Mr. DUNNING: All under the same plan?

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes. Certainly they never will become slums; the pride of ownership will prevent that. I did not see any indication that there was not as much pride of ownership in the apartments, but there is something about walking out of your own door into your own garden that you cannot get in an apartment. But in their wisdom the Swedes have tried to fill this gap in the life of people who dwell in apartments. In both Denmark and Sweden, as a matter of fact, anyone living in an apartment can, if he wishes, have a garden plot on the outskirts of the city, with a garden house on the plot. They are really things of great beauty, because roses grow very easily in both these countries. The garden house is often as pretty a little place as any summer house could be. Of course it is very small, it is intended only for holidays and Sundays, when the apartment dweller comes to enjoy his garden.

I did feel, after visiting Denmark and Sweden in particular, that in matters of housing and health, as in many other things, they were setting a pace for all other countries, and I think we have a great deal to learn from their experience. I do not say that we could do just what they have done, because conditions are different here, but I do think that if we start off by thinking that good housing for all the people is the greatest national investment we can make, we will be able to overcome all the obstacles that stand in the way of the realization of that objective.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return immediately to the question I suggested to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). It seems to me that in matters of jurisdiction we are so often inclined to consider the question in regard to some involved scheme whereby the dominion in cooperation with the provinces, or the dominion in cooperation with the lending agencies, or the dominion in cooperation with somebody else, should do this, that or the other thing. I should like to suggest—and I am just making only a suggestion in that regard—that when the Minister of Finance is considering the housing problem, as apparently he is considering it, he might have advice from the Department of Justice with respect to a simple scheme, somewhat along the lines I am going to suggest.

Let me assume that the government introduced into the parliament of Canada, either by way of amendment to the present housing act—which the minister thinks has some virtue—or by a new act, a dominion housing scheme under which a commission was appointed; the government borrowed and advanced money to that commission with which to build houses; the commission constructed, in any particular province or municipality, so many houses which it sold on a rental basis plan, such as has been outlined by the minister this afternoon, as to monthly payments. Under such a scheme would there be any question as to the jurisdiction of such a housing commission appointed by parliament to carry on?

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member permit me to answer?

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I can give an illustration by pointing out that the people who bought or rented those houses would immediately be subject to provincial and local taxation which, as I was indicating, is the big handicap in developing any housing scheme to-day. We could not control that.

Mr. LAWSON: I realize that, but the quantum of taxation has nothing in the world to do with the question of the jurisdiction of this parliament to do something. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member is distinguishing between slum clearance and low cost housing.

Mr. LAWSON: I care not whether a distinction is drawn.

Mr. ROGERS: But on the point of jurisdiction surely there is a distinction.

Mr. LAWSON: The only suggestion I would make to the minister in connection with jurisdiction would be that of creating a certain number of low cost houses, if the government were so inclined, after investigation.

Mr. ROGERS: But slum clearance brings up the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. LAWSON: Unquestionably. What brought it to my mind was the excellent information given the house this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I should not wish one word of mine to detract from the laudable objective behind the resolution before the house, but I do feel that there is a correlative problem which any government should consider and with respect to which it should act concurrently, in dealing with any housing problem. I refer to the matter mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) who gave expression to an idea which I had in mind.

Frequently in the house I have heard reference to the forgotten man. Usually, when that expression is used, we refer to the taxpayer. I have frequently thought, however, that if there is one man who is more forgotten than all other forgotten men, it is the home owner who has been burdened by direct municipal taxation, as outlined by the Minister of Finance this afternoon.

Mr. FACTOR: And who is paying high rates of interest.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, and paying high rates of interest. I shall touch upon that point later. As I see it, the difficulty has been that the municipality has had only two sources of taxation, one property and the other income. In their wisdom, some of the provinces have seen fit to take from the municipalities the power to tax income, and hence the whole burden of taxation in the municipality is to-day almost a direct tax upon real property. Unless some readjustment is made with respect to taxation between municipalities and provinces, I say seriously that in my opinion a tremendous number of urban and suburban municipalities cannot possibly survive. I realize that is not a problem for this parliament, but I suggest that in any scheme which may be considered or brought down by the Minister of Finance or the government, we should be careful to make sure that by legislation we do not place any additional burden by way of property tax on the home owner in a municipality.

May I illustrate how such a burden could be created. Let us assume that a scheme has been in effect, and that to-morrow we go into municipality A to build one hundred or one thousand new homes. In all probability the streets which we would lay out and upon which we would build the homes would not have local improvements. The new houses would have to be serviced with water service, sewers, roadways and sidewalks. In Ontario and, I believe, in two other provinces only a proportion of the cost of those new local improvements would be assessed against the house receiving the benefit. A proportion of the cost of local improvements, usually about twenty-five per cent, is spread over the whole municipality, and creates an additional burden upon the man who already owns a home in the municipality.

I believe it is incumbent upon the house to take care that in legislation we do not create an additional burden. This afternoon the minister outlined the progress being made under the Dominion Housing Act. A few days ago he indicated his hopes and aspirations as to what might be accomplished in providing employment through the new measure for the renovation of homes. I am thoroughly confident that neither of these measures will meet with the success I believe the minister anticipates. I say they will not for two reasons: One, that literally thousands of people in Canada are losing homes they now have and, two, the burden of direct property tax, which I have already mentioned.

To a great extent Canada is a nation of home owners. In looking over the most recent census figures, I was surprised to observe that of all urban and suburban householders in Canada in 1931 approximately 47 per cent were home owners. In my own province of Ontario, of all suburban and urban house holders approximately 52½ per cent are home owners. It is for these people that I plead with the minister this afternoon. In literally hundreds of cases working men in Canada have purchased or built homes in days when they had full pay envelopes and a reasonable measure of prosperity. In many cases that was done by dint of frugal living, saving and hard work. Then came the depression. Because of diminishing pay envelopes and, in some instances, envelopes which ceased to be received, and by reason of heavy municipal taxation plus a high interest rate to which reference was made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Factor), hundreds of these people have lost their homes, and thousands to-day are in danger of losing them. In many instances interest rates ran as high as seven or eight per cent. I suggest that it is not going to avail us much if we clean up one slum only to create another, and I urge that in any scheme under consideration, care should be taken of those home owners who are likely to lose their homes.

I am not so sure that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier is feasible. However, if I may, I should like to make one, although the minister may not think my suggestion is feasible.

Mr. DUNNING: I realize this is a difficult question, and I am looking for ideas.

Mr. LAWSON: The former government passed two pieces of legislation, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Farm Loan Act. A combination of those two measures enabled the harassed farmer to remain upon his farm and to get a reasonable adjustment of his debts. Under the aegis of the farm loan board he was enabled to borrow money at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish it worked that way, but it did not.

Mr. LAWSON: I can only say that while I have received complaints from persons who had loans on farms concerning rates of interest being reduced, nevertheless every time I talk to any people associated with the administration of the acts I meet enthusiasm. Every time I talk to a fellow who happens to be a debtor instead of a creditor, he seems to have got some relief.

Mr. DUNNING: When I said it did not work that way, I meant the combination of the two acts, that the combining of the two did not prove successful.

Mr. LAWSON: I believe a combination of an adaptation of these two acts would salvage thousands of homes for home owners in our urban and suburban municipalities. I am not one of those who will rise in his place in parliament and urge upon a government of which I do not happen to be a member that it should embark upon some wild scheme which cannot be financed on a sound basis. However, I do believe there are thousands of homes in this country that could be saved if the means were made available to the home owners to have their loans readjusted at a low rate of interest which it would be possible for the dominion to provide. If a home owner could have his payments amortised and if he were given a short space of time, say six months or a year, before he had to start making his first payment, he would be able to save his home.

I am quite willing to admit that in some cases the payments would not be met, but I doubt whether there would be many cases where losses would occur. The loan on the average house would not be such that it could not ultimately be got out of the property. Do not think for a moment I am suggesting that we endeavour to save the home of a man who has a first mortgage of $3,000 and a second mortgage of $1,500 on a home for which he paid $5,000 in boom days.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the fellow who needs help the most.

Mr. LAWSON: I am not so sure that it is. The man who needs it the most—I could take the minister to hundreds of them in the riding I represent—is the man who has either built his own little home or bought it, and over a period of five, ten or fifteen years has been paying out of his wages in order to obtain an equity of ownership in that home. That is the man to whom I want consideration given. Even if some losses were incurred under such a scheme, I believe it would be worth it. We shall never have any finer citizens in this country than the home owners. Show me a nation of home owners and I shall show you a nation that will progress to new heights by evolution and never be torn asunder by revolution. The home owner is the stakeholder in this country. It is for him that I make my plea. Laudable and desirable though it may be that we should have housing schemes, I suggest to the minister that if any such schemes are to be proposed, he consider concurrently and endeavour to bring in legislation which will give relief to the home owners whose problem I have tried to outline in the last few minutes.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, this subject seems to have resolved itself more or less into a matter of finance. The question has been covered thoroughly from many angles and in my remarks I shall endeavour to avoid repeating what has been said already. The Dominion Fire Prevention Association prepared a statement of certain facts which was read at the convention of the maritime provinces chiefs of fire departments held at Kentville, Nova Scotia, on July 15, 1936. The statement reads as follows:

Sixty-five per cent of our people now live in houses of the cheapest construction, ill equipped and poorly adapted to obvious needs—and one-quarter of the families of the dominion live in accommodations of three rooms or less, while nearly 160,000 families live in one and two room dwellings lacking sanitary conveniences and efficient heating—investigation has revealed.

My purpose in taking part in this debate is to endeavour to prove conclusively, from figures taken from the Canada Year Book and the Labour Gazette, that it is financially impossible for nearly ninety-five per cent of the people of Canada to build themselves homes, even of the cheapest type. Among the facts that should not be ignored in any attempt to solve the housing problem is the social and economic condition of the people. One out of every ten of the entire population of Canada is existing on relief at the present time. Notwithstanding their needs, these people cannot hope to change their living conditions. Of the remainder of the population who are permanently employed, the average earnings are less than $18 per week. If I understood the hon. member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Mallette) correctly, he said that there was sufficient money in the country somewhere to provide loans for the building of these homes. I should like to place on Hansard a statement which will show where some of this money is at the present time. I direct attention to a report in the Edmonton Bulletin of September 12, 1936, of a statement by Mr. W. A. Bog, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, with reference to deposits in the chartered banks of Canada. The report says:

"The two greatest depositories for the savings of Canadians in all walks of life are the banks and insurance companies," declared W. A. Bog, general manager, at the bank of Montreal's annual meeting.

Continuing, he said: "There were on 31st October, 1935, over 4,600,000 depositors in the chartered banks with deposits aggregating $2,090,508,000, representing an average of about $450 for each account. It is estimated that there are 3,500,000 life insurance policy holders in Canada and that the assets by which this insurance is protected amount to over $2,000,000,000.

A great part of these funds belonging to depositors and policy holders is invested in securities. The protection of the savings of Canadians, built up so laboriously and with such self denial over the course of years to ensure a measure of security in old age or to provide for dependants after death, is and always has been the first consideration of this bank and should also be that of all government authorities. In most instances, these savings are not large and a loss of only a small portion of the principal is sufficient in many cases to bring want and anxiety.

Any policy which would tend to weaken the sanctity of contracts is to be deprecated as, in addition to harming those who can least afford to bear losses, such a policy would strike at the very core of our economic order, for when there is lack of confidence, a slakening of business activity takes place, bringing unemployment in its train."

Without an investigation of the truth of the statement that the average deposit in the chartered banks is $450, it might convey the idea that we are becoming fairly prosperous. Nothing is further from the truth, as regards both the average depositor and prosperity in general. The article stresses the fact that we must not lose confidence; but how can we have confidence, especially in our banking system, when we can so easily detect this thinly disguised effort to deceive us by not giving all the facts? If one turns to page 910 of the year book of 1936, one will find a statement of deposits as at October 31, 1935. They are segregated in this manner: There were 4,290,695 depositors, having on deposit $501,881,610, grouped as having less than $1,000 each; 302,743 depositors, having on deposit $598,611,600, grouped as having $1,000 to $5,000 each; 41,815 depositors, having on deposit $376,319,432, grouped as having $5,000 to $25,000 each; 4,402 depositors, having on deposit $199,461,844, grouped as having $25,000 to $100,000 each; 1,223 depositors, having on deposit $407,229,739, grouped as having over $100,000 each.

These figures become even more significant when taken as averages. They show that 92⅝ per cent of the depositors in our chartered banks have an average deposit of $117, or 24 per cent of the entire deposits; 6¼ per cent average $1,977, or 28½ per cent; one per cent average $8,760, or 18 per cent; one-tenth of one per cent average $45,311, or 9½ per cent; one-thirty-eighth of one per cent average $33,976, or 20 per cent. Approximately 7⅜ per cent of the depositors own 76 per cent of the deposits. So there should be no difficulty in understanding why at least 92⅝ per cent of our population cannot take advantage of the house building plan. If for no other reason it is because they are minus the owner's equity of 20 per cent.

Now let us consider the wages of various groups to ascertain if the wages are sufficient to cover living expenses and leave a surplus enough for the repayment of a loan as provided by the housing plan. At pages 708 and 709 of the Labour Gazette for August, 1936, are given statistics collected by the bureau of statistics and taken from MacLeans Building Reports for 1934, as follows:

Construction Trades

	Employees	Average wages
Construction and trade contractors and sub-contractors	37,561	$745
Cities, towns, villages, municipalities	49,946	385
Harbour commissions	1,137	882
Provincial government departments	44,810	545
Dominion government departments	24,405	493
Total	157,859
Average		$536

Those are for the construction trades, construction and trade contractors and subcontractors.

Approximately one-half of the construction this year was done directly by government authorities, and if we take the average wage paid to these people in the different provinces we get the following results:

	Average wage paid
Prince Edward Island	$474
Nova Scotia	662
New Brunswick	481
Quebec	556
Ontario	544
Manitoba	514
Saskatchewan	321
Alberta	408
British Columbia	483

We also find that the minimum wages for the various provinces in retail stores average $12 per week or $504 per year, taking an average of 42 weeks. To be perfectly fair in this comparison, I have taken the fair wage agreements with the contractors as shown on pages 93 and 94 of the Labour Gazette for 1937, in companies constructing buildings and earth traverses at the dominion arsenal at Valcartier, Quebec, which can be considered about the highest average wage paid in the dominion to-day.

From a list of 39 occupations I find that men working 44 hours per week earn 65 cents an hour for the average year of 42 weeks, which gives them an annual income of $1,201.20.

Now let us review the cost of the family budget, as taken from the January issue of the Labour Gazette, covering a family of five, and this does not include clothing, entertainment, medical attention, education, transportation, cosmetics, tobacco, and so forth, but comprises only a very meagre supply of foods, laundry, fuel, light and rent. The weekly cost is averaged at $16.99, or a total of $883.48 a year. So, if we deduct the amount of the average budget from even the highest average wage, there remains a balance of only $317.72 per year.

To aggravate the situation still further, I find that the average index of wholesale prices for building materials increased 4 per cent in the first eleven months of 1936, while at the same time the index value of permits decreased 5·2 per cent. It is difficult to gain confidence in a situation like this where an increase in income is immediately accompanied by an increase in the price of commodities equal to, if not always, greater than the increase in income.

A list of loans made during the year is shown at page 112 of Hansard of January 20 last. These figures must have been just prior to the ones which were given to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) this afternoon. These figures bear out my contention that the class of people most in need of homes are unable to avail themselves of the loan privileges because of insufficient income. The figures for the various provinces are as follows:

Provinces	No. of loans	Average	Amount	Family Units	Average loan
Prince Edward Island	6	$5,394	$ 32,364	6	$5,394
Nova Scotia	94	4,475	420,737	96	4,382
New Brunswick	12	3,765	45,179	13	3,475
Quebec	231	9,668	2,233,394	467	4,782
Ontario	359	5,863	2,104,085	418	5,033
Manitoba	12	8,380	100,564	12	8,380
Saskatchewan	nil	....	....	..	....
Alberta	nil	....	....	..	....
British Columbia	10	3,150	31,500	10	3,150

It will be quite understood that the cost of building in British Columbia would be much less than in Saskatchewan and other prairie provinces owing to the difference in the price of commodities and building materials.

Saskatchewan, the third largest province in percentage of population, with 21·67 per cent on relief, has been unable to avail itself of any benefits from this scheme. Perhaps this is because we have the lowest average wage scale in the dominion, in addition to high freight rates on building materials imported into the province.

It has become absolutely plain that the idea of cooperating with loan companies to put out home-building loans will not result in any substantial volume of business within a reasonable time. The business alternative is to make government loans direct without relying on any middleman agency. Companies naturally want profitable business for the companies and the need for ending unemployment is not a company object. To substantiate that statement I would point out that one of the largest financial institutions in this country, namely the chartered banks, has apparently been doing considerable toward helping the unemployment problem by unemploying men. The Canada Year Book for 1936 contains figures showing that from 1920 to December 31, 1935, the banks have closed 1,245 branches in Canada. In Prince Edward Island they have closed 14; in Nova Scotia, 35; in New Brunswick, 24; in Quebec, 77; in Ontario, 363; in Manitoba, 165; in Saskatchewan, 301—over 50 per cent—in Alberta, 215; in British Columbia, 52. In the Yukon one branch was opened, increasing the number from three to four.

The housing problem in Canada is not solely one of monetary returns. It involves the more fundamental question of whether we are civilized or not and whether we are prepared to follow in the path of better housing conditions blazed by Britain and other countries. The fundamental question of whether we are civilized or not is easily answered. So long as this nation has money issuing power and allows its people to subsist on relief just one stage removed from physical distress, this nation is not civilized and I doubt whether it is wholly Christian. Under present money famine conditions the earning power of the nation is rigidly held down far below the basis justified by the available national assets. These assets cannot be brought into active earning profitable account without the use of money. The only way to get the necessary money at work is to break the money famine, and the only power to break the money famine is in the hands of the government.

There are several adjustments, no doubt, that would aid in this direction. We find the statement by James F. Coughlin, K.C., in his pamphlet Housing and Slum Clearance, with regard to taxation in the different cities:

> In the city of Winnipeg, the tax sales are proceeding at such a rate that the assessment roles are being seriously diminished; the 1935 tax sale list included 2,250 parcels representing arrears of $1,128,000, and on the list were 606 homes occupied by their owners, and 527 other houses which were believed to be occupied by their owners.

In the city of Regina, the mayor says, they have reached the point of confiscation of all real estate. And so the story goes through all the western provinces. No doubt the same may be said about eastern Canada.

To my mind the rates of interest in this housing plan are altogether too high. If it is necessary that the banks shall discontinue the payment of all interest charges to depositors in order to reduce the interest rate, I am absolutely in accord with that program. Freight rates also should be adjusted so that those points which are removed from the source of supply shall be placed in some kind of a zone system, whereby such distant places will not be penalized because of their geographical position. There should be a reduction of taxation on homes, and above all else, security for regular income; that, I think, is one of the more important features of our community life. At the present time many people who are able to build homes are not doing so because they have no security for their income, and in many cases where I inquired of people who could build homes why they had not done so, they invariably declared that it would not be safe. If they keep their money in liquid assets, in the event of losing their positions they can always remove it to other districts.

Mr. H. J. PLAXTON (Trinity): I wish to contribute a few thoughts to this very interesting and vital discussion. It seems to me that the problem of reviving the building industry must be attacked on two fronts: one, by the governments, federal, provincial and municipal, of this country, the other by private capital; its responsibility in this connection is just as serious and profound as the responsibility which is charged to the government under the resolution now before the house. It is true that it is the government's responsibility to assume the task of clearing slums in this country. There are many reasons available to support that statement. For instance, one has only to review the experience of the house building industry in England to find support for my conclusion. At the moment there are perhaps two fairly obvious reasons to sustain what I have just said. In the first place, I do not think that any fair-minded person can ask private capital to engage in slum clearance. Speaking with intimate knowledge with respect to my own riding, I know that rents have fallen to such low levels in that particular urban centre that it is absolutely uneconomic and impossible for private capital to engage in the clearance of slums or near slums. Second, as has been mentioned by previous speakers, there is the grave question of jurisdiction, and it is a right peculiar to municipal governments and not to private capital to enforce the tearing down of obsolescent homes. That has been the experience in England, and I think we shall find that it will prove to be the experience in this country. To that extent I must support the resolution before this house.

But what is the duty of private capital? It seems to me that if private capital wishes to maintain as its exclusive field for investment that which it has had for many years, namely, the first mortgage lending and building industry field, it is the obligation of private capital in this country to provide long term cheap money to enable the building industry not only to fill the shortage of homes which has accumulated during the last seven years, due to the total stagnation of that business, but also to provide on a mass scale low cost homes for the wage earners of this country on a basis and terms which will permit of repayment. Private capital in the last seven years has dodged that responsibility. It has tried to maintain a system of first mortgage lending which is absolutely antiquated, and, if I may refer again to England for experience, should have gone out of practice about the time when hoop skirts disappeared. It is the job of private capital—if I may personify it—to provide the financing for mass production of low cost housing in this country. So, if people say to the governments of this country, wake up, and attack this problem of reviving the building industry, I say it with greater emphasis to private capital, because for the last seven years it has passed up the prime field for investment in this country, namely, real estate.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): In the few minutes that remain this afternoon I wish to say a few words on this motion, as in 1935 and 1936 I introduced this question. What the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has said is nearly the same speech he made last year on a motion introduced by me in regard to housing, and the same speech he made the year before last when a committee was appointed to go into the whole question. But I say to the Minister of Finance, notwithstanding everything he said to-day, that in 1919 Doctor Hastings, medical health officer of Toronto, and I helped to persuade the government to lend $25,000,000 to the municipalities for construction of houses, and every dollar of that was paid back. The motion of mine discussed last year as recorded on page 221 of Hansard, stated:

> That, in the opinion of this house, Canada should immediately adopt a comprehensive national housing, building, reconstruction, renovation, slum clearance, land settlement and reforestation policy adapted to its circumstances and also embracing as one of its main features a national policy for youth in relation to education and industry and employment, so as to get people off the dole and back to remunerative employment.
> And further, that this house is also of the opinion, that in any such national reconstruction policy a lower rate structure for bank, mortgage and insurance loans is an immediate necessity. Such a reconstruction policy to also embrace protection for industrial workers in urban and suburban areas from forfeiture on the same principle as farmers and fishermen are now afforded by existing legislation.

Now, that debate went on all afternoon and evening at that time, and it is a strange thing that the government to-day has practically the very same reply to this resolution. The municipalities are the only bodies who ever pay money back. This parliament spent over two billions on railways, hardly a dollar of which has been paid back, and on other works such as breakwaters and harbours. Does the Quebec harbour commission pay money back? No. The only people who repay are the municipalities; yet they get no help. The Minister of Finance wants to do something to help housing and slum clearance, let him do something to lower bank and mortgage rates and insurance charges. These companies came here and appeared before the committees two years ago and they have no idea except to keep up the rates.

It is for the minister to offer a policy. Is or is not housing a matter of national policy? The answer is Yes, it is. It was found to be so in England, in the United States, and it is so in Canada, because an emergency exists, and was found to be so by the committee in 1935. But every time it is proposed to do something for the industrial workers in the cities and towns of this country, fifty-one per cent of the people never can get any help at all. All the government of the day do is appoint a lot of useless commissions like this National Employment Commission, who do nothing and do it well. They just go around in a circle. The minister can find all this in the housing committee's report. Doctor Coats of the bureau of statistics showed that the municipal, provincial and dominion authorities were spending $100,000,000 on relief, about $70,000,000 of which could be saved and given back in reconstruction work if it were spent on slum clearance and housing. The financial situation is bad, I admit, but this is a federal problem and upon the government of the day rests the responsibility of solving it. It is being solved in England and England is recovering faster than any country in the world because of balanced budgets, tariffs and a sane policy on housing and reconstruction.

I do not wish to prevent the mover of the resolution (Mr. Massey) from saying a word or two before six o'clock, but let me say that in the old days everyone owned some property in Canada, a mill, a store, a factory or land. We have been slow to see how the ownership of private property has been taken away by big business in Canada. The right to ownership or private property is derived from nature, not from man, and the state has no right to take it away, but only control it. But all this parliament does is to do nothing. The government have appointed three or four useless commissions. Another bill dealt with the other day—I refer to Bill No. 11, respecting home owners—will lead to nothing but a glorious fiasco. I was in a bank the other day and saw a workman there who has a first mortgage and a second mortgage on his home, a chattel mortgage on his goods and a bill of sale and a mechanic's lien and the bailiff in possession for taxes. How can he get any relief out of this glorious fiasco proposed by the Minister of Finance of a loan from a bank when the man has nothing?

I was sorry to hear reference made to-day to what the city of Toronto has done. It has been a pioneer in public health, in housing and in slum clearance from 1914. In 1914 it gave the first guarantee of bonds; the great Doctor Hastings led Canada in public health and the elimination of slums. I can tell the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) that Montreal is badly in need of a clean-up on slums by a health officer like Doctor Hastings.

I may have something further to say on the third reading of Bill No. 11, because it looks to me as if this is not private members' day; the government might just as well abolish private members' day; all this session the leaders have monopolized the time. I understand the mover of the motion wishes to reply, so I shall say no more now, but I am glad to see the large number of new members of this house climbing on the bandwagon for housing and construction and slum reform, glad to see the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) also getting active, because two years ago I did not approve when the then government appropriated $10,000,000 and spent $1,000,000. It was not the housing policy of my resolution on which the committee was formed.

Mr. WALSH: May I say in reply to the hon. member that the city of Montreal would have been heard from to good effect this afternoon if it had not been for the peculiar action of the whips on either side of this house.

Mr. CHURCH: The working people of Toronto have very little to thank the hon. member for, however, in the way he spoke the other day about the textile matter. I did not prevent him from speaking, though.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 11, 1937

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved that the first report of the standing committee on standing orders be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

TONEY RIVER, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What is the total amount of expenditure in 1936 in respect to breakwater at Toney River, Pictou county, Nova Scotia?
2. Who was the foreman or person in charge of the work?
3. What is the rate of pay allowed such foreman or person in charge; for how many days was he allowed pay; what is the total paid to him?

4. If any balance remains unpaid, what is the amount of such balance?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. $6,767.07.
2. W. Scott MacDonald.
3. (a) $4.50 per day; (b) 102 days; (c) $459.
4. District engineer reports a further amount of $80.25 for labour has now been passed for payment.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT COMMISSION

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. What was the date of appointment of each member of the National Employment Commission?
2. What was the amount of travelling expenses and living allowance paid to each member?
3. Does the $20 per day salary paid to certain members of the commission include Sundays and holidays?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. May 13, 1936.

2.

3. No. They are paid for working days only.

CAPE TORMENTINE—BORDEN CAR FERRY

Mr. KIRK:

1. What were the total receipts from the operation of the car ferry from Cape Tormentine to Borden from January 1, 1936, to January 1, 1937?
2. What were the operating costs of the said car ferry between the same dates?
3. What is the amount of the annual interest charges upon the initial cost of the said car ferry and terminals at Borden and Cape Tormentine?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $96,606.97.
2. $393,846.73.
3. $379,487.25.

HARRINGTON EAST, QUE., POST OFFICE

Sir GEORGE PERLEY:

1. In what year was the post office at Harrington East, Quebec, first established?
2. Has it been closed?
3. If so, (a) for what reason; (b) did the people using the post office wish to have this done; or (c) did they petition against its being closed?

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. 1st August, 1856.
2. No.
3. Objections were received in the form of a petition.

CANDLE LAKE, SASK., POSTMASTER

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Who is the postmaster at Candle Lake, Saskatchewan?
2. When was the appointment made?
3. Was the position advertised?
4. What is the salary involved?
5. Who carries the mail between Candle Lake post office and Meath Park, Saskatchewan?
6. When did the present carrier begin his duties?
7. Was this work advertised or were tenders invited?
8. If so, who applied, and at what salary or tender?
9. What is the present carrier being paid?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. Mrs. Sadie Grier.
2. 23rd Ocober, 1936, on the inauguration of post office.
3. No, not necessary.
4. $100 a year.
5. Simon Lehne.
6. October 23rd, 1936.

7 and 8. No. A reasonable rate being available, temporary arrangements were made in order to permit prompt opening of post office. It is the intention to invite public tenders for a permanent contract at an early date.

9. $260 per annum.

POST OFFICE—LETTER CARRIER DELIVERIES

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Did the government recently change the hours of service of postal employees so as to make deliveries of mail more frequent?
2. If so, what changes were made?
3. Was any estimate made as to the number of additional persons who would be employed as a result of such changes?
4. What was the number so estimated?
5. What was the number so estimated for each of the provinces of Canada?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1 and 2. Continuous service is now given six days a week. This involves letter carrier delivery on Saturday afternoons and statutory holidays.

3. Yes.
4. 478.
5. Nova Scotia, 13; New Brunswick, 15; Prince Edward Island, 2; Quebec, 118; Ontario, 193; Manitoba, 33; Saskatchewan, 24; Alberta, 31; British Columbia, 49.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES TRADE UNION

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Are the employees of the Post Office Department organized into a trade union?
2. If so, what is the name of said trade union?
3. Does the Post Office Department deal with the accredited representatives of said trade union from time to time, recognizing them as the proper representatives of the men employed in the post office?
4. Did the Post Office Department discuss with said accredited representatives changes in postal service making for greater frequency of delivery before said changes were effected?
5. Does the Post Office Department recognize the principle of collective bargaining with the employees of the Post Office Department?

Mr. ELLIOTT (Middlesex):

1. There are several unions or organizations amongst postal employees.
2. The names of the organizations are Federated Association of Letter Carriers; Canadian Postal Employees; Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada; Railway Mail Clerks' Federation.
3. Questions affecting working conditions and the welfare of staffs are discussed with the representatives of the various organizations.
4. Yes.
5. This is a matter of government policy.

MARKET GARDEN IMPORTATIONS FROM THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LENNARD:

1. What was the approximate value of the market garden products imported into Canada from the United States during the year 1936?
2. What was the approximate value of market garden products exported to the United States during the same period?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Imports of fresh vegetables into Canada from United States in 1936 amounted to $3,785,505.
2. Exports of fresh vegetables from Canada to United States in 1936 amounted to $1,970,794.

LOWER BURLINGTON, N.S., GOVERNMENT WHARF

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What amount was authorized for expenditure on the government wharf at Lower Burlington, Hants county, Nova Scotia, in the year 1936?
2. What amount was expended on said wharf, to whom paid, and what amount as: (a) salaries; (b) wages; (c) material; (d) other expenditures?
3. Who was in charge of the work, and who was the foreman?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. $2,800.
2. (a) and (b) Clifford Sanford, $285.74; Percy Tucker, $178.80; Gesner Tucker, $132.00; Ernest Lycett, $76.80; George Wilson, $133.20; Chas. Salter, $60.00; Thomas Benedict, $135.90; John Walker, $24.00; Orland Card, $66.30; Alvin Burgess, $56.40; Clarence Card, $95.15; Lorimer Bryden, $57.60; Edgar Card, $165.00; Merton Burgess, $15.40; Alfred Marsters, $51.60; Lewis Marsters, $28.80; Clyde Bryden, $15.40; Eric Lycett, $7.20; Con. Mosher, $37.40; C. Sanford, $5.85; Palmer Burgess, $24.00; H. Benedict, $10.20; H. Chudleigh, $13.20; Prescott Sanford, $12.00; Seymour Sanford, $4.50; total (a) and (b), $1,692.44.

(c) and (d)

R. M. Card, timber, $105.31; Harold Card, timber, $22.41; Mrs. Jean R. Young, timber, $80.28; S. E. Sanford, timber, etc., $36.30; H. K. Sanford, timber, $52.20; Windsor Traders, Ltd., hardware, $33.04; Wilcox Bros., Ltd., hardware, $150.90; Frank Salter, ballast poles, $54.00; Douglas Harvie, timber, $19.80; Lewis G. Sanford, timber, $98.66; Clyde Bryden, timber, $51.03; Fenton Mosher, ballast poles, $18.00; "S.S. Rotundus" freight charges $0.35; Lucius Bancroft, timber, $9.90; Prestor Marsters, timber, $25.11; Fulton Eller, plank $130.53; Lewis Sanford, timber, $76.68; Bernard Sanford, timber, $12.06; Mrs. Gracie A Sanford, timber, $46.80; total (c) and (d) $1,023.36; grand total, $2,715.80.

3. (a) Work done under supervision of district engineer, Halifax, N.S.
(b) Clifford Sanford.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS ON GREAT LAKES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Are there any federal life saving stations on the great lakes or inland waters, and where are they located?
2. What sum for life saving voted in 1936 was spent on the great lakes, and where?
3. Does the government contribute annually to the cost of the Toronto harbour life saving stations?
4. If not, what arrangement, if any, has the government for such service outside of Toronto harbour?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes. Point Pelee, Southampton, and Port Stanley (caretaker).
2. $2,851.15—at Point Pelee, Southampton and Port Stanley.
3. No.
4. None.

FOUNDERING OF THE "SAND MERCHANT"

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What steps are being taken by the government to carry out the recommendation of Mr. Justice Errol MacDougall in his report of the sinking of the Sand Merchant in December, 1936, on lake Erie, for a further investigation on certain lines?

2. How many lost their lives in this wreck?
3. Was there any barometer on the ship, wireless aids to navigation, modern or adequate life boats or drills of crews on lite saving, and were the life boats in working order?
4. Will any steps be taken as recommended, to regulate hatches and their use on the lakes by such draft of ship?
5. Will any steps be taken to consider granting a pension to the dependents of those who lost their lives in this wreck?
6. Will the Minister of Transport take steps to prosecute, under the direct power given him in the criminal code, those owners who send, or those who take unseaworthy ships on the great lakes in the late fall, without adequate aids to navigation, as set out in the criminal code, sections 288 and 289?

Mr. HOWE:

1. A special technical committee has been formed to conduct a thorough investigation into the design, construction and navigation of vessels of the type of the SS. "Sand Merchant."
2. 19.
3. Barometer on board inefficient.
No wireless equipment carried. Ships of this class exempt from carrying wireless.
Boat drill not carried out.
Vessel well found and equipped, including life boats.
4. For special committee to consider.
5. Question raised would be a matter of government policy.
6. Yes.

*SURRENDER OF RESERVES BY INDIAN BANDS

Mr. NEEDHAM:

1. What number of Indian bands, if any, have surrendered their reserves on account of mineral leases being applied for on such reserves?
2. What benefit accrued to each such Indian band as a result of such surrender?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, the question cannot be answered in the form in which it appears on the order paper. No reserves have been surrendered by Indians on account of mineral rights. If the hon. member has reference, as I expect he has, to what mineral rights may have been given by lease on the reserve, it can and will be answered in that form.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WOODS MANUFACTURING COMPANY LIMITED—CONTRACTS

Mr. HEAPS:

1. Have any contracts been awarded during the past five years to the Woods Manufacturing Company Limited, of Hull, Quebec?
2. If so, what was the total value of such contracts?

[Mr. Church.]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROVISION FOR ADMINISTRATION BY COMMISSIONER UNDER MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Combines Investigation Act and amending act of 1935, to provide for the administration of the act under the Minister of Labour by an officer to be known as the commissioner of the combines act, for the investigation of alleged combines by the commissioner, and for the appointment of such a commissioner, special commissioners and assistants; and to provide salaries, remuneration and expenses therefor.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN FEED CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether anyone has directed his attention to the serious condition which has developed throughout southern Alberta. On account of the deep and drifted snow and long continued cold weather there has come about a dangerous scarcity of feed and water which threatens the destruction of thousands of breeding stock which are highly essential to the economic well being of Canada. If the minister's attention has been drawn to this matter, would he mind telling the house what measures have been taken to meet the emergency?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago the officials of the rehabilitation organization of this government in the west wired me stating that difficulties were being experienced by owners of a considerable number of cattle located in the southern portion of Alberta who as yet have not come definitely under the arrangements made previously in connection with direct relief. There was not sufficient feed shipped into this area during the earlier part of the season to take care of the cattle. I immediately wired the representatives of the department in the west and asked them to make a complete investigation of the situation and report both here and to the government at Edmonton. A few days later I had a wire from the Minister of Agriculture in Alberta, and I wired him in reply indicating what had been done from this end and suggesting that he wire us later informing us what he considered the condition to be. I understand the situation is now being handled by our organization in cooperation with the provincial organization in Alberta.

GRAIN MARKETING

ANSWER TO QUESTION ON FEBRUARY 3 AS TO AGREEMENT BETWEEN WHEAT BOARD AND WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) took exception as a question of privilege to an answer given on February 3 to a question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley). The answer was in the following terms:

1, 2, 3. The subject to which this question relates, namely, the marketing of Canadian grains abroad, is now being investigated by the royal grain inquiry commission, which has not yet reported to the government.

As Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce I am responsible for that answer. I regret the suggestion that there has been any discourtesy to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, as none was intended in the answer given. I have examined the records in relation to this matter and I agree with the leader of the opposition that the answer as originally given, while the facts were correctly stated, was not happily expressed. I have revised and expanded the answer to the question, and with the permission of the house I should like to place upon the records a correction of the original answer, as follows:

1. Yes. To exporters only.
2. Made without knowledge or advice of wheat committee of the cabinet.
3. Cancelled without knowledge or advice of the wheat committee of the cabinet on December 20, 1935, because the wheat board considered it advisable to do so.

CANADA GAZETTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday evening, February 9, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) put a question to me in committee of supply with reference to the circulation of The Canada Gazette. I have this information to give to the house. On February 10 the distribution of The Canada Gazette stood at 557 copies free and 569 copies on subscription. The complimentary distribution includes copies sent to senators and members of the House of Commons on request, to registrars under the Bankruptcy Act as provided for by statute, to the library list as provided for by P.C. 1471, and to the daily newspapers. Subscriptions include copies sent to various departments in Ottawa and requested on departmental requisitions. Other copies are paid for at the rate of $8 per year by the public in general.

HOME IMPROVEMENT LOANS

PROVISION TO ENCOURAGE REPAIR OF RURAL AND URBAN DWELLINGS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 11, to increase employment by encouraging the repair of rural and urban homes.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the second reading of this bill I desire to give to the house the information which I promised three different members would be forthcoming on the motion for second reading. The information is with regard to the area affected by drought in the three western provinces, the general conditions which have existed in that section of Canada since it was first settled, the actions which have been taken by different governments which have been in power from time to time to deal with the situation, and the details of what is intended to be done during the coming year under the present legislation.

I think I can best outline the area which has been affected by referring to the map which I have in my hand. If you take a point on the boundary line between Canada and the United States immediately south of the town of Morden in Manitoba and draw a line directly from there to the town of Lloydminster, which is located on the boundary line between Alberta and Saskatchewan, just south of where the North Saskatchewan river enters the province of Saskatchewan, then westward and southward to about the town of Cochrane, west of Calgary, and then directly south to where the western boundary of Alberta meets the American boundary line, generally speaking you will have taken in the area known as the open prairie country of western Canada which has been affected by what we have been pleased to call the drought in recent years.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the minister give the number of acres in that area?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I can give all that information in a general way. Before going on to discuss the general question, I should like to make this general statement which I am sure will meet with the approval of everyone who has been interested in the problem. I believe the great majority of the people in that area, while realizing that they have suffered many hardships, would wish me to emphasize the fact that they appreciate the efforts which have been put forth by the Red Cross, by governing bodies generally, by the railways, by individuals and communities in other parts of Canada, and by creditors in general to make their burden lighter during this period of difficulty which has extended for from five to seven years. I think the great majority, if not all, of the people in that vast area believe that a real effort has been made, by all those to whom I have referred, to do something to lighten the burden of those who are passing through these difficulties.

I might describe in another way the area that is affected. As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said the day before yesterday, about three hundred municipalities are affected. I would estimate that the acreage contained in those three hundred municipalities would be approximately 60,000,000. Of course that 60,000,000 acres embraces all the different types of land that are to be found within the area I defined a moment ago, and includes not only the land but the portion of it which may be covered by water. The whole area, figured out on an acreage basis—640 acres to the square mile—covers a little over 60,000,000 acres. I think I should be well within the mark if I were to say that about 45,000,000 acres, or about three fourths, of that land is occupied, but probably not more than about 20,000,000 acres of it has been improved. In other words, not more than about 20,000,000 acres in that area have actually been used for the production of crops, and the raising of live stock, as we understand the term when we speak of small farmers having stock running on pasture. That would cover the area that has been affected more or less during the last six or seven years.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

The only qualification I would make in the description of the area would be that as you follow that long line from south of Morden on to Lloydminster, and that long line from Lloydminster down to Cochrane, zig-zagging back and forth across it you will find differing conditions. Sometimes you will find the land north of the line affected by drought, and in other cases you can go well into the southern section and find land which has not been affected by drought for any considerable number of years.

I might add that you have within that area, well within the centre of it in some cases, sections of territory which have not felt the real effect of the drought in the same way that other sections of the territory have. For example, you can take the heavy lands that surround Regina city and Moose Jaw. Those lands, while well within that area, have not been affected to the same extent as lands farther south and farther west that are not as heavy in their texture. Then we have right in the centre of the larger district, about the town of Rosetown, and to the south of Rosetown on towards Elrose, a section of country which during the whole period of the drought and the difficulties of the drought have had a fair crop. In some years it has been better than in others, but in any case these people during the greater part of the time have been able to keep entirely off relief. The same is true of the majority of people who live on the heavy lands around the city of Regina and the city of Moose Jaw.

I would point out that this year the area does not take in quite the 300 municipalities, but it does take in a larger area than it has in any one of the previous seven years. This year the area affected, which has been admitted to the care and administration of the federal government so far as assistance is concerned, covers about 250 municipalities. This area represents more than 50,000,000 acres of land, about 35,000,000 acres of which is occupied, and about 18,000,000 acres of which is improved or being farmed in the ordinary sense of the term.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, 18,000,000 of the 35,000,000?

Mr. GARDINER: About 18,000,000 of the 35,000,000, yes. I think the size of this area can be better appreciated if I put it in this way. The area comprises more than one-quarter of the occupied, and more than one-fifth of the improved, area of farm land in the whole Dominion of Canada. I do not know whether that is generally understood or not, but I repeat that the occupied part of what is now generally called throughout Canada the drought area, but which I prefer to call the open prairie section of western Canada, has within it one-quarter of all the occupied farm land in the Dominion of Canada and a little more than one-fifth of the improved farm land in the Dominion of Canada. I might say further that it contains a population of approximately 900,000 people—almost equal to the entire population of the province of Saskatchewan. It is a population greater than that of any province in the Dominion of Canada except the two great central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. That I think expresses more completely the importance of the problem from the point of view of the Dominion of Canada than any mere statement of what the area is and the acreage involved. The population affected is equal to that of the third greatest province in Canada in point of population, and greater than the population of any other province except the two largest provinces in the dominion.

Within that area, inside the lines I have spoken of, you have the city of Calgary, the city of Lethbridge, and the city of Medicine Hat in the province of Alberta; you have the cities of Moose Jaw, Weyburn, Swift Current, Regina, Saskatoon and North Battleford in the province of Saskatchewan. I recite these facts, Mr. Speaker, in order to impress upon the house, if I can, the impossibility of even considering the question of placing such a large number as 900,000 people to better advantage in any other part of the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that 900,000 include the cities and towns?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, it includes the cities and towns, which are largely dependent on the area in which they are located.

I think I have said sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to impress upon the house the importance of the question that has to be dealt with under any legislation having to do with rehabilitation, and as well the importance of that area to the remaining part of Canada.

There has been a great deal of discussion during the last seven or eight years as to whether difficulties of this kind were experienced in the prairie sections of Canada prior to the last five or six years, whether the lands in that area have been depleted by winds and other conditions, whether they have been depleted by certain methods of farming. All these questions naturally arise in our minds as a result of the experience we have been having in the last six or seven years. I make bold to say that if we had any other kind of climate than what we have in the prairie provinces, people could not live there and maintain homes. I think that statement can be made without fear of contradiction. If we had any different kind of climate in the area I have described, people could not live there if they relied upon farming for their maintenance. I should like to take a moment or two to give my reasons for making this statement.

In the first place the western plains of Canada are divided into three steppes, and the borders of those steppes of prairie and park land run parallel with the Rocky mountains. These borders in the form of hills run from the northwest down towards the southeast. The first steppe, the one nearest the Rockies, extends from the foothills to the east of the mountains just to the west of the city of Moose Jaw and its eastern border almost parallels the Rocky mountains. The edge of the next steppe runs just east of the city of Brandon, and again parallels the Rocky mountains, while the edge of the third steppe parallels the Rockies through a point east of Winnipeg. The area contained in the third steppe averages about 800 feet above sea level. The area contained in the second steppe, which extends from Brandon to Moose Jaw, has an average height of about 1,600 feet above sea level, while the area contained in the steppe extending from Moose Jaw to the foothills of the Rocky mountains has an average altitude of about 3,400 feet above sea level.

Those who are familiar with the western part of Canada know that the growth in the first steppe is naturally different from the growth in the second steppe, while the growth in the third steppe, is different from either of the other two. You find oaks and elms, similar to those in eastern Canada, growing in the Red river valley. You find poplars and willows growing in the second steppe, but the natural growth in the third steppe, at least in the southern part of it, is short grass, and for that reason we speak of it as prairie country.

One of the reasons why I say it would be very difficult if not almost impossible for people to live in that area under any other climate is shown by the figures of average rainfall which I should like to present:

	Inches
Vancouver	58
Lethbridge	15·9
Regina	14·11
Winnipeg	20
Port Arthur	22·5
Belleville	35·6
London	38
Sherbrooke	36·9
Kemptville	38

These are the centres of some of the most important farming areas in Canada, stretching right from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Hon. members will note that as compared with any other part of Canada the rainfall in those prairie sections is very much less. Someone may say that Vancouver is almost as far north as Lethbridge and Regina, so why is it that crops cannot be grown with equal success on the other side of the mountains. That reason is found in the fact that the Rocky mountains lie between Vancouver and the prairies, and the winds that come over the warm currents of the Pacific ocean carry both moisture and heat, giving a more equable temperature during the year on the western side of the Rocky mountains. When they cross over to the eastern side of the mountains they are associated with temperatures ranging from 110 degrees above zero, as we had it last July, to 40 and 50 degrees below zero, as we have it in January. Then you have the seasons shortened by the fact that the warm winds do not come over the mountains, and therefore, since we are so far north and at such an altitude above sea level, it would be impossible to produce farm crops if we had as much rain as they have in Vancouver. Perhaps that may be understood better if I remind hon. members that any year we get more than the average rainfall on the western prairies we are afraid of one of two things. We are afraid of rust which we had in 1934, or we are afraid of frost, which we had in 1907. Of course we have had frost in many other years that I could enumerate, but 1907 was most severe.

I recite these facts in order to indicate that those plains are particularly suited to the production of certain crops because of the climatic conditions that exist. In recent days there has been some controversy as to the possibilities of the Peace River country for the production of wheat, as compared with the open prairie country. I am not going to enter into that controversy in any way. The Peace River country is suited to the growing of some varieties of wheat. The northeastern part of the province of Saskatchewan is suited to the growing of some varieties of wheat. The province of Manitoba is suited to the growing of certain varieties of wheat. But the one section of western Canada which, under all conditions excepting those of frost, extreme drought or too great rainfall at certain seasons of the year, is certain to produce No. 1 Northern wheat or in some instances No. 1 hard wheat, is the short grass prairie region of western Canada. No. 1 Northern wheat or No. 1 hard wheat are known the world over as strong wheat, and there is no other place in the world where a better variety of strong, hard spring wheat can be grown than in those short grass prairie regions. One of the reasons for that is that you can grow hard wheat only where you have a comparatively low rainfall and at the same time fairly long and fairly cool nights. These are the two conditions that contribute to the high protein content wheat that is being produced in those areas.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I repeat that I make bold to say that if you had any other kind of climate in that part of western Canada it would be impossible to maintain a population there at all, doing what we are attempting to do at the present time. I should like to ask this question: What does the history of the area show? Well, I do not know whether you call it good fortune or bad, but I have always considered it good; I have had the privilege of living in the prairie sections of North America ever since 1890, with the exception of the four years from 1896 to 1900. During five years of that time, from 1890 to 1895, I lived in the state of Nebraska, which is in the heart of that part of the United States that has suffered so severely within the last few years. What I want to say to the house is this, that during the period through which we are passing we have not experienced anything more difficult than farmers all through the prairie section of the central part of the United States experienced during the nineties of the last century. The area of Canada of which I am now speaking was not settled in the sense that it is settled to-day, but from the old timers who live in it I understand that exactly the same climatic conditions prevailed over that area in the nineties as have prevailed during the last five or six years.

Most of us in this house can remember the experiences of the years from 1914 to 1921. I have brought to the house the records of crop yields during some of the years since this section of country has been settled, and I have done so in order that I might more fully illustrate to you what I have in mind in the statements I have just made. Let us take crop district No. 3. This district lies between the Soo line in Saskatchewan and Shaunavon—or rather it extends almost to Shaunavon. It runs up on the north of Swift Current towards the Saskatchewan river, taking a triangle out of the centre of the southern part of the province. I find that in 1914 the farmers in that district harvested a little under two bushels to the acre on all the land then under cultivation. That is a poorer crop than they have had in district No. 3 in any year since 1914; in other words, it is the poorest crop they have ever had since they settled that country. They were fortunate enough to have a good crop in 1915, and to illustrate another point with regard to the possibilities of the country, I may say that whereas the yield in 1914, one of the most difficult years they have ever experienced there, was two bushels to the acre, that same area of country, with an increased acreage, had an average in 1915 of thirty-one bushels to the acre, a higher average than any crop district in Saskatchewan.

I have before me the average rainfall in those different years and I will mention one or two of them to indicate the impossibility of theorizing about rainfall in western Canada and determining whether we are likely to have a good crop. In 1914 the rainfall in district No. 3 was 12·53 inches and in 1915 it was 16·30 inches, about 3½ inches more. In 1915 it was a little above the average that you get around, say, the city of Regina and in 1914 it was slightly below the average. Now in the one year they had a yield of two bushels to the acre and in the other a yield of thirty-one bushels to the acre; and that yield of thirty-one bushels came in the year following one of the driest seasons they have ever had.

Let us come down to 1928. Everyone in this house knows that the year of greatest wheat production in Canada was 1928, and I will read to the house the rainfall in the different crop districts in that year:

District	Rainfall inches
1	14·9
2	12
3	10·7
4	11
5	12
6	11
7	12
9	9·65

These are for the province of Saskatchewan. District No. 8, I may observe, is away up in the northern part of the province and district No. 9 is north of the North Saskatchewan river.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is, is it not, that it came at the right time?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think that is the point. Now, if we take all the years from 1913 to 1934 and study the rainfall right across the grain-growing section of western Canada we shall probably find that the rainfall in 1928 was as low as in any one of those years; and yet they produced the greatest crop that western Canada has ever had. And, as the leader of the opposition says, the reason for that is that the rainfall came at the right time of year. But we might add this, that even when the rainfall does come at the right time, if it is preceded by heavy winds, particularly in the open prairie country, the winds themselves ruin the crop before the time for the rainfall to do it any good arrives; and if the rainfall is succeeded in the early weeks of July by very extreme heat, as in the last year, that very extreme heat in itself offsets the good that the rainfall did in the month of June. These are some of the difficulties facing the grain growers in that area of Canada; they are some of the factors that have to be faced when considering ways and means of dealing with the problem.

I said that we had difficulties there in the nineties. We had them in 1914, and then we had two good crops, and thereafter we had comparatively bad crops from 1917 to 1921. Now we have been experiencing, from 1931 to 1936, another series of poor crops, and some might be inclined to ask why it is that we have experienced greater difficulty in some of these periods than in others. In so far as my memory takes me back to the experience of the nineties, I do not think that we have had any greater difficulty in western Canada in the thirties of this century than the Americans had to cope with on land of the same kind further south towards the close of the last century. The experiences are almost identical.

Mr. BENNETT: There are more people in the west.

Mr. GARDINER: At that time the prairie states were not as thickly populated as now, but many people moved out of that section in those days back to the areas they had come from. Those of us who went from Canada returned to this country and started all over again, and that has been the experience of many persons who have gone into the west during the last few years. But speaking of the period between 1914 and 1921, there was something else that intervened. Although the yield was almost though not quite as low as it has been during this period, and although the only real difference in the two periods was the comparatively large crops of 1915 and 1916—I may remind the house that we had a big crop in 1932 as well—in the period from 1914 to 1921 wheat prices to the farmer at the elevator ran from $1 a bushel up to $1.84, and in some years even higher than that. So that a farmer who had a crop of five bushels to the acre in the period between 1917 and 1921 had very little difficulty because he was getting $1.84 for his wheat. When, however, he gets five bushels to the acre, with the elevator paying him 35 cents per bushel, or in some cases, for No. 1 wheat, as low as thirty-four cents, then his problem is an entirely different one. Someone says, Yes, and twenty-five cents. Yes; there were a great many instances where the farmers did not get more than twenty-five or twenty-six cents. So that even with a crop of ten bushels to the acre in 1932, say, the farmer would be very much worse off than in 1917 or 1921 with crops of three, four, five, or seven or eight bushels to the acre.

I wanted to deal with these different areas in order to lead up to the next point which I desire to discuss. It has to do with the history of this particular area—and when I speak of the history of it I mean the settling of that particular part of the country. It is in this matter that I think some obligation rests upon the people of all Canada in connection with that area. Prior to 1905 this area was comprised in the Northwest Territories and administered by a government situated at Regina. But that government did not have the same powers, particularly in connection with finance, as the provincial governments which later were set up. The immigration policy in connection with the settlement of that area was administered entirely from Ottawa. The western areas differed in some degree from other parts of Canada in regard to settlement. The lands and resources of the eastern provinces and of British Columbia were owned and controlled by the provinces, and they had some control of the settlement of such lands. When the western part of Canada was first being opened up one or two things were done that seemed wise at the time but the wisdom of which, reviewed in the light of experience of this district of which I am now speaking, has turned out to be at least questionable. One of these had to do with the system of survey that was adopted. If I understand rightly, we copied that system from the United States. The country was blocked off into areas twenty-four miles square; then these were divided into four parts six miles square, and those again split into sections; then people were brought in and settled on quarter sections, cut out here and there all over the country. In such areas as the heavy lands around the city of Regina, those around Rosetown, and some of the heavy land areas in Manitoba, that system worked out successfully and settlement was carried on in a way well suited to those sections. But looking back on the problem as it is in the southwest part of Saskatchewan and southwest of Manitoba and southern Alberta, I am inclined to think that something more in the interest of the future generations who are to live in that country could have been done than the carrying on of that type of survey. I shall deal with that later.

In 1905 the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were set up. Settlers began to go there in great numbers in 1908. An hon. member from Alberta made a statement the other day as to why settlement did not take place there earlier. It is true that pamphlets were written by explorers and men sent out to make surveys calling attention to the difference between that area and some other parts of western Canada. I think it was in 1908 that the minister of the interior brought down in this house legislation providing for preemptions as well as the giving of homesteads to people who would settle in the western part of Saskatchewan and southeastern part of Alberta. If I remember aright, when that bill was introduced in the house the statement was made that while a farmer could make a good living on a quarter-section of land in the settled areas of western Canada, it would not be possible for him to do so in the areas we are discussing this afternoon; therefore the position was taken that men going into that section to homestead should be given a quarter-section of land free of any other charge than the $10 homesteading fee and the three years' residence requirement, and also the right, if desired, to purchase another quarter-section at $3 per acre. In other words a settler could get a quarter-section of homestead land and a quarter-section of preemption land. That was done, I believe, because it was realized that conditions there were more difficult and that more land would be required to enable a family to make a living.

Between 1908 and 1914 a great part of that area was settled by homesteaders. In 1914 the wheat acreage of Canada was approximately ten million acres. Then the war was declared, and in 1915 the wheat acreage of Canada increased by 4·8 million acres, or almost 50 per cent in one year. The increase in wheat acreage in Canada between 1914 and 1921 was from 10,300,000 acres to 23,000,000 acres, something over 12,000,000 acres for the dominion as a whole, and of that increase 5,500,000 acres was in this area of which I am speaking. In other words, farmers were induced to go into the production of wheat in the southern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta. Why? Simply because Canada wanted them to find homes there? Not at all. I think I am right when I say that the government of the day suggested to the present leader of the opposition—I know they suggested to me and to the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and to everyone else who at that time was occupying public office—that they would like him to go out through that section of Canada and impress upon the people the importance of getting into wheat production in order to help win the war. And we did it. We did it to such good effect, apparently that, looking back at the records now, I find that five and a half out of twelve million acres of increase in the whole dominion took place in that particular part of western Canada.

We not only persuaded them to break up land; we persuaded them to buy the machinery with which to do it. During those years, as everyone knows, the sons of most of those men were overseas, and when we went to them we had to devise with them means of breaking the land and getting it under cultivation. We told them of the possibilities of machinery, how the work could be done without the employment of more labour than was available. This acreage was broken up and used for the production of wheat, and whether that had anything to do with it or not, the war was won. At any rate it was as a result of an appeal made by the dominion that these people went there and broke up these lands. It is all very well for us to look at that area to-day and criticize the men who settled there and broke up lands which were not suited to the production of wheat, to say they should not have done it and therefore now they should shift for themselves and leave that area and go to some other part of Canada. But there is some responsibility upon all the people in Canada through the national government for the action then taken. I have no criticism to make of the action taken—

Mr. BENNETT: It was a union government.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I have no criticism to make, even if it had been a Liberal government, a Conservative or any other kind. I think any government in power in Canada at that time would have tried to get the wheat to feed the armies and the people overseas who needed it. Fortunately the wheat production during some at least of those years was fairly good; during others it was not so good, but the price during all the time was sufficient to maintain the people who were there.

From 1914 to 1919, therefore, we doubled our acreage in wheat in Canada, and of that increase a great part was in the area to which I have been referring. To-day we talk a great deal about the necessity of reducing acreage. People in that area in 1934 were sowing to wheat one and a quarter million acres less than they were sowing to wheat in 1921. They were sowing two and a half million acres less to wheat in 1934 than they sowed to wheat at the peak in 1932. In other words these people themselves have been cutting down the wheat acreage in that area. They have been trying to adjust themselves to the condition that exists. All I should like to suggest to the house in that regard is that we have some reason for giving special consideration to the people who are in difficulties out there, first, because of the manner in which the settlement was started; second, because of the inducements which were given them during war time to go into the production of wheat on areas of land that would not be suitable for such production when prices dropped, and, third, because of the fact that in that great extent of territory there are possibilities for the settlement and maintenance of a population in Canada such as is not to be found anywhere else in the country.

In concluding my remarks on this angle of the matter may I say that there are some 900,000 people living there now. For the purposes of this discussion let us consider that there are a round million in the area which might require consideration. I believe I can say that if we are in the house five or ten years from now we shall find that there will be still at least a million people in that section of Canada. I say that because I know conditions, having been from one end of Canada to the other, I do not know of any place to which these people could go where, under average circumstances, they would be any better off than they will be right where they are. May I say further that I am inclined to think that if we are in the house ten years from now we shall probably find that there are more rather than less people living in that section of the country. The probability of there being more will be greater if we handle the problem in the way it ought to be handled.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister proceeds to the next branch of his subject, may I ask, first, whether he has an estimate of the rural population in the area, and, second—I think this is very important—what was the sum total of the revenue derived from that area by the population inhabiting it between the years 1914 and 1919?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures, but I believe I can deal with the question in a manner which will illustrate the point the leader of the opposition has in mind. I have not the figures broken down for the area in question, but I believe the population for the province of Saskatchewan is broken up in a manner which would indicate that about 34 per cent of it is in the urban centres of the province. Some of that percentage is so close to the land we might very well call it rural. Then, about 66 per cent is in the rural districts of the province, and actually living on the land. I believe that would be almost true of the area about which I am speaking, although the existence of some of the larger cities in the area might change the percentage slightly.

Mr. BENNETT: The percentage is smaller in Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it will be much smaller in Alberta than in Saskatchewan.

In order to deal with the matter just raised by the leader of the opposition, namely as to what we have obtained from that country during certain periods, I should like to go back to the point I was discussing a moment ago. I called attention to the three difficult periods we have had. It is within the memory of most hon. members that what we might call one of the best periods in that section of the country extended from about 1900 to 1914. There are different reasons why that was a good period, from the point of view of the whole dominion. One reason is associated with the fact that immigration was coming in rapidly. Then, railway construction was taking place throughout the whole country. New lands were being opened up, and capital came in with the immigrants and with the development, which proceeded very rapidly. A prosperity went with all these things, one such as we have not had in any other period. But in the period between the depression of 1890 and before the beginning of the depression in 1914—which would have been a great depression indeed had there not been a war to raise the prices—there was a period of fair production and fair prices. The fair prices along with fair production made it possible for people to exist in the area. Then, there was the second period about which I spoke, namely the time during the war when yields were poor but prices were high, and people got by on the small yield and high prices. Then, there was the time between 1922 and 1928 in which we had the highest yields we have had during any period since the opening of western Canada. Along with that we had fair conditions, because we had fair prices in combination with the high yield.

In order to illustrate the effect of conditions on the people in that section of the country I shall attempt to show the difference between fair crops combined with low prices and good crops combined with good prices. I shall take three years from the hearts of two different periods, and shall begin with the years 1926, 1927, and 1928. In order to use figures familiar to me may I confine my remarks to that section of the area which extends into the province of Saskatchewan.

In 1926, 1927 and 1928, we produced in Saskatchewan 793,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole province?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the whole province; two-thirds of the wheat came from the area about which I am speaking. In the three years 1931, 1932 and 1933, which were not by any means the worst years we produced 471,000,000 bushels. We must compare the 471,000,000 in three years out of the worst period with the 793,000,000 bushels in three years out of the best period.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister has the information, would he give the average price during those periods?

Mr. GARDINER: In one period it ran up around $1.50 to $1.75, and in the other it was down around eighty cents.

Mr. BENNETT: The bureau of statistics does show an average, I believe, and I thought the minister might have the information. However, I do not wish to interrupt him.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the information set out in that way, but I can give it in another way. Taking all farm products in the first three year period, namely 1926, 1927 and 1928, we find that returns amounted to $1,180,000,000, which was derived from a combination of good crops and good prices. Then, in the later three year period the returns amounted to only $354,000,000, or showed a decrease of $800,000,000. These figures indicate that from one period to another the sum derived was cut to about one-third. Putting it in another way, in the second three year period, as compared with the first, the difference in receipts by farmers in the southwestern part of the province throughout the whole of what is called the drought area, would be even greater. Farmers in the drought area were without any crop to sell at any price, but people in the other sections of the province had some crops to sell, even at the low prices which prevailed.

When I say that about $800,000,000 indicates the difference in the returns to the farmers between one three year period and another, I am stating something which is important from another point of view. We have heard many estimates of the indebtedness of the farmers of western Canada. More particularly have we had estimates of the indebtedness of the farmers of this section of western Canada. The government of the province of Saskatchewan have made a survey of this area and they know very well the indebtedness of the individual farmers. They know exactly the indebtedness of the school districts, the municipalities and all the other organizations that are related to the carrying on of government in the province, including the telephone companies. When we estimate the indebtedness of the province, of the municipalities, of the school districts and of individuals, we find the total to be $600,000,000 in round figures.

I should like to say to those who are concerned about the future of the province of Saskatchewan that we are going to have good crops again in western Canada and some day we will have a combination of good crops and fairly good prices. When we do get a combination of good crops and fairly good prices our position will not be an impossible one. This is why I think governments should give some attention to the maintaining of the people upon this area.

May I put the matter in another way? We sometimes wonder how people who could produce in the last few years all the wealth of which I have been speaking in the last few minutes could be in the position in which they find themselves to-day, without money and without credit. These people came into this country between the years 1908 and 1914. The war came on and they were induced to spend money in order that they could produce more wheat. They did produce more wheat, partly for that reason and partly because they could get a good price for it and hope to make some money. Producing wheat in the volume in which they did at the prices which they were able to obtain, like most human beings under similar circumstances they carried on developments which probably would not have been carried on otherwise. It is true that to-day you can go into that section and find shacks similar to those described yesterday by the hon. member who introduced a motion stressing the necessity for some kind of action in connection with youth—in some of the new areas you will find quite a number of them—but in that portion of Saskatchewan of which I am speaking I think you will find that the homes compare favourably with the homes on farms throughout most of the Dominion of Canada.

I think you will find the condition of the roads to be better than the roads were in other parts of Canada during the first twenty-five years of settlement. I think you will find accommodation by way of telephone service which was not enjoyed in other parts of Canada or probably anywhere else in the world during the settlement of the first generation upon farming lands. It is true that they have all these things, a considerable part of the cost of which was paid during the years of good crops. In spite of their optimism, in spite of their enthusiasm for their jobs, in spite of the suitability of these people to the area in which they are to be found, they could not pay for these developments in the six or seven years in which they had good crops at good prices. I do not think any population anywhere could have done it. They find themselves in debt to-day, and I believe any other population in similar circumstances would find themselves in exactly the same position.

They came into this period of difficulty with this debt hanging over their heads. I think that ninety-nine per cent of them expected to pay every dollar of that debt and every dollar of the interest that they had signed to pay. They ran on for three years, and the interest was being added at the rate of eight per cent year by year. They ran on for five years and they began to think more about it. They got into the sixth year and found that their debt had increased by fifty per cent or more without their having obtained anything other than the use of the property which they had created by partly paying for it with previously borrowed money. They then began to ask themselves whether they would ever be able to pay the full amount of their indebtedness. I think it is better in this house to give encouragement to men of that kind, to let them know the possibilities of the future by quoting figures, such as I have quoted, which indicate that this debt can be paid within the lifetime of the present generation without imposing any great hardship upon the people who live in this area. With this picture before them they will go on with greater hope than they would if we tried to convince them that the debt could never be paid.

I asked a question a moment ago as to whether the government of the day and the governments of the past had been grappling with this problem as governments should. I want to take you back just for a moment to the difficult year of 1914-15, the first year of the war. The government of that day was of the Conservative party. They went into this area and organized the whole area for relief purposes. They put an administrative organization into the area and paid every dollar that was paid out in direct relief, that is outside of what was put up by voluntary organizations. At that time there were less than half as many people in the area, and yet the government spent $8,715,000 in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PELLETIER: Has the minister the figures for the three western provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not have the records of the other provincial governments. I have the figures for Saskatchewan because I brought them down with me.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that figure include payments for seed grain?

Mr. GARDINER: I have some doubt about that, but it probably did. In 1914 the dominion government of that day assumed what the leader of the opposition referred to as a national problem. They set up an organization to take care of this and they spent $8,715,000 in doing so. Since then we have had two periods of difficulty. During the period of the war higher prices prevailed, but the yields were somewhat low. We had other troubles, but they did not require the setting up of an organization, either by the federal government or by the provincial government, to handle the situation. However, there was a cooperative effort on the part of the two governments, or I should say on the part of the four governments, because Manitoba and Alberta were also interested. In Saskatchewan—I think this is also true of the other provinces—it was necessary to provide seed wheat. The federal and provincial governments each undertook to pay fifty per cent of any loss which might be incurred by the municipalities as a result of seed being advanced to the farmers. During that period $4,385,000 was advanced for seed purposes.

I want to emphasize the fact that I examined the records in 1928, after there had ceased to be any need for the giving of seed or the providing of relief of any kind, and I found that only $180,000 of that money had not been paid. There was advanced $4,385,000 and at that time only $180,000 had not been paid, and much of that has been paid since. Of the amount paid, the government of Canada was called upon to pay only $334,000, and the government of Saskatchewan paid $334,000. In other words, when these farmers got good crops from 1922 to 1928 they paid off that indebtedness almost in its entirety. It was only in respect to farms which had gone under foreclosure or had been taken for taxes that the government were called upon to pay. The farmers of that area paid amounts which, with interest, aggregated $4,000,000 during those years. So that there is nothing or very little standing on the books to-day charged against the farmers of western Canada as a result of the difficulties of that period.

This brings me down to the period from 1931 to 1936. During the first year, 1931, the government, in its best judgment, and I think the government had the support of all sides of the house in so doing, paid a bonus of five cents a bushel on the wheat grown in the northern part of the three western provinces. That bonus amounted ultimately to somewhere between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000. But it so happened that in the southern part of Saskatchewan, the area we are dealing with to-day, there was very little if any wheat, and the government again in its judgment, with that condition existing, agreed for that year to shoulder the entire cost of taking care of the people of that southern area, although perhaps it was not put in exactly those words. At all events they advanced or agreed to advance $10,000,000 to the government of the province of Saskatchewan to take care of the people in the southern and western part of the province, and they did a similar thing with respect to areas outside the province of Saskatchewan. That bill in the first instance was charged back to the farmers because of the method of administration that was set up by the provincial government and agreed to, I think, at the time by the federal government. But eventually the notes taken from the farmers were cancelled and the Dominion of Canada to-day is carrying the entire cost of the $10,000,000 that was spent in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan and amounts spent in other provinces, which was put up in the year 1931.

Mr. BENNETT: 1930-31.

Mr. GARDINER: 1931-32.

Mr. BENNETT: There were 330,000 people on relief—men, women and children.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, as the right hon. leader of the opposition says, at one time we had 330,000 people on relief. I am citing these facts, Mr. Speaker, only to indicate that the government of that day carried out in principle exactly the same policy that was carried out in 1914-15.

In the spring of 1932 a new relief agreement was entered into between the federal government and the provinces. Again, Mr. Speaker, I am not offering any criticism, but just citing the facts. The government no doubt realized as it came into the succeeding year that these costs might be costs spread over a number of years rather than incurred in any one particular year. Another method, therefore, was adopted for the time being. The federal government lent the provincial government moneys to be expended in taking care of the people in that area, having put up a third of the amount in actual cash. The federal government provided one-third of the expenditure in loans in order that the provincial governments might carry on.

In 1934 there was a change of government in the province of Saskatchewan. When the election was over I happened to be at the head of the government, and I came to Ottawa and negotiated with the government then in power, which was led by the present leader of the opposition. While we did not always agree in our discussions and negotiations, I must say that the leader of the opposition as Prime Minister of Canada took the same position with regard to the giving of assistance in the drought area of Saskatchewan in 1934 as he had taken in 1931, and as we took in 1935. On November 2, 1934, the Minister of Finance of the day, Mr. Rhodes, wrote a letter to the government of Saskatchewan in which he stated that the government of Canada as then constituted had from the beginning looked upon this as a national problem, that they had considered it earlier in the season as being national to the extent that they should have taken responsibility even for administration, and he went on to indicate that since the matter had been delayed until November 2, partly on our account, it was impossible for the federal government to take responsibility for administration then and they would have to rely upon the administration set up by the provincial government to expend relief moneys. He went on to say that the federal government were prepared to advance to us money from time to time as we indicated the necessity for its being spent for relief purposes, that we should in the meantime give treasury bills as security for the money, and that as the federal government were satisfied that the money had been spent for the purpose for which it was voted the treasury bills would be returned to the province of Saskatchewan and the debt cancelled.

I wish to say that the province had secured on the same basis an advance of moneys having to do with payments on the two previous years. I think it goes without saying that the same principle that was applied in 1931, and again in 1934-35, because the undertaking was carried out by the government now in power during the succeeding year—that same principle should apply to the two years in between.

Might I point out that in the period 1931-36—again I am dealing only with the province of Saskatchewan because I hesitate to discuss matters which concern the other two provincial governments; and I discuss this particular matter only because I had some personal connection with it—the total amount advanced by this government between 1931 and 1936, including the amount advanced in 1935 for seed grain, was, in round figures, $50,000,000 for the province of Saskatchewan alone. That, added to the other total of $8,715,000 which I mentioned a few moments ago, gives a total of $58,715,000 which had been advanced by the people of Canada towards the maintenance of people in the area of which I have spoken as being important for the development of the Dominion of Canada. I think at this point I should emphasize again, Mr. Speaker, that the people living in that section of the country, the great majority of them at least, realize that governing bodies have been doing considerable in order to carry out their obligations to them.

May I now analyse these figures for a few moments? Of this amount of $58,715,000, $36,815,000 has already been assumed entirely by the federal government, but about $10,900,000 of it is still charged up against the public debt of the province of Saskatchewan. I invite the attention of the house and the country to that fact. There is included in the present gross public debt of Saskatchewan $10,900,000 in respect of which the federal government has agreed, as soon as the accounting is completed, to return to the province of Saskatchewan treasury bills representing that amount. The province had given the treasury bills to the dominion for security; after the provincial government makes an accounting of the moneys spent on relief, the treasury bills are returned to the province, but in the meantime they stand as part of the public debt of the province.

Then something happened during this last summer which accounts for the reference I made at the beginning of my remarks to creditors as well as governing bodies having to do with this problem. There is $15,300,000, for which this government assumed responsibility during the period 1932-33, 1933-34, and down to January 1, 1935. Last midsummer when it was assured there was to be another crop failure in the area of which I have spoken the government of Saskatchewan approached the government of Canada and approached creditors of individuals, repsented largely by municipal bodies and lending companies, to assume some obligation for the debt that has been piling up on the people in that territory. Their request was based upon the idea that if the federal government had assumed the obligation for this amount of $15,300,000, and eventually was going to relieve both the province and the individuals concerned of that obligation, as they had done on other occasions, it would inspire greater confidence on the part of these people if that statement were to be made public. We naturally said to the loan companies and to the provincial government, "What do you intend to do?" The loan companies said they were prepared to wipe off the back interest on all their loans in that area down to January 1, 1935, and to make other concessions, depending upon examination of individual cases. They agreed to go into the area, not to ask the individual whether or not he wanted an adjustment but with new agreements containing the adjustment actually written in, which meant that never again would the individual be billed for that amount of money. In its turn the province said it had assumed obligations in the years just before 1931, for relief and seed grain, amounting to something in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000; that there was owing to the treasury a considerable amount of unpaid taxes, and that in addition there were large sums owing to the municipalities throughout the whole area in the form of unpaid taxes. The provincial government took the responsibility for seeing that that amount was written off the indebtedness of the individual farmer. I am told, Mr. Speaker, that the result has been that approximately $75,000,000 of debt was written off the farmers of that area through a cooperative effort on the part of the mortgage companies, the dominion and provincial governments, and the municipalities.

Other negotiations have been carried on with banking institutions and other creditors, with somewhat similar results. So when the proper authority is received we are under obligation to deal with the matter in that way, in order to carry out our part of this cooperative effort. In 1931-32 we assumed responsibility for an expenditure of $10,000,000. In 1934-35 we assumed responsibility for a total of $10,900,000. In the intervening years we assumed responsibility for sums totalling $15,300,000. In 1936-37, the present year, we assumed responsibiilty for $7,200,000, and in doing so we adopted a different method of administration. We insisted that the provinces make their recommendations in advance, giving us all the information. We set up an organization to check their representations, and we are paying the bills as they are presented to us. In other words they are not being charged up against the province and will not show at any time as part of the public debt of the province. The only change in the policy is the change to which I have just referred, a change in administration. The principle is exactly the same principle that was adopted in 1914-15, in 1931-32, restated in 1934-35 and carried on down to the end of this period. I think, therefore, the dominion government has shouldered a fair share of its obligations assumed in connection with the settlement of this country. In other words the problem has been assumed as a national one by the governments of the day, whoever headed them, and in the last analysis the expenditure has been made from the treasury of Canada.

I might be asked one further question, and when I have dealt with it I shall be through. It is this: Is further effort worth while? Well, I may say that in 1922 the province of Alberta undertook to evacuate part of this territory, and experiments have been carried out which are worthy of investigation now in order to indicate what we might do in the future. The province of Saskatchewan has placed upon its statute books legislation making possible the resettlement of people throughout that area, based upon soil values as related to the moisture which falls from year to year, and similar work has been done by Manitoba. These provinces find it very difficult at the present time to finance any considerable expenditure on this or any other matter having to do with that area, and the question arises as to what extent they should be assisted by the dominion government. Just the other day I was reading an article in a newspaper published in the state of Montana. It was the Great Falls Tribune, of which I have a copy, and the article deals with the experiences of the people in one county on the other side of the line. I should like to read one paragraph in order to indicate what is being done in one county in the state of Montana, immediately south of this area to which I am referring:

> The development of submarginal lands, including the construction of reservoirs, fencing, farm obliteration, rodent control, spring development, road building and the development of recreational centres, when added to the original cost of the 928,592 acres of submarginal land purchased by the government, brings the total investment to about $3.40 an acre. Land purchase amounted to approximately $2.40 an acre and the development to an additional dollar an acre.
> Comparing the expenditure of $1,786,368 (or, up to the present time, $1,000,000), with the direct relief load, seed and feed loans made by the government in the five preceding years, when a conservative estimate places the amount in this area at $3,500,000, the report shows a constructive program as against a destructive program.

Mr. MacNICOL: In reading from that article did the minister refer to flood control?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not flood control; I think it was rodent control. This is in the dry area just to the south. Some slight amount might be spent to control the water in certain areas in order to make use of that water elsewhere, but this article has to do with water control and similar things such as are being done on our side of the line, in a smaller way.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the reference was made in regard to submarginal lands.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not see any reference to flood control. There is mention of the construction of reservoirs but not to flood control.

The reason I mention that, Mr. Speaker, is that it calls attention to the very situation that is before the house at this moment. During the last six years we have spent something over $50,000,000 in doing what to all intents and purposes leaves those people at the end of each season just where they were in the beginning. That is, we have been doing a necessary work; we have been maintaining them there throughout the winter. But we have been doing very little through the expenditure of that money to direct the people or to assist them towards a condition where it will not be necessary in the future to do the same thing over again. We believe that we should do something constructive in that area during the coming year rather than leave ourselves in the position where the whole expenditure a year from now, if there is another crop failure, will have to be made to maintain people in that area during another winter. To that end we have changed slightly the existing organization in order to take care of this problem.

One of the members from Toronto, speaking the other night, misunderstood me when he came to the conclusion that we were going to set up another organization in the form of other committees to deal with the problem confronting the people in that area. That is not in the mind of either myself or the government. There have been set up under the present organization—there were set up in 1935 and again in 1936—local organizations in the form of agricultural associations who simply organized themselves. They did not necessarily get our consent to do this, but they themselves have organized and gone to work. We were trying to persuade the people in that area to dig dugouts in order to have water, and when I went there last summer I found that very few of these dugouts were being made. When I went on some of the farms and saw the conditions I could understand why the dugouts were not being constructed. The leader of the opposition said that when he went and viewed that country about a year ago he had to admit that it created in his mind a depressed feeling. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has made a similar statement. I must say that when I went and looked at it in the first week of July last year, having gone over the area during the previous five or six years at about the same time of year, it created even more than a depressed feeling in my own mind, and I began to wonder just why those people would stay there year after year and face those conditions continuously; and the only answer I could get was the answer that occurred to myself, that it was the experience between the nineties and the present time that induced them to believe that they were doing a real service to themselves and to the country by remaining there. When one went to an individual farmer and suggested that a solution for his problem was to dig a dugout to catch the spring run-off of water so that he could have a water supply for his cattle, he said, "You show me a spot sixty feet long and forty feet wide, and tell me to take a team of horses, which I have no oats to feed, and one scraper and dig a hole twelve feet deep, and say you will give me three cents a yard for every yard of earth I dig." When farmers made that statement to me I realized exactly the thought that would occur to my own mind as a farmer if the proposal had been put up to me. If I worked every day of the year, from beginning to end, it would be difficult for me to dig that hole, and if I worked only at such times as I could spare from farming, I should probably not be able to dig it at all.

At a meeting that was held I called attention to the experience that I had when I was in Ontario—and every farmer from Ontario knows this—when the farmers want to thresh their crops they get in about a dozen of the neighbours and spend a day threshing that crop; then they go to another farmer's place and do the same thing. I said, "Why don't you do the same thing down here?" The chairman replied, "I will tell you what we will do. You make that four and a half cents a yard and that will pay approximately half the cost of digging the holes. We will dig the top half; you do not need to pay us at all. Then you bring in a drag line and take out the bottom half and the four and a half cents will pay for it, and we will dig these dugouts." Well, they started the next week to organize a committee and in that area they made dugout after dugout, with the result that next spring, when the water run-off comes along, the farmers will have a store of water for their stock. It is committees of that sort that we need in that area, committees that organize themselves voluntarily or under the direction of the department; and we want some legal authority to deal with these organizations as committees organized under the act. We are going ahead if this bill passes the second reading and goes on to final signature by the governor general. The other existing committee will probably remain.

There is one thing more I think I should explain in connection with the present intentions of the government in carrying out the activities proposed under the rehabilitation act. I will not go over what has already been done under the act as it stands. Everyone is familiar with the digging of dugouts, the building of dams, the reseeding of grass in certain areas, and everything of that kind that is being done.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: To what percentage of the whole territory involved does this work apply? How much does it cover?

Mr. GARDINER: It applies to approximately all the area I spoke of at the beginning, that is, the area contained in the lines from south of Morden to Lloydminster and towards the southwest.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Up to the present time to what extent have dams and dugouts covered that area?

Mr. GARDINER: When I was there last summer I had some discussions with our own organizations as to the rate at which this work was proceeding, and in order to convince them that they did not have a proper picture of it I took two of them in an aeroplane and we flew over the district. The picture one gets flying over the district is this. One looking down on a certain area sees that half the farmers have dugouts which they probably made when they first went there; no doubt they dug them in some better period. These men have no water problem to worry about because they have their water supply. But one will find in every one of these communities half a dozen other farmers who for some reason or other did not provide themselves with these dugouts and now in these difficult times they are without the means of doing the work. I shall be able to give the exact figures when the estimate comes down, and perhaps it would be better not to attempt to speak accurately until then; but I can say that a considerable number of these dugouts and dams have been completed over the whole area.

We have deemed it advisable to set up a central office in Regina and there we are compiling all the information that is available from the municipal authorities and the provincial and dominion governments with regard to moisture condition, soil condition and so forth in these areas; and in addition to that we are completing a survey made in the province down to the first of January, 1935, showing ownership of lands in the area. We hope to have that survey completed early this spring, and, when it is, we intend to call into conference representatives of all the organizations mentioned in the original act and there determine upon some line of policy to deal with the situation. To indicate what I have in mind, I may say this. There is an area where a complete survey has been made in the northwestern part of Saskatchewan. There is another in Alberta. The area in Saskatchewan shows that in a considerable extent of country there are only fourteen farmers still left on the land, because these lands are marginal lands. In all probability the fourteen who are there are among the best of the farmers who were in the district to begin with, and they are still there partly because they have a run for their cattle near where they are living. What we hope to do is to get the cooperation of the railway companies, which still have an interest in some of these lands; the cooperation of mortgage companies, who may have some interest; the cooperation of municipalities who may have taken over lands for unpaid taxes, and the cooperation of the provincial and federal governments, in getting the people moved off, say from a piece of mortgage company land in the centre of the area to a piece of land owned by the mortgage company outside the area, transferring the obligation along with the farmer. Then we hope to be able to have the whole marginal area fenced and turned into what may be called a community pasture. We hope to have the government take some responsibility for providing a water supply and directing the breeding of live stock in those areas. In other words, instead of trying to convince the people of that section that the land should all be turned back to range country, comparatively small areas, which are surrounded by better land, should be selected and turned into community pastures, which should be placed at the disposal of the people in the neighbourhood without cost to the individual other than the fees he pays to put his stock there. In brief, the land would be converted into what are for all intents and purposes public ranches.

Last year some of our friends from eastern Canada went west to purchase cattle under a scheme which the government evolved of paying half the freight on cattle brought from the drought area to eastern Canada. I think they will all agree that in buying cattle they got the best satisfaction when they could go to a ranch where the cattle were all bred in one way so that when they looked at one animal it could be taken as fairly representative of most of the stock to be found in the herd. They purchased these cattle, brought them to eastern Canada, and are feeding them on their farms here. We believe that the setting up of a number of these community pastures will result in their becoming breeding areas for the stock of that district, to which people can go and obtain stock from time to time. Experience shows that 600,000 head of cattle in the southern part of Saskatchewan, and a much greater number in southern Alberta, is too large a number to be fed there from year to year under the weather conditions that exist.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. GARDINER: If we can have the herds properly established in the first place, breed them properely, and make it possible for individuals, either dealing indirectly or going and seeing the stock for themselves, to have this well known breed of stock brought down to feeding fields elsewhere at about one year old, we believe we shall be doing something for agriculture not only in the drought area but throughout the length and breadth of eastern Canada. In other words, we hope to bring together all the people of Canada, not only as has been done in recent years in helping the people in that area in difficulties which are beyond their power to overcome, but to cooperate in reestablishing them.

Going back to a point I made in the beginning, to the effect that I believe the system of surveys adopted was wrong, I am sure we can settle people to better advantage around these community pastures and around water supplies throughout that part of the country than in any other way. That resettlement will probably require the organization of these people into communities, and the communities will require committees such as are spoken of in the bill. These committees will work at the job with the advice and assistance of officials of the Department of Agriculture. In other words we hope to put some direction from the department at the disposal of committees established here and there, helping the people to do something for themselves. Nothing is more disheartening than to see a man in that country with a section of land on which he has been doing his best to grow a crop, and the winds and the heat in the early part of July gradually wiping it out, while he wonders what he is going to do for the next winter. And yet, looking down over the bank of a ravine such as that of the Qu'Appelle, if he is far enough north, or the Frenchman river, if he is in the southwestern corner, or the valley of the Saskatchewan, spots of land can be seen upon which he could live and use the land to much better advantage than it is now being used if there were means of getting there. When we build a dam that costs $130,000, as we did at Valmarie, and see below it some 6,000 acres of land that can be used for the settlement of people, this government believes that that land should be in the possession of the people of Canada, or at least in the possession of the province in which the dam is located, and we believe that land should be used for the resettlement of these people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GARDINER: If we could take people off some of the large expanses at the top of the hill and put them down in the valleys on farms of forty or eighty acres, give them a water supply from the dams that are built, put them in a position where they know they can grow sufficient feed for a certain number of head of stock, and then at some other point where wheat growing is not practicable organize a community pasture into which they can put their stock during the summer, have them properly bred and taken out in the fall and brought back to the feeding lots, we should be doing two things: organizing the people into communities where life would be more worth while, and at the same time cutting down the expenses of the municipalities, the school districts, and the province. And I think we can do the same thing about community pastures on the marginal land as we can about these reservoirs of water of which I have been speaking. As to the areas of better land, I think we need not worry particularly. Those for the time being will operate very much as they are.

May I conclude by saying that this not a one year job; it is not a job that can be done by having an act on the statute book providing so much money this year and perhaps nothing next year. I do not think it is a job that can be done even in three years. The bill now before the house is limited to three years, merely to allow us to proceed with the job we have in hand to the point where we can come back to the house, show what has been accomplished and ask for the amount of money we believe will carry the job to a conclusion. We believe the time has arrived when the Dominion of Canada, looking back at an expenditure of $50,000,000, should be prepared to face an expenditure of at least $10,000,000 over a period in order to avoid similar expenditures in the future.

I therefore move the second reading of this bill in order that it may go on to the committee.

Mr. G. W. McDONALD (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the bill which is before the house, and I know that all hon. members from the west, and particularly those from the southern parts, are equally interested, as well as a large number of people who have been affected by the drought of recent years. I wish to compliment the minister on his presentation of the case and to concur in all he has said on this burning question. It is quite evident he has made a real study of the subject, and I believe all hon. members ought to show an interest in it, not only to save future expenditures, but because it is good business to grapple with the problem when it presents itself. I am sure hon. members were interested to hear that one-quarter to one-fifth of the tillable land in Canada has been affected by the drought. One other fact seems equally evident, namely that if the problem is not solved in the near future the trouble will spread.

Before discussing the subject under review, on behalf of the people from the west may I thank the former administration for introducing the legislation, and the present one for amending it and trying to put it into operation. Further, may I thank both governments for the splendid help given the people in the west by way of relief. Ten years ago our people would have scorned the idea of having to accept relief. We have as good a class of people in western Canada as are to be found anywhere, and relief is one of the things they never thought they would have to accept. For that reason I would urge that the house do everything possible, as soon as possible, to help overcome conditions in the west which are bound to spread. Drought and drifting sand will not confine themselves to a small area, but will soon extend to greater and greater proportions.

Further, may I thank the combined churches of Canada who were responsible for shipping hundreds of carloads of vegetables into western Canada. One should refer also to the Red Cross, because surely if there is one organization in Canada which is doing good work, it is that one. In thanking the Red Cross one must include those who contributed to its fund. Then, in this connection I cannot leave out the manufacturers. I have talked to some of the secretaries responsible for the distribution of the clothing shipped into our country by hundreds of bundles, and they have said to me that some of the articles were too good. I replied, "Not a bit of it." We received all kinds of underwear for the people in the district, and other commodities, including the best grade of woollen blankets Those things are not too good for our people. Those who received them certainly feel grateful to the people who gave them, and I believe good will come of it. We must remember the old saying that it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. It is my belief that the spirit of gratitude in which the people of the west received these goods will certainly cause them to have a better understanding of and a more kindly feeling towards their friends in the east. It will be a long time before we forget the kindness of the people throughout all Canada, and the splendid way in which they came to our relief at a time when we so sorely needed it.

I am not in a position to give expert advice as to how the difficulties in the west can be obviated, but I am pleased to see that the government has made a start. The minister was talking about dugouts, of which in my constituency there are hundreds. We have machines in the west which will dig as many as two in a day. They have been working for many weeks, and yet it will be a long time before every person can have a dugout. They are still within thirty miles of the town of Boissevain in which I live. However, the people who have the machines are digging them as quickly as they can be dug, and in every instance the government is doing its share.

Then, we are planting trees. We have begun an experiment in the southwestern portion of our province. Two whole townships, with the exception of very few farmers, have agreed to prepare the land and to plant the trees furnished free by the government, even to the extent of paying the express charges. The farmers are paid at the rate of $3.50 per thousand for planting the trees, and in addition they are paid $20 per mile per year over a period of four years for attending to the trees which have been planted. In 1936 hundreds of miles of land within the area were prepared for the planting of trees, but I am sorry to say the drought was so severe that the experts from the Department of Agriculture would allow us to plant only 125 miles. The trees are of the giant Caragana type. They are planted forty rods apart, and will be cultivated by the farmers of the district and paid for by the government. This is the first experiment of the kind, so far as I know, in the province of Manitoba.

In addition to that the Souris river has been surveyed from the boundary as far north as the town of Souris and I believe it is the intention of the government to put in at least a few dams. Some may say that it was an act of God that brought on the difficulty. I wish to say that these are conditions of which we have had no experience. The land on the western plains is possibly as fertile as any land under the sun. Past events have proven the truth of this statement. In some seasons when the rainfall is slight and when the winds are high we experience continual drifting, which in a very short time will blot out or cut off even the most rapid growth. At that time of the year it takes almost continuous rainfall to produce growth.

We have these conditions, but it does not matter now whose fault they may be. We must face them, and I believe they can be overcome. There is such a thing as dry farming, and with the planting of trees, favourable seeding conditions, less cultivation, and more pasture land, conditions would improve. The time is not far distant when the farmer will be only too glad to take the advice of the Department of Agriculture in these matters.

In some respects the department has made mistakes and suffered through lack of experience, the same as the people did. I have been told that weed inspectors told different provincial departments that a serious condition was ahead of us, and that it must be tackled, but no attention was paid to them. In western Canada we have been afraid to advertise our troubles. We were afraid we might give our country a bad name. However, the conditions are now known and it would be folly to try to hide them. Fortunately they are not insurmountable, and with the cooperation of the house, departments of agriculture in the west, the federal department and the farmers there will be little difficulty in overcoming them. But it will take time.

I understand there are other hon. members who will wish to talk on the subject. I had not intended to attempt to give expert advice. True, I have lived in the west for thirty years and knowing the conditions I would express the hope that the rest of Canada may never have to experience the difficulties through which we have passed. But if that time should come the house may be sure that if people in the west are in a position financially to do it, they certainly will be willing to help out. I hope, however, that such help may never be required. No doubt after the experience we have had, the rest of the country will take every necessary precaution.

I shall not deal with the subject at greater length, except to say that the west is worth saving. Last year I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) speak of conditions in Alberta, where the farmers could produce in one year more than $100,000,000 in wealth. In the mind of the Minister of Agriculture, Saskatchewan may be the richest province, but speaking broadly of western Canada the former prime minister said that in the prairie provinces wealth can be produced in volume in a shorter time than it can be produced anywhere else. The matter therefore is well worth the serious consideration of this house with a view to the devising of ways and means of combating the drought problem as we have known it in the west for the last seven years.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the statement he has made. While there are many matters that we do not view in exactly the same light, I doubt whether I have ever heard the case for the farmers in the drought area of western Canada presented in a more informative or comprehensive manner. The constituency to which I belong is in the centre of the drought area, and therefore I feel that in discussing this problem I am not asking the house to devote its attention to a merely local problem. This problem affects more than half the province of Saskatchewan as well as large areas in Manitoba and Alberta. The problem of drought affects the welfare of hundreds of thousands of people in western Canada and ultimately the welfare of the entire dominion. The problems of the drought area may be divided mainly into two classifications.

First, there are the problems directly attributable to economic conditions. In common with the rest of Canada we have felt the repercussions of the world-wide depression which has been in effect since the fall of 1929. I am cognizant of the fact that every section of Canada has its own peculiar economic problem, and western Canada is no exception. However, there are several particular problems that have led to straitened economic circumstances in the west, and it is my intention to review these briefly.

The present economic condition of the prairie provinces had its origin in part, as the minister has already said, in certain mistakes in early land settlement policies. These were evolved and applied at a time when the control of the natural resources of the province was administered from Ottawa. It is unnecessary for our purposes here to endeavour to place the blame for these mistakes; suffice it to say that some 290,000 farm families were scattered over a huge triangle, the longer side of which stretched for some 1,200 miles from southeastern Manitoba to the Peace River block in British Columbia. Hindsight is always better than foresight, and it is apparent now that some more orderly type of farm settlement would have saved enormous sums of money during the past forty years. If outer areas had been opened up, only after reasonably close settlement along a limited network of railway mileage, the population would have been better supplied with roads, schools and transportation services at a much lower cost.

Another mistake made was throwing open for settlement large areas of sub-marginal lands, unsuitable in many respects for the growing of grain. Even under the best possible conditions, only a precarious livelihood could be hoped for in such areas, and in times of drought only failure could be expected. No continuous or extensive attempt was made to test the soil scientifically or to determine the sources and amount of water available. Where attempts were made to classify new land, these were ignored totally by the incoming settlers.

Added to the mistakes made in land settlement is the even more serious problem of the burden of debts now being carried by the people of the prairie provinces. Under the urge of speculation, farm and other properties were bought for sums out of all proportion to their capacity to produce. On the strength of prices prevailing at that time, money was borrowed against these newly acquired lands at high rates of interest. It is useless to say that the debtors were not compelled to borrow, for it can be said just as truthfully that the creditors did not have to lend. The money was not lent to the western pioneer because of any philanthropic motives. Money was lent to the west because higher rates of interest were available there than could be secured in the east. Money was invested in western Canada for purely business reasons; it was a partnership in which both parties hoped to profit. What was true of agriculture and business was equally true of municipal and provincial bodies. Expanding prosperity seemed to warrant heavy capital expenditures. In those days there were to be found lenders just as eager to lend as the borrowers were to borrow.

It is unnecessary to review in any detail the results which followed the deflationary period, commonly referred to as the depression. With the sudden falling of prices of all primary commodities, there occurred conversely an increase in the value of the dollar. Debts that had been incurred when wheat was $2 per bushel had to be met with wheat selling at fifty cents or less per bushel. The value of property dropped alarmingly and was no longer considered as good security. Loans were called in and credit restricted. As a result, farmers, workers and businessmen are now faced with the problem of debts, the principal of which cannot be paid at existing prices and to which has been added, in most cases, the unpaid interest for the past five or six years.

The Minister of Agriculture made some reference to the attempts which have been made along the lines of debt adjustment and to the debts which have been cancelled during the past year. I have no wish to digress from the matter before the house and get into the question of debt adjustment, but I should like to point out that the problem facing the western farmer who has had to accept debt adjustment can be summed up in a single paragraph contained in the standard renewal agreement which these farmers have been compelled to sign. I quote as follows:

> For better securing the punctual payment of the moneys payable under these presents and said mortgage, and pursuant to the Land Titles Act, the farmer does hereby agree to become and does become tenant to the mortgagee of the said land, and the mortgagee does hereby lease the said land to the farmer for a term of three years from the 1st day of January, 1937, at a yearly rental of one-third of the whole crop of grain of the different kinds and qualities grown on the said land in each year, to become due and payable at the time of cutting of any of the said crop. The mortgagee may at any time after default under these presents determine the said tenancy without any notice to quit.

Nor have government bodies fared any better. Municipal and provincial authorities have been called upon to assume hitherto undreamed of responsibilities in the way of relief. Feed and seed requirements had to be met, and added to these was the fact that revenues were curtailed because of the inability of large numbers of the population to pay their taxes. It has been estimated that the funded debt of the three prairie provinces is in excess of $500,000,000, and that the net municipal debts, including those of municipally owned utilities, are in excess of $300,000,000. There must be added to these amounts the huge sum owing in farm and urban mortgages, balances due on agreements of sale and on commercial accounts. When we add to all this the freight discrimination which has operated for years against western Canada; when we consider further the fact—this is taken from the report of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) as published in 1934—that the tariff cost the western provinces $54,925,352 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1931, and when we recall to mind the fact that, with the exception of the years mentioned by the minister, the price of wheat has seldom equaled the cost of production, it must be clear to hon. members why the economic conditions of western Canada are so acute.

As I said, there is a second classification of conditions affecting the welfare of the people of western Canada. I refer now, not to the economic conditions which are general throughout Canada, but to the climatic conditions which are peculiar to the section known as the drought area. For the past five years drought has affected an area of 75,000 square miles, including some of the best wheat land on the North American continent. This area is on a front of about 700 miles in length. When we call to mind that in 1928 one billion bushels—let there be no mistake, one thousand million bushels—of grain were produced in western Canada, and when we realize that over much of that land black blizzards have since blown with relentless fury, we can understand how parts of that country have been reduced to a veritable desert.

The real tragedy of the drought, however, was not the loss of crops, but the fact that the absence of water meant the loss of hogs, cattle, poultry and vegetable gardens. In short, the drought took from the prairie dweller his livelihood and left him, for the first time in his experience, entirely dependent upon the outside for his daily food. The result has been a lower standard of living for western people. Relief measures may have provided sufficient to keep body and soul together, but there has been no way of replenishing the stock of dishes, bedding and furniture that have worn out during the period of the drought. The vitality of our people has been slowly sapped; their health has suffered; the social life of the drought area population has been seriously impaired, with disastrous results to the mental and physical condition of our people. The Weyburn Mental Hospital, located in the constituency which I represent, is at the present time admitting an average of over one person per day to that institution. Education has been maintained only because some of our teachers with undaunted courage have continued to teach in rural schools for the unheard of pittance of from one to three hundred dollars a year.

I think nothing could show better how the income of the western farmer in Canada has been reduced than to quote from sessional paper 146, which gives the income tax paid and the number of farmers paying income tax in Saskatchewan since 1930. I quote:

Number of farmers in Saskatchewan paying income tax
1929-30	1,304
1930-31	994
1931-32	144
1932-33	32
1933-34	29
1934-35	38
1935-36	96

This is the total amount paid in income tax by the farmers of Saskatchewan during that period:

Amount of income tax paid
1929-30	$53,324 51
1930-31	53,128 50
1931-32	5,434 98
1932-33	776 26
1933-34	1,312 07
1934-35	2,614 72
1935-36	3,166 21

Nor has the drought problem affected the rural population alone. The greatly diminished purchasing power of the farmers in the drought area has meant hardship for the workers, professional and business men whose livelihood depends upon the farmers' prosperity. Merchants and professional men have found it impossible to collect back debts and have been compelled in many instances to continue serving the drought-stricken farmer without any hope of immediate remuneration. Workers have found that lower wages and unemployment have inevitably followed the bankruptcy of the western farmer.

The effect of this combination of economic and climatic conditions has been twofold. First, it has produced a system of relief of the most pernicious kind. Since the opening of the session some statements have been made in this house with reference to racketeering in the matter of relief. May I ask the house why we have such a condition? Is it not largely that we have placed a premium upon improvidence? In Saskatchewan, for instance, the government has a relief schedule depending upon the number of persons in the family, but there are deductions if the farmer milks cows, keeps chickens or raises hogs, with the result that the farmer is best off who does the least to help himself.

The second effect has been on one of our greatest natural resources, namely, the wheat growing land of western Canada, which is in danger of being very rapidly wiped out. The report of the Canadian Conservation Institute shows that the area affected by drought is slowly spreading northward, and unless some immediate steps are taken to combat this menace we are in danger of losing one of our greatest natural assets. I submit therefore, Mr. Speaker, that this affects not only the actual area involved but the entire Dominion of Canada. It has been estimated that the western farmer has had his purchasing power reduced to the amount of $450,000,000 a year since 1929. This undoubtedly has had a disastrous effect upon the industrial areas of eastern Canada. I feel, as has been already suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), that these conditions constitute a national menace. Were an epidemic or a flood or a forest fire to break out in any part of Canada, the government would promptly rush assistance to the district affected. I contend that an equally serious calamity has occurred and that definite steps must be taken at once.

The first step which I think should be taken, and indeed must be taken, is that the people within that area shall be guaranteed at least food, clothing, shelter, fuel and the necessary medical services. It is hardly necessary to stress this point. In a country which produces wealth to the extent that Canada does, there is no need for any person, or any group of persons, to suffer privation. But may I say this cannot be done if provincial relief grants are to be cut, as has been announced in the press, on April next. There can be no money in western Canada until after the next crop, if there is a crop. Most of the provinces are close to bankruptcy; they have been unable to collect their taxes, and a reduction in relief grants could have only one result, namely, a lower standard of living for our hard pressed people in the drought area.

The second step which I would suggest is a rehabilitation program similar in some respects to that outlined by the minister. The speech from the throne this session contains this sentence:

> A comprehensive program to meet the serious conditions created by widespread and intense drought in western Canada was adopted during the summer months.

Without being unduly critical, may I say that while such a program may have been adopted, no material evidences of it were at all apparent in the large part of southern Saskatchewan which I covered.

The constituency from which I come borders on the international boundary, so I have had an excellent opportunity of studying the work being carried on by the United States government in what is commonly called their "dust bowl." In an area slightly smaller than our drought area the United States is spending $500,000,000 over a period of ten years. This means $50,000,000 a year. Compare this with the situation in Canada, where we have spent $850,000 in two years in rehabilitating the drought area. In other words, we are spending less than one per cent of the amount being spent by the United States government in the same period in a slightly smaller area, admitting, of course, that the United States area is much more densely populated.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if rehabilitation is to be anything more than a mere gesture, we must be prepared to spend at least $5,000,000 per year over a ten-year period in order to produce any serious effect in retarding the ravages of the present drought and to take the necessary measures to meet a recurring drought. There may be some dismay experienced at a figure of $5,000,000 per year. The other evening the right hon. leader of the opposition reminded the house that there is a limitation upon the money which may be expended, having relation to the benefits to be derived therefrom, and to this the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) nodded his assent. May I point out that $5,000,000 is not anywhere near the point of limitation.

Mr. BENNETT: No one suggested that it was.

Mr. DOUGLAS: I am not suggesting that; I am merely saying, with reference to the figure I am citing, that it is nowhere near the point of limitation. In the first place, this area constitutes the granary of the world. It would cost a great deal more than $5,000,000 if we were to lose some of the finest wheat growing land in Canada or if we had to transport and resettle the people now living in the area. May I point out also that under an appropriate rehabilitation scheme whereby wages would be paid for services rendered, this $5,000,000 would not be expended entirely on rehabilitation; it would relieve us of the necessity of paying relief in some instances, and thereby a saving would be effected.

Let us examine, therefore, whether there is any hope of such an expenditure being warranted. It is often said that no matter what you do you cannot change the climate. That is granted, but there are things we can do. I have before me reports on a number of surveys that have been made by engineers, some under the auspices of the Canadian Conservation Institute and others under the direction of Secretary Wallace of the United States Department of Agriculture. Most of these reports agree on one or two cardinal points. The first is that the great tragedy of the drought was due to the fact that we were not prepared for it. The second point on which they agree is that the reason for most of the suffering occasioned by drought, was not merely the lack of crop but the lack of the necessary water to sustain stock, water gardens and carry on the ordinary routine of life. In short, the real tragedy was that the farmer was no longer able to supply his own table and feed his family. Had the average farmer been able to keep his cattle, hogs, chickens, horses and so on; had he been able to irrigate even a small garden, the loss of crops would not have occasioned anything like the suffering which has come to the people in the drought areas during the past six years. Most engineers are agreed that while we cannot change the drought cycle, nevertheless we can prepare for the contingency of drought. Some authorities contend that the drought cycle ended in 1936, which may or may not be true. If the present drought cycle is broken—and we hope it is—then not only must we rehabilitate the soil from the ravages of the drought that has taken place, we must also take measures against future contingencies.

Whether we like it or not, Mr. Speaker, drought will continue to be a recurring problem. The measures to which we may resort have been dealt with already to some extent by the Minister of Agriculture, but I wish to group them into three classifications. In the first class are those measures necessary for replacing fibre in the soil. In the second class is the conservation of water, in order to keep stock alive. In the third class are steps to prevent, as far as possible, evaporation of moisture, which is so great a factor in soil drifting.

With reference to the first group, the replacement of fibre in the soil, I quote from the report of the Canadian Conservation Institute, which makes the following suggestions: First, soil drifting can be largely prevented; second, strip farming is at least effective temporarily until other factors are adjusted; third, cover crops help and, fourth, fibre can be returned to the soil by growing forage crops.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it is no longer wheat producing land.

Mr. DOUGLAS: That will be true of some of the areas, and I shall be more specific about that in a moment. There are areas which never should have been opened up for the production of wheat, principally the highlands, which are dotted here and there with lowlands which can be used for wheat production. Not only that, but farmers have been in the habit of leaving a large part of their farms in summer fallow every third year. Now they have come to the point where, if they can afford to do so, instead of leaving part of their farms in summer fallow, they put in some cover crop in order to put fibre back into the soil. In North Dakota I came across a number of farmers whose soil had been tested. The nitrate qualities were still in the soil; the difficulty was that the soil had been reduced to a powder by the constant erosion of the wind with the result that the soil lacked fibre. The government of the United States, under the A.A.A. program, gave these farmers crested wheat grass seed free of charge and paid them $7 an acre to put it in. They did so, and the results were twofold. In the first place, the farmer was no longer dependent upon relief in any shape or form; he had enough to buy feed for his horses and was able to keep his machinery in a state of repair. Most important of all, however, was the fact that he had begun to rehabilitate the soil in order that once again it might produce wheat.

I am not suggesting that we are in a position to supply free crested wheat grass seed and pay farmers $7 an acre to put it in, but I am suggesting that this seed could be made available and at least feed could be given for the horses of the farmers or fuel for the tractor farmers.

Mr. EVANS: Might I ask a question? Was that not done in Saskatchewan? I understand that crested wheat grass seed already has been furnished to the farmers.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes, crested wheat grass seed has been furnished, but in most cases where it would have been of value the farmers had no feed for their horses, with the result that they could not put in the seed. In many cases the horses are in such weakened condition or have died or been sold, with the result that the farmers are not in a position to put in the grass seed even if it should be given to them. It will be necessary to give not only grass seed but also feed for their horses or fuel for their tractors.

With further reference to the point raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition, before passing on I may say that in the drought area there are areas of land which never should have been opened up for wheat growing. Some of them will have to go back to grass for ranching purposes, and in those areas there will have to be such a movement as has been suggested already by the minister. In the majority of cases, however, proper cover and forage crops will bring back the soil to the point where once more it will be able to produce cereal crops.

Now I should like to say a word with regard to water conservation. As I have suggested already, during the drought the main difficulty was that it caught us unprepared. The impounding of water in small bodies would make it possible for a farmer in the drought area at least to keep himself and his stock. The other evening someone said you could not impound water if it was not there, and unfortunately in many districts that is only too true. But in many districts there is water which is not being impounded. In the spring of 1934 I stood at a point twelve miles north of the town of Trossachs and watched many tons of water pouring down into a gully. When I came back three months later, it was a desert where one could not even pasture cattle. Some steps should be taken in such places to catch the freshets in the spring by means of small dams built to hold water so that the horses might be kept alive. This might be done in three ways. First of all, individual dug-outs might be built on the farms. The Minister of Agriculture has said that, despite the fact that the government has been offering $75 for the building of dug-outs, very few of them have been built. The explanation is simple. First of all, it costs $150 to dig a dug-out to the specifications set down by the department, and this means that the farmer must be able to put up the other $75. But that is not the most serious handicap; the real handicap is that the farmer must have the necessary scrapers and these he has to borrow from the municipality. But when he borrows them and has only his son or a hired man to help him, it takes several weeks to dig the dug-out, and while they are digging it, other farmers in the community have not the use of the scraper. Unless there can be some way of paying the farmers so much per day or supplying feed for their horses and putting in sufficient machinery to enable them to work in groups, no progress will be made. A group of men could dig a dug-out in less than a week, whereas the individual farmer without any assistance will work the entire summer at it. In Manitoba, I understand, the provincial government has put out digging machines with the result that an entire dug-out is made in a day. That is not done in the part of the country I come from, and there is need of it. If every farmer had in his back-yard an individual dug-out according to the specifications set by the department, he could see his way through the summer and would be able to keep his stock alive.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the dug-outs hold water?

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes, they will. I had thought the water would seep away, but this has not happened. The ground is so hard that it retains the water. This fall I visited dugouts made a year ago and it did not seem possible that animals had been drinking from them at all.

An hon. MEMBER: Does the water not get very foul?

Mr. DOUGLAS: Yes; it would not be fit for human consumption, but it is excellent for stock. Another method would be to build small dams in some places. Farmers who have good horses and can buy feed should be able to build these dams very successfully, but a great many of the farmers are not in a position to do this. Again, there is the possibility of putting gangs of men to work. Here I would refer to the United States, though of course I do not suggest that we should follow them slavishly. In North Dakota and Montana I found groups of men working. A farmer working by himself received $4.80 a day, and a man with a team of horses received $8.80.

Mr. BENNETT: That was before the election.

Mr. DOUGLAS: He was allowed only ten day's work. The elections may have had something to do with it, but I know the results were beneficial. It gave the people purchasing power and it gave them supplies of water for their cattle. Another thing that can be done has already been mentioned, and that is the building of municipal dams.

Once the problem of storing water has been settled, the next question to be considered is the possibility of retaining the moisture and of preventing evaporation. This could be accomplished by planting shrubs and trees and keeping summer fallow from lying bare by having coverage growing on it.

I suggest that the attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon will be something of an inspiration and encouragement to the people of the drought area. Very frankly, they were discouraged last summer and fall. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) visited the drought area and some of us hoped that something would come of his visit. Unfortunately, however, he could not spend much time there. He remained two days in the drought area and most of the time he spent in Regina and Moose Jaw. Returning to Ottawa he said to the press that he had been encouraged by his visit. Unfortunately he was the only person on whom the visit had that desirable effect. However, the statement of the Minister of Agriculture leads me to think the government is going to take a more constructive attitude to the problem.

May I suggest to the government that the spending of less than an average of half a million dollars over a period of two years does not begin to touch the problem. It seems to me that in the past two years the government have been penny-wise and pound-foolish, in connection with this scheme. We have spent less than one per cent of what our neighbours to the south have spent in dealing with a similar problem. Five million dollars a year may look like a lot of money, but I submit that the returns warrant it, especially when we remember that in last year's budget we set aside $140,000,000 to meet interest on funded debt, and this year it will be $138,000,000. I remember also that some $3,000,000 went to the railways for maintenance of way work and this year we shall vote in the estimates nearly $300,000 for delegates and decorations in connection with the coronation.

Mr. SPENCE: What has that to do with the question?

Mr. DOUGLAS: In sessional paper 129 I see that we are paying to legal counsel in the Turgeon wheat investigation $20 a day living expenses and $200 a day salary. In view of all these expenditures, surely $5,000,000 a year to help to reclaim 75,000 square miles of country and to take care of nearly a million people and make it possible for them to raise their standard of living is not too much. This country cannot give too serious consideration to a group of people who are on the verge of starvation and bankruptcy.

Mr. H. W. WINKLER (Lisgar): As one representing a constituency lying partly within and partly outside the dried-out area, I wish to make a few remarks. The ground has been pretty well covered, but I would say that whether sunspots or trade winds or other contributing factors have created the condition which exists in western Canada and in certain parts of the United States, we are all agreed on one thing, and that is that it is a national catastrophe. Floods have been regarded as a national calamity in the United States and earthquakes have been so considered elsewhere. These calamities are spectacular, and though the calamity that we are now discussing is not spectacular it is nevertheless just as devastating.

Naturally there are difficulties in connection with the question of boundaries and the minister no doubt fully appreciates this fact. In the district I have the honour to represent there are two rural municipalities that still lie outside the dried-out area, but they are as badly affected as any in southern Manitoba. In fact, last summer I motored over most of the area in southern Manitoba and I can say that there is no area that is in a worse condition than the particular district to which I refer, namely, the municipalities of Stanley and Rhineland. These are only in part affected; nevertheless I am sure that those who have gone over that part will say that those areas are as bad if not worse than any in southern Manitoba. There has been considerable difficulty over these; letters have poured in to the provincial government and representations have been made, and the understanding seems to be that the federal government refuses to consider these areas as part of the federal relief scheme. I have before me a letter dated November 16 last, signed by Mr. Miller, the legislative assembly member for Morden, in which he says:

> I have been advised by the provincial government that the government at Ottawa definitely refuses to extend the drouth area to take in the southern section of the municipalities of Stanley and Rhineland.

In view of that I put on the order paper last Monday a question which appears at page 631 of Hansard, and the answer clearly indicates that the Department of Agriculture regards this area as not having been requested for inclusion in the area for which the dominion government would be asked to assume responsibility. The minister has just said that the department insists on the province making the recommendation in advance. Apparently no other recommendation was found than the map submitted early in the negotiations. So I suggest that there is room for considerable improvement in striking these boundaries. I am confident that ultimately these areas which are so bad will have to be included, but until they are there is going to be a great deal if dissatisfaction. I suggest that the provincial government be required to make a survey, because if they do not there will be municipalities all over the province asking to be included, and if the government depend upon petitions they will go very much astray. I have only one recommendation to make, which is that this government ask the provincial government to make a survey; if that is done, such an area as I have described cannot be overlooked.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McIntosh in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Committees.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it proposed to pay these committees?

Mr. GARDINER: No, there will be no pay.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Duties of committees.

Mr. BENNETT: I find great difficulty in this section. I believe it is a duplication of the existing section, and provides merely that two shall do what one is now authorized by law to do. That cannot be controverted. The position under section 3 of the act of 1935 is that named persons constitute a committee, and the duties of the committee are defined in section 4 of that act. It is now proposed to establish one or more committees, and the section defining the powers of the new committees, as well as of the old, is the same as the existing section 4, with the exception of changing the word "committee" to into "committees" and adding the words "land utilisation and land settlement." The first question which suggests itself to me is this: Is it proposed to do away with the advisory committee?—because otherwise the new section means nothing more or less, as I say, than simply the creation of another committee with the same duties as the advisory committee? Perhaps the minister would enlighten us on that.

[Mr. Winkler.]

Mr. GARDINER: If I thought the section meant what the leader of the opposition has indicated, I would have it redrafted. However, I believe it provides what we wish. As I said this afternoon, a number of committees have already been set up. They are advisory committees, but they advise locally. For example, in connection with the area surrounding the town of Estevan there is a farmers' committee known as an agricultural association, and taking in, I would say, about three or four municipalities. It has no direct connection with the municipal council, but the reeve of one of the municipalities happens to be chairman of it. That committee has been very active, it has taken great interest in the reseeding of areas, providing of water supplies, and organizing methods of digging dug-outs which I described this afternoon. This is done without expense to the government. Any time any departmental official or I may have been in the district, we have been willing to sit in with the committee and listen to suggestions they had to make. We have adopted those which seemed good, and have directed their activities in connection with other matters. It has not cost the government anything. It is all to the good, and we would like to encourage that kind of thing. The original committee for which there was provision in the act advised strongly in favour of organizations about which I have been speaking. Before I took charge of the federal department, half a dozen organizations similar to the one I have indicated had been set up. In entering upon the work we found that such committees had no legal standing. This year, in making an effort to get someone to take responsibility for the building of some of the community dams, we found that we really had no one to whom we could go who seemed to have any constituted authority to deal with the matter. We believe it would be much better to have power under the act to have more than one committee with the right to advise the government. Of course, if we think it is good, we take the advice of the original committee. Otherwise, we explain our reasons for not following their suggestions.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, one cannot change the language of the bill merely by stating that it does not mean this or that. The real truth of the matter is this: This measure wipes out of existence the prairie farm rehabilitation advisory committee. That is number one. And mark you, it does it very clearly. Why should the advisory committee be wiped out? If one looks at section 3, which is printed on the opposite page of the bill, we find the personnel of the committee therein set out.

When the original measure was passed, the house give a good deal of thought to it. First of all, the committee was to consist of the following personnel, as set out in paragraphs (a), (b), (c) et cetera. They are wiped out.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not say they are wiped out.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are; the section says so.

Mr. GARDINER: No. We do not of necessity have to have them, but we can reconstitute the same committee.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister is not going to say that. The present measure repeals the provision setting out the personnel of that committee. Let us have no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. GARDINER: I can say this, and say it definitely, to the leader of the opposition, that committee is still going to exist, and will be reappointed under this section.

Mr. BENNETT: But it cannot exist under that authority, because the authority is being repealed. Let us have no misunderstanding about it. I shall read the new section 3, so that it may appear on Hansard.

1. Section 3 of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, chapter 23 of the statutes of 1935, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"3. (1) The governor in council may establish one or more committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

(2) One of the members of each committee shall be appointed chairman thereof by the minister."

That is the whole of the new section 3. The section being repealed is as follows:

3. (1) The governor in council may establish a committee to be known as the prairie farm rehabilitation advisory committee, hereinafter called "the committee," the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

(2) One of the members of the committee shall be appointed chairman by the governor in council.

(3) The committee shall consist of the following:

(a) one representative of the Manitoba grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(b) one representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(c) one representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;

(d) one representative of Saskatchewan live stock farmers from the drought areas;

(e) one representative of Alberta range farmers from the drought areas;

(f) one representative of mortgage companies of Canada;

(g) one representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association;

(h) one representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways;

(i) two representatives from the dominion Department of Agriculture; and

(j) one representative of the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta."

This bill repeals all of section 3 in the original act, and the personnel of the committee, in its entirety. Why is that done? The minister says it is proposed to reappoint them. Then, why repeal the statute under which they are already appointed? I cannot understand the position at all.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to read the section as it stood originally, and then read the new section.

Mr. BENNETT: I have just read it.

Mr. GARDINER: And I should like to interpret it.

(1) The governor in council may establish a committee to be known as the prairie farm rehabilitation advisory committee, hereinafter called "the committee," the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

That is section 3 of the present act. Section 3 of this bill simply says this:

(1) The governor in council may establish one or more committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

The only difference between the two clauses is that the same committee shall continue to advise, but we may name other committees for similar purposes in connection with similar matters in the areas where they are working. We are suggesting that we should not be compelled to maintain at all times the personnel of the committee as now provided for in the act. But I repeat that there is no present intention of changing that committee.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are gone the minute this bill is assented to.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the old section they could be done away with at pleasure; under that section it was not necessary to maintain them.

Mr. BENNETT: No one is suggesting it was. The minister read three lines of section 3 and he did not read subsection 2 and 3, which I have just read and which are the operative sections with respect to this matter. He now says that committee can be removed at pleasure; of course that is true, but they are now being removed by statute, wiped out by statute. I want to know why and I think I have a perfect right to know.

Mr. GARDINER: I really do not think it makes a great deal of difference. The old section 3 says that we may wipe them out at pleasure, and section 3 of this bill says that we may wipe them out at pleasure. I am not saying that it is the intention to wipe them out, but the power is there under both sections.

Mr. BENNETT: They are wiped out now.

Mr. STEWART: I think the minister will agree that any committee of this kind should be thoroughly representative of every interest affected in this important and large area. Undoubtedly that was the plan and the purpose of those who drafted section 3 in the act as read. The minister says that the members of that committee may be dismissed at pleasure, but I understand that means the particular individuals shall hold office during pleasure. Under that section 3 you would still have to maintain a committee based upon the lines set out in the section. It seems to me that section was well drawn, and drawn for the purpose of making the committee thoroughly representative. The principle of the old section has been departed from and there is no underlying purpose in the new section. Any person may be appointed. It seems to me that the minister is weakening the act; he is taking a step calculated to make it less effective than it should be, and he has not given any reason why he is departing from the principle I have stated.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this not mean that the minister desires power to constitute more than one committee and he does not want his hands tied as to who shall comprise those committees? Does he not consider that the membership set forth in the original act would make a good committee for the purposes of the act? If he intends to retain them, why not continue to set out the personnel of the committee?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Could you have four committees all the same?

Mr. BENNETT: The fact is that the committee described in the act is not accidental. The committee provided for in the original act is one that came into being after much consultation with many people. It was not an accidental act of the government. It was the most representative committee we could possibly secure. It embraced representatives of every institution and organization concerned in the problems to which reference was made this afternoon.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Whether or not we like it, the bill now being considered by us wipes out that committee. It is no good to say that the committee will be continued, that it will be reappointed; there is no guiding principle as to who it shall be and as to how it shall come into being. The committee is to be wiped out and the minister will then be in a position to appoint a committee composed of as many people or as few as he likes personally. The minister will have complete control over that committee.

The whole principle of the act was, if possible, to get this matter out of politics. It will be observed that the committee was representative of all classes and interests and organizations concerned in this matter in the three prairie provinces. That precluded the possibility of its being political. The only manner in which politics may be said to have entered into the appointment of that committee was in connection with the appointment of the chairman. The minister still has power to appoint a chairman of each committee, but he has repealed the old section in its entirety. The original section set out a list of the organizations from which the selection should be made, but that section disappears. It is idle for the minister to say—I do not think he is really serious—that the committee continues because the minute this bill is assented to, that minute the advisory committee disappears. All the negotiations and discussions and efforts which were made to try to arrive at some basic principle for the appointment of the committee are wiped out. There is no longer provision that the committee shall consist of representatives of the various interested parties and organizations; the appointment of the committees provided for by this bill is to be entirely at the discretion of the minister. In other words, the appointment becomes political, using the word "political" in its proper sense. It is appointment by governor in council without limitation as to who shall be members of the committee.

The limitation which appeared in the old act was not accidental. It took a great deal of time and effort to get that section in the shape in which it is. Mark you, the committee was to be only an advisory committee. There was no suggestion the other day that it was to be wiped out, and I was curious to see what would be suggested about it. That was not stated even this afternoon by the minister. I can readily understand a desire to set up local committees. I said the other day that while that might mitigate to some extent against the national nature of the effort, nevertheless I was prepared to concede it. But the national committee is being wiped out; the personnel is being wiped out; the sources from which the new committee is to be selected are no longer indicated in the statute. In other words, they may be members of political organizations instead of members of the various mortgage associations, railway companies and others interested in this matter.

I submit that we should not make this most retrograde step. At a time when we should be concerned about the national interest, we are vesting this matter with purely political considerations. Such a step was not contemplated when this statute was introduced, because section 3 contained a list of the organizations from which the personnel should be drawn. The list was as comprehensive as one could possibly get. It was to include a representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association, of the railway companies, of the live stock and farming interests, and of the three western provinces. There were to be two representatives of the Department of Agriculture, but that did not give them a predominating voice in the advisory committee.

The committee was purely advisory. In his statement of a few days ago the minister certainly did not intimate that the government proposed to repeal the provisions of section 3 with respect to personnel. Nevertheless, that is what is happening. If it is the desire to strengthen the purposes for which this rehabilitation effort was made, the principles that governed in the creation of the committee in the first place should not be departed from.

Mr. McIVOR: As one who formerly was a farmer I can see the utility of these small committees. Suppose you want to dig a hole in southern Manitoba or build a dam in southern Saskatchewan; I think it would be a foolish waste of time to call together a big committee when a small local committee could deal with the matter far better.

Mr. BENNETT: No one has even suggested that. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) puts a construction on my words that does great violence to his own intelligence. We have said distinctly we are quite ready and willing that there should be small committees to deal with local matters. The advisory committee was a national committee to deal with large problems affecting expenditures of a national kind to be borne by all the people of Canada. That is the reason the provisions are as they appear in the act. Their insertion is not accidental; they were put in after a tremendous effort to try to secure agreement on the part of those concerned—great interests that have a deep concern in this part of the country, people who have a large amount of money invested there and are concerned also with the larger interests of the welfare of the people—in order that from these voluntary cooperative organizations in the various provinces there should be selected a committee which should destroy any possible chance of the national nature of the effort being made secondary to political considerations.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, I do not know what the leader of the opposition had in mind when the act was first drafted nor do I know what provisions the Minister of Agriculture of that day had in mind, but if either of them had in mind what the right hon. gentleman is now attributing to me, it would have been very easy under this act to do the very thing he says we want to do by amending it. This act reads:

> The committee shall consist of the following:
> (a) one representative of the Manitoba grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas.

It does not say that he is to be a member of any farmers' organization. He is selected by the minister and he can be any person at all that the minister sees fit to select from anywhere in Manitoba. Then paragraph (b) reads:

> (b) one representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas.

Again, it does not say that he has to be a member of any grain growers' organization in Saskatchewan; all he has to be is a grain growing farmer in Saskatchewan. Then paragraph (c) reads:

> (c) one representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;
> (d) one representative of Saskatchewan live stock farmers from the drought areas.

Not a member of a farmers' live stock organization or an officer of such an organization, but any individual at all who raises live stock in the province. Then paragraph (e) reads:

There is even a distinction in the terms used for Alberta as compared with Saskatchewan. In Saskatchewan it is live stock farmers; in Alberta it is range farmers. Any range farmer at all from the drought area may be selected. Then paragraph (f) reads:

> (f) one representative of mortgage companies of Canada.

Again, he is appointed at the will of the minister, and it may be anyone he desires to appoint. It is not necessarily someone chosen by a mortgage association. Then the subsection continues:

(g) one representative of the Canadian Bankers' Association;
(h) one representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways;
(i) two representatives from the dominion Department of Agriculture; and
(j) one representative of the government in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

All I wish to say in respect to that is that these men were appointed by the previous government, and we have not changed a single one of them. So, if there were any politics in the matter when the act was set up, we have not seen fit to play any politics by changing any of the men appointed. They are still there. We have been in office now for considerably over a year administering the act, and I do not know why the leader of the opposition should want to attribute to us intentions to do in the future what we have not done in the past.

In relation to what it is desired that committee or any other committee shall do, I attempted this afternoon to outline one of the things we had in mind to do. We have in mind to call representatives of the mortgage companies, not appointed by us, but appointed by them; representatives of the railway companies, not appointed by us, but appointed by them; representatives of the provincial governments, appointed by themselves; representatives of the rural municipalities in the three provinces, appointed by themselves; representatives of the farmers' organizations, live stock organizations and grain growers' organizations, not appointed by the government, but appointed by themselves. We have in mind to call them together in conference this spring just as soon as the information is available that I indicated this afternoon was being compiled in our office at Regina. Then we hope to ask these people to cooperate with us in dealing with certain problems having to do with the resettlement of areas into which some of these organizations assisted in bringing settlers, in the financing of whose activities some other organizations took a part. I venture to say that if we want advice with regard to that particular matter from any outside group, we would not be calling exactly the same persons who might be appointed. But I am not anticipating any difficulty in that direction. I have already discussed our intentions with these organizations, and I know they are prepared to cooperate with us. We have no reason whatsoever for feeling that they think there is going to be any political reason for anything that we are suggesting to them. As a matter of fact, I have always followed the policy; as I think most of us in connection with matters of government have, that the best politics is to deal with this kind of thing in a businesslike way, to call together people who are interested and to discuss the whole matter with them, whether they be Liberals or Tories or whatever they may be, and then, after having discussed it with them, to proceed in a cooperative way to handle the problem before us.

If it is necessary to set up committees that are more or less local in order to carry out the wishes of all these organizations and the wishes of the government, then we desire in this act to have the authority to do that. But we do not know that we would be either strengthening our position or putting these organizations into a position that they would probably like to be in if we are going to call in some other organization which we set up and choose individuals to advise us on what we are going to do when we call them together. Probably there might be reasons for changing the personnel as provided in the original act, and doing other things in connection with the setting up of local committees that are not suggested in the present act at all. The only difference in the powers that are given to "committees" as against "the committee" is contained in the words: "land utilization and land settlement." What is intended to be covered by that is the rearrangement of population in cooperation with railway companies, mortgage companies and others in order to put these people in better relationship to possible water supplies and community pastures.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the points made by the minister, I have to point out that he is now endeavouring to put on the statute a construction entirely at variance with that which he placed upon it when it was first mentioned in the house. At page 637 of Hansard, in moving that the resolution go to committee, he said:

In moving that this resolution go to the committee of the whole I should like to make a brief explanation. Dealing with the matter of committees I may remind the house that in the act passed in 1935 provision was made for the setting up of an advisory committee. The membership of that committee was indicated, not in its personnel but in regard to the organizations which were to be represented on it. We have had certain experiences during the last two years in connection with the carrying on of the work in the different provinces which indicate that it would be desirable to have authority to appoint more than one advisory committee. This particular committee which is provided for in the act as it stands will not necessarily be done away with.

That was the statement made on the motion to go into committee. I do not think the minister is serious in suggesting that the provision respecting one representative each from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways would be complied with if the governor in council appointed some persons not connected with either railway. The difficulties of defining with any degree of accuracy the organizations in any of the provinces concerned with farming or ranching so that there would be representatives of those particular industries on the committee would be very great. The reason the word "range" is used in connection with Alberta is that that is the term used with respect to cattle grazing in that province. Would one say that any person other than a representative of the mortgage companies of Canada could represent those institutions? Would one say that other than a member of the Canadian Bankers' Association could represent that organization? I think the interpretation the minister placed upon the matter the other day was the proper and correct one.

As to the case for the appointment of local committees, I repeat I am satisfied that this may be desirable. I said so to the minister the other day. It may serve a most useful purpose, for the reasons given by the minister this afternoon. If he desires to get rid of the advisory committee, possibly he has power under the statute to do so. If he desires to say that he is not going to be bound by this limitation, as he said very properly, the limitation not upon the personnel but with regard to the organizations which will be represented on the committee, I can understand that, but I should like him to say so. The effect of it is that he merely says this advisory committee is to be wiped out. In its place are to be what are known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees and the advisory committee, which might or might not have served a useful purpose, is to perish. Perhaps the minister would give us the names of the members of the advisory committee, because my recollection is that they were appointed as representatives of the various organizations to which the statute refers.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the list of names before me at the moment, and I would hesitate to try to give them from memory. I quite agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said. I remember the personnel fairly well, and I know that those I remember were not appointed for political reasons.

Mr. BENNETT: But the point is that they were members of these various organizations, the bankers' association, the railways and so on.

Mr. GARDINER: There were representatives of the railways, the mortgage companies and so on, and some of the other members may belong to stock organizations and grain growing organizations, but they were not appointed as representatives of those organizations.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the minister proposes that these gentlemen shall be appointed by or from various organizations, what would be the objection to rewriting the clause, specifying that where they represent organizations they shall be appointed by and from those organizations? Would that not meet the difficulty which has arisen in this discussion? I may say that I do not question the motives of the minister in making this change, but I feel that if it can be specified that certain people shall represent the grain growers, the stock men, the municipalities and so on, probably it will strengthen confidence in the act, particularly in view of the discussion which has just taken place.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister speaks, Mr. Chairman, may I say I did not suggest that the minister's motives were improper. What I said and what I repeat is that a limitation placed upon the exercise of the power by the minister was a fundamental principle of the statute of 1935. No such limitation now appears, and the appointments —and I was very careful to use the word in its proper sense—are what are described as political appointments. That is, the minister, in the exercise of his discretion as Minister of Agriculture, makes the appointments, and without limitation. As originally framed, the act imposed a limitation, and that limitation was imposed in order to prevent the possibility—I shall put it in that way—of purely political considerations governing with respect to the appointments. I did not suggest, and the minister should not say I did, that he had any improper motive. I was merely describing what is meant under our responsible institutions and representative government when I said the appointment was a political appointment without any limitation as to the classes that should be represented in such appointments. If, for instance, the minister maintained the section as it now stands—and as I must confess I thought, until to-night, he intended to do—and added his provision for additional committees, I would understand his position. If, for instance, he disliked the advisory committee he could dismiss it, since I assume its members hold office during pleasure. He could get rid of them, and then if he saw fit to do so he might select political appointees out of these classes. In that case I could not have a word in the world to say.

I am not putting it in that way at all, nor do I intend to put it in that way. I do say, however, that when parliament initiated this legislation, it was extremely concerned about an endeavour being made to place the effort upon a national plane, and the limitation imposed upon the government, which is upon the minister, as to appointments was contained in the statute. Parliament limited the government in the exercise of power; in other words, parliament said that the personnel of that committee should consist of representatives from the various organizations named. The minister says it does not mean representatives from these organizations, but that is how it was read. Certainly with respect to banks, railways and mortgage companies the appointees have to be representatives of those classes. If the act is open to another construction—I do not think it is—that could be easily remedied.

The point I desire to make beyond all question is that parliament, in setting up an advisory rehabilitation committee as distinct from a local committee, differentiated a national concern from a domestic concern; a matter in which all the taxpayers of the country are interested from one in which those who are upon the soil in the localities in question are interested; those who are concerned with their investments from those who have borrowed, and all this is dealt with in this statute by imposing a limitation upon the appointments. If that limitation is no longer observed, I can only say that I think it will militate against the general success of the effort. There never before was a time when there was such crying need for some unity of thought and action with respect to any matter as there is with respect to this. That advisory committee, serving without pay, was selected with these limitations, so that there could not be any possible chance of any racket with respect to it, or any favouritism. It was provided that the Department of Agriculture should have two members on the committee, though not representing it, in order that the minister and the department might be kept thoroughly informed and in a position to make such representations as might be thought desirable to ensure the national nature of the undertaking.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, I had nothing to do with the drafting of the original act, but I must say that the leader of the opposition is reading into the act a great deal that does not appear there in terms. Section 3 of the act provides:

> The governor in council may establish a committee to be known as the prairie farm rehabilitation advisory committee, hereinafter called "the committee," the members of which shall hold office during pleasure.

Then it goes on to recite where those men may be chosen from. Then the act continues:

> 4. The committee shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and to develop and promote within those areas systems of farm practice, tree culture and water supply that will afford greater economic security and to make such representations thereon to the minister as the committee may deem expedient.
> 5. No member of the committee shall receive any payment or emolument for his services, but he shall be repaid all actual reasonable travelling or other expenses in connection with the work of the committee.
> 6. The minister may appoint such temporary technical, professional and other officers and employees as he may deem necessary and expedient for carrying out the provisions of this act and the salaries and expenses of such officers shall be fixed by the governor in council.
>
> 7. The governor in council may make such regulations as may be necessary or expedient for the effectual execution and working of this act and the attainment of the intention and objects thereof.
>
> 8. For the purposes of this act the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated. . . .
> 9. The minister shall annually lay before parliament a report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year.

That is the whole act. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is in that act nothing which says that the committee is ever to be called by anyone. There is not a single word to indicate that the committee has to be called. No provision is made for any one having authority to call it at any time. In other words, if I wanted to do what the leader of the opposition seems to imply might be done, all I should have to do would be simply to sit back and not call this committee at all; it would not become effective and we should have no expense in connection with its operations. I do not know what the intention was in drafting the act in that form in the beginning, but that is the form of the act. In my opinion, nothing is to be gained by having on the statute books an act that presumes to do something and does not do it. That setting up of the committee has not had any effect on the administration other than that they are called together from time to time and you listen to the discussions and if you care to adopt their suggestions, very well. But you can do that without having it stated in an act. I have dealt with these men for a long time and I know them well enough to realize they are prepared to go anywhere and discuss any matter such as this without expense to the government. It is their business as well as that of the people who are interested in the area, and they are prepared to meet at any time. On previous occasions I have invited some of the very persons who are on this committee to come from eastern Canada to Regina and discuss matters concerning Saskatchewan, and there has never been any bill to the province. They come and discuss these matters because, as I say, it is their own business as well as that of the people of the province, and I see no necessity whatever for drawing conclusions which are not contained at all in the previous act.

On the other hand, as I have said, I do not see any reason for disbanding that committee, though I can conceive of the committee itself having very strong reasons for asking that I should disband it and appoint other committees, and the main reason is that these are the very people—the last three or four organizations mentioned; that is to say, the mortgage companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways as well as the bankers' association—to whom we are going to go and ask to have certain things done in connection with rehabilitation. I venture to say that they, in fairness to themselves and everyone else, would be the first to suggest that there should be some other form of advisory committee, and if they so suggest I want to be in the position of being able to say that I am not compelled by the act to keep a certain type of committee set up. There is no intention whatever of using the committee for the purposes that seem to be in the mind of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not see how the minister could seriously make the statement he has just made. He suggests that the act does not provide for calling the committee and that, therefore, it need not be called. But this amending bill does not provide for calling the committees.

Mr. GARDINER: We left the act as it was.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister leaves the act as it was; therefore, if it is good now it was good then. I need hardly say, however, that the purpose of framing the act as it was framed was to leave the widest possible discretion and power without limitation, because to endeavour in a statute to state what the limitation should be would be to defeat the very object for which the statute was framed, and the provision with respect to regulations that might be made would be ample if it were necessary to select that very committee in a locality to deal with a purely local matter.

The minister suggests that while the statute provides for the governor in council naming a chairman, it does not provide for the calling of the committee, although it provides for its appointment. Of course, there are certain legal implications that are inherent in a bill of this kind, and it is assumed that the persons thus named will discharge the duties which they are appointed to undertake. And then the chairman is appointed under the statute. The minister says that that committee is being disbanded. That is not what is happening. The committee is being decapitated, it is being put out of business; it no longer has any continuance because the statute that provided for its appointment is being repealed. It is not a question of the disbandment of the committee; it is a question of the dismissal of it by statute. There need be no doubt about that, and I do not think any good reason has been given for it.

The minister also referred to the fact that the representatives of the mortgage companies, the two railways and the bankers' association, making four in all, would be appointed. As, I believe, there are ten other members of the committee, they are placed on the committee for the purpose of enabling their views to be thoroughly canvassed by the other members of the advisory committee in order that the advice given the minister may correspond with what is enacted in the section. But it will be observed that the only change the government has made in the act of 1935, after the criticisms made by the minister as to the looseness with which it is drawn, is to add a section providing for the repeal of the limitation imposed with respect to the appointment of the advisory committee and to abolish that committee and provide for the appointment of one or more committees to be known as prairie farm rehabilitation committees, adding the words "land utilization and land settlement" among the purposes in respect of which the committee is to advise.

You cannot have it both ways. You cannot adopt the act as being satisfactory, adding to it only the words I have indicated, and on the other hand say it is entirely unsatisfactory because you need not do anything under it. The whole purpose is to do something under it, and something was done under it. This leads me to ask this further question: Has there been any termination of the services of any of those named under the act to be appointed by the minister? It obviously was intended, not that the committee should make appointments but that it should give advice, and I ask now, whether, by action under the provisions of the statute, there have been, since this government came into office, any dismissals of those who were employed under the act.

Mr. GARDINER: Since the government came into office, the offices have been moved from Swift Current to Regina. The main reason for that is that in our opinion it is advisable to have the records at a more central point, where many records were gathered in any case in connection with the carrying on of provincial matters. The same man is in charge of the engineering staff now who was then in charge. During the last winter some of the engineering staff were dropped because the work in the winter months was not considered necessary. Some of the same men were taken on in the spring. Not all, but a considerable proportion of the staff is the same now as before.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the chairman? I do not remember.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Vallance is in charge of the whole activity.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Vallance?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Immediately under Mr. Vallance is Mr. Russell, who, I believe, was taken from the staff of the old Interior department here and sent out. Mr. Jacobs is under Mr. Russell and he also, I believe, was taken from the same organization and sent out. Four or five of the leading men were with the Interior department before the lands were turned over to the provinces. These men were put in charge of the work and are still in charge.

Mr. BENNETT: Whose place did Mr. Vallance take?

Mr. GARDINER: The direction of the work prior to that time was under Mr. Thomson who was in charge at the experimental farm at Swift Current. We considered Mr. Thomson had sufficient work to do in connection with the operation of the farm; it had always been necessary to have a farm superintendent there; his services are still available.

Mr. BENNETT: What salary is paid to Mr. Vallance?

Mr. GARDINER: The salary is $4,000.

Mr. LEADER: I do not rise to discuss the legal point at issue, but I wish to point out to the minister what I think must be an omission. Section 3 of the act sets up committees, and what I have to say is in regard to their composition. The act states that the committees shall consist of the following:

(a) one representative of the Manitoba grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;
(b) one representative of the Saskatchewan grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas;
(c) one representative of the Alberta grain growing farmers from the drought and soil drifting areas.

The house will notice that the three prairie provinces are all represented as far as the grain growing organizations are concerned. Then we have:

(d) one representative of Saskatchewan live stock farmers from the drought areas;
(e) one representative of Alberta range farmers from the drought areas.

I do not think the omission is intentional, but the live stock growers of Manitoba are not represented.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all wiped out.

Mr. GARDINER: The proposed amendments make it unnecessary to appoint that committee, as has been pointed out by the leader of the opposition. Under the bill as drafted we could add to the representation on that committee or take away from it. It is not our present intention to do so, but as we go along there may be reasons why that committee should be either added to or members taken from it or that we should set up new committees.

Mr. STEWART: Could the minister give the committee a short resumé of the activities of the advisory committee? I am not sure whether any report of the committee has been laid on the table of the house, but it would be interesting to know how far the committee have gone, what they have accomplished, what they have recommended, and whether at the stage they have reached it is not almost fatal to disturb or destroy such a committee before they have completed a scheme and made a report. It seems to me that if they have launched any line of inquiry, until they have made a report they should at least be continued and permitted to finish their work.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not at the moment in a position to say how many times they have met, but it is not very often. Since I have taken over the department I have attended one of their meetings, the one held here in Ottawa. I think they held a meeting prior to that in Regina; I am not sure whether they held any others. I am not familiar with the meetings that may have been held in the fall prior to our coming into office. At the meetings which they held they did consider certain propositions which have been placed before the government to be undertaken under this act; they passed upon them as to feasibility. The greater number of these passed upon have either been completed or are in process of being investigated. I do not think I have anything to say in criticism of the work they have done; I think their work has been satisfactory to all concerned, but some even of the members themselves have suggested that the meetings might be more or less futile. They have no authority; it is very difficult for them to say that this thing should be done and the other should not; they simply meet and carry on discussion for the day, get reports from engineers and others and then advise on the reports they get.

As to the amounts that have been expended, I have under my hand the different projects for the two years the work has been carried on, and I think this indicates the scope of the work. Perhaps it would be sufficient if I read a summary of the larger conservation projects in the three provinces:

Wild Horse dam, province of Alberta, $14,990.
Middle Creek reservoir, Saskatchewan, $12,645.41.
Adams lake project, Saskatchewan, $5,429.55.
Municipality of Edward, Manitoba, $10,214.03.
Municipality of Lajord, Saskatchewan, $11,770.
Valmarie project, $123,332.25.
Eastend irrigation project, $63,080.
Canada Land and Irrigation Co., Alberta, $80,000.
Eastern irrigation project, Alberta, $14,990.
Dam near town of Souris, $4,000.
Crystal City, Manitoba, $2,978.91.
Red Deer gas well, Alberta, $4,378.29.

That is an experimental well put down to discover whether or not gas could be obtained at less than 800 feet, the gas to be used in pumping water for stock in certain areas.

High Creek, to the southwest of the town of Estevan, Saskatchewan, $17,431.08.
Mountain View project, Alberta, $2,500.
Crystal City, further expenditure, $355.30.
Wild Horse dam, Alberta, further expenditure, $3,000.
Valmarie, further expenditure, $1,488.72.

That makes a total expenditure in Alberta of $119,858.29; in Saskatchewan, $235,177.01; in Manitoba, $17,548.24.

Those are the types of project upon which this committee would be consulted. Then, on the general work of the department in connection with rehabilitation, such as the digging of dug-outs, all the committee would do in relation to that would be to advise whether or not it is a proper policy to follow. The work from then on would be conducted under the administration of the office which has been set up by the department. The same thing would be true of small dams and other projects. In connection with re-grassing, the committee would only be asked their advice in the first instance as to whether re-grassing is a good thing to do. Then, an agreement having been reached as to that, the experimental farm branch would go on with the work. That is the nature of the procedure which has been followed.

Mr. STEWART: The minister's report refers more to specific undertakings than to any general comprehensive scheme that would seem to attack the problem along the lines set out in the statute. I should like to know if there are any reports along that line. The minister speaks about the committee considering suggestions made to them—made to them, I assume, by his department. It seems to me that is putting the matter the wrong way about; it is reversing it. The committee was organized, as I understand it, for the purpose of studying the whole problem, all the conditions, and then on its own account making recommendations and developing a plan which over a long period of years was calculated to relieve the unfortunate and distressing conditions to which the minister has referred. I should like to know if there is any report on any action taken by the committee along that line, rather than action dealing with specific projects which may be said to be merely local in their nature and effect, and altogether much less in scale than that contemplated by the act.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that the minutes of the meetings held and the discussions conducted would indicate that at the earlier meetings of the committee matters of policy such as have been mentioned were discussed. That is, the question was discussed as to whether it would be a good thing to embark upon a program of strip farming. It was agreed that in certain areas that would be a good thing. Then, the question was further discussed as to whether it would be a good thing, in certain areas or sections where there were marginal lands, to start re-grassing, and it was decided that might be a good thing to do. Advice was given that moneys might be expended for that purpose. Another question considered was whether the planting of trees and the formation of protection belts might be of assistance. One or two areas were selected in which experiments along that line were to be tried out. Then it was decided, as a matter of policy, that it might be a good thing to dig a number of dug-outs, and that was agreed upon. It was thought it would be a good thing to build a number of dams on the ravines which, during the greater part of the year, are dry, but which, in the early weeks of the spring, contain considerable water. And the suggestion was that the water should be conserved for stock during the succeeding months. That has been adopted, and work has been carried on along that line.

Then, discussions arose in a meeting as to whether we should assist certain irrigation organizations already in existence. I imagine that even some of those members of the committee might feel themselves a little out of place in discussing and advising on a policy of that kind, because of their relationship to it. In any case, all those matters were discussed and certain lines of policy were laid down. Once the work had been planned, there was not much more for the committee to do until we had money to embark upon some new line of operation. So far we have not had sufficient to do even all we have been asked to do or all that we might like to do in connection with the policies about which I have been speaking. There are minutes of the meeting showing the decisions on these questions, and favourable decisions were made at that time.

Then, there were projects, such as the building of a dam on the Saskatchewan river, to the northwest of Moose Jaw. This dam would have involved a very heavy expenditure of money, and a further expense would have been involved in connection with pumping the water from the river to the banks. There would have been a further construction of works to carry irrigation to the south and east of the bow of the river. That matter was discussed before the committee. I assume they got their information from exactly the same engineers as would give it to the department or any other body if it were investigating a matter of that kind. The decision was reached that such undertakings were too costly and perhaps would not bring the results expected from them. It was felt that an expenditure of money to that extent would be more or less uneconomical.

Those situations have been discussed before the committee and, as I said a minute ago, we have arrived at the position where, when the members of the committee are next called together, if we are going to follow out the proposals made this afternoon we might have to suggest to them that, since we are going to be dealing with the organizations named in the legislation, probably they are not the people who should be advising as to whether we should proceed. As I said a minute ago, probably some of these concerns would be the first to see that. I do not think we should be limited by any act as to the exact personnel which must be set up in order to deal with any of the problems put before us in the future.

Mr. STEWART: I should like to ask again whether there is available any report of the meetings of the committee, or if such a report is referred to in any report of the department.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; I have read a complete report of it, and if desired, I can table it.

Mr. BENNETT: But has the report called for by statute been tabled? I could not find it the other day, but possibly it has been.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the report which is to be laid upon the table annually, and which is described in the statute as "A report of all proceedings under this act for the preceding fiscal year." Yes, that has been done.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, that is important. So far as I could learn the other day I could not find that it had been tabled. I am not quite certain about this, but I do not think it has been. I was looking for it the other day, but possibly I had not the right title, or I did not get it for some other reason.

However, there is one point I desire to make, and if the minister will give me his attention, perhaps he will realize that I am not endeavouring to embarrass him in the least, but rather am endeavouring to assist him. If he will look at sections 3 and 4 of the new measure, to which reference has been made, he will find that there is no provision for the appointment of the local committees which, I believe, has been the whole basis of our discussion. It provides for the appointment of one or more committees to be known as the prairie farm rehabilitation committees. Then, the duties of the committee, unfortunately, have not been changed so as to admit of subdivision between local and general committees. The point I made when I first rose to speak this afternoon was that the local committee, formed in the municipality, had these duties assigned to it. If the minister will listen, he will see that this measure does not at all carry into effect what he wants. It says:

> The committees shall consider and advise the minister as to the best methods to be adopted to secure the rehabilitation of the drought and soil drifting areas in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

It does not refer to the local area at all, but rather it refers to the whole situation. That is, the new committee shall be a national committee, so far as it deals with drought area. But the minister has in mind another kind of committee altogether. Then, look at the other words:

> . . . to develop and promote within these areas systems of farm practice, tree culture, water supply, land utilization and land settlement that will afford greater economic security and to make such representations thereon to the minister as the committees may deem expedient.

That is not at all what the minister wants. I do not desire to delay the matter, but it is clear that this section is not what he wants. As a matter of fact, when I first mentioned the matter this afternoon I realized that there was this difficulty, and asked the minister about it. I found later that we were at cross purposes. However, after listening to what he has said, it is quite clear that this section is not what he wants. He must have a section which is entirely different and provides for something quite different from the advisory committee; he wants a domestic committee. If he will just look at the language of the section, he will see that this bill does not provide for that at all. It is still a national committee, that is so far as the matters with which it deals are concerned.

I am not saying that the report has not been tabled, but I have not been able to obtain it. The statute provides that the report shall be tabled in the first fifteen days, and it probably has been, but so far I have been unable to get it. After listening to the minister, I have said that I am in accord with his suggestion for the appointment of local committees, but I think he will have to add something to the section. I thought the minister made clear what he had in mind in connection with the local committees, and I said the other day that as long as he retained the national nature of the committee he should have the widest possible discretion in the appointment of smaller committees, some voluntary and some on request, in the different communities, to deal with these problems. But I think he will agree with me that this section does not do that. I listened to the minister's explanation and at first I thought he meant to deal with the matter in the large way of a national committee, but he told the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) that he desires to have one national committee, advisory in its character, with other local and domestic committees. That is what I thought he had in mind, but this section does not do it.

I think he will agree with me that if he desires to make this certain in the bill, he will have to add another section which will make it clear that the domestic committees are not to be advisory. I think the provision for local committees is a reasonable thing to ask for, but I suggest that perhaps a better way to do it would be to look into this matter in the light of our discussion and in the meantime move that the committee rise.

I think we should have the report of what has been done. I should like to point out to the minister the details of payments which have been made and which are to be found on page 390 of the statutes of 1936. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act is an item of $214,000 for experimental projects and large scale demonstrations therefrom. There is another item of $234,000 for water development projects. Under western conservation works we find the following items:

Southern Alberta storage dam, Wild Horse, Alberta, $6,953.63.

Middle Creek reservoir, Govenlock, Saskatchewan, $11,368.69.

Dam construction at Adams lake, Govenlock, Saskatchewan, $7,500.

Construction of dams in the municipality of Edwards, Manitoba, $6,000.

Waskana reclamation projects, municipality of Lajord, Saskatchewan, $7,300.

Valmarie irrigation project, Valmarie, Saskatchewan, $121,187.28.

Eastend irrigation project, Eastend, Saskatchewan, $63,080.

Payment to the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, Vauxhall, Alberta, $65,000.

I desire to make some observations with respect to the payment to the Canada Land and Irrigation Company. These payments were made in order to make useful work that had already been done in connection with water supply. I received communications from farmers to the effect that they were being called upon to pay too much money for the use of water under this scheme. I think the minister knows enough about this irrigation project not to want to talk very much about it. This is one of the black spots in the history of this country. It commenced away back in the days of Sifton and it has been a continual drain upon our resources. During the war we put up a large sum of money in the days when Doctor Roche was Minister of the Interior. This has gone on and on, and every government has been called upon to make some payment in connection with lake McGregor and the distribution of water over the areas tributary to this system.

Under these circumstances I feel quite certain the minister will see that the bill does not meet his point at all. If this report has not been tabled, I suggest that it be tabled to-morrow. There are two or three matters in the province in which I lived about which I am very anxious. On one of them the minister spent $80,000 last year, and it may be necessary to make some inquiry with respect to this as the bill progresses.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to having the committee rise in order that we may give this matter further consideration, but I would just like to say to the leader of the opposition that this is not my suggestion. This suggestion came from those who have been administering this act.

Mr. BENNETT: About the local committees?

Mr. GARDINER: Officials of the department; not from Mr. Vallance, who is handling the work on the ground, but from others in the department who are in charge. I wish the section to be wide enough so that I can continue this committee if I so desire.

Mr. BENNETT: As the section stands now, the committee would have to be reappointed.

Mr. GARDINER: I can reappoint it; that is a very simple matter. I raised the very question brought up by the leader of the opposition. The latter part of the section reads:

> —and to develop and promote within these areas systems of farm practice, tree culture, water supply, land utilization and land settlement that will afford greater economic security and to make such representations thereon to the minister as the committees may deem expedient.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister very frankly says that that is the national nature of the plan as distinguished from what would be considered the local nature.

Mr. GARDINER: The man who drafted the bill tells me that that part of the section is intended to deal with the very matters the committee has been considering. Under the old section they submitted to the committee questions like these small dams as a matter of general policy.

Mr. BENNETT: They did not have to submit them at all; the committee was advisory.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: They have been using it for that purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: I think if the minister takes the matter up with the law officers in the light of the discussion to be found on Hansard, they will have no difficulty in realizing that the section does not express what the minister desires it to express. In the evident intention of taking a short cut, they have cut out the very committee which the minister desires to create, that is, the local committee. On the other hand, they have conferred upon the advisory committee powers that are national in their nature.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest that the section be allowed to stand.

Section stands.

On section 3—Committees.

Mr. BENNETT: I think possibly the minister will want to redraft this section.

Mr. GARDINER: It had better stand.

Section stands.

On section 4—Appropriations.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder whether the minister thinks it necessary to have that. All it says is that the governor in council may authorize the expenditure. What is called the release of an appropriation takes place as a matter of course after parliament appropriates the money. The Minister of Finance submits to council a recommendation for release of the estimate, and the governor in council may release the estimate of such sums as have been appropriated. I think the minister desires to say there that there may be expended, under whatever direction he may think desirable, under the direction of the minister or of the governor in council, such sums as may be appropriated for said purposes. But to say that the governor in council may authorize the expenditure—well, the very minute we give approval to the estimate we have authorized the expenditure. The minister knows that quite as well as I.

Mr. GARDINER: I am well aware of that, but we thought it wise to express the idea of continuity. I did not want a limitation on the amount of money which was going to be available. I thought that might well be left to the house and, in turn, to the government after the house had voted the appropriations. The government still has control over the expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, there is no doubt about that.

Mr. GARDINER: It was dealing with the idea that there is some continuity about this, that it is not just a thing which can be done this year and dropped next year.

Mr. STEWART: It seems to me the idea of continuity is better preserved in the old section 8 than in this new section. Provision is made there for the work going on for three years, but in this new section no provision is made unless it is appropriated by parliament in subsequent years.

Mr. GARDINER: The section will not do any harm.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to seem to be factious, but I am sure the minister would be the last man in the world to put that section in a statute. It says:

> The governor in council may authorize the expenditure in each of the fiscal years from and including 1937-38, up to and including the fiscal year 1939-40 for the purposes of this act, such sum or sums as may be appropriated by parliament in each of the said fiscal years respectively, for said purposes.

I am sure the minister will see that that does not mean anything. He can easily devise words which will be a combination of the old section and the new to preserve that sense of continuity which I think probably is desirable, because it is notice to everyone that it is a continuing operation, not just a one year campaign but going on not merely for one, two or three years, but, as the minister said this afternoon, probably for many years. What he wants to say is that this is going to last longer than one year, and an appropriation for one year is an indication that there are going to be appropriations for other years. I do not believe he will ask us to accept this section as it stands. It would be a reflection on the parliament of Canada to put it in that way. The minister has had much experience and knows that once parliament has voted the money, it is available for the purposes of the appropriation.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. member must take into account that authorizing an expenditure by the governor in council may mean the authorization of a particular expenditure under an appropriation. Where you have many small sums expended, such as has been the experience under this act, the release on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance is of the whole sum voted, but that does not relieve the particular minister concerned from recommending to council expenditures for the purpose of dealing with small projects within the gross total.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: That is really the thought which is in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it is easily provided for. You could say that the governor in council may from time to time authorize the expediture, in each of the fiscal years mentioned, of sums that do not exceed the sums appropriated.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the intention.

Mr. BENNETT: I see the point.

Section stands.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the committee rises, would the minister make sure about that report?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Civil government—
Salaries, $212,685.75.
Contingencies, $30,000.

Mr. MARSHALL: What is the reason for the increase in this item?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): As to salaries, there is a decrease as compared with last year due to the abolition, in accordance with P.C. 144/1268 of May 28, 1936, of the position of editor, grade 1, which had not been filled with permanent appointment prior to June 15, 1936. As to contingencies, the increase of $4,000 over the previous year has been found necessary owing to an increase in the activities of the department with a resultant added expense for travelling, long distance telephone, telegraphs and sundries.

Mr. STEWART: What is the position that was not filled?

Mr. ROGERS: The position of editor, grade 1, on the Labour Gazette.

Mr. STEWART: Was the vacancy created by death or resignation?

Mr. ROGERS: The position was made vacant by retirement.

Mr. BENNETT: How did he come to retire?

Mr. ROGERS: He retired due to age.

Mr. BENNETT: He was superannuated, I suppose?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: What do the industrial research clerks do?

Mr. ROGERS: They carry out special investigations with the librarian of the department, particularly in connection with the matter which is prepared for publication in the Labour Gazette.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been looking through the details of the vote on page 75 of the estimates. I assume these are permanent members of the staff in the head office at Ottawa. If so, what officers would be looking after the provision of work for the young unemployed or in directing any works planned by the department to provide employment? What officer of this staff would be assisting in the direction of such work as is performed in the United States by the C.C.C. camps in providing work for young men?

Mr. ROGERS: The special supplementary estimates will contain the votes for unemployment and relief. My hon. friend will recall that last year the estimates were divided in that way. We are now dealing with the ordinary expenditures of the Department of Labour, not with the unemployment relief branch. When the special supplementaries are before the committee, I shall be very glad indeed to deal with that question. There is in the list referred to by my hon. friend no official who deals directly with unemployment and relief as apart from the ordinary administration of the department under the deputy minister. Officials who deal directly with unemployment and relief are in a temporary branch of the department for which provision is made in the special supplementary estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then what does the director of employment service do?

Mr. ROGERS: The director of employment service, as I think I explained when the estimates of the department were before the committee on Monday, has general supervision over the employment service of Canada, but that employment service consists of employment offices which are maintained by the provinces on a basis of financial assistance by the dominion under the Employment Offices Coordination Act. That is to say, we contribute $150,000 per year to the maintenance of an employment service. I believe I have already given the figures with regard to that service.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): There seems to be a reduction of one typist, grade 1, $840. Is that an abolished position?

[Mr. Rogers..]

Mr. ROGERS: This case is similar to that of the position of editor, grade 1. The position of typist, grade 1, was not filled on June 15, 1936, and was abolished in accordance with the provisions of the order in council dated May 26, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the position has been abolished?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask the minister whether this would be the appropriate time to discuss the question of the annuities branch, or whether it would be better to take up that matter later.

Mr. ROGERS: There is a special vote for the annuities branch, and I think I would prefer to have the discussion come up under that vote.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well. There is one question that I might ask, because the matter was under advisement a couple of years ago, in happier days. It is as to whether the translator's office cannot be brought within the bureau for translations. It will be remembered that we endeavoured to effect a substantial saving, and the other evening the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) spoke with great satisfaction as to the results which had been obtained, notwithstanding the attitude which we encountered when we took that action. I should like to know whether the Department of Labour could not bring its translations under that bureau.

Mr. ROGERS: The question of whether publications of the Department of Labour should be brought under the translations bureau has been under discussion recently. We have taken the position in the department that while we would be very glad indeed to work out a common arrangement with the translations bureau, we would prefer not to be brought directly under it. The Department of Labour differs a little from other departments in that it has its monthly publication, the Labour Gazette. Certain of the details connected with that publication have rendered it advisable, until the present at all events, that we should not bring our publications wholly within the translations bureau.

Mr. BENNETT: Some years ago I regarded that answer as being inadequate, and I certainly think the necessary change would have been made if an accident had not occurred by which the hon. gentleman is where he is this evening. I can readily understand the officials always being opposed to the change. The minister will be advised that it is a very undesirable thing to do. There never was in any department a curtailment of employment as to which any person in authority did not advise the minister with upraised hands that to think of doing it would wreck the whole institution. The whole idea is to add to the number; never decrease it. It increases your importance if you are able to maintain a larger number than previously was the case. I know all about that argument; we had to meet it, and we had enough courage to meet it in a way which ultimately brought encomiums from the Secretary of State the other evening.

I suggest that the minister exercise some of that tyrannical power which is vested in a minister, according to reports I have read in the press from time to time, and see to it that, notwithstanding the advice which may be tendered to him, his good sense is allowed to operate. He knows very well there is $4,800 that need not be spent at all, $3,000 in the one instance and $1,800 in the other. I know that from personal investigation, but I also know there will not be one official of his department who will not advise him, "Oh, no, let us keep on more people for this job. It adds to our importance." The minister will remember what a very distinguished mother is said to have told her son. May I speak as an old man to a younger man, and suggest that my hon. friend be a real minister for five minutes and end those two positions. Just five minutes is all that is necessary.

My other point is with reference to statistics. The bureau of statistics claims it has all the information that may be necessary for the purpose of supplying a long-suffering and tolerant public with information, and the Department of Labour says, "We could not get along unless we had our machines and statisticians, because we are a little different from anybody else." There never was a department that you tried to cut down that was not different from any other. They are all different; they always will be. Is it necessary to have statisticians as distinct from the statistical department?

Mr. ROGERS: My experience and observation thus far lead me to the conclusion that it is desirable to have a statistician in the Department of Labour. I would say this, and feel quite sure the leader of the opposition will agree. The staff of the Department of Labour of Canada, as one sees it enumerated in the estimates, is astonishingly small when one considers the nature of the tasks that are being imposed upon departments of labour in our own and other countries. Certainly I have no desire to retain the services of any members of the department who are not performing their work as it ought to be done.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that: I was not suggesting that.

Mr. ROGERS: I wholly agree that we should make every effort to avoid duplication. When I came to the Department of Labour I was struck with the fact that there was a bureau of statistics and that some of the departments of the government also had their own statisticians. The publication of the Labour Gazette requires a continuous and concentrated attention to statistical data, which convinces me of the utility of such an official at the present time. As to the translations matter, I am not prepared to say that there might not be some economy in bringing the publications of the department under the translations bureau. As I said a few moments ago, the matter has been under advisement quite recently. I can assure the leader of the opposition that I shall be glad to reconsider it and to apply what common sense I have to the reasons that are given for retaining the publications within the department.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that if the hon. gentleman applies the common sense which he possesses, there will be two positions fewer in the department. There is one point I have not been able to satisfy myself upon. I did not have time in my day to press the matter as I should have liked, but it seems to me that the payment to the actuaries, having regard to the tremendous implications that arise from their position with respect to annuities, is not at all in keeping with the payment of $1,800 to a confidential messenger, the actuarial assistant receiving $1,920. It was one of those things that I could not get around to.

Mr. ROGERS: The confidential messenger's salary is $1,320.

Mr. BENNETT: I meant to say $1,320. The assistant actuary certainly has pretty large possibilities for increasing the charges on the public of our annuities branch, because upon his determination more or less rest rates and the settlement of many problems connected with annuities. The insurance branch does a large amount of business in connection with this matter and we all know what the report is. We are, of course, losing money in the annuities branch. I shall not discuss that to-night, but it is a matter we intended to deal with, and when the subject comes up the minister will have fortified himself with sufficient information to satisfy my not unreasonable thirst for knowledge in that regard.

Mr. ROGERS: The rates were increased.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister tell me how the work performed by the senior fair wage investigator and mediator fits in with item 175 passed some days ago?

Mr. ROGERS: The salaries are provided under the present vote. The conciliation and labour vote covered the expenses in connection with the performance of the conciliation services. The salary of the officer is provided under the present vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the work of the fair wage officer the same as that taken care of under item 175?

Mr. ROGERS: The title is chief conciliation and fair wage officer.

Mr. LAWSON: Coming back to the salary of the actuarial assistant, I see that it is the same as it was last year. Does that mean that he is at the maximum of his classification under the civil service? Apparently there is no statutory increase in that case.

Mr. ROGERS: The maximum for the actuarial assistant is $1,920, but I would point out, particularly with reference to what was said a moment ago by the leader of the opposition, that there is also provision for two senior actuarial assistants at a higher rate of salary.

Mr. LAWSON: Are they listed now?

Mr. ROGERS: They are listed just above —two senior actuarial assistants.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the qualifications of these actuarial assistants?

Mr. ROGERS: The qualifications are laid down by the civil service commission. I can only say that they do require specialized knowledge of higher mathematics.

Mr. HEAPS: Must they have passed the Chartered Accountant examination?

Mr. ROGERS: That is not a requirement.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): What are the duties of a confidential messenger?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not had very close contact with the confidential messenger mentioned in this list, but he does perform the duties of messenger between different branches, and he also attends to filing. I believe one finds confidential messengers in most departments of the government.

Mr. MacNEIL: To what extent does this vote provide for salaries of those officers of the department who are engaged in the work of the employment service of Canada?

[Mr. Rogers..]

Mr. ROGERS: The salaries of headquarters' office are included under the present vote.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is the total personnel of those assigned by the department to the employment service?

Mr. ROGERS: There are twenty-seven permanent and two temporary employees in that branch, and the director.

Mr. MacNEIL: The other evening, when this matter was under discussion, I directed to the minister some inquiries with reference to the Employment Service of Canada. I find that in consequence of what I said because of representations made to me, and because of the publicity that ensued, an unfortunate impression has been created that I intended to charge the officers of the department with laxity in the discharge of their duties. That was not my intention. I had hoped that it might be possible to extend the facilities of the Employment Service of Canada, but I had no reason to suggest at any time that the officers of the department condoned any practice which might expose young women seeking employment to unscrupulous exploitation. I wish to make that explanation in all fairness to the officers of the employment service.

Mr. ROGERS: I appreciate very much the statement made by my hon. friend. I did not understand him to make any specific charge against any officer of the employment service when he spoke some days ago. I believe I did assure him at that time that I felt certain that the officials of the various employment bureaux appointed as they are by the provincial governments, would be just as anxious as any officials of the headquarters' staff to prevent abuses of the kind he described.

Mr. HEAPS: The other evening the minister intimated to the committee that the department would probably appoint four additional men to study and become efficient in the work of conciliation. Is any provision being made in the estimates to cover work of that sort?

Mr. ROGERS: The authorization by the civil service commission did not go through in time for inclusion in the present estimates. The necessary provision will have to be made in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. HEAPS: In that case is it the intention that members of the existing staff retire in the coming year?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe I informed the committee some days ago that two members of the conciliation service are approaching the retirement age. Provision has been made for extending the employment of one of the conciliation officers. I feel that if we can retain their services for the time being, it would be an advantage to do so, particularly as we wish the junior conciliation officers to have the benefit of their experience.

Mr. HEAPS: I observe that in many provinces men are employed by the various departments of labour to perform a duty similar to that performed by those of the federal department. Is an effort made to have officials of the federal and provincial departments work in conjunction, or do they work separately? It seems to me there is bound to be a certain amount of overlapping; I have in mind what happened in Welland in the last few days. This overlapping is bound to lead to friction. Does the federal department work in close harmony with the provincial bureaux of labour or the ministers in the various provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: There has been the utmost cooperation in the conciliation work which is done by the federal Department of Labour and that done by the provincial departments. Not all provincial departments of labour have conciliation officers. Quebec and Ontario at any rate have officers who specialize in conciliation work. At Welland representatives of the federal department and the Ontario department were on the scene of the dispute at the same time and worked with the utmost harmony. There is a possibility of duplication, and possibly of conflict, but normally the federal department sends its conciliation officers when the parties request the services of such an officer. The federal department has had perhaps a wider experience in this type of work, and generally speaking it does not happen that you have a conciliation officer of the federal department working with one from a provincial department in seeking to bring about settlement of a dispute.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the work of the chief conciliation officer coordinate with the work provided for under vote 174?

Mr. ROGERS: Item 174, which passed the committee on Monday, covers the publication of the Labour Gazette, and travelling and sundry expenses connected with the administration of the Conciliation and Labour Act.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the salary of this officer?

Mr. ROGERS: The salary of the officer is covered under the present vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under contingencies, what is embraced in the items: clerical and other assistance, $9,972, printing and stationery, $9,000 and sundries, $11,028?

Mr. ROGERS: The item of salaries in the contingency vote covers the office staff of the minister's department.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there a list?

Mr. ROGERS: I have a list before me. Does my hon. friend wish the names and the salaries paid?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been trying to find it in the auditor general's report. If it is salaries, why is it not enumerated just as they are above under some one of the various branches?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe this is customary. The salaries listed under civil government are salaries of permanent officers of the department. The staff of the minister's office is not permanent; it is on a temporary status.

Mr. MacNICOL: The salaries under contingencies are not permanent?

Mr. ROGERS: They are temporary employees in the minister's office.

Mr. STEWART: Under the organization which has been built up by the National Employment Commission, have not some of the duties which were formerly discharged by the regular staff of the department been taken over by that organization? If that be so, should there not be some decrease in the staff? Then I notice one official in particular, an accountant. I know that in other departments the comptroller reorganized and took over the accounting very largely under his staff. Does that apply with respect to that particular official?

Mr. ROGERS: The accountant referred to by my hon. friend is a permanent officer of the department, has been there for many years, and is in charge of the personnel. As far as the general accounting service is concerned, the Department of Labour has cooperated with the comptroller of the treasury in the effort to concentrate the accounting under one supervising head.

As to whether certain duties formerly discharged by members of the department have not now been transferred to the National Employment Commission, I would remind the hon. member that we are dealing, under the civil government vote, with the permanent staff of the Department of Labour, a staff which was not expanded to any extent during the years of the depression. There has been a certain transfer of responsibility from the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour, which branch is on a purely temporary basis. That staff has been decreased to some extent in consequence.

Mr. STEWART: Is the accountant to whom the minister refers on the staff of the comptroller or on the staff of the department? In the other departments I understand the accountants are on the staff of the comptroller of the treasury.

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that the accountant referred to is Miss Dewan. She is a link as it were with the civil service commission and is in charge of personnel. I gather that she does not do very much accounting work.

Mr. MacNICOL: The increase in the sundries item under contingencies seems very large in comparison with the whole item. The vote before us is for $11,028, whereas a year ago it was $7,055. Would the minister let us know what the $11,028 covers, or what it is proposed to cover?

Mr. ROGERS: There is an increase of about $4,000 over last year. As I explained a few minutes ago, that is accounted for by the increased activities of the department, with added expenditures for travelling, long distance telephone service, telegrams, and sundries. It is a very small increase, but it has been put in to meet what we believe will be an increase during the coming year under the heads mentioned.

Mr. McNICOL: Are these expenditures under unemployment relief works?

Mr. ROGERS: It is the work of the department, generally, and does not cover the unemployment relief branch at all. That is a temporary branch of the department, which is not included in the estimate before the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: The item has been increased by fifty per cent. There must be an increase of fifty per cent in the work to be done under that particular item.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I should give the hon. member a statement of the sundries during the current year. They are:

Travelling expenses, $1,120.04.
Telephone and telegrams, $2,454.53.
Printing and stationery, $2,872.15.
Subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals, $235.42.
Other sundries, $1,843.46.

The last item includes cartage, express, freight and advertising.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. BROOKS: Would the minister state the difference between the western representative and the general eastern representative? Would he state their duties, and why one is called the western representative and the term "general" applied to the eastern representative?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Harrison is the western representative. He is also the conciliation and fair wage officer for that district. Mr. Quirk is the eastern representative. He occupied a similar position for Quebec and the maritime provinces. That is to say, he is available to deal with fair wage complaints, or to serve as a conciliation officer in the entire area.

Mr. BROOKS: That is why he is called "general," is it?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Under the contingency item of "clerical and other assistance," to which the hon. member for Davenport referred I should like to ask one or two questions. I did not follow up the point because I thought $9,972 would include the private secretary. However, I see the private secretary is in a separate estimate, and I should like the minister to be good enough to give details of the item amounting to $9,972. I do not want the names, but what positions are involved?

Mr. ROGERS: Secretary to the executive in the minister's office; two clerks, grade four; a stenographer, grade two, in the minister's office, a stenographer, grade three in the minister's office, a confidential messenger in the minister's office; one stenographer, grade two. May I add that in the Department of Labour of necessity in these times there is a great volume of correspondence, and for that reason it has been necessary to increase the stenographic assistance in the office.

Mr. LAWSON: Does the secretary to the executive mean the young lady who does the work dictated by the private secretary to the minister?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that is correct.

Item agreed to.

International labour conference, $15,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was Canada represented at the last meeting of the international labour conference in October of this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Canada was represented. I take it the hon. member refers to the special conference dealing with maritime questions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; Canada was represented. The government representatives were Doctor Riddell, permanent advisory officer at Geneva, and during its earlier sessions I, too, attended. The representation is a tripartite one. At the conference there was a representative of the employers interested, and also of the employees' organization. Mr. MacCallum represented the employers and Mr. MacDonald represented the employees.

Mr. MARSHALL: How much of the last vote was actually used?

Mr. ROGERS: Last year's vote was exceeded by $600 owing largely to the fact that in addition to the usual international labour conference held in June, there was the special conference on maritime questions held in October.

Mr. MARSHALL: Does that mean an expenditure of $15,600?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe a number of important conventions were adopted at the special maritime conference. I wonder whether the minister could tell the committee how the Canadian representatives voted on these conventions?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not before me the report giving the exact information the hon. member requires. I can say however, that the Canadian delegates—and I take it the hon. member refers to the governmental delegates—supported most of the conventions before the conference, but I would hesitate to make a statement concerning each convention. It would be of no service to the committee unless the information were exact. I shall be pleased to secure the information later.

Mr. MacINNIS: My next question may be considered as one touching on government policy. However, as I understand it, at present these maritime matters are under the jurisdiction of the federal government, and I do not think there would be any legal obstacles in the way of the dominion's ratification of the conventions. Could the minister inform the committee as to the intention to bring down legislation at this session ratifying these conventions?

Mr. ROGERS: The conventions dealt with by the maritime conference in October last were as follows:

Draft convention concerning the regulation of hours of work on board ship and manning.

Recommendation concerning the regulation of hours of work on board ship and manning.

Draft convention concerning the liability of the ship owner in case of sickness, injury or death of seamen.

Draft convention concerning sickness insurance for seamen.

Recommendation concerning the promotion of seamen's welfare in ports.

Draft convention concerning the minimum requirement of professional capacity for masters and officers on board merchant ship.

I may say that the complete and official text of these various conventions was received only yesterday from the League of Nations. According to practice, these conventions are being brought to the attention of the Department of Justice. They will then be directed to the particular department of government which is chiefly concerned, in this case the Department of Transport.

Item agreed to.

Limitation of Hours of Work Act, Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act, and the Minimum Wages Act, $10,000.

Mr. LAWSON: I had almost anticipated the minister advising us of the abandonment of this item in view of the recent decisions. Would he be good enough to state for what purposes this vote is now required?

Mr. ROGERS: As my hon. friend will realize, this particular item was included in the estimates before the decisions of the privy council were announced. It is of the same description and amount as the item that was inserted in the estimates last year. At that time we felt that there was some possibility of expenditures being needed in connection with setting up inspectional staffs and possibly for drawing up regulations under these various statutes. I doubt whether we ought to eliminate this item at the present time. I think it might stand in the possible event that it might prove of value to have a conference with the provinces with respect to this legislation.

Mr. LAWSON: What amount was expended last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Some $2,100, entirely in connection with drawing up regulations in anticipation of the possible decisions of the court.

Mr. LAWSON: If only $2,100 was required last year, I would suggest that it is difficult to conceive that the calling of a conference of representatives of the provinces would involve an expenditure of $10,000. I think the minister must have in mind some more definite use than that when he asks that this item be left in the estimates.

Mr. ROGERS: I assure my hon. friend that I have no designs beyond what I have suggested. It is simply there, as I see it, to meet what might be a very remote contingency, that is, the desirability of having a conference with the provinces in connection with the subject matters of this legislation. As I have stated before, this item was included in the estimates before the decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council were announced. It does seem to me that it might be of some value to have it remain.

Mr. LAWSON: Is this one of those votes that lapses if it is not used for the purpose indicated, or can it be used for some other purpose?

Mr. ROGERS: If it is not used for the purpose indicated, it cannot be used at all.

Mr. McIVOR: Has this item anything to do with the enforcement of the eight hour day for unorganized labour? I know of unorganized workers who do not have an eight hour day or who do not get one day of rest in seven.

Mr. ROGERS: This item was included to provide for the administration of the Limitation of Hours of Work Act, the Weekly Rest in Industrial Undertakings Act and the Minimum Wages Act, assuming that these statutes were upheld by the judicial committee of the privy council. The judicial committee has ruled against their validity, and the item is retained against the contingency of a conference being held with the provinces to consider the subject matter of the legislation.

Mr. MacNICOL: First of all, I want to express my regret for the fact that the legislation passed by the former government has been disallowed by the privy council. I hope the minister will use his most vigorous efforts to continue the line of activity of the last government to do something for labour. The previous government never received the credit they should have received for the honest efforts they made to help workmen throughout the country. They endeavoured to see that there was no violation of the minimum wage law, that the workers should work only for a reasonable week and that the hours of labour per day should be limited. When the legislation proposed by the late government was going through the house, the draft conventions and recommendations of the international labour conferences from 1919 to 1934 were referred to. I believe that at that time the then member for Kenora-Rainy River, who had previously been the Minister of Labour, the Hon. Mr. Heenan, supported the efforts of the government to relieve the disabilities under which workmen are now labouring. Article I of draft convention number 26 reads:

> Each member of the international labour organization which ratifies this convention undertakes to create or maintain machinery whereby minimum rates of wages can be fixed for workers employed in certain of the trades or parts of trades (and in particular in home working trades) in which no arrangements exist for the effective regulation of wages by collective agreement or otherwise and wages are exceptionally low.

It is about time that we had some law in Canada to control the rates as to minimum wages. Where there is no control over wages, we have sweat shop conditions, and there is too much of that in this country. For years the International Labour Union has endeavoured to induce all governments to adopt minimum wage laws. I am one of those who like to support the efforts of this union and the unions associated with it in Canada to ensure better conditions for the working man in the way of better wages and treatment. I am not one of those who condemn industry. My observations have been that industry generally treats the labouring man fairly. There is the odd industrialist who brings censure on industry generally. It was to take care of that odd man who does not treat labour properly that these draft conventions respecting minimum wages, hours of labour and the weekly day of rest were adopted. The minister, I am convinced, has at heart the best interests of the workers of this country, and I sincerely hope that he will achieve something along these lines. We read almost daily of men and women working an outrageous number of hours per week, apparently because the federal government has not sufficient authority, as I am convinced it should have, to enforce its will in this regard in the various provinces.

The time is past when one province or another—and I have no particular province in mind at the moment—should permit conditions to prevail in factories, which conditions another province would not tolerate for one minute. I am convinced the time has come—and I am sorry the privy council did not see it in that way—when this parliament should endeavour to bring about uniform conditions in labour from one end of Canada to the other. Uniform conditions in labour throughout Canada would work against the practice of employers in one province moving their whole plant to another province where labour restrictions are not as severe. I could name offhand a number, and I could easily obtain a list of perhaps fifty factories that in the last few years have moved from the city of Toronto to another province than Ontario, because in Toronto so far as possible industrialists are induced by compulsion, public opinion, and perhaps by the local government, which I believe does endeavour to carry out the majority will of the operators in this regard, to provide decent working conditions.

These firms have moved outside the province of Ontario to where they can operate without the restrictions prevailing in Toronto. I hope the day is not far distant when employers in all the provinces of Canada will have to maintain in their factories more reasonable conditions than obtain in some places to-day.

Something was said the other day about the posting of wages. I am in accord with that. I believe that men working in factories should know what is being paid for the various grades of work therein. That is all provided for in the draft convention concerning the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery. I quote from section IV:

> For effectively protecting the wages of the workers concerned and safeguarding the employers affected against the possibility of unfair competition—

That is surely one thing which this government should have power to ensure, protection against unfair competition.

> —the measures to be taken to ensure that wages are not paid at less than the minimum rates which have been fixed should include > (a) arrangements for informing the employers and workers of the rates enforced;

The workers should know what those rates are. A few days ago in this house it was stated that certain workers were not able to obtain the rates in force. It is surely their privilege to know how what they are being paid compare with rates being paid elsewhere. They should know that they are receiving a return equal to what is paid elsewhere. The section continues:

> (b) official supervision of the rates actually being paid; and
> (c) penalties for infringements of the rates in force and measures for preventing such infringements.

This vote is a very small one, and I do not know just what the minister can do with it. But if it would help him to call a provincial conference which might be induced to recommend that this government and the minister and his department shall have more control over minimum wages, the limitation of hours of labour, and the weekly day of rest, he would be doing a wonderful work for $10,000, a work that would be worth many times the vote. I wish the minister every success in such work. I believe he is earnest in his intentions, and I should like to see him obtain such recommendations from a provincial conference that he might obtain power to ensure fair play for the workers throughout this country.

When I stop to think of the throwing out of an act that was passed by the late government, the unemployment insurance act, I can hardly find words to express my feelings. What is the result to-day? I have no hesitation in saying that it was one of the greatest social acts enacted by a British parliament. The workers in England are working full blast making munitions to-day. When that work slows up many thousands of men may be thrown out of work, but every man who is thus thrown out of work will, during his years of employment, have laid up for himself a fairly substantial unemployment insurance pension which he will find very helpful in the years when work is slack. I hope they will not be unemployed, because a steady wage is better than unemployment insurance. But next to a steady wage, unemployment insurance is the very best thing I know, and I sincerely hope that the minister, during his term of office, may be able to bring that great boon to the workers of this country.

I am not going to discuss the subject to-night because I spoke on it when the bill was before the house, but I may say that it is one of which I have made a very exhaustive and extensive study, examining into conditions in Europe and other countries. I do hope the minister with his sincerity will be able to bring this boon to the working men of Canada. I know that this subject does not come under this item, but all these questions are inter-related because a minimum wage, if enforced, will eliminate the sweat-shops, and the elimination of sweat-shops will provide more men and women with employment. The limitation of the hours of labour—in some places in Canada the workers work sixty, seventy and eighty hours a week—and the reduction of the hours of labour to what these draft conventions call for, forty-eight hours a week, will result in the giving of employment to many thousands of men now unemployed. The weekly day of rest, if enforced, will give many thousands more men and women employment. I know the minister is an idealist, and it is up to him now to put many of these things into practice by whatever means he can employ, using persuasion and all the force of his character to bring each one of these boons to the working men of Canada. The working men and women of Canada have been too long without them. I give the late government credit; it certainly made an honest and vigorous attempt to provide these boons to the working classes of this country. It is true that the acts were thrown out, but it would be unfortunate if the good things the working men of these nine provinces of Canada ought to have should be denied them because we have nine provinces. I certainly hope the minister will be able to do something which will bring these matters under the control of the department of which he has charge.

I cannot speak for the labour organizations, but I have seen their work, and during the time I was associated with business we had the benefit of the experience and assistance of sound labour organizations at all times. At that time, when I was in business, I believe the international labour organization of Washington and its counterpart here in Canada rendered actual service to industry. I am not one of those who attack these labour organizations, because I know what they do. When we had any trouble in the plant with which I was associated, invariably the labour organizations which directed or controlled men in that plant tried, by conciliation, to keep those men employed and never, so far as I can remember, induced them to go on strike if it could be avoided. A labour organization which does that does good work. In my twenty-five years in industry I saw many fine improvements which were recommended by labour organizations. I am sure, if the minister would attend the next nation-wide meeting of the Canadian labour organizations and present the benefits of minimum wages, one day of rest in seven and so on, with all of which the working people are familiar, they would assist him in obtaining from the provinces, by conciliation and agreement, the necessary support to enable him to have placed on the statute books of Canada legislation that would be beneficial to the country as a whole.

We are asked to-night to vote a fairly substantial bill of salaries. Perhaps it is not enough for what the men and women in the department are doing; I do not know. I am not in any way criticising or finding fault, or doing anything but praising the staff under the minister. But it is a fairly substantial staff and its purpose should be, and I believe is, to assist labour. If that department can get under its control all the things I have mentioned, then it will be a real, one hundred per cent labour department.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before we leave this item, I should like to ask a question with regard to the $100,000 in aid of technical education, authorized by statute. Was the entire amount of $100,000 which was appropriated last year paid out in technical education grants?

Mr. ROGERS: Of the amount of $100,000 available, the following amounts were paid: To Nova Scotia, $22,261.24; to Manitoba, $14,099.12; to Saskatchewan, $21,533.73; or a total of $57,894.09. That expenditure was from April 1, 1936, to December 31, 1936.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacINNIS: How is this money paid? Is it paid on application by the educational department of the province? What are the conditions that must be fulfilled before the province may take advantage of it? I note that there was no payment to British Columbia, yet we have some very good technical schools in that province.

Mr. ROGERS: The explanation is this: the Technical Education Act provided for an appropriation over a period of years, that sum of money to be divided among the provinces on the basis of population. Not all the provinces took up the full allowance available to them under the act, which has been amended twice, the last amendment being made in 1934. That amendment simply provides that any portion of the $10,000,000 appropriated under the act which may remain unexpended at the expiration of the fiscal year ended the 31st day of March, 1934, whether previously carried forward or not, shall be carried forward and remain available according to its apportionment for the purposes of the act during any one or more of the five succeeding fiscal years, and no portion of the said $10,000,000 shall be paid to any province after the 31st day of March, 1939. So it is only in the case of a few provinces that the allowance is still made available under the section to which I have just referred.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much of the $10,000,000 is still unappropriated?

Mr. ROGERS: The total sum unappropriated is $369,536.24, and the appropriation from year to year has been put in at $100,000, for the very simple reason that this amount has been more than enough to cover the applications from the provinces which still have claims to make on that amount.

Mr. GREEN: Are any arrangements being made to call a conference with the provinces in order to try to work out some way of enacting this social legislation?

Mr. ROGERS: No arrangements have as yet been made. As my hon. friend is aware, the text of the decisions of the privy council was received only within the last day or so, and it appears in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day. The matter is receiving the consideration of the Department of Justice and also of the other departments particularly concerned, including the Department of Labour.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask if it is the intention to call such a conference?

Mr. ROGERS: I would prefer not to state at the moment, on my own authority, whether such a conference would be called. Obviously if it were called, that would be done by the government and not by the minister of a department.

Mr. GRAYDON: I assume I need not draw to the attention of the minister the great importance of the social legislation and its fate when it was brought before the judicial committee of the privy council some time ago. In almost every quarter where there is labour feeling, in my constituency and in other places throughout the province from which I come, the matter of the social legislation which was passed by the late government has assumed very great moment indeed.

I should like to point out to the minister, who I know has the matter in hand and who is very anxious that something concrete should be done, that this is one of the most important problems facing the government of the day. I would point out further that wherever you speak to the labouring men in industry or on the street, the same questions come up—the eight hour day and the minimum wage legislation. In the last week I have talked with many people employed in industry and they are very much concerned over the attitude of the government of the day with respect to the enacting of legislation of this kind on a permanent basis. The eight hour day, the question of minimum wages and the question of unemployment insurance in the dominion at large are matters that vitally concern the labouring people in Canada. I submit that something should be done at once to implement the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South a few moments ago, and that no time should be lost in calling a conference or at least in doing something along these lines, because the labouring people demand that the government shall do something worth while for them and do it quickly.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the minister by him the number of provinces that have already enacted the legislation mentioned here, with regard to limitation of hours and the minimum wage?

Mr. ROGERS: None of the provinces, to my knowledge, has enacted legislation precisely in these terms, and I have not before me a statement of the legislation respecting hours and minimum wages existing in the various provinces. Most of the provinces have statutes covering both hours and minimum wages, generally minimum wages only for women.

Mr. RYAN: Is there a fair wage officer in the maritime provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: The eastern representative, Mr. Quirk, whose office is at Montreal, covers a territory including the maritime provinces. He does this in the same way as the western representative with an office at Vancouver covers the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

Mr. RYAN: I would point out to the minister that the people of the maritimes are urging the appointment of a fair wage officer to be located in the maritime provinces. I appreciate the fact that the work is being done from Montreal and I have no particular criticism of the officer, but it has been brought to my attention at different times that there is a desire to have an officer appointed for the maritime provinces, to be located there, and I suggest that the most suitable place would be somewhere in New Brunswick, possibly Saint John.

Mr. ROGERS: Other suitable places have been suggested.

Mr. FINN: I may say for the information of the hon. member for St. John-Albert that there was a fair wage officer at Halifax and he was removed by the late administration. Mr. Quirk comes from Halifax and has always been most satisfactory in every respect. I am only too pleased to be able to make that statement. I do think that the minister, together with his deputy and his assistants, might take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, but I must add that I cannot endorse the idea that an officer should be moved from Halifax and the new appointee be located in Saint John.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Are there any employees working on government projects or in government offices more than eight hours a day or six days a week? I have been informed that there are individuals who do.

Mr. ROGERS: If there are any complaints of that kind I shall be glad to have them brought to my attention, and if they fall within the Fair Wage Act it is the duty of the Department of Labour to see that the matter is rectified. It may be that certain projects are excepted from the operation of the Fair Wage Act. The act itself provides for such exception by order in council, but from the information given by my hon. friend I am not able to say whether the eight hour day is being exceeded in any particular project.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The complaint made to me has reference to firemen working in the barracks in the city of Calgary. I was informed that they were working seven days a week and sometimes ten hours a day.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there more than two fair wage officers in Canada?

Mr. ROGERS: There are four in all.

Mr. BROOKS: Where are they located?

Mr. ROGERS: One in Vancouver, one in Toronto, one in Ottawa and one in Montreal.

Mr. BROOKS: Has any section of the dominion complained that it has not received proper attention from these officers?

Mr. ROGERS: There have been suggestions from time to time that there should be a fair wage officer resident in the maritime provinces. The matter referred to a moment ago by the hon. member for St. John-Albert has received the attention of the department, and we realize that there are some reasons—particularly the question of easy access in cases of dispute—which seem to recommend the appointment of a fair wage officer in the maritime provinces. On the other hand, we have not yet been convinced that the eastern representative is not able to work satisfactorily. It will be remembered that provision is now being made for the appointment of four junior conciliation officers, and with that addition to the staff it may be possible to meet the situation which we have been discussing.

Mr. MARSHALL: Under the act for the organization and coordination of employment services, what is the amount of the subventions paid to the various provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: I take it the hon. member wants to have the apportionment of the $150,000 among the various provinces?

Mr. MARSHALL: Yes.

Mr. FINN: The minister speaks of four special officers who are practically undersecretaries in his department, and I gather from what he has said that perhaps one of these might be assigned to the maritimes. Am I correct?

Mr. ROGERS: I think that might meet the situation.

Mr. FINN: I think the policy shall be to appoint as fair wage officer a person who is in contact with and has the viewpoint of the interests of the various sections of Canada and knows the industry in which labour is employed. Mr. Martin held that position at Halifax and his services were dispensed with by the late administration. The person appointed should be one who has knowledge of local conditions in the maritime provinces, if there is to be one for the three provinces, and is in sympathy with the industries there and with labour generally. When these juniors to be appointed have become acquainted with local conditions it might be wise—I do not say it would—to consider assigning them to these various duties, in order to keep down the expenditure of the department. But I concur in the view of the hon. member for St. John-Albert that at least a maritime man should be appointed who knows conditions there; that was the policy of the administration prior to 1930—and I suggest to the minister the viewpoint which has been expressed by the hon. member for St. John-Albert, and in which I believe my colleague the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor), who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment, would concur. I should be pleased to confer at any time with the minister and my colleague and any other hon. member from the maritime provinces to present our views and receive those of the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: I appreciate the offer of my hon. friend. I now have the information with respect to the apportionment of the $150,000 among the provinces for the maintenance of employment services. These figures are for the fiscal year 1935-36:

Nova Scotia	$ 4,040 13
New Brunswick	4,411 97
Quebec	32,035 04
Ontario	61,840 78
Manitoba	9,666 88
Saskatchewan	12,680 23
Alberta	11,678 60
British Columbia	13,646 37
	$150,000 00

The federal subvention amounts to about 31 per cent of the gross expenditure on employment services.

Mr. MARSHALL: Under what vote does the administration cost come?

Mr. ROGERS: The administration cost of the headquarters office in Ottawa comes under vote 177 which passed the committee on Monday last.

Item agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 19, for the protection of the Dionne quintuplets.—Mr. Gray.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT—PROBABLE DATE OF BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) if it is likely that the trade agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada will be laid upon the table before the budget is presented, and also if he is in a position to give us any indication as to when we may expect the budget in the event of the trade agreement not being presented before the budget is brought down.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): It is a little early to determine that. The trade agreement has not yet been finally completed. I shall endeavour to give the house as soon as possible information as to the time of presentation of the budget and also with respect to the trade agreement.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, February 11, consideration in committee of Bill No. 18, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Duties of committees.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, I took advantage of the over-night adjournment to have the departmental officials and the law clerks go over the discussion which took place last evening and make suggestions as to what they thought might de done to meet the proposals then made. The chief law clerk advises that in order to clarify the position the word "advisory" should be added to sections 3 and 4 of the act. The addition of this word will make it perfectly clear that these committees are not charged with administration. Subsection 1 of section 3 of the act would then read, "The governor in council may establish one or more advisory committees. . ." The word "advisory" should be added in subsection 2 before the word "committee." In section 4 of the act the word "advisory" should precede the word "committees" wherever it occurs.

In further explanation of what was said last evening I may say that the original advisory committee found it advisable to have other committees set up. One committee was instituted to advise in connection with water work, another to advise in connection with regrassing, and so on. The committee found it preferable to have this more or less expert advice on these matters. I am informed that the main committee met only twice, once in May and again in December of 1935—that is, one under the previous government and one under the present government. The real work that was based on the discussions that took place there was carried out by these subcommittees which we hope to establish in some legal position by an amendment to the act. It is intended that these committees shall be advisory in the same sense that the original committee is advisory. I would suggest, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that these amendments be made to the bill, adding the word "advisory," at the places indicated. I am sorry that the typewritten recommendation has not yet reached my desk, but I expect it here at any moment.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I had thought out certain amendments which I believed would meet what the minister stated was his purpose last evening.

First we must take it that he proposes to abolish the present advisory committee. I submit respectfully that that is a mistake. I should like to have placed upon Hansard the names of those who comprise that committee as it now is. I mentioned it yesterday, and the minister stated that he did not have the names then, but perhaps he will place them on Hansard this afternoon. I think it is a great mistake to destroy this committee. The minister says he may reappoint it, but why abolish what you may reappoint? That seems to be a reasonable question.

I have in my hands the report made under the provisions of the statute of 1935 which was filed on the Friday preceding the day I came into the house, which perhaps accounts for my not having seen it before. I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I say that this is a report signed by nobody and addressed to nobody, and it is a little difficult to treat it as a proper report of the kind that should be made under the act. It is headed, "Report of the work conducted under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act for the fiscal year 1935-36," and after citing the act it proceeds as follows:

Administration of this act is vested in the federal Minister of Agriculture, who is assisted by an advisory committee appointed by order in council. The advisory committee comprises representatives of farming, ranching, financial and railway interests in the affected areas, as well as officials of governments of the dominion and of the provinces concerned. The function of the advisory committee is to suggest measures to the minister for the rehabilitation of drought and soil drifting areas. Detailed organization and supervision of work under the act is largely performed by the dominion experimental farms.

In view of that paragraph in the report, I ask this committee whether they think it is quite fair to put this work in the hands of Mr. Vallance. Mr. Vallance was a member of this house. His strong predilections are so well known that it is not beyond reason to say that he could not go into any community and remain there longer than a few hours without discussing politics. That is not unfair, but I shall not say more than that in his absence. He has no peculiar qualifications for this position, and he is being paid the equivalent of the indemnity of a member of parliament, he having been a member of the last house. I submit that whatever we should do, we certainly should take out any thought of there being anything of a political flavour to the administration under this bill, and it is impossible to do that with Mr. Vallance at the head of it—absolutely impossible; and what is more, there is no member of this house who was here in Mr. Vallance's day that does not know it. He has told us on several occasions that he was born in Scotland, which of course is a great asset, a very great asset in Canada; but the knowledge he has of these areas is problematical, in view of his own statements from time to time, because he lived in a section of the country that is not concerned or has very little concern with this—

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Right in the drought area.

Mr. BENNETT: Swift Current is, but how much of Battleford was in that area?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Practically all of it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: It is all in it, every bit of it.

Mr. BENNETT: We will assume he is familiar with his own locality. Now I take the minister's own statement—these are the words in the report:

Detailed organization and supervision of work under the act is largely performed by the dominion experimental farms.

What is more, this report contains details of what apparently the dominion experimental farm people were doing. I put this to the committee: is it fair to the people of Canada who are to spend millions of dollars in rehabilitation that a very strong partisan should be placed in charge of this work? Remember this: the preceding government had to deal with it, and whom did they put in charge? They took the manager of the experimental farm at Swift Current, so that those who had to provide the money would feel at least that there was no political flavour to the administration.

I confess to having a great liking for Mr. Vallance personally, as many others have; but as to his fitness for this position it is quite inconceivable that anybody would seriously consider it. He could not go into any community without talking politics. He is so constituted that he cannot help it. I am not saying that to his detriment at all, because it shows a lively interest in public concerns; but it does not indicate any fitness for this job, and that is the reason that the preceding government placed the administration in the hands of the experimental farm manager at Swift Current. I do submit that to appoint Mr. Vallance to this position at $4,000 a year is to give a blow to the efficiency of the administration of this act right at the start. It is now under suspicion; it was the minute Mr. Vallance was appointed, and will continue to be, and that is unfair to the people who have to find the money. The press this morning suggests that the minister expects to get $3,000,000 for next year. When the $3,000,000 is provided, the gentleman who is to be at the head of its administration is one whose offensive political observations in this house have been of such a character that certainly he is not entitled to great confidence on the part of many people. The people in the area affected are not all of one political faith; they are people with differing political views. I put that to the government.

After a statement of the general drought conditions, the report continues at page 2:

Under the rehabilitation program which has been inaugurated in accordance with the terms of this act, efforts are being made to effect improvements in farming practices and land utilization. An essential feature of this work is the encouragement given to farmers to solve their own drought and soil drifting problems by community cooperative action, with a minimum of material and financial assistance from governmental sources. For this reason the rehabilitation program is largely demonstrational and fact finding, with the object of supplying leadership and guidance for permanent readjustment of agriculture in the affected area rather than to provide temporary assistance during the continuance of the existing conditions.

With the foregoing general aims in view, measures are being introduced throughout the drought and soil drifting areas to secure the most economical utilization of soil moisture for crops, to prevent soil drifting and to reclaim abandoned farm land for its most suitable use in either crop production or grazing. Drought resistant grasses, with soil binding properties, are being used for the production of hay or pasture on areas of land which are unsuitable for grain production. Regrassing work of this nature is especially timely in the semi-arid areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta in view of the present trend towards grazing on these areas. Tree planting as a measure of soil drifting control is being conducted on a large scale, both for demonstrational and experimental purposes. Throughtout this work considerable attention is being given to the economic aspects.

That is a record, not a prospectus. The minister indicates his prospectus, but this is the record which the minister places before the house of what has been done, not of what is to be done. On that state of facts it is shown by the record that we have been able to do this with the aid of this advisory committee.

I would ask the committee to look at the closing paragraph on that page:

An important part of the rehabilitation program is the development of surface water resources for stock watering purposes, and for the production of reserve supplies of feed under irrigation.

In connection with all phases of this program a considerable amount of investigational work is in progress, while the demonstrational projects have valuable fact-finding qualities.

The various rehabilitation measures in use, and the agencies through which they are being introduced, are described below, together with some reference to the progress made during the fiscal year 1935-36.

Then follows the record of all these proceedings. Here are the words:

During 1935 thirty-nine district experiment substations were established at strategic points in the affected area of the prairie provinces. The location by general districts of the various substations is shown in the following list.

Then follows the list: southwestern Manitoba, three Goodlands, Lyleton, and Pipestone; southeastern Saskatchewan, Alameda, Avonlea, Radville, Strasbourg, Weyburn; southwestern Saskatchewan, Canuck, Carmichael, Fox Valley, Limerick, Lisieux, Parkbeg, Tompkins, Tugaske, Valjean, Gravelbourg, Herbert, Kincaid, Piapot, Riverhurst, Shaunavon, Willow Bunch; central Saskatchewan, Dunblane, Guernsey, Juniata, Kindersley, Loverna, Rosetown; southern Alberta, Bindloss, Castor, Cessford, Consort, Foremost, Lomond, Whitla, Youngstown, and Pincher Creek.

Inasmuch as the district experiment substations serve as the principal means of introducing the best measures of drought and soil drifting control, and of determining the relative value of different measures in various districts, the work of these stations is described below in some detail.

After which follows several pages giving in detail the work that has been accomplished.

Then follows reclamation projects and these projects are referred to at great length—at Melita, at Mortlach, and at Kerrobert; and as to the agricultural improvement associations, what has been done is set out in some detail.

There follows what I conceive to be most important, in view of what the minister said yesterday—this is his report, not mine—on page 10: "Agricultural improvement associations under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act as of March 31, 1936." That was nearly a year ago, and here is the statement of the improvement associations that existed then. Presumably there are many more now. There was no amendment of the act at that time. In Manitoba there are associations at Goodlands, Lyleton, Medora, Pierson, and Reston. In Saskatchewan there are associations at Aneroid, Beechy, Ceylon, Chaplin, Estevan, Gull Lake, Hazenmore, Herbert, Kincaid, Lafleche, Limerick, Lucky Lake, Macrorie, Maple Creek, Meyronne, Minton, Moose Jaw, Mortlach, Orkney, Shamrock, Shaunavon, Sidewood, Tugaske, Valor, and Weyburn. In Alberta there is the Argyle-Clear Lake agricultural improvement association.

We then come to grass seed production. The question was asked yesterday what was intended to be done. Here is the record, not of what was intended to be done, but what was done, in respect to grass seed production:

During the fiscal year the following quantities of seed were supplied for various rehabilitation projects:

	Pounds
Crested wheat grass	86,384
Brome grass	25,760
Western rye grass	8,190
Sweet clover	35,000
Alfalfa	7,230
Alsike clover	500
Timothy	1,000
Reed canary grass	500

Here is a record of achievement under this act that I consider to have been a fulfilment of the purposes for which it was enacted.

Then there is a reference to seed and clover, where it came from, and the conditions under which it was produced:

In order to determine the best methods of seeding perennial grasses and legumes seeding experiments are being conducted by the dominion forage crops laboratory at Saskatoon, in cooperation with a number of farmers in that district. In these experiments grasses and legumes were seeded at different dates on light soils both broadcast and drilled, with and without cultural treatments. While the results secured during 1935 were not sufficiently conclusive to enable recommendations to be made, they provide some valuable guidance for future investigations.

Tree planting is then dealt with, and one is amazed at the very large effort—much greater than one would have expected—that has been put forward in that regard, in the distribution of seedlings. Reference is then made to the field crop shelter belt association,—all these under this act; all in actual operation:

These associations have been formed by farmers in selected districts where it is desired to establish demonstration field shelters in order to determine their effect in checking soil drifting and conserving soil moisture. Each member of an association undertakes to plant field shelter belts on his farm with the assistance and under the supervision of the tree planting division.

Then there is a reference to the Conquest field crop shelter belt association:

It was organized in January, 1935, and subsequently brought under the operation of the Rehabilitation Act. By March 31, 1936, this association comprised twenty-seven members representing a farming area of 51,840 acres. During 1935 over 80,000 trees were planted in shelter belts in this area, and preparations were made to plant 372,200 trees in the spring of 1936.

A statement follows of what has been done with regard to soil research and soil survey. I consider the matter of soil survey to be so important as to warrant a few observations with respect to it. One of the very richest of the station owners in Australia left his large fortune, or a substantial part of it, to establish a laboratory for the purpose of providing a survey of the soils of western Australia,—the Waite institute. It is presided over at the present time by Doctor Richardson, who has visited this country and with whom our research department is in close consultation. A complete soil survey map of Australia is being prepared to determine what parts are capable of being used for the production of crops of grain and what parts are fit only for grazing and for the raising of cattle and sheep. Observe now what we are doing here, and I think this is one of the most important observations in this report:

The object of soil survey work is to determine the nature, extent, and location of various types of soil, with special reference to their crop producing capacities. This work, in addition to being of fundamental value in soil research work, is particularly useful in the formulation of land utilization policies and for the guidance of farmers and prospective settlers.

For a number of years soil surveys have been conducted in each of the prairie provinces under the direction of the provincial universities. Under the rehabilitation program soil survey work throughout the drought area is being accelerated by the provincial universities and the dominion experimental farms.

During 1935 the department of soils of the University of Manitoba conducted a soil survey of 1,774,080 acres of land in the southwestern part of the province. The area surveyed consisted of townships one to seven inclusive in ranges 19 to 29 west of the prime meridian. This survey covers the principal drought and soil drifting area in Manitoba.

Then follows a reference to what has been done in Saskatchewan through the soils department of the university of Saskatchewan; and these words, on page 17, are important:

This map is the result of work done during several years prior to and including 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Since 1926, in fact.

Mr. BENNETT: I will read it.

A reconnaissance soil map of the southern part of Saskatchewan, with a descriptive report, was prepared during 1935 for publication by the soils department of the university of Saskatchewan. This map is the result of work done during several years prior to and including 1935. The area covered by this survey, consisting of more than 60 million acres of land or about two-fifths of the total land area of the province, extends from the international boundary to township 48, and includes practically all of the settled agricultural land in the province.

Mr. DUNNING: For the information of my right hon. friend I may tell him that that work was done as a result of the establishment by the province of Saskatchewan a number of years ago of a fund at the disposal of the university as an endowment for that specific purpose, the moneys used being a surplus accruing to the province from the operations of the 1919 wheat board. The work has been going on for quite a number of years. The sixty million acres referred to really represent the accumulation of the work.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I have read from the report of the minister's colleague. The report of the Minister of Agriculture is a report under this act, and I assume when he states that the map was prepared in 1935 he is stating the fact.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, the map, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This sixty million acres is—

> . . . about two-fifths of the total land area of the province, extends from the international boundary to township 48, and includes practically all of the settled agricultural land in the province. Further soil survey work in Saskatchewan will consist of reconnaissance surveys in the northern part of the province, and detailed surveys of problem areas in the south.

In Alberta, it is stated, they have already surveyed 921,600 acres located in townships 1 to 8, in ranges 1 to 5, west of the fourth meridian.

> In this work special attention is being given to blowout and drifting areas.

Then follows a report on the economic survey—all under the provisions of this act:

> A comprehensive study of land utilization in Saskatchewan and Alberta is being conducted as a part of the prairie farm rehabilitation program by the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture with the cooperation of the department of farm management of the university of Saskatchewan and the provincial department of agriculture in Alberta.

Passing on, we find a complete report on water development and hygrometric survey in the western provinces, and, at page 21, a summary of the expenditures that were made for these purposes. The appendix is another important part of the report. It shows the progress of water development under the supplementary Public Works Construction Act of 1935 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, and the various projects are dealt with in detail, including the expenditure that was made in connection with the Canada land irrigation project. But the important point is that this work has been carried on—

> . . . Under the appropriation that was made under the Public Works Construction Act of 1935 and under the terms of the supplementary Public Works Construction Act, 1935—item 6, western conservation works—the sum of $500,000 was made available for the construction of water development projects in the prairie provinces. This sum is being used in the construction of large agricultural water development projects in the drought areas as part of the rehabilitation program while small water development projects are cared for under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Engineering services for both large and small projects are provided for under the latter act. Administration of this fund is through the water development committee under the dominion experimental farms of the Department of Agriculture.

Then there is a report on the progress of water development work in 1935, and a statement with regard to the large schemes dealt with:

> Community irrigation projects:
> Val Marie irrigation project, Sask.
> Eastend irrigation project, Sask.
> Wild Horse storage dam, Alta.
> Middle Creek storage reservoir, Sask.
> Community water storage projects:
> Souris dam, Man.
> Crystal City dam, Man.
> Rural municipality of Edward, Man.
>
> Drainage projects:
> Municipality of Lajord reclamation project, Sask.
> Rehabilitation of existing projects:
> Eastern irrigation district, Alta.
> Canada Land and Irrigation Company, Alta.
> Water development projects for 1936.
> Adams Lake dam, Sask.
> Wood River storage dams, Sask.
> Red Deer experimental gas well, Alta.

Details follow as to the works done with respect to each of these, and, finally, a statement of cost. That report, as I say, was tabled by the minister under the provisions of the act, and it brings us only to March 31, 1936. Since that time nearly a year has passed, and, as the report indicates, much work that was then in progress was to be continued during the year 1936; so that I assume, for the purposes of my observations, that the work has been carried forward. I therefore suggest that the inevitable conclusion at which one must arrive is that the act has been found satisfactory, otherwise these vast undertakings would not have been carried out. Consequently there must be some good reason why, by statute, we are abolishing this advisory committee, and that reason I have not yet received. I asked yesterday whether some reason could be given, and I had in mind an amendment which I might have suggested, though I knew that if I proposed an amendment it would be simply courting and inviting its rejection. I merely suggest, however, that the existing section should stand and that there should be added a second section which would provide for the setting up of local committees and associations. But that can be done under the section that deals with regulations, and it has been done. Here is the report of the minister, who does not suggest a single difficulty in the operation of the act—not one. Nor does anyone else make any such suggestion in writing. Mr. Vallance does not offer a report complaining of inefficiency, nor does any one else complain of the inadequacy of the act. We have, therefore, an act that brings its operations to the end of March, 1936, indicating that it has been highly successful and that operations have been carried on with respect to every matter that is mentioned in it. I therefore suggest that the proper course would have been to leave the advisory committee alone—because, if it is found unsatisfactory, the minister can abolish it by order in council—and to add another section to provide for the appointment, if the minister so desires, of local committees charged with responsibility for matters in connection with local associations, agricultural and otherwise. But I need only point out, in answer to that, that they have already functioned under this act, that the regulatory power is broad enough to permit of this; and I have taken all the time I have in dealing with this matter for one reason and one reason only. I am not personally concerned about it, but I am vitally concerned that there should not be created in this country a body of public opinion that looks upon this effort as one that is political in character. I speak feelingly because the late government set it up. The late government initiated the statute and we appointed as chairman a gentleman who was charged with responsibility for the administration of the experimental farm at Swift Current, a man who was out of active politics. We placed in authority one who, at least, would carry the confidence of all those who were concerned.

It might well be desired, so far as the advisory committee is concerned, to improve or alter the personnel; it might be desired to amplify it in many ways. I am not concerned about that. But clear it is, on that report which was tabled the day after the house opened, Friday, and coming from the Minister of Agriculture, that up to March 31, 1936, a variety of operations had been carried on under the act, and I think it would satisfy most of us that it was better than had been suggested. But, mark you, the change in chairmanship from the manager of the experimental farm at Swift Current to Mr. Vallance has not been calculated to improve public confidence in the undertaking, and it is not calculated to inspire confidence on the part of the people of eastern Canada who will have to provide largely the money which the minister asks for. It will not enhance in their minds the disinterestedness of this legislation, which, for some reason that has not been given us, abolishes the advisory board, whose report is there without complaint from the minister, and substitutes by way of amendment sections providing for smaller committees—though in that respect I offer not the slightest objection if the minister thinks they are desirable. But one would have thought, when this report was prepared, that there would be some indication that there had been a failure of power on the part of those charged with responsibility, or that there had been inadequacy of authority, or that there had been some other want that had to be supplied by legislation. Nothing of the sort appears, however; and, stripped of everything, the bill that is now before the house is one that wipes out of existence the advisory committee and, as amended, authorizes the continuance of an advisory committee and the appointment of local committees—something that has been done during the last fifteen or eighteen months. And persumably it was done under the regulatory section; for, as I explained yesterday, the act was drawn in the most comprehensive and general terms because it was deemed inadvisable to particularize having regard to conditions existing in western Canada, inasmuch as that would be greatly detrimental to the efficiency of the act. The largest power of expansion was therefore provided for by regulation and otherwise; and this report, whatever else may be said about it, is a complete vindication of the character of the work under the provisions of the statute.

I had hoped that possibly the minister might be content to leave the advisory committee as it is, having power as he has to change it by order in council if he so desires, and to add to his bill a section providing for the appointment of additional committees from time to time if that were desirable. As to the suggestion of permanency of policy and continuity and stability, I am quite content with any language that may be employed for that purpose which expresses the idea indicated by the Minister of Finance yesterday, namely, that as projects are studied and their cost estimated the governor in council could appropriate out of the sums which have been provided for that purpose sufficient money to enable these named projects to be carried forward to completion.

If anyone, Mr. Chairman, supposes it is an easy thing to stand up and talk about this matter for the length of time I have, and that it is done merely for the purpose of talking, he is greatly mistaken. I desire to assure this committee that I have only one object in doing so. Having gone to western Canada some forty years ago last month, and being vitally concerned in everything that affects the welfare of the people who will live there long after I am gone, I have made these suggestions because I feel that this is a retrograde movement, rendering less efficient something which has been proven by the minister's own report to be highly efficient; and what is more I regret that it indicates an atmosphere, a tendency that I should like to see avoided. And I hope hon. members will believe me when I say that when we had to appoint a chairman they can have no conception of the number of people who would have liked to be appointed; for there are Vallances in all parties. But the man who was appointed was in the public service, one who according to the report of the minister, having to do with a demonstration farm, was the best suited and fitted to do that work. We therefore avoided any political aspect, although I am afraid we displeased greatly men who felt that they had claims. They were not then defeated candidates, nor had they been in the last House of Commons, but they had qualifications equal to those of the gentleman who now presides over this organization. I had hoped it would not be necessary to put a violent partisan into this position. I can speak with some degree of feeling about it, because we took steps to avoid doing it, and having taken those steps naturally I regret the course which has been taken in connection with this matter. I cannot usefully say anything more in respect to it; the government has the power to pass this legislation. But I want placed upon Hansard the names of the advisory committee, in order that there may be some understanding of what is meant by the minister when he says in the opening paragraph of his report that he was assisted by an advisory committee appointed by order in council comprising representatives of farming, ranching, financial and railway interests in the affected areas, as well as officials of governments of the dominion and of the provinces concerned. Just who they are who are now to be deprived of these non-remunerative but highly serviceable positions I think should be placed upon Hansard.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped last night, having gone as far as I did to try to meet what I considered to be the very trivial objection raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), that when we came back to-day, having met him at least half way, we should be treated to a discussion of the legislation on its merits rather than have to listen for half an hour to the right hon. gentleman who I think protests a little too much about his own political purity. Having listened to the speech which we have just heard I think it would be well to place before the committee the full record indicating how this committee was set up in the first place, when and how often it functioned, and what was done before the committee was set up at all.

Towards the end of 1934, I think in December, the premier of Manitoba addressed clubs in eastern and western Canada proposing a scheme for the rehabilitation of the drought area of western Canada. In those addresses he suggested everything that is included in the powers given under the act which was eventually passed in this house, and a number of things which are not contained in that legislation. On the suggestion of the premier of Manitoba I called a meeting in Saskatoon and invited to that meeting representatives of the governments of Alberta and Manitoba, and took with me to the conference the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan. We met in the early part of January, discussed the drought situation, and listened particularly to the representations which the premier of Manitoba had made in these addresses and wished to present to the governments of the three prairie provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: That was in 1935?

Mr. GARDINER: That was in January, 1935. On January 19 I wired the Minister of Agriculture of Canada in these words:

> Three prairie premiers meeting a week ago decided to hold meeting of committee of six, two from each province, some day before February 7 to discuss drought and arrange for compilation of all information available re soil, climate, etc. All are anxious Ottawa have two representatives. Could you suggest a date when you could be represented in Regina? Writing.

On the same day I wrote the following letter to the Minister of Agriculture:

> I sent you a telegram this morning which reads as follows:

And then I quoted the telegram.

> A week ago to-day Mr. Reid,—

Who was then premier of Alberta.

> —Mr. Bracken and I met in Saskatoon and discussed the possibility of setting up a committee which would give special attention to having all information available with regard to the dry area of the west compiled at the earliest possible date.
> A committee was set up consisting of the three premiers and the three ministers of agriculture of the western provinces, and it was decided that we ask the federal government to be represented on the committee by two. We are desirous of having the first meeting of this committee some time before February 7, and would like to invite your government to have two representatives appointed who would be members of the committee.

It is the intention of this committee to arrange for the expenditure of a small amount of money to be used for the purpose of getting together in one place all of the information available with regard to the dried-out area pertaining to climate, soil, tree planting, the growth of grasses and all other information available from any source with regard to the area itself. It is also our intention to have compiled all the information available with regard to surrounding areas similarly affected, particularly on the American side, with a view to laying the foundations for systematic endeavour towards a solution of the drought problem in the three provinces.

It was thought that if each of the governments were to put up $5,000 towards the clerical work involved and the federal would put up an equal amount, namely $15,000, the sum thus set up would cover all the necessary expenses.

That is, the necessary expenses of compiling the information.

We would like therefore to invite the federal government to join us on this committee through representative whom they would appoint, to have them assist in the financing of the work and to lend every assistance possible in connection with getting the records completed.

I trust that you will be able to set a date when it will be possible for your representatives to be present.

Now, I had a reply to that dated January 22. It is very short and very concise:

Ottawa, Ontario,
January 22, 1935.

Hon. J. G. Gardiner,
Premier Saskatchewan,
Regina, Sask.

Re tel appreciate your wiring agenda suggested meeting re drought conditions.
